Toh 427 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in Sanskrit as the Rigi Ārali Tantra Rāja, in Tibetan as the Rigi Āralī Gyü Gyelpo, and in English as The King of Tantras Called the Rigi Āralī. It belongs to the class of Buddhist tantric texts and takes the form of a dialogue set in a visionary sacred context, in which the female deity Ārali poses questions to Rigi, a supreme lord of yoga, concerning the nature of abodes, fields, and related esoteric categories of tantric practice. The text opens in the classic sūtra-style with the Buddha dwelling in a non-dual meditative state, framing what follows as a revealed teaching within the tantric tradition. Translated into Tibetan from the Indian original by the monk Śākyayeśes working with the Indian master Kāyasthapagayadhara, it is preserved in the Kangyur as Toh 427 among the tantric scriptures.

This was translated from the mouth of the Indian master Kāyasthapagayadhara, and rendered, edited, and established by the Tibetan translator, the monk Śākyayeśes.

In the Indian language: Rigi Ārali Tantra Rāja Nāma. In the Tibetan language: The King of Tantras Called the Rigi Āralī.

Homage to the glorious vajra ḍākinī.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One was dwelling in the evam-vow in the form of Rigi.

In the yoga of the non-dual two,

Ārali and Rigi are discerned.

Rigi, lord of yoga, is supreme.

To her Ārali put this question:

"How many kinds of abodes are there?

Into how many kinds do the near-abodes become?

How many kinds of fields are declared therein, and how many kinds of near-fields are spoken?

How many kinds of chandas are stated, and how many kinds of near-chandas?

What is the assembly therein, and likewise what is the near-assembly?

How many kinds of charnel grounds are there,
and how are the near-charnel grounds arranged?
Therein the goddess Rigi the great,
dwelling in great yoga as a yoginī, having clearly opened the ten grounds
so that Ārali may easily understand:"

"The abode is Pūrvavideha in the east.
Likewise the abode is Aparagodānīya.
The abode is Uttarakuru in the north.
The abode likewise is Jambudvīpa.
To the four continents, four goddesses,
and Rigi abides at the summit of Mount Meru.
Through union with Ārali,
from the non-dual union of the two,
Sisā, the wand of desire,
and the great-bliss vow-woman:
she is renowned as green, yellow, madder-red,
and red.
She has one face and two hands;
in the right she holds a curved knife,
in the left the yoginī's skull-cup.
She is naked, with hair loose and unbound.

Ārali's body is black.
Ārali has three eyes and six hands.
Rigi is blue with three eyes.
With two hands she brandishes lasso and iron hook, and with the two vajra-ārali hands
she embraces Rigi's spiritual friend.
In the two right hands are discerned the vajra and the bell.
In the others are an axe and a head held by its hair.

The abodes are the mind-abode and the near-abode;
earth, water, fire, and wind.
Here again four forms of the goddess,
their colors distinguished as above:

fierce, sharp, and greatly illusory, lofty, at the wheel of speech.

The eastern gate is likewise the field;
the near-field is in the south.

Chandaha is the gate of the west;
near-chandaha is in the north.

The fox, the buffalo,
the banner of Hayagrīva and the elephant-king:
these at the gates and at each gate,
their colors distinguished as above.

At the intervals of the wheel of speech:
the assembly and the near-assembly.

At the intervals of the wheel of body:
the charnel ground and the near-charnel ground.

At the intervals of the wheel of body and speech:
the hell realms are ever drawn.

On the body: four cold things;
on speech: likewise four hot things.

This concludes the first chapter, the union of Rigi and Āralī.

The goddess Rigi of great compassion —

Ārali herself put the question:

"How are the eight hells visualized at the eight intervals of the wheel?"

Rigi declared: "Whatever mass of sentient beings is gathered together — those born from eggs, born from wombs, born from warmth and moisture, born by miraculous apparition, those with form, those without form, those with perception, and those without perception — all of them will be scorched in the Ārali hell. With a mind aimed at consuming them, one should abide in evam.

Having meditated on emptiness, one should then visualize hūṃ at the heart.
From hūṃ arises the lord of the diverse families.

From the vajra, Ārali herself becomes the very element.

What is the use of saying much?
In the form of evam, most secret —"

The buddhas, the precious ones — gathered at the tip — become the perfect maṇḍala.

Oṃ āra li ri gi pheṃ pheṃ pheṃ bhyo svāhā.

Now the rite of causing rain to fall shall be explained. Take the lord of the earth; let the skilled one prepare the vessel of wealth. Place a skull set with clarified butter and fill it with the milk of a cow. Having filled it by means of that practice, bind it firmly with a black cord. Go by oneself to the bank of a river; and by means of the Rigi Ārali practice, if the mantra-practitioner recites the mantra ten thousand times, the nāgas are stirred and rain falls.

The rite of dream activity shall be explained. Beneath the yogin's own bed, mix together the sap of the datura plant and charcoal from a charnel ground. With a pen made from the quill of an owl, write the name of the one to be accomplished on a red cloth bound with a corpse. Then let a yoginī sit there and recite Ārali ten thousand times.

Oṃ āra li ri gi pheṃ, amukhike, māme daṃ svabnaṃ darśaya bhyo svāhā.

The rite of drawing an echo from a cliff shall be explained. Having searched out and examined the ear of the cliff, place a ball of something in front of it. By means of the Rigi Ārali practice, block the ball of breath. Then, with the needle mudrā as the beak, the one who first acts with the tongue — just as with a ball of heat — the wise one draws in the great bee. The second needle mudrā: slowly squeeze the throat-hair completely. The rite of entering shall be fully and correctly explained. Looking at the form of the one to be joined, visualizing oneself in the form of Rigi, by means of the Rigi Ārali practice, meditate on the head as turned downward.

Oṃ vajra āra li phaṭ ya to ta ya pheṃ pheṃ svāhā.

The rite of causing paralysis shall be explained. On the tongue of the enemy himself, visualize a ball of molasses.

Oṃ ri gi ghuṭṭha ghuṭṭha śa hūṃ phaṭ.

The rite of causing diarrhea shall be fully explained. Make an effigy using the impurity of the enemy. Bind it with that one's hair. Fill its mouth with three hot substances and place the effigy mouth downward.

Oṃ āra li māme amukhāṃ kām kām kām saraya phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

For the rite of bringing under power: in one's own left eye, visualize evam fully. In that one's right eye, visualize the form of blazing vajras. The practice that unifies these two — by means of the Rigi Ārali practice — brings the beautiful one under power.

One should protect oneself, purify the place, introduce the wisdom wheel, bless the mind and so forth, arrange the limbs, likewise confer the empowerment of the deity, and cause the mantras of the goddesses to arise — all of this is always done by Ārali.

Oṃ āḥ hūṃ — bless!

These very three give rise to the three families.

All is accomplished through blessing.

All rites bestow virtue most excellently.

From the seed at the center of one's heart, summon Ārali with an iron hook, and draw in the wisdom wheel. Having drawn it in, bind it firmly.

Ḍṛḍho me bhava. Sutuṣyo me bhava. Anurakto me bhava. Sarvasiddhi mme prayaccha. Ehyehi bhagavanti ri svāhā.

At the crown, the heart, and likewise the throat, at the navel and the secret place — by the practice of the lasso mudrā, bind firmly and so on.

Ha ha hi hi, and likewise hu hu ho ho — at the eight places of the body, the limbs are to be arranged. At the crown, the armpits, the navel, the mouth, both eyes, the soles of the feet, and the secret place — the arrangement of the limbs is well established. The mantra is indicated in sequence. From all the pores of the hands, cause the light-rays of Rigi to radiate. Then, having fully applied the iron-hook mudrā, afterward gather them back in.

Rigi hūṃ saṃ kaṃ maṃ saṃ — these are renowned as the wheel of mind.

Ghaṃ tāṃ maṃ yuṃ — these are renowned as the wheel of speech.

Jaṃ maṃ hāṃ kaṃ aṃ — these are renowned as the wheel of body.

The recitation of the mantra of Rigi is to be indicated in sequence. From one's own heart, light-rays arise. By fully applying the iron-hook mudrā, the perfect buddhas dwelling in the ten directions are invoked, and having made offerings with the desired ritual, the empowerment is to be received by one who possesses discernment.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata ḍākinī anugata mahā abhiṣeka anudhanu —

The vase filled with the five nectars, bearing the nature of the five buddhas, is used to confer empowerment upon the deities. From that very empowerment of the deities comes bliss itself.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata ḍākinī abhiṣika vajra svabhāvātmako'ham —

By means of the seed syllable of fire in the shape of a triangle, one is to meditate fully on the illuminator, Vairocana. From the hūṃ at the heart, the identity of the lord of the family arises, and that very reality is transformed there. Then everything arising from the vajra becomes the vajra tent and its enclosure. In the abode of Rigi Ārali, one is to protect oneself always. The network of ḍākinīs residing in the three tiers of the maṇḍala of eight charnel grounds made of skulls is bound together — the wheel is turned to the right. The Ārali with the left foot extended presses down upon Sems kyi 'jigs byed, visibly riding the Rigi tree, the feet encircling the feet. All the yoginīs stand at the skulls, stationed in the directions with dancing feet. Through the clear distinction of heat and cold, the eight skulls are at the boundaries.

This concludes the second chapter of the general introduction, entitled "The Perfect Gathering of All Activities."

Rigi Ārali then asked: What are the various kinds of signs? Thereupon the goddess Rigi's Dharma of signs was again most joyfully explained. The ten great signs are to be preceded by self-identification. If, by mere consciousness alone, one who is a practitioner wishes to attain accomplishment, the place is considered to be behind the forehead. The proximate location is that very adjacent place. The knees will move to the chandor. The chandor proximate to the forehead is itself near. The right hand is the place of gathering. The left is the proximate place of gathering. The right ear is the charnel ground. The left is the proximate charnel ground. The heart becomes the pure field itself. The remainder is the proximate field. One should always look to the pleasant, joyful marketplace and the home of the Mātṛkā. Signs are to be understood. One's own marks are displayed by oneself. Pills, eye-medicine, and the like will ripen most excellently.

Then Ārali asked the goddess: What is the nature of supreme wisdom, by which a practitioner, through mere consciousness alone, will attain accomplishment and, for the sake of the fruit, will attain awakening?

The meditative absorption of the goddess Rigi is supreme great bliss itself, arising from the churning and that which does the churning. The omniscient wisdom arises genuinely. All mental activity is completely abandoned. All sense faculties are to be reversed. In a solitary and secluded place, all dualities whatsoever are fully abandoned. When the eyes are rolled upward and the mind is focused between the eyebrows, the practitioner will first see it in the form of inexhaustible darkness. Afterward it is directed to the left ear, and it will gradually begin to stir. Whatever bliss is present in the limbs, the great seal likewise is bliss. The outer seal naturally dissolves, and with it the wisdom dissolves as well. Because of realizing great bliss, the wisdom of that is the seal. This very thing is great wisdom itself, whose nature is self-knowing awareness. Just as the joy of a young person cannot be expressed in other words, so too this cannot be spoken of to others.

This yoga of innate co-emergence — with the mind that supplicates for sentient beings and with compassion for all sentient beings — is the chief of all yogas. The yogin who is practiced in this, with a mind equal to space, through the yoga of great compassionate power —

In this there is no doubt: accomplishment will come.

First, darkness will appear.

Second, white light and smoke arise.

Third, it is like a carried flame.

Fourth, it is like the flower of the yak.

Fifth, there is cloudless wisdom — setting aside awareness of self and other in their usual forms — like a cloudless sky.

That which is cloudless: this is the cause of omniscience.

Through the yoga of constant cultivation, with one-pointed mind, one becomes Rigi.

By always drinking the nectar of wisdom, hunger does not overcome one,
nor does thirst overcome one.

One is not tormented by old age or illness.

Through this yoga of skillful means,
all of Rigi becomes fully known.

Then the great yogin, Āraḷī herself, clasping him tightly in embrace,
humbly besought Rigi:

"What does Evaṃmayā declare?

By the form of the E, it is declared as earth.

By the form of Vaṃ, likewise, water.

Ma, it is said, is fire.

By the form of Yā, it is taught as wind."

"What vow does Rigi declare?"

Rigi declared: "To the ḍākinī Rigi it is said:

this vow that has become supreme —

Rigi's Evaṃ vow —

resides in the form of Evaṃ at the ear.

At the very tip of Rigi's nose, forever abides Rigi.

This very supreme wisdom is the master of the wisdom of omniscience."

This is the third chapter: on establishing and on the signs of the four great elements.

Then the great yogin besought Āralī herself — beautiful by nature:

"How does one draw the blood of one who harms the Three Jewels?"

Rigi declared: "In front, with the hook and so forth, placing the flower of the yak,

draw your own blood.

Rigi, listen: through practice,

the twenty downward oral breaths arise.

Afterward, blood is drawn outward.

The splitting of the god is to be declared.

At the crown, imagine a blazing.

Pervading all with a garland of flames,

there recite the mantra:

Oṃ Heruka patam phipātāya.

Through Rigi's union with Āralī, obeisance to the god brings cessation.

The limbs of Āli and Kāli being equal,

in the middle between these two is one's own seed.

Through that very own seed, one's own mudrās are manifest.

From the mudrā, the gods arise.

Oṃ śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāvātmako'ham.

The hook mudrā: with both hands,

the little fingers interlocked in the manner of hooks.

The two middle fingers are pressed by the great thumb.

The two index fingers form the noose.
Vajra, sword, great lasso —

What other wisdom of Dharma is well known as Rigi?
By the four noble truths (āryasatya),
Sisī and the rest are well renowned.
The four fearlessnesses are well known as Mibazar and the rest.
By the four means of gathering,
Vala and the rest are well renowned.
The six arms are said to be the six classes of beings.
The three eyes are declared to be the three realms of existence.
The terrifying — that is my very mind — is the act of casting down at the root of the feet.
Joy and the rest — the ten grounds —
the abodes and so forth are truly and fully renowned.
The six perfections are the six mudrās.
The skull-cup is the very maṇḍala of space.
One who abides at the center of Evaṃ Mayā — contemplate it thus.

With the characteristic mark of all that arises as confusion, all abides perfectly in the continuum.
The curved knife is the very cutting of ignorance.
The skull-cup is itself great compassion.
By reciting the mantra of Rigi, Āraḷī — the mantra Caṇṭe'u Hūṃ He — the foe, declared to be the source of Dharma, is well known as vajra among vajras.
At the crown, the māra of afflictions.
The skull-cup is pure space itself.
The hook is the seed of Rigi.
Likewise, the noose is purity itself.
Gathering the purity of the nature,
the body is a pure stūpa.
The cross-legged posture is to be understood as the throne.

It is taught to be the very heart of Jambudvīpa.

The three lines of the navel are explained as the navel itself.

The belly, too, becomes form.

The throat is also spoken of as throat.

The rib-cage is to be understood as the skull.

The crown of the head is said to be a garland of parasols.

The two eyes are the moon and the sun.

The forehead is born from the head.

The bones are the relics of the Sugata.

Therefore, one's own blessing arises.

Therefore, the body is an image of a buddha.

The yogin should constantly make offerings to it.

This is the fourth chapter, on explaining one's own essential nature as a buddha.

Great King, this pure food —

truly opened by Āralī — therein is the great illusion of Rigi.

All beings are purified in wisdom.

The accomplishment of purpose is Vajrasattva (Skt. Vajrasattva).

The goddess who sustains life is the mudrā.

The great bliss of the auspicious Rāhu is from the conceptual elaboration of illusory form.

The great illusion itself is nourishment.

Through the manifold displays of vajra illusion,
the accomplishment of purpose is co-emergent joy.

The son is the Blessed One who bears the vajra.

The father is known as Vajradhara.

The mother is the Great Illusion.

That very one is supremely renowned as the mudrā.

The great old thumb is the vajra.

The navel is said to be the source of Dharma.

Through the manifold displays of the great illusion,
the accomplishment of purpose itself is resplendent.

By nature, all beings are buddhas themselves.

Goddess, hear the proclamation of Rigi.
Through thoroughly examining conduct in action,
embodied beings are constantly afflicted.
Joy is said to be "Shishir."
She who desires supreme joy is the goddess of joy.
She who is free from joy is the goddess of great bliss.
She of co-emergent joy is the goddess of vows.
The ill-favored woman is spoken of as "o-ru."
The sharp one is the embracing woman herself.
She who produces illusion is the Great Illusion.
The pressing of the thumb upon the lip —
the dispute of joy is the fox.
By drinking honey, one becomes the buffalo.
Through conceptuality, one is Hayagrīva.
By giving milk, one is the victorious banner of elephants.

Vajra Rali, full of great desire — the goddess of desire is spoken of as Rigi.
By the very nature of skillful means and wisdom,
all beings are fully pervaded.

By the four aspects of "si-si," the four hells, and likewise the four aspects of "ha" —
however one has conducted oneself in saṃsāra, this does not contradict nirvāṇa.

Vajra Āralī herself
also transforms into semen.
Rigi is said to be great bliss.
By the union of Rigi and Āralī,
it is to be called Vajra Illusion.
Through the conceptual elaboration of the illusory woman, all beings are thoroughly deluded.
The illusory woman is buddha herself.
She causes all illusions to proliferate.

The heart mantra is: Oṃ Āralī bhyo bhyo ha ha ha ha. Si si si si — to be recited indistinctly.

The close essence of the two is: Ha ha ha.

Whatever mantra there is for the elaboration of action,
that very mantra is supremely praised.
It is the mantra of the essence.
It is aroused by the close mantra.

The meditation is the experience of great bliss.
Likewise, the samaya offering itself —
among all the samayas, what is born from a human being is supremely praised.

Drinking the two — nāga and scorpion — is the samaya.
The horse of dreams is supremely praised.
The samaya for killing is the buffalo.
For empowerment, the dog is supremely praised.
The samaya for drawing blood is the vow of entry, and likewise the female drum.
For an erection, the flesh of the mongoose — found without transgression.

If, however, one has killed,
at that time the yogin will not accomplish the practice.
A yogin who has the intention of protecting sentient beings will accomplish it — of this there is no doubt.

The maṇḍala shall be made four cubits across.
The gate shall be four finger-breadths.
The gate-frame is said to be two finger-breadths.
The foliage ornament is also two finger-breadths.
On the arch of the gate-frame,
twelve finger-breadths are declared.
The divine pennant is two finger-breadths.
The stairway descent is sixteen finger-breadths.
From the gate, by two finger-breadths,
the vajra garland is to be made likewise.

The core of the maṇḍala is round,
endowed with four colors in the four directions.
The colored powder of five colors is to be called "the five threads."
Gold, or else silver, pearl, and coral, straight and true —

thoroughly mixed with lapis lazuli —

The five precious substances are to be thoroughly inserted. The vessels are in the number of the gods. The Victorious Vessel is the largest. The winding of the vessels is to be performed by the sādḥaka with proper consecration.

First, the ground is to be thoroughly purified. Second, the lines and so forth are to be drawn. On the fifth day, the maṇḍala is to be drawn. Likewise, on the fifth day, the fire offering itself is to be performed.

"O lord who protects the world, and O goddess, you shall come under my power. I shall erect this maṇḍala. O Luminous Protectress, make it free of obstructions. Just as I myself am in the forest, so too may the torma offering be given continually. Remaining for one session at night, the wise one should please the maṇḍala."

The mantra for the torma offering is: Oṃ śargati kasa ne nākāro mukhaṃ sarvādharmāṇaṃ ādyānutpannatvāt.

The mantra for driving out obstructing forces at the time of thoroughly taking up the ground is: Oṃ anasatana naṭa tiṣṭhaya mā vāruṇa kubera kasvāca sthāneṣu tiṣṭhadhaṃ rakṣaṃ kuru tame piratram.

This is the fifth chapter, the chapter on the defining characteristics of the ritual and its certainties.

The King of Tantras called the Rīgī Ārali is complete.

This was translated and edited, and the final version established, from the oral teachings of the Indian master Kāyasthapagayadhara, by the Tibetan translator, the fully ordained monk Śākyajeśes.

Translator's Notes

- The text is a Vajrayāna tantra with highly technical maṇḍala terminology. Several terms require comment. "Rīgī" and "Ārali" are tantric deity-names transliterated from Sanskrit originals that remain partially opaque; Rīgī likely renders a Sanskrit term related to a wrathful goddess (possibly related to ṛkṣa or similar), while Ārali is a ḍākinī name. The passage conflates cosmological geography (the four continents) with the maṇḍala's deity-abodes, which is standard in this genre. "Chandas" and "chandaha" appear to be transliterations of a Sanskrit term used here as a directional or maṇḍala category rather than in its ordinary sense of prosodic meter; I have left the transliteration. "Sisā" in the phrase "Sisā, the wand of desire" translates [Sanskrit text], which is uncertain; it may be a ḍākinī name or an obscure tantric term. The phrase [Sanskrit text] ("with a mind aimed at consuming/dispatching them") carries the sense of a wrathful ritual intention. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the chapter's close, which appears to reflect the manuscript's condition rather than a translation choice.

- The passage is a ritual manual section of a tantra devoted to the deity Ārali, combining Sanskrit mantras in Tibetan transcription with Tibetan verse instructions for magical rites including rainmaking, dream-control, paralysis, and subjugation practices. The Sanskrit mantras are transcribed phonetically in the Tibetan and are rendered here as close phonetic reconstructions; some syllables are corrupt or tantric coded and do not yield standard Sanskrit. The term rendered "ball of something" for gong bu in the cliff-echo passage is a small clay or dough ball used as a ritual implement; the exact substance is not specified. "Datura sap" renders datura ra yi khu ba, where datura is the standard identification of da tu ra. The "ear of the cliff" is a technical term for a concave rock face used for echo-divination rites. The three-body wheel mantras at the close correspond to standard tantric body, speech, and mind maṇḍala seed-syllable sets.
- The term chandor (Tib. རྩམ་འཁོར་) appears twice and refers to a specific anatomical or subtle-body location; it may be a transliteration of Sanskrit chandas or a tantric technical term for a particular body-site or nerve point. The precise identification is uncertain and left as chandor.

Sems kyi 'jigs byed (literally "mind-frightener" or "terrifier of mind") appears as a figure being trampled underfoot in the iconographic description; it likely refers to a deity or demon subdued by the central figure, possibly a form of Bhairava or a similar being. The Tibetan is rendered descriptively where it serves as a name.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end with the yogin passage, indicating this is a fragment continuing into the next section.

The mantra syllables are transliterated as they appear; some syllabic divisions in the Tibetan source are irregular and have been normalized to standard Sanskrit phonology where clear.

- The names Rigi and Ārali appear to be tantric initiatory names or deity-names specific to this text. Rigi functions both as a deity and as a practitioner-name throughout the passage, while Ārali is the female consort figure. Their Sanskrit equivalents, if any existed in the original, are not recoverable from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase rendered "the flower of the yak" translates Tibetan ya pa'i me tog, which likely refers to a specific ritual flower or plant; the yak-flower identification follows the earlier passage's established usage.

The terms "Sisī," "Mibazar," and "Vala" appear to be transliterations of Sanskrit names for specific ḍākinīs or deity-attendants associated with the four truths, four fearlessnesses, and four means of gathering respectively. Their full Sanskrit forms are not determinable from context alone.

The mantra syllables Oṃ Heruka patam phipātāya and Oṃ śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāvātmako'ham are retained as liturgical Sanskrit. The second is a standard Vajrayāna self-identification formula: "I am of the nature of the vajra of wisdom of emptiness."

The "twenty downward oral breaths" is a tentative rendering of a difficult technical phrase relating to a prāṇāyāma or inner heat practice; the exact number and direction follow the Tibetan literally.

- The text contains a number of short, untranslated exclamatory syllables functioning as mantric or coded terms — such as "Shishir," "si-si," "ha," "o-ru," and "Rali" — which appear to be tantric twilight-language (sandhyābhāṣā) or seed syllables. These have been transliterated rather than interpreted, as their precise referents belong to a specific commentarial transmission. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation reflects this.

The term translated as "scorpion" for 蝎子 (gzir) is uncertain; it may refer to a specific creature used in tantric ritual context. Some editions and commentaries differ on this identification.

- The mantra strings are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan; they are liturgical Sanskrit dhāraṇī passages and are rendered phonetically rather than translated, which is standard practice. The second mantra in particular is syntactically fragmented in the source and likely represents a corrupt or abbreviated transmission; no emendation has been made.

The phrase rendered "Luminous Protectress" translates ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་, literally "the luminous one who protects" or "the female luminous guardian"; the precise deity intended is not specified in this passage and may refer to a specific mandala deity in the broader tantra.

The title रीग्वेदार्णव is a transliteration of a Sanskrit title; "Rigī Ārali" is preserved as a phonetic rendering since the Sanskrit original's precise meaning and spelling are uncertain.
