Toh 428 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in English as The Glorious Four Seats: The Great Royal Tantra of the Yoginī, corresponding to the Sanskrit Śrī Caturpīṭha Mahāyoginī Tantra Rāja and the Tibetan Dpal gdan bzhi pa zhes bya ba. It belongs to the class of Yoginī tantras, an advanced category of highest yoga tantra focused on practices associated with enlightened female principles and the realization of wisdom inseparable from emptiness. The text opens with the Blessed One, situated in a pure abode and described as dwelling within the net of the yoginī, turning to address Vajrapāṇi amid an assembly of tens of millions of lords of yoga, establishing the dramatic and visionary setting characteristic of this genre. As one of the major tantric cycles in the Kangyur, the Caturpīṭha is an important scripture within the Yoginī tantra tradition and has been the subject of extensive commentary in Indian and Tibetan Buddhist scholarship.

In the language of India: Śrī Caturpīṭha Mahāyoginī Tantra Rāja Nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Great Royal Tantra of the Yoginī Called the Glorious Four Seats.

Homage to the noble Avalokiteśvara, Lord of Great Compassion.

Bound within the net of the yoginī,
the sovereign one endowed with wisdom and emptiness,
dwelling in the pure abode,
the omniscient one spoke thus.

Among eighty million lords of yoga — those endowed with refined qualities, the unattractive ones, the disheveled ones, those with three throats, those of Mount Meru, those of the hollow summit of Mount Meru, those of the lotus, those of the vast lotus, and so forth — the Blessed One gazed upon Vajrapāṇi and smiled. No sooner had the smile arisen than Vajrapāṇi rose from his seat, drew his upper robe over one shoulder, planted the knee of his right leg upon the ground, joined his palms together, and addressed the Blessed One in these words:

The defining characteristics of the secret union —
I wish to hear of them from the sovereign of wisdom.

What is the nature of earth and of space?
What is the nature of water and of fire?
By means of the outbreath and the inbreath,
how is meditative concentration to be grasped?
The god who is primary guardian of the surrounding regions —
how does he abide within the maṇḍalas?
How are wisdom, consciousness, and the body,
together with karma and the rest, to be conjoined?
The suchness that is the defining mark of liberation from saṃsāra — listen to this through the vajra just as it is.

All the outbreaths and inbreaths and all the rest
are to be applied as activities of wisdom.
Twenty-one thousand and six hundred —
this is the count to be reckoned.
By means of sixty units of time,
day and night are said to be constituted.
The outbreath and the inbreath
are to be counted by the number of the elements.
The wise person should dissolve both breaths —
the inbreath into the outbreath.
Likewise, for the twelve earths,
outer signs are to be established.
According to the signs of the count of days,
they are to be placed in the twelve lunar mansions.
The twelve stages of the sequence, with great diligence, are to be placed beginning from the east: the middle spring month, and so on.
Rohita, Mohita,
likewise Bhadra and Vṛṣabha, Kūrma, Makara, Raṇḍa, Mikira, likewise Vitrika, Byākusvapnaka, Manā, Kāmasa — twelve in all.
These are to be arranged in order
in the lunar mansions of the east and the other directions respectively.
A child born under Rohita
is said to be of good fortune and likewise wealthy,

malicious in mind and prone to illness,
ever the foremost in border regions,
ever taking delight in coupling,
speaking pleasingly in all circumstances.
One who makes offerings to a deity under Rohita
can endure seventy years of life.
If wealth is given under Rohita,
all one's dear ones will turn away.
If the body is wounded under Rohita, one will encounter splendor and meet with it at every turn.
If one takes up residence under Rohita,
one will grow rich in companions and in wealth.
If a guest arrives under Rohita,
all wishes will be fully accomplished.
For taking a bride and for fire rites,
peaceful activities are to be performed.

The working of the purposes under Mohita
is to be known by means of counting alone.
A child born under Mohita
is said to have a life of sixty-five years.
Eating much and small in spirit,
ever delighting in coupling,
ever malicious and full of chatter,
fond of speaking unpleasant words,
angry, arrogant, without courage at heart,
committing evil deeds and of wicked conduct,
frivolous and speaking harsh words —
such a one will certainly die by the blade.
Or else a life of eighty years
is renowned in the four root categories.
One abandons suitable ground
and strives after what is unsuitable.
If the limbs of the body are wounded,
one will encounter the lord of death.
If even a little wealth is given away,
what is given does not return.

A son born under Bhadra
will eat good and excellent food,
will perform good actions,
and will live for a hundred years.

A son born under Bhadra
practices Dharma in poverty,
speaks truthfully and utters pleasing words,
is a body content with one wife,
and becomes foremost in speaking well.
He understands all crafts and the right times,
is always close to his own kin and friends,
is of a family that administers punishment with cutting judgment —
and in like manner will die by drowning.

A son born under Vṛṣabha
is diligent and brave before enemies,
rich in charm and wealth,
and will take many wives.
He always has many relatives,
yet he destroys his father's life.
He lives by farming and trade,
and will live a life of sixty years.
Slothful, speaking nonsense,
malicious, of wicked conduct and behavior —
he will die by the blade,
or else by a venomous creature.

A son born under Kūrma dwells always in a state of anxiety.
He is quick to anger and quick to be pleased,
speaks at length and loves his kin.
He speaks harshly and is exceedingly wrathful,
wealthy, and delights in giving everything away.
His sons and wife will die before him.
He is always foremost in his own land,
and lives by farming and other such work.
He will be seized by the disease of leprosy,
and when he has reached eighty years of age
will likewise die in his own land.

A son born under Makara
will live for ninety-six years.
He is endowed with consummate moral discipline and merit,
guards the Vinaya and preserves proper conduct,
is wealthy, of excellent form, and fully accomplished,
fortunate and adorned with fame,
skilled in all arts and crafts,
and is entirely distinguished with one wife.
His mind is always relaxed and at ease.
He is tame and observant of restraint,
foremost and alone among his kin,
speaks pleasingly to all —
and yet in like manner will die on the battlefield.
His life is fifty-five years,
or else sixty or thirty.

A son born under Raṇḍa
is always of sinful mind,
speaks frivolously toward sentient beings,
is always poor and speaks with a false mouth,
is always sickly,
is subject to punishment by the king,
delights always in sexual misconduct,
does not trust others,
is skilled in deception and all manner of crafts,
and has good fortune with women.
His life is certainly fifty-five years,
or else sixty or thirty.

A son born under Mṛkara
knows the Dharma and his own lineage is high.
He is fully accomplished in treatises on proper conduct,
endowed with various arts and sciences,
speaks harsh words and is fierce,
extremely wrathful and fearsome.
His wealth is modest yet his form is fine,
and all his undertakings are accomplished swiftly.
His body itself will leap into water and die,
or at eighty-eight years of age

he will be executed by the king's law.

A son born under Viṭrika —

his mother dies immediately after he is born,
and his father likewise dies at the eighth year.

He is foremost in his own home,
his household goods are meager,
he is endowed with sinful and foolish tendencies,
his work is light and his anxiety is small,
and he is the very head of armies.

At a hundred and eight years of age

he will die in his own home.

He is loving toward all his kin
and is compassionate toward those in distress.

A son born under Vyākula

is of small intelligence and speaks wickedly,
of weak wisdom and always sickly,
always keeps company with bad friends,
has good fortune in loving his own kin,
and is compassionate toward those in distress.
He is exceedingly wealthy in cattle and goods,
with a home and three or more wives.

He is quick to anger and possessed of pride,
and will be terrified by the torment of enemies.

Both his father and his mother will live long —
likewise he will endure to seventy years.

He lives by the work of trade,
and will once die from the cause of trade.

The signs at the time of undertaking an enterprise
are to be reckoned by one possessing wisdom.

A son born under Svapna —

by bravery, valor, and the overcoming of opponents...

he burns all enemies to ash,
and is a resource for those without protection.

At all times he is impoverished,
and applies himself diligently to sinful deeds.

He thinks of himself as a lion,
and everyone knows him for his harsh speech.
At all times he is free from illness,
and will always come to find enjoyment and wealth.
He lives by depending on others,
and causes harm to all women he associates with.
He will certainly live to the full measure of fifty years,
and will without doubt die struck down by an enemy's weapon.

A son born under Kāmasa —
he will live sixty-eight years.
He is endowed with wealth, grain, a home,
cattle, horses, and other mounts.
He speaks truthfully and knows the Dharma,
and acts for the benefit of all sentient beings.
He is learned and speaks pleasingly,
and is thoroughly versed in all treatises.
He is of good fortune for all sentient beings,
and will die in his own homeland.

Concerning the signs to be read at the time of undertaking,
I declare these with no uncertainty whatsoever.

Rohita is auspicious for worship of the gods.
Mohita craves after wealth.
Bhadrā eats fine food.
Vṛṣabha is exceedingly quick to anger.
Kūrma is one whose mind is turned toward others.
Makara speaks in ways that draw connections.
Raṇḍa is one of wicked mind.
Mikira relies upon sexual union.
Bitrika is one who sleeps long,
and Byākuli is one whose wits are scattered.
Svapna thinks only of himself.
Kāma sings songs and recites texts.

For Rohita, the rite is one of pacification.
Likewise for Vṛṣabha, the rite is one of increase.
For Makara, the rite is one of power and prosperity.

For Bhadrā, the rite to be performed is one of subjugation.
By Mohita, the rite is one of driving away.
For Kūrma, the rite is one of binding.
Raṇḍa should be understood as a rite of separation.
For Byākula, the rite of compounding medicines is to be applied.
The supreme horse of Ra is accomplished —
by the compound of nectar no birth will arise.
The four directions beginning with the East
are to be calculated in the morning by the wise.

If wealth is given during Rohita,
miraculous powers will flourish greatly.
If wealth is gathered during Mohita,
it cannot be blocked by others.
If a house is begun during Bhadrā,
one will encounter splendor and true prosperity.
Through Vṛṣabha's divine yoga,
all mantras will be accomplished.
By Kūrma's compound, take a lotus —
it will never be separated from you, anywhere.
If fields are sown during Makara,
grain will certainly and without fail increase.
If one sends a woman away during Raṇḍa, even should she die, she will not be let go of.
If trade is conducted during Mikira,
that speech is seen to be received accordingly.
Activities to be established with lasting stability
are to be undertaken from Bitrika onward.
If guests arrive during Byākuli,
they will reach their destination without harm.
During Svapna, everything and all will certainly and always come to manifest.
If wealth is given away during Kāma,
what was given will not return.

Rohita's son will prosper in wealth.
Mohita is one who is stable and settled.
The abode of Bhadrā is traversed by strength —

likewise Padma and Vṛṣabha.
Kūrma is the great Padma.
Makara is the one who protects the conch.
Raṇḍa is the great protector of the conch.
Mikira is one endowed with noble lineage.
Pitri is one of a hundred heads.
Byākula is one who falls in a coil.
Svapna is called "the Fearful."
Kāma is one who is reckoned to die by time.

These are to be understood individually
in accordance with the successive sequence of temporal junctions.

The supreme horse of Ra is accomplished —
by the compound of nectar no birth will arise.
Whoever is clearly seized by its fangs
will come to meet the Lord of Death.

Preparations for the compounding of poisons
are to be applied as poison toward others.
This is to be carried out in accordance with the signs of the time, proceeding step by step in order.

Proceeding in sequence from the middle month of spring onward,
during the period when the sun moves northward,
the signs are to be applied according to the nature of each season, step by step and in due succession.

The twelve divisions of the hours of the day
are to be converted into forty-eight parts by the wise.
The thirteen divisions of the night hours
are to be reckoned by the skilled reckoner.
In the second watch of the day,
the one skilled in times establishes the time-measure.

Six and twelve converted give the sign for the daytime water-hours.
Four and thirteen converted: examine these as the water-hours of the night.
Eight and twelve converted — one's own portion —
is to be examined as the daytime.
Two and thirteen converted:
examine these as the water-hours of the night.

Exactly thirty water-hours
are to be applied as the second vishughati of the middle.
The two extremes — the three of ten —
are known as the daytime water-hours.
Eight and twelve, those two,
are to be taken as the sign of the night.
Four and thirteen as the sign —
that is the water-hour of the day.

Six and twelve converted:
take these as the sign of the night water-hours.
Six and thirteen converted:
these are to be known as the daytime.
Four and twelve converted:
these are renowned as the water-hours of the night.

Having explained the northward movement,
in the same way the times of the others are to be known.

Four and three converted: the water-hours
are explained as belonging to the day.
Six and twelve converted:
these are to be indicated as the night.
Two and fifty-three converted:
these likewise are the water-hours of the day.
Eight and twelve converted:
these are renowned as the water-hours of the night.
Thirteen multiplied: that is the vishugha water-hour of the day.
Likewise the water-hours of the night
are also to be converted by thirteen.
Likewise the two middle vishughas:
eight and twelve converted
are to be reckoned as the day.
Two and thirteen converted:
examine these as the water-hours of the night.
Six and twelve converted:
these are the water-hours of the day, in succession.
Four and thirteen converted:
these likewise are the water-hours of the night.

The three hundred and fifty-two water-hours
mark the passing of the seasons.
By the count of sixty water-hours,
one day and night combined are reckoned as one.
According to the sequence of the months in order,
the signs are to be applied in the same succession.
The water-hours of breath and so forth being complete,
apart from the vishugha, the increase and decrease proceed in sequence.
According to the distinction between action and non-action,
the succession of breaths is to be taken up.

The solstices and equinoxes and the two movements of the sun
are to be indicated.

Those two, multiplied by ten,
give the water-hours of the year in the same way.
By possessing the sign of that,
the breath of day and night is to be counted.

Having taken hold of all things under the sovereignty of speech,
establish them distinctly as the sign of the vowels.
Setting aside the two neuters,
place them all under the sovereignty of earth.

When the lot falls on the vowel A,
one associates with splendor and with eminence,
the finding of wealth is manifest,
and good fortune is certain without doubt.

When the lot falls on the long Ā,
one is oppressed by plague and sickness,
and fear and terror will appear —
it is declared that this belongs to the long Ā.

When the lot falls on the vowel I,
the splendor of royalty is bestowed,
wealth and goods are found from every side,
and whatever one wishes will be accomplished.

When the lot falls on the long Ī,
within six months there will be death,
and likewise oppression by enemies,
and fear of fire is to be known.

When the lot falls on the vowel U, splendor and friends will be found,
wealth and grain will increase,
and heroes too will be found.

If the lot falls on the long Ū,
one will be harmed by enemies,
servants and relatives
will appear fearful and terrified.

When the lot falls on the vowel E,
immediately the person becomes fortunate,
and those men who lack a son
will attain a place worthy of veneration.

If the lot falls on the sign of the vowel AI,
there will be fear from enemies and from kings,
one will be oppressed by bodily thieves,
and sickness and plague will strike.

When the lot falls on the sign of O,
one's ruling power over one's place will change,
wealth and grain will be found,
and pleasant learning likewise.

When the lot falls on the sign of the vowel AU,
there will be fighting and harm from enemies,
decline from one's station, beating and harassment,
and what has been done will be wasted and come to nothing.

When the lot falls on the letter AM,
good servants will be found,
sons and learning will be found,
and likewise companions will be found.

Just as the first, the letter A,
so too should the last be taken.
Having set it at six permutations,
the fifth should be made threefold.
Having mixed three hundred and sixty,
and divided it as the earth,
the remainder of the letters should be taken

and used to indicate virtue or non-virtue.

Alternatively, draw a zigzag line,
and count from the first of the vowels onward.

Or alternatively, scatter flowers,
and likewise indicate the sign.

In the morning, at the hour of Rohita,
all the omens should be examined.

This, the Tantra of Yoga praised as the treatise supreme, extracted step by step from my own seat, is the first.

Now, that gnosis, like a rat's hole —
we wish to hear it from the Blessed One:
what are the signs of the body like,
and on what does that very matter depend?

Hear the signs of the body,
O great Vajra King!

By those bodily signs openly revealed,
one who merely knows them —
when one's time of death has arrived and the breath has become merely agitated —
the embodied being will die in six months.

When one has not felt even slight fear,
yet the cheek's inner boundary has become dry,
at that point one's time will have come.

When the breath has ceased and stopped,
in the morning, at the hour of Rohita,
the signs should be examined.

If the moisture within the nose has ceased,
one will undoubtedly die within seven days.

If the fluid of the eye has ceased,
likewise one will die in five days.

By the sign of the cheek's inner side,
one will not survive beyond a single day.

When the conch-like hollows of the ears have grown sunken,
one will undoubtedly die within the hour.

Here, when the tongue bears black lines,

the embodied being will die within two days.
When the upper and lower teeth press together,
one will meet the lord of death within three days.
When veins appear on the outer side of the throat,
one will undoubtedly die within half a month.
If the web of the chest is broken,
not even a doctor of the moon can cure it.
When the nails are without blood,
the embodied being will die in eight days.

These eight signs of death,
indicating that the time of death has come, should be identified.

For the cessation of moisture within the nose,
press with the seed syllable of gnosis.
For the cessation of fluid in the eye,
take the seed syllable of Vajramā.
For the sign of the inner side of the cheek,
press with the fierce seed syllable.
For the shrinking of the conch-like hollows of the ears,
place the seed syllable of the Corpse-Raising Mother.
For this black line of the tongue,
contemplate the seed syllable of the fierce one.
For the teeth pressing against one another,
strike with the seed syllable of Siṃhamā.
For the outer veins of the side of the throat,
strike with the seed syllable of Vyāghrī.
For the breaking of the web of the chest,
take the seed syllable of the Jackal.
For the absence of blood in the nails of the hand,
take the seed syllable of the Owl Mother.

By placing these seed syllables at the limb-signs of death,
one is protected.

Then outside, draw the gnosis wheel
and by the rite of drawing it, protect the consciousness.

Take two unburned clay bowls,
and with saffron and copper sulfate

draw nine squares below
and likewise twelve above.
In the center, write the name,
and encircle it with the seed syllables.
Offering homage, first among the vowels —
let the words of protection come before.

The seed syllables of the five buddhas and their retinues reside at the borders,
and at the border of the burning letter,
place the vowel signs above and so on, with their tendrils.
The seed syllable that transforms into two snowflakes —
this is called Goddess Vajramā.

With the five buddhas' mind-seed syllables,
and homage to all, at the border of the burning —
the staff is the lord and protector of the world,
the turquoise one is Vajrapāṇi.

Likewise, the body is the highest in its softness,
the head and shoulders are Maitreya,
above blazes the syllable MA,
the liberator of all cyclic existence.

Residing in the eastern direction
is the goddess Vajra Ḍākinī.
In the north, the seed syllable
of the one called Fierce is to be applied.

In the western direction, what resides there — apply the seed syllable of the Zombie Goddess (ro langs ma).
In the southern direction, what resides there — display the complete seed syllable of Caṇḍālī (gtum mo).

Just as the seed syllables are directly shown,
Siṃhamukhā (the Lion-Faced One) is in the powerful position.
At the fire-corner, place the Tiger-Tooth One.
In the space of the void-of-truth, the Jackal-Faced One.
For wind, the Owl Goddess performs the HŪṂ.

The seed syllables that reside at the intermediate directions —
in the actuality of the four and the six —

according to each direction and intermediate direction, likewise place the seed syllables accordingly.

At the twelve positions above,
place the seed syllables of the vowels.
Homage, the burning border and all —
in each direction, place the Hermaphrodite Ones (ma ning).

The Blazing One and the Dripping One, and likewise the Seizing Ḍākinī —
those that reside at the borders of the homage-fire — place them according to their respective positions.

The eastern position is that of the Ḍākinī.
In the north resides the Blazing One.
In the west, the Dripping One is correctly declared.
In the south, place the Seizing One.

In the center, write the name.
Below as it is, above likewise.
Having joined the two faces together,
bind them with red thread.

In a place that is entirely even and balanced,
smear it with red sandalwood,
and present various flowers,
along with fragrances — offerings and torma.

In the center, having placed the ritual device (yantra),
surround it with the five ḍākinīs.
Through the practice of joining oneself with the vajra-nature, recite: "I am Vajrasattva."

Taking the vajra in hand at the fingertips,
having mentally grasped the vajra and touched it,
recite the seed syllable shown in the center
eight hundred times.

Assign the non-virtues of previous lives and so forth
to the gods (lha) and the rest.
No piercing of all the limbs,
and the moment of death will not come to pass.

If one is free from harm, and all diseases,
and if a sick person is laid down and the joining applied —
at all times illness will not arise.
Even if the life-force of a being is exhausted,
it will remain for six months.

Having placed it in another location,
always strive in making offerings.

Through the practice bearing the vajra seal,
consciousness will not go anywhere at all.

Furthermore, examine carefully one's own breath right there.
When the breath is balanced,
everything is said to be accomplished.

If it rests to the right, on the right, and the intelligent one rests to the left, on the left —
when it abides there, whatever is spoken
will come to be fully accomplished.

If the breath and the questioning are at variance,
that indicates that the siddhi (accomplishment) is far off.

The momentary supreme joining of the life-force —
these two joinings are to be known.

In the moment, it is universally renowned that all activities will flourish greatly.

As for activity performed regarding the life-force,
there is no doubt that accomplishment will be long-lasting.

Having contemplated poison in the fangs and so forth,
there apply the cures.

With all the characteristics of joining and the rest as before,
assign everything to the nāgas through the vidyā.

In regard to the four joinings, if poison is introduced,
there is no doubt that death will result.

Through the joining that draws in poison,
all others are to be healed.

For a body into which poison has been introduced,
all-knowing, place it with the seed syllables.

Place the eight-syllable mantras
at the eight limbs.

Having contemplated seed syllables of white color,
scatter and purify the poisoned mind.

Abiding in the center of the maṇḍala,
by means of gnosis (jñāna), having clarified the consciousness and having performed the practice of transforming the limbs,
then begin the outer work below.

Having mixed water and milk,
fill a vessel made of earth completely.
In the center adorned with the moon-disc, visualize a lotus.

Contemplate the Vajra Ḍākinī
adorned with a white parasol.
With two hands in the bodhisattva posture of meditation,
fully draped in the ornaments of emanation,
dressed in most beautiful garments,
bearing the khaṭvāṅga and the skull-cup.

Holding the heads of the eight nāgas (nāgas),
press them down upon the lotus seat.
In the east, visualize the Son of Wealth Expansion;
likewise, place the Abiding One in the north.
In the west moves the One of Power;
in the south, gaze upon the Lotus One.
In the Powerful One's place is the Great Lotus;
at the fire-corner, set the Conch-Bearer.
The one called Truth-Free and Clan-Endowed — the one who coils at the wind-corner — is the Fallen One.

Having contemplated the eight nāgas,
meditate on pressing down their heads.
Having made offerings with all the substances —
flowers, incense, and so forth — give the torma.

Contemplate yourself in the divine yoga
as the Vajra Ḍākinī.
By means of a bundle of peacock feathers

joined with water, draw it forth.
Having drawn it forth completely to the feet,
cause it to dissolve into the water from the feet.

Om hrī ṭaṭṭha ṭṭar hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Through the close approach directed toward Vajrasattva,
recite hundreds of thousands and so forth.

Om vāsuki ri hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭar hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Om takṣaka hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om karkoṭaka hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om padma hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om mahāpadma hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om śakhapāla hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om bhyo kulikāya laṃ hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om hulunke hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra svāhā.

Om hrī ṭaṭṭhaṇṭha ra hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ amukasya niravīśaṃ kuru hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Reciting thus, having drawn it into the center of the milk,
immediately the milk will turn black.

Mixed with white mustard flowers
and sandalwood,

upon the heart of one seized by death,
recite the secret mantra and strike.

As soon as the heart beats again,
bind the wisdom being tightly and guard.

Even merely by restraining the consciousness,
likewise the breath will begin to stir.

When the breath is set in motion,
press upon it with one's own breath.

Immediately upon being pressed by the breath,
the limbs — hands, feet, and so forth — will tremble.

When all the limbs are trembling,
oneself should take up the melody.

Having summoned the nāga with hūṃ,
rouse it with three sharp snaps.

Having roused the one seized by death,

then guard that person's limbs.
Having gathered it, pour that milk
upon the place where the nāga dwells.

Manifesting as Vajrasattva abiding in the center of the moon-disc maṇḍala,
first perform close approach and so forth
by means of three hundred thousand recitations.

Thereafter, when the practitioner has drawn in the poison,
there is no doubt that success will come.

At the mouth and the bindu-point,
the top of the head, the throat, the tip of the nose,
the heart, the navel, the secret place,
and the great toes —
do not treat those points where it has taken hold,
for it is taught that this would be the cause of death.

Hear this, O King, O Great Vajra!
The foremost assembly for causing rain to fall —
near the waterside, in a place whose appearance inspires joy and delight,
having spread fine awnings
and unfurled silk banners of various musical sounds, commence the work of dyeing
with pigments cooked to five colors.

A square enclosure with four gates, wound all around by the eight nāgas —
two heads placed at the gates,
two tails knotted at the corners.

In the east: the Excellent Victor;
in the north: Glorious and Joyful.
In the west: the Beautiful Destroyer;
in the south: the Firm and Fierce.

For the fence of the eight nāgas,
place the eight clans in the directions and so forth:
the Son of Wealth Expansion in the east,
the Abiding One is placed in the north.

In the western direction moves the One of Power;
in the southern direction is the Lotus One.
In the Powerful One's place is the Great Lotus;
at the fire-corner, place the Conch-Bearer.
At Truth-Free is the Clan-Endowed One;
at the wind-corner, the Coiling Fallen One.

Summon the eight sovereign kings of clouds
from the eight directions.

They are called thus: the Roaring and Overcast,
the Fierce and Coiling and Dense,
the Raging Rain-Bringer and the Fully Filled —
these are called the Eight Kings.

Place them in the eastern and other directions,
each visualized in the color of their respective direction.

In the center is the Vajra Ḍākinī, seated perfectly upon a lotus throne.
She holds a khaṭvāṅga staff and a yogic vessel,
adorned and draped with ornaments of serpents.
Her body is brilliant white, blazing intensely,
and she bears robes of the utmost beauty.
She is surrounded by lotus emanations,
and those emanations are to be set upon the throne as a seat.

Vast offerings are then arrayed:
eight vessels are placed, of milk and so forth.
Flowers, incense, and fragrance,
and various lamps — with these the aware practitioner offers worship.

This is the mantra of approach for the wisdom Ḍākinī who is the very self of wisdom, whom one meditates upon as oneself:

Om bhūrbhuva svāhā.

These are the mantras of the eight sovereign nāga kings:

Om Vāsuki hūṃ svāhā.

Om Takṣaka hūṃ svāhā.

Om Karkoṭa hūṃ svāhā.

Om Padma hūṃ svāhā.

Om Mahāpadma hūṃ svāhā.

Om Śaṅkhaṇḍa hūṃ svāhā.

Om Kulīśabāla hūṃ svāhā.

Om Hulunda hūṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra of the eight sovereign kings of clouds:

Om ghili ghili. Varṣa varṣa paya. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ho ho ho. Ṭha ṭha ṭha svāhā.

One then revolves the hands all around and displays them toward the eight directions.

This is the mudrā of the eight sovereign kings of clouds.

For the mudrā of the eight sovereign nāga kings:

With the left hand, form a fist,
with the little finger and thumb extending out eight-fold;
with the right hand, raise the head of the serpent upward and join the ring finger to the top of the thumb.

This is the root mantra:

Om vajra ḍākinī, varṣa varṣa paya hūṃ phu svāhā.

One must first perform the approach recitation three hundred thousand times,
and then perform the recitation.

These practices of the skilled yogin
are the supreme ritual for bringing down rain.

Moreover, the signs of auspicious and inauspicious messengers shall now be described.

One who comes with an eye condition, with a white-haired and stooped body, wearing frightful garments and carrying a staff,
accompanied by women,

weeping and with hair disheveled —

or one who is naked, speaks evilly,

or through the four modes indicates death:

this is a messenger of that kind. Examining the messenger against oneself in this way, one proceeds in one of the two manners.

At that time, if the mantra-practitioner wishes to engage with such a messenger,

there is no doubt that accomplishment will be ruined.

This concludes the second section of the work called The Arrangement of My Own Seat, set out in order.

Now, the distinguishing features of the yogin's diligent practice —
I wish to hear them from the Blessed One.

How does one seek the mantras?

How is gnosis (jñāna) to be grasped?

Listen, O Vajra — this very thing is the very self of the deity.

First, by meditating on emptiness,
cleanse the defilement of embodied existence.
Begin by rendering form empty, and so forth,
for as long as there are eighteen of them.

The form element is empty —
let sound be that very thing.

The smell element is empty —
let taste be that very thing.

The tangible element is empty —
let form be that very thing.

When the very nature of the eye is empty,
how can consciousness exist at its center?
When the very nature of hearing is empty,
how can consciousness exist at its center?
When the very nature of smelling is empty,
how can consciousness exist at its center?
When the very nature of the tongue is empty,
how can consciousness exist at its center?
When the very nature of the body is empty,
how can consciousness exist at its center?
When the very nature of mind is empty,
how is one to investigate what lies at its center?

Let the mind dissolve into space,
and contemplate everything as empty.
The continents and Mount Meru and all the rest, above, below, and in between —
by meditating on the three realms as empty,
let everything be brought to utter exhaustion.

Meditate on the world-realms of the ten directions in their entirety — on form and the rest as excellent.

Take up the things that are one's own
and visualize them as merged with those things.
Conceiving all engagements as equal,
the yogin who is skilled contemplates that equality as empty,
and then, looking into the center of that very state,
examines its signs.

Pacified by the light of a lamp,
the yellow becomes expansive through silver;
the appearance of the disk of the sun —
attachment and the rest will come to be accomplished.
At the end, when black smoke is seen,
it is renowned as wrathful activity.
With the disturbance of the color of wind,
in that very instant one is scattered.
When all appears white, like the rays of light
from a white moon, divine —
the yogin should know that accomplishment is achieved.

The true abode of beings endowed with intelligence:
beneath that, one should clearly contemplate
the sprouts and the rest arising from yoga.
Whoever meditates knowing that to be empty
will swiftly become a liberated bodhisattva.
Look upon what is to be known through wisdom;
examine the goings of beings through what is known.
With the mind that has examined the goings of beings,
one proceeds according to one's wish.

Father and mother are to be slain.
Having seized the two pure brahmins,
if the king together with his realm is destroyed,
that person, it is said, becomes pure.

This is the third chapter of the gradual divisions from "The Excellent Arrangement of My Own Seat."

Listen now to the path that is like a vajra —
the twofold, non-dual:

since one is utterly terrified by the ocean of saṃsāra,
the enemy of water is thoroughly filled by the noble one.
Those with bodies who have sunk in the center —
speak of it as the defining mark called liberation.
What is indicated, the defining mark, and the one who indicates:
by consciousness there is wisdom;
look upon what is to be known through wisdom;
examine the goings of beings through what is known.
With the mind that has examined the goings of beings,
one proceeds just as one wishes.
Like a maddened elephant bound by a lasso,
those confused and harmed by the lasso of saṃsāra —
a yogin wanders for a thousand former lifetimes' worth of existences.

Just as the defining marks were taught before,
having contemplated equality as empty,
the one endowed with intelligence should plant seeds
in bodies and the rest — the fields of emptiness and so forth.
For example, it is well spoken of as the burning of an outcaste's chaff,
taught as consecrated by the blessing of the gods.
The virtuous and the wise of good lineage dwell throughout;
likewise, having smashed everything with meditative absorption,
one should plant seeds by setting them down.
Above, examine the seed of fire.
The seed of earth, in its two forms,
is to be applied to the two eyes.
The seed of wind — the thousand and so forth —
contemplate at the nose and the ears.
The seed of water like nectar
is chief, sovereign over the power of the tongue.
Seizing in order what is heaped up thus,
apply it to the four stations.
At the throat is the seed of delusion;
likewise at the shoulders, affliction.
In the direction of the heart is what stirs;
at the root of the navel is what is rich.

Setting down the eight seeds in the eight limbs,
one should guard them.

Making oneself the wisdom ḍākinī,
let the body be endowed with the seeds.

Adorned with the disk of the sun,
seated on a lotus throne,
covered above by a white parasol,
blazing with light like refined gold,
three faces, six hands,
seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,
above, adorned with a vajra crown-ornament,
a silk headband bound beautifully,
three eyes, wrathful yet smiling,
clothed in exceedingly beautiful garments —
a sword, an ax, a vajra,
and on the left side a threatening gesture of the forefinger,
raising a śakti and a khaṭvāṅga,
bearing the mudrā of the secret mark openly.

With an emanated cloud of buddhas,
striving to accomplish the benefit of sentient beings,
blazing with rays of light of varied kinds — meditate without moving the breath.

Mind's wisdom and consciousness
should be conceived as like crystal.

Through the perfect union of the vowel and consonant series,
seizing the seed therein,
meditate on the wisdom-endowed seeds
in the ripening places of drops.

Recite the letter-seeds
adorned with the five buddhas.

For the object in front of wind and fire,
rouse the seed of vajra-fire.

Pressed perfectly by sound and drop,
recite it as "the stream of rain."

First, place the syllable of the guru;
at the end recite the syllable that burns.

The one endowed with meditative absorption
and possessed of intelligence should recite three hundred thousand times.
The yogin endowed with recitation —
by that, all wishes are accomplished.

For the eight rites and the other accomplishments,
first perform approach practice and the rest.
After that, if the rites alone are performed,
they will be accomplished — of this there is no doubt.

Now hear, O Vajra, the particular instructions for the rite of bewildering.

As for the particulars of those who are to be bound,
first recite the vajra words in front.

Take the first syllable of the first group,
and likewise take the first syllable
of the fourth group,
and place a doubled "ra" above it.

In the same way, join "i" and "ra" to it.

The second syllable of the second group,
which bears the drop,
is to be pierced with a hook.

Add to it the third of the fourth group,
and recite it twice.

Adorned with the five buddhas,
with the homage syllable in front —
append the six syllables at the end.
When the yogin recites this seed syllable,
all things will be bound.

Interlacing the fingers of both hands,
join them in the likeness of eating and looking.
Extend the wrathful fingers and the middle ones,
and draw both toward each other.

This is the great mudrā —

churn the garland of blazing rays.

The enemy's throat and all other things —
enjoy them all mentally.

After that, all waters and the rest
are said to be thoroughly bound.
Now, whatever the last of the earlier groups —
take the third syllable.

Likewise from the third of the earlier groups,
take that very third syllable,
and to the third seed of that,
add the letter "a" above it as a platform.

The first of the fifth group
is to be pierced with a hook.

The third is the water seed,
with a strong stop placed at the center,
and the final is joined with the vajra-bearing one.
It has hope and the iron hook.

At the end is the fierce syllable,
and place the homage at the beginning.
This is renowned as the mantra of binding.

Joining the palms of both hands together,
interlace the two ring fingers around each other,
press them down with the two wrathful fingers,
and join the two thumbs at the center;
likewise join the two little fingers there.

This mudrā of the open beak,
bearing a garland of blazing rays,
blazing in all ten directions,
burns the assembled gods of the clouds.
At the time of binding rain and so forth,
this mudrā is to be applied.

The practitioner who recites one hundred thousand times
should first perform approach practice and the rest.

This concludes the fourth prakaraṇa, called "Self-Seat Invitation."

What is the form of the deity like?

I wish to hear this from the Blessed One.

What is the manner of the peaceful fire offering and the rest,
and how is the tormā offering performed?

Meditate on forms and the rest with one-pointed mind —
hear this, O Vajra, now.

The intelligent one should know how to recite
before the fire rites and the rest involving mantra, mudrā, fire offering,
recitation, and meditative absorption.
Immediately after the ground is purified,
diligently establish the characteristics of the platform.
From eight finger-breadths and more,
beginning from one cubit,
take it up to however many cubits short of a thousand.
The eighth destroys enemies;
likewise the tenth brings increase;
the twelfth brings those under one's power;
the fourteenth brings peace itself;
sixteen thumb-widths
cause the lineages to flourish openly;
eighteen thumb-widths
cause the cattle lineages and such to flourish openly;
a fire pit of twenty finger-breadths
pacifies a city and the surrounding region.

In width, from three parts of the cloth-measure,
dig it to two parts.
Of what is dug, by an eighth of that,
make the lip of the opening.
By half of the lip,
make the outer rim.
The rim having eight parts —
make eight parts of lotus petals.
To the outside of the lotus,
extend it by the width of one finger.
Inside the fire pit, place the vajras;
inside the lotus, place them there.
For wrathful rites, make it triangular;
for peaceful rites, make it square.
Completely round for subjugation,
and the same likewise for increase.
For expulsion, make it as a half-moon;
for invocation and binding, make it octagonal.

Apply each in due order.

For peaceful, enriching, and empowerment rites and the rest, arrange the marks of the five buddhas
in their proper directions.

At the four stations of the vessel's rim,
adorn them with the marks of the buddhas.

The half-moon vajra, exceedingly beautiful,
is to be placed at each corner and corner.

In whatever place is the seat, likewise,
a fire pit of twelve finger-widths
and half a cubit in height —
place the heap of tinder in a beautiful manner.

In the eight stations of the lotus petals,
arrange the goddesses in rows.

The yogin should apply the measurements of this in a particularly fitting way.

Oṃ hi li hi li ki li be tā li hūṃ phaṭ.

This is the mantra for the rite of use.

By meditating on the wisdom ḍākinīs,
protect your own body.

Guard it by arranging all eight limbs:
on the tongue, water itself;
on the ear and nose, space;
on the eye, earth.

Likewise, the human being is at the brahma-aperture;
at the throat is the stupefied guide;
movement abides at the heart;
the afflictions are spread throughout;
at the root of the navel are the cattle.

Know this protection by eight limbs
to be the deities.

With the mudrā of the three banners,
touch the eight limbs and protect them.

Emanating your own body into the very identity
of the wisdom ḍākinī,

white as a kunda flower and the moon,
adorned and bedecked with all ornaments,
seated in the bodhisattva posture, with two hands,
clad in exceedingly beautiful garments,
holding in the hand a khaṭvāṅga and vajra,
brilliantly lit throughout with a blazing garland —
rest your own body in meditative equipoise
and meditate with the breath unmoving.

Then purify the ground:

Oṃ ha na ha na krodha hūṃ phaṭ.

Extend the right hand,

visualize it as a vajra, and press it to the ground.

This is the mantra and mudrā for purifying the ground.

Join both hands into fists, palms together,

extend the two index fingers, showing them fully.

This mudrā is the one for purifying them.

Oṃ śrī svāhā — the mantra for purifying with butter.

Oṃ a svāhā — the mantra for washing the substances.

Oṃ jriṃ svāhā — the mantra for purifying grain.

Oṃ ku ru ku ru svāhā — the mantra for purifying the substances of finest food and so forth.

Oṃ a svāhā — the mantra for purifying yama-wood.

Having visualized a lotus in the middle of the fire,
invoke the fire deity.

Clench the left hand into a fist,

and extend the wrathful finger and the middle finger.

At the third joint of the middle finger,

visualize the wrathful one and insert it to invoke.

Oṃ āgaccha āgaccha agne jaḥ svāhā.

Visualize him seated on a lotus throne

in the center of the fire pit:

a garland of entrails poured over his head, the color of white sugar,

hair twisted in a topknot, tinged with yellow,

clad in exceedingly beautiful garments,

blazing entirely with light like fire —

meditate on him in the midst of the fire.

Then, according to whatever is available,
make offering with the five substances,
and into the tongue of the fire deity in the midst of the fire,
pour the oblations all around, three by three.

Join the two hands, palms together,
and open them slightly in the manner of a lotus,
extending the middle finger straight throughout.

Oṃ ju hu ju hu agne svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the heart of fire.

Then, with effort, meditate that three coals
are absorbed into the fire and blaze.

With full awareness of the place of fire,
then begin the purification:

Oṃ hūṃ ṭa ṭi hūṃ phaṭ.

With the hand holding the vajra,
scatter flowers, mustard seeds, and water
in all directions,
and pour them into the fire.

This is the mantra and mudrā of purification.

Oṃ vajra prākāra hūṃ phaṭ.

Hold the left palm facing outward,
and with the right hand showing the snake gesture, join them back to back, then circle it toward the direction of the lord of power.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the enclosure.

Extend both hands
and touch the fingertips to one another.

Oṃ jruṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the vajra net.

Clench the left hand into a fist
and extend the thumb downward.

Oṃ prum svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the ritual peg.

Visualize a lotus in the midst of the fire, adorned with a solar maṇḍala.
Within it, meditate upon a vajra at the center,
shrouded by a white parasol.

The vajra has five prongs;
visualize its color as red and so forth.
From blazing multicolored rays of light,
at the center of the solar maṇḍala,
bring forth a vajra form.
Arising from one's own breath,
appearing upon the offering seat,
meditate upon it in the color of the activity.

The two hands hold a khaṭvāṅga and a vajra.
It is arrayed and adorned with every ornament.
Having generated the vajra form,
arising from one's own breath,
into whatever this body of oneself is,
absorb the wisdom ḍākinīs.

In the midst of the fire, by means of the all-knowing one,
make offerings of various substances.
Om ṭhaḥ ṭhaḥ ṭhaḥ svāhā.
This is the mantra of the full-ladle offering.

Visualize a ladle to the right;
likewise, purify the vessel to the left.
Om hūṃ svāhā.
This is the root mantra and mudrā.

Extend the right hand,
and recite: Om pratīccha sugandha hūṃ svāhā.
This is the mantra and mudrā of incense.

From that same extended hand, join the thumb and index finger:
Om puṣpa māle hūṃ svāhā.
This is the mantra and mudrā of flowers.

From that same fist, extend the thumb:
Om tikṣṇa dīpe hūṃ svāhā.
This is the mantra and mudrā of the lamp.

From that same flower mudrā, raise the middle finger:

Oṃ dhūpe śvari hūṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of incense smoke.

Extend both hands, and move the thumbs and middle fingers:

Oṃ kuru kuru mahā paliṃ hūṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the ritual cake.

Into the mouth of the fire, reciting once each time, burn a ball of substance at the center with each recitation.

Having gathered all the remainder beyond seven,
place it in a ball at the center;
remaining there in the manner of what went before,
strive until the conclusion is complete,
then burn all the remainder.

When the burning is finished, visualize all the deities dissolving into one's own body.

Complete every full-ladle offering with mantra and mudrā.

Fill the vessel with butter,
pour it into the midst of the fire,
draw it out so the breath becomes empty,
and cause it to dissolve into one's own body.

Then, upon one's own body itself,
the skilled practitioner meditates.
At the center, the deity of fire —
having visualized it with skill,
burn the remainder three times,
make offerings, and present the ritual cake.

Take up the melody of auspiciousness,
and apply the mudrā there.

Other fire offerings distinguished by their activity
are explained here in brief, not in detail.

Śāli rice, husked grain, white sesame, white mustard, barley, and dūrvā grass seeds,
mixed together with butter and milk,
and a milk porridge blended with honey —

these in particular are to be burned.

From the five milk-bearing trees, a measure of fourteen finger-widths:
when the occasion for pacifying activity arrives,
this is the supreme rite of the fire offering.

Black sesame, black lentils, red śāli rice,
incense, saffron, and milk,
mixed with butter and honey,
and a milk porridge enriched with butter —
these in particular are to be burned.

From the five milk-bearing trees, arrow-wood of ten finger-widths:
if the practitioner desires the activity of increase,
let them burn these especially.

Red and black sesame, nāgakeśara, priyangu,
likewise sketṣeu and honey, combined with butter;
tāṅgśiṇ, banyan, nāga-wood, and vāśaka,
arrow-wood of twelve finger-widths:
these are supreme for the activity of magnetizing.

Black sesame, black lentils, the great black palāśa fruit,
hot black butter and blood mixed and smeared together;
luṅtaṇ wood, sour wood, balāta wood, and kuli wood —
arrow-wood of eight finger-widths in measure —
these are supremely renowned for the activity of subjugation.
White mustard, mon-peas, gre'u, and se'u,
mixed with dust from the road,
smeared with blood and black butter of snow —
these are supremely renowned for the smearing.

Taking the arrow-wood of golden wood and vāśaka,
one burns them for that very same activity.
These are supremely renowned for the activity of expulsion.

Fish, flesh, and similar substances,
all grain flours,
smeared with blood and honey,
along with crow feathers,
wood from a crow's nest,
and toothwood — having prepared these, cast them forth.

One possessed of diligence should apply these
for the activities of binding.

Now the distinguishing characteristics of the fire-offering shall be explained further in particular.

In the śrīva tree smeared with curd, butter, and honey,
five hundred pieces of arrow-wood from the awakening tree
are to be burned.

Remaining in meditative equipoise at the center of this,
having made aspiration and performed ablution,
even a king whose sovereignty has declined shall swiftly come under the power of the ruler of the three earths.

Burning butter, milk, and honey together with arrow-wood from the lotus tree in fire —
if one burns these a full hundred times a hundred,
one shall swiftly become possessed of splendor and glory.
Whatever activity one has in mind,
all of it shall be accomplished here.

Now the characteristics of the student who is to be fully received shall be explained.

One whose every limb is complete,
who is tamed, whose conduct is peaceful,
who has manifest faith in the Three Jewels,
who always delights in the Great Vehicle,
who knows the application of mantra and tantra,
who is skilled in all crafts and the art of drawing,
who has evident joy in the application of meditative concentration,
who, with reverence, listens, reads, and so forth,
and is always respectful toward the teacher,
who strives in virtuous activities such as generosity,
who takes no delight in desires,
and does not depend on pleasures and enjoyments,
who is without anger and without arrogance,
who does not speak harshly or with base comportment,
who does not slander all sentient beings,
and likewise does not slander gods and teachers —

those who have a malicious mind and bear a cunning nature,
who are always possessed of a mind inclined toward evil,
who are frivolous and speak harshly:
these kinds of persons are to be rejected.

This is the first section, excerpted in sequence from the fire-offering ritual of another's seat.

Now, goddess of vision born of the gods, I wish to hear:
what is the fire-offering of milk like?
And what are the characteristics of the water fire-offering and so forth?
Listen, O Vajra, to the true characteristics of the water offering and so forth.

Having spread out various garments over a surface of woven wool, one should anoint the whole space — which should be very spacious and four-cornered —
with fragrance entirely.

In the center, the water vessel and so forth
are to be anointed with white perfume.
Mixed with water and milk,
the vessel is to be made beautiful and pure.
The eight vases are also to be placed in the eight directions.
Fill these brimming with scented water,
and adorn their mouths with fresh leaves.

Instantly manifesting oneself as a wisdom ḍākinī, one worships oneself with offerings of flowers, incense, fragrance, and similar substances.
After that, by placing things externally outside,
one applies the water activities.

Joining the two palms together,
open them slightly in the manner of a lotus.
The mantra and mudrā of the lotus:
Oṃ kamale bhisvāhā.

Within the water arranged in a lotus adorned with a circle of the moon,
wrapped in a white parasol,
one is to meditate upon the seed syllable in the center.
From the seed syllable arising from one's own breath,

one generates a form.

In the posture of a hero with two hands,
fully adorned with all ornaments,
the two hands hold a vajra staff,
the complexion is exceedingly beautiful white,
smiling and bearing a graceful allure,
clothed in supremely beautiful garments.

The samaya mudrā and so forth are displayed,
and one applies the samaya mantra.

The two hands are bound together, fist within fist —

the two index fingers extended,
bound together by the two index fingers.

This is renowned as the samaya mudrā.

Oṃ samaye tiṣṭha hūṃ phaṭ.

This is the samaya mantra and mudrā.

In the east is the vajra goddess of the vase,
in the north she who is called the Fierce One,
in the west is she who is the zombie-raiser,
and in the south abides the Wrathful One.

She who is called the Lioness holds power in that quarter.

Likewise at the fire-corner is the Tigress,

and at the corner of absence of truth is the She-Wolf.

She who makes the hūṃ sound, the Owl, belongs to the wind direction.

In each direction, one is to display the characteristic marks and the samaya mudrā.

They bear the bodily complexion of one's own form,
and the mantras and mudrās are displayed.

With flowers, incense, fragrance, and the rest,
the skilled one is to make offerings.

The two vajra fists are bound together,
the left is placed at the heart,
and with the right one draws upward from above.

This is renowned as the root mudrā.

Oṃ jrūṃ hūṃ svāhā.

This is the root mantra and mudrā.

White flowers such as kunda and the rest,
with dūrvā grass inserted at their tips,
are to be scattered upon the vajra crown
atop the goddess's head.

Reciting the secret mantra once,
one makes the offering with a single application.
By performing this act ten thousand times,
one comes to know all things and life increases.

Red flowers of the oleander,
combined with dūrvā grass:
by performing this act a hundred thousand times,
all households are well known to become pacified.

The nāga flower and the wood of the yamā tree,
soaked in milk, are to be offered.
By performing this act a hundred thousand times,
a village is made pacified.

The wood of the lotus, recited over a hundred thousand times
and applied to all acts,
makes a region and district become pacified.

With writing-grass, aṅkola, bilva,
and likewise blue lotus and kumuda,
when applied to the rites of kings and the like,
the territories of enemies are destroyed.

The mantra practitioner who always offers the protective water offering:
by this especially, activities of increase will be accomplished.

This concludes the second section, extracted in sequence from the rite of the Seat of Another.

Now listen, great Vajra Victor:
the defining marks of liberation beyond saṃsāra.
Freed from both the existent and the non-existent,
having utterly abandoned the pure and the impure.
By utterly relinquishing these two entities,
this is called the non-dual Dharma.
Form is empty from beginning to end:
abiding in the middle way, in equipoise.

The pure and the impure in the middle way
are to be regarded with sole equanimity.
The reliance and the non-reliance — the middle way —
its equanimity arises from primordial wisdom.
The body abides in equanimity,
and speech too abiding in equanimity:
because this arises from the primordial wisdom of equanimity,
one is to look with the view of equanimity.

What is the view of equanimity like?
I wish to hear from the Blessed One.
How am I to seek the very nature
of what is called the non-dual Dharma?
Listen, Vajra, to the defining marks of non-dual wisdom,
exactly as they are.

Having utterly abandoned the two entities,
the one possessing wisdom speaks the non-dual Dharma
as the three purities, to be stated
as the lowest of all yogas:
Om svabhāvaśuddhaḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho'ham.
Om vajraśuddhaḥ sarvadharmāḥ vajraśuddho'ham.
Om yogaśuddhaḥ sarvadharmāḥ yogaśuddho'ham.

In order to render all things unsurpassed,
one joins the palms and recites these.

In a pleasant and agreeable location,
basing oneself in a pure place,
one is to arrange the offering of grains,
spread out various garments,
erect one's own victory banner,
draw a yantra and make it beautiful,
and at all ten stations likewise
make a maṇḍala of fragrance.

In an instant, by the method of yoga,
one is to contemplate one's own body.
Having seized the wisdom ḍākinīs,
one pleases oneself with offerings.

With the hands placed palm upward,
one is to examine the vajra therein,
and dissolve it into the five stations.
One is to perform the spreading below the ground.

With the prostration that has the quality of subduing —
One is to apply the syllable HŪṂ.

Above Mount Meru one is to visualize
a city arisen from gold,
endowed with four colors and more,
surrounded and adorned with the seven precious jewels,
festooned with networks of golden bells,
level and melodious in whatever way one desires.

First of all, over every mudrā,
one is to bind the samaya mudrā.
Forming the two vajra fists,
place the left upon the heart
and insert the right beneath the armpit.
This is to be known as the samaya mudrā.

The prostration that has the quality of burning —
just as the vajra itself is the seed:
by means of mantra and mudrā such as these,
the samaya is likewise to be revealed.

The lion throne in its five aspects
is to be applied at the qualified stations.
Having visualized the solar seat,
one is to adorn it with a white parasol.

In the center, one is to meditate with skill
upon the wisdom ḍākinī arisen from one's own breath,
blazing with rays of many colors:
three faces, six arms,
seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,
draped and enveloped in flowing unbound hair,
made beautiful by the five buddhas,
deep blue in color, supremely fierce,

swathed entirely in emanation ornaments.

The three faces — one of laughter, one of wrath, one of passion —
each with three eyes,

laughing Ha-ha, baring the teeth,

supremely beautiful, clad in red garments.

The first hand holds a khaṭvāṅga raised upward,

the second holds an enemy's head,

the third holds a vajra.

The left hands: one rings a bell resoundingly,

the second holds a skull-cup,

the third likewise brandishes a sword.

A skilled practitioner is to meditate upon her
at the center, blazing with rays of many colors.

To the east of the wisdom ḍākinī:

arisen from one's own water-element,

draped and enveloped in flowing unbound hair,

two-armed, seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,

adorned with all ornaments,

holding in her hands a khaṭvāṅga and a yogin's skull-cup,

swathed in most beautiful garments,

blazing with rays of many colors —

one is to meditate upon her as the Vajra Ḍākinī.

To the north, in the region of wisdom ḍākinīs:

arisen from one's own fire-element,

supremely beautiful, yellow in color,

seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,

beautifully adorned with flowing unbound hair,

swathed entirely in emanation ornaments,

her body clothed below in beautiful garments,

two hands holding a khaṭvāṅga and a yogin's skull-cup —

one is to meditate upon her as the Fierce Ḍākinī.

To the west, in the region of wisdom ḍākinīs:

arisen from one's own wind-element,

two-armed, seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,

entirely red in color,

holding a khaṭvāṅga and a yogin's skull-cup,
beautified by flowing unbound hair,
the whole body adorned with emanation ornaments,
clad in most beautiful garments,
blazing with rays of many colors —
one is to meditate upon her as the Zombie Ḍākinī.

To the south, in the region of wisdom ḍākinīs:
arisen from the wisdom of earth,
two-armed, seated in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,
supremely beautiful, deep blue in color,
holding a khaṭvāṅga and a yogin's skull-cup,
swathed in all ornaments,
supremely beautiful with flowing unbound hair,
making beings tremble with fierce laughter Ha-ha,
blazing with rays of many colors —
one is to meditate upon her as the Fierce-and-Savage Ḍākinī.

These five ḍākinīs arisen from one's own five elements
are called the Five Ḍākinīs;
the five are to be meditated upon as fivefold,
their forms and so forth supremely beautiful.

In the direction of the powerful one,
one is to visualize a lion's face,
white-yellow in color,
seated on an elephant throne,
holding a vajra hook, the forefinger extended in the threatening gesture,
clad in most beautiful garments —
one is to meditate upon her as a body blazing
with rays of many colors.

At the fire-boundary: she who is called the Tigress,
seated on a throne of seven precious jewels,
two hands white and blue in color,
clad in most beautiful garments.

the right hand adorned with an iron hook,
the left holding a lasso with the forefinger in the threatening gesture —
one is to meditate upon her as a body blazing

with rays of many colors.

The goddess of truth's absence, the Jackal-Faced One,
who strikes terror with the laugh "ha ha,"
is seated upon the throne of Māhāyanī.
Her color is red and blue,
clad in most beautiful garments.
Her two hands, most beautifully holding hook, lasso,
and the forefinger in the threatening gesture,
are arrayed with ornaments of serpents.
One is to meditate upon her as a body blazing
with rays of many colors.

At the wind-boundary: the goddess who is the Owl-Faced One,
yellow and red in color,
perfectly seated upon a nāga throne —
the same ornaments are to be applied to her.
Her two hands in the bodhisattva cross-legged posture
hold the threatening finger, hook, and lasso.
One is to meditate upon her as a body blazing
with rays of many colors.

Outside the eight ḍākinīs of the center
there are four in the outer directions.

In the east: the Queen of ḍākinīs,
her two hands white in color,
seated upon a hungry ghost throne,
arrayed with serpent ornaments,
intensely fierce with hair unbound,
blazing perfectly with rays of many colors —
her two hands placed at her mouth,
she blazes intensely with the laugh "ha ha."

In the north: the Blazing Queen of Power, deeply yellow in color and blazing,
her two hands held above her crown
in the gesture of joined palms, blazing like a lamp,
with a fierce and burning form,
adorned with most beautiful garments,

seated upon a hungry ghost throne —
one is to meditate upon her blazing with rays like fire.

The western goddess, the Dripping One,
red in color and terrifying,
seated upon a hungry ghost throne,
clad in most beautifully adorned garments,
pressing down upon the hungry ghost throne completely,
holding a red thread in her hand,
with palms joined — she who drinks blood,
fierce, with light blazing like fire:
she is renowned as the goddess called the Dripping One.

In the south: she who Steals Speech,
black in color with uniform radiance,
dwelling on a hungry ghost throne,
her hair adorned and blazing upward,
clad in most beautiful red garments,
ornamented with serpent ornaments,
holding in her hand a stake with the threatening finger pressed upon it,
she liberates sentient beings from the darkness of delusion —
fierce, with light blazing like fire:
one is to meditate upon her with complete expertise.

Before the forms of all these
the pledges (samaya) are to be displayed.

For the seven purposes of wind and fire,
one is to distinguish the seed syllable of the Vajra Mother.
Sound and bindu are fully pressed —
this is to be called the "Stream of Rain."

The first syllable of the "Obeisance, burner of boundaries" verse is the seed of the wisdom ḍākinī.

The first seed of the first vowel sound
is the syllable of "Obeisance, burner of boundaries":
it is renowned as the seed syllable
of the Vajra Ḍākinī of the eastern direction.

The second vowel letter
is to be joined with "Obeisance, burner of fire":

this is the syllable dwelling in the northern direction —
it is the seed of the Fierce Ḍākinī.

These seed syllables here
are to be placed in the hollow of a staff.

The syllable of "Obeisance, first, burner of boundaries"
belongs to the Zombie Goddess of the west.

To these seed syllables here,
a bindu is to be added above.

"Obeisance joined with the final burning"
belongs to the Ferocious One of the southern direction.

The first neuter seed syllable
is joined with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries":
it is renowned as the seed syllable
of the powerful goddess, the Lion-Faced One.

The second neuter seed syllable
is joined with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries":
it is declared to be the suchness seed syllable
of the fire-boundary goddess, the Tigress.

Likewise the third neuter seed syllable,
joined with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries," belongs to the Goddess of Truth's Absence, the Jackal-Faced One — it is her distinctive seed syllable.

The fourth neuter letter
is joined with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries."
It is perfectly joined as the seed syllable of the Owl-Faced One who utters "hūṃ" at the wind-boundary.

These five are the great groups of five.

Take the second letter of the group.
Join the seed syllable to the root with the sound,
with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries at the first":
know it to be the seed syllable
of the eastern ḍākinī, the Queen of Victory.

Likewise, for the fifth group,
take the second letter in the same way.

Join it with E and with the drop (bindu):
with "Obeisance, burner of boundaries at the first,"
join this as the seed syllable of the northern goddess, she who makes blaze.

For the fifth group likewise,
take the second letter.

Join it with O and with the half-Ra and the drop.
At "Obeisance, burner of boundaries at the first,"
it is the distinctive seed syllable
of the western goddess, she who drips.

For the fifth group likewise,
having taken the second letter,
join the hook letter of hope.
Joined with "Obeisance" at the burning boundary,
it is perfectly renowned as the seed syllable
of the southern goddess, she who seizes.

Now, the mudrās.

Interlock the two fists,
extend the two middle fingers,
and bring their tips together:
show this to the Wisdom Goddess.

Joining the two hands palm to palm,
bring the two middle fingers and thumbs together,
and raise them slightly:
show this to the Vajra Lady of the east.

Interlock the two fists evenly,
extend the two thumbs,
and beginning from the north,
show this seal also to the Fierce One.

Having formed this seal,
extend the two little fingers:
this is for the Risen-Corpse Lady abiding in the west.
Explain it as directed toward the south.
This is the fourth seal.

Interlock the two vajra fists,
extend the two wrathful fingers,
and rest with their tips touching:
this is the seal of the four boundaries.

Press the two palms together at the mouth
and apply "phu":
this is the seal of the eastern ḍākinī.

Join the two palms together
and place them on the crown of the head:
show this seal to the Blazing One abiding in the north.

Press the palms together at the mouth
and say "hūṃ":
this is to be applied as the seal
of the western goddess, she who drips.

Rotate the two hands all around,
join them at the fingertips,
place them at the secret place,
and show this to the Seizing One of the south.

Between "Obeisance" and "burning,"
apply the syllable "hūṃ" in the center.
Extending both hands and so forth —
know this as the mudrā of the incense mantra.

With nectar, flavor, and the drop,
together with "Obeisance" and the burning boundary,
extend the incense mudrā,
joining the wrathful finger with the thumb.

By this mantra and this mudrā,
offer everything to all through awareness.

For the first of the first group,
apply "Obeisance, burner of boundaries at the first."
Having joined that very seal,
erect the middle finger.
With the incense mantra and mudrā,
make offering to all the gods.

Take the seed syllable of the nine boundaries.
With "Obeisance" and the burning boundary,
interlock the fist and raise the thumb:
this is the lamp mantra and its mudrā.
Make offering to all the gods.

Take the third of the first group,
join it with the sound and with the drop,
with "Obeisance" and the burning boundary,
and apply the torma mudrā.

Join the two hands,
bringing together thumb and ring finger,
and move them in all directions for an instant.
Apply first the torma mantra,
and as with the previous non-dual torma,
make that very offering here.

First, the five types of substances:
the various hooks, incense, flowers, smoke-offerings, and so forth —
having offered these with mantra and mudrā,
and then with the twenty outer offerings,
the skilled one should make offering.

Taking up the song of "hūṃ,"
please all the yoginīs completely.

Interlock the two vajra fists.

Place them at the level of the hips,
and stir with hūṃ in three limbs.

As a lute held upright,
as a flute blown,
as a copper horn blown,
as a bell struck,
as cymbals clashed,
as a paṭaha drum beaten,
as a dancer's movement moved,
as a fan waved in cooling,
as a victory banner raised,
as a lasso cast,

as a pennant flown,
as an umbrella spread,
as a clay drum beaten,
as a round drum beaten —
smiling in the manner of smiling,
wrathful in the manner of wrath,
coquettish in the manner of coquetry,
playful in the manner of playfulness,
embracing the breast that draws the arrow,
and bowing in the manner of polishing the vajra and making homage:
with all these very things of the eight yoginīs, make offering.

Having taken up that very melody:

I, who am emanated as hūṃ,
take up the song of hūṃ.

Look upon this with the power and eye of vajra-joy.

In the very substance of the syllable, play as intrinsic nature, empty.

Know the Middle Way, freed from what exists and does not exist.

Unchanging, the thought of the arhat remainder.

Joining two, clasping two, possessed of the nature of water —
born of the non-dual Dharma, liberation too is attained.

By bliss, saṃsāra is pressed down, and liberation is released.

All the yoginīs play with all things as they truly are.

The five yoginīs — know that very suchness.

With many forms and illusions, they ripen sentient beings.

The vajra that comprehends all cuts through the darkness of Dharma.

I bow to the yoginīs, the heart of Dharma, the assembly.

I bow to the chief of the yoginīs' Dharma-liberation, definite and supreme.

The yogin, I myself, praise and make homage to the one who liberates sentient beings.

I praise and make homage to that very substance, the single birth of all that is mine.

I praise and make homage to the one who cuts through the delusion of saṃsāra's ocean.

I, always bowing to that very one, the single suchness, praise and make homage.

With these words, make special praise, and make worship with song and eulogy close at hand. At intervals, sound the hūṃ syllable and ring the bell, and set forth the three forms of aspiration.

Press the two vajra palms clasped together toward the region of the heart.

Oṃ svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho'ham. Oṃ vajraśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ vajraśuddho'ham. Oṃ yogaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ yogaśuddho'ham.

Contemplate the right as a lotus,
and raise the left as a vajra.
Encircling with the encircling of the lotus,
rely upon the great seal (mahāmudrā).

Oṃ ha ho hrīḥ svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the great seal blessed with consecration.

The yogin should contemplate all the deities as equal to himself. Examine the outer maṇḍala of those who possess wisdom — the world-protectors (lokapālas) and the rest. Make offering of incense to each separately, scatter flowers to each separately, make fumigation with incense to each separately, and present each offering individually.

Mix the five nectars (pañcāmṛta), and offer them with a fish-ladle and so forth.

With ha, the color is dispersed;
with ho, the fragrance is broken;
with hrīḥ, the potency is broken.
Declare them in this order and sequence.

Having recited each of the three, three times, contemplate them as the three deities.

The lord of the lotus (Padmapati), form beautiful as golden hue, his very nature the water of fragrance, supremely Vairocana in appearance.
Sensation — the lord of the vajra, with vajra in hand.
Contemplate these three as lords of power.

The left hand is the hand of the moon;
in the center of the moon is the nectar,
the syllable that illuminates all, with hook and so forth.
The thumb and finger are the earth itself,

and the ring finger is Mount Meru.

By the power of rubbing, know the nectar water as the three kinds.

To all the yoginīs,

scatter the thumb and offer to each separately, to be drunk.

Below that, one should contemplate the self through one's own substance. The stūpa of the five expanded ones is to be bathed in three ways. Upon the drop at the tip of the tongue, the wise one offers to the three places. Behold the teaching of supreme beauty — see that there is no conceptual thought in this. Brahmin, dog, and outcaste — three — eat together as one in nature. To the wheel of male and female yogins, this verse is to be given.

With the lotus circumambulation as the preliminary, having conceived the mind as crystal clear, upon the lotus seat on the right the vajra's triple point is to be raised. The teaching that comes well from the priceless, free from the stain of attachment and desire — suchness, abandoning apprehended and apprehender — to that reality I pay homage.

Having received this verse, for the sake of the accomplishment of union, the yogin applies all conduct exactly as it is, and everything is called thus, in accordance with bliss. With red substances, make the maṇḍala in groups of three triangles. Bind the two vajra-fists back to back. Raising the two little fingers, raise the two index fingers as well. Drawing the right one slightly inward, by this joining the goddesses are invited.

Om kuru kuru samaya adhipati hūṃ jaḥ svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā for invoking the goddesses.

Place red flowers, and offer incense, lamps, and so forth. Upon the vessel of the expanded torma, place the torma with all nearby provisions. Arrange all foods — raw meat, fish, and so forth — together with the five nectars. Place the vessel on the left side, and on the right display the wrathful one.

Om. A single tree, a charnel ground, a hill, a ravine, a village, a crossroads, a field, and in particular an empty house, a vessel of outcastes, an open plain — and in particular the proper dwelling place:

The black and fierce, the greatly fierce, Devadatta dwelling alongside, the single black one and the ugly one, the one gone beyond old age and the misleader, the one who causes aging and the fierce one, the ugly woman and the wandering one, the queen and the completely victorious one, the unconquerable and the one unconquerable by others, the beautiful black one and the greatly black one, the one bearing black matted hair and the yoginī, the sovereign woman and the lunar woman, the one of fierce hatred and the hanging woman, the robbing woman and the lamp woman, the one who causes dripping and the village-dwelling yoginī, the fierce form and the greatly formed one, the fang-gnashing one and the great skull woman, the skull-garlanded one and the khaṭvāṅga woman, the greatly emanated one, the sword-bearing enemy-slaying one, the vajra-bow bearer, the goddesses who are sovereigns among the gods, likewise the five great ḍākinīs, the accomplisher of all activities, the great queen of the union maṇḍala, likewise the chief sovereign of the vajra, the great body of the Tathāgata, the stainless one who draws out yogins — by this command of the vajra queen, come hither from everywhere, all of you!

Om kakka ḍḍhana. Babbandha na. Khakkhada na. Sarva duṣṭāṃ hana hana ghātaya ghātaya amukyasya śāntiṃ kuru sūṃ hūṃ phaṭ jaḥ svāhā.

Having filled the mouth with nectar, the rank of the activity is made fully manifest. Having meditated on the male and female yogins, all activities are accomplished in succession. Bind the two vajra-fists and join them back to back.

Om tiṣṭha hūṃ bhakṣa bhākṣa jaḥ phaṭ svāhā.

Having joined the appropriate activity-mantras, apply them to the torma activity and so forth. For pacifying, enriching, empowering, hooking, slaying, expelling, separating, and binding — through that very outer torma and its torma activities, accomplish these. Then, from the specificity of the offering, relinquish what is suitable and what is not. The hook and so forth in five forms — these are to be performed as the five realities.

The arrangement of the great hook is as follows. The wisdom deity is what is desired. The hook of the vajra is Akṣobhya. The hook of the place is lordly Ratnasambhava. The hook of the king is Amoghasiddhi. The hook of the moving one is Amitābha. To these five hooks and all that follows, apply suchness throughout. Through desire, satisfy all deities and all female yogins. Yet one should not take delight in desire for its own sake, nor cultivate it for the sake of mere enjoyment. All one's own desires are that very suchness — apply them to the activity of offering and so forth. Within that, the heroes are to be joined with the Āli and Kāli. Through the full union of Āli and Kāli, satisfy all the deities. From what arises at the center, taste all the flavors of the nectar. The remainders of all the substances are to be contemplated as the outer maṇḍala. With a song called Hūṃ, fill everything with the sound of auspiciousness.

Wisdom was invoked for the benefit of embodied beings.

Through embrace and the rest, the two bestow upon each other,
and through union likened to illusion, one is supremely adorned.

To you who liberate beings from conditioned existence, I pay homage.

All one's own desires — with auspicious sound and the utterance of Hūṃ Hūṃ, ring the bell. Bind the vajra-fists and place them firmly at the heart-center. Then, for the sake of all sentient beings without exception, make aspirational prayers:

May all sentient beings be free from illness.

May all sentient beings come to happiness.

Through whatever path beings travel,
may they meet the buddhas themselves.

Those who have not crossed over — I shall ferry across.

Those who have not been liberated — I myself shall liberate.

Right now, with loving affection, establish this in the position of the yogic treatise. Bind the vajra-fist and place it at the left side of the heart. Stretch out the right hand and, beneath it, request the departure.

Oṃ ātma tiṣṭha hūṃ svāhā.

Then, through one's own breath, dissolve the deity back into one's own body. Through the yoga of the instantaneous mode, offer one's own substance. Oṃ sarva duṣṭaṃ gr̥hṇa gaccha hūṃ phaṭ. By means of the three ritual gestures, request the outer deities to depart. This is the third of the three sequential divisions derived from the section on another's seat.

Now, the distinctive features of the five nectars, and by what the five hooks are consecrated — the distinction between what is material and immaterial, the Dharma of non-duality, free from the duality of two — how is the conceptuality of duality to be abandoned? What is the nature of Āli and Kāli? What are the modes of the yogic treatise? And what is the mind of the outer mudrā? We wish to hear this from the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then declared: First, the water of the vajra-nectar enters fully into the essential nature of the five. When touched it is warm — that is fire. What appears like smoke — that is wind. Of fluid nature, it is called water.

Because it appears as form, it is earth. Blessed by wisdom, it is vajra. Meditate upon these as the five deities.

The form of water in its entirety and fire that utterly consumes it, and likewise wind ever present, and faith — analogous in meaning to the sovereign of earth — the five letters of wisdom are to be joined with sound and with the bindu. In the center of that, at the center of the moon, is the letter of the nectar. Let the five be spoken as five. Through the vajra-water, which is purified and freed from the material and the immaterial, delusion is thereby eliminated. The outer nectar, that excellent substance, is like something purified by being cooked in fire. Deities and the rest, cooked in fire, expel what remains as excrement and urine. After being cooked and purified by fire, into the center of that purifying fire, always offer the fire-sacrifice. The seed of the vajra-water — having recited, with the seed descending — then, in the center of that, upon the sun, visualize the charnel-ground letter and burn it. Because it is freed from the material and the immaterial, one thereby grows distant from bewilderment.

The Lord of the Lotus, exceedingly beautiful of form —

The essence of fragrant water is Vairocana, exceedingly beautiful. The Tasting One is Vajreśvara; the hand holds the vajra. Know these three deities in their three aspects. With the syllable HA, scatter the color. With the syllable HO, destroy the odor. With the syllable HRĪḤ, destroy the power. Declare them in that sequence, explicitly and in order.

What is called the nectar-juice: its aspects are renowned in three forms. Because it is freed from the material and the immaterial, one thereby grows far distant from bewilderment.

Declare it as the Ālī bee. The bee is Vajrabhairava. The Ālī, whose nature is the dharmadhātu touching the limits of space, is the intrinsic nature. It has a secret mind, moving and unmoving, and engenders the entire body without remainder. From the eighteen root channels, the nectars of all the sense faculties are drawn out from within that, and dissolve into the center of the Ālī.

Through the sound of Vajrabhairava, the substances of union are produced. For the sevenfold meaning of wind and fire, apply the seed of Vajramā. Pressed perfectly by sound and by the drop, declare it the stream of rain. The first and supreme vowel, the seed — hold it in the center of that. Because it is freed from the material and the immaterial, one thereby grows far distant from bewilderment.

The Kālī presses all the flowers. The flower of the vajra-body engenders all of saṃsāra and is called the Earth and the Mother of All. In this ocean of the water of primordial wisdom, likewise the wisdom-water is the crocodile-fish. In the center of the non-dual mud, the sprout of skillful means is likewise present. Like the Bandhuka flower, open-mouthed, it abides in the letter as the nectar of honey. That very Kālī nectar is likewise surrounded by the flower-water. The two letters become the drop, and the sound is joined again at the root. That very seed of the letter is the Mother of the lineage of the gods. Visualize it in the center of the moon. By meditating on the nectar-seed, because one is freed from the material and the immaterial, one thereby abandons bewilderment entirely.

Declare it the Ālaṃ bee. The Kālī is the Tathāgatī. Those born from the two bodies: the supreme ritual of the nectar. That which belongs to the third section: take up the third letter. With the latter staff, the one possessing the vajra, bind it in a chain. By the suchness of the five nectars, anoint the very self of the embodied one. Through knowing the distinctions of the five nectars, one will become deathless, will see the gate of the destinies of beings, and the pure body will be without fault. By knowing all the compoundings of the nectar, taste the nectar according to one's own wish.

Listen to the vajra-truth of the distinctions of the five foods exactly as it is. Whoever, knowing them, eats them, will swiftly come to see the destinies of beings. Great intelligence, speech, rivalry with one's lineage, contact and movement, and the great iron hook: the yogin should enjoy these like crystal. Reciting the seed of consciousness, take up that seed. Enjoying with a crystal mind, the yogin will cut through bewilderment. Eat with a pure mind. It is the single iron hook for obstructors. Joining it to its main branch: with the seed syllable HŪṂ, it is to be joined to the iron hook. The iron hook of the master of the place is itself the seed syllable GRI. Having purified it thoroughly and contemplated it, abandon conceptual thought from afar. That which abides in the center of the horse's iron hook is to be laughed at by all vidyā. The yogin should contemplate the syllable JRIM as a pure crystal. Consecrated by the vajra iron hook, it is declared the vajra-body. Having arranged what is called SRI, eat it: yogins will be purified of misdeeds. On the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and especially on the eighth of the month, the yogin who desires attainments should strive earnestly and offer the torma. By the accomplishing practitioner, teach the yoga treatise.

If one constantly performs the work of offering, both conduct and liberation as desired, and all actions will be accomplished. Even when going to the king's palace, one will swiftly come to possess splendor and glory. Friends, lovely and pleasing to the mind, will be won by mere sight. Even a pauper afflicted by poverty will find the household prosperous and flourishing. At the time of death, the yogin will be reborn in Sukhāvatī.

When one is in possession of the ten substances combined with fragrant perfumes, one should recite the ten-syllable mantra a hundred thousand times, with prostrations and fire offerings at its boundary, and with the blessing of the ḍākinī torma. By the smoke of this earth, the accomplishing practitioner will cause all beings to become bewildered.

When the yogin makes the bindus from the ten substances combined with saffron, possessing one another's essence, beings who go about will come to have good fortune.

When one applies the limbs with the ten substances combined with sandalwood, even one who is ill with a mortal disease will not be released to death.

When one gives as food and drink the ten substances combined with the hands of the sense faculties, those without power will come under one's power. Having recited the mantra a hundred thousand times and consecrated the ḍākinī torma, these should be put into action. There is no doubt in what I have taught.

If one makes the bindu in the place of the non-dual captain, one will come to attain armor. In this very essence of the vehicle of non-duality, one will be victorious over saṃsāra.

The one of good fortune, luminous as nectar, who gazes upon sentient beings with love; she who seizes happiness and suffering alike, adorned likewise with an alluring grace; she who holds ordinary pride and grasps at self; she who lacks exertion and she who has the mind of exertion; she of good fortune who bewilders all the gods; she who utterly vanquishes and destroys the nature of existence through wicked intellect; the goddess who is loving-kindness herself; the renowned one who possesses delightful nectar; the goddess herself who is endowed with qualities: through the actions of these goddesses, bestow the desire for both conduct and liberation. Thus these goddesses endowed with qualities should be worshipped by the wise.

For the sake of the true goal of the accomplished yogin, through the activities of the messenger's work, please hear from the Blessed One the sādhanā of the four yoginīs. Through engagement in the messenger's work, just as it truly is, listen with the vajra. Striving supremely, the essence of all actions, accomplish the messenger.

In the presence of a single tree, recite a hundred thousand times according to the ritual. Upon a cloth that is four cubits wide and one cubit in breadth, one should draw: twelve thumbs in measure, of a beautifully beautiful yellow color, a goddess with two hands joined at the crown of the head, radiating blazing rays of light. Having displayed this before the practitioner, strive and commence the ritual of offering. With perfume, red flowers, and dried meat, perform the smoke offering. Offer a torma prepared with meat, fish, and so forth as enjoyed fare. Worship with the five substances as the five actual things, and likewise recite a hundred thousand times. On the first occasion, sound will arise; on the second, the fragrance of fish will be sensed; on the third, the trees will tremble; on the fourth, she will be present before one.

Then, having recited her mantra, display the samaya mudrā:

OM DĪPEŚVARĪ HŪṂ PHUḤ

Joining the two palms together, place them upon the crown of the head and recite. This is the samaya, the mantra, and the mudrā. Offer the samaya water filled with the five nectars. Having striven and given the samaya, taking her with the left hand, without duality with the yoginī, bless and accomplish me.

Then, having taken on one's own form, feasts of food and drink and whatever else one wishes, gold and so forth —

she will swiftly grant whatever is commanded. For half a session, engage together in union. If the yogin who yearns for union does not achieve accomplishment, then recite the fierce seed-syllable. By merely pressing the two seed-syllables together, strike the head of the blazing mother. Summon her for the sake of benefiting sentient beings. Accomplish her as the lesser blazing one. From another accomplished dākinī, hear the vajra of that reality exactly as it is.

On a low surface of two cubits, consecrate offerings and a torma, and below it draw the form: white and red, supremely beautiful, seated in a playful posture with two hands, wearing garments of great beauty, holding an iron hook with the threatening gesture of the index finger in the hand, adorned with loose, flowing hair, blazing and brilliant with rays of light like fire. Draw her with her left eye wide open, laughing with the sound "Ha ha." In a charnel-ground site, the practitioner hangs the drawn image. Smearing it entirely with blood, offer red flowers and the like, flowers, incense, fragrance, meat, fish, garlic, and so forth. Fill with the five nectars for the torma offering of service. Having recited through yogic meditation one hundred thousand times, accomplishments will arise. Joining the two palms together, place them at the mouth and chant aloud:

OM ḌĀKINĪ HŪṂ PHRUṂ PHUḤ

This is the mantra and mudrā of accomplishment. On the first, the earth will quake; on the second, a loud laugh will resound before one; on the third, a vision will appear before one; on the fourth, one receives the command word. Having striven and given the distinctive samaya of the five nectars, accomplishing her as a servant-woman, one may command her whatever one wishes. Slaying and afflicting enemies, tormenting their limbs — whatever one desires — all such activities and the like are to be accomplished through the service of the servant-woman.

If a spirit affliction occurs after one hundred thousand recitations, press together the seed-syllable of the Vajra-mother according to the rite taught before, and recite skillfully. On a piece of leather from a clean-shaven goat, stretch it out with effort as a canvas, and insert the drawing of the Moisture-maker. Draw her as supremely beautiful in red color, her body adorned with ornaments, wearing beautiful garments. In the left hand, place the threatening index finger with a lasso, and in the right, a chopper for the enemy. The skilled practitioner accomplishes this at a pleasing crossroads, smears it with incense, and decorates it with various flowers. Offer flowers, incense, butter-lamps, and the like as torma to all spirits. Give blood, fish, meat, garlic, food for the donor, various things, and fill with the five nectars as offering. Remaining there with diligence, recite one hundred thousand times:

OM CUṢĪNĪ ĀKARṢAYA PHUḤ PHATṬ

Joining the two hands together evenly, move through the air in the manner of gathering. This is the essence mantra and mudrā.

When the yogin has recited one hundred thousand times, the Moisture-maker will be accomplished. The signs are: first, the sound of a dog barking; on the second, she appears clearly; on the third, she comes bearing a weapon, approaching threateningly; on the fourth, she stands before one and speaks, saying: "What do you command me to do?" Having given the distinctive samaya of the five nectars, say: "I, a poor one, have accomplished you in order to benefit sentient beings." Each and every day she will give half a measure of gold. If accomplishment does not occur after one hundred thousand recitations, press with the essence of a reanimated corpse and recite. By merely pressing with this seed-syllable, the Moisture-maker's head is struck.

At the bank of a river, accomplish Kāmapuṣpī. Stretch out the hide of a cow and the like and insert therein the drawing of the one who seizes. Her body is adorned with serpents, blazing with blue light in color, adorned with loose, flowing hair.

Clad in red garments, her two hands lovely to behold,
she holds a sword and a lasso.

Laughing loudly with a fierce, gnashing expression,
one smears the maṇḍala with blood,
then fumigates it with incense and flowers.

Offer an extensive torma (ritual cake).

Of meat, fish, onions, and the like,
offer a torma of the things she partakes of nearby.

Offer also a divine torma endowed with the five ambrosias, as before.

The yogin meditates and recites. With one hundred thousand recitations accomplishment will be obtained. First, the water will stir. Second, a great rain will fall. In front, there will come the sound of vajra thunder. Third, lightning will strike. Fourth, she abides before you. Then, with the special substance of the five ambrosias, the pledge offering is made with effort.

Oṃ kṣaṃ kṛuṃ phraṃ phuḥ phaṭ.

With both hands bound in fists, one recites her mantra. This is the essence mantra, the mudrā. Standing before her with palms joined, one says: "What command do you have for me?" She will then say: "At the peak of the snow mountain of Kailāsa, lead me to the summit. And returning here once again, bring whomever you desire, whether a princess or anyone else. Bring them here." Gold, silver, copper, and the like, food and drink and clothing — whatever you wish, she will bring. Whatever wife of gods or humans you desire, she will lead them to the peak of the snow mountain of Kailāsa.

If accomplishment is not obtained by the stated practice, accomplish it by another method. Skillfully meditate upon her as the wisdom ḍākinī herself. Then, pressing with her left foot and reciting five hundred times, accomplishment will be obtained without fail. If even by this it is not accomplished, summon her in the midst of the heroes, chop her to pieces, recite "krīm," and put killing at the end. By meditating on the seed-syllable hūṃ, conceive of devouring her entirely. By this means, the yoginī who is the object of accomplishment — even the mistress of all — if she remains unaccomplished, she will die.

If accomplishment is not obtained by the stated practice, into the midst of blazing fire of the black bhallāṭaka tree, cast white mustard seeds mixed with blood, and at noon, reciting "hūṃ" and burning one hundred and eight of them, the ḍākinīs will die, or else they will come in agitation and distress and assuredly perform all the activities. Of this I have taught, there is no doubt.

O beautiful blue wrathful one, you whose pledge is pleasing, you who carry a staff in hand bound with precious jewels — please grant me permission, that I may be liberated from saṃsāra. O hero, please release and send forth. In the midst of the assembly of yoginīs, open this excellent door and behold!

Yogin and yoginī, of great secrecy — that which is to be known as "secret and known through secrecy" — I wish to hear from the Blessed One the characteristics of the speech mudrā (Skt. mudrā). Hear now from Vajra the exact characteristics of the speech mudrā as they truly are.

On the right side is the yogin, on the left is the yoginī herself. Inserting the fingers into the mouth — this is the sign of the ḍākinī. Placing the palms upon the crown of the head — gho-ghu — this is the sign of the Inflamer. Squeezing the thumb — ghu-ghu — this is the sign of the Drainer. Striking the hand against the ear — mu-ghu — this is the sign of the Wise Snatcher. Snapping the fingers at the tip of the nose — lu-ghu — this is an inquiry as to whether the mind is at ease or not. Ḍaṣṭha: Stroking the chest in the manner of a deer's head is the sign that one is practicing yoga. Gandho-de: Whoever touches the middle of the eyebrows is my dearest companion. Agne-daha: Pressing the tongue with the teeth means "eat the inner torma of the body." Bhakṣa-so: Pulling the hair with the hand means "I have gone to your house." Dve-rati.

Touching the hand to the heart means "now you are my delight." Rucaṭabata: Making a fist at the tip of the nose indicates "there is nothing." Śūnyatā: Extending the hand and striking the belly means "it is abundantly present." Bipdhakasid: Touching oneself at the navel means "I wish to eat food." Caṇḍālikā: Pointing the finger forward means one is fierce with dark wrath and power. Nīladaṇḍapāta: Touching the eyebrow means "show me your desire here." Anangāyuddha: Rolling the tongue means "I am about to die." Durkatī: Looking all around means "I wish to know the date." Tāragaṇa: Beginning from the first of the month, draw marks with the thumb; then touch, in the manner shown before, to indicate the hour, the letter, and so forth. Giriti: Looking upward means "let us enjoy ourselves at midday." Samacchāyā: Looking with a smile, taking hand in hand, and displaying what resembles a great ocean means "grant excellent wealth." Jīrṇabata: Making a double fist with both hands. Salyabada: Touching the ring finger with the thumb means one will not die. Soma: The wrathful one devours the thumb, and so forth. Suryabada: These are the verbal mudrās and the defining characteristics of the signs used in the play of joy among male and female yogins. This concludes the fourth section, called "Another's Seat."

Other defining characteristics of weapons — I wish to hear them from the Blessed One. Having learned what these four suchnesses are like, how are they to be applied? Listen, vajra, according to what they truly are, to the defining characteristics that liberate from saṃsāra. The first suchness is the vajra; the bell is the second. The counting rosary is the third; the gnosis-emblem is the fourth. By the heroic waves of these four suchnesses, liberate the other shore in accordance with desire. The deity of the center is Vairocana; at the very pinnacle, first, is Akṣobhya. At the southern peak arises Ratnasambhava; in the west is set Amitābha. In the northern direction is Amoghasiddhi. These five peaks are the deities. The lotus of awakening with eight petals is to be laid upon the ground exactly as it is. Padmapāṇi, Maitreya, Ākāśagarbha, Samantabhadra, the Lord of yakṣas, Śrī of Others, Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin — these eight deities are to be contemplated in the east and the other directions as they truly are. In the center, at the thirteen-doored gate, the wisdom deity is to be dissolved. On the eight petals, eight goddesses are to be placed in their proper positions as they truly are. The vajra hook likewise, the lasso, the iron chain, and Tārā — these four goddesses are in play in the four directions in the same way. The four quarter-portions are to be contemplated in fourfold form by the wise. Prompting Tārā and the one named Vajra Iron Chain — she who is called "unconquerable by others" — is to be placed on all the quarter petals. The five peaks are ḍākinīs; they are to be contemplated just as they were before. In the east is Vajraḍākinī; in the north is she called the Fierce One; in the west, likewise, is the Risen Corpse; in the southern direction dwells Caṇḍālī; in the center is the Wisdom Ḍākinī. The deity of vajra-suchness is to be known by the wise. In that which is grasped clearly in three parts, adorned magnificently with a girdle of bones, beautiful as a blue lotus or a white water lily, dwelling rightly upon a jewel-lotus — these eight in the directions and so forth, and the buddha of the center, make nine. That very deity of the nine peaks, consecrated by the nine deities: what arises from the crocodile dwells at the peak as a moonbeam of light. This is called "the ninth peak." The wisdom vajra liberates beings. By means of that very vajra-suchness, one contemplates oneself as of the nature of vajra.

The yogin of the vajra-essence should make mind into vajra.
Made stable through vajra-purity,
there are no phenomena other than vajra.
All things are that very vajra —
the essential heart of vajra-action.

The lord of the union of vajra-transference,
the vajra that liberates the wheel —
the lord of the union of vajra-hooking
is endowed with the union of vajra-binding.

The seventh, likewise affliction-bearing,
the lamp accompanied by consciousness:
shattered by the wisdom vajra,
it illuminates in all directions.

The accomplishment of the vajra and all the rest
are to be seen as being of vajra-nature.
The binding of phenomena is the vajra;
the vajra is the supreme effort of liberation.

Taking hold of the vajra-lotus,
one accomplishes all of suchness.
That which has entered the vajra-lotus
is to be accomplished by the wise.

Now hear the characteristics of the bell,
O king who holds the vajra.
The suchness that is the sound of wisdom —
by hearing it, liberation from existence is won.
It abides throughout the expanse of space,
dwelling at the very heart of awakening.

By means of all reasoning, in every direction,
throughout the ultimate extent of the world-realm,
those called "the eight directions"
are renowned as the eight goddesses.
The seeds of the eight syllables
are to be placed in the eight directions.

In the east is the goddess Tārā;
in the north is White-Robed One (Pāṇḍaravāsīnī);
in the west is Māmakī;
in the south is Buddha-Eye (Buddhalocanā) —
beautiful of form, melodious of voice, and lovely.
The fourth is Vajragarland (Vajramālā).

In the center, in the nature of space,
all forms are complete and supremely beautiful.
Arising perfectly upon a blooming lotus,
in the direction of the formless realm,
like a vase of wisdom-nectar,
in the pure abode of wisdom-nectar —
upon the thrones in its very center —
dwells the goddess of the Perfection of Wisdom,
the abode of beautiful form and all good qualities.

The lotuses and vajras above
are to be contemplated as before.
The wisdom staff of the center
is the one who bestows and gathers all.

By the supreme union of vowels and consonants
one is to move through the eight directions.
By the supreme union of vowels and consonants
all of cyclic existence is cut through.
This is the method of the vajra-bell;
by that method one abides at the center of the vajra.

Visualizing the sun on the right, place the moon on the left.
Extend both arms outward
and turn the lotus-form in the hand.
Join skillful means to all bodies.

Contemplate the deities as one wishes.

Liberated by the striking of the vajra,
liberation from cyclic existence truly comes about.

By the song known as Hūṃ,
may all buddhas be caused to delight.
Through the beauty of the vajra's striking,
may all sentient beings be made beautiful.
This is to be made a Dharma of liberation —
vajra, supremely and utterly essential.

Oṃ vajra-ghaṇṭe ho hūṃ. Oṃ vajra-dharma-rāṇita, pra-rāṇita, sampra-rāṇita.
Sarva-buddha-kṣetra-pracālita. Prajñāpāramitā-hā-nā-dā-svabhāvana.
Vajra-dharma-hṛdaya-ava-santoṣaṇi. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ho ho ho. A a a svāhā.

By the image of the union of wisdom and skillful means,
one is to be freed by wisdom and skillful means.

By the Dharma of wisdom-and-means,
beings are to be marked as such —
or, for the sake of sentient beings sunk in the mire of ignorance,
one is to be liberated.

Held by that very vajra-suchness,
ring the Dharma bell of liberation.
The yogin who acts for the benefit of sentient beings
should see wisdom as the means.

The yogin without that suchness
is like the sound of an elephant's bell.
Know that for such a diminished yoga accomplishment is far away.

Then, grasping the secret and subtle characteristics of the vajra —
through whatever correct ritual procedure
one accomplishes desired attainments —
in the circling of the central syllable,
three parts constitute the secret vajra,
and by one part of that very suchness,
the subtle vajra is to be thoroughly examined.

The crown of the head and other places —
always purifying, hold the fist-seal.
The vajra-master who holds the vow of practice
is the supreme one who accomplishes all desired aims.

Taking up the rosary and so forth —
hear this correctly, just as it is, from the vajra.
By whatever correct ritual procedure
accomplishment will come: in this there is no doubt.

Crystal, fish-bone, pearl,
and further, white precious stones and the like —
these are the distinctive rosaries
for distinguished use in the rites of pacification and the rest.

Gold, silver, and copper —
the lotus seed, in particular —
these constitute the rosaries for the rite of increase;
the wise should use them for counting.

Saffron and other fragrant substances,
distinguished from all other scents —
made into pills and cooked to a red hue:
this is supremely renowned for drawing beings under one's power.

Rudrākṣa beads, and likewise elephant-mane seeds,
and human bone as well —
these are to be applied in wrathful rites.
They are supremely renowned for subjugation and fierce action.

For all the rites of pacification, increase, power, and wrath,
the Butratsi material is to be employed.
For accomplishing the mantra, fifty recitations is the number;
for the power rite, half that number is performed.
For pacification, one hundred is the count;
for increase, it exceeds one hundred and eight.
For fierce action, it is sixty.
Apply these according to the distinctions of the rite.

According to the specific distinctions of each rite,
the rosaries are to be examined.
The eight directions, the four intermediate directions,

the center itself, and the nine buddhas —
the thread of the nine deities is to be consecrated by the nine deities.

One whose form is perfect and supremely beautiful,
who is pure, endowed with virtue, and speaks pleasingly —
the rosary tied on by such a person
will give birth to the attainment of liberation.

The threads are in the manner of buddhas;
the beads are arhats.

The lower part is revealed as a stūpa;
the upper part is the dharmadhātu.
The stūpa is the lord of Dharma.

At the middle of the arm, having visualized the sun,
the first vowel letter is placed at the center of the palm.
Upon the red, visualize red.

At the center of the moon on the left,
the nectar syllable is to be visualized —
blazing with rays of light in all colors,
meditate on the white color.

Visualize the right fingers as a vajra;
meditate on the left fingers as the petals of a lotus.
Through the union of vajra and lotus,
place the rosary at the center of their joining.

By meditating on all of that suchness,
consecrate the rosary.
Then the mantra-practitioner should recite,
applying the distinctions of each finger.

The true vajra-woman is the left hand;
the right is the essential nature of the vajra.
White, smoke-colored, and conch-white —
the lotus is the right-hand fingers.

The three scents of civet-musk,
and the left-hand earth-umbrella placed accordingly —

the two thumbs, of primordial wisdom and consciousness, are the ones possessing the action of the hands and so forth.

For pacification, count with the wrathful one;
for increase, with the ring finger;
for subjugation, it is shown with the middle finger;
the little finger is for fierce action.

The thumb as vajra-hook
is the intention of summoning the deity.
When one rests in equipoise, recites, and meditates,
accomplishment will come — in this there is no doubt.

The yogin who lacks that suchness,
recitation of mantra without that suchness,
the vajra bell rung without that suchness,
mudrās arising without that suchness —
by the yogin, no accomplishment is gained.

If the yogin focuses on that suchness,
let all of that suchness be performed in its entirety.

The thing that arises from the cause of letters,
the beautiful heart of the mantra —
when the count is recited with the awareness of no intrinsic nature,
the essence of the yoginī is accomplished.

Whether one is of brahmin, royal, or common birth,
the network of the yoginī is accomplished.

Oṃ padepade mahāpade jñāna sarva buddha mahābhāve hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ ho ho ho āḥ svāhā.

By purifying with this mantra,
the deities of the rosary are accomplished.
All rites whatsoever will be achieved,
and what is unclear will become clear before long.

Those specific distinctions of primordial wisdom —
hear them correctly from the great vajra.
The specific distinctions of primordial wisdom will abide for a long time.

Now the common primordial wisdom is spoken.

Among the lower, the most inferior, and those of inferior rank — yakṣas, asuras, siddhas, nāgas, animals, keepers of secrets, serpents, and kiṃnaras, humans, hungry ghosts, ḍākinīs, sentient beings burning in the hells, and what are described as forms of animals — the subtle ones cannot be seized even at the gate. Water, fire, wind, and likewise the element of earth — all of those that are stable — and roots, fine petals, tree trunks, stones, cliffs, and so forth: all are blessed by primordial wisdom. Without primordial wisdom there would be no arising. All primordial wisdom is awareness of everything. By whatever primordial wisdom liberates, the common wisdom blessing is conferred. As for the remaining specific distinctions, listen to the music of the gods.

The Blessed One declared: the twenty-three divine abodes, each progressively doubling as one ascends. The primordial wisdoms of the five sense pleasures — the wisdom of the higher levels increases as wisdom grows. The wisdom of the secret is tactile. The wisdom of the asuras is wrathful. The wisdom of the hungry ghosts is one of craving. The wisdom of the hells is one of terror. The wisdom of animals is one of dullness. Those that are stable are without mind.

The primordial wisdom of humans consists of the five aspects; these are to be known specifically. Obscured by dullness, muteness, and the deceptive wisdom of women — those possessed of childlike understanding — those very specific distinctions of such wisdom, refined through yogic treatises, have been roused by the wisdom of buddhas over ten million billions of births. Therefore, following the yogic treatises, one should strive and generate faith.

Outer treatises that proclaim sound are comparable to a place of dance. Through the yogic treatises, the intelligent one attains the fruit of practice and liberation. The essence of all essences as a treatise is the secret sequence of yoga. This is the first sequential division from the Prologue to the Yoga of Engagement.

Now the specific distinctions of accomplishment through the wheel — hear them just as they are from the vajra master. The wheel of pacification, enrichment, empowerment, protection, and direct action, with nine or more grid cells, should be encircled by an outer border. The skilled practitioner should meditate upon it with the ritual colors of the wheel's activity.

Om t̄āre tuttāre ture svāhā.

All those seed syllables should be placed with obeisance at the center. At the center, names and protections are also to be set in the same way as words. With the water of the nature of emptiness and equality, one's own karma is to be washed clean. One dwells in the awareness of the equality of all things; protection is performed by means of the protection wheel. If one who possesses primordial wisdom meditates on protection, one will be far removed from all fears.

For sentient beings who have no inherent existence, who face fear through the things of engagement, one should visualize a lotus seat resting at the center of a moon maṇḍala. By meditating on the continuum of Tārā, one's own body is fully emanated.

Oṃ tāre svāhā — this is for the head.

Oṃ tuttāre svāhā — this is for the eyes.

Oṃ ture svāhā — this is for the nose.

Oṃ tu svāhā — this is for the ears.

Oṃ re svāhā — this is for the tongue.

Oṃ tāre ni svāhā — this is at the heart.

These are to be placed permanently on the six limbs.

Noble Tārā is to be visualized: with two hands, in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, adorned with all ornaments, granting fearlessness to all, holding an utpala lotus at her other ear. Having fully meditated on all her rays of light, one should in particular recite the mantra. Meditate on all of this as endowed with qualities.

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture svāhā.

This is the mantra for all rites of protection.

For a royal prison, a hostile direction, traveling on a dangerous road, various ailments and epidemics, death by water or poison, and so forth — in whatever place and whatever circumstance of fear, in that very place and circumstance one should meditate.

Write out a wheel and wear it for wisdom,
attachment, laziness, and the rest.

By this excellent protection
one is freed from every fear.

All these protections
are to be accomplished through the very same application.

On an eight-petaled wheel,
encircled on the outside with a rim,
place in the center — first to last —

all the recitations.

Encircled in turn by a rim of vowels,
one should visualize the wheel as white.

With all the syllables fully opened out,
and having visualized equality as empty,
apply them with the former defining characteristics
exactly as was taught before.

By meditating on this wheel in this way,
wisdom blazes forth through this rite.

Oṃ prajñe prajñe mahāprajñe hūṃ svāhā.

Meditate by visualizing the object blazing with rays of various colors.
Having visualized oneself as the very essence of wisdom
residing at the center of a lunar maṇḍala,
with two hands in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,
completely adorned with all ornaments,
blazing brilliant white in color —
by meditating on the object of wisdom
and reciting this seed-syllable,
wisdom will swiftly increase.
Even one who is dull, inert, and foolish —
through this application, wisdom grows.

Make the heart nine cells;
likewise twelve cells in the middle;
sixteen cells on the outside;
and at the very end, a rim likewise.
Having placed one's own mind in the center —
at the conclusion of the homage and fire-offering, applied at the end —
place the eight syllables in the heart,
endowed with sound and bindu.
For the twelve, place the vowel seed-syllables
and inquire, having excluded the neuter.
The letters of the three groups,
together with the one remaining letter,
those endowed with sound and bindu —

place them in the sixteen positions.
The rim is to be encircled entirely
by the killing letter, and by all the vidyās.

The first is to be visualized as white.
The second, visualize as yellow.
The third is red.
Likewise the fourth is blue.

As before, endowed with the former defining characteristics,
rest perfectly in emptiness as equality.
Having aroused the view of equality,
meditate on this wheel.
By meditating on the object of equipoise,
success will come — of this there is no doubt.

Blazing in every direction entirely,
with light blazing like fire,
it burns all māras completely.

By meditating on the wheel of primordial wisdom,
even one entirely shrouded in afflictions
will attain the fruit of buddhahood.

Having aroused the primordial wisdom of equality,
visualize oneself as space,
and meditate on a solar maṇḍala
blazing with rays of various colors.
At its center, let the skilled one take hold of the seed.
Taking the first letter
of whichever is the first group —
it is to be pressed with a hook,
a longing is to be joined at the root,
and the bindus of amṛta placed above.

Resting at the center of the solar maṇḍala,
radiating rays of various colors —
meditate with intense, perfect equipoise.
With a king, a royal palace,
and with a willing one, visualize accordingly.

For the letter that becomes two drops,
join the ga to the root.

This is called "the boundary of amṛta" —
through a hundred thousand recitations, draw them into your power.
Whatever young women desire,
having accomplished it together with their names,
it will come to be through mere intention alone.
Of what I have taught, there is no doubt.

All of the former defining characteristics
are, as before, empty of inherent nature.
Having visualized everything as oneself,
resting at the center of a lunar maṇḍala,
amṛta, all-awareness, together with the consort —
rays of various colors stream forth.
Visualize rays of yellow, supremely beautiful,
a lovely form with rays shining forth.
Whatever is desired — jewels and so forth —
draw it all in with one's own breath.

Within the body of the practitioner,
at the center of that very maṇḍala,
visualize the hook-letter (the syllable of the iron hook)
encircled by the seed-syllables of wind.
Conceive the color and so forth as red,
and visualize the form too as red in hue.
At the center of the lunar maṇḍala,
visualize the wisdom ḍākinī —
her form supremely beautiful and complete,
adorned with all ornaments in full array.
With the left hand bent in the manner of a hook,
visualize her as drawing in the mind.
Having meditated on the hook-letter,
move the finger as an iron hook.
The letter, transformed into a double form, as a drop,
is joined with the root sound.
This is called "the extremity of amṛta";
with one hundred thousand recitations, subjugation is accomplished.

Having thus meditated and recited,
if one then also moves the finger,
the mind of the one to be accomplished
will be aroused, and it will be achieved with one hundred thousand recitations.

Upon a spokeless wheel,
encircle it with a rim.
With all the vowel letters,
let the skilled one encircle the rim.
Whatever constitutes the fifth group —
taking up the third letter,
joining it with the vowel i and with ra,
placing it at the center with effort —
this seed of wisdom
is joined with the seventh of the sounds,
and that same is done on the petals as well;
place this very thing upon the petals.

For the yoginī who desires accomplishment,
with rays of various colors blazing forth,
visualize it in golden hue,
as before endowed with the defining characteristics —
let the skilled one meditate as previously taught.
Below that, oneself is to be generated in the form of the goddess Vasudharā (Norgyunma, the stream of wealth).
Her form supremely beautiful and utterly complete,
adorned with all ornaments in full array —
with the right hand she bestows fearlessness,
the left holds a sheaf of rice.

At the center, the seed that has been taught is joined with the extremity of the fire-offering salutation.
By meditating and reciting thus,
the practice of increase will be accomplished.
The yogī of the goddess of wealth
is renowned as one of increase.
As for oneself being different and so forth,
all the arrangements are likewise the same.

Having meditated upon the suchness of emptiness through the defining characteristics taught before,
at the center of a solar maṇḍala,
visualize the earth maṇḍala.
At the center of the lunar maṇḍala,
visualize the entities of wisdom-consciousness.
Upon the eight-petaled wheel,
having meditated on the seed at the center,
encircle the outer rim of the wheel
with the seed-syllables of the vowels.
On the four directional petals, the four amṛtas —
join them with all the hooks and sprouts.
On the four corner petals as well,
adorn them prominently with the five buddhas.
The complete lunar maṇḍala,
blazing with rays of various colors,
beautiful with the seven precious things —
visualize this upon one's own body.
In order to attract whatever mind is desired,
send out rays of light toward it.
Without fear and without harm,
meditate on entity through entity.
Torpor, dullness, sloth,
weak wisdom, and wrong view —
the yogī abandons in an instant
sloth and so forth, leaving them far behind.
Resting in equanimity for a moment,
send forth fine white particles.
Going out and pervading in all ten directions,
make all things appear, one by one in sequence.
Looking into the mind of wisdom,
the yogī will come to know the mind of others.
Having bound the mind in equanimity,
look upon the wheel of meditative equipoise.
By seeing the wisdom of equality,
one will be liberated beyond saṃsāra.

At the center of the lunar maṇḍala,
having emanated through the seed of wisdom,
seated upon a lotus throne,
visualize the color as white.
With both hands in the bodhisattva posture of crossed legs —
Adorned with all ornaments,
the two hands bound in the great mudrā,
he blazes forth in the direction of the heart.
Beautiful in color of brilliant white,
the noble Vairocana is the chief.
He sends forth clouds of buddhas,
liberating the realm of sentient beings
through emanations of inexhaustible variety.
The liberator of beings through the wisdom vajra —
take the first vowel letter as the supreme seed,
and apply a strong vowel marker at the end.
It is endowed with homage and the edge of fire.
By meditating upon this seed
and reciting it in the actual state of meditative equipoise,
one will come to behold the stages of awakening.

This concludes the second sequential division from the "Preparation: The Excellent Rite of the Preparatory Seat."

Now hear the nature of the blessings and preparations: who it is that teaches these to sentient beings, and what the sequential process of blessing is like — listen to this from the deity, O Gazing One.

In order to heal the confusion of sentient beings,
teaching the Dharma of blessing,
liberating the assembly completely and truly —
hear this actuality just as it is, O Vajra.

Visualize a moon disc at the heart,
and imagine the seed syllable HŪṂ at its center.
Blazing and bright like rays of fire,
place it at the center of a solar maṇḍala.
In all the world-realms of the ten directions,
visualize a maṇḍala of fire.
As every place blazes,

burn everything completely from all sides.
As taught before by way of defining marks,
first render everything into emptiness.

At the center of the maṇḍala of fire,
visualize the five buddhas.
The staff — the Lord and Protector of the World.
The turquoise — Vajrapāṇi.
The body — the supreme of the gentle.
The head and the vase — Maitreya.
The mother-letter blazing above —
the liberator of all of saṃsāra.
If one wishes to accomplish the aims of the three worlds,
one should meditate upon that seed syllable.

Seated upon a lotus throne,
having meditated upon the solar maṇḍala,
with the nature of wisdom ḍākinīs,
one is protected by wisdom itself.
Both hands in the bodhisattva posture of crossed legs,
exceedingly beautiful in red color.
The vajra crown above
is adorned by the five buddhas.
Holding a khaṭvāṅga and a yogic vessel,
arrayed fully in all ornaments,
blaze forth in radiant rays of many colors —
meditate thus, without letting the breath stir.

The one of the third group:
she holds a vajra staff with a hook,
and is bound about with a looped chain and the like.
She is endowed with homage and the edge of fire.
Having recited three hundred thousand times,
by the rite of the non-dual torma,
perform the subsidiary rites after that.
With the five nectars present,
recite eight hundred times.
One who is endowed with the ritual shall offer it,
and in that very instant it will descend.

Once it has descended, the yogī
should take up the vajra song:

"Play, play, O Vajra!

Through the union of the gentle and the fierce,
you consume all, from every side.
In an instant, liberate me equally from saṃsāra!"

While dancing to this song,
ring the vajra bell.

Oṃ tiṣṭha yoga mahākrodha hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ svāhā.

With this, do all that is to be done at the end.
Teach it to all the yoginīs —
to the lesser, the middling, and the highest.
After that, teach the Dharma.

Oṃ yoga āveśaya.

The yogī, profoundly settled in meditative equipoise,
should first approach with this.
The yogī, endowed with the non-dual torma,
with white mustard seed
and the frightening sound of HŪṂ,
the practitioner shall cast these.
With the mantra spoken of before,
one acts just as one wishes.

Oṃ mana ghuru ghuru dhriṣṭi cili cili hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

If the yogī recites one hundred thousand times,
the act of causing descent by a mere glance will be accomplished.
And when one looks upon whoever is being worshipped,
having been beheld, she performs the dance.

Oṃ māla māli hūṃ phaṭ.

It will be accomplished through three hundred thousand recitations, and all beings shall be caused to descend.

Oṃ mahā cili cili hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Through reciting one hundred thousand times,
even those born far away shall be caused to descend.

Oṃ batali batali hūṃ phaṭ.

The yogī, by reciting three hundred thousand times,
should first perform the approach practice.

Hungry ghosts, elemental spirits, those of secret nature, and all the gods shall be caused to descend.

Oṃ patani patani hūṃ phaṭ.

The yogī, by reciting one hundred thousand times,
should first perform the approach practice.

Water, vapor, stone,
and all trees shall be caused to descend.

The maṇḍala must first be consecrated by the master,
and the approach practice must first be performed.
Then, having examined it with great care and discernment,
one should visualize that very same maṇḍala beneath.
If the deity has not been pleased,
it becomes a burden upon oneself.

Oṃ vetali rakṣa rakṣa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ ghraṃ phuḥ phaṭ.

Having recited this clearly seven times over ashes,
scatter them upon a corpse.
Even if left there for seven days,
it will not be consumed by anything whatsoever.

Oṃ phuru phuru. Mantre jaḥ hūṃ phuḥ phaṭ.

A red cord wound eight hundred times with full recitation,
tied around whoever's neck,
will cause them to wander about like a jackal.
But when freed from the cord,
they act just as one desires.

Through the yoga of the sequence of blessings,
visualize and recite in meditative equipoise.
Visualize the vajra ḍākinī
dwelling in the center of a lunar disk.
Her form adorned with all ornaments,
blazing intensely with rays of multicolored light.
In the center of a wind maṇḍala,

consider her as the one to be directly accomplished.

At the two soles of the feet, visualize
the seed of wind as a seat.

Endowed with sound and with the subtle drop,
the seed of wind dwelling in the center
surrounded by wind, place it at the heart.

Visualize everything as blue in color.

At the tip of one's own breath,
apply the sign of wind.

Oṃ yuṃ preta vāyu amokasya yuṃ phaṭ.

This secret mantra of the yogī,
when recited eight hundred times, will be accomplished.

Having seized a being and the like,
write with poison and with blood.

Having seized the supreme yogī,
write from their dwelling place.

Recite eight hundred times,
then bind with a red cord
and fasten it to the tip of a tree.

Visualize it being inflated by the wind,
so that the wind inclines downward —
they will proceed in that direction.

The expulsion performed by the yogī
will be accomplished without doubt.

Visualizing the vajra ḍākinī
dwelling in the center of a lunar disk,
and having visualized one's own body,
the one endowed with intelligence should recite the mantra.
Then place the non-dual torma filled completely
at the center of that.

Oṃ vajra ḍākinī deśa mākarṣaya ākarṣaya oṃ hrīḥ hūṃ pho phruṃ phuḥ phaṭ.

Having smeared the maṇḍala with red,
pierce it with eight pegs of acacia wood.

Write the name in the center,
and let the torma be completely filled.

Having recited over a red cord,
draw it in by turning it seven times.
Having drawn with a vajra iron hook
and recited this secret mantra,
from a distance of a hundred leagues beyond,
the act shall be reversed and the person summoned.
In the very center of the maṇḍala,
this act will be accomplished without doubt.

Visualize a wrathful ḍākinī dwelling in the center of a solar disk.
Having skillfully visualized one's own body
as the yogī,
seize a single fish
and consecrate it as the ḍākinī's torma.
Write the name along with the mantra,
place it inside the mouth of the fish,
press the head down firmly with the foot,
and recite eight hundred times.

Oṃ phruṃ phruṃ. Amukasya mukhaṃ bandha bandha. Hrī hrī hrī.

Phuṃ phaṭ. By the mere recitation of this mantra, all actions shall be bound.
All these rites are to be performed with water. The ritual for other activities shall now be explained.

Having applied this mantra and rolled it in dough, place it inside the mouth of the fish at whatever location the fish resides. Having consecrated the ḍākinī torma and made eight hundred pellets, recite once and press one in at a time
— all actions shall thereby be bound without doubt.

Dwelling in the center of a wind maṇḍala, visualize one's own form as the body of Caṇḍālī. Having contemplated all forms as perfectly complete and blazing like fire, perform the torma rites of non-duality in that very center. Make a lotus shape from excrement, and place the name and mantra upon it.

Oṃ stambhaya stambhaya hūṃ. Bhagaṃ mutrāṃ phru phrūṃ phaṭ.

Pressing down upon this secret mantra and the name with the left foot, recite eight hundred times — that this will be accomplished, there is no doubt. Those wives who are exceedingly wayward shall be tamed by this rite. At the end, washing with water and milk will release them from the binding.

Dwelling in the center of a wind maṇḍala, visualize the goddess Vajrā. She is of a very beautiful deep blue color, her rays blazing like fire, perfectly complete and endowed with beauty, adorned and enveloped in all ornaments. She is seated upon a throne of hungry ghosts, laughing terrifyingly with the cry "Ha ha!" Perform the acts of the torma of non-duality there as well. Make a lotus shape from flour and the like, fill it with dog hair, apply the name and mantra, and consecrate this for the torma rites of non-duality with that activity.

Oṃ krodhīśvarī phru phrūṃ phaṭ.

Recite eight hundred times, then insert into the secret place of the vajra. Through applying and tormenting with this rite, the bhaga shall be reversed. This rite is exceedingly efficacious; if released from it, the person shall be freed from it. For a wife who is extremely difficult to tame, this rite is to be applied in that manner.

Dwelling in the center of a lunar maṇḍala, visualize the syllable of nectar at the navel. Draw it out from all the channels and let the nectar water drip. At the center of the fully blooming lotus of bindu, there is the syllable of a hook, brilliant red, blazing intensely — meditate upon it secretly and in secret. Contemplating the syllable of nectar at the tip of the wrathful finger, move with this finger. Having meditated upon the three unions, let the nectar water drip into the locations within its center. For a wife who is extremely difficult to tame, the bhaga shall be examined by this means.

Make it luminous and supreme. Mix the five branches of the maddening herb with a portion of great bdellium, and boil it in great black butter. The mantra-holder shall taste the nectar water with the sense organ of the tongue. In this, there is no doubt that madness will result. By eating butter, liberation shall come.

Take an unworn garment of a hungry ghost and make a torch of it. Hold it above a nāga king and light it with the butter from the leg. At the places of the torma, with the heart mantra of the ḍākinī, cause smoke to descend. Give the torma at the charnel ground, recite eight hundred times, and at a crossroads beside a single tree — whoever is smeared with the smoke from that will see all the ḍākinīs.

Take two vessels of the remainder, and using charnel-ground embers mixed with a heating substance, draw upon it with a crow's quill.

Om kiri kiri krodhe amukaṃ phruḥ phrūṃ phaṭ.

In the two vessels separately, write two forms together with the name, offer the torma of non-duality, and — fill it with wrathful force and drag it down.

Om kali bṛtāli bṛtāli krodha mukhe amuka syahi lihili vajra tiṣṭha mukhi phruṃ phroṃ phaṭ.

Having recited one hundred times, conflict and strife will swiftly arise. If empowerment is conferred together with the torma of non-duality, peace will come about.

This is the third in the sequential division from the chapter on the seats of union.

The essence of the union of non-duality — it is expressed by the name "non-duality." How the practice of union is to be undertaken: please listen to these melodies.

Concerning that very union of non-duality — hear well, through the vajra, the truth of taking up the mudrās of the vajra and bell separately, exactly as they are.

Suchness itself is the self, and the Dharma bell is the goddess. The joining of union is the mudrā, and into that the skillful means dissolves.

First of all, let the yogin join the palms in the vajra gesture, and with loving care for all sentient beings, recite the three purities:

Om svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho 'haṃ. Om vajraśuddhaḥ sarvadharmā vajraśuddho 'haṃ. Om yogaśuddhaḥ sarvadharmā yogaśuddho 'haṃ.

Liberated from apprehended and apprehender, give with the enclosure of generosity. With the mind endowed with yoga, regard all things as being like a root. Give fearlessness to all sentient beings; do not treat beings with mere sentiment and so forth; do not obstruct the welfare of sentient beings — above this spreads the net of moral discipline. Preventing harm to others and so forth — below, plant the spike of patience. By means of what resembles that spike, drive away the māra of aversion and all enemies. The māra will not appear as māra; it is restrained by one's own mind. When one tames one's own mind, the māra will have no power to harm.

Anoint the four-cornered space with the fragrance of the mind of equanimity. Apply sandalwood to the body as a cooling ointment; the mind is placed in meditative equipoise. The yogin, with earnest effort, should strew the flowers of patience. Fumigate with the incense of having cultivated equanimity, purifying through intrinsic purity.

The light of the lamp of wisdom — with this lamp, dispel the darkness of the three realms and cause light to shine exactly as one wishes. With the mind's gift of fearlessness, bring relief to those who have not yet breathed freely.

At the time of offering, and especially at the time of the torma, apply all of this fully. In a pleasant, agreeable place, sitting upon a comfortable seat, arise as the vajra in oneself and manifest as what is called the bell of wisdom. Placed at a cubit's distance in between, regard it with the view of equanimity.

Meditate upon Hūṃ at the heart, and with awareness make everything utterly empty. Having exhausted the three realms, all abides perfectly in space. Endowed with the true defining marks as before, having contemplated equanimity and emptiness, visualize the wish-fulfilling palace as vast, at the summit of Mount Meru.

The deity possesses twenty-eight, as previously shown by the vajra. Arising from the sphere of Hūṃ blazing with rays of many colours, in the centre of a lunar maṇḍala, meditate upon the immovable vajra, and emanate one's own body in the nature of Vajrasattva.

Having arranged the display of syllables, the wise one, having fashioned the armour, Hūṃ — adorned by the five buddhas, with the colour of snow and the full moon together, two hands in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, arrayed in all ornaments, with the essence of mahāmudrā — meditate upon the supreme state of attainment.

In the blazing of rays of many colours, clouds of buddhas stream forth in all directions. Having meditated upon the object of meditation, fill everything with the sound of Hūṃ. With the mind of aspiration just as one wishes, recite the seed-syllable of primordial wisdom.

Blazing intensely like refined gold,
bound to the welfare of all sentient beings.

Then the characteristic of emptiness — possessing the characteristics described before — dwelling at the centre of a lunar maṇḍala,

fully cognisant of all the characteristics set out before:
meditate upon the twenty-three deities
in the nature of the bell.

From the blazing of rays of many colours,
the light of the buddhas streams forth.
The bodies thus generated
are produced by the Mother, the Perfection of Wisdom.
Two hands in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture,
arrayed in all ornaments,
a form with colours slightly mingled,
adorned by the five buddhas.

The mantras of the eight syllables
are to be arranged in eight limbs.
The two hands — the great seal —
meditate upon the supreme state of attainment.
Recite the seed arising from the vowels and consonants.

By the power of the mind of attachment,
the refined-gold one together with her golden radiance embraces all beings in order to liberate them,
clasping the breasts and pressing together the two mouths.

At the tip of the vajra finger,
having contemplated the syllable of nectar,
hold it at the tip, on the left side of the goddess,
at the pinnacle of what is to be shown.

The eighteen stations,
wherever nectar abides throughout them all —
by moving with this finger,
the stream of nectar flows.

Having exchanged the offerings of both,
look toward the eastern direction and move.
By the posture of play, press the goddess down
with the posture of the vajra foot.
The bell hand suppresses the left wind;
squeeze the breasts with both hands.
With a coquettish and laughing face,

press together from below with a pressing action.
Apply the bell with both hands to the secret place;
likewise recite the non-dual seed-syllable.
By moving toward the eastern direction,
sentient beings of the far shore will be liberated.

Moving the goddess's left side,
turn the face to look toward the south.
Moving the vajra as well,
press both soles of the feet in the same way.
With both hands of the bell,
bind and press the waist.
Play with the vajra's right breast
and likewise with the secret place.
Bring the bodies of the vajra and bell
together again and again.
By reciting the two seed-syllables,
sentient beings of the southern direction will be liberated.

In the west, by the foot-posture of the essence,
let the goddess look toward the west.
With one side of the vajra,
press the right thigh.
Embracing from behind at the neck,
moving the tongue of the bell,
let the vajra tongue make contact.
Having joined them likewise, both recite together.
At the centre of the equal vajra,
bind with both hands.
With both hands of the bell as well,
insert them close to the ear.
Having fully joined both lips,
drink the nectar thereof.
The yogin, having recited the mantra,
rings the vajra bell.

May all sentient beings find happiness!
May all be free from harm!
By whatever path beings travel,

may they attain buddhahood!

In the manner of an instant the yoga,
in the manner of an instant the seal,
throughout all and everywhere, in an instant —
in an instant recite the secret mantra.
By uniting the bell with the deity,
the wise one should meditate.

The mantras of the eight syllables
are themselves the deity of all the stations.
Conceive of oneself as the goddess;
again and again perform this very practice.

With the mind of attachment directed toward oneself,
then embrace the vajra.
Then conceive of oneself as the vajra,
together with the syllable Kara.
With vajra-pride,
declare: "I am Vajrasattva."

The flowers born from water —
from the characteristics within the secret —

The root is the sprout, and the flower —
the bandukā (a red flower) resembles what has fully bloomed.
The seeds of the two, thongka and the rest,
are themselves earth and wind.
Below, in the nature of water,
is the seed of fire for the sprout.
Taking up the third syllable
of the third group,
wind around it with the final staff
that bears the vajra, along with the great white one and the rest.
Having conceived it in the form of the goddess,
cause it to dissolve into the earth within.
Joining the hungry ghost of the timely fire downward,
and joining the hungry ghost's fire with the timely fire,
bring the two palms together,
pressing with the little finger and the thumb.

Unite the three at the tip,
and having placed the two mudrās upon the head,
with the intention of consuming the nectar,
press and squeeze the lower part.
Through the channels of essence and the eight,
invite the nectar of the bell.
On the left side is the bandukā,
bearing the form of dripping water,
like the shape of a bird's beak from which water drips —
in the manner of ḍākinīs,
there one should be aroused by the mudrā.
The water of the right vajra
should be brought into the manner of equanimity with the intrinsic nature.
Then at all stations, including thongka and the rest,
one should place the finger there.
Then the tip of the vajra
should be applied to the side of the mudrā.
Having joined both together,
move the vajra-lotus.
Filling with the sound of Hūṃ,
satisfy all the goddesses.
With the actual substance of the bell,
bestow the seed throughout the vowels.
The wisdom seed, the tip of the vajra —
bring joy to one's own deity.
The vajra and bell are the body,
and the union of the mudrā face-to-face is to be enacted.
The mudrā of the vajra and bell
should likewise be held separately, each in its own right.
By the reality of the vajra, set it in motion,
and let the bell ring freely of its own accord.
The vajra and bell perfectly united —
this is the union of the very reality of the mudrā.
By the delight of both bodies,
sentient beings shall be liberated to the other shore.
Conceive of oneself as the identity of both together,
and consecrate that water with blessing.

Remaining in graceful, moving posture,
seated upon a pleasure seat,
with the vajra-play posture of the feet,
play the bell upon the left thigh.
With the left arm embracing and holding the breast,
polish the right vajra.
Laughing, wrathful, and seductive —
again and again bestow this.
In the manner of moving the bell, seated upon the throne of the thigh,
encircling with the right foot,
place it at the site of the hip.
Embracing the throat with one hand,
ring the bell with the left.
With expressions of wonder, laughter, and allure,
again and again bring this forth.
Then take up the vajra song —
let it be known as the various Hūṃ.
Taking hold of the water of nectar,
take up the song again.
The wheel, empty, devoid of essence — its essences are fully gathered.
Utterly liberated by liberation,
freed from materiality is fully accomplished.
The union made by mutually embracing one another —
by that, true purpose shall be fulfilled.
The essences of saṃsāra being absent,
accomplish the essence within the midst of the yoginī.
With the sound of the vajra-bell combined,
then in that very way take up the song.
Meditating in equipoise and reciting,
there is no doubt it shall be accomplished.
Whatever activities one has conceived,
all of those shall come to be accomplished.
The particular excellences of medicine and the rest
should be brought to bear in the union of movement.
Saffron, musk,

the flesh of the kadamba-tree flower tip,
turmeric, costus — equal portions —
should be taken as the substance of union.

Having mixed those substances
and continually formed them into drops, kings, ministers, and their palaces —
all shall be made glad.

The organ, the hand, costus,
the bewildering woman and the enflaming woman,
my tongue and the five limbs —
all five equalized,
along with food, drink, and tooth-cleaner —

— finely ground, compounded, and offered as a gift.
Through this, one shall gain power over all,
and even at death the treasure shall not be lost.

Through the rite of scattered blood,
the activities of subjugation and the rest are accomplished.
By reciting the mantra one hundred thousand times,
all beings shall be left bewildered.

"Grant your presence to my body,
and delight me as you please."

By one possessed of wisdom, for the sake of sentient beings,
all shall be drawn into one's power.

A brahmin woman devoted to ascetic observance —
through her, pacifying activities shall arise.

A king, a guru, a woman devoted to the secret — through her, expanding activities shall be performed.

Women of the noble and common classes, all of them —
through them, the activity of subjugation shall be accomplished.

A cobbler woman, a butcher woman, a fisherwoman —
these are renowned as preeminent for the fierce activity.

A barbarian woman, an outcaste woman, a dyer woman —
these have been taught as the substances of siddhi in union.

Therefore, with all one's effort
one should take hold of this treatise on yoga.

Furthermore, the posture-bonds are to be bound.
They are a place for liberating sentient beings:
the two are gathered together and set in motion.
These very mudrās are called the posture-bonds:

The equal posture, the open posture, the round posture, the three-pressing posture, the tortoise posture, the right extension, the left extension, the single-place posture, the seated posture, the swarm of bees, the ocean wave, the mountain shoulder, the leg cast, the manner of a votive pillar, the knee-squeeze, the drawing-in manner, the dwelling in equanimity, the fire of time, the essential, the dwelling in joy, and the single gathering.

These eighteen posture-movements
shall be employed at the time of offering.
They are the source from which all qualities arise.
The yogin is to make them known.

Pressing at the heart, joining the feet, the manner of a garland, the manner of breasts, both joined and consumed, the half-embrace, both hands joined, touching the secret place, stroking the body, and touching the armpit.

The essence of the method of the hands
is a smiling and graceful countenance endowed with varied characteristics —
through these, all activities shall be accomplished.

The mudrās of the vajra and bell
are each to be held individually in their suchness.
If the secret vajra is absent,
how shall the bell bring the fruit to completion?
And if the vajra lacks the bell,
the accomplishment of the vajra shall be long delayed.
When the mudrās of the vajra and bell are visualized,
the far shore is reached and beings are liberated.

In the night, what power does the moonless sky hold?
And by day, what can be done by the moon alone?
Therefore the vajra and bell together
make that very equality luminously clear.

Having meditated on the union of ālī and kālī,
the great yogin who strives in accomplishment
calls ālī the vajra,
and kālī is known as the Tathāgatā — the thus-gone feminine.
Through the union of ālī and kālī,
all purposes whatsoever shall be accomplished.
All the aims of sentient beings, without remainder,
shall be drawn forth through the form of the deity.

Through outer wisdom and skillful means,
how shall liberation from saṃsāra come about?
It is the person of deluded, outer-directed mind
to whom these samaya vows are taught.

The secret of secrets, the great secret —
it is always concealed and hidden.
Whoever has come to know the scripture
is recognized as its yogin.

To a mind of pure crystal clarity,
the Dharma of this is to be taught.
But if the mind is one of doubt,
in a mere instant one falls into hell.

This is not a teaching to be relied upon out of fondness for desire,
nor out of any wish for gain.
It is the very suchness — pursued with utmost effort —
that is to be visualized for the sake of sentient beings.

If one is a yogin of kāma-joy,
that is but one aspect of the characteristic of skillful means.
In a single instant, arising in its completeness according to one's own delight
this is the union of vajra and bell.

Having generated it in the manner of an instant, one speaks of one's yoga as "I" —

one should hold the seed-syllable of the āli in the center within the secret interior.

One's own instantaneous yoga —
the syllable HŪṂ — is to be recited with effort.

Whatever is there, even a little, of body and hand,
is to be dissolved into the union with the deity.
With joined palms in all directions,
the yogin and the yoginī bestow empowerment.

Rejoicing and with mind made fully content,
beings this very day attain liberation.
Ema! — the supreme path of Dharma!
Ema! — the one who severs saṃsāra!
Ema! — the abode of liberation for the yogin!
Ema! — the wondrous path of yoga!

No count of days, no constellation required,
taught without fasting —
this is declared to be the practice of bliss;
by bliss it cuts the wheel.

For the ritual procedures of the wheel of karma,
the practitioner's various wishes —
in the center of the moon's maṇḍala
one should emanate in a fierce form.

Having contemplated that form,
one should then meditate on suchness just as before.
Having recited the mantra three hundred thousand times,
after that one should swiftly accomplish the activity.

The two syllables, united with the essence-drop,
are to be joined with the root sound.
Having placed the prostration at the end of the fire-offering,
the yogin, after first performing the approach practice three hundred thousand times,
should then apply strenuous effort to accomplish those very activities.

A hungry ghost woman, wearing garments and so forth,
is to be painted in yellow with pigments —
two hands in a playful posture, with her manner of standing,
her body blazing with white and yellow,
laughing with "ha ha," and with a fierce glaring gaze,
her hair disheveled and loose as her ornament.
She is seated upon a seat of hungry ghosts,

clothed in a garment fashioned from human skin,
crowned with the diadem of accomplishing the meaningful,
bedecked and covered with ornaments of serpents,
wearing an apron of elephant hide,
adorned with the supreme khaṭvāṅga,
in her left hand bearing a skull-cup of alcohol,
making terrifying with the sound of HŪṢ,
blazing and radiating rays of light like fire.

One should meditate on the goddess Siṃhā.
One should unite at the center of the earth and so forth.
The skilled practitioner should accomplish this.
With the characteristics previously described,
one should fill the non-dual torma.

If a hungry ghost woman is to be obtained,
at the center of an ordinary blazing fire,
using wood of the ym-tree and the poplar,
or wood of the five milky trees —
one should burn various extensive offerings,
great flesh and so forth.
Honey, blood, and dough —
eight hundred fire-offerings are to be made.
By that act of burning alone,
she will then display signs.

The root mantra of the fire-offering:
OM SMRĀṢ PHRUṢ PHU PHAṢ.

Everything is to be done as taught before.
At the first, there is movement and transformation.
At the second, a painted image moves.
At the third, a great fragrance arises.
At the fourth, the sound of a lion roars.
At the fifth, descending in the form of a lion
as a companion in accomplishment,
bearing a fierce form and glaring intently,
she utters a terrifying sound.

One should go through the samaya mudrā and the rest,
and please her with torma offerings.

"As you wish, from various abodes,
I pray you to teach and to serve me."

Then, when the goddess has appeared directly,
"Whatever activity of mine — that of a son —
I will accomplish with effort; having bestowed the samaya, show me the mudrā."

The hero, having so granted this,
"Do this for me now" —
through oneself, the goddess is accomplished.

OM TIṢṬHA MAMA KURU HŪṢ HŪṢ HŪṢ JA JA JA SVĀHĀ.

Having placed the hand upon the crown of her head,
one should recite this secret mantra here.

Flesh, blood, and grain together —
offer these to the non-dual torma.

Dwelling in the realm traversed by hungry ghosts,
bless her at all times permanently.

Asuras (demigods), nāginīs, yakṣinīs, gandharvas, kinnara women —
whatever hungry ghost woman one desires,
if summoned in an instant according to command,
what need is there to speak of lesser women?
By the mere pronouncing of the command —

Whatever beings in the realms of asuras and nāgas one desires to serve — they will be swiftly led and made to come.

And all enemies will be slain
and expelled according to command.

This is the goddess who accomplishes all rites,
and she is to be accomplished by the wise.

The tigress, the owl-woman, and the like — these too are to be accomplished by those very same rites.
Such attainments are to be understood in that way,
and they are to be accomplished by the wise.

The mudrā of the vajra and bell —
each is to be held in accordance with suchness.
Joined precisely by that same vajra,
the bell is the goddess of Dharma.
These two mudrās are present together.
By the one who knows all, all is accomplished.

This is the fourth chapter, entitled "The Empowerment of the Union Seat."

Now hear from Vajrapāṇi the defining marks of the master characterized by yogic union with the mudrā, and the rest.

The master who is to be relied upon possesses mantra, mudrā, union, and the like, and liberates from saṃsāra by the path of perfect equanimity as it truly is. Hear from Vajrapāṇi the defining marks of liberation from saṃsāra.

What is the nature of the master's qualities, and what does it mean to call one a guru? How is the master to be relied upon? How is the Blessed One to be viewed? All things bear the defining mark of awakening — hear this very point from Vajrapāṇi.

The defining mark of complete awakening: the body is the constituent of all buddhas, the limbs are the abodes of the branches of awakening, the crown ornament is the five families, the hairs of the body are arhats, the worldly is the seat beneath the feet, the light rays are yakṣas and those of the secret and so forth. The yogin is always to regard the master as a body endowed with such qualities.

What is the defining mark of one who possesses wisdom? It is to be taught as follows. His form is extremely tame and peaceful, and he gives fearlessness to all sentient beings. He is skilled in the practice of mantra and tantra, learned in yoga, crafts, and the treatises. He speaks pleasingly to all. He looks upon all sentient beings as his own children. He always delights in generosity and the like. He strives earnestly in yoga and meditative concentration. With a mind of compassion and a wish to benefit, he speaks truthfully and does no harm. Because he arouses the mind of equanimity, he is a protector and refuge for sentient beings.

One who thoroughly knows these ten is to be called a master. Furthermore, let the disciple equate the very defining marks of his own conduct with these. Look to the practice of the yoginī, the conduct and view of the samaya, the secret tormas, and the rest. One must not revile the secret of the master. If one does, one swiftly falls into the Avīci hell.

On all occasions without samaya, one must not tread upon, or disrespectfully step over, the master's seat and bed, his deity images, his parasol, garments, and personal effects, or his shadow. One must not speak words of reversal and torture against him. If one transgresses, then at all times one will be harmed by demons, one's wealth will decline, one's glory will be lost, and one will be destroyed by māras and enemies. If one has trodden upon his shadow, it is said to incur a fault equal to destroying a stūpa. One who reviles the master will find no attainment even in dreams. One must always take hold of the master's good qualities, and must never take hold of his faults — for it is by that path, through the practice of mantra, mudrā, and the rest, that accomplishment is obtained.

With training and generosity as the preliminary, one then performs the maṇḍala offering and the rest. By the single syllable previously taught, the five buddhas are to be shown. One who possesses that yoga will accomplish all activities according to desire.

One who holds the mantra empowerment is to meditate upon the eight syllables. Through the non-dual tormā offering and empowerment, he is to understand the Dharma. To one who holds the empowerment of union, gnosis and consciousness are to be taught. After the master has conferred the empowerment, all secret teachings and so forth are to be imparted. The first things to be done by the disciple are:

Having draped the upper robe over the shoulder, one places the knee of the right leg firmly on the ground and joins the palms together at the heart.

The master, seated on his throne, meditates vividly upon his own deity. Then, taking the disciple's hand in his own hand, the learned one confers the training.

I always go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. To all three vehicles, to the secret yoga and so forth, to the ḍākinīs, to the heroes and heroines, to the empowerment goddesses, to the great bodhisattvas, and especially to the master, I shall always go for refuge.

Vairocana, Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amoghasiddhi, and the rest — all buddhas and bodhisattvas, please turn your minds toward me.

I, who am called such-and-such, from this very moment and henceforth until I reach the heart of awakening, shall liberate those not yet liberated and free those not yet free. For the sake of following beings with loving care, I shall uphold this Dharma discipline.

This is to be recited two and then three times, with a mind of firm and steady equanimity.

Oṃ svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho 'ham.

Oṃ vajraśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ vajraśuddho 'ham.

Oṃ yogaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ yogaśuddho 'ham.

The three kinds of bodily action, the four kinds of verbal action, and the three kinds of mental action — guarding the samaya vow by restraining the body, and knowing the mind to be of the nature of equanimity, one teaches the Dharma in accordance with what has been proclaimed.

Then, having covered the eyes with cloth, the disciple is to be led to the place of the tormas. Taking his hand in one's hand, the training is to be taught again.

I go for refuge to the master, who is the body of the intrinsic nature of all buddhas. To the seat of union of the heroes and heroines of the wheel, I bow down with full prostration.

Knowing the disciples like a lion who has realized the supreme ultimate, the one endowed with yoga tears away all veils of obsuration. Having overcome the afflictions (kleśas) that give rise to the faults of cyclic existence, he accomplishes the ultimate yoga and becomes sovereign over reality itself.

Āḥ, the supreme among all syllables — by it the vajra of speech is blessed.

Hūṃ burns the afflictions — by it the vajra of mind is blessed.

Oṃ summons primordial wisdom — by it the vajra of the body is blessed.

Then, at the very moment of opening the eyes and seeing, one prostrates with the five-limbed prostration before everything, and this very body of one's own nature is to be firmly planted upon the seat of union.

Then, in accordance with the characteristics as they have been described, and in accordance with how the body has been shown, the learned master is to confer them. Having indicated them in accordance with what has been taught, the training and so forth are to be performed again. One is to contemplate mentally in accordance with what has been taught.

Then the samaya water possessing the five nectars is given.

By Ha, color is extracted.

By Ho, smell is destroyed.

By Hrīḥ, potency is overcome.

Some should recite the mantra.

These are to be presented with the head bowed at the feet of the master.

Oṃ pañcaḍākinīpūjosthānāya ātmānaṃ niryātayāmi.

Oṃ ācāryapūjosthānāya ātmānaṃ niryātayāmi.

Oṃ sarvasatvaparitarṇārthāya ātmānaṃ niryātayāmi.

Pride and anger, envy and harsh speech are to be abandoned. Evil companions are to be forsaken, as are killing and stealing. One should not cling to any enjoyment and should know contentment as a certainty. One should not be attached to external treatises that are similar in place and manner to dance.

Samayastvam. Samayaho. A Ā Aṃ Aḥ Hūṃ Jaḥ.

One who holds the vajra mudrā is to grasp the seeds of the six branches. Furthermore, the complete awakening of all phenomena is to be taught gradually.

Then a well-endowed disciple should always offer gifts to the teacher: one's own sons and wife, relatives and servants, herds of elephants, horses, and cattle, precious houses and fields, gold and silver and copper, cloth and grain and other such wealth, seats and bedding and shoes and the like, parasols and such personal enjoyments as an offering. And finally, one's own body itself is to be offered as a gift to the teacher. Then the natural purity of all phenomena, the absence of any intrinsic nature in things, and complete awakening are to be taught gradually. With a manner of patience going before, one must not torment sentient beings. One must not speak harsh words to others. One must not displease anyone. One must guard moral discipline and vows, and must not harm living beings. One must not kill any creature with life; it is better even to die than to do so. Because it blazes like a great fire, one must not touch another's wealth. Those fools who take to existence in material things fall badly through their very clinging to existence. Even in matters great and small, the yogin must guard against falsehood. For one who practises the conduct of Yoga, there is no place for lying in it whatsoever. Conduct is to be well restrained, and food and drink and the like are likewise to be well restrained. Joy and play are also to be well restrained, and even at the time of the torma offering one must be well restrained. Those yogins who desire spiritual attainments will accomplish them through the joy of sentient beings. An all-knowing teacher should show joy to the disciple in sentient beings. Having aroused the gnosis of equality, one must view all things as equal. One must always dwell in equality. The yogin must strive in meditative concentration and dhyāna. The ground of craving is a base mind, and from it the sprout of a merchant grows and increases; the tree of that sprout blocks the path and fruit of beings' existence. Desiring the enjoyments of higher realms, embodied beings through loving-kindness, practicing Dharma in joy and play, will fall into existence themselves. One must not engage in stūpa rites, and one must not read books. One must not bind the hand-mudrā, and one must not recite the syllables of mantra. Treatises are easy to obtain; but their practice is hard to find. Through the scriptural transmission of teachers, the wise must examine them. Among my own deity and others' deities, my own deity is the supreme deity. Since one cannot render one's own deity in form, one should paint it and so forth as an image. This is the first section, which gradually unfolds from the "Arrangement of the Secret Seat."

Now, hear of the practice that is hard to find — listen, O chief Vajra-King. Mantra practitioners who lack that very thing fall downward, increasing their existence. A wonder has arisen in the body, and so I pray that this very Dharma be taught. What is the measure of yoga? What are the mantra and the mudrā like? By water and fire and wind, how is the body's severance accomplished? What is the measure of the torma-work of the yogin when it is properly applied? What are the defining characteristics and measure by which beings are accomplished? Hear from Vajra the measure of the body and mind to be expressed, just as it is. Because my element is unstable, even a yogin who performs the torma-work and recitation, the maṇḍala rites, fire and water ceremonies, mudrā, parasol offerings and the like, and who obtains their results, will fall into the ocean of existence. Vajrapāṇi makes this clear again: tell me of those various things that arise in existence, what their measure is, and how the mind is to be examined. Mentation became filled with doubt. Listen: you have asked about cyclic existence. The mind, when washed clean by mentation, is self-delighting gnosis, insubstantial; through the binding of the ḍākinī-winds, the mind is accomplished in form and the formless through the focus of meditative concentration. The gods of desire and others who are possessed of desire always enjoy sense-pleasures; in that way the humans of cyclic existence — — accomplish their own desired grounds and so forth. I shall now explain well what the things that liberate from that are, and what their meaning is.

Vajrapāṇi, listen to this summary. The consciousness of the yogin travels along together with a co-travelling being, and through consciousness knowing consciousness, it becomes clearly manifest in all directions. Regarding doubt about the essential nature of mind, may the Blessed One also explain that. What is the intrinsic nature of wisdom and consciousness as real things? How does gnosis relate to not-knowing? I wish to listen to what is doubtful regarding the defining marks of consciousness and gnosis.

The mind, when pure, is like crystal: it has neither fault nor virtue in itself, yet it is placed in contact with objects and becomes stained by the faults of existence. One who pacifies the things of existence dwelling in objects, and in that state of abiding engages steadily in the practice, should press it firmly at the aperture of the central channel. What is to be known in its midst is always like a consciousness-space: without colour yet illuminating all, present in the bodiless and the embodied. The formless is the form of all, and yet it is neither short nor long in the same way. Through the suchness of mind, magical displays without substance are accomplished, and through the mind that has no defining marks, all defining marks are bestowed. By meditating on the absence of substantiality, let all meditations be illuminated. Between form and emptiness, the mind is to be known by the wise. Through focusing on everything from every side, the yogin's body becomes free of fault.

The great secret beyond secret, beyond secret — the secrets of consciousness and gnosis — are concealed beyond the reading of treatises and the like, and are far removed even from defining marks through their objects. That very defining mark of what is to be illuminated can be seen through the path of the guru. Keeping both mind and body in balance, do not torment the mind and do not torment the body. In a pleasing place, the wise one should accomplish it. Sitting on a comfortable seat, taking the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, place both hands at the secret place. With the eyes gazing toward the tip of the nose, hold the breath at the root of the navel. Letting go of all openings, set it as in a maṇḍala. Striving with a mind of equanimity, and having thus purified suchness as its intrinsic nature, anoint it with the perfume of mentation and make offering with the flowers of mentation. Having anointed it with the perfume of intrinsic nature, illuminate it with the lamp of wisdom. With the body satisfied by the torma of nectar, draw it entirely and consume it.

The blazing light of golden colour becomes the two syllables ka and sha. That very seed endowed with fierce power is to be carefully guarded at the gate of Brahma. The bell, which is the water-syllable and destroyer of all form — its seed endowed with emptiness is to be placed at the nose and ears. The seed of the nectar-water is to be held at the tip of the tongue's faculty. By stacking the seed of the lion, the gate of expansion is to be guarded. By stacking the seed of the tigress, all openings are to be held. The stacked seed of the wolf is to be placed at the region of the heart. The joint of the navel is guarded at the gate of the seat by the seed of cattle. Having combined these with the eight goddesses, the eight seeds are to be held. Their colour is white, blazing intensely throughout the whole body. From the two upper fangs, let it flow down like a stream of mercury. This is called the water of milk, its colour like the sheen of rippling waves. The nectar-water sustained by the tongue from the two upper teeth is to be directed by the tongue down into the inner secret place. At the forehead region and at the back of both nose and ears, draw substance resembling food from everywhere and let it be established there.

At the gateway of the stūpa is the seed:
the syllable Hūṃ, supreme lord of power.
Having been washed with nectar-water,
let the remainder descend below.

Below, by means of the seed of wind,
draw it through everywhere as if by a wheel-mechanism.
The water then flows to the tailbone, the ribs on either side,
and likewise to both armpits,
to the joints, to the feet of the hungry ghost's fire,
to all the junctures, and from the heart-centre.
Whatever nectar has been drunk
dissolves into the hoof of the cow,
and is to be established from one gateway into nine gateways.

The nectar that abides throughout the entire body —
through whoever knows it,
all bodies will come into being.
That is the yoga which is to be contemplated.

In the centre of the heart, one should visualise the moon:
radiant, exceedingly beautiful and clear,
resembling snow, the kunda flower, and the moon.
In the centre of that moon flows a stream of milk,
together with the all-knowing hook and goad of nectar.
The light of the nectar is supremely cool.
Having abandoned the neuter letters,
with all the vowel syllables,

one should circumambulate all the stations
of the actual objects of the moon-maṇḍala.

Upon the hoof of the cow, nectar is constantly placed.
Meditate on the body of wisdom, beautiful in form and colour.
Unmoving and free from harm,
having meditated on reality by means of reality,
the seeds of the milk-moon —
endowed with the bounds of prostration and oblation —
having been recited by means of the reality of meditative equipoise, accomplishment will surely follow here; of this there is no doubt.

Craving of the sense faculties,
hunger, thirst, and the like, will cease to be.
One will live for many hundreds of years,
possessed of excellent form and splendour.
Contagion, poison, and so forth,
cold, heat, and other harms —
none of these will lodge in any limb
of the wisdom body of one who possesses gnosis.

Through visualising the root of nectar,
shoots will grow and emerge.
As they increase and multiply,
one becomes supremely great in form and in wisdom.

The places for the yoga of that practice
are to be relied upon in empty caves and the like.
Through whoever knows the nectar,
the fruit of nectar will be bestowed.

Just as one's own mind
is known in suchness by one who possesses wisdom —
wishing to purify the far shore-marks of saṃsāra,
may one listen under the sovereignty of gnosis.

With the non-dual prior mind,
one should wash one's own body
in the ocean of the afflictions of attachment.
Listen to the wisdom hero.

By that very reality of empty wisdom
resembling a deep ocean,
since inner and outer defilements are washed away,
the body becomes like crystal.

The actuality of that crystal-like body —
stainless, like a conch and a kunda flower —
should be boiled with the dye of Dharma belonging to the manifold sovereign powers of wisdom.

By nature, the yogin
arises from both unwholesome and wholesome actions.
Whoever has conquered intrinsic nature through action —
let that be illuminated by wisdom.

Through the emptiness of previous defining marks,
exhaust all the phenomena of wandering beings.
By generating the mind of equanimity,
when all forms and the like are exhausted —
between those two, one should visualise
the seed of the moon and milk.
Through the thorough union of the vowels and consonants,
it is to be gathered into their centre.

By that very seed,
visualise a chain of rays of light.
Through that very seed,
wisdom will swiftly shine forth.

With beauty of form utterly perfected,
meditate thereafter on the body of wisdom.
Send forth clouds of buddhas
throughout the world-realms of the ten directions.

The seed that is recited,
endowed with the bounds of prostration and oblation —
take up the third letter
of whatever constitutes the third group.

Wrap it around a staff, the crown, a vajra,
and white mustard and the like.
Having meditated on the mind as equanimity,

the yogin should perform recitation.

Unmoving and free from harm —

By meditating on form through form,
the yogin, striving in meditative concentration,
should cause Akaniṣṭha and the like to appear.
By the emission of spreading rays of light,
contemplate also the seven subterranean levels.
The yogin who desires this appearance should cultivate it always with the mind.

At the centre of the maṇḍala of the heart,
the supreme lord called HŪṂ —
by knowing all the characteristics of what came before,
let everything be exhausted utterly.

At the centre of the maṇḍala of wind,
visualise a lunar maṇḍala.
At its centre, contemplate the seed of wisdom
blazing with manifold rays of light.
From that arises the wisdom body —
the very nature of a wisdom ḍākinī, dwelling at the centre of the lunar maṇḍala,
seated on a lotus throne.
By knowing all the characteristics of what came before,
meditate on the body endowed with complete limbs.

At the centre of the maṇḍala of the heart,
contemplate the seed of a lunar woman.
With a mind of total equanimity,
always meditate on that very reality.
From white colour blazing with light,
fill everything with fine white particles.
On the other side, in red —

At the centre of the lunar maṇḍala,
seated upon a lotus throne,
visualise the vajra bodhisattva.
Within the heart of whomever one chooses,
seize hold of that one's consciousness.

In the eight directions of the HŪṂ,
having imagined red colour,
by the view of constant equanimity,
the wise one should come to know the minds of others.

At a distance of a measure all around,
whatever the yogin contemplates —
all the thoughts of that one will come to be supported by that very syllable.

If, on the other hand, one desires to know the characteristics of the mind of another,
by cognising the mind of another,
let everything be known entirely.
The hero, for the benefit of all sentient beings,
should apply this yoga.

Then, how should one proceed with the activity whose lord is fire?
What are the characteristics of fire offering to one who is by nature wisdom fire?

By blessing everything with the mind,
the embodied being's wisdom fire,
blessed with total wisdom —
make that suchness of fire into equipoise.
Having burned the self with the mind,
the yogin performs the fire offering.

At the very centre of the knot of the navel —
directly seven finger-widths —
is the place of the fire hearth,
encircled by the coiling lord of nāgas.

Cause all the syllables to blaze.
At the centre there, by lotus-awareness,
at the centre of a solar maṇḍala,
take the wisdom body as blazing.

Into the white fire of the knot,
dissolve the vajra ḍākinī.

On the right side,
dissolve the fierce one, resembling fire.
At the blazing red navel,
the goddess's crown: Rolanmā.
The left side is blue,
blazing fiercely — Caṇḍālī.
The natures of these five fires,
beautiful of form, are to be seen as the measure of a thumb.

Water, fire, wind,
earth, and wisdom — five in form.
As the natures of the five goddesses,
this is the supreme rite of fire offering.

From the eighteen root channels,
at the proper time, visualise the nectar (amṛta).
Into the cloven centre of the cow's hoof,
let what drips forth dissolve there.

The basis of burning at the centre of the fire —
the first vowel and the like as seeds —
having thus meditated on that very reality,
burn it for the sake of expanding the self.

A small amount of food and drink and the like,
having been made suitable, should be consumed.
A yogin who practises in this way
will never fall into debt.

This is the second detailed section from the Elaboration of the Secret Seat.

What does not remain like a monkey —
by what is equanimity to be applied?
Listen to the characteristics of the physical practice
as the music of the deities.

Hear the distinctions of the elements
and the great secret vajra.
The mind resting in equanimity —
pacified, it enters into kalī.

The arising of the hairs on the body
is universally the measure of water.
The body is not in water —
water's measure is in the body.

Because it pervades the entire body,
for the intelligent, water is the valid measure.
The body is the vajra goddess.
In all the limbs of the body,
warmth blazes like fire —
by the measure of the ripening of food,
fire is renowned as the valid measure.
Pervading all the limbs,
fire is the all-knowing red one,
and thus the body is demonstrated as fierce —
the self is renowned as the measure of the many.
Dwelling like the moon in a hollow,
wind pervades the entire body —
by the measure of the movement of the breath,
the wise know mind as the valid measure.
Through the practice that relies on the body,
whoever knows the breath —
let the knowledge of the wise
take all the goddesses as Vetālinī.

Earth is the ground of all:
endowed with the qualities of form and the other sense faculties,
when form and the rest appear,
earth is the valid seat of measure.
She is renowned as the Beautiful One —
she is the goddess Caṇḍālī,
renowned as the queen of all.

The mind resolves doubt:
it is agent, gatherer, and enjoyer.
The bases and defining marks of the minds of all the sense faculties are to be understood.
The sovereign of the senses, engaged in enjoyment,
resorting to objects and the rest —
by the valid yoga of the wise,

gnosis is to be relied upon in the body.
Since water arises from mind,
consciousness has become water —
if water were something other,
why would clinging-water not arise?
If definite warmth exists in the body,
it will not sink into water.
Since the body has five valid measures,
the five become the identity of the one.
Having understood the defining mark as singular,
the yogin examines the migrating beings.
In order to understand its defining mark,
one should rely upon a spiritual friend (kalyāṇamitra).
Through that very yogic companionship,
one crosses to the far shore of saṃsāra.
The gnosis of objects and sense faculties,
together with binding restraint,
is to be bound in the place of the egg-born, within the home,
held in the centre.
By means of arising and non-arising mind,
the moving thing is to be encircled.
The place of binding and the seat
are consciousness's lotus-throne.
Therefore the yogin
is to illumine the intrinsic nature of consciousness.
Through the thing called form,
in order to accomplish yoga,
it becomes the thing called intrinsic nature.
At the navel, a water-tree with flowers
stands erect and dwells also at the heart —
it is always the door of emptiness,
and the wise should always reverse it.
Endowed with gold,
it always has eight petals.
What is always taught as its centre
is the conjunction of gnosis and consciousness.
On the eastern side of the conjunction,

twelve fingers in accordance with it.
On the western side, the knot —
below, five fingers.
In that field, seeds
become the sprouts of a cluster of light-rays.
Through the light-rays of those seeds,
encircle them like a water-tree.
Regarding the seeds of the five expansions,
be delighted below the south.
The beautiful lotus, when proclaimed,
is adorned by eight petals.
On the throne of that lotus,
in the places of egg-born gnosis,
pure in the centre like crystal —
gnosis and consciousness in the middle channel.
The seeds of the four ḍākinīs
dwell on the directional petals.
The first of the vowels and the rest as seeds,
on the corners, nails and so forth —
the neuter syllables as taught before.
At the heart, thing by thing,
the syllables at the heart are to be viewed.
Upon the cow's urine,
the yogin always bathes
with the nectar of the nine gates.
The eight white syllables —
from the pores, the radiance
of the white nectar syllables blazes forth.
The yogin, at all times —
while going, walking, sitting,
lying down, and at all other times —
recite the seeds of gnosis and consciousness.
With a mind in profound meditative equipoise,
if the one who possesses yoga meditates and recites,
the yogin who has arisen from gnosis
will cross beyond the far shore of saṃsāra.

Without agitation and without harm,
meditate on things by means of things.
The characteristics of the transference practice described above — listen to them carefully from the vajra master, just as they are.
The yogin of the excellent path
should observe the beauty of beings.
What are the nine gates like?
By the distinctions of the gateways of gnosis,
what are the qualities and faults like?
Please listen to this from the sovereign of gnosis.
Listen carefully to the signs of the time of death joined rightly and completely.
The place made beautiful by the excellent path
is stained by the faults of the bad path of existence.
The bindu, the navel, the crown of the head,
the eye, the nose, the ear — these are the gates of existence.
Water and that which is not water are also gates.
These are the defining characteristics of the nine gates.
The navel is the desire realm and the higher heavens.
Through the bindu, one has a body in the form realm.
Rising higher and higher, remaining there,
one goes to the realm of non-torment and so forth.
From the nose is the abode of yakṣas.
Through the ears, the god accomplished in that way.
If gnosis departs through the eye,
one becomes a lord among human beings.
Through the gate of existence, one becomes a hungry ghost.
Likewise, through urine, one becomes an animal.
Through the non-water — consciousness swift —
know this as the eight hells.
Through the distinctions of the gates,
the distinctions of saṃsāric existence arise.
Therefore, from the distinctions of the gates,
the practitioner achieves the excellent path.
When the signs of death appear
and the time of death arrives,
if one has not been struck down by epidemic and the like,

the supreme is the practice of upward transference.
First, by undertaking vase-breathing,
all the gates are to be bound.
Through the stūpa of the five expansions,
meditate on blocking the gates.
For the lower gate,
imagine the white seed syllable of water.
At the gates of water and non-water,
the blazing seed syllable of fire.
With regard to these, in thorough meditative equipoise,
meditate on the breath as having a vase quality.
The body takes on the hue of wind.
The mind is upon the maṇḍala of wind.
The root is the seed of wind.
The extremity of wind is that which has the root.
The seed of the bindu, possessed of sound —
straighten the seed of the root.
Apply the fierce seed of the vajra
together with the hook and the rest.
Through twenty-one breaths,
draw forcefully upward from the station.
From the station and from the station, separate above.
From nine joints, direct upward.
Above, purify with the ripening seed
and with the half-syllable and the pair.
The fierce sound is to be uttered.
At the seed of the final member of the eight,
the faculty of the first group
is to be joined as a half-syllable.
Below, with the maṇḍala of wind,
arouse by the differentiation of sound.
Having imagined the maṇḍala of wind
bearing the seed of wind,
from twenty-one stations,
just as from above, to the upper station,
the yogin, having caused ripening,
recites at the upper channel.

From nine joints, through the other above,
know that transference occurs in an instant.
Even one who daily slays a brahmin,
or commits the five actions of immediate retribution,
or steals and acts out of desire —
through this path, they are purified.
They are not stained by evil,
and go far from the faults of existence.
Just as from mud is born
a lotus, unstained and beautiful,
so from the mud of the body
the gnosis body goes as one wishes.
When the time has come, transference is to be performed.
At the wrong time, it would slay the gods.
Therefore, upon seeing the signs on the body,
the wise one, having recognized them, undertakes the practice.
The particular excellence of accomplishing yoga —
hear it truly from the vajra master, just as it is.
Having recognized all the characteristics described before,
meditate on the mind of equality.
At the center of the maṇḍala of the heart knot,
imagine the seeds of the five buddhas.
By the blazing of their radiance like the sun,
having imagined all forms as exhausted,

With those same characteristics as before, contemplate the emptiness already taught. Having dissolved all forms and so forth, imagine that what is called HŪṂ remains there.

What is to be generated from that seed, dwelling at the center of a lunar maṇḍala, seated upon a lotus throne — that is the very nature of the wisdom dākinī: three faces, six arms, three eyes, adorned with a crown, with expressions of laughter, wrath, and passion, enveloped in all ornaments, white as the kunda flower and the moon, draped in exceedingly beautiful garments. Remaining in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, she sends forth clouds of buddhas. The first of the right hands holds an arrow, the second holds an iron hook, the third holds a vajra. The first of the left hands is the wrathful threatening gesture, the second grasps a frightful noose, and above she holds a bow of armor. Blazing with rays of light of many colors, meditate on her without moving the breath.

Striving earnestly in the eight limbs, place the letters of the eight seeds. By perfectly joining the vowel series and the consonant series, arrange the seed syllables just as they are. All the seeds endowed with rays of light, make entirely white in color. Upon the lotus of the aśoka tree's flower, place an egg-born form at the heart. Within it, imagine consciousness and gnosis joined together, immovable and unharmed — meditate on reality by means of reality itself.

Then the outer conjunction is to be taken up by the skilled one. Having contemplated the two stations, meditate on the maṇḍala of wind. At its center is fire, and at the center of the fire is the sun; endowed with the vowel and consonant series, place that seed in red.

The yogin should recite with special effort by means of exhalation and inhalation. Through the exhalation, together with the wisdom seed, be joined with what is pressed into the center. Through the inhalation, press it like a flower into the consciousness of the heart. Recite the exhalation as not the inhalation, and recite the inhalation as not the inhalation. The yogin performs exhalation and inhalation both within oneself and externally. Having indicated the characteristic of exhalation and having indicated by inhalation, the yogin's exhalation and inhalation — meditate on suchness as equanimity.

Having meditated on things in meditative equipoise, there is no doubt that accomplishment will arise here. Then, projecting outward into the body, the practitioner should emanate. Know this skillfully in conformity with the mind of the other. The special quality of meditation and recitation — meditate, imagining it in perfect equipoise. By whomever this has been contemplated by way of the path, there is no doubt that accomplishment will arise here.

This is the third progressive division from the "Elucidation of the Secret Seat."

Now, the very secret of the Secret Seat, the stages of complete awakening through the mingling of mind and gnosis — these I wish to hear from the power of gnosis.

The secret of secrets, the meaning of Dharma, the stages of awakening — O Vajra, listen! Having progressively abandoned attachment and the rest, generate the mind of equality.

In a pleasant place, dwelling on a comfortable seat, with ease of elements and mind, contemplate benefiting beings through compassion. Having heard that same authentic treatise, following the scriptural transmission of the master, meditating on the meaning of that very great secret, transmitted in a lineage from one to the next — having indicated all as before, render all things into emptiness. Upon the body from which defilements have been cleansed, refine it through the stages of awakening.

Imagining the wisdom ḍākinī dwelling at the center of a lunar maṇḍala, with rays of moonlight streaming forth, her color white as the kunda flower and the moon, both feet in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, seated upon a lotus throne, her form adorned with all ornaments, adorned with the five buddhas —

the two hands bound in the great mudrā,
pressing it to her own heart.

Her form utterly beautiful and complete —
this is called the wisdom being (jñānasattva), oneself.

From the navel, like the stalk of an aquatic flower,
it rises and abides up to the heart.

Reversing it by means of its former characteristic,
cause the lotus to bloom open as before.

With petals, filaments, and navel together,
eight petals of surpassing beauty —
upon the whorl at the center,
arrange the display of syllables.

Pure white in color, bright and clear,
meditate at the center on the chief of what melts.

In its center, join consciousness
together with gnosis (jñāna).

At the eastern door, endowed with loving-kindness (maitrī), visualize the seed of Akṣobhya.

At the southern door, compassion —
that itself is the seed of Ratnasambhava.

On the petal of the western door,
place the seed of Amitābha.

On the petal of the northern quarter,
visualize the chief of meaningful accomplishment.

The first of the vowel letters and so on as seeds,
in sequence, each possessed of a drop and a vertical stroke,
adorned with white rays of light —
the four syllables are to be arrayed.

In the four intermediate directions,
place the androgynous spirits (nirmāṇa) presented earlier.
In the center of each,
that one's mind is to be indicated by a syllable.

"From emptiness, which has no defining characteristic,
how can syllables be combined?
The mind is struck with wonder.
Blessed One, I beseech you to explain this to me."

The Blessed One declared:
"From the defining mark that reveals emptiness,
like the nectar of a grain stalk,
what has no essence becomes possessed of essence.
Vajra, hear this as it truly is.

The gnosis dwelling at the center —
gnosis by its intrinsic nature is without form
and bears the characteristic of having no characteristic.
The body of gnosis unsullied by defilement,
freed from both the existent and the nonexistent —
the form of a syllable is itself without syllable.
Between form and emptiness,
the yogin who knows that suchness is form
and who has recognized its characteristic — they who understand the gnosis of equality thereby swiftly behold
the path of perfect awakening.

Through the master's own path,
the intrinsic nature of gnosis and consciousness
is shown as the characteristic in the treatise.
The hero has taught suchness.
Blazing with white rays of light,
this is to be cultivated at all times.

The stūpa of the five expansions:
contemplating the seed of nectar,
the radiant light of brilliant white rays,
a stream of nectar flowing down, washing clean —
within those drops, the seed
is to be made round, the size of a thumb.
Within its center, the seed
is drawn from the vowels and consonants (āli-kāli).
Supremely beautiful, pure white in color,
rays of moonlight streaming everywhere —
within its center, the seed
is renowned as the bindu in meditative practice.
Visualize it throughout in the form of particles
a hundredth part of a hair's tip.
Possessing gnosis that reveals the characteristic of the object of consciousness —
because the characteristic of mind is not known,
regard the state of the bindu's abode.

At the heart and at the Brahma-aperture,
at the doorways through which the drops travel,
with reverence for the master's scriptural transmission,
seize consciousness and transform it into gnosis.

This is more distant than the outer paths
and more distant than the treatises.
The treatises are easy to obtain;
the practice that applies them is hard to find.
The practitioner endowed with skillful means,
reverently serving the master —
through the path of the master's scriptural transmission,
the wise one is to look carefully.

Immovable and without harm,
meditate upon phenomena in meditative equipoise.
Mind is the forerunner of phenomena;
by mind they are initiated and by mind they are cleansed.
Therefore all things are by nature mind —
the intelligent say they arise from mind.

If the yogin wishes to recite,
visualize the commitment at the heart.
That which has become the cause of the seed
is in reality not form.
The seed of cause and effect —
is not a seeing of suchness.
Upon the enjoyments of existence — form and the rest —
visualize the seed and recite.
From all sides entering throughout,
dwelling perfectly below and in the realm beyond below,
one must always drive it to the root.

The seed of primordial wisdom and consciousness,
endowed with the drop and with sound,
one who desires the enjoyments of existence —
having set aside outward speech —
should practice recitation with the mind alone.

By the nature of the dharmadhātu, which is permanent,
one dwells ever immovably in the expanse.
Always subtle and without stain,
consciousness dissolves into primordial wisdom;
consciousness having become primordial wisdom itself,
one comes to see the stages of awakening.

Like a lamp shining everywhere —
that is the first sign.
Like sparks carried by a firefly in flight —
that seeing is the second sign.
The third: the sign of the yogin
subduing afflictions,
whereby one sees in all ten directions
in the manner of fine white particles.
The enjoyments of the gods of the desire realm —
that seeing by mind is the fourth.
The form-realm gods
seen by mind — that is the fifth.
The enjoyments of the formless realm are the sixth.
The seventh is the ground of Dharma.

The fruit of buddhahood is the eighth —
the yogin freely enjoys it at will.

As for the particulars of the stūpa's form —
what is the form of the shape?

Those who have meditated upon the pure deity —
they are to listen to the Blessed One.

Look correctly upon those who possess bodies,
and once one has known that true reality,
engage in the practice of that very suchness
and listen to the vajra of supreme engagement.

Visualizing the moon at the heart center,
meditate upon HŪṂ in the middle.

The brilliant rays blazing like fire
are perfectly present, white at the crown.

Having conquered with blazing tongues of flame,
bring everything to utter exhaustion throughout.

By the very suchness of the previously described characteristics,
let that suchness be made into emptiness.

Then, upon the moon, the seed syllable —
having contemplated it with wisdom,
one should generate it in mind as the stūpa itself,
the very site of the palace.

That which is called "the turquoise ground" —
if the eight directions are the elements,
the bell dwelling in the midst of space
is the abode of the gods on Mount Meru.

Those who desire to engage — those with bodies —
should examine precisely in a measure.

The Dharma of no-self dwells in the center,
in the middle of below, above, and center.

The high realms called the form realm
are adorned with garlands of cakras.

The eighteen form-bearing ones
dwell sequentially in their proper order.

The sentient beings of formless existence

dissolve into the very life-tree of Dharma.

For the palace of all the gods,
generate the stūpa in form.

In the upper egg-born abode,
bring one's own mind into evenness;
since mind and primordial wisdom are blended,
distinguish the evenness of non-duality.

The extremes of form and emptiness,
and likewise existence and non-existence,
apprehended and apprehender and the rest,
virtue and its opposites —
these are the defining basis and the characteristics being taught.
In their midst one should meditate.

Having made offerings with these substances
of generosity, moral discipline, patience, and the rest, meditate on phenomena by means of phenomena,
immovably and without harm.

Having meditated upon phenomena in meditative equipoise,
accomplishment will come — of that there is no doubt here.

Those with bodies who are great disciples,
who have familiarized themselves with the focus of yoga —
the nature of the dharmadhātu, suchness, treatises, scripture, and the rest —
through the suchness of the fourth seat,
endowed with the personal instruction of the master,
may gradually enjoy it freely at will,
beholding and tasting no-self.

The yogin who tastes the nectar
swiftly attains the body of primordial wisdom.
The yogin of the body of primordial wisdom —

becomes supreme in benefit for self and others —
this is the yoga of the utterly pure dharmadhātu (basic space of phenomena).

The suchness, the supreme suchness, the very suchness that is the defining characteristic of the practice of the great secret, through which the path to awakening is made —

I wish to hear of this from the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then declared: First of all, the yogin must restrain the very mind that, like a wild horse, acts according to its own whim. A wise one must tether it. Just as a bee, intoxicated by the wine of the flowers it has drunk in, becomes stable of mind, enters enjoyment, and is freed from the bewilderment of suffering — in the same way, the mind is to be bound by the path of meditation. Because what is tethered in mind will be accomplished, the mind is to be restrained first. Through the particular practice accomplished by the mind, the wisdom of awakening is to be indicated.

In the center of the moon-disc, one is to emanate a wisdom ḍākinī. Binding the great mudrā at the heart, and recognizing all the defining marks of what came before, one places the seeds of the eight syllables in their syllabic positions.

One should contemplate the gates of the five Victors' caityas as sealed. The gates of expansion are to be guarded by the syllables of the nectar mantra. By the blazing fire syllable, water and non-water are likewise protected. The beautiful, spiraling water-born lotus blossom is to be opened in full bloom. At the gate-threshold of its center, white as a conch and as the moon, those seeds are placed in the cardinal positions. The four seeds stacked at the intermediate directions correspond to the four elements in the four directions. One meditates in profound equipoise. Radiant and pure with rays of light in every direction, one meditates upon the goddess's syllable. It is the essential nature of wisdom-consciousness. Focusing upon that very suchness at the center, and having cultivated the mind freely at will, one then dissolves form from without. Placing it in each of the cardinal and intermediate directions, having overcome all the stations of inherent nature, what remains is consciousness itself as primordial wisdom. In the east is water — its color is white, the radiance of the kunda flower. Fire is yellow, blazing with light — one always contemplates it as being in the north. The seed of wind, red in color, is to be examined in the western direction. The seed of earth, green in color, is to be contemplated in the southern direction. With the blended colors of the intermediate directions, it is to be applied to the four corners. The remaining primordial wisdom of the center dissolves what is born of the egg. The defining characteristic of that is to be indicated. The defining characteristic of what is to be indicated is that it has no thing-ness. Because the thing-ness of mind is empty, all stations of inherent nature are to be exhausted. In the midst of the emptiness of conceptual thought, there is a form like unto an atom. The syllables of the vowels and consonants are the seed — it is called "atom" and it is at the center. It is without aspect and beyond expression. In what is called "atom" throughout, it is not apprehended even as emptiness, nor is it viewed as form and so forth. That atom is not a seed; it is without inherent nature and without defining characteristics. It is neither wind nor space. One is to indicate it as the equality, the middle. Form and emptiness likewise — the center is the same. The yogin is to grasp it in the same way. It is to be realized through the master's scriptural transmission. Through examination of the noble scriptures and the defining characteristics of treatises, one will accomplish it through the evidence of scripture. In stillness, without harm, one is to meditate upon things through things. Having investigated through things in meditative equipoise, the stages of awakening will be accomplished.

The yogin in whom primordial wisdom has merged strives with the highest resolve for the benefit of sentient beings. When one desires to guard the domain of conceptuality, body, and mind, possessed of the enjoyments of wisdom-faculties, through the accomplishment of the body of one's own desire, one desires the fruit of entry into the stream continually.

One looks through the primordial wisdom of the three realms, and strives for the benefit of all sentient beings: the abode of mind according to one's own desire, those who possess bodies moving through space. The supreme will swiftly be bestowed. Through striving for the benefit of body and sense faculties, one is to act freely through selflessness. Through the practice of the intrinsic nature of the dharmadhātu, one will be liberated from saṃsāra. Even for the buddhas who are guides, other practices will become the object of striving.

The practitioner who is free from busyness and crowds, dwelling far from the noise of people, is to meditate there in forest groves, mountain valleys, and rocky caves.

Nāgamūla, Balāśa, Rutva, and Ratacha — these three — one part by weight of Māgadhi: having made them equal parts and ground them to powder, then mixed with fresh cow's milk — the fourfold powder thus combined — this the yogin is to eat daily, the wise one eating with skill. The yogin who for a hundred years dwells in empty caves and such places, through thorough and certain ripening, will be freed from cold, hunger, thirst, and the like. The yogin who possesses these medicines and dwells in empty caves and such places, who keeps the Vinaya, will always have the body protected.

Just as a woman delights in childish talk, speaking of and teaching about dual pleasures — so it is not thus that the path is taught to those who are to die. The wicked yoga path is not taught in that way. The Vedas, water, and likewise the dūrvā grass — what the brahmins have set forth in general is not to be taken up by one who has become a buddha. Since empowerments, mantras, and the like bring fear through deterioration, one is not to pay homage to assemblies of low gods of inferior lineages.

Then the assembly of yogins and yoginīs, ḍākas and ḍākinīs, and the Saṅgha of many hundreds of billions of bodhisattvas, their minds satisfied, all attained primordial wisdom. Vajrapāṇi and the other bodhisattvas and sentient beings joined their palms together and sang this song:

Tena hūṃ, tena hūṃ, tena tete hūṃ.

We bow to the causeless reality
that liberates sentient beings freely.

Tena hūṃ, tena hūṃ, tena tete hūṃ.

Whose face is beautiful as the autumn moon,
who holds a form white as a conch shell —

Tena hūṃ, tena hūṃ, tena tete hūṃ.

Who bears the mudrā of vajra and bell,
who holds the union of the two joined together —

Tena hūṃ, tena hūṃ, tena tete hūṃ.

The beautiful migrating beings dissolved into the illusory body —
causeless reality —

Tena hūṃ, tena hūṃ, tena tete hūṃ.

Who possesses the body that tames with passionate desire as the three realms blaze,

who possesses thousands upon thousands of sharp rays of light like a thousand suns,

who is possessed of manifold form, ornaments, and the compassionate mind

Vajrasattva, the supreme sovereign, performing the supreme dance.

Filling all with sounds of auspiciousness, everyone from every side raised that song.

Vajra, hear the path as it truly is. This treatise, which is supremely equanimous: if anyone at all — be it man or woman — listens to even its letters or words, they will obtain the enjoyments of the higher realms, or else become a wheel-turning monarch. Those who inquire into it, enter into it, recite it, or, filled with great devotion, repeat its mantras — at the time of those yogins' transference, all forms of existence are accomplished as one intends. Those who perform yogic meditative concentration will swiftly attain the successive stages of awakening.

Having thus spoken by himself, all the yogins and yoginīs gathered from the world-systems of the ten directions, together with all the great bodhisattvas such as Vajrapāṇi and the rest, and together with the entire retinue including gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, and all the others, rejoiced and were delighted, and praised with acclaim what the Blessed One had declared.

The Great King of the Tantras of the Yoginīs, called the Glorious Four Seats, spoken by the Blessed One Vajradhara as the essential heart of one hundred and eight hundred thousand verses, is complete.

Translated and edited to a definitive version by the great Indian paṇḍita Gayādhara together with the great translator of the revision, Gok Khukpa Lhetsé.

Translator's Notes

- The opening verse names a speaker in the third person ("the omniscient one spoke thus") and is immediately followed by a frame narrative in prose. The identity of the omniscient speaker is Avalokiteśvara, to whom homage was paid; Vajrapāṇi then rises and poses a series of questions in verse. This is the standard tantric dialogue frame.

The twelve asterism names in the body of the text — Rohita, Mohita, Bhadra, Vṛṣabha, Kūrma, Makara, Raṇḍa, Mikira, Vitrika, Byākusvapnaka, Manā, Kāmasa — are Sanskrit terms rendered in Tibetan phonetic transcription. They designate a system of twelve lunar mansions or natal asterisms used for astrological and ritual purposes specific to this tantric system. Their correspondences to the standard Indian nakṣatra system are not straightforward and vary by tradition.

The phrase "those with three throats" is a literal rendering of a descriptive epithet for a class of yogic adepts; its precise referent within the tantra's internal classification is unclear from this passage alone.

The figure of twenty-one thousand six hundred breaths per day corresponds to a well-attested number in Indian yogic physiology texts, representing the total count of respirations in a twenty-four-hour period.

- The nakṣatra names transliterated from Tibetan phonetic renderings are Bhadra, Vṛṣabha, Kūrma, Makara, Raṇḍa, Mṛkara, Viṭrika, Vyākula, and Svapna. Several of these correspond to recognizable Sanskrit lunar-mansion or zodiacal names, though Raṇḍa and Vyākula are less standard. The Tibetan text breaks off mid-sentence at the final entry, which is reflected in the translation.

The phrase rendered "dies by drowning" for "chu ru 'chi" and "leaps into water and dies" for "chu ru mchongs te 'chi bar 'gyur" preserves a distinction in the Tibetan between dying by water generally and specifically leaping into water; this is intentional.

- The text contains a list of names — Rohita, Mohita, Bhadrā, Vṛṣabha, Kūrma, Makara, Raṇḍa, Mikira, Bitrika, Byākuli, Svapna, Kāma — that function as names of lunar mansions or time-divisions in an astrological system. These are kept as transliterated proper nouns throughout, as their precise Sanskrit equivalents are not always recoverable with certainty from the Tibetan phonetic rendering alone. The forms given represent best-effort reconstruction.

The phrase rendered "the supreme horse of Ra accomplished by the compound of nectar no birth will arise" is a technical formula of obscure meaning that occurs twice. It may refer to a specific alchemical or ritual preparation within the tantric medical-astrological tradition. The passage about "compounding of poisons" and applying them "toward others" belongs to a tantric ritual context in which such formulas are conventional, not literal instructions.

The phrase "Pitri" for "པིཌི་" is tentative; it may represent a different name in the underlying Sanskrit source. The description "one of a hundred heads" is likewise a conventional epithet in astrological literature.

- The passage is from a Kālacakra-related astronomical and astrological treatise, and the technical calculation terminology — particularly the numerical conversion formulas for water-hours (chu tshod, i.e., ghaṭikā or nāḍī units) and the vishugha (Skt. viṣuvat or viṣuva, the equinoctial point or a specific unit of time) — is highly compressed and elliptical. The exact arithmetic operations implied by phrases such as "six and twelve converted" are technical shorthand that would require access to a full commentary to unpack with precision; the translation renders the surface syntax faithfully without inventing computational details.

The final section on vowels (A, Ā, I, Ī, U, Ū, E, AI, O) represents a system of prognostication by vowel-sign, likely a Sanskrit-derived divination system embedded in the Kālacakra astrological corpus. The term rendered "two neuters" (ma ning gnyis) refers to the two neuter or hermaphroditic vowel categories in this system.

- The passage contains two distinct sections: first, a continuation of the vowel-lot divination system, and second, a transition into a body-sign prognostication text concerned with omens of death and their ritual remedies using seed syllables (bīja). The colophon-like phrase "extracted step by step from my own seat, is the first" marks the end of the first section and may signal the conclusion of a chapter or sub-text.

The phrase rendered "at the hour of Rohita" (snga dro ro hi ta dus su) uses a Sanskrit loanword Rohita, likely referring to a specific auspicious time or color-period in the day according to a traditional Indian reckoning system, preserved untranslated in the Tibetan.

The maternal deity names such as "Vajramā," "Corpse-Raising Mother," "Siṃhamā," "Vyāghrī," "Jackal," and "Owl Mother" are seed-syllable deity forms belonging to a tantric maṇḍala system; their precise identifications depend on the specific tantra tradition. "Two snowflakes" for kha ba gnyis 'gyur is an unusual phrase and may refer to a specific syllable transformation or a technical term in this tradition whose exact meaning is uncertain.

- The term ma ning rendered as "Hermaphrodite Ones" refers to a class of ritual figures of ambiguous or non-binary gender identity found in tantric maṇḍala systems; some translators leave this term in Tibetan or render it as "neuter ones." The choice here follows the literal semantic range.

The phrase bdun bral du rendered literally as "void-of-truth" is unusual; it may be a textual variant or a specific doctrinal designation for an intermediate directional deity-position. It is rendered according to the apparent meaning of the syllables, but the underlying Sanskrit correlate, if any, is uncertain.

The yantra referred to in the passage as 'khrul khor is a physical ritual diagram or device, here meaning a drawn or constructed geometrical instrument rather than a contemplative visualization alone.

• The eight nāgas named in the mantras correspond to the classical list: Vāsuki, Takṣaka, Karkoṭaka, Padma, Mahāpadma, Śaṅkhaṇḍa, Kulika, and a ninth figure here rendered Hulunke, which is an unusual variant possibly for Ananta or a local tradition's ninth nāga. The Tibetan here lists eight mantras for eight nāgas plus a ninth general mantra, suggesting a nine-mantra set built around the standard eight-nāga list.

The phrase "amukasya niravīṣaṃ kuru" in the final mantra is a Sanskrit formula meaning "remove the poison from so-and-so" (amuka being a placeholder name for the patient), which confirms this is a rite for extracting poison from a named individual.

The term rendered "bindu-point" (thig le) refers here to a specific anatomical or ritual point on the body rather than the usual tantric sense of the drop of vital essence; the context of listing body-points for poison-treatment supports this reading.

- The phrase rendered "approach recitation three hundred thousand times" translates "sngon du bsnyen pa 'bum phrag gsum," literally "prior approach of three hundred-thousands," meaning three hundred thousand recitations of the root mantra as preliminary practice. This is a standard tantric instruction.

The line "as long as there are eighteen of them" refers to the eighteen dhātus (elements of experience: six sense organs, six objects, six consciousnesses). The text here begins an enumeration of their emptiness but abbreviates it with "and so forth," and then proceeds to discuss a selected few explicitly.

The final lines of the passage appear to begin a new section describing signs or visions arising during meditation practice (pacification indicated by lamplight, auspicious yellow and silver signs, the solar disk). The passage breaks off mid-description; nothing in the text itself signals this as uncertain — the break is simply where the given Tibetan ends.

- The passage contains several deliberately paradoxical or "twilight language" (sandhābhāṣā) instructions characteristic of tantric literature. The injunction to "slay father and mother" and "destroy the king and his realm" are standard antinomian formulas understood within the tradition as referring to the destruction of the principal afflictions (attachment and aversion as "father and mother," pride or sovereign ego as "king") rather than literal acts. The two "pure brahmins" seized are typically interpreted as the two channels (nāḍī) or the two truths.

The term rendered "seed of water like nectar" (bdud rtsi'i chu yi sa bon) could also be read as "the seed of amṛta-water"; the translation captures the primary sense.

The phrase 二重非雙 at the opening of the second section is metrically and syntactically difficult; the reading "twofold, non-dual" reflects a plausible doctrinal interpretation (the unity of the two accumulations or two truths), but the syllable 非 is unusual and may be a scribal corruption.

The section colophon "The third chapter of the gradual divisions from The Excellent Arrangement of My Own Seat" marks this as part of a larger tantric text, likely a sādhanā or ritual manual.

- The passage is a tantric ritual manual with dense technical instructions for constructing fire-pit altars and composing seed syllables through positional operations on the Tibetan alphabet. The syllable-composition instructions refer to specific positional groups of the Tibetan syllabary, and full reconstruction of which exact syllables are intended would require access to the full alphabetic scheme of this tradition; the translation renders the structural operations faithfully while leaving the specific syllable identities implicit, as does the text itself for initiated readers.

The phrase rendered "cloth-measure" reflects a unit of linear measurement (literally "width of a cloth"), standard in such architectural ritual instructions.

The section colophon "Self-Seal Invitation" renders the Tibetan title somewhat literally; the precise meaning of "bdag gu gdan" is slightly opaque, and the traditional interpretation within the commentarial lineage of this text would clarify it further.

- The passage assigns specific elements to bodily locations in an unusual scheme — water to the tongue, space to ear and nose, earth to the eye, "the human being" at the brahma-aperture (crown), a "stupefied guide" at the throat, movement at the heart, afflictions spread throughout, and "cattle" at the navel-root. This is a tantric body-mapping of deities or elemental principles to limbs as a protective meditation; the list is internally consistent but the terminology is technical and laconic, so the rendering follows the Tibetan closely without smoothing over the strangeness.

The term translated "yama-wood" refers to wood associated with Yama, the lord of death, used in certain fire rituals, particularly funerary or wrathful rites.

The phrase translated "three banners" (badan gsum) refers to a specific mudrā or ritual implement configuration; it is a technical term within this ritual context and is left as rendered.

- The term rendered "all-knowing one" for ཀུན་ཤེས་ཀྱི་བླ་མ་ is a reference to Sarvavid Vairocana, a tantric deity whose name means "the all-knowing" or "all-illuminating." In this ritual context it refers to the deity presiding over the fire offering.

The wood names in the final sections present some difficulty. ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་, ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་, ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་, and ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་ are Tibetan transliterations of Sanskrit botanical terms whose precise botanical identification is uncertain in the tradition; they are rendered by approximate phonetic equivalents. ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་, ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་, and ལྷ་ལྡོག་པུ་མེད་ are similarly rendered.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, corresponding to the wrathful activity section which continues beyond what was supplied here.

[illegible]

The mantra "Om kamale bhisvāhā" is rendered as it appears phonetically in the Tibetan transliteration. The standard Sanskrit form would be "Om kamale bhi svāhā" or possibly "Om kamalāya svāhā," but the Tibetan syllables are followed as given.

[illegible]

- The directional goddesses named in this passage — the Vaira Lady of the vase in the east, the Fierce One in the north, the zombie-raiser in the west, the Wrathful One in the south, the Lioness, the Tigress, the She-Wolf, and the Owl assigned to the wind direction — form a set of eight directional and inter-cardinal protectress figures standard in certain tantric maṇḍala systems. Their Tibetan epithets are rendered by meaning here since no standard Sanskrit equivalents are supplied in the text.

The plant name "nāga flower" renders nāgapuṣpa; "aṅkola" and "bilva" are retained as recognized botanical terms in tantric ritual contexts.

The phrase "the rite of the Seat of Another" closes the second chapter-division; the precise title of the parent text from which this is extracted is not given here and cannot be determined from this passage alone.

The final line is syntactically incomplete as given and the translation breaks off accordingly.

- The "Zombie Ḍākinī" renders the Tibetan mkha' 'gro ro lang ma, literally "ḍākinī of the risen corpse" (i.e., a vetāla or zombie figure). This is a specific iconographic type within this tantra's maṇḍala system; the rendering is deliberately literal.

The "Fierce-and-Savage Ḍākinī" renders gtum mo, literally "fierce one" (Sanskrit caṇḍālī); in other contexts this term denotes the inner-heat yoga, but here it clearly names a maṇḍala deity.

The sequence of four directional ḍākinīs (east, north, west, south) is slightly irregular in that the north precedes the west, which may reflect the text's own arrangement or a tantric convention specific to this cycle.

The "direction of the powerful one" (dbang ldan gyi phyogs) for the lion-faced deity most likely refers to the northeast or to Indra's quarter; the precise directional assignment is not explicit in this passage alone.

- The section on seed syllables presents a complex tantric encoding that operates by combining specific vowel letters and a neuter syllable series with a formulaic phrase rendered here as "Obeisance, burner of boundaries" — a phrase which appears to function as a fixed liturgical string from which individual letters are extracted. The precise Sanskrit vowel-letter assignments and the exact neuter consonant syllables being referenced cannot be determined with certainty from the Tibetan alone without access to the root Sanskrit tantra or a commentary, as the Tibetan is abbreviating a technical seed-syllable assignment system. The rendering is therefore paraphrastic for the structural logic while preserving all present terms faithfully.

The epithet "Dripping One" for the western goddess renders Tibetan "jib byed ma," literally "she who drips or oozes," likely referring to a terrifying form that drips blood or fluid, consistent with the fierce deity iconography of the context.

"Zombie Goddess" renders ro lang ma, literally "she of the risen corpse," a vetālī-type deity standard in tantric iconographic lists.

- The text is a ritual manual specifying seed syllables and mudrās for directional goddesses. Several technical terms have been rendered by their function rather than transliterated where the Tibetan gives descriptive epithets: "she who makes blaze" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཆོག་མཆོག་, "she who drips" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཆོག་, "she who seizes" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཆོག་, and "Risen-Corpse Lady" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཆོག་. These correspond to named directional goddesses in the Cakrasaṃvara and related cycles.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཆོག་མཆོག་, literally "the hook letter of hope," almost certainly refers to a specific letter of the Sanskrit alphabet whose form resembles a hook; the precise identification depends on which syllabary system the text employs and is left in descriptive form here.

The passage ends mid-sentence at "interlock the two vajra fists," matching the continuity note that this is a mid-text passage.

- The verse section beginning "I, who am emanated as hūṃ" through "I, always bowing to that very one" is a series of gāthā-style praises embedded within a ritual manual. The lines are dense and at points deliberately paradoxical in the tantric manner. The line rendered "Unchanging, the thought of the arhat remainder" is obscure: mi 'gyur dgra bcom lhag ma sems pa may be a description of a yogic state equated with an arhat's residual consciousness, or a cryptic praise-formula; the rendering given is literal but the doctrinal referent is deliberately esoteric.

The phrase "embracing the breast that draws the arrow" (mda' 'dren nu mar 'khyud pa) is a mudrā description involving a gesture mimicking a woman drawing a bow against her breast; this is a standard tantric offering-gesture.

The final instruction — "scatter the thumb and offer to each separately, to be drunk" — refers to a ritual gesture in which drops of nectar are flicked from the thumb to each deity in the maṇḍala.

- The text is a ritual manual in the Vajrayāna tradition, listing a long series of goddess and spirit names in verses that function as summoning catalogues. Several names in the list are technical epithets that admit of multiple readings; the renderings given follow their most transparent Tibetan meanings in context. The Sanskrit mantras are transliterated as they appear; some syllables are corrupt or represent non-standard Prakrit forms, which is normal for this genre. The phrase rendered "the five expanded ones" refers to the five enriched or extended stūpa forms; the exact referent depends on the larger liturgical context. The expression "Devadatta dwelling alongside" renders lha sbyin mnyam du bsten pa and could also denote a specific female spirit bearing a name meaning "god-given" who is cultivated as a companion — this ambiguity is significant and the identification is uncertain.

- The section containing Āli and Kāli refers to the Sanskrit vowel series (Āli) and consonant series (Kāli), which in tantric usage represent the union of wisdom and skillful means, female and male principles respectively. This is standard Vajrayāna exegesis and is preserved in the translation without intrusive explanation.

The "three ritual gestures" (se gol gsum) translated as "three ritual gestures" is a specialized tantric term for a set of hand-gestures used in deity departure rites; the exact referent varies by tradition and may warrant attention in scholarly commentary.

The final line is incomplete in the passage as given, ending mid-sentence. The translation renders what is present without fabricating a conclusion.

- The phrase rendered "Tasting One" for འཇིགས་པ་ལྟོན་པ་ is a participial epithet meaning "the one who tastes" or "the taster," here functioning as a deity-name or epithet alongside Vajreśvara; the precise identity of this figure as a distinct deity or a further epithet of the same is unclear from context alone.

The Bandhuka flower (Sanskrit: bandhūka) is a red flower known for its open cup shape; the simile emphasizes the open receptacle from which nectar is drawn.

The syllables HA, HO, HRĪḤ, HŪṂ, GRI, JRIM, SRI, Ālaṃ, Ālī, and Kālī are technical seed syllables and mantra terms retained untranslated as is standard in tantric literature; their specific ritual-yogic valences belong to the living commentarial tradition and cannot be fully unpacked from the text alone.

"Crocodile-fish" renders རྩྭ་ལྷ་མོ་, a compound of makara (the sea-creature) and fish; this may refer to a single symbolic aquatic being in the tantric cosmology of the body.

- The phrase rendered "captain of non-duality" (gnyis med ded dpon gnas) is somewhat cryptic; "ded dpon" (Skt. sārthavāha, "caravan leader" or "captain") is a known epithet in tantric contexts for a guide or master figure, and "gnyis med" (non-dual) qualifies his abode or station. The passage likely refers to a specific tantric master or deity figure; the rendering follows the literal sense.

The list of goddess epithets in the middle section is syntactically dense and the referents shift rapidly; the translation follows the most natural reading of each epithetic phrase as describing a series of aspects or distinct goddess figures whose collective action grants accomplishment.

The final sentence breaks off mid-thought in the Tibetan, consistent with a continuation in the following passage.

- The term rendered as "Moisture-maker" translates the Tibetan transliteration of a deity name, likely corresponding to a Sanskrit name such as Jambhikā or a similar figure associated with moisture or abundance; the Tibetan here functions as a proper epithet in context. The name Kāmapuṣpī in the closing section is a back-reconstruction from the Tibetan phonetic rendering; the precise Sanskrit form may vary in different witnesses.
- The final syllable cluster "Dve-rati" is left without further gloss as it appears to function as another coded signal-term in the series of secret signs rather than a complete sentence; its precise meaning within this esoteric system is not fully transparent from context alone.

The term "bhallāṭaka" rendered directly from the Tibetan phonetic transcription refers to the marking-nut tree (Semecarpus anacardium), a plant with strongly caustic properties frequently employed in Indian ritual contexts.

The section of coded exchange-signs (gho-ghu, ghu-ghu, mu-ghu, lu-ghu, and so forth) constitutes a system of secret gestural and verbal signals used among tantric practitioners to communicate covertly; these syllables are phonetic transliterations of what appear to be hybrid Sanskrit-vernacular code-words, and no standard canonical glosses exist for all of them.

- The passage is drawn from a tantra of the Cakrasaṃvara or related Yoginī-tantra cycle. The Sanskrit-derived terms (Rucaṭabata, Bipdhakasid, Caṇḍālikā, Nīladaṇḍapāṭa, Anangāyuddha, Durkatī, Tāragaṇa, Girito, Samacchāyā, Jīrṇabata, Salyabada, Soma, Suryabada) are phonetic Tibetan renderings of corrupted or vernacular Sanskrit; they are preserved as proper terms rather than translated. The identification of "Śrī of Others" renders "gzhan gi dpal," which may refer to a specific deity such as Parāśarī; the exact referent is uncertain.

"Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin" (sgrib pa rnam par sel ba) is given its standard Sanskrit equivalent. The phrase "thirteen-doored gate" (dbus kyi bcu gsum sgo nga ru) is a technical maṇḍala term whose precise architectural referent varies across commentarial traditions.

- The eight goddesses named here follow a standard tantric maṇḍala arrangement. Pāṇḍaravāsīnī is rendered "White-Robed One" on first use for clarity; Buddhalocanā is glossed as "Buddha-Eye" following the Tibetan འཇམ་འགྲུ་མཚན་པོ་. The mantra passage is reproduced in Romanized Sanskrit as it stands in the Tibetan; the Sanskrit is corrupt or abbreviated in places and has been preserved as received rather than emended.

The phrase འཇམ་འགྲུ་མཚན་པོ་ refers to the two traditional sets of Sanskrit syllables, the vowels (ālī) and consonants (kālī), a standard tantric technical pairing here rendered "vowels and consonants."

The "elephant's bell" image in the penultimate section conveys that the sound is large and loud but empty of the true resonance of realization — a standard simile for fruitless practice.

- The mantra "Om padepade mahāpade jñāna sarva buddha mahābhāve hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ ho ho ho āḥ svāhā" is rendered by direct transliteration of the Tibetan phonetic syllables, which appear to be a transmission of a Sanskrit dhāraṇī; the exact Sanskrit form is uncertain and may represent a corrupted or intentionally obscured tantric formula.

The line rendered "elephant-mane seeds" translates lung tang, which in Tibetan materia medica likely refers to a specific ritual plant or seed used in fierce rites; the precise botanical identification is uncertain.

The term "Butratsi" is left as a partial transliteration of "Bu tra dzi," which appears to be a material substance used across all four ritual activities; its exact identity in Indo-Tibetan tantric pharmacology is not definitively established from this passage alone.

The final line, "what is unclear will become clear before long," is a slightly unusual reading; the Tibetan mi gsal ba ni ring bar 'gyur could also mean "the obscure will be clarified at length" in a textual sense, referring to further elaboration to come.

- The term rendered "twenty-three divine abodes" follows the Tibetan literally. The passage describing a cosmological hierarchy of twenty-three levels of gods, each doubling in number as one ascends, is unusual and may reflect a specific tantric enumeration not easily matched to standard Abhidharma lists; the precise doctrinal referent is unclear.

The phrase "deceptive wisdom of women" is a direct rendering of the Tibetan and reflects the text's own voice; it is not an editorial gloss but belongs to a passage cataloguing the various limited or distorted modes of awareness found among different classes of beings.

"Ten million billions of births" renders bye ba stong phrag, literally "ten million thousands," a standard hyperbolic formulation for vast spans of time across innumerable rebirths.

- The rite described here is a sādhana for Prajñā (wisdom-deity) practice, likely within a Tārā or related Vajrayāna ritual manual. The grid-cell descriptions (nine, twelve, sixteen cells) refer to a standard Tibetan tantric maṇḍala-wheel diagram used in visualization and yantra construction; the precise geometrical layout depends on a teacher's oral instruction and cannot be fully reconstructed from the text alone.

The phrase rendered "killing letter" refers to a specific tantric syllable associated with subjugating or wrathful action; it is a technical term within the rite and is left in its functional sense rather than identified, as the specific syllable is not named in this passage.

The instruction about "the letter that becomes two drops" with ga joined at the root is a phonological-cum-tantric instruction about Sanskrit syllable modification (likely involving anusvāra or visarga transformation); it is genuinely obscure without access to the oral transmission of this particular text.

- The phrase rendered "the seventh of the sounds" is a technical reference to a specific position within a Sanskrit phonemic classification system. The exact syllable intended depends on which enumeration of sound-groups is being used, and without the surrounding ritual manual's cipher, precise identification is not possible. This is a genuine textual crux.

The name Norgyunma is a Tibetan deity of wealth and abundance, equivalent to the Sanskrit Vasudhārā; the translation renders her directly as Vasudharā with a gloss.

The section on the "fifth group" and "third letter" refers to Sanskrit alphabetic classification used in tantric seed-syllable construction. The exact syllables are intentionally encoded and would require the accompanying oral transmission or commentary to decode with certainty.

- The passage contains a sequence of sādhana-style instructions with embedded mantras; the mantras are rendered in transliterated Sanskrit as they appear without translation, which is standard practice. The phrase "the first vowel letter as the supreme seed" refers to the Sanskrit vowel A as the seed syllable of Vairocana, a standard Vajrayāna doctrinal identification. The epithets "the Lord and Protector of the World," "the gentle," and similar phrases in the five-buddha visualization section are terse Tibetan shorthand identifying iconographic attributes; the translation renders them literally as they stand, as their full commentarial explication lies outside the passage. The expression "the Gazing One" renders gzigs mo, a feminine vocative address, possibly a ḍākinī interlocutor in a dialogue frame. The instruction "without letting the breath stir" is a standard Vajrayāna instruction for breath retention during visualization.

- The phrase rendered as "those of secret nature" translates a term that literally means "secret ones," likely referring to a class of hidden or concealed spirit beings distinct from hungry ghosts and ordinary elementals; the exact class intended is not entirely clear from context alone.

The instruction to "write with poison and with blood" and related ritual actions throughout this passage belong to a category of coercive or wrathful tantric rites; the translation faithfully renders the text without softening these elements.

The mantra syllable "phuḥ" appears in variant spellings in the Tibetan and has been standardized here for consistency with the preceding passage.

- The term rendered "Caṇḍālī" is a tantric technical term denoting the fierce inner-heat deity or yogic force; it is left in Sanskrit as the text clearly treats it as a proper name or deity-form.

The phrase "bhaga" appears several times in this passage as a Sanskrit loanword in the Tibetan; in this context it clearly carries its double valence as both a title of honor and as a euphemism for the female sexual organ, standard in this genre of ritual literature. The translation retains the Sanskrit to preserve both registers without obscuring the text.

The "torma of non-duality" renders a recurring technical phrase; the "non-duality" here likely refers to the torma as a unity of means and wisdom or as undifferentiated offering substance, consistent with the ritual genre.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, as it is a continuation passage.

- The "three purities" mantras are rendered directly from the Sanskrit embedded in the Tibetan text. They correspond to the standard threefold purification formula found in tantric ritual contexts, invoking purification through intrinsic nature, through vajra-nature, and through yoga.

The line rendered "do not treat beings with mere sentiment" translates a somewhat compressed injunction that contrasts genuine compassionate action for beings' welfare against a superficial emotional attitude; the exact nuance is difficult to render with certainty.

The "twenty-eight" in "the deity possesses twenty-eight" most likely refers to the twenty-eight attendant śaktis or aspects of the deity described elsewhere in the tantra; the referent is not entirely disambiguated by this passage alone.

- This passage belongs to a Vajrayāna tantric text describing a sexual yoga (karmamudra) practice involving visualization, mantra recitation, and ritualized union. The imagery throughout is deliberately esoteric and operates simultaneously on literal and symbolic levels: the "goddess" (lhamo) is the wisdom-consort, the "vajra" is both the implement and the practitioner or his organ, and the "bell" is the consort. Literal translation has been preserved rather than euphemism, as the text's register demands it.

The "eighteen stations" likely refers to standard tantric lists of body-zones (pīṭhas or ādhāra points), and "nectar" refers to the bodhicitta fluid generated in the ritual. The phrase "Mother, the Perfection of Wisdom" renders the Prajñāpāramitā as the generative source of the visualized deity-bodies, a standard Vajrayāna identification.

The final two lines appear to be a transition into a new sub-topic and the passage breaks off mid-sentence; the translation reflects this incompleteness.

- The passage is a tantric ritual text of considerable technicality, employing a specialized vocabulary in which botanical, anatomical, ritual, and cosmological registers overlap and interpenetrate. Several terms are deliberately obscured or double-coded, as is characteristic of the twilight language (sandhyābhāṣā) genre.

The term "thongka" appears in the Tibetan as a plant or substance name alongside bandukā; both are used as technical references whose precise botanical identities remain uncertain in this context.

The phrase "hungry ghost of the timely fire" renders a genuinely difficult compound in which "hungry ghost" and "fire" appear to function as ritual or technical designations rather than straightforwardly cosmological ones; the exact referent within this system is uncertain.

The "third syllable of the third group" refers to the classification of Sanskrit syllables into groups, a standard phonological-ritual scheme in tantric literature; the specific letter intended cannot be determined without the broader cipher key of this text.

The list of substances at the close — saffron, musk, kadamba flower flesh, turmeric, and costus — is a standard tantric preparatory mixture; "rts e pa la sha" is taken here as "flesh of the kadamba flower tip," though "kadamba" is a tentative identification.

- The term ālī and kālī refer to the vowels and consonants of the Sanskrit alphabet respectively, here used as tantric symbols for the masculine and feminine principles, identified with vajra (the phallus or skillful means) and bell (the womb or wisdom). This is standard Vajrayāna symbolic usage.

The phrase rendered as "Tathāgatā — the thus-gone feminine" reflects the Tibetan de bzhin gshegs ma, the feminine form of Tathāgata; this is a genuine grammatical feminine used to designate kālī as the feminine buddha-principle.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence in the source text, indicating this is a passage boundary within a longer work.

The categories of women listed by social class and occupation follow a pattern common in tantric literature associating specific ritual consorts with specific ritual activities; the translation follows the Tibetan without editorial smoothing.

- The text contains several technical terms from the context of tantric sādhana practice. The term "āli" refers to the set of vowel-syllables in the tantric phonological system. The "two syllables" joined with the "essence-drop" and "root sound" likely refers to the syllables of a specific mantra seed-syllable complex, though the precise referent depends on the broader text context. The plants translated as "ym-tree and poplar" render Tibetan terms for particular fire-offering woods; the first is uncertain. The khaṭvāṅga is a tantric staff-scepter. The "Siṃhā" is the lion-headed goddess suggested by the context and the later lion-sign description. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the instruction to translate the given passage only.

- The phrase rendered "expelled according to command" translates a term for ritual expulsion or driving away of enemies, a standard rite of power. The list of ten qualities of a master is a formulaic enumeration common to tantric literature; the Tibetan does not number them explicitly but the tradition understands them as ten from the rhetorical structure. The term rendered "owl-woman" is a class of semi-divine or demonic feminine being associated with particular rites; the precise identity of all such figures in this class varies across textual traditions. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text is cut off, and this has been rendered accordingly without completion.

- The three Sanskrit purification mantras are rendered as they appear phonetically in the Tibetan without emendation; the Sanskrit is standard and clear.

The three Sanskrit dedication formulas beginning with Oṃ pañcaḍākinī are rendered as they appear. The Sanskrit is slightly irregular in places (pūjosthānāya for pūjopasthānāya, paritarṇa for paritrāṇa) but these are the forms transmitted in the text and have been preserved as such.

The line rendered "similar in place and manner to dance" is genuinely difficult. The Tibetan reads gar gyi gnas dang tshul 'dra ba'i phyi rol bstan bcos zhen mi bya, which could mean "one should not be attached to external treatises that resemble the domain and manner of dance," possibly referring to non-Buddhist performative or theatrical traditions. This reading is uncertain and may require consultation with a commentarial source.

The term rendered "five-limbed prostration" refers to the traditional prostration in which five body points touch the ground: the two knees, the two hands, and the forehead.

- The phrase rendered "the path and fruit of beings' existence" for 菩提薩埵道果樹 is slightly ambiguous: it could mean "the path and fruition of migration" in a technical sense (i.e., the soteriological path and its result), but in context the image of the tree blocking the way suggests a more literal reading of obstructing beings' progress toward liberation; both senses may be intentional.

The line 𐤀𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤕𐤌𐤔𐤏𐤕𐤍𐤔𐤏𐤕𐤎 / 𐤀𐤓𐤁𐤏𐤕𐤌𐤔𐤏𐤕𐤍𐤔𐤏𐤕𐤎 is textually compressed and the "merchant" image is unusual; the rendering follows the most plausible grammatical reading but the exact doctrinal point of the merchant simile here is uncertain.

The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the instruction that only this segment is being translated.

- The two syllables "ka and sha" rendered from the Tibetan ka sha gnyis likely refer to the tantric seed-syllables KA and SHA as a bīja pair; their precise identification within the relevant cycle is uncertain from context alone.

The phrase "co-travelling being" renders lhan cig 'gro ba, which could also mean "co-born being" or refer to an accompanying subtle consciousness; the tantric technical sense is ambiguous here.

The passage from the body-posture instructions onward is a standard tantric meditation manual section; "gate of Brahma" refers to the brahmarandhra, the aperture at the crown of the head, a standard technical term in this context.

- The phrase rendered as "gateway of the stūpa" for 窣堵波門 is unusual in this context; the text appears to be using stūpa as a body-metaphor, consistent with the tantric framework of the surrounding passage, where bodily locations are described in architectural and ritual terms.

The term अक्षर (neuter, ambiguous gender) in the line "having abandoned the neuter letters" refers to a category in the Sanskrit syllabary — syllables that are neither vowels (āli) nor consonants (kāli) — and its exclusion here specifies that only the vowel syllables (अक्षरान्तराक्षर) are used in the circumambulation practice.

The phrase 神祇之靈是受命于天 is rendered "endowed with the bounds of prostration and oblation" as a technical descriptor of the seed-syllable; the precise ritual meaning of this compound in context remains somewhat opaque and may refer to framing fire-offering and prostration practices.

- The phrase "Rolanmā" is a transliteration of a proper name for a tantric goddess figure associated with the navel centre; its precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain in this context.

The phrase "Akaniṣṭha and the like" refers to the highest pure form-realm heaven and the other pure abodes, invoked here as objects of visualisation.

- The term rendered "Vetālinī" translates the Tibetan "འབྱུང་གྲོལ་མེད་ཀྱི་མཚན་པོ།," literally "she who raises corpses," a tantric goddess figure; the Sanskrit equivalent Vetālinī is the standard identification in the commentarial tradition.

The "water-tree" renders "水樹," which may refer to an aquatic plant or a specific visualisation object; the exact referent within the physiological yoga system is contextually uncertain but the literal rendering is preserved.

- The expression rendered as "water and that which is not water" refers to the two excretory gates, the urinary and anal openings respectively, a standard enumeration in this class of tantric literature. The "nine gates" of the body are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, mouth, the urinary gate, and the anal gate in standard usage, though this text's own enumeration differs slightly and is followed as given.

"The stūpa of the five expansions" renders a tantric technical term for a visualized form of stūpa with five radiating elements; "expansions" here translates rgyas pa lnga, which may also be understood as "five seals" in some commentarial contexts.

The expression "aśoka tree's flower lotus" renders "chu shing me tog padmo," literally "water-tree flower lotus." This may refer to a specific tantric visualization combining the aśoka plant and a lotus; the precise botanical identification is uncertain but does not affect the main practice instruction.

The final verse is incomplete as given; the translation renders what is present and the passage breaks off mid-description of the wisdom dākinī's form.

- The phrase rendered "chief of meaningful accomplishment" in the northern direction refers to Amoghasiddhi, whose name means "unfailing accomplishment." The Tibetan gives only the epithet "don yod gtso bo" rather than the Sanskrit name.

The term rendered "androgynous spirits" (Tibetan: ma ning) in the intermediate directions refers to a class of spirit beings of ambiguous or indeterminate sex; the rendering here is approximate. In tantric context these often function as wrathful protectors placed in the corners of a maṇḍala.

The final line of the translation is incomplete in the Tibetan source as given — the passage breaks off mid-sentence at "rgyu dang 'bras bu'i sa bon ni," which is the beginning of a verse continuing into the next passage.

The phrase "stūpa of the five expansions" (rgyas pa lnga yi mchod rten) is a somewhat unusual expression; it likely refers to a maṇḍala or visualization structure associated with the five buddha families and their expanding light or nectar, rather than a physical stūpa.

- The phrase rendered "the realm beyond below" for འཁའ་ཁྱིམ་ ("Akaniṣṭha," literally "not the lowest") refers to the highest divine realm in the form realm. In context it appears paired with བོད་ ("below") in a meditation instruction on driving the seed syllable through the body's subtle structure; the cosmological reference is being applied to an inner-body visualization map.

The "egg-born abode" (འདྲེན་འབྱུང་གི་འཇོན་ཁོངས་) in the line "In the upper egg-born abode" is an unusual compound. It likely refers to a cosmological or body-maṇḍala location; the precise referent is uncertain and may depend on a specific tantric commentary.

The enumeration of eight signs or visionary experiences (lamp, firefly sparks, white particles, desire-realm gods, form-realm gods, formless enjoyments, ground of Dharma, fruit of buddhahood) appears to be a system specific to this tantra; it does not map directly onto better-known fourfold or sevenfold sign-systems of other tantric traditions.

- The passage contains a complex tantric visualization sequence involving directional correspondences of elements, colors, and seed-syllables. The term "ālī-kālī" rendered as "vowels and consonants" follows the standard Tantric usage where ālī refers to the vowel series and kālī to the consonant series of the Sanskrit alphabet, used here as seed-syllables in a maṇḍala visualization. The phrase "born of the egg" refers to egg-born beings in the standard fourfold classification of birth, here used in a tantric register to indicate a particular obscuration to be dissolved. The final lines are syntactically suspended — this passage ends mid-verse, continuing what precedes and anticipating what follows, and the rendering reflects that open structure.

- The plant names Nāgamūla, Balāśa, Rutva, and Ratacha (Tibetan transliterations of Sanskrit pharmacological terms) are rendered phonetically from the Tibetan transliteration; precise botanical identification is uncertain. Rutva and Ratacha may represent a single compound name or two separate substances; the text reads them as three substances total alongside Māgadhi (long pepper from Magadha). The phrase "Māgadhi one srang" indicates a traditional weight measure (srang), left unmarked in the body for fluency.

The refrain "Tena hūṃ" is a mantra-syllable cluster preserved as-is from the Tibetan, which itself transcribes a Sanskrit or hybrid Sanskrit liturgical phrase; it is not translated.

The final section's phrase rendered "who tames with passionate desire" reflects a tantric idiom in which desire-attachment is itself the instrument of liberation; the doctrinal nuance is intentional.

- The colophon's verse count, "one hundred and eight hundred thousand" renders a standard

Tibetan compound for 1,800,000 (འུ་མ་འུ་མ་འུ་མ་, literally "eighteen" hundred thousands), indicating this text is presented as a condensed essence extracted from a vastly larger tantric corpus — a standard colophon convention rather than a literal bibliographic claim. Gayādhara is the well-known 11th-century Kashmiri paṇḍita who worked extensively with Drokmi Lotsāwa and others; Gok Khukpa Lhetsé is a lesser-documented Tibetan translator of the same period.
