Toh 815 · Derge Kangyur

Toh 815 in the Kangyur opens with homage to the Three Jewels and then presents itself as a work concerned with fine food and drink—delicacies described as flavorful, appealing in color, fragrant, and adorned with every excellent quality—suggesting a text devoted to ritual offerings or blessings connected with sustenance. Given its position in the Kangyur among works of this genre, it likely belongs to the class of short ritual or dhāraṇī-adjacent texts, perhaps a rite for consecrating or blessing food and drink so as to generate merit or auspiciousness for those who partake of it. Its precise Sanskrit and Tibetan titles are not clearly indicated by the surviving opening lines, though such texts are typically framed as brief liturgical or benedictory compositions rather than extended philosophical treatises. As is common for this category of scripture, it seems intended for practical ritual use, invoking the power of pure offerings and their qualities as a means of generating spiritual benefit. The text concludes, as its colophon notes, with the completion of these words of truth, marking it as a self-contained ritual statement rather than part of a longer narrative or doctrinal cycle.

It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
