The Tantra Called the Mirror of All Secrets, the Net of Magical Display of Vajrasattva

རྡོ་རྗེ་སེམས་དཔའ་སྒྱུ་འཕྲུལ་དྲྭ་བ་གསང་བ་ཐམས་ཅད་ཀུན་རྒྱུད་ཅེས་བྱ་བ་ཀྲོམ་ལེའོ་ཞེས་བྱ་བ་རིན་ཆེན།

The Tantra Called the Mirror of All Secrets, the Net of Magical Display of Vajrasattva, known in Sanskrit as the Vajrasattva Māyājāla Guhya Sarva Ādarśa Tantra and in Tibetan as Dorjé Sempé Gyutrul Drawa Sangwa Tamché kyi Melong, is Toh 833 in the Kangyur, where it belongs to the section of Ancient Tantras of the Nyingma school and to the Māyājāla, or Net of Magical Display, cycle of Mahāyoga tantras. It opens with homage to the buddhas Vairocana, Akṣobhya and Amitābha, after which Vajradhara, the Lord of Secrets, praises the assembled Victors and requests a teaching that gathers all ritual systems of body, speech and mind. Across thirteen chapters the tantra sets out the setting and occasion of the teaching, the view, conduct, maṇḍala, empowerment, sacred commitments, practice, the distinctive features of the path, and the spontaneously accomplished result, described in terms of the enlightened bodies, speech, mind, qualities and activities. It closes by entrusting this secret to Vajradhara with strict warnings about who may and may not receive it, and its colophon attributes the translation to the Indian preceptor Vimalamitra and the Tibetan monk Jñānakumāra.

In the language of India: vajrasatva māyājala guhya sarva ādarśa nāma tantra. In the language of Tibet: The Tantra Called the Mirror of All Secrets, the Magical Net of Vajrasattva.

oṃ Homage to Vairocana! hūṃ Homage to Akṣobhya! aṃ Homage to Amitābha!

Then glorious Vajradhara, lord of the secrets of all the victors, holder of the treasure of empowerment by them all,
joyful, with wide-open eyes and with reverence, praised and circumambulated all the victors, sat respectfully before them, and made this request:

Emaho! Speech of all the buddhas, king of all ritual systems, tantra that teaches the rites in full, stainless, profound and hard to fathom,

Vinaya, Sūtra and Abhidharma, accomplishing the sacred commitments and attainment, tantra of the rites of body, speech and mind:
this that settles everything without exception, how is it Vajrasattva?
What is it by which the Magical Display is taught?
For what reason is it taught as the tantra of the Net?
For what reason is it called scripture?
For what reason is it explained as general?
How is it called secret?
For what reason is it the meaning of the essence?
How is it called suchness?
For what reason is it called definitive?
To which persons was this name spoken?
These are the questions asked about the name.

In the common and the special modes, for what reason is one called the Teacher?
What are the place and the retinue like?
What are the time and the compilation like?
How is it that he is Akṣobhya?
How is it that he is called Vairocana?
For what reason Ratnasambhava?
For what reason Amitābha?
What is Amoghasiddhi like?
Locanā and Ākāśadhātvīśvarī, Pāṇḍaravāsinī and Māmakī:
for what reason is one called Tārā?
For what reason Kṣitigarbha?
Ākāśagarbha, mighty Avalokiteśvara, and Vajrapāṇi: for what reason are they so named?
What are Lāsyā, Mālā, Gītā and Nṛtyā?
Maitreya, Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin, Samantabhadra:
for what reason is one called Mañjuśrī?
The four times, Dhūpā, Puṣpā, Ālokā and Gandhā: for what reason are they so named?
What are Vijaya, Yamāntaka, Hayagrīva and Amṛtakuṇḍalin?

Aṅkuśa, Pāśa, Sphoṭa
and Ghaṇṭā: for what reason are they so named?
For what reason the two, Mind and Excellent Dharma?
Lord, tell me definitively!
For what reason, from the uncommon inner and secret introductions, how are the teacher, the teaching, the place and the retinue, the time and the compilation, spoken of?
From the renowned common introduction, how are the teacher, the retinue, the place and the time, and what are the teaching and the compilation like?
Great being, please explain!
This is the verse of questions on the introduction.

Why does the opening of the discourse become twofold,
common and uncommon?
Who opens the discourse to whom,
and what means and result does it show?
The stages of the five minds and the five wisdoms,
common and uncommon,
and with what they are connected: please explain!
This is the verse on the opening of the discourse.

Great being, chief of teachers, who has gained mastery over the Magical Net, perfect lord of Dharma, perfect mass of splendor:
what is to be viewed, and for what reason?
By whom is it realized, and what comes of it?
What is the difference between realizing and not realizing?
How many doors of realization are taught?
What are the reasons, the modes and the result?
This is the question on the view.

For what reason is there common conduct?
Common and uncommon: which, and for what reason?
What are the conduct of wisdom, of the accumulations and of compassion, of realization, the partial conduct,

the conduct of connection and the conduct of the vidyādharas?
By whom is it practiced, toward whom, and how?
For what reason does its result come about?
And where one is not endowed with it, tell me the faults of that practice!
This is the question on the particulars of conduct.

Of the common, the general and the particular,
of the intrinsic nature and of spontaneous presence, for what reason is it called a maṇḍala, and which is it?
How does it become outer, inner and secret,
and two means of taming?
Which are the three stages of the samādhi maṇḍala?
What is called superior samādhi?
In the two, what are the union of body, speech and mind, and the stages of outer, inner and secret?
What is the maṇḍala of images like?
For what reason is it called an image?
The image of what appears in what?
For what reason is it called superior, and what is that called an image like?
Taught as two, as three and as six,
how are ultimate and relative bodhicitta joined as outer, inner and secret?
What are the two maṇḍalas of the gathering?
Who gathers what, where,
and practicing how, accomplishes what?
What is the intent behind teaching these?
With which occasions are they connected?
With what are the roots and the branches connected?
How are the center and the surround to be examined?
Speak, great supreme being!
That about which certainty has not been found,
and which has not become the practice of all,
explain it well, great supreme victor!
This is the question asked about the maṇḍala.

By whom, to whom, and in which,
how is the perfect empowerment conferred?
How shall I come to understand it?
With what, where and how is it connected?
What are its faults and qualities like?
Please explain the stages of the result!
How many are the rites of entry here?
What are the stages of the activity like?
Vajrasattva, great bliss, fully perfected in the Magical Net,
through the nonduality of means and wisdom,
please dispel my doubts!
This is the question asked about all the topics of empowerment.

For what reason is that called a sacred commitment which is relied upon by whom, toward whom?
How many root sacred commitments are taught?
For what reason are they to be called roots?
Tell how many branches are taught!
How are these connected with the path, with approach and accomplishment, and with which persons and which aims?
What are the faults and qualities of keeping and transgressing them?
How are they spoken of as outer, inner and secret?
In view, conduct and practice, in the knowable, samādhi and sacred commitment, what is accomplished, what not abandoned, what guarded?
Supreme victor, great being, please explain!
Of the common and the uncommon, of the supreme and the not supreme,
what are the distinctions of accomplishment like?
By whom, where and how is it accomplished?
What are summoning, binding, healing and killing, dividing, expelling, defeat and victory?
How are treasure, keen eyes, swift feet,
and the level of a vidyādhara accomplished?
Supreme victor, please explain!
This is the question asked about accomplishment.

What, and which, are the stages of enlightened activity?
By whom, and where, are they to be undertaken?
What are the hearth, the substances and the kīla?
What are the samādhi, the posture and the fire pit?
What are the stages of those to be tamed?
How are the stages of the distinctions explained?
How do the result and the qualities come about?
Speak, speak, supreme chief of victors!
Cut through my doubts completely!
This is the question asked about enlightened activity.

By what marvelous person, and in what manner, is the path entered at first?
Why are there outer, inner and secret paths?
The yoga of emptiness, great compassion, what are the single mudrā and the elaborate?
The levels of maturation, of mastery, of mudrā, and what are the characteristics of the spontaneously present?
How many kinds of culmination are taught?
What is the result of the outer, inner and secret brought to culmination, the very aim of oneself and of others?
How is the meaning of the twenty-five to be understood?

That which is the king of ritual texts,
the unsurpassed Net of Magical Display (Māyājāla), comprehending all paths and results,
is the tantra that explains the rites in detail.
The secret, the great secret, not realized by those of poor fortune, the collections of sūtras and the Vinaya, the heaps of Dharma, all the teachings, reaching to the limits of space, have emanated from the Secret Essence (Guhyagarbha);
therefore this is the essence of all, of all the paths of generation and completion, as many as there are, without exception.
To those of the lesser vehicle, to the untrained, to those whose lineage is cut off, and to those lacking empowerment and pith instruction, however they look, it does not appear.
Since it is the domain of supreme persons, to individuals trained for eons as numerous as atoms, because it is secret, through secret means it is taught, so that limitless accomplishments may be attained.

All phenomena, outer and inner, the whole vessel and its contents, together with support and supported,
however they are known and have come to be known,
all of them without exception, though of a single cause, appear distinctly through the power and potency of conditions.
Whatever abides in stages of distinction, the nature, those to be tamed, and the sugatas, appears distinctly through the force of delusion;
in the uncontrived state there is no difference.
All the particulars that are taught as distinct through self-appearance and karma, in order to establish them in suchness, Supreme Victor, you who are wholly filled with great bliss, please answer the meaning of these questions, and establish us in the secret meaning where skillful means and wisdom are joined.

This completes the king of ritual texts, the explanation called the Root Tantra of Questions, from the Tantra of the Net of Magical Display, the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva.

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajradhara, a being fully endowed with the major marks and minor signs, surrounded by countless victors,
in the self-arisen, pure celestial palace, skillful means and wisdom in embrace and union, and all the others likewise in accord with him, smiling, and beaming his approval, spoke in a manner of delight:

"What countless victors have spoken, speech, speech transmitted, and the tantra of the mind,
virtuous in the beginning, the middle and the end,
the rite of skillful means and wisdom inseparable:
O supreme one who has asked of it in detail, listen! Now, O sattva, I shall explain.

All phenomena without exception are nondual, self-aware, the very mind of awakening;
this intrinsic nature without distinction is what is called vajra.
Phenomena whose nature has no limit, comprehended and directly realized through the union of skillful means and wisdom:
this is explained as the outer, inner and secret sattva.
The nature, the means, and the meaning of the result,
the stages of potency appearing as display,
and the meaning of the union of means and wisdom:
these four are explained as magical display.
That which, from the undifferentiated, is connected as differentiated essence, means and identity, and through the force of blessing, is what is explained as the meaning of net.

The teaching renowned without being spoken, free of superimposition and denial, and spoken from the mouth, is itself stainless scripture.
Being the universal of action and wisdom,
and because it is complete through completeness, it is scripture.
The nature of the general teaching, being the nature of all things whatsoever, though it abides neither as one nor as many,
is an ocean of tantras of individual teachings.
It teaches this, teaches by this, teaches for the sake of this;
since all meanings are fully complete in it, it is called the general scripture.

Why is it called secret?
It is the nature of body, speech and mind;
primordially it is the essence of the nature, and it has become the means and the result:
this is stated as the meaning of secret.
Those inferior by disposition, the untrained, those lacking empowerment and sacred commitment, and, obscured by their own imputations, the distinctions of the grounds:

owing to each of these,
because they are without its taste, it is explained as secret.

The phenomena of nature, means and result are the meaning of the great sphere;
the transcendent and the mundane are all, without exception, of one taste and inseparable.
All the distinctions of vehicles and the particular teachings that exist are gathered here, are indicated by this means, and this alone is their root.

The mind of awakening, means and wisdom nondual, great bliss, self-arisen wisdom without beginning or end, is the nature of Vajrasattva.
The brilliant blessings of the victors, the inconceivable greatnesses, are taught from this; therefore it is the essence,
as with a core and its light.
Because the quintessence of cause and result is gathered in it, it is called the essence.

Because all things are the mind of awakening, in no way cut off at edge or center, pervaded by the three things,
it is the cause of perfect completeness.
Knowing through the vajra, as suchness, skillful means and wisdom inseparable,
the capacity for one's own and others' aims complete:
this is the reality of the result.
Because the appearances falsely imagined as two distinct things are, like light in darkness and transmutation into gold, of one taste, this is the reality of means;
therefore it is called reality.

Various things, inseparable, are neither different in meaning nor one in meaning.

The certainty of that very secret is taught as threefold: ground, path and essence, each made certain by certainty.
Where four vehicles are taught,
they are not definitive, being for guiding beings;
to abide definitively in the vehicle of one taste is the unsurpassed definitive vehicle.
From the uncontrived, self-arisen nature, naturally free of agent and action,
the diverse illusory maṇḍala is magically displayed:
this is the self-appearing Net of Magical Display."

From the nature that has no edge or center, through causes, conditions and karma, there is delusion into separateness.
That itself is the very mind of awakening, abiding in evenness, without edge or center.
Thus the tantra that appears as separate is like space and the sectors marked off within it.
By meditating directly on the two paths joined of the great tantra, the Net of Magical Display, the sphere of great bliss, skillful means and wisdom inseparable, manifestly appears.
This very path of entry and of liberation is called the path of the Net of Magical Display.
What is wholly pervaded by the nature, joined by means with the power of things, having grown in strength stage by stage, is the magical display of special means.
The beginningless vajra mind,
the very essence of all phenomena,
the profound teaching, the general scripture,
skillful means and wisdom inseparable,
is the tantra of the ritual texts, detailed in its rites.

For those who from countless eons before have trained in wisdom and possess compassion, purified through faith, diligence, sacred commitment and ritual, it is the domain of those of the highest faculties.

This vehicle of the vajra secret is accomplished as essential nature, as blessing, as symbol and as vajra:
the vajra vehicle, great bliss.
Because it is secret from those of bad nature and the inferior, the perverse and those without interest, and those without empowerment and sacred commitment, it is called the secret vehicle.
If a master who lacks skillful means teaches the Secret Essence to a student who is not a vessel, self and others all will suffer, and remain long in burning and obscuration.

From the great Tantra of the Vajra Mirror of the Net of Magical Display, this is the first explanation, the explanation of the meaning of the title.

Then, further, what is to be explained is the uncommon secret meaning.
To the uncommon retinue, Vajradhara, victor of the ten directions, having made the maṇḍala manifest, through the union of vajra and lotus confers the empowerment of the mind of awakening.
Then, in a single instant, he clears away the common and uncommon afflictions, views and objects of knowledge, and since he definitively teaches the two paths, the common and the special secret, he is called the Teacher.

His supreme place is now to be explained, as the place of arising, of dwelling, of support, and of symbol, because of blessing.
Through the special features of means and path,
the lord of all, the great Vajradhara himself, in that great supreme place, Akaniṣṭha,
which transcends the Pure Abodes,
there the perfect buddha attained awakening;

in order to tame beings without fortune, the emanation attained awakening here.
The place where all the buddhas dwell,
which transcends the Pure Abodes,
the culmination of the worlds produced by karma, is the blazing celestial palace of Akaniṣṭha.
Its expanse unbroken in the ten directions,
it is inlaid with special qualities.
There, in the bhaga of the secret consort,
the great Vajradhara, lord of the thirteen grounds, together with countless others, dwells, packed like sesame seeds in a pod.
The suchness of all phenomena, without beginning, end or middle,
is the Akaniṣṭha of nature, of the true meaning, since it is the palace of all the victors.
The place on which all the victors of past, present and future rely,
and that which closely symbolizes them,
the palaces arising from mind and from signs, meditated, drawn, constructed and so forth, celestial palaces resembling that one,
are, through the victors' mantras and blessings, places of symbol, for the sake of their dwelling there.

The great perfect enjoyment, arisen from the various accumulations of special merit and wisdom, both common and uncommon,
is in the supreme place of great Akaniṣṭha,
which transcends the Pure Abodes.
The lords of the families, spontaneously present bodies of the mudrā, free of being one or many,
are the universal form of all the buddhas.
Because from the very beginning they are the treasury of the supreme vehicle, for those to be tamed who have abandoned the extremes of obscuration they bring about abandonment in a single instant.

However many various phenomena there are,
they are not different things; therefore the palace is round.
Because it is pervasive, inlaid and immeasurable, and because of the four wisdoms, it is shown as a wheel.
Because the dharmadhātu has no meeting or parting, it is encircled all around by a round enclosure.
Because there is nothing not pervaded by body, speech, mind, blessing and compassion, it is shown in a form of expanding qualities.
Because self-arisen wisdom is free of limits, and for the sake of the mind that is free of measure, not abiding in coming and going in the ten directions, its foundation is shown as an immeasurable wheel.
Because from the beginning it has the essence of blessing, it is a treasury, unaccumulated, spontaneously complete;
because it fulfills the hopes and wishes of beings, it is a celestial palace of blazing jewels.
All phenomena, of various things and of no things, abide by themselves in their essence;
because they are free of self and other, of apprehended and apprehender, it has no outer and inner and no obstruction.
The result of means that relies on the common is exalted through the means of wisdom; because it appears manifestly to the minds of those to be tamed, its four projecting bays are surpassingly beautiful.
All the stages of those to be tamed, high and low,
common and uncommon,
enter emptiness, wishlessness, signlessness and luminosity;
therefore wisdom dawns as four doors.
Since its many means are inconceivable, by traversing the eight paths in sequence all the qualities of the result are completed; therefore sixteen porticoes of cause and result are shown.
Because it is free of the paths of clinging and of rejection, the five wisdoms play as the sense pleasures;
since it arises from the self-offering that delights all,
it is shown thronged with goddesses of sense pleasures.

Through possessing skillful means and wisdom, possessing the means of non-attachment,
and the spontaneous completeness of the qualities of greatness, there are seats of sun, moon, lotus and jewel.
Through karma, compassion and aspiration, bodhisattvas of great power dwell there by the force of their aspirations, in order to gather an ocean of learning.

At that time, though it is beyond the limits of time, it is the time when the four times are equal in essence;
because it is directly realized at the end of time, it is taught as the uncommon time.
At that time, as the victors of the ten directions had prophesied for ten million eons, when the time for taming had come, the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, made the compilation.
Because the victors of the three times had blessed him,
the one of supreme fortune within the retinue, the secret Vajradhara, having compiled it, taught it to the retinue to be tamed.

The name of all the ocean of victors, past, future and present,
by whatever means have gone, go and will go into suchness, which is the certainty of the three bodies, of body, speech and mind, endowed with the three liberations, with wisdom and with the six perfections, whose buddhafields and qualities are inconceivable, in whom all eighty particulars are gathered:
because he has comprehended the vajra, and is not shaken by actions and conduct, by austerities, or by the mountain of existence,
he is called the supreme Akṣobhya.
Because whatever body, speech and mind appear through the union of skillful means and wisdom appear distinctly

through the particulars of inclination and of means, he is the supreme Vairocana, the Illuminator.

The qualities of all the victors are the essence in which the accumulations are gathered;
because qualities arise like jewels, he is called Ratnasambhava, Source of Jewels.
The doors of immeasurable speech, through the particulars of faculties and means,
the doors of meaning, sign, speech and letter, appear limitlessly; therefore he is the supreme Amitābha, the Limitless.
Through immeasurable compassionate activity, through compassion without coming or going,
he accomplishes the aim of protecting beings;
therefore he is shown as Amoghasiddhi, Accomplisher of the Aim.
These kings of awareness, too, are the five ordinary ones purified in their very ground, and having been made manifest from them by that means, they master them and appear as themselves;
therefore they are called kings.
The stages of union, of absorption and control, and of the winds, made manifest from above and below, whatever is made manifest from that means,
the form of bliss, its feeling, perception, formations
and consciousness, with the taste of undefiled bliss, having mastery, are explained as the kings of wisdom.
Because the colors of what appears, what is meditated and what is drawn,
of the mudrā, and of the channels, essences and drops, are white and red and yellow, blue and green, in sequence.

The bliss and happiness of all the victors, the mothers from whom conduct arises, the five from whom all things are produced, the purity of ordinary clinging,
the nature of the five queens of mastery, are what is distinguished as solidity, moisture, warmth and motion, and the element of space,

made manifest from the means of above and below.
Object and cognition being inseparable, through the union of compassion and wisdom she sees saṃsāra and nirvāṇa as nondual: the supreme Locanā, the Eye.
Because the great expanse of undefiled emptiness produces, gathers and sustains, suchness, free of edge and center, is what is called Ākāśadhātvīśvarī, the Expanse of Space.
Because by realization she cleanses and burns away the boundless stains, common and uncommon, of karma, views, afflictions and objects of knowledge, she is called Pāṇḍaravāsinī, the White-Clad.
Because with the water of karma and samādhi, of wisdom and compassion, without interval, she washes and satisfies them all, water is explained as Māmakī.
Because through realization and means,
and through the winds of the means of samādhi, she ferries beings across to the realm that needs no journey, she is explained as Tārā, the Savior.

The essence, self-arisen wisdom itself, since it is the support and ground of all and all-pervading, in the nature of the mind of awakening, is called Kṣitigarbha, Essence of the Earth.
The self-arisen essence, the mind of awakening, like space, beyond thought and expression, which transcends edge and center, superimposition and denial, is itself Ākāśagarbha, Essence of Space.
Because with immeasurable compassion he watches beings without weariness until they have crossed the river, he is Avalokiteśvara, chief of the lotus.
With the vajra of realization and inseparability

he destroys the signs of grasping at extremes and at self; therefore he is Vajrapāṇi.

The four secret consciousnesses, both common and special,
the common and special objects,
from the union of skillful means and wisdom, through symbol, realization and meditation, appear manifestly as the four goddesses.
Because she is supremely graceful with the mind of awakening, with bliss, and with the bliss of means,
this goddess is explained as Lāsyā, the Graceful.
All the particulars of outer and inner sound of saṃsāra, liberated and unliberated, she utters like echoes;
because it is without interruption, she is Mālā, the Garland.
What is taught as the essence of satisfaction is the very specialness of what is fragrant; because the melody itself satisfies and gladdens the mind, she is Vajra Gītā, the Song.
Pervaded by taste, like the movements of a dancer, the dance of the four great blisses pervades, is beautiful and satisfies, and unfixed, it releases; therefore she is Nṛtyā, the Dancer.
Ornament, the sounds of passion, the garland of the mind, and the dance of bliss are the nature of the four goddesses.

For the boundless beings who have not realized, through acting with natural compassion he benefits and protects them all; this is called Maitreya, the Loving One.
Through the special culmination of realization and familiarization, he clears away the stages of karma, afflictions and views;
this is Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin, Remover of Obscurations.
When the abiding of skillful means and wisdom is realized, because there is no dwelling in rejecting or accepting,

all things outer and inner, vessel and contents without exception, being without division, are Samantabhadra, the All-Good.
Because with undefiled wisdom he cuts through the net of views, all grasping at self and other,
he is undefiled wisdom, the body of Mañjuśrī.
The faculties, together with letters and drops, are spoken of because they appear manifestly through their place, their realization and their meditation.

The four times are the stages, twice eight;
they are spoken of for the sake of releasing that very thing, of producing relish, and of purifying the domains.
Because she satisfies speech with fragrance and with bliss, and the mind is without reversal, she is Vajra Dhūpā, the Incense.
Because she arranges flowers blissfully as drops in the maṇḍala that pervades outer and inner, she is the unsurpassed Vajra Puṣpā, the Flower.
To clear away the darkness that dwells in the mind, outer and inner,
the unsurpassed light of wisdom and primordial wisdom is Vajra Ālokā, the Lamp of clarity.
Because she abides pervading all,
with the bliss of self-arisen samādhi, in all maṇḍalas outer and inner,
she is the pervading Vajra Gandhā, the Scented Water.

Because, with his intent on suchness, he has vanquished all the phenomena of saṃsāra without exception at the seat of awakening, he is called Vijaya, the Victorious.
Wisdom free of apprehended and apprehender is the antidote to the conception that grasps at two;
because it destroys that through realization and familiarization, he is yamāntakṛta, Yamāntaka.
Because from the ocean of saṃsāra, through miraculous power joined with means,
he destroys and liberates,

he is explained as the king Hayagrīva.
On the five poisons, the māras of saṃsāra, by clearly familiarizing them as the five wisdoms, whatever coils into the nondual elixir, with obscurations exhausted, is explained as Amṛtakuṇḍalin, Coil of Nectar.

Where the faculties together with the body, objects, consciousness and contact are,
wisdom that cuts off its own continuum is taught as the four kinds of gatekeepers:
reversing permanence and annihilation in one's own continuum, together with dhāraṇī, deity and bliss, with drop and with awareness.
Because she summons from the place, because one can then go nowhere, because it is hard to pass beyond it, and having dissolved it in, with bliss, she is Ghaṇṭā, the Bell.
Seizing, embracing and binding, and being nondual: this is great bliss.

Applying to one's own body, to appearance and existence, to the stable and the moving, by way of realization and familiarization, that which brings all of them to mind without exception, inseparable from all the kings of awareness, the ground of all, the indivisible vajra, is explained as Samantabhadra.
All phenomena, conditioned and unconditioned, without exception, the expanse pervaded by the undefiled, without exception, whatever has become realization and knowing,
is explained as Samantabhadrī.

The indestructible drop, great bliss, the quintessence of the pure essence, endowed with the five wisdoms, self-arisen, abiding in all who have bodies, is the Teacher himself, possessed of the speech of awareness.
The dharma cakra is the place of Dharma.
In the manner of the four lights, e and the rest, by way of a body that is hidden,

it abides pervading all who have bodies.
The very bliss of self-arisen mind is the essence free of movement;
in the middle, artha, the mind of awakening, the expanse of mind, the wisdom of space.
mana mata is mentation, memory and thought.
The memories and thoughts that move in consciousness, wishing for the clarity of the space of wisdom, memory, thought and awareness abide as the retinue.
Inconceivable undefiled consciousness, all of it, into the wisdom of space,
into the nonconceptuality of the awareness of great bliss, he gathers and makes it abide in experience.
Great bliss, unborn,
indivisible like space,
the body inseparable from the wisdom of space, abides as the essence of all three times.
What is pointed out closely as "this"
abides in the manner of the four, e and the rest:
outer, inner, intermediate courtyard and facades, the secret Akaniṣṭha, with its ornaments complete.
The drop, in the shape of vaṃ, without elaboration, guards the inexpressible teaching, and the blessing, great bliss, nonconceptual, he makes appear to the retinue.
mani manu mata:
that which binds is the substance of memory, thought and mentation.
By those consciousnesses that possess karma what is clearly understood is called the retinue.
The very essence of all phenomena,
the substance of the sixteen drops and the five minds, the meaning of the nonconceptual coemergent, is made clear by way of blessing and direct perception.
The time when the undefiled drop arises, skillful means and wisdom nondual, the moment of inconceivable coemergence, is held to be the time of great bliss.

Cognition, together with support and supported, relying on the stages of means,
through the meaning gathered by the winds, is made clear as self-awareness, the king of means.

With whom, to whom and where,
by whom, when, and what was spoken:
because these have become the root from which the expression arises, this is taught as the setting.
In the state of the single wisdom, indivisible, of all the tathāgatas, from the great Vajradhara Samantabhadra various bodies are magically emanated.
At that time all the victors, too, among the gods are Vajradhara himself;
among the asuras, the Teacher, lord of the jealous ones;
among humans, the Lord of Sages;
taming the animals with sound;
clearing the torment of the pretas with the fierce one;
in the hells, the king of Dharma of suffering:
they dawn as the essence of the emanation bodies who tame.
In some places they pass from the gods,
in some they enter the womb and are born, practice austerities, tame Māra and attain buddhahood, turn the wheel and pass into nirvāṇa.
There is no fixity of place:
hells, pretas, animals,
humans, gods and asuras, whatever their individual places, are the places where the Teacher tames beings.
The gods and the humans,
the asuras, pretas and animals,
and the hell beings, each in their class of beings, are arrayed by the power of their own inclinations and karma, by the power of the different ways of taming.
When they meet according to their own inclinations, through their own different sign languages, whatever leads to realization and liberation is the time when the Teacher teaches each as befits them.

The vehicles taught are various;
because each one's clinging is boundless, by the power of manner and inclination they appear in the manner of various vehicles.
The single vehicle, in the manner of sameness, appears as two, three, four and five,
nine, eighty thousand and so forth, in the manner of taming beings.
Through the activities of body, speech and mind, through various means, according to the power of taming, he fully turns the wheel of Dharma.
Then each of the beings, too, having realized the meaning of their own root ground, by the five stages or by a single means abide in the ground of the vidyādhara, of buddhahood.
Each with their own portion, as an emanated body, the first of the retinue abiding on the grounds spoke the sequence of what they had asked, gathered into mind, words and letters,
and it is known continually as what is called tantra.
The tantras of body, speech and mind,
view, conduct, maṇḍala, empowerment, sacred commitment, practice, enlightened activity and the stages of the path, outer, inner and hidden,
the nature, the abiding, and what makes manifest:
the tantra of means is taught as threefold.
Whatever was taught by those fully awakened in the ten directions and four times, the Sūtra collections, the Vinaya, the Abhidharma,
the tantras of body, speech and mind,
the stages of means of generation and completion, are gathered in the Net of Magical Display.
All the phenomena that are thus renowned are the great tantra, the Net of Magical Display, which explains all the rites of the ritual texts,

the supreme speech of all the buddhas,
virtuous in the beginning, the middle and the end, spoken by all the victors of the three times.

From the great Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva, the Net of Magical Display, this is the second chapter, explaining the setting.

the person and the means, in common, whatever has become an object of the intellect, that is the common object.
The person, the means and the Teacher himself, what has not become their domain,
and is endowed with the great means and with secrecy, that is the uncommon.

That very one, for the sake of the two retinues of beings, makes himself appear in two ways.
The aggregates, elements and sense sources themselves are spontaneously present as the victors, father and mother, as the male bodhisattvas and as the female bodhisattvas.
Because they destroy without exception the secret objects, faculties, consciousness and contact, they are the wrathful ones;
because they are born from signs, the marks and the rest, they are the consorts, explained as not abiding through karma.
Mind and phenomena are Excellent Dharma and his consort, the Excellent One.
The six afflictions, attachment and the rest, are explained as the six emanations of the Sage.
That itself, in the ten directions and four times, is the aggregates, elements, consciousness and objects, the faculties, the times, and the body with its four phenomena;
the signs and afflictions are the consorts themselves.
Since that itself, being mind, is unborn, from the union of the superior two truths the five minds of awakening are magically displayed.
All phenomena, things, appearances and sounds,
appear as unborn and unceasing,

as nonabiding and without reference, as without coming or going.
Though for oneself wisdom appears clearly, because others have not realized it,
the nature and essence are secret from the beginning:
the meaning of the secret, utterly hidden and concealed.
When that itself is well explained, in the secret that is primordial sameness, through the power of the conditions of ignorance and wrong thought, the suffering of saṃsāra appears, as if left behind there.
That itself is the essence of the sugatas, the essence of things that has no thing.
In order to ripen beings,
from the nature of body, speech and mind the emanations are magically displayed.
With various bodies, speech and minds they turn the wheel of Dharma.
In those maṇḍalas of the victors, too,
the Teacher and retinue, one to another, father and mother and the nondual, whoever to whomever makes the request, by words of symbol and of intention,
and the assembly of teachings comes to appear.

Through the projecting union of the winds, by that means whatever stirs the consort, the light of passion, the nondual union,
the thirteen grounds, body, speech and mind,
are made clear as the deities of great bliss;
having made the wisdom of space manifest, the clear taste of the wisdom of bliss comes to be known from arising, joy, abiding, and coming and going themselves.
Whoever requests whatever of whomever, by the power of whatever condition, from those whatever appears as clear wisdom, appearance and existence together with bodies and things,

the wisdom of space appears as anything at all:
this is the inner request, the great means.
Because the means urges wisdom with songs of passion and with union, and wisdom in reply also urges the means with the songs and dances of śa da pa, and through the stages of mantra and union they are directly joined through the four mudrās, through the union of the moving winds of skillful means and wisdom nondual,
the very means of summoning and having summoned, bringing down, holding and drawing up, reversing, holding and joining,
there come generation, completion and the great completion.
All that arises from the ultimate stages,
common and uncommon,
appears as the five minds:
the drop that arises from means,
the secret drop of wisdom,
and what arises from nondual bliss:
the five minds come to appear in sequence.

Means and wisdom in equal union, arising from body, speech and mind, the eighty particulars all gathered,
the forty-two maṇḍalas,
through body, speech, mind and the five wisdoms, through the union of means and nature, set their seal upon all beings.
Through the nature of bliss of the vessel and its contents, all, without exception, abide as coemergent.
Movement, rising, aspiration, entry, abiding and culmination, the ground of birth and the means,
and, after birth, the culmination, the five wisdoms, the very nature of all the buddhas, abide just as they are.
Through the particular inclinations of beings, forms, colors, mantras and lights, maṇḍalas and the rest abide separately, taught in accord with the minds of individuals.

Arising from support and supported,
self-arisen great bliss, nonconceptual, abiding bodiless in the body, pervading, nondual, in the manner of fullness.
Because the special bliss of samādhi,
the undefiled bliss,
through the deities of nature, imagination, appearance and the power of blessing, outer and inner, vessel and contents, body, speech and mind, all arise without exception from the three unions.
The channels, the winds and the drops are relied on in sequence, and union, projecting and gathering are by the winds;
wisdom enters the pure essence by the winds.
The stages of the drops of bliss arising from above and below, through the particular features of the pure and dregs and of the winds, are the very result as desired.
Just as potencies meet through conditions,
the potencies of a single cause appear separately.
The paths, mundane and transcendent, arise from the channels and the drops, from the winds, the outer and inner pure essence and dregs, and the manner of the path and of movement.
Because of absence and lack of potency, through emptiness and the force of perverse potency, one's own body is destroyed and suffers,
the faculties are incomplete, and one becomes inferior.
Because the five minds and five wisdoms are taught as common and uncommon, as the image of the samādhi of nature, relying on a consort of the right family, the five minds, with longer and shorter durations, make all phenomena of self and other without exception coemergent wisdom:

not a thing, not a nonthing,
not self, not other, not both, not nondual, self-arisen great bliss, illusion itself, the stable vajra, self-appearing,
the illusion of wisdom, spontaneously present.

From the great Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva, the Net of Magical Display, this is the third chapter, explaining the request.

Then, further, what is to be explained
is the explanation of the object, the knowable for all:
all phenomena, without exception, every one, free of both one and many,
are suchness without edge or center.
From equality free of all superimposition and denial, through the difference between realizing and not realizing, various phenomena are magically displayed.
Beyond ground and root,
the indivisible nature is suchness.
Beyond the domain of thing and nonthing, the various essences of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are self-appearing:
the nondual great means, vajra itself.
How wonderful! From nondual great bliss various abodes and enjoyments, families, colors and lifespans,
and the distinctions of pleasure, pain and faculties, various natures, are magically displayed.
Like an illusion, the moon in water, a rainbow, they abide as the essence of the mind of awakening (bodhicitta).
Whatever appears through karma and conditions, through the differences of each one's own clinging, through various distinct faculties,
is seen as the various powers of conceptuality.
The expanse whose nature has neither ground nor root, through coemergent and imputed non-seeing and wrong clinging grown strong, appears as the force of the perverted wheel of delusion.

Without dispelling saṃsāra, the pure fields, spheres of activity and enjoyments, samādhis, powers, strengths and miraculous displays, immeasurable higher perceptions and wisdoms, various bodies, speech and minds, qualities and activities are self-appearing:
the spontaneously present benefit of self and other.
Like a wish-fulfilling jewel with its variety, the unaccumulated, spontaneously present body, indivisible from all variety, appears to all in accord with their wishes.
All of it is the self-arisen mind of awakening, appearing as the meaning of the indivisible truths.
For like the nature of space, though it appears in that way to each,
it cannot truly be grasped as one.
Uncontrived, self-arisen, peace itself, it is the completely pure essence;
in saṃsāra itself is nirvāṇa, known as the completely pure expanse.
From the self-appearing essence of all,
free of all superimposition and denial, all variety without exception is magically displayed.
Neither thing nor nonthing, that in which suchness is beyond objects,
immeasurable like space,
without partiality, edge or center, its extent immeasurable:
just as one thing pervades another, the essence of the elements, space and the rest, free of particles, is the undefiled essence itself.
Whatever appears in the faculties of all embodied beings, connected with the refined essences, is altered by the power of wrong seeing;
it is self-appearance without self or other.
All without exception, indivisible, the stream of the five essences of means and wisdom, enjoyment enjoined as the means, abides pervading all beings.

Whatever there is of means and wisdom is the very nature of the Net of Magical Display.
The mind of awakening, indivisible in nature, is the very essence of great bliss.
What is to be realized by all without exception, the countless victors and vidyādharas of the past, the present and the future, abides as the essence that pervades without direction.
Whatever appears, without exception, is suchness, uncontrived, unmade, peaceful;
beyond one and many,
it is the very nature of all buddhas.
Like the nature of space, free of limits, all of it abides so; yet because, through the faculties' differing realization, through pure and impure ways of seeing,
that nature has not become an object of experience, through outer, inner, secret and other empowerments and connection with the oral instructions, it is taught for the sake of seeing and realizing suchness.
For this reason the vajra master, possessing complete qualities and ability,
to one who has faith, diligence and the observances, and is endowed with special wisdom, gives empowerment, sacred commitment and instruction;
and through the power of the connection of cause and conditions, bliss, clarity and nonconceptuality are brought to perfection through means.
The essence, the great secret of secrets, is the accomplishment of body, speech and mind:
outer and inner, self and other without exception, all are indivisible suchness.
For those who lack means and set their seal on everything, it has turned into a mass of darkness.
Just as darkness and light, poison, and the elixir that turns metal to gold surely change their nature through skill in means, so, through the view, conduct and samādhi of this,

it becomes so at once.
Just as, in the indivisible nature of space, color, shape, substance and the rest are all without distinction, so through skill in means all becomes thus.
Ordinary people and the perverse, ascetics and solitary realizers (pratyekabuddhas), those of outer and inner, those who hold to distinctions, those concerned with clean and unclean, and those of partial realization:
whoever strays from the view of equality, through wrongness of essence and means,
of faculties and the rest,
that very thing becomes a harmful force.
The illness by which one is seized, through excellent means and diligence, through the distinction of such striving,
is itself, without being abandoned, completely purified.
Because, in suchness as it truly is,
through the difference of realizing or not realizing, whatever appears as distinct phenomena does not in reality abide that way.
The vajra is unborn wisdom;
the mirror is means itself, in which variety appears.
The equality of their nondual union is taught as the sublime indivisibility of all.
Next, the doors of realization are to be explained.
Since there is nothing to be gained by anything for anyone, view, conduct, path and fruit are this alone; there is no other aim to pursue.
There are those who, for that aim, through words, mantra substances and austerities, through the blessing of whatever has been taught,
wish to benefit themselves and others.
There are those who hold that when that from which body and mind arose has perished, they lie latent in the elements, and since thereafter there is no factor of benefit or harm, austerity and effort are not needed.

There are those who, because of the four causes of action, in order to bring about happiness by pleasing and purifying, through rites and fierce austerities, appear to wish to be released and liberated.
Through the four truths, their sixteen aspects and the distinct paths, by way of abandoning through seeing and through meditation in the three realms, free of all defilements for their own sake, one gains liberation for oneself, nirvāṇa.
The solitary realizers, through the awakening of their habitual tendencies, having examined for themselves the twelve links as non-arising, exhaust ignorance, the wheel of delusion, its cause and effect, and reach the stage of supreme bliss, as they wish.
The mind of awareness without distinction, however one regards the difference of true and false, is the essence, clear and nonconceptual, appearing as the force of the potency of self and other.
Phenomena are like illusions, mirages, echoes and the moon in water;
their suchness, free of extremes and center, the union of the two truths, is the way of the Middle Way.
Setting out the three sublime vajras, freed from the illusion of things, and relying on pure interdependence, the illusion of wisdom dawns directly.
Since, through activity and ritual action, relying on ablution and cleanliness, through the power and strength of mantra and mudrā, one reaches the stage of holding the vajra of the three doors.
Distinguished by being in accord with both of these,
having realized the four suchnesses, through becoming familiar with action and samādhi together, one abides at the stage of Vajradhara.
Making samādhi and awareness primary,

through mantra, mudrā and contemplation, one actually transforms into the deity's guise just as it is,
and through familiarity the aims of self and others are accomplished.

Through the distinction of means and liberation, the faculties, objects and consciousnesses, all the spheres of activity of the world of appearance and existence, outer and inner, vessel and contents, however they change, being sealed by the secret means of indivisible means and wisdom, all without exception becomes vajra itself.
That great means, the hero of appearance and existence, of a nature indivisible and pure:
since its various displays are self-appearing,
all without exception is nondual wisdom.
For whoever has grasped the means and awareness of nondual means and wisdom,
the phenomena of saṃsāra that others reject become the very essence of the nectar of wisdom.
In the essence that accords with things just as they are,
free of all one and many,
they do not abide as separate entities.
Therefore, just as the generation, deity and celestial palace, the completion, the wisdom like space,
and things as coemergent are appearances transformed by conditions, all without exception becomes its essence.
Through differences in how these are viewed, whatever appears as each one's own inclination, intention and degree of capacity, just as from the nature of clear space sun and moon, planets and stars, clouds, mist and vapor arise, while space stays self-arisen, self-clear and unchanging, all phenomena, however they appear, have not moved from their meaning by the force of reality;
since they appear just so,
they gather into the expanse of space itself.

Next, I shall explain the reasonings.
Since the essence of awakening pervades all beings without exception, and all must see it and grow familiar with it, the individual common reasonings, the uncommon ones and the rest,
like the ocean's expanse and its rivers, arise to tame all without exception.
Whatever there are, the four common ones and so on,
in order to refute wrong views and partisan clinging,
and to show the connection with means by the force of reality,
the common reasonings are stated.
Because, by all these reasonings, it is displayed from itself, it is the mirror itself.
All without exception is neither one nor distinct;
it is wholly free of every extreme,
and is established with nothing to grasp in the middle:
it is free of one and many.
Cause, condition and result:
those means are the three that are pure from the very beginning, the realization that all without exception is self-appearing.
That is its defining characteristic.
The single cause, the way of the syllables, blessing and direct perception:
all without exception dawns as the four realizations, and suchness itself appears as the four realizations.
Whatever appears from the unborn state is one, like water and its waves;
since this and that are one and indivisible, things are known from their own account.
The root of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa is the five, desire, aversion and the rest, ground and root, uncontrived and momentary.
Whatever appears there as particular and general, through realization one knows general and particular characteristics.
Vessel, contents and mind streams, infinite, through the two equalities and the two superior equalities,

all phenomena, things, appearances and sounds,
abide uncontrived as suchness.
All without exception, the essence and the bindus, the five chief ones, the eighty-two that flow,
the thirteen million channels with their branches, are free from all savors and all phases.
The first, abiding; the second, the two;
the third, pervading all without exception:
these are the reasonings of experience.
Through the bindu, its location and the syllables mingling with their blessing, great bliss appears manifestly.
Just as from water come distinct rivers,
and from the ocean drops of water, and like the fruits of path and of farmland, the distinctions of means appear.
Whatever has arisen from the five refined essences, all bodies and minds, channels and bindus, the savors and essences of the five elements that appear, belong to great wisdom.
Three, the actual eight and so on, the colors and numbers:
whatever abides is the vessel;
from the distinctions of each one's essence the mind of awakening itself appears clearly.
The refined essence itself, where ultimate and relative are indivisible and the four truths are indivisible, appears in a manner pervading all without exception.
The bindu of nondual means and wisdom,
one and many itself,
is great wisdom free of them,
released from one and many.
The gathered essence, the bindu of two savors, is the cause;
endowed with the conditions of wind and instruction,
the result appears as coemergent.
What abides in oneself is made clear through means.
The savor of the union of means and wisdom,
the essence gathered together with channels and syllables, through means and the instructions on the winds, makes all coemergence directly clear.

Bliss and emptiness inseparable, self-aware great bliss, unborn form:
just like light and its shape,
all is the indivisible mode and self-appearance.
The five conceptions produced by bliss, together with root and branches,
are all great wisdom itself, sealed by the five wisdoms.
Through the faculties together with vessel and contents, the essence joined in the union of father and mother, self-appearing in the continuum of the five minds, is clear in the manner of the four equalities.
These and other infinite reasonings of outer, inner and ultimate secret, the infinite reasonings, are explained:
the tantra that explains the vajra mirror.
Whoever realizes it,
for them all body, speech and mind are self-appearing,
and qualities and activities are self-appearing,
dawning from the undefiled self-arisen state.
Phenomena are spontaneously complete as the fruit,
the aims of self and others spontaneously complete;
from resting uncontrived in the state just as it is,
the spontaneously present maṇḍala arises.
Whatever relies on whatever, in whatever, through spontaneous presence is the fruit itself:
uncontrived illusion, spontaneous presence itself, in the four times and ten directions without exception is self-appearing as the spontaneously present fruit.

From the great Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva, the Net of Magical Display, this is the fourth chapter, explaining the view without exception.

all the distinctions of conduct of the manifest perfection of the Net of Magical Display, these are to be explained.

Through nature, means and manifestation,
all conduct is taught.
How wonderful! From the essence of self-awareness come pleasure and pain, abodes and enjoyments, lifespans, colors and so on.
In some there is manifest attachment;
in some, fierce conduct of aversion;
in some, being as if crushed by a mountain;
in some, the darkness of blindness;
in some, jealousy appears;
in some, avarice and strife;
in some, immorality and the abandoning of activity;
effort and effortlessness and so on:
such things are found without limit.
In the infinite, boundless dharmadhātu, in the infinite expanse of space, that is the distinction of conduct.

The self-arisen conduct of means itself, just as it is thought of and examined, because its nature is without division,
is the inconceivable acting and conduct of the three doors.
Although by the nature of means and wisdom all without exception have the abode of the buddhas, because they do not realize it and are without means,
their various pleasures and pains are inconceivable.
For one who possesses the great means, desire, aversion, delusion, pride and great jealousy are taught to be bliss on the path of awakening.
People who lack means,
through various methods and activities,
through various hard deeds and practices, gain no liberation beyond men and gods.
For example, as with something that contains poison, according to the distinction of means and according to the distinction of realization, there are various streams of pleasure and pain.

From the pure, nondual nature, through the particular distinctions of imputation, discordant and various pleasures and pains are experienced, yet there is no movement from the uncontrived expanse.
Those who, from the common and the real,
by way of action and activity,
have acted, act and will act:
therefore, by this conduct, it is called conduct.
Although by the nature of the conduct of the Victors it pervades like water and its waves, in the various activities of rejecting and accepting there is no conduct held by means.
Because, through means and wisdom, and through various sounds and realizations, it has not become the object of the common,
the conduct of means is uncommon.
In some cases it is the common itself:
the liberated and the unliberated, wandering ascetics and non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), women and the lowly,
kings, heroes and ascetics,
children and the rest, each distinct.
In some it is shown as laughter and as ferocity, scolding, terror and peace;
in some, likewise, great attachment, deceitful conduct and wantonness;
peace, theft and jealous conduct, desire, the torment of enjoyments, song, dance and performance, playfulness and charm, and likewise terror and threat, savagery and harm,
pure fields and miraculous conduct,
many marvels and miracles:
whatever deeds are done by whomever, in order to tame all beings without exception, infinite deeds are displayed.

For the peaceful, Brahmā; for the wrathful, the wrathful;
for the liberated, the young and beautiful at play;
for the anguished, the confused and the suffering, each one's own infinite guide:
the infinite play of the body is shown.
Blessing and self-appearance, symbol, awareness and samādhi;
in words, attachment, aversion and delusion,
great pride and jealousy, soft and slow, melodious and harsh, rough and fierce, coarse and fine, long and short, music, the sounds of gods and nāgas, of humans, nonhumans and bhūtas; householders, the mighty, good masters, the lustful, the cruel and so on:
infinite various plays,
in pure and impure modes,
the infinite play of speech appears.
In some there is love and hatred, distraction and non-distraction, dullness and mountain-like stillness, gathering, not gathering and fading away, freedom and non-freedom, sharpness and dullness, ignorance, wisdom and so on:
the infinite play of the mind appears in the manner of omniscience.
Infinite, indivisible, it is the sublime itself.
Whatever is weighed by the valid means of scripture, reasoning and oral instruction, the knowable comes to be understood.
Then all phenomena without exception, self and other, outer and inner, indivisible, appear in the manner of omniscience.
Infinite, indivisible, it is the sublime itself.
With stable mindfulness and vigilance, like the depths of the ocean of the three times, having become an unmoving, clear state,

by joining the three doors in equipoise:
first is the conduct of realization, clear and stable in suchness, which is taught as the conduct of emptiness and wisdom.
Then, since all the ten directions without exception are the self-arisen mind of awakening itself, whatever appears has no independent existence:
an illusion, an optical illusion, an echo, a mirage, a water bubble and so on.
By the power of the former and the power of this,
one should meditate by joining them in equipoise.
Without looking at anything, it is made manifest, and since there are not two stages of samādhi, compassionate conduct toward all is this sublime conduct to be practiced.
Through the nature, the specific focus,
the pervading and whatever arises spontaneously from it, one fully engages in compassionate conduct.
Then, being like an illusion, oneself appearing without partiality, because one can be transformed into anything at all, whatever is clear as awareness in the central channel blazes on a seat of sun and moon stacked together.
From whatever seed syllable, by the rite of means, emanating, gathering and melting, it becomes manifest, appearing as the essence of the three vajras.
That very one, by one, five and three,
becomes clear, stable, blazing and beautiful;
it is joined, as the occasion requires, in front and elsewhere.
One, indefinite, in stages,
and what is called the wheel: it becomes four.
Without relying on whatever it is that relies on whatever, meditating on emanation and gathering is meaningless.
Through growing familiar with faultless clarity and stability, whatever is meditated on becomes clearly manifest.
To reverse ordinary clinging and conceptions,
to connect with the path,

and to enter swiftly into the fruit of accomplishment, one should meditate on the deity of the sign.
Once it has become stable and clear in this way, since the three doors of self and other, outer and inner without exception, are clear as body, speech and mind, cutting off ordinary conduct, for the three doors there is no equipoise and post-meditation.
In order to clarify it in this way,
one should begin the one-sided conduct.
Then, having grown familiar with the root, and as one's training reaches special completion, in order to unfold and increase it step by step, one should meditate on the elaboration of the branches.
Endowed with the eleven and nine extra ones, by dividing, expanding and condensing from one,
the deities at the root of the wheel one should meditate on clearly, set in place as father and mother.
The nine extra deities beyond those are elaborated as branches and meditated on.
By the nature of the two kinds of taming, there is the beautiful mode and the taming of the vicious.
The deities and their numbers of faces, arms and heads too, by the mode of elaborating root and branches, in the stages that match the number of the maṇḍala, should be elaborated and meditated on.
In the modes of number and the numberless, in the expanse of space, leagues and earshots wide,
one should meditate on various massed clouds of buddhas, peaceful, wrathful and the rest.
From the first to the last,
with the samādhi of awareness clear and stable, one should meditate stage by stage on the assemblies endowed with body, speech and mind.
In the stages of a hermitage, or in a forest, on a riverbank, a mountain peak or in a charnel ground, faultless and complete in qualities, free of the faults of enemies and of direction and intermediate direction, endowed with the stages of examination, in an auspicious and suitable place, one should furnish a celestial palace of stacked tiers, beautiful, complete with ornaments.

Those who lack the wisdom and means of equal samādhi should practice by the light of those above them.
Through the power of self and other,
in equality one should enter the assembly.
With the five requisites, unhindered, one should begin the stages of the ritual just as they are,
with dance, song and performance, and with samādhi.

one should practice without interruption.
If, before one's aims are fulfilled, that illusory body is not stable, then through the mind making the three vajras clear, one is a vidyādhara of maturation, from then on fearless like a garuḍa.
Then, if one has the conduct that connects with it, one attains the undefiled stage of mastery, free of destruction for hundreds and thousands of eons and more,
and in hundreds of thousands of continents and worlds infinite miracles of taming appear.
On the fearless, irreversible stage, the yogin who is a perfected hero, with the special kinds of conduct for the sake of others, through the various powers of taming, sends forth various forms of loving care.
This is the outer conduct of wisdom
of all the Victors,
the ritual taught in full.
Then, further, what is to be explained:
the special conduct and rites of the stages of inward entry;
next, these stages are explained.
In all embodied beings
there are four cakras and body, speech and mind.

The channels that rise and blaze, that coil, that are connected and unconnected, that hook, that hold, that drip and that abide,
and likewise those that pervade and those that err:
since things flow in them and they hold their places, they are explicitly called channels.
These, cause, path and fruit,
through the nonduality of means and wisdom,
generate great bliss.
From the nature of above and below the general and the particular unions arise.
Through the wheel that pervades with the seed, the channels pervade everything and drip.
Through the connection of refined and dregs with the wind, by the condition of the male and female essences, defiled and undefiled bliss is generated.
It abides pervading the whole body.
The refined essence accompanies the downward-clearing wind.
Where there is the wheel of articulated sound, that too pervades all and flows;
since it errs and turns, it is a wheel:
the wheel of enunciation, the support of speech.
Whatever is unclear, whether complete or incomplete,
the articulation of sound becomes pure or impure:
pleasant, melodious and unmelodious, birds, gandharvas and bees,
it makes the various sounds of desire.
Red in color, pervading the body, the nāgas and the rest abide accompanied by the utha wind.
The dharmacakra is the support of the life force, the life force of every ground and root without exception, with four channels and eight branches, where the five refined essences gather, chief of all.
Its outer layer is like a jewel with many folds;
the indestructible bindu, great bliss,
a heap of jewels, a casket,
the lord of the various five wisdoms, having the nature of the short a, abides accompanied by the life-force wind.

Its outer layer is a lotus of eight petals:
the nature of reality, wisdom and qualities, and the four autonomous ones, with eight branches.
These are the common outer layers.
Here the three channels are in stages:
the channel of defilement, the channel of higher perception and the nature of reality abide in three layers.
The wind too is one or two,
and from it the varieties are immeasurable.
There is the abiding wind and the moving wind.
The abiding are life force and wisdom;
the moving are explicitly said to be four:
the outer and inner, and the upward and downward.
Each of these too, by the distinction of refined and dregs, appears manifestly in eight stages.
Through sleep and the seeds of rebirth, it is the basis of all desire, aversion, memory and thought.
Wherever it abides or does not abide,
it is the wind that moves and transfers,
and it causes all pleasure and pain, experiencing them and generating them.
This, through abiding and not abiding, since mindfulness masters the life faculty,
the others abide and transfer;
the abiding one is the life-force wind.
That in which delusion climbs, which spreads and emanates everything, rising and sinking, climbing, filling and emerging,
the channel with two doors pervading the whole body, with sixty-four at its core,
coils in a stream of four outer layers.
Coiling from the center is the channel of the bindu, accompanied by the propelling wind of bliss.
Because there too it errs and emanates, the wheel of emanation is wisdom itself.

Below it is the blazing triangular channel, blazing upward and radiating downward, with a seed blazing with light;
the element touched by the lower part of its tip,
the caṇḍālī channel blazing below the navel, is like a man who arouses desire.
These generate bliss;
they abide in their places, each with its measure.
Below that is the support of the moving wind, whose function is to open and to close.
Through having both that and this,
it separates the refined and the dregs of the body.
The eighty-two particular channels gathered together are body, speech and mind.
The channel at the navel that drips downward, the three channels meeting, is the vital point of bliss.
The moving wind relies on the bindu, spreading and bowing to right and left.
Above the tip of life where the sixteen gather,
the three channels gathering at the throat are the wheel of articulated sound, the vital point of speech.
Then, in the bindu of the refined essence, all abides in the manner of gathering.
Through the essence gathering in the channel of awareness, unobstructed, clear higher perception arises.
In the outer channel of defilement itself, through the essence of great bliss gathering, the very experience of great bliss is born.
The bindu of the nature of reality, unmoving, when the essence in which the refined essences gather dissolves into it, is the great bliss of undefiled wisdom endowed with the five wisdoms;
the vast expanse of space comes to pervade without beginning or end.
From realizing this or not realizing it the various conducts of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa arise.

The distinctions of means are the five mudrās:
through the wind that moves, the fire that blazes,
and the water of the bindu, and by holding them, great bliss becomes clear as the mudrā of space.
Since through bliss one sees the meaning of bliss, the channels, bindus and winds, and bliss, self-aware and unborn, are themselves nonconceptual great bliss.
Being free of independent existence, they are undefiled:
bliss itself without independent existence.
Since the bindu of the refined essence pervades all, together with the outer and inner faculties, bliss dawns, with the nature of illusion.
All without exception is great bliss itself.
Because that is sealed with that,
bliss, nonconceptual and coemergent, abides clearly as the single mudrā.
Where the wheels are endowed with the essence of the channels, seed syllables and letters, bliss,
and the five elements endowed with the savor of wisdom,
the bindu of emptiness and bliss mingle, there one abides in constant mindfulness.
Because each one also abides in this way, the wheels, the channels and essences with the bindus, the deities and wisdoms, body, speech and mind, one's own body, appearances, all vessel and contents, are clear as the number of the elaborate mudrās.
Because the five essences are wisdom alone, the meaning of the bindu, refined and dregs indivisible, in their individual colors and shapes, and in the hidden body, speech and mind, through the awareness that is indivisible and clear, all without exception becomes manifestly clear as great bliss.
Then, great bliss itself, having been mastered by the dance techniques and the wind, the awareness of bliss dawns in all.
Having become free of clean and squeamishness, the five excretions and the five desirables, together with the essence of the bindu and the refined essences, since they mingle in the great bindu, one abides in unchanging, deathless life.

Self-aware great bliss itself abides without beginning or end.
The moving bindu, together with the wind, dissolves into the undefiled, clear essence.
Endowed with the five higher perceptions, undefiled, in the essence of the refined, the path is brought to completion.
Then, what is to be explained is the secret.
Saṃsāra and nirvāṇa,
from the distinction of sun and moon, the two truths,
of the union of means and wisdom,
all without exception appear clearly.
Where there is separation from means, abodes, pleasure, pain and indifference, enjoyments, lifespans and colors,
with clinging to self and what is one's own, through forms, sounds, smells and tastes, touch and various recollections, by the nature of clinging and bondage, the four natures become clear.
From that comes the ordinary path of saṃsāra.
The body, abiding since beginningless time, is itself the essence of space, great bliss.
The two bodies, all their channels and essences, means and wisdom, body, speech and mind, like letters traced by a crawling worm, abide connected with the two organs.
For one who has means and oral instruction, women of the royal caste, the merchant caste and the brahmin caste, of the common caste, dyers and dancers, tanners, traders,
mothers, daughters-in-law and sisters, coquettes, prostitutes and the rest, are taught to be fields where accomplishment arises.

Twelve, fourteen and sixteen, and eighteen, full of essence, are the best;
twenty and so on are taught as middling;
twenty-five is the limit of the lowest,
and with others, it is said, there is no accomplishment.
All actions and activities,
the applications of the rite, are thoroughly undertaken.
In the four essences of the abiding elements, when the four elements meet the conditions that make them clear, from the dance technique where sun and moon mingle, from the three coemergents that are one,
the five wisdoms dawn in experience,
and all without exception becomes great bliss.
From the four places, channels, essences and bindus, through equal union endowed with the four mudrās
of nondual means and wisdom,
having identified refined and dregs by means of the wind,
the coemergent things,
joined with the master who has the longing, through emanating and gathering, releasing and holding,
and reversing, one experiences sun and moon as indivisible.
From the first, destruction and the rest, up to the great Vajradhara, Lord of Secrets, through bringing the five paths and five minds to completion, the distinctions of power become clear.
For the nondual means and wisdom, from the eastern gate of the space of Akaniṣṭha,
when sun and moon rise at the same time,
held by the hour and the planet, wisdom itself, without day or night, arises through the application of the propelling wind.
In the world of space, pervading, which appears as the awareness of yoga, whatever special essence abides in the beautiful flower of great bliss, having gathered the crystal and coral bees

of the union of means and wisdom, increasing by the essence of yoga, it is spontaneously accomplished on the thirteenth stage.
Great bliss, nonconceptual, arising from the dance technique of embrace, arising from the fraction of an instant,
is the essence of undefiled wisdom.
All without exception is the appearance of the refined mind, free of clinging, abiding in neither emptiness nor conception;
it is the coemergent thing, abiding as all-pervading.
It is the nature in which perceptions are exhausted, the bindu itself, waxing and waning, the very end where the fifteen are complete,
the state of emptiness where all union is exhausted.
That itself, arising from blessing, is the very essence of directions, times, vessel and contents.
The bindu, free of particles, without clinging, illusion, reflection, echo and so on,
all without exception, in the nature of great bliss:
when ordinary memories and thoughts cease of themselves, the illusion of great bliss appears directly.
The body, speech and mind of great bliss, the savor of wisdom of the five melted essences, all is one-pointed mindfulness itself, indivisible means and wisdom,
the very experience of a single mindfulness.
Through the union of means and wisdom, countless as thirteen million, the bindus appear as bliss itself.
On each bindu, unmingled, sealed with body, speech and mind, with mindfulness and the five wisdoms,
all appears as a host of bindus.
The self-arisen deity of awareness, great bliss, both one and beyond number,
sits on a seat of sun and moon.

Seated within a pervading tent of bindus, the lord, with the lord of the support, with the ornaments of the connection of channels and essences, three pillars and four palaces, four openings for the two keys:
by opening the four gates the celestial palace together with the deities becomes manifest.
The secret Akaniṣṭha, blazing, endowed with hermitage and charnel ground, with outer, inner and intermediate tiers:
on a seat of sun, moon and lotus,
the three times are of one taste in the bindu.
Great bliss abides without duality.
The hosts of the assemblies of indivisible means and wisdom are likewise:
the common sacred commitment and samādhi, and the five, awakening, wisdom and compassion;
elsewhere, means and wisdom, conduct, song, dance and ornaments:
through enjoying them as play without abandoning them,
the stream of the sun and moon of wisdom dawns.
Wind, mind and wisdom together, since they do not move, are free of defilement.
To the very limit of space
undefiled bliss is unbroken.
That itself is the immeasurable maṇḍala, appearing manifestly filled with great bliss.
For those who have entered the path,
all the distinctions of conduct of outer, inner and secret without exception are here taught in full.
Endowed with means and wisdom, the yogin, according to the occasion, outer, inner, secret and so on,
should practice whatever is suitable.
From first realizing to the ultimate,
in the path conduct of outer, inner and secret, whatever one wishes as the object to be enjoyed, one practices all without accepting or rejecting.

Through the view, conduct and samādhi of means,
like the lotus in the mud, or like the means of darkness and light and turning to gold, one who is skilled in means should practice.
Through the offering to the male with means, whatever is enjoyed as bliss free of attachment in the pure fields and spheres of activity, in the enjoyments of the expanse of space, one enjoys great bliss
and becomes the lord of spontaneous presence.
Those who lack means and, not connected to the path, without meaning, relying on sounds and words, undertake the secret conduct:
whatever they practice will not appear,
but like the powerless entering battle, they ruin both themselves and others, suffer in this very life, and go to the evil destinies, the place of the perverse.

of the natural maṇḍala, of samādhi and of the reflected image, of the further two, of samādhi and of the reflected image, and of the awakening mind (bodhicitta) and of the assembly, the meaning of the maṇḍala I shall explain.
Because the faculties, their objects and all the consciousnesses are not other appearances, not distinct, all without exception are the self-aware awakening mind, uncontrived, by nature luminous, the essence of all without exception, the nature of the victors of the ten directions, those who have passed and those yet to come.
All the phenomena without exception, every one, of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa, diverse, yet indivisible in nature:

that itself is the natural dharmakāya.
That itself is the world, the stable and the moving;
all that appears and resounds, just as it is,
the definite nature, the forty-two,
is explained as the natural sambhogakāya.
That itself is the diverse mudrās:
everywhere body, speech and mind, qualities and activities, inconceivable, supreme:
the natural nirmāṇakāya, beyond thought.
That which abides in the heart of the embodied,
of all beings without exception, however many,
the self-arisen undefiled wisdom form,
the indestructible bindu, great bliss,
pervading all like space,
is the nature of the nonabiding dharmakāya.
From that very root nature, all that has the nature of container and contents, all thoughts without exception, are the maṇḍala, the very nature of complete enjoyment.
That very bindu, as subtle and coarse, performs inconceivable deeds of appearance;
the cause by which it appears to tame each one is called the nature of emanation.
Here the aggregates and elements, consciousnesses, faculties, objects and times, afflictions, permanence and annihilation, mind and phenomena:
although to some it does not manifestly appear,
it is the uncontrived natural maṇḍala, appearing as pervading all.
One's own heart, endowed with the five pure essences, the pure aggregates and elements, together with the objects of the faculties, together with channels, vital essence and bindus, appearing of itself as body, speech and mind, seals all without exception.

The great bindu where the essence gathers, whose nature is sun and moon mingled,
the bindu of bliss appearing of itself:
although by means it is made manifest through the ways in which all gathers, the nondual bindu, the taste of bliss,
appears naturally in all beings.
These, father and mother, body, speech and mind,
together with channels, essence and bindus,
abide primordially, without meeting or parting, because the undefiled wisdom of all the victors, appearing of itself, is an ocean of measureless qualities.
It is the wisdom palace of Akaniṣṭha.
In the center of the blazing wheel palace, adorned with the ornaments of undefiled qualities, upon the seat of the fearless aggregates, the lord Samantabhadra turns the wheel,
and the beings who await his command dwell before him.
Moreover, the oceanic assembly of victors, of body, speech and mind and of qualities, whichever of the five families each has become,
with heads of liberation and hands of wisdom, each in its own manner of being seated,
are arrayed in front, behind and in the ten directions, abiding in the manner of father and mother in union.
Because of self-arisen, unobscured wisdom, arisen from the undefiled two accumulations, equal in extent to the element of space, countless worlds, together with their atoms, abide in perfect array.
They who possess the hands and faces and means of undefiled wisdom,
holding sway over the families that behold their faces,
have become great vajra holders.
The supreme speech of all those victors without exception, inexpressible,
reaching to the limit of the expanse of space,

through symbol, meaning and blessing, the secret and so on, as is fitting, proclaims an ocean of the sound of the sacred Dharma.
The miraculous display of blessing of the ocean of undefiled wisdom manifestly arose: a ā i ī u ū e ai o au ṛ ṝ ḷ ḹ aṃ aḥ ka kha ga gha ṅa ca cha ja jha ña ta tha da dha na ṭa ṭha ḍa ḍha ṇa pa pha ba bha ma ya ra la va śa ṣa sa ha kṣa
By the sending forth of these,
the expanse of space together with the world-systems of the ten directions, the oceans, the encircling iron mountains and Meru, rivers, ponds and lakes,
the beings dwelling there,
each with their own enjoyments, pleasures and pains, outer and inner, container and contents, all without exception shake and quake, and a great sound also resounds.
Having purified them so that they do not remain, they are blessed as the essence of speech;
as they dissolve into emptiness, all without exception becomes emptiness.
A is the middle between empty and not empty, yet it does not exist even as an object of reference.
All phenomena that appear and resound, however many, abide in the very garland of letters.
Because its nature, too, whatever appears as the natural, the miraculous display, the samādhi, the secret and the drawn,
is the appearance of the distinctions of awareness.
Through the manifest appearance of what are called root and ornament and of the letters of the deities, it is the very nature of body, speech and mind, appearing entirely in a pervasive manner.
Wherever there are the blessing of compassion and the miraculous display of samādhi and awareness, these are the manifest appearances of their own particular distinctions.
These, of diverse nature, wherever and however they abide, all of them,

abide with none that has not become letters.
The secret mind of all the victorious buddhas, the ocean of wisdom,
like space without end,
pervades all with undefiled vastness.
The infinite maṇḍala of knowables, in a manner that is neither one nor many,
through unobscured, clear wisdom, it knows clearly, like the expanse of space.
The phenomena and beings of the three times, the realms and the countless victors, mountains and oceans, together with their atoms, before and after, unobscured, in this very present, appear manifestly, as in a mirror.
In the glorious maṇḍala of space, all-pervading through the five wisdoms, omniscient, with the ten powers, without limit, the Lord of Space, great bliss, has gone to the far shore of the ocean of higher knowledges.
The entire maṇḍala of knowables, every one, has the nature of the awakened and the purified;
the self without beginning or end, great bliss, illusion itself,
is not other than self-arisen mind.
This is the nature of the body, speech and mind
of all the victors,
which, before whatever beings are to be tamed, manifest as diverse emanations.
Where there are the haughty lords of the three realms of existence, wrathful, fierce and malevolent, in order to tame them through wrathful compassion, they act as wrathful tathāgatas.
Their bodies are like Mount Meru, their feet and hands as many as atoms;
according to the particulars of those to be tamed, three faces, six arms and four legs, nine heads, eighteen arms and so on,

twenty-one heads and so on;
likewise, as many as the atoms of the moving and the unmoving, they generate hands, feet and faces.
Holding various weapons, throughout all the worlds of the ten directions, with diverse dancing methods of activity,
such as the four miracles,
the great haughty ones, and Īśvara (Śiva), Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śakra (Indra), and gandharvas, Yama and yakṣas, malevolent, proud, bound by cause and effect:

in order to cut off cause and effect at the root, without letting a single one escape, cowed in their pride, their wrath and their fierceness, whatever they might say,
their own oceans of affliction not yet dried up, by pressing compassion upon their hearts, they tamed them openly.
In some places as the Great Glorious Heruka, in some as Vajra Heruka himself,
in some as Ratna Heruka, in some as the Padma Tathāgata, in some together with the various, as Karma, each embracing the assembly of his own consorts, holding the various weapons of his family, with colors and attire to match;
likewise their sons, their servants, their messengers, their secondary emanations and so on.
From the pores of their vajra body hair, sixty koṭis of messengers were sent out to spread through all the ten directions, and all those hosts of the malevolent, equal to the element of space, having been tamed at once, without exception, were established on the ground of irreversibility.
Their speech, too, is diverse:

by sending forth emanations, with a single voice they fill the three realms with sound:
hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ viśva krodha jvala maṇḍal phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ hala hala hala hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ trat tra ta tra ta kroṭa kroṭa kroṭa hala hala hala hulu hulu hulu tiṣṭha tiṣṭha tiṣṭha bandha bandha bandha daha daha daha gṛhṇa gṛhṇa gṛhṇa paca paca paca cchinda cchinda cchinda garja garja garja hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ bhyo bhyo bhyo phraṭ jvala raṃ
With this sound all is filled.
As far as the very limit of space, with mountains, continents and oceans, with the encircling ranges and the worlds of the trichiliocosm, all without exception shook and was filled with sound.
Those hosts of the malevolent, with their retinues, not left under any power of their own,
the malevolent were tamed all at once.
Then their retinues and servants, too, spoke in fear and made supplication, offered up their own hearts, took the vow, swore oaths, and were set upon their own path.
Those blazing maṇḍalas, too,
in some cases, toward delusion, act with stupor;
in some, toward passion, with great passion;
in some, toward the lustful, they display lust;
toward hatred they practice violence;
the proud they press down with a mountain.
Through wrath arising from peace and peace itself, clarity and suppression of the heart, wrath of passion and wrath of hatred, wrath of delusion, wrath of suppression and so on,
for eons as many as the atoms of the realms, through the wisdom of their own knowing,
as diverse means of taming, they display the emanations of mind of the manifestly perfect Net of Magical Display.
Because familiarity with non-elaboration itself, that itself is the maṇḍala of samādhi:
outer and inner, container and contents, without exception,

all that abides throughout the ten directions, abides as the king of self-awareness.
This is not male, female or neuter, nor sexless, nor anything of the kind.
Beyond things and non-things, it is the wisdom of the expanse of suchness, the state of unborn awareness:
one should meditate on this vividly.
oṃ dharma dhātu svabhāva ātmako 'haṃ Because it does not rest in conventional names such as born and unborn, and transcends the operations of the intellect, this is called suchness.
In this there are no stages;
it is said to be the domain of supreme persons.
All without exception is the vajra of self-awareness itself;
in the manner of pervading, it is space;
utterly pure, luminous by nature,
it is the great sacred samādhi.
By it all becomes manifestly clear:
all phenomena, outer and inner, every one,
through familiarity, are unelaborated suchness.
That is the common samādhi.
The indestructible bindu, the self of the pure essences, four combined, five-natured, nondual,
together with channels, essence and bindus:
through the samādhi joined with means,
together with the taste of the five wisdoms, the meaning of unborn great bliss, undefiled pervasion, manifestly ripens.
Wisdom, which has the form of space, is self-arisen, without outer or inner,
of the nature of clarity and bliss;
mastered through means and bindu, it arises clearly in all the embodied.
The very pure essence of the elements of the four places, the support together with the supported, the self-arisen bindu, bliss itself, by pervading clearly, without directional parts, becomes the body of great bliss.

The self-arisen essence, the body of pure essence:
the elements dissolve into the undefiled essence.
The bindu is free of elaboration, and appears pervading all without exception.
One's own body, channels and essence, outer and inner, all, ripening the dregs into pure essence, the pure essence shines as the heart of wisdom.
That itself, the unmoving self-arisen bindu free of elaboration, appears through the power of undefiled pure essence.
Because, arising from the consort, whether born, emanated or imagined, from the churning of the two organs, at the end of the sixteen moments, from the dancing method of sun and moon mingled,
the coemergent reality becomes clear:
the essence in which the five minds are complete,
the inexpressible, self-appearing, is revealed.
Where all body, speech and mind abide,
by binding together the three dances of embrace, all places and elements without exception appear as forms of self-aware wisdom.
The bindu of the awakening mind,
in which means and wisdom are inseparable,
together with support and supported,
blessing oneself as clear, all phenomena of appearance and existence, just as they are,
shine as the essence of the coemergent.
All without exception, the family of great bliss, the sacred union, comes to appear.
This is explained as the outer, inner and secret maṇḍala of samādhi.
Because the yogin of signs first meditates on suchness:

self-aware, unborn suchness, free of thing and non-thing, uncontrived, self-aware luminosity.
Then one meditates on compassion, like space,
the yoga that is clear yet empty.
Or else one should meditate in the manner of an illusion, an echo and the moon in water.
Then, through familiarity in which oneself as the letter is clear and stable, one purifies what is impure and should contemplate the five pure spaces:
e yaṃ vaṃ su laṃ
Earth, water, fire, wind and space:
meditate on them as the self-appearance of awareness.
In their midst is a jeweled mansion, beautiful in form,
with a four-spoked wheel and its hub,
a round rim without beginning or end, corners, projecting bays and intermediate courtyards, four gates, archways and stairs, five-tiered cornices and half-garlands, pillars of sense pleasures and fringed eaves, adorned with clear, unobscured ornaments.
In the center, the five seats, the fearless and the rest, with sun, moon, lotus and so on,
five, three, four and one.

Upon the seats, in their fitting order, arisen through the rite from the seed syllables, the principal and his consort, dark blue, holding vajras, blessed in smiling embrace and union:
through the rite of empowerment with its five aspects, uniting, urging and generating the sons, one sets out each in its place.
Dharmadhātu, white, holding a wheel;
Equality, jewel, yellow, in the south;
Discernment, lotus, red, in the west;

Accomplishment of Activity, sword, green, in the north;
their consorts, matching their families, holding bells, embrace them.
In the spaces between the spokes of the wheel, beginning from the southeast: Kṣitigarbha, white, holding a sprout, embraced by Lāsyā, conch-colored, with a mirror; Ākāśagarbha, blue, holding a sword, with Mālā, holding a garland, the color of the sky; Avalokiteśvara, ruddy, with a white lotus,
with Gītā, red in color, with a lute;
the Vajra Holder, green, of the action family, with Nṛtyā, green, dancing with both arms outstretched.
In the four corners, in their order:
Maitreya, white and yellow, holding a nāga tree;
Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin, red and yellow, holding a volume;
Samantabhadra, red and green, with a jewel sheaf;
Mañjuśrī, white and green, holding an utpala.
Their consorts, matching their families, Dhūpā, Ālokā, Puṣpā and Gandhā, embracing and bowing, abide in their proper manner.
At the four gates, in due order,
Mahābala and Yamāntaka, Hayagrīva and Amṛtakuṇḍalin, the four,
with Aṅkuśa, Pāśa, Sphoṭa and Ghaṇṭā; blue-black, yellow-black, red-black and green-black; with vajra, skull-staff, skull and snake, and crossed vajra;
the consorts, too, with their respective emblems, abide at the four gates, menacing, in embrace and union.
In front of and behind the courtyard, Samantabhadra, father and mother, the color of the sky, with various mudrās, not fixed,
upon the gesture of equipoise radiating wisdom, marked with vajra and bell.
The six sages: white, yellow, dark blue, red-black, yellow-black and smoke-colored, in the four directions, above and below, in the eastern and western manner, with lute, armor, bowl and casket, book, and fire and water: so it should be known.

Akṣobhya and the other agents are adorned with Vajradhara;
the others are adorned by their own, yamāntakṛt constantly;
the six sages are adorned with Samantabhadra.
Blazing with body, speech and mind, endowed with blessing, endowed with the vajra essence that radiates and gathers:
so should the stages of the rite be known.
Wisdom itself, the pure essence endowed with vital essence,
is uncontrived suchness,
connected with the state of the space of wisdom.
Through compassion that pervades all, the pervading essence of bliss blesses whatever ordinary thoughts there are into great bliss.
The essence of the pure five elements is the cause from which all arises:
dharma cakra, the dharmadhātu, the indestructible bindu, the abode of all.
The distinctions of potency, subtle and coarse, are four;
the bindu's form and feeling, perception, formations and consciousness itself, the very nature of the five wisdoms, are explained as the five kings.
The five elements, together with their pure essence, because they generate delight, are the consorts.
The blissful consciousnesses of the eye and so on,
and their essence together with their objects, abiding with channels, essence and bindus, are the inner sattvas, male and female.
The supports where their respective channels and essences abide,
the faculties, each together with the four times, are explained as the outer sattvas, because they are distinguished by place and time.
Those generated by the pure essence, the four phenomena of the body, together with permanence and annihilation, should be known as the male and female guardians of the four gates.

Great bliss, mind and phenomena, self-awareness itself, is Samantabhadra, the bliss of taste itself.
In the domains of the six afflictions, they arise of themselves as bindus of emanation.
Acting for others' benefit through the four modes of taming,
the deeds of emanation are inconceivable.
All, from the nature of the pure essence, possess the taste of the five wisdoms, are adorned with the five places and essences,
and are sealed by the five wisdoms.
The seed is body, the letter is speech, bliss is mind, endowed with the maṇḍala of body and speech, together with the root bindu that radiates and gathers.
Since this abides in all without exception, it should be known as the ancillary practice.
Having first done the emptiness vajra and the rest, without clinging to oneself,
one should take a consort whose family has been examined.
Having purified the three doors of one's own being,
one makes the body into the yoga of the deity.
The core of the vajra is the anther;
contact is earth, moisture is water, heat is fire, movement is wind,
and the pure essence of bliss is space.
The bha ga, shaped like bhruṃ, the place of bliss, is the celestial mansion where all variety gathers;
sun, moon and lotus are the seat of potency, fully endowed with the qualities of greatness.
The taste of means and wisdom joined:
by joining it equally with the nature of the pure five aggregates and five elements, wisdom, subtle and coarse, is nondual.
The faculties, objects, times and consciousnesses of means and wisdom joined are deities born each as its own bliss, coemergent wisdom itself.
Means and wisdom being nondual, having gained mastery over the moving wind, through tending the bliss of the path of means,

one turns back one's own imagined thoughts.
In the essence of things,
even I find nothing to be turned back.

In the seed, the bindu of bliss, through the four methods, the dancing method of the wind, together with a potency that has the full measure of joy, this reality is made firm as the coemergent.
As for the great mudrā of bliss:
because all outer and inner, container and contents, without exception, are of one taste in great bliss, all without exception abides as the coemergent.
The bindu of bliss where the essence gathers, since it is the essence of all qualities, and since it is complete with all the qualities of greatness, abides as the essence of all the buddhas.
Then the king of all the victors, in order to bless all without exception as the supreme deity, uttered the heart essence of speech:
bhruṃ viśva viśuddhe hūṃ vajra dhṛk oṃ jri na jik svāṃ ratna dhṛk āṃḥ ā ro lig hāṃ prajñā dhṛk muṃ dhā tvī śva rī lāṃ dve ṣa ra ti māṃ mo ha ra ti byāṃ rā ga ra ti tāṃ vajra ra ti kṣīṃ ha rā ja ya trāṃ ā garbha ya hrī ha hūṃ padma va da ya jīṃ ku ru pa ṇī hrīḥ hūṃ lā sye sa ma ya stvaṃ trāṃ mā lye sa ma ya hoḥ hrī gī tī rā go 'haṃ a nṛ tye rā ga yā mye mai dha ra ṇe svā hā thkhiṃ nissa raṃ bha ya svā hā hūṃ sa rā jā ya svā hā muṃ śrī a raṃ gā ya svā hūṃ jaḥ ṅhū pa pra ve śa hūṃ puṣpa a ve śa paṃ dī va su khi ni ho gandhe citta hūṃ ya mātna kṛt jaḥ phaṭ hūṃ vighnānta kṛt hūṃ phaṭ hūṃ padmānta kṛt vaṃ phaṭ hūṃ prajñānta kṛt hoḥ phaṭ oṃ ma hā vajra dhā ra ma hā kro dhī śva ri jva la ni phaṭ oṃ ma hā ratna dhā ra ma hā kro dhī śva ri jva la nī phaṭ oṃ ma hā padma dhā ra ma hā kro dhī śva ri jva la nī phaṭ oṃ ma hā karma dhā ra ma hā kro dhī śva ri jva la nī phaṭ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ vajra citta hūṃ a a a vajra bha dra sa manta oṃ oṃ mu ne kriṃ svā hā oṃ mu ne hūṃ druṃ svā hā oṃ mu ne sruṃ svā hā oṃ mu ne praṃ svā hā oṃ mu ne śaṃ svā hā oṃ mu na ye svā hā oṃ e hye hi bha ga vān ma hā ka ru ṇī ka tṛ śya ho sa ma ya stvaṃ jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ oṃ āḥ hūṃ svā hā va va va va va jra jra jra jra jra sa sa sa sa sa ma ma ma ma ma ya ya ya ya ya oṃ āḥ hūṃ svā hā oṃ

The nondual Net of Magical Display, the profound secret body, speech and mind, inseparable from me from the very beginning:
may it be inseparable right now!
oṃ vajra sa ma ya hūṃ oṃ vajra sa ma ya stvaṃ oṃ vajra sa ma ya hoḥ jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ By saying this,
the beautiful and diverse maṇḍalas, mingling nondual in one taste, become clear as the maṇḍala of the trichiliocosm.
oṃ āḥ hūṃ svā hā muṃ māṃ lāṃ pāṃ tāṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ trāṃ trāṃ trāṃ trāṃ dhri dhri dhri dhri āḥ āḥ āḥ āḥ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ Fully endowed with jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥrab, the five principal lords and five principal ladies, the thirty-two connected ones, the wrathful vajra males and females, the four gatekeepers, the infinite hosts and so on:
they made the maṇḍala appear in its full extent.
The wheel in two tiers, together with its spokes, with courtyard and gates, the ranks of the deities, each with its own emblem and seat, abide in their proper postures.
Then those victors,
in order to empower and bless those great maṇḍalas,
spoke the secret mantras:
oṃ ma hā śū nya tā jñā na vajra sva bha va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ ma hā ā darśa jñā na vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ ma hā pra tyā vekṣa ṇā jñā na vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ ma hā sa manta jñā na sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ ma hā kṛ tya a nuṣṣā na vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ sarva ta thā ga ta ma hā kā ya vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ sarva ta thā ga ta ma hā vā ka vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ sarva ta thā ga ta ma hā citta vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ sarva ta thā ga ta ma hā a nu rā ga vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ oṃ sarva ta thā ga ta ma hā pū ja vajra sva bhā va ātma ko 'haṃ Having said this, the wisdom body, speech and mind become clear, dissolving one-pointedly.

The citta is Akaniṣṭha, the blazing abode, the treasury of perfection, a blazing jewel, the indestructible bindu, a casket, the place where all the victors dwell.
In the essence of the five elements of the citta, the bindu of bliss, subtle and coarse,
as the identity of the five wisdoms, is called the king who holds the secret.
Those five wisdoms of pure essence, wherever they shine as the indivisible vajra, generating the five poisons as the wisdoms, are called the consorts, the essence of joy and bliss.
The wisdom in which the five elements gather, self-arisen wisdom, the mind of bliss, the bindu together with the four consciousnesses, is explained as the sattvas of mind.
The four objects over which they hold sway, the bindu, the vital essence of bliss, what is held as illusory bliss,
are explained as the four objects in order;
and since holding sway is nondual, they are explained as the essence of father and mother in union.
The supports, with channels, essence and bindus, each together with its own potency, because each holds power over its own,
are explained as the outer rank.
Through the bliss of the five elements:
delighting, and the arrangement of bindus, the clarity of the wisdom of space, and that very pervasive nature:
through the nature of undefiled bliss they delight the realms of the ten directions.
Summoning, binding, delighting and clarifying are said to be linked as the vital essence of the path of means.
By making the great means clear, the four phenomena of the body, permanence and annihilation are abandoned;

the self-appearing bindu of bliss,
because it conquers all, is the wrathful one.
The three hūṃs beyond the vital essence are the essence free of agency;
being free of the three objects, they are the dharmadhātu, all without exception utterly pure, Samantabhadra.
Linked with the essence of pure essence and dregs, together with the six seeds of affliction, having tamed them through the bindu, they expound the teaching:
this is explained as the nirmāṇakāya.
All, moreover, are sealed by the taste of the five wisdoms, which abides pervasively, and appearance and existence, the body, speech and mind of great bliss, are held clearly by constant mindfulness.

Then, further, I shall explain.
In the center where the diverse secret peaks gather, crowned with the summit of the outer and inner ranks, noble through the blessing of the essence,
the abode of all the blessings of the qualities, in the nature of the secret lotus,
one should view the vajra as the nondual bindu.
The dewdrop bindus of sun and moon, mingling with each other, are parted by the wind.
Through the five secret elements wisdom plays.
When the five aggregates of the dregs are purified, the nature of the five pure essences shines, and the kings shine as the tathāgatas.
What is taught as the five secret elements is known from the occasion when faculty and object meet.
The five mudrās, the consorts of the supreme families, are to be viewed at the time of freedom from the dregs.
The blisses of the mind of bindu shine each as the bliss of its own bindu.
The pure essences of the wisdom consciousnesses are known as the clarity of great bliss.
Graceful with the attire of the bliss of samaya,

the three doors linked and attached to the bindu, where the sound of bliss resounds, delighting with the dance of moving and transferring.
The mind is the abode on which the bindu rests;
through the bliss together with its support, which holds sway over the objects as bliss, each produces its own bindu.
Together with the mind and bindu
of nondual means and wisdom:
summoning, holding, embracing and abiding, binding the bindu, the wind, the upper and the lower,
these are the methods of moving and bringing down;
satisfying, and releasing the bindu;
through the clarity of wisdom the mind of bliss expands.
Examine them clearly in their order.
The secret object, the faculty, contact and whatever consciousness there is: those are the ta kri ta.
Because the nature of bliss is unborn, permanence, annihilation, sign and selflessness are the nature of the female gatekeepers: secret mantra.
It is called secret mantra because it means knowing and protecting.
Beyond the three cognitions, obscurations exhausted, that which makes self-awareness is called Mind.
The dharmadhātu itself, where the three streams are exhausted, that which is to be realized, is explained as Samantabhadrī.
The seeds of saṃsāra together with the afflictions:
as on the former path of the dewdrop bindu, through the radiating and gathering of the bindu of union with means, the twelve secret deeds are shown.
The seed, the bindu, the unborn form:
the teaching is taught in three stages.
Through the three hundred limbs of desire, the sixty-four and so on,
ordinary clinging is self-liberated,
and by moving the vajra joined with the anther, the self-blazing bindu takes on form.
The five fathers and mothers, outwardly, are held through means.

The light of the rising sun and moon, traveling from tip to tip, dispels all the darkness of saṃsāra, and all without exception shines as the coemergent.
That itself should be known as the secret.
The entire maṇḍala of the victors, abiding as forty-five,
the very essence of the nature of mind,
is the sign that symbolizes each one,
and so too in the extensive and condensed forms.
Vajra, wheel, blazing sword, bell, lotus and jewel:
this is explained as the order of the vajra holders.
Elsewhere, wherever it is, know the vajra:
the first at the heart, the left in embrace.
Jewel, sprout, blazing sword, white lotus, great vajra, utpala, nāga tree, book, sheaf;
beautiful form, jewel garland, lute, dance gesture, incense, lamp and unguent: each should be known in order.
The nṛ head, vajra, skull, crossed vajra;
hook, noose, spho ṭa hoḥ;
radiating light, equipoise, vajra palms joined,
the five-pronged wisdom vajra and the bell of the dharma element are said to be held firm at the heart.
The great sages should certainly be known as two-armed:
bowl, armor and weapon, lute being played, casket offered, book in the manner of teaching the Dharma, mass of fire and vase: so they should be known.
Others that agree are to be examined by context;
the distinctions that differ are taught in detail.
Vajra, jewel, lotus,
crossed vajra and bell: eight should be known.
Vajra, hook, arrow, snapping fingers;
jewel, sun, banner, teeth;
lotus, wheel, sword, tongue;

crossed vajra, fist, armor, fangs.
Others, too, that accord with the context should be known as signs of mind, each one-pointed on its own meaning.
Through the blazing of the five wisdoms of pure essence:
cutting, indivisible, joy, unstained, generating bliss,
and nonconceptual: know them in order.
Generating qualities and cutting off the ordinary,
and likewise unstained wisdom itself, arise from their respective aspects of the qualities.
The shapes of each one's channels, essence and bindus abide each in its own way:
know them as bindus of bliss.
The self-arisen bindu of pure essence, appearing as all by way of connection, is the very shape and form of seminal essence and channels.
Since each one's activity, thought, essence and emblem accord with these shapes, what shines clear and stable as the mind of great bliss should be known at the time of mind.
From the clear nature of the bindu
of nondual means and wisdom,
the wisdom of the great emblems of mind appears of itself, immeasurable.
The light of the bindu of great bliss appears entirely as each and every one.
The five wisdoms of great bliss of the entirely nondual bindu, and the doors of symbolization divided from them, the inconceivable natural signs of mind,
are not other than the mind of bliss.
Because these maṇḍalas, too, are meditated upon in the common place, in the heart of the indestructible bindu one should make body, speech and mind clear.
On the ultimate bindu, at the tip of the lotus,

one should make them clear in their order.
Then, in order to tame the malevolent, the blazing maṇḍala is clearly explained.
Following the stages of the rite, at one's heart is the causal seed hūṃ;
as it becomes clear through purification, stage by stage, since one's own five elements and five afflictions appear as the five self-arisen ones, one should meditate on the five elements themselves.
e yaṃ raṃ suṃ keṃ raṃ Having made each from these,
one should meditate on space as a triangle, wind as a half-moon, the churning waves and depths of blood, delusion as corpses, pride as mountains, and hatred as fire.
Their colors, too, should be known in order;
examine their activities and natures with vigilance.
From bhruṃ arises the charnel-ground celestial mansion:
a four-spoked wheel, skull garlands, two intermediate courtyards together with gates, fringes of skull garlands and snakes, beams and pillars of corpses, with black clouds and charnel-ground ornaments, wrathful goddesses and nectar goddesses, with walls of skulls in fives and threes, adorned with sun and moon. Having imagined this, together with the haughty ones, yakṣas, rākṣasas, gandharvas and Yama as mounts, one should meditate on them clearly in the same way.
Through the stages that arise from the rite of the vajra of body, speech and mind, in order to stabilize it through nondual clarity, one should perform empowerment and blessing in order.
Through the radiating bindu of union, having tamed all the malevolent without exception, each one's rank becoming clear, through hūṃ they sit upon the seats in their directions.

Arising from the eight seed syllables ha, the hosts of Gaurī and the hosts of Caurī, Pramohā and Vetālī, Pukkasī and Caṇḍālī, Ghasmarī and the Mother Host, displaying their respective menacing attire, dissolve into the four emanations, and performing their respective activities and proclaiming their essence mantras, they gather and should be placed in their respective directions.

Arising from the eight seed syllables he,
the tiger, lion, fox and dog,
the vulture, the kaṅka bird, the owl, the raven and the rest, the piśācīs (the animal-headed goddesses), with their emanating and gathering, their activities, directions, colors and emblems, should be visualized just so, in their proper order.
Through the four phaṭ, the horse-faced and the sow-faced, the snake-faced and the monkey-faced, in order, together with their activities, body colors and emblems, abide in their proper order.
In the center of the wheel, these five abide as father and mother joined in mudrā.
On the four flanks of the spokes and the four truncated corners one should place the mātṛkās of the sacred places.
In the first inner courtyard the eight piśācīs should be placed in order in the directions and intermediate directions.
At the four gates the gatekeepers abide in menacing form.
In the last inner courtyard
the hosts of attendants, handmaids and servant women, with their body colors, emblems and manner of sitting,
should be arranged in their proper order.
The diadems of jewels and of skulls should be made to suit the occasions.
Body, speech and mind are likewise;
they are explained as the branch maṇḍala.
Because the wisdom of space itself is held to be the ultimate, free of elaboration, it pervades all things with the bindu of bliss, and the nature of reality and compassion appear everywhere.

The bindu, one's own heart, the seed, the cause, is the essence free of defilement.
Possessing the essence in which all is gathered,
the bindu is linked with everything above and below.
Abiding in the manner of hollowness, it pervades all without exception.
The gate of jhaṃ, the ground gate of movement, pervades through motion and through action.
The places and activities that pervade the body appear distinctly, each in its own way.
Above that, of the nature of the tilaka, endowed with the eight blazing ones, performing the work of melting and blazing, it is also held to be called the Fierce One.
The elixir dripping from the gate of the bindu, moist and dripping, with vaṃ at its heart, of the nature of hostility and of bringing down, how it abides in the embodied one should make clear.
Whatever rests on whatever is its support:
the bindu together with the channels is the support of bliss.
That very thing, generated and transformed, being the support, is the maṇḍala of the ground.
The wheels are of the nature of the celestial palace, linked in their order above and below.
Because it abides in the body, it is the charnel ground;
gathering colors, channels and elixir, it possesses them as ornaments and seats.
The bindu on which all rests is the deity of nondual great bliss.
Through the bliss of the seed syllables it is endowed with body, speech and mind.
Though one, through the taste of bliss of the five courtyards it abides in a manner that pervades all without exception.
In the body abides the great bindu:

the place, the elixir, and bliss itself.
Arisen from the great means, from skillful means,
the wisdom of space is immeasurable.
The four entries and the eight stages are surpassed through the single bindu.
Because it exhausts the afflictions it is the Exhauster;
it is the blazing of the five wisdoms of the pure essence.
From the nature together with its objects the blazing maṇḍala clearly appears.
The blissful bindu of the places is the secret of the eight charnel ground ladies, explained as the nondual piśācīs.
The bindu together with skillful means is linked to the gates of entry into the maṇḍala;
the essence is joined as the bindu itself.
From that with which it is coemergent, great bliss is unborn.
All without exception is great bliss itself,
pervasive, vast and boundless, uninterrupted.
The taste of bliss in which all is gathered,
the space in which even the thirteen grounds are gathered,
the form of the self-arisen great pervader, is clear as the great all-gathering bindu.
The form of e endowed with the three gates of liberation;
bliss stirred and the bindu aroused;
the wind of emanating, gathering and binding;
the ground where vajra and lotus unite;
the ground of bliss free of any support.
The bindu of śukra, which is moist,
is of the nature of the secret water.
When these are joined through the mudrā, the warmth of bliss arises, blazing of itself.
From bhrūṃ comes the secret celestial palace, the jewel casket of the buddhas, whose essence gathers all the manifold,
the exalted Akaniṣṭha,
whose substance is perfected qualities,

with gates through which the four joys enter,
with the ladder of the bindu descending and ascending.
Bliss is seated, victorious, upon sun and moon.
The mingled bindus are the taste of bliss, the deity of bliss where sun and moon are joined.
Through the great method of drinking and drawing up, since it exhausts the seeds of saṃsāra, it is explained as the devouring wrathful one.

Whatever is of the nature of the immeasurable bindu, in the palace of the thirteen grounds, great bliss, the form of wisdom, abides together with body, speech and mind.
Blessed through the three perceptions, and endowed with the five secret wisdoms, those who have received empowerment are sealed.
The great secret bindu
is self-arisen great bliss itself;
where the movement of conceptual thought is cut off, it abides between vajra and lotus.
The lotus, the essence of the lower gate, is the maṇḍala of all the victors;
as secret body, speech and mind, skillful means and wisdom abide as nondual.
When the bindu in which all is gathered becomes the nondual elixir, its great bliss
abides, filling everything in a pervading way.
The coemergent ocean of wisdom, the secret bindu, the taste of bliss, appears in the manner of sun and moon mingled,
and is explained as the great secret maṇḍala.
Then all the victors without exception, according to the particular dispositions of those to be trained, reaching to the limits of the expanse of space, appeared as vajra wrathful ones, and generating them, they made manifest the mantras of the fierce deities who tame the malevolent, and their celestial palaces.

Through the power of the fierce secret mantras, the ten directions burn, burn intensely, and are utterly burned throughout.
They blaze, blaze far and wide, blaze everywhere.
With the wrathful hosts of the blazing maṇḍala they are filled, filled completely, filled throughout.
They are shaken, shaken violently, shaken throughout;
scattered, scattered widely, scattered throughout;
they tremble and quake in the same way,
and a mighty sound resounds, filling the ten directions and the four times.
All the malevolent of the ten directions without exception are subdued, swoon and become intoxicated.
Roused by bliss,
they perform the joyful dance of great bliss to the very ends of space in the ten directions with magically displayed forms.
From the nature of the vajra secret the maṇḍala of the great bindu is transformed.
Primordially of the nature of the bindu, abiding as the unfabricated bindu, all without exception sealed as the bindu, it is suchness, having the form of space.
The bindu of bliss that is all without exception is of the nature of the great pervader; great bliss, free of edge and center, is declared to be great compassion.

The cause of all is the bindu, the root of all seeds without exception, the palace of the indestructible heart, the celestial palace of perfected wisdom;
its characteristic is like space,
and it is the dwelling place of all the victors.

The throne that is the seat of the malevolent afflictions is taught as the very subduing of those to be trained.
The five aggregates and afflictions, purified, are of the nature of the five kings;
together with one's own heart and the pure essence, they are declared to be the five sovereign ones.
The consciousnesses together with their objects, with the support and the supported,
are the sixteen piśācīs of bliss.
The maṇḍala looking outward and looking inward, summoning, holding, and binding with the bindu:
the nature of the bindu is nondual.
On the path together with the bindu of the central channel, the hosts of sovereign ones and mistresses of the sky, taking up the manner of the near descent, by the four methods of bringing down the bindu, bring it down and burn the substance of one's own continuum.
The hosts of radiating and gathering of the awareness that arises as memory enter into the meaning of great bliss.
Through nondual dissolution the maṇḍala blazes.
Since all is clear as body, speech and mind, through nondual dissolution they are pleased.
All the maṇḍalas of natural bliss dissolve into the expanse of awareness and experience.
All the afflictions that arise as memory and thought should be known as the three burnings.
Wisdom, great bliss itself, should be known as the three blazings.
Through the bliss of the mind of awakening all without exception is filled and pervaded.

The bindus above and below, upper and lower:
the upper bindu blazes below,
and the lower one blazes above.
One and two scatter, pervading the whole body.
The body with its channels shakes, quivers, and is filled with blazing bliss.
A sound of satisfaction, mastered by bliss, resounds, pervading all without exception.
The bhaga of body, speech and mind is great bliss, the expanse of space.
The four elements are vajra and lotus;
the bliss of the union of contact,
where the movement of hope and fear is cut off, should be viewed as suchness.
Through the bliss of the mingled bindus, the mind that pervades even the thirteen grounds, stainless like space throughout,
self-arisen and without direction, appears everywhere.
Through the bliss of skillful means and wisdom, the pure essence of the sequence of the elements is known as the seed, the cause of bliss.
The bhaga, the essence of the lotus,
the dwelling of the maṇḍala of body, speech and mind,
the support of great bliss,
is the precious vessel of the buddhas.
The five aggregates and the five afflictions are overpowered by the five wisdoms, seated upon seats of lotus, sun and moon.
The essence of all the buddhas is the nature of great bliss itself.
At the very moment the bindus meet, it has the taste of the five wisdoms.
The five wrathful ones crush those to be trained;
the five elements are shown as the sovereign ones.
Experience together with its objects, the consciousnesses and their objects, should be known as the piśācīs.
The four unions together with the mudrā should be known as those of the gates.

The bindu that enters the spinal column should be known as the bliss of the sovereign ones.
The nature of the two turning toward each other:
when great bliss has been invited, thought enters the maṇḍala of bliss.
The stages are nondual, the supreme meeting of signs.
The bindus of body, speech and mind are made to dissolve nondually.
All the lords and ladies of yoga are pleased with great bliss.
In the hidden heart of the buddhas all is endowed with the nature of bliss.
The nondual bindu, the taste of bliss,
endowed with the five wisdoms, is undefiled.
The maṇḍala filling outer and inner is the nature in which all is gathered.
From the method of the dance where sun and moon mingle, the coemergent becomes clear.
The bindu where the two unite in the thirteen grounds is of the nature of the vajra;
it is called the nondual embrace, and dissolves into self-aware great bliss.
The precious buddhas and their treasure, the casket, the essence of union, from the palace of body, speech and mind cause all the bindus without exception to abide.
The palace of body, speech and mind is the very abode of great bliss;
the vajra essence, linked with the channels, abides as the bindu of nondual bliss.
The great secret bindu
is the elixir in which all is gathered,
the secret treasury of perfected qualities.
One should abide on the path of the essence.
The essence of the vajra sun is adorned with the light of the vajra moon.

Filled with the nondual bindu, the nature of great bliss dawns.
That which has a support arising from what it supports:
through the union of whatever with whatever, the great bliss arising from the great means, from skillful means, comes to blaze.
Then Vajra Heruka, each one's own mind maṇḍala, considering the perception of those to be trained, manifested the maṇḍalas of mind.
The vajra one, with vajra and bell, lifts up the world together with its encircling ring;
likewise lifts it with its encircling ring;
likewise with wheel and axe,
and vigorously shakes the khaṭvāṅga staff.
The jewel one, with the precious jewel and the noose of entrails, strikes hard with the vajra axe.
Supreme passion, with the great lotus,
sounds the bell and drum.
Action, with sword and great plough, hurls the world far away;
the middle hands brandish the vajra and the red conch, and strike with the great club.
The queens, the great blood-drinking ladies, too, embracing, hold out the lotus and blood.
The emblems of the mātṛkās of the sacred places and lands are these:
a staff of a child's corpse, bow and arrow, and a victory banner;
a child's heart and a vajra, in the manner of eating and striking;
a child's heart, a red conch, and a child's entrails;
they abide in the manner of joining head and body, crossed above and below, outside and inside;
licking a child, tearing open the torso and gazing within;
entrails and heads, a corpse carried as a burden, entrails and a knife, and they hold a vajra hook.

Aṅkuśa, Pāśa, Sphoṭa,
and Ghaṇṭā, ringing the bell, summon them.
The hosts of attendants, handmaids and servant women are beautiful in their twelve and their eight.

With their own seats and implements, they stand ready, saying, "What shall we do?"
All of them, with beautiful ornaments, have smiling faces, flirtatious eyes, and an embracing manner;
their hair is bound in braids and locks.
Singing the songs of the śadapa, red, swaying with passion,
with broad hips and slender waists, swelling breasts, upper and lower body opened and proud,
red, leaning and bowing,
they bear a manner both respectful and flirtatious.
Those seated on their respective seats are these:
Rākṣasī, dark maroon, holds a fresh skull.
Brahmāṇī, reddish yellow, holds a lotus.
Mahādevī, whitish green, a trident.
Lobhā, blue, holds a wheel.
Kumārī, red, hurls a short spear.
Indrāṇī, white, brandishes Indra's vajra.
Vajrā, yellow, drinks sandalwood.
Amṛtā, red, holds a lotus.
Saumī, the moon goddess, white, a white lotus.
Daṇḍī, dark green, brandishes a club.
Rākṣasī, red, drinks blood from a conch.
Bhakṣasī, the Eater, dark green, draws out entrails.
Rati, red, holds a curved knife.
Mahābalā, white, holds a plough.
Vajrā, yellow, cuts with a razor.
Kāmā, red, draws a bow and arrow.
Vasurakṣā, white, holds a vase.
Vāyudevī, blue, waves a banner.
Māraṇī, the Slayer, white, with the edge of a sword.
Agnāyī, red, holds a firebrand.
Vārāhī, black, has a noose of tusks.
Cāmuṇḍī, red, eats a small corpse.
The Manifold One, white, drinks blood from a skull.
Varuṇī, reddish yellow, holds a snake noose.

Black Vajrā holds an iron hook.
Yellow Vajrā holds a noose with a goat's head.
Red Vajrā binds with an iron chain.
Dark green Vajrā rings the bell and stands proud.
Each has a majestic posture.
Then further I shall explain,
for the sake of elaborate emanation:
for the wrathful ones of body, speech and mind,
of qualities and of activity,
five divisions, each with fifty-eight.
One should examine how the mantras, the samādhis of the mudrās, the body colors, the manners of sitting and the sequences change according to the families.
Thus, through the practices of visualizing, drawing, reciting and devotion,
one should meditate as is appropriate.
Then the Blessed One, greatly delighted, with menacing gaping mouth and rolling eyes, baring his fangs, striding toward the ten directions, performed the dance in a terrifying stance,
and emanated the ten terrifiers.

When these were brought forth, the mountains shook their foundations, all the oceans without exception were churned, and the great sound of the mantras resounded.
Hūṃkāra, Vijaya, Nīladaṇḍa, Yamāntaka, Acala, Hayagrīva, Aparājita, Amṛtakuṇḍalin, Trailokyavijaya, and Mahābala: these wrathful ones each torment all their obstructors, and terrify and crush them all without exception.

These kings of wrath, too, the intelligent yogin should draw, visualize or focus upon within a mountain of the fire at the end of the eon.
They appear in the colors dark blue, white, blue-black, blue-green, dark red, smoky, green, whitish green, conch white and red.
The wrathful consorts abide as their bodies and their shadows.
Wheel, human head, vajra and club, together with a blazing sage;
grasping Yama by the leg and brandishing a staff;
sword, Nairṛti, club and winged staff;
holding eight banners and a cudgel;
a jewel and a staff with three human heads;
a three-pronged vajra and a human head;
plough and pestle, held in right and left.
Or else they have three faces and six arms.
The intelligent one, having visualized them thus,
destroys obstructors and the malevolent.
One should meditate on them together with palace and retinue.
Then further, what is to be explained:
one should clearly examine one's own body as the maṇḍala of the support and the supported.
Navel and heart, as body, speech and mind, with the lines, the major and minor units;
the four places are the pure essences of the elements;
the torso is the charnel ground and the celestial palace, with pillars, beams and portals, canopy and vajra fence,
wheels, nets and half nets, sun and moon windows and pools, the central axis with wheels stacked right and left,
the crest with sun, moon and lotus enclosure:

the celestial palace where the victors dwell.
In the self-arisen wheel of citta, the heart, is the bindu, the very self of the five wisdoms.
Through the taste of all the bindus gathered without exception, miracles are displayed and the malevolent are tamed.
One should meditate in the manner of the perfected samādhi of arranging each wheel in its place.
The pure essence of the four elements is the consorts; the pure essence of bliss is the space element;
the nature where skillful means and wisdom are nondual is the elixir, the nature of the five elements.
In the bindu of the śrīracitta, where moon and sun abide,
one is able to crush the inner malevolence, to transform the field of experience into bliss,
and to set out each bindu in its place.
Opened out, they are the wheels in sequence;
gathered in, they are the great bindu itself.
The bindu endowed with the five wisdoms:
the pure essence of skillful means is explained as the consort.
The bindu of consciousness, experience itself, appears as the wrathful goddesses because it crushes the ordinary.
The bindus of the places, together with the channels,
should be known as the piśācīs.
The four places are the gates of entry;
the elixir of bliss rests on the spinal column;
radiating and gathering are the sovereign goddesses.
In the bindus of the ten places and supports the nature of crushing is made clear.
Experience is without arising and without aspect;
because the field of experience is pure, it is explained as inner.
Relying on moon and sun,
the continuum of the path of body, speech and mind, the moving and the blazing of the bindu, freedom from hope and fear, and recollection become the four limbs of bliss.
Through the four mudrās of the embracing dance, the vajra essence is joined to the lotus.

Through joining movement evenly with the wind, sun and moon dawn at the same moment.
From that, pervading everywhere, all without exception becomes coemergent.
Nondual great bliss
is born from the method of union and churning.
The secret bindu arisen from skillful means is the taste of the elixir in which all is gathered.
The experience that rests upon the support, the superior wisdom, is born from skillful means.
The five wisdoms, beginning with the dharmadhātu, are signs, because they symbolize the mind itself;

That on which it rests, the blazing and the dripping, the wind of bliss and the space element, and likewise the queen who brings forth delight, indivisible, nondual, together:
that which arises from skillful means, the two entities, the hosts of objects and of sense faculties, the coemergent bindu itself, appears of itself entirely as bliss.
Arisen from the power of nondual union, it is shown as the bindu of the mudrās of the sacred places and lands.
Summoning, embracing, binding and bringing down are the gates through which wisdom enters;
the stream of the bindu passing through the spinal column should be known as the sovereign goddesses.
The bindus linked with the hairs of the body, subtle, appearing inconceivably,
are mudrās beyond number;
having visualized them, join them to the realms of space.
The secret bindu arisen from the four bodies, great bliss in which the elixir of the three realms is gathered, from a stability like a mustard seed that does not fall, appears in a manner that pervades all.
The bindu, great bliss, the union of skillful means:

through the nature of attainment and familiarization, as one becomes free of perceptions of clinging, signs arise that are beyond one's control;
then perform the rite of gripping and pressing down.
The manifold phenomena of appearance and awareness rest upon the bindu of great bliss.
Like gazing at the heart of the sun, the meaning in which looking yields no seeing,
all appears as the ornament of great bliss.
Next the reflection maṇḍala is explained.
All the phenomena, however many, that are taught as saṃsāra and as nirvāṇa are great self-arisen wisdom;
that itself is the supreme of manifold things.
Whatever phenomena appear, stable and moving, the great and coarse phenomena that abide,
appearing in common to all without exception, are the very essence of self-arisen skillful means.
They are the vajra wisdom, emptiness, primordially unborn,
an essence that is no thing whatsoever,
the nature of the mother, wisdom.
As far as the very limits of space,
the self-arisen form of the mind of awakening, the nature of all without exception, appears immeasurably in harmony.
Just as the nature of a clear mirror is linked with manifold forms, from the bindu of all awareness the whole maṇḍala of body appears.
Throughout all the infinite reaches of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa, the sounds of both the animate and the inanimate, the definite and the indefinite,
the manifold, deluded and undeluded, the spoken, the thought, and the magically displayed, the infinite blessings appearing of themselves,

are the supreme speech of the mind of awakening.
Like the sound of space and like an echo, it is awareness without independent existence.
As many as are the infinite intentions, so is the whole maṇḍala of speech, abiding without independent stability.
As far as space extends to its limits,
for eons without end,
like rain from the sky and bubbles, like clouds and masses of waves, wisdom, happiness and suffering, the definite and the indefinite, the sublime and the inferior, attachment and freedom from attachment, grasping, clinging and non-clinging, phenomena imputed without true aspect, whatever memory, thought or awareness there may be,
all is awareness appearing of itself.
Like the image of a past memory, or like the experience of a dream or an illusion, though manifold things appear, they are not independent.
All the maṇḍalas that have been explained, wholly free of any independent existence, are reflections, because they lack independent existence.
The reflection maṇḍala of nondual skillful means and wisdom is spontaneously present.
Self-arisen wisdom without arising or ceasing, the indivisible vajra form of all,
whose aspects have no end:
since its spontaneously present qualities appear of themselves, its reflections dawn naturally.
The self-arisen maṇḍala free of extremes, because it appears as anything at all yet is not apprehended, and does not abide as truly stable, dawns entirely as the reflection maṇḍala.
Great bliss, self-arisen and spontaneously present, like a jewel perfect in qualities, because it appears as immeasurable phenomena, is the reflection of great bliss.

For the higher and lower grades of those to be trained, beings pure and impure,
in order to arouse their enthusiasm for the conduct of awareness, from the beginning to the very end, according to each one's own disposition, it appears in just that way to them.
The reflection is the outer stage, because it has become a common object.

The body, undivided and without remainder, complete with outer and inner, vessel and essence, the abode rich in essence that brings about bliss, the indestructible bindu, the substance of all,
the form of self-arisen great bliss, through the potency of the link between the refined and the dregs, appears as the phenomena of two kinds of things, the defiled and the undefiled.
In the intrinsic nature of the causal bindu, through the distinct particular potencies, the elements, the consorts, great bliss, and the rest appear from the power of the bindu's potency.
The very heart of all the cakras, the blazing bindu, the form of bliss, together with the particular channel letters,
the bindus of gathered essence, filled with flavor, are the maṇḍala of all that is supported, appearing everywhere as the whole of vessel and essence.
The secret stage of great skillful means:
the bindu itself, dependent on the four elements, moves and drips, abides and dissolves;
proceeding through these three distinctions, like the domain of embarking on a boat and drinking the illusory water of a mirage, or like reaching the summit of a mountain clear as a mirror and gazing upon everything, it appears as the very reflection of great bliss.

The bindu of the four stages:
whatever formation of bliss is stirred, the distinctions of the bindu in the four places are clear, like pearls strung on a garland.
The dripping and blazing bindu, like sesame seeds ripened in the fruit, like a whole heap of sesame, abides as the body of bindus.
When experience blazes clearly, trembling, swimming particles, the hair standing on end, leaping, uttering sounds, the dance of heroes, appear as a host of displays.
When the world of appearance and existence, great bliss itself, with the ordinary set, has become stable, the bindu is refined by the power of space.
When, by the power of one-pointed seeing of space,
the bindu dissolves into emptiness, it is ascertained as the form of wisdom space.
All of appearance and existence, vessel and essence without exception, as the reflection of great bliss awareness, like gazing out from the depths of the ocean, appears in just that way, without exception.
Because it is experienced by awareness and its domain is pure, it is explained as inner.
Self-arisen great bliss itself, in order to train secret individuals and to reveal secret experience directly, is endowed with all the ritual activities of the union of skillful means and wisdom, and, with empowerment, blessing, and purification, by completing the three hundred and sixty and the sixty-four,
the lotus heart with the vajra,
like a sun crystal giving forth light, is moved by the mudrā of self-arisen wind;
the jewel drips water without control, and all is gathered into the bindu of awareness.

When the moving wind ceases, awareness dissolves into the bindu of emptiness.
The stages of the bindu that rest on a ta, from the nature of moving and not moving, appear as saṃsāra and nirvāṇa.
By relying on the secret bindu, one becomes the universal monarch of great bliss over all.
First is the bindu of the body, then the bindu of awareness, then the bindu of wisdom itself, and finally it dissolves into the bindu of the nature of reality.
Then, without meeting or parting in the three times, the very space element of great bliss, profound and without movement, free of all clinging and attachment of one's own continuum, the reflection of great bliss dawns.
When it is not realized, it is the pervading reflection;
through realization, it is the reflection of experience;
this reflection of consummate wisdom is not the domain of the inferior, those with incomplete limbs, those without empowerment and pith instructions, ascetics, the unripened,
and the fortuneless who have fallen away;
therefore it is the sublime great secret of the secret.
Next, what is further to be explained
is the superior reflection maṇḍala.
To arouse delight in ordinary beings,
I shall explain the rite in detail.
Although the great maṇḍala, the light of realization, has not become manifest just as it is,
since through this one comes to realize it in a superior way, it is taught as "superior." Because what symbolizes what for whom comes especially close to symbolizing it, and because whatever is accomplished by relying on whatever is accomplished especially swiftly, this is called superior.

Because by this means, whatever arises from whatever is manifestly superior, it is superior.
The body, speech, and mind of all the Victors are manifestly shown by that means, and because it is not the actual thing itself, it is taught as a reflection.
Just as, through the means on which one relies, that very thing appears in likeness, so for those to be trained who have not seen it but have faith, it is a means resembling it;
because it is not the actual thing but resembles it, it is a reflection.
It is the intrinsic nature of all the Victors.
The form of the five self-arisen wisdoms, spontaneously complete with immeasurable wisdom, appears to undefiled trainees.
Through the reflection of its qualities, for defiled persons who have faith, the very aspects of body, speech, and mind are symbolized in likeness; therefore it is a reflection.

Because, although in the essence of the dharmadhātu no division into distinct things abides, under the sway of devotion and of ferocity, one is not tamed by just anything at all;
and because compassion pervades all,
the maṇḍalas of enjoyment and emanation are taught.
To subdue by skillful means and by ferocity those who cling and those who are proud, they are suited to each in this way;
thus the superior reflection is explained as twofold.
Wherever is auspicious and pleasing, above and below, in the four directions and the intermediate quarters, excellent, pleasing, and free of obstacles, the finest of outer and inner mountains and hermitages:
examine one's own ground well, examine the omens through prognostic signs and through meditative experience,

reject what is impure and has bad marks,
and take what is pure and delightful.
For a ground that is blessed and auspicious, in order to pacify any dispute, request it free of obstacles by satisfying its owners, both visible and invisible.
In order to bring it under one's control, undertake every branch of the rite, satisfy them with offerings and delight,
and bring the ground under one's own control.
Having cleared away and purified the common faults, train the mind in the nonreferential Dharma, and purify it as the great purity of outer and inner,
swift in accomplishment and delightful.
On what abides, unfabricated from the beginning, as the substance of all, blessed by its intrinsic nature, through the superior truth, indivisible, bless it in essence as the deities and the celestial palace.
In order to guard it against obstacles, visualize clearly the emanated maṇḍala, send forth the cakra of vajra wrathful ones, and guard it with the four hūṃ together with the mantra.
In order to hold these well, seal the boundary against what is impure, and, having completed all the activities of the rite, make supplication to all the Victors, and, until the aims one desires are accomplished, claim it by name as a treasure of accomplishments.
Because, through the rite explained,
the impure and the bad,
through realization and the rite of samādhi, are made equal, one abides without hope or fear.
As the outer and inner maṇḍala has been explained, its measure is in accord with it:
the sublime maṇḍala of mind;
or it may measure four finger-widths, or it may be made to measure a finger's length, or it may measure one body-length, or three or four body-lengths,

or eighteen,
or it may be made to measure twenty-five;
or it may measure a krośa or a yojana, in accord with one's own awareness,
a measure equal to the expanse of space.
The maṇḍala endowed with its measure is made beautiful and fine with twenty-five pleasing ointments and incenses; then begin the rite connected with it.
The marking cord, made of cotton not used for other purposes or of material from a charnel ground, new, tightly twisted, and without knots, is the wisdom line into which dissolve the five blessings and body, speech, and mind;
and with awareness the lines should be struck.
The secret emanation and gathering of skillful means and wisdom, nondual, is just the same.
The maṇḍala, the pleasing palace, the ground, are explained as lines because they are unmistaken and clear.
What symbolizes what is just the same:
because the five colors, the aggregates, the elements, the sense sources, consciousnesses, and the rest symbolize the wisdom maṇḍala;
and because realization tears the net of saṃsāra, it is also called "color."
It is color because it teaches the deluded who have not seen.
Draw it with twenty-five colors, or with colored powders of the five.
With gold, silver, beryl, ruby, and sapphire,
endowed with the five precious substances,
the learned and wealthy may draw it as they please.
Or else with rice and paddy, changed in color, it is the same.
The lowly and those of little wealth should draw it with the five sources.

Through the dissolution of the ten Victors,
of skillful means and wisdom, nondual,
the wisdom jewels have no outer or inner;
they should be viewed as the essence of purity.
oṃ aṃ hūṃ svāhā
sarba pañca ratna samaye hūṃ Bless with mantra and mudrā the ten grains, heaped up and scattered.
For all of the peaceful maṇḍala, the walls are of wisdom jewels, with nets and half nets, porches, vajras, half moons, sense pleasures, jeweled grounds, and wish-fulfilling trees, adorned with pools, bells, and small bells;
always draw it and meditate on it.
For the maṇḍala that tames the vicious,
there are skulls of five kinds and of three kinds, and dry skulls in the courses of the walls;
the eight great supreme ones, based on Brahmā and the Lord of the Gods (Indra), are held to be these.
With the rest the roof is laid, endowed with the eight planets and with the sun and moon as skylights.
Nets and half nets of snakes and garlands of skulls are its varied adornments.
To tame the vicious, outer and inner, cause and result,
four porches are explained, adorned with garlands of fingers, garlands of skulls, and garlands of sense organs, suns, and moons.
It is endowed with wrathful goddesses, the five meats, nectar, and the sense pleasures of the charnel ground.

The charnel grounds, their soil soaked with blood, with impaled men in the eight directions and quarters, eight lakes of rakta swirling with waves, strung skulls, the winds of the charnel grounds, endowed with terrifying sounds and the light of fire, together with banners of flayed hides in the eight directions and quarters;

upon the upturned skull of the Great God (Śiva), light rays radiating from the crest of citta, the maṇḍala of Heruka itself should be drawn complete and meditated upon.
Because they fulfill the hopes of all beings without exception, they are endowed with jewel garlands and ornaments.
Because they possess all the fearlessnesses, powers, and the rest, they abide upon mounts of mighty beasts.
Because their conduct is untainted by faults, they appear beautiful with blazing lotuses.
Because skillful means and wisdom are nondual, they sit upon beautiful seats of sun and moon.
Because they do not stray from the meaning of great bliss, they sit in the manner of delight, in embrace.
Body, speech, qualities, activity, and mind abide as the ornaments of the perfectly complete body.
Because the path and the branches of awakening are complete, there are garlands and the like.
Because compassion does not abandon saṃsāra, it is like the makaras holding young nāgas.
Because compassion has no interruption, the connection abides without interruption.
Because diligence abandons saṃsāra,
the deer abide in pairs.
Because they see all with undefiled eyes, they are shown seeing virtue and wrongdoing with their eyes.
Because their power to overwhelm all is complete, garuḍas are shown abiding there.
Because they turn the wheel of Dharma and dispel the torment of the fever of the afflictions, the wheel of the parasol of compassion is shown.
Because all without exception is gathered into one,
a thousand crests blaze with light rays;
this is shown for the sake of the intentions of those to be trained.
The individual forms of the deities, their various body colors and postures, together with seats, hand emblems, and ornaments, and with their male and female modes, through focusing on suchness and through the manner of looking upon those to be trained, and through the way principal and retinue, outer and inner, gaze, the stages of how they are seated are taught individually.

Whatever is the heart essence of each, distinguished by its own color, in order to show the maṇḍala of speech, should be made clear in its proper order.
Whatever is the emblem of the mind of each,
with its color and shape,
in order to show the maṇḍala of mind, should be set out in its proper order.
For the maṇḍala that tames the vicious, too, the great conches, the great cloths, and the rest,
the very cakras of body, speech, and mind, should be set out clearly in their order.
On suchness there is no reference point:
empty, nonreferential awareness itself, in which no conceptual examination abides;
meditate on it as the dharmadhātu, suchness.
The equality in which the two truths are indivisible pervades from the beginning, yet is not realized; therefore the yogin should meditate on compassion without partiality, like space.
From the clear forms of the syllables, the aspect of self-arisen wisdom, having purified clinging and grasping,
through the emanation and gathering of the syllables, generate the five elements in sequence.
Having refined the nondual light with bruṃ, meditate that it is the celestial palace.
Whatever the aspects are,
from their nonduality with the seed of self-awareness, through their mingling, whatever principal deity there is is generated, empowered, and blessed;

then meditate on the retinue too as inseparable and mingled.
To the one fully complete, ripened, and matured, with jaḥ hūṃ baṃ, nondual, contemplate until what is desired is consummated.
When all the activities of the rite are finished, with various common offerings, the offerings of Samantabhadra, and the rest,
by the eight and the sixteen goddesses, the sequence of offerings should be undertaken.
The five kinds of precious things, horses and oxen, grain, storehouses, houses and homes, sons, wives, and servants, places, fields, and garments, ornaments, garlands, food, drink, and enjoyments, pools, springs, and streams, ponds, wells, and marshy springs, mountains, hills, and pleasure groves, the encircling iron mountains and Meru, the dances and songs of many people:
offer extensively various offerings equal to the expanse of space.
The hero's five meats, five nectars, essences, music, and lights, various scents and supreme ointments should be presented, pure and excellent.
The supreme fields, the ones to be liberated and the rest, through the actual act and through view, conduct, and samādhi, liberate all those to be accomplished, without exception, and cause them to be born in the vajra field.
Goddesses, human women, and vidyā consorts, the application of the rite according to one's own understanding, through actual union and through union in samādhi, with the music of great bliss filling the element of space, outer and inner, with the jewel goddesses and articles and the bliss of the experience of touch, make offering in the manner of nondual purity to the heirs of the Victors, as many as the atoms of the fields.

With music and with songs the sequence of the maṇḍala should be praised.
When, through recitation of the three vajras, the signs appear well,
the rites of purification, blessing, empowerment, offering, and consecration,
and the rites of examination should be performed extensively.
In the four directions of that maṇḍala, in hearths for the four kinds of activity, at the four times, with the substances proper to each, offering should be made in the manner of the four deities.
Then the master who has obtained authorization, having entered the maṇḍala and gained the capacity, in order to liberate saṃsāra through compassion, should lead the fortunate disciples in.
Whatever merit there is in directly seeing and entering the great cakra of body, speech, and mind of glorious Vajrasattva, entering here is just the same.
Wherever body, speech, and mind are present, in order to arouse enthusiasm through devotion there, all the Victors too perform miracles and bless the three doors.
And through completing the rites of yoga, in order to show to those to be trained, peaceful and wrathful, the individual signs,
the forms of body, speech, and mind, painted, hammered, or cast, should be arranged well, each in its own place.
All of these are the maṇḍalas of body, speech, and mind;
apart from this there is no other deity.
Where it is connected with empowerment, in order to bless through the sequence of fifteen,
in maṇḍalas of four and of eight, eighteen fathers and mothers should be placed.

In maṇḍalas of twelve and of sixteen, there should be forty-two.
In twenty or in twenty-five,
the extensive rite should be set out in order.
These may be cast, in relief, or sculpted, or they may be drawn or meditated upon.
This is the outer maṇḍala.

The maṇḍala of profound empowerment,
common and uncommon,
rests on four finger-widths or a finger's length;
it does not follow outer forms.
Seeing it, stabilizing it, and growing familiar with it arise in sequence through clarity.
Through the stages of the path of the lineage, it comes to be experienced to the end.
Through the stages of the means of empowerment, one should place confidence in the blessing and the pith instructions.
This is the maṇḍala of empowerment.
Likewise, on other occasions as well, in order to apply it to the common accumulation, the five elements, the cause, the self,
and space, purified and blessed, are cast out each in turn.
Through the application of one's own rite, whatever is undertaken will be accomplished.
This is explained as the accumulation of merit.
Further, so that the powerful yogin may accomplish directly whatever he wishes, there are the maṇḍala of deathless life,
the maṇḍala of signs and prognostication, the maṇḍala of nectar that destroys poison, the maṇḍala of miracles, of the vetāla, and the rest;
whatever is taught for the sake of whatever is to be accomplished, that itself is the maṇḍala of accomplishment.
Through the yoga of the deities of the four activities, on a ground in keeping with the family, with hearths bearing their respective marks,

it is explained as the maṇḍala of enlightened activity.
The master endowed with capacity and power, in order to stabilize it as the vajra body, measuring a krośa, a yojana, or the like, manifest and clear as body, speech, and mind, the domain of fortunate yogins, is explained as the maṇḍala of the gathering.
Next, what is further to be explained:
since by its nature as signs and concepts it obscures the meaning to be seen, the rite for purifying these is explained.
The things imputed by ordinary clinging, through realizing and meditating on the superior two truths, all of outer and inner, vessel and essence without exception, are burned within the state of body, speech, and mind.
The signs of the deities of the maṇḍala, in however many forms they abide,
are the very magical display of self-awareness;
the signs are purified within the state of the bindu.
The way the stages of the bindu appear is awakening mind without outer or inner;
all things and non-things are purified, and the fire of the awakening mind of self-awareness blazes in the ten directions and is gathered into the expanse.
When, through yoga made workable by familiarity, one undertakes to work for the benefit of others,
first, in order to purify the three misdeeds, undertake the sequence of the threefold ablution.
Through the maṇḍala that tames the vicious,
part them from obstacles and obstructors;
summon, bind, dissolve, and settle them at ease;
adorn them with protection, ointments, incense, and ornaments.
Having set out all the seeds of saṃsāra, through the dissolution of the rite of action and through the sequence of the maṇḍala's emanation and gathering, the seeds of saṃsāra should be purified.
At that time, set the lamps in their places,

and on each lamp the deities are to be placed with their heart essences complete; supplicate, grant permission, and generate them as heirs.
When entry, empowerment, and the rites are complete, the maṇḍala of the wrathful ones is likewise:
having performed the fire rites of the four activities,
to those purified, each in their own place, inseparable from the three deities and the host of concepts, make offering with fire offerings, songs, dances, and performance.
When all the activities of the rite are finished, gather it into the state of the great bindu.
Next, what is further to be explained
is the maṇḍala of the awakening mind:
all without exception is the awakening mind itself, and I shall explain it so that this may be realized.
All phenomena without exception and all maṇḍalas without exception do not abide as distinct divisions;
they are the very maṇḍala of the awakening mind.
Self-arisen, without high or low, body, speech, and mind, and body, voice, and mentation,
are the ground, root, and heart of all without exception, gathered in the self-arisen awakening mind.
That itself is self-aware luminosity, not a thing and not a non-thing, not both and not other than both,
free of all extremes, center, and parts, profound, vast, and expansive;
it is the domain of the Tathāgatas, and since it is not the domain of logicians, the awakening mind is the secret of secrets.
How wonderful, the marvelous, astonishing Dharma,
the secret of all the perfect buddhas:
from the unborn all is born, yet in being born there is no birth.
How wonderful, the marvelous, astonishing Dharma,
the secret of all the perfect buddhas:

from the unceasing all ceases, yet in ceasing there is no cessation.
How wonderful, the marvelous, astonishing Dharma,
the secret of all the perfect buddhas:
from the nonabiding all abides, yet in abiding there is no abiding.
How wonderful, the marvelous, astonishing Dharma,
the secret of all the perfect buddhas:
from the nonreferential all is referenced,
yet in referencing there is no reference.
How wonderful, the marvelous, astonishing Dharma,
the secret of all the perfect buddhas:
from no coming and going there is coming and going, yet in coming and going there is no coming and going.
The unborn awakening mind of awareness, nonexistent, yet with the nature of things, is the very essence of Vajrasattva.
In all outer and inner, vessel and essence without exception, together with the moving and the unmoving, it is the very maṇḍala of the self-arisen mind.
Its natural abiding, its realization, contemplating, referencing, and growing familiar,
the signs of body, speech, and mind, gods, asuras, and secret ones, piśācas, bhūtas, kinnaras, kumbhāṇḍas, pretas, and nāgas, all moving creatures without exception, plants, trees, branches, and fruits, and every excellence without exception, are the unfabricated deity of the ultimate meaning itself, without distinction in the awakening mind.
That they are taught elsewhere as "deities" is merely a verbal convention.
In the awakening mind, nondual, they are taught as one in the meaning that is realized.
Whatever is the nature of great compassion, because it does not meet with any meaning that abides, has become the abode of compassion for all without exception; compassion is the awakening mind.

Applied thoroughly to the meaning that is without contradiction, it is called the relative awakening mind.
All phenomena with forms, however many,
all that is taught as infinite, without exception, is the magical display of the awakening mind;
like a miracle in the sky, though various things appear, there is no thing.
However these may abide,
though they are nothing other than the awakening mind, because they are common objects they are explained as outer.
In the maṇḍala of the mudrā of one's own body, six self-arisen cakras abide.
The moving one is set in motion by yaṃ;
it abides in the bodies of all beings.
Having the nature of casting out and drawing in,
even in the age of degeneration bliss dawns.
The ripening triangle abides below, with the channel knots of the three liberations and the three bodies;
it blazes, causes the bindu to descend, and abides;
it ripens great bliss in one's own body.
The abode of bliss on which it relies, on the jewel grid of the buddhas, the short a, the heart, abides at the navel.
The channel that circulates, drips, and abides is connected with the path of the vajra central channel.
Having the essence that pervades and expands, it is endowed with thirty-two and two channel letters;
it is the abode of the heart of the dharma cakra.

The substance of the four channels and the eight branches, the support of the eight consciousnesses, refined and dregs, is to be known through the four that move.
The bindu itself, in which the refined essence is gathered, is drawn in by hūṃ, which relies on ā.
Having the nature of the five wisdoms, in bliss, the higher knowledges, and the nature of reality, it comes to arise, consummated in sequence.

Endowed with the bindu of the sixteen sound combinations, through its petals bearing the vowels, it has the nature of all sounds and languages without exception;
pervasive, it has the nature of speech.
Endowed with the ten classes, it is the path of arising, entering, and abiding;
through the stimulation of skillful means and wisdom, bliss will arise, without doubt.
In the maṇḍala of thirty-two,
the bindu, its expanse of equality, has become the cause from which all arises, and abides pervading all embodied beings.
It is the substance of all, the chief of all, gathering all without exception, nondual.
From the heart gathered at the crown of the head down to the soles of the feet and the secret place, it is held up by the pillars of body, speech, and mind.
The vessel, the essence, and the channels are the essence of its nature.
The mingled refined and dregs are separated by skillful means.
Moving, rising, aspiring, entering, abiding, and consummation:
born and transformed in a sequence of instants, through the power of the flavor in which the five elements are gathered, the five minds come to be known in sequence.
This itself is explained as threefold, applied according to the sequence of the occasion:
through the channels, the bindu, and bliss, it is explained in the manner of outer, inner, and secret.
Then, a daughter of the royal caste, the lordly caste, the brahmin caste, or the caṇḍāla caste, or a dancing girl, pleasing, in the bloom of youth, of great capacity and great passion, easy to instruct, her mind untroubled, of fitting body, her complexion half white and half red, sweet of voice, captivating the mind by her mindfulness;
with a maiden of eighteen, sixteen, fourteen,

or twelve years,
when the union is complete and the signs have arisen, through a union in which the ordinary is abandoned, from the five elements gathered in the secret empowerment, endowed with the thirteen millions and the two,
like the elixir that turns things to gold and like the dispeller of darkness, skillful means and wisdom are nondual, sun and moon meet at their tips,
the wheel at the tip where all is gathered.
Arising, entering, and abiding accompany the wind.
Through rising, ordinary consciousness ceases.
Through moving, experience itself becomes one-pointed.
Through aspiring, the minds mingle as one.
Entering is jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥste, consciousness entering into bliss.
Through abiding, it abides for a long time.
Through the dance method of consummate mingling, the teaching of the inexpressible bindu is marvelous.
When ordinary clinging has set, clinging is reversed and awareness dissolves, and swooning of consciousness and the like occur.
The pleasing, radiant mudrā consort:
seeing her brings bliss to body and mind, meeting her makes suffering decline, and intimacy with her brings stable bliss.
If she is practiced with skillful means, the conceptual clinging that is not overcome even by training for an eon is reversed, and one ripens into great bliss right now.
The yogin who wishes to stabilize what has been attained sees, hears, and dwells together with her;
through embrace, meeting, and practice, coemergent wisdom is born.
Because it is not the domain of those without empowerment, the ill-fated, and the lowly, who do not realize it, it is explained as "secret."
Next, what is further to be explained:

having consummated the samādhi of the stages, one should meditate on the maṇḍala of thirty, endowed with three groupings,
endowed with body, speech, and mind.
Where it has come under the sway of the extensive, endowed with the five families and the five wisdoms, from body, speech, mind, and qualities, one should meditate on the sequence of seventy.
One of little devotion who wishes to practice in secret uses the maṇḍala of a single grouping;
of ten or else of eighteen,
one should meditate on the final grouping.
Here one should meditate on the feast gathering, in which all maṇḍalas are gathered.
Where there is the maṇḍala for taming the vicious,
the sequence is the same:
the wrathful ones, the sequence transposed, should be meditated on merely so that the sequence is not mixed.
Through the gathering of the yogins' requisites, the gathering of maṇḍala, samādhi, and conduct, since all is gathered without exception, it is called a "gathering."
First, faith, diligence, samaya, view, and the rest go before,
and through consummating samādhi in sequence,
a yogin who has the capacity, fortunate, with equal measures of heat, or, if lacking that, accomplishes it by training in emanation and gathering.
In an utterly secluded and pleasing place, a mountain peak, a secret slope, or an island,
a charnel ground, a mountain hollow, or a forest edge, free of gatherings of people, in that place free of obstacles, since the yogin is like a king, one should construct a circular house adorned beautifully with precious and pleasing things, with outer, inner, and middle parts, together with a place for walking.

Yogins and yoginīs equal in number, complete in view, conduct, samādhi, and samaya, with the requisites of dance, performance, gathering, and emanation, the requisites of songs and sounds, the requisites of food and drink, and the requisites of ornaments and clothing,
joining the vowels and consonants in union,
are seated in the essence of the stacked sun and moon.
Because deities, humans, requisites, place, and conduct are all gathered, these are explained as the "gathering."
When skillful means and wisdom are joined, in the samādhi of the clear father and mother, all the endless Victors are summoned like rain from the sky;
upon the father and mother mingled nondually, empowerment, blessing, and ornaments are bestowed.
With the five nectars and the five meats, food and drink, the deity delights in the deity, all are satisfied with light, and many beings are to attain bliss.
Through the five dances, the five performances, the five steps and words, dance and performance, play, and utterance, the light rays of the families are clear in emanation and gathering, the outer and inner darkness of beings is dispelled, and one is trained from one vidyādhara ground to the next.
Through the five songs, the five words, and the five families, uttered while looking in each direction,
all beings attain bliss,
and the sound of the great conch of Dharma resounds.
The requisites of outer and inner ornament, precious crowns and earrings, bracelets, anklets, and necklaces, whatever adorns with clothing and ornaments, make samādhi pleasing and clear and make one worthy to be beheld by beings.
Endowed with the power of wind and capacity, the habitual tendencies of the three doors are exhausted;

through gaining mastery over the wind of blessing,
joining the vowels and consonants in union,
through joining at the time when the sixteen are complete, when the lord meets the one of passion,
when sun and moon rise at the same time,
all the capacities of the domains, common and uncommon, are reversed, and the defining character of the path of seeing itself is born.
For a month or a half month, at the junctures of time and so on,
the experience of great bliss is unbroken.
Through resting evenly in the meaning that has been seen, it becomes stable and certain, and one gains confidence.
The body is the great mudrā, great bliss, undefiled samādhi;
even for hundreds of thousands of eons great bliss is unbroken.
Through enjoyments emanated, the beings of many world systems are then joined to the expanse of beings.
From the time the vajra body is attained onward,

is the everlasting svastika, free of birth and death.
Through the twelve, the fourteen and the sixteen, the sacred family of mastery is accomplished.
Then, up to the sixteenth, within that very bindu of wisdom the bindu of wisdom itself appears, inconceivable, infinite, supreme.
Persons who enter gradually,
by first seeing the actual meaning, are to traverse the grounds in this very life;
in order to attain spontaneous accomplishment of all that is intended and done, through view, conduct and samādhi linked in sequence, they strive on the uninterrupted path.
However many stages of circumstance there may be,

ordinary people, those of wrong conduct, those of mere aspiration and the like are not its domain;
by attaining capacity and accomplishment one should link the secret with the path.
Abiding in the five great yogas, becoming stable stage by stage, one who attains the clear and unmoving is endowed with fearless strength;
like a lotus in the mud,
by abiding in the various kinds of conduct, the root is the yoga with elaboration;
practice abides in the gatherings of the appointed times, and the branches are taught as the conduct of the gathering.
As for why the maṇḍala is definitively taught:
self-awareness without edge or middle is the center;
the four wisdoms radiating in the manner of a wheel are the circle.
What transcends the world is itself the center;
the manifold world is explained as the retinue.
The very meaning of awareness is the center;
self-arisen miraculous displays are taught as the retinue.
Vajrasattva is the center;
the gods and goddesses of the four families, the wrathful males and wrathful females, are explained as the retinue.
The samādhi of the deity is the center;
conduct and implements are explained as the retinue.
Whatever is sealed by whatever,
through the force of habituation and growth, all phenomena, as they appear and resound, become the very essence of that.

This is the sixth chapter, the complete explanation of the maṇḍala, from the Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display (Māyājāla).

Then, what is further to be explained:
the perfect rite of empowerment, the ritual procedure that joins one to the grounds of skillful means,
I shall explain.
The great secret of all the Victors, the very ocean of all without remainder,

the universal form of all the Victors, in the assembly of the retinue, the ocean of wisdom, together with the natural maṇḍala, relying on the wisdom goddess,
through the empowerment of great wisdom,
the Lord of Secrets becomes the great Vajradhara.
By the lord of the ocean of wisdom, from the first ground up to the tenth,
in the maṇḍala of blazing samādhi, relying on the goddess of awareness, through empowerment by the river of samādhi, one advances through the grounds, the wisdoms, the buddhafields, and the stages of miraculous deeds.
Having attained the vajra body on the path of seeing,
for the yogin endowed with the experience of penetrating insight, in the maṇḍala of the experience of awareness, relying on the dhāraṇī through the dynamic power of awareness, one is joined to the undefiled vajra body.
The yogin who has attained stable awareness, for the yogin who has the karma and the good fortune, in the maṇḍala of the exalted image, relying on empowerment and blessing through the beautiful mudrā of an awareness consort, confers the empowerment of ritual means;
and through the instructions of the lineage of empowerment the yoga endowed with the experience of union is attained.
Wise with an ocean of wisdom, protecting beings with an ocean of compassion, having obtained samaya, empowerment and the warmth of awareness, and the empowerment handed down stage by stage through the lineage, skilled in the meaning of the profound intent, a seed able to withstand conditions, of great splendor, not confused about rites and activities, undistracted, with diligence free of interruption, like the lion, king of beasts,
of great splendor, never intimidated by others, possessing the power of gathered blessings, accomplishing the blessing of word and truth:

such a one should undertake the rite of empowerment.
One endowed with faith and samaya, with great compassion, eager to learn, perfect in diligence and wisdom, who for eons as many as the atoms of the realms has been well established in hearing, reflection and meditation, with an unchanging, steady intention, having abandoned ordinary thoughts, should regard the master as the Tathāgata, as the lord of taming, skilled in means.
That master, the buddha, in turn, should think of the disciple with compassion, as of a patient, abandoning faults, harshness and deceitful intent.
Those endowed each with their own capacity, with diligence able to accomplish the aims of self and others, fully endowed with the three disciplines, seeking for the sake of accomplishment, certain to belong to the family of the great secret, and not falling under the sway of others:
to them one should give empowerment and instructions.
On a mountainside or the like, rich in resources, where trees and flowers flourish,
a mountain fragrant with the scent of sandalwood,
a place of one's own control, free of obstacles, a mountain hermitage, a place of good qualities outer, inner and secret:
in such a hermitage where all is gathered without remainder, once it is found, there one should dwell.
For the person who has perfected the ten grounds, in a place of buddhafields without limit, the Victor, the great Vajradhara,
relying on the wisdom goddess,
through the instantaneous empowerment of wisdom, the eighteen qualities spontaneously present are spontaneously complete in that very instant, and one abides on the ground of the Lotus Eye and ripens on the ground of the Wheel of Syllables.

With great bliss that makes no division of self and other,
one's intent is impartial;
through a nature without increase or decrease, one benefits others like a wish-fulfilling jewel.
For the being who has attained the ground, habituated and stable, in the palace of the awareness of samādhi, the regent, the being who is lord of the frontiers, with an ageless goddess of awareness, beyond family, accomplished through the power of samādhi:
the disciple, relying on her with certainty, just as water is poured into water, through the empowerment of the blessing of samādhi, the empowerments free of any form arise by themselves as the empowerment of experience.
Through attainment, stability and habituation, in a hundred worlds, ten thousand, a hundred thousand and more, the aims of self and others are perfected;
since this depends on but a single instant, the regent is explained to be a king of Dharma.
For one who has entered the path, whose family has been determined and who has obtained the signs, the master who abides on the path near its end, over a krośa, a yojana and so on,
with the vajra measuring lines, joined and declared, makes the maṇḍala of mudrās arise vividly:
this is taught as the supreme manifold maṇḍala.
In the maṇḍala of a thousand buddhas that holds sway through manifold awareness, relying on a powerful maiden,
through the empowerment of means and samādhi,
one gains mastery over vajra life and comes to possess miraculous powers and higher knowledges.
First, the supreme child certain in family, endowed with every good quality, one of unchanging, stable lineage endowed with faith, diligence and discipline, is granted permission when the warmth is present and receives empowerment;

by the master who is like a king, in the exalted image endowed with blessing, the mind of faith, devotion, diligence and engagement abides in an irreversible and steady manner.
Crown ornament, diadem and garland, parasol, vase, food and drink, armor, mudrā and victory banner, and the empowerment by the five essences:
upon the way things abide by their nature and essence, through empowerment by substances, means and samādhi, the blessing of capacity becomes manifest, and one comes to belong to the vajra family of the Great Vehicle.

Then that fortunate disciple, reversing all ordinary perceptions, for the clarity in which each is made into the deity, matching the measure of capacity with experience, receives the empowerment of listening, of meditation, of holding, of performing enlightened activity, and the empowerment of the vajra king master.
For one who abides by nature and essence, like water placed in water,
through the empowerment of means and samādhi,
the measure is whether one lacks capacity or has attained it:
it is not conferred on one who lacks capacity;
it is conferred in stages on those who meet the measure.
The awareness consort, the action mudrā, aged sixteen or eighteen,
fragrant and endowed with good qualities:
in the non-duality of means and wisdom, in which the essence of all the Victors is gathered,
the channel wheel of vajra and lotus,
endowed with the taste of the five wisdoms,
the supreme vessel of means and wisdom, by dissolving into the tip in the manner of the three means, all the Victors of the three times, as Vajrasattva the size of a mustard seed, dissolving from tip to tip,

the three kinds of negative tendency are purified;
the very essence of channel, vital essence and bindu becomes clear like the light of a lamp, and the experience and signs of great bliss are attained:
they arise right now, without doubt.
One fully endowed with the vajra sun, who has well reached fourteen or sixteen, with the qualities of outer, inner and secret, having made the awareness consort a goddess through blessing, the very methods of generating passion are to be made manifest by one endowed with intelligence.
Then, when all the rites are complete, in order for the master to entrust them as non-dual,
having again performed the union of blessing, taking hold of the ring fingers of both,
and entrusting her well to this disciple, one should give the secret permission:
"This person you have taken is excellent.
From this day on, you, supreme child, by joining your three doors evenly as the deity, abandon the inferior, ordinary view!
By experiencing great bliss, abandon the view of the vehicle of austerities!
Through the non-duality of means and wisdom,
make the experience of bliss stable!
By meditating stably, without interruption, you will go to the ground of Vajradhara.
Therefore, O fortunate one of good family, never be separated from her!"
Through the means of union and samādhi, and by gaining mastery over the moving wind, there is no obstruction in the work of the bindu.
As many maṇḍalas of the Victors as there are atoms:

the bindu itself is where all of them gather without remainder.
The ground, too, is the thirteenth, endowed with both.
Relying on experience and joining non-dually, the bindu supported by the wind arises as one taste, simultaneous, neither forceful nor slow, neither the experience of contemplation nor clinging attachment.
The mind of the melting of the vowels and consonants (āli-kāli), the garland of buddhas, is without duality.
Vajra and lotus are vigorously stirred,
and from the mudrā of the embrace and the dance, when the tips of sun and moon meet and come together, the act is to hold the bindu of the wind, cut off its movement and press the bindu down, and set consciousness in the state of space.
According to greater or lesser faculties and wisdom, until it has become stable three times, or until it is attained, it should be given.
The vajra consort, beautiful as moonlight, avoiding those who are base or of bad family, untouched by the vajra organ,
not enjoyed while under another's control, of twelve, fourteen, or fifteen also:
by means, food and conduct, the rite of approach should be performed according to the scripture.
With the vajra tongue, the ring finger, an artificial ring finger and the like,
through the branches of means and anointing, the secret palace should be opened wide.
Having found the channel that overwhelms saṃsāra, join it fully with the longing lord.
When signs of the bindu, fast or slow, arise, hold its movement to the measure of the wind.
When sun and moon arise at one time, the great means that overwhelms saṃsāra:
by experiencing it, one attains the river-like samādhi.
If it parts from the channel, with phaṭ it will be emitted;

by equalizing the pure essence and the wind it will be held.
Know it by the hūṃ that reverses and draws up;
by the hūṃ of gathering it is bound and remains,
and the bindu pervades the body.
The first places the seed,
the second generates capacity, the third generates experience, the fourth makes that very thing stable, and the fifth, practicing with stability, accomplishes the supreme siddhi in this life.
The vajra master who has obtained permission, endowed with capacity, should undertake the rite of consecration.
Then the disciple should be admitted in the proper way.
Having imposed the samaya of the vows, free of all the faults of the three doors, one should give the stages of empowerment.
In order to stabilize the experience of empowerment, one should give the corresponding instructions.
Instructions, stable experience and the stages of the path:
the path brought to perfection is the result itself.
At the culmination of warmth, at the eighth ground, and at the pure grounds of the greatly renowned buddhas, through the signs of self-awareness and through compassion, the guiding powers appear as three ḍākinīs, of space, of sound and of form.
In the one known as the Lotus Woman (Padminī), union and songs appear,
and by stabilizing mere form one is liberated.
The root maṇḍala of empowerment is the uncontrived maṇḍala of the vajra expanse.
The maṇḍala of the wrathful ones is ancillary, for accomplishment and for taming the vicious.
First, having obtained the root empowerment, one should obtain the empowerment of the later maṇḍala.
For disciples, empowerment is firmly set according to their inclination; it is not fixed as merely common.

The first, second and third are the empowerments of Vajrasattva;
the fourth and the fifth are the maṇḍala of Heruka.

Those who do not please and honor the master who teaches the unmistaken path, blessed by the Victors of the three times, and who, without being granted empowerment and permission for each to engage according to their capacity, explain and listen to the secret, meditate on it, practice it and so on,
will not attain the result for countless tens of millions of eons, but will be born in the realms of hell.
Because they have scorned all the holy ones, many illnesses and sufferings, ḍākinīs and grahas will harm them,
and then they will surely die.
When the master endowed with blessing empowers and blesses through skillful means the supreme person, certain in family, fully endowed with faith, diligence and discipline,
the Victors, the ḍākinīs, and the accomplished male and female vidyādharas fulfill all one's wishes in this life, and one becomes the master of perfect blessing, empowerment and accomplishment.
When one is empowered in this way, ordinary clinging is purified, and having actually entered the path of great bliss, one is unhindered in any accomplishment;
whatever actions one undertakes are accomplished, and by enjoying the aims one desires, one perfects the stages of the ten grounds, attains the ground of the Lotus Eye, and abides on the ground of the Wheel of Syllables.

From body, speech, mind, qualities and activity,
the twenty-five are spontaneously present:
the result of empowerment dawns from within oneself.
Whoever is apart from this great means, though they seek the result with diligence for eons as many as the sands of the Ganges, will find the result they desire empty.
Because of the master, the disciple, and the maṇḍala, in their proper sequence, through action, samādhi and blessing, the rite of entry is explained as threefold.
The great secret of the body, speech and mind
of all the buddhas of the three times, the great path of the Net of Magical Display, the vast rite, complete without remainder, of the glorious Vajra Mirror:
according to the stages of entry, all the secrets should be known.
That very vajra master, beautiful in respectful attire, holding flowers, makes the wheel manifest, and by urging their body and speech the deities recall their samaya and turn their attention.
Into the maṇḍala of Vajrasattva, through the power of clarity and awareness, in order to bless the vajra disciple, the masters too should enter.
Then the disciple should be brought in:
bathed, dressed in fragrant fine clothes, with faith and respect, bearing jewels, with respectful and pleasing words, offering the body, abiding with a pure mind.
Through the practice of Amṛtakuṇḍalin one should dispel obstacles and provide protection.
Whatever the rite, generate the disciple as the deity, and take care that the signs are complete.
The five samayas of all the Victors and the three syllables of body, speech and mind should be given;

having made the vajra firm at the heart, the samaya should be properly imposed.
Water blessed with white and red sandalwood is given to drink three times, and the vessel is set down.
Then the disciples proclaim the pledge themselves and are made certain of the secret meaning.
Upon the deity with whom each is connected the jewel is cast, and it is examined.
Summoning that deity with mantra and mudrā, dissolving it, it abides inseparable;
so that the blessing may remain always,
the rite of firm stabilization should be performed.
Having removed the cataract of unknowing, one should take on the pride of the manifest wheel.
Then the purity of the deities and the maṇḍala should be shown in stages.
Then to the master, the buddha, one should offer whatever one has, without remainder.
Through the pure rite of blessing, offering to the maṇḍala and meditating, the qualities of having entered are inconceivable:
one becomes a vajra holder.
Therefore, for one certain in family, the stages of entry are shown first;
having obtained all the root and branch empowerments, one is empowered in proper order.
Then, receiving the command of the guru, one should practice to accomplish the accomplishment one desires.

This is the seventh chapter, the complete explanation of empowerment, from the Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display.

Then, what is further to be explained:
the unsurpassed vajra samaya, the firm vows that have been pledged:
these I shall explain well.
By all the buddhas of the three times, in the past, the future, all three times, it has been decreed like a royal law or an oath, decreed in stages as a curse:

its nature as blessing is hard to transgress, and it is explained as what all must guard.
For with regard to this great samaya blessed by the holy ones, the Victors of past, present and future with their heirs, the vidyādharas and the ḍākinīs, the gods and humans,
the nāgas, non-humans and hosts of bhūtas, even the great gods endowed with miraculous powers, by transgressing the sacred will be burned.
As for this very nature of the sacred:
persons who practice the intent of all the Victors according to the mere sound of the words will be burned by practicing it wrongly.
It is decreed by the holy ones,
and its blessing is naturally established as a curse:
whoever transgresses this sacred pledge, even one who holds the vajra, will be burned.
If, having obtained empowerment and blessing in the intent of the holy ones, one practices with certainty in the manner of the sacred,
all adverse factors will be burned.
Therefore the buddhas of the three times proclaimed it as samaya.
The unsurpassed samaya
is the self-aware mind of awakening, complete without remainder, free of edge and center, of going and coming,
the very nature of mind, without base or root.
Whoever realizes this meaning is transformed:
this is called the ultimate mind of awakening.
The unborn mind of awakening itself appears as the very nature of birth; one's own body is the mudrā of the Victor, and all that appears there is of one essence.

Clearly realizing the three doors to be like oneself is explained as the relative mind of awakening.
The one who explains the secret, confers empowerment, gives instructions and scriptural transmission, restores what is broken, bestows accomplishments supreme, common and the rest, and brings liberation,
is equal to the buddhas;
therefore do not let your devotion lapse for even an instant.
Being non-dual with one's own deity, the yogin clear in the four mudrās keeps the three doors in evenness, without interruption, like a river.
The secret of all the buddhas is the very secret of the Great Vehicle;
therefore to those who are not vessels, to the inferior and the like, to the perverse, the ten secrets and so on should not be spoken.
First, being of one life with the secret, and never parted from the essence of awakening, it would be easier to cut off one's own life oneself:
do not part from the samaya of love and devotion.
These are the root of the path and of practice, and the root of all accomplishments;
if these are impaired, all is impaired, and so they are taught as the root.
The branch samayas, common and uncommon, I shall now explain.
First, having received the secret scriptural transmission, until capacity becomes manifest, for the sake of oneself and others, in common ways, going beyond all contradiction, exaggeration and denial, and pleasing everyone's minds, not contravening the common samaya,

is explained to be the common samaya.
For the uncommon person,
the uncommon great means,

the five afflictions and the five conducts,
the five nectars and the five consciousnesses, the very dharmas of the five accomplishments, are the domain of the being whose family has been determined;
since they are not the domain of the common yogin, they are explained as uncommon.
From the very first until the signs are attained, with body and mind undistracted and one-pointed,
the root and branch samayas are to be taken up together with their forms.
When the ground is attained, habituated and perfected, and one abides in the meaning of samādhi, since the three doors no longer act contrary, in the samaya of continuous samādhi all the samayas of form are gathered without remainder.
When one rises from that meaning, there is compassion, and the root and branches are carried by their own momentum.
When one abides on the ground of a buddha, it is the samaya that cannot be transgressed:
like the moisture of the ocean, there is nothing to gain or abandon;
it is the samaya of wisdom that needs no guarding.
This samaya is most wondrous.
Until approach is accompanied by signs, one should guard the general samaya;
and when whatever practice one undertakes is to be accomplished, without the specific samaya of each ritual procedure it will not be accomplished.
In order to establish each person in the secret meaning through the samaya and austerity in which they delight, infinite kinds of samaya have been taught.
To the yogin who is a beginner the root and the common samayas are taught.
To the person who has relied on these and is endowed with experience, the uncommon samaya is taught.
To the fearless person of realization the samaya without transgression or impairment is taught.
To one who has attained the ground, habituated and perfected,

the samaya of continuous samādhi is taught.
Connected with all accomplishments and realizations, this samaya is the great vajra.
This samaya with its root and branches, blessed by all the buddhas:
whoever obtains it and guards it as sacred is said to accomplish it even with few good qualities.
All the ritual procedures for accomplishment, supreme, common and the rest, whatever rite, whatever samādhi, whatever practice it may be,
by striving greatly to keep it unimpaired will be swiftly accomplished.
If one is not blessed,
even Vajradhara himself would come to ruin.
Since the very qualities of all the Victors arise from the vajra samaya, whoever relies on this sacred pledge becomes like a wish-fulfilling jewel.
This sacred austerity to be guarded, of the body, speech, mind and branches of all the Victors of the three times, is not to be transgressed by anyone;
it is the very sacred abiding.
Persons of inferior karma and fortune, of inferior family and great laziness,
and of evil nature:
whatever fool transgresses it, turns his back on the two accomplishments,
and curses the holy ones,
having wronged all the buddhas, the king of vajra holders becomes wrathful and destroys him and his line for up to seven generations.
The ḍākinīs and vidyādharas and the hosts of fierce, flame-mouthed, raging and terrifying ones cut off his life at once, and he is born in the realms of hell.

Even if that world is destroyed,
he will be born in another world, and until space is destroyed or the outer ocean runs dry, he will be freed elsewhere never at all.
Abandoning the holy guru, quarreling with vajra brothers and sisters, not remembering the mind of awakening itself, neglecting mantra and mudrā, explaining the secret to those who are not vessels, and denigrating the secret meaning:
for these one will experience suffering here too, and the instant one ceases, immediately, without even a body of the intermediate state, one will be born in the vajra hell.
The dharmas to be guarded and imposed, the root together with the branches, connected with the common empowerment and forming the common, general domain:
these are to be guarded in common,
and this is the outer samaya.
The mind joining means and wisdom, the stages of the path of the five minds of the bindu:
when awareness is clear without remainder,
the non-dual bindu arises in experience.
By transforming the essence of the bindu of bliss, the six collections, self-appearing, become companions of the bindu.
Since all is blessed by the bindu,
everything is clear as the mudrā of great bliss.
The bindu of awareness is not to be released outward.
Through the bliss of the union of the wheels, ordinary bliss is transformed into the faculties.
The intent and conduct of the Victors are experienced through means, and ordinary clinging is reversed.
For one endowed with means, the meaning is the secret meaning:
the five maṇḍalas of light of one's own heart, by the stages of arising and setting, like the secret bindu of the great means, once known, abide as nothing to abandon.

The five self-arisen essences that abide appear as the meaning of one's own body, the support;
by the ways in which they pervade and move, they abide as both refined and dregs.
The concepts of one's own body, refined and dregs, with their colors, limbs and lesser limbs, are known as the five wisdoms of bliss and are taught to be great bliss itself.
Born from the essence of the five elements, they are entirely the nature of the bindu;
endowed with the taste of the five wisdoms,
they are truly taught to be the five Victors.
Means and wisdom, vajra and bell, the luminosity of the stages of sun and moon:
when the five minds become clear in space, the supported and the support are non-dual,
and coemergent wisdom appears.
What is not retained is taken up by the vajra tongue.
All the concepts of the two are blessed as the single taste of great bliss.
The mind of bliss, not parted even for an instant, abides firmly, unparted throughout the three times.
Through the recitation of wind and bindu,
everything is clear as the mudrā of great bliss.
Great bliss comes through means and experience;
it is not reached by speech and words.
Through the bliss of the meeting of the two in union, the ordinary is exhausted and one is joined to great bliss.
What no one is able to give,
one now experiences directly by one's own capacity.
This meaning, which for others is false, is shown through means, directly, as true.
In order to abandon ordinary clinging, it is free of misdeed and of shame.
At the times of arising, capacity and abiding,

the five natures are accomplished as a matter of course.
From each of one's own channels and essences, the nectar abides inseparably.
The five elements, the faculties, form and so on,
through the blessing of union endowed with means, are known as coemergent great bliss.
Sun and moon held by the wind:
from the essence free of signs, through the great means free of clinging,
from the coemergent nature,
being filled with the taste of the five wisdoms, all are accomplished as the five Victors.
This is the great samaya of the nature of outer, inner and secret.
The samayas, infinite in kind, in the most condensed form are of two kinds;
in the middling form, they are to be known as five root samayas and ten branches.
The most extensive samayas number three hundred and sixty in general:
luminosity, the nature itself,
the appearance of one's own maṇḍala, the supreme Victors of the four times, perfection in evenness, with nothing to accomplish, the samaya of abiding in spontaneous bliss, utterly pure awakening free of apprehended and apprehender, the samaya of holding the meaning once realized, the samaya of abiding in the mind, the samaya uncontrived from the very beginning, the samaya of the complete purity of the conditioned, the samaya of the inseparability of phenomena, the samaya of fearlessness in all things, the samaya of the svastika that increases life, and that in which there is nothing at all to guard:

these are the samayas of the view.
The samaya of uniting with all, the samaya of liberating all without remainder,

the samaya of taking what is not given,
the samaya of speaking falsehood, the samaya of enjoying all things, and the samaya of enjoying the sacred substances:
these are the samayas of conduct.
The three kinds of samaya of practice are:
the samaya of the vajra birthplace, the samaya of the power of the place that guides, the samaya that shows the path,
the samaya that brings full realization, the samaya of transforming awakening, the samaya of mastery over all,
and the samaya of the power of the vidyādhara state:
these are the samayas of realizing what is to be accomplished.
The samaya of the mother, rich in the expanse, the samaya of joining means itself with wisdom, and likewise of joining wisdom with means,
the samaya of overpowering the majesty of the elephant, the samaya of letting nothing be wasted, the samaya of protecting all,
and the samaya of the mudrā of samādhi:
these are the samayas of the means of practice.
The samaya of the gathering offering, the samaya of the gathering maṇḍala, the samaya of the gathering activities,
and the samaya of satisfying the piśācīs:
these are the samayas of the activities of practice.
The samaya of showing the true meaning, the samaya of the infinite supreme speech, the samaya of meeting all languages, the samaya of meeting without letters,
the samaya renowned throughout the three-thousandfold world, the samaya of the supreme speech of wisdom, the samaya of the inconceivable vajra speech, and the samaya of the unchanging vajra:
these are the samayas to be known by oneself.

The four samayas of samādhi on what is to be known:
the samaya of space that illuminates, the samaya of earth that supports,
the samaya of fire that burns, the samaya of water that stirs, and the samaya of the great one that scatters:
these are the samayas of the five wisdoms;
and the samayas of the five aggregates are the samayas of the five supreme means.
The samaya of phenomena as reflections, the samaya of knowing them as like sound, the samaya of knowing them as like scent, the samaya of knowing them as like taste, and the samaya of knowing them as like touch:
these are the samayas of non-duality.
The samaya of the five colors,
the samaya of the five directions, and the samaya of the five empowerments:
these three are the samayas that pervade generally.
The samaya of the very state of bliss, the samaya of spontaneously present wisdom, the samaya of the fearless supreme Victor, the samaya of spontaneous perfection in evenness, the samaya of the inseparability of directions and times, the samaya of one's own maṇḍala, the samaya of faultlessness in the Dharma, the samaya beyond expression and beyond elaboration, the samaya of the non-duality of directions and times, the samaya of the non-dual mind of awakening, the samaya of the unconditioned, the samaya of sealing all,
and the samaya of obstructing nothing:
these are the samayas of the samādhi of essence.
The five to be accomplished are taught:
the samaya of the wheel of Dharma, the samaya of the source of jewels, the samaya of the lotus free of attachment, the samaya of accomplishing all aims, the samaya of the terrifying vajra, the samaya of the body of suchness, and the samaya of being endowed with all riches:

these are explained as the seven samayas of body.
Showing the true meaning and the rest,
the eight samayas of speech themselves, are to be known as complete within oneself;
they are to be accomplished by guarding the result.
The samaya of mastery of self-awareness, the samaya of the utter purity of the great and supreme,
the samaya of natural luminosity, the samaya that binds awakening, and the samaya of mastery over all,
six in all, are explained as the samayas of mind.
The samaya of arraying the fields of awakening, the samaya of the abode where wisdom dwells, the samaya of showing the celestial palace, the samaya of transforming all the manifold, the samaya of possessing the inexhaustible treasure, the samaya of inexhaustible practice, and the samaya of the great inexhaustible treasure:
these are explained as the seven samayas of qualities.
The samaya of blessing all,
the samaya of cutting down the hosts of Māra, and the samaya of acting for the benefit of sentient beings are explained as the three samayas of activity.
The samaya of the vajra of abandoning, the samaya of the wisdom of desire, the samaya of great delusion, the samaya of great jealousy, the samaya of pride as supreme bliss, and the samaya of the five afflictions:
these are the samayas of not abandoning.
What is guarded, never distracted at all:
the samaya of the five equalities, the samaya of the inseparability of the truths, the samaya of uniting body, speech and mind, the samaya of completing the five paths, the samaya of uniting all in bliss, the samaya of the vajra that crushes the perverse, the samaya of overpowering saṃsāra, the samaya of the uncontrived and spontaneously present, and the samaya of union in the bliss of the bindu:

these are the samayas of continually guarding the view.
The samaya of continually meditating in samādhi, the samaya of binding the mudrās, the samaya of recitation with melodious sound, the samaya of evenness of the three doors, and the samaya of union with wisdom in bliss:
these are the samayas of continuous samādhi.
The samaya of overpowering conventions, the samaya of ease and richness in one's conduct, the samaya of the direct leap of awareness, the samaya of the uncontrived pure place, and the samaya of the self-arisen, free of place:
these are the means of guarding that abide all at once.
The samaya that generates all,
the samaya that joins the six continua, the samaya that satisfies through realization, the samaya of pervasive space, and the samaya of accomplishing the benefit of others as a matter of course:
these teach the greatness of samaya.
The great hells and the ordinary hells, pretas, animals, rākṣasas, yakṣas, womb-spirits, the flame-mouthed and flame-tongued, gods, asuras, Rudra, Brahmā and the rest, saṃsāra:
these are taught as the births that are the penalty.
This is the great samaya of guarding.
If one realizes the meaning of emptiness,
there is no such thing as restoring or impairing;
it has passed beyond the domain of penalties.
It is the domain of only a few persons.

If a root samaya is impaired, before a hundred gurus and companions one should make a hundred thousand confessions, perform seventy million recitations, offer seven hundred thousand tormas, and perform one million one hundred thousand fire offerings.
Then one should take it again,
or remain once the guru has given permission.
If that object of confession is not present,

or if three years or more have passed,
or if, on seeing the manner of confession, thoughts of faithlessness and craving arise, it has passed beyond the limit of restoration.
Even confessing for eighty thousand great eons, one will not be purified;
in what is called the Vajra Hell one experiences unbearable suffering, and for as long as space endures one whirls about like a wheel of weapons.
If a branch samaya is impaired, one should keep silence for seven months, perform one thousand and eight fire offerings, recitation to the measure of ten million and one hundred thousand, and offer ten thousand tormas.
Then one should take it again,
and proclaim oneself pure and cleansed.
Teaching and explaining the secret to one who is not a pure vessel, transgressing the command without having obtained empowerment, going beyond the word of the Sugatas, proclaiming the secret at full measure to one who is not a qualified vessel, and, without practicing the secret oneself, spreading it to everyone out of vanity:
such is a person who has gone beyond all limits.
Because he shows contempt for all the buddhas, the buddhas of the three times, enraged, destroy him down to the seventh generation.

When guru and companions, father and mother, relatives and friends, king and ministers, and the king's subjects turn hostile without any fault, this is explained as a sign that samaya has been impaired.
Obstacles arising to the profound, practice not bringing about what is desired, the protecting deities growing negligent, and disgrace arising without any wrongdoing are explained as signs that samaya has been impaired.
When, having first received the guru's transmission, one's own awareness senses no impairment, wishes for happiness and well-being are fulfilled, and the particular aims of oneself and others are accomplished as before, like a wish-fulfilling jewel, and praise is received,
these are the signs of being unimpaired and meaningful.
Such a one is a king, a lord of yogins.
Even if signs of being unimpaired arise, quickly undertake the rite of restoration and repair.
If it is impaired yet there are no signs and all appears well, that is not right:
one's own seed has been burnt, happiness is used up, and one suffers forever.
If, when signs of being unimpaired arise, one quickly restores it, former habitual tendencies will be exhausted.
This is the eighth chapter, explaining samaya without exception, from the Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display.

Next, what is to be rightly explained:
for all the varieties of accomplishment, supreme, common, and so on,
I shall explain the ritual procedures of the manuals in brief.
From all the kings of tantras without exception, those who have entered through devotion to the common,
by unbroken training in the common requisites, samādhi, mantra, and mudrā,

and by bringing signs and power to completion, accomplish whatever they aim at:
this is the contaminated, common accomplishment.
I shall explain what is other than that.
When a yogin of the supreme obtains empowerment, samaya, and samādhi in the stages of outer, inner, and secret, he attains the irreversible, stable yoga.
From seeing onward, on the path of meditation the family is not fixed;
whatever samādhi he cultivates is without obstruction.
In this very life he gains mastery and is free from fear, and then attains the nature of the five kāyas.
Because the one endowed with the supreme attains the supreme through the supreme,
the supreme accomplishment is not common.
One who has gained faith, samaya, wisdom, diligence, discipline, and patience, who is dependable and loving, complete in empowerment, who knows the practice and the application of the path, who has mastered his mind and is irreversible and steadfast, and who has gained experience and gladly takes it up:
such a person, alone, or in groups of five or three,
in mountains, in hidden mountain hollows, on river islands, in ravines and rock fortresses, in charnel grounds, mountain caves, and at river confluences, in places pleasing, auspicious, and delightful, completes the rite and its blessing.
Whatever rite of activity there may be, performed by oneself or by another,
is endowed with one's own mastery and perfect auspiciousness.
Through completing the preliminaries of samaya, empowerment, and view, whether one has first attained the three yogas or is simply one whose mind is steady from the start, whatever the mind focuses upon is itself linked with rite and samādhi, according to each one's own ritual manual.

Ordinariness, laziness, and doubt are overcome by the power of faith;
if one is not endowed with these,
it does not succeed even for one who has attained the grounds, so what need to speak of ordinary persons?
If one performs the rite of summoning, oneself is the powerful and fierce wrathful one,
deep red, the color of smoke.
Abiding as above, what radiates and gathers is nothing but nooses and hooks.
With steady focus, having gained the signs, until it becomes manifest, recite one's own mantra, and at its end,
"so-and-so jaḥ hūṃ."
Enemies, obstructors, gods, and dhāraṇī holders, even if endowed with power and miraculous ability, are summoned helpless like ordinary beings.
If its purposes
are not quickly accomplished, until they are well accomplished, the skilled one should bind whoever it may be.
Through speech, method, and samādhi it will be accomplished, without any doubt.
Upon the tongue of oneself, vivid as the powerful fierce one, imagine the wheel of magnetizing, with nine arranged, bearing the three syllables.
Its light fills the realm of space like molten ruby;
whoever it dissolves into comes under one's power.
Declaring the truth, bind them with speech.
Or else, just as someone long desires the substance to which he is attached, make a pledge to fulfill his wish,
and with the samādhi of pleasing taming, attend to him with pleasing means.
If he wishes to go and stray away, threaten, bind, and torment him with the powerful fierce mudrā.

Having captivated his mind with pleasing means, like people gathered and enthralled by musicians and conjurers, parted from their tasks by such means,
he will remain without parting.
Through the power of stable samādhi, view that sentient being, whoever it may be,
as bound by various wrathful males and females with light and blazing mudrās and remaining before you.
Pleasing, threatening, and at last the substances:
through stable samādhi these certainly succeed.
If things are certainly produced from nothing, and the eight adverse ones and the rest are certainly accomplished, what need to mention bringing under control beings who exist and appear?
If one performs the rite of healing,
the rite is twofold, accomplished by undertaking it.
Having continually generated oneself, and absorbed all empowerments and blessings, in a crystal vase in front generate from the heart the goddess of water.
The Victors of the ten directions become her,
and the goddess melts into light in the vase.
Imagine disease and suffering purified.
Milk of a reddish-yellow cow, medicines, jewels, incense, and grains, and the ingredients of the nectar essence are consecrated with the mantra of Māmakī:
oṃ māmakī sarba paba duru duru svāhā
A body afflicted with disease and suffering, when washed with it, will doubtlessly be restored to health.
Oneself, endowed with the bliss of discipline, having first completed the preliminaries, in a hermitage, a remote and utterly solitary place, an uninjured, undecayed, properly qualified great corpse from the charnel ground, bearing the marks, having performed all the washing, anointing, and fumigation, whether it is male, female, or otherwise, that rite will surely be accomplished.

Having placed it well in the center of a clean maṇḍala, oneself vivid as any wrathful one whatever, summon even Brahmā or Śakra (Indra) with one's own mantra, the life-essence, and jaḥ, and bring them down with the four mudrās.
If trembling and laughter, weeping and terrifying sounds occur, display the samaya mudrā.
Give it the oath-water, bind it under oath, and dispatch it to whatever task one wishes.
If, being worldly, one falls into doubt, one will be devoured by it, will faint, and will oneself die at once.
When one with stable samādhi practices without interruption, becoming lustrous and lovely is the first sign;
a sweet fragrance and a glow is the second;
uttering sounds of joy is the third;
brilliance and splendor are the reviving of its vigor.
If hri comes from the mouth of the great corpse, cut it off with the vajra teeth of samādhi.
If the vetāla is struck, it turns to gold.
When that is cut, the sword of the tongue is armor and weapon nothing can withstand;
since it defeats even the armies of the asuras, what need to mention powerful heroes?
In its five sense faculties lie the accomplishments of the five superknowledges.
If the skilled one practices according to his own ritual manual, it will be accomplished.
If one washes and anoints the beautiful corpse of a maiden of seventeen or eighteen, adorns it well with ornaments and garments, and then, into that fragrant one with pure faculties, oneself through the yoga of the powerful fierce one summons and binds with mantra and mudrā a goddess, either of wisdom or of the world, lovely and blazing with light, one should dissolve her in until signs appear.

Fragrance, sound, and light, trembling, stirring, and laughter are explained to be the first signs.
The deity's presence and speech are the second;
actually rising up is the full measure.
Then bind her by pledge and oath and bring her under control.
If, when she is awakened for union, she displays great miracles and turns perverse, with the great pride of the powerful fierce one bring her under control and overwhelm her.
If one enjoys play with them in passion, in an instant one gains the four miraculous powers:
abiding without birth or death, blazing entirely with great bliss, and traveling to all realms are accomplished without hindrance.
Having sought out and obtained the corpse of a child, clean, unwounded, lovely, and fine, purify it and anoint it with nectar and scents, anoint it well with dahūmata, and bind it with a five-colored dhāraṇī cord.
Summon Brahmā, Śakra,
or any goddess with the heart mantra, continually dissolve them in with the four mudrās, and, vividly meditating on oneself as any wrathful one, Hayagrīva or Yamāntaka and the rest, summon forcefully and dissolve them in.
When the signs arise and culminate in manifestation, it will speak of good and ill.
If it trembles and does not speak, empower its tongue skillfully with the light of oṃ and with amṛta, while Hayagrīva threatens it with laughter;

it will doubtless speak well.
If one performs the secret rite, the yogin who has gained clarity and stability,
at a charnel ground, a solitary tree, a crossroads, or a place where gods and demons manifestly dwell, should imagine oneself as Dveṣavajra, smoky black, blazing with light, eyes glaring, weapons blazing like fire, with emanations raging like a rainstorm.
In front, a homa pit a cubit in size, triangular, smeared with charnel charcoal and human blood.
Inside it, place the liṅga and the five nectars, made with the cause of attachment, the heat, and a support to which the consciousness clings.
Have messengers summon the target with name and clan, dissolve it in, and bind it with mudrā.
With a fierce kīla made of iron or of black wood, strike the three places.
With the fierce hriḥ ṣṭīḥ from right and left,
burn it with a wrathful mind;
burning fierce thorny wood within it at midnight, naked,
even a god will be destroyed.
If one performs the rite of separation, meditate on oneself as Yamāntaka, fearsome, vicious, savage, and proud, utterly terrifying and menacing.
At the hour fearsome by daylight and at midnight fearsome with darkness, draw whoever it is and wrap it up, and entrust it to the two, the gods and the asuras.
Let it be driven by that toward the quarter of the wind.
Imagine emanated messengers waging battle, fighting and quarrelling in every way;

between them a hawk and a crow fight.
If one imagines fire, water, and wind blowing upon them, whoever they are, whoever they may be,
they will part and fall to fighting.
In order to drive away kings, brahmins, and ministers, and the vicious and harmful kinds,
so that they cannot remain, meditate on oneself as Aparacitta in a fierce and wrathful manner.
Beneath any enemy or obstructor draw the wind seed syllable, and on top mount them, with their name and clan.
Imagine vividly that the one to be tamed, present before one, rides upon the camel of Vāyudevī, led and driven on by endless emanated messengers, and imagine him led into the presence of Yama.
If by this even one without breath, in a faint, is forcibly driven elsewhere,
what need to mention one who is alive?
If one wishes to defeat an enemy army, meditate thoroughly on oneself as the protector Acala, just as he abides.
Having drawn his image as well,
bless it there with the rite, and over a sword of seven kinds of iron, twelve finger-widths in measure, together with the heart mantra, recite the mantra seven hundred thousand times and more, clearly, until those signs arise.
When there is light, sound, and trembling of the earth, and the sword gives forth a cry, drawing it turns back the battle, and brandishing it puts the army to flight.
If one wishes oneself to be victorious and great, having become clear and stable, visualize oneself vividly as Dveṣavajra, and write the name and clan on charnel-ground cloth.
Summon and dissolve in with mantra and mudrā, and when certain and stable omens appear, press it down with the feet of Heruka, threaten it with the fierce laughter of Hayagrīva, overpower it with the garuḍa-wing mudrā, enclose it in a box with oneself and a dog, and expel it.

Press it beneath one's own threshold, or else press it beneath oneself.
With the crossed-vajra mudrā press down from above and declare the truth:
one will become their king.
If a poor person wishes to find treasure, one who is trained in the rite visualizes the special deity of the five families, and imagines each one's hand emblem, the size of a mustard seed, until it is seen with the senses, reciting the mantra and declaring the truth.
When the sign is stable and clear, go toward the direction where it lies.
Through the power of truth, samādhi, and mantra, whether it rests, speaks, or is seen,
the tiny emblem will fall there.
Then one meets with the treasure and is freed from all poverty.
Then, if the vajra yogin wishes to have the eye of superknowledge, oneself, a yogin of the deity,
in an utterly solitary place, with the five kinds of eyes and the fat of the seventh,
their rendered fat together with soot,

should be mixed with magical milk.
Practice with the vajra pra divination for seven days.
When experiences and the signs of warmth are attained, anoint the eyes well with it, along with the mantra:
in an instant one sees with superknowledge the ten directions together with the trichiliocosm.
In order to examine the mindstreams of persons, to reverse clinging through fierce suffering, and to bring about mental happiness through the various pure realms, accomplish superknowledge well by means of the signs.

One who wishes to attain swift-footedness, having meditated on oneself as the special deity and attained stability without interruption, should sit upon a moon disk.
From yaṃ comes a wind maṇḍala that travels a hundred yojanas in an instant.
By imagining oneself abiding on it, without distraction, just as the wind pervades, one will traverse many hundreds of yojanas in a mere instant.
If one wishes to go to the level of a vidyādhara by means of the four miraculous powers, having first attained the pure meaning, when the mudrā has become clear,
on a moon in the space liṅga, from hūṃ a vajra, by the threefold rite, one gradually gains mastery of stability.
Relying on the mudrā of the refined essence, relying on the wind together with the vajra and the moon, one gains the ground of traveling to whatever realm is fitting:
the vajra vidyādhara
accomplishes the activity of the pure realms.
On a moon in the space before one, transform oṃ by way of the rite.
By the stable wheel, with moon and wind, the body abiding through the power of the refined essence, the Tathāgata vidyādhara travels to the various realms and should accomplish his own wishes.
On a moon in the expanse of space, by the rite of what arises from traṃ, the jewel together with wind and moon,
by the force of intense samādhi that moves it, with refined body and mind, one travels to all the pure realms and one's special intention will be accomplished.

At the center of the maṇḍala of space, meditate on a moon together with a lotus.
From hriḥ, the mind of supreme Dharma in manifold forms, clear and stable, its power displayed by the wind: whatever refined body and mind there may be travels to the realms, and its wishes are accomplished.
At the center of the expanse of space, meditate on it together with the various consonants.
From a or ha, train in oneself as the action mudrā.
Once stable, by the power of the refined wind, whatever realm one has in mind, the wish one desires will be accomplished.
Through this the elements have no power over one;
having gained mastery over the deathless wind, overpowering through the four miracles, and taming the vicious through superknowledge, there is not a single rite that is not accomplished.
Then, further, there is the stage for those with passion:
those of lesser fortune, those exhausted by union, and ascetics who long for the goal of bliss;
these are to be set in the goal by skillful means.
When the bodily mass endowed with method possesses the method of its own particular rite, the manifold dance methods of great bliss accomplish it with the taste of magical display.
Great bliss is the abode of enjoyment and of Dharma;
the bindu of emanation is the taste of bliss.
Through the nature of the five spaces in their entirety, one's own body, abiding unaltered, is itself bliss.
Having obtained the discipline of the three bindus, through Tārā and the bindu, the place, the method, and samādhi, arising from what the method indicates,

in which all the eighty particulars are gathered,
the various rites of accomplishment succeed.
Through one's own support together with the bindu, the nature of the refined essence pervades and abides;
through the union of method that stirs it, all is set in motion and drawn back.
Having mastered, through the bindu of wind,
the refined and the dregs, the moving and the unmoving, the very bindu that spreads and drips is bound by the wind.
The bindu that has degenerated into dregs, for one endowed with the power of method and the wind's essence, is like water on a lotus.
From the nature of the self-arisen bindu, the support, the outflows and the dregs, the root and seed of saṃsāra, and the bindu of wrong conception together with clinging are destroyed by the self-arisen bindu of space.
In one's own body, the essence of great bliss, like sky and clouds, inseparable, refined and dregs are the very nature of bliss.
The bindu, as with water and milk, through the power of the abiding wind and the support, separate the refined from the dregs and dissolve the refined.
All conceptions of outer and inner things appearing as light in one's own heart and body, by the propelling force of the wheels of wind and the rest, train so that they do not remain there.
Wherever there are seeds together with dregs, through the blazing of the five wisdoms of space, the mind that moves about wherever it goes is instantly destroyed.
Together with wind, channels, and bindu, endowed with the taste that method stirs, all being of the nature of bindu, and wholly freed from adverse clinging,
the bindu of one's own mind together with its support, endowed with the intelligence of refined wisdom, all-pervading, the essence that is the source of bliss, opens the treasure-mine of secret awareness.

The outer and inner movements, together with the bindu, blaze as bliss from the heart, and as a sign great bliss blazes in one's own body.
Striking the precious channel of superknowledge, awareness dawns as the five superknowledges.
Then the unchanging channel of emptiness dissolves into the changeless, all-illuminating wind.
The special method, which the inferior cannot accomplish:
by the descent and riding of the secret bindu, by the power of linking channels, essence, and samādhi, the force of many eons is halted, and it is accomplished as the wind of refined wisdom.
Reaching the end without going anywhere comes from the power of familiarity with great bliss.
The bindu in which the five essences gather is that great bliss in which the five tastes mingle; through the distinction of meditation and perfection, great bliss abides as the supreme family.
Next, what is to be spoken of:
one who has the discipline complete in all that is profound, whose faculties are in their prime and ripened,
a passionate one able to hold sun and moon, endowed with the crown wheel of the bindu and the power of the secret Akaniṣṭha, abides in this very well-endowed support.
Having gained mastery of the special methods and play, and of samādhi and the wind, at the time when the four elements are separated from their dregs and refined, through the dance method in which sun and moon mingle, whoever sports together with the goddesses by means of the methods of play draws in all the essence of the lotus, in which the eighty-two particulars gather.

The power of the bindu of the five heroes, whose very nature is to radiate without staying, should be bound, held, and made to remain by the yogin who possesses method.
Through the meeting of the tips with it and reversing the two,
the sprout of bliss is nurtured;
free from all ordinary clinging, whatever arises together with thought, through the experiences of separating refined from dregs, the dregs, the habitual tendencies together with clinging, cannot remain, through its power.
Through the power of the secret bindu, attachment to all base kinds and all memory and thought are defeated, and the outer and inner, the whole container and its contents, as the nature of the coemergent, are all called to witness, and victory is won.
In the essence of vajra and lotus, through the nature of joyful play,
the taste in which method and wisdom are clear, when the Victors of the ten directions gather, that great treasure of undefiled qualities is accomplished from the power of the secret method:

the taste of the bindu, the essence of great bliss.
Through mastery of bringing down, holding, and reversing, when whatever is in the three channels dissolves, one obtains uninterrupted bliss, the superknowledge of omniscience, and a life without birth or death, and abides in the unchanging dharmakāya bindu in the manner of one who has abandoned movement.
Through the immeasurable miracles of great bliss one purifies the secret realms and turns the secret wheel of Dharma.
With the experience of great bliss and the dance of joy, with manifold sounds of passion,

to the very limits of space
one sings manifold songs, beautiful, in a manner free of shame;
with the one red in color and moist,
through manifold ways of play, with the vajra, the great essence, together with the moon, one unites with the essence of the lotus together with the sun of passion, and in the dance of embrace with the light of joy, one utters the heart of the wind and brings the sprout of existence to cessation.
This is the ninth chapter, explaining accomplishment without exception, from the great Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display.

Next, further, what is to be explained:
in all the kings of ritual manuals the stages of the activity rites are clearly taught as four.
First is the nature of pacifying;
after that, enriching, for the sake of increase;
through increase, magnetizing;
and, to liberate those who will not come under control, the wrathful:
thus the common and special qualities are complete.
Unconfused about the rites to be performed, with the nature of stable power,
one should undertake them in their proper order.
White snowy slopes and pleasant hillsides are for pacifying;
trees, flower groves,
and fruit-laden places are of the nature of enriching.
Three-way junctions and deep ravines are explained as places for magnetizing.
Charnel grounds, solitary places, crossroads, and places where bhūtas gather are auspicious for the wrathful.
For pacifying, a white base, round, in three tiers, with oṃ, together with a wheel of white light:
such is the nature of the pacifying hearth.

For enriching, yellow, with sandalwood, square, in three tiers, with traṃ, together with radiating rays of jewel light:
this is taught as the enriching hearth.
For magnetizing, red earth with the light of passion, half-moon shaped like a bow, marked with a lotus,
in three tiers, with hrī:
this is the hearth for magnetizing.
For the wrathful, black earth with charnel charcoal, triangular, raised up with a three-pronged vajra, with skull garlands and black light, in three tiers, with hūṃ:
this is the arrangement of the wrathful hearth.
Milky trees, golden trees, trees of passion, and thorny trees are explained as the kindling and firewood for each of the four activities.
The liṅgas are of their respective colors, and their placement too matches the four hearth pits.
White butter, white rice, white sesame, white barley, cooked grain, milk, and yogurt, silver powder, and white tormas are explained as the substances for pacifying fire offerings and tormas.
Aged butter, molasses, and honey, rice and cooked grains with realgar,
golden flowers and sandalwood, gold powder and yellow tormas:
these are the substances of enriching,
and glory and splendor will increase.
Pungent butter and sour beer,
rambu, lotus, and rakta,
red rice, sandalwood, copper powder,
and red tormas are the substances for magnetizing.
Human fat, butter, and the three pungents, elephant flesh and blood, cooked beans, the three poisons, great ash, pungent butter, mustard seed, the three powders, human blood, and tormas interspersed with name and clan are explained as the wrathful substances for liberation.

For those of silver or of white wood, with knotted head and rounded point, arrange the peaceful deities on the sides, and plant them while vividly visualizing oneself as the Tathāgata.
For those of gold or of yellow wood, with knotted head and square point, meditate on the enriching deities on the sides, and plant them with the pride of the Jewel.
For those of copper, coral, or red wood, with knotted head and crescent point, arrange the magnetizing deities on the sides, and plant them while vividly visualizing oneself as Rāgavajra.
For those of iron or of black wood, with knotted head and three-edged point, arrange the wrathful deities on the sides, and plant them while vividly visualizing oneself as Dveṣavajra.
From oṃ, traṃ, hri, and hūṃ, upon the sequence of the five elements, clearly visualized, generated from e vaṃ mā ya bhruṃ, generate the palaces, round, square, half-moon, and triangular in shape as appropriate, in colors according to their own manner.
Upon the seats of their respective seed syllables, by the rite of radiating and gathering the four lights, generate the principal of each of the four activities according to the activity, with a large retinue resembling the principal.
The hand emblems, each one's heart symbol, are the marks that indicate the four activities;
the colors are explained as distinguished by activity.
Empowered and adorned by the families of the four activities, with the radiating and gathering of the light of the four activities, having generated them clearly through the rite, complete the activity with invitation, dissolution, and so on.
By means of the four rites and samādhis, practice one-pointed samādhi on the four activities.
If, by one-pointed focus on whatever is aimed at,

all the rites of the four activities are accomplished without exception, what need to mention minor rites?
Facing east,
with a clear mind, unmoving, seated in the full cross-legged posture, pacify the savage and vicious.
Facing south,
one-pointed in the perception of joy, seated in the jewel posture, increase glory and splendor.
Facing west,
one-pointed in passion and longing, seated in the lotus posture, bring everything under control.
Facing north,
gnashing the teeth with a wrathful mind,
in the tortoise and wrestler stances, liberate the vicious and set them on the path.
As for the sequence of the respective mantras:
perform the pacifying rite in the morning, and do the enriching at midday;
evening is the time for magnetizing, and the wrathful should be done at midnight.
By practicing at the four times of night and day, the four activities will certainly be accomplished.
oṃ so-and-so śīntaṃ kuru svāhā. svā so-and-so puṣṭiṃ kuru svāhā. hrī so-and-so paśaṃ kuru svāhā. hūṃ so-and-so māraya phaṭ.
The places of the liṅga, too, take the shapes of the four activities.
Summon, and plant the four kīlas, and the pellets, or the remainder chopped up, offer into the mouths of the respective deities.
The tip pacifies, the branches enrich,
the trunk is for magnetizing, the root for the wrathful.
Bitter, sweet, sour, and pungent woods, and likewise the offerings of taste.
Taking fire from the houses of one of good lineage, of a king, of a prostitute, and of a butcher, set down the goat-born one appropriate to the rite.

From the four seed syllables, in order, come Pāvaka, the Mighty One,
the Splendid One, and the Destroyer, these four,
their body colors distinguished by the four activities, with the gundhe flask, a box, a noose, and a trident, and in the left hand a rosary, their heads blessed by the four families for the four activities.
Having completed the invitation, offering, and feast, in the belly, in a palace arising from bhruṃ, generate the deity corresponding to the rite,

according to the procedure of each one's own ritual manual.
By performing the rite with fire offering and dance, there is no doubt that anything at all will be accomplished.
In order to pacify such as these,
the angry and the proud, and those tormented by suffering, malice, and illness,
one undertakes the pacifying rite.
Short life, many illnesses, poverty of glory and wealth, dangers and fears:
when refined and dregs are exhausted and dissolve into the essence, the indestructible bindu in which the essences gather ceases into the state of the bindu of emptiness.
Through gaining mastery over the moving wind, and superknowledge free of arising, perishing, and attaining, great bliss is itself the wisdom of space,
the vajra bindu without change or destruction.
By joining whatever there is from above and below, the palaces of body, speech, and mind blaze with great bliss, like the oil in sesame seeds, for as long as sun and moon endure.
The descending bindu, in the form of the moon, is to be sealed and held by the wind;
pushed up from below and drawn up from above, it abides, pervading everything with great bliss.

Nonconceptual clarity brought to perfection, like a lion cub or the full moon:
through the union of method and samādhi, in the great wisdom of bliss, all qualities abide complete.
The passionate and those lacking discipline, with their bodies, memories and thoughts, and habitual tendencies, whether of the family or not,
together with all their three doors:
these are disciples of the upper door, and are tamed by it.
Having first obtained the secret stage and trained in the practices of wind and bindu, the taste of great bliss, of bodhicitta, whatever appears in the manner of the five minds, through the very experiences of movement, attainment, and stability, the body, together with outer and inner memories and thoughts, arises as having the very form of space.
Together with body and appearances, indivisible like the reaches of space,
the bindu of great bliss abides with a.
The bindu bearing the pattern of emptiness becomes manifest through the movement of clear knowing.
Urged from below and pressed from above, one enters the method of mixing refined and dregs.
The door of yaṃ, possessing the wind of bliss, is pushed upward by the application of movement;
that which moves, having the essence of wind, is drawn downward by way of the hero's path.
The wind in which awareness-wisdom abides dissolves into the expanse of emptiness, of space.
When outer and inner movement is cut off, awareness abides in the state of bindu.
Signs of bliss will arise:
trembling, sweating, hair standing on end, sounds, bodily bliss, running about, laughter, fainting, and so on. Whatever arises, perform the rite of stabilizing and refining.

If adverse and wrong phenomena are detected, through the rite of the stages of method, expelling grahas, fumigating, and suppressing should be examined as is fitting.
Clearly entering without interruption into the experience of the bindu in one's own body, transforming ordinary clinging,
ripening the lordship of bliss, pacifying memory, thought, the mindstream, and so on,
pervading with the increase of great bliss, bringing everything under control through the yoga of wind and bliss, and memory and thought abiding in the state of a:
this is the inner stage.
Next, what is to be explained is the secret.
From the union of method and wisdom arise the four secret activities, in order to turn back ascetics and ordinary people from the common path.
One who clings to desire, whose faculties are ripe, together with a qualified consort, in the hermitage of great bliss, the abode of the bindu, has all the special qualities complete.
The nature of nondual embrace is the source from which great bliss arises.
The expansive secret bhaga, possessing the power and blessing of pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, and wrathful activity in due manner, abides in the manner of the secret bindu.
Whatever secret fire offering is offered into the secret hearth of the lotus, not in years or months
but swiftly, becomes a body of great bliss.
The refined and dregs, the essences and imprints arising from method and wisdom, together with the fluids of sun and moon, are the substances of the secret offering of great bliss.

Torment and the lack of bliss, clinging and thought, these very attachments:
upon one's own liṅga itself, by striking the four secret kīlas, complete,
into the secret object, in coemergent samādhi
the four activities are complete without being sought.
The manner of play and the two bindus, the channels of the lotus and the vajra essence, whatever the experiences and manners of union, are to be examined at the time of secret union.
The ways the channels abide differ in color, shape, and so on.
By offering all the offering substances together with sun and moon into the hearth with the two ladles, it will descend as the great bindu.
For those who delight in the secret meaning, who practice the discipline of awareness, whose faculties are vigorous and ripe, who are devoted to the meaning of the bindu, and who are trained in wind and essence, all yogins, male and female,
whose minds still have memory and thought:
for the sake of such disciples this has been explained.
Those who are skilled in method, endowed with empowerment and samaya, diligent in method and union, having gained mastery of joining the tips of sun and moon, through the dance method of mastered holding and reversing, the meaning of the coemergent nature of things arises clearly in the manner of the five minds.
Through the miraculous power of riding sun and moon, and through mastery of the moving wind, from the essence in which the four elements gather, the nonconceptual bindu of great bliss appears manifestly, here and now, through method.
Whatever a master lacking method, without empowerment and lineage, teaches by words and reasoning to those without fortune and inferior in karma, like setting a base-born man upon the throne, ruins himself, destroys others, and brings destruction.

Where the secret bindu itself has given rise to experience on the five secret paths, in the maṇḍala of undefiled bliss, relying on the three ḍākinīs, the immeasurably vast wisdom bindu gradually reaches its final abode.
Whoever, through acquaintance and familiarity with this,
with movement dissolving into the bindu, memory and thought clear as space,
and great bliss ripened beforehand, is joined to the deathless ground of buddhahood,
is freed from all fears,
is blessed by the hosts of goddesses, displays manifold play and sport, with method and wisdom nondual, beholds the face of complete enjoyment, and, connected through the vajra empowerment, pleases the supreme assembly of the Wheel of Syllables.
To the very limit of space,
with undefiled wisdom of great bliss, blessed with an ocean of wisdom,
immeasurable like space,
one becomes the very essence of all the Victors.
This is the tenth chapter, explaining limitless activity, from the Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display.

Then, what is further to be explained:
for those who delight in the secret path, the uncommon secret path
I shall explain in its stages.
A person of great faith and great discipline, whose family is certain in the Great Vehicle, endowed with compassion, empowerment and samaya, diligent in practice,

with body, wealth and livelihood, with children, wife and kingdom,
first pleases the guru,
and, skilled in means, receives what is desired.
The whole of the outer and inner, the vessel and its contents, is the self-appearance of self-arisen wisdom;
in the manner of being neither one nor many,
the two truths are nondual and inseparably linked.
Through blessing, scripture and reasoning, self-arisen wisdom manifestly appears.
The self-abiding wheel is inconceivable, not the domain of dialecticians.
Through great method arisen from method, for increase, for joy and bliss, and for wealth, one should strive in the activity of enriching.
To bring under control the mighty, those of great splendor, kṣatriyas, ministers, brahmins,
and the malicious,
one undertakes the magnetizing activity of summoning.
For enemies, obstructors and other savage ones whom nothing is able to tame, in order to torment them and transform their perception, one undertakes the wrathful activity of liberation.
With regard to any object whatever,
first pacify what is adverse;
then increase good qualities;
then apply that very one to the activity of magnetizing.
If it does not come under control, torment it wrathfully and liberate it.
Since it might fall into wrong destinies, hurl it with phaṭ to the abode of Akaniṣṭha.
It will certainly be accomplished, without doubt.
First, by means of the preliminary rites, examine the difference between being capable and incapable.
Then capability is obtained, and then, having obtained the prowess of bliss, unobstructed activity is accomplished.

By training and growing familiar with the undefiled path, the four miracles and the four activities, those to be tamed, the realms, power and might,
and the potency of blessing become distinctively exalted.
By attaining at the culmination the realm of the five kāyas, like water and its waves, the source and its display, because it is the essence of immeasurable qualities, this is spontaneously accomplished activity.
Karma, afflictions, harmful beings, suffering and thoughts, however many there may be,
through rite, method and samādhi are pacified into lucid stillness.
Through the splendor of jewel-like pride, glory and wealth increase,
one is endowed with life, youth and strength, and one's qualities equal the limits of space.
Through the samādhi of Rāgavajra, the vajra of desire, Māra, the malicious, kings, the Lord of the Gods (Indra), rākṣasas, ḍākinīs, and even Vajrapāṇi come under control.
Through the samādhi of Dveṣavajra, the vajra of aversion, endowed with rite, substances and mantra, if even the vajra of the dharmakāya would be destroyed, what need is there to speak of others?
One's own body is the expanse of all great bliss.
Skilled in the method of the bindu of one's own body, one with the power of familiarity in the yoga of the winds, abiding within the inner maṇḍala, through experiences the four activities become clear, and they transform in their proper sequence;
what becomes manifestly clear to oneself becomes actual through stable capability.
The very palace of the cakras, and none other, is what is explained as the place where the winds stay, enter, are held, dissolve and abide.

The dharma cakra is the celestial palace.
In the center of its four channels and eight branches, e vaṃ ma ya are the shapes of the four activities, their colors predominating according to the activity.
Habitual tendencies, seeds, dregs, thoughts and the substances of ordinary clinging abide as four unchanging experiences.
By the bindu these are pacified;
by the bindu one's body, outer and inner, is enriched;
wind and bindu, together with thoughts, are brought under control by capability;
by the bindu, in the unfabricated state of space, the life-wind gathered together with the bindu dissolves into the state of a.
Movement is clarified and agitation suppressed;
one should abide in the unchanging expanse.
From one's own body, the essence of method, the four cakras, fire and wind, being made workable by the moving wind,
the wisdom of space is clear in every way.
With mind-stream and body enriched by the bindu, one gains mastery of great bliss, free of clinging attachment.
Whatever is stirred by the application of samādhi, the signs and capabilities of the stages arise.
Colors, numbers and essences, shapes, measures, the pervasion of the bindu,
and so forth, limitless:
the manner of their presence is just like that.
In the hearth of the four cakras, by stirring the activity of the Caṇḍālī fire, the clear essence and the dregs, and the habitual tendencies of thought, are offered to the indestructible bindu.
All movements, outer and inner,
are the self-arisen wheel, the supreme bindu.
All the common domains of experience, because outer forms are taken as the path,

are explained as the common outer path.
That very thing inwardly, the channels and cakras, and the bindu generating experience within:
this sequence is explained as inner.
Those who, though empowered and trained, have not realized it, the ill-fated and those whose family is severed, are not its domain; being hidden, it is called secret.
First, the intelligent person, regarding all as the indivisible truths, through the reasoning that knows the nature of things, sees in the aggregates, elements and sense sources the meaning of the nonduality of method and wisdom:
primordially complete buddhahood itself.
That itself is unborn in the three times.
For one who realizes on the basis of it, all the branches of the path are complete, and the ten grounds are complete without being set out in stages.
Since all qualities arise by themselves, nothing whatsoever is left out, and it is itself the fruit of completing the two accumulations.
This is the domain of those of instantaneous faculties.
Whoever, in understanding and inclination, has little realization and delights in signs should train in the gradual yoga in special sessions of common meditation.
First, all things outer and inner, vessel and contents, are not objectified in their own place, unfabricated, not removed, not dwelt upon;
not examining any thing at all,
not conceptualizing even that itself, with no grasping, thought or clinging remaining, in the manner in which there is neither thinking nor anything thought, self and other, outer and inner, all without exception, not established as the essence of anything, through the practice of not dwelling on anything at all,
the essence nonconceptual in its own place:
meditate on it in an unfabricated way.

If movements of signs arise like turbidity in water, by resting in the unfabricated nature, all is nonconceptual suchness;
by resting in the nature, it becomes pure.
Just as, when the sky becomes clear, the clouds too clear away by themselves, whatever arises and is noticed, all memories and thoughts, are of the nature of empty dharmatā.

When the whole of appearance and existence is the nature of mind, without outer or inner,
and when that very thing, as the nature of emptiness, has been made familiar and one's capability is stable, that yoga of suchness
is the yoga of great emptiness.
The activities of the three doors unfabricated, unexamined, nonconceptual, dwelling on nothing:
this, being one-pointed yoga,
is the conduct that has abandoned activity.
Then, when one rises from that,
like an illusion, the moon in water, a mirage, a rainbow, foam or a water bubble, though things appear, they do not abide as entities.
All awareness, outer and inner,
is nothing but appearance, the magical display of emptiness.
All is the essence of awareness, and that too, like the nature of an illusion, one should meditate on without clinging attachment.
The magical display of the illusion of wisdom, though it self-appears as an immeasurable essence, is the self-appearing miracle of blessing;
toward the lesser ones who do not realize it thus,
because it dawns as self-arisen compassion, it is the yoga of great compassion.
Whatever beings there may be, beholding them with great compassion,

by way of manifold deeds, conduct is limitless, as many as they are,
showing only what accords with their benefit.
Ordinary ways and skillful means, through body, speech and mind, as befits each one:
conduct that becomes of benefit is inconceivable.
Where there is no pervading love and compassion, it is yoga in name only;
the family of the Great Vehicle is severed, and one has fallen into the lesser family.
The nature of mind, which is without root, is the root of all phenomena.
Like the indivisible regions of space, all is free of independent existence;
its essence is neither true nor false.
Phenomena are mere names, without substance.
To be stable in this way in the three doors is the conduct of great compassion.
Then, the very nature of illusion, awareness whose nature is nondual, meditate on clearly as the syllable hūṃ.
The entire outer and inner, vessel and contents, through radiating and gathering, should be made clear as hūṃ.
From the gathering of that many atoms, view the bindu as unobjectifiable emptiness.
From ma and a come the seats of sun and moon;
what is pressed between them, together with hūṃ, should be made clear.
Each one's own speech, too, is without contradiction.
The essence pressed between them is the hand emblem;
the body whose nature is subtle radiating and gathering meditate on as clear and free of flaws.
Then, each having reached its full measure, the great mudrā of the family itself, peaceful or wrathful as the occasion requires, should be meditated on as is fitting.
Either with one face and two arms, or meditate on three faces and six arms.

In one place, three places or five places, meditate on the limb deities complete.
Having grown familiar, dissolve them, and all domains of experience should be clearly visualized in that way.
To meditate on the deity of a single root is the yoga of the single mudrā.
By striving greatly in meditation with the three doors, one passes beyond distracting religious activities.
It is the conduct that is the root of all,
and is called the conduct of a single focus.
Then the conceptual branches, both of them, as method and wisdom, having been visualized, should be meditated on in that way.
The three syllables radiating light, or else the five wisdoms themselves, should be placed in one place, as the heart essence.
Likewise, the principal lord and lady, the male and female sattvas, and the male and female wrathful ones, meditate on as the retinue;
and know this for mind and mental objects too.
Faces and arms and the number of deities:
when the clusters are elaborated, it is with elaboration.
From body, speech, mind, qualities and activity,
meditate on five clusters, together with the wrathful ones.
Or else, with three clusters
endowed with body, speech and mind, meditate on the male and female wrathful ones as the retinue.
The lord of the family, the supreme of mind, together with the host of wrathful ones:
by way of devotion and application, meditate on the deities of a single cluster.
The master who abides on the path close to its end, with maṇḍalas of a krośa, a yojana and so forth, merely by casting the vajra measuring lines, has the mudrā maṇḍala in its clarity;
this is declared the supreme manifold maṇḍala.
First is the maṇḍala of a krośa,

then the maṇḍala of a yojana;
in the inconceivable expanse of space meditate on the manifold maṇḍalas of the buddhas.
Then, endowed with the five requisites, with people in harmony in samādhi, devotion and conduct, just enough in number to match,
one should accomplish the desired aim as a cluster.
With method and wisdom joined,
males and females gathered in equal number, endowed with an assembly of gathered requisites, build a circular house in a solitary place.
Each one, visualized as method or wisdom, enjoying the requisites,
by means of vajra songs, dances and movements, for six sets of thirty days, or twelve, fourteen or sixteen, one gains mastery over life and attains the undefiled.
Then, by sixteen hundred,
the five kāyas become spontaneously accomplished.
The coming together of all friendly people is called the gathering of the yogic assembly.
The completeness of the enjoyments of wealth is explained as the gathering of blissful enjoyments.
Because all gods and oath-bound ones assemble, it is declared the gathering of the great assembly.
Because no conduct at all is grasped,
and because it continually completes the two accumulations, it is definitively explained as the great gathering.
By completing the uninterrupted path, the awareness-being cannot be overcome.
Though wearing the guise of gods and humans, he gains mastery over the miracles of the five elements.
Through pure realms and enjoyments, he joins in evenness, higher and ever higher.
The body of a vajra vidyādhara abides in all realms.
If, through the force of clinging to signs,

the power of realization becomes weak, then even if the mudrā of awakening, the vajra body,
the major and minor marks and so forth, appear manifestly in that guise, one does not see peace, suchness itself.
The consorts with whom one is joined,
on the common path and on both occasions, by the greater or lesser distinctions of their capacity, are explained according to the four activities.
A white one, short in stature and loud of voice, her face and body fair, her topknot coiling to the right, her limbs slender and soft, her voice clear, heavy of breath: with her one performs pacifying.
One with many companions and limbs, slender, lithe and tall,
her face and body yellow and squarely built,
with pendulous flesh and full breasts:
these should be taken at the time of increase.
One whose face is lotus-colored, broad of shoulder, with long brows, her upper and lower body in proportion,
her body, fluids and breath fragrant, endowed with bliss, her limbs not prominent:
she becomes supreme for drawing in.
A black one, triangular, with bristling hair, with wrathful frowns and a childlike body, fierce, harsh of speech and without restraint, free of notions of clean and unclean, is explained as for killing.
One who has attained stable capability, training in these from ground to ground, is the holy awareness-being,
endowed with the transmission of the stages of yoga, master of the unborn evenness, who has brought everything to full clarity.
Because self-aware wisdom is the meaning of tantra, one who has actualized self-appearing awareness is the supreme vidyādhara, spontaneously accomplished.

Even if he lacks the might of samādhi's capability, he is a sattva who trains through the grounds, with nothing to be produced;
sharing one domain with the Sugatas themselves, he has obtained the transmission of the awareness-being.
If the body of elements perishes, viewing himself, his three doors, as the deity, he is freed from the body amassed from the elements and ripens into the great mudrā of samādhi.
Like a garuḍa chick freed from its shell, the whole supreme mudrā of illusion:
that is what is called "matured." Defilements exhausted, a vajra body, from then on free of the qualities of change and destruction;
having obtained the transmission of great bliss, he is free of the qualities of defiled training.
An emanation body with mastery over realms, the enjoyments of his samādhi immeasurable:
whoever's capability from practice is stable becomes a vajra body, indestructible.
Free of the five destructions, defilements exhausted, having gained power over the three masteries, with immeasurable bliss and enjoyment, he acts for the benefit of beings for countless eons, and through seeing he is likewise of the nondual family.
The regent, the being who trains through the grounds:
the whole of the outer and inner, vessel and contents, is immeasurable like space,
beyond the stream of thoughts of edge and center.
Free of fear, relieved, gone beyond sorrow, seeing the faces of immeasurable self-appearance, he is free of any object to look at elsewhere.
The might of familiarity with the awareness of samādhi passes beyond the domain of wretched signs.
Mastering thousands of worlds, of the family of the nondual great mudrā, just as space has no limit,
through the prowess and power of meditation and capability, into the thicket of habitual tendencies and signs the fire of samādhi-awareness has broken out.

Whoever, in boundless, immeasurable realms, has trained through samādhi-awareness, and through meditation and samādhi-awareness has obtained the prophecy of Vajradhara, is the vidyādhara of the great mudrā.
Then, the prowess of awareness perfected, through the play of the wisdom goddesses, he is the consummate awareness-being;
gaining mastery over ten million realms,
the very son of Vajradhara, having obtained all empowerments and miracles, he pervades with his realization to the limits of space.
Through the distinctions of meditative equipoise and post-meditation, he receives the prophecy of the Victors and abides by their command.
Though he moves through all the pure realms, and though he acts within the wondrous secret nature, through the nature of the view he does not see directionless space, and so reaches culmination through empowerment and realization.
Empowerment, samaya and discipline:
first, having brought the training to completion, one who wishes to perfect the bindu applies himself to the inner secret meaning.
Having completed the common activities, the body together with its domains of experience, and the whole of deity yoga,
one should view as the very bindu of great bliss.
By uniting deity and bliss in evenness, appearance sinks into the bindu as bliss.
The four kāyas, the maṇḍala, the elements and the bindu, by uniting them in evenness as the five pure essences, through their essence and through conditions,
the stages of method are known from arousal.
Experiencing the bindu of bliss is nonconceptual bliss without parts.
The indestructible bindu, the self of all,

bearing the pattern joined with emptiness, free of all ordinary activity, is taught as conduct itself.
Through the nature of the melting bindu, the bliss of dripping, blazing, dissolving and filling, the thirteen grounds too are adorned with bliss.
The bindu seeps through the whole body;
as a sesame seed is pervaded by its oil,
it is filled with an all-pervading taste.
Like light and its essence, without exception, appearance and existence are the great bindu itself, clear as pervaded by great bliss.
The bindu in which all is gathered is the essence of the five elements mingled;
the indestructible bindu, the elixir of bliss, sealing all with bliss,
the wisdom of space is clear in every way.
It is the realization of the Victors of the three times:
since a single bindu pervades all,
great bliss and compassion swirl together as one.
That is the mudrā of great bliss, explained as the single inner mudrā.
Since that becomes truly workable, together with the bindu of great bliss, in all eighty particulars without exception, bodies radiate in each separate bindu, with the five elements and the taste of wisdom;
the seed bindus are adorned with bliss;
the nonconceptual bindu is the sound of supreme mind.
One's own body having ripened, they radiate as appearance.
From whatever to whatever they radiate, so far extends the mudrā of the bindu;
the bindus of bliss are beyond number.
The five wisdoms and body, speech and mind, being pervaded by one indivisible taste, having completed countless accumulations of great bliss, all appears as the mudrā of bliss.

Whatever is sealed by that ripens into the bindu of great bliss.
Forms, outer and inner, with their dregs, ripen into the essence of the bindu of great bliss.
Passing beyond the body of the dregs of the elements,
a body of essence without interruption, since the bindu fills the lowest vessel, all ripens into great bliss.
Then, endowed with method and samādhi and with the power of guiding the winds, one enters the bindu of the precious transmission.
Ripening in an instant into the five clairvoyances, one becomes free of the classes of beings.
The bindu dissolves into the indestructible a;
one obtains the wind without exit or entry, abides in a body without change or destruction, in bliss itself without increase or decrease.
Appearance becomes the bindu itself;
the bindu dissolves into the short a: nondual bliss free of parts.
This is undefiled, self-arisen, great bliss itself, free of conditions,
like fire and its heat,
or the ocean and its moisture.

Over wind, bindu and awareness, over life, wealth and the elements, and over all five sense pleasures, one gains mastery.
The great mudrā of bliss is the wholly undefiled bindu, the boundless bindu of awareness itself.
When the defilements of the dregs and the winds are exhausted, samādhi is clear as the bindu of great bliss.
Since awareness is clear as the taste of great bliss, whatever is seen is the mudrā of great bliss itself.
Like domains of experience transformed through union, or as darkness is transformed, or poison into elixir,

the boundless pure realms become the great mudrā of great bliss.
For those persons who have meditated, ordinary things and covetous attachments, all the elaborations of forms, without meditation and without deliberate effort, are spontaneously accomplished as the bindu of great bliss.
Like water and its waves, or like the perception of having reached the ocean, through familiarity the clarity of great bliss reaches its culmination.
All conditions and harms, even through touch, sight, hearing and recollection, blaze in experience as the bindu of great bliss.
Remaining for many eons, one accomplishes the mingling of the five elements and all domains of experience into the bliss of one's own body.
If one trains in the secret path, through the illustrative bliss of awareness one realizes coemergent joy, and the stages of the path are accomplished to the end.
The yogin whose faculties are in their prime and passionate, devoted to great bliss,
abiding in e and vaṃ:
awakening arises from vajra and bell.
Through the coemergent substance, having realized all as bliss,
through the rite of outer and inner union, when one is endowed with the signs, possessing the four secret mudrās, one should play in supreme great bliss.
With the sun and moon of wisdom joined in evenness, the bindu that cuts off hope and fear arises.
Without falling, abiding and dissolving, from the meeting of the lord and the yearning one,
like a light free of day and night,
when sun and moon rise at the same time,
and all becomes pervaded by bliss,

the unmoving bindu dawns.
If signs of decline appear,
through method, experience and play, one should train in the proper sequence.
The bindu of sun and moon mingled,
of method and wisdom nondual, coemergence itself, free of substance, is the mudrā of all the Victors.
When abiding in coemergence, since all is the one taste of great bliss, one abides as the single mudrā of great bliss.
The very bindu of vajra and lotus,
with channels numbering twice thirteen million, by the dance of sun and moon mingled,
in each palace of bliss,
when it radiates to fill them with bindu, body, speech and mind and the five wisdoms are sealed with the taste of experience.
Having perfected the bliss of the body, one should abide in the bliss of awareness, which is beyond cause, condition and dependent origination.
If it declines, then by thinking, by looking, listening and so forth, one should meditate without interruption.
Since awareness ripens as bliss, the three doors ripen into great bliss.
The domains of experience, together with winds and bindu:
by mastering the method of familiarization, one masters the bindu and the winds,
together with support and supported,
and is able to bring under control goddesses, human women, yakṣiṇīs and ḍākinīs.
One masters lowering, holding,
reversing and spreading the bindu.
If it is emitted into space,
one is parted from the path of accomplishment.
From then on, apart from offering and bestowing capability on one's own proper occasions, the bindu does not fall elsewhere,

and one should train in the path of mastery.
When the bliss of sun and moon mingled dissolves into the undefiled essence, it self-appears as the bliss of mind, and the bliss of mind is uninterrupted.
When one is free of the force of what illuminates, all is the mudrā of great bliss, body and mind abiding in evenness, beyond measure, bounds, expanse and taste.
The play of immeasurable bliss is the great delight of all the buddhas:
the bindu, the seed, free of defilement, the experience of great bliss unceasing.
Since one experiences oneself as the bindu, one is never parted from the bindu of the essence.
Subtle, free of dust, without stain, the vajra bindu is the bell itself, self-appearing without effort, abiding as an essence with neither parting nor attaining.
Where it flourishes richly with hosts of qualities, arising from a stream like a flowing river of great bliss, the two accumulations are complete and self and other spontaneously accomplished.
It is not elsewhere: it is only one's own appearance.
Because the nature abides, nothing comes from elsewhere.
By reversing clinging, I see my own face myself.
This is the eleventh chapter, explaining all the special features of the path, from the Great Tantra of the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display.

Then, what is further to be explained:
that which is to be accomplished by all, the great qualities, as numerous as the atoms of all the ten directions, I shall explain.
The nature of the five culminations, though it abides as realization and as fruit, seeing, familiarization and accomplishment are rightly explained as common fruits.

As for the truly consummate fruit, arisen from great method,
it is the precious wish-fulfilling jewel, spontaneously complete with immeasurable qualities, beyond measure and reference, inconceivable and spontaneously accomplished.
Immeasurable like the limits of space, the wisdom of omniscience has become the treasure of all that is supreme,
a jewel without depletion or increase,
abiding equally in all.
The nature of all the buddhas,
beyond the measure of bounds and expanse:
whatever appears, pure or impure, has no accepting or rejecting and no partiality at all.
In the self-arisen luminous maṇḍal all is of a single nature; through the measureless blessing of compassion it fulfills all wishes.
Self-arisen wisdom, spontaneously present, being the essence of all phenomena, though it self-appears everywhere, without direction, has no clinging and no deliberate intent.
The fruits of all the vehicles, with their grounds, paths and so forth, though each is a culmination relative to its own,
are not equal to the great and supreme spontaneous presence.
The immeasurable qualities of buddhahood, spontaneously complete in a single instant:
the lord of the family, great Vajradhara, through the play of the wisdom goddess, manifestly attains the bliss of sun and moon and establishes beings on the ground of Vajradhara.
Of all the immeasurable Victors, because the beings to be tamed are limitless, body, speech and mind are likewise limitless,

and their modes of presence appear immeasurably.
Spontaneously complete in great qualities, the nature of the sixth buddha, with marks reaching to the limits of space, abides with the wisdom of great bliss expanding.
Like the moon made full by the sixteenth day, wisdom itself, complete in all,
free of all the faults of the limited grounds, abides as the very self of all qualities.
Throughout the limitless buddha realms,
to the very limits of space,
for as long as beings to be tamed, as numerous as atoms, remain, it abides without meeting or parting for an instant.
The great bindu in which the essences gather is the undefiled bindu of bliss, joined in bliss with ā, present in an all-pervading way.
The channels of the eighty particular bindus, the taste of the secret bindu of gathered essences, are transformed within the unborn evenness, and by way of filling all,
the limitless realms of the ten directions, being of one taste in the undefiled bindu, are suchness itself, having the form of space.
The element-bindu in which the four kāyas gather, possessing the essence in which the five pure essences gather,
is the unchanging essence in which the three gather.
The forty-two, filled with bliss, opened by the taste of the bindu, immeasurable body, speech, qualities and mind,
are an inconceivable self-appearance:
the mudrā of the bindu is inconceivable.
All the outer and inner essences and dregs are the self-arisen bindu of pure essence itself, a self-appearance with no other and no direction, directionless great bliss itself.

The great secret bindu
is the essence of perfect qualities; from the essence of great bliss immeasurable qualities are magically displayed.
The bindu of great bliss, free of gathering and radiating, is undefiled;
beyond partiality, there is nothing it does not pervade;
it is evenness without beginning or end.
It is the nature of all the Victors.
By resting evenly in the taste of the bindu, all phenomena, to the limits of space,
are clearly experienced as great bliss.
The major and minor marks beyond measure are the bindu complete in itself; all the play of bliss, however much there is,
abides as complete in itself.
The bliss of all the buddhas is the great self-arisen bindu; from the melting of the vowels and consonants arises bliss pervading space.
The secret bindu, the cause of all, the bindu of space, the secret state, great pervasion without part or direction, abiding in the body, its nature unborn:
the body, speech and mind of the lord of bliss are immeasurable like space.
The abode where the secret bindu of method and wisdom inseparable resides, together with all the Victors, immeasurable, as many as sesame seeds and atoms, the whole taste of great bliss, through its coemergent nature, conveyed in experience by awareness without being spoken, is the abode of great enjoyment without grasping.
The taste of the self-arisen support of sun and moon, gathered without being abandoned, has no meeting or parting.

The secret bindu in which the essences gather,
the taste of bliss filling space, arises from the power of the nondual embrace.
The expanse of space, the mind of awakening in its richness, the great bindu neither released nor emanated:
like the limits of vast space,
the measure of bliss too is immeasurable.
The number of the father-mother pairs abiding there is equal to the limits of space, as many as the atoms of the realms, and the maṇḍala of bliss of each one is as numerous as atoms, equal to the limits of space.
Of father and mother joined nondually, method and wisdom with their essences gathered,
the taste of the bindu, obscured by nothing, beyond the signs of the three appearances, the elixir of all the precious buddhas:
together with all of them, numberless, ten millions as many as atoms, through the distinctions of inclination and passion, limitless guises appear:
some gaze with desire,
and likewise speak gently;
some embrace and gaze;
some use nail-marks and kiss;
some caress, strike and blow;
spreading apart, bowing and swaying proudly, showing the teeth and showing the navel, kissing, squeezing and laughing.
Through these manifold plays those without passion are made passionate, and passion is swiftly spent;
the parched is swiftly made moist,
and the harvest of great bliss is grown.
With gods and goddesses and their retinues, numbering ten millions as many as atoms, dancing and smiling together, they play and sing this song:

How wonderful! Great bliss, the nature of all the buddhas, coemergent, free of dust like space!
When the vajra is placed in the lotus and moved, imagined appearances set.
Though it is made joyful, pervading all like space, the faculties are stirred by the wind, and the seeds of bliss, the outflows, rise up again.
The great bliss of union in which all movement is cut off equals the expanse of space and endures for just as long.
Goddess, the five sense pleasures are complete in you;
relying on you, in joy I raise my eyes and behold all the realms of the Victors.
When ordinary beings, in pleasure, enter into attachment to the objects of the senses, entering fully into joy, bliss, one-pointedness and lovely desire, the two organs play, sun and moon meet, and great supreme bliss is born, vast;
yet though they taste birth, aging, sickness and death, hope and fear, shame and shamelessness, and the eight worldly concerns such as renown, the childish do not know it.

Whoever enters the secret meaning while lacking method and wisdom will not see the desired fruit arise, as with seed sown in the ocean.
Śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas fall short; even a Victor, lacking method and wisdom, would find the sprout of awakening wholly withered.

When this was taken up in song, the assembled retinues, as numerous as atoms, each cast off their ornaments and garments;
the heroes took on the manner of alluring women, and in maṇḍalas as numerous as the atoms of the ten directions, with manifold songs and dances, they cut off ordinary thoughts of the mind and captivated the mind with great bliss.

Likewise inconceivable maṇḍalas, realms, means, and wondrous bliss, and the manifold methods of taming, appear as anything at all, immeasurable and endless;
yet from the essence of the single sphere,

self-arisen wisdom, the mind of awakening, through the manifold dance of enlightened deeds, anything at all is emanated according to those to be tamed.

Since method is mastered through method, the great method arising from method is a marvel, a wonder, a great astonishment,
the nature of all the buddhas:
the great method, illusion, has wondrously arisen.

Illusion is the expanse without birth or cessation.
Body, speech, qualities, activity and mind,
all gathered without remainder, are utterly pure.
Everything is the self-aware mind of awakening, the maṇḍala that encircles all,
the very source of the nature of all.
It performs deeds, yet nothing is done.
Without depletion and without increase,
it is the great treasure of accomplishments, beyond thought.
The sphere of wisdom, self-appearing,
is inconceivable, endless and supreme.
Wisdom without edge or center cannot be described as "one" or as "this."
Like space, self-arisen and permanent, it is without transition or change, and so it is.
Just as space has no edge or center, self-arisen wisdom has no beginning or end.
The mind of awakening, unarisen and unborn, is clear like the light of the sun of wisdom.
Buddhas, sentient beings, liberation and freedom, all of them, are without remainder self-aware luminosity;
because self-arisen wisdom is self-appearing,
there is not the slightest knowing or obscuring.
Within the single wisdom that knows, since it is free of any phenomena that are parts of itself, it knows all phenomena, to the very limits of space, in a single instant, without mixing them.
From the self-aware mind of awakening itself, no high or low, nothing to adopt or reject, is found;

so although it appears of itself as the essence of saṃsāra, it is unattached and faultless, like a lotus.
The essences of immeasurable qualities, being self-arisen awareness appearing of itself, are all the oceans of wonders without remainder:
they appear of themselves, with nothing to be gained from another.
Blessings, miracles and wondrous qualities are emanated from the self-arisen itself.
Their modes are manifold, differing as pure and impure;
though they never stir from the one essence, they are seen according to each one's inclination.

Speech pervades space;
its sound resounds pervading the ten directions;
according to inclinations, in manifold ways, inconceivable and manifold methods of taming appear.
Mind is the mind that knows all without remainder;
loving, bringing benefit and happiness, it emanates the higher knowledges, the wisdom that knows;
in the wisdom mind there are no distinctions.
Qualities, free of measure and distinction, hold the treasure of the jewel of space;
to fulfil immeasurable wishes, their blessing is like a wish-fulfilling jewel.
Activity is blessing appearing of itself;
in the manner of the meaning without coming or going,
like the wish-granting vase and the precious jewel, it fulfils all aims without agent or act.

All elaboration, without remainder, is utterly pure; self-arisen awareness without edge or center is the source of everything without remainder:
great bliss, the Dharma body.
All the enjoyments of desire are all complete in the state of nonduality;
having gained boundless mastery of that very state,

it is the body of perfect enjoyment.
From the essence of the single body, the sphere, throughout all the world realms, in whatever way suits those to be tamed, it displays magically: the emanation body.
Through realizing the meaning of the unarisen and unborn, all without remainder is indivisible, vajra itself, fearless, free of all antidotes:
this is taught as the vajra body.
That in which manifest awakening takes place, luminosity, space without edge or center, untouched by the limits of the four bodies, is the primordial manifest awakening.

Having abandoned the extremes of all divisions, it abides thus, equal with all;
by its meaning it comes to pervade all without remainder:
this is the speech of inexpressible meaning.
Through bodies and mudrās and ways of gazing, through the intent of meditative absorption, for those to be tamed, what is shown in an inexpressible way is taught as the speech of symbols.
When anything whatever is seen or heard, just as a hero's gaze dispels a battle, awakening is realized as space through the thing itself:
this is called the speech of blessing and realization.
Whatever appears for whomever's sake, where antidotes and obstacles do not remain, and which others cannot defeat,
is declared the overpowering speech.
By uttering a single word, endless words arise;
finding what each inclines to, they are liberated, endowed with an ocean of qualities:
this is the speech of spoken words.

However much it is elaborated in many forms, in the expanse of phenomena there is no distinction;
even in conceiving, the concepts and signs are nonconceptual wisdom: the liberated mind.

Through nondual great bliss it plays among the five enjoyments of desire;
when all without remainder appears as bliss, this is the mind of great bliss.
Though it has no self or other, outer or inner,
being self-arisen and free of the two sides, it knows all the intentions of those to be tamed:
the mind that frees all beings without remainder.
However many objects of awareness appear, in the essence of all without remainder, arising, destruction and antidotes are empty from the beginning:
this is called the unchanging vajra mind.

The immeasurable realms of space, the seats that show the distinctions of greatness,
the undefiled ornaments,
the palaces blazing with wisdom, and the masses of light rays, pervading without edge or center, all appear.
Further, the great qualities, like space without edge or center, cannot be measured or weighed;
the undefiled qualities of greatness appear.
Further, the enlightened activities performed, as many as the domains of those to be tamed, through inconceivable gateways of deeds appear without limit.
To explain them in summary,
they are gathered into the four that are endless, pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, wrathful and the rest, and all are accomplished spontaneously.
In short, the categories of the result are summed up as twenty-five.

This concludes the twelfth chapter, explaining spontaneous accomplishment without exception, from the great tantra Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display (Māyājāla), the Mirror of All Secrets.

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajradhara, empowered by immeasurable Victors, the Lord of Secrets, treasury of mantra, the treasure-holding king of great strength, joyful and delighted, brandished the very vajra in his own hand, and, together with koṭis as numerous as atoms, whirled it all around.
The worlds were shaken in six ways:
he made them quake and tremble, quake all over and tremble utterly.
The worlds of the great trichiliocosm with their encircling ranges he filled with light and sound, and wondrous miracles of marvelous body, speech and mind were displayed.
With the wondrous, marvelous miracles of outer, inner and secret offerings and the five qualities of desire he pervaded all, and pleased the whole host of Victors.
All, joyful and devoted,
the assembled retinues, equal in number to the atoms of the realms, took up this praise in song with manifold sounds:

oṃ āḥ hūṃ a la la ho
The mind of the Net of Magical Display is the unborn mind of wisdom and bliss;
the nonconceptual, clear mind abides pervading all;
it is wholly indivisible, neither conditioned nor unconditioned, without arising or perishing;
in the sublime mind there is no arising or sensing, no stirring or ceasing at all, and so it is bliss, ho!
The body of the Net of Magical Display is the body of bliss, blazing with manifold light; however it appears, manifold and endless, it is void of essence; through the means by which that very nature gathers, it is thus the captivating, satisfying body;
however clearly the endless manifold distinctions appear, in the state of space there is no distinction, ho!

The qualities of the Net of Magical Display are a precious wish-fulfilling jewel; endowed inexhaustibly, the wheel of ornaments appears immeasurably vast;
it captivates beings, so beautiful that they never tire of beholding it;
it appears with the qualities of all the Victors complete, and these have no end, ho!
The speech of the Net of Magical Display is profound and vast, like space; understood by all and satisfying, it sends forth the vajra sound, proclaiming melodiously;
the great vajra sound, endless, appears accordingly as each is inclined and as befits them, ho!
The activity of the Net of Magical Display spontaneously accomplishes manifold deeds; for aeons as many as the atoms of the realms it tames all beings without remainder;
this manifold miraculous display of method and wisdom, never joined and never parted, is at play, ho!

Then the supreme Victor, the Great Being, entrusted this secret
to Vajradhara and the others, together with koṭis as numerous as atoms:
"This secret essence of mine is the nature of all the teachings of all the buddhas of the three times, and appears as the method of all without remainder.
It is the Secret Mantra, the Vajra Vehicle, the glorious tantra of the mind of magical display, in which all phenomena without remainder appear, the Secret Mirror, the tantra of method." All the Victors, as numerous as atoms, assembled and praised this sublime teaching.
This great tantra of the Net of Magical Display, the definitive meaning of the profound scripture, is like a mirror for all;
yet persons of severed or inferior lineage, though they look into it, see no reflection appear.
They turn their backs on the two teachers, cling to outer doctrines they have devised, hold the master in contempt, bear great hatred toward their vajra siblings, deny the profound meaning, scorn the meaning of the secret tantras, are miserly and greatly attached to their own side,

and possess neither faith nor sacred commitment.
To persons who will not give up kingdom and jewels, holding the dualistic view of outer and inner,
even if, for aeons as numerous as the atoms of the realms, one's body and mind were to be torn apart, one must not show the secret volume;
for them there is never empowerment or accomplishment.
If, out of delusion, one should give it to them, one falls into the Hell of Unceasing Torment oneself.
One who has faith and sacred commitment, who gives up all abundance, who comes with the sublime requisites, and who has no regard even for body and life, never meets with meager enjoyments.
Devoted to the Great Vehicle, respectful, with discipline and loving compassion, serving and honoring the vajra master, patiently bearing faults and rebukes, undisturbed in mind though keeping company for an aeon, holding no notion of wonder or weariness toward anything at all, whether bad or good, of good nature, knowing proper conduct, in whose company the disease of poison does not arise:
to such a sublime one give the secret.
Those without the master's oral instructions, unaccustomed to the secret meaning, using as their valid cognition their own mistaken reasons, try to settle the hidden secret meaning.
Fools cut off by darkness, following their wrong attachments, ripen into hell in this very life.

This great secret essence, the mudrā of all the tathāgatas, is the secret of all without remainder;
so whoever, having realized it, makes it clear has empowerment and maṇḍala complete, and accomplishes the aims of self and others spontaneously.
This great secret is the fruit of having served and honored as many realms as there are atoms and of having relied on the master of the gathering.
Therefore it is the domain of the Victor's heirs alone;
those mighty in fame, who live by gain and honor, are utterly rejected.
Aho! It is set in the secret vajra words.

This concludes the thirteenth chapter, on the consummation, from the tantra of Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display, the Secret Mirror.

The great tantra Vajrasattva's Net of Magical Display, the Secret Mirror of Vajrasattva, is complete.

It was translated, edited and finalized by the Indian preceptor Vimalamitra and the monk Jñānakumāra. Later the nun Zemo requested it again and again from Vimalamitra himself. If this is spread to others, the sacred commitment is broken.

Translator's Notes

• "The two, Mind and Excellent Dharma" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) most likely refers to the central couple Samantabhadra and Samantabhadrī, as mind and phenomena; the names are rendered by meaning. "The four times" refers to the four offering goddesses who represent past, present, future and indeterminate time.
• The questions on "maturation, mastery, mudrā" and "the spontaneously present" refer to the four levels of vidyādhara (of maturation, of mastery over life, of mahāmudrā, and of spontaneous presence). In the colophon □□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□ ("completes"). The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is obscure; it is rendered loosely as "smiling, and beaming his approval." In the explanation of the title words, □□□ is read as □□□ ("display, dynamic expression"), and □□□□□□□□□□□ ("provisional meaning") is read as □□□□□□□□□□ ("the meaning of net"), since the verses gloss the words of the title in turn (vajra, sattva, magical display, net). Similarly □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("cause of perfect completeness") may be a slip for □□□□□ ("tantra, continuum"), which would fit the gloss "not cut off"; it is translated as written.
• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ (once written □□□□□□□) is read as "transcending the Pure Abodes" (Śuddhāvāsa), Akaniṣṭha here being placed beyond them. In "sixteen porticoes of cause and result" (□□□□□□), the sense is that the eight paths, as cause and result, are symbolized by the gateways. □□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "beyond the limits of time." The name □□□□□□□ is taken as a short form of Vairocana (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), as the gloss "appear distinctly" (□□□□□□□□□□) shows.

• The opening □□□□□ is read as □□□□□□, "victors." The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, describing yogic practices of the winds, is obscure; "absorption and control" is a tentative rendering of □□□□□□□□. □□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as the incense goddess Vajra Dhūpā, since the four outer offering goddesses (incense, flower, lamp, scented water) follow in sequence and Gandhā is named separately as □□□□□□□□. The verses gloss each deity's name by its function, which the translation keeps by adding the English sense after the Sanskrit name.

• The opening section describes the secret Akaniṣṭha and its teacher and retinue within the yogin's body (the indestructible drop, winds, mind and mentation). The Sanskrit-letter syllables (e, artha, mana mata, mani manu mata, vaṃ) are code words of this esoteric reading and are left untranslated. The six "teachers" listed are the emanations for the six classes of beings; the one for the hells is described as "the king of Dharma," possibly an allusion to Yama as Dharmarāja. □□□□□□□ is taken as the facades or projecting fronts of the palace.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as "the thirteen grounds" (as □□□□□□□□□□□□□, matching the earlier "lord of the thirteen grounds"); read literally it would be "thirteen million." The term śa da pa, describing the songs and dances with which wisdom answers, is obscure and is left as written. Much of this chapter describes the esoteric yoga of union with a consort and of channels, winds and drops in deliberately terse terms; renderings of the sequence "summoning, bringing down, holding, drawing up, reversing" follow the literal Tibetan.

• Here □□□□□□ in "the countless victors and vidyādharas" means "endless, infinite" and is not the name Amitābha. The last part of the passage seems to run through the views of the vehicles in order: worldly religious practice, the nihilists, the eternalists, the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas, Mind Only, Madhyamaka, and then Kriyā, Ubhaya (Caryā) and Yoga tantra. The brief lines make it hard to say exactly where one view ends and the next begins.

• In this passage □□□□□□ means "infinite" every time and is not the name Amitābha. The phrase translated "by the force of reality" (□□□□□□□□) is read like the logicians' "force of fact" (dngos stobs). The line on the channels (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) and "known from their own account" (□□□□□□□□) are terse, and the renderings are tentative. "The single cause, the way of the syllables, blessing and direct perception" are the four realizations (rtogs pa bzhi) of Mahāyoga.

• Here □□□, □□ and □□□□ are the ordinary words "song", "dance/performance" and "love", not the goddess names used elsewhere. In "for the peaceful, Brahmā" □□□ may mean "pure" rather than Brahmā. The lines about the "one, five and three", the "four" called the wheel, and the "eleven and nine extra ones" are terse technical terms of the generation stage, and the renderings are literal.

• Here "the expanse of space" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is the ordinary phrase, not the name of the consort Ākāśadhātvīśvarī, and □□□□□□□□ is "unmoving", not Acala. □□□□□□□□□□□ is given as "the utha wind", following the Tibetan spelling. It may stand for the udāna wind. Much of the channel terminology here is terse and technical, and some renderings are literal.

• Here "dancers" (□□□□□□□□) belongs to a list of women of various castes and is not the goddess Nṛtyā. "Flower" (□□□□□□) and "the essence of space" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are ordinary words here, not the names Puṣpā and Ākāśagarbha. The numbers "twelve, fourteen, sixteen, eighteen", "twenty" and "twenty-five" are given as bare numbers, as in the Tibetan. "The offering to the male" (□□□□□□□□□□) is tentative. The doubled □□ in □□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□.

• The opening list of maṇḍalas is terse: it names the natural, samādhi and reflected-image

maṇḍalas, then "the further two, samādhi and reflected image", then those of the awakening mind and the assembly; it is rendered as it stands. In "all-pervading through the five wisdoms" the text reads □□□□□□□□□□ ("distinguished in all"); this is taken as a slip for □□□□□□□□□□ ("all-pervading"), which the parallel line just above uses. The sentence beginning "Because its nature, too" is elliptical in the Tibetan and is kept so. The passage ends mid-sentence; the list of haughty gods continues in the next piece.

• The heruka forms (Great Glorious, Vajra, Ratna, Padma, and the Karma family "with the various") follow the five-family scheme; □□□□□□□□ ("blood-drinker") is rendered Heruka. In the list of wrathful modes, □□□□□□ is taken as a slip for □□□□□□□ ("wrath of hatred"), matching the neighbouring terms. "Not left under any power of their own" renders the terse □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□. The "seats of the fearless" are presumably the lion and other animal thrones. The architectural terms (□□□□, □□□□□□□, □□□□□□□) are rendered by their usual maṇḍala-palace senses. In this passage, □□□□□□□ means "consort", not dhāraṇī.

• The four directional buddhas are named by their wisdoms (Dharmadhātu, Equality, Discernment, Accomplishment of Activity), as the Tibetan does. The emblems of the six sages (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ entrails" (ba su 'dren), "winged staff" (dbyug gshog), "cudgel" (be raṃ) and "club" (sti ra). The songs of the śadapa are left untranslated; the word may stand for ṣaṭpada, the humming bee. In the mantra the ninth syllable of the kro series is written kra and is kept so.

• The line rendered "phenomena imputed without true aspect" reads rnam par ma med brtags pa'i chos, whose wording is unusual; the rendering is tentative.

• The line rendered "trembling, swimming particles" reads literally "trembling and dust (rdul)"; the sense of rdul among these signs of experience is uncertain. The syllables "a ta" on which the stages of the bindu rest are unclear and have been left as written. "The three hundred and sixty and the sixty-four" likely refers to the channels or practices of the completion stage and the sixty-four arts of union; the text does not specify. "Gazing out from the depths of the ocean" renders mjings, whose precise sense here is uncertain.

• "The eight great supreme ones" (mchog chen brgyad) are not named here; in Mahāyoga they are a set of eight great worldly deities, and the line may mean the skulls of Brahmā, Indra and others form these eight. "The five sources" (byung khungs lnga) is rendered literally; it likely means five colored substances from natural sources. "Garlands of sense organs" renders dbang po, which could also be read as Indra.

• □□□□□□ here is the Great God (Mahādeva, Śiva), on whose upturned skull Heruka's maṇḍala rests, not the goddess named earlier. "The supreme fields, the ones to be liberated" refers to the classic objects of wrathful "liberation" (zhing bcu, the ten fields). "Great conches, great cloths" (dung chen ras chen) are listed without further explanation.

• "The jewel grid of the buddhas" renders sangs rgyas rin chen gab tse; gab tse ordinarily means a divination diagram or grid, and its exact sense here is uncertain. The "five elements, the cause, the self, and space ... cast out each in turn" in the rite for the accumulation of merit is rendered literally; the list is terse.

• "Endowed with the thirteen millions and the two" renders sa ya bcu gsum gnyis ldan pa literally; its reference in this description of the secret empowerment is unclear. The five minds, five dances, and similar sets are not enumerated in this passage.

• The text plays on the two halves of the word maṇḍala in Tibetan, "center" and "circle" or "retinue"; the verses identify what is the center and what is the surrounding circle. In "the samādhi of the deity is the center," the text reads lha ya, evidently a slip for lha yi, "of the deity." The phrase rendered "the lord of the ocean of wisdom" uses the word earlier rendered Īśvara, but here it is an epithet of the presiding buddha, not the god Śiva. In "relying on the dhāraṇī," the term may here denote a consort (as in gzungs ma), in keeping with the parallel stanzas. "Lord of the frontiers" for the regent's epithet (mtha' bdag) is uncertain. In the earlier lines, "mālā," "flowers," "scent" and "unmoving" occur as ordinary words, not as the goddess or deity names listed earlier.

• This section describes the sexual yogic practice of the third empowerment with an action mudrā (karmamudrā), in the technical language of channels, winds and bindu. The ages given for the consort are rendered exactly as the text states them. "The thirteenth, endowed with both" is obscure; it may refer to the thirteenth ground reached through the union of the two (means and wisdom). "First, having obtained the root empowerment" reads dang la, evidently a slip for dang po, "first." The "vajra sun" and "longing lord" are cryptic terms of the union practice and are given literally. "Lamp," "garland" and "dance" occur here as ordinary words, not as the offering goddesses named elsewhere.

• "Even the great gods endowed with miraculous powers" renders lha chen, here a generic term for mighty gods rather than the goddess named elsewhere in this text. "One who holds the vajra" (rdo rje can) may also be read as Vajrin, an epithet of Indra. "Keeps the three doors in evenness" reads mnyams par, taken as mnyam par.

• This section describes the inner and secret samayas in the language of the completion stage and sexual yoga: the bindu, winds and channels, and the five nectars. "Bell" here renders dril bu as a ritual implement, not the goddess Ghaṇṭā. "He will be freed elsewhere never at all" renders a terse line (thar te gzhan du nam yang min) whose sense is that there is no release elsewhere before space is destroyed or the ocean dries up.

• "Pride as supreme bliss" renders bde mchog, here describing the transformed affliction of pride rather than the deity Cakrasaṃvara. "Transforming all the manifold" uses sna tshogs as an ordinary word, not the deity named the Manifold One elsewhere. "The great one that scatters" is evidently the wind element, completing the list of elements. Rtsangs pa in the list of births is taken as a variant spelling of tshangs pa, Brahmā.

• "Recitation to the measure of ten million and one hundred thousand" renders the terse bye ba tshad 'bum gcig; the intended figure is unclear. In the signs of impairment, the line listing guru, companions, parents and others ending in "hostile without fault" is read as these people turning against the practitioner without cause; it could also mean the practitioner hating them. The line "From seeing onward, on the path of meditation the family is not fixed" (mthong nas bsgom lam ma nges rigs) is obscure. The lines on ordinariness, laziness, doubt and faith are elliptical; they are read as faith overcoming those three, with faith and the other qualities as what one must possess. "Dhāraṇī holders" renders gzungs in a list of beings; the precise class intended is uncertain. "The eight adverse ones" (mi mthun brgyad) is not identified with certainty. The passage on the signs of being "unimpaired" calling for restoration follows the Tibetan as written.

• "Reviving of its vigor" renders the unclear nyams sod; it may be a corruption for "the fourth" (bzhi pa), completing the numbered series of signs. "Dahūmata" (Tibetan 'da hū ma ta) is an unidentified anointing substance, given as spelled. "Aparacitta" follows the Tibetan spelling a par tsitta; it may stand for Aparājita, but this is not certain. In the rite of separation, "the hour fearsome by daylight" renders the obscure dang rung, and "wrap it up" renders the unclear blan. "Enclose it in a box with oneself and a dog" is a literal rendering of a difficult line. "Twelve finger-widths" supplies the unit implied by "twelve" for the sword. "The fat of the seventh" is literal; it may refer to the fat of a seven-times-born person, or to a seventh day.

• "Vajra pra divination" renders rdo rje pra, a pra rite (prasena, mirror divination). The passage on the stages of bindu, wind, and channels is highly condensed completion-stage instruction, and several lines (for example "the space liṅga," "the three bindus," "the eighty particulars," "the eighty-two particulars," and "meeting of the tips and reversing the two") are rendered literally without the commentarial explanation they presuppose. "The various consonants" renders gsal byed sna tshogs, read as the letters from which the following syllables arise. "Tārā" here may refer to the consort.

• "Unites with" renders the unclear spongs mdzad. In the fire-rite substances, "elephant flesh and blood" reads glang chen for the written klung chen ("great river"), which makes no sense here. "The goat-born one" (ra skyes) is uncertain; it may refer to the fire god, whose mount is a goat. The four fire deities are given as Pāvaka (written papaka in the Tibetan), and, translated from their Tibetan names since their Sanskrit forms are not certain, the Mighty One, the Splendid One, and the Destroyer. "Gundhe flask" keeps the Tibetan's transcribed Sanskrit; it is probably a water vessel. The objects planted with knotted heads and differently shaped points are the four kīlas mentioned below.

• "Sweating" reads rngul for the written rdul ("dust"), which makes no sense among the signs of bliss. "The upper door" (steng sgo) contrasts with the lower door of the secret practices; the passage is terse. The lines on short life, illness and poverty appear to introduce the enriching activity in its inner sense without an explicit statement.

• The ritual sequence here follows the four activities (pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, wrathful). "Receives what is desired" renders an elliptical line, probably meaning that the disciple receives the desired instructions. The line on those who "have not realized it" though empowered and trained is compressed in the Tibetan and its construal is somewhat uncertain.

Rāgavajra and Dveṣavajra here name the vajra samādhis of desire and aversion, kept consistent with earlier usage.
• The descriptions of the four types of consort contain several rare or obscure physiognomic terms, and some lines are uncertain: "heavy of breath" for rlung khar lci, "many companions and limbs," "lithe and tall," "broad of shoulder" for sog ka, and "limbs not prominent" for yan lag med. Here dkar mo is a type of consort, "a white one," not the goddess Gaurī; likewise the black one. The numbers of days are given literally (six sets of thirty days, or twelve, fourteen or sixteen); the text does not specify the unit of the last three. Khra mo is read as khro mo, female wrathful ones.
• "The bindu of the precious transmission" renders rin chen lung gi thig le; lung may be an error for rlung, "precious wind," which would fit the context of guiding the winds. The opening lines on the bodhisattva "with nothing to be produced" are compressed and their construal is uncertain. "The five destructions" and "the three masteries" are given as the text has them without further specification.
• "Twice thirteen million" renders sa ya bcu gsum phrag gnyis, the number of channels. Here vajra and bell (rdo rje dril bu) are the paired symbols of method and wisdom, not the goddess Ghaṇṭā. "Space" (mkha') in the line on emission is likely also a veiled term for the consort's lotus.
• Several terms in the description of amorous play are rare and their sense uncertain, notably dkar 'dzin ("showing the teeth"), and tha skam ... bengs ("the parched is made moist"). In "free of gathering and radiating," the text reads brel ("busy"), taken as bral ("free of"). The line "equal to the limits of space, as many as the atoms of the realms" is irregular in the meter of the source. The "sixth buddha" is Vajradhara, the lord of the five families.
• The twenty-five categories of the result are evidently the five bodies (Dharma body, enjoyment body, emanation body, vajra body, and primordial manifest awakening), five kinds of speech, five kinds of mind, five qualities (realms, seats, ornaments, palaces, light rays) and five activities, as set out in the verses. Here □□□□□□□ in "the mind that frees all beings" is taken in its general sense of delivering beings, not in the ritual sense of a wrathful rite. □□□□□□ is rendered "fall short", i.e. are of inferior standing.
• Two couplets in the passage on unworthy and worthy recipients are terse: "for them there is never empowerment or accomplishment" and "never meets with meager enjoyments" render the Tibetan "never empowerment and accomplishment" and "never inferior enjoyments" literally, and their exact force is open to interpretation. "The two teachers" is left as stated; the text does not specify which two are meant. The final word of the concluding line is spelled □□□□□□□□□, evidently for □□□□□□□□, "is complete".

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
