

Śrī Kāya Vāk Citta Tantra Rāja · Toh 388 · Derge Kangyur

"The body is of the essential nature of the vase.
Speech is held to be of the nature of the secret.
Mind too is wisdom and primordial gnosis.
The buddha, the goddess Māmākī, Samayatārā, and White-Robed Pāṇḍaravāsini —

thus was it said to Vajradhara.

One who is thoroughly familiar with the meaning of the tantra, who is not confused by the words of explanation, and who is not defeated by others' debate — yet if one has not received empowerment and oral instructions, then empowerment, consecration, fire offering, and the like,
and the practice of mantra, are all fruitless toil.

After death, one is born as a hell-being.

Therefore I pray that the chief one fully explain the authentic oral instructions of empowerment."

Vajradhara declared:

"For the vase empowerment sequence to begin,
one must first seek out a place that is highly praised,
auspicious, pleasing, and very pleasant.
Auspicious birds should cry out their sweet song.
One should hold that a wish-fulfilling tree is present.
Alternatively, a charnel ground with a single tree, or a riverbank, and such places —
to the lord of the land and the earth goddess, offer a tormā, a fire offering, and an ablution offering, then press down the earth and take its measure with plumb lines.

Then first present the approach practice.

The three levels of approach are superior, middling, and lesser, defined by signs, numbers, and times.

For each of these three, there are three:

signs are form, light, and sound;

numbers are one thousand, ten thousand, and one hundred thousand;

times are fifteen, thirty, and seven days.

When the approach practice is complete,
after pleasing the deities through the approach,
all the substances for the deity and the disciples should be properly arranged in an excellent manner.

A girl of auspicious years should gather kuśa grass from a direction compatible with the earth element, and check for signs.

On the tip of a tooth-stick, place flowers and fragrance.
Check the signs on the protection cord and so forth.
The maṇḍala of empowerment is then to be generated.

The maṇḍala is for disciples of superior, middling, and lesser capacity, together with samādhi, flowers, colored powder, and sequence — whatever applies, that very one it is.

Then set out the offering substances in order.
With the khaṃvīra mantra,
the vajra action is to be performed upon them.
Then with the kuśa grass and so forth, the sweeping ritual together with its rites is to be performed.

Furthermore, as preliminary substances for pleasing the lama, and in order to make offerings to the deities of the maṇḍala — horses, elephants, buffalo, jewels and other treasures, incense, lamps, and so forth — one hundred, or one thousand, or ten thousand, or one hundred thousand — with an upper garment, ornaments, banners, and the like, having consecrated them, gather the accumulations and set them outside.

Then the disciple is to be introduced.
Anoint with bath-water and fragrant substances upon the limbs.

'How wonderful! Who are you?
If you have awakened from the illusions of the world, do you sport in the great maṇḍala of great-famed Heruka?
With faith, be joyful.
Free from conceptual thought, Vajrasattva,
you of great bliss — show yourself to me, the Teacher.
I pray that Vajradhara take notice.
He who was prophesied for supreme awakening —
I seek you, the Great Protector.
Grant me that very pledge.
Grant me the awakening mind.
Grant me what has arisen from the lotus.

Grant me the secret delight.
I pray that the Protector lead me into the supreme city of great liberation.'

'Excellent! Excellent, noble child!
You are the supreme among all the Victor's sons.
Since you are the destroyer of all conceptual thought,
you who are nondual should take this up.
Equal to Akṣobhya, the Blessed One,
you who are beyond subjugation should take it up.
Take up that very supreme reality of the conduct and practice of the pledges.
Skillful means and wisdom joined as one — you must never abandon them.
In pure conduct and likewise in meditative concentration, apply yourself with effort and make the mind stable.'"

One should drink alcohol regularly and not become angry. Likewise, one should understand the nature of meat. One should rely upon the mudrā of another. These are the eight sacred pledges (samaya).

Take refuge in the Three Jewels. Bestow the common vows and the generation of awakening mind. Perform three circumambulations and three prostrations. Having drawn a curtain across the middle, cover the five senses — the eyes and the rest. Offer flowers to the many deities. Purify and cleanse all by means of the all-creating water. The vajra together with the flower should be placed upon that one's heart and meditated upon. One should confess the faults of transgressions — such as showing contempt toward the master and the like. Bring down the outer vajra-holder. First, confess negativities three times.

Through the eye, seeing forms; through the ear, sounds; through the nose, smells; through the tongue, tastes; through the body, tactile sensations — the accomplishments (siddhi) and the enlightened activities respectively: the skilled one should know how to examine these. Having cast the flower, make offering to the deity as well.

The retinue members are the limbs of the principal deity. One should know the defining marks of the principal. Just as a healing physician draws out the thorns from the five sense faculties, so too do the great bodhisattvas and the Victors perfectly dispel all the cataracts of ignorance.

Thereupon the maṇḍala of the mirror is revealed to that one. In the empowerment maṇḍala to the northeast, on an eight-petalled lotus, place it and confer the five empowerments of awareness. Through the water element, Akṣobhya, and the mirror, the enlightened activity of the Vajra family is accomplished. The crown ornament possesses the precious gemstone: by the nature of the wisdom of equality (samatā jñāna), the enlightened activity of the Jewel family is accomplished. The vajra empowerment of Amitābha: by the nature of discriminating wisdom (pratyavekṣaṇā jñāna), the Lotus family performs enlightened activity. The bell of meaningful accomplishment: through the wisdom of all-accomplishing activity, various enlightened activities are performed.

The empowerment of the name, drawn from the family, is joined with vajra — vajra mind. Being the very essence of the great Vairocana, from the nature of the wisdom of the dharmadhātu, it holds the defining marks of suchness. On a fearless lion throne, the master who engenders the family should confer the empowerment. Through the subjugation of the four māras, the four great kings — in the form of victory banners through which phenomena never decline — pervade all through the dharmakāya. One should cover from above with a parasol.

The vajra and bell are the two ascetic practices. The mudrā and sacred pledge are the third. Relief and prophecy, permission and the irreversible, stabilization — these are the five aspects. Furthermore, all the particular material substances — the seven precious things and everything else — I have declared to be held in common.

For the vase empowerment there are three divisions: the first is entering the maṇḍala; the second is the empowerment of awareness; the third is stabilization.

Then the secret is to be explained. Having established the bodhicitta in the body as Mount Meru, resting upon a seat of bliss — one should seek the first wisdom-consort (vidyā) who has become the support of the secret empowerment. First, examination through wisdom; then, receiving the self-empowerment; purifying faults; generating the maṇḍala; pacifying obstructing spirits and obstacles; protection; and offering with assemblies to it. Make many drops of perfumed liquid. That very one who abides at the left — having rubbed and performed the union with what is rubbed — through the stream of bliss arising from the rubbing, pervading the entire body secretly, let it flow like white upon a red vein. As with entering the maṇḍala before — visualizing a syllable JAḤ at the wheel of Romatī, having blessed the tongue as a lotus, visualizing BHYAḤ at the tip of the tongue, blended with camphor from Siṃhala, settling BHYAḤ there and dissolving into it. Enjoy and unite the two by means of both, and meditate in the center without any object. For the secret empowerment there are three divisions: conferring the vajra upon the principal consort; conferring it by means of the fierce wrathful one, the broad one;

conferring the vajra upon the brahma-channel.

As for the wisdom-gnosis empowerment as well, first comes the examination of the wisdom consort. Through body, speech, and mind — all three — the skilled one should examine and come to know her. Then, having examined the five distinguishing features — family, youth, wealth, adornment, and form — these five distinctive marks of the body constitute what is taught as the outer examination.

Stability of mind is the family's distinguishing mark of the vajra — so have I declared. Having little conceptual thought is taught as the distinguishing mark of vajra youth. Being adorned with non-conceptuality is what one should understand as the distinguishing mark of vajra adornment. That suchness itself does not change into a threefold state, and is the unfailing victory banner of Dharma — this is the distinguishing mark of vajra form. Enjoying all phenomena in the flavor of emptiness is the distinguishing mark of vajra wealth. Kuṇḍalamā is the family of the mind — this is the distinguishing mark of family. Being erect like an arrow of suchness is the distinguishing mark of the youth of mind. The vein being clear and red, and the awakening mind being clear and white, shining in a non-dual manner — like a clear jewel threaded through silk — this is the distinguishing mark of the form of mind. For some, the nāḍī and rasanā, and the avadhūtī as the non-dual — this is the distinguishing mark of the wealth of mind.

The first is the outer examination, the second is the inner, the third is the secret. Examination of the body is the body of the deity; examination of speech becomes the speech; examination of the mind becomes the mind. Know that the intent pervades all under the manner of mere illusion. The six of the body, the seven of speech, and the seven of the mind — in the manner of illusion. The first is confusion of a mirage for water; the second is the mirage itself; the third is like a mirage that does not appear — so should one understand it from the mouth of the teacher.

For water there are seven, for butter one; for smell there are seven, for meat two; for eggs four, for milk three. These are taught as the support of what is sought, for a period of three to four years.

For kara there are two, for sugar one; for beer know there are two; for adornments there are various particular kinds. Meat of winter and likewise of autumn — if kept one day it possesses essence. Meat of summer and spring as well — if it has warmth it possesses essence. Meat that has died by its own nature: if it is sought out and used, the samaya is impaired. It should be combined with the five roots along with their branches, and further with medicines such as fruits, together with butter. Meat is likewise used in the manner of butter. Snow produces the essence of everything; sweetness causes everything to be relished. Essence-producing meat is called youthful; relished meat has fifteen portions. Essence-producing meat and butter, both, are mixed in proportions of five and five. Beer is taught to be equal to these. For relished meat as well, in equal portions of milk and egg — take five and three, then five and two as the chief ones. With sour beer or milk, give them in equal measure with the meat. This is the branch with elaboration.

Then come delimitation of boundaries, service, and the various samaya practices — these are the branches without elaboration. I have taught these for the sake of attaining empowerment: the meditation that precedes the conferral of empowerment. Entrust the wisdom consort, give the pith instructions, perform the signs, and examine the marks of desire. The examination being utterly without elaboration, embrace with the hands and feet and so forth — this is taught as the initial method of union. Diadem, neck ornament, and so forth — this is called the great method of union. Standing, squatting, supine, face-down, sideways — these are the five. The profound intent of all of these: one who practices without understanding that intent thereby creates the cause of birth in the Avīci hell. Transformed a hundredfold from the ordinary, it is connected with the vase empowerment. The vase and the secret — beyond the secret is the third. The karmic ripening thereof cannot be fully described. The sequence for entering the maṇḍala should be learned from the mouth of the guru. The actual practice of cultivating the seven branches, arising from three distinct forms: mantra and medicine are the first, the method of union is taught as the second,

The third is meditative absorption (samādhi). By means of mantra and medicine, the kundā is straightened. The measurements of the girdle, the measurements for remaining in place, and the measurements for straightening are all to be known. The girdle that accords with the four elements is equal to the measurement of the waist. Three or four finger-widths of silk or cotton: the measurement for remaining in place is of six kinds. It abides in the palace of liberation's secret, abides in the sense sources with awareness, abides in the empty wheel of Hayagrīva, abides in the elements, the secret, and the bliss-sustaining place, abides in the emanation wheel on the petals, abides at the heart with perfect abandonment, and abides undivided in Heruka, unencircled by vajra sovereignty. The measurement for straightening arises at four finger-widths. First one bathes; for the second, medicine, oil, and fragrance, three in three twos, are applied to the upper and lower body and smoked over fire. The three-pronged root is profoundly subtle. Spru-ba, lca-ba, ra-mnye-ba, nyeu-shing, ra-mo-shags and its branches, stones and the like — five are combined; and also medicine, oil, and fragrance are poured into silk and so forth, and the fumigation is applied through both openings. If one applies the profound mantra and cultivates it, one should first come to know the signs: the various glorious signs of attachment arise, and at the latest they arise in three or seven instances. Having come to know the particular intent, this is the distinction between mantra and medicine. If one does not understand the intent and seeks medicine and the like out of mere desire, the demerit of this is inconceivable.

If one comes to understand the method of fumigation, the opening of the central channel is declared to be the distinctive method of application. The reversed application of great bliss, the reversed application of the cakras, the reversed application of the body, the reversed application of gnosis, the reversed application of the elements, the reversed application of the mother, the reversed application of the bindu (Skt. bindu), the reversed application of meditative concentration, the reversed application of syllables, the reversed application of emptiness, the reversed application of breath, the reversed application of joy, the reversed application of caṇḍālī, the reversed application of the channels, the reversed application of bodhicitta, the reversed application of left and right, the reversed application of signs, and the reversed application of the support — these were not beheld even by the Omniscient One; they are the secret of the minds of all buddhas, the mother of all bodhisattvas, the uncommon generation of all their sons. This is the distinction of meditative absorption.

Without measuring the distinction of this, there is no profound meaning. It is also taught that the pith instructions are given prior to conferring empowerment; through those pith instructions, empowerment will be obtained. Because one relies upon the wisdom-mother (prajñā) and generates the gnosis of bliss, it is taught as the empowerment of wisdom and gnosis. Sindhura is wisdom and camphor is gnosis; the bliss of that is gnosis. Sindhura is called wisdom, and camphor is explained as gnosis. The union of the three channels is wisdom, and its bindu is gnosis. For some, nālinī is gnosis and rasanā is wisdom. The channel is called wisdom and the awakening mind is gnosis. The ḍākinī is wisdom and the hero (dāka) is explained as gnosis. The three joys are gnosis and innate joy is wisdom. Below is called wisdom and above is also explained as gnosis. The left is called wisdom and the right is also explained as gnosis. The dharmadhātu is called wisdom and the four gnoses are gnosis. Mudrā-signs, names, and syllables — still further distinctions are to be known.

Regarding wisdom and gnosis, there are also three: training in words is permitted; regarding reflections, it is stated; and cultivation through direct realization is taught.

The four aspects of the syllables E and Vaṃ, and of Māyā: E is earth, Vaṃ is water, Ma is fire, and Ya is wind.

E is compassion, Vaṃ is loving-kindness,

Ma is joy, and Yā is equanimity.

E is Avalokiteśvara, Vaṃ is Māmakī,

Ma is White-Robed Tārā, Yā is Tārā.

E is generosity, Vaṃ is moral discipline,

Ma is patience, Yā is meditative concentration.

E is the Great Seal (mahāmudrā),

Vaṃ is the commitment seal (samayamudrā).

Ma is the Dharma seal (dharmamudrā), and Yā is the wisdom seal (prajñāmudrā).

E is the east, Vaṃ is the south,

Ma is the west, Yā is the north.

E is the bindus of body,

Vaṃ is speech, Ma is mind,

and Yā is the bindu of gnosis.

E is blue, Vaṃ is green,
Ma is red, Yā is yellow.
E is ḍākinī, Vaṃ is lāmā,
Ma is born-of-parts, Yā is form-possessing.
E is the gnosis ḍākinī,
Vaṃ is the vajra ḍākinī,
Ma is the flesh-eating ḍākinī,
and Yā is the karma ḍākinī.
E is cessation, Vaṃ is the path,
Ma is suffering, Yā is the origin of suffering.
E is great bliss, Vaṃ is enjoyment,
Ma is Dharma, Yā is emanation.
E is the major marks, Vaṃ is emptiness,
Ma is liberation, Yā is the minor marks.
E is the manifold aspects,
Vaṃ is karmic maturation.
Ma is complete purification,
and Yā is aspect free of defining characteristics.
E is the lesser, Vaṃ is the middling,
Ma is the higher, Yā is the supremely highest.
E is fire-wind flowing from the right,
Ma is earth-wind flowing from below,
Yā is water-wind flowing from above.
E is the elder monks, Vaṃ is the great assembly,
Ma is the venerable ones, Yā is all.
E is approach, Vaṃ is close approach,
Ma is accomplishment, Yā is great accomplishment.
E is southeast, Vaṃ is southwest,
Ma is northwest, Yā is northeast.
E is tantra, Vaṃ is mantra,
Ma is gnosis, Yā is the secret.
E is luminous appearance, Vaṃ is increasing appearance,
Ma is attained appearance, Yā is clear light.
E is the excellence of self,
Vaṃ is the excellence of time.
Ma is taught as the excellence of gnosis,

and Yā is the excellence of wind.
E is the abode of self,
Vaṃ is taught as the abode of yoga.
Ma is the abode of other,
and Yā is the abode of tantra.
E is joy, Vaṃ is supreme joy,
Ma is innate joy, Yā is joy beyond joy.
E is the mirror-like gnosis, Vaṃ is the gnosis of equality,
Ma is the gnosis of discernment, Yā is the gnosis of accomplishment.
E is the dharmakāya, Vaṃ is the enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya),
Ma is the emanation body (nirmāṇakāya), Yā is great bliss.
E is pacification, Vaṃ is magnetizing,
Ma is enrichment, Yā is wrathful subjugation.

The three great mantras condensed from syllables:

Oṃ is the wheel of body,
Āḥ is the wheel of speech,
and Hūṃ is the wheel of mind.
Oṃ is Vairocana, Āḥ is Amitābha, and Hūṃ is by nature Akṣobhya.
Oṃ is the left hand, Hūṃ is the right, and Āḥ is the heart-center of the middle.
Oṃ is the left eye,
Hūṃ is the right, Āḥ is the central channel.
Oṃ is the vital breath, Hūṃ is inception, and Āḥ is to be understood as abiding.
Oṃ is body, Hūṃ is mind,
and Āḥ is to be understood as speech.
Oṃ is the physical body, Āḥ is speech, and Hūṃ is to be understood as mind.
Oṃ is skillful means, Hūṃ is wisdom,
and Āḥ is non-duality.
Oṃ is the left channel, lalanā, Hūṃ is the right channel, rasanā,
and Āḥ is the avadhūtī.
Oṃ is the right channel, rasanā,
Hūṃ is the left channel, lalanā, and Āḥ likewise abides in the center.

Oṃ is camphor, Hūṃ is saffron, and Āḥ is the white-and-red channels.
Oṃ is supreme joy, Hūṃ is special joy,
and Āḥ is the meaning of innate joy.
Joy becomes innate joy,
and innate joy becomes joy.

Joining result to cause,
and joining cause also to result;
joining cause to cause,
and joining result also to result;
joining cause and result as non-dual;
joining wisdom to skillful means,
and joining skillful means also to wisdom;
joining skillful means to skillful means;

joining wisdom to wisdom, and joining skillful means and wisdom as non-dual — the intent of this joining is difficult to realize even for the omniscient.

A is Vairocana and Akṣobhya,
Nā is Ratnasambhava, Ro is Amitābha,
and the bindhu (Skt. bindu) is Amoghasiddhi.
Oṃ is the intrinsic nature of the five Sugatas,
Zhabs is born of Amoghasiddhi,
A is likewise Amitābha,
Ha is Vairocana,
Ro is Ratnasambhava,
and the bindu is the intrinsic nature of Akṣobhya.
Zhabs is born of the intrinsic nature of Tārā,
A is the essential nature of Pāṇḍaravāsīnī,
Ha is Vajradhātviśvarī,
Ro is the intrinsic nature of Māmākī,
and the bindu is to be known as Locanā.
The five elements, the five bodies,
the five wheels, and the five joys are to be understood in their proper sequence.

Zhabs is born of diligent activity.

A is the wisdom of equality,

Ha is the dharmadhātu,

Ro is discriminating wisdom, and the bindu is mirror-like wisdom.

The intended meaning of all of these is the secret of the mind of all buddhas — utterly secret and difficult to fathom, sealed by the convention of syllables.

Then the bodhisattva Vajrahṛdaya (Vajra Heart) and the assembly of ḍākinīs made offerings and, having paid homage, disappeared from sight.

The King of Tantras of the Body, Speech, and Mind called the Vow-Net of the Ḍākinīs is complete.

Translated by the paṇḍita Gayadhara and the translator, the monk Śākya Yeshe.

Translator's Notes

- The title inscription at the opening marks the colophon of a preceding tantra and the incipit of the present one. The text moves from colophon to title page to the body of the Śrī Kāya Vāk Citta Tantra Rāja without a clear structural break in the Tibetan; this translation renders them in sequence as they appear.

The term "khaṃvīra mantra" is a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit mantra seed-syllable compound found in tantric ritual texts; it is left transliterated as no standard English rendering exists and the Tibetan gives only the phonetic form.

"Samayatārā" and "White-Robed Pāṇḍaravāsini" are two distinct tantric goddess figures named in the list of buddha-consorts; Pāṇḍaravāsini is rendered by her Sanskrit name as it is a proper epithet meaning "White-Robed One."

- The passage is a Vajrayāna ritual text dealing with tantric empowerment procedures. Several technical points deserve mention.

The opening line "One should drink alcohol regularly and not become angry" renders a formulation common in tantric samaya lists where alcohol is a ritual substance, not a license for indulgence. The eight samaya items enumerated across the preceding context are a standard pledge list.

The syllables JAḤ and BHYAḤ are tantric seed syllables left in transliterated form as they appear in the source.

"Romatī" is the transliteration of the Tibetan ro ma, one of the subtle body channels, here in the form of a proper name for the channel wheel at that location.

"Camphor from Siṃhala" refers to camphor from Sri Lanka, renowned as the finest quality in classical Indian sources.

The final incomplete sentence — "conferring it by means of the fierce wrathful one, the broad one" — corresponds to the text's evident continuation; the passage ends mid-enumeration of the three divisions of the secret empowerment.

- The term Kuṇḍalamā rendered from the Tibetan ཀུན་ལམ་ is a technical tantric designation for the consort or for a specific nāḍī; the reading is uncertain and some editions may differ. It is treated here as a proper name or epithet of the mind-family.

The phrase rendered "seven of speech" and "seven of the mind" with "six of the body" reflects a numerological list whose full referents are not spelled out in this passage; the structure mirrors three levels of illusory examples that follow immediately.

The phrase ཀ་ཀ་ is read as "two kara," where kara likely refers to a measure or type of sugar product; the exact referent is uncertain in context.

- The passage presents a dense technical exposition of Yoginītantra or Anuttarayogatantra practice instructions, combining subtle-body physiology with symbolic correspondences. Several terms here are technical transliterations rather than translatable Tibetan words: kundā, sindhura, nālinī, rasanā, spru-ba, lca-ba, ra-mnye-ba, nyeu-shing, and ra-mo-shags are all specific medicinal or ritual substances whose exact botanical or material identities are uncertain from the text alone and have been left as transliterations accordingly.

The phrase rendered "reversed application" translates go-bzlog sbyor-ba, a technical term for a method of practice involving inversion or reversal of the normal flow or order; the precise meaning varies across traditions and is left somewhat open in translation.

The "Omniscient One" who did not behold these reversed applications is a striking and genuinely unusual claim; in context it likely refers to an omniscient being of a lower vehicle, or the statement may be rhetorically paradoxical to emphasize secrecy.

- The four ḍākinī categories — gnosis, vajra, flesh-eating, and karma — reflect a standard Vajrayāna fourfold classification of ḍākinīs.

The term rendered "born-of-parts" translates a term meaning beings assembled or composed of parts, a category in tantric enumerations of ḍākinīs.

The passage on the three great mantras lists two slightly different assignments of Oṃ and Hūṃ to the channels lalanā and rasanā within a few verses of each other; this is not a translation inconsistency but reflects the text itself, which appears to present variant enumerations deliberately.

The final lines appear to be the opening of a list of yogic unions that continues beyond this passage.

- The syllable analysis throughout this passage follows a system in which the Tibetan syllables A, Na, Ro, Zhabs, and the bindu (bindu here rendered simply as "bindu" in the verse) are assigned correspondences with the five buddha families and their associated consorts, wisdoms, and elements. This is standard tantric syllable-deity yoga and has been rendered descriptively in line with the verse structure. The syllable-by-syllable correspondences shift register between the two stanzas, which is characteristic of tantric twilight language; no emendation has been made.

The colophon names Gayadhara as the Indian paṇḍita and Śākya Yeshe as the Tibetan monk-translator, a well-attested translation partnership of the early transmission period.
