Toh 450 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Jñāna Vajra Samuccaya and in Tibetan as the Dpal ye shes rdo rje kun las bsdus pa, rendered in English as "The Glorious Compendium of All Wisdom-Vajra." The text takes the form of a buddha's discourse addressed to an assembly of great bodhisattvas, including Maitreya, who pose questions about fundamental topics such as ignorance, mental factors, and the nature of mind. The Blessed One, described as the very embodiment of wisdom dwelling in the secret expanse of all Tathāgatas, responds from within a profound meditative absorption that unifies the body, speech, and mind of all buddhas. The text belongs to the tantric section of the Kangyur and opens with homage to the Glorious Mañjuvajra, indicating its association with the Mañjuśrī or Vajradhātu cycle of tantric teachings.

In the language of India: Śrī Jñāna Vajra Samuccaya. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious Compendium of All Wisdom-Vajra. Homage to the Glorious Mañjuvajra.

Thus did I hear. At one time the Blessed One, being himself the essential nature of wisdom, dwelt in the secret expanse of all Tathāgatas, and entered into the undivided meditative absorption that is the sameness-taste sacred commitment vajra of the body, speech, and mind of all buddhas.

Thereupon the bodhisattvas — the great bodhisattva Maitreya and the others — made request and supplication. They then addressed the Blessed One: "What, pray, is what is called ignorance, mental factors, and mind?"

When they had spoken those words, the one who is himself the vajra nature of the body, speech, and mind of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata of all Tathāgatas, declared:

"Sons of noble lineage, listen well.

From the vajra of the three wisdoms
the very suchness of the vajra bodhicitta truly arises — and for that reason the intrinsic nature of the wisdom-vajra is to be understood thus:

The three wisdoms — pure mind and the three appearances — are the vajra, the source from which they arise; inseparably, wind and rigpa abide as non-dual. Bodhicitta is the inseparability of conventional and ultimate. Vajra suchness is that which truly arises from the nature of reality (dharmatā), primordially and spontaneously accomplished — the great bliss that is the essential nature of all phenomena. Since it arises from, enters into, and abides as the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of the buddhas, all phenomena of saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are pervaded and governed by the wisdom-vajra, the inseparability of wind and mind, which is unobstructed.

The intent of all Tathāgatas is the non-duality of basic space (dharmadhātu) and wisdom; it is that which supremely arises from manifest awakening itself. From the inseparability of wind and rigpa, at all times the three appearances arise and do not cease. This very thing is to be fully understood as co-emergent.

The genuine meaning is profound. As for what is truly taught in the nature of the vajra: the secret, true bodhicitta — from the nature of reality (dharmatā), the inseparability of wind and mind — is a self-aware knowing (rang rig), profound and unchanging, free from conceptual elaboration, unceasing and pacified. From within the state of non-arising, equality, even though there is no conceptual realization, from causes and conditions, that very knowing-ignorance arises, sourceless, with no beginning and no end. From that, co-emergent ignorance — that which is proximately attained, without substantiality — arises unobstructed from luminosity, from the core of all selflessness, from non-appearance; though not sequential in its arising, it arises within profound great emptiness.

From ignorance, the condition of appearance arises; appearance, once attained, is non-conceptual. From that, intrinsic nature arises from mind; from that, appearance expands — utterly luminous and vast in emptiness. The ornaments arising from mind: from cause, from the eye, the object, the sense faculty, and from the immediately preceding condition, what is called mind arises. That has been declared to be the meaning of appearance and emptiness.

Mind abides in its object; mental factors individually display their distinctions. That very ignorance is the nature of reality (dharmatā). Since the nature of reality does not abide as a self, those appearances and emptinesses — three and three — arise free from conceptual elaboration. They arise from within luminosity, and because luminosity, bliss, and emptiness are inseparable, the essential nature of vajra bodhicitta is thus revealed."

Having taught this, the bodhisattvas — Maitreya and the rest — were at that time struck with the most profound wonder, and remained in silence, saying nothing at all.

Thereupon the Blessed One, who is himself the vajra nature of the body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas, seeing that those bodhisattvas had fallen silent and said nothing, declared: "Why do you remain silent?"

Then the great bodhisattvas prostrated at the two feet of the Blessed One, touched their heads to the ground, and made this further request:

How wondrous! O Teacher, Holder of the Vajra,
The consciousness so difficult to understand,
Divided into three in its most profound distinction —
May the Blessed One be pleased to teach it,
May the Sugata be pleased to speak.

When they had so requested, the Blessed One declared:

That which arises from luminosity itself
Is called mind, mentation, and consciousness —
Become the root of all phenomena.
From it, the self that is wholly afflicted
And the self that is thoroughly purified
Are recognized — two knowings arise from that.

The mount of that consciousness is the wind element.
From wind arises fire, from fire arises water,
And from water, it is taught, earth in turn arises.
From their assembling come the five aggregates themselves,
The six sense bases, and whatever appears as sense objects —
All of these are dependent origination,
The mingling of wind and consciousness in close union.

Thereupon the three consciousnesses make manifest
The appearing of the intrinsic nature with perfect clarity, Experiencing conduct in its wake.
Through the cause and effect of appearances, the intrinsic natures Arise thoroughly and correctly,
And yet appear like a dream or an illusion.

And that luminosity is without abiding,
Without cessation, and without arising —
The true ultimate truth, the perfect limit.
What arises from it as the darkness-appearance
Is taught as the cessation called ignorance.
Its intrinsic-nature appearances are Confusion, distraction,
Lack of mindfulness, laziness,
Non-speaking, and the unilluminated.

Ignorance also arises from mind.
From the near-attainment of the appearance that blazes like a lamp —
The essential nature being dharmatā, free of conceptual thought —
Through the subtle entering of the wind element,
It is knowing and yet dim, like a neuter being.

Taught as resembling the light of the sun,
And like the most brilliant mirage —
Its intrinsic nature comprises attachment, joy, Supreme joy, ferocity, and the like.
On the conventional level it is revealed through direct perception,
Through masculine form, through the assembly of father-gods,
And the symbol "vajra" is its own posited designation.

From mind, that which is called "mind" is explained.
Like the light of the moon, supremely clear —
Taught as resembling the reflection of the moon in water.
Its intrinsic nature is freedom from attachment and so forth.
On the conventional level, from the luminous appearance,
It is the symbol of women, the bhaga, the lotus, and the assembly of goddesses.

Now, in order to teach the abiding nature of all phenomena:

That which arises from luminosity itself is dharmatā, luminosity naturally and perfectly pure by its intrinsic nature. From the luminous expanse, awareness-as-non-conceptual knowing arises together with the subtle wind.
Thus mind is the all-base consciousness (ālayavijñāna).
Mentation-consciousness is that which engages in expansion and contraction.
Consciousness is that which possesses the eight collections.

The root of all phenomena is the awakening mind, unchanging, vajra-like, equal to space itself.

From impure seeds, wandering beings appear as thoroughly afflicted in their delusion. From habitual tendencies, that which is the reverse of delusion appears as the thoroughly purified.

From the various conventional designations imputed by those outside the Buddhist tradition, taken as a self, conceptuality becomes twofold and appears as subject and object. Self and other — by the dual imputation of grasping at self and what belongs to self — one grasps at things and at signs, and this is made known in mind itself.

From that, it appears as consciousness itself, and from that very point, through the wind of dharmatā, luminous appearance dawns as self-arisen luminosity.

Thereupon, from the stirring of the wind of karma, fire arises from attachment, and the water-appearance of aversion arises from friction.

From warmth and moisture, the earth element of delusion arises, and there the five elements gather and collect together. From that, the root awareness of the all-base (ālayavijñāna) rests at the heart center alone, and from that, through straying into subject and object, these elements assemble, and from their assembly there appears the five aggregates (skandhas), the six sense sources (āyatanas), and the five sense objects. Since wind and consciousness are inseparably mingled, this is nothing other than dependent origination arising everywhere without obstruction.

From within the non-conceptual state of the nature of reality (dharmatā), arising together with the wind, the manner in which consciousness moves through existence in the intermediate state is as follows. From that point, the three consciousnesses arise: luminous appearance arising from condition, the spreading of luminosity, and the attainment of luminosity — from the causal condition, the object condition, the dominant condition, and the immediately preceding condition — manifest arising, the luminosity of a nature endowed with conceptuality, the thirty-three natures, the forty characteristics, and the seven moments of ignorance, clearly experienced in activity by day and by night. This is the time of impure experience.

When the wind subsides and awareness rests even slightly, all the causes and effects of the three luminosities become like illusions, and every aspect of intrinsic nature is self-purified, self-pacified, and self-liberated in the expanse of primordial wisdom. Then, through the arising of the non-conceptual wisdom of suchness (tathatā) — blissful, luminous, empty, and selfless — the intermediate state of the purification of habitual tendencies, the intermediate state of dream, is where body and speech appear everywhere like illusions.

That very illusory-body appearance purifies the activities of conventional truth. By fully engaging with luminosity, holding it as a unity, and through the meditation of subsequent dissolution, when co-emergent defilements are completely purified, there is no abiding anywhere, no obstruction with respect to all phenomena, no abiding, and no arising. This is the meaning of the non-abiding of the ultimate truth free from conceptual elaboration, and is called the non-appearance of the extreme of the real.

From that very state, a subtle wind of darkness-like luminosity, turned back from its natural course, is taught as the cessation that is ignorance. Its nature gives rise to appearance, to confusion, distraction, doubt, forgetfulness, laziness, speechlessness, and weariness.

Ignorance arises from mind. From the blazing of the luminosity of attainment like a lamp, the essential nature — the non-conceptual nature of reality — enters subtly into the element of wind, and consciousness remains unmoved, like one who is neither male nor female. At the navel, in a lotus of eight petals along with four voids, the syllable of the neuter rests. The Hṛīḥ with its bindu is visualized in the center. This is the very meaning of the attainment of luminosity.

The spreading of luminosity is taught as being like the sun, supremely clear, like a mirage. Its nature includes desire, joy, supreme joy, intense joy, and the like. At the conventional level it is indicated by direct perception, by the form of the male, by assemblies of gods, and by the sign called vajra — all designated by one's own attribution. In that very same lotus at the navel, in the disc of the sun, a vajra with a bindu stands in the center; the thirty-seven syllables of the Kālī clarifiers illuminate the very spreading of luminosity.

What arises from mind is called mind. Luminosity like the moon, supremely brilliant, is taught as being like the reflection of the moon in water. Its nature is free from attachment, and so forth. At the conventional level, from the luminosity, it is the sign of the female, of the bhaga (womb), the lotus goddess and her retinue. As before, with the moon in the center together with the lotus, the vowels extend in the directions as blazing light; at the junctions, twelve pairs are set out in sequence. This completes all the progressive stages of the secret mantra wheel. Visualization with recitation causes the three minds to appear as illusion — the union arising from within the expanse of the clear-light wisdom.

The spreading of luminosity is bliss.

Without a fixed object to grasp, attachment and clinging are released. Like the brilliance of the sun, bliss arises naturally from within. The very dwelling, coming, and going — each instant — is meditative absorption free of signs, the opening that dispels darkness.

The mind of wisdom that has attained luminosity is of the nature of non-conceptual awareness. That very ignorance, now thoroughly purified, is without darkness and without luminosity as a separate appearance — arising like a lamp, spontaneously present, unmoved and unmoving, perfectly pure. Purified within the expanse of the nature of reality, which has no fixed abode: emptiness, great emptiness, utter emptiness free of substantiality, the emptiness of all things that is undefiled, the near-attainment without appearance — pure like space, luminous clarity, the great mudrā beyond compare and beyond duality, the dharmadhātu of co-emergent arising, transcending all objects of special insight, all-pervading peace free of conceptual elaboration. From within the expanse of emptiness, transcending the extremes of both conceptual thought and non-conceptual thought — such is the vast ocean that is itself the nature of reality, profound and immeasurable. Upon it, grasses, trees, moving things in all their variety rise and fall, come and go, and though covered and stirred by multitudes, by reason of its non-conceptual nature that has no fixed abode, it is of one taste, unchanging, like space.

The yogi's very body is like an illusion, like a dream. From that which is the certainty of the body as it actually abides, the perfect union of vajra and lotus gives rise to the wisdom of discernment. From the union of one's own vajra arises fire. From fire, water; from water, liquid substances — first those that are smooth and fluid, then those that are bright and reddish, then those that grow firm and solid, and those that become rounded. Then, from the luminosity free of attachment, from globules of blood arise those that become hard and cartilaginous. These, bearing the form of Viṣṇu's tortoise, are generated from the vital fluids and blood of the parents. Then, from the attachment that arises through the equal union of the two sense faculties, one should understand it in terms of that which is free from attachment and the middle portion free from attachment. From that, the channels arise manifestly in the body — seventy-two thousand and more. There are the central channel, the right channel, the left channel, the navel, the heart center, the throat, the crown, the secret center, the navel-hair wheel, and again thirty-two; the three-mouthed channel, the chain channel, the eye-like channel at the root, the middle channel that is the precious palace, the channel that is the seat of awareness, the shape of the great bow, and the bliss-sustaining jewel wheel. From these many and various forms, abiding at the heart as vital essence in the form of syllables and the like that have become life-breath, come the immeasurable streams of beings of the three realms, bearing within them all faults and all qualities. Therefore, the mudrā that appears as the maṇḍala arising from the body and emerging from the body — and so forth — together with the mudrā of vocal recitation and the mudrā of meditation become three. The mantras that arise perfectly from the vowels and consonants, along with wisdom as the method of mind, are to be held as objects of focus in the manner of great bliss that is undivided.

From that very bliss of the union of the father and mother, Attaining the portions of the family through the successive stages, Arising as the five wisdoms of manifest awakening,
The perfected body arises and will perform its activities.

All phenomena are to be established as the self, and the self is to be established as the deity — the deity itself is wisdom. Form and the other sense objects and the two sense faculties have become method. The perfect union of vajra and lotus is the method of mind and mental factors. The great bliss of samādhi arising from the equal union of mental factors makes method and wisdom of equal taste. This is indicated by the example of what resembles an illusion. Then the tathāgatas in buddha fields as numerous as the grains of sand of the Ganges—an illusion, a reflection of the moon in water, a visual disturbance, a mirage, a dream, an echo, a city of gandharvas (scent-eaters), an optical illusion, a rainbow, lightning, a water bubble, and a reflection in a mirror — by these twelve examples of illusion, the samādhi of great bliss is indicated.

From the channels and winds of the vajra body,
the syllables, the bindus dwelling there,
and the assemblies of vowels and consonants,

method and wisdom arise as a single taste.

Clarity and bliss as the very ground,
non-conceptual dharmatā and activity —
wind and awareness, in equal union, arising, entering, and abiding: that is what it is.

Dharmatā, luminosity, is the all-base — consciousness unmodified, self-luminous, unobscured, self-arisen, constantly moving yet unchanging, constantly:
that suchness abiding is what serves as the ground.

The arising of aspects and mental factors —
their many natures, both sequential and non-sequential in character — are steered by the conditions of conceptual gathering and dispersion.
From the three free of attachment they arise.

Mental engagement — coming and going,
awareness becoming agitated, and mental withdrawal.

The three sorrows: faithlessness,
residing peacefully through absence of aversion, pervasive conceptuality, anger —
these are mere fright, burning.

Contact, coarse conduct, and holding grudges — great terror.

Craving arising as great, middling, and small;
the four appropriating clinging, which conceal.

Non-virtue — the torment of hunger and thirst.

The four mental engagements of a vidyādhara.

The knower — from abiding comes the feeling that makes one wonder:
it is of three kinds — intention.

Sleep and regret, investigation and analysis,
sense of shame and conscientiousness,
non-harmfulness, compassion, and tenderness and loving-kindness — three and three —
and doubt, accumulation, miserliness,

and jealousy: conceptuality is their intrinsic nature.
Within the state of luminosity, expanding and gathering.
Attachment, fixation, and joy, delight and extreme delight —
these are the arising of the realization of attachment.
Contentment through bliss, absence of delusion,
great satisfaction, wisdom,
wonder, laughter, and fulfillment.
Embracing, kissing, pressing together,
and resting — that very samādhi.
Diligence, triumph,
action and seizure arise from effort.
Boasting of strength, pride, arrogance.
Through aspiration one becomes elated.
Innate self-nature is equanimity.
Non-differentiation, which is supreme.
These six — elegance, aversion, resentment.
The virtuous with conscientiousness — clear of speech, truthful, with faith, without deceit, endowed with mindfulness.
Untruth and, likewise, what is definite.
Not vigilance, what is uncertain.
Non-grasping, the mind of non-attachment.
Giving, exhortation — being straightforward.
Likewise, delight, and shamelessness.
Bold harm-doing.
Heedlessness and lack of shame.
That which lacks vigilance.
Through deception and guile, performing shows, inconsistency, engaging in inconstancy, restlessness with remorse —
these are the arising of conceptuality.
From the awareness of luminosity's expansion,
they roam and enter into activity.
These characteristics have been taught.
Attachment: the intermediate moment —
like ignorance itself,

thick, devoid of luminosity.

Forgetfulness and dullness.

Great confusion with wrong views.

The inexpressible is exhausted through entering into cessation.

Weariness, laziness, and sluggishness.

Uncertainty, mental scrutiny.

The arising of indeterminate states, subtle and gross — arising, ceasing, and abiding.

All habitual tendencies, defiled conceptuality — in the very suchness of attaining luminosity, through emptiness free of conceptual elaboration, they become pure and luminous.

That very inner consciousness — the dharmatā co-emergent, free of conceptuality, luminous in essence, empty and selfless —

Moved by wind, the aspects of appearance arise.

In that very instant, intrinsic nature enters into arising.

The three appearances (appearances, increase, and attainment) become manifest.

Therefore, having ascertained these points definitively — just as butter has no deliberate combining with milk and sesame, and just as sesame oil simply arises from sesame — so too, without deliberately combining the vajra and the lotus through the mantra and mudrā of deliberate union, one is unable to closely examine the three consciousnesses. Where there is no wind, there is no support of the all-base consciousness. Where there is no support of the all-base, consciousness does not arise. Where consciousness itself is absent, there is no capacity to properly unite the bhaga and the liṅga, and thus the meditative absorption of great bliss is not attained. Just as butter arises from churning milk, and just as sesame oil arises from sesame, so too it is for the purpose of closely examining the vajra — the gnosis of skillful means — and closely examining the lotus — the gnosis of wisdom. There is no engagement with an object, and since there is no mental grasping at it, the wind, which is the mount of consciousness, is absent. With that absent, the outer four great elements and the inner elements and sense bases cease to be, and the apprehension of the three appearances does not arise. Since there is no entering into the ultimate limit, union does not occur.

The essential nature of awakening mind —
through accomplished devotion, brought to its end, toward the guru, the vajra-holder —
all the stages of the path are perfected.
Obscurations purified, qualities attained,
as one who has found the victory of empowerment:
all activities and accomplishments without remainder,
and the inexhaustible abode of gnosis is reached.

Whoever, through the meditative absorption of great bliss in which all stages of the yogic path are simultaneously perfected, by aspiration alone, will come to abide as a beginner and will also come to abide in irreversibility.

The teaching of selflessness set forth in the general meaning, like a sūtra:

E is the dharma; BAṂ is the person.
Empty, peaceful, without inherent existence —
all aggregates, elements, and sense bases entirely,
all phenomena are free, lacking intrinsic nature.
The gnosis of equanimity, beyond acceptance and rejection.

E is emptiness free of conceptual elaboration;
BAṂ is taught as the supreme skillful means and great compassion.
Non-dual, equal, the bodhicitta of one taste.

The three doors of liberation and the six perfections,
the four immeasurables and the four means of gathering,
the thirty-seven factors conducive to awakening,
the four individual perfect cognitions, the unmingled qualities, the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, and the unguarded —
the vast expanse of knowledge itself pervades all.

From E and BAṂ — stability and movement, appearance and emptiness — all aggregates, elements, and sense bases are pure maṇḍalas of the divine nature.

The many meanings of syllables, sounds, and conventional expressions are without conceptual fabrication; arising from various conditions, causes and effects, distinguished in appearance, like an illusion — these are the conventional notions of the world, signifying through sound.

That which is called "the hidden teaching of desire":
from the yogic union of skillful means and wisdom,
the various forms of first joy, and subsequent attachment,
and the highest ripening — supreme bliss itself,
free of characteristics, arising moment by moment, co-emergent, the great seal of unchanging blissful gnosis —
the different aspects, free of joy, follow thereafter.

That very essence is the unsurpassed awakening mind,
bliss and emptiness inseparable, the great awakening.

All and always, the awakening mind purified by the fire of gnosis:
through undefiled bliss, body and mind become utterly pure.

Throughout the world, the many forms of stability — dependent thereon, Mount Meru assembled through dependent origination, celestial palaces and so forth appear from the delusion of things.
Dependent upon them, all sentient beings of the three realms, throughout their lineages,
arise and cease like illusions.

Saṃsāra has arisen from objects, sense faculties, and conceptual thought.
From the blessing of the Tathāgatas —

By the perfectly averting teaching of the conventional path, turning back from grasping at phenomena as defining marks, through realizing the true meaning of intrinsic nature, awakening is attained.

That suchness of luminosity is distinguished from ordinary consciousness in general.
From it, mind, unmodified,
not falling to any side of the abiding nature,
also free of conceptuality, in the nature of reality,
manifests plainly as the three appearances.

Just as from a state where object and subject have subsided,
from an ocean utterly calm and clear,
moved by wind arising therefrom,
waves emerge and roll —
so from intrinsic nature, mental factors and masses of conceptuality arise.
Through the power of abiding place, cause, time, and condition:
while abiding, from luminous emptiness,
the cause being the inseparability of wind and mind,

in the three times and in the timeless, instant by instant,
what is empty in essence is stirred by wind.
From conditions it appears as phenomena bearing defining marks.
Through the differentiation of abiding things establishing particular distinctions,
that very consciousness is presented as an offering,
and distinguished from what is non-erring.
From the variety of virtue and non-virtue,
pleasure and suffering are experienced.
From karma, afflictions, and habitual tendencies, actions of body, speech, and mind appear to manifest.
Through the instructions of a teacher who purifies what is impure, one is liberated from all of it.
The appearances of merit, non-merit, and their actions —
the varied arising of causes and effects — emerge from a space-like expanse
as space-like magical display.
That very reality, from its nature of unborn arising, abides without cessation.
It is dependent origination:
that very suchness, from the nature of reality as selflessness, beyond conceptual elaboration, free of mixing of existence and non-existence, abides perfectly complete, without fixed location.
In what abides in the sequence of a string of beads,
the wheel that is firm gathers the sequence in its proper order.
The very heart of the mudrā, bearing all sacred commitments, the five elements in their entirety, the goddess Vajradhātu (the deity who is the space of the vajra).
Great bliss, the vajra, the secret excellence:
that unchanging suchness, into which the arising ground dissolves — in an instant, all adornments complete, like a filled vase, the nectar of the crown becomes gnosis victorious.
The three syllables that express it denote the object: Vajradhṛk.
It is the manifestation born from the completion of activity.
Having attained appearance, and simultaneously abiding therein, the subject-bearing: the expansion of appearance.

Through awareness entering into the particular that conceptualizes, the brilliant: the appearance of radiance.

Maitreya (Loving-Kindness, the bodhisattva) then asked: What is the hidden meaning?

The Blessed One declared: What is hidden by conventional truth is this: the entire vessel and its contents, without remainder, appearing as if illusory — that I have blessed, and it is naturally true and perfectly pure.

What is hidden by the three appearances of mind is this: what arises perfectly from the nature of reality — appearance, expansion, and radiance — arises together with intrinsic nature, like the mind and gnosis free of all conceptual thought.

What is hidden by phenomena is this: the meaning of bliss — the bliss of uniting vajra and lotus equally — which signifies the three appearances of naturally pure intrinsic nature: that will come to perfectly abide in the state of great bliss. This is the explanation of the hidden meaning.

Then the great bodhisattva Maitreya asked: Blessed One, what is the general meaning?

The Blessed One declared: The general meaning is explained for the sake of those — such as śrāvakas — who practice the Dharma free of attachment, who have not been liberated from the habitual tendencies of conceptual thought, and who, throughout all the tantras of the Great Yoga, upon hearing the astonishing vajra words that explicitly set forth the phenomena of desire — such as the expression "dwelling in the bhaga of the noble vajra lady" and the like — would disparage them. It is spoken as the general meaning in a manner not contradicting those persons.

Maitreya asked: What is the literal meaning?

The Blessed One declared: Whatever is expressed in reliance upon the meaning of the sounds of the vowel and consonant series, making the limits of expression, the limits and expressions arising from conditions in their variety, together with its explications — this is taught as a partial indication relying upon the diverse conventional designations.

Maitreya then asked:

Maitreya asked: How is this supreme, unshared ultimate explained as being definitive?

Then the Blessed One declared, giving the word "Excellent!" to the great bodhisattvas: Excellent, excellent! O bodhisattva endowed with supreme compassion, listen. The limit is the boundary. "The mode of genuine luminosity" is the ultimate. The limit, having a limit, bound, the genuine limit, the limit itself, free from reversal, transcending all philosophical tenets — this is the ultimate.

The great bodhisattva asked: Blessed One, by what means is the ultimate attained?

The Blessed One declared: The three emptinesses of the limits of the aggregates, elements, and sense sources and so forth, as appearing in the three appearances — empty of those. The limit of the three emptinesses — free from referential object, like an illusion — is the bliss-emptiness of luminosity.

The great bodhisattva asked: Blessed One, how does one arrive at the ultimate of the three emptinesses as luminosity?

The Blessed One declared: Just as fire burns wood and causes it to blaze, so likewise the light of wisdom in luminosity is caused to operate by gnosis over a long duration. Just as it causes even the leaves of a palm tree to blaze, so likewise skillful means causes the expansion of gnosis into luminosity to be thoroughly purified. Just as the petals of a cotton blossom are burned, so likewise the gnosis that obtains appearance, becoming supreme, causes thorough purification. Therefore, just as the leaves of the palm tree and the petals of cotton, when burned, blaze and are reduced to ash, so likewise emptiness, great emptiness, utter emptiness, and total emptiness, through the proximate attainment of appearance, become luminous.

Luminosity is ultimate truth itself.

Through realization of the gnosis of equality,
the mass of conceptuality rising from the basic space —
the activity of the impure antidote —
and all things: cause, condition, object, engagement, are burned by the self-arisen fire of non-conceptual awareness.
Just as the many varieties of wood and the many bundles of cotton are burned and rendered substanceless,

so likewise all grasping at form without remainder is burned and dissolved in the very ground of the dharmadhātu and abides no more.

Through the vajra-like meditative absorption
all conceptuality is utterly destroyed without remainder;
the knowing of perfectly pure gnosis,
the stream of the awakening mind,
flows without cessation, its enlightened activity an unbroken stream;
unchanging emptiness, great bliss, union, the perfectly non-abiding — arising from the unattainable, universally arising, spontaneously accomplished, abiding as suchness.

From suchness itself, conceptuality and non-conceptuality become thoroughly purified, and through the distinction of the intrinsic nature as trained and untrained, one arrives at the essential nature of perfect non-abiding. This is spoken as the definitive teaching.

This concludes the third chapter of the glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya.

Maitreya asked: Blessed One, how is it that all the Tathāgatas in the yoga tantras explain things by means of the six limits?

The Blessed One declared: By means of: taught with intent, and taught without intent; provisional meaning, and definitive meaning; literal, and non-literal.

Maitreya asked: Out of compassion, please, Blessed One, show the distinction of each term.

The Blessed One declared: That very definitive teaching — which is taught with intent in a manner that is wonderfully contrary to worldly convention — is as follows: such vajra expressions as "neither attachment, nor free from attachment, nor the middle between them, not to be found as an intermediate" and the like are taught with intent.

Bliss is not defiled bliss;
it is bliss that is without defilement.

Bliss has been relinquished, and without result,
it arises like an illusion.

That very wisdom of bliss as suchness is not perceived even as a middle.

For persons of lesser faculty
it appears as a terrifying contradiction.
For those of supreme faculty, upon hearing
a teaching on phenomena never heard before, wondrous certainty arises within them,
and through that they attain a marvelous meditative absorption.
This is the defining mark of attaining liberation.

In order to refute those who speak of outer and secret doctrines, who hold the impure to be pure, who wish the unliberated to be liberated, and who enter by their own whim — to reverse even a slight amount of conceptual worldly thinking — the meaning of profound wisdom, the purification of confused appearances about the abiding nature, that very essence was taught with intent.

Now, the following vajra expressions are taught without intent: "no body, no speech, no mind," "without self," "all is empty," "purity," "luminosity," and the like. They are taught without intent because they are not intended to confirm grasping at things and characteristics, or at a self, in all phenomena. Rather, they teach that all phenomena are selfless, and from conceptual-elaboration-free suchness they rely upon emptiness; all phenomena are primordially pure in their intrinsic nature; "no body" means that the aggregates, elements, and sense sources are not perceived; beyond verbal expression, there is no self; and "no mind" is taught without intent because all is empty of inherent existence.

The following vajra expressions are provisional in meaning: camphor, great blood, red sandalwood, vajra, lotus, syllable, and mudrā. Here, camphor refers to semen; great blood refers to menstrual blood; and the mixture with the fluid of red sandalwood refers to that fluid itself.

The following vajra expressions are definitive in meaning: vajra-liṅga (the mark of the father), the characteristic mark, skillful means, lotus-bhaga (the lotus of the mother), wisdom, syllable, mudrā, and the consorts, and so forth. Camphor refers to the maṇḍala syllable; great blood refers to the syllable of the solar maṇḍala; red sandalwood refers to the red eight-petalled lotus with its three syllables; the vajra-tantra characteristic mark is the father; the lotus characteristic mark is the mother; the syllable is the mantra-seed; and the mudrā is the hand-emblem — the fully accomplished body endowed with the four mudrās.

The fully perfected divine body, together with the deities thoroughly visualized, has some capacity to avert confusion beyond the ordinary — that is the common teaching. Furthermore, from the perspective of the meaning of non-difference in intrinsic nature: camphor is the semen called kapūraka, flowing from the motion of all forms; great blood is self-arisen blood, the siṃhalarakta, flowing from root and hair; the fluid of red sandalwood, mingled within the dharmodaya, is fully merged inseparably within the lotus-womb of the mother, and from that non-separation it is the very completion of the full awakening of the bodies of beings. The lotus-bhaga is the wisdom aspect; the vajra-liṅga is the skillful means aspect; from the balanced reverse of sun and moon becoming equalized, the syllable — the seed — accomplishes the qualities. The father-and-mother, the vajra consorts endowed with the four mudrās, truly demonstrate from the dharmodaya the meaning of manifest bliss as gnosis — that is the uncommon teaching.

The Blessed One declared: Whatever is expressed through the medium of the various sound-meanings of the vowels (āli) and consonants (kāli) — their limits, the common characteristics of what is expressed, and the uncommon secret: for the great bodhisattvas, the dhāraṇī-mantras and vidyā-mantras of the supreme great secret are to be thoroughly realized in dependence upon the suchness of this sound. And for those persons who have become logicians, the common verbal expression is the indivisible vajra syllable which functions as life-force; the many collections of teachings also arise from that suchness and dissolve back into suchness — this is what is taught as the provisional meaning.

For those as well, there are the five aggregates, the five families, the five elements, and the five wisdoms — all perfectly pure — together with the heaps of moral discipline, meditative absorption, wisdom, liberation, and the wisdom of the vision of liberation. The support of space meets with the four directions, turning. From the body of sun and moon abiding in their place are born the maṇḍalas of empowerment, trembling with movement, turning toward the directions from the fourth abode. The rivers number eighty-four: a thousand and eighty, bearing the light of Dhṛti. These become gateways to the Dharma and arise as the supreme aggregate. In the both-together tantra (ubhaya-tantra) and the action tantra and the rest, what is explained with clear meaning in the literal sense of the words — for instance, the maṇḍala, the fire-offering, the tormas, the medicinal substances, the assemblage of rites for pacification and the rest, and likewise the teaching of the eight great worldly accomplishments — all of this is explained in the literal sense of the words, set forth according to the meaning of the syllables.

The maṇḍala's conceptual ritual and the rest,
the conduct of approach and accomplishment bearing fruit,
the detailed explanation of the meaning of the limbs —
this is what is taught as the literal sense of the words.

Koṭakṣa, Koṭabhaṇa, Koṭave, Koṭabhaśvapa, Katirka, Kolakhya, Kolaba, Kolabhaṣṭha, Kolastathā, Kolabhābhi — by these, the sense faculties and their objects are expressed. Such vajra-syllables as these are a hidden explanation, conveyed in a manner that is not literal. The secret of the Tathāgata's symbolic language, what the ḍākinīs teach by signs such as Koṭakṣa and so forth, and the secret symbolic usage unknown in the world — this is taught as the non-literal expression.

From bodhicitta itself, free of conceptual elaboration,
free of extremes, devoid of conceptual thought,
the great seal (mahāmudrā) without object —
non-abiding union (yuganaddha), unsurpassed.
The vajra's self-arisen meditative absorption,
the essential nature of the Tathāgata —
this the Victor has taught as the definitive meaning, establishing the analysis of the six extremes.

This is the fourth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya.

Then the great bodhisattva asked: Blessed One, what are the classes of tantra of the great Vajra Vehicle? The Blessed One declared: The classes of tantra are as follows: the tantra of unsurpassed yoga, the tantra of both-together, the tantra of conduct, the tantra of action, and the tantra of conceptual ritual.

Maitreya asked: What is the measure of those tantras? The Blessed One declared: The tantra of unsurpassed yoga consists of twelve thousand verses; if expanded in full, it is beyond counting. The yoga tantra consists of six thousand verses. The conduct tantra consists of eight thousand verses. The action tantra consists of four thousand verses. The tantra of conceptual ritual and the subtle tantra consist of four thousand verses. Together these total thirty-four thousand verses.

The final letters of the names "tantra" and "conceptual ritual" include all of these: ka, kha, ga, gha, ṇa; ca, cha, ja, jha, ña; ṭa, ṭha, ḍa, ḍha, ṇa; ta, tha, da, dha, na; pa, pha, ba, bha, ma; ya, ra, la, va; śa, ṣa, sa, ha, kṣaḥ; a, ā, i, ī, u, ū; ṛ, ṝ, ḷ, ḹ, e, ai, o, au, aṃ, aḥ. These are the assemblages of the syllables of names.

The great bodhisattva asked: Blessed One, what are the ritual enactment and accomplishment of those? The Blessed One declared: Arising in due sequence through the blessing of the ultimate truth by one's own empowerment, in order to fully reveal the abode of awakening that arises from desire, one abides in the mahāsamādhi of great bliss in the form of a wheel-turning king in the midst of the retinue of noble consorts, entering fully into the bhaga of the vajra consort — and so one enacts and accomplishes the six extremes and the four modes of vajra-speech, which are wondrous conduct contrary to the ways of the world.

Thus it abides in the great yoga tantra.

The vidyā-queen, the goddess, and the retinue of the maṇḍala together are to be appointed to their places.

Then, fully practicing the ten aspects of suchness beginning with the accomplishment of enacted activity, one accomplishes — this abides in the yoga tantra.

Fully practicing the vast and various activities of action, the characteristic of the mudrā and visualization belonging to the activity tantra, one accomplishes — this abides in the conduct tantra.

Focusing upon saṃsāra as utterly terrifying, maintaining extreme purity, absent the bliss of a wisdom bodhisattva, absent the pride of oneself as a deity, and practicing through the wondrous sphere of activity proceeding from causes by way of one's own condition — one accomplishes — this abides in the action tantra.

Fully practicing mantra, medicinal substances, fire offering, eye medicine, swift-footedness, and so forth — the eight great siddhis — one accomplishes in the subtle and conceptual tantra.

Now in verse:

The nature of the great secret tantra,
its definitive words, their application, and their grounds, together with the means of its distinctive classification —

the measure of the text and the measure of its elevation, the mode of teaching what is stated and what does the stating:

By generating the awakening mind, the preliminary, and the concordant,
the distinctive path of ripening, the path of blessing,
the subsequent appearance, the connection — all uncommon —
the bliss-path, swift insight, and the transformation of phenomena:
this very thing is the profound and unsurpassed skillful means.

Of the glorious great Vajradhara, inseparable from his body, speech, and mind —
the very essence of supreme great bliss, whose nature is wisdom, stainless and pure.

"Tantra" — the word tantra means continuity:
tanta, the knowing of things, means continuity in what is real;
traya, the three times, being without beginning —
it is that which leads and destroys the host of thoughts.

A continuity that is connected, without missing link,
that expands from the element of sentient beings:
the bodhisattva yogi,
the buddha's deeds, boundless,
uninterrupted, the stream of wisdom,
the inexhaustible wheel of enlightened activity —
upon that very reality the name "tantra" is applied.

The basis of exposition and the occasion of exposition in the great secret:
extensive and condensed, the nature unchanging, entry, abiding, consummation — unsurpassed:
this is the measure of elevation in the Vajra Vehicle.

Since previously the cause involved great anguish, and one was unable to abandon it upon entry —
it is like that of the Great Lord (Mahādeva, Śiva).

Abiding in the path, the two-staged Dharma,
the nature unchanging, the supreme secret —
having traversed the grounds and paths to completion, with the guru's path as the chief,
the unsurpassed is attained in this very life.

Cause, method-path, and result —
the root tantra of the secret that accomplishes:
from the supreme essence, one practices immeasurably.
The subsequent tantra that illuminates, easy to transform, performs the ascetic practices and supplies what is lacking, dispels doubt and bestows certainty,
applies the signs of the time to the mind,
and reveals the distinctions of vessel, knowledge, and fortune.

In the great secret, in all its general and particular aspects:
abiding in difference and in unity — samādhi —
and the ultimate sequence — the samaya of body, speech, and mind —
the suchness of the vow, pervading all — the awakening mind, sealed with the seal of genuine great bliss, wisdom immeasurable, cut off from no direction, falling to no extreme, equality free of conceptual elaboration, great purity — beyond sound and beyond what is not sound: the tantra is unsurpassed.

This is the fifth chapter of the Glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya.

Maitreya asked: Blessed One, what is the first act of engagement?

The Blessed One declared: In the immeasurable palace of the perfectly pure, boundless great maṇḍala of the dharmadhātu — the unchanging great bliss of Akaniṣṭha — the Tathāgata, dwelling at the center surrounded by the retinue of all tathāgatas by means of the bodhicitta vajra, having conferred the unsurpassed secret empowerment of the assembled tathāgatas upon immeasurable great bodhisattvas — the attainment of complete purity of the great secret, the vajra-essence of body, speech, and mind, and the complete purity of wisdom:

Having become the inexhaustible source of adornment — the qualities and enlightened activities of the entire maṇḍala — abiding in the very state of pure appearance free from conceptual elaboration, emanating and gathering: this is called the first act of engagement.

Maitreya asked: Blessed One, how is the supreme king of maṇḍalas to be revealed?

The Blessed One declared:

In this very immeasurable maṇḍala,
the body, speech, and mind of the Tathāgata —

the supreme, unsurpassed vajra — together with support and supported:
the heart-essence of the palace of the Sugata.

For the beings of the desire realm,
upon the great Mount Meru,
in the multistoried mansion:
Śakra (Indra) together with his retinue,
the thirty-two close lords and more,
with self-arisen jeweled offering clouds —
the sequence of empowerment is displayed.

Together with Īśvara and Umā, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the six-faced one, and others —
in order to tame them, through the non-dual union of object and sense faculty,
by way of the conduct of enjoyment and bliss,
for the sake of accomplishing complete purification,
they are introduced into the maṇḍala.

Then, in that very pure realm, transcending the state of suchness itself,
the supreme awakening mind, the unsurpassed vajra, enters the overwhelming vajra samādhi.

The inseparability of dharmadhātu and gnosis, equality itself,
the yoga of great bliss — fully awakened:
sun, moon, lotus, the vowels and consonants (āli-kāli),
from the very suchness of the vajra of mind, speech, and body,
light blazes forth and pervades the world-systems.

All animate and inanimate existence becomes utterly pure.
The stream of luminous appearance is refined through the blessing, and the rank of Vajrasattva is established for beings.

Having obtained bliss and mental joy,
thereafter, from the ocean of yoga and gnosis,
the inseparable sovereign — the body of awakening mind —
from the arising of gnosis and the vajra samādhi, displays the miraculous display of blessing, and the supreme very blessing of mantra —

the unsurpassed miraculous display of empowerment —
in the nature of the spontaneously accomplished heart-secret:

Oṃ Āḥ Hūṃ Svāhā — light radiates forth, rays of light pervade the ten directions.
From Lāṃ Māṃ Pāṃ Tāṃ Āṃ arise the four elements.
From Meṃ Bhāḥ Eṃ Oṃ Oṃ Oṃ Hūṃ Oṃ Saṃ:
the great bodhisattvas, whose nature is the eight consciousnesses.
Rū Śa Ga Ra Pa — the very objects of the senses.
From Jaḥ Hūṃ Vaṃ Hoḥ and the blazing six-Hūṃ lights:
the ten — the kings of the wrathful ones who bring to the limit, together with their consorts —
subdue the directional demons of the assemblages of limbs and abodes.

Supremely excellent yoga displays miraculous wonders.

Then that very bodhicitta vajra-holder of all tathāgatas appears with three faces and six arms, adorned with ornaments.
With complete major and minor marks, bearing the mudrās.
That very one — the dharmadhātu vajra together with the four consorts — comes forth from the dharmodaya and from the center of the heart.
From the emanation of many tathāgatas,
the explicit teaching — that very secret — is proclaimed.

Then, thereafter, for the sake of taming beings of the desire realm, by way of the form of Vajrasattva that pleases — from the body of Vairocana (the Illuminator), the vajra-holding form — a portion of the body melts, manifesting as a goddess.
The conduct of great bliss and joy — the manifest play of gnosis, emanating and gathering — is joyfully displayed.

The glorious supreme maṇḍala of Akṣobhyavajra (the Unshakeable Vajra), immaculate, square, blessed.

Then immeasurable hosts of tathāgatas pervade all directions and times, entirely surrounding it.
Awakening mind itself, the vajra, abides at the center.
The Blessed Vairocana, the jewel-born,
Amitābha, the unfailing depth.

Together with the immeasurable Sugatas, non-dual with the primordial wisdom mother of self-luminous appearance — this is the utterly perfect sequence of the great yoga.
Blessed by the vajra of body, speech, and mind,
the samaya being and the great wisdom being — the power is stabilized and the empowerment and seal are conferred.
The samādhi being abides definitively at the heart.
The supreme protector of the great yoga,
the Tathāgata who is the being of great awareness — skillful means and wisdom abide as non-dual.

When the immeasurable tathāgatas have assembled,
the immeasurable maṇḍalas of the retinue are beyond all telling.
With vast clouds of offerings of vajra, jewel, and lotus,
the sky is filled and worship is offered through a host of offerings.
To the Tathāgata, the great Vajradhara,
all tathāgatas and bodhisattvas together made supplication in common.

"From the secret assembly of all tathāgatas, arisen from the secret,
gathered into the vajra essence — Blessed One, please expound the essence."

Thus they beseeched and made supplication. At that moment Vajradhara spoke:

"Here, to you who have applied yourselves with delight to the definitive secret, who have requested the supreme great secret —
since even all the most excellent tathāgatas were themselves visited by doubt,
how do all you bodhisattvas understand it?"

All the bodhisattvas made this supplication:

"To that which has become supremely difficult to understand
by reason of the words arising from the vajra samaya, through the very power and strength of the tathāgatas,
taking hold of the fortunate ones,
with the most excellent power, fully accomplished —
bless us with utterly profound realization, and grant empowerment so that direct understanding is achieved.

All the wondrous wisdom-displays,
please reveal them clearly right now."

This is the sequence of the first approach.

The glorious Vajradhara, abiding in the vajra samādhi of manifest perfect awakening,
as the Primordial Protector himself,
the being of great awareness,
non-dual with the dharmadhātu vajra mother, emanates and gathers the maṇḍala.

The glorious Akṣobhyavajra, entering the vajra samādhi of the wisdom lamp, arises from Vajradhṛk.

Three faces, six hands,
like indranīla sapphire and jasmine flowers,
with faces blazing with passion.

lotus and wheel and jewel,
and on the left, lotus and sword.

Adorned and seated in vajra posture,
from that very body streams of light radiate forth, pervading through all the Sugatas
the ten-directional buddha fields in every quarter.
Having purified and cleansed the migrating beings, they re-enter through the crown and dissolve into the heart.

Thereupon, immediately,
the Blessed One becomes Vajra Aversion.
Seated upon a lion throne of various precious gems,
above moon and sun,
he abides at the center of the great maṇḍala.

This is the samādhi of the manifest arising of the lord of the maṇḍala.
This has been the sixth chapter of the glorious Vajrajñānasamuccaya.

The glorious Vairocana, entering the vajra samādhi of manifest realization,
three faces, six hands, jasmine-white in color —
he sports with the wheel, bell, and consort.

upon an elephant throne, above lotus and moon,
adorned and seated in the cross-legged posture.

The Sugata Ratnasambhava (the Jewel-Born One) abides in the selflessness vajra.
Arisen from Ratnādhṛk, golden in hue,
with wish-fulfilling jewel and bell,
wheel, lotus, and sword,
equal to a white conch and blue lotus — adorned with jewel ornaments, a supreme horse, with consort, seated in the cross-legged posture.

The glorious Amitāyus
abides in the blazing-light vajra.

Arising from the syllable Ārolik as the light of desire,
blue and white, with lotus, bell,
vajra, wheel, and sword,
with consort, seated upon a peacock throne,
adorned with jewel ornaments and radiating light,
seated in the cross-legged posture.

The Blessed One of the indestructible body abides in the overpowering vajra.
Arisen from Prajñādhṛk, emerald in hue, white and red, holding sword and bell,
vajra, wheel, and jewel,
lotus — adorned with jewel ornaments —
with consort, seated upon a Śaṅśaṅ throne, seated in the vajra cross-legged posture.

This is the meditative absorption of the manifest arising of the wheel of the Tathāgata family.

This is the seventh chapter of the glorious Jñānavajra-samuccaya.

The vajra queen Locanā (the Seeing One) of all the Tathāgatas, dwelling in the samaya of equalization of all vajra-holders, arising from Mohārati,

with a face the color of a white conch, tinged blue and red,
equal to the vajra of body,
abides to the east and south upon a lotus and moon.

The vajra queen Māmakī, entering into the meditative absorption that delights the buddhas, arisen from Dveṣarati,

with faces of vaiḍūrya, white conch, and the color of desire,
adorned and resplendent with various jewel ornaments, abides in the south-western corner upon a lotus and moon.

The vajra queen in white garments, entering into the vajra meditative absorption of devoted attachment, arisen from Rāgārati,
equal in nature to the vajra of speech, Paṇḍurikā, blue and white,
graceful and adorned with jewel ornaments, abides in the north-western corner upon a lotus and moon.

The vajra queen Tārā,
the singer called Vajragītā (Vajra Song), entering into meditative absorption, arisen from Vajrarati, graceful,
emerald, white conch, and Bhanduka in hue,
equal to the vajra of enlightened activity,
beautifully adorned with jewel ornaments,
abides in the north-eastern corner upon a lotus and moon.

At the navel, heart, throat, and secret place of the body, the seed syllables Lāṃ, Māṃ, Pāṃ, Tāṃ —
the goddess consorts who sport in blissful wisdom together with the elements.

This is the great mudrā of the equality of suchness,
the meditative absorption of the goddess of the union of equal wisdom.
This is the eighth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajra-samuccaya.

The goddess Vajrarūpā (Vajra Form), entering into the meditative absorption of the supreme samaya offering, arisen from the mantra Vajrarūpe,

supreme and white in body, holding a mirror,
equal to Vajranetrikā (Vajra Eyes),
beautifully adorned with jewel ornaments,
abides in the corner of the fire direction.

From the goddess Vajraśabdā (Vajra Sound),
the vajra cloud of light in the sky,
abides in the satisfying meditative absorption.
Arisen from Vajraśabde, equal to Vajra Māmakī,
a singer who makes garlands resound with melody,
worshipping all through song,
abides in the corner of the direction free from truth.

The goddess Vajragandhe (Vajra Fragrance), revealing the seven branches of awakening,
abides in the vajra meditative absorption of suchness.
Arisen from Vajragandhe, equal to the white-robed consort,
holding the supreme divine object of the conch,
adorned with jewel ornaments, graceful and mindful,
abides in the corner of the awareness-holders' direction.

The goddess Vajra Supreme Taste, abiding in the meditative absorption of universal offering, the great samaya offering,
arisen from Vajrāśye,
holding a jeweled lotus vessel filled with nectar,
holding the essence of supreme taste,
equal to Tārā,
abides in the corner of the direction of power.

Thus they, the wisdom-consort offering goddesses,
are worshipped by an ocean of clouds of offering.

This is the ninth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajra-samuccaya.

The essence of the ground of the bodhisattvas —

Arisen from the mantra of Kṣitigarbha, born from the supreme peaceful samaya,

white in color, holding a wheel with ten spokes, adorned with a topknot and a crown, seated in the eastern corridor in the cross-legged posture —
this is the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, whose samaya is both substantial and insubstantial,
abiding in the meditative absorption of equal taste.

Arisen from the syllable Vajrapāṇi Aṃ, golden in color, holding a blazing vajra, seated in the cross-legged posture in the southern corridor —
this is Ākāśagarbha, the essence of awakening and of space, who looks to the supreme samaya,
having entered into meditative absorption.
Arisen from the mantra of Ākāśagarbha, golden in color, holding an emerald,
adorned with garlands, abiding in the southern corridor.

The bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara

The glorious protector Maitreya
has entered into the meditative absorption
of the mantra-arrangement of the Vajra Proliferation.
Arisen from Maitrīnātha, conch-white in color, with a nāga-tree water-vessel for ablution, adorned with precious ornaments,
he abides in the eastern corridor.

The bodhisattva Samantabhadra
has entered into the meditative absorption
of the cloud of offerings pervading all buddha-fields.
Arisen from Samantabhadra,
green in color, bearing a multi-colored vajra,
adorned with various precious ornaments,
seated in the cross-legged posture in the northern corridor.

All of them are upon lotus-and-sun thrones,
adorned with topknots and garlands,
each with three faces and six arms,
the principal face gazing in the manner of a loving gaze.

Mem Thlīm Oṃ Oṃ Oṃ and Hūṃ Oṃ Saṃ —
these correspond to the eight consciousnesses.
They are the purely awakened bodhisattvas.

This is the tenth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajra-samuccaya.

The assembly, the disciples, the person, and the teaching of words and meaning, fully gathered under the two truths —
these are the distinctive determinations.

Then at the four gates of the maṇḍala and in all the cardinal directions are the ten wrathful ones, who bear terrifying forms and who vanquish obstacles,
each with three faces and six arms.

The great wrathful one, the Destroyer of Yama,
has entered into the meditative absorption
of the blazing vajra-wheel.
Arisen from Yamāntakṛt, dark blue in the center, white on the right, red on the left,

bearing a vajra-hammer, a wheel, a sword, a jewel, and the threatening gesture —

he abides at the eastern gate upon a gandharva.

The wrathful king who perfects wisdom
has entered into the meditative absorption
of the vajra of manifest awakening.

Arisen from the mantra Prajñāntakṛt, conch-white in color with a blue and red face, holding a lance, a battle-axe, a wheel, a sword, a jewel, and a lotus — he treads upon sprites at the southern gate.

The king of the wrathful ones, Supreme Horse, arising from the meditative absorption of the lotus of vajra-freedom, the origin of wisdom — arisen from Padmadhṛk, resembling the color of Bhāṇḍurīka, dark blue on the right and white on the left, inspiring awe, holding a lotus, a vajra-hammer, a sword, a wheel, and a battle-axe — he abides at the western gate upon a lord of nāgas.

The wrathful king of coiled nectar, having entered into the vajra-samādhi of the essence of blessing — arisen from Vighnantatakṛt —

with a face of white and red malachite, holding a wheel, a sword, a stake, and threatening with the finger-gesture of menace —
he abides at the northern gate upon a yakṣa.

The wrathful king, the Immovable Protector, entering into meditative absorption in the inexhaustible vajra of the dharmadhātu,
arisen from the mantra of Āryācala —
with a face of white and red vaiḍūrya, holding a sword, a wheel, a stake, a lotus, a jewel, and making the threatening finger-gesture —
he subdues the sages of the southern direction.

The wrathful king, Sovereign of Desire, entering into meditative absorption in the unobstructed vajra of meditative concentration,

arisen from the mantra of Ṭakkīrāja —
with a face of indranīla blue and kuṇḍa red, making the threatening finger-gesture with crossed hand-gesture, holding an iron hook, a sword, a blue lotus,
making the threatening finger-gesture, and holding a lasso —
he abides upon a demon-throne.

The wrathful one, Bearer of the Vajra Club, arisen from the samādhi of terrifying compassion, from Nīladaṇḍa — with a face of white and red like a rain-cloud in color, making gestures with a staff, a sword, a jewel, a wheel, a lotus, and the threatening finger — fierce, unbearable, blazing with masses of fire —
he abides upon the seat of the wind-god.

The Great and Mighty Vajra Wrathful One, entering into meditative absorption in the vajra of the inseparable three bodies (kāyas), arisen from the mantra of Mahābala —
with a face of cloud-white, with utpala-hue, and with a face of vaidūrya, holding a trident, a fan-banner, a sword, a wheel, a jewel, and making the threatening finger-gesture —
he abides upon a seat of elemental spirits.

The wrathful king, Vajra Uṣṇīṣa, entering into meditative absorption in the supreme vajra of the power of awareness,
arisen from the mantra of Uṣṇīṣavijaya —
sky-colored, with the uṣṇīṣa's seal bound upon the crown, holding a vajra, a sword, a lotus, making the threatening finger-gesture, holding a lasso and a wheel —
he destroys all harm and subdues the lords of the earth, subduing the divine king Brahmā.

The wrathful body of Vajra Harm and Beauty, entering into the vajra samādhi of the gnosis of the supreme origin, arisen from the mantra of Śumbharāja — utterly dark blue, fierce, destroyer of the poisonous and malignant forces of animate and inanimate existence, holding a vajra, a wheel, a sword, a jewel, a lotus, and making the threatening finger-gesture —

he pacifies all harm and subdues the lords of the earth.

As for the wrathful ones in their bodily stations: at the seed, hand-implement, and root-place — on the right a dark-blue skull-staff, on the left a club; at the throat, one bearing a lotus; at the secret place, a coiled variegated vajra. The four gates are guarded by Jaḥ, Hūṃ, Baṃ, Hoḥ. Adorned with the six-part Hūṃ: at the right shoulder a hook, at the left a trident; at the divine navel a staff and triśūla; at the crown a vajra in a rounded form; the wheel elevated and exalted.

All the wrathful kings are accompanied by their consorts, adorned with precious jeweled nāga ornaments, their hair blazing upward amid masses of fire, with bodies that are thick-limbed and heavy. Crying out Hā hā hūṃ hūṃ, they cause the three planes of existence to tremble. They tame those demons who grasp at things as substantially existent, and those who hold wrong views. The union of father and mother in non-dual bliss reveals the heart-essence of gnosis of the maṇḍala of the great secret bliss. This is the meditative absorption of the wheel of the manifest arising of the divine assembly.

This is the eleventh chapter of the Glorious All-Gathering Vajra Gnosis.

What is the division of the ornament of depth?

Through its divisions of the bounded and the manner of exposition, it is adorned with distinctive capacity as an ornament — this is the teaching of the secret ornament of the sovereign of the earth.

As for the ornament of breadth, there are general and specific kinds.

For breadth: that which teaches the meaning of the subject, that through which the five possessing lineage ones are definitively led,
the place that accomplishes persons and attainments,
five measures, endowed with the immeasurable form realm,
the defining marks of a qualified teacher,
the tantra, the occasion, the definitive words,
and the conduct that is brought to conclusion through its causes.

The ornament of distinguishing the Dharma comprises the two assemblies of students and the two truths.

Then the great bodhisattva Maitreya (loving-kindness) asked:

"Relying upon the supreme meditative absorption of the king of karma, the great yoga abiding in ultimate truth, how should one thoroughly engage in the welfare of sentient beings?" The Blessed One declared: "For as long as one does not perform the activity of pacification and so forth for the benefit of sentient beings, for that long one will remain thoroughly established in the ultimate limit. When one sees that the welfare of all sentient beings is to be accomplished, at that point one arises from the ultimate limit, and having accomplished the welfare of sentient beings, one enters into and does not abide at the ultimate limit itself, thus actualizing the nirvāṇa that does not remain.

When the benefit of beings arises,
at the moment the time has come,
beheld by the vajra eye,
all enlightened activities arise without obstruction, certainly,
in accordance with the intentions of those to be trained.

One who has obtained firm ground and wind
and is borne aloft by wind, relying on the vital effort
of skillful means and wisdom,
achieves the swift-footed vajra siddhi.

Through the ordinary body, speech, and mind,
one-pointedly focusing on deity, mantra, wind, and mind,
by thoroughly transforming them with the meditation wind and the mother wind,
the attainment of the golden transmutation is achieved.

From the consciousness of the illusion that makes one a deity, through the clarity of samādhi, water, and wind,
by seeing matter that has become invisible,
the eye-medicine pill itself is thus accomplished.

The sharp visualization of wind,
the supreme weapon of the yogin,
cuts wherever it is aimed:
the siddhi of the unobstructed sword.

When ordinary breath ceases without conceptuality, another mother abides for the field-protecting magical display.

From the power of mantra, the messenger,
the siddhi of the resurrected corpse arises.

From the nectar abiding in one's own body,
when the elements become balanced through equalized taste,
just as the supreme elixir with its essence is found,
the distinctive attainment of essence-extraction is accomplished.

At the channel-point of the sky-wind,
by purifying the wind-vessel and knowing how to conceal,
one attains bliss without a shadow cast, causing what does not appear to appear.

From the aperture of the channel of the secret gate,
by clarifying the nine elements of constituent purity and impurity with the lamp of the assembled light,
the subterranean siddhi of the asuras' cavity is found.

Enchantment, summoning, and dispelling, suppression, inflation, wrathful activities,
pacification, and increase — these are accomplished through the nāgas.

Because of the distinction in subject to be expressed and means of expression, in example and manifest power,
and in the particular meaning of Dharma,
it is the powerful ornament of the secret.

Abiding, clarity, and miraculous power, qualities and enlightened activities: the ornaments in sequence —
these are ever adorned with their means of expression.
The purpose that is served is unsurpassed.

The purpose-establishing and the great secret of gnosis — seeing the meaning and the essence:
the ornament teaches differentiation and synthesis.

Pacifying poison, protecting,
and the activity that crushes the power of adversaries:
these are the many collections of activities taught in the vast expanse.

This is the twelfth chapter, the act of engaging, from the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

Then the great bodhisattva Maitreya asked: "Blessed One, what are the seven kinds of ornament?"

The Blessed One declared: "They are taught through five kinds of preamble, four kinds of reasoning, explanation through six limits, four modes of explanation, two kinds of division, examination of the student through five kinds of person, and the intention of the two truths.

The five kinds of preamble are as follows: the name, the person, the agent, the measure, and the purpose.

From the first, the preamble teaching the occasion of discourse:

Endowed with the five excellences, summarized, concordant with the jewel and the Dharma of the golden wheel, the syllables E and VAM, the vajra, abiding at the crown, the Teacher with his retinue, the occasion, and likewise the Dharma, gnosis, the time, the measure, the purpose accomplished —
the bodhisattva, the vajra ritual, the empowerment, the chapter with synonyms endowed with the five aspects of the situation, distinguished in meaning by the two stages and three tantras, divided into sections from the side of awakening."

The supreme limb of yoga practice and accomplishment, gathered in sequence through the four vajra limbs,
from the distinctions of purpose: activity and attainment,
the eight accomplishments, the supreme, perfect and complete.

At the great-bliss wheel, the bindu as the chief:
nine hundred wisdom-winds arise;
eleven, four quarters, five sections — the root abiding places;
twice fifty: the vowels and consonants —
the wheel with a thousand spokes, the hidden wheel.

The conduct, graduated and sequentially secret:
the stirring of the essence of the wondrous maṇḍala, mantra and wisdom, the arising of the body of gnosis, and the rites —
the infinitely vast lineage-holder, limbs, and fruits are taught.
Mantra and illness, supreme-inclined yoga accomplished, activity accumulated and concluded, subsequent retention, dream Dharma, the pure maṇḍala, the gathered ritual activities — samaya vows, fully perfected: the condensed teaching of the text.

This is the thirteenth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium.

At the heart-center, the Dharma wheel in its very nature — whatever is the secret essence of the innately born, the supreme lineage-stream of the great Śākya king, endowed with the time, born in the palace of ultimate meaning, breathing relief —
the occasion of awakening: from A, KHAM, BĪR, HŪM, the entry, the water-gate, support of genuine liberation;
from vision: the wind-domain, transcending objects, all seen trembling;
the well-gone one, wisdom-seeds as six —
the support of definite arising and self-arising, non-dual, bound and ceased by cessation, the certainty stirring at the heart,
the Vajradhara made manifest, wisdom-conduct known, turning the wheel, teaching, obtaining the supreme essence — becoming omniscient, unsurpassed.

That is called the tantra: the five manifest awakenings, purified aggregates, the elements' secret, a single family-nature,
the occasion established, empowerment and so forth as path and vajra, the cause: conduct — peaceful, fierce, wrathful, gathering the assembly —
the divisions of the occasion are to be understood in two modes.

The wish-fulfilling jewel, the body endowed with essential nature.

This is the fourteenth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium.

At the throat, the enjoyment wheel, the vajra of speech:
the six with edges, endowed with the strength of the mighty elephant, from the collection of expressed meanings, names, words, expressions, sounds,
the six united tastes, the enjoyment expressed with meaning,
the definite purposes of the six destinies, become an ornament,
liberation from the worldly abode and beyond the world;
the broadly attained yoga, cause and effect, dream,
and the comparable, showing illusion — the interpretable meaning.

The graduated philosophical systems, from dhāraṇī, a gathering of qualities, liberation through essential nature, emptiness,
non-conceptuality, non-arising, phenomena purified,
free from elaboration — from suchness, taught universally.

Completely purified wisdom, the definitive meaning, turning back the mind that grasps phenomena as signs and characteristics, showing the path of genuine, non-dual wisdom, overwhelming what is inferior, the wondrous supreme meaning — the intended explanation, the great secret, source of all, accomplishing all aims.

From the great ocean of the arising of phenomena,
led by the rope of compassion, the supreme intelligence, expanding and condensing the words and meaning, reaching the seat of awakening —
these qualities are called the non-intentional.

The purity of the abodes of channels, winds, awakening mind, and syllables;
the secret distinction of single taste, vital breath, and exertion — the definitive and interpretable;
at the heart, the five syllables of the root, the five falling syllables — six and five of the intended explanation: what is to be known, the path to be trained.

The non-intentional: the vowels, the branches of the melodious voice of speech,
the very suchness that proclaims the selflessness of phenomena;
the vowels and consonants with six — the marks and signs, adorned from the sound of suchness, unsurpassed.

The non-suchness sound, ten abiding places, the vajra-sphere:
the condensed Guhyagarbha, expressed through symbol-explanation itself.
The Dharma of virtue at the beginning, middle, and end, unsurpassed, inexhaustible, in all aspects — the infinitely vast accomplishment of meaning, the gathered ritual activities of thought,
abiding upon the accomplished, shown arising as the sound of suchness.

Irreversible, free and transcending extremes,
the especially deep meaning of the essence through symbol —

Freed from the conventional designations of the Victor's sphere of activity, it is proclaimed as the sound of non-suchness.

Intention directed toward another time is interpretable meaning.
Intention directed toward another person is interpretable meaning.

Intention directed toward equality is definitive meaning.
Intention directed toward another object is definitive meaning.
Intention directed toward a person's disposition is intentional teaching.
Intention directed obliquely toward transformation is intentional teaching.
Intention directed obliquely toward the antidote is intentional teaching.
Intention directed obliquely toward the text is the sound of non-literality.
Intention directed obliquely toward defining characteristics is the sound of non-literality.

This is the fifteenth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium.

Abiding in the emanation wheel at the navel,
the explanation possessing its proper mode, faultless and free from inversion in its teaching —
this accords with the Dharma-method of the Vajra Queen.

The navel wheel, bearing sound, with eight syllables:
in the sūtra, e-vaṃ, ma-yā, secret itself.

The tantra's general symbol, form, sound, and seal,
from the conventional blessing of self and other —
the dream body and illusory body are symbolized; the bardo is purified.

The three minds, emptiness, wisdom's concealment itself.

From the three appearances, directly as they arise, pure luminosity.

From bliss, the blazing and dripping of the fierce inner heat.

The outer, non-dual, secret meditative absorption.

The illusory display is taught in the manner of the Queen.

First, the meaning of the syllable — the general name alone.

Having set forth the joining of conditions through vowels and consonants,
the many modes of activity, together with their sounds,
are symbolized by the connection of actions, body, and limbs.

From the two general and specific meanings, the direct meaning belongs supremely to the paths of hearers, solitary buddhas, and bodhisattvas, endowed with the six — entry, liberation, and so forth.
Complete knowledge of all phenomena is taught here.

The general meaning of the Vajra Vehicle for all tantras —
the yoga of viewing intention, secretly teaching, together with awareness mantras and dhāraṇīs, the very secret mantra —
the successive stages of entry into the gathered path.

From the hidden meaning, the supreme secret essence,
the source of the unsurpassed, like the Queen, adorned outwardly with precious ornaments as befits the direction — through the two general meanings, the garment of successive robes.
The hidden secret meaning: the Queen's body, speech, and mind.
The body is like illusion, convention, and dream.
Speech is from the non-dual union of wind and mantra.
Consciousness, mind itself, the three appearances concealed.
Through the path of bliss, the four joys concealed.
The supreme secret of the play of great wisdom —
the essence, great bliss, innately born.

The source of wisdom itself is the four moments.
The ultimate, the real, luminosity itself.
Relying upon that, the path swiftly traversed:
self-arisen calm abiding and insight, equal in taste.
Union, unchanging, vajra of awakening mind.
The path brought to completion, spontaneously accomplished essential nature.
Beyond expression, the great expanse — that too is suchness itself.

From e-vaṃ, endowed with the five excellences:
known from the example meaning through sound and signs.
From the forty syllables, the secret opening statement —
e-vaṃ as the secret, the sūtra's expanded opening proclaimed.
The maṇḍala appearance, taught as the abode of Jambudvīpa.
The form of the secret mantra and the symbol mantra joined to meaning — what has become common, the dispelling of doubt.

This is the sixteenth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium.

From the wheel of the ūrṇā at the point between the brows, from the activity of the channel through the single taste of method and wisdom, breath and effort, the entering and exiting, the expanding and gathering of bodhicitta,
and the method of outer and secret cutting through superimposition — from the distinctive abiding nature of the vajra body,
it is like a general bearing a sword.
For the two — assembly and student — the general and individual characteristics,

elaboration and conduct, suchness as appearance, the path.
The opening of the sense gates of consciousness and wisdom, taught through the doors of thorough distinction among phenomena.
The analysis of persons is known in two divisions;
separated by empowerment, distinctively with respect to phenomena too —
the outer inclines, the secret abides within.
That very suchness — its particular distinctions — is to be illustrated.
The path by which worldly beings reverse the three realms through meditative concentration,
and the transcendence of the world: the non-reversing, the genuine, is taught.
From wisdom, the support of the guru's path — extraction, completion, attainment.
Through the unbroken stream of blessing, the unsurpassable meaning of great bliss.
The supremely accomplished bliss without compare — dispelling non-realization, wrong conception, and doubt.
Free from superimposition and denigration, stainless, possessing accomplished secrecy.
Ultimate in essence, perfected awakening: the fruit as path, as conduct.
This is the seventeenth chapter of the Glorious Jñānavajra, the Compendium of All.

Dependent on the secret wheel and the family, the faculty of a being whose mind belongs to one of five families — superior, most superior, inferior, and middling —
the limbs, the doors of the winds, the domain of the five faculties, endowed with the five nectars: that is suchness as minister,
the bindus of bodhicitta, the source of bliss.
That very secret wheel, the sustainer of bliss,
is gathered by the stream of fortunate and intelligent beings.
The person's family-type is matched to examples:
the distinctions of the vessel are concordant with the Dharma, comparable.
The gradation of faculties entering the stream — differing qualities are concordant with the Dharma in the minister:
like sandalwood, one of inferior faculties.
Like the blue lotus, the one who has become last.
The white lotus — the fortunate who are slightly shrunken.

The red lotus — one of superior faculties, turning with great diligence.
The most superior is like a jewel, unsurpassable.
The channels, the bodhicitta syllables, the pure winds — arise in determinate and indeterminate ways.
Through the trained, and through those whose nature, qualities, and reverence have been attained beginninglessly.
Like sandalwood: one of the śrāvaka family.
Like the blue lotus: a pratyekabuddha.
The white lotus: bodhisattvas.
Like the red lotus: those who enter the secret mantra.
Like the jewel, endowed with qualities:
that is the family of the glorious Vajradhara.

This is the eighteenth chapter of the Glorious Jñānavajra, the Compendium of All.

Conventional truth is like a moon reflected in water, and so forth.
Ultimate truth is emptiness — the eighteenth.
Its meaning appears in an instant, like stars and planets rising over the ocean.

All qualities are brought to their fullness from the place of the uṣṇīṣa.
The essence of the three vajras, the three bodies, is perfected.
Everything shakes, stabilized by bodhicitta.
It is the general who bears the sword that cuts superimposition.
Ultimate and conventional, inseparable — the supreme horse.
The Middle Way of union, not abiding at any extreme.
The four bodies spontaneously accomplished, wisdom: the perfect buddha.
The basis of purification and the means of purification are present in graduated sequence.

All the channel-abodes of the vajra body — whatever is coarse or subtle in dependence on the central channel, whatever has been equalized and become the great vajra secret —
the suchness of the two truths as the path:
the gathering of all, the sequence fully perfected,
and through the vajra-like samādhi of awakening —
throughout the first, middle, and final,
at all times and in all aspects as support,
all-pervading, with no fixed abode yet an abode inconceivable;
cause and result unobstructed, the arising of dependent origination —

the lordship of body and so forth, boundless qualities,
the very buddha-fields pervading like space,
the union dissolving wherever it settles and enters as dance —
the intrinsic nature of bodhicitta, unchanging, non-dual, of equal taste: the path,
and in view as well as conduct, thoroughly in union,
endowed with the splendor of arising unobstructed.
The wisdom unsurpassed, the ground of the thirteen lordships,
the ultimate, instantaneous: awakening-space wisdom,
inseparable, great awakening: the protector himself,
great bliss, great equality, the great self-arisen.

This is the nineteenth chapter of the Glorious Jñānavajra, the Compendium of All.

Inner emptiness, outer emptiness, inner-and-outer emptiness, and the emptiness of emptiness — these are gathered by meditative absorption (samādhi).

Great emptiness, ultimate emptiness, compounded emptiness, and uncompounded emptiness — these are gathered by diligence.

The emptiness that transcends extremes, the emptiness without beginning or end, and the emptiness without abandonment — these are gathered by perfect joy. The emptiness of intrinsic nature and the emptiness of all phenomena — these are gathered by thorough pliancy. The emptiness of particular characteristics and the emptiness of non-apprehension — these are gathered by the factors of awakening that perfectly discriminate phenomena. The emptiness of non-things and the emptiness of essential nature — these are gathered by perfect mindfulness. The emptiness of the essential nature of non-things — this is gathered by perfect equanimity, the factor of awakening endowed with it. This is the instant — the meaning of the truth of the nature of reality.

Then the bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha rose slightly before the protector Maitreya (Loving-kindness, the future Buddha), asked his forbearance, and addressed the Blessed One: "I request permission to ask a little about the profound meaning, and space to do so." The Blessed One declared: "If you know the time has come, ask as you see fit. I shall teach it well."

Then the bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha spoke in verse:

The intention of this great secret tantra is profound and vast beyond measure, and since its depth is difficult to fathom,
I pray you speak its profound essential meaning.

The Blessed One then declared:

Excellent, Ākāśagarbha!

That very great secret, from its first level to its last,
all the distinctions of its earlier and later gradations — listen to the teaching with reverence, and hold it well.

The secret suchness, unsurpassed,
whose cause and fruit are profound and vast,
the tantra that unites skillful means and wisdom:
the union, great bliss, shall be taught.

Good at the beginning, the middle, and the end —
it teaches the supreme awakening mind itself.
The distinctions of ground and of things,
the capacity of the path, activity and the rest, and the teaching of the wisdom that is the source of arising — these give birth to the aspiration mind and the engaging mind.

The awakening mind taught in the ultimate sense,
the arousing of mind according to true meaning:
from the meditative absorption (samādhi) of Samantabhadra,
at the crown a lotus, moon, and sun —
the wheel OM, white, radiating light;
at the throat a red lotus, AH, blazing with light;
at the heart a moon-disc vajra,
white, five-pointed, radiating light —
the HŪṂ wisdom the color of liquid silver.

The awakening mind of conventional and ultimate truth —
let this very suchness be established in meditative absorption.
At the forehead a jewel, the earth-letter in gold;
at the navel a sword, vibrantly green —
these, the essential nature of the five wisdoms, radiating light, purifying beings with their brilliance,
gather back again, and the lord of the family,
the light of vajra-vaiḍūrya (lapis lazuli),

dissolves into the vajra at the heart;
through the opening of the wrathful vajra,
the assembled nature is Vajradhara himself.
The very vajra of the awakening mind abides in non-dual great bliss —
it will be shown through the expression of realization.

One who abides in the meditative absorption of yoga
and abides on the worldly path:
if they incline excessively toward the outer,
they engage the thought of the eight worldly concerns.
Without abandoning the practice of divine visualization,
by training in the subtle wind and by meditating on the coarse bindu, one attains great activities and the common accomplishments —
by directing attention to these, provisional results are obtained.

From the meditative absorption endowed with the two stages,
the path of the family yoga with expansion and gathering,
from the suchness of seed and bindu,
the essential nature: wisdom and great bliss are accomplished.
The supreme inner meaning is to be made manifest.

The arranged maṇḍala,
and the maṇḍala that abides in body and awakening mind,
the very source of the great-bliss maṇḍala —
the supreme maṇḍala of mind.

The maṇḍala of vase, secret, and wisdom,
and the maṇḍala of the very heart of suchness:
this is the supreme empowerment of wisdom (jñāna).

In the great maṇḍala of secret suchness-wisdom, great bliss spontaneously arisen and co-emergent — the vajra of immeasurable ultimate wisdom empowers, without obstruction, all those who are endowed with good fortune.

This is the twentieth chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

The supreme actuality of the Dharma, which is the activity of the Tathāgatas
the secret of conduct made manifest:

those with exceptional vessel have understood it.

From doubts arising about why, in a pure abode with an assembled retinue, words such as these should appear,
whether they are outward-facing and shared,
literal and otherwise than literal,
or whether they enter the teaching as one pleases — these misconceptions are reversed by the Tathāgatas:
reversing what has become inverted,
they spoke in reply, severing superimpositions.

From the teaching of the meaning of selflessness as the object of mind,
and the presentation of the meaning of solitude,
the secret of awakening is taught progressively and simultaneously.
Suchness itself arises manifestly as the path.
Conduct and liberation that are unsurpassed:
for the sake of taming beings through manifold skillful means,
one engages in conduct like an illusion.
Holding the supreme vow of yogic discipline,
conferring empowerment on all and everywhere,
fearless and victorious over all foes —
this is the conduct of vidyā-vow.
Samantabhadra, the protector, engages in all conduct.

Through conduct with conceptual elaboration, take up as the path
the non-dual way of meditative equipoise and post-meditation.
Attaining conduct victorious over all directions,
the great wisdom is to be practiced.
From the union of great bliss and equality of taste, ultimately one is liberated beyond acceptance and rejection.

From the conduct of the Avadhūtī:
one engages in conduct that is elaborated, and conduct that is free of elaboration and pure,
and conduct that is utterly free of all elaboration.

This is the twenty-first chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

The unsurpassed empowerment of the awakening mind, secret, belonging to all buddhas:

through empowerment performed according to the capacity of faculties —
superior, supremely superior, and middling —
all are marked by the path of conviction and practice.
From the supreme great secret meaning,
the path of wisdom is itself taught.

The measure of the great maṇḍala — primordial wisdom immeasurable as Mount Meru.
The supreme domain of conduct taught here:
the goddesses of worship's display make offerings,
offering through the bliss of manifold lotuses.
All the Victors of the ten directions and three times,
relying upon the vehicle of the great secret,
attained vajra-wisdom absorption.
In the essential nature of Vajradhara,
having become the equality of great bliss,
they fully awakened in inseparable wisdom.
The unsurpassed offering of one who holds the lineage.

From single-pointed mindfulness up through bodily solitude, in coarse absorption during the phase of training — in equipoise and post-meditation alike —
the five objects: Vajradhātuvīśvarī and the rest,
the five faculties such as Kṣitigarbha and the others:
one trains in conduct relying on the father-and-mother deities.
Since apprehended and apprehender are not abandoned and conceptual elaboration is present,
this is known as conduct with elaboration.

The field of offering: the five families — Vairocana and the rest.
The five sense objects appear as gods and goddesses.
The one who offers, abiding in elaborated conduct, makes offering through distinct rites appropriate to each family.

The support-disciple is free from elaboration, possessing pure solitude of body and solitude of mind.
Through the subtle absorption conferred by the master's blessing, the disciple in equipoise and post-meditation trains in method and wisdom, relying upon body and mind in non-dual dependence.

The object of offering is the five Lords of the families and so forth.

The actual offering is threefold and distinct.

The one who offers, the yogin, makes offering with method.

The support-disciple, through utterly elaboration-free clear light up through the pure illusory body, trains in the very subtle absorption in equipoise and post-meditation.

Through intention, one trains in method, wisdom, the faculties, and the five objects as non-dual and without inherent nature.

Because elaboration is entirely dispersed thereby,

in the utterly elaboration-free, specifically:

the object of offering is that from which the wisdom body arises, and the one who offers is the person abiding as an illusion.

The meaning: from the three appearances abiding as illusion —

the actual offerings are themselves the illusory sense pleasures. The method of offering is precisely the dissolving into the state of clear light by means of the two meditative concentrations.

This is the twenty-second chapter of the Glorious Compendium of All Wisdom Vajra (Śrī Jñānavajrasamuccaya).

Through six subsequent recollections, the summary is set forth:

From the three isolations, the illusory body,
and clear light as the causal preliminary,
through the conduct of meditative absorption,
one possesses the two sequential absorptions.

From the secret conduct of the five families of the completion stage of the pure illusory body, while still training, one attains the wisdom of union.

Through the generation stage, the purification of space and secret —
the conduct of blessing and meditative absorption.

Through the sixteen subsequent recollections,
from the teaching of path and conduct:

abiding in the pure illusion,
the absorption of the signless —

the first application of the five families is taught.

Through the five beginning with recollection of the buddha,

from pure illusion and clear light in reverse order,
the completion stage is taught.

From within the three appearances, the saṃbhogakāya dwells as Vajradhara.

From within the state of the bliss of father and mother,
through the emanation and withdrawal of Vairocana,
the nirmāṇakāya is to be emanated and withdrawn.

The sixth subsequent recollection teaches the extraction of essence by causing the nectar of the small tongue to flow.

The seventh: oneself, possessing father and mother, abiding in the signless —
dwelling in the supreme maṇḍala king.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth teach the blessing of body, speech, and mind —
the yoga of the deity is taught.

The eleventh and twelfth: the cause — the deity's body, speech, and mind,
the fourfold blessing gathered together —
all enters into the dharmadhātu of wisdom;
finally, the attainment of the supreme is taught.

The thirteenth teaches the path of the buddha
for the intermediate state.

The fourteenth and fifteenth: the accomplishment of Mahāmudrā — these show the path to awakening in this very life.

Thus, through the fifteen subsequent recollections, meditative absorption is taught.

The sixteenth subsequent recollection of conduct:
having condensed the maṇḍala absorption,
the conduct of nine or five goddess-figures brings conduct to its completion.

Through the sixteen subsequent recollections here,
the distinction of swift liberation is also taught — the profound and the vast.

This is the twenty-third chapter of the Glorious Compendium of All Wisdom Vajra.

To the Sugatas and bodhisattvas
of the world and beyond the world,

the vajra words that cut through doubt are given, teaching the true meaning.
Through the ripening and liberation of secret wisdom,
the Dharma of meditative absorption and wisdom is taught.

Whatever is spoken with intent —
the prior arising, the subsequent following, the implied intent — becoming clear and distinguished from all else;
drawing forth the central nature of the maṇḍala, gathering the families — that suchness is invoked in the Victors.

The vajra recitation that cuts through:
taking what is not given, with mind as the focus;
the clear light of improper conduct;
speaking falsely by way of illusion;
and through union's non-abiding — these are what coarse words and reification are reversed by.

When the karmic winds are somewhat subdued,
and the power of the wisdom wind is found,
meditative absorption enters, luminous and supremely subtle.
Throughout the entire body, the breath and effort fully settle.
Abiding in the central channel, the going out and coming in do not stir.
From that, wisdom rays like lightning arise from everywhere, within the center of the sphere —
the awakening mind mingled as a white-and-red sphere,
the gate of going out and the gate of entering:
immovable, grasping the hare, like the full moon —
the yogin's right and left nostrils:
from one it emerges, into the other it enters,
satisfying, blissfully dwelling at the heart-center.
The essence of the vajra-bearer abiding there,
aroused, makes offering in the ten directions
to all Sugatas, and from the arising of their delight, nectar is drawn forth from the hair-tuft of the eye,
and entering, the yogin proceeds into the crown-wheel.

Dissolving from the throat into the heart, great awakening abides in the avadhūtī.

That very suchness — nectar free from conceptual elaboration — flourishes abundantly,

pervades the ten sites, and all becomes irreversibly transformed.

Arousing the essence of great bliss,
by the equal taste of the vajra of body, speech, and mind,
the awakening mind becomes supreme, manifest as vajra itself.
All the Victor's sons rejoice utterly,
and the power of the wisdom-essence is made firm.

This, through the supreme messenger of wisdom, in that very instant, causes awakening to be directly manifest.

This is the twenty-fourth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom-Vajra Compendium, treating of the arising of wisdom.

From the manifest arising of wisdom:
by mantra, the deity's body is generated;
from the five manifest awakenings,
it accomplishes the very state of the Vajra-bearer.
The pure two truths — cause and effect —
bring completion into the body of utter purity.
The yogin of the deity of the family completes the stages in their proper order:
this is the yoga generated by mantra.

Through wisdom, the body is generated;
the yogin who is the Vajra-bearer himself enters into illusion and emptiness — it is not seen by means of material things.

The animate and inanimate of the three realms, together with their selfhood, held as a totality, then dissolved in succession through meditative absorption:
all enters into the abiding of luminosity,
and the union of wisdoms is attained.

Through the bodhisattva's meditative absorption,
together with the seeds that produce the higher knowledges, thorough accomplishment arises from that.
The power of the enlightened activity of body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas —
an ocean of matchless qualities,
the supreme wheel of inexhaustible adornment —

The twelve vowels endowed with melody, through the five-element winds,
transformed into the five goddesses:
the sixty limbs of melodious sound are uttered.

The clarifying letters of the Kālī —
ḍa, ḍha, da, dha, ya, la, ta —
from those thirty-four and the rest:
with six added, from the forty-two,
eighty minor marks arise,
abiding through purity of intrinsic nature.

Or again, with the doubled vowel letters,
the thirty-two supreme major marks
arise from causes, conditions, and proximate causes:
cause and effect become clearly manifest.

The qualities of all fully awakened buddhas — distinguished beyond the wheel-turning sovereign —
the hair-tuft blazing with light between the brows, sinking into the secret hollow,
the crown protrusion unseen by sight,
the rays of light pervading the maṇḍala:
through the stable power of empowerment,
the mighty activity of the causes and effects of the qualities of the form body arises.

The secret mantra, profound and vast,
swiftly bestows blessing.

Making bliss the path, in this life
and in the intermediate state it makes wisdom directly manifest.
From the guru, liberation and conduct are obtained —
this is the special directly-witnessed dependent arising.

This is the twenty-fifth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom-Vajra Compendium.

Then, the contemplation of intrinsic nature:

Just as on a great ocean
all the flocks of birds that move about make many comings and goings, yet the ocean remains without agitation —
so upon the wisdom of the three appearances,

there is no staining and no conceptual thought.

Through the utter purification of the channels,
the inner heat's (caṇḍālī) wisdom-fire blazes.

When the wind — the vital and exertive — is purified, illusion, mirage, and moon-in-water appear.

When the spheres are purified, luminosity and great bliss appear.

From the purification of habitual tendencies and conceptual thought, buddha-fields are seen in dreams.

When the syllables are purified and the elements clarified, liberation is attained through the extension of knowing.

When the three minds are dissolved, along with their aspects,
what remains as the insight of the three minds appears with certainty to the yogin.

The waves of conceptual thought are stilled of themselves.

Appearance is without arising,
and the obtaining of appearance is without cessation.

Appearance arises but does not abide; because it does not abide, it is impermanence. The obtaining of appearance is emptiness abiding as meaning. Luminosity is the nature of reality, suchness — pure like space, great bliss, unobstructed, stainless, peaceful. It is the ultimate Great Seal (mahāmudrā) itself. All the powers of the grounds and paths are perfected. It is the very essence of the union that is still learning. Through the complete purification of the three vajra gates, the union beyond learning is made manifest. That, brought to its ultimate conclusion, is the unsurpassed.

Then the Glorious Vajradhara, through the meditative absorption (samādhi) of the Gentle Vajra (Mañjuśrī), enters wisdom through the two dhyānas, and teaches what is distinguished therein. The accomplishment of the five vidyādharas (knowledge-holders) is explained, together with the teaching that the yogin will obtain the accomplishments of yoga. The virtue and power of the nectar pill of three syllables brings swift accomplishment. The empowerment-activity of the vajra hook, the manner of virtue through the samaya of the five meats — through these, mastery and accomplishment are obtained, and manifest fruition and activity are achieved.

Now the four branches of approach and accomplishment: the fourfold vajra, the body of the deity; bodily solitude, vajra recitation; the three appearances, illusory body, luminosity — each individually gathered as the path of dhyāna. The holding of the vital winds is suchness. Mindful recollection, branch, the power of meditative absorption: from the teaching on the gradual steps of union, suchness abides in the aspect of the family. Whatever is separated from cause, condition, path, and power — all the domains of view and conduct as they manifest, gradual arising and simultaneous arising — these are to be understood as the sequence of the leap-over (tögal). The path of becoming a buddha in this very life, the path through which accomplishment arises in the intermediate state, the vajra blessing of the three gates — through aspirational prayer, accomplishment is established in a future time.

Dwelling in meditative concentration: the faculties, method; the very object-domain is wisdom; samādhi — the joining inseparable, in the secret place — is awareness transcending the three times. From the clarity of consciousness as suchness: unobstructed, not following after objects, unmoved, pure of afflictions, conduct and distinctions are clearly discerned. Non-conceptual, without object of focus, unerring — body and mind not separate, joy transcending sensation, the mind abiding because there is no distraction. The many wounding thorns of harm are pacified and stilled in the natural state of the three gates. Undefined bliss, the nature of reality, abides without union or separation. The fully tamed assembly of consciousnesses — what is to be known becomes purified as the dharmadhātu. Since apprehended and apprehender are exhausted and purified, emptiness and wisdom become one-pointed. Because there is no turning back in any aspect, there is awakening without marks.

The obtaining of appearance is emptiness; offering becomes great emptiness. All that is mere appearance is emptiness, and all obtaining is emptiness itself. Because the state of purity, supreme clarity, and excellence arises, they become of one taste. In the forward order and the reverse order, the host of conceptual thoughts is stilled. This is the path of all buddhas that directly destroys the world — and this it is that is taught as supreme.

From the very nature of all Tathāgatas, what arises from conditions becomes the path. From the yogin's clarity, non-conceptuality, and bliss-producing view, through the power of the bound karaṇa (Skt. karaṇa), the three existences are rendered immovable. Through the vidhu (Skt. vidhu) — the granting of complete renunciation, the vow — the quality of making stability immutable is obtained.

From the palace of the channels where the body resides: on the right, the sun exerts effort; on the left, the moon binds the vital wind — the teaching of the path of entering, abiding, and dissolution is given. In the central channel, the awakening mind is made to rest, grasped as the definitely abiding that is free of transfer, not becoming a mere sign — the supreme channel. Particular meditation on the wind of karma: through its cessation, the darkness of Rāhu (the eclipse-seizer) is overcome. Above and below the tip of the secret nostril, the elements and condition-winds assist appearance. Reverse the five gates and remain. The lamp of wisdom arises as appearance. For whichever yogin makes this manifest, the signs of the purification of wind and mind appear. Or, at the time of transference, the path is attained. From that, when the intrinsic nature is purified, from within luminosity itself there is emission and absorption, and entry is made through the central channel path.

The bliss-drop, skillful means,
and the great fire of wisdom, discernment —
entering as one without duality into the central channel (dhūtī), the nectar (amṛta) remains unmoved in the secret path.
There, resting upon the life-force, retention becomes the path of wisdom.

From that, the inner heat (caṇḍālī) blazes,
and the karma-wind turns upward to the navel.
From the syllable HO, the nectar blazes and drips.
At the throat, joy; at the heart, supreme joy; at the navel, the exceptional;
at the secret place, the innate, which does not turn back —
the unsurpassing is attained.

Cherish the recollection of that very suchness as wisdom.
Body, speech, and mind together with wisdom are stilled;
the suchness of the mudrā (seal) is made manifest.

The consciousnesses are thoroughly purified:
at the navel, the conceptual thoughts of desire;
at the heart, the four concepts of sleep;
at the throat, the consciousnesses of dream;
at the forehead, the consciousnesses of waking are abandoned.

In the drops that abide within the wheels of the karma-wind's channels, both the support and the supported — the unchanging bodhicitta — are attained.

The aggregates of karma are reversed,
and one enters into the truth of equality.

When the gateway at the crown protrusion is opened,
the aim of Vajra-the-Firm (Indra, king of gods) is attained,
and immeasurable qualities are made manifest.

Skillful means and wisdom inseparable —
one becomes the glorious Vajradhara.

The assembly of qualities and enlightened activity of that very suchness arises everywhere from the state free of conceptuality.

In an instant, manifest perfection and union —
this is called meditative absorption (samādhi).

The great secret state is attained; awakening is fully realized.

This is the twenty-seventh chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

Then, the accomplished omniscient wisdom of the innermost secret, vast beyond measure —

through the aim of the genuine yoga that is both worldly and transcendent, having become endowed with unobstructed power,
the meaning of blending the two truths is taught.

Through the fourfold enlightened activities,
the very manner of accomplishment is taught.

Through the ten methods of recitation, the meaning of accomplishment is shown, and through the suchness of all mantras,
as the complete path and grounds are made manifest,
self-empowerment (adhiṣṭhāna) is accomplished.

In this very life and in the intermediate state (bardo),
the attainment of the siddhi of wisdom is explained.
Above, what accomplishes the meaning of transference,
through the wheel of the seventeen deities, accomplishment is brilliantly revealed and bliss is attained.

When the result that is to be indicated is fully accomplished,
the power of that which indicates it arises unobstructed.

There is the cause and result of what is to be illumined and what illumines, and the cause and result of what is to be generated and what generates.

From within the cause-and-result of essential nature, because the cause produces the result
and the result arises from the cause,
it is a cause-and-result of mutual dependence.

They come to be established as a single essential nature:
though cause and result are distinct in aspect, since they are of the same class, abide in the same location, and are inseparable,
they are established as belonging to a single established category.

All causes and results without exception are dependent origination, and that very suchness is the essential nature of space.
Though emptiness abides as a diversity of phenomena and things,
it is of equal taste, unceasing.

All phenomena, every appearance, arises from within the intrinsic nature of space.
The side of obscuration and the side of appearance —
their arising and ceasing are in suchness, without substance.

If the two truths are made separate,
the path of wisdom becomes purposeless.
If luminosity and emptiness are made two and distinct,
one falls to the extreme of either eternalism or nihilism.

Relying on the abiding nature of things,
the luminous wisdom that is free of substance —
the inseparability of the profound and the vast — purifies all causes and conditions.

The ultimate dhyāna and samādhi are of the nature of the vajra-like.
Reversing all phenomena —
as fire blazing in a mass of wood burns it and renders it without substance — so in the end, all is purified into emptiness by the fire of wisdom.

From the expanse that is like space,
the enlightened activity of wisdom arises unobstructed.

This is the twenty-eighth chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

Then the king Vajradhara taught the glorious consciousness of the body, the magical display of wisdom, and so forth — the four goddesses and ten wrathful ones, and the many supreme enlightened activities of various kinds — all for the purpose of taming beings. From the vajra of body, speech, and mind, through the gradual distinction of outer and inner, the rite of purification that is not yet accomplished — the very nature of the phurba (ritual dagger) — is taught.

All beings in the desire realm are caught in the root of the wind of conceptual thought. Bound by the knot of self-grasping, the path of the liberating wisdom of ripening and freedom is to be known from the lips of the teacher. Within the arrangement of the eight-petaled lotus, focusing on the seventy-seven syllables, it is endowed with sixteen aspects.

The warmth is the mind luminous and free of conceptual thought — the ground from which the qualities of abandonment and attainment arise. At the summit, the power to make offerings is found; one becomes stable, freed from fear. The patience is the attainment of luminosity itself — completely freed from all conceptual thought. The supreme Dharma is the near-attainment of luminosity; the wisdom that follows is supremely great. The overwhelming display of dependent origination arises; reasoning becomes manifest and conceptual thought is purified. One thereby attains the qualities of both saṃsāra and nirvāṇa; having passed beyond the dimension of apprehended and apprehender, it becomes the path. The intention of the Victor is to be realized.

This is the twenty-ninth chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

In order to teach the meaning of accomplishment in the conduct of elaboration-free wisdom: a secluded place of retreat, endowed with all qualities — the charnel ground of body, abode, and mind — is to be made the place of complete practice, by way of complete purification of the grasping at substantiality.

The flesh-marked one (i.e., one bearing the characteristic marks) sports in the flesh of the thought-free consort — in particular, accomplishing genuine wisdom — practicing always without straying from the state of wisdom.

The vidyā (wisdom consort), born from wisdom and discernment, is awakened through twenty aspects: she is the very embodiment of two tens.

Meditating on the vajra maṇḍala is the generation of the wisdom body — the maṇḍala of the support-and-supported body arisen from luminosity, together with what rests upon it, endowed with the palace of the great Vajradhara.

That same maṇḍala, with aggregates, elements, and sense sources completely purified, is to be visualized as the maṇḍala of the glorious great Vajradhāra.

The sacred commitment of excrement and urine is the joining of sense object and sense faculty into non-duality. And so forth — engaging in objects in the particular sense of the food of experiencing bliss-emptiness.

"There, as the rite prescribes" means: the play of Vajradhara as Father and Mother, the great bliss that is immutable — thoroughly accomplished.

That maṇḍala's support, the celestial palace, together with the dharmodaya (source of phenomena) and the elements stacked in succession — the entire assembly of deities of support and supported — all arisen from wisdom, arisen from wisdom: their defining characteristic is the essential nature in which bliss and emptiness arise as a single taste, perfectly complete.

Because he is supremely good, he is born from luminous wisdom. His face is supremely beautiful, arising from the powers and strengths of wisdom.

The ornaments are the seven branches of the noble wealth, transcending the aspects of abandonment and ripening — perfectly complete by virtue of the greatness of wisdom.

What is placed at the center of the maṇḍala is Vajradhara himself — visualized together with the vajra-consort Sparśavajrā (Vajrā of Touch), who has become the vajrā of the dharmadhātu.

The five maṇḍala wheels are the maṇḍalas of the five Tathāgatas — at the forehead, throat, heart, navel, and secret place — endowed with the major and minor marks of the buddha bodies, with their respective body colors, hand implements, and ornaments, arising from wisdom in an instant.

There, the lord of yogins, by means of the secret circle of mantra contemplation, accomplishes the secret of wisdom — the great seal (mahāmudrā) of non-dual bliss and emptiness, whose essential nature is immutable, the place of offering in which one makes genuine offerings without measure.

This is accomplished through the meditative absorption of experiential realization in which perception has been transformed.

This is the thirty-first chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, Compendium of All.

Now, in order to teach the cultivation of the unsurpassed secret arising from that very same reality, this chapter is entitled "Possessor of the Vajra of Body, Speech, and Mind." The vajra of body is immutable. The vajra of speech is unceasing. The vajra of mind is the wisdom of non-conceptual gnosis. The maṇḍala in which these are inseparable, making itself fully manifest to all Tathāgatas and all bodhisattvas, is the great Vajradhāra. Because he radiates and reabsorbs from the luminous light of the vajra body, he is the Great Ray of Light and the Supremely Great — displaying the inconceivable sport of wisdom that radiates and reabsorbs.

Moreover, in that very reality, the pure families of wisdom consorts are revealed in order to demonstrate the perfect accomplishment of wisdom. These are the brāhmaṇī and others. The consort of the vajra family is like one who bears the sacred fire — the one who transforms all phenomena into wisdom. The Tathāgata family consort is the cook — the one who transmutes all things into wisdom. Or alternatively, "brāhmaṇī" means one who is unstained by the impurity of sin. The kṣatriya consort belongs to the jewel family and is endowed with the greatness of blazing wisdom. The noble consort belongs to the lotus family and is free from attachment. The consort of the vajra-Dharma family is accomplished precisely as one free from attachment, like a lotus risen from the mud. Or alternatively, by means of the dancer's family, she transforms everything — this is the one who swiftly brings about the attainment of the wisdom of great bliss, the secret wisdom. Or she is like a consort of the lotus family, or like the Fierce Lady (Caṇḍālī) who severs conceptuality at its very root. In particular, through the union with the bodhisattva vajra endowed with the wheel of aversion-as-vajra, at the place of the heart — the inseparability of emptiness and compassion — through the union with the awakening vajra, the wisdom consort with the color of a blue utpala lotus, like a bodhisattva unsullied by the water's stain upon the utpala, is the one who transmutes all things cooked into wisdom. Those who are equal to the wisdom of the buddhas attain the lordship of perfect accomplishment through the non-duality of meditative equipoise and subsequent attainment.

This is the thirty-first chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, Compendium of All.

Now, from the section teaching the yoga utterly free from conceptual elaboration: the union of the two excellences is the union of the skillful means of wind and the wisdom-awareness of emptiness free from elaboration — co-emergent, self-arising, of equal taste, the union of great bliss — whereby all the conduct of dance-like experiential practice, in the sport of wisdom, is to be carried forth as all buddha-activity within the expanse of great luminosity, the great bliss of union.

This is defined as "difficult to transgress because it is not to be transgressed" — meaning the bodhicitta of all Tathāgatas must not be caused to pass away — and its benefit up to this point is as follows: one who possesses the wisdom of the three secrets of body, speech, and mind will in that very instant attain the characteristic and the meaning of being inseparable from the bodhicitta-vajra and the buddha-activity of the Glorious Vajradhāra.

The vajra of the setting vajra-sun: the vajra is the pure illusory body, inseparable from skillful means. The sun, from the aspect of light and the spreading of light, in the attainment of the light of setting — and in particular, when all conceptuality of inherent nature is gathered, without distinction, into the wind and the consciousness in the right and left channels alone, and dissolves into the central channel in the expanse of primordial wisdom without acceptance or rejection — this is the great setting itself. At that point one comes to abide in the expanse of great non-abiding luminosity, the great clear light of bliss and emptiness inseparable, like the sky perfectly pure.

Rising from that into the union of post-learning, it is like the dawn appearing — in the singular excellence of the wisdom of knowing that pervades the three times and ten directions in an instant, one becomes omniscience itself, the knowledge of all aspects.

In particular, to teach the purified illusory body as the elucidation of primordial wisdom — this is the king among bodhisattvas.

The wheel-turning king (cakravartin) who possesses all phenomena as his equal is endowed with the seven precious things. In the provisional sense, when adorned with the seven noble riches, he becomes adorned with the seven ornaments of the great secret tantra; thus the three bodies are established as complete with the seven limbs, and desire and liberation are fully accomplished — this is precisely the full accomplishment of unsurpassed union endowed with the eight sovereignties.

In order to show that all grasping at things and characteristics as a basis for conceptual fixation is displayed as a pure illusion without fixed abiding — this is called the Vajra Sovereign of Phenomena, the great sovereign of Dharma arising from the limitless awakening mind. Having attained the irreversible ground, one comes to abide on the pure ground — that is, one comes to abide on the ten grounds. The three luminances together with their intrinsic natures are utterly purified, and by attaining the sequence of consecrating oneself with blessing, one traverses the bodily abodes and the proximate abodes and so forth. Because the support and what is supported thereby become self-blessed, when the king upholds the sacred pledge of the host, with unobstructed primordial wisdom one exercises sovereignty over inexhaustible enlightened activity and qualities — powers, fearlessness, and so forth — the eight sublime sovereignties, the unmingled qualities, and mastery of eloquence. The unsurpassed excellence of all appears directly and without measure.

From the two kinds of manifest awakening, outer and inner are explained as needed.

The inner time is the display of miraculous deeds,
the victory over Māra.

The three vajra gates are each purified,
the outer manifest awakening of learning at dawn.

The non-learning union is the four bodies gathered into one, primordial wisdom liberated in a single instant.

This concludes the thirty-second elucidation from the Glorious Primordial Wisdom Vajra: A Comprehensive Compilation.

Thereupon, to teach the sovereign of great bliss who has manifestly awakened: the vajra-yogin, having given special instruction on the distinctive qualities of the vajra body, and having engaged the awareness-woman in a manifest drawing-together — by means of the space-secret endowed with blessing, the vajra dharma-source (dharmaodaya) arising from method and from what proceeds from method sinks into the lotus. The seed-syllable of wisdom expands, the faces of moon and sun become equal, and the practices of primordial wisdom that bear the character of luminance, increase, attainment, and near-attainment in their subsiding aspect are all fully undertaken.

By the primordial wisdom of clear light appearing at the outset and arising at the conclusion, all intrinsic natures subside into the universal ground and are completely purified.

As for the aspect of the dawn appearing: since wisdom enters and reverses within the expanse of the pure sky-luminance, this is the supreme meditative absorption that transcends the four emptinesses. From the cause — the growth of the awakening mind everywhere — through the condition of the power of the awareness-woman, the bindus increase and expand through all the channels and abodes. At the time of joy, manifold instants arise; at the time of supreme joy, the distinctive karmic maturation ripens; at the time of special joy, the very identity of that is perfected. In the moment immediately following the passage of those three instants, from innate joy free of defining characteristics the instant becomes directly manifest — and one attains the great union, the great Mahāmudrā (mahāmudrā), non-abiding, of the primordial wisdom of bliss and emptiness in equal taste, the meaning of union.

To show the greatness of unsurpassed purity as that very suchness: the ornaments, being ornaments of meaning, appear as the inconceivable greatness of primordial wisdom, and the greatness of qualities in terms of synonyms and categories overflows without measure. In every aspect, sequential and simultaneous, they appear everywhere. Flowers are the form-vajra; incense is the fragrance-vajra; the string instruments and so forth are the sound-vajra; there is the taste-vajra; and there is the appearance of the touch-vajra-woman.

Vajrasattva: the enlightened activity of the bodhicitta vajra —

all aggregates, elements, and sense bases become support and supported, and immeasurable bliss arises from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet, whereby all appearance and existence becomes immeasurable bliss. Throughout the three realms, through magical display, inconceivable inexhaustible miraculous manifestations without measure appear in a single instant.

At that time, the teaching on the supreme three bodies is as follows: bliss is the saṃbhogakāya; luminosity is the nirmāṇakāya; non-conceptuality is the dharmakāya. In their inseparable essential nature, spontaneously present, enlightened activity arises without obstruction. This is what is to be meditated upon perfectly.

As for the hundred leagues: this reveals the activity of expansion and contraction, performed throughout all of space by the immense light of the Tathāgata's buddha-fields without measure.

The union of the two faculties: skillful means and unsurpassed great compassion are wisdom endowed with the pinnacle of all aspects, whereby the space and gnosis of the meditative absorption of emptiness become inseparable.

Buddha is the union beyond training, the state of one who trains no more. Awakening is the perfect internalization of genuine primordial wisdom.

The ground of peace, free from all extremes: through the actualization of the great non-dual union, one becomes the supreme lord of the thirteenth ground.

The instruction on close gathering: the vajra-holder abides in the pure illusory body. Having perfected all the paths of the non-training union, the māras are conquered at the first watch of night. Attaining the power of Vajradhara, the bodhisattva of the vajra-essence, through that attainment the secret abode of great primordial wisdom is accomplished.

At the very pure accomplishment of the early dawn: primordial wisdom that does not abide anywhere; the great uṣṇīṣa perfectly complete; the great indestructible bliss unsurpassed — these are attained.

The samaya substance of excrement and urine: through gnosis dissolving into evenness of taste within the expanse, the inexhaustible attainments and the pure ocean of primordial wisdom arise. In the single instant of perfectly realizing the great awakening, the secret of the vajra body, speech, and mind — Vajradhara, the Tathāgata, becomes directly manifest.

What is truly spoken is the outer manifestation of awakening: this is taught by way of intention.

From the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium, this is the thirty-third chapter.

Now here:

All phenomena are like illusions,
And one enters and moves through them as if in illusion.
From the sequence of consecrating those very illusions,

Out of the impure arises the pure divine body.
Body, speech, and mind, the three, are held as the path in illusion.

The aggregates, elements, sense bases, elements, and so forth —
All of suchness is fully gathered within the two knowledges.
Whoever has fallen into the deep sleep of the great emptiness
Will, through the activity of the wind, come to see dreams.
In dreams, varied appearances from sense objects appear as distinct.
All conceptual causes and effects are dream-thoughts.
Whoever falls asleep at night and during the day —
Sleeping and waking have not become two different things.

Covered by dense earth, one sleeps in deep, prolonged slumber.
All karma performed before, whose fruit has not yet ripened,
Is then set in motion and brought forth by the wind.
When former karma has ripened, wind and mind both Transfer in the world's movement to other states of dwelling.

Just as the Victors dwelling in all ten directions
Have in their bodies no bones, flesh, or blood,
Yet enter the elements for the sake of sentient beings,
Acting for beings' welfare through emanation and illusion —

So too, the mind in its sequence of sleeping, dreaming, and waking Is bound by the net of conceptual thought and appears as multiple.
Since it does not entirely pass beyond phenomena,
It is neither true nor false, neither one nor many.
There is nothing whatsoever that becomes an external object.
Therefore one's own mind is the magical display of emptiness.
What appears as illusion must be reversed through the reversal of delusion.
One should realize the selflessness of whatever appears as appearance.

That very dream state — thought-free, self-luminous —
Is the appearance of the gathered elements abiding in their source:
Earth firm, water cohering, fire sharp and intense,
Wind light and agitated, mobile and unstable.
Gathered into space, the body is blissful, pleasant in experience;
From the pure nectars (amṛta) the vital energies arise:
Costus root equals aversion; the four equal delusion;
Camphor arouses attachment; saffron generates pride;

The karma of manifold kinds causes envy to disperse and accumulate.
When these become the path through focused attention, the qualities of a realized being dawn.

What formerly arose appears as a sign of what will arise thereafter;
The mind of mindfulness settles on the definite marks of object, time, and feature.

The experiential appearance, unaltered by the conceptual mind, appears as illusion —

That very taste, once savored, is the companion of primordial wisdom.

From the very mind that has become the core of one's own life-force,
The three realms appear as the nature of reality, mind, body, and elements —
There is nothing other, and from the wind the three realms are emanated.
The illusory body and the dream are seen as like a dream being dreamed.

The three realms, mind and awareness — their very identity is suchness.
For the one of middling realization who thereafter understands, all phenomena Appear as illusion and dream.

For the superior one, realization is like space —
Endowed with meditative absorption and samādhi in luminosity,
With realization become supremely excellent,
Understanding is like a wish-fulfilling jewel.

This is the very meaning of the union (yuganaddha) made manifest:
Effortlessly, from essential nature itself, for the benefit of others,
Free from conceptual thought, unmoved, spontaneously accomplished.

This was the thirty-fourth chapter of the Glorious Wisdom Vajra, the Compendium of All.

It teaches the supreme maṇḍala of the arising of the Dharmadhātu-wheel
That gathers all the maṇḍalas of all the Tathāgatas —
The great secret maṇḍala without equal.

Through the vajra of body, speech, and mind,
The secret play of father and mother —
Coming here from Akaniṣṭha (the highest pure realm),
It causes the blessing and primordial wisdom to descend.

This is the great vajra empowerment,
The secret of the wisdom initiation:
In the places of the yogin's body —

Crown, navel, forehead, Throat, heart, and the secret place —
The great vajra of the Sugata,
The outer, inner, and secret father and mother,
Through non-dual play, confer the empowerment:
The immutable primordial wisdom of great bliss —
The great secret empowerment, pure and stainless.

The secret seal (mudrā) of the vows
Of the secret Vajrayāna,
The heart-essence of the awareness holder (vidyādhara) —
This teaches the true and perfect vow.

The turning and reversing of wind and mind, and the changes of the vital junctures —

Does wind-mind abide as one, or do they become different?

If wind and mind are conjoined as one,

Which of the two goes forward first?

If they act in the manner of going and coming in sequence,

Then what goes first, and what follows after —

Whatever each does, to that same extent,

Do they act separately, or do they act equally as one?

If they act separately, the quality of their unity is lost.

If they act as one, there is no before or after.

When the wind ceases, does conceptual thought cease or not?

If conceptual thought were to be reversed,

How would the wind perform its function?

One must examine whether the elemental wind and the innate nature of thought

Arise and engage together, or do not.

The life-force — whether it is wind or consciousness —

When the external elemental wind ceases,

The life of those who have a body also ceases.

Of the outer wind and the inner wind,

If one ceases, does the other thereby cease?

If one reverses, do all reverse?

If one reverses yet the other three do not —

The distinctions in their classification must be understood.

This teaches the abiding nature of the going and reversing of wind and mind.

Those who do not always receive the blessings —
All qualities, wisdom, and enlightened activity
Are seized through capacity, without regard to time.
The root of all the conceptual thoughts that cause downfall
Is cut by knowing the innate nature.
All phenomena are like illusion and dream —
Into the secret accomplishment of great bliss:

Wondrous great bliss is desire itself —
Knowing it, one speaks of it as without inherent nature.
Abide and practice as the vajra-holder.
Reversal is itself the medicine, the vast gnosis —
One does not fall into transgression.

Vow, skillful means, and wisdom:
In the great seal of non-duality,
That very vow is the vow at all times.

This is the conduct-vow (Skt. caryāvrata) of the meditative absorption called the Vajra that Overpowers the Secret of All Vows.

The three vajra-natures assembled,
The vajra-yogin dissolves.
Those two — body, speech, and mind as vajra —
The bold waves of conceptual thought utterly stilled.
From the pure illusion of analytical gnosis,
The utterly pure yoga with conceptual elaboration,
Beyond elaboration — emptiness transcending action,
From luminosity, utterly free of elaboration,
The great seal, union, is attained.

This is the thirty-fifth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya.

This is the supreme great-secret mode of suchness of all mantras.
From the three vajras the wheel arises —
It is the entry into awakening and buddhahood.

From suchness, direct realization arises,
And becomes an inconceivable ornament.

The object of expression, the means of expression,
The hero, the manifest, power —
Because Dharma and its meaning pervade all,
The powerful and distinctive are the ornament.

Abiding, luminosity, magical display,
Qualities, enlightened activity — the ornaments in sequence:
That which expresses is always the ornament,
The meaningful purpose is unsurpassed.

The gnosis that accomplishes the meaning abides —
The great secret, the distinction of bliss and vision:
This teaches the analysis and synthesis of the ornament.

Then the Sugata (well-gone one), the vajra-holder,
With affection for the assembled gathering,
Spoke the pure vajra secret speech —
Jñānavajra declared it here:

How wondrous! The dharmadhātu, the basic space of phenomena
Of all the buddhas without exception, is vast gnosis —
Luminosity by nature, utterly pure,
Like the expanse of stainless sky.

The arising of the essential nature of gnosis:
When the three realms are purified, one practices awakening.
For the arising of bliss for all beings,
May virtue be completely purified.

The pure body — the vajra body,
Accomplished through the three doors of liberation.
Speech is pure through the mode of Dharma,
With the great individual perfect awareness.
The melody of speech does not divide or change.
Consciousness, through the three times and beyond time,
Arises as gnosis and great awakening —
Inseparable great bliss, non-abiding.

Then the great bodhisattvas such as All-Obscurations-Completely-Cleared and the others were struck with wonder and amazement, and they addressed the Blessed One, the lord of all Tathāgatas: "For what reason does the Blessed One speak such coarse words in the assembly of the Tathāgatas?" Thereupon all the Tathāgatas spoke to those bodhisattvas thus: "Sons of good family, see here — do not speak so," and from there up to "terrified and overwhelmed with dread, they fell into a swoon." The passage from "revive them" up to the glorious Vajradhara is spoken to resolve the doubt of those present through implicit meaning.

The passage from "one who delights in killing living beings" up to "this will lead to the accomplishment of buddhahood" is indicated by: "Through the mere touch of the light, they resumed their places on their respective seats."

When they asked why vajra words — a path of speech that appears to be improper — were spoken, the Tathāgatas declared: "Sons of good family, do not give rise to such wrong and inferior perceptions." Why? "Sons of good family, this is the supreme conduct of mantra." "The conduct of mantra is the conduct of the Tathāgatas" — from there up to "these sacred commitments (Skt. samaya) are to be recognized accordingly" resolves the doubt of those with implicit understanding regarding the transformation.

From "the body is unchanging, non-abiding, and unborn," and so forth —

Then again, the noble Mañjuśrī and the others made a request to the Tathāgatas, and all the Tathāgatas declared: "What need is there to speak of you others — even we ourselves do not rejoice in the awakening of the vajra of body, speech, and mind, the immutable secret of the three vajra gates that we have obtained." When asked why, they replied: "It arose from the immutable, essenceless nature of the vajra of unborn awakening, which is perfectly and fully awakened." This resolves the doubt of those with implicit understanding regarding the characteristics of the essential nature of phenomena, in their implicit intention.

In order to abandon despondency of implicit intent, the passage beginning with "Sons of good family, the great sentient being" up through "obtaining vajra gnosis" sets forth the teaching.

The passage beginning with "the Blessed One Dīpaṃkara" up through "because there is no fortune for it" is instruction for those for whom the arising of the secret mantra Vajra Vehicle is rare.

Moreover, the teaching that the path is fully complete without remainder and that awakening occurs in a single lifetime within a single body is shown from the passage beginning with "nevertheless" up through the statement "will be counted among those called buddhas."

Then those bodhisattvas, upon hearing these words of vajra speech, wept aloud. Thereupon all the Tathāgatas addressed those bodhisattvas with these words: "Bodhisattvas, do not weep. Do not cultivate the three kinds of suffering."

All the bodhisattvas supplicated: "Blessed One, how could we not weep, when there is not even the fortune to hear the mere name of the secret syllables?"

All the Tathāgatas declared: "Do not say such a thing. Since the intention is implicit with respect to the antidote, and in order to abandon despondency, the syllables are common. Sons of good family, just as you do not know and have not heard it, so too we — all the Tathāgatas and all the bodhisattvas — have not seen these secret syllables, have not obtained them, and have not perfectly and fully awakened through them. Why? Because the syllables of the three secrets are utterly pure." This resolves the doubt.

"One should not make a bodhisattva of mantra, for if one does, awakening will be difficult to obtain" — the statement that one who does not part from clinging will become bound is an implicit intention directed toward a different person.

In brief, the passage "the five aggregates are fully proclaimed as the five buddhas" and so forth is an implicit intention directed toward a different meaning.

The passage "do you see the sameness in all phenomena?" is an implicit intention directed toward sameness.

The statement "because there is fortune for this enumeration of Dharma" is an implicit intention directed toward a different time.

Implicit intention itself, in its intention directed toward the meaning of irreversibility, constitutes implicit intentions. The general category of implicit intention is correct implicit intention.

This is the meditative absorption called "Revealing the Distinctions among the Intentions of All the Tathāgatas." This is the thirty-sixth chapter of the Glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya (the Compendium of Wisdom Vajra).

The essential nature of the awakening mind —
by one who, through devotion brought to its pinnacle, toward the master, the vajra-holder,
has perfected all the stages of the path —
obscurations are purified and qualities obtained,

like attaining the sovereignty of a great king.
All activities and spiritual accomplishments without remainder,
an inexhaustible abode of gnosis is gained.

In the maṇḍala wheel of sacred commitments,
reveling in great bliss,
the channels abide in their places within the body,
in the aspects of the six wheels.
Through the pure syllables of the bindus and the winds,
from the gnosis of bliss, secrecy, and emptiness,
into the lord of beings, the jewel-topknot,
dissolving completely in non-dual, equal great bliss — liberation itself.

All dependent origination comes to be known.

From the ultimately victorious supreme activity,
from within the expanse of ultimate emptiness,
having arisen as the body of Vajrasattva, transforming into the body of Vairocana — dwelling upon a lunar throne, through the union of non-dual vision —
for all those who desire peace —

There, one pacifies harm and obstacles.
For enrichment, the splendor of the jewel-source, Māmakī — through non-dual union — expanding and gathering, one causes a rain of jewels to fall.

For magnetizing, Amitābha himself, with the White-Robed Mother — through non-dual union —
through emanation, one draws all under one's power.

For wrathful activity, with utter certainty, dwelling upon the lotus-sun,
non-dual with Tārā —
expanding and gathering, through the wrathful one, one applies to activity.

From all of these, the entire assembly of karmas, luminous like illusion and dream,
one regards as the very blessing of oneself.

The twelve examples of illusion will serve to illustrate the meditative absorption of great bliss. In this way, all Tathāgatas without exception who dwell in the world-realms of the ten directions — for as long as the ocean of saṃsāra endures — remain in the unsurpassed and profound and vast meditative absorption that is like illusion, which is sovereign over all phenomena, and they delight and take great pleasure in the many desirable qualities. Endowed with the secret and inconceivable qualities of omniscience, by the mere wish as one desires, they bring forth, without obstruction, inexhaustible adornment-wheel activities from buddha-field to buddha-field, throughout immeasurable buddha-fields.

This is the thirty-seventh chapter of the Glorious Compendium of All Primordial Wisdom (Śrī Jñāna-vajra-samuccaya).

Ema! The vajra is appearance.

Ema! The vajra is expansion.

What is said to be the vajra is the primordial wisdom of attaining luminosity.

The illusory wind and illusory mind — arising from mere illusion — "wherein?"
In the expanse of clear luminosity.

There, like illusion and dream: body without body, mere appearance; speech without speech, mere sound; mind without mind, without conceptuality — emptiness itself.

There, from the expanse of the emptiness of clear luminosity, the body is cultivated in meditation: in the instant of pure illusory body, the union body arises and is attained.

For one who dwells in the learning stage of union: the gnosis goddess, the vidyā who arises from the primordial wisdom of the spontaneously accomplished expanse — the sky of clear luminosity — and in that very same state, the essential nature made joyful by the non-dual joining of method and wisdom, where method is endowed with great compassion.

Through the taming of māra, the vidyā — born from illusory appearance — is the great-bliss sport of the yogin, the unchanging vajra of primordial wisdom. Through the joining of the wisdom-lotus, the dharma-source, with that — what is called "one who cultivates these": from the three — the instant of the vajra body of pure joy, the instant of the vajra speech of supreme joy, and the instant of the vajra mind of pure joy free of joy — the three vajra bodies, so characterized, manifest through the four instants the innately arisen, equal-taste great bliss, the svabhāvikakāya. The supreme of herds, the vajra of awakening mind, becomes gladdened; and it becomes equal to the meditative absorption of the tenth ground, the great renowned bodhisattva dwelling in the learning stage of union.

In the pure moment, the seventh instant of primordial wisdom — the greatly resplendent one — attaining the power of gnosis, the lord of primordial wisdom, endowed with the seven limbs, manifests the three bodies. The saṃbhogakāya, the primordial wisdom of joy-union, arises as great bliss, and through great compassion the benefit of beings is manifested. The unceasing stream of primordial wisdom, the great seal of uninterrupted flow, naturally pure — the inseparable attainment of expanse and wisdom.

The syllable "sabha" (saptā) is the word for "seventh," and it is said to be endowed with limbs.

That very suchness pervades all,
attaining the ground that symbolizes primordial wisdom.
Dwelling on the ground of Vajradhara, great awakening itself.
My body, speech, and mind are vajra.
In meditative equipoise and subsequent attainment, non-dual, unchanging, with supreme signs and markers —
the great seal of manifest accomplishment —
the rite of the lord of secrets.

Contemplation that has become the body of awakening, the vajra of primordial wisdom, free from obscuration — the unsurpassed union does not abide in the expansion of knowing.
In the very instant of non-conceptual, appearance-free awareness, qualities are perfect and complete.
Having become a Tathāgata, one abides in the very nature of omniscience.

This is the thirty-eighth chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

Then all of this expanse of space — the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas, the great commitment, the vajra of primordial wisdom — through the very nature of bliss of the awakening mind, caused every single maṇḍala to shine forth everywhere. Pervading and completely filling all three levels of existence, just as a vase fills with vajra-like unchanging water, it was consecrated through utter purity.

Then wherever beings wander through this entire vajra-expanse of space, arising from the three bodies, upon being touched by the splendor of the vajra's rays of light they attained empowerment. All beings, having become Sugatas, arhats, attained the equalized taste of the primordial wisdom of the three vajras. Inseparable union, unsurpassed, was realized. True and manifest complete awakening was attained.

Because the essence of all phenomena transcends the path, having reached the ultimate perfection, one is liberated from the labors of effortful striving. The primordial wisdom of co-emergence, utterly pure, has become the union that supremely does not abide.

Free from the duality of affirmation and negation, obtaining and abandoning, one is free from cause and condition, beyond the phenomena of signs and characteristics. The primordial wisdom of knowing, selfless and equal, arises naturally from the state of objectless luminosity. Self-purified, inseparable from the expanse, self-liberated — enlightened activity supremely pure, unsurpassed. Object and subject, awakening neither obtained nor not-obtained, beyond conceptual thought, free from extremes, beyond expression. Suchness pure: great bliss, spontaneously accomplished.

This is the thirty-ninth chapter of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All.

The Tathāgatas of the three times, throughout the ten directions in infinite buddha-fields — beholding all, knowing all — in meditative absorption (samādhi) utterly pure and complete, through omniscience, in a single instant, like space, without conceptuality, to trainees ripe in their time, effortlessly, body, speech, and mind arise in unceasing, unobstructed benefit, emerging from the state of non-appearance.

Whether comprised within a tantra or not, the vajra nature will be revealed.

From that, the unsurpassed primordial-wisdom body of manifest complete awakening — the Tathāgata entering, abiding, and arising: this equality is awakening from the nature of reality, suchness itself — spontaneously accomplished emptiness, free from conceptual elaboration by its very nature.

Manifest complete awakening in the nature of all-pervading clarity: the all-pervading vajra lord, having become the clear luminosity free from substantiality.

Manifest complete awakening as the inexhaustible primordial wisdom of appearance: the suchness that is ever unchanging, whose characteristic is luminous clarity, peerless and matchless.

Manifest complete awakening as the net of illusion: arising everywhere without obstruction, in all aspects without cessation at any time.

Manifest complete awakening as the utterly pure dharmadhātu: the primordial-wisdom body free from dualistic apprehension of separate objects — the great awakening mind of all buddhas, throughout the three times and all extremes, the great maṇḍala. In the great secret bliss, through the vajra-commitment wheel of body, speech, and mind, it appears in the varied forms of peaceful and wrathful bodies.

Endowed with marks and signs of the perfect enjoyment body, father and mother — the very nature of great bliss —
through immeasurable great compassion, arising in unceasing aspiration,
engaging in accordance therewith, it does not become still.
Being without intrinsic nature, it does not change.

From the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All — this is the fortieth chapter.

Then, in the presence of the immeasurable assembly of all the Tathāgatas gathered together, hearing close at hand the vajra voice, the melodious speech of the Blessed One, the great Vajradhara — supreme form endowed with perpetual joy — one attains bliss and mental ease. In that very instant one gains the gateway to true meditative absorption, and one praises with the melody of wondrous primordial wisdom.

Though unmoving from the dharmadhātu,
through immeasurable compassion he protects all beings.
To the great sovereign of awakening wisdom,
great bliss beyond compare — I pay homage.

To the vajra secret, the unchanging,
the supremely excellent great bliss,
lord of the dance of skillful means and wisdom,
non-dual and inseparable — I pay homage.

All the fierce and unruly
he overwhelms with the sound of his speech.

The great subduer of māras, the terrifying —
to the ocean of Victors — I pay homage.

Obtaining the inexhaustible treasury of phenomena,
he bestows its riches upon all beings.

The supreme great seal, sovereign without equal — to the crown and the uṣṇīṣa — I pay homage.

Ruler of the world, lord of the three grounds,
the great immaculate jewel, incomparable great king of magical display —
to the heart of awakening — I pay homage.

Thus did all the Tathāgatas perfectly praise the glorious great Vajradhara.

Then the great bodhisattvas Maitreya and the rest, and the bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha (the Essence of Space) and the rest, beyond measure in number, were filled with delight and joy. Realizing the sameness of all phenomena, they remained in silence.

From the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, the Compendium of All — this is the forty-first chapter.

Transmitted in succession from the great master Candrakīrti, translated and established in final form by the Kashmiri paṇḍita Ākarasiddhi, a disciple of the glorious Nāropā, together with the translator monk Tshulkrims.

Translator's Notes

- The term "rang rig" appearing in this passage is a key Vajrayāna and Dzogchen technical term, often rendered "self-awareness" or "reflexive awareness." Here it is used in the compound "profound, unchanging self-aware knowing" (zab pa mi 'gyur rang rig ni). The translation renders it as "self-aware knowing" to preserve the technical sense without a lengthy gloss in the body.

The phrase "wind and rigpa" (rlung rig) is a tantric technical pair: wind (prāṇa) and rigpa (pure awareness, vidyā). "Rigpa" is left as "rigpa" in the compound phrases where "wind and rigpa" (rlung rig) are paired, since it functions as a proper technical term in this Vajrayāna context; elsewhere "rigpa" is contextually rendered.

The threefold repetition "three and three" (gsum gsum) for "appearance and emptiness" reflects the standard Dzogchen-Tantra schema of the three appearances (snang ba gsum) and their three empty counterparts; the translation preserves this formulation rather than speculating on a specific referent.

- The passage presents a cosmogonic and psycho-cosmological schema quite specific to a tantric context, treating mind, mentation, and consciousness as arising from luminosity and correlating them with elemental arising, three modes of appearance (sun-like, moon-like, lamp-like), and tantric symbolism of masculine and feminine principles. This appears to be from a text within the Yoginī-tantra or related cycles.

The term rendered "neuter being" translates a Tibetan term literally meaning a being who is neither fully male nor female, used here as an analogy for a state that is knowing yet unclear — awareness present but obscured.

The phrase "the water-appearance of aversion arises from friction" renders a technical tantric usage in which the three poisons are correlated with the three appearances and their elemental counterparts; "friction" here is the literal sense of the verb used and carries connotations of rubbing or grinding as a cause of water or cooling.

- The passage contains a repeated phrase in the Tibetan, "sNang ba mched pa dang" appearing twice in sequence, which may be a scribal dittography; the translation follows the apparent intended reading of the three luminosities: appearance, spreading, and attainment.

The terms for the three luminosities — "snang ba," "snang ba mched pa," and "snang ba thob pa" — are technical terms drawn from Dzogchen and Mahāyoga completion-stage literature, rendered here as "luminous appearance," "spreading of luminosity," and "attainment of luminosity" respectively, following standard rDzogs chen commentarial usage.

The thirty-three natures, forty characteristics, and seven moments of ignorance are standard Vajrayāna accounts of the dissolution process, and the thirty-seven Kālī syllables refer to the vowel series used in tantric maṇḍala visualization; no further glossing is inserted into the text so as to preserve the flow for narration.

- The passage lists a series of technical channel names from Tibetan vajrayāna subtle-body physiology. "Kun-dar-ma," "Roma," and "Brkyang-ma" are the standard left, right, and central channels rendered here as "the central channel, the right channel, the left channel" following conventional identification; the Tibetan order is atypical and worth noting for specialists. The term "Viṣṇu's tortoise" renders "Khyab-'jug rus-sbal gyi rnam-pa can," meaning forms bearing the shape of the cosmic tortoise associated with Viṣṇu (Skt. Viṣṇu), a cosmological and embryological allusion. The rapid enumeration of embryological stages — fluid, reddish, firm, rounded — follows classical Indian embryology (garbhāvākṛānti literature), rendered as accurately as the brief terms allow. The text breaks off mid-sentence with the reference to buddha fields as numerous as Ganges sand, indicating this passage continues beyond the excerpt provided.

- The passage is a dense scholastic enumeration of mental factors and experiential states within a Vajrayāna tantric framework, likely drawn from a Mahāyoga or Anuttarayoga commentary on the stages of inner experience. The twelve examples of illusion correspond to a standard list found in several Yogācāra and tantric contexts.

The term rendered "city of gandharvas" refers to the gandharva-nagara, a classic Indian metaphor for an illusory or miragelike appearance in the sky; it is left as a gloss rather than the Tibetan compound because listeners will benefit from the explanation.

The section on mental factors appears to enumerate a semi-technical taxonomy that does not map precisely onto the standard Abhidharma lists; some terms have been rendered according to their most contextually coherent meaning within the tantric framework rather than strict Abhidharma equivalents.

The final verse is left incomplete in the source text as given, trailing into the next passage.

- The passage is from a Vajrayāna tantric text, the Yeshe Dorje Küntü Dedupa (dPal ye shes rdo rje kun las bsdus pa), and much of the technical vocabulary relates specifically to the inner

- The passage contains several technically dense Vajrayāna sections. "Vajradhṛk" is left in Sanskrit as it appears in the Tibetan in Sanskrit transcription and functions as a tantric name or epithet meaning "vajra-holder" or "vajra-bearing suchness." The three appearances (appearance, expansion, radiance) are standard terms of the completion-stage inner yogic system. The phrase "vowel and consonant series" renders ā-li kā-li, the Sanskrit vowels and consonants used in tantric hermeneutics. The phrase "bhaga of the noble vajra lady" retains the Sanskrit term bhaga as the Tibetan itself uses Sanskrit here in tantric context; it refers to the consort's sexual organ as a ritual hermeneutic term, which the text explicitly addresses as something that scandalized non-tantric listeners.

The line "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" presents a compressed series of near-synonymous terms for "limit" and "ultimate," rendered as a sequence of epithets in the translation; the precise syntactic parsing of this verse line admits some variation.

- The Sanskrit terms āli and kālī refer in tantric usage to the vowels and consonants respectively, conceived as the sonic basis of reality. Their appearance here marks a transition from general doctrinal exposition to the inner hermeneutic of vajra language.

The passage simphalarakta flowing "from root and hair" follows the Tibetan closely but the physiology is that of a tantric subtle-body context; the precise referent is intentionally encoded.

The syllable strings beginning Koṭakṣa etc. are Sanskrit terms rendered phonetically in Tibetan; they represent a class of ḍākinī symbolic language and are accordingly left in transliteration throughout.

The phrase rendered "the tantra of both-together" corresponds to the Tibetan term for ubhaya-tantra, the category between yoga-tantra and caryā-tantra in the standard Sarma (New Translation) fourfold classification; here the text presents a fivefold classification that is somewhat non-standard, which may be worth noting for scholarly readers.

- The verse section on the etymology of "tantra" presents a syllabic breakdown — tenta (continuity in reality), traya (three times) — that reflects a traditional Indic etymology by syllable-parsing. These are not standard Sanskrit words but represent the text's own exegetical unpacking of the term.

The phrase rendered "like that of the Great Lord (Mahādeva, Śiva)" refers to a tantra category or practitioner type associated with Śiva, likely indicating the Mahāyoga context in which even those bound by great affliction can enter the path — a standard polemical-comparative point in Vajrayāna literature.

The final sentence is syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan as given; it opens what would be the Blessed One's answer but appears to break off. No completion is supplied.

- The mantra syllables in the middle portion of this passage — Lāṃ Māṃ Pāṃ Tāṃ Āṃ, Meṃ Bhāḥ Eṃ, Rū Śa Ga Ra Pa, and Jaḥ Hūṃ Vaṃ Hoḥ — are ritual seed-syllables belonging to tantric maṇḍala systems. They are transliterated as given; their doctrinal correspondences (elements, consciousnesses-as-bodhisattvas, sense objects, wrathful gatekeepers) are indicated in the surrounding verse lines and are rendered accordingly. The passage breaks off mid-list with Amitābha; the text is continuous and the translation preserves this open ending.

The term rendered "dharmodaya" (Tib. chos-'byung) literally means "source or arising of phenomena" and is a tantric term for the triangular source-symbol from which deities emerge; it is left in Sanskrit as a term of art.

- The term འཇམ་མཐོག་ and འཇམ་འཕྲུལ་ are phonetic renderings of Sanskrit Vajradhṛk and Ratnadhṛk respectively, meaning "holder of the vajra" and "holder of the jewel." These are seed-deity designations used in Vajrayāna ritual visualization sequences, and are kept in transliterated form as proper names since they function as technical liturgical identifiers rather than ordinary descriptive phrases.

The line rendered "Vajra Aversion" translates འཇམ་མཐོག་འཕྲུལ་འཇམ་མཐོག་, the vajra-form of the buddha associated with the transformation of aversion into mirror-like wisdom, identified with Akṣobhya in the Vajrayāna fivefold buddha family system. The passage here is somewhat unusual in ascribing this transformation to Akṣobhyavajra himself rather than presenting it as a separate figure.

- The passage contains a number of tantric seed syllables and deity names in hybrid Sanskrit-Tibetan transliteration that are rendered phonetically as they appear. "Ārolik" is the seed syllable of Amitāyus-Amitābha as given in the preceding context. "Śaṅśaṅ" renders the Tibetan śaṅ śaṅ, a mythical bird sometimes identified with the garuḍa; its throne parallels the elephant and horse thrones of the preceding buddhas. The phrase "direction free from truth" for bdhen bral phyogs renders a directional epithet that is technically opaque; it may refer to the western direction as associated with absence of conceptual fixing. The four inner offering goddesses — Rūpā, Śabdā, Gandhā, and Rasā (form, sound, fragrance, taste) — are standard in Vajrayāna maṇḍala literature as the inner offering goddesses of the outer ring.

- The passage ends mid-description with "arisen from Vighnantatakr̥t," indicating the Tibetan text is cut off at this point; the description of this fourth wrathful king at the northern gate is incomplete.

The syllable sequence "Meṃ Thlīṃ Oṃ Oṃ Oṃ Hūṃ Oṃ Saṃ" is a string of seed syllables in the original Tibetan rendered phonetically from the Tibetan; their correspondence to the eight consciousnesses is stated in the text itself.

The term rendered "sprites" for རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ in the context of Prajñāntakṛt treading upon them at the southern gate refers to a class of lower spirit-beings; the Tibetan grul bu ma can denote a type of earth-spirit or sprite.

- The passage lists several wrathful deity figures whose names are given in transliterated Sanskrit mantric form within the Tibetan. These include Āryācala (a form of Acala), Ṭakkīrāja, Nīladaṇḍa, Mahābala, Uṣṇīṣavijaya, and Śumbharāja. These have been rendered in their Sanskrit forms throughout.

The closing verses beginning "What is the division of the ornament of depth?" appear to introduce a new section of the text in a more doctrinal and classificatory register, summarizing chapter headings or structural elements of the tantra. The terms "ornament of depth," "ornament of breadth," and "ornament of distinguishing the Dharma" are technical structural categories within the text itself. The phrase rendered "five possessing lineage ones" reflects the Tibetan rig can lnga, referring to five classes of suitable trainees with the relevant tantric lineage. The phrase "five measures endowed with the immeasurable form realm" reflects a compressed and likely elliptical list whose full doctrinal referent would require the root commentary to explicate fully.

- The passage contains several highly technical Vajrayāna terms relating to yogic accomplishments (siddhi) involving wind-practices, channel-work, and tantric ritual. The stanzas enumerate classical lists of minor siddhis: the golden transmutation (alchemical transformation), the eye-medicine pill (making invisible things visible), the sword siddhi (the unobstructed cutting ability), essence-extraction (rasāyana), the resurrected corpse (vetāla), and subterranean access. These are standard siddhi-categories in Indian and Tibetan tantra literature and are rendered accordingly without modernizing interpretation.

The final verse section is the colophon of chapter twelve followed immediately by the beginning of a new section on the seven ornaments, framed as a fresh exchange between Maitreya and the Blessed One. The syllables E and VAM at the crown are the standard tantric opening of the Hevajra and related tantras, here incorporated into the preamble list.

- The passage is an extremely dense Vajrayāna abhidharma-style summary verse, likely a colophon-and-chapter-heading sequence from the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium (dpal ye shes rdo rje kun las bsdus pa), enumerating the contents of chapters thirteen and fourteen. Several terms carry highly technical Vajrayāna meanings that admit of multiple interpretations within different commentarial traditions. The phrase translated as "nine hundred wisdom-winds arise" refers to a specific subtle-body topology in which nine hundred prāṇas circulate at the great-bliss wheel, a figure that varies across traditions. The sequence A, KHAM, BĪR, HŪM is a seed-syllable formula whose precise referent depends on the specific tantra's internal exegesis; it has been left in transliterated form as it functions as a proper tantric cipher. The phrase rendered "from vision: the wind-domain, transcending objects, all seen trembling" is syntactically compressed to the point of genuine ambiguity and may refer to a specific gazing practice in the completion stage. The final two lines appear to be a transitional verse opening into the next chapter rather than a complete unit, consistent with the passage breaking off mid-section.

- The passage is a highly condensed scholastic summary, likely a chapter-by-chapter synopsis or table-of-contents verse for a tantric commentary on the Guhyagarbha or a related cycle. The term rendered "Vajra Queen" is rdo rje btsun mo, a tantric consort deity or principle; it is kept as "Vajra Queen" throughout for consistency with what precedes. The phrase "forty syllables" refers to a standard enumeration of the Sanskrit syllabary in tantric contexts. The "six" in "endowed with the six — entry, liberation, and so forth" is a compressed list whose full enumeration is not given in the passage; this is a characteristic ellipsis of the genre and not a translation problem. The "four moments" in the line on the source of wisdom refers to the standard Vajrayāna enumeration of the four moments of gnosis arising in the context of bliss and emptiness; no gloss is inserted in the body per instructions.

- The colophon formula "Glorious Jñānavajra, the Compendium of All" refers to the Śrī Jñānavajrasamuccaya, a Vajrayāna scriptural compendium; chapter numbers (seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth) are given in the Tibetan colophons and preserved as such.

The passage on the five family-types and their lotus or jewel analogies reflects standard Vajrayāna faculty-classification (the five spiritual families, pañcakula), mapped onto practitioners by capacity. The analogies — sandalwood, blue lotus, white lotus, red lotus, jewel — are technical designations for śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha, bodhisattva, mantra-practitioner, and Vajradhara-family respectively, and are rendered accordingly.

The final enumeration of sixteen (or more) emptinesses — inner, outer, inner-and-outer, emptiness of emptiness, great, ultimate, compounded, uncompounded — corresponds to a standard Prajñāpāramitā enumeration and is here organized by the factor that "gathers" or realizes each group.

- The passage describes a complex Vajrayāna visualization and empowerment sequence. The phrase rendered "the earth-letter in gold" refers to the Tibetan syllable SA (ཤ), interpreted in many commentaries as the seed-syllable associated with the earth element; this is a standard tantric convention. The sequence of syllables OM, AH, HŪṂ at crown, throat, and heart is the universal Vajrayāna body-speech-mind triad. The term "vaiḍūrya" denotes the precious blue-green stone, here rendered "lapis lazuli" as the closest familiar equivalent, though some traditions interpret it as beryl or aquamarine. The phrase "expansion and gathering" renders a standard technical dyad of the generation and completion stages in certain Tibetan tantric systems. The final sentence describing empowerment is unusually compressed even by tantric standards; the translation follows the most coherent grammatical reading.

- The term Avadhūtī here refers to the central channel in tantric physiology; the phrase "conduct of the Avadhūtī" indicates the innermost practice associated with working with the central channel, which underpins the three levels of conduct described immediately after. This is consistent with the standard Vajrayāna commentarial tradition.

The passage ends mid-sentence with "from the three appearances abiding as illusion," indicating the text continues and this is a deliberate stopping point in the source provided.

The five objects paired with the five faculties as deity figures (e.g., Vajradhātviśvarī, Kṣitigarbha) follow the standard Vajrayāna maṇḍala system in which the five sense-object goddesses and five bodhisattva-gate guardians are identified with faculties and their objects. No single Sanskrit reconstruction is supplied for the Tibetan རྒྱལ་མཚན་ as it functions adjectivally in context alongside རྒྱལ་.

- The phrase rendered "the small tongue" refers to the uvula, a standard anatomical reference in Vajrayāna physiology for the point from which inner nectar flows. The "hair-tuft of the eye" (mdzod spra) is the ūṇā, the curl of hair between the brows that is a major mark of a buddha, here treated as the point from which nectar descends. "Grasping the hare" is the classical Indian description of the moon's markings, i.e., the full moon that holds the image of a hare; this simile describes the awakening mind sphere as stable and full. The passage throughout is a highly condensed verse summary (a table of contents in verse) of the preceding chapters, followed by a brief prose and verse section on the physiology of the wisdom wind and the flow of the awakening mind.

- The phrase rendered "the twelve vowels endowed with melody, through the five-element winds, transformed into the five goddesses: the sixty limbs of melodious sound are uttered" reflects a tantric phonological cosmology in which the Sanskrit vowel series (here counted as twelve), the consonants, and their numerical transformations are correlated with bodily winds, goddesses, and the marks of a buddha. The arithmetic sequence ($34 + 6 = 40$; doubled to give 80 minor marks; separately, the 32 major marks) follows a standard Vajrayāna embryological-cosmological scheme; the numbers are rendered as stated in the Tibetan without harmonization.

The term "three minds" (sems gsum) in the final stanza likely refers to the three experiential luminosities recognized in tantric practice: appearance, increase, and attainment — a technical category in Highest Yoga Tantra. This is left as "three minds" in the body and flagged here for the listener's orientation.

- The terms karaṇa and vidhu appear here as transliterations of Sanskrit words used in the Tibetan original without translation. Karaṇa likely refers to a specific yogic technique or binding practice; vidhu is uncertain in this context but may relate to a purificatory or renunciatory rite. These are left in Sanskrit as the text itself preserves them as technical terms whose precise referents belong to the specific tantric commentarial tradition of this text.

The phrase rendered "leap-over" (tögal) refers to the Dzogchen practice of thod rgal, a direct crossing-over technique associated with the spontaneous arising of visions. It is kept as a descriptive English rendering consistent with standard Dzogchen terminology, though the surrounding context is Inner Yoga Tantra rather than Dzogchen per se, indicating a point of textual interest.

- The four joys mentioned in the sequence at the throat, heart, navel, and secret place correspond to the standard Vajrayāna fourfold joy schema: joy (ānanda), supreme joy (paramānanda), exceptional or distinguished joy (viśeṣānanda), and the innate or co-emergent joy (sahajānanda). The term rendered "the unsurpassing is attained" for "सर्वविशेषादतिशयोक्त्यैवमुत्तमं" is slightly ambiguous: it may mean the attainment of a joy that is supremely unchanging, i.e., the fourth joy experienced in its reversed ascent, which some traditions call "the beyond-supreme." The rendering follows the most common commentarial reading.

The phrase "वज्रप्राप्तिर्वाप्तं वाक्मयं" literally means "having attained the aim of the Firm Piercer." This is a recognized epithet that can refer to Indra (Śakra), but in tantric context it more likely alludes to the vajra itself or to Vajrapāṇi in his "firm" aspect; the translation renders it accordingly without forcing a single identification in the body of the text.

- The phrase rendered "seventy-seven syllables" is literally "seventy-seven letters" and refers to a specific visualization practice; the precise technical referent may vary by commentary tradition.

The term translated "flesh-marked one" refers to a tantric practitioner bearing characteristic signs or marks; the exact significance depends on the specific Anuyoga or Mahāyoga context of the text.

"Sparśavajrā" is a reconstructed Sanskrit for the Tibetan "reg bya rdo rje ma," meaning the vajra-consort associated with the sense of touch; this is a standard tantric figure.

The phrase rendered "the food of experiencing bliss-emptiness" involves the tantric understanding of sensory engagement as inner experience; no single conventional translation fully conveys the technical usage here.

- The passage is the concluding portion of chapter thirty of the Glorious Vajra of Wisdom, Compendium of All (Skt. Jñānavajrasamuccaya), and chapter thirty-one begins mid-passage. The chapter colophon appears twice in the Tibetan, bracketing a new chapter beginning; both are rendered as colophons in sequence, as the text itself presents them.

The term rendered "Fierce Lady" for རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ is the tantric deity Caṇḍālī, associated with the inner heat practice (tummo). The gloss is given once here.

The phrase "the setting vajra-sun" renders རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ as a compound technical term describing the dissolution of solar or luminous appearance into the central channel — a standard Vajrayāna completion-stage process. The text itself immediately glosses this, and the translation follows the text's own explanation closely.

- The term dharmodaya rendered as "vajra dharma-source" follows its tantric technical sense: the triangular source-of-phenomena symbol, often identified with the lotus in paired method-and-wisdom practice. The passage "sinks into the lotus" reflects the standard tantric union imagery here.

The phrase translated as "draws together the awareness-woman in a manifest drawing-together" refers to the ritual engagement with the mudrā-consort (vidyā / rig ma) in the context of the four-joy practice that follows.

The text ends mid-sentence in the passage provided, so the translation ends accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "the thirteenth ground" refers to the thirteenth bodhisattva bhūmi, a distinctly Vajrayāna enumeration that extends the standard ten-ground scheme, here signifying the highest fruition level of tantric realization.

The line "the samaya substance of excrement and urine" belongs to the Vajrayāna context of consecrated substances used in tantric feast practice; no further gloss is inserted in the body per the formatting guidelines.

The final two lines are compressed and the last line's syntax is elliptical in the Tibetan. The rendering "the selflessness of whatever appears as appearance" reflects the most grammatically natural and doctrinally consistent reading, though a case could be made for "realize that whatever appears has no self-nature."

- The passage is a complex tantric text from the Glorious Wisdom Vajra Compendium (dPal ye shes rdo rje kun las bsdus pa), and the colophon identifies this as chapter thirty-four. The section on elemental correspondences (costus root, camphor, saffron, and so on) draws on Indian medical-tantric lore associating plant substances with the five afflictions; the identifications follow standard Tibetan tantric commentarial tradition. The final lines of the passage are clearly incomplete as given, ending mid-sentence — this is a feature of the source text as supplied, not a translation omission. The term rendered "union" (zung 'jug) is the standard Tibetan for yuganaddha, the non-dual union of wisdom and compassion, or of emptiness and luminosity, a key Vajrayāna technical term. The four-substance enumeration in the afflictions section (costus equals aversion, camphor arouses attachment, saffron generates pride, with the four together equaling delusion) reflects a specific commentarial tradition on medicinal-tantric correspondences and the reading is contextually secure.

- The phrase rendered "the vajra-holder dissolves" (རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་) could alternatively mean the vajra-yogin "merges" or "is absorbed" rather than "dissolves"; the context of union-practice favors absorption or merging, but "dissolves" is also standard in the dissolution-stage (laya) terminology of completion-phase practice.

The section describing "the bold waves of conceptual thought utterly stilled" (རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་) is terse and the syntax compressed; the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading — conceptual agitation pacified — but the compound is unusual.

The colophon "thirty-fifth chapter of the glorious Jñānavajrasamuccaya" names the root tantra from which this passage derives; the full Sanskrit title is Śrī-jñānavajrasamuccaya-nāma-mahātantrarāja.

- The final verse section is dense with Vajrayāna technical vocabulary. The term rendered "jewel-topknot" (Tibetan: mdzod spugtsug tor) refers to the uṣṇīṣa or cranial protrusion, here used esoterically in conjunction with the channels and winds. "Bindus" (thig le) are the subtle drops central to Vajrayāna physiology and are left in Sanskrit convention rather than translated, as no English equivalent is fully satisfactory; the rendering "bindus" is standard in scholarly literature.

The passage ends mid-sentence ("for all those who desire peace"), indicating the text continues; this is consistent with the continuity instruction provided.

- The passage identifies four tantric activities (pacification, enrichment, magnetizing, wrathful action) and associates each with a specific buddha and consort in non-dual union: Māmakī for enrichment (associated with Ratnasambhava's family), Amitābha with the White-Robed Mother (Pāṇḍaravāsīnī) for magnetizing, and Tārā for wrathful activity. The text appears to be a root tantra verse section followed by auto-commentary prose, and the boundary between verse and prose requires interpretive judgment in several places.

The phrase rendered "the twelve examples of illusion" refers to a standard Vajrayāna list of twelve similes for illusory appearance used to characterize the nature of the illusory body and great bliss absorption.

The Sanskrit term "sabha" glossed as "saptā" (seventh) in the text is the text's own gloss on a Sanskrit word appearing in Tibetan transliteration; it is reproduced as such.

"The supreme of herds" renders "khyu mchog," a standard epithet meaning "foremost among a herd," here applied to the bodhicitta-vajra.

- The phrase rendered "does not abide in the expansion of knowing" reflects a non-abiding (rab tu mi gnas, apratisthita) that characterizes the Madhyamaka great non-abiding nirvāṇa, here applied to the omniscient wisdom itself — it neither rests in saṃsāra nor in a fixed nirvāṇa.

The closing verse's "father and mother" (yab yum) refers to the tantric union of the male and female buddha-principles, symbolizing the inseparability of skillful means and wisdom, bliss and emptiness.

- The phrase "to the crown and the uṣṇīṣa" renders the Tibetan "coḍpan gtsug tor," literally the diadem and the cranial protrusion, two of the major marks of a great being. In context this is a homage to Vajradhara's physical glory as embodied in these marks, though it functions grammatically as a stand-in for the whole figure.

The "three grounds" in "ruler of the world, lord of the three grounds" most likely refers to the three realms of the desire, form, and formless worlds, over which the figure holds sovereign mastery.
