

The Conduct of the Yoginī

Yoginīsañcāryam · Toh 375 · Derge Kangyur

རྣམ་ཐོབ་མཁའ་ཀུན་ཀྱི་སྒྲུབ་པ།

Toh 375 in the Kangyur is a Buddhist tantric text known in English as The Conduct of the Yoginī, in Sanskrit as the Yoginīsañcārya, and in Tibetan as the Rnal 'byor ma'i kun tu spyod pa. It belongs to the class of Yoginī tantras within the Kangyur's collection of tantric scriptures, and it concerns the esoteric rites and modes of conduct associated with advanced Vajrayāna practice, including the sequential and reversed orders of arising, the reading of signs, and the cultivation of great bliss through the path of yoga. The text opens with a homage to the glorious Vajrasattva and a verse salutation to the guru as vajra-holder, through whose grace the state of great bliss is said to be attained in a single instant. Its content is presented as an explication of teachings that remain concealed within the broader tantric corpus, laid out as a practical guide for the accomplished yogic practitioner.

In the language of India: Yoginīsañcāryam. In the language of Tibet: The Conduct of the Yoginī.

Homage to the Blessed One, the glorious Vajrasattva.

Through whose grace the state of great bliss
Is attained in a single instant,
To the feet of the vajra-holder (Skt. vajradhara), precious as a jewel,
That guru — I bow down.

Now what is to be rightly taught
Is the supreme rite of conduct.
To cultivate this, the master of three wheels,
Is to abide on the path of yoga.

What remains concealed in the tantra
Regarding the forward and reversed order of arising,
Just as it was taught, that is spoken of;
The explanation too is given in the same way.

Every last teaching given separately
Is the detailed rite of signs.
Through mere knowledge of this,
The practitioner attains accomplishment.

By the mode of thirty-seven,
One abides on the side of awakening.
This is taught as the object of meditation in the world:
The glorious Heruka, supreme among beings.

Now first, the sovereign of yoga should generate divine pride toward the five aggregates. Toward the aggregate of form: Vairocana. Toward the aggregate of feeling: Vajra Sun. Toward the aggregate of perception: Padma Lord of Dance. Toward the aggregate of formations: Vajra King. Toward the aggregate of consciousness: Vajrasattva. The essential identity of all Tathāgatas is Śrī Heruka Vajra. Toward the two eyes: Vajra of Delusion. Toward the two ears: Vajra of Aversion. Toward the two nostrils: Vajra of Envy. Toward the tongue: Vajra of Desire. Toward the body: Vajra of Miserliness. Toward all the sense bases together: the expanse of the sovereign vajra. Toward the earth element: she who causes downfall. Toward the water element: she who causes death. Toward the fire element: she who summons. Toward the wind element: she who commands dance. Toward the space element: she who is the lotus-web. In this way, divine pride is to be generated toward the aggregates, elements, and sense bases. From the Conduct of the Yoginī, the purification of the abodes of the deities: the first abiding.

Now the thirty-seven factors of awakening (Skt. bodhipakṣadharmas) are to be applied through divine yoga. What are all of these? The close placement of mindfulness on the body; the close placement of mindfulness on feeling; the close placement of mindfulness on phenomena; the close placement of mindfulness on mind; the miraculous foot of aspiration; the miraculous foot of diligence; the miraculous foot of analysis; the miraculous foot of mind; the faculty of faith; the faculty of diligence; the faculty of mindfulness; the faculty of meditative absorption; the faculty of wisdom; the power of faith; the power of diligence; the power of mindfulness; the power of meditative absorption; the power of wisdom; perfect meditative absorption as a factor of awakening; perfect diligence as a factor of awakening; perfect joy as a factor of awakening; perfect pliancy as a factor of awakening; perfect discrimination of phenomena as a factor of awakening; perfect mindfulness as a factor of awakening; perfect equanimity as a factor of awakening; right view; right intention; right speech; right action as its fullest scope; right livelihood; right effort; right mindfulness; right meditative absorption; generating virtuous phenomena not yet arisen; fully guarding virtuous phenomena already arisen; abandoning non-virtuous phenomena already arisen; and not generating non-virtuous phenomena not yet arisen. Thus: the close placements of mindfulness, the right abandonings, the miraculous feet, the faculties, the powers, the factors of awakening, and the noble eightfold path in its fullest scope — these are the thirty-seven factors conducive to awakening. This concludes the second part: the teaching of the thirty-seven factors conducive to awakening from the conduct of the yoginī.

Now, to summarize briefly the enumeration of the divine correspondences of these, as they stand: the close placement of mindfulness of the body is the ḍākinī. The close placement of mindfulness of feeling is Lāmā. The close placement of mindfulness of phenomena is Khaṇḍarohā. The close placement of mindfulness of mind is the Corporeal One. The miraculous foot of intention is the Supremely Fierce One. The miraculous foot of diligence is the Fierce-Eyed One. The miraculous foot of investigation is the Luminous One. The miraculous foot of mind is the Great-Nosed One. The faculty of faith is Viramatī. The faculty of diligence is the Dwarf Woman. The faculty of mindfulness is the Sovereign of Laṅkā. The faculty of meditative absorption is the Shade of the Tree. The faculty of wisdom is the Earth Protectress. The power of faith is the Great Terror-Bringer. The power of diligence is the Wind-Force One. The power of mindfulness is the Beer-Drinker. The power of meditative absorption is the Blue-Cleansed One. The power of wisdom is the Supremely Good One. Perfect meditative absorption as a factor of awakening is the Horse-Eared One. Perfect diligence as a factor of awakening is the Bird-Faced One. Perfect joy as a factor of awakening is the Wheel-Force One. Perfect pliancy as a factor of awakening is Khaṇḍarohā. Perfect discrimination of phenomena as a factor of awakening is the Beer-Seller. Perfect mindfulness as a factor of awakening is Cakravartinī. Perfect equanimity as a factor of awakening is the Supremely Courageous One. Right view is the Great-Powered One. Right intention is the Wheel-Turner. Right speech is the Great Diligent One. Right action in its fullest scope is the Crow-Faced One. Right livelihood is the Owl-Faced One. Right effort is the Dog-Faced One. Right mindfulness is the Sow-Faced One. Right meditative absorption is the Blessed Glorious Heruka. Generating virtuous phenomena not yet arisen is Steadfast Yamī. Fully guarding virtuous phenomena already arisen is the Messenger of Yama. Abandoning non-virtuous phenomena already arisen is Tusk-Bearing Yamī. Not generating non-virtuous phenomena not yet arisen is Yama the Destroyer.

This concludes the third part from the conduct of the yoginī: the teaching on the pure divine forms of the thirty-seven factors conducive to awakening.

Then the body of the glorious Heruka, the supreme hero of non-duality, is to be rightly expounded: each limb and member of that body abides as follows. The nails and teeth are half-skulls. The body and its hairs are great bones. The skin and its impurities are bones. The flesh is the one who gnashes fangs. The sinews are the enemy of the gods. The bones are Amitābha. The kidneys are Vajra-Radiance. The heart is the Vajra Body. The two eyes are the One with Sprouts. The bile is the Vajra-Haired One. The lungs are the Great Hero. The intestines are Vajra Hamzad. The spleen is the Supremely Good. The belly is Vajra the Excellent. The excrement is the Great Terror-Bringer. The hollow of the navel is the Ugly-Eyed One. The phlegm is the Supremely Powerful One. The pus is Precious Vajra. The blood is Hayagrīva. The dust is Ākāśagarbha. The fat is the Glorious Heruka. The tears are Padma, Lord of Dance.

The saliva is Vairocana. The mucus is Vajrasattva. This concludes the fourth chapter, which presents the pure display of the hero drawn from the conduct of the yoginī.

Then, further, what is to be explained:

The accomplisher of all attainments (Skt. siddhi), by merely knowing which the practitioner will obtain all attainments — just as one knows the inner nature of oneself, so is the sacred outer maṇḍala.

The manner in which the arrangement is applied is the synthesis of all essences.

Through the mode of support and supported,
Bhairava and the rest abide truly in their places.

As transmitted from the guru in due lineage, whoever knows this ritual —

upon the mountain, on the soft, variegated petals of a lotus in full bloom, the hero who dwells in its center, accomplishing all desired aims —

the ḍākinī, the Lāmā, and she who bears the form of Khaṇḍarohā:
place them in the lotus directions.

They are the accomplishers of all attainments.

Two-armed, with one face, of varied form, the Lady of Display.

In the four intermediate directions place the skull-cups filled with the fifth.
Pūllīra and the rest are joined in their proper order, abiding as domain and dweller in domain.
Invite them; they remain in the center of the wheel.
The yogin with awareness should always offer worship.

The syllable Pu refers to Pūllīramalaya: the hero is Khaṇḍakapāla and the heroine is Pracaṇḍā. The syllable Jā refers to Jālandhara: the hero is Mahākaṅkāla and the heroine is Caṇḍākṣī. The syllable O refers to Oḍḍiyāna: the hero is Kaṅkāla and the heroine is Prabhāvatī. The syllable A refers to Arbuda: the hero is Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and the heroine is Mahānāsā — these are the sacred places. The syllable Go refers to Godāvarī: the hero is Surāvairī and the heroine is Vīramatī. The syllable Rā refers to Rāmeśvarī: the hero is Amitābha and the heroine is Kharvarī. The syllable De refers to Devīkoṭa: the hero is Vajraprabhā and the heroine is Laṅkeśvarī. The syllable Mā refers to Malava: the hero is Vajradeha and the heroine is Drumacchāyā. These are the adjacent sacred places. The wheel of mind — moving through space.

The syllable Kā refers to Kāmarūpa: the hero is Aṅguri and the heroine is Irāvatī. The syllable O refers to Oḍi: the hero is Vajrajaṭila and the heroine is Mahābhairavī. These are fields. The syllable Tri refers to Triśakuni: the hero is Mahābhairava and the heroine is Vāyuvegā. The syllable Ko refers to Kosala: the hero is Vajrahūṃkāra and the heroine is Surābhakṣā — adjacent field. The syllable Ka refers to Kaliṅga: the hero is Subhadra and the heroine is Śyāmadevī. The syllable La refers to Laṃbaka: the hero is Vajrabhadra and the heroine is Subhadrā — these are the chandoha. The syllable Kā refers to Kāñcī: the hero is Mahābhairava and the heroine is Hayakarṇā. The syllable Hi refers to Himālaya: the hero is Virūpākṣa and the heroine is Khaganānī. These are the adjacent chandohas. The wheel of speech — moving upon the earth.

The syllable Pre refers to Pretapurī: the hero is Mahābala and the heroine is Cakravegā. The syllable Gṛ refers to Gṛhadevatā: the hero is Ratnajvālā and the heroine is Khaṇḍarohā. These are the assemblies. The syllable Sau refers to Saurāṣṭra: the hero is Hayagrīva and the heroine is Śauṇḍinī. The syllable Su refers to Suparṇadvīpa: the hero is Ākāśagarbha and the heroine is Cakravarāmiṇī. These are the adjacent assemblies. The syllable Nā refers to Nāgara: the hero is Śrīheruka and the heroine is Subīrā. The syllable Si refers to Sindhaudeśa: the hero is Padmanarteśvara and the heroine is Mahābalā. These are the charnel grounds. The syllable Ma refers to Marudeśa: the hero is Vairocana and the heroine is Cakravartinī. The syllable Ku refers to Kulūtā: the hero is Vajrasattva and the heroine is Mahāvīryā. These are the adjacent charnel grounds. The wheel of body — moving beneath the earth.

Kākāsyā, Ulūkāsyā, Śvānāsyā, and Sūkarāsyā are in the directions. Yamādādhī, Yamādūtī, Yamādaṃṣṭriṇī, and Yamāmathanī are in the intermediate directions.

In this way, so long as the outer and inner nature have not been definitively comprehended as one's field of experience, one should continue to meditate upon them as objects of contemplation.

From the Conduct of the Yoginī, the fifth chapter, which teaches through the abodes of the deities.

Then the emblems of all, beginning with the sovereign,
the assemblies of mudrā, one's own color, hand-implements, and manner of abiding — these are to be definitively concealed within the tantra.

The great king Śrī Heruka, who utterly vanquishes all that is malevolent — with two hands he perfectly embraces, and with two he holds the elephant hide.
In the remaining right hands: an enemy-stake, a trident, a curved knife, and a ḍamaru drum.
In the remaining left hands: he raises the khaṭvāṅga, a great red skull-cup, a lasso, and the heads of Brahmā — these are described.
He is adorned with twelve of these.
He holds a garland of skulls as an offering vessel — this is to be known as numbering fifty.

The Blessed One's consort stands before him:
one face, massively blazing.
In the embrace she holds skull-cups filled with the blood of malevolent māras.
With the right hand she constantly makes the threatening gesture, and in the fierce hand she holds a curved knife.
Her body color is red, blazing greatly,

her form substantial, adorned with skull fragments.
Her hair flows loose; her body has three eyes.
Her bared fangs are awesome and terrifying.
She is well embraced about the hips by his legs.
The two abide in the mode of kissing.

The four ḍākinīs and the rest hold khaṭvāṅgas, vessels, and curved knives.
On their bodies they have three eyes, the five mudrā-ornaments, and the like,
and are adorned with flowing loose hair.

The twenty-four heroes
are adorned with the five mudrā-ornaments and the like.
Two hands, one face, three eyes — their crown of matted hair is bound with silk.
They well embrace vajra and bell, and enact great passion and subsequent desire.

The twenty-four yoginīs are adorned with flowing loose hair, with the five mudrā-ornaments and the like,
and their crowns are adorned with jewels.
They embrace with a vessel and the rest,
and hold curved knives with the threatening gesture.

Śrī Heruka and all the rest abide in the posture with the right leg extended.
They are adorned with necklace, armlets, earrings,
and a garland of skulls.
The offering vessel, the skull-cup held aloft, and ashes — these are explained as the sixth mudrā.
Through the purity of the six perfections, they are adorned with the six mudrā-ornaments.

The vajras of body, speech, and mind are adorned with pure ornaments below the three eyes.
Through the distinctions of body, speech, and mind, one should meditate on oneself as the essential nature of the accomplishments of the three syllables, and those who desire accomplishment should do nothing else.

Whatever merit arises from that — the vast qualities of accomplishment — could not be expressed in their merit even by hundreds and thousands of tongues.

The four, beginning with Crow-Face, are all gatekeepers.
They hold khaṭvāṅga and skull-cup, and on their bodies they bear the five mudrā-ornaments and the like.

Yamādhṛta and the rest are at the four intermediate directions.
They have both legs extended, possessing two forms, captivating the mind —
just as the dākinīs arise, those of Crow-Face and the rest are distinguished accordingly.
Thus, without exception, they abide in the wheel, in accordance with the sequential rite of color-distinctions.

From the Conduct of the Yoginī, the sixth chapter, which teaches one's own emblems, faces, mudrā-ornaments, body colors, and weapons.

Then the two armors —
by whoever knows them, swiftly will the practitioner attain accomplishment.
This is to be definitively explained as concealed within the tantra.

Oṃ ha. Nama hi. Svāhā hu. Bauṣaṭ he. Hūṃ hūṃ ho. Phaṭ haṃ.

Apply the armor to: the heart, the crown, the top of the head, the shoulders, and the two eyes.

The first is Vajrasattva,
the second abides as Vairocana,
the third is Padmanarteśvara, the lord of dance,
the fourth is described as Śrī Heruka,
the fifth is Vajrasūrya,
and the sixth is the supreme horse, Hayagrīva.
Thus, by these six armors,
one is most excellently protected.

Oṃ baṃ. Haṃ yoṃ. Hrīṃ moṃ. Hrīṃ hrīṃ. Hūṃ hūṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ.

The navel, the heart, likewise the mouth, the crown, the top of the head — these are the armor-points.

The first is Vajravārāhī.

The second is to be called Yāminī.

The third is Mohinī herself.

The fourth is described as Dākinī.

The fifth is known as the Universal Terror.

The sixth is described as Caṇḍālī.

These six armors together are the Sow and the non-dual yoginī.

From the General Practice of the Yoginī, the Two Armors Explained — the seventh chapter.

Then, having understood the two armor-points, one meditates fully on the wisdom wheel,
and through the application of mantra and mudrā, swiftly draws the samaya wheel in.

Press the foot down and gaze upward;
above, proclaim the sound Pheṃ.

The heroes and yoginīs dwelling in the world-realms of the ten directions — summon them.
With mantra, rouse them truly, and in that very instant invite them in.

Curve the finger; the middle finger is firmly joined.

The thumb is precisely applied as a vajra hook.

This is placed at the center of the forehead, and by rolling and turning it round and round,
the mantrin bestows blessing upon the heroes and yoginīs.

The syllable dyā is precisely applied at the tip of the nose.

The syllable byā is properly placed at the hub of the sex organ.

At the navel, the heart, the mouth, and the forehead, consecration is bestowed with the full assemblage of mantras.

At the navel and at the heart, the yoginī —

by the mantras of the buddha-ḍākinīs — through the two channels, the avadyūtī, is heroically blessed.

The yoginī and the hero are non-dual.

The first joy is the hero;

the supreme joy is the yoginī;

the joy of total delight is the entirety.

The means of bliss — all of this is to be known.

In the realm of the gods, on the earth's surface, and beneath the earth, in an instant they become a single form.

What I have explained as meditation, and what is described as the gathering — with the two arms, right and left, the turning is the bliss of the ḍākinī.

From the General Practice of the Yoginī, the Inviting and Gathering of the Wisdom Wheel — the eighth chapter.

Then, listen — those who wish to know what is to be understood as the emanation body and what is desired as the perfect enjoyment body.

The great mudrā of the Great Vehicle is said to grant the attainment of the yoginī.

Above the great mudrā
there is no other yoga more supreme.

Śrī Heruka, the great king, is the lord sovereign over all yogas.

The net of the ḍākinīs, bound, taken from that which is equal to space — omniscient wisdom is its intrinsic nature.

Śrī Heruka, the supreme hero, in whom all noble beings are gathered,
is accomplished through the drink of peace.

The supreme station is eternal, and the flawless abiding is permanent.

Join properly to sons and so forth;
dwelling as object in each and every domain, establish oneself as the identity of Śrī Heruka.

The twenty-four syllables are to be understood as the perfect enjoyment body, abiding within the great yoga.

In brief, one who enters with thoroughness — let the diligent, discerning mind know this.

Now listen, practitioners — I shall explain how the reversal is taught.

Śrī signifies non-dual wisdom.

He signifies the emptiness of cause and so forth.

Ru signifies freedom from arrangement.

Ka signifies non-abiding anywhere.

That is empty of intrinsic nature, all-pervading and indestructible.

Meditating on this in brief,

one will attain the desired accomplishment.

Meditating fully on the three bodies —

the dharmakāya, the saṃbhogakāya, and the nirmāṇakāya — and the thirty-seven factors of awakening:

these one must certainly meditate upon.

From the General Practice of the Yoginī, the Explanation of Entry — the ninth chapter.

Then, if one grows weary from meditation, employ the special mode of condensed conduct.

Do not be separated from the practice — this is the yoga of conduct.

As described previously, elaborately perform the dhyāna ritual,
and to whatever activity one desires, offer the tormas especially.

On the tenth day of the waning moon and likewise on the tenth of the waxing moon, diligently make excellent offerings of beer and so forth to the heroes and to the Vajra Goddess.

Join the mantras described earlier with the seal, and guard them properly in accordance with the ritual.

Om ā ra llī hoḥ jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ. Vajra-ḍākinī samaya stvaṃ dṛśya hoḥ.

Recite this thus three, four, or five times.

With the samaya substances and the rest well in place, open the vajra-joined palms with the fingers pointing upward.
Let the heroes and yoginīs recite it openly.

Om kha kha khāhi khāhi. Sarva-yakṣa-rākṣasa bhūta-preta-piśāca-unmāda-pasmāra-vajra-ḍāka-ḍākinī-adaya imaṃ baliṃ grhṇantu samayaṃ rakṣantu mama sarva-siddhim me prayacchantu yathābhaṃ. Yathéṣṭaṃ bhuñjatha jighrata pibata mātikramatha mama sarva-kārtayā. Satsukhāṃ viśuddhaye sahāyikā bhavantu hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The mantra of the hero's wheel and the others, adorned also with charnel grounds and the like —
the yogī, facing south, makes excellent offerings at a lofty site.

As indicated by what is proximate, one should offer according to one's ability.
On the tenth day of the middle winter month and the rest, make offerings with faith.

To the noble person, the tamer of all, offer every kind of happiness.

There, the food offerings are to be eaten,
and the remainder is to be left in a vessel.

The glory that comes to one's hand through this nothing whatsoever can destroy.

This is to be worshipped by those who are devoted.
When the glorious Heruka becomes fully delighted,
he will bestow the supreme of all joys,
for the supreme abides in his very hand.

At night, with hair unbound, if one makes torma-offerings naked in the vow-conduct, the glorious Heruka, the lord of yoga, will be gladdened by the mothers through this.

This is the tenth chapter of the Conduct of the Yoginī, which teaches the protection of making torma and offerings on the tenth day.

Then, the six perfections,
the thirty-seven factors of awakening, the grounds, the ten stages and the rest —
these are of the nature of the Great God (Śiva), the supreme divine one.

Whatever things by whatever means one properly engages the minds of people — by that one is transformed into that very thing, like a jewel possessed of various forms.

Likewise, whether dwelling with fear or dwelling without fear, however one dwells, through pure meditative concentration or through meditation, all activities are excellently accomplished.
The supreme fruit of conduct and liberation is to be attained in this very life.
The meditation I shall explain is an essence gathered from all.

One who possesses the understanding of an erroneous mind — you must not teach it to any such person.
As the guru has taught in due order, that by which one quickly comes to understand:
in ten million thousands of lives, urged on by illusory wisdom, with genuine faith aroused and abiding in the yogic mode of conduct — such a one is fit for it.

One who is mute and dull, possessed of bad methods,
one who has the understanding of a childish mind, sentient beings who are not yet fully matured, those who have gone astray through external treatises — all of these do not know it.
Covered by the darkness of non-knowing, delighting in relying on arrogance, possessed of a mind with pride and the other seven — all of these do not know the secret domain of purification of the buddhas.

The great master who is the glorious Heruka's true entry, who is the great self,
swiftly generates the accomplishments and is one who instills immediate confidence.
One who knows the yoga of the rite of total purification — to that one the activities of the ritual are to be taught.
Within the three existences without remainder,
that one knows the teaching of the omniscient.

By seeing, by touching, by hearing, by remembering — from all misdeeds one is liberated, thus, this is beyond doubt.

Turning back the gods and making sport, turning back the distinctions of mantra, turning back the secrets of meditation — these accomplish every essence.

The minds fully ripened that are the common ground of all the tantras — here the samayas of the mantras of preparation and the rest are taught in that way.

The relief spoken of by the Sugata (the Buddha, the well-gone one) — a pure body, free of fault —

Even a mantra-practitioner of little merit shall obtain it through my delight.

From the All-Pure Conduct of the Yoginī — the eleventh chapter, teaching the purification of all things.

Then: neither guarded nor unguarded, neither one who holds a maṇḍala nor one who does not,
without recitation, asceticism, or fire-offering — in brief, one who has gathered the mind in proper form.

The consciousness to be apprehended and the primordial wisdom — these are to be striven for through what the guru has taught.

The way of external treatises is an exceedingly long path.

For yogins, through skillful means, striving in service and veneration of the guru — this is the teaching of the defining mark of the Teacher, and it is the hero who teaches that very suchness.

The self of the yoga of momentariness, possessed of the mudrā of momentariness — in all respects, everything is instantaneous;
in an instant the secret mantra is recited.

Speaking, seeing, embracing with the hand, clasping, the pair of two, and so forth —
the Tathāgata has declared these as relief;
they are to be relied upon to an ever higher degree.

All is taught here.

Other varieties are like grass.

That very suchness is the life of living creatures;
that very suchness is the immutable, the supreme.

That very suchness pervades everything and abides distinctly throughout all bodies.

That very suchness is the wisdom of the buddhas;
it is declared to be glorious Heruka.

Men, those of indeterminate sex, and the rest — even the subtle essence is grasped therein.

In that which has arisen as the self of wisdom — those who abide on the grounds, all the treatises without exception,
those who abide at the ultimate end of the Vedas:
in this world and in others,
without that, nothing is accomplished.

From among the ultimate ends accomplished through the Vedas, this is proclaimed as the supreme essence.

All these beings appear as the very nature of the five buddhas, appearing like skilled dancers and beautiful paintings.

That which is called great bliss is one alone,
and the experience of that one dances in many forms.

Sitting and rising, speech itself, entering and completing, purity itself,
blessing, empowerment,
and meditative absorption — these are the condensed worship.

Then: the other name of the ritual, the non-duality of skillful means and wisdom — in that very suchness, everything arises;
it performs the sending forth and the gathering.

A Ā, I Ī, U Ū, Ṛ Ṝ, Ḷ Ḹ, E AI, O AU, Aṃ Aḥ.

Ka Kha Ga Gha Ṇa. Ca Cha Ja Jha Ña. Ṭa Ṭha Ḍa Ḍha Ṇa. Ta Tha Da Dha Na. Pa
Pha Ba Bha Ma. Ya Ra La Va. Śa Ṣa Sa Ha. Kṣaḥ.

This is the Blessed Lord himself.

It abides as the supreme, the transcendent.

It is the source of all gods and is itself the stream of all mantras.

Whoever constantly meditates on this,

constantly reads and reflects upon it, and a yogin who recites it first — shall become non-dual glorious Heruka.

The hands and so forth are ornaments therein;

the girdle and all the dwelling-places are therein.

Whoever constantly holds this shall come to understand all phenomena.

Contemplating the Ālikāli before oneself,

the great yogin, abiding in the body's stations, should meditate upon a perfectly complete lunar disc as dwelling at the root of the navel.

Contemplating what abides at the center of that — the syllable of the supreme and most excellent place, endowed with the vajra of body, speech, and mind —

one should meditate upon the body of the deity.

That is beyond form;

it is mind itself, without substantiality.

Contemplate the inconceivable as contemplated, yet do not examine that contemplation as a characteristic mark.

Or: contemplating mind itself as oneself, from that one will attain dhāraṇī.

From the All-Pure Conduct of the Yoginī — the twelfth chapter, teaching the single abode of suchness determined from all tantras.

Then, furthermore, what is to be explained:

the hero and the yoginī are non-dual.

The abode of the great yoga of glorious Heruka is the syllabic ground.

Pullīra-malaya is the head.

Jālandhara is the crown of the skull.

Auṭya is the right ear.

Arbuda is at the back of the body — that is the abode. Godāvarī is the left ear. Rāmeśvara is at the corner of the eye. Devīkoṭa is the two eyes. Mālaya is at the shoulder joint — that is the near-abode. Kāmarūpa is assigned to the armpit. Oṭe is at the two breasts — that is the field. Triśakuni is at the center of the navel. Kośala is at the tip of the nose — that is the near-field. Kaliṅga is assigned to the mouth. Lāmbaka is precisely at the center of the throat — that is the chandoha. Kāñcī is to be assigned to the heart. Himālaya is at the edge of the armpit — that is the upachandoha. Pretapurī is at the thigh. Gṛhadevatā is at the channel of evacuation — that is the assembly place. Saurāṣṭra: contemplate the two thighs. Suvarṇadvīpa is at the two shanks — that is the near-assembly place. Nāgara is at the fingers. Sindhu is at the two soles of the feet — that is the charnel ground. Maru is to be assigned to the two thumbs. Kulutā abides at the knees — that is the near-charnel ground.

Pūjā o agora demā, kā o trikokala kahi, pregr sausunāsi maku — whether sleeping or waking or arising, whether eating, walking, or practicing the Dharma, whoever arranges these in their proper place will not be shaken by the three worlds.

The tantra of names, drawn from the collection of one hundred thousand verses, is a condensed essence. The tantra equal to space is likewise explained from within a single hundred-thousand. The wisdom tantra is secret; it abides in what arises from the arising of names. Through teaching it becomes an emanation body (nirmāṇakāya); through exposition it is held to perfect the enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya). Each and every teaching, without exception, reveals the suchness of nirvāṇa. The three bodies are explained as three wheels of Dharma. Dharma and so forth is precisely the perfect enjoyment body. The accumulations of merit and gnosis abide within the two truths. Those of inferior mind — foolish and dull — those of inferior wisdom who hold wrong views, those corrupted by the treatises of non-Buddhists (tīrthikas): these are slanderers of the guru. All of these are to be utterly abandoned; even respectfully, they should not be taught.

In the distinction between part and part, that is taught as non-dual. The purifying goddess of empowerment and the goddess of command give rise to heroes. All of those below, without exception, engaging in conduct, are the foremost liberators from saṃsāra. Emanated from all the Vedas without remainder, at the ultimate culmination of accomplishment, this is proclaimed supremely.

O hero, you should explain this to me.

Conceal it from buddhas who are tīrthikas.

Following sounds, the diminishment of sounds, and signs, following precisely this very path —
the condensed meaning, correctly taken, is the elaborate language of signs.

One who does not know all-conduct and yet teaches yoga to a yogin — that one's effort is pointless, and they will not attain the fruit. What the noble ones proclaimed in the past for beings was concealed and taught differently. From what is taught here in all-conduct, the practitioner is to perfectly rest in equipoise.

The Victor formerly, in the great tantra, accomplished the syllables of mantra. Whatever karmic activity it may be, it is to be performed having examined whether it is virtuous or non-virtuous. At the edge and at the center of the syllables, all things are there perfectly accomplished.

From the All-Conduct of the Yoginī — the thirteenth chapter, teaching the non-dual certainty of the vowel and consonant series (āli-kāli) and all actions.

Then, in all the tantras, the secret ritual is to be explained. The vajra-hero-yogins and so forth abide on the thrones of the four buddhas. The vajra-heroes-yogins and the dākinīs and so forth — the lords who are the foremost heroes and yogins. The four aspects such as the mirror and so forth — these are precisely the non-dual, the union of non-duality. The non-dual substances — flowers and so forth — are to be offered each in turn. The five mudrās and so forth are the supreme body; by reaching the far shore one fulfills the six perfections (pāramitās). The offerings made with the hands and so forth, possessing gnosis — the wise hero should know these. The six yoginīs in their proper sequence, Vajrasattva and the rest — twelve in all — are to be joined with the great heroes, and — praised with hand-offerings and so forth. The five groups of five are to be thoroughly blended, and blended also with milk. The definite offering rests upon the excellent abode, endowed with desire for conduct and liberation. Through hand-offerings the yogin fulfills the desired aim of giving. He obtains an altered state of mind, and gains food, drink, clothing, and the like. If the divine offering is performed, all one's intentions are completely fulfilled. This hero is a great hero — a yoginī is hard to find on the surface of the earth. The conduct and vow of the yogin, the lord of yoga, is the foremost among all. Whoever always offers to himself here bestows all the fruits of desire.

From the conduct of the yoginī, the hand-offerings taught in proper conjunction with the four heroes — this is the fourteenth.

Then the hero and yoginī: the ritual of non-dual conduct is explained. First, the yogin in meditative equipoise should strive and generate capacity. Immediately following the generation of capacity, one practices the vow of what the mind desires. For the sake of taking up the welfare of sentient beings, the great hero should go forth. Having shared out the limbs of living creatures, seeking happiness, one guards their wellbeing. Abandoning all attachment to offering, one abides in glorious Heruka in purity. With the aspiration for the fruit of liberation, one should please all the yoginīs. The hero should examine the brahmin's thread and the like through the root mantra. He is adorned with a garland of fifty syllables, the secret mantra of the divine essence. All things such as skull fragments and so forth are to be examined as the elements of the body. The six armors of the hero — with this seal the body is made beautiful. Vajravārāhī and other such mantras make the throat beautiful with the syllable of flowing sound. The supreme bearer of the ḍākinī skin-garment of all buddhas — the khaṭvāṅga is the divine body; wisdom is to be examined as the ḍamaru. The skull, the bell, and all such things are to be examined as the elements of the body. The secret mantra of seven syllables makes the earrings and ears beautiful. The mantras of the six yoginīs are the ornament of the girdle. The mantras of the yoginīs of all the cakras are the skull-cups in the hands. The mantra of the mother of Vairocana — with that skull the head is adorned. Having thus thoroughly contemplated oneself, one is well-guarded by the vow-mantra. One who always lives in brahmacarya — this is the worship of the eight-limbed mantra. By day, one examines the blessed hero; by night, one examines the blessed mother. There is nothing whatsoever that must not be done. There is nothing that one always must not think. There is nothing whatsoever that must not be eaten. There is no speaking of virtue and non-virtue. Just as one's own self moves, so others do likewise. Just as oneself is, so too are others. Thus contemplating, I the yogin, having utterly abandoned all fears, conduct myself like a heroic lion and fulfill all intentions. For glorious Heruka, who abides as the foundation — however many movements of limb there are, and however many utterances of words — that very number are mudrās and secret mantras. The conduct of the five families is to be practiced as a single family. One who knows this possesses the self-nature and will go to the supreme rank. For one possessed of the mind of non-dual gnosis, there is nothing whatsoever that must not be done. With a mind of non-conceptual self-nature, one practices the five desirable qualities of sense-pleasure.

From the conduct of the yoginī, the teaching on non-dual vow and secret mantra — this is the fifteenth.

Furthermore, in the time of the latter age, at the end of the era, the accomplishment (siddhi) will not be obtained. Because the mind is thoroughly disturbed by other things, through mudrā, maṇḍala, and recitation, easy accomplishment will not come — there will instead be the suffering of hunger and thirst. Yet striving and fixing one's aim on what is desired,

By that very suchness, I, the yogin, wander freely as I wish in the primordial wisdom of Heruka.
The yogin who hears this from afar and sees it in an instant — having understood this Dharma just as it is,
it will fulfill every aspiration.
Made into great wisdom itself,
the excellent conduct of non-dual primordial wisdom:
apart from the vowels and consonants,
if one desires this Dharma otherwise, that person's effort is without purpose and the fruit will not be obtained.

The sūtras and the conduct of kriyā, yoga, secret, and their various divisions — teaching these to all the world is itself the cause for the aim of awakening.
What I have taught as the entry is the two accumulations as non-dual.
That very suchness, called the nature of Dharma, is held to be nothing other than nirvāṇa.
That all things rest upon the two truths —

this I declared before.

By the siddhi, the yogin becomes one who delights in cultivation.
Meditating upon all conceptual elaborations, through elaboration one brings about freedom from elaboration.
Whatever is secret throughout all the tantras, that suchness is taught through emanations.
By this tantra, the yogin rests rightly upon the two truths, clears away all mental states,
and makes full use of all enjoyments.
The great-minded one binds the wheel — Cakrasaṃvara — and moves in that vow.

Whatever are the signs of the yoginī — forms, gestures, and conventional names — in the domains of the five households and other places, the five yoginīs themselves abide.
In every place where accomplishment is to be achieved, one strives ardently to circumambulate from the left.
According to the conduct of the wheel explained before,
with the ritual numerations and with vows, through mantras of the heroes and the like,
one fulfills whatever the yoginī desires in mind.

In the eastern petal,
one meditates on the ḍākinī in the form of a donkey.
Śrī Heruka
performs all actions.
Abiding in the state of Śrī Heruka, whatever one intends in body, speech, and mind — spoken or unspoken —
all of these are swiftly accomplished.

From the conduct of the yoginī, the certainty of siddhi and the display of the activity of Śrī Heruka — this is the sixteenth.

Then, in the Śrī Heruka tantra, mind is taught to be stainless.

The emanation of pure Dharma is revealed in the form of Vajravārāhī.
From the union of method and wisdom, suchness and everything arise.
The mirror and the other four aspects — the yoginīs abiding in the petals of the lotus, the four ḍākinīs abiding in the lotus:
Māmakī and the others are the excellent ones.
Skull fragments and the rest abide in the wheel — the twenty-four are non-dual.
Contemplate that the heroes themselves are sentient beings liberated from saṃsāra.
Wrathful Vijaya and all the rest,
at the gates and the corner junctions, by various means of taming,
they strive for the benefit of sentient beings.

The one who abides in the secret place should strive earnestly to keep it hidden.
The yoginī and the hero bestow siddhi as one desires.
Having obtained the fruit of yoga,
one will not fall into the ocean of existence.
The means for liberation from saṃsāra is the condensed essence of the tantra.
In order that it be easily understood by teacher and student,
the ritual has not been explained at length.

The yogin's mind is at rest — nirvāṇa should not be pointed to.
The excellent being who so conducts himself becomes purified of every transgression.
In this life or in the next,
by this he will see buddhahood itself.
As the characteristics of the non-virtues described before are to be abandoned, the yogin who meditates on this bestows all the pleasures of desire.

By reciting the names of Śrī Heruka — whatever secrets belong to gods and all others, and whatever exists among humans and the like — by that merit, one obtains those.

Even by merely thinking on it in meditation, by reciting, reading, or writing it,
one will obtain the enjoyments of the higher realms, or else become a wheel-turning sovereign.

When the yogin comes to the time of transference, Śrī Heruka and the rest,
all the heroes (vīras), and however many yoginīs there are carry various flowers in their hands, with various banners and victory standards, with the sounds of various musical instruments, and with various songs they offer nearby homage.
Death is but a conceptual thought;
they carry him to the abode of those who move through space.
Such great heroes and yoginīs are rare upon this earth.

Just as a woman delights in childish talk and also speaks whatever gossip all are saying, she explains the path too, and then comes to die —
the yogin's wicked path is said to be like that.

Then there is yet more to be described:
the abodes and so forth, the dwelling places of the yoginīs.
The yoga of Śrī Heruka and the rest,
the heroes, the non-dual yoginīs:

At Pullīra, the mother who is supremely fierce;
at Jālandhara, the fierce-eyed one;
at Oḍyāna, the radiant one;
at Arbuda, the great-nosed one;
at Godāvarī, the courageous-minded one;

at Rāmeśvara, the small-statured one;
at Devīkoṭa, the sovereign of power;
at Mālava, the one of tree-shade;
at Kāmarūpa, the guardian of the earth;
at Oṭi, she who is the great terrifier;
at Triśakuni, the one of swift wind-force;
at Kosala, the one who drinks ale;
at Kaliṅga, the goddess of blue hue;
at Lampāka, the supremely good one;
at Kāñcī, she of the horse-ear;
at Himālaya, the bird-faced one;
at Pretapurī, the wheel-force;
at Gṛhadevatā, she born of portions;
at Saurāṣṭra, the seller of ale;
at Suvarṇadvīpa, she who is the wheel-armored one;
at Nāgara, she who is supremely courageous;
in the land of Sindhu, the greatly powerful one;
in the land of Myāṅgan, she who turns the wheel;
at Kulūta, the one of great diligence.

The daughters of each of these lands are the non-dual yoginīs.

Dwelling constantly in the secret mantra,
one should strive and accomplish the practice.

Each yoginī is attended by a retinue numbering in the tens of millions.
The marks, the defining characteristics, the mudrās and so on are to be concealed by the practitioner of the left.

Whatever terrible deeds bind ordinary beings in bondage — those very same, when practiced with skillful means, liberate one from the bondage of existence.
Having crossed beyond saṃsāra, one becomes possessed of gnosis according to one's wish.

Throat ornament, crown ornament, shoulder ornament, ear ornament, the Brahmā thread,

the neck adorned, the garland on the crown, the waist-band, the ankle-bells — these are the sounds themselves.

On a mountain peak, from the anthers of various lotuses, from the vowels and consonants, fully endowed with twenty-four,
together with the assembly of heroes and yoginīs, pressing down upon the lord of Umā, embracing the vajra and bell upon the body, one should meditate upon the supreme state of Śrī Heruka, the great king.

Then always here with perfumed water, always smearing the limbs of the body;
adorned with fragrant limbs,
and anointed with the mudrā of ashes and so forth;
with form covered by colors and the like,
one's own body is completely transformed.
Knowing this to be the conduct-vow,
one dwells well in yoga.

Possessed of limbs, possessed of joints, gathering, likewise the heart-force, and these four modes of dance — one should know them by seeing reality itself.
What is called the mode of ardor is said to be the yogin's knowledge.
Endeavoring in that very thing is the great dance of the fortunate.

All who dwell in the place of dance — those ornaments are declared to be that very thing.

Beckoning universally, binding, sending forth, and likewise setting in motion, lowering, this coiling,
and likewise here adorning,
loosing the Brahmā-thread from the body, binding in every aspect,
properly inserting the ankle-bells,

the hand ornaments themselves, the single life-staff thread —
the lower part is sixty-eight, and the embellished is known to be sixteen.
The garland is twenty-five.

From the All-Conduct of the Yoginī, this is the seventeenth chapter, which teaches the purification of suchness and related matters. The All-Conduct of the Yoginī is complete.

Translated, revised, and finalized by the great translator of Zhu Chen, Gö Lhatsé.

Translator's Notes

- The text breaks off mid-sentence in the Tibetan, ending with the enumeration of factors. The translation faithfully renders it to the same point without artificially completing the thought.

The title "Yoginīsañcāryam" is a Sanskrit hybrid preserved in transliteration in the Tibetan; it means roughly "the going-about or conduct of the yoginī." The Tibetan renders it as "rnal 'byor ma'i kun tu spyod pa," which I have translated as "The Conduct of the Yoginī."

The phrase "master of three wheels" for "khor lo gsum bdag" likely refers to the practitioner as lord of the three energy centers or maṇḍala-wheels of body, speech, and mind, a common tantric idiom.

"Vajra of Miserliness" and the wrathful goddesses named for the elements follow a standard Cakrasaṃvara-cycle system of transforming the afflictions and elements into their purified vajra-nature. The specific names for the female deities of the elements — she who causes downfall, she who causes death, she who summons, she who commands dance, the lotus-web — are technical terms from this tantra cycle and have been rendered literally.

- Several of the deity names in this passage are transliterated Sanskrit or hybrid Sanskrit-Tibetan names rendered into Tibetan phonetics, such as Lāmā, Khaṇḍarohā, Cakravartinī, Ākāśagarbha, and Hayagrīva. These have been retained in their standard Sanskrit forms. The name "Vajra Hamzad" renders the Tibetan "rdo rje ha mdzad," a phonetic Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit deity name whose precise Sanskrit original is uncertain; it is kept close to the Tibetan phonetics. The term rendered "hollow of the navel" translates "mtsog ma'i sbubs," which literally means something like "the cavity of the navel area"; the exact anatomical referent involves some ambiguity but "hollow of the navel" conveys the sense adequately.

- The passage is a list of sacred sites (pīṭhas) from the Cakrasaṃvara or related Yoginī-tantra tradition, each associated with a heroic pair — a male deity (hero/vīra) and a female deity (heroine/vīriṇī or dākinī) — rendered throughout by transliterating the Sanskrit place and deity names as they appear in the Tibetan phonetic transcription. The classification of sites into places, adjacent places, fields, adjacent fields, chandohas, adjacent chandohas, assemblies, adjacent assemblies, charnel grounds, and adjacent charnel grounds follows the standard 24-site pīṭha schema of the Cakrasaṃvara cycle. The verse section at the opening of the chapter is metrically irregular in the Tibetan and has been rendered as close verse in English; some lines shade into prose instruction.

- The term rendered "enemy-stake" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is a ritual weapon, a kind of stake or spike used against enemies; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain but the compound is clear in Tibetan.

The phrase ལྷོ་མཆོག་ཀྱི་སྐད་ཀྱི་ཕྱི་ལོ་ལྟར་ — literally "it is to be known as fifty" — refers to the skull-garland numbering fifty, a standard iconographic count in Heruka traditions.

Yamādhṛta rendered for རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་: the Tibetan literally means "firmly established Yama" or "Yama-steady"; this is a deity name in the maṇḍala, here given its Sanskrit equivalent provisionally.

- The term rendered "the Universal Terror" for the fifth figure is literally "she who makes all tremble" or "universal frightener" — a name of a wrathful goddess in this context. The rendering captures the semantic force.

"Avadyūtī" is a tantric term for the central channel (also spelled avadhūtī); the Tibetan transliterates it as a borrowing from Sanskrit. The passage describes a bilateral consecration through two channels converging at the central channel.

The syllables dyā and byā in the invitation and placement sequence are mantric syllables; their precise Sanskrit equivalents as used in this tradition are uncertain, and the Tibetan preserves them as transliterations.

The etymological analysis of the name Heruka into the four syllables Śrī, He, Ru, Ka is a standard tantric nirukta interpretation found in several Heruka-cycle texts.

- The mantra passages are rendered in standard IAST transliteration as is conventional for dhāraṇī and tantra mantra material within sūtra and tantra literature. The Sanskrit of the offering mantra contains a few textually compressed or unusual forms; I have transliterated faithfully rather than normalized.

The phrase "possessed of a mind with pride and the other seven" refers to the seven secondary afflictions associated with pride in Abhidharma classification; this is a brief allusive enumeration in the original.

The final line is incomplete in the source passage as given; the translation renders what is present and the sentence naturally continues into the following passage.

- The Ālikāli refers to the Sanskrit vowel and consonant sequences that precede it in the text — the vowels (Ali) and consonants (Kāli) together form the complete Sanskrit phonemic alphabet, which here functions as a tantric visualization support. This is a standard usage in Cakrasamvara-cycle literature.

The list of sacred sites at the close (Pullīra-malaya, Jālandhara, Auṭya) are pīṭha-s, sacred power-places of the Cakrasaṃvara system, which are mapped onto the yogin's body. The text breaks off mid-list, consistent with the passage ending mid-section.

The phrase rendered "those of indeterminate sex" translates a term that literally means "the neuter" or "hermaphrodite" in classical usage but in tantric context refers to a third gender category recognized in the tradition; the translation reflects this without anachronism.

- The passage containing the untranslated syllables "Pūjā o agora demā, kā o trikokala kahi, pregr sausunāsi maku" appears to be a string of Sanskrit or Apabhraṃśa mantra-syllables rendered phonetically in Tibetan transliteration. These syllables do not yield transparent semantic meaning and function as a ritual dhāraṇī or mantra formula embedded within the text. Rendering them as phonetic transliterations preserves their character as sacred sound-strings rather than discursive prose.

The site-list in this passage belongs to the well-known Śākta-influenced system of twenty-four or thirty-two sacred "power places" (pīṭhas, kṣetras, etc.) familiar from the Cakrasaṃvara cycle and related tantras. The categories rendered here as "abode," "near-abode," "field," "near-field," "chandoha," "upachandoha," "assembly place," "near-assembly place," "charnel ground," and "near-charnel ground" represent a standard eightfold fourfold typology of sacred sites in that tradition.

- The phrase rendered "the syllable of flowing sound" for སྐྱེལ་གྱི་ཐུག་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ཡི་ཐུག་པ་ is syntactically ambiguous. The compound སྐྱེལ་ཐུག་པ་ could denote a specific syllabic or melismatic element of tantric vocalization; some readings take it as "throat-water" or "song-fluid" in a more literal anatomical sense. The rendering here follows the ornament-series context.

The line སྐྱེལ་གྱི་ཐུག་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ཡི་ཐུག་པ་ presents a tension: སྐྱེལ་གྱི་ཐུག་པ་ normally means brahmacharya or celibate conduct, yet the surrounding context of tantric sexual yoga makes this likely an ironic or trans-valued usage, meaning conduct at the level of Brahmā or pure conduct in the tantric redefined sense. This ambiguity is doctrally significant and noted here.

- The phrase "vowels and consonants" renders ā-li kā-li, the standard tantric enumeration of the Sanskrit vowels and consonants used as a technical expression for the totality of sonic reality and, by extension, for the correct symbolic vehicle of the teaching. The point is that if one seeks this Dharma outside this complete symbolic system, one's effort is fruitless.

The "five households" is a standard Cakrasaṃvara topographical reference to the five sacred sites or cremation-ground domains associated with the maṇḍala.

Circumambulation "from the left" is pradakṣiṇā reversed, i.e. counter-clockwise, which is the tantric convention in several Heruka cycles; the Tibetan gyon nas bskor ba unambiguously specifies this.

The final line is incomplete in the passage as given and the translation faithfully renders only what is present, ending at the clause boundary.

- The passage contains a long enumeration of sacred sites (pīṭhas) paired with epithets of the yoginīs who preside over them. These are well-known tantric power-places (pīṭhāni) drawn from standard lists in the Cakrasaṃvara and related Heruka tantric cycles. The Tibetan renders their presiding yoginīs by descriptive epithets translated here as literally as possible; the Sanskrit place-names are retained in their standard scholarly forms.

The phrase rendered "the lord of Umā" refers to Śiva, Umā being a name of his consort Pārvatī; this is a standard tantric idiom for the subjugation of Śiva beneath the deity.

The simile of the woman delighting in childish gossip and then dying is an unusual passage with some grammatical ambiguity in the Tibetan; it appears to caution against the yogin speaking openly of the path, comparing such indiscreet disclosure to frivolous talk that leads to ruin. The reading is consistent with surrounding admonitions about secrecy.

The numerical figures at the close — sixty-eight, sixteen, twenty-five — refer to components of the ornament-system of the tantric practitioner's ritual regalia, whose precise technical referents belong to the internal commentarial tradition of this tantra.

- The colophon names the translator as Gö Lhatsé, the renowned eleventh-century Tibetan translator (Go Lotsāwa Khukpa Lhétsé), associated with the Zhu Chen translation workshop. The phrase "purification of suchness" renders dag pa la sogs pa in relation to de kho na nyid, meaning the chapter treats the purification or clarification of suchness (tattva) among other topics. The chapter number seventeen is explicitly stated in the colophon.
