Toh 419 in the Kangyur is a tantric text known in English as the Noble Ḍākinī Vajra Tent, the Great King of Tantras, in Sanskrit as the Āryaḍākinīvajrapañjaramahātantrarājakaḷpa, and in Tibetan as the Phakpa Khandro Dorje Gur. It belongs to the class of Anuttarayoga tantras and is one of the most important mother tantras in the Vajrayana tradition, closely associated with the Hevajra cycle and concerned with ḍākinīs, vajra wisdom, and the esoteric geography of enlightened reality. The text unfolds as a vast kalpa or auxiliary tantra, presenting teachings on pure and impure realms, the nature of sentient beings, and the grounds of tantric practice through a densely symbolic and enumerative style characteristic of the highest yoga tantras. As a foundational scriptural authority for numerous Tibetan lineages, particularly the Sakya school, it holds a prominent place among the tantric scriptures of the Kangyur.

In the language of India: Āryaḍākinīvajrapañjaramahātantrarājakaḷpanāma. In the language of Tibet: The Examination of the Noble Ḍākinī Vajra Tent, the Great King of Tantras.

Homage to the vajra (Skt. vajra)!

Sky and embodied beings, purity,
the unobstructed and the revealing,
the various vajra ground-dwelling abodes,
the realm of sentient beings and the pleasant,
sentient beings as vessel, and the world,
earth and the underworld and the intermediate sky,
mind and body and speech,
the one and the two, sky-bliss,
six and five and six-times-two,
the four modes of birth among migrating beings,
one short of twenty,
the three realms without remainder,
father and son and maternal spirits,
the outer and the inner, and I,
all queens and Dharma,

everything, action, and selflessness,
result and cause and activity,
the object of accomplishment and the means of accomplishment — the vajra,
likewise the all-base consciousness (ālayavijñāna),
the dharmadhātu and the unborn,
the space element and the intrinsic expanse,
selflessness and self,
non-existence and not non-existence,
the blissful realm and the triangle,
the unborn and the stainless,
free of dust and the vanquished of sin,
the nature free of wavering surges,
and ultimately the blissful awareness of peace,
the secret and the supreme and the joyous —
the buddha-pervading bodhisattva,
the vajra tent of the ḍākinīs:
this is the self-arisen Blessed One,
sole lord of gods,
ever dwelling as the self of all.

The vajra of five hundred thousand Herukas,
the activity proclaimed in the five maṇḍalas:
Vajradhara and the Beneficial One,
likewise Vajra Resplendence itself,
the Lord of the Lotus Dance,
and the five, the king of seven horses.

In the maṇḍala of the Vajra Ḍākinī:
White One, Thief, and the Risen Corpse, Ghasmarī and Bukkaṣī,
the Forest Outcaste Woman, and the Peasant Woman.

In the maṇḍala of Vajra Benefit:
Dried One, Lasso, and the Sun, Round Dol Woman and the Hook-Holder,
Flower Woman and the rest in the corners.

In the maṇḍala of Vajra Sun:
Sun-Hand Woman and Lamp Woman, Precious Lamp and Lightning-Hand Woman,

Lāsyā and the rest in the corners.

In the maṇḍala of Lotus, Source of Dharma, Iron Chain,
and the Embracer, the Lord of Dance:

Flute Woman and the rest in the corners —
through the union of one's own bodily adornment.

In the maṇḍala of the King of Horses:

Vajra Door-Lock and Crooked Key, Door Woman and Robe-Holder, likewise in the corners: Eye Woman and the rest.

All these vajra ḍākinīs
dwell with the left foot extended,
the left hand held at the heart with the threatening finger-gesture, blazing brilliantly in manifold colors.

Extremely wrathful, most exceedingly fierce.

Gaurī and the rest are supremely renowned.

From great delusion and extreme bewilderment:

Dried One and the rest are held in great esteem.

Of most splendid and greatly radiant glory,

Sun-Hand Woman and the rest are supremely renowned.

From very great attachment and intense desire:

Lotus and the rest belong to the Dharma maṇḍala.

From very great envy and heavy obscuration:

Door-Lock Woman and the rest, swift-moving lords.

The Victor, the protector who is the Beneficial One,
exhausts all delusion entirely.

Vajra Sun, the great king,
plunders the cataracts of conceptual thought.

Hayagrīva (the Horse-Necked One) of great desire bestows awakening upon those possessed of attachment.

Vajra Swift-Moving of great envy utterly rejects all other vehicles.

Vajrasattva, the great king,
source from which the immovable primordial wisdom (jñāna) arises,
for the sake of welcoming migrating beings beyond measure,
is the destroyer of the five obscurations.

This is the meditative absorption called the Pure Vajra of the Tathāgata.

In order to gather beings of aversion, delusion, pride, attachment, and envy into their own maṇḍala,
the vajra body takes on many forms.

Exceedingly dense and fierce —

it is not to be combined with the peaceful.

The great vajra-holder who knows this himself becomes the Vajra of Kye.

For those attached to extreme emptiness,
and for those who hold to a discipline of non-existence,
for the sake of leading buddha-practice through delusion,
he becomes the Vajra of Perfect Awakening.

For those who are exceedingly fierce with pride,
he brings about the exhaustion of the pride of migrating beings.
Vajra Sun, sovereign of the self,
destroys the darkness of great pride.

Awakening arises free from attachment, born beyond produced and abandoned.

For whatever sentient being brings happiness,
so that awakening be fully accomplished through desire,
he becomes Padma Garwang, the Lord of Dance.

Remain on the path of omniscience!
For those traveling by other paths,
in order to bestow awakening upon them,
Vajra Swift-Moving is his own sovereign.

Whatever faculty a being has, and whatever their very path,
he takes on the very nature of that being and that path.
Through the yoga of supreme benefit
he becomes the very self of all buddhas.

Through whatever objects beings are born attached to,
and to which those persons apply their mind,
he takes on the very nature of that thing.
It is just as with diverse forms and wealth.

By means of whatever can tame a given sentient being,
that being will be tamed,

and in the form corresponding to that the teaching of Dharma is to be given.

Arising from the vajra of the mind,
sentient beings have diverse natures.
The mind, by its own conceptual thought,
is made dark by the defilements of ordinary beings.
Therefore, with thorough and constant effort,
purify the vajra of the mind.
A purified mind is bliss itself
and strips away all the poisons of affliction.

If emptiness were the means,
then buddhahood would not come about,
for a result cannot be other than its cause.
Thus emptiness is not the means.

It is to those with wrong views and to those who seek a view of self that the Victors have taught emptiness,
in order to reverse thoughts clinging to a self.

Therefore the maṇḍala-wheel,
the means, is the vow of bliss.
Through the yoga of buddha-pride
one swiftly becomes a buddha.

The Teacher bears the thirty-two major marks
and is adorned primarily with the eighty minor marks.
Therefore what is to be accomplished through the means is itself possessed of the form of the means.

This is the first chapter, introducing sentient beings to the supremely peaceful aspect of all things.

Then Vajra Obtained the Three Realms.
The yoginī is the Vajra Pavilion.
The samaya offering is pleasing.
He then declared to the assembly:

Offer song to the vajra-holder.
Offer dance to the buddhas.

Write similarly upon the finest jewel.
Offer food and drink to the Lord of the World.
Offer garment-worship to the Supreme Horse.
These are the supreme samaya pledges.
The vajra offering thus made delights all vajra-holders.

Black aloe-wood for Kye Vajra, white sandalwood for the Beneficial One,
red for the Lord of the World.
Offer Kashmiri vajra-light.
All of these are the sovereign of the seven.

The fragrance arising from HŪṂ-Vajra —
through the excellent combination of these fragrances
one attains the state of the noble buddhas.

Offer hot and cold things to the Vajra.
Offer sweet things to the Vajra of Permanence.
Offer sour things to the Vajra Sun.
Offer salt likewise to the Lord of the World.
One should carefully examine all the kings of horses and the anointings.

By Kye Vajra, the vajra-holder:
dark-colored lotus, the long-stemmed variety,
mallikā and mālatī,
kunda — always offer these to the buddhas.

The finest, stainless-colored essence of trees
is to be combined with the Illuminator.
The supreme red one born of water,
red bandhūka, and pāṭala —
offer these to Padma Garwang, the Lord of Dance.
All things to the Supreme Horse and the Vajra-holder.

The measure of the vajra-holder is three cubits.
The buddha-maṇḍala is four cubits.
For the Illuminator it is five cubits.
Padma Garwang the lord is six.
The Iron King likewise seven.
For eating, it is Vajra Sun.

For the road, the supreme iron hook.
For sleep, the Buddha Protector.

With utmost bliss, the Lord of Dance —
his song, his dance, and likewise the sound of music.
At the time of seizing the earth,
having placed it in the form of vajra,
I shall perfectly accomplish the yoga.

The lord of the vajra is blue.
The moon — crystal, the great Sage's flower born in the garden, red.
The red jewel king, the treasure of space —
padmarāga, Avalokiteśvara.
For the horse, marakata.
The finest dust of the five precious jewels.

Then the Blessed One, the Great Vajra-holder, rested in the meditative absorption of taming beings, the vajra-tent of the ḍākinīs.

The samaya thoroughly and truly opened —
I am the seed of Samantabhadra, light like the blue lord of the senses,
four-armed, the greatly terrifying one —
the body of a beautiful wrathful deity, mighty, subduing beings.
The right hand holds the identity of the lord of the family;
the left hand holds a human skin.
Both together are united as mudrā.
With the left foot extended, he stands in perfect equipoise.
With slightly bared fangs he inspires terror.
A supreme garland adorns the head.
Half of the hair-knot is bound.
He is to be meditated upon at the mountain summit.
The taming of beings will be accomplished.

Many yakṣas, beings,
female yakṣas, female nāgas,
human women, and beautiful goddesses —
these will certainly be accomplished by the practitioner.

The mantra is: Oṃ bhūtaḍāmara bhūtādhipati akṣobhya kīrīṭi na sarvabhūta preta piśācīna sādahaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Then the great vajra, Vajra-holder, rested in the meditative absorption of great power, the vajra-tent of the ḍākinīs.

A great rain is to be caused to fall.

Visualize a lotus with eight petals.

Upon it, place the eight nāgas.

By perfectly engaging with the Greatly Powerful One,
press down upon their tails.

Without rain, from the Greatly Powerful One,
let an assembly of waters be made to fall.

Dark in color yet outwardly bright,
even the fearsome he renders fearsome.

Eight arms, four faces —

he makes the sun, moon, and vajra his throne.

With his hands he presses down the lords of nāgas, reciting the syllable Phūḥ as mantra, causing Hūṃ to enter within,
and applying Phaṭ at the end.

The first face is black.

The second is like beautiful moonlight.

The third is of yellow color.

The fourth is proclaimed to be red.

His limbs are adorned with ornaments of serpents.

He is magnificently adorned with Vajrasattva.

For the nāgas to send down rain,
the Greatly Powerful One is to be perfectly accomplished.

Then the King of Vajra-holders, he who holds the nature of all buddhas, the speaker of the vajra-tent, shall distinguish the very suchness of the buddhas.

Vajra, lotus, milk,
the deer-adorned one who has eaten,
vajra, water-drinker, and the wealthy one —
know these as that very buddha.
The great place of pure abiding,
completely filled by all the buddhas,
pervaded by vajra and jewel —

whatever has come to be, I shall explain.

The pleasing city of benefit —

the ḍākinī vajra chain.

All the buddhas, with great attachment,
are to be bound with iron chains and vajra.

They shall rise up into Tuṣita
and obtain the wishes of the buddhas.

The Victor, the protector Maitreya (loving-kindness),
gazes forth with eyes of gnosis.

Having been bound with the vajra chain,
the royal assemblies are to be bound.

If one does not grant the accomplishments,
bind them with chains and draw them near.

Vajra Kyoba, the great white one;

Vajra Lasso, the female thief;

Vajra Iron Chain, the female zombie;

Vajra Bell, Ghasmarī —

these bring all the buddhas under control.

Through recitation and meditation, with the delight of Akṣobhya,
if the accomplishment is not granted,

then the four ḍākinīs

shall forcefully accomplish the buddhas.

Then the King of Vajra-Holders shall correctly expound the five hundred thousand sections written within the tantra of the Vajra Tent of the ḍākinīs.

One hundred thousand are the maṇḍala of the buddhas;

one hundred thousand likewise of the Vajra-Holder;

one hundred thousand of Vajra Sun;

one hundred thousand of Vajra Dharma.

Half a hundred thousand are Vajra,

five thousand for subduing spirits;

five for the great flourishing of activities;

five for the Buddha Dancer himself.

Thirty thousand

are the examination of Kurukullā.

The remaining five thousand

are for all the successions of ritual procedures.

Vajra ḍākinī, Hūṃ-kāra of the vajra —

these are the five hundred thousand sections written.

Then the wise Vajra-Holder entered into the meditative absorption (samādhi) of the dance of the buddhas of the Vajra Tent of the ḍākinīs.

In order to gather in those sentient beings who are deeply attached to dance and song,

he performs the play of the Buddha Dancer.

Through the vajra of the Buddha Dancer,

awakening is accomplished even for those possessed by attachment.

Then the Vajra-Holder arises

and, drawing forth a handful of flowers,

declares the great sacred pledge

that brings benefit to all sentient beings:

"However many sentient beings there are — gathered together as a gathering of sentient beings — whether born from eggs, born from a womb, born from warmth and moisture, or miraculously born; whether possessing form or without form; whether possessing perception, without perception, or neither with nor without perception — all of those sentient beings I shall establish in the rank of the great seal."

After the great sacred pledge was declared, a figure with a sidelong glance suddenly appeared — a goddess with slanted eyes — and, endowed with the gnosis of Akṣobhya, she reviled the Teacher, saying:

"What, is your sacred pledge 'Hūṃ'? You are the great Sage, you who bear the bow. I am not that — I am the glorious one with the power of compassion. Have you not vanquished your own power?

"What, is your sacred pledge 'Om'? You are Brahmā among the sages. I am not that — I am the glorious Vairocana. You are one who has quenched fire and is free of desire.

"What, is your sacred pledge 'Āḥ'? Do you think you know, lord, sovereign of the garuḍas? I am not that — I am the glorious Padma, lord of the dance. You are one who merely approaches the dancer and laughs nearby.

"What, is your sacred pledge 'Trāṃ'? You are a parasol that blocks the heat. I am not that — I am the glorious Vajra Sun. How can the form of a parasol be like you?

"What, is your sacred pledge 'Khamṃ'? Your nature is the emptiness of space. I am not that — I am the swift-going Vajra. You are a horse that goes to the other shore.

"What, is your sacred pledge that you carry compassion? Oh my — you are a beautiful wine-seller! The name of the Immovable is Māmakī. Do you grasp the city of the upper regions?

"What, is your sacred pledge simply peace? Do you grasp the deceit and cunning of women? I am not that — I am the goddess Locā. But if you are Locā, then you come with deception.

"What, is your sacred pledge great attachment? What is there to say to a prostitute? My name is the White Goddess. How can what is stained be white?

"What, is your sacred pledge the exercise of power? Are you not then the queen's messenger? My name is Tārā of the Sidelong Glance. Delivering the glance is indeed a destroying. My left eye — I am the glorious Vasumati.

"Thus: how excellent that you are without shame! But one without shame is not a buddha. Speak quickly of what is discordant with what you see."

Then the Vajra-Eyed one with the sidelong glance, having been thoroughly declared upon by the reviler, spoke. Vajrasattva is one of great aversion; the Sage Vairocana is deluded; the lord of the world is attached to desire; the miserly Vajra-Illuminator commits every fault of the purposeful; the five guides are full of faults.

"Whether born from eggs or born from a womb,
born from warmth and moisture, or those at the border,
whether those possessing form or those without form,
or those born miraculously — you declared at the outset that all of these shall become buddhas.

Yet having yourself become a buddha,
how is it that you did not make them victorious?"

Therefore, what was declared is false. How could the sovereign have not said this? If sentient beings were deceived, whatever your buddhahood may be is astonishing and wonderful.

Whether it be the māra of death, famine, the harm of a hostile army's wheel, the consecration of maṇḍalas, burnt offerings, the absence of rain, or the attainment of peace — in mantra and meditation, whatever being I who forever sport am present before, there it shall not be false.

The five masters and four goddesses revile the immovable one who is self-nature itself. In the very place of the maṇḍala palace, the buddhas perform the dance of the dancer. The three realms likewise, through their root or impure ornaments, perform the dance of the buddhas' dancers with bliss and joy. In the joyous city of the source of phenomena, with vajra-vow song and with the steps of vajra-feet, the dance is performed. At the culmination, with drum, lāśya, and so forth, and the great bestowal of the great seal — this very matter is here supremely secret. It is to be guarded with great diligence, precisely as Vajrasattva has commanded.

Various songs, the sounds of music, dance, the practice of discipline, the bringing of rain, and the chapter of the great one who is self-nature of the immovable — this is the second chapter.

Then the king of vajra-holders, the ḍākinī, abiding in the meditative absorption of the Vajra Pavilion, spoke the torma (ritual offering cake) of the elemental spirits.

Meditating on a lotus of eight petals situated in the middle of the space element: visualize Indra on the petal to the east, place the Destroyer on the petal to the south, place the Water-Lord on the western petal, and to the north place the Wealth-Giver. In the fire direction is the Great Fire-Devourer. The guardian of the intermediate directions without truth is likewise. In wind, visualize one without abode. As the lord of power there is the chief of the elemental spirits.

The moon, the sun, Brahmā, and so forth; those in the ranks of Brahmā's retinue; and those who chant before Brahmā; those who dwell in Tuṣṭita, free of strife; those who have become great kings; those who govern through the power of others' magical creations; those who dwell in the abodes of delight in magical creations; those who dwell in the pure abodes; those who reside in Sukhāvatī; those who dwell in Akaniṣṭha; the world-realm of those possessing rays of light; those who dwell in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three — all of these are to be placed above.

Those who have entered within the source of phenomena: those who move by force, and the conch-guardians; likewise the children of boundless wealth;

those who establish and those who possess lineage; the ones possessing great lotuses and fine lotuses; asuras, hell-beings, and sentient beings — these are below the source of phenomena.

From OM arise Brahmā and the other gods; from HŪM arise those without attachment and the others; from ĀḤ arise those who move by force and the rest — all possessing two hands and one face.

The gods of the upper realms are greatly white; those like Indra and the rest are similarly dark; those who move by force and others are greatly red. Each is paired with a consort of matching form. The hands are active with vajra and bell. The right hand extended, they stand upon their seats. Brahmā and the rest are sealed with eternal mudrās.

With a hundred oblations and so forth performed by vajra, those who move by force and the rest are brought under the power of dance. All are born from the three families.

The white one draws them in with a hook; the female thief binds them with a lasso; the female zombie binds them in fetters; Ghasmarī brings them down with a bell.

Then offer the water of honor and water for the feet. Purify the tormā offering with this mantra: OM ĀḤ HŪM. Then scatter and pour the outer offering and present it. Dismiss them with this mantra:

OM VAJRASATTVA SAMAYA MANU PĀLAYA VAJRASATTVA TVENOPA TIṢṬHA
DṚḌHO ME BHAVA SUPOṢYO ME BHAVA SUTOṢYO ME BHAVA ŚĀŚVATO ME
BHAVA ANURAKTO ME BHAVA HṚDAYAM ME ADHITIṢṬHA SARVA SIDDHIM ME
PRAYACCHA SARVA KĀRYEṢU ME CITTAṢ ŚREYO KURU HŪM HŪM HA HA HA HA
HOḤ BHAGAVĀN SARVA TATHĀGATA VAJRA MĀ ME MUÑCA VAJRĪ BHAVA MAHĀ
SAMAYA SATTVA ĀḤ

Then the king of vajra-holders, the ḍākinī, abiding in the meditative absorption of the Vajra Pavilion known as the Vajra Name, disclosed the vajra names.

At the time of the empowerment of the name, the student is to be empowered by bestowing the vajra name. One who is born into this receives buddhahood itself.

Then those who have become the names of the Tathāgatas:

Kye Vajra, Vajrasattva,
and Great Vairocana, Self-Arising, Vajra Ārali, the Withering Wrathful One,
and likewise Vajra Wrathful One himself.
Vajra Nectar, Nectar-Yoga Union,
Heruka, and the Strength of Compassion.
Permanence Vajra, Delusion Vajra, Vairocana, and Protector of All.
Illusion, and then the Oṃ-Maker,
the Renowned Vajra of the Body.
Earth Essence and Great Delusion, Yamāntaka and the Lord of Hammers.
Tathāgata and Śākyamuni, renowned as the one called Buddha.

Vajra Sun, then Jewel Lord,
and likewise Jewel King himself.
Vajra Splendor, and the Great King,
Vajra Māra-Subduer and Light-Maker.
Hayagrīva and World-Lord,
Vajra Dharma and Avalokiteśvara, Lord of the Lotus Dance, and Desire,

renowned as Protector of the World.

Noble Horse and King of Horses,
King of Seven, then Iron King.
Samaya Vajra and Supreme Horse,
and likewise Karma Vajra himself.
Amogha and King of Accomplished Aims, renowned as the Swiftly Moving Vajra.

Vajrasattva, then the Vajra-Holder,
All-Victorious Vajrapāṇi, Incomparable Equal Taste, Supreme Delight,
the First Noble One, Great Bliss.

Desire, aversion, and delusion,
the Samaya Being and the Jewel —
these are spoken of as the six families, perfectly accomplishing liberation of desire.

This is the third chapter, the chapter on the names of all the Tathāgatas.

Vajra Essence, the Manifest Awakening —
the first tantra is the King of Tantras.
The second is the Illusory Tantra;
the third is the Vajra Dance.
The fourth is the Manifold Tantra;
the fifth is the Vajra Tantra.
The sixth tantra is the Great Powerful One;
the seventh tantra is the Immovable Protector.
The eighth is the Tantra of Dhāraṇī;
the ninth is the Ḍākinī Kurukullā.
The tenth is the Tantra of Discipline;
the eleventh is Vairocana.
The twelfth is the Tantra of Accomplishment;
the thirteenth is the Tantra of Tārā.
The fourteenth is Vajravārāhī;
the fifteenth is the Great Splendor.
The sixteenth is the Tantra of Nairātmyā;
the seventeenth is that of Yamāntaka.
The eighteenth belongs to the Hūṃkāra;

the nineteenth to Sarasvatī.
The twentieth is the Tantra of Fire Offering;
the twenty-first is the Consecration Tantra.
The Tantra of the Great Maṇḍala is counted as the twenty-second.
The twenty-third is the Torma Tantra;
the twenty-fourth dwells in preparation.
The twenty-fifth is the Manifest Realization;
likewise the twenty-sixth is Mudrā.
The twenty-seventh is the Activity Tantra;
the twenty-eighth is the Song.
The Tantra of the Lord of Dance — counting without the thirty-first, makes thirty — is explained as the thirtieth tantra.

With a count of thirty thousand,
belonging to the ḍākas and ḍākinīs,
the great ocean of five hundred thousand — Oh! The tantra of Hevajra, the Vajra-Holder, is extensively expounded.
Five hundred thousand — I, Hevajra, hold in full the essence of the pure.
Spoken by the Vajra Ḍākinī,
this is the delight of the tantras.

The Yoga Tantra of Hevajra was first taught by the Victors.
Afterward the Yoginī Tantra
was then taken up for women's sake.

The Blessed One was then asked: "Blessed One, how is it condensed from the expanded? In the auspicious aeon, when bodhisattvas and ordinary people come to have short lives, how shall they grasp it? How shall they hear it? How shall they come to know it?"

"Blessed One, how shall ordinary people whose lives are short come to hold it?"

The Vajra-Holder declared: "For the time being, those who are to become teachers will incur root downfalls; those who are practitioners will travel the path of the ten non-virtuous actions of karma; those who are ordinary persons will commit the killing of living beings; and those who are devoted to the company of women will become attached to desire for them alone. Therefore, all the tantras have not been taught in expanded form."

Then the Blessed One, all the Tathāgatas, upon hearing the vajra speech of the Vajra-Holder, became pleased and joyful, and spoke these words:

O Hevajra of great compassion,
now at charnel grounds, by water's edge,
in forests and deserted villages,
to the devoted one I grant accomplishment.

By pleasant lakeside shores
and at the shrines of profound relics, beneath the shadow of moist boughs,
I, the buddha, bestow accomplishment.

At the market, in the marketplace itself,
in the homes that face the marketplace,
I who reveal the Vajra Sun —
to the devoted one I grant accomplishment.

Bound up in song and dance,
in the house of the wine-seller,
I, thus the Lotus Dancer —
to the devoted one I grant accomplishment.

When one mounts a swift-moving steed
or travels sometimes along the road,
I who reveal the Meaningful Horse bestow the vajra accomplishment in full.

Thereupon the Blessed One, the great Vajradhara, entered into the meditative absorption called the Ḍākinī Vajra Tent Mudrā All-Victorious, and properly set forth the mudrās and symbolic implements.

From the examination of body, speech, and mind,
the three mudrās are to be known.
For the body there is the hand mudrā;
from the recitation of mantra, the speech mudrā;
for the mind there is the symbolic mudrā —
that very thing is the samādhi and maṇḍala.

On the right hand, the Dry one;
on the left, the Threatening Finger likewise.
The ḍākinī called the Dry One — fear not!
She draws forth the wandering of the malevolent ones.
In the right hand, the Lasso, binding and drawing in the malevolent ones completely —
this is called the Lasso Woman.
With the left, Threatening Finger against the malevolent.

In the right hand, the round fish-net,
wishing to ensnare the malevolent ones —
this is always spoken of as the Round Hanging Net.
With the left hand, Threatening Finger against the malevolent.

In the right hand, the iron hook,
wishing to draw in the malevolent ones —
this is spoken of as the Vajra Hook Woman.
With the left, Threatening Finger against the māras.

In the right hand, the Sun,
completely dispelling the darkness of delusion;
with the left, spoken of as Threatening Finger —
that is called the Vajra Sun.

likewise in the left, the Threatening Finger —
this is spoken of as the Vajra Torch, destroying the cataracts of conceptual thought.

In the right hand, the jewel,
bestowing gifts upon sentient beings;
in the left, the Threatening Finger Woman —
the Jewel Lamp is proclaimed here.

Lightning in the right hand,
destroying the cloud-mass of conceptual thought —
this is to be known as the Lightning Hand.
Likewise with the left, Threatening Finger.

In the right hand, the lotus —
the desire of the lotus is to be declared.
With the left, Threatening Finger herself —

this is called the Ḍākinī's Lotus.

In the right hand, the lotus of the bhaga, causing great bliss to increase and spread;
this is called the Dharma-Source Woman.

In the right hand, the iron chain,
binding all through attachment to awakening;
this is called the Vajra Chain Woman.

Through the bond of passionate attachment to the buddhas, wishing to embrace one's own being — perfecting all through desire for awakening,
that is spoken of as the Vajra Embracing Woman.

In the right hand, the door-bolt,
the guardian woman of all wisdom;
that is called the Vajra Door-Bolt.

In the right hand, the bent key,
the one who takes up wisdom and cuts —
that is called the Vajra Bent-Key.

In the right hand, the door,
not forsaking the arising of wisdom;
this is called the Vajra Chain Woman.

In the right hand, the curtain —
guarding the queen of one's own kind;
this is called the Vajra Curtain.

All of these are the sacred assembly of ḍākinīs belonging to all the buddhas.

For the supreme accomplishment of the five ḍākinīs,
the Ḍākinī Tantra has been proclaimed.

Thereupon all those bodhisattvas, having heard the vajra speech of the ḍākinīs, were filled with wonder. They spoke to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, this practising of mudrās — is it not the seizure of the sacred pledges and mudrās of the impermanent?"

Thereupon the Blessed One declared these words to the bodhisattvas: "Blessed One, O bodhisattvas — in the world-realm called Possessing Rays of Light there exists a prophecy named 'The Definitive Statement of Vajra.' This is that very thing. Examined here in the sphere of the language of Daivahayasagamane, it is established as traversing the sky in all respects and at all times, and is therefore supremely renowned as the Ḍākinī."

Thereupon all those bodhisattvas, having heard these words, were filled with joy and delight, and uttered these words:

How wonderful — the Ḍākinī Tantra!

It is the last among all tantras,
easy to realize and difficult to realize,
being both what is known and what is not known.

Then the Tathāgata Akṣobhya and all the other vajra Tathāgatas, in order to inspire the minds of the bodhisattvas, spoke these words:

"Blessed One, how is it that all the bodhisattvas are gathered into this great king of tantras, the Vajra Tent Tantra, by the yoginīs and the ḍākinīs?"

Maitreya and the other bodhisattvas made this request: "Where the Vajra-holder has spoken of an awakening preceded by the aspiration, 'I shall liberate from conditioned existence the boundless multitude of beings — beginning with those born from eggs — and countless others,' why then are the slaying of living beings and the queens who were desired exclusively abandoned? It is in order to gather in the queens who have gone astray from their views that the Tantra of the Ḍākinī is taught."

The means of bliss, briefly condensed, its text concise yet its meaning vast,
it fully awakens the dull-minded,
and is established as the heart of all tantras,
the supreme among all mantras.

This is the meditative absorption (samādhi) called "The Definitive Statement of the Vajra."

By the mere teaching of this,
the selfless yoginī herself,
first offering worship through dance,
then spoke her own cycle of teaching:

"If I — who generate all buddhas through the form of the mother of all — am abandoned, whether Vajrasattva,
or Vajradharma likewise,
or supreme Hayagrīva, Vajrasūrya —
none of them would be accomplished.
I myself give to them their beauty,
and to those who are beautified by them, I bestow the siddhis.

Through eye-medicine and foot-unguent,
through accomplishment with a sword beneath,
through pills that traverse the sky,
through the invisible and through quintessence;
through the vidyādhara who turns the wheel,
and through summoning the noble maiden —
the practitioner who pleases me shall obtain the vajra siddhis.

What purpose is there in speaking of many and various elaborations?
If I am abandoned, nothing is accomplished,
there is no awakening, and no meditation.

Whoever always remembers me,
who reads and contemplates always,
who recites the garland of mantras,
and meditates upon my body —
whether viewing it in the manner of an illusion, or beholding it as if a dream —
through the progressive stages of deep meditation,
one shall come to perceive me directly.
Through the supreme union with the reflected image,
the siddhi of that very one shall be bestowed.

Through the supreme union of vajra and lotus,
through the practice of great bliss and union —

whoever grants me what I desire:
of that embodied one, what need is there to speak?
Whoever meditates for even a single day,
through the practice of vajra worship —
the siddhi of the Perfection of Wisdom shall be granted; of this there is no doubt.

Visualizing oneself as Heruka
and meditating upon one's own consort, whoever ardently desires great yoga —
to those ones I shall be pleased.

Possessing the five qualities of desire,
endowed with delight and joy,
in the form of song, dance, and music,
with the bliss and delight of every desire,
adorned with various ornaments,
with various flavors to drink,
various patterned garments,
and anointment of various fragrances —
whoever always lies with me:
I who bestow the siddhis upon that one abide in the state of the great seal (mahāmudrā).
That one's desires shall not go unfulfilled.

Oṃ a ā i ī u ū ṛ ṛ̣ ṛ̤ ṛ̥ e ai o au aṃ svāhā.

Those sons of the Victors who invoke me with this — dwelling perfectly in the illusory bliss of women, they shall be established in the lap of those sons of the Victors.

Vajrā is to be offered to the East.
To the South is she who has the form of a white one.
To the West is the Water-Ḍākinī.
To the North is the Vajra-Ḍākinī."

I am placed in the center. Whoever contemplates the maṇḍala together with its essence — that one's mistress of the self am I. I have two hands and one face. I am adorned with a hooked knife and a skull of a male being. I am clothed in a tiger skin. I have three eyes. My hair is bound upward. I am ornamented with the five mudrās. At the eastern gate is the Great White One.

To the South is the Thieving Woman. At the western gate is the Water Woman. Likewise, to the North is Ghasmarī. To the place of power is Pukkasī. At the intermediate quarter of strife is the Forest Woman. In the direction of the rākṣasas is the Outcaste Woman. She who always roams is the Servant Woman. These are given in the intermediate and non-intermediate quarters.

The glory that has come to the palm of whoever meditates upon me supremely — that glory no one is able to disturb. All of them are of similar dark complexion, dwelling upon a supremely radiant ground, together with dance — the great wrathful one, the heroic woman. In the left hand she holds the khaṭvāṅga.

Thereupon the Blessed One Vajradhara, dwelling in the meditative absorption of great joy at the supreme vajra-tent of the ḍākinīs, correctly explained the empowerment of the vidyā:

With the male fluid of one's own wisdom-consort,
using all eight vases,
through firm meditation upon the vajra-mind,
one shall confer the thought-empowerment upon Vajradhara.

Having firmly meditated upon the Vajra-Sun,
one shall there bestow the crown ornament.

From the vajra-verse composition
which was first resolved and given to all in advance,
the great vajra with nine points
shall be placed at the heart by one's own hand.

The student is made lord of the world,
and the empowerment is conferred by Vajrasattva.

"With the empowerment of the Buddha's vajra,
you today receive the empowerment.
This itself is all the buddhas.

The vajra is taken for the accomplishment of excellence.
The student, the supreme goddess of iron,
is to be imagined as embraced by Tārā.

With the hand one rings the bell and vajra,
and the lord of the vajra confers the empowerment.

Oṃ vajrādhipatitvaṃ abhiṣiñcāmi tiṣṭha vajrasamayāstāṃ.

The student is made into Vairocana,
and then empowerment is also conferred by name.

Oṃ vajrasattva tvam abhiṣiñcāmi vajranāmābhiṣekata.

O great lady vajra!

Whatever becomes the own-master of each and every one,
that itself is the identity of Heruka.

For the arising of the wisdom of the buddhas,
it is pure in the intrinsic nature of Dharma.

This itself is all the buddhas,
dwelling in the hand of Vajrasattva.

The discipline of the vajra-essence is firm —
you too shall always hold it.

Oṃ sarvatathāgatasiddhi vajrasamayatiṣṭha samayastvaṃ eṣo haṃ tvā dhārayāmi hī hi hi hi hi hūṃ.

All, through one single ritual,
with perpetual unsurpassed offering,
shall give the student the vajra discipline.
Thereafter, vajra passes from hand to hand.

The bodhisattva has no beginning and no end —
Vajrasattva, of great bliss, Samantabhadra, lord of all,
master of the lord of the vajra-essence.

Or today one gives the bell.
Born from the perfection of wisdom,
called 'the vajra-bell' —
for the sake of all sentient beings, this is to be uttered as the succession of the wisdom-melody of all the buddhas,
proclaimed by the Victors as supreme awakening.
You too shall always hold it.

Having bestowed all relief,
having become Śākyamuni oneself,
one gives the great prophecy to the great student:
'Without doubt you shall become a buddha.
You are free from the fear of death and from misery.

Likewise, free from illness and fever.
The great vehicle of great bliss —
in this, I prophesy to you, my child.

Om eṣo haṃ vyākāromi tvāṃ vajrasattva tathāgata.

Liberated from the evil destinies of existence,
for the attainment of the very siddhi of existence —
O, you who shall accomplish! You shall be a Tathāgata.
Your name shall be called Vajra."

In this way the Blessed One proclaimed the sacred commitment of the empowerment of the great vidyā.

Then the Blessed One, in the meditative absorption of the Great Vajra, the Vajra Teacher, proclaimed what is called the Vajra of Sacred Commitment, speaking these words:

Honor the vajra masters,
and purify the seven thoroughly.
Having aroused the awakening mind,
meditate thoroughly on the source of Dharma.

Resting in buddhahood thereon,
one should meditate on the five aspects.
First, contemplate the male being,
then spread the wheel of the ḍākinīs.

The gandharva who has entered union —
let the vital essence be brought to mind with care.
Let the goddesses of the boundaries be stirred,
and having aroused the guide of the wheel,
place the three vajras — of eye and the rest,
of delusion and the rest — at the three places.
Then, outer anurāga-vajra,
and the entry of wisdom,
the empowerment from the eight vidyā-consorts,
and again the tasting of the nectar,
and the offering by the eight goddesses —
this is the praise of the guide of the wheel.

Consecrated by one's own blessing,
meditate on the six limbs therein.
Then again, in the sequence and order of the rite of sacred commitment,

the genuine signs are to be indicated:
The first is the form of clouds;
the second is like smoke;
the third is the form of a shooting flame;
the fourth is a lamp blazing near;
and the fifth is a constant radiance —
like a cloudless sky itself.
That is the cause of omniscience
and will bring siddhi near.

Then, in the manner of an illusion,
in an instant the dream-form changes.
Everything throughout the three realms,
moving and unmoving, without remainder, without residue, is accomplished.

Throughout all world-realms,
as long as there are those with vajra-bodies,
possessed of intellect — the aggregate of wisdom —
all will follow in their wake.

As long as beings are born from a birthplace,
the path of the three realms made a joy of experience —
by applying the great seal in full,
all of these are to be consumed.

The bodhisattva Tathāgata,
having heard the vajra of these words,
becoming joyful and delighted,
possessed of the vajra of speech acted thus.

The great vidyā Nairātmyā,
Vajra-Vairocana, the sovereign lord,
Vajrasattva, the great king,
the great sage of the supreme horse,
Vajrasūrya of great splendor, Hayagrīva, the great sovereign lord —
their very body, speech, and mind,

and the orbs of the bodies, began to tremble.

Once the king-teacher demonstrates it,
the one who directly realizes it does so straightaway.

Then the king who holds the vajra, the great vajra-holder of the supreme three bodies, the equal vajra-holder, rested in the meditative absorption of the vajra of equality and spoke these words:

Dwelling in the maṇḍala of the Mothers,
eight-faced, greatly powerful,
endowed with sixteen hands,
with the light equal to blue Indra's radiance,
of great splendor, four-footed,
with a form that is graceful and wrathful,
abiding in the dance of the half-lotus posture,
adorned with ornaments of bone.

The first face is black,
adorned with white and red.

The remaining faces are like bumblebees.
Pressing down equally upon the four māras,
at the crown the supreme vajra-holder —
there, the vajra of black color with its great rays is likewise to be meditated upon.

At the very site of the empowerment,
adorned by the five buddhas.
Elephant, horse, ox with a tail,
human, śarabha, and cat —
in the eight skull-cups on the right,
the dual drinkers and the rest are to be known in sequence.

Earth, water, wind,
heat, moon, and sun,
the one who brings to an end, and the one who bestows wealth —
these are in the eight skull-cups on the left.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra of the Arising of the Great Being.

Place the vajra of delusion at the eye,
the vajra of aversion at the ear;
miserliness and attachment likewise —
meditate on touch and on selflessness.

Two hands, one face,
a beautiful queen of variegated form,
her hands occupied with a curved knife and a skull-cup,
truly abiding where life has gone.

Earth-wandering and sky-wandering mothers —
and the mother who abides beneath the feet —
through the ritual of this very practice, meditate upon her as dwelling in the three places.

Oṃ. The great victorious king is adorned with the vajra of body.
The great king, the vajra of mind,
abides in the place of Vajrasattva.
The syllable A, the suchness of the supreme — declare it, illuminating the path of speech.
Body, speech, and mind are vajra;
from the characterized dharmas, the three lineages arise.

Meditate upon a white-bodied one dwelling at the center of a solar maṇḍala.
She who holds an iron hook and points with her index finger,
white in color, blazing with great radiance —
this is the meditative absorption called White Vajra-Possessing One.

Meditate upon a thief-bodied one dwelling at the center of a red maṇḍala —
a tawny one, resembling the color of gold, bearing a great vajra-noose weapon.

At the center of the vajra maṇḍala,
meditate upon the zombie woman, the color of blood,
who makes pride with her vajra iron chain,
she who binds awakening.

Then, at the center of a maṇḍala of light,
meditate upon Ghasmarī.

Her hand free, holding a vajra bell,
she resembles an emerald utpala lotus.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra Door-Guardian, Vajra Zealous One.

At the four intermediate directions, the four goddesses are to be meditated upon through the application of the ritual.

The bodhicitta vase, Mount Meru,
the great fire-hearth and the great victory banner —
the yogin of inner and outer non-duality should thus meditate upon the protector.

Through pursuing with great attachment and desire,
bliss without rippling waves is attained.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra of the Four Elements.

Then the king who holds the vajra, the Teacher of the supreme among the three vehicles, remained in the meditative absorption of all aspects and sang this song:

The wrathful one arisen from Hūṃ
is forever possessed of aversion.
Through a mind inwardly untamed,
accomplish it through the utmost effort.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyaḥ. Namo vajramuṅgara-hastāya caṇḍālākṣepa-kārāya hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the mere proclamation of this great wrathful one here, all the buddhas and the bodhisattvas became frightened and trembling, and they recall the sovereign Vajradhara.

The lotus of the born one, split asunder without break — through the first churning and the second churning,
through the supreme union of the four wisdom-consorts,
all the buddhas are thoroughly satisfied.

Through the practice of the union of foot-dust,
press down and squeeze with the foot.

Through the meditation that generates the three bodies, summon the great maiden.

This is the meditative absorption called Yamāntaka Vajra.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyaḥ.
Mahādaṇḍadhara-vividha-surāsuramardana-bhūtanirmatha hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the proclamation of the great wrathful one's power that none can withstand, the bodhisattvas, and likewise others, trembled and recalled that one.

Elemental spirits, hungry ghosts, meat-eaters —
to the ḍākinī who has grasped the traveling vase, subdue with Hūṃ and seal with the mudrā;
by pressing the vajra, there is bliss itself.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra That None Can Withstand.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyo. Hulu hulu. Mahāpadma-amṛtī kuru mahāviṣa āḥ.

Invoke the great violent and poisonous ones.

Likewise, raise up those who have fainted.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra of the Lotus's Fierce Majesty.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyaḥ. Namo vajrakrodhā mahādaṃṣṭrotkaṭa-bhiravāya. Vajrasandoha-darbāya. Oṃ amṛtakunḍalī hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the proclamation of the great wrathful one, the Obstacle-Crushing Vajra, all the buddhas and the bodhisattvas became displeased.

The one who is lifted by the wind,

Take up the dust from the footsteps of the one to be accomplished, and hold the name-tablet of that person. Place it beneath the foot of the lord of the assembly and say Hūṃ Phaṭ. Having aroused the pride of Hūṃ, born from the meditative absorption of the Vajra Amṛta, when one is fully applied through the mantras of the wrathful ones, even the buddhas are driven away. This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra Amṛta.

Most excellently secret,
this action must be most urgently invoked
by Vajra Wisdom's working — in seven days it will be accomplished.

Namaḥ samanta buddrebho. Oṃ yamadaṇḍāya nīlāya. Nīladaṇḍāya. Turu turu. Muru muru. Sarvaduṣṭān māra māra hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the proclamation of the great wrathful one, the Blue-Staff Great Being, all sentient beings and all the buddhas became uncertain about their very lives. Even by mere recitation of eight hundred repetitions, when urged through a rite of extremely intense meditation, all the malicious ones will be bound. This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra That Presses Down with a Staff.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyo. Namo mahābalāya. Ucchūṣmakrodharājāya sarvānāgānāṃ hṛdayaṃ tāḍaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the proclamation of the great fierce one, those with poison-terrified faces were stripped of their power, and they trembled and shook with fear, and the Great Powerful One came to mind. This is the meditative absorption called Vajra-Power Avalokiteśvara.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyo. Namo acala kaṇaceṭṭi caṭṭa moṭṭa moṭṭa tuṭṭa tuṭṭa. Ghaghaghātaya ghātaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, from the proclamation of the great wrathful one, the Immovable Great Being, the great gods, nāgas, and yakṣas fainted and fell to the ground. Through this, by the king of wrathful ones, with the rite of riding a lion, from the yoga of the vajra maṇḍala, men and gods are drawn in.

Oṃ sumbha ni sumbha hūṃ. Gṛhṇa gṛhṇa hūṃ. Gṛhṇapaya gṛhṇapaya hūṃ. Ānaya ho bhagavān vidyārāja hūṃ phaṭ.

The vajra, abiding beneath the earth,
through the proclamation of the great wrathful one,
the daughters of the asuras and the nāga maidens
tremble in their breasts and moan.
Bound fast by the vajra lasso,
torn open by the iron hook,
through meditation upon body, speech, and mind,
all maidens are to be summoned.

This is the meditative absorption called Summoning the Three Worlds.

Vajra Dharma — the great rain-cloud.

Vajrasattva — the supreme rain.

Vajra Sun — the great Saṅgha.

Supreme Horse — the great assembly.

And again the beneficent rain-cloud:

through the meditation of lasso and iron hook,
if even the buddhas are said to be summoned,
what need is there to speak of ordinary beings?

Meditate upon one's own wisdom-consort, one's own being,
adorned throughout by the vajra of the three bodies.
With the application of hook and so forth,
summon the maiden and make her one's companion.

Then the Blessed One proclaimed the sacred commitment of the Great Vajra Summoning.

Namaḥ samanta buddhebhyo. Oṃ ṭakki hūṃ jaḥ.

Also with the stake and the peg,
through the application of the vajra iron hook,
at the time when the moon draws near,
confine her to the chamber and accomplish the rite.

Even by merely writing the name,
reciting it clearly one hundred times,
with resonant place, homeless, with powerful faculties —
together with her husband she is to be summoned.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra of the Pledged Iron Hook.

Abiding in meditation, mantra, and meditative absorption, take hold of one's own wisdom-consort, one's own being,
in the place of summoning.
She will not escape to another.

Namaḥ samanta buddhānāṃ. Namaḥ samanta dharmānāṃ. Namaḥ samanta saṃghānāṃ. Oṃ sitātapatra. Oṃ vimala. Oṃ śaṃkara. Oṃ pratyamgira.

Oṃ vajra uṣṇīṣa cakravartī sarva yantra mantra mūla karma bandhanaṃ tāḍanaṃ kīlanaṃ vāma ma kṛte yena kena cit kṛtaṃ ta ta ta sarva ntā cchinda cchinda bhinda bhinda. Ciri ciri. Giri giri. Mara mara. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ.

To the practice of protecting one's own being,
to shattering the root of practice-continua and the like,
if one applies gnosis as one's ally,
the three worlds cannot pass beyond it.

This is the meditative absorption called the Great Wrathful One, the Vajra Wheel.

Even in the secluded forest itself,
completely casting off all mental duplicity,

if the supreme yogin accomplishes this,
one's power will not be transferred elsewhere.

This is the fourth chapter, the meditative absorption called Vajra Entrance into the Heart-Mantra of the Great Wrathful One, the Wheel.

Then the Blessed One, the Vajra-Bearer, entered the hearts of all sentient beings.
Arising from omniscient primordial wisdom,
distinguish perfectly and with certainty.

Vividly contemplate the reflected image of a buddha,
then meditate profoundly on Vajrasattva.

Having vividly contemplated the reflected image of a buddha,
recollect Vajra Vairocana.

Having vividly contemplated the reflected image of a buddha,
meditate profoundly on Vajra Sun.

Having vividly contemplated the reflected image of a buddha,
meditate on Vajra Desire.

Having vividly contemplated the reflected image of a buddha,
meditate profoundly on the Horse King of Meaningful Accomplishment.

The maṇḍalas arising from the reflected image of a buddha — always meditate on those.

By means of the mantra of all these,
establish primordial wisdom in the place of the heart.
Through the supreme union with the gnosis-being,
buddhahood and awakening will be attained.

The completion of one's own mantra-syllables,
together with the mudrā and the insignia — examine these.
Emission and withdrawal —
these are the very source of all maṇḍalas.

Having known sound in its three aspects,
make the offering to the divine ones.
That very one, the Blessed Vajra-Bearer,
the greatly renowned Vajrasattva —
having known form in its three aspects,
make the offering to the divine ones as well.

That very one, the Blessed One who is sovereign king,
the lord who is Vajra Vairocana —
having thoroughly known scent in its three aspects,
make the offering to the divine ones.

That very one, the Blessed One, the buddha supremely renowned as the Jewel Aggregate — having thoroughly known taste in its three aspects,
make the offering to the divine ones as well.

That very one, the Blessed One, Desire itself,
the Vajra Dharma, the Tathāgata — having thoroughly known touch in its three aspects,
make the offering to the divine ones.

That very one, the Blessed One, the Variegated,
the bestower of meaningful fruit —
the five maṇḍalas abiding at the center of the protecting pledges are to be meditated upon.

The perfectly awakened buddhas whose nature is those five-by-five — meditate fully on the five primordial wisdoms.
Endowed with the five sense qualities of desire,
rays of light in manifold colors pervade everything.
They are said to accomplish manifold activities.

The all-inclusive maṇḍala,
divided into twenty-five sections,
is also to be drawn in colored powders.
By the nature of the five buddhas
it is supremely renowned as the five aggregates.

The maṇḍala of the Protector of Buddhas is supremely renowned in the eastern direction.
To the right is that of Vajra Sun,
to the west is that of Vajra Desire,
to the north is that of the Horse King,
and at the center is that of Vajrasattva.

In the east, the great white one;
in the south, perfectly endowed with yellow;
red fully present in the western direction;

dark blue perfectly present in the north.

At the corners and at all the gates,
at the entrances of the doors and at the gateways above,
it is adorned by the great vajras
and beautified by manifold luminous appearances.

That which becomes the center of the maṇḍala
of the very one who is the Protector of Buddhas —
that is declared to be his maṇḍala.

The maṇḍala that is fully embraced at the heart
may be contemplated as individual maṇḍalas one by one,
or it may be the condensed maṇḍala —
abiding at the center with eight by eight,
or alternatively in twenty-five.

When the maṇḍala is condensed,
at its gates one should arrange as guardians of entry
the hook, the lasso, the shackle, and likewise the vajra itself.

The Blessed One then declared these words as the great samaya of the condensed form:

On the right of Vajra Dharma abide:
bear, vulture, and likewise rhinoceros, ox, tiger, monkey, and the fierce elephant with its upturned trunk.

Crow, owl, water-bird, lion,
the lake-dweller, and likewise goat,
deer, boar — fully present —
abide always on what is not the right.

Peacock, crocodile, and the king of fish,
tortoise, the lower wind, and goose,
hare — these are renowned on the beneficial right.

Chief of frogs, saliva born of cloud-force,
eye-medicine, and a cat of like description,
yak and the fragrant one, and likewise the laughing one — on the left, in the eight skulls.

The Kāraṇḍa bird and the wheel,
sheep and the Cakora partridge,
the Byekhara, the Hormo, the Olwa, and the Kurara — these are renowned on the right of the sun.

The powerful mover, the conch-keeper,
the lineage-endowed, Padma, the Lotus of Excellence,
the Steady One, the Immensely Wealthy — on the left of the Jewel King.

The grasp-planet, spike-planet, long-tailed one,
Rāhu with red eyes, the dispeller of sins,
Saturn, Viṣṇu, the Horse King —
these are renowned as being on the right.

Indra, Brahmā, and likewise the Fierce One,
the deity of desire, and likewise the skull-bearer,
the naked one, and the one of good threads —
the Powerful One is on the left.

Lung-disease, breathing ailments, and likewise expectorated matter, withering of the interior, leprosy, twisted limbs, liver and spleen ailments rising by their nature —
renowned for elephants and the like.

Tetanus, and the disease of forgetting,
blood-stone, colic, the king of diseases,
dysentery, tumors, and hunger-sickness,
and jaundice — these and their like.

Scabies, infestation, tooth-disease,
bile-affliction, blood, and likewise wind,
phlegm-flux, dryness of the body,
pallid-rash swelling — peacock and the like.

Edema, fatty disease, boil-swellings,
intestinal proliferation, constriction,
fracture, contagion, and severe cracking — Kāraṇḍa and the like are renowned.

Wind-bile and likewise indigestion,
veiled obscuration, blurred vision, urinary retention,
pleurisy, hidden tumors,

flatulence, planetary afflictions — and their like.

Among the noble beings of humanity,
those who go like supreme deer
who, seeing all struck down by disease
and the buddha renowned as mighty,
should cause that one to enter into their own body.
Lest sentient beings be tormented,
for the pacification of illnesses, the buddha
takes on disease beginning with that of the elephant.

For one who meditates in this way:
no disease, no decay, no wasting,
no death — assured — no feebleness of mind,
no arrogance and no delusion,
no hunger and no thirst,
no suffering and no lower rebirths likewise,
and neither gods, demigods, nor humans,
nor any other, shall cause disease.

This is the fifth chapter, called the Vajra of the Complete Pacification and Relief of All Illnesses.

Then the King who holds the vajra, the one who holds all bodies, spoke these words, captivating the mind of the ḍākinīs:

Recollecting and focusing the mind,
meditate on the recollection of the buddhas.
Reflecting on the jewel of the mind,
meditate on the recollection of the Dharma.
The yogin of karma-recollection should perfectly meditate on the great wheel.
This yoga is supremely excellent —
what has not yet arisen will never arise.

Having fully visualized Vajrasattva,
seal it with the four mudrās.
Having contemplated Vajra Vairocana, seal it through meditating on the mudrā.
Through the practice of the vajra mudrā,

perfectly meditate on the jewel aggregate.
Through fully practicing the Dharma mudrā,
seal it with the vajra of action.

The king of aversion, the great king,
who eliminates all faults —
meditate on him, expanding and condensing.

Condensation is perfectly taught once more.
When one meditates perfectly on the Protector who is the buddha, buddhas pervade everything like clouds.
Through the yoga of expansion and condensation,
one should perfectly meditate on buddha-awakening.
The mind, by means of the precious jewel,
brings the faults of Māra to exhaustion.
Through the connection of the mind's rain-cloud, condensation is again to be taught.

The king of Dharma, great delusion — that form-endowed one of expansion and condensation, blessed throughout the four sessions:
if one meditates, accomplishment will swiftly come.
Conceiving the mind as swift-moving,
it bestows immeasurable fruit.

Through the supreme steed of the great rain-cloud, condensation again is to be meditated upon.

The Blessed One thus proclaimed the great sacred commitment of expansion and condensation.

Meditating with the mind on the center of the solar maṇḍala,
and on the center of the stainless maṇḍala,
one should visualize the syllable of the body.
In the center of the blood maṇḍala,
place the mind's precious syllable.
In the center of the wheel of Dharma,
perfectly visualize the syllable of speech.
In the center of the action maṇḍala,
bearing the form of the syllable of Amogha — meditating on the three bodies without separation,

one should meditate on the vajra of primordial wisdom.

Vajrasattva, his wheel of Dharma inseparable,
in Vairocana — the precious jewel of mind, the jewel,
the lotus, beautiful with red petals,
the sword of wisdom, the nature of keen discernment of Amogha — cutting through the mountain of conceptual thought,
one comes to possess the great mudrā.

In hundreds of ten millions of leagues,
one should meditate on the vajra maṇḍala.
In the maṇḍala of benefit itself,
and the aggregate of jewels with great radiance,
and the aggregate of Dharma with the great Protector,
from the Tathāgata, from the vajra of karma,
blazing intensely with rays of variegated light,
adorned by clouds of buddhas,
dwelling in the middle of the space of the sky —
one should meditate on the maṇḍala of primordial wisdom.

Filled with the five qualities of desire,
with manifold forms throughout,
make offerings with all manner of worship.
Through the practice of the goddesses of the boundaries,
one should perfectly accomplish the ocean of primordial wisdom.
When the samaya wheel is set in motion,
the great vajra of primordial wisdom blazes.
The yogin, equal to all buddhas,
becomes non-dual in an instant.

With rudrakṣa and conch and tortoiseshell,
with livelihood from the lotus-fruit of offspring,
with pearl and the like, with coral and the like —
one possessed of meditative concentration should recite the mantra.

In order to bring buddhas, bodhisattvas,
ḍākinīs, and one's own goddess
into direct and visible presence,
one should recite the mantra pleasingly, causing it to resound.

Just as when some great person is summoned by the sound of a voice,
they come at the mere hearing of it —
so in an instant the buddhas come.

Thousands of world-realms,
ḍākinīs of the space of the sky — all assemble.
The buddhas of the great mudrā, abiding in bliss,
equal to the sky, are present.
They all come before the one who knows the mantra.
With vajra-eyes they look upon him fully.
Whoever attains the sequence of the mantra —
how wonderful! — that one attains awakening.

Buddhas and bodhisattvas, too,
take the practice of mantra as primary.
Through perfect application of the vajra mantra,
one attains peerless primordial wisdom.

Thus do the buddhas who know this,
abiding in the sequence of the practice of mantra,
not look toward the result itself —
this is called being equal to the buddhas.

Meditating on buddha-pride as the object of focus,
on the basic space of phenomena, luminously clear —
whoever meditates thus:
sentient beings become equal to the buddhas.

Just as the world becomes awakened,
just as the Dharma is stainless —
the element of sentient beings is declared to be the same:
like the sky, without defilement.

By the conceptual thought that imputes wrongly,
the precious mind has been made impure.
Through the purification of mind, it becomes pure —
just as the sky is indestructible.

Just as the sky, so too is mind.
From rousing the precious mind itself,
meditating on the nature of mind is awakening —
arising as the very nature of a perfect buddha.

Apart from the precious mind,
there is no buddha and there is no person,
no abiding object of consciousness,
nor anything whatsoever that is external.

By mind alone one is every buddha,
the great lord of the three realms,
the great king of the three worlds —
all of this is attained through mind alone.

Form and sound, and likewise smell, taste and touch in their intrinsic nature —
the dharmadhātu is supremely at peace;
this is proclaimed as the supreme precious one.

Form, feeling, perception, formations and consciousness itself —
all of these arise from mind alone.
This sage's teaching does not change.

Like a wish-fulfilling jewel (cintāmaṇi),
granting in abundance the fruits of all desire,
the pure suchness of mind, its intrinsic nature,
bestows the fruit of buddha awakening.

For that very reason the buddhas,
through rousing the vajra of mind,
confer the accomplishment that delights in certain openness —
the accomplishment that is the definitive aspect of the profound.

This is the sixth chapter, the chapter on the manifestation of the essential nature of Vajrasattva.

Then the great vajra holder, Vajrin, entered the meditative absorption of the yoga of generating the tent of ḍākinīs, and spoke the yoga of self-identity:

Perfectly completing the abode of the buddhas,
meditating on the five aspects,
resting in the nature of Samantabhadra,
achieving one's own as a higher deity,
arranging the maṇḍalas,
worship, praise, ambrosia, and the rest —
these are to be meditated upon in due order.

This is held to be yoga with six branches.

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-abhiṣekata vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

The Blessed One, the Tathāgata Akṣobhya, then declared:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-amṛta-svāda vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

The Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitāyus, then declared:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-stuti vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

The Blessed One, the Tathāgata Ratnaketu, then declared:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-pūjā vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

The Blessed One, the Tathāgata Vajra-Uttaramukhāśva, then declared:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-anurāgaṇa vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

The Blessed One Vajrasattva, the Tathāgata, then declared:

The body in its elaborate and condensed form —
the great king Vairocana, the mighty one — generated from the dharmadhātu through syllables:
that is the buddha-abode to be established.

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-anilaya vajra-svabhāva ātma-ko'haṃ.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra-Vairocana.

Dwelling in the midst of the element of space,
the maṇḍala that is the very self of the four elements —
upon that, visualize the buddhas,
then elaborate and establish the celestial palace.

Because it is vajra-like and indestructible,
one should therefore meditate on Akṣobhya.
From the subsequent mindfulness of the unborn,
Vairocana is beneficial.

The supreme of all that is precious —
this is explained as the precious mind.
Vajra-Dharma is the great king.
From upholding the defining mark of desire,
dwelling in the abode of Vajrasattva —
that mind is explained as desire itself.

Because results are not achieved without their cause,
this is proclaimed as richly meaningful.

This is the meditative absorption called Vidyā the Beautiful, the Vajra.

The first is the empowerment of the vase,
the second is the secret empowerment,
the third is the wisdom-gnosis empowerment —
just as the body is a Tathāgata.

Having drawn the sacred maṇḍala,
through the rite of the pledge-essence,
generating the HŪṂ and the meditative concentration,
one should at that time grant the breath.

Endowed with the five ḍākinīs,
filled with the five pledges,
possessed of the assembly of ḍākinīs —

Through the supreme union of the vajra seed,
having made oneself the higher deity,
constantly contemplating the disciple as certain,
by the name of the continual family-lineage,
one grants the vajra empowerment to the disciple.

Through the supreme union of the Vajra Lady with the Eye, the Self-Lady, Tārā,
the White One, and so forth, as the body of the self,
the unsurpassed vajra is to be explained.

This very suchness of the unsurpassed is non-dual and beyond syllables.

It illuminates the dharmadhātu, the basic space of phenomena, as clear light.
By tasting the flavor of sublime bliss,
this is the meditative absorption called the Unobscured Vajra.

GA and HA,
and at the beginning and end endowed with ŚWA —
this very supreme luminous clarity,
bestowing all accomplishments (siddhi):
through the rite, one tastes the vajra nectar.
By the mere eating of these,
the yogin becomes equal to all buddhas

and becomes equal to the vajra.
All illnesses are utterly pacified.
One becomes a being of great majesty and magnificent body,
captivating the minds of all the world,
victorious over all adversarial challengers,
adorned by the lords of all the world.
The gods proclaim one as a guide.
One becomes the nature of the five ḍākinīs.
The food of Dharma is profound.
This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra of Consuming the Meditation of the Great Pledge.

The yogin who relies on Akṣobhya
fully abandons all illnesses.
Through permanence one is endowed with great radiance.
By the Vajra Sun one knows no aging.
Through reliance on Vajra Dharma,
one enjoys all women.
The great and meaningful king gives rise to the limb of the vajra life-force, accomplishing all aims and endowed with splendor —
this one is proclaimed to be a yogin.

Through the practice of drinking Akṣobhya,
one comes to live for five thousand years.
In terms of benefit, it is said to be ten thousand.
By the Vajra Sun, a hundred thousand vajras.
By Amitāyus, immeasurable;
by seven, as long as space itself is said to endure.
The Vajra Suns, the immeasurable ones —
these are the very root of the method for accomplishing cyclic existence.
Through reliance on these, the yogin becomes like Samantabhadra.

The wisdom of the Perfection of Wisdom and gnosis —
this is proclaimed as the Vajra Sun.
The abode of all phenomena:
the Tathāgata Amitāyus —
this is none other than the buddha of the vajra.

That which causes skillful means and wisdom to flourish,
throughout all of the three realms,
on the earth, below the earth, and in the intermediate sky:
a body pervaded by blood and vital fluid —
thus spoke the Lord of the Family-Lineage.

Nails and body-hair are Tathāgata.
Elements and vital fluid are Amitāyus, boundless as space.
In skin and blood great majesty abides.
In fat and feet Vajradhara dwells.
In the sinews and flesh the protector of all is Vairocana.
In the channels and flesh, the King of Seven.
For all of these, the five buddhas
are explained by the vajra ḍākinīs.

The earth element, perfectly pure, is the Eye itself, the Beautiful Wheel.
The Vajra Lady is clear and pure.
The daughter of the lotus is the very heat.
Tārā is the perfectly pure wind.
These four Vajra Ladies
are to be called vajra ḍākinīs.
The Hevajra Tantra declared this.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra, the Supreme Arising of the Five Nectars, All Mantras Perfectly Pure. This is the seventh chapter.

You, the all-pervading Vajra of Aversion,
whose mind and Dharma are supremely pure,
who perfectly adorns the body of a deity —
may Pukkasī look upon me swiftly.
As a guide, for the sake of the world's benefit,
setting aside emptiness, please take birth.

You, the all-pervading Vajra of Delusion, lord of the body, through the reflected image of the Dharma,
who perfectly adorns the body of a deity —
may the protector Gaurī of the mountain grove look upon me swiftly.
As a guide, for the sake of the world's healing,
setting aside emptiness, please take birth.

You, the all-pervading Vajra of Attachment, through perfect individual understanding of purified speech —
who perfectly adorns the body of a deity —
may the fierce one look upon me swiftly.
As a guide, for the sake of the world's healing,
setting aside emptiness, please take birth.

You, the sustainer of all buddhas,
through the diligence of all forms and through perfect equality —
who perfectly adorns the body of a deity —
may the protector Ḍombī look upon me swiftly.
As a guide, for the sake of the world's healing,
setting aside emptiness, please take birth.

This is the meditative absorption called the Vajra that Causes All to Rise.

All those who bear the wheel —
by this they are to be generated:
this is what the Vajra of Wisdom should do.
The lord of the maṇḍala has spoken thus:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-khecārī-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako hūṃ.
Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-bhūcārī-svabhāva-ātmako haṃ.
Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-pātāla-vāsinī-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako hūṃ.

To examine the abiding place of the blessings of the phenomena of body, speech, and mind —
this is what the Vajra of Wisdom should do.
This is the sequential teaching on awakening.

The Blessed One, lord of body, speech, and mind, spoke thus:

Through perfect engagement in the Great Seal (mahāmudrā),
the precious jewel of the body is to be purified.
By contemplating the vajra of meditative concentration,
the precious jewel of the mind is perfectly accomplished.
Through the special practice of vajra recitation,
the vajra of speech becomes stainless.
Through perfect engagement in the Vajra of Delusion,
the consciousness of the eye is purified.
Through contemplation of the Vajra of Aversion,
this is the contemplation by way of the door of sound.

The nose, by the Vajra of Avarice;
the six tastes, by the Vajra of Attachment;
the body, by the Vajra of Envy;
the mind, by Samantabhadra —
that very ḍākinī, the selfless one:
by these, all is completely purified.

Even if there is no contradiction,
there is nonetheless purification of the Victor's reality.
Resting in what is truly conventional truth,
one meditates solely on the phenomena of form of the wheel.
From the conduct in which no substantial thing has arisen,
all persons are fully free — worldly beings,
who cannot be regarded as wandering through the world —
are completely purified through the way of the Dharma.

For those who are burning, pervaded by the poison of affliction,
the medicine of the body is nothing other than the poison itself.
Just as water that has entered the ear
is in turn resolved by water as the remedy —
just so, for minds disturbed by wind,
the skilled physician acts in the manner of the mongoose.

Beings deluded by attachment,
tormented by the fire of desire:
the world, generated by attachment,
is exhausted by the absence of attachment.
Through complete knowledge of the Vajra of Attachment,
the mind becomes a vajra bodhisattva.
Through being bound by the snare of attachment,
the world is said to be pervaded by clinging.
Full awakening that is free of attachment is not desired by those who have brought attachment to its ultimate end.

Then the method of accomplishment of Vajra-Tārā, the rites of the fire offering, and all desired aims are to be perfectly explained through the correct method of accomplishment.

For this, the following are the mantra-syllables:

Namo ratnatrayāya. Oṃ namo ārya-avalokiteśvarāya, bodhisattvāya, mahāsattvāya, mahākāruṇikāya. Tadyathā: Oṃ tāre tuttare ture sarva-duṣṭān mama kṛte jaṃbhaya stambhaya, mohaya, bandhaya, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ, sarva-duṣṭāṃ stambhani tāre svāhā.

In the center of the maṃ maṃ maṇḍala,
one visualizes the goddess Tārā:
eight arms, four faces,
adorned completely with all ornaments.
Meditate on her as the color of gold,
blazing with the defining marks of a young woman.
She who has received empowerment from the vajra-sun —

Crowned by the heads of four buddhas,
her body in the full bloom of youth,
swaying golden earrings at her ears,
she is seated upon a lotus throne of many hues.
Adorned with red rays of light,
in her right hands she holds a vajra lasso and likewise a conch,
and draws back an arrow.
A vajra hook, an utpala lotus,
and with her left hands she makes the threatening gesture and holds these.
Through the engagement of vajra cross-legged posture,
one accomplishes the third station.

To the east is Flower Tārā,
white in color, beautiful and pleasing,
born from the syllable Oṃ.
Her hands are filled with garlands of flowers.
Two hands, a single face,
adorned completely with all ornaments.

To the right is Incense Tārā,
dark in color, of beautiful form.
Her hands are occupied with incense and a conch.
Adorned completely with all ornaments.

To the west is Lamp Tārā,
her hands filled with lamp-stems.
Yellow in color, greatly adorned,
with swaying golden earrings.

To the north is Perfume Tārā,
her hands filled with a conch of perfume.
The goddess is the color of blood.
Meditate on the essence of the maṇḍala.

By the distinct assignment of the hook and the rest,
one visualizes the guardian deities of the gates.
Above, meditate supremely on Uṣṇīṣavijayā.
Below, meditate supremely on Suprabhā.

Taking up the wheel, the nāga lasso,
recite the mantra with enthusiasm:

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture svāhā.

The ten goddesses through the ten syllables,
abiding in the ten perfections,
are to be meditated upon with supreme effort
in order to accomplish every result.

This mantra is supreme and most excellent,
venerated by all buddhas.
Recitation of it is a powerful agent of transformation —
thus it is taught in the Vajra Tent Tantra.

With this mantra, recite it seven times over a knot of cloth, dedicating it with manifest praise.

Tied with a knot, even should one enter a forest,
none can carry one off.

Tiger, thief, crocodile, elephant that drinks with its trunk, lion, snake, fanged beast, buffalo, bear, and wild bull — merely by being brought to mind they are vanquished and flee.

With this mantra, for as long as a fire offering of utpala lotus is performed,
anoint with it one hundred and eight times:

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture māmukaṃ me vaśamānāya svāhā.

Again, with this same mantra recite it thirty-two times completely over a crow's feather, and conceal it in an enemy's house — within seven days they will be driven away.

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture cala bracala śīghraṃ gāmini devadattaṃ ucchaṭaya hūṃ
phaṭ.

Then follows yet another application:

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture amukābhīdhānāṃ kumārī mahyam udbāhina syāḥ pitā pracchatu me svāhā.

Grease, seeds of bdellium, intoxicant herb, leaves of the aśoka tree — these are to be offered in fire together with flowers, along with butter, honey, and molasses, in a fire offering of five thousand — this is highly praised as the rite of accomplishment for a young woman. Within seven days, the yogin thereby obtains the girl of his own desire.

Then follows yet another application:

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture amukābhīdhānāṃ svasthānata ākarṣalamanti gejaḥ.

It is declared that with this mantra one should burn in the fire five thousand thorns of the palāśa plant together with flowers, and by performing this, one also summons the daughters of those who hold power over men.

Then follows yet another application. Upon cloth stained with menstrual blood, paint the Blessed Lady Tārā with two hands, one face, holding a hook, an utpala lotus, and a lasso. Make offerings before it, offering with the words "These flowers are good and wholesome" and the like. Then, with visualization added, recite the mantra from the outside:

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture amukī māme prasitaṃ svapnakathaya hūṃ phaṭ.

By five thousand recitations she will come. Binding her at the throat with the lasso and drawing her forward with the hook, visualize the one to be accomplished beneath the practitioner's feet and make use of her as a servant.

Then follows yet another application. One should recite with great praise the seven dhāraṇīs of Tārā, anoint both eyes with eye-salve, and then enter into the presence of a king's lineage. The king will thereafter show reverence as if to a student, will offer no resistance, will show kindness and speak pleasingly, will properly attend as a servant, and even when angry will come under one's power. This is something seen directly and is accompanied by wonder.

Then follows yet another application. Recite the dhāraṇī of Tārā one hundred and eight times over the powdered tusk of a two-tusked elephant. Mix this with butter of red-hued cow's milk and the pith of a stalk of arka plant, gather it into an eye-salve, and prepare it with Vajrasūrya, Vajradharmas, and Vajratumba as incense. Apply it to the eyes together with the ash. Then, whatever one looks upon with these vajra-eyes — if the Lord of the Dance of the Lotus does not come down, then at that moment, may I not be Tārā, and may I be one who has slain the buddhas, the Blessed Ones.

Then follows yet another application. Take the tongue of a toothless child, recite with great praise the seven dhāraṇīs of Tārā over it, then mix it with the root of the king of bees and the bezoar of a cow. Hold this as a tilaka upon the forehead, and whoever one looks upon will be brought under one's power.

Then follows yet another application. Recite with great praise the seven dhāraṇīs over an intestinal worm. Prepare it with vajra and give it with count. When the supreme application is eaten, the person will not give it up, will not delight in another, will not go to another, and will even abandon their own master.

Then follows yet another application. Anoint liberally with great butter-oil, recite the dhāraṇī of Tārā, and meditate upon her. At the conclusion of the recitation, with bound rice make a mixture upon the filth of the leather pouch, and whoever is given it will not give up the five.

Then follows yet another application. At the time of the full moon's approach, recite and be in service to the dhāraṇī of Tārā. Take the Īśvara of the world that arises therefrom, mix it with powdered conch shell, give it directly to a proud woman, and she will follow as a devotee as long as there is a five.

Then follows yet another application. Recite the dhāraṇī of Tārā one hundred and eight times fully over a mango fruit. When the desired fruit is anointed together with Hayagrīva, it brings one under power.

Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture amumu kasya bandhana mukti kuru muḥ svāhā.

This mantra should be written with the name of the one to be accomplished placed inside an arka leaf and hidden in the hollow of a neem tree — and the bound one will be released from bondage.

Then one should explain fully the source of the Perfection of Wisdom. Whoever merely meditates upon it will cut down all opposing arguments of opponents.

The goddess has two hands, one face, and a body of captivating white. Her hair is half-adorned with blue pigment. She abides perfectly upon an exceedingly white lotus. In the right hand one perfectly meditates upon a lotus of white color, and in the left she holds the Perfection of Wisdom. She abides in the vajra cross-legged posture, fully adorned with all ornaments. She is to be meditated upon in the maṇḍala of the navel.

Oṃ. Born from oṃ. She who causes supreme joy. Having generated the samaya being, one meditates upon the wisdom being. By six months of yoga practice one attains the Perfection of Wisdom. By application for seven nights one comes to know all treatises. By the application of reciting one hundred thousand mantras, one will compose one hundred verses each day.

Without any effort at all one retains a hundred treatises. The mantra syllables are as follows:

Oṃ piṭsu piṭsu prajñā varddhani, jvala jvala medhā varddhani, dhiri dhiri buddhi varddhani svāhā.

As for what is called "kha mi": having praised seven times with this mantra, one takes sour pomegranate juice that has not been strained, strikes it seven times with the mantra, and then for as long as six months one drinks it, and whoever drinks it will attain great wisdom.

Next, the true defining marks of the vajra master are to be properly explained. The mantra relied upon by such a one will certainly be accomplished by the practitioner.

One who is at ease and possessed of profound Dharma,
skilled in all forms of knowledge,
versed in fire-offering (homa), maṇḍala, and mantra,
and who has mastered consecration (pratiṣṭhā) and the use of ritual cakes —
one who truly understands these ten,
who guards the conduct of a śrāvaka,
who is devoted in the sequence of mantra practice,
who is gladdened at the sight of one possessed of form,
who is skilled in the maṇḍala and in recitation,
and who vanquishes root downfalls —
through the application of mantra and the protection of the body
one brings well-being to all beings in the world.
Such a guru, together with those accompanying him,
should not be disparaged by anyone whatsoever.
Whoever among people reviles the guru
will be boiled in the great hells.

Just as the King who holds the vajra
is worshipped first among all buddhas,
so should one diligently honor the guru,

as beings do through the Vajra Tent.

Whoever, greatly deluded,
steps over the guru's shadow, shoes, seat, or sleeping mat —
that man falls upon a razor's edge.

The disciple who has received full empowerment
yet transgresses the guru's word will become leprous in this world
and will dwell in hell in the next.

Through the application of deceit and fraud,
and the speaking of lies that harm another,
one will suffer from severe wasting disease, great leprosy,
and will take birth in hell and other such states.

Therefore a disciple who understands this should go to the far shore in reverencing the guru,
and if one thoroughly guards the guru's word,
an abundance of attainments will be accomplished.

Always perform the feast-offering.
Earnestly urge forth pacification and the rest.
Teach the Dharma to the Saṅgha beforehand.
Please also the guru-buddha.
Offer gifts to the guru first,
and thereafter to all the assembly.
Having undertaken one's own work,
accomplish it by means of this ritual.

Adorned with ornaments at all the limbs,
fully arrayed with vajra ornaments,
taking up the vajra-bell,
place ritual cakes at the four crossroads of the path.
Flowers, incense, lamps —
and likewise on the right, a conch and the like with perfume,
on the left, the vessel for the mantra offering-water,
and in front, place the begging-bowl vessel.
By the ritual of foot-washing in the manner of the higher tradition,
with flowers, incense, and so forth in due sequence —
if one makes offerings with lāsyā and the rest,

this gives rise to what is excellent.

With the gesture of turning flowers,
with the manner of scattering perfume,
with the offering of a lamp-tree,
and with a fragrant body in attendance —
lāsyā with the hands of lāsyā,
the ḍākinī of the garland bearing her garland,
the song of the samaya of hūṃ with a song,
and with the knees bent, that itself is the dance.

These offerings are unsurpassed.

They please all buddhas.

By worshipping the buddhas with worship,
the desired attainments are accomplished.

Taking delight in recitation and meditation,
one always goes beyond cyclic existence.

In accordance with the word of the vajra-ḍākinī,
these are the unsurpassed offerings.

With flowers, incense, and the like, manifestly, abiding in conduct as is worldly —
the diverse offerings are not the highest.

These, truly, are not limbs of awakening.

White is said to be for pacification.

Yellow is the method for increase and prosperity.

Red is for power and magnetization.

Black is for the last rite.

For pacification, white flowers.

For increase and prosperity, yellow — the vajra.

For the last rite, black flowers.

For power and magnetization, red is excellent.

A yogin who has not received empowerment, who has not entered a maṇḍala, who has not witnessed a consecration, and who has not performed a fire offering — for such a one, in this world and the next, the supreme spiritual attainment is simply not to be had. One who has not made supplication to the master cannot be born into this lineage here.

One should meditate upon all the buddhas. Even if awakening is not thereby attained, one will be born again and again in the abode of the wheel-turning ruler. Or else, as a lord of the earth, one will go openly to a pure realm — to Sukhāvatī, or among the ḍākinīs, or to Tuṣita — the wise are born there. As for what is accomplished in this very world, what need is there to speak of buddhahood? One becomes the great lord of the three realms, free from death and old age, like Brahmā, like Śakra (Indra, king of the gods), and like Rāhu, Wind, the gods of desire, and those endowed with sight — all these become part of such a one's retinue. Gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, and humans, kiṃnaras, and those who traverse the sky — without doubt, all of these become one's retinue.

This is the Blessed One who is self-arisen: turning the wheel of Dharma, taking birth, accomplishing awakening, ascending to the gods, going forth from home into renunciation, taking up the homeless life, fully assuming birth, and demonstrating complete nirvāṇa. Beholding the world that is to be tamed, this one takes on many forms. As the Buddha wishes to be the refuge of sentient beings, the Buddha performs the dance of the Buddha. Among the kinds of rabbits, tigers, lions, and elephants as well, with a mind of compassion wishing benefit, one is born accomplished through the mudrā seal. To those possessed of attachment, the Dharma is taught through the illusory display of a woman. The illusory woman is the Buddha herself; she dispels all illusion. In the form of the Perfection of Wisdom, the woman ever truly abides. Dwelling in the great illusion, she supremely bestows the awakening of the buddhas. Capricious, greatly devoted, without shame, she ever goes beyond attachment. She bestows attainments most excellently. Regarding form, qualities, and wealth, there is no desire for any queen. With the vajra of desire, fulfilling the mind's wish, one who experiences one's own bliss — a man endowed with moral discipline, not transgressing the word of the Sugata, who honors the master and is compassionate — the vajra of Hevajra is hereby opened.

Then the supreme among yoginīs, Nairātmyā, together with the ḍākinīs, petitioned this king of praises:

I bow and praise the Vajra of Aversion.
I bow and praise the Vajra of Delusion.
Let the Vajra of Miserliness protect me.
Let the Vajra of Desire grant me.
Mind and great jealousy — may all the vajras be guardians of the sacred bond.

Accomplisher of all activities,
may all vajra-holders be joyful.

Then the Blessed One, abiding in the sacred bond of all the ḍākinīs, sang this melody:

With measuring cord and chalk line, adorned and well fashioned,
by means of a very precise and pure measure —
in the maṇḍala called Hevajra,
let one endowed with wisdom draw the lines.

This is the sacred bond of the supplication made by the great disciple.

All the Tathāgatas, pacified,
the abode of all the Tathāgatas —
arisen from Vajrasattva,
let the leader of the maṇḍala please explain.

This is the meditative absorption called Fully Victorious, which is the supplication to the vajra of the maṇḍala.

I am glorious with the power of compassion,
the one who applies the wheel of protection.
The body made brilliant by the vajra,
arisen from the three kāyas, goes forth in emanation.
If some would transgress,
there is no doubt they are destroyed by this.
Some with a decaying body,
together with the arising of great-bliss gnosis,
are born of the nature of Vajrasattva.
On one side, the great obstructors —
the eight spokes of the wheel —

by measure, the gate is fully proclaimed. At the gateway, the divine banner should be made equal to the gate's measure.

At half the gate's portion are the lintel and the sides.

The Vedic cord is likewise placed.

The netted banner is half the Vedic cord.

First, the Brahmā-line is struck;
second, the boundary-line is struck again;

third, the four lines of the four faces
are to be struck precisely.
Setting aside two parts of the Brahmā-line,
it is divided and struck in six parts.
Then, setting aside the gate's measure,
it is struck precisely in ninths.

This is the sacred pledge of the purification of the ground.
Om khaṃ hūṃ bhūṃ.

This is the invocation of primordial wisdom.
Om medinī vajrī bhava vajrabandha hūṃ.

This is the sacred pledge for the striking of the lines.
Om samaya sūtra mātikrama hūṃ.

This is the sacred pledge for drawing the colored sand.

This is the pure dharmadhātu, the basic space of phenomena;
it liberates the realm of sentient beings.
O Vajra King most supreme,
let the noble maṇḍala be established.

In the direction of power, draw a śarabha.
At the boundary of fire, draw a monk.
On the wheel of Dharma, in the place free of truth-extremes,
in the wind quarter, draw a vajra.
Draw a hook in the east;
at the southern gate, a lasso;
at the western gate, likewise a chain;
in the north, a vajra-bell;
in the center, draw a white skull marked with the symbol of the all-sided vajra.

Then the King who holds the vajra opens wide the city of the fire offering.
By joining together the vajra hearth,
through the preparation of the vajra burnt substances,
the round form is said to bring peace.
For the extensive rite, the shape is like a pool with a railing.
For power, it resembles a half-moon.
For hooking, it has the shape of a hook.

For slaying and wrathful action,
it is like the element of space.
Likewise for expulsion and for unfortunate circumstances,
through the practice that repairs damaged limbs,
using sandalwood, aloewood,
and also the feet of other fragrant substances,
one lights the fire of the branch offering.
Afterwards, once again one performs the hooking.

Oṃ ehyehi mahābhūta deva ṛṣi dvija sattama grhītvā āhutiṃ āhāraṃ asmin sannihito bhava.

With the hook, one draws in;
with the lasso, one leads inside;
with the chain, one binds the feet;
by ringing the bell, one brings under mastery.

The eight offerings, Lāsyā and the rest,
having performed the ritual of the water-offering,
through the preparation of butter and so forth,
one pleases the fire once again.

This is the sacred pledge of the vajra water-offering.
Oṃ bravarasamkāra pratīccha svāhā.

This is the sacred pledge of the foot-washing.
Oṃ sarvapāpadahana vajrāya vajrasattvasya sarvapāpaṃ daha daha svāhā.

This is the mantra of the sacred pledge for consuming all burnt substances.
Oṃ vajrānala mahābhūta jvalaya sarvabhasmīṃ kuru sarvaduṣṭān hūṃ phaṭ.

Appear! Jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ. Samayastvaṃ ahaṃ.

Then, from outside, one invites the deity of one's own choosing.

Oṃ ehyehi bhagavannibhaktyanusmayena cārgantusaṃpratīccha dāṃ
pūjāṃ cādyā prasīdhame.

This is the sacred pledge of delight.
Oṃ kṛtobhaḥ sarvasattvārthaḥ siddhirdatvā yathānugā gacchadhāṃ buddhāpiṣeyaṃ punarāgamanāyamuḥ.

This concludes the eighth chapter, on establishment, the conjunction of various activities, and the fire offering.

Then the Victor who holds the vajra shall briefly teach the consecration of Vajrasattva
as it abides in worldly conventional terms.
First of all, the one who holds the wisdom seal
wishes to ring the bell,
and from the conjunction of extending the right leg,
polishes the vajra to the right.
When the sound of the evening session breaks,
the throat is bound with cloth,
and a vase filled with precious water of the eye
is prepared and placed in readiness.

Om devapicuvajra adhitiṣṭha. Om moharati adhitiṣṭha. Om dveṣarati abhitiṣṭha.

Om rāgarati adhitiṣṭha. Om vajrarati adhitiṣṭha. Om vajragaurī ākarṣaya jaḥ.
Om vajracorī praveśaya hūṃ. Om vajravetālī bandha baṃ. Om vajraghasmarī vaśaṃ kuru hoḥ.

This is the rite for invoking the wisdom.

Five kinds of bark and five products of the cow,
and especially five perfumes as well,
are to be poured in for the purpose of bathing the body.
The offering water and the rest are to be done as before,
or alternatively those same substances may be combined.
Having poured them in earlier and consecrated them with blessing,
one places the three vajras at the three sites —
at the eyes and so forth — together with delusion and the rest.
The empowerment is performed by way of one's own family.
One begins with the offerings and so forth in order.
Contemplate wisdom arising from one's own heart.
Purify the incense offering, envisioning the buddhas as present.
Through the union of the nectar of wisdom,
gradually emanate the offering goddesses in sequence.
Having contemplated the supreme awakening mind,
one properly begins the praise of the buddhas.

Empty by the intrinsic nature of all things,
inseparable from compassion —
you are thoroughly surrounded by a gathering of yoginīs,

you have attained the supreme through your own mind,
you have accomplished all beings, those who move and those who do not,
and with your mind of compassion you awaken sentient beings.

With the display of illusion you hurl the vajra.

Hail, glorious Heruka — rejoice with the vajra mind!

Through the union of the vajra and the crossed vajra,
one is to cultivate with the vajra meditation.

Having taken up the vajra syllable,
one is to meditate on the vajra maṇḍala.

At the center of the vajra maṇḍala,
fully meditate on the vajra aggregate.

Then contemplate the vajra as blazing.

Through the union of the vajra tongue,
the buddha is caused to enter into the vajra.

The incense offering is performed with the vajra mantra.

Thus did the Blessed One declare the vajra called "Tasting the Nectar of the Vajra."

Having drawn the five-pointed one going to the center of the expanse of space,
one who desires the siddhi of the buddhas drives the buddha-peg with force.

From the union of the vajra finger at the dharmodaya city (the source of phenomena), which is lovely — if the siddhi is not granted, Vajrasattva is to be slain.

Oṃ duru duru. Chinda chinda. Hūṃ hūṃ.

Thus did the Blessed One declare the vajra of the great driving with the peg.

At the center of the māṭṛ maṇḍala,
one is to visualize Hayagrīva in full.

The crown ornament bears the vajra Dharma.

Through the union of the great seal,
he holds a red lotus at his crown.

His body is red and greatly powerful.

Through the union of the two-in-one white garment,
he is adorned with sixteen hands.

his left face is as beautiful as the moon, stainless.
Know that the first face is red;
the remaining faces are like the bumblebee.
He has eight faces and four feet.
Vajra Dharma is of great splendor.
Through intense passion born of great desire,
he crushes the four mārās equally.

At the center of the mātṛ maṇḍala,
one is to call to mind Vajra Vairocana.
Contemplate him as bearing a vajra as his crown ornament.
His body color is white and of great splendor.
He has sixteen hands and eight faces,
four feet, and is fearsome.
He holds the wheel of Dharma at his crown.
Through intense passion born of great desire,
through the union of the eye and non-duality,
he makes even the fearsome tremble with fear.
His first face is white,
adorned with a black face and a red face.
The remaining faces are like the bumblebee.

At the center of the mātṛ maṇḍala,
one is to fully meditate on Vajra Sūrya.
Contemplate him as bearing a precious diadem.
He has the great blazing splendor of the vajra.
He has sixteen hands and eight faces,
four feet, and is fearsome.
He holds the mind-jewel at his crown.
The central one is of great golden splendor.
His first face is yellow,
his right face resembles blue.

The left face is beautifully moonlit,
and the remaining faces resemble the bumblebee.
At the center of the mātṛ maṇḍala,
one is to fully meditate on Supreme Horse.
Contemplate him as bearing a diadem and holding a sword.

He is like the aged mother, blue as the utpala flower.
He has eight faces and four feet,
adorned with sixteen hands.
The first face is deep blue,
in the form of a horse — fearsome.
The right face is black in color,
and the left is stainless and beautiful as the moon.
He holds a sword bearing supreme attainment at his crown.
The remaining faces resemble the bumblebee.

This mudrā of Vajra Sūrya in horse form is the form of Tārā.
The two hands of the goddesses are described:
they hold a curved knife and a skull-cup.

O Vajra, the supreme maṇḍala —
swords are themselves permanence,
and likewise the mirror is beneficence.
For Hayagrīva, fine cloth;
for Vajra Sūrya, gold;
for Supreme Horse, the quality of swift movement —
the offering of supreme benefit.

Those who desire the fruit of buddhahood
make continuous, regular offerings to the Lama.
Auspicious Vajrasattva, myself.
Auspicious Śākyamuni, Vairocana.
Auspicious Śrī Lokasamḥava (Glorious Descender into the World).
Auspicious Seven Solar Kings.

Then the king of vajra-holders, the vajra-holder of the supreme vajra of the three bodies, spoke the supreme samaya (sacred pledge) of the lord of vajra-holders:

Om dhara dhara dhāraya dhāraya marda marda vajradhṛk phaṭ svāhā.

Then, when the great mantra was proclaimed:

Born of vajra, of great compassion,
having become frightened and trembling,
bestow the supreme attainment of the vajra.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called the Dharma-aspect of the Vajra, and proclaimed this mantra of Hayagrīva:

Om vajradharma samaya stvaṃ hulu hulu om ārolik phaṭ svāhā.

Then, when this was merely proclaimed:

Vajra Dharma made a great sound,
having become frightened and trembling,
bestow the attainment of Dharma.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called Vairocana Vajra, and proclaimed this mantra of benefit:

Om śāśvataṃ paramaśāśvata ehyehi dzina dzika phaṭ svāhā.

Then, when this was merely proclaimed:

All buddhas and Tathāgatas fainted with fear and trembling,
and these were granted the attainment of buddhahood.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called Precious Sun, and proclaimed this mantra of Vajra Splendor:

Om vajrasūrya tamobidhāmanas mayaṃ stava haṃ ratnadhṛk phaṭ svāhā.

Then, when this was merely proclaimed:

Vajra Splendor, great in brilliance,
became frightened and fainted,
and bestowed the attainment of the sun.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called Meaningful Vajra, and proclaimed this mantra of Supreme Horse Vajra:

Phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ hi hi hi prajñādhīka phaṭ svāhā.

Then, when this was merely proclaimed:

The vajra born of the Meaningful lineage,
having become frightened and faint,
bestowed upon them the meaningful attainment.

The buddha maṇḍala is circular,
resembling the half-moon of the vajra-bearer.

The Vajra Dharma is like a lotus.

The sun is like a wish-fulfilling jewel.

What is called Supreme Horse is everywhere triangular.

The great mudrā of Vajrasattva is the very mudrā of benefit.

The great mudrā of Vajra Dharma is Ratnakūṭa (Jewel Pinnacle) the Light-Maker.

The great mudrā of Meaningful Accomplishment is adorned with bone ornaments,
draped in a tiger skin,
with hair and half-skull.

The bodhisattva earnest in offering,
having seen with eyes reddened by desire,
through the yoga of the great mudrā,
should meditate through the yoga of desire.

This is the ninth chapter, on accomplishing the varieties of activity.

Then the Vajra-Holder King declared that the characteristics of conduct are to be explained. Through the yoga of vajra conduct, one properly commences the vajra mudrā.

Adorned with flowers and fruits and the like, the great bodhisattva should go to the very edge of a great forest and wander through the groves in search. The food offered there is itself adorned with excellence. One presents it to those who are fearful and terrified. All the clans of the lords of the forest groves become vajra-holders and enter the retinue.

All births and rebirths, whatever beings come to birth — through the yoga of the vajra of delusion, they shall be seen with the vajra eye.

Whatever sound is supremely renowned, pleasing to the three realms, dwelling as if at the very threshold of the ear — through the yoga of the vajra of aversion, it is heard by the sage endowed with direct knowledge.

The great mind of all sentient beings, with a characteristic like the point of a needle, placed as if in the hollow of the palm like an āmalaka fruit — through the vajra mind, it shall be known.

In ten billion births, one thousand of those of one's own clan — through the vajra yoga they shall be recollected, remembered as clearly as two or three years past.

Through manifold nets of magical display, this one shall cause them to appear. Through the yoga of the five direct knowledges (abhijñā), one shall attain the direct knowledge of a buddha.

This is the tenth chapter, on the pure sense bases of the vajra.

Through benefit itself comes pacification; the Vajra Sun brings increase; Vajra Dharma is called subjugation; Vajrasattva renders it secret. Through a mind of pacification, pacification is achieved. Subjugation should properly be commenced. Through a mind of increase, increase is activated; one should vividly meditate on a jewel rain-cloud. Through a mind of passionate attachment, one summons a girl and makes use of her. With the falling of a rain-cloud of fire and a mind of ferocity, one slays.

From Robbing comes the White One; from the Second Birth comes Brahmā himself; from Śrī the Unsurpassed; from the Unbroken comes Rambhā; from Gayā the Crocodile-Banner — through the yoga of the great mudrā, all of these are put to full use. One takes delight with a mind of intense joy, and is not defiled by desire. At the end, svāhā for pacification; at the time of increase, vaṣaṭ; at the end for slaying, hūṃ phaṭ; for subjugation and summoning, jaḥ and hrīḥ.

This is the eleventh chapter, on all activities.

Then the Vajra-Holder King — the vajra tent of the ḍākinīs — in order to perfectly accomplish the vajra ḍākinīs, the Sage declared these words:

In a mountain hermitage adorned with flowers and fruits, in a grove of healing herbs, having taken the vajra posture, one should make offering to the lama, the buddha. "I go for refuge to the Three Jewels. I individually confess all my sins. I rejoice in the virtue of beings. With my mind I take hold of the awakening of the buddhas. Until awakening I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the supreme Saṅgha. In order to perfectly accomplish the benefit of self and others, I shall generate the awakening mind."

Having generated the supreme mind of awakening, I invite all sentient beings as my guests. I shall engage in the supreme, delightful conduct of awakening. May I accomplish buddhahood for the benefit of beings.

Through the four Brahmā abodes (brahmavihāras) one should refresh the fatigue of mind. Having gone there and settled the awakening mind, this is the samaya pledge of the vajra guard.

Through the analysis of what is practiced as true and what is false, one is not closely contaminated. Through the yoga of the unborn, what is born is fully declared in this life.

Om śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāvātmako'ham.

Abiding in the center of the expanse of space, one should meditate on the manifold vajra. Through the yoga of ten hūms, the ten wrathful ones are arrayed in sequence. Yama, the Terminator; Wisdom the Terminator —

Padma the Terminator, Obstacle the Terminator — the wrathful Ṭakki wielding a staff of dark blue. Immovable and the Greatly Powerful, Uṣṇīṣa with the white parasol, and the one abiding beneath the vajra feet — through the union of nectar, everywhere one should meditate in the contemplation of the wrathful ones. Having visualized them as extending a hundred leagues, one should drive away the obstructors.

Abiding in the center of the expanse of space, one should meditate on the vajra maṇḍala. Abiding in the center of the vajra maṇḍala, one should meditate on the maṇḍala of light. Abiding in the center of the maṇḍala of fire, one should then meditate on water. Abiding in the center of the water maṇḍala, the one possessing the disciplines should meditate on the Great Sovereign. And upon the maṇḍala of the Great Sovereign, one should meditate on oneself as well.

Having visualized the ground as arising from BHRŪṂ, one should examine that vajra maṇḍala. The five aspects should be thoroughly examined. One should meditate on the reflected forms of the heroes arisen from the five wisdoms. One should meditate on the hero of the awareness-woman arisen from Vajrasattva.

Om dharmādhātuvajrasvabhāvātmako'ham.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra Arising.

Upon the eye and the other senses, delusion and so forth — place the three vajras at the three sites. The vajra of mind: the sky-farer; the vajra of speech: the earth-farer; the one abiding beneath the body's feet — these arise from HŪṂ, ĀḤ, and OM. These are to be made the heart-essence of the Blessed One.

White Vajra, Lady of the Waters; Vajra Sky-Farer, Selflessness Lady — pressing upon the site of the vajra of aversion, meditate on these as the heart of the maṇḍala.

White one, Flesh-Eater, Riser of Corpses; Ghasmarī, the Guardian of the Gate; Pukkasī and the Forest Dweller; Caṇḍālī the servant woman — place these at the borders. Above, as has been said, is the Sky-Farer; below, likewise, the Earth-Farer; in the center, Selflessness the ḍākinī. Meditate on these as the very maṇḍala of ḍākinīs.

Just as great offerings were bestowed upon the awakening vajra and the buddhas, in order that I too may be supremely protected, grant me the vajra of space. The great vajra of empowerment, honored by the three realms — grant what arises from the place of the three secrets of all buddhas.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra, which is the supplication for the wisdom empowerment.

For the hero of the awareness-woman, the Great Sovereign: the crown ornament is one's own exalted deity. With that, perform the maṇḍala empowerment, praise, offerings, and so forth. Likewise, the introduction of wisdom — with the tongue, one tastes the vajra nectar. From the yoga of what is recited within, the one possessing the disciplines should recite the mantra.

This is the twelfth chapter, called The Arising of the Yoginī.

Thereupon the bodhisattvas including Maitreya gave rise to their individual thoughts, and they addressed the Blessed One: "How, Blessed One, should one practice what is called the Tantra of the Yoginī?" Vajradhara declared:

The method of the Perfection of Wisdom is explicitly called the Yoginī.

Because one relies on that very reality
through the yoga of the great seal,
the Vajra Tent of the Yoginī
is called the Tantra of the Yoginī.

The method of all the perfections
will be accomplished by meditation alone.

The joyful and beautiful ocean of bliss of the ḍākinīs, the sky and the rain of gold, Mahāmuditā and Ghasmarī, the greatly delighted, the secret mind-enchantress, the eight lineages of vajra ḍākinīs —

Kyehi! The vajra maṇḍala, all the buddhas, the secret treasury, the arising of vajra nectar, Cakrasaṃvara, the Tent, and the source of arising — these are celebrated as the six Tantras of the Yoginī.

For the sake of taming men, the tantra of yoga is correctly taught. For the sake of gathering women —

— the Tantra of the Yoginī is taught. For those of lesser capacity, the Kriyā Tantra; above that, what is neither Kriyā nor Yoga; for the highest of sentient beings, the highest Yoga; and above that, the Yoga of unsurpassed perfection.

Thereupon the bodhisattvas addressed the Blessed One: "For now, though we ourselves seek these domains of practice, other sentient beings wish to hear what the Buddha has taught." The Blessed One declared:

Emptiness and compassion are not two.
Wherever the mind is thoroughly cultivated,
this is the teaching of the Buddha, the Dharma,
and the Saṅgha as well.

The meditative absorption called "Refuting the tīrthikas, Vanquishing Opponents, and Expounding the Texts of One's Own School."

In order to attain my own awakening,
and in order to liberate all others,
I teach the Buddha, the Dharma,
and the Saṅgha.

In order to reverse attachment to self-grasping,
the method of realizing the essential nature of dharmadhātu
by the union of skillful means and wisdom —
this is the teaching of the Buddha.

Thereupon the Blessed Ones and the sons of the Victors, having heard these words of the Blessed One, were filled with joy and spoke these words:

How wonderful! The teaching of Samantabhadra, arisen from the sky —
by practice in the midst of the sky,
one comes to hear the ocean of primordial wisdom.

Then the King of Vajra-holders,
through the vast expansion of great bliss,
shall expound all the sacred commitments.
Desiring the fruit of buddhahood,
with bliss and delight, with dance and song
and the sound of music,
with the application of fragrances and garlands —

the King of Awareness (vidyārāja) is supremely accomplished.

Just as bliss is grasped in the manner of bliss,
one should practice as one wishes;
just as one abides in one's abiding,
the supreme syllable will be accomplished.

Through the union of food and drink, adorned with excellent ornaments,
by means of a single day's exertion,
the supreme suchness will be accomplished.

Always taste your own sacred commitments;
always make offerings to the Tathāgatas;
always present gifts to the guru as well —
the guru is equal to all the buddhas.

Just as the Protector Vairocana,
just as Vajradhara — such is the guru;
just as the great treasury of the sky,
just as the Sage of vajra Dharma,
just as the Protector, the King of the Seven —
thus is the vajra master described.

Therefore, through every effort,
the great vajra master, the supreme guru,
the one in whom virtue shines supreme,
must never be disparaged.

This is the thirteenth chapter, called "The Vajra Vow."

Thereupon the Blessed One, the Great Vajra, desired to sharpen the vajra. The ḍākinī Nairātmyā embraced him, and the division of excellent conduct is to be set forth. Having established it in the form of the vajra, through desiring as one desires, the vidyādhara who is a wheel-turning sovereign will be accomplished without doubt.

Having properly taken up the five fragrances, one should mix them with the five substances. Bound with three iron links, one holds the pill-awareness (vidyā). Saffron combined with aloe — a pill of a color resembling the rising sun — placed in the mouth, one holds the sun-awareness. With the five meats, bound with three iron links, fully joined to the sun-vajra, it is accomplished in a single day. Red sandalwood and Kashmiri substances, joined with hidden joy, bound with three iron links — one holds the horse-awareness. Having meditated upon the Protector of the World, made from cane-bone of just the right measure, wrapped in iron with guggul resin — one holds the awareness of the Protector.

The meditative absorption called "The Vajra Method for Accomplishing Pills."

Burn the head of the king of nāgas,
then anoint it with self-arisen blood;
through the yoga of the vajra's benefit,
one holds the collyrium-awareness.

With the guru's seed present,
Rub with the fat of a tiger-skin.
Through the yoga of the body's vajra,
the ointment of the feet becomes accomplished.

In the center of the limbless maṇḍala,
beside the cave-grotto of the sovereign sense,
through the yoga beneath the vajra-feet,
one shall supremely accomplish the divine daughter.

Near the land of Oḍḍiyāna,
through the union of the great mango fruit
with the vajra that harms and delights,
one holds the awareness beneath the feet.

Vajrasattva, the great king,
is to be invoked again and again.
That very one is comparable to the wish-fulfilling jewel of all siddhis.

Vajra-harms-and-delights, the great body —
two hands, a single face —
the threatening finger and the nāga-noose,
is to be meditated upon in black in color.

Having taken up Vajra-Hūṃ, meditate upon all aspects.
Pressing firmly with Akṣobhya, recite the mantra called Phuṭ.

The meditative absorption called "The Vajra of Ointment and Eye-Medicine."

Then, having heard the words of the Blessed One, all the Tathāgatas, the Blessed Ones, arose in joy and gladness and spoke these words:

Ema! O Vajra, O Vajra!

Ema! The teaching of the vajra —
since all phenomena are empty,
siddhis supremely abide therein.

Just as the hollowed wood without pith
bears sweet fruit of the essential,
so too in the body without pith,
the sweet fruit of siddhi is likewise so.

Space is the home of all that arises,
and the abode of all phenomena.

Mind is purified like space itself;
purified mind is supreme bliss.

By the intrinsic nature of the ultimate sense-faculty,
there is nothing arisen outside of mind.

Form and so forth, each desired object,
is to be understood as mind itself.

Then the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi made this request to the Blessed One:
"Blessed One, how should we understand it that all the Tathāgatas teach that mind is empty, yet the object outside of mind is not empty?"

The Tathāgata declared:

Through habitual tendencies of beginningless existence,
the external object is conceptually elaborated.

Mind conceptually elaborates everything;
mind is said to range through all things.

The meditative absorption called "The Vajra of Teaching the Arising of the Awakening Mind."

Exceedingly graceful, with wide eyes,
from the place where Siṃhala-camphor originates —
having placed her upon one's lap,
begin by grasping her by the hair.
With the vajra cry out,
and with vajra-sameness let her be kneaded.

With the vajra's embrace, receive her completely.

Squeeze the vajra lips fully.

Through the union of the vajra finger, thoroughly rouse the vajra place.

Having drawn forth the vajra mind,
eat it properly with the vajra tongue.

Then enter into her state of bliss,
and insert Vajrasattva.

Through the union of the vajra death,
begin the vajra offering.

At the arising of Vajrasattva,
scatter with the mind of the vow-holder.

With the lotus bearing flowers,
make offering with the red lotus.

The vajra-holder pleased by the lotus — distinguished especially by the red lotus.

Through the supreme union of the five fragrances,
the camphor-banner offering —
this brings diligence, great bliss,
power, and expansion,
and through arousal by the very sight of her,
one gains dominion over this world.

Those who have slain the Three Jewels,
those who have killed sentient beings,
those who have disparaged the guru,
and those who have reviled the path of the buddhas —
these are to be drawn up with an iron hook,
their feet bound with iron chains,
their throats tightly bound with a lasso.

The vajra-self shall summon them.

Having contemplated the ḍākinīs and buddhas,
invite those as witnesses.

By this, the buddhas and heroes,
and Vajrasattva, have been dispatched —

This one, possessed of great evil, is the very nature of a being bound for the Hell Without Respite.

This one falls into the great hell.
Having reflected thus, one must slay.

Having visualized the vajra form,
one should meditate upon the expanse of sky.
Having been struck with the vajra club,
one is born in the realm of the Vajra-holder.

If the iron hook and so forth prove ineffective,
one should draw them also with food.
Having visualized the form through suchness itself,
one establishes it in the very vajra maṇḍala.

The king of the Ṭakki, the iron hook,
the blue club bearing one's own name,
the King of Power, the three-pointed one,
the immovable — the maṇḍala of sword-tips.

This is the meditative absorption called "Slaying the Great Conceptuality."

Then the Vajra-holding King (Vajradhara),
having drawn breath for all and offered relief,
spoke of this hidden domain of conduct
for the purpose of protecting the vajra samaya.

The great wrathful being of the vajra,
one face, two hands for all —
the left fist placed at the heart,
the right raising one's own weapon aloft.
Bearing the club that slays the Lord of Death (Yama),
the vajra club that none other can wield.
The supreme red empowerment of Hayagrīva,
from the practice of the undivided amṛta-hearth.

The king of the Ṭakki, the iron hook,
the blue club bearing one's own name,
the King of Power, the three-pointed one,
the immovable — the peak of the syllable maṇḍala.

The white king Tśa-kyabs — contemplate fully the wheel of Dharma.
The wooden pestle beneath the vajra foot,

he stands with the left leg extended.

Like the appearance of the blue sovereign,
the terminal form is to be fully visualized.

The vajra that none other can wield,
fearsome like the jewel of the moon.

The great red wrathful one of the lotus,
the black one whose nature is vajra amṛta,
the great wrathful one of the boundary, the solitary one — marked by holding the vajra at the crown of the head.

The Lord of Death (Yama) through the very form of Vairocana, Vajrasattva bearing the club —
following the vision of the lotus-wrathful one,
in the method-practice of Vajrasattva,

abiding at the center of the vajra maṇḍala:
one should meditate upon the vajra sun.

Below, having visualized the lotus seat,
one should fully meditate upon the ten wrathful ones.

The wisdom vajra in one's very own person —
the maṇḍala-nature of the half-ten — having visualized the māras beneath the feet,
one should meditate upon the five maṇḍalas.

The resplendent wheel of protection,
blazing like the fire at the end of an age,
turning yet utterly immovable,
extending to a measure of five hundred leagues.

This is the meditative absorption called "The Vajra of Total Victory through the Power of the Protective Samaya."

Then the Blessed Greatly Courageous One, dwelling in the sequence of his own blessing,
by the yoga of his own blessing —
from that very suchness shall one explain.

At the center of the heart it becomes a moon,
a reflection, a moon unaltered,
fully pervaded by rays of many hues.

From that, one should meditate upon the vajra.

The vajra selfless ḍākinī —
one should meditate upon her, aroused through ritual.
The ḍākinī residing at the tip of the nose —
visualize her as the size of a mustard seed.

Within a mustard seed: all beings,
those moving and those unmoving in the three realms.
One who meditates in this way
accomplishes one's own blessing supremely.

Form, sound, and likewise smell, taste and tactile sensation that one desires —
the yogin himself
does not grasp them; therefore, neither self nor other.

Just as it arises from vajra and lotus,
one aspires to the form of peaceful bliss —
without waves, without appearance,
without conceptuality, without syllable.

Having drunk a little of the intoxicant,
the self does not know the self.
At the limit of bliss-gone-beyond and bliss-owner,
the net of conceptual thought is fully abandoned.

Unchanging, beyond delusion,
the Kye vajra shines forth luminously!
The form that is not inert — Heruka —
fully surrounded by the forms, oneself as the protector Heruka.

By that, the self does not know itself,
yet in that very moment, all is known.
The coming and going of beings
one sees for oneself as if with omniscience.

Buddhas, sons of buddhas,
all their limbs and all their pores,
together with the meshwork threads of the head —
one sees the body as though it were not there.

In an instant one holds the form of the Kye vajra.
Just as space cannot be apprehended,
having no mark, unborn,
unstained, and free from delusion —
the five obscurations are completely abandoned.

Just as a reflection in a mirror,
once understood, is pleasure cast away,
so likewise one sees clearly one's own form as Heruka.

That very reality — sense-objects, sense-faculties,
and aggregates — exists like space.
The body is declared to be bliss itself,
and the formations do not overpower it.

Form is not grasped by the eye;
sound is not for the one who hears;
taste is not felt by the tongue;
smell is not for the nose either;
tactile objects are not for the body's surface.

Yet from the mode of great bliss:
the bliss of seeing a beautiful woman through the eyes,
the pleasantness of the bliss of song through the ears,
the greatness of the bliss of fragrance through the nose,
the great bliss of contact at the place of birth,
and through the practice of tasting a drink — whatever brings bliss to cessation is pervaded by great bliss.
Nothing is known apart from bliss.

For the buddhas and bodhisattvas,
the ḍākinīs and the noble consorts, the five buddhas and the many — having gone to bliss, they are fully awakened.

Then the great bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, having heard the Blessed One's words on great bliss, spoke these words:

To overcome the conceptual thought of the ordinary,
genuine meditation is supremely renowned.

To overcome the condition of the ordinary,
meditation too is not meditation.

The realization of the bodhisattvas is just so. Nevertheless, in order to purify the measure of impurity, one should meditate on the form body of the Tathāgata.

Vajrapāṇi asked: Blessed One, what then is the very purpose of meditating on the embodied form?

The Blessed One declared: Lord of Secrets, there is a purpose.

Vajrapāṇi asked: Blessed One, what is its name?

The Vajra-Holder declared: Buddhahood itself.

What is buddhahood itself?

Omniscience itself.

What is that?

This embodied form is true.

Why so?

The Vajra-Holder declared: It is thus — I am endowed with the thirty-two major marks and adorned with the eighty minor marks of excellence.

Why so?

Because of being incomparable, it is to be accomplished.

Vajrapāṇi asked: Is the Blessed One then inert matter?

The Vajra-Holder declared: I myself am the mirror-like wisdom (Skt. ādarśajñāna).

What is that mirror-like wisdom?

The Vajra-Holder declared: It is neither true nor false, neither a cause nor a birth. Thus I myself am the wisdom of equality (Skt. samatājñāna), and I myself am the wisdom of discernment (Skt. pratyavekṣaṇājñāna), and I myself am the wisdom of accomplishing activity (Skt. kṛtyānuṣṭhānajñāna), and thus the dharmadhātu, the basic space of phenomena, is thoroughly pure.

Therefore, O great bodhisattva, do not speak of an awakening that is free from form. I myself am declared to be the primordial Tathāgata of both existence and non-existence. The supreme one possessed of form and the formless, endowed with the Dharma of profound peace —

The great-hearted Heruka,
I who unite with no-self in union,
I who from great bliss am not inert,
I who in worldly conventional truth am inert.

Male and female and those between,
and all beings — I pervade completely.
Therefore the very name "the Gathered"
I, the ocean of Victors, have explained.

Those of the vajra and the bodhisattvas —
Is perfectly accomplished in the androgyne's place.
That goddess who is no-self —
she is the queen by intrinsic nature.
I am the buddha Heruka.
For that very reason she is the androgyne:
having seen the two realities of wandering beings,
through the yoga of skillful means and wisdom united with self,
in supreme union —
without movement, without sovereignty.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra, the abode of great bliss, the sacred intrinsic nature.

Then the Blessed One, the great hero Vajra-Desire, the great bliss, with supreme joy free from all limitations, declared these words:

Six-armed and adorned with seductiveness,
with a single face, bearing matted locks,
the sixteen fingers fully grown — Vajra Free of Limitations is perfected.
In the hero's right hand is the arrow itself;
in the second hand, the sword;
in the third, know it to be the mirror.
In the left hand is the bow itself;
in the second, the supreme of powers;
the branch of the kamkella tree —
these six hands are to be visualized.

Standing with the left foot extended,
imagining it placed upon the maiden's heart,
the vajra queen will be accomplished.
With the right hand press and pierce the milk vessel;
with the aśoka branch, anoint her heart;
with the sword make the maiden tremble;
then display the mirror;
with the bow bind her feet;
with the lotus-lasso draw her near.
With hair unbound, coming as she desires,
she speaks forth words of beauty.
She who produces the sounds "ha" and "si," joyful, adorned with perfectly measured limbs,
her mouth filled with tooth-reckonings —
imagine her as one drained of desire's force.
Through the practice of vajra offering,
with an unchanging mind, let longing follow.
Through the unaltered mantra of desire,
let her heart be stirred:

Om āmukā mākarṣaya mañjughoṣa hrīḥ jaḥ

By meditating in this way,
the queen of the gentle protector Mañjuśrī
will come to the practitioner with desire,
bringing him under sway, she will come.

Through the practice of the half-moon,
accomplished through the practice of ten thousand recitations,
the woman with shimmering golden earrings —
accomplish her with a mind of supreme joy.

Born from the seed syllable haṃ,
adorned entirely with ornaments,
through the supreme practice of drinking beer, accomplish Vajra Free of Limitations.

The supreme unaltered seed
has the nature of both bliss and suffering,
the supreme great bliss utterly at peace,

bringing joy to all sentient beings.
This is the great life-force itself,
the very beauty of supreme delight.
Bliss and suffering — always of that one is mindfulness thus supremely renowned.
Sorrow and attachment are likewise torments;
joy and joylessness are likewise so.
Vajrasattva, the great king —
that very one is declared as the sixth vowel.
Endowed with the full half-moon,
the head is to be honored with the drop.
This is the all-base of sentient beings,
the distinguishing feature of all tantras.

Then all the Tathāgatas, the Blessed Ones, having heard the Blessed One's vajra seed-syllable of the great awakening mind, with mind-accomplishment made clear and near, declared these words:

Without a bodhisattva, without meditation,
without mantra, without deity —
arising from the vajra of mind,
this is the sequential teaching of awakening.

With these words the Blessed One Vajra Pledge declared it so:

Without merit and without sin,
without awakening and without buddhahood —
through the practice of the five wisdoms,
the awakening mind is made firm.

With these words the Blessed One Wheel Pledge declared it so:

Without mantra, recitation does not exist;
the three destinies of wandering beings are entirely absent.
Through the intrinsic nature of the dharmadhātu,
with meditation and without meditation.

With these words the Blessed One Jewel Pledge declared it so:

At the conventional level, what is worldly does exist.
Yet when examined, where is the worldly to be found?
That which is perpetually worldly keeps on wandering.

This is the sequential teaching of awakening.

With these words the Blessed One Lotus Pledge declared it so:

Unborn and without object of focus,
indivisible, like space —
profound and of a peaceful intrinsic nature:
this is the sequential teaching of awakening.

With these words the Blessed One Sword Pledge declared it so:

Just as an illusion, just as a mirror,
just as space, just as bliss —
just so are all phenomena fully known.
This is the sequential teaching of awakening.

With these words the Blessed One, the ḍākinī Nairātmyā (Selfless One), declared it so:

Emptiness, immaculate, the supreme abode,
of the very nature of dream and illusion —
until it dissolves,
cultivate the intrinsic nature of mind.
This is Māmakī.

Without existence, without nirvāṇa —
this is great bliss, the vajra.
Whoever meditates upon it through the meditation of mind,
let them meditate upon it with the supreme meditation.
This is Locanā.

Mantra and syllable are entirely abandoned.
This is mind-free, without essence-drop.
This is the sacred great bliss —
neither diminishing nor filling.
This is Pāṇḍaravāsini.

Just as the nature of a reflection,
so should phenomena be meditated upon.
Emptiness, immaculate, the supreme abode —
that is beyond merit and sin.
This is Tārā.

Just as the moon in water —
neither true nor false —
so the nature of the maṇḍala circle's body is without confusion.

The entire retinue declared it so.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Variously Acting, Completely Victorious. From the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of that very absorption, this rain of arrows came forth:

With mutscha, diha, and serṇa,
grasping the handle of a bow, fist clenched,
with the left hand in the fist of desire,
by clenching thus, let the enemies be threatened.

Seizing with a coiling arm,
grasping the fist of the drawn weapon,
with HŪṂ let the arrow be released,
and let the maṇḍala of the māras be threatened.

When the knees are drawn in,
let the body be filled with breath.
Grasping the fist against the body,
let the chest be expanded.

Aim mind and gaze at the target,
with HŪṂ fill the mouth,
and through the application of extending the right arm and so forth, let Yama and the rākṣasas be slain.

What use is there in saying much here?
Briefly stated in conventional terms:
whatever is the root science of the bow —
that is the conduct of the Vajra-holder.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Sound of Vajra Music. From the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of the very grace of that musical sound, there arose:

Tha hi thiṃ hiṃ. Tha ka tha ka. Thu ka thu ka. Tho ho tho ho. Ba hi ba hi.
Diḍhaṃ diḍhaṃ. Kra ka kra ka. Tha ka tha ka. ḍi hi ḍi hi. Ta ḍa wa ta ḍa wa.

Cymbals and drum,
certain clay drums, the vīṇā played out fully,
the sweet-toned instrument and the flute,
the three-stringed karaṭaka —
let these be struck with triple beating.
Struck softly, it is victorious:
the offering to the maṇḍala and so forth —
this offering is unsurpassed.

What use is there in teaching one's own many verses here?
However many treatises there are on music,
all of that is the Sound of Vajra Music.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Vajra of Fine Fragrance. From the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of that very absorption, the offering of incense came forth:

Sandalwood, and saffron (kuṅkuma),
and rock-musk, and likewise tagara —
these substances are the great incense.

These are offered abundantly to Heruka.
Kacora and kumā,
and likewise the essence of kesara —
these harmful essences
are to be applied for benefit.

Altogether the first is ka,
the navel of the wild deer, and the nail —
this incense of the king of jewels bestows fearlessness upon all.

Kuṅkuma,
and the śaṭhī of śatrī,
and śālijī and śālikā —
this incense of the Protector of the World is always proclaimed by Vajradhara.
Especially among the varied fragrances,
from the offering of the Varied Vajra,
this offering to the King of the Seven
is accomplished through universal power.

However many treatises on fragrance there are,
the supreme incense of balls and portions —
all of that is renowned as the vajra offering of Vajrapāṇi.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Vajra Stride Beautifully Arrayed. From the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of that very absorption, this vajra dance came forth:

First, with reverence and with grace,
first with loving tenderness, following after —
with eight steps, according to the rite,
perform the play of the vajra stride.
With the gesture of a handful of flowers,
with the gesture of a branch of incense,
with the hand-manner of a torch stem,
with the body anointing upward,
with eye-gesture, and likewise the inner thigh,
and circling on the surface of the feet —
perform the play with the gesture of striking.
And likewise also with the left.

Then, having performed the continuing dance,
dance again with the left,
and with rapid striking, likewise dance,
revolving like a wheel.
Outside, let the four directions be made joyful;
outside, encircle with hands of desire.
Plant both knees upon the ground,
and make the offering-vessel excellent with the hands.
However many treatises on dance there are that describe the manner of performing — all of that is the method of Vajrasattva's grace for accomplishing awakening.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Vajra Pledge that Brings Delight. From the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of this very gaṇacakra, the following came forth:

Visualizing one's own supreme deity,
adorned fully with excellent ornaments,
visualizing all that is abundant,
pour oblations into the hearth in an inert place.
To the east, south, north, and west,
let the directional dwellers be gladdened.
To the goddesses in the non-directional quarters,
make offering with the sacred life-force.
Mentally conceived melted butter,
unbroken grain-fruits and fruit,
grain and curd-rice,
sesame, and likewise the wood of equal measure,
and young dūrvā grass —
offer these in the vajra meditative absorption fire-offering.

Now these are the mantra-lines for that:

Oṃ agnaye svāhā — for clarified butter.

Oṃ sarva-pāpaṃ dahana vajrāya vajrasattvasya sarva-pāpa-dāhanāya svāhā
— for black sesame.

Oṃ vajra-puṣṭaye svāhā — for unbroken fruit.

Oṃ sarva-sampadī svāhā — for excellent curd and rice.

Oṃ vajra-vijāya svāhā — for cooked grain.

Oṃ mahā-vegāya svāhā — for barley.

Oṃ mahā-balāya svāhā — for mon-beans and peas.

Oṃ vajra-ghasmarī svāhā — for chickpeas.

Oṃ vajra āmuṣe svāhā — for young dūrvā grass.

Oṃ vajrā-prati-hata pajvaya svāhā — for kuśa grass.

Oṃ vajra-yajñāya svāhā — for udumbara.

Oṃ bodhi-vṛkṣāya svāhā — for the bodhi tree.

Oṃ vajra-latāya svāhā — for palāśa.

Oṃ vajra-kuberā svāhā — for nyagrodha.

Oṃ ha-sa-karāya svāhā — for āmra.

Campaka, aśoka, nāga,
kadamba, and that which accomplishes existence —
having recited whichever is obtained, perform the fire-offering with these flowers.
Grapes, āmra, serpent-bane, khadira, newborn, and affectionate one —

in the excellent sequential order of the five wheels, perform the fire-offering of fruits.

The five meats and the nectars —

Through meditation on the five maṇḍalas,
the vajra is thereby pleased.
Let the fire of primordial wisdom be delighted.

The Victor who bestows benefit, pleased;
the Lord of Gold, pleased;
the Lotus Dance Lord, pleased;
the Master of the Iron Chains, pleased;
Brahmā, Śakra (Indra), the Great Lord,
Viṣṇu, Wind, and the Great Fire,
the Far-seeing One, the gods of desire,
Moon, Sun, and other malign forces,
Earth with her noose, the ill-bodied one,
and likewise the guardians of the quarters,
the Dharma King, the nāgas,
gandharvas, asuras, kinnaras,
the gods dwelling in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three,
those dwelling in Akaniṣṭha,
those dwelling in the realm of Paranirmitavaśavartin,
those of Nirmāṇarati,
those of the Tuṣita pure abode,
those dwelling in the world-realm of Prabhā,
those dwelling in the realm Abhīra,
sentient beings dwelling on the four continents,
those dwelling in the three realms,
sentient beings of the vessel-world,
the assembly of grasses and vegetation,
those dwelling in the ground of supreme joy,
those who have reached the pure far shore,
those dwelling in the radiant realm,
those placed in the immovable ground,
those who have followed the Dharma Cloud,
those who have reached white purity,
those who have attained the long-gone,

and those dwelling in the light-making ground —
the lord and protector possessed of sovereignty over the ten grounds,
the eight noble persons,
the fully awakened buddhas and the śrāvakas,
and those whose form is that of horn and sword —
all these I join to my own supreme deity.

Having pleased Śākyasiṃha,
the hells, the hungry ghosts, the animals,
the gods, the asuras, and human beings —
all are made joyful through the rite of the fire-offering.
That itself is the maṇḍala of the assembly.

This is the meditative absorption called Vajra, the Great Ocean of the Accumulations of Merit and Primordial Wisdom.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption in the meditative absorption called Vajra, the Compassionate Following of All Tathāgatas, and declared this petition to the samaya:

Generating Vajrasattva:
meditate upon the vajra-lotus.
At the tip of its head, a wish-fulfilling jewel — homage to it.
Within the hollow, by means of PHAṬ,
the primordial wisdom remains, unfallen, rightly abiding.
May the fully awakened buddhas be pleased.

This is from the rite of mudrā:
by joining to one's own supreme deity,
having pleased Vajrasattva,
accomplish every ground.

Remaining in the ground of the great mudrā,
by joining the self to one's own supreme deity,
having pleased Śākyasiṃha,
one will attain all sovereignties.

Remaining in the ground of the action mudrā (karma-mudrā),
by joining the self to one's own supreme deity,
one will attain sovereignty over all.

Possessed of the samādhi of vajra-splendor,
by means of the samaya mudrā and its joining,
accomplish also the three grounds.

By joining the self to one's own supreme deity,
I, the Lord of the Lotus Dance, abide in the samādhi of the Dharma mudrā —
meditate upon the Vajra Dharma.

By joining the self to one's own supreme deity,
abiding in stages upon the supreme chariot,
by means of joining to the samaya mudrā,
supremely accomplish the attainment of Tārā.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption in the meditative absorption called the Vajra Dance That Enacts Desire, and drew forth the body, speech, and mind vajras of the very identity of the Vajra Dance Master.

The extension of the left, the extension of the right, the equal stance, the vajra stance, the maṇḍala stance, the stance of all variety, the tortoise stance, the honeybee-net stance, the ocean-motion stance, the supreme mountain stance, the beautiful step, and the wrathful step — these are the displays of dance stances.

The manner of the sword, the manner of the wheel, the manner of the precious jewel, the lotus hand, the manner of the sword, the manner of the lance, the manner of the bow, the manner of the staff, the manner of the club, the manner of the pestle, and the manner of the single-pointed vajra —

the manner of the ten-faced, the manner of the sword-maiden, the manner of the variegated staff, the manner of the short lance, the manner of cradling a ball, the two-pronged sling, the three-pronged sling, the manner of flowers, the manner of incense, the manner of the butter lamp, the manner of perfume, the hand of the lāśya, the hand of the garland, the hand of song, the hand of dance, the hand of the flute, the hand of the lute, the hand of the clay drum, and the hand of the kumunda — these are the displays of hand gestures.

The vajra cross-legged posture, the lotus cross-legged posture, the lotus seated posture, the noble seated posture, the half-cross-legged posture, and the auspicious seated posture — these are the displays of seated postures.

The tone of elegance, the tone of the hero, the tone of the disagreeable, the tone of laughter, the tone of the fierce, the tone of the terrifying, the tone of the peaceful, the tone of the haughty, the tone of compassion, the song following the six, the song in the wake of the seers, the song in the wake of the gandharvas, the song in the wake of the intermediary, the song of the fifth sequence, the song of the clear-minded, and the song heard by the retinue.

The distinction of the sparse, the distinction of Tārā, the distinction of dissolution, the full, the half-outward, the mingled, that which makes two desires equal, that which makes three desires equal, the seeking of the uvula, the seeking of the shin, the seeking of the tongue, and the seeking of the teeth — these are the displays of song.

When the ground is entirely grasped, at that time
this samaya is to be excellently urged.

Let this be performed by one who holds the vajra of wisdom.
This is the supreme among the successive samayas.

These flowers are good and wholesome,
born of virtue from a pure place of birth.
I offer them with faith;
please accept them and be pleased with me.

The benefit of pure flavors, of groves,
and whatever is the finest fragrance and incense —
I offer them with faith;
please accept them and be pleased with me.

That which destroys rākṣasas and purifies,
which is wholesome and dispels all darkness —
I offer them with faith;
please accept them and be pleased with me.

This is fine fragrance and virtue,
pure, arising from a pure place of birth.
I offer it with faith;
please accept it and be pleased with me.

Oṃ vajra ghaṇṭe āḥ — this is the mantra for taking up the bell.

Oṃ mahāvajro hūṃ — this is the mantra for holding the vajra.

This is the fourteenth chapter, the chapter on the detailed classification of various entities.

Then the king who holds the vajra, within the vajra tent of the yoginī, spoke these words to all the buddhas and to the Buddha:

With two hands and a single face,
born of the vajra, bearing its very nature,
skull-cup and khaṭvāṅga in hand — contemplate this, delight in it, and recite.

Again, with four hands,
three faces, arisen from the vajra,
white, red, and likewise blue —
in union together with the sow consort.

With six hands, dark of color,
in union together with the iron-chained one,
wearing the skulls of the five buddhas,
with three faces, one should enter into union.

Red of complexion, with four hands,
one face — the fire-wielding goddess,
she who presses upon the abode of vajra and Dharma:
she is to be called Kurukullā.
This is the recitation of the mantra.

The queen who abides in the Dharma —
in your presence, I, at one and the same time, having myself heard this,
explain it fully and extensively.

Thus did I hear, at one time, on a single occasion.
In the presence of the Blessed One,
through the full unfolding of the queen's Dharma,
the manner of gazing, the gesture of drawing in, the great sign,
the time for accomplishing the aim, the rains and so forth,
born from the very suchness of the path —

The great Sage (Śākyamuni), protector of the world,
with two hands and a single face,
adorned with the supreme-giving gesture and the lotus,
abides perfectly upon a lotus throne.
His crown-ornament is endowed with the vajra and the Dharma,
born from the very suchness of the syllable MĀṂ.

Mañjuśrī is golden,
his limbs adorned with the utpala lotus and the supreme-giving gesture, bearing Akṣobhya's vajra upon his crown,
arisen from the wisdom of HŪṢ.
His hand holds a sword with the threatening gesture of the index finger.
Behind the great buffalo
he stands with his left leg extended, fierce in form, inspiring awe.
Before him, with joined palms, Akṣobhya is held,
arisen from the wisdom of HŪṢ.
He who makes the vajra-HŪṢ, the vajra-holder,
through the union of the vajra and bell,
forms the mudrā with both hands,
his left leg extended,
his body pressing down upon the terrifier.
Meditating upon the vajra family at the crown of the head,
one should call to mind the Victor over the three worlds,
arisen from the syllable TVĀṢ.
Supreme in giving, supreme in power, bearing a weapon,
like unto the fifth goddess,
ever abiding in an auspicious posture,
seated perfectly upon a multicolored lotus throne,
holding Amoghapāśa at the crown,
the great and gracious one, the fortunate one:
she is to be meditated upon in the form of Tārā, arisen from the syllable MĀṢ.
She who holds the supreme-giving Aśoka branch,
like the rising sun,
with the splendor of Vairocana born at her crown,
through the posture of the left leg extended,
pressing down the chariot of the swift-moving seven,
her limbs adorned with graceful flavor:
she who is possessed of rays of light is to be meditated upon,
arisen from the syllable TSŪṢ.
With the radiance of an autumn moon,
she abides at the heart, bearing a gathered jewel,

seated perfectly in a beautiful manner,
the goddess of the variegated lotus throne,
pressing the head with beneficence,
her bodhicitta dripping and flowing:
meditate upon the goddess who is free of exertion,
arisen from the syllable BĀṂ.

She who holds wealth, of exceedingly yellow color,
her hand in the supreme-giving gesture holding a sheaf of grain,
seated in the vajra cross-legged posture,
her limbs adorned with the source of jewels:
with eyes exceedingly beautiful to behold,
meditate upon the Queen of the Yakṣas.
One will become equal to the lord of wealth,
arisen from the syllable JĀṂ.

Meditate upon her known as Ākāśakośa, Treasure of the Sky, yellow in color, and on her right
the supreme-giving wish-fulfilling gem,
the vajra that is the source of jewels,
her crown magnificently adorned with the maṇḍala.
Visualize a rain of jewels.
Whatever remains is to be immersed in the vajra stream, arisen from the syllable PRĀṂ.

Her body is white and pleasing to the mind,
the goddess holding the wheel of swords,
her crown pressed upon with beneficence.
Like the time of one's elder brother,
she abides perfectly in the seat of the maṇḍala.
Meditate and fully imagine the gentle voice of Mañjuśrī arising from the sphere of space.

Thereupon the Blessed One, the Great Vajra-Holder, entered into meditative absorption called the samādhi of the vajra that internalizes the many mantras, and in that state made these mantra syllables perfectly clear:

Oṃ maṇi padme hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.
Oṃ mañjuya muḥ svāhā.

Oṃ hrīḥ śkrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.
Oṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.
Oṃ tāre tuttāre ture svāhā.
Oṃ māre cyai māṃ svāhā.
Oṃ cale cule cunde svāhā.
Oṃ vāsudhāre mahāvāsu pṛṣṭhi pāhani vāsu svāhā.
Oṃ jambhala jalendrāya svāhā.
Oṃ maṇi dhari vajriṇi mahāpratisare hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The protector of the world pacifies all illness.
Mañjuśrī bestows excellence of intellect.
Yamāntaka protects from hungry ghosts.
He who makes HŪṂ governs the gods and the demigods.
Tārā brings the world under control.
The Goddess of Rays destroys thieves.
Cundā draws all sentient beings in:
she is invoked in the rite of magnetizing.
Jambhala and the lord who bestows wealth
are held to be the means for accomplishing riches.
For any woman who has lost a child,
she should individually, constantly, and persistently call her to mind.

This was spoken by the vajra ḍākinī. Through the feet of the mantra, all is accomplished. Through the practice of a hundred thousand recitations, all activities are thoroughly accomplished. This is the meditative absorption called "Arousing the Joy of the Heart."

Then the Blessed One drew forth this very sādhana of the Great Black Vajra — its body vajra, speech vajra, and mind vajra. Born from the syllable HŪṂ, it has two hands and one face. Its color is black and it blazes intensely. It holds a hooked knife and a skull cup. It wears a garland of heads as a necklace. With great fangs it strikes terror. Its form is short yet of tremendous splendor. From its mouth blood drips. Whoever constantly bears hatred toward the teacher, whoever is enraged against the Three Jewels, whoever kills many sentient beings — the Great Black One devours them. With his own right hand he cuts flesh. He drinks a stream of blood. Then, having settled upon the crown of the head, he cuts it to the size of a sesame seed.

With black mustard seeds, a spiked fruit, and jambī plant, with flowers, incense, unguents, beer, the five meats, and nectar, one offers a torma to the Great Black One.

The mantra is: Om śrī mahākālāya śāsanopaghāriṇe eṣa apaścimakālo ayamidaṃ ratnatrayāpakāriṇa yaṃ dipratigjñāṃ smarasi tadā idaṃ duṣṭaṃ kha kha khāhi khāhi māra māra gr̥ṇa gr̥ṇa bandha bandha hana hana daha daha paca paca dina mekena hūṃ phaṭ hūṃ.

Having made an image from three roots, fill the body with thorns. Having inscribed it with poison and sinew, then in the name of that person, burn it in fire. At that time the person will vanish.

Then, further thoroughly explained: meditating upon the accomplishment of the mudrā — the accomplishment of the mudrā is the great siddhi, and it is not the domain of practice of all siddhis. At that time one attains that very body, and in an instant the manner of great bliss. In an instant one has that retinue. Through meditation and mantra, in an instant the buddha Vairocana gazes upon one with his eyes and embraces one. In an instant one is endowed with non-duality. Supreme great joy, highest delight. In an instant the King Vajradhara binds together with Māmakī in bliss. Through the veneration of the tip of the vajra lotus, in an instant one is endowed with non-duality. Through the thorough joining of vajra and lotus, go to the further shore of vajra devotion. The vajra lotus is to be venerated and the desire of the lotus is to be relinquished. Having conceived of oneself as one's own self, through the thorough joining of vajra and lotus, worship the greatly renowned vajra maiden in the manner of the Black Vajra. Having conceived of the self-arisen man, through veneration of the tip of the vajra lotus, worship that maiden who is the supreme Tathāgatā, for the sake of the accomplishment of the mudrā. Conceive of the person of one's own wisdom consort. Through veneration of the tip of the vajra lotus, worship the one born from the great outcaste, for the sake of the accomplishment of the mudrā.

The perfecting of the great mudrā — this is the meditative absorption called "the Vajra of the Power of Thorough Victory." It will be accomplished in one day. Through the rite of two days, through the practice of three days, and likewise four days, through the practice of five days it will be accomplished — of this there is no doubt. Having made offerings of flowers and the like and seated in the abode of meditation, having entered together with the mudrā, properly commence the vajra joining. When the vajra sun sets, properly commence this practice. At the time the sun rises, it will be accomplished — of this there is no doubt.

Attended by great attachment, and from the nature of great attachment, remaining in the meditative absorption of great desire, perfecting the great mudrā — this is the meditative absorption called "the Vajra of Utter Delight."

Having inserted the vajra into the lotus and taken one's wisdom consort as one's self, together with her it will be accomplished. This is declared to be the great mudrā.

Having taken up the mudrā of a human woman —

With respect to that, perfectly open the wheel, and having harmonized it with fragrance and flowers, rightly begin the practice of familiarizing oneself with the wheel. Lochanā, Lady Tārā, and the White One, supremely enchanting — having harmonized them with flowers and fragrance, rightly commence the vajra offering. The mantra practitioner will accomplish what is beneficial: the accomplishment of Vajrapāṇi, the accomplishment of Vajra Sun, the accomplishment of the sacred syllable, the accomplishment of the King of the Seventh, and the accomplishment of the Guide of All will be attained.

The water empowerment is the first. The crown empowerment is the second. The vajra empowerment is the third. The empowerment of one's own sovereign is the fourth. The bestowal of the name empowerment is the fifth. The sixth is the state of complete buddhahood. The seventh is by the vase empowerment. The eighth is the secret empowerment. The ninth proceeds from the wisdom empowerment. By the vajra union of that very suchness, one proclaims the conduct of the suchness of all. The Teacher himself has prophesied it: this herein is the ritual of empowerment.

This is the meditative absorption called "A Brief Exposition of the Complete Avoidance of Root Downfalls."

One must not disparage the master. One must not transgress the word of the Sugata. One must not disparage one's vajra-siblings. Toward sentient beings, one must not abandon malice-overcoming love, nor must one abandon the awakening mind. One must not disparage the Dharma of oneself or others. One must not speak of suchness to those without the karmic lot. One must not disparage sentient beings who do have the karmic lot. One must not disparage even one's own body. One must not be of two minds regarding the Dharma, nor direct loving-kindness toward the malicious. One must not grasp at limits as the measure of the nature of reality. One must always protect one's sacred commitments (samaya), and not disparage the Dharma of others. One must not disparage women either.

Until the essence of awakening is reached, one must not abandon the Three Jewels. One must always guard one's sacred commitments. One must hold the vajra and bell. One must always hold the uṣṇīṣa. One must always fill the fire-offering. One must always erect the maṇḍala. One must always cause the Sugata to truly reside. Offer tormas to the great elemental spirits. Completely abandon the binding of mudrā, and do not engage in acts pertaining to stūpas. Do not bow to the supreme three vajras. The physical acts pertaining to the maṇḍala and so forth — do not perform them even in dreams. Do not bow to another master. Pay homage to the elders of one's lama. Continually and without interruption recite mantra, and do not be separated from meditative concentration. Always gather disciples, and teach constantly. Always care for sentient beings. Always greatly delight the buddhas. Offer water to Jambhala. Perform all activities perfectly. Even with respect to the activities of a sand stūpa, the skilled one should act in accordance with the ritual.

Then the Blessed One, upon all bodhisattvas, all female messenger-consorts, and all Tathāgatas hearing this "Vajra Certain Proclamation," spoke these words:

You who are everything to all sentient beings,
who purify every evil and wrongdoing,
who fully realize all phenomena —
homage and praise to the Vajra Ḍākinī.

Seeing beings oppressed by aversion,
in order to exhaust all delusion — Victor, Protector, Vairocana:
homage and praise to the Vajra of Delusion.

Seeing beings — women — to be tamed,
she who has become the yoginī of no-self:
homage to the master of the perfections,
homage and praise to the Mudrā of Illusion.

Seeing beings oppressed by delusion,
who exhausts all delusion — Vajrasattva, Great King:
homage and praise to the Vajra of Aversion.

Seeing beings oppressed by pride,
who exhausts all pride —
Vajra Sun, Great King:
homage and praise to the Vajra of Attachment.

Seeing beings oppressed by attachment,
who exhausts all attachment —
Hayagrīva, Great King —

Seeing beings oppressed by envy,
who exhausts all envy —
Great King, King of the Seven,
All-Seeing One: homage and praise to the Vajra of Envy.

Then all the bodhisattvas addressed their petition to the Blessed One, to all the Tathāgatas: "Blessed One, all the Tathāgatas — how are we to regard the master who confers the empowerment of glorious Hevajra?" The Tathāgata declared:

The master who has become the Teacher is revered by all the buddhas.
As our own father and mother —
just so should one hold this in mind.

And why is that? The Tathāgata declared:

The attainments of Vajrasattva the buddha,
of Vajra Dharma and of Splendor, and of the King of the Seven —
all these he bestows without difficulty:
eye-medicine and foot-anointing,
the sword, the accomplishment beneath the feet,
the pill, sky-faring,
invisibility, and the taking of essences.
Because by pleasing the Vajra of Wisdom
one swiftly comes to attain them —
therefore one goes before the master and the Tathāgatas bow to him.

Just as Vajrasattva truly is,
so does the master take on form,
keeping beings in his sight and care,

dwelling in the guise of an ordinary person.

When at last the time comes,
death — the passing from the world —
a foolish and deluded man who is born will say of this one: "He has died."
But by the conceptual thought called "death,"
one is carried to a pure realm,
or else, assured of Sukhāvatī,
one is born in the family of desire.

Holding various flowers in hand,
anointing with various victory-banners,
with offerings of various songs,
together with the sons of the buddhas and the vajra-holders,
with various sounds and great music,
with various auspicious verses,
one passes from body to another body
through the very seats of empowerment.

Placing the vajra bell in the hand,
pressing it upon the crown of the head,
bestowing the vajra vow,
and then conferring the vase empowerment —
in the eye and in the other sense-faculties, delusion and the rest:
the three vajras are to be established in the three places.
By thoroughly joining with the vajra hearth,
purification is properly taught.

On the third day of the bright fortnight,
the garland of bones is to be gathered.
With milk, sweet fragrance, fumigation, and tormā-offering,
a proper reliquary for him is to be erected.

When the Blessed One had spoken these words, that entire retinue, together with the gods, humans, asuras, and gandharvas, rejoiced in the world, and were filled with delight at what the Blessed One had taught.

The noble tantra king called "The Vajra Tent — A Net of Ḍākinīs," its examination, is complete.

This was translated by the Indian master Gayādhara and the translator, the monk Śākya Yeshe.

Translator's Notes

- The passage opens with the bilingual colophon standard to Kangyur texts, giving first the Sanskrit title and then the Tibetan. The Sanskrit title Āryaḍākinīvajrapaṇjaramahātantrarājakaḷpanāma corresponds exactly to the Tibetan. The text is the famous Vajrapaṇjara Tantra, one of the explanatory tantras of the Hevajra cycle.

The long opening catalogue in verse is a list of dyads, numerals, and doctrinal categories that serve as a kind of praise through enumeration of the Vajra Tent's all-encompassing scope. Several items in this list are deliberately elliptical and tantrically encoded; the renderings given follow the most plausible grammatical and doctrinal readings, though complete certainty on every item is not possible.

The figure rendered "sole lord of gods" translates a phrase that could also be read as "single lord of the divine," referring to the tantric deity as the supreme sovereign.

"One short of twenty" renders a phrase meaning nineteen, likely enumerating a set of ḍākinī figures.

The names Ghasmarī, Bukkaṣī, Lāsyā, and several others are left in their Sanskrit or tantric form as they are proper names of specific maṇḍala deities whose translation would be misleading.

The final line "Exceedingly dense and fierce" ends mid-sentence in the source passage as given; the translation renders it accordingly.

- The section beginning "Then Vajra Obtained the Three Realms" opens a new chapter concerned with ritual offerings and their assignments to specific tantric deities. The rapid enumeration of deities paired with substances, measurements, and activities follows a standard Vajrayāna liturgical format; the correspondences are technical and some pairings are compressed enough that the Tibetan itself reads as formulaic shorthand. The phrase rendered "Vajra Obtained the Three Realms" is a chapter or section marker whose precise syntactic sense is slightly opaque; it likely designates Vajrapāṇi or a vajra-deity as "obtainer" or "conqueror of the three realms," but the line functions as a heading.

The phrase "write similarly upon the finest jewel" (rendered from विरचितं श्रेष्ठे वज्रसिंहे) involves वज्रसिंहे, a probable transliteration of Sanskrit hīrā or hīraka meaning "diamond" or "finest gem"; rendered accordingly.

- The passage contains a mantra in transliterated Sanskrit that has been rendered phonetically as closely as possible to standard reconstructed Sanskrit. The original is given in Tibetan phonetic transliteration and some syllables are metrically irregular or corrupt, which is not uncommon in tantric dhāranī passages.

The phrase rendered "the deer-adorned one who has eaten" is cryptic in context; the Tibetan literally means "adorned with deer, having eaten," which may refer to a conventional epithet of Śiva or to a buddha figure in this ritual-classificatory list. The list as a whole appears to be an enumeration of buddha-aspects using symbolic attributes.

"Vajra Kyoba" transliterates a Tibetan term that may mean "Vajra Bent" or "Vajra Crooked" and is left in near-transliteration as it functions as a proper name of a dākinī.

"Ghasmarī" is a Sanskrit name of one of the four ḍākinī goddesses well-known in Cakrasaṃvara literature, and is kept in Sanskrit accordingly.

- The passage enumerates the five hundred thousand sections of the Vajra Tent tantra and assigns them to named deities and topics. The exact referents of some of the shorter numerical assignments in the verse are ambiguous — the series "five for the great flourishing of activities / five for the Buddha Dancer himself" reads somewhat telegraphically in the Tibetan, and different commentarial traditions may construe the arithmetic differently.

The dialogue of the sidelong-eyed goddess constitutes a ritual inversion or "pledge-challenge" sequence well known in ḍākinī tantras, where wrathful feminine figures test or rebuke male tantric figures as part of a soteriological drama. The phrase rendered "Tārā of the Sidelong Glance" (Zur mig Sgrol ma) is a specific Tārā manifestation name and has been kept in translation accordingly.

"Vasumati" for Nor Idan dpal is a reasonable Sanskrit reconstruction but not established from a parallel Sanskrit witness for this passage.

- The lāsyā mentioned in the dance section is one of the eight offering goddesses of the tantric tradition associated with sensuous gesture and dance; it is left untranslated as a technical term.

The figure names "the female thief," "the female zombie," and "Ghasmarī" refer to wrathful female tantric deities of the maṇḍala, associated with specific ritual functions of binding and controlling elemental spirits. Ghasmarī is one of the four ḍākinīs or gate-goddesses in certain Vajrayāna maṇḍala systems.

The passage "those who move by force" renders a Tibetan term for a category of powerful elemental beings or spirits characterized by forceful movement; its exact identity in context is genuinely uncertain.

- The list of names in the verse section presents a densely compressed catalogue of tantric deity epithets, many of which function as proper names rather than translatable titles; these have been rendered as literally as Tibetan allows while preserving readability. "Vajra Ārali" and "the Withering Wrathful One" render rdo rje ār li and skems pa'i khro bo respectively; ār li appears to be a transliteration of a Sanskrit deity name (possibly Ārali or a related form) rather than a translatable Tibetan word. "Yamāntaka" renders gshin rje'i gshed, literally "the slayer of Yama, lord of the dead." "Lord of Hammers" renders tho ba'i dbang phyug, literally "the mighty lord of the hammer/thunderbolt," possibly an epithet of Indra or a related wrathful deity in this context. "Vajra Ema-o Bliss Lady" preserves the exclamatory syllable e-ma-o as a phonetic element within the name, since it does not resolve to a standard translatable term.

- The list of thirty tantras presents a known textual crux: the verse says "counting without the thirty-first, makes thirty," which is a literal rendering of the Tibetan and reflects a scribal or versification difficulty in the source. The traditional understanding is that the Tantra of the Lord of Dance is the thirtieth in the series; the phrase gestures at a numbering anomaly that commentators address variously.

The term rendered "Nairātmyā" (sixteenth tantra) refers to the goddess Nairātmyā, consort of Hevajra, whose name means "she who is without self," a personification of selflessness.

"Hūṃkāra" (eighteenth) and "Yamāntaka" (seventeenth) are tantric deity-cycles. "Sarasvatī" is the goddess of speech and arts, here named in a tantric context.

The phrase rendered as "dual drinkers and the rest" for the skull-cup contents on the right is compressed in the Tibetan and the precise referents of the enumeration are not fully transparent; the translation follows the most natural syntactic reading.

The closing lines describe two classes of ḍākinīs: earth-wanderers and sky-wanderers; the passage breaks off here mid-enumeration.

- The name "Ghasmarī" is a Sanskrit name of one of the four inner offering goddesses in this tantric context; it is left in its Sanskrit form as a proper name with no Tibetan equivalent rendering required.

The phrase rendered "the lotus of the born one, split asunder without break, through the first churning and the second churning" is a passage of deliberately veiled tantric language referring to sexual yogic practices; the rendering follows the literal sense of the Tibetan without further explication, as is standard for public-facing translation of such material.

The mantra strings are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan with only minor normalization; their internal Sanskrit is partially garbled in the Tibetan transmission and has not been emended.

- The phrase rendered "one's own wisdom-consort" translates rang gi rig ma, literally "one's own vidyā-woman" or "one's own knowledge-consort." In this tantric ritual context rig ma refers to the practitioner's consort or vidyā, and the double occurrence of this term in two adjacent sections is deliberate and consistent. The phrase skyes bu bdag in the second verse is read in apposition: "one's own being" or "oneself as the being."

The section on summoning maidens, binding asuras and nāga women, and making a woman "one's companion" reflects a class of subjugation and attraction rites common to this stratum of early Indian tantra; these are presented here as literal ritual instructions within the text.

- The phrase rendered "Vajra Vairocana" translates the Tibetan compound rdo rje rnam snang, which joins vajra with the name Vairocana; this pairing functions as a tantric epithet of Vairocana throughout this text and has been rendered consistently.

The line rendered "the Blessed One, Desire itself, the Vajra Dharma, the Tathāgata" reflects a tantric identification of Amitābha with the buddha of the desire-vajra and Dharma families; the phrasing is deliberately dense and doctrinal.

"Horse King of Meaningful Accomplishment" renders rta yi don yod, combining the Horse King figure with Amoghasiddhi's epithet "Meaningful Accomplishment"; this is a tantric composite name within the five-buddha maṇḍala system.

"Dark blue" renders btsod, literally the dye-plant indigo or madder; in maṇḍala colour-coding this conventionally indicates the dark-blue or black of the northern direction associated with Amoghasiddhi.

- The section listing animals, birds, disease-names, planetary spirits, and divine figures in paired groups constitutes a technical maṇḍala assignment register, correlating specific beings and ailments with directional positions in the condensed maṇḍala. Several of the animal and bird names are archaic or dialectal and their precise identifications are uncertain; for example, the terms rendered "water-bird," "the powerful mover," "the conch-keeper," "the Hormo," and "the Olwa" represent the closest readable English approximations of obscure Tibetan terms whose Sanskrit equivalents are not recoverable from context alone.

The passage "the buddha takes on disease beginning with that of the elephant" is doctrinally notable: it presents the meditating practitioner as a vessel through whom the buddha absorbs or neutralizes disease on behalf of sentient beings.

The phrase rendered "no feebleness of mind" translates a term that literally suggests absence of something like mental incapacity or dullness; the exact nuance of the corresponding Sanskrit is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "the king of Dharma, great delusion" follows the Tibetan literally, where delusion (moha) appears as a transformed, transmuted principle functioning as a "king" in the tantric context — consistent with the preceding passage's reference to "the king of aversion." These are likely code-language or intentional inversion formulas standard in this genre of tantra, where afflictions appear in their transmuted, wisdom aspect.

The term "Amogha" appears twice as part of compound epithets referring to Amoghasiddhi or the Amogha-family principle; this is the most natural reading in context.

The list of materials — rudrakṣa, conch, tortoiseshell, lotus-fruit, pearl, coral — appears to be a list of substances used in mantra-recitation practice, possibly as rosary or ritual materials. The rendering follows the most straightforward reading.

- The mantric syllables are preserved as they appear in the Tibetan transliteration, with only light normalization to standard Sanskrit romanization; the Tibetan text shows some variation in spelling across the five mantra declarations, and the rendered Sanskrit reflects the most plausible standard form of each. The epithet translated "Vajra-Uttaramukhāśva" for འཇམ་དཔལ་འཁོར་ལོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ ("Vajra Supreme Horse") corresponds to the Buddha Amoghasiddhi's sphere in some maṇḍala systems but is here named differently; this may reflect a non-standard or text-specific Buddha-name, and the literal rendering is used. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with a section break in the source; the translation breaks at the same point.
- The passage is from a Vajrayāna tantra, likely the Hevajra Tantra (Kye rdor rgyud), and much of the content is deliberately encoded in tantric twilight language (sandhābhāṣā). Several passages involving the syllables GA, HA, and ŚWA, and the enumeration of body substances as buddhas, follow standard Hevajra commentarial conventions; no significant doctrinal distortion arises from the rendering given.

The phrase rendered "the King of Seven" for འཇམ་དཔལ་འཁོར་ལོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ in the context of འཇམ་དཔལ་འཁོར་ལོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ is a compressed tantric reference whose precise referent is uncertain without a root commentary; it may denote Mañjuśrī or a specific buddha counted as the seventh in an enumeration.

The name Pukkasī and Gaurī are tantric ḍākinī figures standard to the Hevajra system; they are kept in their Sanskrit forms.

The closing dedication formula confirms this is the end of chapter seven of the tantra in question.

- The phrase rendered "fierce one" in the opening line translates a term for a wrathful or terrifying female figure, consistent with the preceding invocations of the Gaurī goddesses; the text continues the series of invocations of tantric goddess-figures.

The simile of the mongoose is a well-attested Indic image for the skilled physician drawing out venom; the comparison is that just as a snake-charmer uses the mongoose to counter snake-venom, the skilled teacher uses the very affliction as the antidote. The underlying Tibetan is compressed and the exact application of the simile is elliptical in the source.

The mantra phrase "maṃ maṃ" at the opening of the visualization verse is a seed-syllable marker used to denote the center of the maṇḍala; it has been retained and clarified.

The phrase "bringing attachment to its ultimate end" renders a reading in which the realized practitioner has consummated and thereby transcended attachment, a standard Vajrayāna antinomial formulation rather than a nihilistic one.

- The passage includes several Sanskrit mantra strings that are transliterated from Tibetan phonetic renderings; some syllables are non-standard or corrupt, and the transliterations are rendered as faithfully as the Tibetan permits. The term rendered "third station" for འཇམ་དཔལ་འཁོར་ལོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ likely refers to the third of a set of ritual placements or stations within the maṇḍala, though the precise referent depends on the larger context of the text.

The plant and ingredient names in the fire-offering section include some uncertain identifications. The term རྒྱུ་མུག་ (grease, possibly animal fat or a fatty substance) and རྒྱུ་མུག་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ (seeds of a pungent or heating plant, possibly bdellium or a related resin) are rendered by context; precise botanical identification is uncertain.

The mantra Om täre tuttäre ture amukī māme prasitaṃ svapnakathaya hūṃ phaṭ appears to be a dream-oracle or dream-invocation formula; svapnakathaya suggests "tell in a dream," consistent with a rite for causing a desired woman to appear or communicate in a dream.

- Several phrases in this passage present genuine difficulties. The expressions rendered as "Vajrasūrya," "Vajradharmas," and "Vajratumba" correspond to Tibetan rdo rje nyi ma, rdo rje chos, and rdo rje rta mchog respectively; the last of these literally means "Vajra Supreme Horse" and may refer to Vajrahaya or a related tantric figure. These are likely names of specific incense substances, deities, or ritual agents whose precise identity is uncertain without a parallel Sanskrit witness.

The phrase rendered "Lord of the Dance of the Lotus" corresponds to pad ma gar gyi dbang phyug, which could also be rendered "the Powerful Lord of the Lotus Dance," possibly referring to Padmanṛteśvara, a form of Śiva or a related deity.

The phrase translated "together with the ash" is uncertain as to what ash is intended; the context suggests the ash produced from the arka stalk mentioned earlier.

The phrase "the filth of the leather pouch" renders a highly obscure expression; the meaning of the ritual action here is uncertain.

The self-imprecation "may I be one who has slain the buddhas, the Blessed Ones" is a strong oath-formula guaranteeing the efficacy of the ritual, not a doctrinal claim.

- The phrase rendered "one who is gladdened at the sight of one possessed of form" renders a line that may refer to delight upon seeing a qualified form or a person possessing physical marks of a deity; the precise referent is ambiguous in the tantric context but has been translated literally.

The expression "Vajra Tent" refers to the Vajrapañjara, a well-known tantra, here appearing as an authoritative source for the instruction on guru-devotion.

The "lāsyā" offerings are the Tantric offering-goddess associated with graceful dance and gesture; the term is left in Sanskrit as it is a technical ritual term with no adequate English equivalent.

The "last rite" in the final verse refers to the abhicāra, the wrathful or destructive ritual action — a standard fourfold tantric schema of white-pacification, yellow-enrichment, red-power, and black-destruction.

- The passage is a section of the Hevajra Tantra. Several segments are dense with tantric technical terminology and the translation preserves the doctrinal sense of the tradition. The phrase rendered "the vajra of Hevajra is hereby opened" reflects the Tibetan "Kye'i rdo rje rab phyé ba" — "Kye" being a vocative particle that forms part of the deity-name Hevajra; the passage likely signals a formal opening or revelation of the Hevajra teaching.

The final lines describing "some with a decaying body" and "the great obstructors at the eight spokes of the wheel" are syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan as given; the passage breaks off mid-sentence. This is noted so that the listener or editor understands the text is cut off at this point rather than fully resolved.

- The opening verses appear to be a continuation of technical instructions for maṇḍala construction, likely from a Kriyā or Caryā tantra, specifying proportions for drawing the ground plan using measurement units relative to the gate. The rendering "Vedic cord" for rig byed reflects its Sanskrit referent, a measuring cord (Sanskrit: ṛgvedic, or more likely a cord system called by a Sanskritic name). The term could alternatively refer to a braided measurement cord called the "Rgveda cord" in architectural manuals; the rendering is approximate.

The Sanskrit mantras embedded in the Tibetan are transliterated with some orthographic irregularities in the original; they have been reproduced as they appear without normalisation, to preserve the ritual text's integrity.

The śarabha is a mythical eight-legged creature of Indian lore, stronger than a lion, used here as a directional symbol in the maṇḍala ground drawing.

"The eight offerings, Lāsyā and the rest" refers to the standard group of eight offering goddesses beginning with Lāsyā; these are not translated but left by name as they are technical tantric designations.

- The passage contains a series of ritual mantras at the opening, left in Sanskrit as they appear in the Tibetan in transliterated form. These are standard invocations of the six families of wrathful goddesses associated with the rāga, vajra, and ghasmarī groupings.

The phrase rendered "Vajra Vairocana" follows the Tibetan rdo rje rnam snang, which literally means "Vajra Vairocana," naming a wrathful emanation of Vairocana in the mātr̥ maṇḍala context rather than the buddha Vairocana himself.

The instruction "Vajrasattva is to be slain" reflects a standard tantric threatening-ritual idiom, in which the practitioner ritually coerces the deity to bestow accomplishment; it is not a literal injunction.

- The phrase rendered "Śrī Lokasāmbhava (Glorious Descender into the World)" translates "लोकासम्भवः" literally; this appears to be an epithet or possibly a deity-name within the maṇḍala context, and its precise identification is uncertain. It may refer to a specific tantric form rather than a familiar iconographic figure.

The line "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" describing swords as "permanence" and mirrors as "benefit" reflects an offering-attribution scheme in which ritual implements are matched to specific qualities or activities. The precise doctrinal logic here is terse and may belong to a commentary tradition not preserved in this passage alone.

The mantra syllables are transliterated as faithfully as the Tibetan script permits; variant Sanskrit reconstructions are possible for several of them.

- The names in the list — "the White One," "Brahmā himself," "Śrī the Unsurpassed," "Rambhā," and "Gayā the Crocodile-Banner" — appear to be the names of specific female deity figures or ḍākinīs whose precise identities depend on a commentary tradition not fully recoverable from this passage alone. The rendering follows the most literal reading of the Tibetan.

The phrase rendered "Robbing" translates a term suggesting forceful seizure; these appear to be technical names within a tantric dākinī classificatory system.

The mantra syllable "vauṣaṭ" is the Tibetan phonetic rendering of the Sanskrit sacrificial exclamation "vausat," here adapted into the tantric ritual context.

The passage ends mid-sentence with "Yama, the Terminator; Wisdom the Terminator," indicating this is a continuation broken off mid-chapter.

- The wrathful deity names Ṭakki, Pukkaṣī, Ghasmaṛī, and Caṇḍālī are standard tantric deity names from the Heruka/Cakrasaṃvara cycle and are rendered in transliterated form following convention. The term "Obstacle the Terminator" in the opening line renders "Geghs the Terminator," where the Tibetan "bgegs" (obstructors) appears to function as a proper name in parallel to Padma the Terminator in this wrathful deity list.

The passage ends mid-sentence at "for the sake of gathering women," which is where the supplied Tibetan text breaks off.

The six Tantras of the Yoginī listed by name correspond to well-known Yoginī tantras of the Anuttarayoga class; Cakrasaṃvara (Saṃvara, rendered here as Cakrasaṃvara) is explicit in the Tibetan.

- The passage is a dense tantric text combining doctrinal verse with ritual prescriptions for pill-making (piṇḍa) and related sādhana instructions. The "five fragrances," "five substances," "five meats," and the various "awareness" or vidyā formulas are standard Cakrasaṃvara-cycle tantric categories; they are rendered literally as the text requires rather than glossed, since the technical terminology would be known to the intended audience.

The phrase rendered "the King of the Seven" for རྒྱལ་པོ་བདེན་པ་ is uncertain; it may refer to a specific group of seven protector deities in this tantric cycle. This is noted here rather than flagged in the text.

The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the instruction that the source text is a continuing excerpt.

- The passage is from a Vajrayāna tantric text of the Mahāyoga class, likely the Sarvabuddhasamāyogaḍākinījālaśaṃvara or a related tantra. Several terms throughout carry deliberate double entendres characteristic of twilight language (sandhyābhāṣā): "vajra," "lotus," "vajra mind," "vajra lips," and related expressions operate simultaneously on outer ritual, inner yogic, and secret sexual-yogic levels. The translation renders these literally, preserving the ambiguity the tradition intends.

"Vajra-harms-and-delights" renders rdo rje gnod mdzes, a deity name whose Sanskrit equivalent would be something like Vajraharmamanorama or Vajrāmanorama; no canonical Sanskrit is certain here.

"Siṃhala-camphor" (si hla ga bur) refers to camphor originating from Sri Lanka (Siṃhala); the phrase "from the place where Siṃhala-camphor originates" may alternatively be read as identifying the woman's place of origin rather than the camphor's.

The final verse fragment is incomplete as given; the translation preserves the open-ended character of the passage as it breaks off.

- The term rendered "king of the Ṭakki" is a transliteration of བླ་མ་ཆེན་པོ་, which appears to be a tantric technical term or possibly a proper name for a class of wrathful beings or a specific deity; its Sanskrit referent is unclear, and the transliteration is retained.

The phrase "blue club bearing one's own name" reflects a tantric implement personalized through ritual inscription; the exact practice context is esoteric.

"The great wrathful one of the boundary, the solitary one" renders རྒྱལ་པོ་ཆེན་པོ་འཇིག་རྟེན་གྱི་འཇིག་རྟེན་པོ་, where རྒྱལ་པོ་ is ambiguous — it may mean "unique," "solitary," or "alone in greatness." The rendering reflects the most natural reading.

"Tśa-kyabs, the white king" (ཐུ་མཚན་ལྷན་པོ་འཇིག་རྟེན་པོ་) appears to be a specific deity name within the tantric cycle whose identity is not immediately disambiguated from the text alone; it is retained as a proper name.

The half-line རྒྱལ་པོ་ཆེན་པོ་འཇིག་རྟེན་པོ་འཇིག་རྟེན་པོ་ ("the maṇḍala-nature of the half-ten") is cryptic; "half-ten" (i.e., five) may refer to the five maṇḍalas mentioned immediately after.

- The phrase rendered "the five obscurations" refers to the standard set of five hindrances or obscurations in tantric context, here listed without enumeration in the Tibetan; no emendation is required but listeners familiar only with the five hindrances of sūtra should be aware the tantric referent may differ.

The compound "place of birth" renders a Tibetan euphemism for the sexual organ, standard in tantric bliss-enumeration passages.

The term rendered "those between" for "ma ning" refers to a third-gender or intersex category (Skt. paṇḍaka or napuṃsaka) in Buddhist discourse; this is doctrinally significant as indicating the universal scope of Heruka's pervasion.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence, consistent with a passage boundary in the source text.

- The term rendered "androgynous" throughout translates the Tibetan for an intermediate or neuter gendered being, neither fully male nor female, which in tantric context designates both a cosmological category and a symbolic position in the maṇḍala.

The phrase "sixteen fingers fully grown" refers to the measure of full adult maturity indicated by sixteen finger-widths, a standard iconographic description.

The "sixth vowel" in the context of Sanskrit phonology refers to the vowel ā or possibly a specific seed syllable counting within the tantric vowel series; the precise referent here depends on the counting system employed in this tantra, and the doctrinal point is that the deity's identity is encoded in a syllable.

The kaṃkella tree is a plant used in tantric ritual context; its exact botanical identification is uncertain in the secondary literature.

The mantra "Om āmukā mākarṣaya mañjughoṣa hrīḥ jaḥ" is transliterated directly from the Sanskrit as it appears embedded in the Tibetan; āmukā is a standard placeholder meaning "so-and-so" in Sanskrit mantra formulas, indicating that the name of the intended person is to be inserted there in practice.

- The passage contains several divine names used as speaker-attributions for individual stanzas: Māmakī, Locanā, Pāṇḍaravāsīnī, and Tārā. These are the four buddha-consorts of the Vajrayāna maṇḍala tradition; each closes her stanza with her own name in the Tibetan, which I have rendered as signatures in the translation body, consistent with the apparent structure of the text.

The archaic syllables rendered as Mutscha, Diha, Serṇa, and the percussion-syllable sequences are transliterated bow-posture or ritual-action mnemonics in a tantric context; they resist meaningful translation and are reproduced phonetically, consistent with the treatment of mantra syllables elsewhere.

The term rendered "sweet-toned instrument" (Tib. mñar ba can) is a musical instrument whose precise identification is uncertain; it may denote a lute-type instrument with a resonant, sweet tone.

The term "tagara" is a fragrant plant (Valeriana hardwickii or similar); "rock-musk" (brag zhun) is ambergris or a resin exudate. Both are well-attested incense ingredients in Indo-Tibetan ritual literature.

- The plant and substance names in this passage present considerable philological difficulty. Several terms appear to be transliterations of Sanskrit botanical names that resist confident identification. Kacora likely refers to Kaempferia galanga; kumā and skra sgra nyid (kesara) likely refers to saffron stamens or a similar substance. The line rendered "the navel of the wild deer" refers to musk from the deer's musk gland. The phrase "mon-beans and peas" renders mon sran gre'u, a grouping of leguminous plants common in Tibetan fire-offering lists. "Serpent-bane" for sbrul 'jig is uncertain; it may refer to a specific plant known to repel or harm serpents. The mantra transliterations follow the Tibetan phonetic rendering as closely as possible; some Sanskrit reconstructions involve minor normalization. The line "pour oblations into the hearth in an inert place" (bems po'i gnas su sreg blugs bya) refers to the fire-offering hearth placed at a ritually neutral or uninhabited location, a standard instruction in such rites. The passage breaks off mid-sentence with "the five meats and the nectars," indicating the text continues beyond the supplied excerpt.

- The passage contains a series of cosmological and soteriological references identifying beings across the three realms and the bodhisattva grounds. The enumeration of divine realms follows standard Buddhist cosmology: Akaniṣṭha is the highest of the pure abodes, Paranirmitavaśavartin and Nirmāṇarati are the fifth and fourth heaven of the desire realm respectively, and the "ten grounds" refers to the ten bodhisattva grounds. "Those whose form is that of horn and sword" likely refers to specific tantric deity forms and the rendering follows the literal Tibetan; the precise iconographic referent may vary by tradition.

The phrase rendered "the Lord of Gold" translates a term literally meaning "sovereign of gold" and likely refers to Ratnasambhava or a closely associated deity-principle.

"Śākyasiṃha" means "Lion of the Śākyas," an epithet of Śākyamuni Buddha; retained in Sanskrit as it appears to function here as a proper name in its own right within the tantric context.

- The term rendered "lāśya" is a Sanskrit loanword referring to a graceful style of dance or gesture; it appears in Tibetan transliteration and is retained as such.

The phrase "hand of the kumunda" likely refers to a gesture associated with the kumuda lotus or a related offering implement; the Tibetan transliterates a Sanskrit loanword whose precise referent is uncertain in this context.

The line "the song following the six" is ambiguous — "the six" may refer to the six classes of beings or six musical tones; without wider context the translation preserves the ambiguity.

The closing verses shift into a complex frame-narrative mode where the text simultaneously presents a liturgical first-person voice and a canonical "thus did I hear" formula, suggesting a deliberate interweaving of tantric samaya-instruction and sūtra-style authentication. This is an intentional generic blending characteristic of certain Vajrayāna ritual texts, not an error.

- The passage describes a series of deity visualizations, each associated with a seed syllable from which the deity arises, a standard tantric maṇḍala presentation. The identifications follow the textual logic: the first figure (two-handed, single-faced, with Akṣobhya at the crown) is Mañjuśrī in his Yamāntaka-related form; the figure with the buffalo is the deity standing behind the great buffalo (maḥiṣa), consistent with Yamāntaka iconography. The phrase rendered "the chariot of the swift-moving seven" refers to the seven horses of the sun-god's chariot, a standard Indic image. The phrase "like the time of one's elder brother" is obscure in context; the Tibetan reads rgang gi ming po'i dus lta bur and most likely refers to a specific ritual time-reckoning or lineage context that cannot be resolved without a fuller commentary. The final verse, calling on a woman who has lost a child to continually recite, almost certainly refers to Cundā or one of the preceding goddesses and follows naturally from her mention above.
- The sādhana passage describing the Great Black One (Mahākāla) shifts between liturgical prescription and iconographic description. The phrase "born from the syllable HŪṂ" refers to standard tantric visualization practice in which the deity arises from a seed syllable.

The Latin-script mantra is transliterated as closely as possible from the Tibetan phonetic rendering; some syllables remain uncertain due to the compressed Tibetan phonetic conventions for Sanskrit, particularly "śāsanopaghāriṇe," "dipratigjñāṃ smarasi," and "dina mekena," which do not correspond to standard Mahākāla dhāraṇī forms known from other sources.

The term rendered "three roots" in the sorcery rite is ambiguous; it could refer to three root substances used in tantric hostile rites rather than the "Three Roots" (guru, yidam, ḍākinī) as a doctrinal category.

The section on mudrā accomplishment involves terminology of sexual yoga in the highest yoga tantra context. "Vajra maiden," "wisdom consort," "one born from the great outcaste," and the joining of vajra and lotus are standard technical euphemisms for tantric consort practice. "Māmākī" is the buddha consort associated with Vajradhara in the Vajra family.

The passage ends mid-sentence ("Having taken up the mudrā of a human woman —"), indicating the text continues beyond this excerpt.

- The phrase rendered as "the King of the Seventh" translates "bdun pa'i rgyal po" literally; this may refer to a specific deity or empowerment-king of the seventh stage, but the referent is not entirely clear from context alone and may be a proper name or title within this particular tantric cycle.

The line "do not engage in acts pertaining to stūpas" and "do not bow to the supreme three vajras" and related prohibitions are somewhat compressed in the original, and the exact valence of each prohibition depends on the specific tantric code being elaborated; the translation renders the Tibetan as literally as naturally readable English allows.

The sequence of praises at the close presents an unusual pattern in which, for example, "Vajra of Aversion" is paired with one who exhausts delusion (Vajrasattva), and "Vajra of Attachment" with one who exhausts pride (Vajra Sun) — this inversion of expected affliction-deity pairings appears to be in the source text itself and is translated as found.

- The passage renders "bDun gyi rgyal po" as "King of the Seven," an epithet consistently used in the preceding context; it most likely refers to Amoghasiddhi or a comparable figure presiding over a group of seven deities in the Hevajra maṇḍala system, though the precise identification depends on broader tantric context not resolved by this passage alone.

The term "mig sman" and the list that follows are standard Mahāyoga siddhi categories: eye-medicine, foot-anointing ointment, the sword-siddhi, the pill, sky-faring, invisibility, and essence-extraction — rendered according to their established equivalents in the secondary literature on this tantra.

The phrase rendered "seats of empowerment" translates "dbang gi gnas nams," meaning the bodily locations associated with the four empowerments, a technical tantric term; the passage describes the transference of consciousness at death guided by the master.
