

Tantra of the Vajra Nectar

Toh 435 in the Kangyur is the Vajra Amṛta Tantra, known in Tibetan as the Rdo rje bdud rtsi'i rgyud, or the Tantra of the Vajra Nectar. It is a Buddhist tantric text belonging to the class of esoteric scriptures, and its opening situates it within a visionary setting in which the Blessed One dwells in the secret lotus of the Vajra Nectar and sports together with the goddess Māmakī in a stacked palace of immeasurable dimensions. The text takes the form of a dialogue in which the goddess petitions the deity to reveal methods of accomplishment associated with the nectar of the vajra, a subject connected to purification, transformation, and the esoteric powers of enlightened body, speech, and mind. Notably, the translation opens with what is presented as the fourth and final chapter of a separate but related work, the Great Secret of the Immovable, before the Vajra Amṛta Tantra itself begins, suggesting a close editorial relationship between these two tantric cycles within the Kangyur collection.

This is the fourth chapter, the chapter on secret mantra, from the noble tantra of the Great Secret of the Immovable. The noble tantra of the Great Secret of the Immovable is complete.

In the Indian language: Vajra Amṛta Tantra. In the Tibetan language: the Tantra of the Vajra Nectar. Homage to the glorious Vajrasattva.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One, the Tathāgata — the essence of the body, speech, and mind of all tathāgatas — dwelt in the secret lotus of the Vajra Nectar. In the stacked palace of immeasurable dimensions, together with Māmakī, the Blessed Vajra One sported in delight. Then the goddess made this request in verse:

O Great Secret, supremely abiding, supreme tantra of the Vajra Nectar —
what you, a god, previously proclaimed, the method for accomplishing the nectar —
please now declare it again in great bliss.

Then the Blessed Vajra One spoke:

The Vajra Nectar, great bliss,
beyond thought, inexhaustible, subtle,

purposeful, transcending the sense faculties,
excellent, peaceful, utterly pure —
this is what is called the Vajra Nectar.

Then the Blessed Vajra One, with loving desire for Māmakī, through the meditative absorption of the Vajra Nectar, made the Great Secret manifest directly. The supreme secret gnosis — the Vajra Nectar — in all its tantras I shall now explain.

Through firm embrace and milking,
through playful union in joy,
through melody, sweet music, and dance,
the supreme tantra of the Vajra Nectar
will thus be swiftly accomplished.

What is called the nectar fluid
assuredly generates the three classes of beings.
For you, the joyful one, the fair-faced,
I shall explain the method of its accomplishment.
Listen with full attention to these words.
Setting it forth in brief, I shall explain:

For the benefit and welfare of sentient beings,
the supreme Vajra Nectar of union —
whatever yogin comes to know it will be swiftly liberated from the bonds of saṃsāra.
It is beyond all teaching and vast in gnosis;
its accomplishment (siddhi, Skt. siddhi) fulfills the three worlds.

For the accomplishment of body, speech, and mind,
the practitioner engages in bliss.
Through the union of vajra and lotus,
the Vajra Nectar is drawn forth.
Milk is poured into the bhaga's lotus;
the Vajra Māmakī pours milk.
The Vajra Nectar, great bliss —
so the Blessed Vajra One declared.

By pouring milk into the bhaga's lotus,
at that moment the joyful goddess
requested the secret maṇḍala of delightful experience that arises from the Vajra Nectar:

By what ritual sequence
should the offering maṇḍala be established?
Here, how exactly is the offering performed,
and likewise, what is the maṇḍala like?
Great bliss is difficult to attain — please speak in full delight.

Then the Blessed Vajra One, greatly delighted by the milking of the Vajra Nectar and great bliss, laughed and spoke thus:

For the accomplishment of body, speech, and mind,
and in order to liberate beings from the ocean of saṃsāra,
through the practice of great bliss union,
Māmakī here drew this design.

Having drawn a triangular maṇḍala,
place within it the secret lotus of Māmakī.

Inside, bearing the heart-essence,
make an eight-petaled lotus.

At the center, the great secret vidyā
with the chief figure — three faces, six hands:
the first face is black,
the right face is desired to be white,
the left is declared to be red.

Adorned with divine ornaments,
wearing divine garments and a flower garland,
anointed with divine fragrances,
performing the pacifying divine accomplishment,
bearing the vajra of body, speech, and mind.

The outer maṇḍala also
is to be thoroughly arrayed with four gates.

At the east, place the Frowning One;
at the south, the Terrifier of the Terrifying;
at the west, the Mare-Formed One;
at the north, the Leader of the Host.

The wise one shall draw the eight vidyās
equally on the eight lotus petals.

The Beautiful One and the Peaceful Face,
the Moon Woman and the Conch-Bearing One,
the Hare-Holder and the Maṇḍala Woman,
the Hare-Holder's Image, the Delightful, and those who bring ease to the mind —
the eight vidyās and the eight virtuous ones,
all with three faces and six arms,
of varied forms, joy-inspiring —
shall be drawn steadily
in the cardinal directions and the intermediate directions.

As offerings: the vīṇā and the drum likewise,
and incense and flowers and so forth;
song, dance, and worship,
with joyful festivity and union —
the great bliss of the vajra nectar
of the secret wheel is to be accomplished.

From mother, maidservant, daughter,
sister, and kinswoman alike,
take from them the vajra nectar
and offer to the secret maṇḍala.
By taking the nectar from one's mother,
it becomes equal to the vajra nectar.
The sister, free of illness, with white healthy teeth;
the daughter grants all that is desired;
the brahmin woman accomplishes what is meaningful.
Having been desired for the secret maṇḍala,
let the tongue be rolled,
and with the mouth receive it from the lotus.
The great bliss of the vajra nectar —
from that, accomplishment swiftly arises.

After the manner of a bee enjoying itself,
enjoy every woman according to desire.
Drawing together, pressing close, and stretching out,
lifting up, called the full extension —
by performing these binding unions, accomplish the three levels.

With great flesh and with great blood,
and likewise with excrement, urine, and semen —
these are the five vajra nectars,
to be accomplished day by day.

The great bliss of the vajra nectar:
if one desires accomplishment for oneself,
then the practitioner shall supremely accomplish
all purposes through these means.

Magnetization, ensnaring, conflict,
killing, expelling, and the rest —
with the great bliss of the vajra nectar,
let every activity be performed throughout.

The great bliss of the vajra nectar —
this was proclaimed by the Blessed Vajra One.

Thus ends the first chapter, which presents the mode of performing the secret maṇḍala, from the King of Tantras called the Vajra Nectar of Great Bliss, the Vajra Nectar Tantra of the vajra of body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas.

Then the goddess (lha mo) who had been gladdened, Māmakī of the fully bloomed lotus,
having embraced him firmly,
poured milk upon all his senses.
Holding her lips with her mouth, pouring milk,
the siddha mantra is to be recited.
Holding his body also with the vajra bond,
the Vajra-Bearing One performed the secret act,
having inserted the vajra into the lotus.
In passion and delight, let desire be indulged.

With the pleasant sounds of the siddha tone,
the cuckoo bird (kaukkila) and flute and such — sport with the goddess Māmakī.
With the great bliss of the vajra nectar,
grasp the breast and press it,
and trace upon it with the nails.
And removing the garment,
look upon her above and below.
Having poured milk into the fully bloomed lotus,

words of joy are also to be spoken:
"O Māmakī of the blooming lotus,
O great goddess — excellent, excellent!
With eternal attachment and desire,
I shall delight in you.
Whatever desire you have requested,
I bestow upon you supremely."

Then the goddess Māmakī addressed these words in turn:
"The Blessed One himself, in suchness, manifested by the awakening mind —
just as inexhaustible wisdom plays
through the utterly subtle,
so does a god act in this way.
Through the union of the two senses,
doubt arises in me concerning these things,
and I become supremely amazed."

Then the Blessed Vajra One explained the great bliss of the vajra nectar:
"Listen to this, O Māmakī —
the penetrating union of wisdom,
exceedingly subtle, the great secret,
the essential nature of the object of wisdom.
This I shall expound:
that which supremely accomplishes buddha awakening,
fearless, inexhaustible, and permanent,
without beginning, beyond the senses.
Both being and non-being,
with sense faculties and without sense faculties,
not seen in any element of arising —"

"It is seen through the path of union.
The union is taught as being of two kinds:
outer and inner.
The outer is the aggregate of form and the rest,
the arising of all kinds at the conventional level —
diverse, moving and unmoving.

Throughout all three realms without remainder,
that single one pervades everything:
all is consciousness alone.

Why is it that sentient beings, who are without self,
have a stable aggregate of consciousness?

Even those dull-minded people of a degenerate age
do not understand this at all.

That which has not arisen from mind, yet is the face of mind —
the essential nature of wisdom and its object —
all is that single consciousness.

When it becomes the condition for the body,
it becomes one with phenomena and a single phenomenon,
and at that time all things are transformed.

Why is it that among the many phenomena,
though phenomena are themselves many,
liberation — like rivers flowing to the ocean —
is one alone

and cannot be found as many?

How it dwells in great abundance within:
this is obtained only from the lips of the guru.

The lotus of the bhaga (the sacred feminine) is filled with space, adorned by the five spaces.

Endowed with heart and pith,
it is enveloped by eight petals.

At its center there dwells the Vajra One,
possessed of the nectar of the awakening mind.

The bindu, freed from partial, non-dharmic aspects,
is fully relinquished.

Perpetually flowing there is the nectar —
the form of the nectar of the awakening mind (bodhicitta),
the foundation of all the elements,
pervading above and below throughout.

By it, seeing and hearing,
smelling and tasting,
touching and the enjoyment of pleasure,
food, garlands of flowers,

ornaments and robes as adornments,
various sounds celebrated by voice,
things to be taken up and held,
sport and movement,
sitting and likewise lying down,
waking and turning,
all that is seen in dreams,
laughter and likewise noise,
exceedingly mind-capturing dance,
and the beating of drums —
all these various things being spoken of here,
the forms of madness and intoxication,
delusion and desire in their very suchness,
the formless one possessed of many forms,
male and female and the neither — the self of all those possessed of many forms —
like a wish-fulfilling jewel of varied appearance:
having pervaded by the nature of pervasion,
that very suchness abides in supreme greatness.

This, O Māmakī, is suchness:

there is no recitation and no grasping,
there is no act of counting on a rosary at all,
nor should food be abandoned.

Having made offering to the lotus of the bhaga,
the nectar is to be consumed by the wise.

The great bliss of the vajra nectar —
by that, suchness itself is accomplished.

That which is the channel through which the nectar flows —
the lotus at the center of the bhaga —
among the thirty-two other channels,
that one is central, that is the chief.

Far superior to all the others,
nine channels are present.

The vidyās (awareness-holders) that reside at the nine gates are to be venerated by the practitioner.

The five goddesses of sensual qualities

always gaze together with the Vajra One.
When one practices them supremely in this way,
the Omniscient One declares this 'freedom from attachment.'
These supreme and excellent great secrets
are taught, O beautiful Māmakī, as union.
The various Tathāgatas such as Vairocana and the rest —
this is not known even by the Tathāgatas.
Eternal joy of mind's happiness:
this supreme one is excellently revealed through union."

Upon seeing the secret lotus,
and the greatly expansive Māmakī,
the great bliss of the vajra nectar —
this suchness I shall explain.

This concludes the second chapter, called "The Display of the Wisdom of Suchness and Union," from the Great Tantra of the Vajra Nectar, the Great Bliss of the Vajra — the vajra of body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas.

Then that goddess of joy,
adorned with anklets of hara bells,
taking up this melody,
delights the great bodhisattva.
From the Vajra of Great Bliss, the Evoker —

"I seek the supreme syllable.
Great bliss in the lotus of the bhaga —
this is the vajra's meaning, great bliss.

She who holds the earth, the garland of sounds,
and the six-limbed one, and others — the manner of gathering the peripheral retinues:
the melodious sound of the various, the common, and the pure is to be taken up.

Having taken up those pure melodic tones,
through the display of joy and mental ease,
with the vajra nectar of great bliss,
accomplish the awakening of the buddhas.

Having taught through the secret maṇḍala,
suchness has resolved my doubts.
By your grace, Vajrin,
I shall ever be engaged in primordial wisdom."

The Blessed One free from attachment,
this arising of the vajra nectar —
the union that is the arising of the Vajra Vehicle,
I shall now set forth.

"Yet I still have doubt:
the display of the two mudrās —
how does the perfect mudrā arise,
and what are their mantras?

From what do the mantras arise?
And in particular, also the gods —
the god is uncertain about this very point.
Please tell me in brief."

Then the Blessed One, the Vajrin, spoke the Great Bliss, the Vajra Nectar: "The arising of the mudrās and mantras — hear it, O Māmakī!

Three kinds of mudrā are taught, arising from body, speech, and mind.
Body becomes the supreme mudrā.
Speech is the mudrā, the activity of mantra.
The mudrā of the sign of mind
abides in meditation, in the image, in the non-dual.

From the Great Tantra of the Vajra Nectar,
the action mudrā (karma-mudrā) is to be known.
The sign mudrā (samaya-mudrā) is not drawn.
The mudrā directly perceived is form.
The god is the goddess, the woman.
Through the bliss of all the senses,
make offering at the lotus of the bhaga.
Through union of the vajra and the lotus,
accomplish all activities.

Just as the great wish-fulfilling tree,
with its thousands of hundreds of branches,
and its roots and what is held by it,

all become a condition for birth —
so too the channel through which nectar flows
is the mother of mantras and mudrās,
and the arising of these mantras
dwells at the center of the bhaga.

Then the Blessed One, the Vajrin, with the Great Bliss of the Vajra Nectar, having inserted the vajra into Māmakī, declared: 'Hear, O Māmakī — the characteristic of the mantras.

First is the union with Vairocana:
Om vajra amṛta mahāsukha —
combined with the four seeds,
joined also with the syllable Svāhā.

And again, the offering to Vairocana:
two syllables, then the fourth.
That which is endowed with the fourth —
the supreme essence of Māmakī —
is solely the eight, and the one at the center.
Adorned with the eight ornaments,
applied to the eight petals,
the mantras of the goddesses are extracted through mantra.

Now hear the mantras of the gatekeepers,
O fortunate Māmakī.
Extracted from the last of those mantras —
by the knower of mantra using the eight seeds,
pressed by the deity of emptiness,
endowed with Vairocana,
combined equally with the syllable Svāhā —
are the bestowers of all accomplishments.

Four are of the gatekeepers.
Four are incense, flowers, and so forth.
With the hermaphrodite syllable at the four corners, Svāhā and Vairocana also —

The goddess, the secret Māmakī,
with drum and all offerings, is to be worshipped."

The Great Bliss, the Vajra Nectar — thus spoke the Blessed One, the Vajrin.

This concludes the third chapter, called "The Teaching on the Sequential Extraction of Mantras," from the Great Tantra of the Vajra Nectar, the Great Bliss of the Vajra — the vajra of body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the rites of fire offering shall be explained in sequence.

Through the ritual of the union tantra,
body, speech, and mind are accomplished.

Pacifying and enriching activities,
likewise subjugating and forceful,
and equally battle and dispersal —
all these accomplishments of mantra and mudrā
I shall explain in their entirety: the arising of the Vajra Nectar.

The bodhisattva Vajrasattva, the dancer —

Standing with a belt and support, adorned with all ornaments, the master shall enter the maṇḍala. Having conquered the three realms, the right foot shall be extended and then the left foot extended as well. With both feet level, one immediately purifies the ground by means of the earth-goddess. When the earth is touched, softness arises.

Then, after driving out the obstructors, and likewise the śruta and others — the guru is saluted above. Next, from outside, the goddess of the earth is invited:

Oṃ, ehyehi — O great goddess, steady earth-goddess, mother of the world, who perfectly fulfils all treasures, adorned with divine ornaments, who brings forth the sounds hara nupura — offer worship to Vajrasattva. Having accepted these gifts, may you accomplish the fire-offering rite. Hi hi hi hā svāhā.

Urine, excrement, blood, and semen shall be scattered upon the ground of the maṇḍala. For the purpose of consecration, great flesh shall be offered as incense. Then the vidyā (Skt. vidyā, the wisdom-consort) is introduced: a caṇḍāla woman, a smeared woman, a dancer, a brahmin woman, likewise a queen, a woman of the common class, and a woman of the royal class — these are to be worshipped with fragrance and incense and adorned with divine ornaments. On the five limbs, the syllable Hrī; in the center of the bhaga the syllable Hūṃ. Locanā, Tārā, Pāṇḍaravāsini, and Māmakī — one shall visualize these. Into the center of the bhaga the master shall cast flowers alone.

Then the mantra-practitioner shall everywhere measure and mark the fire-offering pit. For pacifying rites it shall be round, measured and drawn with a cord one cubit across. Having dug half a cubit into the earth, it is painted with white chalk. Everywhere it is drawn evenly after the manner of a wheel, with equal sides. For enriching rites, it is one and a half cubits, and one cubit shall be dug. It is square with equal sides, drawn with black soot and an iron stylus. For wrathful rites it is triangular, twenty finger-breadths wide; when dug to ten finger-breadths, in its center a blazing vajra-wheel is drawn, agitated by a garland of flames. Likewise for subjugation and summoning, a perfect crescent moon is drawn.

Having properly laid out the fire-offering pit, the directional orientation shall also be indicated. Facing north, the mantra-practitioner shall undertake pacifying rites. For enriching rites, east is specified; for wrathful rites, south; for subjugation, west alone is taught; for summoning and dispersing it is likewise. For wrathful rites it is always black; for subjugation and the rest, the five colors are used.

With rice, sesame, milk, butter, and honey combined, together with the five nectars, one performs the fire offering for pacification and enrichment. All the wood for burning shall be fragrant, milk-sap-bearing wood. Various foods or tormas offerings shall be given to all elemental spirits. Whatever torma the practitioner offers is given with the great mudrā of the blood-drinker. Whatever is desired in one's mind is always accomplished by the yogin.

During summer the season is for pacifying; for enriching it is likewise winter. Spring is for wrathful activities — the practitioner shall perform all of them accordingly. Dawn is declared supremely suited for pacifying; for enriching it is the early evening; at midday or at midnight, wrathful rites are to be performed always.

In the center of the fire-offering pit, the yidam deity is generated by the syllable Hūṃ, and one visualizes the face gazing upward — the fire offering is then to be presented to that deity. If a hundred thousand fire offerings are presented, direct, manifest results will arise before one.

First, the fire is to be summoned — the site of offering for all gods, the fierce deity with a blazing garland of light-rays, through whom the awakening of a buddha is accomplished:

Oṃ, ehyehi — come here, you, without any doubt. O fire-god, grant manifest accomplishment. Fierce one, worshipped by the three realms, saluted by Viṣṇu

and Brahmā —

Accept these offerings, O holder of the vajra, even though you shift your left foot. Oṃ Hūṃ Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ Phaṭ Svāhā.

First, the offering of fee is presented; then, afterward, the god's torma and flowers are offered.

Oṃ — divine flowers, deeply red, fragrant and exceedingly beautiful: accept these flowers today and bestow your blessing upon them. Hūṃ — this is the mantra of the flower offering.

Oṃ — a lamp with blazing rays of light, dispelling the terrors of the lower realms, the auspicious eye of the gods: O lamp, we pray you to accept this. Hūṃ — this is the mantra of the lamp offering.

Oṃ — the wholesome incense fire of sandalwood and camphor, fragrant and sweet: accept this offering, which is to be endowed with power, and bestow your blessing. Hūṃ — this is the mantra of the incense offering.

Oṃ — the various divine fragrances, adorned with many kinds of camphor, arising from the various syllables and from Hūṃ: we offer this perfume and pray you to accept it. Hūṃ — this is the mantra of the perfume offering.

First, the ritual of worship is to be performed for the fire without any doubt. Afterward, the vidyā-mantra of one's own yidam deity is to be recited and recognized. With the many forms of song, dance, and food, the vidyā-holder and the practitioner are to please the gaṇa assembly through offering.

If accomplishments are desired, one performs the accomplishment of body, speech, and mind. The fire-god, the lama, the vajra-holder — worship them and bring it to completion.

Oṃ — accomplished through the fire-god, leading all sentient beings to happiness: for the sake of the accomplishment of body, speech, and mind, protect us in accordance with the gods. O fire-god, please depart in peace and pacify the ground of the earth. Through moving and unmoving things, grant to the practitioner and to all — grant the ripening fruit of my merit and bestow the accomplishments of mantra. A Ā I Ī U Ū Ṛ Ṛ Ḷ Ḷ E Ai O Au Aṃ Aḥ Hūṃ Svāhā.

Vajra-nectar, great bliss — so declared the Blessed One with his vajra. This is the fourth chapter, entitled "The Teaching of the Fire-Offering Ritual," from the Great Tantra of the Vajra-Nectar of Great Bliss of the Vajra of Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Tathāgatas: the Vajra-Nectar.

Now the explanation of the eye-ointment is to be given to you.

Take the smoke of the essence of great fat, then burn an owl's head and mix it with abundant blood. Apply it by night, grind it into fine powder alone, and fill the gall of a vulture. With many applicators of human bone, anoint the eyes — this the yogin is always to do.

The preparation of the accomplishment of the eye-ointment arising from the vajra-nectar is to be accomplished on the eighth and fourteenth days of the dark fortnight, within the bhaga. It performs the activities of pacification, enrichment, as well as magnetization and subjugation. It eliminates all manner of fierce possessing spirits, and the four-day fever and poison entirely — O goddess, the Joyful One, we speak truly to you. Worshipped greatly in Rājagṛha, it destroys enemies as well, and likewise blocks obstructors. It is to be recited while bearing the eye-ointment.

Om̐ — wide-eyed one whose form fulfills desire, delighting in excrement, urine, and blood, goddess with three faces and six hands, Māmakī of fierce form — Hrīm̐ Hrīm̐ Hūm̐ Hūm̐ A Am̐ A Hā Hām̐ Svāhā.

The first face is black; know that the right is white and the left is red. On the right side she holds a sword and a wheel; on the left, a lasso and an iron hook, and likewise a vajra and a bell. Visualize her within the bhaga, and in that place the eye-ointment is to be accomplished.

Fill the bhaga with saffron, then afterward insert a liṅga into it. The mantra to be recited over it is: Om̐ — the sound of the syllable, the opening of the syllable — Vajra Amṛta — is proclaimed. The sound resounds with Phaṭ. Along with the nectar that is its equal, it is to be drawn forth from within the bhaga.

Having recited a hundred thousand mantras over it, one should then use it exclusively for the bindu. The woman will enslave her husband, and even a king with a retinue assembled before him will be brought under sway. Whatever man performs this rite will gain the good fortune of any woman he desires. In the great capital city he will dominate, and his enemies will be utterly destroyed.

Take the fruit of the arka plant, mix it with nectar, and then recite the mantra of the wrathful three-faced form and of the fierce executioner of Yama, Lord of Death. Having prepared it with great flesh and mixed it with beer, give it to drink. The person will be perpetually intoxicated, wander in confusion, become emaciated, and die.

Oṃ Hrīḥ Ṣṭhri Vikṛtānana Sarva Śatrūn Vināśaya Stambhaya Mārāya Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ.

The mantrin takes musk, writes the seed syllable upon the bhaga, anoints it evenly with sandalwood, and causes her to dwell together with him. The impure dwelling place becomes great bliss, and retainers and servants will become his in actuality.

Having made an image from urine and excrement, offer incense of great flesh. Bind it with the enemy's hair, smear it with powdered bone, bury it hidden at the enemy's door, and within seven days he will die.

Make a burnt offering with great flesh mixed with urine, excrement, and blood, using the cremation ground's firewood. At a crossroads with a single tree, draw a fire-pit and perform the burnt offering at midday and at midnight. Smearing oneself with ash in the form of the great wrathful executioner of Yama, and meditating while pressing forcefully upon the enemy, he will without fail die.

The Great Vajra Nectar of Great Bliss — thus it was taught by the Blessed Vajra One.

This concludes the fifth chapter, called "Teaching the Great Activity," from the Great Tantra of Vajra Nectar of Great Bliss, the Vajra Nectar Tantra of the body, speech, and mind vajra of all Tathāgatas.

From the Great Vajra Nectar Tantra, the practice of the Glorious Vajra Hūṃkāra will now be briefly explained, along with the sequence of the maṇḍala ritual.

The maṇḍala ritual is drawn from the Trailokavijaya. One draws lines in four cubits or in one and a half cubits. In a maṇḍala resembling the disk of the moon, blazing and swirling with rays of light, one places the Glorious Vajra Hūṃkāra — three-faced, likewise six-armed, complete with all ornaments, hands adorned with mudrās, accompanied by four knowledge consorts, seated at the firm breast of Umā, slightly baring his fangs, laughing wrathfully. On the right is drawn an arrow, and likewise on the left a bow. In the fourth pair of hands is drawn: the second pair holds the breast. All the knowledge consorts have three faces. Likewise the gatekeepers with iron hooks, and likewise flowers, incense, lamps, fine perfumes — all are to be drawn truly. The one who enchants with a garland, likewise the one who enchants with melody, the dancing woman too has six arms. Likewise do not draw the flute woman — draw in the maṇḍala the lute-player, the great drum player, the clay-drum player, and all the cymbal players.

From the Great Vajra Nectar Tantra, a being of excellent fortune is also to be placed there — with two arms and one face, those of the excellent ones alone — adorned with every ornament. The practitioner too is drawn in front, holding a rosary, and likewise a vajra and a bell. Offer the tormas, the ritual substances, beer libation, tastes, and feast offerings. On the eighth and fourteenth of the dark fortnight, apply colored sand to the maṇḍala. In the center draw a square.

If one desires the supreme attainment, the single most important mantra syllable is the accomplishment of Vajra Hūṃkāra. Externally, one makes offerings to the master and gives one's own sovereignty over the kingdom, or one offers a maidservant, a daughter, and likewise a mother or a sister. If I myself desire the attainment of accomplishments through the practice of body, speech, and mind, Arisen from the Conqueror of the Three Realms, this is to be accomplished always by the mantra practitioner. The maṇḍala of Vajrasattva arises from vajra nectar. Endowed equally with the five nectars, it is that which eliminates all lower rebirths. Through the union of vajra and lotus, the glorious Vajra Hūṃkāra is accomplished.

It is taught that the bodhicitta of the yogin and the yoginī manifests in emanated form. Many times over one should sport with the wisdom consort (vidyā) within the maṇḍala. Having tasted at the center of the lotus, those heroes who dwell in mantra should take from the lotus by mouth and receive only the nectar fluid itself. One should not take it on the finger. If it is taken in that way, destruction will follow, the power will be ruined, and the result will not come. The great wisdom consort should also draw it forth and apply it as well to the vajra. Through this, buddhahood itself is accomplished. The nectar that has the form of the essential fluid — the vajra nectar of great bliss — thus was it declared by the Blessed One of the Vajra.

This concludes the sixth chapter, the teaching on the accomplishment of Vajra Hūṃkāra, from the Great Tantra of Vajra Nectar Great Bliss — the vajra of body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas — the Great Tantra of Vajra Nectar Great Bliss.

Then the goddess Māmakī, dwelling in great joyous play, pressed her palms together, prostrated, and with intention sang these words:

I pay homage to the vajra nectar — the hero of blue-lotus body, surrounded by other heroes, complete with the assembly of mudrā consorts.

I pay homage to the vajra nectar — like the sky of autumn, resounding like the hum of bees, one of good fortune who abides for an eon.

I pay homage to the vajra nectar — omniscient, all-beautiful, with perfect faculties on the path.

I pay homage to the vajra nectar — across the entire and unremained three realms, incomparable vajra nectar; the twenty-four great lineages, bringing joy through intense passion, the body adorned with trailing fingernails.

The hands blue as the petals of a blue lotus — O Vajra, buddha and Tathāgata, may you enjoy being together with me with exceeding joy and passion.

For the sake of accomplishing what is to be accomplished in the three realms, you, protector arisen as vajra through the syllable from the flawless supreme emptiness — whoever, moving or unmoving, beholds you, how could they go on wandering in saṃsāra?

Having thus sung, she performs the vajra dance. The dance of the hips, the feet, the shoulders, and the head — these are the defining characteristics of the treatise on dance. The sequence of following method followed in order, praise, swaying elegance, expanding, bowing, and clearly — expanding and the dance of the brow's movement. With the hand mudrā gestures, the dance is to be performed with eight stances.

The goddess Māmakī of the expanded lotus, having danced, then with the vajra bell pours the nectar onto the vajra. Then the Blessed One of the Vajra also pours onto the lotus of Māmakī.

Display the lotus, O goddess. From that, the worship is to be commenced. Remain still, O wisdom consort — we shall commence the nectar meditation. The supreme suchness to be commenced is in the form of a drop of nectar, like a moon in the middle of the sky — that very emptiness is expressly proclaimed. Fearless, inexhaustible, and subtle, conquering Vajrasattva. The goddess dwelling at the center of the navel, in the domain of the secret essence, dripping in the form of the essential fluid, dwells at the center of the lotus-bell. This is the life of living beings, the support of the aggregate of consciousness. Buddha, Tathāgata, Vajradhāra, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and the Great Lord (Śiva), earth and water and likewise fire — wind and space itself as well — moving and unmoving, manifold, throughout all three realms without remainder: that I always contemplate. From it all is generated — myself and you, Brahmā, Indra (Śakra), Viṣṇu, and the rest, bodhisattvas, Tathāgatas, the principal identity of what is known and the knowing of it. That very supreme suchness is what I contemplate. Birth and death alike — all are gathered into that. The one who generates is single, become self-sovereign, innately coexistent, omniscient in every respect and from every respect, quieted and then pervading peace. Why, because it fills that house, is it therefore called a person? Because it dwells in the body it is called "embodied," and because it illumines it is held to be the knower. Because it is the god that cognizes the self within the self, it is therefore called "god." From pervading through entering, it is said to be Viṣṇu. By the word it becomes Vajradhāra. This is the secret that has no teacher — it is to be kept in strict secrecy. To one who is without fault and without deceit, who is not hostile toward the commitments (samaya), who holds no nihilistic view, who is devoted to the guru and self-disciplined, who abandons jealousy and attachment, who has entered the maṇḍala — the disciples of the vajra teaching — to them this extensive teaching, this supreme suchness, is to be expounded. The master, endowed with a wisdom consort, shall confer upon them the empowerment. Vajra-nectar, great bliss — thus declared the Blessed Vajrin.

Thus concludes the seventh chapter of the Great Tantra of the Vajra-Nectar of Great Bliss, the Vajra of Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas, entitled "The Teaching on Song and Dance, Empowerment, and the Great Meditation on Suchness."

Then the goddess rose up, laughed, and made this inquiry: "Blessed One, a doubt has arisen in me. From that which is the supreme wonder, born in me — from that peaceful, vajra-natured one — how does a wrathful form arise?"

Then the Blessed Vajrin, through the vajra-nectar of great bliss, in the union of vajra and lotus, manifested a wrathful form: blazing, with a swirling garland of flames, fierce, terrifying even to the terrifying. With four faces and eight arms, adorned with a fearsome crown of skulls; bearing a khaṭvāṅga and holding severed heads, delighting in skulls and blood, fierce, with a writhing garland of intestines, surrounded by eight wisdom consorts, dwelling in the four great charnel grounds, resonant with the sound of the mantra syllable PHAṬ, sporting in the charnel ground together with assemblies of flesh-eating spirit-risen corpses. Beneath him, the subjugated gods with all their sovereigns — Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Great Lord — and the great flesh-devouring Vajrin: the glorious blood-drinker's form was drawn forth.

The first wisdom consort is the Terrifying One — ugly, outcaste, of dark coloring; the golden-complexioned one of noble lineage, the fierce one — these are held to be the eight terrorizers. Having recited these mantras and performed the dance, the melody was taken up. The great terrifying one, gnashing fangs, adorned and strung with a garland of intestines, consuming great pieces of flesh — to the glorious blood-drinker I pay homage.

In order to benefit practitioners, the recitation mantras are now to be explained. The third syllable of the third, joined with the fourth of the seventh; the third again of the seventh — the syllables of the two are arranged as two. All are endowed with suchness, adorned with the half-syllable. Taking out the fourth of the sixth, the substance of the seventh serves as the seat. The thirteenth presses from above — the mantra extracted with svāhā placed at the end. First offered to Vairocana, this is the root mantra of the blood-drinker. Hear now, Māmakī, the great power of this very king of mantras: if this mantra is recited even once, in an instant the three worlds are destroyed. That all beings of the three realms, without remainder, are consumed — of this there is no doubt.

By it all desires are granted;
one becomes equal to the glorious blood-drinker.
Vajra-amṛta, great bliss —
this was taught by the Blessed Vajra One.

This concludes the eighth chapter, called "The Teaching on Generating the Glorious Blood-Drinker," from the Tantra of the Vajra Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas, the Great Bliss Vajra-Amṛta.

Then the form is to be correctly explained through the swirling amṛta. Three faces, six arms — fierce, black, with the light of smoke. With a garland of rays, turbulent and wrathful, eyes red; the eyebrows of the fierce one, red and curling, ablaze. The supremely fierce one overwhelms with splendor. The hands hold the axe of the enemy and strive; the peg, the vajra, and the lasso. With the left hand's threatening gesture of the pointing finger, all enemies are made to tremble. The sword as the hand-symbol is to be meditated upon. Endowed equally with the eight wisdom-consorts, and complete with the gatekeepers. Having meditated upon the secret lotus, the eight wisdom-consorts are arranged upon the petals: Amṛtā, Amṛtamukhā, Amṛtavatī, Amṛtanetrā, Anantagā, Rūpaśobhanā, Subharūpā, and Sukhasiddhā — all three-faced and six-armed, to be stationed at the directions and intermediate directions. Striving to hold lotuses in their hands, these goddesses dance, bestowing excellent offerings of various forms, and act in sport and play. The king of mantras is to be extracted and again offered to Vairocana. By these words it is fully arranged: the second of the first — emptiness as the seat, endowed. The mantra that presses from above with emptiness is joined with svāhā at the end.

Having thoroughly and perpetually joined with great delight, drawing out amṛta upon amṛta, by joining amṛta with amṛta, the swirling amṛta is to be accomplished. All aims and all attainments too are swiftly accomplished by this. Whether men or women who call to mind the swirling amṛta — the animate and inanimate three worlds all dwell in the palm of its hand. The vajra-amṛta, great bliss, is to be meditated upon always and without interruption.

This concludes the ninth chapter, called "The Arising of the Glorious Swirling Amṛta," from the Great Tantra of the Vajra Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas, the Great Bliss Vajra-Amṛta, the Great Vajra-Amṛta Tantra.

Then another sādhana of the great zombie is to be explained. On the eighth and fourteenth days of the dark fortnight, at a crossroads, a solitary path, a solitary tree, a charnel ground, a mountain, and a riverbank — all rites are to be accomplished there. Likewise, for the raising of a zombie: women who have died from obstruction, possessed of all marks, outcast women and women with moles, householder women — beautiful, fair, unblemished, praised with thirty-two attributes, twenty-five years of age. Taking hold of the female corpse's hair, wash it with pure water. On a flat stone charged with mantra and medicine, smear it with camphor and white sandalwood. Offer various flowers and incense and present a torma. Having anointed it with great butter, beat the face with white mustard. The practitioner, called the blood-drinker, then draws a maṇḍala upon it. A skull-cup, or a crescent, is to be filled in the manner of a bow. Adorning it with skulls and making it complete with the eight wisdom-consorts — a skull sovereign, endowed with the element of flesh, held with all khaṭvāṅgas — three-faced, in a fierce form, six-armed, holding a sword in the hands. Outside that maṇḍala, the female gatekeepers are to be clearly visualized: one with the ears of an ox, one with the ears of a great elephant — a face both beautiful and a face terrible.

Fierce ones holding lassos and iron hooks,
those who terrify with hideous, fearsome forms —
single-faced, with two hands each,
draw them making flower offerings perfectly.
The wisdom-consorts too, in their various forms,
draw as making offerings to the maṇḍala.

Then the hero-practitioner,
adorned with the great conch shell,
with a garland of skulls binding the head —
meditating upon the form of the blood-drinker,
he beats the hand-drum upon it,
dances, and enters the chamber.
Upon its heart-center, the mantra of harm —
the syllable BHYO — is to be recited upon it.
After making offerings at the deity's maṇḍala,
it is to be consecrated with the great blood.

The moment the practitioner recites
the great mantra of the glorious blood-drinker,
an angry groan is to be uttered,
and the risen corpse begins to cry out loudly.
At that time the mantra-holder must not be afraid;
let him keep the blood-drinker's mantra in mind.
And that risen corpse, having arisen,
speaks these words to the practitioner:

"O great hero, O vajra-holder —
whatever you command,
whether sword-eye ointment, the underworld,
or travel through the sky,
whatever the practitioner desires —
all those works I shall accomplish."

Then the practitioner arouses in mind
whatever desires he holds.
All of these are to be accomplished.

The fully blossomed Māmakī
is supreme for accomplishing the risen corpse.
She is born from the vajra ambrosia.

For the sake of accomplishing the body, speech, and mind,
she also draws forth the bliss of the practitioner.

Vajra ambrosia, great bliss —
so declared the Blessed One Vajradhara.

This concludes the tenth chapter, entitled "The Teaching on the Accomplishment of the Risen Corpse," from the Great Tantra of the Vajra Ambrosia of Great Bliss, the vajra of the body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One Vajradhara,
within the Vajra Ambrosia of Great Bliss,
united vajra and lotus in union
and sat in great silence, saying nothing.
With breath suspended, unmoving from within,
fearless and without speech,
he had entered the supreme meditative absorption.
Then Māmakī asked again:

"Blessed One — the subtle vajra
abides within the minds of all sentient beings.
By what means, and in what manner,
can that suchness be attained?"

Then the Blessed One Vajradhara,
within the Vajra Ambrosia of Great Bliss,
laughed, and opening his eyes,
he spoke and declared:

"This same truth, as previously explained —
the form of ambrosia is the vital essence.
Endowed with the five ambrosias,
it is to be tasted constantly, without interruption.
Listen, Māmakī, to the powers
of each of these substances one by one.
The vital essence, which accomplishes
what is to be known as primordial wisdom,
is to be consumed in its pure form.
For accomplishing body, speech, and mind,
the great bliss is to be fully cultivated —

always take it from women
or from girls, continually.
The great blood, O Māmakī,
is the agent that accomplishes every purpose.

If one finds the flesh of a fierce and violent death,
the great flesh too is to be consumed.
Whether impaled on a stake, strangled,
or slain in battle —
if one eats that with deep understanding and instruction,
life will increase and illness will be no more.
Likewise, the bliss of desire,
the accomplishment of buddhahood and awakening,
living in the manner of Vajrasattva —
all of these fruits are granted by that.

Know that the vajra water and urine
are to be consumed by oneself.
Having ground them into fine powder,
they are to be mixed with the great blood.
In the morning, likewise at midday,
and in the evening they are to be consumed.
Having eaten at these three times,
the yogin then drinks the vajra water.

Day by day, O Māmakī,
the practitioner who pursues this practice
will have no illness in the body,
and the sickness of old age will be no more.
Endowed with the splendor of excellent merit in full bloom,
it leads to victory even at the king's gate.
Since it grants every desire,
one attains that which is supremely excellent.
That yogin becomes one who knows all things,
endowed with the qualities of Vajrasattva.
Freed from attachment and from aversion —" freed from craving and from envy —
the vajra amṛta of great bliss:

by that, accomplishment is accomplished.

This tantra of the vajra amṛta,
rich in meaning and arranged in secret stages,
this entire vajra vehicle —
all of it has arisen from this, O Goddess!

The lotus of Māmakī, fully bloomed,
grants bliss through desire.
When I reveal to you this sacred substance,
I reveal it to no one else at all.
This is the supreme great secret.
It abides in me, the master of all pure minds.

Since the bodhisattvas do not know it,
and the formless cannot transform to emptiness,
therefore that same reality is the great vidyā,
desired as the vajra crown-jewel.

Keeping it supremely secret, O Goddess of the dhāraṇī,
do not reveal it even to father or to child.
If one desires the supreme attainment,
one teaches the secret in the seat of practice,
maintains firm devotion and conduct toward the guru,
and having offered to that one, one then reveals the reality itself.

This tantra of the vajra amṛta —
accomplishing bliss — is exceedingly difficult to obtain.
For the fortunate and peaceful who are perfectly complete,
it is an essence that gathers all gnosis together.

From the great tantra of the vajra amṛta,
whoever among practitioners receives empowerment —
the buddhas, bodhisattvas, and all awakening minds bow down to that one entirely.
Having made three prostrations,
that vajra master of supreme good fortune
is declared to be the foremost leader who guides all sentient beings out of saṃsāra.

The vajra amṛta of great bliss —
thus it was spoken by the Blessed Vajra One.
The great tantra of the vajra amṛta,
having been taught by the Teacher to the Joyful One, Vajradhara then dwelt in great expanse
in a subtle form.

This concludes the eleventh chapter, entitled "The Teaching of the Method for Accomplishing the Five Amṛtas," from the great tantra of the vajra amṛta of great bliss, the vajra of body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas: the Vajra Amṛta.

Translator's Notes

- The term "bhaga" in the text is a Sanskrit loanword used explicitly in the Tibetan original and carries its tantric technical meaning of the female sexual organ as a sacred site of offering and ritual union. It is retained here as a technical term appropriate to the Vajrayāna context of the text.

The figure described as "great secret vidyā with three faces and six hands" is the central deity of this maṇḍala. The three face colors — black (front), white (right), red (left) — follow a standard wrathful tantric iconographic scheme.

The phrase rendered "milking" follows the Tibetan རྩལ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, which literally means "to pour milk" or "to milk," used throughout this passage as a technical euphemism for the tantric sexual ritual context. The translation preserves the Tibetan's own language as closely as possible.

- The five "vajra nectars" named here — flesh, blood, excrement, urine, and semen — are a standard antinomian list in certain Vajrayāna tantric contexts and appear here in explicit ritual framing. The text belongs to the tradition of transgressive or "left-hand" tantras, and the passage as a whole is a technical tantric prescription rather than literal behavioral instruction in most commentarial readings, though the text itself presents it literally.

The Tibetan term "sid sgra" rendered as "siddha mantra" or "siddha tone" is a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit compound; the precise reading is uncertain, and it may indicate a specific mantra associated with a siddhi. This is noted as a point of minor textual difficulty.

The phrase rendered "the three levels" translates "sa gsum," literally "three grounds" or "three earths," which in tantric context can refer to the three realms or three planes of accomplishment. The exact referent is context-dependent and commentarily variable.

- The term bhaga is a Sanskrit loanword used without translation in the Tibetan, referring to the sacred female generative center in tantric anatomy and ritual; it is retained here as a technical term consistent with its context in highest yoga tantra literature.

The phrase rendered "the forms of madness and intoxication, delusion and desire in their very suchness" reflects a deliberate tantric inversion: qualities ordinarily classed as afflictions are here asserted to be, in their essential nature, suchness itself. This is a doctrinal point, not a textual difficulty.

The colophon names the tantra as the Vajra Nectar Great Tantra, and the chapter title as "The Display of the Wisdom of Suchness and Union," translating the closing colophon phrase de bzhin nyid sbyor ba ye shes bstan pa.

The final line "From the Vajra of Great Bliss, the Evoker" is the opening of the next chapter and is cut off mid-sentence in the supplied passage; it is rendered as presented.

- The term rendered "hermaphrodite syllable" translates ma ning yi ge, referring to a category of tantric syllable classification in which letters are neither masculine nor feminine — a technical designation found in tantric phonology. The precise identity of the specific syllable intended here is not made explicit in the passage itself.

The section containing actual mantras presents liturgical formulas in a mixed Sanskrit-Tibetan transliteration. These are preserved in transliterated form rather than translated, following standard practice for dhāraṇī and mantra material. The syllable sequences oṃ vajra amṛta mahāsukha and svāhā are retained as they appear.

The phrase rendered "having inserted the vajra into Māmakī" follows the literal Tibetan and should be understood in the context of tantric union practice described throughout the text, where physical union is both a ritual act and a vehicle for the transmission of the teaching.

The closing line — "the bodhisattva Vajrasattva, the dancer" — is the opening phrase of the next section, included in the Tibetan block as it falls before the chapter break indicated by the colophon of chapter three. It has been rendered to preserve continuity with the preceding passage supplied.

- The term rendered "śruta and others" translates srul po la sogs pa. Srul po likely refers to a class of malevolent spirit or corpse-demon; the precise identification is uncertain and I have left a transliterated near-equivalent in the text rather than invent a rendering.

The syllables "hara nupura" are from a Sanskrit dhāraṇī phrase within the Tibetan mantra passage; nupura means "ankle-bells" and hara is likely a verb form meaning "carry" or "take away," or possibly a vocative of a name. The passage is treated as liturgical mantra and transliterated accordingly.

The four goddess names listed with the syllable Hrī on the five limbs — Locanā, Tārā, Pāṇḍaravāsīnī, and Māmakī — correspond to the four consort-goddesses of the standard Vajrayāna maṇḍala. The Tibetan reads spyān ma sgrol ma gos dkar ma, yid dga' ma, which are the standard Tibetan equivalents.

The phrase rendered "great flesh" (sha chen) in tantric context typically denotes one of the five meats used in inner offering; this is standard Vajrayāna liturgical terminology.

- The term bhaga in this passage carries its Tantric technical sense — the ritual seat or receptacle of the goddess — and in the sādhana context refers to the divine source from which the accomplishment arises. The text belongs to a Yoginī-tantra context in which deliberately transgressive imagery is standard. The phrase "the gall of a vulture" renders a standard ingredient list in Tantric eye-ointment recipes; "applicators of human bone" refers to the ritual stylus used to apply the collyrium.

The colophon marks the end of Chapter Four of the tantra. The subsequent material beginning with the eye-ointment instruction constitutes the opening of a new chapter (Chapter Five by implication), though no explicit chapter heading is given in the passage provided.

- The passage is a ritual-instruction text (sādhana/kriyātantra) with wrathful and transgressive elements typical of certain early Vajrayāna tantras. Several ritual substances mentioned — described as "great flesh" and bodily effluents — are standard terminology for the transgressive substances of the caturmudra or pañcamakāra ritual context; the translations follow the literal Tibetan.

The mantra Om Hriḥ Ṣṭhri Vikṛtānana Sarva Śatrūn Vināśaya Stambhaya Mārāya Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ is rendered as found, preserving the Sanskrit without normalization of the unusual syllable ṣṭhri, which may be a corrupt or esoteric form.

The phrase rendered "the executioner of Yama" (gśin rje'i gśed) refers to Yamāntaka, the wrathful deity who destroys even Yama, Lord of Death.

"Arka" is Calotropis gigantea, a plant used in tantric ritual contexts.

"Trailokavijaya" refers to the tantra or deity Trailokyavijaya — the "Conqueror of the Three Realms" — from which the maṇḍala ritual is said to derive.

The final sentence is left incomplete as the Tibetan passage itself breaks off mid-sentence at this point.

- The phrase rendered "the dance of the brow's movement" translates a compound involving the eyebrow and dance; the precise choreographic term is unclear but the general sense is a named gesture or movement of the brow in the dance sequence. This is a highly technical tantric performance vocabulary and some nuance may be lost.

The colophon closing the sixth chapter appears mid-passage in the source text and has been rendered accordingly as a chapter colophon, after which the new section begins.

The term rendered "lotus-bell" for bha-ga ling-ga translates a compound of the Sanskrit bhaga (vulva) and liṅga (phallus), which in tantric usage designates the union of the two; the translation preserves the symbolic register without explicit anatomical terminology, consistent with the elevated register of the passage.

- The mantra construction passage is a technical cryptographic description encoding the root mantra of the blood-drinking deity through a cipher system referencing syllabic positions. The exact phonemes cannot be recovered without the root mantra text itself; the passage is translated structurally as given.

The colophon-like line mid-passage marks the close of Chapter Seven before the dialogue with the goddess resumes, which is unusual structurally — this reflects the Tibetan text's own formatting and is translated faithfully.

- The eight wisdom-consorts named in this passage are given in Tibetan terms that I have rendered by their Sanskrit equivalents reconstructed from the Tibetan: Amṛtā, Amṛtamukhā, Amṛtaviṭī, Amṛtanetrā, Anantagā, Rūpaśobhanā, Subharūpā, and Sukhasiddhā. The Sanskrit forms are reconstructed from the Tibetan and may differ slightly from attested canonical Sanskrit equivalents.

The phrase rendered "the second of the first — emptiness as the seat" mirrors the parallel mantra-extraction passage in the preceding chapter and uses the same deliberately cryptic coding language for syllable selection; the exact phonetic referent is intentionally obscure within the text itself.

- The passage is a chapter-colophon followed by the opening of a new chapter. The colophon closes chapter ten of the Vajrāmṛta cycle and gives the full tantra title in prose; this is rendered as a single closing sentence in the translation rather than as verse, following the structural convention of Tibetan tantric colophons.

The term rendered "vital essence" throughout is the Tibetan transliteration khu ba, which corresponds to Sanskrit śukra or bindu, here referring to seminal or regenerative essence as the first of the five ambrosias in this antinomian tantric context. The doctrinal and ritual context is that of a left-hand Mahāyoga or early Yoginī-tantra system in which transgressive substances function as ritual implements and meditative supports.

The phrase "sword-eye ointment" renders ral gri mig sman, a compound referring to a magical eye-salve enabling the wielder to perceive or cut through hindrances, a recognized siddhi listed in tantra literature.

- The phrase rendered "the Blessed Vajra One" translates Bcom ldan rdo rje, which may be a title of Vajrasattva or Vajradhara as the teaching deity throughout this tantra; the closing lines suggest Vajradhara specifically, and the subsequent mention of rdo rje can by name supports reading these as references to Vajradhara.

The expression "the Joyful One" renders dga' ma, which in tantric colophon language commonly denotes a specific consort or ḍākinī figure who received the transmission; the precise identity is text-specific and not determinable from context alone.

The phrase "formless cannot transform to emptiness" is doctrinally compressed and likely refers to the inability of those in the formless realm, or beings lacking form, to engage the embodied practices of the vajra vehicle; the exact nuance depends on the broader tantra's philosophical framework.
