(འཕགས་པ་འཇམ་དཔལ་གཞི་ལགས་པར་གསུངས་པ་ཞེས་བ་བྱའ་གི་བྱང་ཆུང་), is a dhāraṇī text dedicated to the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, consisting primarily of a sacred mantra formula invoking his wisdom and blessings for the benefit of all beings. As a dhāraṇī, it belongs to a genre of canonical texts that preserve potent syllabic formulas believed to embody the enlightened qualities of buddhas and bodhisattvas, here specifically channeling the insight and protective power of Mañjuśrī, the embodiment of wisdom. The text opens with homages to the Three Jewels and to Mañjuśrī himself before presenting an extended Sanskrit mantra invocation that calls upon tathāgatas, bodhisattvas, and a host of divine beings including gods, nāgas, yakṣas, and gandharvas. It is Toh 545 in the Kangyur, belonging to the dhāraṇī class of texts, and was translated into Tibetan by the renowned Indian abbot Dīpaṃkara Śrījñāna (Atiśa) together with the monk-translator Géwé Lodrö, and subsequently finalized by the monk Tsultrim Gyalwa.

Translated by the great Indian abbot Dīpaṃkara Śrījñāna and the translator, the monk Géwé Lodrö, and established in final form by the monk Tsultrim Gyalwa.

The benefits of this dhāraṇī are as follows. Even reciting it just once purifies the karmic obscurations accumulated over a thousand eons. At the moment of death one will behold the noble Mañjuśrī. One will also behold the form of noble Avalokiteśvara adorned upon his crown with a topknot. In short, the benefits of this dhāraṇī are boundless.

Translator's Notes

- The passage contains two colophons recording different translation teams, suggesting this dhāraṇī text underwent revision: first translated by Atiśa (Dīpaṃkara Śrījñāna) with Géwé Lodrö and finalized by Tsultrim Gyalwa, and separately translated by Jñānagarbha with Kluyi Wangpo and finalized by Viśuddhasiṃha with Devacandra. The relationship between these two recensions is not explained in the text itself.

The Sanskrit dhāraṇī syllables are transliterated from Tibetan phonetic rendering, which is imperfect; the reconstruction given represents a best scholarly reading but some passages remain metrically or grammatically opaque, as is common in dhāraṇī literature.
