The Extensive Commentary on the Condensed Meaning of the Hevajra Tantra, known in Sanskrit as Hevajrapañḍārthaṭīkā and in Tibetan as Kyé Dorjé düpé dön gyi gyaché drelpa, is a commentary on the Hevajra Tantra, one of the major texts of the Buddhist tantric tradition. It opens with homage to glorious Hevajra and a verse of praise to the deity, then moves into an explanation of his symbolism, in which the deity's eight faces, sixteen hands, and other features are read as embodiments of liberations, emptinesses, and compassions. As an exegetical work, it aims to draw out the meaning of the root tantra's condensed teachings and to guide practitioners toward realizing the deity's nature. It is Toh 1180 in the Tengyur, the canonical collection of Indian treatises and commentaries, where it belongs to the tantra commentary class.

In the Indian language: Hevajrapañḍārthaṭīkā. In the Tibetan language: The Extensive Commentary on the Condensed Meaning of the Hevajra Tantra.

Homage to glorious Hevajra.

He has set aside all worldly conduct; the very nature of the Victors, he is ever present and all-pervading. He is without any duality, free of stain, beyond the senses, and the knower of all bliss. He is Evam, the supreme, the peaceful. His mind is not a mind, and that mind is not insentient matter; he is the sovereign of all faculties. He is the very essence of all the buddhas, the nectar body. To realize him I pay homage.

The eight qualities arise from the utterly vanquished; the eight liberations are the eight faces of the principal deity. The emptinesses are the sixteen hands, and the compassions are these skull cups. The fifty unchanging syllables, which express suchness, are arranged as his garland of heads, strung upon his shoulders. In his crown is Akṣobhya, and he bears a half moon, a garland of vajras, and the nature of the skull cup. He stands trampling the māras beneath his fair feet, together with Maitreya and the others and the Vimokṣas.

The afflictive and cognitive obscurations are gathered together; his chest bears the mudrā of union and a tiger skin. The māras and the other obscurations are like a mere fragment to him. He is adorned for the sake of sentient beings. Having bowed to him, I shall write this commentary that explains the secret of his tantra.

Wishing to benefit all sentient beings, the glorious Vajragarbha, sovereign of the ten grounds, drew forth from the great tantra of five hundred thousand verses a brief tantra, well extracted, so that yogis might gain the path. This tantra, which holds many vajra words in seven hundred and fifty verses, was requested by Hevajra himself. The text is six thousand verses long. Whatever follows the root tantra, this serves to clarify the meaning of this tantra.

In this age of the five degenerations, there will arise teachers who proclaim the conduct of yoga but do not abide on the true path. Without a commentary they teach the brief tantra, with evil practice, desiring the wives and wealth of others, and are strongly bent on going to hell. Some, lacking the five clairvoyances and the like, will compose commentaries. Through the pride of logical treatises they will despise the practice of yoga. Buddha Vajrasattva himself, they say, has taken hold of them through the empowerment with great effort. Some will tell people, "I am a vajra holder." They will not bow to any monks who keep the vows of moral discipline. Standing on the ground, these so-called vajra holders will say that they themselves, white-robed householders, deserve homage. Merchants, people of low class, and those who delight in the work of farmers, the deluded who sell the sacred Dharma and enjoy what should not be enjoyed, belonging to the family of Māra, will become the teachers of disciples. Using the pretense of yogic conduct they hide their own faults, and to remove blame from themselves they will certainly come to speak. A disciple should never find fault with the qualities a teacher is to be held to possess. Fault-finding here brings no accomplishment; of this there is no doubt whatever. A wise person should not take as teacher one who is without compassion, cruel in anger, arrogant, unrestrained in desire, and self-praising. These words should not be spoken to disciples in any way.

Those who are merciless in their deeds, wrathful, and wounding to the vital points, who are cruel, who hate monks and people, who are stiff and puffed up with evil knowledge, who have great desires and seek what is not to be sought, who drink liquor to excess and are unrestrained, who praise themselves here and find fault with those of true qualities: they do not understand what is meant when it is said that the Tathāgatas, dwelling in the world realms of the ten directions, come in the three times and pay homage to the vajra teacher who has received the supreme empowerment. Deluded by mere names, they slander the lords of the Victors and will go to wailing.

The one who received empowerment from Vajrasattva at his crown, beneath the tree of awakening, and who has gained the supreme empowerment, is the vajra teacher, to whom the Tathāgatas pay homage. The bodhisattvas of the ten directions, in as many bodies as there are world realms, dwelling there with their five aggregates, come in the three times and pay homage. Then the precious crown, and the various objects of the world realms, and the buddhas who dwell there pay homage: that is the yogī vajra teacher.

As is explained in symbolic language: Vairocana is urine and semen; likewise Akṣobhya and Amitābha. In this way the vajra holder, the teacher, bestows the mudrās of feces, urine and semen, just as the teacher gives the accomplishments of body, speech and mind. In this way the vajra holder bestows them. Among disciples and yogis, conventionally and ultimately, there is the empowerment in the maṇḍala and beneath the tree of awakening, the earlier and the later. There are teachings with intention and without intention, with literal sense and not literal; likewise definitive meaning and provisional meaning. The tantra has the characteristics of the six alternatives.

Whatever qualities of the teacher are shown here in conventional terms are the qualities of Vajrasattva: the characteristics such as the six clairvoyances. He is steady, tamed, and wise; patient, upright, without deceit; he knows the application of mantra and tantra; he is compassionate and skilled in the treatises. He fully knows the ten aspects of suchness, is skilled in the work of drawing the maṇḍala, is of serene nature, and has subdued his faculties. Such is the teacher who holds the secret mantra. One who has these qualities that have been explained becomes a monk holding the vajra. Novices and householders are not like these; the ten are not equal to the monk here. It is explained that those who have the ten bases of training, those who have the five bases of training, and those who have the limit of the bases of training are not equal, these three.

As was taught in the root tantra, the state of the monk who holds the vajra, and whatever pleases the teacher, should be told to the disciple. Questioned by Nairātmyā, the Vajra One spoke these words in due order of stages, in order to give the bases of training.

First, the five bases of training, together with the restoration ceremony and the rest, are to be given along with the complete abandoning of the ten non-virtues; having given them, one makes the person a lay practitioner. Then, having given the ten bases of training, one makes him a novice. Then, having given the countless bases of training, one makes him a monk, one who takes up the discipline of conduct. After that he should come to know the Prātimokṣa, then the system of the Vaibhāṣikas, then, having learned the sūtra tradition, the Vijñānavāda's own teaching. Then he should know the Perfection of Wisdom and the Middle Way, the intended meaning of the Buddha. Having thus listened to other tantras, he should then come to know the Hevajra.

From the definitive emergence of the three vehicles, one rests in the fruit of a single vehicle. The śrāvaka, the solitary buddha, and here the Great Vehicle are three. A fourth and a fifth vehicle among Buddhists are not the intention of the Sage.

Emptiness, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, is first the cause; then, through aspiration, comes compassion; and afterwards the fruit is working for the welfare of beings. One who, having accomplished his own aim, then works for the aim of others, is a wise person. One who is himself afflicted by suffering and poor, how could he give to others? One who is endowed with happiness and sovereign abundance exerts himself out of compassion for the sake of beings. For those who seek cause and fruit: as long as the cause has not been made manifest, until then, from what could a fruit arise at the start without a cause?

Other vehicles are spoken of here alongside the Great Vehicle; this is for the sake of rest, namely the practices of giving, moral discipline, and the like, which are not themselves the goal. The emptiness of all phenomena, I have taught, is what brings about definitive emergence. From that cause which brings about emergence, and then by the power of aspiration, the great fruit whose nature is compassion arises without any focal object. Compassion is taught as threefold: with sentient beings as its object, with phenomena as its object, and without an object. The compassion that does only a little for the welfare of a lifetime takes sentient beings and phenomena as its object. The accomplished bodhisattvas, who abide on the ten grounds, have it as their very nature. The Sugatas, whose twelve links have ceased and whose nature abides on all the grounds, are said to work for the welfare of beings without a focal object.

Whatever the cause is like, such is the fruit. Even in some kodrava, śāli rice will not arise. As the seed, so the tree; as the tree, so the fruit. In the beginning, the middle, and the end, the word of the Sage is virtuous. At first, from a cause accompanied by conceptual thought, a fruit accompanied by conceptual thought arises; for all Buddhists there is conceptual thought, and in the end the fruit is not emptiness. It is as when, at first, to purify fields, one sows kodrava, and afterwards sows the seed of śāli in the purified field. Beings born on the ground of karma are said to be impure fields. Those born in the six impure destinies are spoken of as the fruit of virtue and non-virtue. In the pure field of human birth, because the seed of compassion without a focal object is sown, there springs up the wish-fulfilling tree of emptiness. From the wish-fulfilling tree of emptiness, the fruit of objectless compassion arises, once all beings have been thought of. There is no doubt about this.

To a person who lacks the fortune for the profound and vast teachings, I have taught whatever is pleasing, such as mudrās, maṇḍalas, and mantras. Those future teachers who, through mudrās, maṇḍalas, mantras, and the like, would point out the buddha Vajrasattva himself are of the lineage of Māra. Therefore, for a monk of the Great Vehicle, the teacher is said to be the Vajradhara, one who fully understands the three vehicles and who shows the compendium of the Dharma.

Among the Vedic and other systems and the yogas made by Īśvara and others, and among the mantra tantras of the Buddhists, there is a difference in regard to emptiness. Whoever, deluded in his nature, does not know this causes all his disciples to fall. Without an agent there is no action; without action there is no fruit. "The great illusion, the great fierce one, who brings forth and withdraws, himself the seizer, himself the doer, himself the king, himself the chief": thus the illusion of Īśvara was also taught by Īśvara, in the tenets of the non-Buddhists who hold peace. Viṣṇu, through the teaching of songs, tames the difficult to tame, and he too protects well: "Whenever on this earth the Dharma becomes weak and what is not Dharma advances, then I take birth, in order to protect the good and to destroy the evildoers. For the sake of establishing the Dharma, I come forth from age to age." Knowing in this way all those who teach the Dharma wrongly, the Hevajra himself urged me to compose a commentary.

Homage to the supreme body of intrinsic nature, who is worshipped by the three worlds, stainless; to the one called Dharma, the enjoyment body, the teacher who has truly abandoned happiness and suffering; and to the emanation, who in the sky shows manifold miraculous displays, like an illusion or a conjuror's trick. Having bowed, I shall explain briefly the definitive meaning of the secret words of this condensed tantra.

This brief Hevajra tantra of the buddhas, which is here made especially clear, is the first of the five hundred thousand, the tantra assembly of one hundred thousand verses; and it is the great compilation known as the Abhidhāna of the thousand-fold redactions, and the assembly of the tantra of the Kings of tantras. Elsewhere too, where the Victor gave teaching for humans, the meaning is understood through commentaries. Whoever relies on the brief tantra without a commentary and teaches its secret words is like a blind man, after a snake has entered the water, gazing at the trail long after it has gone. In all the tantras the Victor taught not only the definitive meaning but also the provisional meaning. If the provisional meaning were made clear by a commentary, there would be no point in realizing the definitive.

The Victor's tantras, all of them, are taught with intended meaning and without intended meaning. Others are taught in accordance with the sound, and not in accordance with the sound; and both definitive meaning and provisional meaning are shown.

The aggregates, the elements, and the like, so long as they are stained, are not themselves the deity here. The deity's faces and hands are not perfect buddhahood; they are deliberately imputed by conceptual thought.

The tantras that the Blessed One taught, the Guhyasamāja and the others, encircled by the six alternatives, humble the pride of the learned in the treatises. How could they be grasped by mere reasoning?

This knowing of the three times, exact as a reflection in a mirror, is a wisdom free of the net of concepts of existence and non-existence; it is nonduality itself.

The Blessed One spoke of the thirty-two channels through which the seminal essence descends in great bliss, reaching the throat, and likewise what is in the heart, the navel and the secret place. And what of the descent reaching the joints of the hands and feet and the joints of the fingers? The Victor never spoke of these to me, the Essence of Hevajra.

What was taught to the monks and people of the monastery was likewise in no language other than Māgadhī. What the Blessed One taught in the three collections accords with the tradition of the Sthaviras, for a particular remedy suits a particular illness, so as to cure that particular disease.

These are the four reliances, beginning with reliance on the meaning, and not on the letters and words. The Blessed One, who teaches all phenomena at once in the languages of the gods, asuras, nāgas, yakṣas and others, wondrous and beyond all worldly comparison, spoke in that voice. So, too, with "Thus have I..." and the like, well constructed and possessing the proper characteristics: why should the learned not marvel at the claim that it was taught in the monastery?

The body of the Blessed One, Ḍākinī-like, endowed with every supreme quality, like a conjuring trick, like an illusion: the child and the wise grasp it differently, and its definitive explanation is this. It is adorned with the thirty-two major marks and the eighty fine minor marks. The aggregates, elements, sense faculties and objects dwell together within the maṇḍala.

Fools always want to know dependent origination as arising and coming forth. Reckonings of destruction and birth, of lunar days and planetary movements, are taught in other tantras. Some children want curd without milk, and some want milk with no cow having been born; where there is no application, what fault lies with the one who does not know?

By "Hevajra" the Cakra of Great Bliss and the four seats should be understood. By "Hevajra" and the Cakra of Great Bliss, this short text should be understood through the four seats. By the supreme first Buddha-word and by the Great Bliss, the definitive meaning should be understood. As for tantras of this kind, and other tantras, they are always to be known through teaching and extensive explanation; by commentary, for those who desire the path.

This is the first complete verse, praising the deity desired through the six-thousand-verse commentary on Hevajra and entering into the tantra.

Now the teaching of the tantra is to be explained. Here, first, the Blessed One, clearly seeing the subject to be expressed, the expression, the connection, the purpose, and the purpose of the purpose, grants buddhahood in this very life to beings to be trained who are without certainty, according to the disposition of their own minds. Dwelling in the syllables E and VAM, encircled by a net of ḍākinīs, absorbed in the samādhi of Hevajra, petitioned by Vajragarbha, and also questioned by Nairātmyā, he taught this seven-hundred-verse tantra, a short tantra with its half, extracted from the five hundred thousand verses of the Hevajra. The subject to be expressed here is the Blessed One Hevajra together with Nairātmyā. The king of tantras, the collection of chapters that realizes this, is the expression. The relation of subject and expression between them is the connection. Giving the empowerments, such as entry into the maṇḍala, is the purpose. Having empowered, making suchness clear is the purpose of the purpose. Clearly seeing these, he taught to beings to be trained who are without certainty, that is, who are without the vows of the śrāvakas. "According to the disposition of their own minds" means with the mind that partakes of the five desires. "Grants buddhahood in this very life" means repeatedly in a human birth, and not in the birth of gods, asuras and the like.

"Dwelling in the syllables E and VAM" means dwelling in the ground of all bliss. "Encircled by a net of ḍākinīs" means by those having the characteristics of aggregates, elements and sense sources. "Absorbed in the samādhi of Hevajra, petitioned by Vajragarbha, fully questioned by the wisdom Nairātmyā": from the root tantra of Hevajra, in five hundred thousand verses and thirty-two great sections, the short tantra was fully awakened to. The tantra gathered within the measure of a text of seven hundred verses with its half, comprising twenty-two chapters, the second section, characterized by the net of illusion, was completely taught by the Blessed One Vajrasattva. By the worldly and supramundane truths, for the sake of worldly and supramundane accomplishments, he taught that the wheel of the maṇḍala is to be meditated upon through the generation and completion stages, and through meditation on suchness.

In this tantra the subject to be expressed is Hevajra, and the tantra of Hevajra is the expression.

That which is to be expressed also abides in the very nature of what expresses it. First it abides in the nature of the chapter on the vajra family; then in the nature of the chapter on mantra; then in the nature of the chapter on the deities; likewise in the nature of the chapter on empowering the deities; in the nature of the chapter on suchness; in the nature of the chapter on conduct; in the nature of the chapter on the symbolic language and the settling of the topics; in the nature of the chapter on the gathering of the yoginī wheel; in the nature of the chapter on purification; in the nature of the chapter on empowerment; and in the nature of the chapter on the king of tantras, the manifest and complete awakening. These are the eleven summary verses, and they belong to the first chapter.

Next comes the chapter on the Net of Illusion. "Illusion" means the ḍākinī, and "net" means the assembly. "Saṃvara" means the gathering, and the phrase "together with the Herukas" is a statement of certainty.

In this very tantra, first the following abide in the nature of their chapters: consecration, fire offering, hearth, the various rites, and the chapter on offerings. Then there is the chapter on settling the accomplishments. Likewise there is the introduction to all the tantras, together with the chapter on the symbolic language; the chapter on the meaning of the condensed mudrās of all the tantras; the chapter on the manifestation of Hevajra; the purification of the mudrās, together with the determination of how to draw painted images and write books; the chapter on the rite of eating; the characteristics of the lotus bearer, together with the chapter on taming disciples; the purification of the deities, together with the chapter on gathering the mantras; the chapter on reciting the mantras; and the introduction on yoga through the meaning of the coemergent, together with the granting of permission. Thus the tantra abides in its own nature as consisting of twenty-two chapters.

The Blessed One Hevajra addressed Vajragarbha, and there the Blessed One declared: The essence of the body, speech and mind of all the Tathāgatas is wisdom, which is great bliss. That itself, noble one, is more secret than the secret, and must be hidden, indeed carefully hidden, from those who delight in conceptual meditation.

"Eh-ma! Vajragarbha, one of great compassion, excellent, excellent! Vajrasattva, bodhisattva, great being, essence of the samaya being, listen to what is called Hevajra." This the Blessed One spoke, and it is stated at the end of the place of dwelling. Therefore the place where the mantra dwells is to be stated as what the Blessed One spoke. Afterwards come the Blessed One's words of urging and the request made by Vajragarbha.

"Thus did I hear at one time: the Blessed One dwelt in the bhagas of the vajra ladies, the body, speech and mind of all the Tathāgatas." This is the sentence about dwelling.

Now, regarding the words "Thus did I hear at one time," whose words are they? Are they those of the speaker, the omniscient one, or of the compiler who makes the request? In either case there is a fault with regard to the provisional meaning. If the speaker were to teach what he himself had heard in a past time, then he would lack wisdom concerning the future, since he knows only by having heard it from another. If they belong to the compiler, then the words "thus" and so on would be pointless, since Vajrasattva did not speak them. Therefore this sentence is to be understood as of definitive meaning by way of another symbolic language.

Its definitive meaning is this: The syllable E, the excellent divider, adorned in its center with VAM, is the abode of all bliss, the jewel casket of the buddhas.

This is great bliss, Vajrasattva. He himself is the speaker, "I," who is great bliss. "Heard" means known. "By me" means by myself. "At one time" means at the moment of manifest and complete awakening in a single instant. "The Blessed One" is great bliss. "All the Tathāgatas," in symbolic language, are the five aggregates. "Their body, speech and mind, the vajra ladies": the functions of body, speech and mind, the vajra ladies, are the elements such as space, which are the qualities of the object. Through the distinctions of the life-breath moving in and out, and of the one, two, three, four and five qualities, they dwell in the bhagas of the lotuses at the crown, the forehead, the throat, the heart and the navel. And through the distinction of three qualities, they abide at the navel, the secret place and the vajra jewel. By the distinctions of joy and the rest, the awakening mind dwells in these.

In reverse order, the reverse of this: when the qualities are exhausted, it dwells in the vajra jewel and the secret place; when the objects are exhausted, it dwells in these: the navel, the heart, the throat, the forehead and the crown. This is by the distinctions of the concordant cause and so on. Thus the elements, aggregates and so on are to be expressed completely, through the absence of obscuration, as the activity of great bliss.

The syllable E is Locanā. The syllable VAM̐ is Māmakī. The syllable MA is Pāṇḍaravāsini. The syllable YĀ is Tārā. The syllable ŚRU is Vajradhātviśvarī. The syllable TAM̐ is Prajñāpāramitā.

Next come the aggregates. The syllable E is Vajrasattva. The syllable KA is Akṣobhya. The syllable SMIN is Amoghasiddhi. The syllable SA is Ratnasambhava. The syllable MA is Amitābha. The syllable YE is Vairocana. The syllable BHA is Gandhavajrā. The syllable GA is Rasavajrā. The syllable VĀN is Rūpavajrā. The syllable SA is Sparśavajrā. The syllable RBA is Śabdavajrā. The syllable TA is Dharmadhātuvajrā. The syllable THĀ is Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin. The syllable GA is Avalokiteśvara. The syllable TA is Kṣitigarbha. The syllable KĀ is Ākāśagarbha. The syllable YA is Vajrapāṇi.

The letter vāk is Samantabhadra. In this way the twelve sense sources are complete. The letter tsi is the goddess who makes stiffness. The letter tta is the goddess of pride. The letter ba is the goddess who makes dullness. The letter jra is the goddess of intense diligence. The letter yo is the goddess of deep blue. The letter ṣit is the goddess of fierce eyes. The letter bha is Gaṇḍa's beauty. The letter ga is the crown protuberance. The letter ṣu is the Ender of Obstructors. The letter bi is the Ender of Wisdom. The letter ja is the Ender of the Lotus. The letter hā is the Ender of Yama. The letter ra is Vajrasattva, whose nature is wisdom and means, the thirty-seventh chief figure.

Thus the thirty-seven factors of the side of awakening are completely purified, each in its proper order. They are the six elements, the six aggregates, the six objects, the six faculties, the six activities of the faculties of action, the six faculties of action, and great bliss. This is what is meant by "from the exhaustion of the fourth." Therefore they are the four establishments of mindfulness, the four right abandonments, the four bases of miraculous power, the five faculties, the five powers, the noble eightfold path, and the seven limbs of awakening.

Thus from great bliss, from essential nature, arises the Dharma body. From the exhaustion of the fourth, deep sleep is exhausted. From the exhaustion of deep sleep, dream is exhausted. From the exhaustion of dream, waking is exhausted. From the exhaustion of these, in due order, the coemergent body, the Dharma body, the complete enjoyment body, and the emanation body come to be, and wisdom, mind, speech, and body become free of obscuration. Therefore:

Everywhere hands and feet, everywhere eyes and heads and faces, everywhere ears, in the world
he abides, enveloping all.

And therefore:

Partless, all-pervading, all-going,
subtle, undefiled, the seed;
free of dust, dust-less, stainless, rid of faults, without flaw;
fully awakened, the self of awakening,
all-knowing, all-cognizing, the supreme one,
beyond the nature of consciousness, upholding the way of nondual wisdom.

Thus the Blessed One Hevajra, who is freed from all obscurations and whose nature is the four bodies, is the teacher, the lord of the twelve. The bodhisattva Vajragarbha, the lord of the ten, is the one who makes the request. This is the second section, which settles the teacher, the petitioner, the expresser, the expressed, the connection, and the place of dwelling in the Hevajra commentary of six thousand lines.

Now the petition of Vajragarbha and the clear reply of the Blessed One are to be set out. Vajragarbha petitions with the words beginning "By what."

By what does one become a vajra-being?

How does one become a bodhisattva?

Why is one a great being?

How is one the chief of the samaya-being?

Having heard Vajragarbha's petition, the Blessed One declared:

"Indivisible vajra" is the term spoken.

The being is the three existences as one.

By this method of wisdom

one is called a vajra-being.

One who abides in awakening should be called a bodhisattva.

One filled with the flavor of great wisdom

should be called a great being.

Because one always abides in samaya,

one is declared a samaya-being.

The extensive explanation of this summary is made fully clear in the Hundred Thousand, the fifth section. Therefore one should turn to that very text. There the Blessed One declared:

What is taught as "indivisible vajra" is renowned as the letter vam.

The body, speech, and mind that are indivisible are expressed by the letter vam.

The being who is the three existences as one is to be expressed by the letter e.

The letter e is together with wisdom;

the letter vam has the three families as its nature.

The hero who abides in the center of the navel,

the stamen, has the secret as his domain.

Joined to a wisdom like himself,

he is to be called Vajrasattva.

With two hands he is called Heruka.

He himself is the one who shakes the three worlds.

He himself is said to be the essential nature.

That buddha body is great bliss.

He himself becomes the vajra of wisdom.
He himself is coemergent joy,
and he himself has the nature of the congruent cause.
He is called the single-pointed vajra.
That too is the exhaustion of the fourth state, supremely pure and unchanging.

And the one who abides in awakening, who abides in the center of the lotus of the heart,
is declared a being by the letter hūm alone.
He is none other than Akṣobhya.
He is called the vajra of mind.
He is Viṣṇu, four-handed.
He is jvala jvala bhyo.
He is declared to be the Dharma body.
Abiding in the wheel of Dharma, holding the vajra,
he bears the manner of special joy.
He is also declared to be karmic maturation,
the exhausting of deep sleep.

One filled with the flavor of great wisdom
is to be called a great being.
He is truly expressed by the letter āḥ.
At the throat, lord of the enjoyment wheel,
he is to be expressed as Amitābha.
He is declared the vajra of speech,
the Tathāgata with the lotus in hand.
He is declared supreme joy,
to be expressed as the maker of persons.
Conventional and ultimate,
that too is the exhaustion of the dream state.
He becomes the complete enjoyment body;
buddhas teach the Dharma.
He is expressed as the maker of bliss,
three-faced, six-armed,
kiṭi kiṭi vajra.
He becomes the third Heruka.

One who always abides in samaya,
the one who abides is to be expressed:
the samaya is the hare-bearer, the seminal essence, great bliss abiding at the forehead.
The being who abides well in the nectar is fully declared by the letter om̐.
He is called Vairocana.
He is none other than the vajra of body.
Brahmā, holder of the vajra of body,
is himself to be fully expressed.
Joy is the nature of Brahmā;
he is to be expressed as the form body.
He is declared to be the wheel in hand.
The body has the mark of emanation.
By reversal it too is stainless;
he himself is the exhaustion of waking.
He becomes piṭu vajra, called eight-faced Heruka,
the great hero, four-footed,
fully endowed with sixteen arms.
Thus by the divisions of the body,
Heruka is declared to be fourfold.
From the essential nature, the Dharma body arises;
from the Dharma, the complete enjoyment body;
from that, the emanation body arises.
In this way there are four bodies.

Brahmā holds the vajra of body; the Great Lord, Īśvara, holds the vajra of speech; Viṣṇu holds the vajra of mind; and Vajrasattva is great bliss. Thus it is said.

In the Root Tantra it is explained at length: the families are to be spoken of as three; because they possess an essential nature, they are said to be four families. The classification of the families rests on the division of the four activities. One who wishes for the path of awakening, endowed with yoga, should know this.

The letters Evaṃ are Vajrasattva. The syllable Hūṃ is the vajra of mind. The syllable Āḥ is the vajra of speech. The syllable Om̐ is the vajra of body. As for Evaṃ, the meaning to be realized through the name of each of the letters

Hūṃ, Āḥ, and Om is not to be grasped by the letter or the name. Here there is no substantial reality of the name; for if there were, it would then be something grasped by the mind and the eye, and that is not so. Therefore the ear grasps only the name, whereas the meaning to be realized through it is what is grasped by the mind and the eye. The things meant by words such as pot and cloth, produced from clay, wheel, stick, water, thread, loom, place, yarn, and so forth, are not brought into being by the name. By the mere sound of a name, one does not produce them as clay, which is the cause of qualities such as smell and so on of earth and the rest. This is the Blessed One's definitive statement in reply.

Now Vajragarbha makes his request again, and the Blessed One gives his answer.

Vajragarbha asks:

By what, O Vajra of Kye, is this name in brief given?

What is explained by the syllable He?

And what is to be expressed by Vajra?

The Blessed One declared:

By the syllable He is meant great compassion;

and by Vajra, wisdom is to be expressed.

The tantra whose nature is wisdom and means,
that I shall explain; listen.

The extensive explanation of this brief teaching is in the Root Tantra, and one should enter into that very text. Thus the Blessed One declared:

Compassion without object, toward beings and phenomena, is explained as threefold.

From the word "great," it is without object.

By the syllable He it is expressed.

Through the union of body, speech, and mind,
it is that very syllable Vaṃ spoken of before.

By the word Vajra too is meant the syllable E,
the emptiness of meaning in all aspects.

Whoever enters into these in union is spoken of by the word yogin.

The tantra whose nature is wisdom and means
is to be called a yoga tantra.

It is not by the word "means" that it is a yoga tantra, nor does it become so by "wisdom";

this is called the yoga tantra,
the nondual Vajra of Kye.
All the tantras such as the Guhyasamāja are yoga tantras by that nature of wisdom and means, through the names of wisdom and means,
wherein means is well established and the yoginīs engage in all conduct.
On the conventional level, as yoginī tantras,
I have taught them to the childish.
Where means is transferred,
and wisdom abides truly,
that is explained as the tantra of means;
as it is, so it is conventionally.
As for those who meditate on mudrās and maṇḍalas, to whatever degree they analyze,
to that degree they are broken down,
for they are marked by arising and perishing.
The union of wisdom and means,
the three vajras marked by inseparability,
the knower and the knowable being one,
is emptiness and compassion nondual.
Emptiness, signlessness, likewise wishlessness,
and the unconditioned liberation:
these four are proclaimed throughout.
Compassion, loving-kindness, joy,
and the fourth, equanimity:
these are the four abodes of Brahmā;
from the nonconceptuality of all phenomena,
by a phenomenon without obscuration,
it is designated as the nondual.
Wisdom and means are likewise one nature.
The vajra bodies are not two.
The six aggregates, likewise the elements,
the objects and the faculties too,
the faculties of action,

thus all abide as nondual.

The vows of all the buddhas are well established in the letters Evaṃ.

Afterward, by the division into three families,

from the division into five families,

by the division into six families, and likewise by the division into eight,

the tantra whose nature is wisdom and means,

I shall teach you; listen.

This is the Blessed One's definitive statement in reply, showing how it is established as a yoga tantra.

Now the cause of the arising and abiding of the yoginīs is to be stated. In this tantra, the yoginīs are Nairātmyā and the others, according to the division of the fifteen portions of the moon, being the five aggregates, the four elements, and the six sense sources. The cause of their arising and abiding is the syllable Hūṃ, which is the second Heruka. Therefore, as to the meaning of these: how do the equality wisdom, the consciousnesses, and the deities come to arise?

Likewise:

The glance, the summoning, and the great sign, know the many kinds of powers;

the paralyzing and the expelling,

the paralyzing of a host, and the fierce rites, and others besides, I shall explain.

"Listen, Vajragarbha of Kye": this is the definitive statement on the cause of the arising and abiding of the deities.

Now the cause of their further production is to be stated.

First, Evaṃ comes to be.

The letters Evaṃ are the first cause of Heruka; the syllable Hūṃ is the cause of the second production. Thus it is determined.

From that, things arise, through the division into apprehended and apprehender; through the union of object and faculty, the consciousnesses are each separate. One is bound by the bondage of things. By that bondage of things, the consciousnesses and the eye and the other faculties are bound.

By fully knowing that, one is freed. By halting object and faculty, through fully knowing them. Therefore, by things themselves, one liberates. By seeing past and future objects with the divine eye and the like, the six consciousnesses are freed; for the Blessed One said, "That is another consciousness." Likewise there are other forms and so forth. Therefore:

Everywhere hands and feet and the rest,
everywhere eyes, heads, and faces,
everywhere hearing, in the world
he dwells, having pervaded all.

Now the ultimate meditation is to be stated, through the wisdom and means explained before, beginning with the words "meditate on things."

Here, in space, the object of meditation is like a dream; that is, it lies beyond the nature of even the subtlest particle. Fully knowing this, one should meditate on the absence of any real thing: with a mind free of conceptual thought, one sees the reflection-like appearance. What is free of conceptuality and unmistaken is to be called direct perception. This itself is of four kinds: sense direct perception, mental direct perception, yogic direct perception, and self-aware direct perception. That very cognition is said to have the defining mark of experience, since it makes known, brings one into engagement, and brings attainment.

That reflection-like appearance is established by nine examples, namely: a mirage, an illusory city, an echo, a dream, an illusionist's magical contrivance, a hallucination, an image in a mirror, the moon in water, and space. Wisdom becomes the syllable E.

In the same way, Heruka also is to be meditated on as without real thing; this is the wisdom of insight. Heruka is great bliss. As wisdom is, so too is means. Fully knowing this, one should meditate on the absence of any real thing, and this becomes means. From the word "suchness" it is said that the result is just as the cause is. The letters E and VAM are the body that has the nature of wisdom and means, abiding, that is, dwelling in the navel.

Thus the great wisdom that abides in the body is accomplished through the abandoning of all conceptual thought. The wheel of the maṇḍala, the activities, and the wisdom seal are free of conceptuality, because the wisdom of the Perfection of Wisdom is free of the net of concepts; this is what is certain. This itself is Vajrasattva, Heruka who shakes all three worlds, the body of essential nature. "Pervading all things" means that this body of wisdom pervades these things: the six aggregates, the six elements, the six sense faculties, the six objects, the six faculties of action, and the six functions of the faculties of action. "Though dwelling in the body, it is not born of the body" means that it has no arising or perishing.

Here, there is a passage that will be explained in the chapter on settling accomplishment, in the second chapter of the Examination of the Ḍākinījālasaṃvara. There Vajragarbha makes his request, and the Blessed One's reply teaches, in a conventional way, the bliss of the two organs, as a means of generating understanding in ordinary beings. It runs thus. Vajragarbha asks:

Through the yoga of the completion stage,
the supreme bliss is great bliss.

Completion is without meditation;
what need then is there of generation?

Here "completion stage" means being free of conceptuality and of the bliss of the two organs. If that alone bestows buddhahood, then what need is there to generate a maṇḍala or a seal through conceptual thought? That is the meaning. Having heard these words, the Blessed One Hevajra declared:

This great bodhisattva falls, alas, through the force of faith.

This is on the conventional level.

For whom is there bliss in a body without real thing?

Bliss cannot be spoken of.

By the nature of the pervaded and the pervader, bliss is the pervader of beings.

Just as the scent that dwells in a flower is not understood apart from the flower, a non-thing, so, since form and the rest are non-things,
bliss will not become an object of apprehension.

This too is on the conventional level. Then, once more, he refutes it on the ultimate level, thus:

The thing, and the non-thing too...

This means wisdom in all its aspects.

...for realizing things, the buddha...

This means means, which has the six higher knowledges.

The deluded do not know me.

Whoever is thus, even if overcome by laziness, they are those utterly overcome by the bliss of the two organs. With these and similar words, the provisional and the definitive meaning, the earlier and the later, are explained at length in that same chapter.

Here, what was taught in the chapter on the lineages is to be explained. Because it pervades the beings of the three realms, those that move and those that do not, and the past, future, and present, then if the buddha's wisdom were born from the body, it would be through a relation of support and supported, as with the scent of a flower: just as without the flower there is no scent, so when the body is lacking, it would perish. But this is not so. Therefore, because it pervades both the outer and the body, it is called "dwelling in the outer" and "dwelling in the body"; but since when the body is lacking it does not cease to be, this is the certainty expressed by "not born of the body." So it has been said:

Though a vase may be broken,
there is no destruction of space.
So too, though the body be destroyed,
there is no destruction of wisdom.

Here ends the third section of the Extensive Commentary on Hevajra, in six thousand verses: the ascertainment of the wisdom that is nondual wisdom and means.

Now the channels in the vajra body are to be set forth. Here Vajragarbha asks: "Blessed One, how many channels are there in the vajra body?" The Blessed One declared: "The channels are thirty-two; they are the ones through which the thirty-two awakening minds descend and drip into the place of great bliss." Here, because it is that which fully experiences great bliss, it is to be called great bliss. The channels are the secret wheel's thirty-two, having the nature of the thirty consonants of the six groups beginning with the letter KA, together with the two characterized by being indestructible. Among these, space, wind, fire, water, earth, and the element of wisdom correspond to the nature of the letters E and VAM.

Thus: kā, khā, gā, ghā, ṇā are the elements of space. The letters a, ku, ha, and the visarga arise from the throat; this is known by the letter ha. What falls within them is to be taken by mentioning it, as established by the full explanation. The k̄a group is the element of space.

In the same way, c̄a, ch̄a, j̄a, jh̄a, ñ̄a: the letters i, cu, ya, śa arise from the palate. This is the element of wind, known by the letter i.

In the same way, ṭ̄a, ṭh̄a, ḍ̄a, ḍh̄a, ṇ̄a: the letters ṛ, ṭu, ra, ṣa arise from the crown of the head. This is the element of fire, known by the letter ra.

In the same way, the syllables p̄a, ph̄a, b̄a, bh̄a, m̄a, which are the u, pu, hya, va sounds of those who have lips, arise from the lips; they are the water element, and are known by the letter va. In the same way, the syllables t̄a, th̄a, d̄a, dh̄a, n̄a, which are the ḷ, tu, la, sa sounds, arise from the teeth; they are the earth element, and are known by the letter la. Among these, s̄a, v̄a, ṣ̄a, ś̄a, thk̄a is said to be the sixth, the nature of the five, namely earth, water, fire, wind, and space, the self of the five aspects, the element of wisdom.

The letters E and VAM are the two unchanging ones. Since the letters E, VAM and the others draw the awakening mind to themselves, they are taught as the ones that cause the awakening mind to descend. "Dissolving in the place of great bliss" means urine, feces, and the flowing of seminal fluid. In the midst of these, below and above, are the three channels, which are the principal ones. Below, they cause the feces, the urine, and the seminal fluid to flow; that is, below the navel. Above the navel are the rasanā (the right channel), the lalanā (the left channel), and the avadhūtī, called "the shaker."

This is as the verse says: The lalanā abides by the nature of wisdom; the rasanā abides rightly as method; the avadhūtī is in the central direction, free of grasped and grasper. Here, by the word "wisdom" the moon is meant, and its nature is the breath flowing in the left nostril. Therefore "by the nature of the moon" means that the lalanā is where the breath flows. By the word "method" the sun should be understood, and its nature is the breath flowing in the right nostril; by that nature the rasanā abides. As it was said: By day it is the Blessed Vajradhara; by night it is renowned as wisdom. Just as the sun is called peaceful, so the moon is explained as having breasts. The five maṇḍalas of consciousness, formations, feeling, perception, and form abide in the lalanā in the order of emanation. The five maṇḍalas of earth, water, fire, wind, and space abide in the rasanā in the order of withdrawal. Moving round through the twelve junctions of time, the lalanā and rasanā travel in the uneven and even junctions, and enjoy thirty maṇḍalas.

Here the maṇḍalas of the junctions beginning with Capricorn are as follows, in order: kā, khā, gā, ghā, ṇā. Then, reversing the direction, in the Aquarius junction the short letters arise in the order of emanation in the left channel: ṇa, gha, ga, kha, ka, which are space and so on, and consciousness and so on. In the same way, on the right too, there are form and so on, and earth and so on, through the connection of grasped and grasper according to the distinction of body and intention. Likewise, when the sun rises in Pisces, the syllables cā, chā, jā, jhā, ñā are in the right channel in the order of withdrawal. Then, when Aries rises, ña, jha, ja, cha, ca are in the left channel in the order of emanation. Likewise, when Taurus rises, ṭā, ṭhā, ḍā, ḍhā, ṇā. Likewise, when Gemini rises, ṇa, ḍha, ḍa, ṭha, ṭa. Then, when Cancer rises, pā, phā, bā, bhā, mā. Likewise, ma, bha, ba, pha, pa for Leo; tā, thā, dā, dhā, nā for Virgo; na, dha, da, tha, ta when Libra rises; sā, vā, ṣā, śā, thkā when Scorpio rises. Then tha, ka, śa, ṣa, va, sa, with the junction of Sagittarius arising. In this way there are sixty maṇḍalas of day and night.

Likewise, the maṇḍalas move in the inner channels. What is born from these, which make them known, should be spoken of in the joints of the hands and feet. In the joints of the right shoulder and upper arm is the junction of Capricorn, and the maṇḍalas that are its distinct selves, the maṇḍalas of earth and so on, are in the lower joints of the thumb, index finger, middle finger, ring finger, and little finger, in order. Then, for the junction of Aquarius, in the joints of the left shoulder and upper arm, the maṇḍalas of space and so on are, in order, at the lower joint junctions of the little finger, ring finger, middle finger, index finger, and thumb. Likewise, the junction of Pisces is in the joints near the right upper arm, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the second joints of the thumb and so on. Likewise, the junction of Aries is at the junction near the left upper arm, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the second rows of joints of the little finger and so on. Then the junction of Taurus is at the junction of the right hand and forearm, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the third rows of joints of the thumb and so on. Likewise, the junction of Gemini is at the junction of the left hand and forearm, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the third rows of joints of the little finger and so on. This is the determination of the course toward awakening, the northward movement.

Then, for the southward movement: the junction of Cancer is in the joints of the right waist and thigh, and the maṇḍalas of earth and so on are, in order, at the junctions of the first rows of joints of the toes of the right foot beginning with the big toe. Then the junction of Leo is at the junction of the left waist and thigh, and the maṇḍalas of space and so on are, in order, at the junctions of the first rows of joints of the left foot beginning with the little toe. Likewise, the junction of Virgo is at the junction of the right knee and thigh, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the second rows of joints of the right foot beginning with the big toe. Likewise, the junction of Libra is at the junction of the left knee and thigh, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the second rows of joints beginning with the little toe. Likewise, the junction of Scorpio is at the junction of the right foot and knee, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the third rows of joints beginning with the big toe. Likewise, the junction of Sagittarius is at the junction of the left foot and knee, and the maṇḍalas are at the junctions of the third rows of joints beginning with the little toe, in order.

Thus the sixty maṇḍalas belong to the emanation wheel, and the four are the places of emptiness, the nature of the letters E and VAṂ. Therefore the emanation wheel is a lotus with sixty-four petals.

By the word "petal" are meant the channels that bring down the sixty maṇḍalas. "Four" refers to those that bring down emptiness. Thus the five abodes belong to the channels of each conjunction of time: in the center is the channel that brings down emptiness; in the east, the channel that brings down wind; on the right, the channel that brings down fire; in the north, the channel in which water flows; in the west, the one in which earth flows. In the center, Avadhūtī brings down the maṇḍala of wisdom. As it is said: "In the center of the navel the hero abides, in the realm of the secret filament." Thus the sixty tubes are what bring down the sixty maṇḍalas, and four are what bring down emptiness. Just as the sixteenth part of the moon is only an instant, so one should understand that it also brings down the fully complete maṇḍala. This is the wheel of emanation.

The conjunction of time that is unequal, having the nature of the moon, is the Lalanā. The conjunction of time that is equal, having the nature of the sun, is the Rasanā. Avadhūtī is the equal one, free of apprehended and apprehender, in the central direction; it is to be known in the maṇḍala of wisdom.

Thus in the wheel of emanation the shiftings of the tubes are sixty-four, four of which are emptiness. Then the wheel of Dharma has a lotus of eight petals, and on these eight petals there are eight shiftings, according to the division into watches. These have the nature of the conjunctions of time with their halves, belonging to the Lalanā and to the Rasanā.

Then the throat is the wheel of enjoyment, the Saṃbhogacakra. There, through the division of the short consonants, there are thirty-two channels. The enjoyment wheel is a lotus of thirty-two petals, according to the oral instruction of the guru; the tantra states it in reverse order. In it, by the division into moments, there are thirty-two shiftings. At the forehead is a lotus of sixteen petals, and in it, by the division into half-watches, there are sixteen shiftings. At the crown is a lotus of four petals, and in it, by the division into junctures, there are four shiftings.

Here, the breath moving outward: when the breath goes out, the maṇḍala of the tube-channels in the wheel of emanation comes to appear in the nostril. In the two nostrils, whether the left or the right, at the very end of the first, when the maṇḍala of space descends, then it moves in the center. When the maṇḍala of wind descends, then it touches the upper part of the nostril. When the maṇḍala of fire descends, then it touches the nostril on the right. When the maṇḍala of water descends, then it touches the left, though it may be on the left or the right, directed toward the nose. When the maṇḍala of earth moves, then it touches the lower part. Thus the yogin should know the five abodes in the nostrils, through the distinction of the unequal and equal conjunctions of time appearing on the left or the right.

Here, what was explained extensively in the Kye Dorje of five hundred thousand lines is not stated, because of its great length; those of little learning would be frightened by a lengthy exposition. This is the Blessed One's decision. In the household wheel, which has the nature of the twelve conjunctions of time, Makara and the rest are to be known as the four seats; they are also the marks of the signs of death. The tantra is to be understood through another tantra, as it is said. Rohita, Mohita and the others are the channels through which the unequal and equal conjunctions of time descend; this was spoken in another, intentional language. By these channels good and bad are taught, and also the signs of death and death itself.

For that reason: "The Lalanā brings down Akṣobhya; the Rasanā brings down blood most excellently; wisdom, the moon, brings down excrement; that is renowned as Avadhūtī." Here Akṣobhya is the water element; the water element flowing in the left nostril is the Lalanā. Blood is the fire element; the fire element descending on the right is the Rasanā. Thus on the left is the lotus born from water, and on the right the jewel born from fire, the supreme deity. Wisdom is Avadhūtī; the moon is the drop, the semen. That very thing, having the nature of the five, brings down great emptiness. Thus emptiness descends, and in the center is the supreme deity of the vajra family, renowned as Avadhūtī. Likewise the moon, the sun and Rāhu bring down, in due order, the Lalanā, the Rasanā and Avadhūtī, in the all-pervading life-wind.

As for the downward-clearing wind, it is the channels bringing down excrement, urine and semen, below the navel: the wheel, the sword, and the single-pointed vajra. It is said that there are the upper doors and the lower doors. Of these, the thirty-two channels of the lower doors, which bring down water, will be explained: Mi phyed ma and the others.

Here, in the bright fortnight there are the fifteen vowels, and the sixteenth is the drop. These channels abide encircling the hanging one. They are as follows: A, I, Ṛ, U, Ḍ are, in due order, the first, second, third, fourth and fifth lunar days. Likewise the guṇa vowels: Ar, E, Ar, O, Al, the sixth and so on, in due order. Then the vowels turned into semivowels, Ha, Ya, Ra, Va, La, are, in due order, the eleventh and so on. In the middle of the drop is the hanging one, the sixteenth. Thus above the palate, at the forehead, nectar having the nature of a portion of semen drips; outwardly it is cooling, and inwardly it is stuka.

Likewise the individual channels: "Mi phyed ma and Phra gzugs ma, Mchog ma, G.yon ma, Thung ngu ma", these five being the first day and so on. Then: "Rus sbal skyes sgom, Dbang bskur ma, Skyon Idan ma and Bshang ba ma", these being the sixth and so on. "Mtshan mo ma, Ma mo, Bsil sbyin ma, Drod ma and Lalanā", these being the eleventh and so on, in due order. The Lalanā has the nature of the fifteen; Avadhūtī belongs to the sixteen.

Then the first day of the dark fortnight and so on belong to the Rasanā, in the order of gathering the fifteen days, by the nature of the long vowels. They are as follows: Lā, Vā, Rā, Yā, Hā are the first, second, third, fourth and fifth, in due order. Then, by the division of increasing guṇas, Āl, Au, Ār, Ai, Ā are the sixth and so on, in due order. Then, by the division of the long vowels, Lī, Ū, Rī, Ī, Ā are the eleventh and so on, in due order. At the tip of the tongue is the sixteenth, the distinct one.

"In the midst of these" refers to Romā and the others. They are Romā, Jalmā, Varṇasthā, Spyimā, and Rgyusbyinmā, that is, the first and the following lunar days. Then Saṃyogavirahā, Sdugumā, Siddhā, Pācikā, and Manobhadrā, that is, the sixth and the following. Then Trisaṅkarā, Icchā, Gṛhā, Caṇḍī, and Kātyāyanī, that is, the eleventh and the following. In this way there are fifteen.

In the center of the tongue is the conqueror of Māra, in the form of a black thread, standing as far as the tip of the tongue, hanging down, dripping, short, and tasting flavor.

Again Vajragarbha made his request: "Blessed One, what are these channels like?" The Blessed One declared:

"All that has become the three realms of existence..."

This means the aggregates, the faculties, and the faculties of action, all that has become so. "...abandoning grasped and grasper" means that one enters fully into the central channel. Or again: "By every means, they are imagined as the defining marks of things." This means that the elements, the objects, and the activities are imagined as the defining marks of the things that are consciousnesses.

This is the fourth chapter, on determining the channels in the vajra body, the complete analysis, in the six-thousand-verse commentary on the Hevajra.

Now I shall explain the divisions of the compendium. Here, whatever has been taught in accord with the system and in reversal of the system should be clarified by the commentary in due order.

Here, "the compendium of all the buddhas is established in the letters E and VAM." It is in the secret lotus of thirty-two petals and in the four-petaled lotus at the crown. The rest are gathered together into the wheels of emanation, of truth, of enjoyment, and of the innate. These are the lotuses of sixty-four petals, of eight petals, of thirty-two petals, and of sixteen petals, at the navel, the heart, the throat, and the forehead. At the forehead is Āli. At the throat is Kāli. At the heart is wisdom. At the navel is method.

The innate body is at the navel. The truth body is at the heart. The enjoyment body is at the throat. The emanation body is at the forehead.

The fourth state is at the navel. Deep sleep is at the heart. Dream is at the throat. Waking is at the forehead.

The vajra of body is at the forehead. The vajra of speech is at the throat. The vajra of mind is at the heart. The vajra of wisdom is at the navel.

The letter E is at the navel. The letter VAM is at the heart. The letter MA is at the throat. The letter YĀ is at the forehead.

Locanā is at the navel. Māmakī is at the heart. Pāṇḍarā is at the throat. Tārā is at the forehead. These are the four maṇḍalas.

As to the four moments: the variegated is at the forehead. The ripening is at the throat. The vanishing is at the heart. The one without characteristics is at the navel.

Likewise for the joys: joy is at the forehead, supreme joy at the throat, joy of cessation at the heart, and innate joy at the navel.

Likewise for the truths: the truth of suffering is at the forehead, the truth of origin at the throat, the truth of cessation at the heart, and the truth of the path at the navel.

As to the four realities: the reality of self is at the forehead, the reality of mantra at the throat, the reality of the deity at the heart, and the reality of wisdom at the navel.

At the forehead is the making of "I." At the throat is the uttering of sound. At the heart is the thinking of everything. At the navel is the experiencing of bliss.

As to the four schools: the Sthaviras are at the navel. The Sarvāstivādins are at the heart. The Sammatīyas, honored by all, are at the throat. The Mahāsāṃghikas are at the forehead.

The moon is at the forehead. The sun is at the throat. Rāhu is at the heart. The fire of time is at the navel.

At the forehead are the sixteen transitions. At the throat are the thirty-two. At the heart are the eight. At the navel are the sixty-four transitions.

The four junctures explained earlier are these: the morning juncture is at the forehead, the midday juncture at the throat, the evening juncture at the heart, and the midnight juncture at the navel.

At the forehead is enjoyment. At the throat is empowering. At the heart is dissolution. At the navel is lordship itself. Thus everything is fourfold.

The thirty-six factors of the side of awakening and the thirty-six elements are to be divided into the fourfold division explained earlier. All of them, by fours, should be applied to the four wheels according to their number and the divisions of the family.

Following the root tantra, as it is taught in the manner of other tantras, the compendium is made into six wheels by the division into six families, into five wheels by the division into five families, into four wheels by the division into four families, and into three wheels by the division into three families. This is the determination.

"The tantras of three families and of four families, likewise of five families and six families, arise from the division into pervaded and pervader, and from the distinction between the supported and the support."

Here, by the division of the support into one family, the supported has one face. By the division of the support into three families, it has three faces. By four families, four faces. By five families, five faces. By six families, six faces. By eight families, eight faces.

Here, by the division of the fire of time, it is explained as having one face. By the division of Rāhu, it has two faces, through the nature of wisdom and method. By the division of body, speech, and mind, or of moon, sun, and Rāhu, it has three faces. By the division of the moon, the sun, Rāhu, and the fire of time, or of body, speech, mind, and wisdom, it has four faces. By the division of the five aggregates, it has five faces. By the division of the six aggregates, it has six faces. By the division of the moon in two aspects, the sun in two, Rāhu in two, and the fire of time in two aspects, these eight, it has eight faces.

Here, the division of the moon is the wheel of the forehead and of the hanging channel. The division of the sun is the wheel of the tongue and the throat. The division of Rāhu is the wheel of the heart and the crown. The division of the fire of time is the wheel of the navel and the secret place.

As it is said: "Above Rāhu the sun abides; above the sun, the moon."

Above the moon is Rāhu, and by him the manifold is set in motion. By him, the one who sets it in motion, is the fire of time. It abides in two aspects, in the navel and in the secret place. This itself is called the vajra sun, where the fierce fire (caṇḍālī) dwells. Where the true nectar abides, there abides the syllable haṃ. At the crown, in the lotus, the rain descends: the vajra moon, of stainless light. This concludes the determination of the divisions of the summary.

Now the yoga of the fierce fire is to be explained, beginning with the words "the fierce fire." The words are these:

The fierce fire blazing in the navel burns the five Tathāgatas. It burns the eyes and the rest completely. When all is burned, haṃ, the one bearing the hare, drips down.

This is the verse of brief indication. For the extended explanation of this brief indication, one should enter the root tantra. There the Blessed One declared:

More secret even than the secret, listen to the explanation of the vajra heart. It is the tantra of all accomplishments; it bestows liberation on the yogin. What Vajrasattva has declared is the body of wisdom, free of dualistic thought. The Protector in the center of the three channels abides within the navel, in the secret place. From there, below and above, it extends, with a radiance like a rod of lightning. It awakens the consciousness, the faculties and the elements that dwell in the body.

That Lady of the Earth abides in the navel, as the central peak in the middle. In the secret place the right peak also, descending, is like lightning. It is called wisdom of the same kind; here it is explained to be the fierce fire. It has three peaks pointing downward, and likewise three pointing upward. The peak of Brahmā abides in the middle, the peak of Viṣṇu on the left, and on the right the peak of the Fierce One (Rudra). Through these flow feces, urine and semen.

The rkyang ma (lalanā) is rightly taught on the left, and on the right it is called the ro ma (rasanā). In the middle is the Avadhūtī. That is to be called the Yungmo.

From the navel to the center of the heart, it makes three turns and then proceeds. From the abode of the heart to the center of the throat, it makes three turns and again extends. From the forehead and the throat, in the center, it makes three turns and again proceeds. From the forehead to the center of the crown, it makes three turns and again proceeds. From the crown to the nose, it makes three turns and again proceeds. In the left nostril the rkyang ma abides, rightly established. On the right the channel is the ro ma. Between the eyebrows is the Avadhūtī. The five wheels, the navel and the rest, have three paths each, in all fifteen. From the navel the Avadhūtī goes and comes through the center of the navel. From petal to petal the rkyang ma and ro ma are taught.

In the navel is Rāhu, and from him the moon, marked with the moon, pierces through and reaches the crown. That is the Avadhūtī channel. When a man is intoxicated with desire, through the union of the rkyang ma and the ro ma, the fierce fire is made certainly to descend. It blazes in the navel wheel and surely issues from the path of the Yungmo. Rāhu, marked with the moon, pierces and touches the syllable ha. By that touch the syllable haṃ then melts into white nectar. It descends through the five maṇḍalas, burning the aggregates, elements and the rest. When objects and faculties cease, joy and the other bliss-states arise, and from the moon the drop (bindu) drips. The syllable haṃ abides rightly at the crown. The forehead is the moon, the throat the sun. Then it goes to Rāhu. When the fierce fire has entered the navel, it then proceeds to the wheel of the secret place.

In this wheel of the secret place this falls. This is explained as the great "cattle." Below, by the three peaks and the channels, it is shown to be in a hollow place. The seventh birth, the cattle themselves, bestows the accomplishment of moving in the sky. The Victor seizes diseases. By melting the aggregates and elements, it bestows even the status of a wheel-turning ruler. Having slain the faculties and objects, it bestows precisely sky-going. It possesses qualities such as subtlety. Through the subsequent melting, awakening and the rest occur. It swiftly bestows buddhahood. Just as outwardly mercury is bound, so too this essence of wisdom brings about the great accomplishment that surely destroys all suffering.

In the same way, Brahmā, Viṣṇu and the cattle fall surely into the wheel of the secret place. For as long as it is burned seven times, it grants a broad life in this very life. Above, Rāhu is called the cattle. The moon and the sun are the great cattle. Having fallen into the hole of Brahmā, they give the fruits of enjoyment and liberation. Blood and sinews likewise, by descending in the rkyang ma, are made to fall. These too are called cattle. Other external objects are not cattle. The seven births, the cattle, are altogether the supreme sovereigns.

Listen as I explain how the seven births are in the body. All the flavors of food and drink, the six kinds of eating and drinking, become essence through ripening. That is the first birth of each. Then it becomes blood; in the second it becomes clear. In the third it becomes flesh. In the fourth it goes into skin. In the fifth it becomes channel. In the sixth it becomes sinew. In the seventh it becomes bone. This becomes so in seven turns.

Through the application that relies on this very process, the six treasures are to be called the family. The family is explained to be the body. What arises from the family is called semen. By that, potency is called the elemental particle. The body is the cause of generating. Consciousness, the pervader, awareness, abides in the middle of these. Relying on the moon and the sun, there is Heruka, whose nature is the three existences. The heroes who abide

By four kinds of channels, the wheel at the crown is to be described. At the forehead there are sixteen; at the throat, thirty-two; at the heart, eight wheel-spokes; and sixty-four in the navel wheel, rightly explained. In the secret place there are thirty-two. The channels are explained as the spokes of the wheel, or else the petals of a lotus. The yoginīs rely on these and perform many kinds of activity. By the nature of object and faculty they stir consciousness. The abodes, the near abodes and all the rest are the petals of the channels. In the crown of the four goddesses it is to be called the great illusion. This appears in the first maṇḍala of the navel wheel. At the forehead the vajra drop will be endowed with eight channels. There are the two eyes, likewise the ears, the nose, the tongue, and the hanging parts.

The goddesses beginning with Gaurī, the forms and the rest, the earth and the rest, divided by the portions of the moon, are the selfless ones. These are declared here in this very place. Three faces, six arms, at the throat: these, with the thirty-two, and at the heart as well the eight goddesses, and this four-armed one, dwell perfectly. Viṣṇu the great, as the vajra of mind, arises from the family of Akṣobhya. At the navel, which agitates the three worlds, with sixty-four, these are taught as the five ḍākas. The ḍākinīs and the five elements, these abide in the five wheels. The sixth is at the secret place, the great lord, together with the thirty-two ḍākinīs, the sovereign of the three realms.

The goddesses in the six wheels number one hundred and fifty-six. This is called the Wheel of Time, the six classes of beings gathered into one.

The channels at the forehead and the crown, which are twenty, cause phlegm to flow down. The forty at the throat and heart likewise cause bile to flow down. The sixteen at the navel and the secret place, and the eighty, cause wind to flow down. Those whose nature is aggregation and the rest are the ten channels of the secret wheel. Whatever three channels there are above and below, they obstruct the six wheels. The subsidiary channels are many, and from them the body is sustained wherever it abides. Those number seventy-two thousand, and in the body there are just as many goddesses. The elemental beings are as many as the pores of the hair, three and a half crores, and those established as many as the hairs abide there.

As the outer, so the body. Six breaths make one pala. Sixty palas make one ghaṭikā. A ghaṭikā-measure of moments, less four by four, makes one half-watch. Five of them make a season-junction. Two halves of a season-junction make a watch. Two watches make one period of the day. Four of these are declared the day and night of embodied beings. And with twelve such junctions, by six hundred breaths beyond twenty-one thousand, equal to the sun's staff, there are twenty-four half-months, and likewise twelve months, and the six seasons are taught as they are. By the four equal junctions of the time of union, by the three times, by the two passages, thus the day and night come to be in the body.

Nine hundred breaths make a half-month. By eighteen hundred months, and by thirty-six, the seasons are taught. By five thousand four hundred, the time of union; by seven thousand two hundred, the time of the three; by ten thousand beyond eight hundred passages, and likewise by two, one year is to be spoken.

At transference, the breath in the central channel is fifty-six, with the quarter, exceeded by seventy-five, six hundreds, for twelve. By the breaths of those hundred years, three directions and three years, it becomes the time of the avadhūtī, which bestows death on living beings. In the rasanā, if the wind descends by day and night, then one dies in three years, from the signs of the moon's death. When the life-breath of embodied beings descends in the sun for five days, then one dies in three years, from the sign of the death of the right, the sun.

When the life-breath moves in the left channel for three days, it casts off the petals of the house at the navel, and the passage is exhausted from three years on. For the second, six days likewise; it surely descends in three months. Thus by three months and three months, from the increase of three days each, these eleven petals are cast off in order over three years. As long as thirty-three days, it descends from the left without interruption. By the distinction of the three qualities, it then enters the sun. Two days, and then it enters the center, the navel. Life-breath for one day, and then from death the breaths are cast off.

When the wind descends in the right channel for ten days, it is at the second petal of the house; then one dies in two years. At the third petal of the house, at the lunar day, one dies in one year. At the fourth, descending for twenty days, one dies in six months. At the fifth, if it descends for twenty-five, life is three months. At the sixth, for twenty-six days, life is two months. At the seventh, for twenty-seven days, life is one month. If it descends without interruption from this for thirty-three days, then the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh petals in order, with the five lunar fortnights and the qualities, are cast off in a single day. Then, having abandoned the right channel, the wind goes to the left for two days; then for one day it goes to the central place. Thus, having exhausted the breaths, this is the transference from death.

Below, the semen is exhausted; the mother's blood rises upward. Bound by its own habitual tendencies, consciousness together with the wind arises again after death. Without that, there is no later life.

From a teacher, knowledge; from a lamp, a lamp; from a seal, another seal; from a face, a face in the mirror; from a sound, an echo arises; as fire from a crystal lens, which does not arise without the sun; as the tongue waters from eating something sour, which is not sour and does not arise without sourness; as the sprout from the seed, without that it does not arise. The result has the nature of the cause. It is not from itself, not from another, not from both, not without a cause. Whatever things there are, none whatever arises.

The white and red of father and mother, the life-wind and the downward-clearing wind likewise, together with the vajra of mind, are the cause that produces the body. Amitābha and Ratnasambhava are explained, the life-wind and the downward-clearing wind in order. Body, speech, mind and attachment are the gates of the one with the vajra of mind.

From semen, the half-moon; from blood, the sun arises. From the life-wind Rāhu is established; the fire of time is from the downward-clearing wind. From semen the channels are born; bone is born of semen. From the mother's blood, blood arises; from blood, flesh is born everywhere; from flesh, skin is born; from bone the legs arise.

Semen is the vajra, the dust is the bell; the channel is the lotus, the great jewel; blood is the wheel, and so is bone; flesh is likewise taught as the sword. The utpala and the white lotus, the skin and the legs of embodied beings: these eight, by their own mind, are in order the faces.

The eastern faces become the legs. The moon and the sun are without darkness. From blood arises the nature of clay, the earth; it is to be declared the element of flesh. From semen arises hardness, the earth, whose nature is stone and bone. From the moon the water is accomplished. Fire is accomplished from blood. From Rāhu the life-force is accomplished. The downward-clearing wind is said to come from the fire of time.

The tongue of all embodied beings, together with the uvula and the semen, is generated. The left and right eyes are produced by the dust. The two openings of the nose are likewise produced by the life-force. Produced from emptiness alone, in the same way, are the two openings of the ears. What is produced by the downward-clearing wind is the lower three channels in the same way. What Rāhu in turn produces are the two openings of the breasts. By the downward wind, from the intestines, comes the pair of testicles. In this way the elements of the body come to be. By semen alone the three elements arise; by dust too there are here three kinds. This is what is called the sixfold treasury.

The body and the body's faculty, these two: the left is produced by water, and the right is produced by fire. By the life-force itself it becomes nectar. Above that, three channels are taught. The left is produced by wind; the central one is the lower part of the earth. The right channel is produced by the downward-clearing wind; here there is no doubt.

At the forehead is the disc of the moon, where the five perfect awakenings abide as the body. In the region of the throat is the vajra of speech, in the full disc of the sun. In the middle of the disc of Rāhu is the consciousness of all embodied beings. In the tail of Rāhu, in the earth, the precious one abides well, without doubt. In the disc of the fire of time, Amoghasiddhi abides above the crossed vajra.

Wheel, lotus, and vajra, jewel and sword make the fifth; the vajra of the man, the jewel, and the buddha at the crown are taught as the sixth. Thus these six families of all the buddhas are of great power.

Smell is to be produced by earth. Taste comes about through ripening by fire. From water come sprouts and the like. Touch comes from wind. From the life-wind sound arises. From the downward-clearing wind comes the element of phenomena, in that very faculty of mind. All embodied beings are to know this.

Yamāntaka is produced from bone. From blood, Prajñāntaka is taught. Padmāntaka comes from the channels. From flesh, Vighnāntaka is taught. From the legs, Acala is declared. Ṭakkirāja arises from the skin, Nīladaṇḍa from the body hair, and Mahābala from the nails. From the hair comes Uṣṇīṣacakravartin. From the lower hair comes Sumbharāja.

The joints of the hands and feet are the houses, the four beginning with earth. The divisions of the three qualities are taught as twelve. The joints of the fingers are the seasons and the sixty days and nights. The constellations are those that abide in embodied beings, above and below. Dhruva, by the semen, reached the crown; the dust of the Seven Sages reached below. Just as it is outside, so in the body it is surely born from the womb.

The truth of meaning has twelve aspects. Heruka has twelve arms, through blocking the twelve limbs of dependent origination. According to the stages he has four faces. The sixteen arms are the portions of the moon; know that these are likewise of sixteen aspects. By blocking the eight openings he is the supreme lord with eight faces. The moon, the sun, darkness, and fire are blocked by his feet. Having blocked the half-moons, with the twenty-four arms and the four faces, as before, the Wheel of Time was fully manifested. By blocking the consonants, ka and the rest, there is the other with thirty-four arms. By blocking the sixteen vowels, the sixteen feet are taught. By blocking the nine doors, Vajrabhairava has nine faces. Such tantras and the like come from the blocking of body, speech, and mind. These have been taught by the Lord of the Victors to the childish, from the ground onward.

So it says. In the root tantra it is also taught at length; I have explained only a little for the sake of the understanding of the childish.

The full practice of the root of this very chapter on the families should be understood as the commentary on the meaning condensed in the thirteen and a half verses of the Cakrasaṃvara Laghu. This is the certainty of the Tathāgatas; one tantra is to be understood through another tantra. Thus, with thirty verses, the certainty of the root tantra was spoken by the Blessed One in the chapter on the Hevajra family. In the six-thousand-verse commentary on Hevajra, this is the fifth chapter, on the family, which gathers the yoga of inner heat and is the cause of generation. The chapter on the family is complete.

Having shown only the meaning of the various topics, and having bowed with my head to the Enjoyment Body, in this vehicle I shall explain here, through symbolic expression, this very secret mantra, and the meaning of the families and the rest.

The symbolic expression of the mantras of the buddhas is made clear in the tantra in two ways. One is the symbol of suchness; the second is the declaration of conventional usage. What is called the symbol of suchness is the language of all sentient beings, the words of speech: the conch of the Dharma, endowed with a great sound, the great gong of the Dharma. The one who does not abide, who has passed beyond sorrow, is said to speak in speech that goes everywhere. The mantra of conventional declaration is the one that makes the meaning clear through symbolic expression.

The recitation that follows the meaning is the mantra without division of parts, beautiful through lacking intrinsic nature. One abides reciting in the state of the neuter. The life-breath flows without break, and joy increases. One recites, having arrived at the place of the avadhūtī. It is twenty-one thousand six hundred in a day and a night. In five days it is a hundred thousand, with eight thousand more.

Beginning from the first of the dark fortnight, one continues until three full moons have passed. Beginning from the first of the bright fortnight, one recites until three completions. At the time of the dawn's rising, on the full moon, it is accomplished. Having bowed to Vajrasattva, one turns the wheel of Dharma well. With eight thousand recitations, and likewise forty thousand, and with six hundred thousand, one month brings about the accomplishment of the recitation of the life-breath. It is not by a rosary, and not by speaking aloud.

Fire offering, worship with mantra, satisfying offerings, and other rites, one after another, are all thoroughly destroyed. Those mantrins of childish minds who are powerless in this recitation: for them the terminology of the counting rosary is explained, for those who desire outward enjoyment, so that the mantrin may obtain merit.

By day and by night, let the life-breath enter the central channel. Having entered, it carries off diseases. If the life-breath is bound for the days of the lunar date, this bestows the state of moving in the sky. If for one month the life-breath is purified and abides in the heart, yogins become deathless. If the navel is burned for six months, this bestows omniscience itself.

The wheels at the forehead, the throat, the heart and the navel, in due order, bring unconsciousness, binding, killing, and burning, as appropriate to each. When the life-breath and the downward-clearing wind are stopped, freedom from desire is what is wished for. By the two, killing and burning, the mantra practitioner becomes a buddha. When the life-breath and the downward-clearing wind are exhausted, the twelve links come to be exhausted here. By the stopping of cause and effect, who would not become a buddha?

As long as the life-breaths of living beings move, so long does rebirth continue. When the movements of the life-breath have perished, there is no death and no further rebirth.

Thus the recitation of the mantra's coded signs is that of the neuter. It is to be understood through the code of suchness.

Here the Blessed One said: "From this point on, the chapter on mantras will be explained." This is the torma mantra of all beings. "All" and "beings" together mean all the bhūtas, those who have come into being. Their mantras are to be taken in the number that applies in each case.

Oṃ akāro mukhaṃ sarvadharmāṇāṃ, adyanutpannatvāt.

Here the sound of the letter A is the sound of the indestructible. By such lines as "The letter A is the supreme of all letters, the great, unchanging, sacred meaning; the great life-breath is without birth, free of being expressed in words," one should understand the net of illusion. "All" means the omniscient, as in such lines as "The omniscient, the all-knowing, the sacred one, who knows himself and knows others, all of it; the supreme person who benefits all, who has passed beyond worldly comparison, the supreme lord of knowing and the knowable." The mantra of omniscience is "the speech of all beings in their own languages," and this is the definitive meaning.

Those born from the elements such as earth are the bhūtas, beings whose nature is the five aggregates. Their mantra is the five syllables whose nature is the five aggregates. The syllable Oṃ is their aggregate of form, the vajra body. The syllable Āḥ is the aggregate of perception, the vajra speech. The syllable Hūṃ is the aggregate of consciousness, the vajra mind. The syllable Svā is the aggregate of feeling. The syllable Hā is the aggregate of formations. The torma is offered to them, and at the end it is sent off with three Hūṃ syllables and two Phaṭ syllables.

Thus the syllable Oṃ purifies. Āḥ increases. Hūṃ makes it blaze. Svā makes it nectar. Hā summons. The three Hūṃ offer. The two Phaṭ send off.

With the left hand one purifies. With the right hand one increases. Covering with the joined palms, one makes it blaze. With the gesture of the garuḍa one makes it nectar. With the gesture of Trailokyavijaya one summons. With the vajra gesture one offers. With the hand gesture, joining the thumbs and fingers, one requests departure. The binding of these gestures should be understood from other tantras.

Likewise, the seed syllables of the tathāgatas, in the numbers that apply, are as follows. The syllable Bhrūṃ is Vairocana, at the crown. The syllable Āṃ is Ratnasambhava, at the eyes. The syllable Jṛīṃ is Amitābha, at the throat. The syllable Khaṃ is Amoghasiddhi, at the secret place. The syllable Hūṃ is Akṣobhya, at the heart. Having thus placed these on the body of Piṭu-vajra, one does the same for the other vajra ḍākinīs, and this is the definitive meaning.

Then the mantra of the sixteen-armed one is: Oṃ deva piṭu vajra hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Here the definitive meaning is this. The syllable Oṃ is the seat of the deities, and so, by the first syllable of the mantra, the deity is accomplished. The remaining seed syllables place the limbs, in due order, at the eyes and the other places. With the three Hūṃ the wisdom being is summoned. With Phaṭ it is made to enter, with Svā it is delighted, and with Hā it is made of one taste. This is the heart essence of Hevajra.

Thus all mantras begin with the syllable Oṃ, end with Svāhā, and have Hūṃ and Phaṭ added in the middle. This holds in every case.

In the same way as before, the mantra of the six-armed one is: Oṃ kiṭi kiṭi vajra hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Likewise that of the four-armed one is: Oṃ jvala jvala bhyo hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Likewise that of the two-armed one is: Oṃ trailokyākṣepa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. As for Hūṃ and Phaṭ in the chapter on the ten mantras, these are to be learned from the oral instruction.

The mantra that blesses the body, speech and mind of all is this. The syllable Oṃ blesses the body, Vairocana, on the disc of the moon. The syllable Āḥ blesses the speech, Amitābha, on the sun. The syllable Hūṃ blesses the mind, Akṣobhya, at the heart on the disc of Rāhu.

For the sake of guiding the provisional meaning, the vowels beginning with Nairātmyā are to be recited for the purpose of the ten mantras: a ā, i ī, u ū, ṛ ṛ, ḷ ḷ, e ai, o au, aṃ aḥ. According to the definitive meaning as well, they are to be grasped by the recitation that gathers them separately: a i ṛ u ḷ ka, a e ar o al ca, ha ya ra va la ṭa sa. These seed syllables belong to the portions of the moon in the bright fortnight. That this was not spoken by the Blessed One in the manner of children's reading, as a provisional meaning, is the definitive meaning established in the root tantra.

Likewise the mantra that shakes the city is: Oṃ a ka ca ṭa ta pa ya śa svāhā. This is by the provisional meaning. By the definitive meaning, a, ka, ku, ha, which are to be analyzed, become the throat. I, ca, ya, śa become the palate. Ṛ, ṭa, ra, ṣa become the crown. U, pa, va, and the labials become the lips. ḷ, ta, la, sa become the teeth.

Oṃ a ā ha hā ṇa ña ṇa ma na ṇka svāhā is the mantra that stirs up the city. The chapter on the ten mantras is to be learned from the guru's speech. According to the definitive meaning in the root tantra, the oral instruction is that the thirty moments are distinguished by the portions of the moon, the vowels and consonants.

Day by day, for each day, the sixty vowels and consonants of the sun should be recited, with the divisions of the staff. By the sounds a, ka, ca, ṭa, ta, pa, ya, śa, the vowel-and-consonant series (āli and kāli) is spoken in its definitive meaning. It is said that if one recites the āli and kāli a hundred thousand times, one shakes the three worlds, so what need is there to speak of a single city.

The āli and kāli should be spoken, namely: a ā i ī ṛ ṝ u ū ḷ ḹ e ai ar ār o au al āl ha hā ya yā ra rā va vā la lā. In this expanding sequence the breath enters with the recitation of the āli. When the breath goes out, there is the kāli: ka kā kha khā ga gā gha ghā ṇa ṇā; ca cā cha chā ja jā jha jhā ṇa ṇā; ṭa ṭā ṭha ṭhā ḍa ḍā ḍha ḍhā ṇa ṇā; pa pā pha phā ba bā bha bhā ma mā; ta tā tha thā da dā dha dhā na nā; sa sā va vā ṣa ṣā śa śā, and the final syllables.

At the beginning one generates the syllable oṃ. For summoning, one adds voṣaṭ at the end. Such is the mantra for shaking a city. It is to be spoken for the meditation on a single deity, with recitation over red flowers, and with a fire offering, as will be explained.

In the same way one should speak the mantra of Kurukullā. Here the syllable oṃ accomplishes the body support. The syllable hrīḥ completes the speech of the goddess. In the wind family, it is sealed by Kurukullā with Amitābha. Oṃ is at the forehead; hrīḥ at the tongue; ku at the throat; ru at the heart; ku at the navel; and lle at the secret place. This is the placing of the limbs. Having filled oneself with the in-breath, one recites a hundred thousand times, and at the time of the out-breath one should not move the rosary. This is the mantra of Kurukullā.

Now the definitive meaning of the protective mantra will be explained. The syllable oṃ speaks of the gentle seat, also a pleasing place, moon-like, with fragrant ground. The syllable ra is the sun disc of the seven suns. The syllable kṣa is the crossed vajra. Below it, above it, and in all directions one makes a wheel of ten spokes. Then in the center, from the syllable hūṃ, arises the lord of the wrathful kings. On the eastern spoke is Yamāntaka, the Ender. On the southern spoke is Prajñāntaka. On the western spoke is Padmāntaka. On the northern spoke is Vighnāntaka. In the fire direction is Acala. In the direction of the southwest is Ṭakkirāja, king of desire. In the corner of the wind is Nīladaṇḍa. In the northeast corner is Mahābala. On the upper spoke is Uṣṇīṣa. Below is Sumbharāja. Then, by speaking the second, one has the sun disc of the hoped-for. By the syllable kṣa, the crossed vajra, all becomes one, and so there is the triple-excellent vajra. Through the three syllables hūṃ there are the vajra ground, the tiered mansion, and the vajra lotus seat.

The syllable phaṭ is for striking the malevolent with the dagger. The syllable svā is for invoking the buddhas and bodhisattvas. By the syllable hā, all the offerings and so forth, and the confession of misdeeds and so forth, will be declared. This is the definitive meaning of this mantra.

Now there will be those who accomplish the twenty-four activities taught in the root tantra, and the words of the mantras should be spoken. Here, in the abbreviated tantra, everything that accords with the procedure and everything that reverses it is concealed from teachers who are wicked and do not fully understand. It should be known through the sequence of the lineage of the holy lama and so forth, not through reading the books. Otherwise, one should consult other tantras and grasp whatever words of the Blessed One are reasonable, and are correctly realized across many tantras, not through the mere faith of a fool.

Thus the Blessed One said: "My word is virtuous in the beginning, virtuous in the middle, and virtuous in the end. It is not virtuous at the beginning and non-virtuous in the middle and end, nor non-virtuous in the middle and virtuous at the end." As foolish people imagine: at the beginning meditating on conceptual thought, in the middle meditating on the bliss of the two faculties, and at the end meditating on non-conceptual emptiness, meditating on great bliss. That is like a bad cause of words, and every fruit born from it is seen to be of that kind.

From the seed of the kodrava,
no rice grain ever comes.

From the seed of conceptual thought the fruit becomes conceptual.

What is born from non-conceptuality becomes a fruit that is non-conceptual.

For this reason it is virtuous at the beginning, virtuous in the middle, and virtuous at the end.

As the seed, so the sprout;
as the tree, so the fruit.
This is seen throughout the world,
and this is dependent origination itself.
Whatever mantra belongs to another family does not accomplish another action.
Nowhere in the world
does the sun pacify heat.

As taught clearly to me in the root tantra of Hevajra, just so in this abbreviated tantra
I shall give the extensive explanation.

By the seed of earth: paralyzing, bewildering, and striking with the dagger.
By the seed of water: always pacifying, likewise increasing and neutralizing poison.
By the seed of fire: strongly summoning, always empowering and moving.
By the seeds of wind: causing hatred, expelling, and likewise increasing poison.
By the seed of space: removing poison, likewise killing and harming.
Nourishing, inciting, and delighting are accomplished by the seed of wisdom.

Muteness, deafness, and making a person impotent are likewise accomplished by the mantrin, in due order, through the seed syllables of mind, speech, and body. From the union of earth, water, fire, wind, and space with the maṇḍala of wisdom, the rites of paralysis and the like are accomplished by the supreme practitioner. Making impotent, making mute, blindness, blocking the nose, deafness, and madness are accomplished with the seed syllables of the former kind.

These rites are to be performed in mountains, in mountain wilds, in medicinal meadows, on the shores of great oceans, and in charnel grounds that have existed from the beginning. Mantra recitation, meditation, fire offering, and the raising of the maṇḍala should accord with each particular rite; otherwise no accomplishment will be granted. In another place, neither men nor women accomplish mantra and deity. Once the deity is urged on by the mantra, it comes to perform the rites. Therefore the wise should recite and meditate on the name and on the body of the deity. The root mantra becomes the body. The one called the heart mantra is spoken as powerful. The near-heart mantra is called the mantra of mind. What is taught as the wisdom seed is to be called the wisdom mantra. Seed syllable, near-heart mantra, heart mantra, and root mantra correspond to wisdom, mind, speech, and body; in this order they are to be meditated upon and recited. Until accomplishment arises, recite and offer with diligence. Otherwise, when the ritual procedure is spoiled, no accomplishment of mantra will arise. For one who grasps with faith alone, the body is nothing but affliction.

The syllables ya, ra, la, and va arise from wind, fire, earth, and water, and are to be applied without fail to the east, south, west, and north. In the sequence of long Ī, fire, Nairṛti, wind, and Īsāna, give haṃ and ha above and below, and in the center make offering with aṃ and aḥ. For the sake of reading the buddhas, the lamas, and the sacred Dharma, one makes a maṇḍala in front.

The other, the Victor, the sovereign himself, arises through the maṇḍala of wind: round, the east, the body of Videha. By the nature of the maṇḍala of fire: Jambudvīpa, three-cornered. Four-cornered is the west, Godānīya. The maṇḍala of earth has its own defining mark. By the maṇḍala of water, the half-moon, the north, Kuru, of unpleasing sound. By the nature of emptiness, the maṇḍala of the moon has the defining mark of the Brahmā gate. Below, by the nature of wisdom, is the maṇḍala of the sun, the fire of time. In the center, a distinct drop becomes the mountain of the gods, above and below. Having made the maṇḍala in this way, one then recites the mantras and so forth. Any other maṇḍala on the ground is to be made like a colored-powder maṇḍala.

One constantly makes offering with the thirty-six: the aggregates, the six elements, form, and so on. Earth, water, fire, wind, semen, and blood-sediment are spoken of as the six elements. The aggregate of form belongs to embodied beings. It becomes the throat, the palate, the crown of the head, the lips, the teeth, and the nose. The aggregate of perception is taught as the six kinds that illuminate the meaning of things existent and non-existent. Eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and likewise the mind faculty are explained as the aggregate of consciousness; the six, eye and the rest, are of that kind. Likewise form, sound, smells, tastes, touch, and the dharmadhātu are explained as feelings, because they are experienced. In the same way the consciousnesses enter through the doors of the six faculties, and the objects and faculties bring about the entering. The aggregate of formations is taught as sixfold: the life-breath and the downward-clearing wind, and the three paths, upper and lower, flowing in the six channels. The aggregate of wisdom is also sixfold. The thirty-seventh is the great mind.

The yogin should make offering with a, the vowels, and ka, the consonants, to the cycle of the sacred thirty-six elements. By the nature of the vowels and the consonants, the elements are seventy-two. Of these, the six are the syllables ha and the rest. Through the division into short and long, the seventy-two are taught here. The vowels are thirty-six, joined with the vowels and the consonants. One hundred and eight syllables are to be spoken on the rosary. The yogin recites the mantra. Of the thirty-six consonants, with the short vowels, eighteen, they are joined with the vowels; with one half of a hundred and eight, they are to be spoken there on the rosary. By division of the lunar mansions into quarters, the third is to be spoken in full. By a half portion of the lunar mansions, the fourth is that very thing. By dividing the thirty-six vowels, the fifth is to be spoken in full. By dividing the enjoyment of the lunar mansions, the sixth is to be spoken in full. By dividing the eighteen vowels, the seventh is to be spoken in full. Again, by dividing the thirty-six consonants, there is the eighth. By the rosary of the ascetic, it is explained in this way as eightfold.

With eighteen crystal beads, one performs a single pacifying rite, by one of firm vows. By reciting the thirty-six vowels with pearls, human beings are increased. The twenty-seven lunar mansions are taught for killing one who cannot be revived. Its variant, with the revival of a donkey, is for causing hatred and for banishing. With the thirty-six pure consonants, bringing under control and the rest is done with a pothi leaf. Mixing vowels and consonants completely, with fifty-four, one calls it the lotus, or else, with the sandalwood seed, one summons. With a quarter of the lunar mansions, one causes bewilderment; the lungthang is taught. With the vowels and consonants in quarters, for paralysis it is taught with a rudrākṣa. Thus, for the pure rite, pure kinds are taught in eight ways. For mixed rites of various kinds, one works with the seed syllable or here with a jewel. Do as one finds fitting according to the division of the colors of the elements. Then from this, whatever brings the yogin quick accomplishment.

The mantra that has arisen from the family: the defining marks of mantra will be explained. The a, ku, ha, and ka that arise from the throat, the vowels and the consonants and their defining marks, arise from the element of space;

they are known by the syllable ha. The i, ca, ya, and śa arise from the palate; the vowels and consonants and their defining marks arise from the element of wind; they are known by the syllable ya. The ṛ, ṭa, ra, and ṣa arise from the crown of the head; the vowels and consonants and their defining marks arise from the element of fire; this is by the syllable ra.

Those that arise from the upper lip, the syllables U and Pu, Va and the labial sounds, whichever they are, these vowels and consonants and their defining marks arise truly from the water element. They are known through the syllable Va. Those born from the teeth and the syllables Lṛ, Tu, La, Sa, these vowels and consonants and their defining marks arise truly from the earth element. They are known through the syllable La. The visarga and the anusvāra, though they lack the vowel and consonant, arise truly from the element of wisdom. Thus there are the families of the six elements: earth, water, fire (the devourer), wind, seminal fluid, and the family of dust (menstrual blood). The six elements are explained here as the great person, the great being.

The chief ones, the vowels beginning with A and the consonants beginning with Ka, are the lords of the aggregates and elements, the very lords of mantra. The gathering together of each one is taught for the sake of establishing the sound that brings bliss. Mantra becoming accomplished is just this; so too the mantra of omniscience. It is not by the order of a child's reading. The vowels and consonants that are mixed, produced from throat and palate or from throat and lips, those that come from two places, are not born of a single nature. The vowels born of pure nature arise in a single place, such as the throat. When mantras are always pronounced, that is not pronounced from two places. The syllable A, fully joined with a vowel, does not leave its own place; that is pure by nature. A consonant with the visarga and the dot, joined with vowels such as E, that enters two places is not born of pure nature, and the consonant becomes doubled.

The great mighty maṇḍala is yellow, arising from the syllable Laṃ. The water maṇḍala is white, arising from the syllable Vaṃ. The fire maṇḍala is red, arising from the syllable Raṃ. The wind maṇḍala is black, arising from the syllable Yaṃ. The space maṇḍala is green, arising from the syllable Haṃ. What arises from the visarga and the dot is born from all the colors of wisdom. Likewise the Ta class and the syllable Lṛ, born of that letter, are yellow. The Pa class and the others, with the syllable U, born of the vowel, are said to be white. The Ṭa class, with the syllable Ṛ, born of the vowel, are red. The Ca class, with the syllable I, born of the vowel, are said to be black. The Ka class and the others, with the syllable A, born of the vowel, are said to be green.

Likewise, those born from the syllable Sa, and from A and La, are yellow. White are those born from the syllable Va, and the syllable O born of its quality. Red are those born from the syllable Śa, and the syllable Ar born of its quality. Black are those born from the syllable Śa, and the syllable E born of its quality. Green are those born from the syllable Ha, and the syllable Ai born of its quality. These, A, I, Ṛ, U, Lṛ, are the vowels born of pure nature. These, A, E, Ar, O, Al, are born of the two, quality and nature. These, Ha, Ya, Ra, Va, La, are likewise the two converted by the semivowel change. The ordinary ones with the chief one stand in the middle of the two; the chief leads the maṇḍala.

Again, within each of the classes, the nature is explained as fivefold. These, Ōa, Ōa, Ōa, Ma, Na, arise from the element of space. These, Gha, Jha, Ḍha, Bha, Dha, arise truly from the element of wind. These, Ga, Ja, Ḍa, Ba, Da, arise truly from the element of fire. These, Kha, Cha, Ṭha, Pha, Tha, arise from the element of water. These, Ka, Ca, Ṭa, Pa, Ta, arise from the element of earth. By the division of the six families of letters, and by the division of the chief natures, through the division of each separate letter, the families become fivefold.

As earth and its tail are yellow, so are form, the body and its faculty. As water and the moon are white, so are perception and the tongue faculty. As fire and the sun are red, so are feeling and the eye, these too. As wind and Rāhu are black, so are formations and the nose. As space and the pole star are green, so are consciousness and the ear. As the hare-marked moon is blue, so wisdom, and likewise the mind is said to be wisdom. In the same way smell, color, taste, tangible objects, sound, and also the dharmadhātu are the six families of elements, in order.

Likewise the anus, the feet, the hands, the faculty of speech, and the supreme faculty of the bhaga, all arise from the families of earth and the rest. Likewise speaking, taking, going, excreting, urinating, and emitting seed, these actions arise from the families of earth and the rest. Thus the six elements are fully declared: the six aggregates, the six faculties, the objects, and the faculties of action, and the six functions of the faculties of action. By dividing the six aggregates and the elements, the elements number thirty-six; the thirty-seventh is wisdom, the oneness of the emptiness of all phenomena. The elements are in the outer world and also in the body; as in the body, so in others.

Pure earth is for immobilizing. Pure water is for pacifying. Pure fire is for bringing under control. Pure wind is for causing hatred. Pure space is for sustaining life. Pure wisdom is for killing. These are called the six pure rites.

The others are the mixed ones. By the mixing of earth and water, all embodied beings flourish. By the mixing of wind and fire, all embodied beings are drawn in. By the mixing of wind and water, people are set in motion. By the mixing of earth and space, embodied beings fall. By the mixing of earth and wisdom, the fallen are raised up again. By the mixing of fire and water, men and women are dissolved in desire. By the mixing of earth and wind, there is bewilderment and being pierced with the ritual dagger. By the mixing of space and water, beings are made to tremble. By the mixing of space and wisdom, there is life once more. By the mixing of fire and earth, all embodied beings are tormented. By the mixing of fire and space, embodied beings fall ill with disease. By the mixing of fire and wisdom, embodied beings are thrown into turmoil. By the mixing of wind and space, the various ones are surely driven out. By the mixing of wind and wisdom, in an instant the three realms are bound. By the mixing of space and wisdom, all embodied beings are shaken.

By wisdom alone, all rites are accomplished.

Those who speak of wisdom perform them.

Not by recitation, nor by counting a rosary,
nor by fire offering, mantra, or offerings,
but by meditative concentration alone does the yogin bring all rites to success.

Thus, whatever mantras belong to the three families,
to the four, or to the five families,
all arise from the nature of the elements,
and by rite they perform endless activities.

In this way the mantras of the six families are pure and also mixed with one another.

These are the great beings without number.

To accomplish the divine siddhis, the characteristics of the mantras are to be told according to the nature of the five elements, for the sake of beings, with respect to enemy, friend, and neutral.

A, Ku, Ha, Ka, and those arising from the throat,
the vowels and consonants with their characteristics,

are always present as friends with the mantras of space, wind, and the rest.

I, Tsu, Ya, Śa, and those arising from the palate,
the vowels and consonants with their characteristics,
arise truly from the element of wind;
they are the enemy of those born from water.

Ṛ, Ṭu, Ra, Śa, born from the crown of the head,
the vowels and consonants with their characteristics,
arise truly from the element of fire;
they are the enemy of those born from earth.

U, Pu, Va, Pa, born from the lips,
the vowels and consonants with their characteristics,
arise truly from the element of water;
they are the enemy of those born from fire.

Ḷ, Tu, La, Sa, born from the teeth,
the vowels and consonants with their characteristics,
arise truly from the element of earth;
they are the enemy of those born from wind.

Space is always the friend of wind.
Neutral is water, because it lacks power.
Fire's friend is always wind.
Earth is neutral, because it lacks power.
Water's friend is earth, and fire is the neutral one.
Earth's friend is water, and fire too is neutral.

Setting aside the syllable Om,
the first letter of the mantra is the family;
that itself is the heart of the mantra,
and the form is the cause of completion.
When other consonant letters are stacked upon the first letter of the mantra, of these the first is the one taken,
because it is spoken first.
By the distinction of vowel and consonant,
these become two kinds.
The enemy and friend of the life force and of the body are also to be told.

The enemy, friend, or neutral of the life force are taught through the vowels;
the enemy, friend, and neutral of the body are taught through the consonants.
Through the enemy among the vowels,
the life of the practitioner is taken, without doubt.
Through one characterized by an enemy among the consonants, illness and the like are brought about.
Within a single class, too, Ka and the rest should be known in relation to the practitioner's mantra.
Ōa, Ō̄a, Ō̇a, Na, Ma: these,
and the others, remain as friends.
Gha, Jha, Ḍha, Bha, Dha: these are the enemy of those born from water.
Ga, Ja, Ḍa, Ba, Da: these are the enemy of those born from earth.
Kha, Cha, Ṭha, Pha, Tha: these are the enemy of those born from fire.
Ka, Ca, Ṭa, Pa, Ta: these are the enemy of those born from wind.
Thus friend and neutral are to be known mutually, as before.

The first letter of the mantra stands, whether in its own class or in others,
and the practitioner's two letters become the one born from birth and the one born from the name.
These too are to be fully known as two kinds,
having the characteristics of vowel and consonant.
At the time of birth, the conjunction of the time is of the nature of the five vowel signs.
For a man or a woman, whether born under Capricorn or another sign, the consonant of that sign should be purified.
For Capricorn, the five from Ka onward should be purified by the distinction of the vowel signs.
For Aquarius too, the five from Ōa onward, distinguished in order by empty and the rest.

For Pisces, the five from Tsa onward;
for Aries, the five from Ña in order;
for Taurus, the five from Ṭa onward;
for Gemini, the five from Ṇa likewise;
for the conjunction of Cancer, Pa and the rest;
for the conjunction of Leo, Ma and the rest.
For Virgo, the five from Ta onward;
for Libra likewise, the five from Na onward;
for Scorpio, the five from Sa onward;
for Sagittarius, the five from Tha onward are taught.

By the distinction of withdrawal and emission,
sixty letters are assigned to day and night.
For the movement of the breath to right and left,
the five maṇḍalas descend,
and by their division into six periods,
the outer world, and likewise the body, are determined.
The vowels are to be purified in the middle of the lunar portions,
by the distinction of thirty.
Beginning from the first day of the waxing fortnight, up to the full moon, there are thirty deities.
A, I, Ṛ, U, Ṛ: these are assigned in order to the first day and onward.
A, E, Ar, O, Al: these are well known as the sixth day and onward.
Ha, Ya, Ra, Va, La: these are taught for the eleventh day and onward.
The five beginning with La, in reverse order, belong to the first day of the dark fortnight and onward.
The five beginning with the letter A belong to the sixth day of the dark fortnight and onward.
The five beginning with the letter Ṛ,
among the vowels, are for the eleventh day and onward.
At the full moon the dot is spoken;
at the end of the new moon the visarga is placed.
By the finer division of moments,

these are taught as the portions of each moon.
The vowel that rises in any given portion is the one that chiefly governs beings.
The five consonants that have properties,
these belong to the families of earth and the rest.
In the first moment the vowel is such,
and it becomes the vowel born from it;
in the second, from the second,
and thus all in order.
By the distinction of the thirty moments,
the born vowel should be spoken.

By the first sound of the mantra, through vowels and consonants without doubt, practitioners will exhaust their life or suffer great illness, there is no doubt.
When the vowel is dull, one does not know it,
and when the consonant is free of conceptuality,
the first vowel of the name should be taken,
and also the first of the two consonants.
Whether the first consonant of the mantra or the vowels, for the purpose of accomplishing them
one performs the approach recitation.
Here six rites are taught.
The first is striking;
likewise bringing down, and burning;
then drawing out by mantra,
and then increase and pleasing.

The emptiness made with the visarga presses upon the front of the mantra;
this is the striking by the king of weapons,
and one comes to a state of fainting.
By a hundred thousand recitations of the mantra,
the deity of the mantra is made victorious.
Pride is wholly abandoned,
and the practitioner comes under one's power.
Likewise, pressed down by wind,

it descends upon the yogin.
Pressed down by fire, it burns.
Then by water it is drawn out.
Earth, abiding at the crown,
makes the deity increase through recitation.
Pressed down on the head with the bindu and its accessories,
the one pleased grants the supreme.
Thus by six hundred thousand recitations the preliminary approach is taught, and in all the root tantras the Sugata taught it for the sake of the desired siddhis.

The syllable phaṭ, likewise hūṃ, bauṣaṭ, namaḥ, svāhā, and vaṣaṭ: these are used for the six activities, according to their number. The practitioner who keeps the observance should place them at the end of the mantra. First he should give the offering to Vairocana, and then begin the recitation again. After that he should recite the divisions, and perform the fire offering with one tenth of the recitation. He should do everything according to the rites taught in the tantra. Then the deity will be accomplished, and, being accomplished, will bestow on the mantrin the supreme attainment, whatever he seeks.

Rites of other families, other kinds of activity, other times, other mantra families, other places, directions, and supports: none of these activities bears fruit. Those who recite mantras read from books, and who have abandoned the oral instruction, kindle a fire of accomplishment that is itself an affliction for the ground. If one finds them in a book, what use is it to have taken them up correctly? Whatever is written down and read out has only been clarified as a provisional meaning. Those who have abandoned the true substance of the sacred mantra and recite from books mantras for gods and the like: such practitioners wish to eat the sky. But a practitioner who has steadfast effort in his own mind, or who accomplishes mantra recitation while seeking the good of others, by his wish attains worldly accomplishments. If mantra recitation, fire offering, the place, and the sequence of the offering rite are impaired, the rite will not succeed. This statement is true and just so. For it is shown by the Teacher, by bodhisattvas, and by the gods; therefore the wise should take up this very point with every effort.

With these and similar words, the root tantra taught the accomplishment of mantras by other methods, for the sake of accomplishing activities such as paralyzing. In this short tantra, however, the meaning is to be understood through another, intentional language, and that is what will be explained. "Om hūṃ svāhā: it paralyzes." By the syllable hūṃ one should accomplish the vajra earth element, and by it one should accomplish paralyzing. "Om aṃ svāhā: it brings under control." By the syllable aṃ one should accomplish the fire element, and by it one brings under control. "Om khaṃ svāhā: it expels." By the syllable khaṃ one should accomplish the wind element, and by it one expels. "Om jṛīṃ svāhā: it sows hatred." By the syllable jṛīṃ one should accomplish the elements of fire and wind mixed, and by them one causes hatred. "Om bhrūṃ svāhā: it is a fierce rite." By the syllable bhrūṃ one should accomplish fire and water, and by them one performs the fierce rite. "Om hūṃ svāhā: it summons." By the syllable hūṃ one should accomplish the elements of wind, fire, and space, and by them one summons. "Om ghuḥ svāhā: it kills." By the syllable ghuḥ one should accomplish wind and water, and by them one kills. This was spoken with intention.

What is the direct perception of the faculties? It is the direct perception imputed by the mind. The wisdom of the generation stage is not the direct perception that makes a buddha. What is the direct perception of the yogī? It is that which is self-awareness. The wisdom of the completion stage is the supreme that accomplishes the work of a buddha.

That same wisdom has five distinct aspects. At the beginning, the middle, and the end, the five eyes were taught by the Protector in gathering the teachings. First the eye of flesh, then the divine eye, then the eye of a buddha. After that comes the eye of wisdom (prajñā), and then the fifth, the eye of gnosis (jñāna). For the beginner yogī, the first becomes the eye of flesh. Then through it comes the divine eye, and one sees as the gods see. After that it becomes the eye of a buddha, and one sees as the śrāvakas see. Then, as with the eye of wisdom, one sees as the bodhisattvas see. Then comes the eye of the nature of gnosis, and one sees as the Sugatas see. Whoever possesses the eye of the four kinds of gnosis is called by that name. By the distinction of gnosis and consciousness, two kinds of entities are shown: for those who are still training, the eye of gnosis, and after that what is called the eye of gnosis proper. A buddha has no beginning and no end. The first buddha is the two without conceptual thought, the single eye of gnosis, free of stain. The Tathāgata is the one who has gnosis as his body.

Thus, in the conventional truth of the world, according to the way of dependent origination, "when this is obtained, this arises." In the combination of orpiment and ash, as with the red itself, this should be understood for accomplishing all activities. This is not done by yogīs with the pride of thinking "I am a buddha." From this comes the certainty of accomplishment.

This is the sixth chapter, the section on the accomplishment of the limitless, from the chapter on the mantra families in the six-thousand-verse commentary on the Hevajra.

Having bowed to the hūṃ of Hevajra, I will explain the various accomplishments, out of compassion for sentient beings, in order to bring down rain upon the earth.

"Having made an image of Ananta with the two syllables a and phuḥ": here the image of Ananta should be made from fragrant sandalwood. From the navel up it has the form of a man, and below it has the form of a serpent's tail. It has four arms: in the left, a skull cup of nectar and a lotus; in the right, a fruit of nectar and a jewel. Over its head it has seven hoods in the form of a canopy. Likewise, to its left, the nāga king is made by the syllable aṃ. One should wash it with the five nectars: milk, curd, honey, butter, and sugar are the five nectars, and with these it should be washed. Then one should make offerings with blue utpala flowers. One should anoint the body with the fluid that subdues nāgas, and anoint the head with elephant liquor. Joining two cups mouth to mouth, one fills them with the milk of a black cow. With four fingers one places a measure of twelve finger-widths and a half, reaching from the forehead and the nose to the end of the lips. One should bind it in the eight directions with a thread spun by a young black girl and treated by degrees. Then, at the edge of a pond, on the windward side, one makes a maṇḍala, and in the middle of the pond one places Ananta, the nāga king. In the colored-powder maṇḍala one draws, with colored powders, Hevajra suppressing Ananta. Here I will explain the coloring of the maṇḍala: the black powder is made from charcoal of a charnel ground.

With powder of human bones, white; with cow bile, yellow; with the tusk of a boar from a charnel ground, red; and with thief's leaves mixed with a little human bone, green. With these five colored powders one raises the maṇḍala. First one lays out the lines with a charnel-ground thread, that is, a thread made from the sinews of corpses. Using measures of three cubits and a little more than three finger-widths, from the middle of the eyebrow to the end of the navel, "of those who come and go," so it says.

With half of the maṇḍala one makes an eight-petaled lotus. Of its three parts, in the one part at the center is the sun seat. Upon it, Anantā and the king of Anantā, that is, Hevajra, treading upon them; and on the soles of the left and right feet of Hevajra one draws Jaya and Vijaya. Hevajra has eight faces, four feet, and is adorned with sixteen arms. Nairātmyā clings to his shoulder, and he is rich in twenty-four eyes, which will be explained.

Then on the petals of the lotus one draws the eight lords of the nāgas, with five hoods each, and the rest like the image of Ananta. On the left petal is Ananta. On the right is Vāsuki's son. In the west is Takṣaka. In the east is Karkoṭaka. In the southeast is Padma. In the northwest is Mahāpadma. In the southwest is Śaṅkhapāla. In the northeast is Kulika. At the center of these seed syllables is A Phu. On the petals to the right and left and so forth are phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ. With these eight syllables phuḥ one completes the eight nāgas. In the east and southeast they are black; in the south and southwest, red; in the west and northwest, yellow; in the north and northeast, white. This is by the distinction of the faces of mind, speech, wisdom, and body. All are drawn without the tail pressed down, lying stretched out.

Likewise the ground in the east is black, the south red, the west yellow, the north white, bounded by five lines. The eighth part of the maṇḍala is the gate; likewise the borders and the gate surrounds. Half of the gate is the platform and the ground of the lattice. Half of the platform has five lines, a jeweled cloth, bakulī flowers, and kramaśīrṣa. At three times the measure of the gate, the cornice descends; at the corners are variegated vajras. Outside is a garland of blazing vajras.

Having raised the maṇḍala in this way, one then performs the fire offering, in a round hearth, for the sake of pacifying. Then, having consecrated the maṇḍala, one offers the torma that will be explained, with the mantra beginning "Inda, Jama, Jala, Jakṣa." Afterward the master should recite the mantra with a wrathful inner mind. "Inner" means with a mind slightly joyful, so it says.

Then one places the gate guardians in the maṇḍala and sets out ten vases, and upon them places bowls filled with milk. Outside, in the ten directions, one hoists blue banners, and in a secluded place one recites this mantra: Oṃ ghaṭa ghaṭa, ghuṭa ghuṭa, maśa maśa, ghaṭa ghaṭa, ghoṭaya ghoṭaya, ananta kṣobhakarāya nāgādhīpatāye, he he ru ru kaṃ, sapta pātālagatā nānāgana, ākaraṣaya varṣaya, garjaya tarjaya, phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā. In this way the rain falls.

If the rain does not fall, one reverses it and recites this mantra: Hā svāṭa phaṭ phaṭ pha hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ phuḥ, yarjata yarjaga yarṣabaya rṣaka, ā nāgānātāṃ galatāpāptasakaṃ ruru hehe yeta padhi gānāyarāka bhakṣonta na ayaṭa ghoyaṭa ghoṭa ghaṭa ghasa masa maṭu ghuṭu ghuṭa ghaṭa gha oṃ. When it has been recited in this way, if the nāgas still do not bring down rain, then their heads will split like the flower of the arjaka. Arjaka is a white-stemmed plant like black mallikā; just as its flower splits in the sunlight, so, it is certain, will they. This is the rite for bringing down rain.

Before this mantra one first recites it one hundred thousand times; by reciting it ten million times the mantra is accomplished. When one has performed one million fire offerings, then the practitioner, merely by offering the torma, causes the nāgas to bring down rain, and for that there is no maṇḍala rite. For the maṇḍala rite, one first performs the approach one hundred thousand times and ten thousand fire offerings, and then the nāgas bring down rain; in no other way, as is established in the root tantra.

Now the dispersing of clouds will be explained. Here, when the rain has become excessive, one places that Ananta, filled with charnel-ground ashes in a bowl. The mantra practitioner sits near a charnel-ground cloth and recites this mantra: Oṃ ārya śmaśāna priyāya hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. With this he disperses them. Here too, as before, the approach, the fire offering, and the recitation are done. This is the rite for dispersing clouds.

Now the means of accomplishment of the Vajra Curved Knife will be explained. Here, in order to tame beings hard to tame, one accomplishes the mantra of the Vajra Curved Knife by reciting it ten million times, and also with one million fire offerings. Then one performs the practice with the skull. One pounds a skull together with the five nectars, adds kuṭhāra and chinna, and makes a pill about the size of a mustard seed.

Then one goes to the shrine of Heruka, and in front of Heruka, in the manner of a ten-fold abiding, one recites this mantra until, through the face of the deity's form, the pill is bestowed upon the practitioner: Oṃ vajra kartari he vajrāya hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. For the sake of accomplishment one recites a hundred thousand times, in a single sitting. Then it will be accomplished. Having accomplished it, one draws that figure on the neck of the pill. If one sees the figure on the neck of the pill, with the king and his retinue, and if that neck is cut, then the enemies will become headless. The Vajra Curved Knife is complete.

Now the means of accomplishment of the Vajra Axe will be explained. Here, wishing to split the gods of the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), one accomplishes the bindu of the Vajra Axe. Here too the mantra is accomplished as before. Then, under the constellation Pushya, on the day of the full moon, one takes the seed of the brahma tree; the brahma tree is to be called palāśa.

Mix its seeds with kuṭhāra and cinna, in equal parts, and grind them with Akṣobhya. Having ground it, make an image of the enemy and let it dry. When the sun is seized by the eclipse demon, press it down with the foot and recite the mantra: Oṃ vajra kuṭhāra pāṭaya pāṭaya hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Having recited this ten million times, as before, then, when the sun is seized, accomplish it by day and by night, and having spread it out, draw a dot in the form of the enemy's image. Whatever god the practitioner honors with homage, that god is made to break apart. This is the rite for splitting a god.

Now I shall explain the means of accomplishing for fevers. Having accomplished the mantra as before, one who wishes to bring about a fever writes the enemy's name on a leaf of the arka plant, using poison, mustard seed, and the juice of citraka. Then dig a pit in the ground eight finger-widths deep. On top of it place a fire of husks, and recite ten thousand times: Oṃ hevajra jvara jvara śatruṃ bhrūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Then the one to be accomplished is gradually afflicted. If the leaf is taken out and washed with cow's milk, he is freed. This is the rite for fevers.

Now I shall explain the rite for making someone vomit liquor. Having accomplished the mantra for making one vomit liquor as before, then, one who wishes to make someone vomit liquor visualizes in the navel of the one to be accomplished a wind maṇḍala transformed from the syllable yaṃ. Above it he visualizes a figure transformed from the syllable maṃ, with a belly full of liquor and with loosened hair, vomiting liquor; this is the one to be accomplished, vomiting liquor. He recites one hundred and eight times the mantra: Oṃ hevajra marya muṅgirāya maṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. This is the means of accomplishing for vomiting liquor.

Now I shall explain bringing under one's control. Having accomplished the Kurukullā mantra, as before, by the rite of reciting ten million times and so forth as explained earlier, then, one who wishes to bring a woman made utterly intoxicated under his control goes, on the eighth day, to beneath an aśoka tree, wearing red clothes and eating an intoxicating fruit. He makes a dot with kāmācikā juice and recites the mantra: Oṃ kurukulle hrīḥ amukāṃ me vaśī bhavatu svāhā. By reciting it ten thousand times she will come. This is the rite for bringing under control.

Now I shall explain seizing the moon and sun. First, having recited seven times ten million, the mantra practitioner accomplishes the mantra. Then, one who wishes to seize the moon and sun makes a moon or a sun from pounded rice, steams it, places it in a vessel four finger-widths across filled with vajra water, and recites the mantra: Oṃ vajrārka namācala mālā tiṣṭha tiṣṭha hevajrāya hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. This is for holding the sun fixed. For holding the moon fixed, the mantra begins "Oṃ vajra candra," and so on. By reciting it ten thousand times, the moon or sun stays in place. When it is removed from the urine, it is freed. This is the rite for holding fixed the moon and sun.

Now I shall explain the entry into bringing down the pra, the vajra astrological calculation. As before, one accomplishes the mantra by reciting a hundred thousand times, ten times over, and by a hundred thousand fire offerings of red lotuses. The mantra is: Oṃ nagra nagra kumārike divya locani svāhā. With this mantra, at an unseasonable time, one praises the eyes of a young girl one hundred and eight times, honors them with the five offerings, such as flowers and incense, and then brings down the report. On the fourteenth or eighth day, in the morning, one sets down a vase, places on it a branch of a milk-bearing tree, and puts the fresh butter in a copper vessel, and the juice of resin in another vessel. One praises one hundred and eight times with the earlier mantra, smears the left thumb with resin and anoints it with sesame oil. Then, showing it to the young girl, the practitioner repeats the mantra and has her question the other, saying: "Tell me who has carried off my property. And what else do you see of my intentions?" Then she sees on the thumb and says: "A woman has taken the property, and the need concerns a woman." This is the rite for entering the bringing down of the pra for the sake of the vajra astrological calculation.

Now, to turn back livestock, I shall give the mantra of the essence of livestock. First one gives the syllable oṃ, in the middle the words of the mantra, and at the end "hevajrāya svāhā." One accomplishes it with a hundred thousand recitations, ten times over, and then applies it to the livestock. If one says "beṭuyā beṭuyā," the elephant flees. If one says "mammā mammā," the tiger flees. If one says "tellīyā tellīyā," the rhinoceros flees. If one says "ilimili phuḥ phuḥ," the snake flees. By the mudrā of Nor skyong dul ba, the dog flees. Om śvā tiṣṭha tiṣṭha hevajrāya svāhā: this is the rite for turning back animals. In the same way, for the Ḍoms and others, the name of whichever one it is is placed in the middle, with om first and at the end "hevajrāya svāhā." Reciting the mantra in this way and performing the fire offering rite will bring about accomplishments, but not by merely reading the book. This is the Blessed One's definitive statement in the root tantra.

Now I shall explain the deity yoga for the rites of paralyzing and the rest, beginning with "Vajrā and..." Here Vajrā is the aggregate of form, and by her one paralyzes. Gaurī is the aggregate of feeling, and by her one brings under control. Vetālī, the water yoginī, is the aggregate of perception, and by her one pacifies. Vajradākinī is the aggregate of formations, and by her one banishes. Nairātmyā is the aggregate of consciousness, and by her one certainly causes hatred. Bhūcarī is the vajra lady of tangibles, and by her one certainly summons. Khecarī is the vajra lady of the dharmadhātu, and by her one certainly kills. In the same way, Pukkasī, the yellow one, paralyzes. Śavarī, with the radiance of the moon jewel, pacifies. Caṇḍālī brings under control. Ḍombī banishes. The sovereign lady of the vajra expanse causes hatred. The element of wisdom accomplishes killing. In this way the yogin should know everything, outer and inner. With the colors yellow, white, red, black, green, and blue, one performs the paralyzing and the other rites: through the deity yoga, one accomplishes mantra recitation, fire offering, and the gathering of torma. This is the Blessed One's definitive statement in the root tantra.

This is the great summary that accomplishes the endless variety of rites, in the commentary on the six thousand verses of the Hevajra: the seventh section of the second chapter, the chapter on mantras. It is complete.

Wrathful and yet with attachment, in the form of supreme peace: in whatever form the lord of the Victors has meditated, in that very form he sees his own mind. All those forms are the mind of aspiration. The mind of entering is likewise that one mind. Mind that is not mind, the purity of the three liberations, the one who knows everything throughout the three times: having bowed my head to that Vajrasattva, I, Vajragarbha, shall write the commentary on the chapter on the deities, as realized from the root tantra, so that beings may attain the path.

The generation stage is one: it is focusing on beings and phenomena. The second, without focus, accomplishes the completion stage.

Here, in the Concise Tantra, the Blessed One said: "Now, from this, the chapter on the deities will be explained. First, one should meditate on Maitreya." By these and similar words, the initial words are to be applied to the root tantra, and so too the intermediate words and the concluding words.

There the Blessed One said:

By whom the distinctions of mantra and mudrā are mastered, the yogin's own self is accomplished. The sādhana and ritual procedure of the deity shall be explained by Vajragarbha.

At dawn the mantrin, having voided feces and urine and having done cleansing and the like, sits upon a soft seat. Having made a pill whose nature is the ten substances, he places it in his own mouth. With the five nectars and the elements, having made a maṇḍala before him, he offers incense, flowers and so on in order to Gaurī and the others. White Dbang to Yama, Caurī; in the direction of the lord of waters, Vetālī; to Kubera, the goddess Ḍākinī; below dwells Bhūcarī; above is taught Khecarī. To these one makes offerings in order. The goddess Īśāna's Pukkasī; likewise in fire, Śmaśānī; in the demons' quarter Caṇḍālī; in the wind, Ghasmarī; in order. In the center of the wheel, Hevajra is honored together with Nairātmyā.

Then one should recall loving-kindness, compassion and the rest toward all beings. Having honored these, one then places their seed syllables on one's own body. The seed syllable at the head of the name, together with the vowel a and the dot, is applied: Gaurī on the element of form; Caurī on the element of sound; Vetālī on the element of smell; Ghasmarī on the element of taste; Bhūcarī on the element of touch; Khecarī on the element of phenomena. On the eye, the goddess Pukkasī; on the ears Śmaśānī is intended; on the nose the goddess Caṇḍālī; on the tongue Ḍombī is intended. The body faculty is Hevajra; Nairātmyā dwells in the mind.

This is the first placing of the limbs, in the root tantra. The seed syllables gaṃ, caṃ, vaṃ, ghaṃ, bhaṃ, khaṃ, baṃ, śaṃ, caṃ, ḍaṃ, haṃ, naṃ should be placed on the elements as explained.

"Then one should contemplate guarding the place." It is thus: having meditated from Rephā for seven days, on that sun a hūṃ arises, a varied vajra; one should meditate also on the enclosure of that very vajra and the tent bound about it.

On this very point the root tantra says that first the protection wheel, which turns back the malicious, and the pinning down of obstructors and misleaders with the ritual dagger, are done by the mantrin in the body of the king of wrathful ones. Afterward the desired deity is to be accomplished. This tantra of Hevajra, whose nature is wisdom and means, is a yoga tantra; afterward, as the essence of Nairātmyā's sādhana, because it is practiced by the yoginīs, the yoginī tantra will be explained. Therefore the assembly of the yoga tantra, the lords of wrathful kings beginning with Yamāntaka, should be meditated upon in the protection wheel. The chief of the wheel is Vajra Hūṃkāra, who is the six-armed Hevajra.

Therefore, first one imagines a sun disk before oneself, and in its center the varied vajra, four-faced, wholly transformed from the syllable hūṃ. That varied vajra and the sun become mingled as one, and in all directions, above and below, there are the vajra fence, the vajra tent, and the vajra ground, which the demons cannot break. Outside the fence, and below and above, the mantrin should meditate on varied terrifying weapons.

Other matters should be applied from the root tantra. There the Blessed One said:

The seats of the wrathful kings I shall explain properly in order: faces, body colors, hands and weapons, and the feet in the stance with left leg extended. In the center of the vajra tent, from the syllable bhrūṃ fully transformed, a wheel of eight spokes arises. Below and above the tent two further spokes are made. With eleven hubs, in order, the sun disks; the eleven feet of the sun; these suns alone.

There, upon the sun discs, one places at each one the syllable HŪṂ. Arisen from the HŪṂ and abiding on the sun, one should meditate on the wrathful kings.

On the sun seat in the center, one envisions the leader, Vajrahūṃkāra. He is blue, with three faces and six arms, and he stands with the left leg extended in the posture of the striding stance. The central face is blue, with bared fangs, fierce and terrifying. The left and right faces are white and red, just as the three channels abide. In the right hands, in order, are the vajra, the curved knife with three points, and the bell; in the left are the skull cup and the khaṭvāṅga. He has hair of varied vajras, adorned with Akṣobhya and a half-moon. From his shoulders hangs a garland of heads, and on the head itself a skull. He possesses the five bone mudrās, and a tiger skin is wrapped about his waist. He has nine eyes, his tongue lolls, and he is adorned with serpent ornaments. Such is Vajrahūṃkāra, the leader; therefore one should meditate on him.

Arisen from a black HŪṂ, the one in the east is placed upon the sun: Yamāntaka, black and fierce, standing in the dancing posture with the left leg extended. His faces are black, white, and red, he has a great belly and three eyes, the five mudrās and a garland of skulls, and a tiger skin at the waist. He is marked with nāga lords and varied vajras. All of them have the family lord on the crown, and their colors and implements differ. Likewise, they have four feet each. In the right hands, in order, are the club, the wheel, and the vajra; at the heart is the threatening gesture, with the noose, the bell, and the axe in the left. On his crown is the Buddha Vairocana. The other one, too, is Vajra-crowned.

Arisen from a white HŪṂ, with faces white, black, and red, one places Prajñāntaka upon the sun in the south. He wears the jewel crown. In the right hands one should envisage the vajra, the wheel, and the club; in the left, at the heart, the threatening gesture and the noose, the bell, and the axe.

Completed from a red HŪṂ, with faces red, blue, and red, Padmāntaka is placed upon the sun in the west. He wears the crown of Amitābha. In the right hands he holds the pestle, the vajra, and the sword; at the heart, the threatening gesture and the noose, with the bell and the axe in the left.

Completed from a blue HŪṂ, wearing the crown of Amoghasiddhi, with faces blue, red, and white, with bared fangs and a terrifying countenance, and holding in the right hand the varied vajra, the wheel, and likewise the pestle; with the bell, the threatening gesture, the noose, and the axe in the left, one places Vighnāntaka upon the sun. In the north is Amṛtakuṇḍalin. Completed from a blue HŪṂ, with eyes blazing and flickering, he is placed upon the sun. His faces are blue, red, and white, and he wears the crown of the glorious Vairocana. He bears the sword, likewise the vajra, and the wheel in his right hands; at the heart, the threatening gesture and the noose, with the bell and the axe in the left.

Completed from a blue HŪṂ, with the head ornament of Amitābha, in the northwest, upon the sun disc, the mantrin places the blue Daṇḍa. The root face and the other faces are fierce, blue, red, and white. In the right hands, in order, are the club, the wheel, and likewise the sword; in the left, the threatening gesture, the noose, the lotus, and the axe.

Accomplished from a blue HŪṂ, wearing the crown of Amoghasiddhi, Mahābala is blue in color; the mantrin places him on the sun in the northeast, the lord of power. His faces are black, red, and white, his belly is great, and he is fearsome. In the right hands, in order, are the club, likewise the sword, the wheel, and the jewel; at the heart the threatening gesture and the noose, and in the left the three-pointed axe.

Completed from a black HŪṂ, with Akṣobhya as the skull, below, upon the sun, is Sumbharāja. His faces are black, red, and white. In the right hands, in order, are the vajra, the wheel, and the jewel; at the heart, the threatening gesture and the noose, and in the left the lotus and the sword.

Having thus meditated on the assemblies of wrathful ones as fearsome, the mantrin then gathers them in and causes them to enter his own body. Yamāntaka is placed on the left shoulder, and Prajñāntaka on the right. On the left arm is Padmāntaka, and on the right Vighnāntaka is placed. On the left thigh is Acala, and on the right, the king of desire.

On the left foot, the one with the blue staff; on the right foot, the Great Powerful One. In the place of the head, the Great Uṣṇīṣa. Place the king Beautiful Harm-Doer at the anus. At the heart, make the vajra hūṃ, and place there the first letter of one's own name: yaṃ, praṃ, paṃ, baṃ, aṃ, ṭaṃ, naṃ, maṃ, uṃ, suṃ, hūṃ.

Now the rite of protection is this. The mantrin, having proceeded in due order, makes himself the vajra hūṃ, and then meditates on himself as wrathful. All obstructors and all evils he pins down with the daggers of the command of Beautiful Harm-Doer. Oṃ ghaghaghātaya ghātaya, sarva duṣṭān phaṭ phaṭ. Kīlaya kīlaya sarva pāpaṃ. Oṃ suṃbhani suṃbhani hūṃ hūṃ. Oṃ grhṇa gr̥hṇa hūṃ hūṃ. Oṃ gr̥hṇāpaya gr̥hṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ. Oṃ ānaya ho. Bhagavān vidyārāja hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ.

With this wrathful form, the wise one summons the obstructors and the vināyakas, and then, according to the rite, with this yoga he pins them all down with daggers. In the region below the navel, he should meditate one-pointedly on the great wrathful one, Vighnāntaka. Above, he has three eyes and six arms; below, he gazes upon the hosts of obstructors. One should recite his mantra, and with the vajra dagger strike the body of the obstructor so that it cannot move. Oṃ ghaghaghātaya ghātaya, sarva duṣṭān phaṭ phaṭ. Kīlaya kīlaya, sarva pāpaṃ phaṭ phaṭ. Hūṃ hūṃ vajra kīlaya. Vajradhara ājñāpayati: sarva vighnaṃ kāya vāk cittam kīlaya kīlaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Vajrapāṇi with the hammer, and the king Beautiful Harm-Doer, should be meditated upon. With this mantra, by the knowledge of the secret mantra, one should strike the vajra daggers. Oṃ vajra mudgara ākoṭaya ākoṭaya, tiṣṭha tiṣṭha. Having fixed the daggers in the ten directions, one should then drive away the malicious. Meditate that vajra flames blaze forth everywhere, and that the malicious ones flee, their bodies burning.

This brief tantra shows the protection wheel in a confused order. The practice from "Then, the yogin abiding above it," and so on, up to the pinning down with daggers, is to be meditated upon. This is the determination of the protection wheel. It is spoken of in four verses.

Then, in the ultimate sense, one should meditate that the three realms of existence lack intrinsic nature. In what has no real thing there is no meditation; meditation is not itself meditation. Thus a thing does not become a thing; meditation has no object. First, emptiness is awakening; second, one gathers the seed; third, the reflected image is completed; fourth, one places the letters. In this way, one should follow the yoga tantra of the protection wheel.

Then the mantrin, filling the expanse of the sky with the light rays from the hūṃ at his own heart, should imagine in the sky, as he is inclined, the venerable chief, embraced by his own wisdom consort and surrounded by the eight mothers, together with the gurus, buddhas and bodhisattvas. Then those light rays return, enter his own heart, and from the hūṃ he draws forth the eight goddesses in order to make offerings to the Blessed One. Here too, by reversing the usual order, there is one verse. From one's own body rays of light stream forth, pervading the maṇḍala of the sky. Gathering them back, one should draw them into the heart. The yogin becomes aversion itself, the vajra-born, of great compassion. Having gazed upon the venerable one in the sky, he offers to the eight goddesses, who wear all the ornaments.

Gaurī holds the sign of the deer. Caurī holds the vessel that conquers the māras. Vetālī holds the water-vessel. Ghasmarī holds medicine. Pukkasī holds the vajra in her hand. Likewise Śavarī holds the corpse. Caṇḍālī plays the small drum. Ḍombī dances with passion. The moon is to be called semen, the sun, dust; water is urine. Medicine is bone and flesh. Vajra Vairocana is declared. Corpse is said to be the six flavors. Gokus and so on are the powers, the small drum. Dance is the drink of beer. These are explained as the eight pledges. With these the yogin should make offerings to the chief Hevajra and his retinue.

Then, in front of him, the mantrin takes refuge in the Three Jewels. He should confess misdeeds, rejoice in merits, or offer his own body, and also become steadfast in the path. He generates the awakening mind. Then he requests the buddhas to depart. He directs his attention to emptiness. Again, he should examine in this way. Because of lacking intrinsic nature, it is empty; without cause, it has no sign. Always non-existent, there is no aspiration; volitional activity is abandoned. Because there is no arising or cessation, aspiration has no object. There are no buddhas, no sentient beings; there are no phenomena and no possessors of phenomena. Just as with illusion and dream, and with the city of gandharvas, so one sees buddhas and sentient beings through meditating on suchness. Just as with an echo, so the buddhas teach the Dharma.

Having examined thus, for the sake of taking up sentient beings throughout cyclic existence, the bodhisattva remains in existence. Though the afflictions, the māras, the equipoise, and the cognitive obscurations are certainly burned away by the great wrathful one, he preserves a portion of them. The great bodhisattvas, who love all sentient beings, having examined all buddhas and bodhisattvas completely, should direct their attention to emptiness and recite this secret mantra: Oṃ śūnyatā jñāna vajra svabhāva ātmako 'haṃ. Having recited this, he then recalls his aspiration. With the mind of aspiration, the mantrin should meditate, with divine pride, for the sake of the play of beings.

He should imagine the maṇḍala wheel that will be explained here, adorned with the eight charnel grounds. In its center he should meditate on a lotus with eight petals, a sun disc, and then, upon the sun, the corpse whose nature is the dharmadhātu. From the cause of the buddha's marks, the thirty-two vowels are on the moon, and the eighty consonants on the sun. In their center is the syllable hūṃ, which is called the being. It has the nature of innate joy, and from the sequence of mirror-like wisdom, wisdom of equality, and discriminating wisdom, these are accomplished as one in action. The form arises from the cause of complete perfection. This is explained as the dharmadhātu; the fifth wisdom is the supreme.

One who has fully awakened through the five aspects meditates on Hevajra with two arms. His color is a blend of blue and the pale gray of dawn, and his eyes are red like the bandhūka flower. He wears a garland of skulls and severed heads, and Akṣobhya is the crown set upon his head. He has the wheel, the earrings, the necklace, the bracelets, and the girdle. Through the purity of the five buddhas, the five mudrās are renowned. Akṣobhya dwells in the wheel. Amitābha is the very being of the earrings. The necklace is Ratnasambhava, the bracelets are Vairocana the Victor, and Amoghasiddhi dwells in the girdle. In this way the buddhas are fully established. The goddesses, Moharati (Mohavajrā) and the others, are the sense sources, the eye and the rest.

In his left hand are a vajra and a skull cup, and in the left too is the khaṭvāṅga. In the right is a black vajra, and his very nature is the uttering of the syllable hūṃ. In the charnel ground the Protector plays, surrounded by yoginīs. This knowledge, called the movement of the breath, is declared to be the charnel ground.

Such is the determination of the sādhana of the two-armed form. In the same way, the sādhana of the four-armed form and the sādhana of the six-armed form, up to the end of the chapter on the deities, are easy to understand. Therefore they are not written out here, since there is no difference. This is the eighth section of the sādhana of the deity taught in the commentary on the glorious Hevajra in six thousand lines. The chapter on the deities is completed.

The mirror-like wisdom, the wisdom of equality, and third, the wisdom of discernment; the other, the wisdom that accomplishes activity; and the purified dharmadhātu: these are the five wisdoms. Form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness itself, and earth, water, fire, and wind, with the fifth, space, are empty. The five wisdoms are purified, and the awakening through five aspects is thus fivefold. The one whose nature is the purity of the ten knowables, the holder of the purity of the ten knowables, is called the purified dharmadhātu. He is the great person, the great individual, himself possessing the form of the deity. Having paid homage to him, chief of beings, for the benefit of all sentient beings, I, Vajragarbha, will write the commentary on the chapter on empowerment, which follows the Root Tantra.

Here, the meaning of the chapter on empowerment in the Short Tantra should be understood through the meaning of the Root Tantra, and so one should enter into that very text. Here, when the form of the deity is complete, this mantra should be spoken: Oṃ suviśuddha-dharma-dhātu-svabhāva-ātmako 'ham. This is the completion of the deity's form.

Therefore in the Root Tantra the Blessed One declared:

Listen, Vajragarbha, as I explain the stages of generation just as they are.
There are birth from an egg and birth from a womb,
the two stages that generate existence.
Birth from Brahmā's egg is called egg-birth;
the realms of the world arose in truth from it.
A woman gives birth from the womb as well;
the second is birth from the womb.

First is emptiness, awakening;
bliss comes at the end of death, in transference.
In the mother's womb are semen and blood;
the second is the gathering of the seeds.
Life-wind and consciousness, these five complete the body.
It is to be spoken of as the completion of the image:
the full awakening through five aspects.
In the avadhūtī he swoons with bliss,
the outer sense sources are great enjoyment,
and the great bliss is what awakens them:
Pukkasī and Ḍombinī, Caṇḍālī, and likewise Gaurī, through the dream-state nature
of earth, water, fire, and wind.
Those who are childlike rouse it,
and emerging from the mother's womb,
they attain the waking state,

when the eyes and the rest are empowered.
From the awakening of the sixth consciousness they grasp the five objects.

The lineage seals the child,
and the child seals the lineage as well.

The father seals the son,
and the son likewise the father.

The result seals the cause,
and the cause seals the result.

The relation of the effecting cause and the result is not found when examined closely.

Therefore I will explain this examination of the effecting cause and the result;
listen.

By the nature of seed and stalk,
the cause bears the mark of the result.

All this is imputed by the childlike.

The effecting cause becomes the result:

depending on the seed as cause,
the tree becomes the fruit-bearer, and likewise depending on the tree-trunk as effecting cause, the seed becomes the result.

Thus the cause becomes the result,
and the result too becomes the effecting cause.

The result and the effecting cause both come to be.

In this way these are four in number.

Without a seed there is no stalk, without a stalk there is no seed.

Without an effecting cause, what result could there be?

The assertion would be meaningless.

The begetter of all buddhas becomes in turn the buddhas' son.

That by which one becomes the aggregates, through bliss,
by that one becomes bliss again.

One becomes what is called Vajrasattva.

The aggregates are bliss from death.

Through those aggregates there is the begetter,

from the cause of death and transference.
Without bliss there are no aggregates;
without aggregates there is no bliss.
Without a cause there is no result;
without a result there is no cause.
Cause and result become two and two;
in this way these are four in number.
Who can fully examine what is sealed there by the four?
Again, by the four times four,
through the dharmas of expansion and contraction, since no fixed standing follows,
one remains within the existence of saṃsāra.

Through the nature of arising and ceasing, cause and effect remain in existence. Through the cessation of effect and cause, these neither arise nor perish. When cause and effect have ceased, how could one fail to become a buddha? The yogins who are freed from arising and ceasing see everything.

From sugarcane comes more cane; from cane again comes cane. In the same way, from merit comes merit, and from evil comes evil once more. As maggots arise from decay, so from evil there comes merit, and when merit is exhausted there comes evil, like worms in a dead body.

As the practitioner works with quicksilver, the stages of quicksilver are said to be five. In the same way the wise should know five stages in the awakening mind: the wafting of smoke, the sound "citi citi," the leaping of a frog, the trembling, and the absence of trembling. These are taught as the five stages of quicksilver. Likewise the awakening mind of the meditator passes through five stages: it changes, it changes again, then it flows, then it does not flow, and then it is free of stain.

As quicksilver is caught by a method resting on the cow's yellow pigment, so the awakening mind is held by a method resting on skillful means. Quicksilver that has not been made steady, a mind that has not been made stainless, serves the body and not liberation, serves wealth and not bliss. As copper, once transmuted by quicksilver, never becomes mere copper again, so the body transmuted by wisdom never returns to being an ordinary beast.

By the application of the best medicines, quicksilver consumes iron; made steady and transformed, it transmutes all irons into gold. So too, through the application of the reflection of emptiness, the constituents are consumed in bliss, and one who reaches stainless awakening blesses the minds of others.

Binding takes away disease; melting destroys poverty; transmutation bestows accomplishments; further transmutation gives deathlessness. Suitable causes take away old age, and ripening gives glory. This creator of persons brings accomplishments, and by being stainless it bestows deathlessness.

At death, ignorance enters, and from it the formations arise. This itself is taught as the first protector, three-faced and six-armed, Akṣobhya. Entering first, from it consciousness arises; from that come name and form; then the nature of the six elements, and the six sense sources. From these, form, vajra, and the rest arise without fail. The union of the eyes and the rest with forms and the rest is contact. From it feeling arises, which is Ratnasambhava himself. Craving is the nature of existence and enjoyment, and from that itself clinging arises. From that comes what is called grasping: the stretching out of hands and feet. From that comes becoming, which arises as the infant's breath coming forth.

From that there arises perception, and infants are always said to speak of what is permanent. When the body and the rest are blessed, this is imputed, and again it should be understood as the formations: the teeth fall out and existence goes on. When a child is born, the mothers give the empowerment of bathing with water. Placing a lock of hair on his crown is imputed as the diadem. Piercing his ears and the like is taught as the empowerment of the pennant. The child's speech and laughter are the empowerment of bell and vajra. The fifth, enjoyment, is the observance of the vow. A name is the empowerment of the name. Reading and the like are the permission, which the fathers always give. Thus in seven ways the seven empowerments are renowned. The one who takes the bride is said to be the higher empowerment. Her emptiness of wisdom is said to be the taking of his hand. The union of wisdom and means becomes bliss from dying. The generation of the body becomes approach, and the arising of the life-breath is accomplishment. The twice-born and others being born again is called near-accomplishment. Through the union of wisdom and means, the great accomplishment is supreme.

What is called birth becomes the generation stage; death should be called the gathering in. The aggregates, the junctures, and transference are absent. Ignorance has the nature of transference. The formations and all the rest likewise come to expand and to be gathered in. This is in the root tantra.

Here the Blessed One has said: the chapter on the rite of empowering the deity will be explained.

From the seed syllable in one's own heart, rays of light are sent forth, black and blue, in the form of hooks. By these one summons the buddhas dwelling in the three realms, makes offerings to them together with the eight mothers, and makes the request. This is done with om̐ abhiṣiñcantu mām̐ sarvatathāgatāḥ.

Then those buddhas, in the form of Herukas, consecrate one with vases of nectar, whose nature is the five tathāgatas. While the empowerment is being given, a rain of flowers falls from the sky. The gods sound great drums. A rain of saffron falls. Rūpavajrā and the others make offerings. Locanā and the others sing vajra songs. At the diadem of the empowerment one becomes lord of the family. Through this, Heruka is fully accomplished.

Then the blessing mantra of exhortation and the rest should be spoken: om̐ sarvatathāgatakāyavākcittavajrasvabhāvātmako 'haṃ. Having thus meditated, in three sessions, on the blessed state, one rises, and at all times one should remain in the form of the deity.

In the Commentary of Six Thousand on the Hevajra, the chapter teaching the empowerment of the deity is complete; this is the ninth section. The chapter on the rite of empowering the deity is finished.

Without beginning or end, at peace, the lord pervading what exists and what does not, emptiness and compassion inseparable, this is taught as the awakening mind. Virtuous in the beginning, the middle and the end, to this very jewel of great bliss all things pay homage. The commentary on the fifth chapter, showing this very reality for the benefit of all sentient beings, and for attaining the fruit of the great seal, will be written by Vajragarbha.

Here the Blessed One has said: then from this the chapter on reality will be explained.

Let me now make clear what is meant by "intrinsic nature" and the rest. The intrinsic nature is that which knows itself, the wisdom of the Tathāgatas. Because this intrinsic nature grasps, and because all that is grasped and all that grasps are free of the transformations of the eighteen constituents, for yogins there is no external form, no seer, no eye, and no eye-consciousness. In the same way there is no hearer, no sound, and no ear-consciousness. Likewise there is no smell, no one who smells, and no nose-consciousness. Likewise there is no taste, no one who tastes, and no tongue-consciousness. Likewise there is no tangible object, no one who touches, and no body-consciousness. Likewise there is no constituent of phenomena, no one who apprehends, and no mind-consciousness. Thus the eye and the rest also do not exist. The yogin should meditate on this jewel-like reality, free of the eighteen constituents, because ignorance and the rest are made to cease.

The Blessed One declared in the root tantra:

By the cessation of changing ignorance,
the formations certainly cease.

By the certain cessation of the formations, consciousness ceases.

By the cessation of consciousness,
name and form cease.

By the cessation of name and form,
the six sense sources cease.

By the cessation of the six sense sources,
contact too ceases.

By the cessation of contact,
feeling certainly ceases.

By the certain cessation of feeling, craving too ceases.

By the certain cessation of craving, grasping ceases.

By the cessation of grasping, becoming too ceases.

By the cessation of becoming,
birth certainly ceases.

By the cessation of birth,
old age and death certainly cease.

When the aggregates and constituents have certainly ceased, that very state is taught to be complete peace.

Thus, by the cessation of the body,
the vital wind too ceases.

By the certain cessation of the vital wind,
the awakening mind ceases.
By the cessation of the awakening mind, emission certainly ceases.
By the cessation of the instant of emission,
all yogins become buddhas.
In the same way the afflictions cease,
and the karmas too cease.
By the cessation of the karmas, sufferings too cease.
By the cessation of sufferings, affliction will no longer arise.
When there is no arising of affliction, karma itself does not arise.
When these do not arise, sufferings too do not occur.
The yogin, free of suffering and endowed with bliss, always accomplishes the aims of beings.
Beings conceptualize things as pleasant and unpleasant;
from that the afflictions arise,
and from that karma arises.
From karma suffering arises.
Without bliss, then, from that again,
having wholly abandoned the ten virtues, from what could bliss come to be?
From a mind of suffering, without bliss,
from where could the accumulation of merit come?
The childish yogin who fabricates deities, mantras, mudrās and the like, without merit, in whom could the accumulation of wisdom truly arise?
Without these there is no buddhahood, and no supreme Vajrasattva.
Without that, neither one's own aim nor the aim of others truly comes about.
The pure Dharma body and the complete enjoyment body emanate those emanation bodies.

Waking, dream, deep sleep, and the fourth state, these four states:
when cause and effect cease,
then there is no doubt of buddhahood.
Free of dust, free of stain, without blemish, having abandoned faults, without defect, fully awakened, the thoroughly awakened self, omniscient, all-knowing, the supreme one:
from the cessation of cause and effect comes the body of the lord of the Victors, which is other.
The body, speech, mind and bliss too are other,
the collection of the aggregates is also other,
the elements such as earth are other,
and so too the objects and the faculties.
The activity of the faculties of action is other,
and likewise the faculties of action themselves.
Everywhere hands and feet and the rest,
everywhere eyes, heads and faces,
everywhere with hearing, in the world he abides, having pervaded all.

This is the certainty about reality in the root tantra.

Now, for the sake of accomplishing this, here is what is taught conventionally in the Short Mudrā Tantra:

The mother who gives birth, the sister,
the daughter, and the sister's daughter,
by the rite of wisdom and means,
the yogin who knows should always worship.

"Yogin" means that the minds of the apprehended and the apprehender are one, that the rasanā and the lalanā are one, and that the caṇḍālī and the seminal fluid are one. From that, one is endowed with the mastery of sure accomplishment. One should worship through the union of wisdom and means, the unchanging bliss of chaste conduct. Externally, in terms of country and family usage, this refers to women such as the mother and the rest.

Likewise:

The dancer, the Cauṇḍālī, the Yavanī,
the Caṇḍālī, and likewise the brahmin woman.

"The yogin who knows" refers to the assembly explained earlier, and:

By the rite of wisdom and means,
the one who knows that very reality should always worship.

One should rely on the rite with a bliss that does not change at any time. It is that it does not come apart. "Coming apart" means, in the definitive sense, the emission of the seminal fluid; in the provisional sense, it is being reviled by people outside. Therefore the yogin should earnestly rely on the mother and the rest. This is the Blessed One's certain declaration. When one relies on them openly, then royal families and others inflict suffering on childish yogins. This is what is meant.

"The mudrās of the five families" means: "One should speak of them as the cause of liberation." Here the mudrā that is the cause of liberation belongs to the families of the five Tathāgatas. "With the vajra, that is, with this awakening mind, one should seal." This is the mudrā, Avadhūtī.

Here, although the mudrās of the mother and the rest are taught in a jumbled order beginning with "vajra," they should be taken in their proper sequence. The mother belongs to the Tathāgata family; she is the brahmin woman and Locanā, at the lotus of the navel. The sister is Māmakī, at the heart, belonging to the vajra family, the Yavanī. The daughter belongs to the fire element and the lotus family, the dancer, at the throat. The sister's daughter belongs to the wind element and the action family, the Cauṇḍālī, at the forehead. The wife is the sovereign lady of the vajra realm, the space element, the Caṇḍālī, belonging to the jewel family, at the crown of the head.

The Mahāmudrā consort born at the end is the element of wisdom and belongs to the family of Vajrasattva; she is at the secret lotus. In this way, upward from the navel, these are the five families of the seals. "Briefly, this is to be stated. The families are declared in six kinds." That is to say: at the crown, the family of the space element; at the forehead, the family of the wind element; at the throat, the family of the fire element; at the heart, the family of the water element; at the navel, the family of the earth element; and at the secret place, the family of the element of wisdom.

Thus the principal quality of space is the element of phenomena. The principal quality of wind is the tangible. The principal quality of fire is taste. The principal quality of water is form. The principal quality of earth is smell. The principal quality of the element of wisdom is the element of sound.

In the same way, there are the faculty of the ear, the faculty of the nose, the faculty of the eye, the faculty of the tongue, the faculty of the body, and the faculty of the mind. Likewise there are the faculty of the bhaga, the faculty of speech, the faculty of the hands, the faculty of the feet, the faculty of the anus, and the supreme faculty. In this way the seals are purified: the discharge of feces, the discharge of urine, walking, taking, speaking, and the discharge of semen. Thus the families of the thirty-six come to six families. In this way the thirty-six elements are to be understood.

Likewise there are the six consciousnesses, the six formations, the six feelings, the six perceptions, the six forms, and the six wisdoms. Thus the aggregates and elements come to seventy-two. These, too, are the deities taught in the Dākinījālasaṃvara in its doubled form: the thirty-six maṇḍalas, and the thirty-seventh, Heruka together with Vajravārāhī. Their families are three: the wheels of body, speech, and mind are Saṃvara, and the doubled form is the Saṃvara of the six wheels. In this tantra of Hevajra, the Blessed One made this clear through the two words "wheel" and "saṃvara", as it is taught: "Then the mantrin makes the doubled offering; the net of ḍākinīs is Saṃvara."

The petals, the fields, and so on are doubled. These are the four places and the four near places; the four fields and the four near fields; the four chandohas and the four near chandohas; the four gatherings and the four near gatherings; the four upper-and-lower rendings and the four near rendings; the four charnel grounds and the four near charnel grounds. Thus there are twelve grounds. For each of these there are also four heroic mistresses together with the hero. In this way the six wheels have forty-eight yoginīs. In the wheel of space there are eight vajra ḍākinīs; in the wheel of wind, eight sword ḍākinīs; in the wheel of fire, eight jewel ḍākinīs; in the wheel of water, eight lotus ḍākinīs; in the wheel of earth, eight wheel ḍākinīs; and in the wheel of wisdom, eight curved-knife ḍākinīs. In the vajra jewel there are eight ḍākinīs of emptiness, who hold the single-pointed vajra. The others are the sixteen ḍākinīs born from the sixteen joys, in the sixteen charnel grounds: two at the two ears, two at the nostrils, two at the eyes, two at the tongue and uvula, two at the openings of the crown, two at the door of the anal passage, two at the door of urine, and two at the door of the transference of semen. These are the sixteen yoginīs.

In the midst of them is the chief, the Blessed One Hevajra with twenty-four arms, embraced by the innate joy that is emptiness, as in the doubled Cakrasaṃvara. He is present distinguished by the divisions of time. The year, purified, is the blue body. Passage, purified, gives the white and red feet. The three times, purified, give the black, red, and white throat. The four months beginning with Mṛgaśīras make one season. The four seasons, each made of the three months beginning with Makara, being purified, give the four faces: black, red, white, and yellow. Likewise the six seasons, each made of two months beginning with Mṛgaśīras, being purified, give the six shoulders: blue, red, and white in nature, on the right and on the other side. Likewise the twelve months, each of a nature of four, give the twelve upper arms, black, red, and white, right and left. Likewise by the division of the fortnights there are the twenty-four arms. By the division of the individual lunar days, there are the veins of the joints of the left and right hands, the sixty-odd joints of the fingers, three hundred and sixty in all, according to the division of the days of the year.

Thus Heruka, whose nature is the six families, is the Wheel of Time. He is also to be called the primordial buddha, suchness. His hundred faces, the garland of heads, are the hundred limbs of the Veda, and he is the Blessed One, the great Vajra Skull-bearer, who cut off the head of Brahmā.

The doubled Net of Ḍākinīs, the Saṃvara, has the nature of the six families. In other tantras, it has the nature of the five families. Therefore: "The families are taught in six kinds; in brief, there are five kinds. By the division of body, speech, and mind, they later become three."

By this order of explanation: "Its nature is the families, the five elements, and the five aggregates. By this, the one who counts the Veda should declare it to be called 'family'." This is the determination of the six families, the five families, and the three families.

Now the definition of the Tathāgata is to be stated: "The glorious one gone to suchness, come to suchness itself; by this possessing wisdom, the Tathāgata is to be named." Here wisdom is emptiness, and its possessor is that which is together with the form of emptiness. "To suchness" means the following: in the secret lotus, at the ground of nirvāṇa that does not abide in the final limit of the vajra jewel, the glorious awakening mind, the vajra, has come to dwell in the bhagas of the vajra consorts, whose natures are wind, earth, water, fire, and wisdom, in the lotuses of the forehead, throat, heart, navel, and secret place, from the space element at the crown.

"In the same way he also came." Just as he went below in the descent, so too he came forth from the vajra jewel, from the secret lotus, from the realm of wisdom: that is, by way of the seminal essence rising upward to the navel, the heart, the throat, the forehead, and the crown of the head. In this way, as he went, so he came, and this is established. "The cessation of the twelve limbs" means the attainment of the twelve grounds.

Just as, by way of the worldly, conventional joy, supreme joy, special joy, and innate joy, the essence descended from the forehead downward, so by reversing this, the consequences that accord with the cause, the karmic maturation, the effect of the person's act, and the stainless are made to travel from the secret place up to the forehead. As it was also said:

At the navel, the outflow in accord with the cause is proclaimed.

At the wheel of Dharma, the karmic maturation.

At the enjoyment wheel, the effect of the person's act.

At the crown, the great bliss that is stainless.

This is the definitive meaning, and it will be explained later.

Thus, just as on the first day of the lunar month and so on, through the division into fifteen parts, the mind of wisdom conventionally moves downward from the crown to the secret lotus, with the essence going down in the nature of the full set of parts; so also, by the power of yoga, it is reversed from the secret lotus of the vajra jewel. By the division into parts, the first day and so on, the essence goes upward on the foundation of the nature of the full parts and reaches the lotus of the forehead, and at the crown it does so in the nature of the sixteenth part. In this way, for ordinary beings of saṃsāra, the dark element of the red constituent goes from the secret place to the crown by the division of the first day of the dark fortnight and so on, and at the end of the sky-empty new moon it is the waning of the sixteenth part. Buddhas reverse this very process: from the crown, by the division of the parts of the dark fortnight beginning with the first day, through the particular waning of the sixteenth part of the moon at the end of the sky-empty new moon, it reaches the secret lotus.

As it was also said, with reference to the conventional first buddha:

When all embodied beings die,
the moon, the nectar, goes downward.

Above is the sun, Rāhu, the dust;
this is the defining mark of the object, consciousness.
Therefore the moon, the nectar, goes upward, the unshakable one.
Below are the sun and Rāhu;
consciousness goes to unchanging bliss.

And ultimately, what will be explained right here:

The awakening mind becomes the moon,
having the nature of fifteen parts.
Great bliss is the form of the vowels.
The yoginīs are its parts.

This is the definitive account of the sixteen joys. Likewise in the chapter on the families the Blessed One said:

How the family, in the yoginī's birth and in her abiding, is the cause, how power, wisdom, consciousness,
and the deities arise.
The cause of generating Heruka is first of all E-VAM.
Innate joy and great bliss,
the letters E-VAM, the great unchanging.

This is the definitive meaning.

For the non-conceptual mind,
there is no meditator and nothing to meditate on.
There is no mantra and no deity.
From the nature free of elaboration, mantra and deities truly abide.

By this very fact, it is in the essence of the setting of all the turbidity of conceptual thought, which is the nature of innate joy.

Now the division of the six aggregates into the conventional and the ultimate is to be stated, beginning with "Vairocana," and so on. Here Vairocana leads into the earth wheel. Akṣobhya leads into the space wheel. Amitābha leads into the water wheel. Ratnasambhava leads into the fire wheel. Amoghasiddhi leads into the wind wheel. The one who possesses the bodhisattva nature leads into the wheel of wisdom. And as for these, in their respective order:

Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Śiva (the Peaceful One), and all, are said to be this very thing.

Conventionally, these are sentient beings whose essence flows downward; ultimately, they are buddhas whose essence flows upward. "Brahmā is the nirvāṇa of the buddha," because the element of excrement does not flow out. "Because he enters, Viṣṇu is to be spoken of": because the element of urine enters one's own body and nothing emerges outside, the buddha is to be called Viṣṇu. "Because he is always virtuous, he is peaceful": here virtue means unimpaired moral discipline, and because of the bliss of the essence not being shed, this buddha is to be called Peaceful.

"Because he abides in all, as the lord of all": "all" is the blood element of Ratnasambhava. When this is not shed there is no suffering, and because of its absence, "he dispels pleasure and pain, and at the end arises; his body, free of attachment, is exhausted." "Abiding in the lord of all" is so because, by the divine eye and the knowledge of others' minds, he pervades everything. The buddha is to be called "the All."

"Without apprehension, he is fully awake." Because there is no apprehension through the sense faculties such as the eye, Amoghasiddhi is the flesh element. Because this is exhausted, the eye and the other faculties have no active formation, and because of that absence he is fully awake. As it is said:

Knowing oneself and knowing others, in all respects,
the supreme person who benefits all,
transcending the world's examples,
the supreme lord of knowing and the knowable.

By this the buddha is "free from concept, fully awake." This is the definitive meaning.

"By supreme bliss he becomes that very thing." Here supreme bliss is the undefiled: emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the unconditioned. It is the four liberations blended into one, in the nature of compassion, loving-kindness, joy, and equanimity without any object of focus. That suchness which has the nature of wisdom and skillful means as its objects of focus is said to be the buddha. Thus:

Know the truth in its twelve aspects,
and that very truth in sixteen aspects.

Awakened through twenty aspects, know the pure, the supreme, the unchanging.

This refers to the buddha, the Blessed One. From the stages thus taught: "the three families, and the five families, being one in nature, are the hundred families." So in the Recitation of Names it is also said:

The king of wrathful ones, six-faced and terrifying, six-eyed, six-armed, endowed with power, with skeleton, gnashing his fangs,
Hala-hala, the hundred-faced one.

And likewise:

Blazing vajra, with beautiful eyes,
blazing vajra born from the head,
the vajra that brings down, the great bringer down,
the hundred-eyed one, the vajra eye.

This is the definitive account of the hundred families.

Thus, by the division into conventional and ultimate, the reality of the worldly and the transworldly is with obscuration and without obscuration, with sign and without sign, with conceptuality and without conceptuality, with superimposition and without superimposition, with pride and without pride. Because sentient beings and buddhas stop the twelve limbs of dependent origination, there is no arising, and no entering either. This is the definitive statement of the Buddha, the Blessed One, in all the other tantras, and the wise should understand it.

Now, further, the deities of the conventional Dharma and so on are to be explained, beginning with the words "it arises in the body." Here, because conventional bliss truly arises in the body, whose nature is the five elements, I shall call it "god." The Buddha possesses bhaga, and so he is called the Blessed One (Bhagavān). Bhaga is explained as sixfold: all the qualities beginning with lordship. Lordship, splendor, wisdom, renown, glory, and good fortune as a quality: these are what the word bhaga expresses. Or else he is called Bhagavān because he vanquishes the māras, such as the afflictions. "By the ultimate" is the definitive statement of means.

Now the wisdom is to be explained, in the passage beginning with "mother." Here the means is the father, the seminal element. Wisdom is the mother, the element of the menstrual blood. The one who is produced is the gandharva, a being impelled by karma, at the end of dying and belonging to rebirth, the all-base consciousness. This itself is what the word "migrator" denotes. For the Blessed One said, "O sons of the Victor, these three realms are mind only." The migrator is just this. "She generates the migrator" means that wisdom is to be called the mother, the element of the menstrual blood. Likewise the means of the fortunate one is the seminal element.

Since wisdom shows the divisions of the body, she is to be called the sister. This refers to the transformations of the elements: the body hair, the skin, the flesh, and the blood. Likewise the means is the brother, since it shows the divisions of the channels, the bones, and the limbs; therefore it is the seminal element. Because she draws out the qualities, wisdom is also to be called the daughter. The qualities are the objects of sound, touch, form, taste, smell, and phenomena; she draws these out because she grasps them. Likewise the means is the son, since it is the very engaging of the eyes and the other sense faculties; thus it is the element of means. Likewise wisdom is the sister's daughter, because the consciousnesses engage their objects. The means is the brother's son, because it engages the eyes and the rest. Likewise, because she enters into the bliss of emission, wisdom is called the wife, and the means is called the husband, since the two depend on each other and both arise from the Dharma of the bliss of emission.

Free of attachment, wisdom is called the untouchable one, the outcaste woman. The means likewise is so called. This is the definitive statement of the six mudrās. Because she bewilders all the elements, she is to be called the brahmin woman. Because she cuts, wisdom is the butcher woman. Because she stirs the elements, she is the dancer. Because she burns, she is spoken of as the dark one, the mātṛkā. Because she is untouchable, she is spoken of as the outcaste woman. Likewise the means too should be understood, from its nature of the five actions.

Thus all of this, as external, was investigated by the non-Buddhists through the Vedas and the like. By nature all women and all men have arisen as a single human family, and for them there is no other family. This is the intended meaning in all the other tantras.

Now the recitation of mantras and so on, according to the nature of the elements, is explained in the passage beginning "the expression." Here, the expression of all beings, which is the expression of the vowels and consonants, ālī and kālī, is for that very reason said to be recitation, for the yogis of reality. Likewise, the footsteps become the maṇḍala. Because they measure the ground with their feet, they are to be called the maṇḍala. Likewise, the turning of the hands becomes the mudrā, and so does the touching of the fingers. Likewise, what beings think is the very thing to be contemplated, for by knowing the minds of others, the yogis contemplate it. The phrase "that which is to be contemplated is free of thought" means that "free of thought" is the absence of thinking; this is what is to be contemplated by the yogis.

The bliss attained at the time of the emission of a being, belonging to rebirth and at the end of dying, in the domain of the father, is itself to be eaten by oneself, by one born at the age of sixteen. A woman is to enjoy it at the age of twelve. The bliss by which one dies here, the bliss of being born and abiding in saṃsāra for those in saṃsāra, when it becomes stable, is to be called the meditative concentration of the yogis.

O Essence of Hevajra, by me all this has been taught as the summary of the meaning gathered, chapter by chapter, from each of the five hundred thousand verses of the condensed Hevajra Tantra, in the fifth chapters. Beyond this, the chapters on conduct and so on are to be understood in detail. With thirty verses in the chapter on lineages, the meaning is gathered from the first hundred thousand. With forty verses in the chapter on mantras, from the second. With twenty-four verses in the chapter on deities, from the third. With six verses in the chapter on empowerment, from the fourth. With twenty verses in the chapter on reality, from the fifth. Thus the meaning gathered in these hundred and twenty-odd verses is to be understood by yogis in the five chapters through this extensive commentary.

This is the great summary of the definitive teaching on reality in the six-thousand-verse commentary on Hevajra.

Thus the chapter on reality is complete. The commentary on the meaning of the glorious Hevajra Summary is complete. It was composed by the venerable bodhisattva, the great being Vajragarbha.

This was translated by the Indian preceptor Dānaśīla and the translator Dro Sengkar Śākya Öd. Later it was revised and finalized by the Indian preceptor Subhūti Śrī Śānti and the translator Chok-gru Tingngedzin Zangpo. Later again, in the presence of the Indian preceptor, the king's son, glorious Abhayadeva, the translator Nyel-chor, the monk Prajñākīrti, checked it against the manuscript from Central India and settled the text. Once more, through the excellent exposition of the glorious Shongton Dorje Gyaltsen and others, the translator who is a master of grammar and the sciences, the glorious Lodrö Tenpa, ... The spiritual friend Ralungpa Chödrak Palzangpo, who has great faith in the three sets of bodhisattva commentaries and whose intellectual clarity is vast, had the books of the root text and commentary of the Compendium of Reality, the great Madhyamaka work composed by the great teacher Śāntarakṣita and his disciples, copied and gave them as an offering, and urged the work again and again. In response, it was corrected, translated, checked, and finalized. The scribe was the one named Dzedön Kunga Gyaltsen. May this benefit countless sentient beings.

Here begins the commentary of Vajragarbha.

Having bowed to Hevajra, who bears the twelve limbs and uproots existence, who holds the twelve kinds of purity, I shall explain this extensive chapter on supreme conduct. Following the Five Hundred Thousand, and tormented by compassion for beings, I, Vajragarbha, shall explain it.

Here, the yogī who has entered the maṇḍala of Hevajra, diligent in not abandoning his earlier pledges, engages in conduct for the sake of all beings. Therefore the root text says:

Then I shall further explain the conduct, the supreme perfection, the cause that is the accomplishment of Hevajra,
by which accomplishment reaches its end.

"Then" is a connecting word, indicating that this follows the explanation of the chapter on reality. It means that he has begun the conduct in order that the three realms may be accomplished as Hevajra, by way of the cause that is the accomplishment of Hevajra. No conduct other than this is taught, since it would serve no purpose. The purpose of the conduct is "by which accomplishment reaches its end." It means that he has begun the conduct by which himself and other beings reach the final end of the accomplishment of the great seal (mahāmudrā).

This meaning should be drawn from the root tantra itself. As it says:

Even when the ritual is complete in all its limbs, without beginning the conduct, no accomplishment arises.
Therefore this unattached conduct is the cause of the accomplishment of the seal.

Mere compassion, utterly cut off, cannot accomplish conduct for the sake of beings.
Therefore, endowed with compassion,
one should practice the conduct with effort.

The meaning of these lines should also be understood.

Now the yogī who wishes to practice the conduct should bind on the seals, outer and inner. The same tantra says:

The meditator should take up fine earrings for the ears,
the wheel upon the crown,
two bracelets on the two hands,
a double girdle at the waist, anklets likewise on the feet,
armlets on the upper arms,
and a necklace of bones about the neck.

The meaning of this is clear in the Five Hundred Thousand, so one should turn to it:

If one wishes to begin the conduct,
in order to inspire beings,
one adorns the supreme body with the form of Akṣobhya's wheel.
One turns the wheel in the three existences.
Abiding in the supreme body, by a stream of water,
one turns the wheel of Dharma at once and accomplishes the great benefit of beings.
With the form of Amitābha's earrings
one adorns the ears,
and one makes the three existences attached.
Thereby one will work for the benefit of beings.
With the form of the jeweled necklace
one adorns one's own neck, and having tamed beings by flavor,
one dissolves beings like water.
With the form of Vairocana's bracelets
one adorns the hands,

and if one engages in the benefit of beings,
people will become steady like the earth.
With the form of Amoghasiddhi's girdle
one adorns the waist,
and if one tames beings by wind,
one tames beings by the unobstructed wind.
By the nature of the awakening mind
one adorns the body with ashes, and if one practices the supreme conduct well,
one tames beings with a blissful mind.

Having understood the meaning of this fully, one should know that the definitive meaning is this: the six seminal fluids and six winds, which depend on the six wheels whose natures are called time, water, fire, wind, space, and wisdom, are stopped from flowing outward. In this way the conduct is to be practiced, and thereby one tames those hard to tame; otherwise it is not so. Therefore, what is shown as the sign of their being stopped is taught as the six, beginning with the wheel. Those who practice the conduct must also take up the outer forms.

Furthermore, it is to be connected thus: the practitioner conducts himself as a hero, with food of bliss, abiding in method and wisdom, abiding in the manner of the five families, showing himself through color, gathering everything into a single family, and making himself indistinguishable by color or by family. This is stated in this very Compendium Tantra:

His garment is the skin of a tiger,
His food is the five and a half deathless ones.
Heruka in union is the man himself,
Abiding in the five colors.
Endowed with equality with the five families,
He is to be thought of as one family alone,
Because no distinctions are to be indicated.

From the stilling of the six inner mudrās there arise this strength and splendor. Thus, even fierce and unbearable beings such as Vajrapāṇi, lord of the yakṣas, are not frightened or terrified; how much less ordinary worldly people. Therefore, in order to triumph over the unruly outer and inner māras, one outwardly wears the skin of a tiger as a garment. And in order to win the devotion of people, one eats the nectar, brought down from the realm of the gods and so on. Furthermore, for a person who has entered the way of mantra, for the sake of outer accomplishments, one purifies the head and the other such substances, and also the five and a half deathless ones, possessed of the hair called bya. One abandons conceptual thought and eats them oneself, and also gives them to others, so that beginners in the practice may come to understand. The definitive meaning of eating this nectar is clear in the great root tantra itself, so one should turn to that. As it says:

The food of the five and a half deathless ones
Has not been understood by people.
The very kinds of head and the rest,
By the conduct of the lord of yogins,
Being without cause for the one and the rest to go outward,
He relies on them, and that itself dissolves.
Supreme in celibate conduct and vows,
Brought to the end of austerity, great in austerity.

This is the definitive meaning of the Tathāgatas. Furthermore, abiding in emptiness and in compassion inseparable from it, one becomes Heruka. For the sake of taming outer people, whatever colored powders and so on abide in the five colors are shown to be endowed with the qualities of the five or six Tathāgatas. Even those difficult to tame are tamed by this and become devout. Therefore one should show oneself endowed with equality with the five families. Likewise, since he is the very nature of the dharmadhātu, his color is white; all families and colors are gathered in him, so he is to be shown thus. Hence the line "He is to be thought of as one family alone." Likewise, these teachings should be kept secret and hidden, through the manner of mantra, from all but beginners in the practice: from those abiding on the path of the śrāvakas, those abiding on the path of the pratyekabuddhas, and the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas). Therefore, by means of many colors, "no distinctions are to be indicated"; this is the meaning.

Furthermore, one who practices the supreme conduct, for the sake of sentient beings, accomplishes the hero Heruka with a mind that tames the inner unruliness, and abides as the nature of the colors, that is, of the five families. Thus, he is to enter the bodies of kings, of ministers, of brahmins, of commoners, of outcastes and so on, taking on bodies in keeping with each, and show conduct accordingly. Going into their midst, he overturns their respective families and brings them all into the single family of the vajra.

Likewise, within the family of ministers he hides the signs of the four families, enters in accord with that very one, and teaches the Dharma to those to be tamed. Likewise, among all the families he acts so as not to be incongruous and teaches the Dharma. Likewise, in order to accomplish the karmamudrā, he takes the body of another family, so as to avoid the worldly reproach, and accomplishes the karmamudrā. Therefore it is said:

"Through many families, no distinctions are to be indicated."

The definitive meaning of these points is clear in the root tantra itself, so one should turn to that. As it says:

By joining emptiness with Heruka,
Earth, water, fire, wind and space
Are placed in the path, indivisibly,
With the two, semen and wind, abiding.
It is reduced to ashes by the fire at the end of the age,
Like space, with nothing to be indicated.

Here, when one abides on the path called emptiness, the splendor of wisdom blazes forth. By that splendor the five kinds of semen and the five kinds of wind become of one taste and one mixture, with nothing to be indicated, having abandoned a nature of difference. This is the definitive meaning of the Tathāgatas. Otherwise, because the mind does not rest one-pointedly, semen, urine, excrement and the like abide as different families, and this is called differing distinction.

Now, in order to speak of the special features of the place of the practitioner, the Compendium Tantra says:

A single tree, a charnel ground,
A house of the mothers, or a crossroads,
Or a secluded place, or the border of a forest:
There, meditation is said to be excellent.

The meaning of this should be understood by distinguishing outer and inner. First, the outer: if a beginner practitioner practices in a delightful place, secluded from the bustle of people, the signs of accomplishment will arise. Such places are where nonhuman beings dwell: a place where a single tree stands; a "house of the mothers," where yakṣiṇīs and piśācīs dwell; a secluded place or forest border, that is, a place where other nonhumans gather, secluded from crowds and noise. There the yogin sits, generates great compassion for all sentient beings, and offers tormas three times a day to the nonhumans who live there. He tells those nonhumans again and again, "I shall do such and such; you should accomplish this and that." Then those nonhumans too, pleased with the practitioner, carry out that work, and when it is accomplished he becomes able to work for the benefit of beings.

The definitive meaning of this point is as the root tantra says:

One's own body is the supreme mountain.
The great tree that grows from it,
With its crown ripens the gods,
With its roots ripens the nāgas and the rest.
With its branches it fully ripens humans and others.
That is the tree, and it is taught
That one abides there.
Where the breath does not move,
That is called the charnel ground.
The house of the mothers is emptiness itself.
The play of the lion is the mudrā.
It is not defiled by the adornments of signs,
And because it is hard to realize, it is the night.
It has no seed syllable, no hand emblem,
No color, shape, or family.
It is free of mudrā, fire offering, and torma.
That solitude is the final limit, the place of solitude,
And that alone is the excellent meditation.

This is the definitive meaning as it concerns the Tathāgata.

To show the measure of one's capacity to engage in the practice of conduct, it is said:

When one has gained a little warmth,
If one wishes to undertake the conduct,
Or if one wishes to attain accomplishment,
By this, one practices the conduct itself.

The meaning of this should be drawn from the root tantra itself, where it is said:

If one wishes to undertake the conduct,
The six-limbed union, whatever it may be,

Should be done by first generating
The warmth of smoke, mirage, and the like.

The meaning is this. Yogins who wish to practice the conduct for the sake of sentient beings should first generate warmth through the signs of smoke, mirage, and the like, and only then enter the conduct. Otherwise it becomes an object of ridicule for worldly people. Then, in order to tame men who are full of desire, having experienced the wisdom that does not pass away, one should, as the text says:

Examine a consort of the vajra family,
Of very beautiful face and wide eyes,
Compassionate, whom one has empowered oneself,
And take her up to practice the conduct.
If there is no one of the vajra family,
Then do it with one of the family of one's chosen deity.

The meaning of this is as follows. The girl should be of the outcaste family, not to be touched by other men, or else of any family at all, adorned with beauty and youth. She is purified with the seed of awakening. That is, one who is without any lack of faith in oneself, and one performs the act of union. With the awakening mind of bliss one purifies her mind, and goes about together with her. One tames men full of desire with vajra songs and the like. And the dance belongs to the family of Amoghasiddhi, as this very Compendium of the Tantra says:

If one takes up song out of joy,
Then one possesses the supreme vajra.
When joy has arisen,
One dances with the cause of liberation.
Then one dances with vajra feet,
Doing so in the equipoise of the yogin.

The definitive meaning of this is, as the Pentad of Hundred Thousands says:

Emptiness, unborn and peaceful,
Is called woman.
From the sixteen knots of the channels
Arise the sixteen drops of bliss.
That is also the sixteen years,
And that is also the purification of the mind.

In the same way, the resonance of bliss is the song; the dance is the movement stirred by bliss; and one abides possessed of feet that proceed by the stages of bliss. "One should perform it in the equipoise of the yogin": this is the definitive meaning.

Furthermore, regarding the passage beginning "Unshakable in the form of the wheel" and ending "On the belt dwells Amoghasiddhi" (Don yod), the meaning has already been shown. As for the meanings other than those, they are as follows:

The khaṭvāṅga is the form of wisdom,
The small drum is the form of method itself.

Here "kha" has the form of space. "Ṭvām" is one who abides in austerity. In brief, the meaning is that all phenomena abide in the nature of space. The sound of the ḍamaru signifies turning the wheel of Dharma at one time for all sentient beings in the three realms. Therefore, in holding the khaṭvāṅga and the small drum, the path of the afflictions gives rise to aversion, and the breath's going out, its entering within, and its abiding are themselves the vowels and consonants (āli and kāli). Therefore, as it is said:

Song is taught as pure mantra,
Dance is what is to be meditated upon.
For that reason the yogin
Should always practice song and dance.

Likewise, "The medicine is to be eaten, and the water is always to be drunk" should be understood in two ways. Outwardly, for the sake of worldly accomplishments, one purifies and multiplies excrement and urine and the like, and eats them without conceptualization. By the power of that it is said, "He is not overpowered by the splendor of old age." The definitive meaning is as the root tantra says:

The upper and lower of the left, wisdom and method,
Free of arising and entering, is what is eaten.
The upper and lower of the right, wisdom and method,
Free of arising and entering, is what is drunk.

By this, "he is not overpowered by the splendor of old age, and is always protected." This is the definitive meaning. Otherwise, by eating and drinking external excrement and urine one would not become free of being overpowered by old age, and even worldly people would revile it. That is the definitive point.

Furthermore:

Make a crest ornament from the hair of thieves,

And fix on it what has arisen from hūṃ.

The skulls of the five buddhas

The yogin's conduct bears.

Of the portions of a skull five inches wide,

One makes a crest ornament and holds it.

From the nature of method and wisdom,

The belt of hair, twofold in its winding,

And ashes are worn as an offering of hair.

He maintains the conduct of the yogin.

As this is taught, it indicates the crest ornament by the root called "the hair of thieves," since it steals away all virtuous qualities. On it one fully holds the vajra lattice that has arisen from hūṃ, for the sake of accomplishing the many kinds of benefit for sentient beings. This is by the manner of the five and the twenty ways of manifest awakening, and also by the fifteen-day groups of the waxing fortnight, such as Full and Excellent. Therefore it should be understood through a, i, ṛ, u, ḷ, as having the qualities of water, fire, wind, and space. Thus the passages beginning "the skulls of the five buddhas," and "the portion of a skull five inches wide," are taught at length.

In the same way, for the sake of taming the arrogant worldly gods, one wears a double girdle of human hair; for the sake of the observance of the Great Lord (Maheśvara), one smears the body with ashes; for the sake of Brahmā's observance, one wears a Brahmā-cord of human hair; for the sake of the gods' joyful play, one holds the damaru drum; for the sake of the banner of the Great Lord, one holds the khaṭvāṅga; and for the sake of the observance with fragments of skulls, one should hold the vajra skull. These are to be recited and meditated upon. So it was taught.

The definitive meaning of this is also given in the root tantra, where it says:

Because emptiness and compassion are inexhaustible, the girdle of hair is spoken of.

The ashes are taught as awakening mind.

For the sake of chastity, the semen is not emitted;

for the sake of honoring with hair, one is adorned with the topknot.

Therefore this is the supreme observance of chastity.

By the blissful sound of the damaru,
the three worlds are caused to breathe again.
In the aspect of emptiness, the khaṭvāṅga;
the skull is said to be the bliss that protects the body.
Therefore, for that reason, these are to be recited and meditated upon.

Furthermore, if a yogin who practices the conduct has not fully abandoned shame, apprehension, and the like, then the conduct becomes an occasion for the laughter of worldly people, and it does not benefit sentient beings either.
Therefore it was taught:

Abandon greed, bewilderment, fear, and anger,
and the fruit of shame as well.

Likewise, the same tantra says:

Even if an asura should appear before you,
resembling Indra himself,
do not be afraid of him;
go about in the form of a lion.

Therefore one should not be apprehensive or timid. A yogin who practices the conduct in this way should not dwell in laziness. Abandon the sleep that accompanies laziness. Great delusion dwells in sleep, and so one practices the conduct. Therefore:

Having abandoned sleep oneself, practice the conduct without doubt.

Likewise, the Sugata too, at the time of his austerities, gave up the wealth of kingship, the retinue of queens, and even the very limit of his own body for the sake of sentient beings. The yogin who practices the conduct should also have no concern for his own body. Thus it was taught:

Having given the gift of the body, afterward one properly begins the conduct.

And one should wear space as one's garment. Crows, cruel dogs, and wicked, ill-natured, abusive children are to be regarded as teachers who teach the Dharma, and being scorched by the sun's heat or afflicted by cold are grounds for practicing patience. As for giving other possessions, one should not distinguish among the recipients of the gift: whoever appears before one is to be given to. Thus it was taught:

Therefore, giving should not be given by examining who is worthy and who is not.

Likewise:

In the manner of non-conceptuality,
food and likewise drink,
whatever is found, one should eat freely.
Since one does not conceive of pleasant and unpleasant,
one should not even be attached to it.
Edible and inedible things to practice with,
likewise the drinkable and the undrinkable,
the going and the not going, the mantrin should not conceptualize them.

The meaning of this is as follows. Out of mere attachment to taste, one makes no distinction between foods and drinks. And for the sake of accomplishing the karmamudrā, one should not make distinctions regarding women of the four families, saying, "This one should be approached, that one should not."

Furthermore, the vajra master is to be revered as no different from one's own chosen deity. Therefore, even if I abide on the level of the vidyādhara, I should not discard him. Thus it was taught:

The disciple who has attained siddhi,
the illuminator of perfect wisdom,
for the sake of abandoning the cause of Avīci, should bow directly to the master as an accomplished one.

The meaning of this repeated statement is as follows. If even the buddhas of the three times bow with reverence to their chosen master in the three times, then why should beginner disciples who have entered the path abandon him? The definitive meaning of this was already explained at length earlier.

Moreover, the practitioner of the conduct should not cling intensely to the worldly conventions of training, the seven empowerments, fire offerings, offerings, austerities, vows, and so on. Or else, he should not cling intensely to the training and fire offerings and the like of the non-Buddhist god Śiva and others. Therefore, for that reason:

Freed from training and from empowerment, and likewise from the fruit of shame,

this nature of all things is practiced by the yogin with great compassion.
Beyond fire offerings, offerings, and austerities, having abandoned mantra and meditation, liberated from the vows of samaya,
the yogin practices the conduct.

And likewise, further:

For the sake of all sentient beings, compassion should always be drunk.
The yogin who delights in drinking yoga should not savor any other drink.

This meaning should be understood in two ways, outer and inner. In the outer sense, in accord with worldly custom, at feasts, at the meals of the heroes, and the like, one drinks liquors made from grain and so on, but only up to the point of not becoming intoxicated. In the definitive sense, "other drink" refers to the liquors, made from grapes, rice, and the like, which intoxicate worldly people and lead them to do what should not be done. One should not drink these even to the tip of a hair. Rather, by drinking without interruption the continuous stream of the liquor of the awakening mind of the moon, one moistens one's own body and so forth with the taste of bliss. This is the definitive meaning, as spoken by the Tathāgata.

This is the sixth, the extensive explanation of the chapter on conduct, from the extensive exposition of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Having paid homage to the Teacher, the enjoyment body, who bears the sixteen half-measures of the drop, Vajragarbha has written the extensive explanation of the Tsotsma. Then the chapter on signs will be explained.

Having said this, it should be understood that signs are of two kinds. As the root tantra itself says:

Together with Heruka, the yogī
Should train in the signs of body and speech.
If one does not speak with the signs of body and speech,
Even a buddha will surely be ruined.

Therefore, yogīs and yoginīs who abide in the yoga of Hevajra should take to heart, with diligence, the instruction on the signs of body and speech. In the midst of a gathering, they should not speak in ordinary worldly language in front of unruly outsiders, or of messengers, male and female, of other families. When the great secret that belongs to us is expressed by signs, unfit persons and outside messengers, male and female, remain bewildered. And whoever does not speak the great secrets by signs ruins the accomplishments of both this world and the next, and will go to the hell of unceasing torment.

Of these, the signs of body come first and the signs of speech after. In this chapter only the signs of body are shown, while the signs of speech will be shown in another chapter. Moreover, both kinds of signs should be understood as being of definitive meaning and of provisional meaning. What is taught as it stands in this very condensed tantra should be understood as provisional meaning, while the definitive meaning should be understood from the root tantra.

First, the line "Whoever knows brother and sister" means that brother and sister are the distinct aspects of method and wisdom. "Know it without doubt" means to know method and wisdom exactly as they are, according to their provisional and definitive meanings.

Now, "Whoever shows one finger" should be understood thus: when a man or woman suddenly arrives in front of one and shows one finger, it is a question meaning "Have you come well?" Likewise, "With two, he has come well" means that one answers by extending two fingers, showing that one has come in comfort.

Further, "Holding the left thumb is to be known as the gesture of inquiring about illness." It is to be understood as the sign of asking someone about illness, with the meaning "Are your body, speech and mind well?"

"Whoever offers the ring finger" is the aspect of method, and "to him the little finger is given" is the aspect of wisdom. By the distinction of above and below, they should be understood as wind and fire. "Whoever shows the middle finger, to him the index finger is given" likewise, by the distinction of above and below, should be understood as water and earth. Thus these too are, outwardly and inwardly, of the nature of emptiness and compassion. This is also what the tantra called Glorious Supreme Primordial Buddha says:

In the east and west, earth and wind
Are mutually method and wisdom.
In the south and north, fire and water
Are mutually method and wisdom.

And likewise:

The channel of excrement on the lunar path,
The sun brings down the urine.
The two channels of mind, above and below,
Are the descending seed and the Dark One.

"Whoever shows the nameless finger, to him the throat is clearly shown." When one asks, "Do you know the Dharma that is like space?", the answer, showing the throat, means this: the throat wheel is the path that enjoys the six tastes, and by its power the channels expand, and it will teach the Dharma that is like space.

"Whoever shows with clothing, to him the three peaks are clearly shown." When one asks, "Do you know the characteristics of the protector?", the answer means: "I know, if I know the nature of the three channels, the essence of body, speech and mind."

"Whoever shows the breasts, to him the boundary is clearly shown." When one asks, "If this is attained through the treatises on dance, do you know it?", the answer means: "I know; I realize it from the bliss of the two organs joined."

"Whoever shows the teeth, to him the mouth is clearly shown." When one asks, "Do you know the nature of wisdom?", the answer means: "I know it, if one possesses method and wisdom."

"Whoever shows a frown, to him the loosening of the topknot is to be shown." When someone says, "Then you and I will debate over the nature of method and wisdom," the answer means: "Without fear, let us debate."

"Whoever shows the forehead, to him the back is clearly shown." When one asks, "If the supreme place of the ḍākinīs is in the body, in the head, do you know it?", the answer means: "I know it; apart from the head, other parts of the body too, such as the back, are places of the ḍākinīs."

"Whoever shows the sole of the foot, with the belly one should play." When one asks, "Then how should one travel to those places?", the answer means: "Preceded by the treatises on dance, entering equipoise with a mind full of passion, one will reach those places."

"By the answer of mudrā to mudrā, distinguish by the samaya." This means: "By knowing the signs of the body's mudrās, realize all the great secrets."

Then the yoginī said: "E ma, my son of great compassion." The meaning is: "E ma, you whose nature is great method, you have become familiar with all signs and non-signs."

"If one shows a rosary in the hand, it says 'Let us assemble.' Having released the rosary, take the vow and the observance as the fine practice of the samaya." The meaning is this: in answer to the signs, all the yoginīs, each from her own place, show a rosary in the hand, and thereby indicate: "Son of good family, you and I shall abide in the observance of an unbroken rosary of bliss."

And further it says:

There, those assembling in the outer place,
Abiding in the domain of the good,
Whatever the assembling yoginī says there,
Do all of it just so.

The meaning is: when she commands, "You are fortunate, and you know all the intentional language, outer and inner. Therefore you and we shall gather in the outer place and enjoy the feast of outer and inner bliss," that yogī accepts it all.

"Kye, Blessed One, is it a place of assembly?" is Vajragarbha and the others asking about the distinctions between outer and inner places.

The Blessed One declared:

Site and near-site,
field and near-field,
chandoha and near-chandoha, gathering place and near-gathering place,
city and near-city,
charnel ground and near-charnel ground:
since these are the twelve grounds,
the Lord is sovereign of the ten grounds.
Therefore one should not seek elsewhere.

This is what was said. By this the text shows that all the root classes of channels, which rest on the nature of the three wheels, the six wheels, and the four wheels, are just these twelve grounds. The nature of the three wheels is divided into body, speech, and mind, and also into the levels beneath the earth, upon the earth, and above the earth; in this way the meaning of the tantra of the Wheel of Supreme Bliss is expressed. The nature of the six wheels is divided into earth, water, fire, wind, space, and wisdom; or into form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness, and wisdom; or it is distinguished by the six syllables. This is the meaning of the tantra of the Supreme Buddha. As for what is taught as four, there are the sixty-four emanations, the eight dharmas, the sixteen enjoyments, the thirty-two great blissful ones, and so on. Thus the divisions of the four wheels, the four bodies, the four empowerments, the four joys, the four moments, the four fruits, and so on are taught in the Hevajra tantra, for it is said that everything is fourfold.

Therefore, outwardly, the goddesses who dwell in the villages and run after flesh and blood live in those outer sites. And since it is said, "As it is outside, so it is within," the inner sites are taught to be present in the body in the form of channels, and one should not look for them elsewhere. In the body they are as follows, from Jālandhara up to "the banks of the pools in the pleasure grove." As the root tantra says:

The crown of the head and the top of the head,
the right ear and the side of the ribs, likewise the brow, the middle of the eyebrows,
the hands and the armpits,
the two breasts and the navel,
the tip of the nose and the path of the mouth,
the two shoulders and the male organ,
the sign and the anus, and the place of the chest,
the thighs and the fingers,
the soles of the feet, the big toes,
and the knees:

in this order one should view the sites and the grounds.

Therefore the goddesses who bestow on beings the fruit of conduct and of liberation, and these sites, dwell in the bodies of all embodied beings themselves, in the form of channels and seminal essence.

Now, in order to speak of the particular character of the daytime, it says:

In the Yoginī tantra, the Hevajra, for the sake of all beings who gather as the excellent assembly of yoginīs, the daytime too shall be fully explained.

Here the time of day is of two kinds, outer and inner. Outwardly, on the fourteenth of the waning moon and the like, the village goddesses roam through the outer sites mentioned above in order to steal the radiance of all embodied beings. Inwardly, they scatter and gather in the particular places of the seminal essence, the winds and so on, the breath, the urine measure, the time measure, and the like. In the same way, a yogī who longs for the two kinds of accomplishment should know the distinction between outer and inner. For the sake of the common accomplishment, on the fourteenth of the waning moon and the like, he goes at night to the charnel ground and takes part in the gatherings, such as the autumn festival of the heroes.

This is why the text asks, "O Blessed One, what is the day?", meaning the outer and the inner day. The Blessed One declared:

The fourteenth of the waning half of the month, and likewise the eighth.

Here the fourteenth of the waning half is the twenty-ninth, and likewise the eighth of the waning half is the twenty-third. The definitive meaning should be understood from the root tantra itself, which says:

This moon of awakening mind abides as waxing and waning.
By the waxing she is the one who generates;
by the waning she is the one who destroys.
On the fourteenth of the waning moon and the like,
the ḍākinīs of awakening mind gather through the wheel of great bliss.
This is explained as the definitive meaning.

Furthermore, regarding what should be eaten, it is said:

The banner and the one struck by a weapon, and the one of seven times: these too should be eaten.

The banner is a man or woman, such as a thief, whom a king has punished by sentence, cut with a weapon, and hung on a corpse stake and left there. The one of seven times is some man or woman who has been born in a human body through seven successive lives. The signs of such a person are that the shadow appears sevenfold, the eyes do not blink, there are three wrinkles on the forehead, a fragrant smell comes from the body, and so on. If one sees such a person, one offers flowers into the hands, circumambulates, and says, "Great lord of yoga, now the time has come for you to do something for us." When this is said, that person abandons the body. Having abandoned it, one makes pills from the flesh, each the size of a joint of a ginger root. All of us should eat them and also distribute them to all beings as their share. This bestows the accomplishment of moving through the sky. Likewise, the flesh of ordinary people, of those hung on banners, of those struck by weapons, and so on is purified and increased and made into pills and eaten; this surely destroys wrinkles, white hair, and the like.

The definitive meaning of these is also given in the Five Hundred Thousand, which says:

By this supreme banner of the body,
the tree of channels purified from form,
if one eats the flesh of awakening mind,
the yogī will attain the supreme accomplishment.

And the definitive meaning of the one of seven times is given there as follows:

This body of all embodied beings is of seven births.

From all the food and drink that is eaten and drunk, endowed with the six tastes, what melts and grows as the essence is called the first birth.

Then from this blood arises:
it is said to be the second birth.

From this flesh arises, the third;
becoming skin is the fourth;
becoming channels is the fifth.

From this bone is the sixth,
and marrow and fat are the seventh.
So it was said earlier.

Furthermore, the text says: "Because compassion is generated with effort, the very mention of killing cannot succeed without compassion; therefore compassion must be generated." In regard to this, there is first the distinction between outer and inner. For the time being, for the sake of the outer: "One who commits the five acts of immediate retribution, or who disturbs the Buddha's teaching, belongs to the family of aversion. By means of meditative absorption, for the time being, the one to be killed should not be destroyed in every respect. But if, having concealed everything, a yogī falls away from the samaya, accomplishment can never occur." By this, all the malevolent ones are tamed. Therefore it was said, "Bringing all the malevolent ones into the fold."

Furthermore, as for the definitive meaning, the root tantra says: "The great life-breaths above and below, the great yogī kills and also nourishes. Other than these, he does not kill living beings; he always kills those malevolent ones." This is the definitive meaning.

"It is to be prevented by the chief of the rite." This pertains to both the outer and the inner life. The outer is prevented by the meditative absorption of the family of bliss and emptiness; the inner is prevented by great emptiness.

Furthermore, the times of day and night are to be understood as the division into method and wisdom. Thus: "By day, the Blessed One, the Vajra-holder; by night, wisdom is to be understood." The meaning of this is: "That which is wisdom is non-entity; entity is to be understood as method."

The definitive meaning of this too is found in the root tantra: "That which has the characteristics of the sun and moon, right and left, which makes cool and makes hot, that is both fault and virtue; that is method and wisdom."

Likewise: "There is nothing that should not be done; there is nothing that is always not to be eaten; there is nothing about this that is not to be contemplated; there is no one who does not speak of good or bad." For all this moving and not moving arises entirely from oneself. Therefore: "As one is oneself, so are others; likewise the self is the supreme reality." When one knows one's own nature just as it is, one becomes the sole sovereign who turns the wheel of the three realms.

For this very reason: "Thus the yogī of mind, who engages in eating, drinking, and so forth, whatever limbs he moves, and whatever words he utters, Heruka, dwelling in glory, declares them all to be mantras and mudrās." As it is said: "The maṇḍala deities are this very body. Other deities and maṇḍalas will never be found by searching. So the hero, the guide, has declared." "Śrī is nondual wisdom" means not grasping at either aspect of glory, one's own or another's. "He is emptiness, free of causes and so forth" means the great bliss of meditative absorption, free of causes such as action, wisdom, the binding of mudrās, and torma offerings. "Ru is freedom from gatherings" means bliss liberated from imputed characteristics. Then, to the thought of how that is to be accomplished: "Ka is dwelling nowhere." It is declared that accomplishment comes through being free of gatherings and of objects of focus, and through there being no mutual dependence. Therefore he is Heruka.

Furthermore: "By the yoga of the vajra skull" means by the yoga of sustaining the body. "Whatever beings' flesh the wise one eats, those beings come under his power." If a yogī manifests for himself the yoga of sustaining the body, even buddhas come under his power; how much more so do ordinary beings living in the three worlds do as they are commanded. Otherwise, when the yogī engages with women, if he consumes the flesh of awakening mind without letting it go outward, he gains mastery over his own body; such a one is called a skillful yogī.

This is the seventh chapter, the extensive explanation of the Teaching of Symbols and Settling, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra.

"The awakening mind becomes the moon, whose nature is the fifteen parts. That becomes the yoginī Nairātmyā, who, transforming into the form of a human, brings the three worlds under her power. Having bowed respectfully to her, the extensive explanation of the maṇḍala of Nairātmyā is to be drawn by Vajragarbha. Then the wheel of the yoginīs will be explained." With such words he begins. The yoginī belongs to the waning moon, the fifteen lunar days; she removes the dust of darkness, destroys the dust of appearance, and is spoken of as that which is the awakening mind of saṃsāra looking downward.

As the root tantra says: "By the division of body, speech, and mind, the maṇḍala is considered in three forms. First is Hevajra himself, called the body maṇḍala. After that, Nairātmyā is taught as the mind maṇḍala. After that Kurukullā is taught, regarded as the speech maṇḍala." Therefore it is fitting now to explain the wheel of the yoginīs.

"In the realm of space, contemplate the bhaga. Contemplate in the center, with the wheel first, as appropriate, how the deities arise." Its meaning is this: the preliminary protection wheel and so forth are to be understood from what is taught for the time of generating Heruka. Here, in order to show only the key points, the words "in the expanse of space" and so forth are spoken. After offering to one's own lord, one purifies the vessel and its contents in the manner of "Om śūnyatā-jñāna" and so forth, and imagines all phenomena as like the maṇḍala of space. After that, in order to represent the body, speech, and mind of all the tathāgatas, in that expanse of space one visualizes a letter E-shaped form of immeasurable extent, and within it, "the wheel first, as appropriate."

"Earth, water, fire, and wind": the maṇḍalas are generated in sequence. From their complete transformation, one visualizes the wheel of the maṇḍala of the Blessed Lady, with four gates and with a lintel. "Two rims, faultless": it is cut into two rims in the manner of goddesses of object and subject. "From the hub, one arises": in the hub and the inner rim are the goddesses of the five purified aggregates, which are the five letters of the great emptiness spoken of earlier. These are also called the five great natures, and the later rims become the outer ones.

Therefore it is said, "As for the triangle, the later is declared." Then: "In the center, in the form of the fifteen, contemplate the nature of the seat." This means that because all the elements move, riding upon the life-wind, they are imagined externally as the rasanā channel. "Upon that is the moon. Upon the moon, the seed itself." As is said in the root tantra itself: "First the semen arises from the father; consciousness, endowed with wind, enters there; and there it is joined with the mother's blood. By this meaning the generation stage is taught." Accordingly, it is taught that the rasanā channel, the moon, the seed, and the disk of the sun press down upon one another.

"From the union of the two, great bliss." This is because of the nature of semen and blood, the sequence of the life-breath's exhalation and inhalation, the lalanā and rasanā channels passing through, and the upper and lower passing through each other.

"Ālī abides in the form of the moon; kālī makes appear in the form of the sun." This means that in the external stage of generation, one contemplates the moon disk, fully transformed from ālī, as the way the life-breath comes in, and the sun disk, from kālī, as the way the life-breath goes out. This is the provisional and the definitive meaning.

"From the union of moon and sun." This means from the union of the natures of sun and moon together with consciousness, which makes three. "Renowned as Gaurī and the rest." Externally this is known as the generating of the world of beings and their environment; internally, as the generating of the sacred existence. The meaning is that all the fifteen goddesses, Gaurī and the others, arise in this way.

"The moon, endowed with the mirror-like wisdom; the seven-horsed one, endowed with equality. The seed, the hand-emblem, and the deity of one's own should each be spoken of separately. All becoming one, entirely, completeness is the purity of the dharmadhātu." This means: moved by wind, kindled by fire, ripened by water, held together by earth, and expanded by space. The throat, the palate, the crown, the lips, and the teeth are of the nature of the five wisdoms; this is called the meaning of the five awakenings. Therefore it is said, "By the rite the wise have taught, one should meditate on the five aspects." It should be understood as the provisional and the definitive meaning.

"By the equal union of ālī and kālī, the very possession by Vajrasattva." For the sake of those of childlike understanding, it is taught externally as the seat of sun and moon, fully transformed from ālī and kālī. In truth, it is said: "The syllables HŪṂ and PHAṬ, which arise from a letter and form a sphere, are not desired; one should contemplate the lord of the maṇḍala as arising from the reflection of the sattva." To contemplate the wheel of the selfless one in such a way is the definitive meaning. The meaning of this is also stated in the tantra called the Supreme Original Buddha: "By the union of ālī and kālī, the syllable HŪṂ is not desired. O King!" And in the fifth chapter of the Abridged Tantra explained by Mañjuvajra it is said: "Whichever of A, KA and the rest, the seat of hare and sun does not belong to the Vajra-holder. The letter transformed into HŪṂ, without sign, color, shape, and so forth, is not accepted here. Moreover, what arises from the unchanging, changes and is exhausted; it is endowed with the excellent faculty. Possessing the supreme of all aspects, the Victor holds manifold illusions."

The manner of the generation stage is as taught above: "Hand-emblems and faces as above; the moon, crystal, the light of a jewel." In this context it means that the hand-emblems are imagined as the curved knife and the skull cup, and all the bodily colors are imagined as pure black alone. This is clearly shown by this very text: "By the nature of means and wisdom, in this way everything is complete. The moon and sun are distinguished: ālī is wisdom, kālī is means. In this way Gaurī and the rest differ by their distinction of color." The meaning is that, in the manner of generation by the five outer and inner awakenings and so forth, the one is differentiated merely by color.

In order to show the distinctions of place: "First, in the inner additional circle, five yoginīs surely dwell. Their nature is the five aggregates; the yogic knowers should always contemplate them." This means that the sixteenth through the twentieth days are of the nature of the body. "In the east, Vajrā" means: in the eastern direction the goddess Vajrā; in the direction of Yama, Gaurī; in the direction of the lord of waters, the water yoginī; in the direction of Kubera, Vajraḍākinī; and in the center, the Blessed One, the selfless yoginī. These, gathered under the nature of body, are the goddesses of the five aggregates.

Now, in order to explain the outer additional circle, it begins "In the outer additional circle." "Gaurī, Caurī, Vetālī," and Ghasmarī: these four are placed in the four directions in order, being of the nature of speech and the essence of the twenty-fifth day. Likewise Pukkasī, Śavarī, Caṇḍālī, and Ḍombinī are placed at the intermediate points; from the twenty-sixth to the thirtieth day they are spoken of as the nature of mind, in a manner of complete purity.

"The one below and the one above, Khecarī and Bhūcarī, are spoken of." This means: the one below is the middle group of five, of the nature of speech; Khecarī is the third group of five, of the nature of mind. These two are the two kinds of life-breath of all embodied beings: the upper breath and the lower breath. From these two arose the tantras of means, such as the Guhyasamāja, and the yoginī tantras, such as the Hevajra. Of these, the tantras of means came from above, and the tantras of wisdom came from below. Therefore it was taught: "By the nature of existence and peace, these great compassionate ones abide."

"All the goddesses are dark in body color." This means that by indicating the symbol of wisdom, which is emptiness, their bodies are black. "Fierce, and adorned with the five mudrās." This means that all the goddesses, being of the nature of the pure groups of five days, are adorned: "The wheel, earrings, necklace, bracelets, and belt, these five aspects; the five buddhas also are pure, and by these five the mudrā is purified."

Again, it is said: "One-faced, with red eyes, in the hand she brandishes a curved knife and a skull cup." This shows the nature of existence and peace. As Nairātmyā is, so too the fourteen goddesses are one with her and not different. In this way: "As Nairātmyā the yoginī is, so all the others are explained." "One hand is occupied with the skull cup, in the right she holds the curved knife." The meaning of these words is to show that the colors, the hand emblems, the faces, and so on are not different from Nairātmyā herself.

"With the left she embraces the khaṭvāṅga, her lower body wrapped in a tiger skin, riding on a corpse, blazing with splendor." The definitive meaning of this has already been given above.

"Two hands, with yellow hair blazing upward." This is to show the aspect that appears as dual, for as long as it appears so. By the power of meditative absorption, all the elements blaze upward; therefore the hair is bound upward.

"The six faults, beginning with pride." These are the six, from the earth element up to the element of wisdom: the upward-moving and downward-moving winds, three engendered by the father and three engendered by the mother. These are the six that arise naturally in embodied beings.

"For the sake of cutting, the curved knife is held." In the definitive meaning, this is spoken of as emptiness, and it is said that by it the six faults are cut.

"The Māras of the four kinds of thoughts, of things and of non-things, their blood is to be drunk, for the sake of accomplishment, in the skull-cup of the head-lotus." The definitive meaning of this is as stated in the root tantra: "From the supreme lotus of one's own body, slain by the four meditative concentrations, the flesh and blood of the four Māras abide; the yogī should always drink it by the method of yoga, and will overcome birth and old age." The four states of cyclic existence are the Māras. Their emanations are the Māra of the aggregates, the Lord of Death in the heart, the Māra of the afflictions in the throat, and the Māra of the sons of the gods at the crown. Of the sixteen parts of the moon, four are slain each time; of the twenty-one thousand six hundred breaths, five thousand four hundred are slain. In this way the blood is drunk, and the conceptual thoughts of things and non-things are destroyed.

"The aspect of emptiness is the khaṭvāṅga; the corpse is conceived as method." This was explained at length earlier.

"If one meditates on the wheels by this means." It is said that when one understands the outer and the inner as provisional and definitive meaning and meditates accordingly, accomplishment is swiftly attained; this is the definitive meaning. The meaning of this too is given in the root tantra: "Having seen the three realms of beings caught in the net of conceptuality, the means of liberation for each, just as it applies, has been taught. Those bound by the habitual tendencies of conceptuality are first taught the rites of conceptual practice. When the nature of conceptuality is known, one enters into non-conceptuality. The meditation on the maṇḍala and the wheel, how the deities are generated, the summoning of wisdom, the empowerment, likewise the wheels, the channels, the seminal essence and the winds, all that was taught, the Protector of the World taught for the sake of drawing in the childish. The definitive meaning is practiced otherwise. Whoever looks at the manner of the maṇḍala, the deities, the summoning of wisdom, the empowerment, in terms of seminal essence and wind, that Hevajra does not know."

Now the guidance of the yoginī of the generation and completion stages of all tantras is shown as provisional and definitive meaning, gathered into six limbs. The six limbs taught at the stage of the completion stage are the definitive meaning; the six limbs taught in the generation stage should be understood as the provisional meaning. It is as follows: "First, meditate on black; second, meditate on red; third, meditate on yellow; fourth, green likewise; fifth, the color blue; sixth, the body of white. The yogī meditating the six limbs, and especially joy, and the end likewise." Here, at first, so that the childish may understand, the six limbs are Akṣobhya, Amitābha, Amoghasiddhi, Ratnasambhava, Vajrasattva, and Vairocana as the chief. These are also established as earth, water, fire, wind, space, and wisdom. Moreover, to abandon the conception of a single color, six colors are also taught, for the sake of the understanding of the childish.

Again, to draw in the Sāṃkhya followers, the six elements are shown through the nature of letters. The letters that sum these up are of six kinds: the five, a, i, ṛ, u, ḷ, and at the end of these, one of the letters of method or of wisdom, making six. This too is taught in the Recitation of Names: "The seminal drop, emptiness, the six letters." These six, transformed by being brought near to the consonants alone, which stand at thirty, become one hundred and eighty, and become the days of six months. Likewise, those that rely at the end on a letter of method or wisdom, transformed by bringing near the thirty, make one hundred and eighty; thus it is established as three hundred and sixty. Here, what is transformed together with the accent should be understood as wisdom, and what is transformed together with the seminal drop as method; this is established as the dharma of one year. The detail of this should be understood from the root tantra.

Likewise, for the childish who desire worldly accomplishments, the maṇḍala is meditated on in particular colors according to the kinds of activity, such as killing. Thus the wheel of secrecy is meditated as green, the emanation as yellow, the Dharma as black, the enjoyment as red, the glorious as white, and the crown protuberance as blue; these are words of the worldly vajra. By these statements the six limbs of generation are briefly shown.

"Free from joy, and the end likewise." This shows the six limbs of the completion stage. Thus: "The generation stage itself, and likewise the completion stage; abiding evenly in the two stages, the Dharma of the Vajra-holder is taught."

This is what was taught. And those six limbs of the completion stage are also set out in the eighteenth chapter of the glorious Guhyasamāja, where it says:

Withdrawal, meditative concentration,
Control of the vital breath, and likewise retention,
Recollection, and absorption:
These are called the yoga of six limbs.

This meaning should be understood in full from the Recitation of Names, the supreme primordial buddha. Furthermore, after guiding the immature, this very tantra teaches six limbs in the context of worldly conventional truth, as follows. The line "the aspect of generation is taught" means this: having taught the six limbs of the yoga of conceptual thought, which is the generation stage, the six limbs of union are now to be taught. The text says:

The element of space is the lotus;
Bhaga is said to be the wisdom.
Meditation is the union itself;
Its bliss is called the wheel.

Outwardly this is the element of space; inwardly, the lotus. Outwardly it is the triangular source of phenomena; inwardly, it is the experience of the special quality of the wisdom of bliss. Outwardly this is meditated upon through the sequence of vessel and contents, and inwardly it is the union of pairs. Outwardly it is the interior of the maṇḍala, and inwardly it is the wheel of the bliss of the four drops. That is expressed as follows:

Know it by yourself, in due order.

The outer wheel of the maṇḍala is the complete transformation of the four elements, earth, water, fire, and wind. Inwardly, the drops of the water, fire, and wind elements pass through a sequence that is divided by the sequence of the four instants, and so is analyzed by one's own awareness. The text goes on:

What is called "the gods" is the awakening mind;
How it arises is as the seminal fluid.

Within that palace, to realize in due order the bliss that arises from one's own aware seminal fluid is what the gods are. In this way the six limbs of union are taught.

Now, in order to teach the sequence of the four joys, the text says:

The coarse-born is of two kinds.

First, woman is wisdom itself;

Man should be called means.

For those who wish to attain buddhahood through the union of the two organs, man and woman are indicated by the terms means and wisdom, but this is not the definitive sense. The definitive sense is given in the line: "By the division into conventional and ultimate, afterwards these two are of two kinds." Therefore there are four joys. As to the symbol and what it symbolizes, the conventional bliss whose nature is emission is means, while the unchanging ultimate bliss is to be realized as wisdom. Otherwise, there is first the twofold man, as the text says:

The seminal fluid and its bliss

Are man; wisdom is likewise,

The seminal fluid and bliss itself.

Therefore the joys

Are the exact division into four.

The seminal fluid of men and women is means, and the bliss is wisdom.
Likewise:

On the side of the completion stage also

Are these four innate ones.

This means that, setting aside the symbolizing aspect, on the side of the symbolized, the ultimate, there are four absorptions: the absorption gathered by wind and water, and the absorption gathered by fire and earth. This is why the Recitation of Names says: "Having the peak of the fourth concentration." As for those joys, the text says:

The first joy is the hero;

Supreme joy is the yoginī;

All the very blissful joys come from that;

Know it all from that bliss as means.

Because of the difference between the natural order and its reversal, in men the wind element is stirred first, and then fire, water, and earth in sequence. In women it is reversed, and earth is stirred first. The difference among those joys is taught thus:

Joy is slight bliss;
Supreme joy exceeds it;
Joy beyond joy is freedom from attachment;
The remainder is the innate joy itself.

This meaning is to be understood through these very words of the vajra that follow:

First, the wish to touch;
Second, the wish for bliss;
Third, the destruction of desire;
Therefore meditate on the fourth.

The vase, the secret, and the wisdom-knowledge initiations are by nature perishable and subject to destruction, so it is certain that one should meditate on the fourth concentration. Likewise the tantra of the supreme primordial buddha says:

The three are worldly and conventional;
The fourth is the ultimate itself.

It also says:

Supreme joy is called existence;
From joy beyond joy comes nirvāṇa;
The middle is mere joy;
Therefore the innate abandons it.

These lines should be taken in reverse order. "The middle is mere joy" refers to the first joy. Then comes supreme joy, and then the special joy. It is stated in reverse because the special joy is distinguished through the application of power; this should be learned from the guru's own mouth. The three joys described in this way are existence, that is, of perishable nature, and for this reason the earlier ones are set aside by the limb of wisdom through the division of the supramundane innate, and one should strive for the later states. Beyond even that is the innate of great wisdom, which is to be symbolized by all the earlier limbs of wisdom. This is what lies beyond the realm of expression, and yogins should take it up with effort. As the text says:

There is no desire and no freedom from desire;
It does not become an object of the middle.
Here there is neither means nor wisdom;
It is the true reality that appears.

Inexpressible by others, the innate.

The waxing and waning moon is desire and freedom from desire. The middle is the sixteenth part. In actuality it is not signified by sun, moon, and Rāhu, nor by man, woman, and neuter, nor by om̐, āḥ, and HŪṢ, nor by parts, drops, or sound. Therefore those attached to the bliss of nirvāṇa will not find it apart from the guru, and so following the guru is taught:

It is not found anywhere;
The guru teaches the time and the means;
Know it from your own merit.

The symbol and the symbolized are to be known from the vase of the song of the precious guru, with the limb of the accumulation of one's own merit going first.

Having first found what is to be indicated, one should view it in this way:

The lowest, the middling and the highest,
and others, whoever they may be,
all of these, through meditating on that very sameness of taste, should be seen as one and the same.

So it was taught; this is the brief teaching. By this vajra phrase, those who have directly found what is to be indicated abandon the subtle perception, the gross perception and the central perception of the three worlds, moving and unmoving, and are shown to indicate it as the unindicatable. As the root tantra also says:

The wise person who knows the vidyā, having abandoned the syllables and the drops,
and indicated the unindicatable, comes to hold the body of Hevajra.

So it was taught. In order to explain it extensively, the text says:

The lowest are the subtle meaning;
the highest is to be spoken of as the real thing;
this is what is abandoned by the two central channels.

This teaches the following. Either the things taught as unmoving, or the knowledge that views things as belonging to the desire realm, the form realm and the formless realm, or whatever things there are, highest, middling and lowest, that have the pattern of the three samādhis, one should abandon, and meditate on the sameness of taste of the innate. This is the meaning.

"Others" means the six faculties. In "whoever they may be, the stable and the moving," the meaning is that, of the stable and the moving, even the moving are not to be imagined as abiding in three kinds of things, because they are equal in the taste of the innate.

"Of all this there is no such thing" means that these three worlds of inner and outer phenomena are empty of self and other. This is the meaning.

Sameness is held to be likeness;
to meditate on that sameness of taste is spoken of as "sameness," meaning likeness.
The taste is its wheel.

Here, by the stages of exposition just given, the wheel of existence of the three worlds, with its twelve limbs, arises in sequence. It is from this very wheel that the wheel of luminous bliss arises, so it is not to be sought elsewhere. This is the meaning.

For this very reason, meditation is sameness, one taste.
By this meaning it is expressed.

So it was taught. The basis for making things the same and of one taste is the wheel of existence itself; apart from this I do not see any second thing at all. Therefore it is said:

From me all beings arise.
From me the three realms also arise.
By me all this is pervaded.
I see no other nature of beings.

This very wheel of luminous bliss remains, revolving, for the childish through deep sleep, waking, dreaming, and the bliss of sleep. It is the manifest emergence of the dharmadhātu. As the Mahāyāna sūtra also says:

For the holy it gives rise to bliss;
for the childish it shows terror.
If you see it, you will be freed;
if you do not see it, you will not be freed.

Therefore one should abide in the knowledge that existence itself is the supreme dwelling place of the buddhas and bodhisattvas. As the text says:

Having thus understood, the yogī meditates in profound equipoise, and even a person of little merit will, without doubt, accomplish it.

This meaning is stated clearly in the root tantra, where it says:

Whoever abandons this wheel of existence and seeks a supreme place, that person, who commits the five heinous deeds,
is a wretch, and he is ruined.

The meaning is that the yogī who rests in equipoise without abiding in any such pattern will swiftly attain the accomplishment of Hevajra.

Eating, drinking, pouring offerings, lying down, sleeping, and even thinking,
if one is intent on the great mudrā,
by that one will go to the supreme.

So it was taught. This meaning too is in the root tantra itself, where it says:

If one abides well in the great mudrā, whether walking, strolling, or lying down,
and even if one commits the heinous deeds,
one will be freed; of this there is no doubt.
The yogī who is in this very state,
even if surrounded by a retinue of consorts,
I do not see as bound;
this very one is now Hevajra.

This is clearly taught in this very Condensed Tantra by this vajra phrase:

Where nothing is meditated on by the mind,
all beings come to be meditated on.
By the very meditation without meditation,
all phenomena should be fully known.

This phrase clearly explains the meaning of all the tantras, and of the two kinds of exhalation, it is the exhalation of the great vajra holder. The first of the six limbs of great wisdom, withdrawal, is what the glorious Primordial

Buddha, the Guhyasamāja and others have designated by that term, and the line "accomplished by completely relinquishing all effort" is intended here. This very thing is the Perfection of Wisdom. This is Nairātmyā. This is Heruka. This is the buddhas of the three times. This is the one who liberates from the ocean of existence. This is the sūtra without letters. This is the definitive meaning.

Furthermore, this exhalation of the great vajra holder appears to childish people as a variety of things. They designate and abide in many conventional terms: the moving and the unmoving, self and other, life, nourishment, person, agent, the one who impels and the one impelled, father, mother, teacher, the ancestor of the world, earth, water, fire, wind, space, mountains, oceans, continents, forests, trees, creepers, vines and so on. Yet the protectors of the three times have never said that any of these exist other than as their own essence. The person who views these as supreme and holy is none other than the body of Hevajra. Therefore it says:

Whatever things there are, stable and moving, grass, creepers, vines and the like,
from the nature of their own respective essence,
one should surely meditate on the holy suchness.
There is nothing supreme apart from these very things.

So it was taught. The meaning is that the essence of these things is neither something to be abandoned nor something not to be abandoned.

Regarding the lines, "Self-awareness is itself great bliss; from self-awareness awakening arises," the root tantra itself states this very point. As it says: "Vajragarbha, it is thus: leave the wheel of saṃsāra, whose nature is suffering, exactly as it is. For example, one makes no effort to paint the great expanse of space with many colors. In the same way, O Hevajra, a yogin who wishes to abide in the vajra should train in just this manner." That is the meaning.

The lines, "Self-awareness is the very reason for meditation; from the transformation of what is known by oneself, through suppression, action arises," show clearly both what is to be indicated and what indicates it. At the time of indication, through the words "the first joy, separated from it, has the supreme as its end," one makes the indicator manifest by means of intelligence, and this is the meaning of "one should meditate on what is known by oneself." Therefore the indicator itself, once suppressed and brought under control, becomes clearly manifest. For this reason, as it says: "Self seizes and self acts; self is the king, self is the chief." These words speak of distinctions, and they are the words of the vajra at the time of indication. Such an indicator is to be sought out with great effort at the very beginning; later it is abandoned through the distinction of meditative concentration. For the Chanting of Names says: "Having abandoned the desire for existence and the rest, he is the great joy of the three worlds; white like pure white clouds, radiant like the light of the autumn moon, beautiful like the disk of the rising sun."

Therefore what indicates is the desire for existence, which arises through the power of all the afflictions. What is contrary to it is that which transcends all examples; this is the attainment of the manifest weapon, which is a superior distinction. Hence this same Condensed Tantra says: "Desire, aversion, envy, and likewise delusion and pride, all these do not match even a sixteenth part of the joy that abides there." Likewise, "The wisdom born from the source of phenomena" refers to the bliss that relies on the source of birth. "Equal to space, together with the means" means by the means of undefiled bliss. Elsewhere it is also said: "From the nature of means and wisdom, the three worlds are born from that." Just from the bliss of elaboration the three worlds arise, and the unchanging wisdom too arises from it. For this reason, depending on the context, the terms "father and mother," or "means and wisdom," are applied. In the context of this great secret, the designation is made by distinguishing support from supported. "The form of semen is the Blessed One; his bliss is called the mother." Semen is the father, and bliss is to be understood as the mother. Why is wisdom described in terms of bliss? Because this very text says: "From non-existence, that which is without entity is wisdom; the entity is called the means." And likewise, bliss is cut by the net of all conceptions. It is free from one and many, as in "greater joy than a single instant." This is to be understood, and so it comes to be known through the division of the four instants and the parts of the four joys.

How is it known? "This wisdom of one's own awareness is beyond speech and is a domain of experience. Because this is the sequence of blessing, such is omniscient wisdom. Earth, water, wind, fire, and space as well: through the feeling of awareness that is their nature, not even an instant of any of them can harm. The heavens, the human realm, and the lower realms become a single form in an instant." So, by distinguishing outer and inner, whoever abides in the meditative concentration of bliss, which transcends all examples, is not harmed by those who dwell beneath, upon, and above the earth in the three worlds. For there is nothing that, in that instant, does not become unchanging blissful wisdom. Moreover, these three realms do harm because one is bound by the iron chain of grasping at self and at what is mine. But "by the conceptions of self and other, this great lord is not made subject to harm." That is the meaning.

Here, most childish people, those who belong to the world, hope to be liberated by the four Vedas, by many tenets, and by the eight worldly accomplishments and the like. This the great ancestor has refuted. As it says: "All Vedic tenets, and likewise the increasing of rites and so on, are not accomplishments that purify existence; one will again be born in existence." This is the definitive meaning. "In this world and the next, without that there is no accomplishment." Thus, the childish, inferior in accomplishment because they lack the inexpressible, wander and wander about, and as a result their suffering never ceases. Therefore, for the sake of liberation, one should not abide in desire and attachment to the eight great worldly lords and the like.

"One who does not know this, O Hevajra" means one who does not know Hevajra as just taught. "His toil becomes meaningless" means that, lacking Hevajra, who has no sign of elaboration, even if one practices with body, speech, and mind beyond the count of eons, one is without result.

"Rushing down like the current of a river" refers to those who abide on the path, such as the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas; they are like a river. Otherwise, the childish look down at the current of the Gaṅgā flowing day and night, and conceptions of signs arise. "Bound like the tip of a lamp's flame" means that a yogin abiding in the two paths also comes to abide in the path of fixation, and so cuts off his own path. In the same way, the river that looks downward should be turned into the path of non-duality, like the tip of a lamp's flame, just as waters of differing color, taste, and shape, such as those of the Gaṅgā and the Sitā, become indistinguishable once they have entered the outer ocean. "Always set that very thing, through yoga, in day and night" means: place yourself in that suchness, the single taste of all things, in every mode of conduct. That is the meaning.

Here, what is the use of speaking at length? Whatever becomes an object of the intellect, let one meditate on all of it as having a single flavor. Then accomplishments pervading like space will arise. Thus it is said.

This is the eighth chapter, the extensive explanation of the wheel of yoginīs, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Having paid homage to the one who holds the vajra, who arises from the nature of non-entity, I, Vajragarbha, will write the extensive explanation of the chapter on purification.

Now, a poison or other substance that has not been purified only kills. Therefore, intelligent persons should purify it. So, by the method of the three great secrets, one should purify the three: body, speech, and mind.

First, the text says, "Then the chapter on supreme purification will be explained." This means that it follows upon the explanation of the wheel of yoginīs.

"Certainly all things": this means all things belonging to the three realms. "Purity is declared to be suchness": the medicine that removes the poison of things is suchness itself, which does not change.

Moreover, so that children, the immature, may understand it, the text says: "Afterward, one by one, by way of distinctions, they are to be declared as deities." As to the generation stage, the mantra beginning "Om śūnyatā" and so on is certainly the purification of all things. In the same way, what is imagined as the palace, the deities, and the like is of provisional meaning. This is just what the text says: "Afterward, one by one, by way of distinctions, they are to be declared as deities. The five aggregates and the six faculties, the six sense sources and the five great elements, are purified in their own nature."

First, the nonmoving elements are purified by being imagined as the palace, and the moving elements by being imagined as the deities. Of these, "the five aggregates" means that the five aggregates, from form to consciousness, are purified as the five beginning with Vairocana. In the same way, the faculties, the sense sources, the great elements, and so on are purified as the bodhisattvas and the five consorts.

"The obscurations of affliction and of the knowable are to be purified. Self-awareness, one's own very nature, is itself purity. Purity is not liberation by anything else." The purpose of purifying is to purify the afflictive and cognitive obscurations. How, then, are they purified? The text says "self-awareness, one's own very nature." The knowing that form and the rest are by their own nature unborn is called purity. That purification is not to be done by another way, since not realizing this is the definitive meaning.

Therefore, for that reason: "Because objects are purified as things, the supreme bliss is self-awareness. Objects such as form, and also whatever else is seen by the yogī, are all these things purified. In this way, beings are buddhas by nature." In order that children may understand, form and the rest are by their own nature the buddhas, the chief ones, and so on, as the words "form is Vairocana" and the like declare. Therefore the objects that appear and serve a function, such as the wish-fulfilling tree, the excellent vase, the wish-granting jewel, and the sword, are purified, and this is taught to children as a provisional meaning.

"Blessed One, what is impure?" Vajragarbha made this request to the Blessed One. The meaning is: earlier the Blessed One said that objects such as form, and faculties such as the eye, are buddhas from the very beginning; so I have not seen any second thing apart from that.

"The Blessed One said": this is the reply to Vajragarbha. "Form and the rest": this means that these very things, form and the rest, are impure for children, because they kill in the manner described.

"Why is that?" Vajragarbha asked again. "Because of the things grasped and the grasper": ordinary people grasp at a self and what belongs to a self. Thus they grasp a person as having a nature of his own, and likewise they grasp at change, and at sound, praise, expressive words, and so on. This is what is meant.

"Blessed One, what are the grasped and the grasper?" This asks: by what, at what, and how does one grasp? The Blessed One said in reply: "With the eye one grasps form; with the ear one listens to sound; with the nose one smells scent; with the tongue one tastes flavor; with all things one touches." Children enter into objects in the manner of object and subject, self and what belongs to self, pleasure and pain, and so they are impure. The skillful yogī enters into those same things by means of skillful method, and through this is purified. All pleasure and pain are empty and secluded by their own nature from the beginning. One who knows it so is purified, and this is the definitive meaning.

Therefore: "Those who obtain pleasure and so on through the mind, having rendered them free of poison through purity, should partake of these things to be enjoyed." Here the skillful yogī and those of childlike nature rely on the two truths in turn. The skillful yogī too does not abandon conventional truth: with the twelve illusion examples and the wheel of samaya, each shows the wheel of the maṇḍala according to how each is to be trained.

Likewise, a beginner is to reverse the grasping at self and what belongs to self, that is, the clinging to clan, lineage, cause, and caste. The so-called vajra family rests on the seven conventional empowerments. In order to reverse gradually the conceptions of pure and impure, the four families may mingle among themselves; foods such as ku and the rest are eaten in common; one is to approach those of one's own family and those not of one's family; and one is to dwell together with mothers, sisters, and the like. Through this one turns away from the very coarse ordinary conceptions. Therefore the vajra family gains its name through the seven empowerments themselves.

Therefore we should conceive of the aggregates, the elements, the sense sources, the faculties, the great elements, and whatever is derived from the great elements, and likewise actions and the activities of the faculties of action, as nothing other than deities; we should not conceive of them in any other way. Thus beginners among yogins should proceed as it is said:

The form aggregate is Vajrā; and feeling is spoken of as Gaurī. Perception is Vārī, the yoginī of water; formations are Vajra Ḍākinī. In the manner of the aggregate of consciousness, the yoginī Nairātmyā abides. When these are constantly purified, the yogin accomplishes reality itself.

This is just as a crystal jewel takes on whatever color is placed near it. The great Vajradhara also said to the bodhisattva called Vajradhātu, "Son of good family, the mind becomes just as it has been trained." For this reason the five aggregates are to be conceived as the five goddesses. How this is taught in the inner mode is explained at length in the Yoginī Cakra. That is the inner addition, the purification of the five aggregates.

Because the objects too are to be conceived as deities, the outer addition is then explained. In the northeast, Pukkasī; in the fire quarter likewise Śavarī; in the southwest place Caṇḍālī; in the wind quarter establish Yungmo. By this the goddesses of the four elements are shown.

Likewise, the objects, form and so on, are to be conceived as the deities of the four elements, as follows: in the northeast Gaurī, in the south Caurī, in the direction of water Vetālī, and in the northwest Ghasmarī. This is what is taught.

Further: "Below, she is called Bhūcarī; above, she is declared to be Khecarī." This was explained at length above in terms of outer and inner. The phrase "the aspect of the generation stage" means that it is taught in this order of presentation for beginners.

As for the phrase "by the nature of existence and peace," existence is Khecarī and peace is Bhūcarī. As another tantra says, existence is the forehead, and nirvāṇa is what drips from the throat of the jewel. "These two goddesses are established" should be understood as the two goddesses above and below, in the nature of existence and peace.

What is taught as purity within the generation stage, for the childish to understand, is this: form is taught to be conceived as Gaurī; sound is known as Caurī; the portion of smell is Vetālī; and taste is known as Ghasmarī. Having cultivated an inclination toward these four objects, as conceived by the childish, one accomplishes, on the conventional level, such acts as killing.

The definitive meaning of these four actions is taught in the root tantra. Pacifying is when Vajragarbha calms the torment of the afflictions by the water of awakening mind that arises from the body of embodied beings. Enriching is because body, speech and mind increase through an unprecedented, overflowing bliss. Controlling is because body, speech and mind are turned back from suffering and brought under the power of bliss. The fierce rite is because, by that power, it kills the movement of the twenty-one thousand six hundred life-winds, and the movement of the drops of awakening mind that look downward. Likewise it is said: pacifying is meditation on water, contemplated at the forehead; controlling is meditation on fire, contemplated at the throat; the secret, the meditation on wind, at the heart; enriching, the meditation on earth, abides at the navel.

As for "by touch she is called Bhūcarī; in the dharmadhātu she is Khecārī," this is in terms of outer and inner: consciousness, called the space element, the life-wind moving from above, is taught as the reality of the yoga tantras, the reality of the Guhyasamāja and the others, and is taught as the father's mind. Likewise Bhūcarī is called the element of unchanging supreme wisdom. It is the bliss of the drops of semen dripping downward in embodied beings, the reality of the yoginī tantras, taught as the reality of the Hevajra and the others, and taught as the mother's mind.

This is also said in the tantra called the Primordial Buddha: "The two channels of mind, above and below: one carries the falling seed and is dark; the mind of method is dark; the falling seed belongs to wisdom." Understand this meaning through this vajra word.

Likewise, "When these are constantly purified, the yogin accomplishes reality itself" means that, by attending in due order according to the provisional and the definitive meaning, one will attain in sequence the reality of the worldly and the transworldly.

Further: "The purity of the hands is emptiness; the purity of the mārās is the feet; the faces are the eight liberations; the purity of the eyes is the three vajras." In due order this refers to the sixteen emptinesses, which have the character of the waning moon; the cessation of the four states, such as waking, belonging to worldly beings; the wheel of Dharma, characterized by the eight watches; and the syllables Om Āḥ Hūṃ, characterized by body, speech and mind.

Further: "Earth is called Pukkasī; the water element is called Vyādhī, the huntress; fire is to be known as Caṇḍālī; wind is widely known as Yungmo." This is to be understood outwardly and inwardly in terms of the four kinds of action. The definitive meaning is as the root tantra itself says: "Life is to be cut by the vajra family; Amoghasiddhi speaks falsehood; one steals with the jewel family; one engages in unchastity with Amitābha." Understanding this as it is, it is intended as the cause of the two siddhis.

Likewise, by the distinction of principal figures and ordinary ones: "Aversion, it is said, is Vajrā. Desire is the yoginī of water. Envy is the vajra ḍākinī. Miserliness is the secret Gaurī herself. Likewise, delusion is Mohavajrā." This means that, in due order, these are to be realized in Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amoghasiddhi, Amitābha, Vairocana and the others, by means of the two classes of yogī. Yet it is for the sake of realization by yogīs of limited capacity, the childlike, that this was taught in this context. How is that evident? Because it was said: "In the aspect of the generation stage, which purifies aversion and the other afflictions, the aggregates are to be purified by this."

Even skilled yogīs, following the order thus expounded and relying on the manner of the two truths and the two stages, should teach the Dharma in whatever way the minds of the childlike will be liberated. This is the certainty of the Tathāgatas. Therefore, even in this present age, when strife is rampant, for those who are fit to be tamed through desire, the teaching of desire has been given. "Whatever binds the world, by that very thing one is freed from bondage. The world that does not know this very thing is not freed; and one who abandons it altogether will not find accomplishment." This was taught because the heroes who possess great compassion saw that very method as supreme. Therefore, by these words and letters the childlike are first led onward, but it is not to be taken up by others.

As it is said in this very tantra: "Just as when water has entered the ear, it is drawn out by other water; or again, when one is burned by fire, one is warmed by fire again; so too, when burned by the fire of desire, one should be warmed by desire itself." Therefore it was taught: "No scent, no sound, no form at all; no taste, and no purity of mind; no touch, and no phenomena; all is utterly pure. Know that beings go to the realm of naturally pure beings." That is, first the nature of the afflictions is shown at the outset, and afterward those very afflictions are gradually abandoned by skillful means. This is the instruction of the Tathāgatas. And in the root tantra too it is said: "By whatever sound and whatever guise beings are to be tamed, by that very sound and that very guise the vajra-holders teach the Dharma." And again: "Brahmā, Maheśvara, Viṣṇu, the god of desire, the fierce one, Skanda and the others: these too, in their forms, are for the moment praised; they are the means by which the world draws breath." And again: "O sons of good family, the afflictions such as the union of two are not by their own essence the nature of the afflictions; they are taught as afflictions because of the differing dispositions of persons." All these points should be understood in this way.

This is the ninth chapter, the extensive explanation of the chapter on purification, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra.

Homage to the Vajra Protector, whose essential body, enjoyment body and complete form, and whose emanation body, endowed with the marks, bestow the four accomplishments.

For the benefit of practitioners, the stainless extensive explanation by which disciples are consecrated has been well taught by Vajragarbha. Then, how the order of the maṇḍala is rightly taught: this is introduced by the words "Then..." Here, the vajra master, so that he may bring a disciple into the maṇḍala, must first dispel the obstacles arising from the conceptual thought of both himself and the disciple. This is to be done in this way: the rite is to be begun on a favorable day of the week, an auspicious lunar day, in conjunction with an auspicious constellation, and at an auspicious time. This is the certainty of the Tathāgatas: it is to be begun only after the distinctions of the worldly and transcendent empowerments have been thoroughly gathered in the mind, and not otherwise. That is the meaning.

"I shall fully explain the rite by which the disciple is consecrated": this is the summary statement. In order to introduce the vajra master beforehand, the text says: "First, the actual deity is performed. From HŪṂ the vajra is made with effort. The yogī purifies the ground, and afterward draws the maṇḍala." This means that the vajra master himself first generates himself as the wrathful Hevajra, victor over the three realms, one-faced and two-armed, from the seed syllable HŪṂ. He makes the protection wheel and the other preliminaries, thoroughly purifies the ground, and enters the maṇḍala of meditative absorption himself. That is the definitive meaning.

To show the particular qualities of the site, the text says: "In pleasure groves, in secluded places, in the houses of bodhisattvas, in empty houses, or in a temple, the supreme maṇḍala is to be drawn." Such places are auspicious, delightful, and bring accomplishment swiftly, so they should be sought with effort. At that site one builds a raised platform of earth to whatever size is desired, marks out the lines flawlessly with the measuring cord described in the tantra, and then lays down the colored powders.

"One draws with the supreme colored powders, or else with the intermediate ones: powder of the five jewels, or rice flour and the like." Colored powders are of two kinds. Powder of the five precious substances, such as coral, is taught as supreme. If these cannot be obtained, one may also draw with rice flour and the like dyed with pigments. That is the meaning. As for "the maṇḍala should exceed three cubits by three finger-breadths," the measure is shown either through the three of body, speech and mind, or through the manner of dust, darkness and vitality.

"There, the excellent consorts born from the five families are to be placed." That is, having drawn the maṇḍala according to the rite, the mantra-holder, who himself possesses meditation like the moon's reflection in water, blesses the maṇḍala of colored powders and enters it well himself. Afterward, he has the disciples first take the restraint of the fasting vow, the outer pledge vows, and the generation of the supreme awakening mind. After that he bestows the worldly empowerments according to their distinctions. This is so that the childlike may be led. The empowerment called the vajra master's empowerment is to be completed in full.

Then, in order to show the path of desire to the childlike, a young girl bearing the signs of the five families, devoted above all to the secret vehicle, is first well trained, as will be explained below, and then she is brought into the maṇḍala. As for how: those who possess the age of the sun, those who possess the age of the king, and those who possess the age of twenty are distinguished according to the divisions of the wheels of body, speech and mind, and are brought into the maṇḍala. While one who possesses the age of the sun is available, one of the age of the king or the like is not brought in. But if none who possesses the age of the sun can be found, one possessed of the age of the king and so forth should be brought in. For it is said: "Or else, whoever is found, just so, one who has reached sixteen." For the mudrā of the age of the sun, which bestows supreme bliss, is taught as the best; the age of the king is middling; and the age of twenty is declared the lowest.

"As long as semen is present, so long should the mudrā be relied upon." This should be understood in two ways. The bliss that becomes a cause of happiness for women arises from the age of the sun, and not earlier than that. Likewise, once twenty has passed, that very bliss is destroyed. Moreover, the bliss that comes to be for the vidyā-mantra holders and the vajra disciples should be relied upon for as long as it is experienced. Therefore it is said so.

"The mudrā's face is also bound, and the face of the means is likewise." By this it is meant that the girl, the man and the one receiving empowerment cover one another's faces; this is the armor.

"What arises from that teaching should be dropped into the disciple's mouth." The master, the holder of vidyā-mantras, having relied on the young woman as is proper, mixes it equally with vermilion, with a mind abiding in the supreme delight of the secret, and applies it fully as enjoyment through the disciple's mouth. That this is to be shown as the nature of speech is itself what is proclaimed as secret.

"The very domain of the disciple of equal taste: that too should be done there. It will become self-aware wisdom." Having thus realized what is called the secret, and having shown the reality of worldly desire just as it is, one has the subtle junction of the kings and lords of the mind placed in the site that is examined as the place where it is indicated. This is the command of Vajradhara. After that, the subtle substance is released, a great offering of the gathering is made, and all the treatise on desire that comes below is carried out. Then, from the great guru, the holder of vidyā-mantras, one should seek with life and effort the stages of accomplishing the milk that lies beyond that. Then, regarding that in which the indicator is made clear, it is said: "It will become self-aware wisdom." That which shows and clarifies in this way the reality of the wisdom of discernment is the work of the vidyā-mantra holder; remaining firm and avoiding the realm of Māra is the work of the disciple.

Thus, one abandons the self-aware wisdom that dwells far away like an old man, and enters the great wisdom.

As is said in the root tantra: "Abandoning self-aware wisdom, what cannot be indicated is the indicated; abandoning sound and drop, beyond letters is the characteristic." And likewise in the Recitation of Names: "The supreme person, who knows himself and others, benefits all; beyond all examples, the supreme lord of knowing and the known." Therefore it is certain that one abandons the self-aware wisdom of worldly kind and meditates on the great bliss that does not change. Hence: "Abandoning the right knowing of self and other, emptiness equal to space and free of dust, the supreme nature of existence and non-existence, thoroughly blending means and wisdom, blending attachment and freedom from attachment." This shows that worldly desire is perishable, changing, aware of only itself, one-sided, divided in nature into existence and non-existence, called means and wisdom only by an improper designation and not truly blended, and its aspects of attachment and freedom from attachment are widely divided. Therefore, abandoning that, one must meditate on the unchanging bliss called the fourth.

Therefore, this very great innate wisdom draws embodied beings out of saṃsāra and leads them to the state of holding awareness; it is the great exhalation of breath. As it says: "That alone is the life of living beings; that alone is the supreme unchanging; that alone is the self of beings; that alone is the all-pervader." The great unchanging bliss is the supreme secret of the body, speech and mind of all buddhas, which refutes and subdues all the views of ordinary worldly people regarding a self. Likewise, for those in saṃsāra it is realized through the semen abiding in the body; without semen it cannot be realized. To realize in reliance on semen is the way of the Dharma of desire. Hence it is said: "It abides entirely in the body."

Likewise, those who realize existence and non-existence arise from that very semen of awakening mind. For from semen directed downward arises the basis of grasping at self and what belongs to self; but from that same semen directed upward and increased, one realizes the condensed and expanded forms of all phenomena. Therefore: "Existence and non-existence arise from that; others and whatever they are; the way of all consciousness; the primordial person, the Lord, the self, the living being, sentient being, time, the person, the nature of all things: this abides truly in the form of illusion." Thus, from the downward flow of the semen of awakening mind, it is known that tenets, all views, poetry, histories, and the doctrines of fortune-tellers, of Īśvara, of agents and so forth, many such arise. Therefore the support of the body should be guarded with effort, and those who abide in this way should know all as like illusion. This is the intention.

In order to realize that very illusion-like nature, it is said: "The first is simply joy; the second, counted as such, is supreme joy; the third is freedom from joy; the fourth is called innate." Here, the seminal essence that dwells in the body, when it is relied upon inwardly in the manner of the four joys, brings about the attainment of the illusory body. This is taught as the very way of the dharma of desire, and it is the word of the Tathāgata.

Moreover, in the great tantra called the Vajra Garland it is said: "The unchanging nature of one's own body is to be known through the one supreme one. Having been indicated through an example, it is to be known by the kindness of the guru." Likewise in the Net of Illusion it is said at length: "Having sixteen half-parts, with drops; beyond the reckoning of limbs; having the summit of the fourth meditative concentration; knowing all the limbs of meditative concentration," and so on.

"Vajragarbha and all the others, having heard the wise one declare this, became supremely astonished, fainted, and collapsed upon the ground." This means that when the Blessed One Hevajra taught this dharma to Vajragarbha and the others in the manner of desire, they were utterly amazed and fell to the ground. For the Blessed One's words taught that the very thing which in some contexts is taught as binding is what liberates, and he did not tell them to seek buddhahood anywhere other than in their own bodies. When told, "Buddhahood is in this very body," they said, "Yet we have still not realized it." In this way the Blessed One displayed his miraculous power.

Then they asked the Blessed One Hevajra: "By what stages should we train in that very desire, and how should we strive?" The Blessed One answered: "At first, joy is the form of going; likewise supreme joy is itself going; freedom from joy, and joy too, is itself going; the third has no innate. The Blessed One declared to Hevajra that all buddhas have a single body. So that Vajragarbha might realize it, this is the dispelling without doubt: there is no desire and no freedom from attachment; it does not come to be observed in the middle. Because the three are abandoned, the innate is called awakening."

Regarding that dharma in the manner of desire: the bliss that is the taste of the four instants, which for the childish are distinguished only in four aspects, is to be known from the vajra master, the holder of knowledge-mantras. And it is thus. In accordance with the word of the holder of knowledge-mantras, the three joys are wholly discarded when the three existences are generated, and the fourth is certainly to be meditated upon. In this way, the bliss characterized by the three joys, namely the vase, the secret, and the wisdom-gnosis empowerments, is worldly bliss, since it is only conventional. One discards it, and the bliss that is brought inward, free from desire and from attachment, beyond even the middle, bestows the conduct of bliss itself and liberation.

"Or that very one is all the self; or it is the abandonment of everything." This means that all four worldly joys are abandoned, and all four supramundane joys are to be meditated upon without exception. What well indicates this beyond the four worldly ones is the teaching that one takes on being completely filled by the arising of all four joys. And so it is said: "Freedom from joy is indicated first; the three joys are wholly abandoned."

Thus, when one has abandoned those worldly bliss-like experiences, and at that time abides in the great innate, one has passed beyond the stage of the beginner. It is said: "At first it is like a cloud; when accomplished it becomes illusion-like." At first, the absorption of bliss alternates between being clear and unclear. Afterward, because the absorption of bliss is clear, it becomes predominant, and the unclear is overpowered. Likewise: "Through the distinction of sleeping and lying down, it is always like a dream." This means that after these, at all times, in every state of sleep and waking, all phenomena abide as illusion-like, and no occasion at all is given to the signs of conceptual thought. This is the sign that stability has been attained.

Likewise in the root great tantra it is said: "Having passed beyond the first stage, in what absorption does the yogin abide? The signs of that absorption should be known as of three kinds." Those three signs are the indications of drawing close to awakening. Therefore it is said: "Accomplishment, whose characteristic is inseparability, is achieved by the yogin through the mudrā."

Now, to present what was mentioned earlier, namely the characteristics of the maṇḍala, its shape and so on, the characteristics of the measuring thread, of the colored powders, and the vases and substances, it is said: "The Teacher spoke of the maṇḍala thus: square, blazing brilliantly, with four doors of great splendor, adorned with half-garlands upon garlands, with various wreaths and banners, beautified by eight pillars, and equipped with vajra threads of equal measure." The literal meaning of this is easy to understand.

Further: "Well adorned with various flowers, with incense, lamps, and likewise fragrance, equipped with eight vases and so on, along with branches and so forth; the neck should be covered with cloth, and the five jewels are placed within." These and the following lines present the implements of the maṇḍala and are easy to understand.

"Give Vijaya in the east." This means that one consecrates the vase of all rites, and the water consecrated with the mantra of the wrathful one who is the enemy of obstructors is poured into it, and it is placed in the east of the maṇḍala chamber.

"By the form of one's chosen deity" means by the yoga of one face and two arms.

"Newly and well spun, and wonderfully fine in measure, the thread is to be laid down by one with wisdom." This means that a wise mantrin should fold clean white cotton cloth into five layers, then dye each separately with colors matching the five tathāgatas. Having consecrated it according to the rite as the five families of victors, he should lay the line without error in the directions.

In the same way, the deities of the maṇḍala are to be propitiated. This is what is meant by the lines: "One hundred thousand recitations for the lord of the wheel, and likewise ten thousand for each of those of the maṇḍala." For the sake of propitiating the maṇḍala, the vidyā-holding master first recites the root mantra of the principal deity one hundred thousand times, and then recites ten thousand times for each of the deities of the maṇḍala, thereby pleasing them. He also offers tormas to the guardians of the directions at the three times of day. After that, he carefully examines the characteristics of the site for the pit, and purifies the ground in the manner of the ritual of the great maṇḍala. As it is said: "With the very mantra spoken above, the wise one should purify the ground; with the mantra beginning with A, as before, he should present the torma there." This is to be understood here just as it was explained earlier, when the maṇḍala of the principal deity was taught. In the same way, the protection wheel, the purification into the divine pride of one's own deity, whichever it may be, the distinctions among the empowerments, the offerings, and the making of requests are all to be done as before.

The only particular difference is expressed in the line: "The maṇḍala of Nairātmyā is to be drawn with two additional elements, beautifully." There is no other difference. Likewise, in placing the emblems of the deities, in the earlier maṇḍala of the principal deity all the emblems in the right hands were set down, whereas here only the curved knife is to be set down. Therefore: "Quickly draw Gaurī and the others. In the east draw the curved knife; so too in the south and west; so too in the north, the fire corner, and the southwest and northwest corners." This is the manner of setting down the emblems of the goddesses. The meaning is that on the two additional elements, one sets down in order the emblems of the goddesses of the object and of the subject. And likewise, by the lines "As was taught for Īśāna, so too below and above," the emblems and so forth of the goddess maṇḍala are well explained.

Now he shows how the vidyā-holding master himself enters the maṇḍala, as follows: "Having made the Vajrasattva posture, the right leg is to be extended; joining both hands in the Hevajra gesture, possessing the dance of compassion through skillful means, the master should enter the maṇḍala." This teaches that the vidyā-holder, through the union of skillful means and wisdom, in which the two are not two, generates equal compassion toward all sentient beings, and, endowed with the postures of the dance of compassion, enters the maṇḍala. Moreover, "bathed, clean, with a fragrant body, and adorned with various ornaments," he does this properly as well. In order to subdue the obstructors of conceptual thought: "Having made the threatening gesture, saying HŪṂ HŪṂ, he terrifies them with HĀ HĀ." Speaking these with his mouth, and performing actions such as entering the maṇḍala, is the definitive practice of the Tathāgatas.

Then the instruction on bringing in the disciple is to be explained. "Afterward the very reality is truly taught: pure wisdom endowed with form, and the self of saṃsāra, which is conceptual thought, have not the slightest difference." This is shown as follows. The vajra master, the vidyā-holder, from the very beginning abides in the recognition that all phenomena are like a dream and like the moon's reflection in water. When he causes the disciple to enter the maṇḍala and performs all the expansive rites, he does not do so with the thought that they are real at that very moment of acting. Why is that? Because all phenomena are, from the very beginning, empty of intrinsic nature. But those who engage in these rites and gather disciples while not free of these perceptions are like a mad elephant: they destroy their own ranks and thereby shatter the other's ranks as well.

In this way, through the distinctive meaning of what is expressed, the special qualities of the mantra-holders who enter the yoga tantras and the action tantras are also shown here. Here, in the great yoga, the distinction is taught to be that of the innate meditative absorption, which makes it superior. Here the word "innate" is understood in two ways. First, for the sake of ordinary beings to realize it, it is shown as the moment of bliss of the two organs. Second, the one who, abandoning the moment of bliss of the two organs, abides in the great innate, is the great vidyā-holding master. With this in mind it is said: "In the supreme delight there is no meditation and no meditator; there is no body, no apprehended and no apprehender; there is no flesh and no blood, no excrement and no urine; no vomiting, no revulsion, no bewilderment, no cleanliness, no offering, no obstruction; no attachment, no aversion, no delusion, no envy; no miserliness, no pride, nothing to be seen; no meditation and no meditator, no friend and no enemy; the innate, which is free of arrogance, is of manifold nature."

This statement, which shows the distinctive meaning of the great yoga, teaches the following. The innate is not merely the bliss of the seminal fluid, reaching the vajra jewel, in the meditative absorption characterized by the "supreme" and the other joys. That was taught for the sake of ordinary beings to realize. The state of the vidyā-holder is this: when the yogin has turned away from the perceptions of body and so on, from apprehended and apprehender; when, even if pierced and cut by material vajras and the like, he is not harmed by the injuries of flesh and blood; when there is no excrement or urine; when there is no vomit, phlegm, watery discharge, mucus or bile, which do not arise; when he moves and speaks unobstructed anywhere; and when no conceptions of the six victors, of the families beginning with attachment, enter him. This itself is definitively taught as the distinction of the vidyā-holder, and it is also taught as the innate that is free of all arrogance. Moreover, the mantra-holder pours this very teaching into the ears of the supreme disciples. Why? Because it is the nature that abides by its own essence. For a phenomenon that abides by its own essence is not something the Tathāgatas themselves would use to alter or change.

Vajragarbha spoke as follows.

Why is it that the body, whose nature is pure and has been without intrinsic nature from the very beginning, is said to have the nature of the elements?

The meaning is this. If the aggregates, the constituents, and so forth are pure by their own nature from the beginning, why are they presented as the elements, and as the gods that arise from the elements, and as the action of karma and of the sense faculties? This does not accord with the way of the nature of reality. That is the sense of the question.

Likewise, in the tantra called the Empowerment of Magical Display it is said:

The buddhas have no characteristics and abide fully in the body of truth. When you teach the Dharma as signless, unconditioned, and without equal, great hero, why do you reveal this ritual with characteristics, the practice of secret mantra? This is not the way of the nature of reality.

When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One, the great Vairocana, then said to Vajrapāṇi: Listen to this characteristic of the Dharma. This Dharma is free of thought and has abandoned all conceptualization. In it, the conceptual thinking of mind and mental factors is completely abandoned. The Dharma that I awakened to in the past arose from the wise. It is not known by children, who range in the domain of wrong conceptualization. Those veiled by darkness hold to place, time, characteristics, and the like. It is in order to take hold of those people that this ritual too is taught. There is no place, and there is no time. There is no action and no agent. In all phenomena there is nothing that exists or does not exist. Phenomena are only suchness.

So it was taught. The passage up to "this is not the way" is the quotation of the question, and the passage beginning "when he had spoken thus" should be understood as the quotation of the reply.

Then the Blessed One, the Vajra-holder, who bestows the bliss of the ḍākinīs, spoke. This indicates that he gave Vajragarbha the answer.

The nature free of pride and conceit abides entirely in the body.

The meaning is this. O Vajragarbha, what I taught to children by elaborating the form of semen, its channels, the winds, and their channels, is precisely, for the wise teachers who hold the vidyā mantras, something that has abided as utterly pure from the beginning. But children and ordinary beings abide bound only by the perception of characteristics.

O Blessed One, why are the aggregates the great elements? This repeats the earlier question: O Blessed One, since all phenomena are pure from the beginning, what is the purpose of teaching the great elements to those who practice secret mantra?

The Blessed One declared:

From the union of bo, la, ka, and kko, the earth of the Dharma, the solidity of touch, comes into being. Because the awakening mind is fluid, the element of water comes into being. From movement, heat is born. Because it moves, it is known as wind. Because of bliss, there is the element of space.

The meaning is this. O Vajragarbha, although all phenomena are pure in this way from the beginning, nevertheless on the conventional level they abide as dependable phenomena of cause and effect. When the two are joined in the way taught for the children, that is, when body meets body and so forth, the earth abides as solid, and from earth water is born. For the awakening mind itself is water. Because heat arises from stirring and movement, there is fire. Because fire and semen move, there is wind. And because in this union bliss free of conceptual thought arises, there is space. That is the meaning.

They abide fully in the five. At the time of the union and so forth, they arise in this way as the nature of the five elements, and therefore they are the great elements. That is the meaning.

Because it is the great element of bliss, that bliss is not itself the real. In this way, through the force of effort the five great elements arise in sequence, and because bliss comes about through them, this is worldly conventional bliss and not the true innate. That is the meaning.

What then? The text says: That which is born together with the innate should be called the innate. It is said to be the innate by nature. For only what transcends all action and conduct, what abides in its own nature, and what has the character of space is the innate, since it transcends all austerities and difficult practices and abides in its own nature. That is the meaning. The root tantra also says:

What abides in its own essential nature is itself the innate. It has the character of going beyond letters and transcends the path of speech.

All aspects are one in restraint. Because the performance of the mudrā is abandoned, for the yogī compassion becomes the means. The inseparability of emptiness and compassion should be called the awakening mind.

The meaning is as follows. It is the single nature of the vow of all the buddhas. It is free of the activity that is the cause of karma and wisdom. For the yogī, compassion is the means, and the bliss of the awakening mind flows without interruption. And that profound way, in which emptiness free of any gem-like substance and compassion are not different, is nondual. This is called the ultimate awakening mind, and should also be called the great innate wisdom.

What is made manifest? The tantra says: There is no mantra recitation, no austerity, no fire offering. There is no maṇḍala dweller, and there is no maṇḍala. That itself is the mantra recitation, the austerity, and the fire offering. That itself is the maṇḍala dweller, and that itself is the maṇḍala. In short, it has the nature in which the mind is gathered.

Here, recitation is so called because all instants are counted as exhausted in the suchness of all the buddhas. Austerity is so called because one abandons the eight worldly concerns and the like by way of non-abandoning, without clinging to them. The fire offering is so called because words, letters, the movements of the mind, and so forth are burned. The maṇḍala dweller and the maṇḍala are so called because they abide in the heart of all that moves and does not move. In this way, this conduct, gathering the mind into one, is taught as the innate.

This is the tenth chapter, the extensive explanation of empowerment, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra.

Of the nature of Trailokyavijaya, with one face and two arms, bowing down. The extensive explanation of the chapter on the gazes will be given by Vajragarbha.

In this age, when strife flourishes, many beings who are not holy will arise. Seeing no other way to enter them than to subdue them with a wrathful appearance and with fierce looks, the Lord manifested in forms such as the one with one face and two arms, such as Trailokyavijaya, such as Hala-hala, such as Hayagrīva, and such as Yamāntaka. For this reason the text teaches the distinctions of gaze and so on, the distinctions of breath, the postures, the rosary, the hearth, the substances to be burned, and the distinctions of time, such as midnight. Of these, only the gazes and the distinctions of the winds are taught here. The distinctions of time, hearth, and so on should be known from the context of the fire offering and from other extensive tantras.

Concerning the words "One with an uneven forehead is said always to bring about a fall," and so on: dependent origination, the arising of things in dependence, is the defining mark of phenomena, and the Tathāgatas taught it in this and that tantra. Therefore, if a yogin who is intent on the practice of subduing a wicked being transforms himself into a body of the color of Akṣobhya, with a gaze directed upward, and meditates, recites, and offers the fire offering while looking with both eyes at the same time toward the forehead, he will cause a fall. This is because above, in that direction, resides the form of the family of aversion.

Concerning the words "The gaze of the powerful one abides on the left; on the left are the two images": a yogin intent on the practice that brings the three worlds under control transforms himself into the form of Padmarāga, the ruby, and meditates and so on while looking with both eyes at the same time toward the left. By doing so he brings beings under his control. This is because on the left resides a form like Padmarāga.

Concerning the words "Summoning on the right side; and from above, the two images": likewise, a yogin intent on summoning the three realms of beings transforms himself into a form like the rising sun, and meditates and so on while looking slightly toward the upper right with both eyes at the same time. By doing so he summons the three realms of beings. This is because on the right side resides a form like the rising sun.

Concerning the words "The gaze that stiffens, in the center; the two at the center of the tip of the nose": likewise, a yogin intent on paralyzing the three worlds transforms himself into a form like crushed gold, and meditates and so on while looking with both eyes at the same time at the center of the tip of the nose. By doing so he paralyzes the three worlds. This is because the body of the Great Powerful One, like the color of gold, resides in the center.

Now, in order to show the wind to be employed at the time of the four gazes, the text says: "By the exhaling, he causes a fall." At the time of that very gaze, one should apply oneself to the practice as one's own life-breath goes out, as the wind is breathed outward. This is because when the wind is expelled, all embodied beings come to the time of death.

"By the inhaling he brings under control." At the time of that very gaze, one should apply oneself to the practice as one draws one's own life-wind inward. This is because when the life-wind abides within, everything is gathered under one's control.

"By the filling he summons." At the time of that very gaze, one should apply oneself to the practice by not releasing one's own life-wind outward, but filling it well within and holding it by the practice of the vase breath. This is because, with the wind remaining within and nothing going out, the stream of nectar of all embodied beings, like the moon, is drawn in.

"By the peaceful he paralyzes." At the time of that very gaze, one should apply oneself to the practice by neither extending the wind outward or inward, nor drawing it in, but leaving one's own life-wind just as it is. This is because the life-winds of all beings, freed from movement, become paralyzed.

Now, in order to show the measure of the yogin's accomplishment, the text says, "Upon a moist tree he causes a fall," and so on. To master these four gazes, one meditates, recites, and offers the fire offering and so on according to the rite, and accomplishes them. First, signs of experience arise with regard to inanimate substances, and the samādhi is said to become stable. Therefore the text says, "Upon a moist tree he causes a fall," and so on. Having become practiced in the application of killing, the yogin first, as the wind goes out, looks with the gaze of killing at a tree that is moist and sits there with branches and leaves. When it dries up, then, at that very time, he should apply it to the unruly one as well. This is the meaning.

"The powerful one is renowned for flowers." Likewise, when one possessed of the gaze and wind looks at a flower and it dries up, one should apply it. This is the meaning.

"Summoning upon the vajra tree." Likewise, when one possessed of the gaze and the wind looks at a very hard and rough tree called the vajra tree, and it bends down like a well-ripened ear of grain, one should apply it. This is the meaning.

"Paralyzing what is moving and unsteady." Likewise, when one possessed of the gaze and the wind looks at the peaks of high hills, mountains, and the like, and at the finest, softest blades of grass growing there, so delicate that a mere horsehair's tip of wind sets them swaying greatly, and they no longer sway in the wind, one should apply it. This is the meaning.

The definite point here is what the root tantra says. The yogin who possesses the life-wind together with the awakening mind is able to kill with his own body. Likewise, when both life-winds are under his control, he is able to summon his own awakening mind as it is. And likewise, when he has paralyzed both life-winds and they do not move, he turns them like a wheel upon the outer and inner self. Otherwise, it would become a laughingstock to the worldly, and so it is definite that this should not be done.

Now, in order to show the time for accomplishing the union, it is said: "By the union practiced for six months, accomplishment will come about; of this there is no doubt. Do not be deluded about this, for the miraculous power of the buddhas is beyond thought." This means that if one remains without interruption for six months, and, having settled at the limit, acts with the six limbs according to the instruction of the master, one will succeed. This expression "six months" is taught as a common principle of all the tantras. Therefore those who first accomplish the four kinds of activity within their own body, and so tame beings, act in accordance with what is definitive according to the Tathāgatas; hence one should abandon delusion and doubt about this. That is the meaning.

"Having accomplished the four glances, the wise one should subdue beings. These should not be killed, for the pledge would certainly be broken." The meaning is this: the actions such as killing that are taught are only meant for the time being to frighten beings, in order to tame them, and through that they may also be drawn in. Otherwise, if one were truly and definitively to kill, the pledge of the great seal would be broken and one would go to the Avīci hell. Therefore, as the definitive meaning, the four kinds of activity are taught to be accomplished within one's own body. And so it says: "Having abandoned deceiving beings, one may do all that is not to be done. But by merely harming beings, the accomplishment of the seal will not be found." That is, to say nothing of killing and the like, even merely taking up and remaining in some means of deceiving anyone deceives all beings; through that the pledge is broken and one falls away from the accomplishment of the seal endowed with the supreme of all aspects. That is the meaning.

Now, in order to teach the pledges concerning eating, guarding, and so on for practitioners: "There one should eat the pledge substances: the na, the ga, the ha at first, the final śva, and the first śva. For the accomplishment of Hevajra, eat likewise the five nectars." Those who abide in the pledge of Hevajra should eat and keep these, distinguishing outer and inner. Here na is the first letter of the word for man; ga is the first letter of the word for cow; ha is the first letter of the word for elephant; śva is the final letter in the word for horse; and likewise śva is the first letter of the word for dog. Having made these substances equal in measure, one forms a pill the size of a thumb joint, purifies it, multiplies it, and blazes it, and, making it nectar, eats it; this becomes the outer accomplishment. Likewise, inwardly, it is taught that the senses such as the eyes, which have the names "head" and so on, are turned back from their objects and made to abide; thus the supreme accomplishment comes about. Likewise the five nectars, namely bi, mu, ma, ra, and śu, are also to be used outwardly and inwardly; this is the Tathāgata's command.

"The one endowed with the characteristics taught in the Hevajra: it is marked out from the seventh birth. In particular, delighting in reproach, the seventh time brings accomplishment." This shows the provisional and definitive meanings openly. However, in order to make clear what has not been shown, namely the characteristics of one in her seventh birth, it is said: "A pleasing voice and eyes, a body of fragrance, great radiance; her shadow becomes seven. Seeing this, the yogī recognizes her." That is, whichever woman has a lovely voice, long eyes with the white and dark clearly distinguished, a body like musk and a fragrance like camphor, great radiance, and a shadow that becomes seven, is to be recognized and understood as one in her seventh birth. Having found such a one, the yogī forms a pill the size of a mustard seed and eats it, and so moves in the sky and seeks for countless eons. By such a body of karmic maturation, even those who committed the sins of immediate retribution, and those who have fallen from the special bliss of the dharmadhātu, are said to be purified by that very body. Therefore it says: "Merely by eating it, in an instant one becomes a sky-goer."

Now, to describe the accomplishment of the goddess made as the family: "I shall explain the means of accomplishment of Kurukullā," and so on. This too is taught in the root tantra: "Beings of the three existences, deluded by attachment, to subdue them, the Blessed Hevajra brought the world under his power in the form of a woman." The Blessed One himself showed his body in the manner of passionate red and so drew beings in. "Whatever was taught at length in the twelve chapters is gathered here in brief." Here the protection wheel, the celestial palace, the seven hanging ornaments, the generation from the five wisdoms, and so on rest on being accomplished just as they were taught earlier, at the time of accomplishing Hevajra himself. Here it should be understood that only the seed syllable, color, hand emblems, and seat of the goddess are shown: "The goddess arising from the syllable HRĪḤ, red in color, four-armed, holding in her hands arrow and bow, likewise an utpala and an iron hook. Merely by meditating on her, one brings the three worlds under one's power."

Specifically, the seed syllable that generates Hevajra is HŪṂ, and likewise the syllable that generates Nairātmyā and the others is OM; here, however, she is generated from HRĪḤ and her very nature is to utter the sound HRĪḤ from her mouth. First, from the syllable HRĪḤ transformed entirely, there is an utpala; into it the Tathāgatas are dissolved; from this arises the red goddess in a half-seated posture, four-armed. In the first two hands she holds the bow and arrow of utpala flowers, and in the others an utpala and an iron hook. Her body is adorned with a garland of half a hundred human heads, her crown ornament has five segments with a topknot and a crescent moon, and her red hair stands upward. Having visualized her thus, and with attention joined with recitation of OM KURUKULLE HRĪḤ SVĀHĀ, one will succeed in six months. If one recites according to the rite for a hundred thousand of the syllables' count, it will certainly bring about liberation, and one should perform the ten fire offerings.

As for these rites when done for ordinary purposes, it is as follows. With one hundred thousand repetitions one brings kings under one's power; with ten thousand, ordinary worldly people; with ten million, cattle, yakṣas and the like; with seven hundred thousand, the asuras; with two hundred thousand, the gods themselves; and with one hundred thousand, the holders of mantra. The words "brings under one's power" are to be joined to every line. In every case the fire offering is to be made at one tenth of the number of recitations. If one practices endowed with the gaze and with the conduct that is allied to the vital breath, one succeeds; otherwise one becomes a laughingstock to worldly people.

Here, "Ku" is great bliss. "Ru" is the complete enjoyment. "Ku" is the Dharma. And "Lle" is to be understood as the emanation. By the stages thus taught, one will tame beings.

This is also said in the tantra called the Accomplishment of the Wisdom of Higher Knowledge of the Lotus Family: "Having aroused passion as higher knowledge, and having meditated in perfect equipoise, one becomes master of the five higher knowledges and attains pure accomplishment. So spoke the Blessed Vajra-Holder." Likewise, in the tantra called the Accomplishment of the Wisdom of Great Awakening of the Lotus Family, it is said: "Lord of the World, dwelling in samādhi, through the Dharma mudrā, if one meditates on this wisdom of great awakening, one attains accomplishment. So spoke the Blessed Avalokiteśvara." Therefore yogins who are devoted to taming beings should practice in reliance on this goddess.

In the phrase "the Ḍākinī Network of Vows of Hevajra," the words "Hevajra" and "vajra" have been explained at length above. "Ḍākinī" is the name given to one who possesses a samādhi like space. "Network" means an assemblage, applied to those who are many.

As for "the chapter on the manifest awakening of Vajragarbha": the five hundred thousand verses of the root tantra of Hevajra rest on two chapters, first the chapter requested by Vajragarbha, and afterwards the chapter requested by Nairātmyā. This abridged tantra too is to be understood in that way. Up to this point, the intention is largely the request made by Vajragarbha, but it does not actually rest on Vajragarbha. For Vajragarbha appears and is hidden as the gatherer of the great secret of all the Tathāgatas of the three times, and he is also taught and prophesied as the Lord of Secrets. Therefore these words refer to the majority of the text. And in the second chapter there is nothing that was not requested.

Here ends the extensive commentary on the definitive meaning of Hevajra, namely the explanation of the gaze, and the explanation of the accomplishment of Kuru Kulle, which is the commentary on the eleventh chapter, together with the complete presentation, without omission, of the whole extensive commentary on the first chapter, called the manifest awakening of Vajragarbha.

You who have no body of emptiness and yet possess a body like a vajra, Hevajra, I pay homage to you. Seeing these three worlds oppressed by the thick darkness of ignorance, my heart melts. Therefore Vajragarbha writes the extensive explanation of the chapter on consecration.

Now the extensive commentary on the second chapter is to be taught. First, in order to present well the general characteristics of all consecrations, the text says "Vajragarbha requested," and so on.

The words "Blessed One" are an address to the Blessed One. "I am Vajragarbha, in whom all the buddhas are gathered as one." This means: I am Vajragarbha, whose very nature is the speech of all the buddhas gathered into one. In truth, the meaning is that he is the Lord of Secrets, permitted and praised by the Tathāgatas of the three times.

"Please explain in due order the excellent characteristics of consecration." This means: earlier the Blessed One taught the maṇḍala for the purpose of leading disciples into the maṇḍala; how should the consecration of what was taught be done?

The Blessed One declared: "Having made the fire offering as prescribed, and having raised the supreme maṇḍala..." Here, for the sake of a disciple of the mantra-holding master, and for one who wishes to consecrate a book, a relic, or a painted image, first one performs a fire offering such as the enriching one. Then one draws the colored-powder maṇḍala appropriate to the family. Then one abides in the preparatory stage. The buddhas dwelling in the realm of space are made to dissolve into the base of consecration, and that base of consecration is purified. Then, at the earlier stage, the form of the image is purified. As it is said: "Having abided in the preparatory stage, cause all the buddhas who dwell in space to enter fully into the heart of the image."

The definitive meaning of this is as the root tantra says: "In the preparatory stage granted by the guru, abide in the center of the body maṇḍala. Offer one's five aggregates in the fire offering, and cause the buddhas to dissolve in the form of seminal essence. One's five aggregates are purified as the form of the deity. The supreme blessing for consecration remains for a long time and is of great blessing. This is the supreme consecration." This is the definitive meaning.

"The yogin who is equal to the deity of his own choice has gone to the far shore of all mantras." This means: having performed the consecration in this manner, the yogin is equal to his chosen deity, Hevajra, and has reached the far shore of all mantras.

Oṃ vajra-puṣpe āḥ hūṃ svāhā is for the flowers. Oṃ vajra-dhūpe āḥ hūṃ svāhā, for the incense. Oṃ vajra-dīpe āḥ hūṃ svāhā, for the lamp. Oṃ vajra-gandhe āḥ hūṃ svāhā, for the perfume. Oṃ vajra-naivedye āḥ hūṃ svāhā, for the food offering.

Then the various offerings arise from HŪṂ, and flowers and the rest are presented. This is the order of rites in the higher tantra. The water for the face and the water for the feet are presented as above.

Here, what is presented after being blessed by one's own mantra is the Tathāgata himself. As for the definitive meaning, the root tantra says:

The pleasing flowers are the sun and moon;
the incense is moral discipline without matted locks;
the lamp is the clarity of bliss;
the supreme fragrance is satisfaction in bliss;
the body, speech and mind increase in bliss,
and absorption is the food, the supreme food offering;
gentle and pleasing speech, and one's own life-breath, is the sweet sound of the cymbals.

This is the definitive meaning. Likewise, the water for bathing is the bliss of relying on the unspilled awakening mind, and the water for the feet is cooling, since it leads one to that very place of bliss.

Now, to teach the fire offering:

For pacifying, the fire pit is round,
at the forehead, the maṇḍala of water.
For enriching, it is square,
at the navel, the maṇḍala of earth.
For wrathful rites, it is triangular,
at the crown, the wheel whose nature is space.
In this very pit the rest is accomplished.

And for empowering, the fire pit is at the throat, belonging to the family of fire.
"A cubit and a half, above and below the pacifying one" and so on, down to "above and below the wrathful one," is taught according to the sound of the words; it is not said to have a definitive meaning.

Now, to show the differences of color:

For pacifying the color becomes white,
for enriching yellow, and likewise so.
For wrathful rites the color is black,
for empowering red is well known.

It is also said that colors should be made different according to the differences of the rite. Therefore, in this context all the fire pits should be changed to those colors. And so the colors should differ according to the four wheels.
Hence the white pacifying one belongs to the meditative state of water, at the forehead. The yellow enriching one belongs to the meditative state of earth, at the navel. The black wrathful one belongs to the meditative state of space, at the crown protuberance. The red empowering one belongs to the meditative state of fire, at the throat. Thus the sense is that, as with empowering one does magnetizing, and as with wrathful rites one does causing enmity and the like, the color and shape of the pit should not differ.

Now, to show the differences of the burnt substances:

For pacifying, sesame; for enriching, curds;
for wrathful rites, thorns, and likewise so.
For causing enmity and the like also thorns;
for empowering and magnetizing, utpala.

In order, then: for pacifying one first burns sesame; for enriching, first curds; for wrathful rites, first thorny wood is burned. Likewise for causing enmity and the like, first thorny wood. For empowering and magnetizing, first utpala is burned. The rest accords with the other rites.

Oṃ asnaye mahā-tejaḥ, sarva-kāmārtha-sādhakaḥ, kāruṇa-kṛtvā sattvārtha, asmin sannihito bhava. This is the mantra for inviting the fire god, both worldly and transcendent. Inwardly, the invitation is from the navel.

"I hold various jewels. O Hevajra, goddess who is offered to in wrath, you will come under my power. I draw my maṇḍala, O Cege-mo." These are words spoken at the very beginning, when one searches for a site for the fire offering and finds ground free of disease, requesting the earth goddess to be witness and guarantor.

Svārthañ ceva, parārthañ ca, sādhi-dhaṃ gaccha hyabhuka, āgamiṣyasi, yathā kāle, sarva-siddhi kuruṣā me. This is a praise to please the deity, by way of accomplishing the aims of both oneself and others.

Jaḥ HŪṂ BAṂ HOḥ. A kha raṃ. Oṃ ni ri HŪṂ khaṃ. Oṃ dhvaṃ dhvaṃ. The mantras such as these, in order, belong to the offering water, the water for the feet, and the food offerings, and they should be distinguished as outer and inner.

The definitive meaning of the Hevajra ḍākinī net and the vows has already been explained earlier. This is the first, the extensive explanation of the chapter on consecration, the second examination, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Having bowed to the Sage, the supreme being, who destroys attachment, aversion and delusion, craving and envy,
by which chapter is the establishing of accomplishment extensively explained?

For beings confused in the darkness of suffering, the extensive explanation of that will be written by Vajragarbha.

Now I shall explain the chapter that well teaches the accomplishments, worldly and transcendent.

Vajragarbha asked:

From phenomena that are like space,
like the waves of the ocean,
how will beings come to accomplishment from the form of the deity of one's choice?

The meaning is this. The Blessed One has said again and again, at the beginning, the end and throughout, that phenomena are like space. Vajragarbha asked: "If I have understood, these beings are produced by their own conceptual thought. Just as when someone casts a thousand waves upon the great ocean and they drift without settling in any one place, so these beings abide, set in motion by their own conceptual thought. By what means of practice will they come to accomplishment?"

The Blessed One said:

One who possesses the yoga of Nairātmyā, or the glorious, diligent Heruka, should not, desiring accomplishment, dwell for even an instant with any other mind.

This means: O Vajragarbha, though it is so, the yogī who stands in the first stage of the work enters the maṇḍala as taught, and at the time of generating the pride of the deity, and then, when that is fully complete, if he dwells in the yoga of Nairātmyā, he will certainly become Hevajra. Therefore, one desiring accomplishment should not dwell for even an instant with any other mind, apart from relying on the two stages.

Moreover, the beginner first dwells clinging to color and shape. When that has reached its end, he should train in the yoga of Nairātmyā. And what is she like?

Just as space is not constantly present in all its directions, so the Lord of Secret Mantra does not dwell in any phenomena.
Just as things dwell in space and are always visible,
yet space does not become their dwelling,
so too is the Lord of Secret Mantra.

Like space, and the three times, and the rest, which one wishes to be free of conditions, so too the Lord of Secret Mantra appears even though the three times do not exist. He is only a place of mere designation, free of any agent and the like. The wise apply the conventional term "space" to space. Apart from the name, nothing exists at all, just as with space. So too the Lord of Secret Mantra is no more than a conventional appearance.

He is not fire, not water, not wind, not earth, not the sun, not the moon or any of the planets, not day and not night. He is not birth and not aging, not death and not decline. He is not a moment, not an instant, not the years and the rest. Destruction and formation do not exist, nor does any count of aeons. Nor does any fruit that arises from virtue and non-virtue exist.

Whoever wishes for the state of omniscience, in the midst of the many kinds of conceptual thought, should always strive at that in which all these are absent. Thus it was taught.

Therefore, those who are able to remain constantly in this yoga of Nairātmyā always see Hevajra.

When one first begins to practice, the place that is praised, where the mind can be settled in one-pointed equipoise and accomplishment arises, is declared to be an excellent place. This means that the beginner, since kings, thieves, enemies and the like may at first cause interruptions, should seek out a secluded place and there be single-pointed; this is the certainty of the Tathāgatas.

At night, in one's own house, with the confidence of one who has already accomplished, one meditates on the yoginī, the wise one, or else on Heruka, of glorious form. This means that one may imagine, as in the night, a beloved companion of one's own, profoundly cultivated through conceptual imagining, and lead her to the place of meditation and remain there; or else, in the manner of the hero Heruka, one should remain with Nairātmyā, who arises from oneself. Such is the meaning. Thus, in a summarized way, it was taught: washing the feet, eating, and so on, up to the words "by one who keeps the discipline of wisdom."

In brief: whatever one focuses on closely, make that Hevajra. In any other manner, one should not remain even for an instant.

"Meditate on the yoginī" refers to the wisdom-yoginī taught above. Why is that which is by nature empty called "wisdom"? As it was said: that which is called the emergence of wisdom is known as samādhi; by it the mudrā is quickly accomplished, and if one meditates, it will be accomplished quickly. Thus it was taught. Therefore: in any other way, even for an instant, a malicious mind, through ignorance, is something that the wise, wishing for accomplishment, strive not to remain in for the sake of accomplishment. This should be understood from what was taught. By this it is shown that all the qualities of a buddha depend on diligence.

As for the fortunate one, once the yoga of generation is complete, he is gathered in by the first of the six limbs, withdrawal, the fire of correct wisdom, and when he practices it, these signs will arise. But if one does not wish for the true path, then even for the sake of a spectacle, one should rest one-pointedly in focus for half a month, or else for one day and night, and look. Thus it was taught, as follows:

The meditation that destroys the afflictions I, Vajragarbha, have explained. Out of love, and for the sake of accomplishment, understand it in half a month.

Here is taught the meditation on selflessness, which destroys all the poison of the arrows of latent tendencies. The meaning is: "O Vajragarbha, whose nature is love, realize it in half a month, even as a spectacle."

If one does not make an effort even for half a month, then even so:

Abandoning all thoughts, thinking of the form of the deity, without interruption for a day and night, meditate and examine.

This was taught. Those who lack the fortune to make an effort of half a month at this yoga of Nairātmyā should give up striving at other objects of focus, even for a single day and night, and if they place the mind one-pointedly on emptiness, the signs of the path that inspire confidence will arise. This holds for those gathered in by withdrawal; otherwise, children of confused wisdom would come to despise the word of the Tathāgata. Therefore, apart from the samādhi of withdrawal, meditating for a day and night while abandoning all thoughts does not bring about confidence.

"For the thorough accomplishment of one's own and others' aims, there is no other means in saṃsāra." This means that, in the definitive sense, apart from this samādhi, the aims of oneself and others are not accomplished.

"Having once cultivated the woman of awareness, one has confidence at once." By this it is meant that such a samādhi, which destroys all afflictions, is indicated by the kindness of the guru, through a woman who is for the time being designated by the name "wisdom"; otherwise there is no fortune of finding it.

For those who have thus directly found it, and later abandoned it and focus on the form of a deity, it was taught: terror and madness, likewise suffering, being tormented by grief, and strong attachment, aversion and delusion are not afflictions for the practitioner. That is, he is not utterly tormented by worldly conditions.

Moreover, likewise: since it is known with certainty now that the fruits of benefit and harm will arise, why should yogis remain in lamentation for even an instant? This was taught. For one who realizes things as pure by nature, how could lamentation and torment arise? That is not a place for it, and there is no occasion for it. Such is the meaning.

Likewise, there is yet another teaching on what one should abide in: those who commit the acts of immediate retribution, those who delight in killing living beings, those of low birth, the deluded, those who do evil deeds, those whose bodies are deformed or incomplete, if they meditate, these will be accomplished. This was taught. Even these people, if they meditate on Nairātmyā, will assuredly attain the accomplishment of Hevajra; this is the certainty of the Tathāgatas.

Elsewhere also it was taught thus: outcastes, washerwomen, and the like, those who commit the five acts of immediate retribution, having practiced the conduct of mantra, become buddhas in this very life.

Now, those who are beginners in the practice should first, at the time of entering the guru's following, be taught by these lines: "One who is practiced in the ten virtues, devoted to the guru, with the senses tamed, and free from pride and anger, will for the present be certain to succeed." Accordingly, the time of the ruin is to be understood through the words "First the restoration ceremony should be taught," and so on. They should practice as the tantra says in following the guru, and it is said that they will be certain not to incur the root downfalls and will be a suitable vessel. So these are what one should train in first.

After that, one trains in what is called "guiding the childish worldly ones" and abides in it. Later, the vajra master examines the consort, or else one takes the mudrā of an action that a deity has prophesied. At the time of guiding the childish, it is said: "By the yoga of constant familiarity, through meditative equipoise one attains accomplishment. For one month, practice in secret, as long as a consort has not been found." This means that as long as permission for a consort has not been found, one practices in secret, abiding in the equipoise taught above. This may last a month, or a year, and so forth, but the minimum, one month of training, is fixed.

"When permission is found, the yoginī should instruct the mantrin. Taking the consort, a Cegemo, one holds the vajra for the benefit of beings." In such passages the meaning is this: if she is indicated in a dream, or if she has been well examined by the master, one takes her and engages in the practice. That it becomes for the benefit of beings is the certainty of the Tathāgatas.

As for the one who is found: "Wide-eyed, adorned with beauty and youth, endowed with Siṃhala camphor, purified by the awakening mind." This teaches the characteristics of the consort. She has eyes whose white and red are distinct and somewhat wide, a waist like a vajra, and is twelve or sixteen years old, at the time of the onset of menstrual blood, delighting in the bliss of the awakening mind. Such a consort too is to be purified, though purification by introducing the awakening mind comes later. Before that: "Beginning from the ten virtues, the Dharma is taught to her; she contemplates herself in the form of the deity, and the commitment and mind are one." And it is said: "Any woman who is not purified and is joined to Hevajra violates the commitment and is ruined; therefore the Dharma should be taught to purify them."

Therefore, having trained the woman well and having her imagine herself as Nairātmyā, one leads her to a secluded place. Training in the bliss of the ruin comes at the end of the month. Hence: "If one finds a supreme woman free of all conceptual thought, within one month one will become fortunate; of this there is no doubt." On this: having found such a woman well, one settles in the center of the assembly, prepares many kinds of food and drink, songs, cymbals and dances, adorns the body well with ornaments, flowers and perfumes, arranged well in an auspicious place, and makes true wisdom appear.

Or else: "By one's own power, one summons and examines consorts from among gods, asuras, humans, yakṣas, and kinnaras." This is taught thus: for accomplishing the success of the consort, the daughters of gods, of asuras, and of humans, four kinds, are summoned by mantra from everywhere and practiced with throughout the whole maṇḍala of the earth. Thereby the fortunate yogī will accomplish the consort without fail. The body of a woman who is unclean, rotten, and stained is not suitable. This is the meaning of the words.

"Take her and engage in the practice, having made one's own leisure manifest. The conduct taught by those of terrifying form is not taught for the sake of enjoyment. Examine individually your own mind, whether it is steady or wavering." Concerning this: "This is the greedy childish one who acts carelessly with intoxicating drink, who abandons the nectar drink, and clings intensely to changing pleasure; who makes a living by mantra and consorts.

This improper conduct, together with the empowerments and the all-pervading conduct, is said to be a cause of relying on one's own mind. Those who rely on mere convention and perform the ten non-virtuous actions, what destinies they will have, how could even a guide know?" Such is the meaning.

Now, to show that future childish beings become buddhas by means of the two faculties, women too should practice the empowerment and the conduct. In order to show how the accomplishment and conduct of the inner consort are to be taught, the question was asked. Vajragarbha asked: "How is the consort spoken of by one endowed with the yoga of Nairātmyā? By the two consorts, how does the accomplishment of the consort come about?" The meaning is: how should a woman endowed with the yoga of Nairātmyā accomplish the bliss of the consort? And if it arises only from a woman, then the accomplishment of method would be lacking. So he asked.

The Blessed One declared: "Abandoning the form of a woman, make it the form of the Blessed One." This means that women beginners should entirely give up the conception of themselves as women and put their faith in themselves as Hevajra in person. Likewise: "Abandoning the breasts, they become a bola; the kakkola is rightly placed in the center; the two sides become bells." Any woman who enters into the power of bliss transforms herself into a male like Hevajra, discards the white breast-bearing form and turns it into the bola, and has faith in it with her mind. Thus, at the time of bliss, she who has the male form is endowed with the kakkola; likewise the young woman transforms the two sides of her own source into bells in her faith. And likewise: "The clitoris is transformed into the bola." This is stated to indicate that the object abiding in the center of the lotus is to be generated and examined as the rain of the secret.

Therefore the remainder is the great self itself, the form of the great joy, Heruka. Heruka is the very person of union. Regarding this, it is said that the elements, the sense sources, the remainder, and the rest are of equal taste with one another, being alike. Without any need for transformation, the person is Heruka himself; there is no difference. Thus, from transformation through devotion, the supreme accomplishment of the seal is purified, and it comes to women. So the great self himself has declared. Without any effort the practitioner becomes a man. Through the yogin who is able to make it clear, the accomplishment of the seal then comes about.

This too was spoken: "The yoginī who practices union in this way, having completely exchanged her womanhood, may even obtain in this very life a man's body, handsome and perfect in every excellence." Moreover, in order that monks who hold the vajra may abandon the faults of the worldly, the fact that some young women are transformed into men and become companions in practice is the Tathāgata's definitive teaching. In this way the supreme accomplishment of the seal is attained.

Then: "Neither attachment nor destruction harms means and wisdom. That from which means arises is itself; destruction is wisdom, which ends existence. Therefore there is no true destruction." Regarding this, by such a progression: the yogin who clearly establishes wisdom and means as nondual cannot be harmed when fire, water, and the rest destroy the world. This habitual tendency toward destruction and formation is one's own imputation. This conceptualization of self and other as parts agitates the three worlds. It does not make this clarity disturbed. If one safeguards well the formation and destruction of the world of awakening mind, the great yogin is never destroyed; he moves everywhere like one governed by a wheel. He has no attachment to that itself. Some are destroyed by destruction, but there is no destructible thing and no exhaustion. This means that when the stream of awakening mind is destroyed, all destruction arises.

From the yoga of the generation stage, one meditates the elaboration of the one who keeps the vow. Having made elaboration like a dream, one makes elaboration itself free of elaboration. Regarding this, beginning from a single deity up to a hundred thousand, one should train in the manner taught in each of the tantras, strive, and have faith. As it is said: "Whatever color is taught by whomever, that itself is the maṇḍala of that deity; the forms of the deities are shown thus by the buddhas of the past." Therefore one should strive at the very beginning in the yoga of elaboration.

And as it is said: "Beings are of lesser intellect, deluded by mere activity, and attached to and delighting in the objects of things. Such will arise in the future. Not knowing this manner, because of place, time, and activity, deluded by the signs of virtue and nonvirtue, they desire results. Therefore the great beings have taught this ritual." So it is said.

"Just as when a stream of rain falls, bubbles of water arise, so too the various manifestations of mantra accomplishment have no sentient being, no life, and no agent. All things being empty, only delusion appears." By this one should realize the completion stage.

"Just as illusion, dream, and the intermediate state of existence are, so too is the maṇḍala regarded, through constant familiarization in practice." Regarding this, this completion is just this maṇḍala of one's own deity; like illusion, dream, and the being of the intermediate state, meditating free of attachment and obstruction is itself regarded as completion. Because it is the separate abandoning of desires, it is called "separate abandoning," and so on, as is extensively taught.

"By the empowerment of the great seal, the great bliss that is known thus: this is its blessing. No maṇḍala arises from anything else." That is, knowing things as like illusion, dream, and so on is itself what is called the great seal, the empowerment that liberates from worldly conduct, the Great Illusory Mother, and the Perfection of Wisdom.

For the sake of knowing this itself: "Black bliss, yellow bliss, red bliss, white bliss, green bliss, dedicated bliss, bliss moving and unmoving, all of it; wisdom bliss and means bliss." This and what follows is spoken. From the distinction of provisional and definitive meaning, in order to abandon attachment to elaboration, one generates the maṇḍala colors again and again. Activities and the rest also come to be accomplished, and these too are the six great Vajradharas. Otherwise, "wisdom, the great fire of gnosis," and so on, is taught as the sign of the path, as smoke and the like, because the bliss of withdrawal itself appears in that way. For while in bliss, at the very time of the seed's bliss, whatever form, color, moving or unmoving is observed is not seen as other than bliss.

Likewise: "Bliss that arises everywhere; bliss that is real and bliss that is unreal; bliss is declared to be Vajrasattva." Therefore, for those burned by the fire of desire, the bliss of universal arising is taught as supreme, because by its nature of being real and unreal it brings about the bliss of Vajrasattva. For those who do not waver, it is the bliss of Vajrasattva as it truly is.

Now, to resolve the intention of the statement, "Elaboration is like a dream, and the completion stage should be known," Vajragarbha asks: "This yoga of the completion stage, its bliss is called great bliss. Since there is no meditation on completion, what need is there of generation?" Regarding this, the meaning is: O Blessed One, if buddhahood is through the bliss of the two faculties alone, there is no other meditation of completion; so what need is there of a maṇḍala other than that, or of binding seals?

The Blessed One, the great Hevajra, heard those words and said:

Ema! Great bodhisattva, listen with the force of faith.

If the conventional body had no reality at all, there would be no power to teach what is called great bliss. For that reason he spoke the lines beginning "From what does bliss arise, if the body has no reality?" The meaning of the lines beginning "By what delusion do I not know?" is taught at length in the chapter that settles method and wisdom with certainty. Thus, if the body itself were nonexistent, the bliss that depends upon it would not exist either. Therefore it is said:

The bhaga of the vajra consort,
Its form the shape of the syllable E,
The buddha-jewel, a flower of enjoyment,
Ever dwells within the blissful one.

And again:

Consorts of the four castes and the rest
Give birth to a wondrous daughter.
The bhaga, the place of birth, has the form of E;
The male organ has the shape of the syllable Vam.
Their union is known as the secret place,
And the semen that abides in their midst
The guide has called "buddha."

Thus, so long as there is the body of man and woman, there is great bliss.

The lines "The speaker am I, the Dharma am I, the assembly of listeners am I, the world's teacher and the one to be accomplished am I, the world and the beyond-world am I" refute those foolish people who suppose that, in the buddha, a consort, sensual pleasure, a gathered retinue, reliance on the Dharma, a teacher, listeners and so on, and the teaching of desire must definitely exist. It is to be understood that the sport of the buddha is shown so that future beings may realize it, and that in truth the buddha has a body like a vajra and is unmoving like an elephant. Even so, it is taught that the buddha arises from one's own body; for the vajra-like body, endowed with the major and minor marks, is likewise born in dependence on semen.

The text says:

The nature of innate joy,
Ending in the supreme of the first, free of joy,

Like a lamp in the darkness,
So too, though done, trust it with confidence.

This holy method, when one unites with the supreme consort and relies on the guru's instruction, is illustrated like a lamp lighting up darkness in the end of the first, supreme joy that is free of attachment. Thus:

The bhaga of the consort, the blissful one,
Is marked with the thirty-two signs of the Teacher.
The lord, endowed with the eighty minor marks,
Dwells in the form called semen.

The definitive meaning is also given in the root tantra:

"The lord adorned with the eighty minor marks and the rest is semen," it says.
With bliss that is stable and unemitting,
In ethical discipline that is without lapse,
Taking hold of the limit of the four dhyānas,
This radiant flower of the mind,
Not carried off by the wind,
Is bound, and so comes to bear the minor marks.

So it is taught in its definitive meaning.

Thus, without a body there is no semen; and without semen, how could bliss be perceived at all? Then even what is called buddha would not exist. Hence it is said:

Without that, there is no bliss;
Without bliss, there is no that.
Being without power, they depend on each other.

This was certainly taught by the Tathāgata.

Therefore what is called the perfect buddha is free from all conventions of existence and nonexistence. He has no face or color and so on, and is not a form of bliss. The four joys, the four wheels, the four moments, the four results, the four empowerments, the four stages, and so on; the bliss of man and woman; the channels, the winds, the drops, the fragment of the moon, and sounds and words and so on, none of these is the buddha. Whatever was taught in these ways was taught for beings hard to tame. For that reason the bliss of the two organs was also taught, and the phrase "the nature of the innate buddha" does not refer to the innate nature of semen; rather, the innate that abides as nature is what is called buddha.

Bliss comes from the yoga of the deity;
Therefore the buddha is not a thing,
Nor is he the manner of a nonthing.
Having the form of faces and arms,
He is supreme bliss, without form,
Innate to all beings alike.

Because bliss pervades everything, and because the innate nature pervades everything, he spoke thus. To bring about the realization of these things, seeing no other means, he praised this very form of the conventional as supreme. Hence the bliss that arises from effort is not innate, since it is adventitious, like autumn flowers and the like. For this reason too he said, "It is called the innate nature." What is other than that is a mere illustration, given to lead the childish into the teaching.

As for the line "By a mind of pure aspect, its nature is nirvāṇa itself": this is because the generation stage is by nature pure from the very beginning. Then what kind of samādhi is the generation stage to perform? He spoke the lines:

In the form of the deity's body,
Faces, arms, and colors abide;
They remain merely by being generated,
Yet with ordinary habitual tendencies.

Thus, although from the beginning it is by its very nature free, since the childish have no fortune to realize this, by showing the deity with faces, arms, and colors through ordinary habitual tendencies, the childish become liberated, and not otherwise.

Likewise, examples are plainly visible in the world:

By a mere fragment of poison,
All beings come to die.

This is directly established for worldly people. Likewise:

One who knows the very nature of poison
Destroys poison with poison.

This too is directly established for worldly people. For some person who knows poison mantras and medicines blesses a portion of poison and eats it, and it does no harm; and further, it becomes a basis for benefit in certain illnesses.

In the same way, other powers are also plainly visible. As it is said:

For example, when a wind disorder arises,
one eats a dish of lentils and beans;
but by examining the remedy that reverses it, wind is used to strike down wind.

What this means is as follows. If someone afflicted by a wind disorder is given a broth of lentils and beans as food and drink, the illness will for a time grow worse. Afterward, a physician who knows how to destroy that very illness has butter and the like clarified seven times, mixes it with the powder of the three fruits, and gives it as food, and so uproots the wind disorder.

Just as in this example, it is said:

By conceptual thought, conceptual thought,
and by existence itself, existence is overcome.

That is, the meditative absorption of the generation stage, which is by nature conceptual, first makes use of distinctive worldly conventions: the binding of hand gestures, the manner of sitting, the manner of gazing, the special features of the rosary, and so on. Afterward, through the qualities of what follows, the earlier ones are abandoned. This is the established order of each of the various tantras. Likewise, the Condensed Tantra itself says:

Joy, freedom from joy, and joy again are existence;
therefore meditate on the innate.

And again it is said:

For example, when water has entered the ear,
it is removed by other water.

When some drops of water remain deep in the ear canal, pouring in more water makes them come out again; this is plainly established for ordinary people. In the same way:

So too the conceptual thought about things is to be purified by conceptual thought of the mind.

That is, apart from the absorption of elaboration, the imagined dharma body, and the imagined parts of the body as the forms of deities, which have the character of existence, there is no means of becoming free. Another example plainly visible in the world is this:

For example, when one is burned by fire,
one is scorched again by fire as before.

When a limb is burned by fire, some foolish and unskilled people at that very instant touch something unsuitable, such as water, and so do further harm. In the same way:

Thus one burned by the fire of desire is scorched again by the fire of desire.
By whatever unbearable deeds beings are bound,
by those very same, together with skillful means,
they are freed from the bonds of existence.

The meaning of this is also given in the root tantra:

Desire and the other afflictions bind all people, it is said.
What the hero and guide taught was spoken of the person without skillful means.
For the person who has skillful means,
by that very thing he is freed,
as the great lord of sweetness again declared.
The means for this are these.

That is, those people of the three worlds who are attached are rendered unworthy even of their own splendid possessions by desire itself, and what keeps them in saṃsāra is just this. Since they lack reality, they are like someone riding a maddened elephant without a mahout holding the iron hook. Therefore it is said:

The world is bound by attachment, and by desire itself it is liberated.

Through emission one is bound, whereas through the inexhaustible bliss without emission one is freed. Thus, wherever the Tathāgata spoke in blame, he meant the emitting kind; wherever he spoke in praise, he meant just such unchanging bliss. This very unchanging attachment is not the domain of the yoga of the immature. As it is said:

This meditation of reversal is not known to buddhists or non-Buddhists.

Why? Because in an instant it becomes the nature of the Tathāgatas. Hence it is said:

Because they are of the nature of the five elements.

For in the very instant that desire arises, it takes on the nature of the five elements. How so?

All become five.

This is the time of union. It is said:

From one single great joy
it comes to divide into five kinds.

At the time of a single great joy, luminous like space, five distinct phases arise in the conventional world. As it is said:

By the union of bo la and kakkola.

This refers to the time of the joining of vajra and lotus. And where:

The very latency of hardness, hardness is delusion, for the sake of the Dharma;
delusion is called Vairocana.

For in that instant there is solidity, and hardness is the earth element; therefore that instant is called Vairocana. Likewise:

The awakening mind, being moist,
is declared to be the water element.
Aversion, the guide, is Akṣobhya.

Akṣobhya is the deed, and the defining mark of moistness is the water element. Likewise, at the time of the union of the two, the heat that arises is Amitābha, Boundless Light:

Because desire arises from heat.

That heat of desire is the fire element. Likewise:

In kakkola, whatever is the mind,
that is of the nature of wind.
Envy is Amoghasiddhi; Amogha arises from wind.

The moving and falling of the drop at that time is the work of wind, and since wind accomplishes all aims, it is called as it is. Further:

The desire of bliss becomes blood.
Joy is the defining mark of space.
Space, avarice, becomes Vajra;
avarice arises from space.

In whatever instant, the bliss that arises in dependence on blood is the defining mark of Ratnasambhava, and the precious jewel is a quality of space. Thus wherever the single great mind of bliss is found, it certainly abides in the form of the five, and because it arises as the nature of the five families, it is not understood by buddhists or non-Buddhists, who grow frightened as before. And so:

From just those five families thousands upon thousands are born.

From those five principal families arise ordinary families beyond counting. Therefore the desires of desire too should be known as immeasurable. And those five families should also be shown as having the qualities of the throat, the palate, the crown, the lips, and the teeth.

Here it is. The vowels a, i, ṛ, u, and ḷ arise from five places of articulation and are regarded as five families. When these are modified by the vowel gradations, by augmentation, and by the suffix yaṇ, and are then divided into long and short, they can be multiplied without limit. To give just a brief indication: these things abide as part of method and part of wisdom, and these in turn are gathered into just the vowel series and the consonant series. The vowel series is five, taught as the five letters that arise from five places of articulation, exactly as stated above. When these same five are marked with the dot, they show the part of method. Six arise in the same way, and likewise the five are augmented by being cut off from those, so that there are again six, and these show the part of wisdom. In the same way, the consonants of some are thirty. Thus, when the thirty consonants are brought together with the six letters of method, they become one hundred and eighty, in one course. Again, when the thirty are brought together with the six letters of wisdom, they become one hundred and eighty, just as before, and so there are two courses. The two sets of one hundred and eighty, mingled in the manner of the non-duality of method and wisdom, make three hundred and sixty. Inwardly, this is the breath of one element; outwardly, it is the days of one year. When three hundred and sixty is multiplied by the five elements, it is eighteen hundred. And when this is multiplied by the twelve transits, that is, by the twelve months and twelve houses, it stands as what is called twenty-one thousand six hundred. Thus all the families come to arise from the five families. In this way, the first sixty of the twelve years, and likewise the months, days, hours, minutes, and breaths, when multiplied by the five kinds of elements, should be understood as families beyond counting. And so:

For this reason these are of one nature, supremely beneficial, great bliss.

Through the five minds, beginning with desire,
the division goes into five.

The sands of ten Ganges rivers,
in one family, are the assemblies of tathāgatas.

In the assembly of families, there are many families;
in these families, there are a hundred kinds of families;
and in these again, hundreds of thousands of great families.

In the tens of millions of families, the number becomes unlimited.

Among them, the families without number arise from the family of supreme joy.

This was spoken. Great bliss is the family of space, producing supreme benefit for all embodied beings. This uncontrived, innate reality has no other means of being known except the bliss of the union of the two organs, and so it is certainly secret from śrāvakas, solitary buddhas, and non-Buddhists.

This concludes the second chapter of the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra, the extensive explanation of the chapter called "Establishing Accomplishment."

I bow to the syllables Evaṃ, from which flows the continuum of the four joys.
The introduction of the tantra, in the secret language,
Vajragarbha writes as an extensive explanation.

Then the text says, "Then, to the yoginīs of the Vajra family, the method called the introduction to all the tantras was spoken," and so on. Here, the tantra is of four kinds: the teacher, the secret, wisdom, and gnosis. These four kinds are the tantra. The introduction refers to the history, the place, and the inseparable conduct. These methods are connected with the words "were spoken by the Blessed One." Likewise, in other places:

The vow, the empowerment,
likewise the symbolic language,

the joys and the division of the instants,
and other matters such as food.

The vow concerning these was spoken.

This is said as an indication. The Hevajra is the example. In the same way, for the benefit of future beings, the Blessed One spoke on all of these: what the vow of all the tantras is, what the empowerment is, how many joys there are, what the division of the instants is, and what the food of the yogin is like.

Concerning this:

The vow of all the buddhas is firmly established as Evaṃ.

The great bliss that has the form of Evaṃ becomes truly known through empowerment.

This meaning is also stated in the root tantra itself:

After I have passed into nirvāṇa,
so that śrāvakas and children may understand,
to Vajrapāṇi and the others,
at the beginning of the Dharma, the word Evaṃ.
"Be seated," he said, this is the provisional meaning.
I do not pass into nirvāṇa.
I have a body like a vajra.
At all times I abide,
and to children I show the passing away.

Such is the introduction of provisional meaning. As for the definitive meaning:

Evaṃ means father and mother.
Evaṃ is shown as sun and moon.
Evaṃ is blood and semen themselves.
Evaṃ is declared to be the liṅga and the source of birth.
Evaṃ is method and wisdom.
Evaṃ is the basis of all happiness and suffering.
E is the navel, vaṃ the crown.

This is the definitive meaning. Then the text says, "Then the yoginīs said this to the Blessed One Vajrasattva," which shows the literal sense.

Blessed Teacher, supreme among beings,
the very vow of the ḍākinīs,
what is the form of Evaṃ?
Please explain it in its proper order.

The meaning is this. The ḍākinīs, having summoned the Blessed One Hevajra, who has the nature of Vajrasattva, said: "We do not know the vow of the bliss of the ḍākinīs, nor how the meaning of the syllables Evaṃ is. Please explain this to us." Intending to answer, the Blessed One spoke, "What is the excellent form of E?" and so on. Thus: you yoginīs, beginning with Nairātmyā and Leaf-Clad One of the charnel ground, listen. E is the great secret of all the buddhas. It is within the middle of your own bodies, yoginīs, abiding in the form of a blazing triangle. In its center there dwells something like an excellent vase, which draws forth all the happiness of the three existences, adorned with a wish-fulfilling tree as its ornament and filled with stainless water.

Daughters of good family, this is
the excellent form of E, adorned in its center by the form of Vaṃ,
the abode of all happiness, called the treasure chest of buddha-jewels.

This is the basis and support of all the happiness of the three worlds, the abode of the vow of bliss of the yoginīs, and the foundation for the ascetics to guard their moral discipline. It is also called the palace of the jewel of bliss of the buddhas.

Therefore, even those who are beginners in the practice and who wish to attain buddhahood through the bliss of the union of the two should rely on this basis. If they divide it by means of the four moments and enter into it according to the guru's instruction, it is said that in this very life they will attain the state of the great Vajradhara. With this in mind the Blessed One also said:

From distinguishing the moments,
joy arises from that.
Knowing the moments, one knows bliss;
it is fully established in Evaṃ.

This shows the introduction and the summary. Now, in order to teach the four moments, the four joys, and so on, the text says: "The variegated, the ripening, the culminating, and the one free of characteristics." As the root tantra says:

By the difference between the forward order and the reverse order, thirty-two variegated moments abide.

When there are sixteen ripenings,
from the abiding of eight comes the culminating itself.

Of the sixteen, four abide as free of characteristics.

Earth and water and fire and wind should be known in order.

The forward order of arising is as follows:

it should be known as moving on the left.

The reverse order is the opposite of that;

thirty-two abide as free of characteristics.

It should be known as moving on the right.

Dependent origination is forward arising, and its reverse is the opposite.

The monk, the arhat, has exhausted the crag;

by eliminating attachment he has tamed the senses.

So it is said. Even so, "if the four moments are well understood, the yogī will know that very reality." For without knowing the distinctions among the four moments one does not arrive at suchness, since it is said, "As it is outside, so it is within."

"Embracing, kissing, and so on, are explained as the various variegated forms." That is, the moment of embracing is variegated. Likewise kissing, smiling, and so on, and scratching with the nails, biting, and the like, are all characteristics of the variegated. Ripening occurs afterward. Before it comes the culminating, which is the actual eating of the wisdom of bliss. Because bliss has been eaten, it is called ripening. It is also said, "the moment of the culminating is taken in."

The one free of characteristics is different from the other three, for it is free of eating, having eaten, and being taken in. This was taught mixed up within the tantra in order to prevent people from entering at will without a guru. Therefore it says:

The ripening is the reverse of that.

The wisdom of bliss is the eating itself;

the eating of bliss is by oneself.

Being taken in is called the culminating.

Being free of characteristics, it is other than the three.

Attachment and freedom from attachment are fully abandoned.

Thus it was spoken in the reversed manner in vajra words.

Now the four joys, which accompany the four moments, are explained:

The first, the variegated, is the joy itself;

it is shown at the wheel of the forehead.

At the eyebrows is the supreme joy;

it is shown at the wheel of the throat.

The culminating is the distinct joy;

it is declared at the wheel of the heart.

The one free of characteristics is the innate joy;

it is shown at the wheel of the navel.

By reversing the sequence, as before, being free of characteristics is great bliss.

The master, the secret, and wisdom, and the fourth is again the same.

Here: the water and the rest, ending with the vase, are the master's empowerment for introducing the child. The joy gained by receiving the secret is called the secret empowerment. Touching wisdom is the wisdom empowerment. The fourth is other than the three; since it says "likewise, again likewise," the fourth is not the third, and should be examined as something else. In the definitive sense this is explained as the empowerment of the vajra master. Thus the four empowerments are established as the worldly and the transworldly, the provisional and the definitive.

"The empowerments, by the count of four, should be known in the sequence of joy and so on." This should be understood as before, by the difference between forward and reverse order.

The joy gained through laughing:

in the laughing, the master himself.

The joy gained through gazing:

the gazing is the secret, likewise.

The joy gained through holding hands:

in holding hands, wisdom itself.

Bliss gained through giving of the two to the two:

the two embracing the two, likewise.

Thus the empowerments are of four kinds,

by the distinction of outer and inner.
The wise vajra master should show them to the supreme student.
For the accomplishment of sentient beings
the empowerments are explained as fourfold.
By what is called scattering and pouring this is to be called empowerment.

It is an empowerment because it purifies and washes, that is, it washes away the stains of the burning torment of the afflictions.

Now, in order to teach the inner empowerment of the master:

On one who has reached sixteen years of wisdom,
let him wash well with the hands.
By joining the vajra and bell together,
it is declared the master's empowerment.

That is: to one possessing the sixteen portions of the waxing moon of wisdom, through the joining of one's own vajra and its bell, bliss is certainly the master's empowerment. Likewise:

With a very fair face and wide eyes, adorned with form and youth,
with the thumb and ring finger let it be dropped into the student's mouth.

That is, the substance produced from such union purifies the path of the student's speech; this is the secret. After that the vajra master, having fully honored that wisdom consort with food, drink and so on, should entrust her to the student with these words:

Great being, you take this mudrā endowed with bliss.
Having abandoned jealousy and anger, knowing you will become a great student,
the Teacher gives him permission.

That is, he commands: "Son of the family, take this mudrā from whom arises the bliss of earth, water, fire and wind, and make offerings to her."
Furthermore, "Samantabhadra-like (Kun tu ru), hold the vajra." By this, the distinctive union of the kunduru should also be well shown to that student.

Likewise, the student should say this: "Having seen the guru together with the mudrā, one should offer praise and worship properly." As follows:

Blessed Great Peaceful One (Śiva), kye!
Vajra yogī, as you wish,
unseparated one, accomplisher of the mudrā, arising from the vajra yoga,
as your own nature is great,
so, Lord, act likewise for me.
In the mire of saṃsāra's swamps
I am sunk without refuge; protect me.

Thus the wise student should make the supplication to the guru, the vajra-holder. And with the best food and drink, beef, and if there is none, other things; likewise with incense, food offerings, garlands, bells, banners, perfumes and other offering substances, one should properly honor the vajra master.

After this, once the master is pleased and the disciple has set aside the momentary states of the various kinds, the master should speak again to that disciple as before, saying:

The Teacher said: Great being,
take hold of great bliss.
Until you reach awakening, hold the vajra for the sake of beings.

By this, the very reality is to be shown: the place of the vital point, whose nature is existence, and the state of existence that has been completely abandoned. After that, in order to cut off the disciple's wrong conceptions, the master should speak these words:

This itself is the great wisdom.
It abides in the body of all.
The manner of the two and of non-duality, of things and of non-things, is its very nature, its chief.
It abides, pervading the stable and the moving.

That is to say: "Son of good family, this, which has been practiced and sealed in utmost secrecy by all the buddhas of the three times, you must know to be present in your own body alone. Do not harbor doubt or hesitation about it elsewhere." Why so? Because the tantra called the Vajra Garland also says:

This changeless body of one's own is to be known by the one supreme.
Indicated through an example,
it is to be realized from the mouth of the master.

So the master should instruct: "Son of good family, for embodied beings it abides in the form of the seminal fluid." Likewise, that very seminal fluid should be taught in a manner that restrains true craving and points to it from afar. Again, as before, he should instruct with these words:

It is held to be of the nature of an illusory form.
By the method of the maṇḍala wheel
one is always surely liberated.

Here, sons of good family, although the seminal fluid abides in one's own body, it is not a bliss shared in common with all sentient beings. Therefore actual liberation does not come through it directly. If one thought that liberation came directly, that would contradict what is plainly seen. So, as the supreme method, one should first make preliminary preparations such as the maṇḍala of colored powder, the hand seals, and the taking of vows, and cultivate the contrived yoga. When sufficient time has passed, having fully understood the maṇḍala of the body and tasted the flavor of the essence, one is shown it in the proper way and becomes liberated. This should be taught.

The preceding words themselves make this clear. Then Vajragarbha, having asked forgiveness of the yoginīs such as Parṇaśabarī who were present with him, addressed the Blessed One as follows, and so on, down to the words "how should the stages be explained?" This shows what Vajragarbha asked. After that the Blessed One gave his answer, which is shown by the words:

The maṇḍala is called the essence.
The awakening mind is great bliss.

The essence is so called because it takes up the vital substance, holds it, and brings realization. Likewise it is called the wheel because life and the seminal drops circulate in the manner of earth, water and the other elements. This is shown by:

It is called the essence of the wheel.
The awakening mind is great bliss.

For the essence takes up the vital substance, holds it, and brings realization; and it is called the wheel because life and the seminal drops circulate in the manner of earth, water and the rest. Thus it is said:

The first is called the Ender (Antaka).

It is declared to be the gathered maṇḍala.

Wherever the life-wind and the seminal drops gather, that place is called the essence. Thus it is also said:

The wheel is called the element of space.

It purifies the objects and the rest.

To show a fitting example by which this may be known, it says: "the lotus of the place, the element of space." This is to be indicated by the time when the male organ and the lotus are joined with one another. Therefore it is said:

Through the union of bola, kakkola,
one will know its bliss.

Again, Vajragarbha asked the Blessed One how those who dwell in Hevajra should abide in their vows and pledges, and the Blessed One answered:

You should kill living beings,
for life is said to be mind.

Mind is wind and seminal fluid.

The killing of living beings is the mind alone,
and not otherwise, in that place.

You should also speak falsehood.

What is called "destroying the world" is proclaimed as the word of falsehood.

It is not that either; it is practiced otherwise.

Since one's own life-wind is heard,
all beings at once, by one cry,
to each and every one of them,
teach the fitting Dharma: this is the false word.

You should also take what is not given:

the queen's seminal fluid, not given,
the supreme woman who is one's own.

Take her though not given, not otherwise.

You should rely on another's woman.

Vajrasattva and others rely on another's woman
as supreme; otherwise,
she is not a woman endowed with stain.

By this the vows of definitive meaning are taught.

Next, the Blessed One taught that objects and subjects, the aggregates, the elements, the sense sources, and all of form, sound, smell, taste, tactile objects and the rest, being mutually gathered together, are themselves the wheel of the maṇḍala. The yoginīs did not understand the aspects of objects and subjects, of the aggregates, elements and sense sources, and so they put their question to the Blessed One. This is shown by the passage that begins "And what are these objects?" and ends "What is the nature of these?" To this the Blessed One replied. It is thus:

Form, sound, and likewise smell,
Taste, and likewise touch,
And the nature of the element of phenomena:
These are spoken of as the six objects.

This is what he declared. Of these, the object form is the syllable U, which arises from the lips. Sound is the syllable AH, which arises from the throat. Smell is the syllable A-LA, which arises from the teeth. Taste is the syllable AR, which arises from the crown of the head. Touch is the syllable E, which arises from the palate. And the element of phenomena is the syllable Ā, which arises from the throat. These six are the nature of the six objects. The six, A, I, Ṛ, U, LAṂ and AṂ, are those with the defining marks; and likewise the six, A, I, Ṛ, U, Ḳ and AḤ, are those with the manner of means and wisdom. Because these are established in what is external, in the body, and in everything else, whatever is taught as the six faculties, the six elements, the six aggregates and so on is of such a nature. In this way the six objects and the six faculties become the twelve sense sources, and likewise, by a division of the elements, the eighteen elements are established. The meaning is that these were taught as conventional things so that you yoginīs might understand.

If you ask what their nature is:

Their nature is unborn from the very beginning, Neither false nor true, and thus
All is like the moon in water.
Let the yoginī know it so from the beginning.

Here the meaning is this. By whom, how, and from where were these objects, faculties and the rest first produced? And at the end, by whom, how, and where do they perish? There is no one who produces them or destroys them, because they are pure by nature from the very beginning. The intent is: "You too should know it so."

For example, fire suddenly arises from the drilling stick, the base-board, and the effort of a man's hands. Yet that fire does not abide in the stick, nor in the base-board, nor in the man's hands. When sought in every way, it abides in none of them. That fire is neither true nor false. In just this way, yoginīs, you should reflect on all phenomena. Thus suchness is not the aggregates, nor the elements, nor the sense sources, nor the objects, and it is not to be sought as something apart from them. That is the meaning.

Then the yoginīs, Nairātmyā and the others, all the vajra ḍākinīs, took up the five nectars and, holding the substances of the sacred bond, made offerings to the Blessed One Vajrasattva, delighted him with the union of the dance, and also drank the flavor of the five nectars. The meaning is this. Having grasped and fully understood the meaning of the vajra words spoken by the Blessed One, namely that the suchness of all phenomena neither abides in things nor fails to abide, they honored the Blessed One with the objects, and they declared that they themselves also consume objects.

Then the Blessed One, pleased, showed his empowering blessing:

Kye, kye, vajra ḍākinīs,
You who make homage to all the buddhas,
By the blessing of the vajra offering,
Which I have made secret, that very reality,
Listen well, for I shall speak as you wish.

This means that the Blessed One was pleased, having seen that the yoginīs had understood this profound way of the Dharma, taught through the two truths. Wishing to teach once more the distinctive features of conduct, he spoke those words.

The distinctive features of conduct are these:

Food and drink, however they are found,
Going and not going, one does not avoid;
One should not bathe nor practice cleanliness,
The customs of the village are wholly abandoned.
The wise one does not recite mantras,
And does not fix the mind on meditative concentration.

This is taught in the passage from there up to "Let it be eaten fully with the awakening mind." Because suchness does not arise from conceptual thought, one should entirely abandon all concepts and dwell as one pleases. Why so? Because whatever is perceived is by nature the pure essence. For this reason, for one possessed of the mind of nondual wisdom there is nothing that is not to be eaten, not to be drunk, not to be examined, not to be looked at, or not to be tasted.

Likewise:

Having found the self-arisen flower,
And placed it in the lotus vessel...

This means that the blood arising from the woman's womb is taken into a skull cup. Then:

Mixed with phlegm and with mucus,
It is drunk by one who keeps the vow.

That is, things despised by worldly people, such as phlegm and mucus, are mixed with that blood, and the childish, the bearers of the sacred bond, are also made to eat it. This also removes gray hair, wrinkles and the like. By this the yogin leads those of childish nature. Moreover, since object and subject have become one, the elements do not emerge again, and the lower portion of the day, that is, the downward movement, is the definitive meaning.

The words beginning "Lower garments of various colors" are taught at length in the chapters on conduct.

Furthermore, since it has not been shown which family each of the six sense faculties belongs to, and since they have not been purified, the Blessed One said earlier:

Since all is pure in its objects,
the Blessed One, as said before,
has certainly not made pure
the count of the six faculties.

This is the question put by Vajragarbha, and the Blessed One then gave his answer, beginning with the words "In the eye, Mohavajrā," and so on. This meaning is given in the root tantra as follows:

In the eye is Mohavajrā,
shown by the letter A.
In the ear is Dveṣavajrā, shown by the letter Aṃ.

In the nose is she called Mātsaryā, shown by the letter E.
In the mouth is Rāgavajrā, shown by the letter U.
In the body is Īrṣyāvajrā,
shown by the letter Ī.
In the mind is the yoginī Nairātmyā,
shown by the letter A.
For the sake of purifying the faculties, with this the great bodhisattva is armored.

This should be understood from what was spoken there.

Vajragarbha then asked:

What is called the language of intention?
What is the great pledge of the yoginīs, unknown to śrāvakas and the like?

Here the question is this: "O Blessed One, when yogins who abide in Hevajra find themselves among śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, non-Buddhists, and other childish beings, how should they handle the secret expressions and the rest?"
Likewise:

Laughing and gazing,
embracing, and likewise the pairs,
and the tantra too, in four kinds:
the language of intention has not been proclaimed.
May the Blessed One surely declare it.

So too the question means: "Please also explain the symbolic terms for the bliss of laughing, the bliss of gazing, the bliss of embracing, and the bliss of two giving to two, and so on, in the place where attachment is aroused."

The Blessed One answered, saying "Vajragarbha, listen," and then spoke these symbolic terms. They should be referred to the root tantra itself:

Madana is liquor, and meat is by outer and inner distinction.
Apply this wording to all of these.
The bliss of semen is the intoxicating liquor.
The faculties explained earlier, which do not go outward, are called meat.

Assembly is called Malayaja.

Born from family and non-family,
having the nature of the four wheels, because they gather in their own places
it is spoken of as Malayaja.

The going is called Kheṭaro:
from whatever place, by the fire of time,
one goes to the place of darkness,
like a thousand flashes of lightning-light.

That is why it is called Kheṭaro.

The bone ornament is Nirāṃśu.

It is without parts, free of expression, wholly beyond the realm of words.

The bliss of semen, whatever it is,
is known as Nirāṃśu.

The coming is called Phreṃkhaṇa.

The path of the moon, from the left side,
by which one comes, urged on,
ripening gods and humans and the rest,
is known as Phrekhaṇa.

Cāṇṭeu is called Kṛvīta.

The life-wind is the sound "cāṇṭeu," abiding firmly on the indestructible path;
what the yogin hears and obtains is explained as Kṛvīta.

The unfortunate is called Duduru.

The yogin whose love is utterly lowly,
who lets forth sixteen parts,
is lowly in compassion,
and should be called Duduru.

The fortunate is called Kāliṅja.

Whatever the bliss of one's own skull, which even Brahmā, Śiva, Viṣṇu, and the god of desire cannot at all snatch away, is held to be supreme: Kāliṅja.

The untouchable is called Diṇḍimā.

Nairātmyā and the other yoginīs,
having the nature of sixteen parts,
do not cling to a self; they terrify;
this is proclaimed as Diṇḍimā.

The skull is Padmabhājana.

That by which the body is nourished in a stream,
without which it would not exist,
the sovereign of the three worlds, is Padmabhājana.

The good is called Tṛptika.

All the things of the objects explained earlier are consumed, though not by the tongue.

The supreme flavor of the food of meditation is known everywhere as Tṛptika.

The phlegm is Tīndhinaṃ.

Sun, moon, Rāhu, and the rest,
the one who has abandoned the ram and Kapilavastu, is clearly established by this path.

It is known everywhere as Tīndhinaṃ.

The feces is called Catussama.

Where sun, moon, Rāhu, and the fire of time gather together in equality, because the four meditations are equal,
it is remembered as "the four equal."

The urine is called Kastūrī.

Like a person accomplished in the body, relying on which, the musk deer's navel scent is matched,
it should be called Kastūrī.

The self-arisen is to be known as Siṃhala.

The woman whose source of birth is blood,
the skilled, intelligent yogin should know the generator to be Siṃhala, like sandalwood and siṃhala.

Semen is called Karpūra.

By the great fire of wisdom
the cities are thoroughly stirred up, and the camphor-colored scent is shown.

Likewise it is called Karpūra.
The great flesh is called Śālijam.
The supreme holder of great moral discipline, possessed of a body like a vajra,
or else others, by desire and devotion,
the sky-farer's navel is Śālijam.
The joining of the two faculties is Kunduru.
In the pure abode the great lord is invited by "the one to be burned," and when the two are equally united that is called Kunduru.
It is explained as Vajrabolla.
The water of samādhi based on it gives rise to the wisdom body, and the power and splendor are incomparably great;
it is explained as Bolla.
Padma is called Kakkola.
Relying on the lotus, the three worlds are fully endowed with the nature of bliss, and because one attains a vajra body
it is proclaimed as Kakkola.

By what was said here the meaning of this should be understood. In this order of expression, the symbols, as they stand in the Saṃpuṭa tantra by their established usage, should be kept in mind just as they are. They are to be spoken to one another according to the occasion. The definitive meanings stated above are only to be understood by the mind; they are not to be spoken just as they are.

"Divided by the distinction of colors,
the families are taught as five.
This is the secret language."

This means that the language of intention taught in this way, rich in great meaning and divided into conventional and ultimate, comes down to nothing other than the intention of the five letters. For it is said, "The five mudrās are what is condensed."

These families are as follows. The Yuṇmo is said to belong to the vajra family. Akṣobhya is the element of space. The dancer likewise belongs to the lotus family, and Amitābha is the element of fire. The Rangtsedma belongs to the jewel family, and Ratnasambhava is the element of water. The Kyegyī, the twice-born, is declared to be the Tathāgata family. The great Vairocana is the element of earth. Caṇḍālī is of the action family, and Amoghasiddhi is the element of wind. These grant the accomplishments of the mudrās. These become the vajra semen. The one of fierce discipline should honor them and drink.

By this passage, with its distinction between the provisional and the definitive meaning, the daughters born from these families are to be fully known. Having trained well and acted in the way of bliss, one draws out the awakening mind and drinks it, and so on, and the body becomes firm like a vajra. In the definitive sense, whichever family it may be, outer or inner, the body becomes like a vajra through the fierce discipline of the absorption that does not summon seed syllables. This is the definitive meaning of the Tathāgata.

Vajragarbha, great bodhisattva, the secret language is wondrous. Whatever I explain to you, take all of it up with reverence. This was spoken as a solemn proclamation. Then he spoke these further words of warning, as follows.

Hevajra, whoever has received empowerment and does not speak the secret language, his samaya will surely be broken; of this there is no doubt.

How, then, does the sign of broken samaya appear? Through plague, thieves, spirits, epidemics, and poisons; if one does not speak the buddhas' secret language, one will be afflicted. So beginner yogis must certainly proclaim this language.

If one finds one's own samaya family and does not speak these words, the yoginī born from the four places becomes wrathful at that moment. This should be understood in terms of the provisional and the definitive meaning.

This is the third chapter, the extensive explanation of the introduction to all the tantras and of the secret language, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Supreme among speakers, king of speakers, lion of speech, one who has no equal, who strikes terror into the non-Buddhists: to the Blessed Kye, I pay homage. This is the extensive commentary on the Condensed Mudrās. For sentient beings bewildered in the darkness of suffering, I have written this extensive commentary, so that a lamp may make things clear.

Then Vajragarbha and the others, and the ḍākinīs, fell into doubt, and so on. In the chapter on conduct, there are the songs and dances performed by the yogī that bestow accomplishment. In the chapter on the deities, there are the mudrās of aversion and the rest, and what is to be sealed, by whom, and how. There are the mantra syllables taught in the wheel of Nairātmyā, and what these are. There is the intended meaning of the thirty-two channels taught in the chapter on the families. About all these they asked: Blessed One, I am confused; please explain these to me purely.

The Blessed One then declared the song beginning with "Kolla irisṭi" and so on. Its meaning is to be understood here. "Kolla irisṭi abolā" shows the pīṭha and the near pīṭha. "Mummuṇi reka kakkolā" shows the field and the near field. "Ghaṇe kṛpiṭa hobā jja ikāruṇe kia inarolā" shows the chandoha. "Tahiṃ bala khājja igāḍheṃ ma aṇā bijja aī" shows the near chandoha. "Haleka liṇjarpaṇi aī dunduravājje aī" shows the meeting place. "Cau usamaka cchurī sihlakāspurā lāi aī" shows the near meeting place. "Māla indhaṇa sāliṇjata hi bharukhā iaī" shows the charnel ground. "Niraṃ suaṃga caḍavita hiṃ jasarāvapaṇi aī" shows the near charnel ground. "Preṃkhaṇakheṭakarante śuddhā śuddhana muṇi aī" shows the pīlava. "Malaya jo kunduru pāṭa iḍiṇḍi mata hiṇṇa bājji aī" shows the near pīlava. By this order of recitation, the meaning is to be understood from what the root tantra says: "These are shown as the ten grounds. Whoever sings this song with knowledge will have accomplishment increase, as with Heruka."

Now, in order to show the dance: the yogī whose mindfulness is not stolen dances in the form of Heruka. Free of attachment, with an undefiled mind, he meditates with a mind of desire. This means that the mind is not carried away to anything else in the bliss of passion, while great compassion is stirred; this is the dance. As is said: "He is the abandonment of causes and the rest; ru is freedom from gatherings; ka is not abiding anywhere; Heruka is thus renowned." So, undefiled by the fault of attachment through being free of it, one should stir great compassion for the sake of oneself and others. This is the meaning.

In "Vajra dharma and buddha," the vajra dharma is the nature of speech, and the buddha is the nature of body; from this force the mind is also to be understood. This shows that body, speech, and mind are to be made one.

By the yoginīs and the mothers, with these songs and dances, one sings well and dances too. By this one keeps the samaya, and likewise protects oneself. By this one brings the world under one's power.

By those songs and dances, the outer and inner samayas and the full increase of accomplishments are all clearly shown. Understanding their nature just as it is, one brings the three worlds under one's power, and one should understand that the mantra recitation is exactly this.

Wherever songs are sung with devotion, and wherever dances are performed with devotion, the lord of the gathering has first begun them. This applies either to the great feast gathering that has received the king's command, or to an ordinary feast gathering, or to a heroes' festival other than these. The meaning is that first the chief of the gathering sings, and afterwards the others sing as they please.

At the time of those gatherings and heroes' festivals, through the blessing of song and dance, the first sign will be of three kinds: a smell like that of the garlic-like plant, then in the middle a smell like that of a vulture, and finally a smell like camphor. These are to be indicated by the vajra master. In the same way, by the characteristic of song, the vocal tones at the beginning and at the end are like the sounds of the king of swans and the king of bees; they draw out the tone and rest upon the ending. In the middle is a sound like that of the finest bull, a sound like that of a goat, meaning that it is to be expanded; and in that very instant these signs will also arise in the vicinity of the maṇḍala. Therefore it is said:

The sound of swans and of bees,
and a sound like that of the bull and the cow,
should be listened for at the end of the song.
By the blessing and characteristic of song,
the outer too, in the colored powder, will be revealed.

Now the characteristic of the mudrā will be explained. Why? Because when the signs, the families, the lineage and the conduct have not been fully purified, one does not perform worldly acts such as the marriage rite and the like. If one were to engage in worldly acts without full purification, there would not even be worldly convention, and barbarism would spread everywhere. Therefore it is said in this tantra and that tantra, "As the outer, so the inner." Hence:

The mudrā is the sign and the mark;
by these its family is to be recognized.

Through the practice of meditating on a mixed-up family,
the practitioner has no accomplishment.

and so on was taught. To seal each one with the mudrā of its own family is the certainty of the Tathāgatas. The meaning of this is as the root tantra says:

For aversion, the mudrā is Nairātmyā;
the protector is Akṣobhya, of the aversion family.

For delusion, the mudrā is Vajrā;
the protector is Vairocana, of the delusion family.

For miserliness, the mudrā is Gaurī herself;
the protector of miserliness is Ratnasambhava.

For attachment, the seal is Caurī;
the protector of attachment is of the Amitābha family.

For jealousy, the mudrā is Khecarī;
jealousy is of the Amoghasiddhi family.

Likewise the goddesses of the intermediate directions and so on,
for the sake of earth, water, fire and wind,
are sealed with the mudrā in due order.

Understand the meaning from what was thus taught. Likewise, from "Again, Gaurī with aversion" up to "For desire, the mudrā is Khecarī; know the mudrā through desire," it should be understood as above; they differ only in being distinguished as object and subject.

Now, to show the seed syllables of the fifteen goddesses beginning with Nairātmyā, "The first āli is Nairātmyā" and so on was spoken. The seed syllable of Nairātmyā is A. The second āli, the seed of Vajrā, is Ā. The third, the seed of Gaurī, is I. The fourth, the seed of the yoginī of the ten, is Ī. The fifth, the seed of the vajra ḍākinī, is U. This is the addition of the inner. The addition of the outer will be explained. The sixth, the seed of Pukkasī, is Ū. The seventh, the seed of Śmaśānacārī, is Ṛ. The eighth, the seed of Śvapacī, is Ṝ. The ninth, the seed of Yungmo, is Ḷ. As it is said, "Again the five and two are Gaurī herself."
The tenth, the seed of Gaurī, is Ḹ. The eleventh, the seed of Caurī, is E. The twelfth, the seed of Vetālī, is Ai. The thirteenth, the seed of Ghasmarī, is O. The fourteenth, the seed of Bhūcarī, is Au. The fifteenth, the seed of Khecarī, is Aṃ. "The very seeds of the yoginīs" means that the seeds thus named are the seeds of the fifteen goddesses beginning with Nairātmyā.

In the chapter on the families it is said:

The channels, which are sixteen and two,
are taught as one's own nature.

The channels are two by two, the yoginīs;
each is spoken of in three aspects.

Thus the thirty-two channels taught in the chapter on the families move together with life-breath and mind; by the division into method and wisdom, the channels are two by two, and each yoginī is a goddess, the nature of the fifteen goddesses. Since it is said:

The stretched one, rasanā, the all-trembling one,
are called the selfless yoginī,

the thirty-two are entirely to be given up, outer and inner, in every respect, and offered to Nairātmyā. This too:

Because there is no sixteenth part,
strive to abandon all that remains.

It is said so because there is no sixteenth lunar day. As for what is known as the sixteenth, it is the first day of the waning fortnight. Why is that? "Because it performs no purposeful function," as is clearly shown.

And this too, in this very Compendium Tantra:

Of one whose nature is the fifteen parts,
the awakening minds become the moon.

The yoginīs are its parts,
great bliss, the form of the āli.

Likewise, "the great emptiness, five syllables": at that time, it abides like the shape of the five syllables, and is adorned everywhere by the drops and by what is to be cut apart.

Yogīs of childish mind may say: Are not the āli taught as sixteen, and are not the drops and the transference of joy also taught as sixteen? Why then? The thought "abandon the sixteenth and the thirty-two" is wrong. For the Tathāgata, with childish beings in mind, divided by body, speech, mind and wisdom, taught sixteen joys with the four bodies in mind: the essential body, the Dharma body, the complete enjoyment body and the emanation body. Likewise, the sixteen āli and sixteen drops do not actually exist; since they make the two parts manifest, they are like Rāhu or like a eunuch. Therefore abandon the error of the thirty-two and the sixteenth; otherwise, do not doubt.

Vajragarbha asked:

Arisen from all the yoginīs,
of the nature of innate joy,
the supreme drink, undiminishing, space itself:
why should camphor not be certainly abandoned?

Therefore the meaning is this: "I shall practice so that this camphor-like substance is never abandoned, for the sake of cooling body, speech and mind with the unbroken bliss like space, the supreme drink, the seminal fluid, the awakening mind, the nature of the fifteen yoginīs."

The Blessed One answered in accord with the proper manner, saying, "It is just as you have said." Then Vajragarbha asked, "By what means should one generate the mind of awakening?" The meaning of this is: how should one train in the sequence of entering this kind of path to awakening?

The Blessed One declared:

By the means of the maṇḍala wheel,
And by the stages of self-blessing,
The awakening mind that has form,
Conventional and ultimate, is fully generated.

This was spoken again to teach the following. First one takes the common vows, then is led into the colored-powder maṇḍala, and the master blesses one with the sevenfold procedure known as the vajra master's empowerment. Only then does one generate the awakening mind with the white conventional substance, and with the bliss that arises from it. That is the meaning.

It is further stated:

The conventional is just like the kunda flower;
The ultimate is that which has the form of bliss.

Here, first, the seminal fluid itself is the conventional awakening mind, while the bliss that depends on it is designated by the convention "ultimate." Later, the true reality that arises from the bliss that is not emitted is the ultimate form, and this is the definitive meaning.

The woman, whose lotus holds bliss,
Is by nature the form of E and VAM.
Because bliss is guarded,
She is proclaimed to be "the blissful one."

Here, conventionally, bliss arises from the mutual friction of the woman's lotus and the man's organ, and so she is proclaimed "the blissful one." That same bliss, bound by the iron chain of reality, gives rise to the attainment of a vajra-like body. This is the definitive meaning. In this very Compendium Tantra it is said:

This very place of buddhas, bodhisattvas,
And the holders of the vajra
Is itself called saṃsāra,
And is itself nirvāṇa.
Having abandoned saṃsāra, elsewhere
Nirvāṇa will not be realized.

By generating the support of a youth and a maiden, like the kunda flower mentioned above, there is the statement: "Saṃsāra is form, sound, and so forth; saṃsāra is feeling and so forth; saṃsāra is the sense faculties themselves; saṃsāra is aversion and so forth." But when one has fully defined the support of youth and maiden, like the kunda flower, then through guarding, these phenomena are not said to be nirvāṇa. And the line "Having abandoned saṃsāra, elsewhere nirvāṇa will not be realized" is itself the definitive meaning.

Therefore:

Through bewilderment, it is the form of saṃsāra.

For the bewildered, the messenger of time seizes them, and the fire of time blazes, so that looking downward the kunda-like substance destroys. Then:

Without bewilderment, by purifying saṃsāra,
Saṃsāra becomes nirvāṇa.

Here, when the kunda-like substance, whose movement has been stopped, is free of bewilderment, it is reversed from the course of dependent origination at the navel, the heart, the throat, and the forehead. Dissolving from place to place, it is said, "Saṃsāra is nirvāṇa." For this reason too it is taught:

The awakening mind is nirvāṇa,
Possessing the manner of the conventional and the ultimate.

Then:

Adorned with beauty and the bloom of youth,
Blue, gentle, of excellent lineage,

The place where camphor arises is Siṃhala;
By oneself, Hevajra bestows the empowerment.

These and similar lines designate the conventional woman, who brings about the realization of bliss, by the convention "mudrā," and this was explained at length earlier. Likewise, her liquor is the innate, and drinking it for the sake of oneself and others is itself the brief teaching. Drinking has two kinds of intent, the provisional and the definitive. In the provisional sense, one actually takes it with flavored substance; in the definitive sense, one takes it through the flavor of the organ. Hence:

Having arranged the bola and kakkola,
The practitioner of the observance goes everywhere.
The camphor that arises from union there
The wise do not abandon.
Therefore it is not taken in the hand,
Nor wiped away like a conch shell with fish.
Certainly, for the sake of insight and strength,
It should be taken with the tongue of the deathless.

Camphor itself is Nairātmyā, bliss, whose manner is selflessness; her bliss is the great mudrā. Because one realizes the culmination of the great mudrā Nairātmyā in dependence on the fifteen camphor drops of the bindu, she is designated "Nairātmyā." In the navel maṇḍala of embodied beings dwells the first of the vowels, in the manner of A. From it, at the time of union, the fire of time blazes and burns all three realms. It also burns all the buddhas dwelling in the ten directions and brings them back to their own place. This is the cause of everything. For this reason it is said:

Dwelling in the navel maṇḍala,
Of the nature of the first vowel,
It is conceived by the buddhas as "insight."

And the root tantra also says:

When all embodied beings unite,
The acts of going and coming,
And all happiness and suffering,
Are said to be done by this alone.

This is a common teaching. Of these, "insight" (blo) is a particular name for wisdom (prajñā). Because it performs the work of piercing and cutting each thing separately, the buddhas have called it wisdom. In the yoga of the completion stage:

That very one is the Blessed Lady Wisdom.

Here, when one passes beyond what is like the world and the mind enters within, that is the place of no transference. From there it blazes and burns all realization of signs. As it is said:

"Penetrating wisdom," so called,
Is known as meditative absorption;
Through it the mudrā is accomplished,
And if meditated upon, it is swiftly accomplished,
So spoke the Blessed Lady Supreme Wisdom.

Thus, one who is free of the elaboration of signs in the beginning, the end, and the middle is Nairātmyā. She is spoken of thus:

She is neither long nor short,
Neither square nor round,
Neither smell, nor taste, nor nirvāṇa;
She performs the work of innate joy.

"She" is to be joined with the line "Of the nature of the first vowel." The meaning is that she is the agent of all that is worldly and beyond the world.

In the same way, she is also the agent of what is understood in many ways as primal nature, the person, and so forth. For instance, the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), whose discernment is confused, say:

Earth, water, fire, wind, and space,
Time, direction, self, and mind:
Substance is of the nature of these nine,
And all things have this as their nature.

And likewise:

Substance, quality, and action,
The universal, the particular, and inherence,
These are the six categories of meaning,
And from them this world arises.

Thus they assign many designations.

Now the verse says: "The yoginī born from that, the very enjoyer of her bliss; together with her, the great mudrā becomes the accomplishment that bestows bliss." The sense of what is said here is this: she enjoys the bliss generated by the first vowel, and she realizes the great mudrā, the bliss arising from that and from each of the vowels, and she also bestows that way upon others.

How is she to give it? The verse answers: "Form, sound, likewise smell, taste, and likewise touch, and the nature of the dharmadhātu as well, are to be examined by wisdom itself." By this the giving is done. It is distinguished as outer and inner. Outwardly, one gives in the manner of gathering together the bliss of the woman. Inwardly, one gives through the power of the vowels and consonants (āli-kāli). This too is stated in this very text: "By the union of the vowels and consonants, the dualities of the outer are barred."

The lines beginning "The form born together with that, the yoginī of excellent great bliss," and those beginning "Having the nature of the dharmadhātu," mean that the mandala wheel, the fire pit, the binding of mudrās, and all that is designated by the worldly and the transcendent conventions are founded on that very same ground, for gods, asuras, pretas, hell beings, insects, dust and flakes, and everything else.

Now, having first taught the outer vows at length, among the outer and inner vows, the text teaches the special inner vow of bliss. Vajragarbha asked the Blessed One: "Having fully understood the path of meditating on the wheel and how all the outer and inner deities arise, please also explain the vow to me." The meaning of this request is that he asked for the inner vow of bliss, in which the outer conduct of discipline is wholly set aside. The Blessed One said:

In the center of the yoginī's body
The vow dwells in the form of A.
As it is outwardly, so it is inwardly;
That very vow is fully taught.

The meaning here is this. Wearing a body wrapped in outer cloth, with the robes cleanly dyed by the impure dye of the dyers and the like, and likewise the four defeats, the thirteen remainders that depend on the Saṅgha and are so worded, the indeterminate offenses, and whatever else is taught in this way, were spoken to guide childish people. Apart from these, even in the practice of conduct within the path of secret mantra itself, the teaching of provisional and definitive meaning is extensively given. From that text come the lines "For the emanation is the elder," through "The place of birth becomes free of desire, the hair of the womb is the monk's robe," and also "Naked, with hair and beard cut off, the man reciting mantras is a monk," and the like. These are taught as definitive meaning for yogis of childish mind, who engage in the first stage of the conduct of the mantra door, as distinct from the outer ritual conduct of the śrāvakas. For wise and intelligent yogis, the teaching beginning "Since the emanation is the elder" is of provisional meaning, while the teaching beginning "In the center of the yoginī's body the vow dwells in the form of A" is of definitive meaning.

Moreover, outwardly the vow is not to commit the defeats and the like. Inwardly, in the vow of bliss, because one does not cut the life of the awakening mind, there is the vow of not taking life. Likewise, because bliss is not allowed to be lost, the vow of turning away from unchaste conduct and the other vows are guarded, and this is taught as the definitive meaning. In the Chanting of the Names, too, we find: "Supreme in austerity, of great austerity, one who dwells in purity, Gautama." And likewise: "Supreme holder of great discipline, holder of great patience, steadfast." These and similar lines extensively teach the vow of definitive meaning.

Thus it is said: "The bliss of the bola is the great mudrā, and is all the vajra sense sources." This means that when one enters the path of sun and moon, which belongs to the indestructible path, the outer actions and the mudrā of wisdom and the like are abandoned. Therefore the vow of bliss is fully expanded, and all the channels become like the vajra. This is the nature of the secret absorption. Hence it is said: "By this secret absorption the dualities of the outer are barred."

Furthermore, to refute the idea held by most childish people that the "three bodies" are something external, it is taught: "The three bodies are rightly explained as the form of the wheel within the body." For in the wheel of great bliss and the rest, the dharmakāya, the saṃbhogakāya, and the nirmāṇakāya, all-pervaded by the three channels, are taught as the three bodies, once they are fully understood. Why? Because it is said: "Lalanā is called the body; Rasanā is speech; and when Avadhūtī abides in the center, the freedom from grasped and grasper is the dharmakāya." Likewise, because great bliss pervades everything.

And further: "From where do all beings dispute their birth? Because the emanation is the elder, therefore it is the nirmāṇakāya." For when the body of every person forms, it forms first from the navel, and the life wind and the rest are also emanated from there. So the navel is called "the elder" and is the emanation wheel. Why? Because it is said: "The body that generates and emanates is called the emanation body."

As for "The nature of mind is Dharma, and the dharmakāya is also in the heart," the meaning should be understood from the saying: "When one holds all pleasure and pain, the sign becomes signless from the sign. The signless, unconditioned dharmakāya dwells in the place of the heart."

Of the six tastes and the embodied beings who partake of them, it is said that their foods are surely enjoyed here. This is because the path of the complete supply of food and drink, six tastes and the rest, and the channel that grasps those tastes, lie in the throat. Therefore it is said: in the throat is the wheel of enjoyment. And in the crown the great bliss abides. This means it abides in the basis of bliss.

Now, to speak of the result: Evaṃ, in its aspect, is just the cause in accord. As one has acted, so one experiences. This is proclaimed as "the result in accord with the cause." The meaning is this: in the place of the navel wheel, Evaṃ, the fire of time blazes; it travels along the right channel to the place of bliss, and it draws the flow and sends it to that very place, so that it is experienced there. As for the ripened result, from the wheel of Dharma: because the action is small and the result great, it is the reverse of that ripening. That is to say, the result to be ripened by fire comes by way of the channel of water. As for the result that is the action of a person, enjoyment: it is the producing that acts as a person. The meaning is that, although such causes and results have their own functions, they depend on the exertion of a person. The wheel of great bliss is utterly stainless; the yogī is pure and without stain. This is said because it is given by that which is called "the place that is stainless in its continuum." Therefore: the fruit, distinguished as the result in accord with the cause and the rest, is declared to be of four kinds. Urged on by the wind of karma, the Blessed One engages Prajñā in action. The wind of karma that abides by nature in the navel wheel is called Prajñā; and it is this wind of karma that kindles the fire of time and burns all the world systems.

Now I shall show the definitive explanation of the four great schools. As for "because the emanation is the Elder (Sthavira)," the meaning is that, abiding there, it steadies the basis for the life-breath's going and coming. As for "because speech of the Dharma arises, all the wheels of Dharma exist," it means that the sound of the life-wind in the heart makes all that is spoken clear. As for "because all are honored in the throat, the wheel of enjoyment is honored by all": the foods that nourish all the channels, and all the tastes of drink, travel through the throat; therefore, since it is honored by all the channels, it is said in this way. As for "because the great bliss abides in the head, the great assembly in the wheel of bliss," this is because the awakening mind, like jasmine, for the most part abides in the wheel of bliss. As for "the school is said to be the body, and the belly should be spoken of as the dwelling": the eighteen schools are commonly spoken of as the whole body, and the mother's womb is spoken of as the monastery. Likewise, the mantra recitation is A and Hūṃ. The womb-source, the form of the wheel, is A; and the form of great bliss is Hūṃ. The meaning is that from the navel wheel the sound Aṃ, the life-wind, touches the Hūṃ of the wheel of the thirty-two; therefore it is said in this way. Hence A-haṃ means: "I am, from the beginning, of the nature of the body of great bliss."

By the conditions of these, sentient beings are without doubt buddhas. The ten months are themselves the grounds; the sentient being is lord of the ten grounds. Here, the ten winds, root and branch, of provisional and definitive meaning, are loosened; by definitive meaning they are ten.

Then, from "the yoginī, Nairātmyā and all the goddesses" up to "they fell upon the ground, trembling," the meaning is this: the Blessed One taught that all sentient beings are, from the beginning, of the nature of the ten grounds, with the body of a bodhisattva like a vajra. Why, then, do sentient beings suddenly fall into the place of affliction and distress? How could they arise from the mother? Thus the goddesses fainted. Again, from "the Vajra-holder, seeing those goddesses, because he was disturbed" up to "I myself, with delight, will tell you that very thing, listen," this shows the sound of the song that the Blessed One uttered to make those goddesses joyful. Hearing the speech of the Blessed One as if in a dream, all those goddesses regained their life. That is the meaning.

The Blessed One said: sentient beings are buddhas, yet they are suddenly obscured by stains; when these are removed, they are buddhas. Since all sentient beings are from the beginning of the nature of co-emergence, they are buddhas. The sudden stain is a leak; the severing of its cause is what is meant by "buddha."

The goddesses said: Blessed One, it is so, it is so; there is nothing true and nothing false. What was taught, that the leaking is the stain and the non-leaking is the buddha, is indeed so; this is the meaning of "it is so, it is so."

And the Blessed One himself gave this example: one who does not know, an ordinary person, faints from eating strong poison. Having abandoned bewilderment, one fully cuts through its reality by the mind that knows it. For example, some deluded people, of poor skill in the means of turning poison to account, eat poison and thereby die. But one who eats while fully knowing the reality of the poison finds the poison equal to nectar. In the same way: knowing the means of peace, if one draws breath in Kye's Vajra, one is not held by ignorance and the rest, nor bound by delusion and the rest. That is, freed from the going and coming of the wind that moves in the life-force, and when the drop like jasmine arises and the entry is fully pressed, one draws breath in Hevajra, and is not bound by any affliction such as ignorance. This is the definitive meaning. From their own realization and that of others, there is not a single sentient being who is not a buddha.

Hell beings, hungry ghosts and animals, gods, demigods and humans, worms in excrement and the rest, all have a nature of constant bliss.

This means that the bliss common to all living creatures, the bliss of the bindu that depends on the vital activity of life, as in the crab and the sea monster, is realized just as each one has it. Then the buddha and the bodhisattva are none other than oneself. That is the meaning.

Gods and demigods too, because they do not know that bliss, are bound in saṃsāra by that very ignorance; this is how the line is to be connected. Their nature is constant bliss. In no world-realm anywhere will a buddha be found elsewhere. This is to be connected thus: having abandoned the bliss of self-awareness, one will not find a buddha anywhere else.

What was taught in the manner of a summary is this: the mind is itself the perfect buddha, and so on, down to: those who seek killing as their aim, having known that Hevajra, will attain accomplishment; of this there is no doubt. The meaning is that if one knows for oneself, through one's own mind, that Hevajra, whose nature is the inseparability of the awareness of emptiness and compassion, then one will attain accomplishment. That is certain.

The ignorant are obscured by not knowing, and so they do not know the course of this. This means: falling away from the bliss that is the inseparability of emptiness and compassion, they do not know this course of bliss. What is called the six realms, the crab or sea monster, the limit of the six realms, becomes saṃsāra, and so they become deluded.

The compassionate Vajragarbha, having found the method of Hevajra, he who purifies the objects, will attain the unsurpassed. That is to say, through the power of receiving the guru's instruction, one finds the method; and if one purifies the objects in due order according to the guru's instruction, one will attain the unsurpassed. Here is how: in the place of the four wheels, one kills twenty thousand six hundred and one life-forces, namely five thousand four hundred and five thousand four hundred, and one counts these in due order with the joys that arise by way of the sequence, the joy, the supreme joy, the special joy, and the innate joy. In the same way, in the place of the sixty-four, one kills eighty-four winds, each with one foot. Then, as sixteen channels each are killed with their winds, the four joys are again connected in the same way. Likewise, in the place of the Dharma, one kills six hundred and seventy-five, six hundred and seventy-five. Then, as the channels are killed two by two, three hundred and fifty, three hundred and fifty, the four joys are connected as before. Likewise, in the place of enjoyment, one kills three hundred together with their feet, in excess of thirty-seven. Then, as they are killed four parts by four parts, one connects the four joys each time, as above. Then in the place of the thirty-two, one kills the hundreds, each together with its feet, in excess of sixty-eight. Then, as they are killed four parts by four parts, one connects the four joys as above. All that has been stated is purification according to the guru's instruction.

Now I shall explain the reasoning by which each is sealed with which seal. Vajragarbha asked: the earth is said to be Pukkaṣī; and since delusion is thin, the body is said to be Vairocana; so how, Lord, is Akṣobhya the seal? Putting these and similar doubts to the Blessed One, he received this answer from the Blessed One: having abandoned the body, by the mind alone no beauty arises elsewhere. Therefore the mind is Vairocana, and the body is sealed with the seal of the mind.

This is said because, just as an action is not fully accomplished by wisdom without means, or by means without wisdom, so an action is not fully accomplished by a body that is separate from mind. Therefore the body is sealed with the seal of the mind.

In the same way: the water element is said to be Ḍombī, and Akṣobhya has the form of the seminal fluid. The seal of the chief, Akṣobhya, is fitting to be set upon Ḍombī. Here Vajragarbha asked whether it is not proper that the water element be sealed by the means, Akṣobhya, who is the water element. And the Blessed One again said: having abandoned the mind, the abiding of the body is not seen as anything else. If so, the mind would become delusion.

As above, this is to be understood through the fault of mutual contradiction. Therefore, if the family of mind is sealed by the family of body, it becomes beautiful. That is the meaning.

In the same way: fire is said to be Caṇḍālī, and desire is the seal of Caṇḍālī. If that family were not the other seal, how, Lord, is Ratnasambhava the seal? This means: is it not proper that the fire element, Caṇḍālī, be sealed by the seal of desire, Amitābha? Why then is the family of fire sealed by Ratnasambhava? So Vajragarbha asked, and the Blessed One said this: since desire is said to be blood, and blood is Ratnasambhava himself, and heat, being the nature of blood, is desire, the family of avarice is sealed with the seal.

This was taught because the heat that is the nature of fire is a quality of blood, and without blood there is no heat. Therefore the family of avarice is taught to be sealed by Ratnasambhava.

Moreover: since Yungmo is wind itself, and Amoghasiddhi has the form of wind, the chief goddess, by the seal of Amoghasiddhi, comes to be fittingly sealed upon Yungmo. This means: when Yungmo is said to be wind, is not the seal of wind itself, Amoghasiddhi, fitting? Why then is the family of desire, Amitābha, set as the seal? So Vajragarbha asked, and the Blessed One said this: apart from desire, jealousy does not arise elsewhere. Therefore the wise seal Yungmo with the seal of desire.

Thus all jealousy arises from desire, and since jealousy is not seen apart from the desire of desire, it was taught that the family of Amitābha, desire, seals the family of wind.

The reasonings stated in this way are the reasonings for sealing the goddesses of the four elements, and one should understand that the goddesses of the directions, whose nature is the aggregates, are to be grasped in the same sense. Therefore it is said: since form is solidity itself, and so on, down to the seal arises from what is not reversed.

Having been taught extensively in this way, it should be understood in sequence. Now the reality of the torma is to be shown.

Kye, Vajra, Vajra-holder, to the deity in union,

for the sake of beings, the great torma.
Concerning this, Nairātmyā made her request.

This means that Nairātmyā made her request concerning the reality of the outer and inner torma to the Blessed One, who abides in the bliss in which emptiness and compassion are inseparable.

Having assumed the posture of Evaṃ, to guard the lives of beings from obstructors and misleading spirits, Vajrasattva taught the torma.

Here the words should be joined in this way: after Nairātmyā had made her request, intending to benefit all the elemental spirits, outer and inner, he spoke this teaching on the reality of the torma.

Concerning this, he spoke the mantra beginning with Oṃ Inda, Yama, Jala, Jakṣa, Bhūta, Bahi, Vāyu, Rākṣa, Canda, Sujja, Māta, Babba, Tāla, Pātāla, Aṭa, sarva svāhā. Its meaning is as stated in the root tantra:

Protecting oneself and the yogic place, together with the maṇḍala and its dwelling, generating oneself as Hevajra,
one should perform the rite of the torma.
In the same way, the celestial palace and so forth are generated in due order.
In the space of the central triangle,
one sets out the spirits, whose nature is Hevajra.
Because their nature is body, speech and mind,
from Oṃ, Āḥ and Hūṃ,
one thinks of all the guests and focuses on them as body, speech and mind.
Then, in the proper way, with go-ku and so forth, purified, increased, kindled, and with nectar,
make it complete with the four syllables, and offer it to the assembly.

Having understood the meaning of this teaching, one should guard one's own life and the lives of others.

In the same way, there is also the definitive meaning. The eight petals of the channels in the heart of each spirit are the eight sessions, beginning with Indra. The Rāhu above and the fire of time below are the sun and the moon. Tāla and Pātāla are the upper and lower parts of the navel. The mantra that blesses them so that they are satisfied is "A kāro mukhaṃ" and so forth. In the definitive meaning, the letter A is the door of all phenomena, because they are unborn from the beginning; this is the blessing. Here, "A" refers to what lies beyond all verbal expression, abiding as the indestructible sound. This indestructible sound is the great life-force. It is certain that this torma guards life, whereas by any other method, even if one gives torma for countless eons, life will not be protected. This is the word of the Tathāgata. The other definitive meanings are well established in the extensive explanation in the chapter on mantra, and so they are not shown clearly here.

Regarding the passage "If one honors all the spirits with this torma, the yogins will prosper," and so forth, it is to be distinguished by provisional and definitive meaning. The provisional meaning is what was taught in the outer manner. The definitive meaning is this. "Ādyanutpannatvāt": the life-wind belonging to the indestructible, by which there is no emission, is bliss; that bliss is stainless bliss. Likewise, the channels of the sun at the end of time are burned, and so the goddesses and those who have attained prosperity are delighted. This is the meaning. "If one constantly gives torma here for the assembly of spirits" means: if one gives torma by means of the indestructible life-wind. Because bliss is gathered under one's power, there is power; because the afflictions of emission are destroyed, there are fierce rites, the destruction of the hosts of enemies, banishing, and killing. Because bliss is attracted, and through it the torment of the afflictions is pacified and the wisdom of bliss is increased, there are pacifying and enriching.

Now the reasoning for sealing with the mudrās of body, speech and mind is to be shown. Vajragarbha made his request:

By what mudrā are the Khecarīs sealed?

By whose mudrā are the Bhūcarīs?

Chief one, I did not understand this before.

This means: by what mudrā should the Khecarīs and the Bhūcarīs be sealed? The Blessed One Hevajra spoke again:

In the center of the wheel of the three secrets,
by the division into body, speech and mind,

the wheel is established in the center, abiding above, below and in the middle.

Concerning this: the wheel of the three secrets is divided threefold, into underground, ground level and above ground, and is proclaimed in the Cakrasaṃvara wheel. The Bhūcarī has the mudrā of body. The upper face, whose mudrā is of body, has the family of body, which is delusion, and is proclaimed as Vairocana. The Khecārī has the mudrā of desire. The lower face is Vajrā of speech, has the family of speech, which is desire, and is proclaimed as Amitābha. Nairātmyā is the vajra of mind. Her mind has the immeasurable manner; her mind abides in the central place, and therefore Nairātmyā is born in the center. Her mind has the family of space, and the protector Akṣobhya is proclaimed as mind. These three are the form of the central channel. Three years and a half moon, and two: this is taught as its Dharma. The great tantras such as the Guhyasamāja are said to arise from this very thing. Therefore the families of body, speech and mind are declared to be the three-faced one. In the extensive division, the families are said to be six: the elements of earth, water, fire, wind and space, and the element of wisdom, making six. The three are sun, moon and fire. The five are Rāhu, the dark one, and the other seizer. Adding two to three makes five. The king of the wrathful ones is the fearsome Six-Faced, and Mañjuvajra has five faces. This is the meaning.

Furthermore, in the yoga tantras, so that outsiders may enter, this is taught:

Akṣobhya, Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, Amitābha, Envy, Vajrasattva:
the families are taught as six,
and the six afflictions are purified.
Aversion, delusion, avarice, desire, envy and bliss are proclaimed as the six afflictions.
Through this one meditates in stages.
Having abandoned Vajrasattva, afterwards there are five families.

This means that having abandoned the desire of crowds, they become five families; that is, having abandoned the supremely unchanging wisdom.

Why is this so? Because the family of wisdom pervades all of them. In the same way, by the division into rajas, darkness, and vigor, or by the division into sun, moon, and Rāhu, it is said: "Through attachment, aversion, and delusion, the vajra becomes threefold." That is the meaning.

In the same way, consciousness is this very element of space. It is the essential nature of all the families, or of a single family, because one space abides in forms that are not different from one another. Thus it is said: "Akṣobhya, aversion, the embodied one, is of one taste with the lord of the mind." Therefore, from this very family of the mind arise the five families, the six families, and so on, up to the immeasurable families. For this reason it is said: "This blessing of the vajra of aversion is spoken of as the five families and the six families."

This is the fourth chapter, the extensive explanation that condenses the mudrās of all the tantras, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Eight faces and sixteen hands: having bowed to the hero with the garland of skulls, Vajragarbha writes this extensive explanation of the Hevajra's Abhisamaya. "Sixteen hands, eight faces, four feet, and terrifying, the hero with the garland of skulls is embraced in body by Nairātmyā." Thus it was taught. The sixteen hands are marked by the sixteen emptinesses; the eight faces are the purity of the eight liberations; the four feet are the purity of the four means of gathering disciples, beginning with acting in accord with their aims. He possesses the signs of wrath, namely innate wrath, wrath through force of circumstance, wrath with accompaniments, and wrath by intention. He wears a garland of heads, the purity of the fifty expressers, and is embraced in body by the Great Mother, whose nature is emptiness. The five syllables are the purity of the five mudrās that he holds. This is Heruka, the Blessed One, to whom Nairātmyā put her request: "If you would explain my wheel, which is surrounded by fifteen, then how is your own maṇḍala, O Lord? I have not seen it before." What this means is as follows. My maṇḍala has the nature of the fifteen portions of the moon of awakening mind and is characterized by awakening through the five and the twenty aspects of full realization, and it has been well taught to be of the nature of the goddesses, five and three. How then is your maṇḍala, O chief? It is fitting that you teach what was not taught before.

"Having made a gesture of invitation to Nairātmyā, and having given her the vajra and the skull cup, and having caressed the goddess's breasts, he showed the maṇḍala correctly." The meaning is this: in order to show Nairātmyā his own maṇḍala, he first taught the Dharma of desire, and then agreed to explain.

"The wheel as previously described" and so on, down to "well adorned with vajra lines," is taught. When the characteristics of the maṇḍala palace are distinguished as outer and inner, the nature of generation is like your own palace of stacked tiers. That is the meaning.

"Following upon great desire, from the nature of innate joy, you and I, the lovely one, are together; in the center of that, I am present." Here the meaning is: O goddess, your maṇḍala is of the nature of the fifteen made at the beginning. Here, however, you and I, whose nature is the complete abandonment of the fifteen, are intimately joined, and from this you are surrounded by eight goddesses of innate nature.

From "to the one with eight faces" down to "marked on the crown with a crossed vajra," and from there to "in the delightful city, you and I," the Blessed One, the great chief himself, clearly shows to Nairātmyā the loving nature of his body. In order to draw in childish beings, he shows a body perfect in marks, adorned with all qualities and possessed of all splendor. "In the delightful city, you and I sport greatly with joy." The meaning is that in the maṇḍala palace, whose nature is the dharmadhātu and which is adorned with the qualities of an incomparable realm, they abide, sporting in innate joy.

"Having drawn out Gaurī from the direction of Indra, she abides correctly at the eastern gate," and so on, down to "in the direction of the wind, Yungmo herself," are vajra words showing how eight goddesses arise from the sport of innate bliss. By this the activity of father and mother begetting children is shown, which is the Dharma that causes worldly existence to increase. This same process, by the distinction of the coming and going of the life-breath of embodied beings, comprises four breaths on the right and four on the left, and four sessions and four junctions, eight in all. These lead the drops of seminal fluid, sixteen and a half, and they show the Dharma of day and night. The breath that enters the fiery line at the junction is shown through Nairātmyā and the chief himself.

Then: "From the vajra of great passion, the consort together with him became seminal fluid." This shows that the activity of father and mother has been fully completed, and the mingling is thoroughly displayed. Otherwise, it is shown that all the elements that depend on the channels of the life-breath dissolve inward and no longer move.

In the same way, it is the meaning of the words that he is roused to rise from the ground of the aeon, and that by the two paths he shows the mastery of awakening. "From the offering of various songs, then the goddesses urged him: O noble one, arouse your compassionate mind," and so on, down to "do not cut off your compassion." With these words of the vajra song the meaning is this. In the world, when parents have passed away, sons and daughters and others lament, cry out, and make pleas, saying: "O protector, we have no protector or refuge; please protect us, kyi hud, kyi hud!" and they scatter themselves about. In the same way, when nirvāṇa is shown to be near in the region of the city of Kuśinagara, the great śrāvakas lament, cry out, and make pleas, and the nāga kings also grieve. Yet all the life-breaths of others enter inward and abide in the element of great bliss, and from that state, for the sake of all sentient beings, he is roused by the elements of earth, water, fire, and wind, and engages in the benefit of beings. This is the definitive meaning.

The pot-bellied one, the donkey, the female buffalo, the human, the śarabha, and the cat: in the eight skulls of the right hand, the elephant and the rest should be understood in this order. This shows the eight emblems of the right hands. In the same way: earth and water and wind, fire, the moon and the sun itself, Antaka, and the holder of wealth: these are in the eight skulls of the left. This shows the eight emblems of the left hands. The purification of these is to be understood from the passage that begins with "the lungs and the breath" and ends with "perfectly accomplishing all the wealthy."

In the same way, the great chief is shown endowed with the nine moods of dance. Thus: the seven precious things, and among them what the Sugata proclaimed as the precious general. The general is one endowed with the nine modes. With graceful bearing he brings forth wisdom in beings, and his conduct is without timidity. The wrathful one endowed with ferocity is terrifying; he cuts off wrong views and aversion in the manner of slaughter. For the one who raises up Vajrasattva, the Tathāgata is heroic in valor. For the vajra-holder, compassion; for the boisterous, the supreme Lord of the World. Vajra Sun is greatly wrathful; for the fierce vajra, terror. Śākyamuni is for the repulsive, and Arali is for the wondrous. The marvelous one proclaims the Dharma, appearing laughing. He shows wrath toward the hard to tame as compassion. He accomplishes the afflictions in a wondrous way. In the wrathful and fierce manner, the unmoving, he is in the manner of peace. These and the like are the meaning of the nine dance poses.

The raising up of the hero endowed with such nine dance poses is this: "With OM̐ and HŪM̐ the great vajra arises from the form of the seminal drop; and as the feet strike the earth, gods and asuras are terrified." This means that from the form of the earlier seed, the two syllables AM̐ and HŪM̐ become a skull and a curved knife, and from these the form arises. The bodies of Nairātmyā and of the chief are completely perfected: sixteen and twelve, the sun and moon, perfectly clear and free of stain. That he thereby works for the benefit of beings is the definitive meaning.

GAM̐, CAM̐, BAM̐, GHAM̐, PAM̐, ŚAM̐, LAM̐, ḌAM̐: these are the eight initial letters of the names, in the form of drops. "With these the seeds are drawn forth" should be applied at the time of generating the eight goddesses. In the same way, from "the seeds of the lord, AM̐ and HŪM̐, blazing blue and terrifying" up to "the chief is to be meditated upon in just this way," the nature of the generation of the chief is clearly shown, as already taught above.

Now, to show the emblems in the right and left hands of the eight goddesses, it is taught from "in Gaurī's right, a curved knife" up to "in the left, a threatening finger, likewise." Thus, upon each one's seat, within the joined sun and moon, one visualizes the earlier letters abiding. When these are transformed, one visualizes them as the eight emblems of the right hands, and from their transformation the eight goddesses are fully perfected. Why are they perfected from the emblems of the right? As the root tantra says: "With the right hand of the embodied, all actions are accomplished. The right hand of emptiness-wisdom likewise performs all actions. From striving for the benefit of beings, with the dance of the half-lotus posture, the goddesses beginning with Gaurī are wished to abide well in every way."

In the same way, the eight emblems of the right hands, the curved knife and the others, are applied in order: cutting off the afflictions; proclaiming the sound of emptiness; unmoving bliss; adorning with the very suchness of aversion and the other afflictions; removing all doubt in every action; relying on the arhat; turning the wheel of Dharma; and destroying the afflictions. Likewise the eight of the left are applied in order: bliss in touching; awakening from delusion; guarding bliss; taking up wisdom; utterly cutting off the afflictions; displaying bliss; being without affliction; and displaying the stainless abode.

"Gaurī and the others are described with two hands, three eyes, hair bound upward, and adorned with the five mudrās." This and the like shows that all the goddesses are inseparable emptiness and compassion, the suchness of body, speech, and mind, and the suchness of the wisdom of bliss, and are alike endowed with the five mudrās beginning with space.

"Gaurī becomes black in color," up to "Yungmo is called the Variegated One": the meaning is that the body colors of the eight goddesses of the directions and intermediate directions should be understood in order, through the qualities of the natures of earth, water, fire, wind, and the rest.

In the same way: "Yama, the lord of wealth, Nairṛti, Varuṇa, the wind god, Brahmā, Indra, and Īśāna, the fierce, are the seats of Gaurī and the rest." These are the eight guardians of the directions; they are to be visualized as seats in order, according to the qualities of their natures. Furthermore, eight kinds of worldly gods who are proud are made to fall prostrate and are subdued. Then Gaṭṭogdma and the others are empowered and named, and they are placed in the worldly maṇḍala. That is the meaning.

These are as follows. Tapaśvinī, the one who turns back austerity, is named Wrathful Vajrā. The Golden One is named Vajra Golden One, and Śirṣyā is named Vajra Youth. Brahmāṇī is named Vajra Peaceful One. Īśvarī is named Vajra Spitting One. These are empowered as Vajra Victorious Lady. Then, to all the queens who move in the sky, it is given as follows. Amarā is named Vajra Immortal. Rohanā is named Vajra Radiant. The staff-bearer is named Vajra Supreme Staff. The one who steals beings is named Vajra Waist-Bound, and these and the others are empowered as wrathful vajras. Then, to all the queens who move in space, it is given as follows. The Slayer is named Vajra Melting One. The Eater is named Vajra Eater. The Armored One is named Vajra Armored Lady. The Joyful One is named Vajra Joyful Lady. These and the others are empowered as vajra messengers. Then, to all the queens who move on the earth, it is given as follows. The Peaceful Lady is named Vajra Messenger. Wind is named Vajra Swift One. Fire is named Vajra Blazing One.

Kuberā is named Vajra Retinue. Those and others are empowered as Vajra Messengers.

Then, to all the consorts who dwell beneath the earth, he gave names as follows. The Sow is named Vajra Mouth. Cāmuṇḍī is named Vajra Time. Nāsikācchedā is named Vajra Putrid. The water goddess is named Vajra Water-Monster. They are empowered as Vajra Maidservants.

In the same way, as follows. Maheśvarī is named Vajra Wrathful Lady. Mahābalā is named Vajra of Illusion. The Young Sound is named Vajra Bell.

Brahmā is named Vajra of the Sage. Īśvarī is named Vajra Weapon. They are empowered as the knowledge-kings.

Then, to those who move in the sky, he gave names as follows. The Sun is named Amṛtakunḍalin. The Moon is named Vajra Light. Mahāprabhu is named Vajra Striker. The Tawny Purple One is named Vajra Tawny Purple. These and others are empowered as Vajra Wrathful Ones.

Then, to all the gods who move in space, he gave names as follows. The Honey-Intoxicated is named Vajra Elephant-Nose. The Honey-Maker is named Vajra Garland. The Victor is named Vajra Power. The One Who Brings Victory is named Vajra of Complete Victory. These and others are empowered as chiefs of the assembly.

Then, to all the lords of the upper earth, he gave names as follows. The Treasure Keeper is named Vajra Hammer. Fire is named Vajra Fire. Wind is named Vajra Wind. Kubera is named Vajra Terror. These and others are empowered as Vajra Messengers.

Then, to all the gods who are lords of the underworld, he gave names as follows. The Boar is named Vajra Iron Hook. Yama is named Vajra Time. Gaurī, the hair-tufted one, is named Vajra Chief of Obstructors. Varuṇa is named Vajra of the Nāgas. These and others are empowered as those called Vajra Servants. This is for the purpose of subduing all the arrogant ones of the world.

Having spread out the bola, embraced it closely, and made the offering of milk, and having reverently honored the Blessed One, Nairātmyā asked for the mantra. The meaning of these lines is that Nairātmyā, with the taste of bliss, fully honored her lord and asked for the mantra of Hevajra.

In the same way: the mantra that brings women under control, likewise the subduing of the wicked, the subduing of nāgas, and the striking of gods and asuras, this I shall explain. Goddess, giver of bliss, listen. This describes the qualities of the root mantra. Whatever the qualities of the mantra are, I shall explain that by merely reciting it women come under one's control, the wicked are destroyed, nāgas are subdued, and gods and asuras are tamed. This is the meaning.

I have not taught this to others, not to buddhas or bodhisattvas. Whatever arises through this mantra, and whatever Vajrasattva has done with it, I explain to you, fearsome goddess, because you are not a stranger to me. This means that the qualities of this mantra could not be fully told even over countless eons, and that they are not told even to śrāvakas, solitary victors, and those who have newly generated the awakening mind; this secret is told to you alone.

Having raised the maṇḍala, agitated by garlands of flame, in order to give empowerment to Vajragarbha, one should summon the supreme drop. This means: set up the fearsome maṇḍala of Hevajra, which makes even the fearsome greatly afraid, and learn the reality of the maṇḍala from the vajra master. Having recited the mantra one hundred thousand times according to the number of its syllables, one performs the fire offering with the ten requisites. Having first done the approach, and having applied it to the rite with ten thousand recitations, one can summon even a goddess such as the supreme drop; what need is there to speak of ordinary women? This is the meaning, and these are the qualities of the mantra.

Otherwise, in terms of the wheel of great bliss, the summoning of the supreme drop is by stopping the life-wind; this is the definitive meaning. This is also the empowerment of Vajragarbha.

With a long and good sound, joined with the union of Hevajra, one should summon all the consorts. With an undoubting mind, the yogin, by reciting one hundred thousand times through the yoga of Hevajra, accomplishes all its activities. As for the definitive meaning here: when, from the prosperity of the nature whose essence is emptiness and compassion, one holds the life-wind one hundred thousand times, one comes to accomplish all activities. This is definitive.

Regarding this: give the first of the vowels, adorned with the half-moon and the drop. The first of the vowels is the letter A. The half-moon is like the crescent of the second day of the lunar month, and it adorns the head of the A. Above that, again, it is adorned with the drop. This is the meaning.

Oṃ aṣṭānanāya, piṅgalojhrakeśavartmane, caturviṃśatinetrāya, ṣoḍaśabhujāya, kṛṣṇajīmūtavapuṣe, kapālamālānekaṃdhāriṇe, adharmaṭākrūracittāya, arddhenduvamṣṭriṇe. Oṃ mārāya mārāya, kārāya kārāya, garjāya garjāya, tarjāya tarjāya, śoṣāya śoṣāya, saptasāgarān bandha bandha, nāgāṣṭakān grhṇa grhṇa, sarvasthūn, ha hā hi hī hu hū he hai ho hau haṃ haḥ phaṭ svāhā. These are the lines of the great root mantra, the mantra from which all qualities arise.

Then, the passage beginning "Then that goddess, delighted, from the practice of rubbing and being rubbed" and ending with "he made the maṇḍala of that very one" should be understood to mean that Nairātmyā requested the maṇḍala from the Blessed One, and that the Blessed One himself taught the maṇḍala.

The passage from "with one stage and four doors" up to "and well endowed with five lines" should be understood as teaching the characteristics of the colored-powder maṇḍala. Likewise, "then draw the eight vases" means that they are drawn at the doors and the intermediate points.

Of powder of the five precious substances, or else of powders of grain and the like; and if not, of the tooth-marks of boars in the charnel ground, and likewise of charnel-ground charcoal. Verses of this kind mean the following. Whoever wishes to draw a maṇḍala of colored powders should draw it with powders of gold, silver, and the like, if these can be had. If they cannot be obtained, he may also draw it with powders of grain, such as rice, dyed in different colors. If even that is not possible, it is certain that he draws with the red colored powder made from the boar-rooted earth of the charnel ground, the black made from the charcoal of that same place, and the white made from human bone.

Then the text says: In its center draw a lotus of eight petals with its stamens, and in the middle a human skull, white in color, of three parts. The meaning is this: in the center of a lotus of eight petals, complete with anthers and filaments, one draws a skull of three fragments.

In the same way, the passage that runs from "in the northeast, a śarabha" up to "filled with the rice that grows in the water" shows that the eight emblems on the right are to be drawn, as is to be understood from what was said earlier. These should also be drawn according to the natural qualities of each, with the emblems of the goddesses matching the colors of the goddesses.

For the extended ritual of the maṇḍala, one should consult the great tantra called the Saṃpuṭa; here only the vital points have been taught. That is the meaning. For what is the use of saying more here? It is shown by the line, "Just as in the Compendium of Reality, so one should perform the maṇḍala ritual."

In the same way, the age of the consorts of great bliss is stated as follows: the eight consorts of great bliss, aged twelve and eight and two, adorned with necklaces and anklets, should be brought into the maṇḍala. This is explained thus. At twelve years they are utterly pure, the vajra sun of great radiance. At sixteen years they are utterly pure, the sixteenth part of the moon, the vajra moon of stainless light, free of passion and of great passion in the first. By this reckoning of sixteen in halves, the consorts are explained as eight. They are known as adorned with the drops of bliss, as necklaces and anklets. The passage running from "mother and sister" to "likewise the father's sister, the consorts are renowned as eight" teaches the eight yoginīs divided into outer and inner. In its provisional meaning, it teaches that, in order to abandon the conceptual grasping at a self found in ordinary people, one should actually practice as the tantra describes. In its definitive meaning, the nature of the eight consorts in the heart is the eight drops facing upward; this is certain.

Then: "Embracing firmly and kissing, yogins honor these. Then, drinking the camphor, one makes the offering and cleansing of the maṇḍala. Then the yogin drinks, and will swiftly attain accomplishment." Here the consorts are brought into the maṇḍala, distinguished as worldly and beyond the world. By the drinking of the awakening mind, the yogins are satisfied, and by performing the cleansing offering of the maṇḍala with it, one attains the common accomplishments. That is the provisional meaning. In the definitive meaning, the eight life-winds travel by the right channel, and by drawing in the nectar of wisdom, the maṇḍala of the body is offered and cleansed. By this one attains accomplishment without fail; that is the instruction of the Tathāgata.

Further: "Giving drink of wine, and eating meat and the rice that grows in water." This is the ritual procedure to be performed beforehand by the master. Likewise, the passage beginning "having made her free of clothing" and ending "play games with her" is meant for the childish who are in the power of desire to understand. As is said in the treatise of Bhulai, one should experience the union of immeasurable flavor, like play with the nails and teeth and the white-clasp and so on.

Then, in the second session: "Having covered the eyes with cloth, bring the disciple there." After the six sessions have passed, the disciple is brought into the maṇḍala of Hevajra, the unbearable one, the source of phenomena by nature, which represents the arising of all bliss. The meaning is that one should also show him his own special deity.

The order is as follows. At night, in a house empty of people, once the master and the others have been distinguished, one gives the empowerment, as it is taught, directly to him. Here the intelligent vajra master avoids the fault of confusion in empowerment, and gives the four empowerments in order. By the words "once the master and the others have been distinguished" the number is implied to be four. For this tantra itself says, "Thus everything is fourfold," and the explanatory tantra of this very text, the Ḍākinī Vajra Tent, says: "The first is the vase empowerment; the second is called the secret; the third is wisdom and gnosis; the fourth is likewise the same."

The master's empowerment, in its provisional meaning, is the vase. In its definitive meaning, only one who is fully perfected in the fourth and the rest is called a master, not one who has merely the vase. Why? Because he does not fit the etymology of "master." Therefore the meaning of the words "distinguished by twos and twos, the vase and the rest end with the fourth; by the distinction of worldly and beyond the world, one should know the empowerment to be complete" is as follows. This should be understood in full from the great root tantras, namely the root tantra in five hundred thousand verses, the one called the Explanation of the Hundred Thousand Tantras, and the one called the Primordial Buddha. Here it is taught only in brief.

"How offering and praise are explained, the good disciple should know beforehand." This means that the intelligent disciple should first honor the guru and praise him with the praises given in the tantra, such as "In your body there is no emptiness of the hollow." Then, "What is taught to him is the end of the supreme first beyond joy, hidden in all the tantras, distinguished by the last of the last." Here, so that the childish may for the moment understand through the earlier stations, that which begins in the waning fortnight and ends in the waxing, hidden in all the tantras, is to be shown to the disciple, the supreme person. That is the meaning.

This is also stated in the Net of Illusion: "Free of attachment, the first is greatly attached." Likewise, in the tantra called the Supreme Primordial Buddha it is said: "Filled with the latent imprints of both sides, unmixed." The meaning is that suchness itself is to be shown in a way that does not contradict any of the tantras.

"Having properly engaged in the vajra offering, the goddess then asked him: What is the instant of that deity? May the great chief explain it." Here Nairātmyā asked the Blessed One: by what instant does one abide in the deity of bliss, and how is it to be realized? And the Blessed One answered in turn:

"There, there is no beginning, middle, or end. It is neither existence nor nirvāṇa. This is itself supreme great bliss, neither self nor other."

The instant of that goddess is existence, that is, passing on from the thirty-two places. It is not nirvāṇa, since it has not passed beyond by any gate. It is also what is meant by "no beginning, end, or middle," and by "neither self nor other"; it is also the instant that is free of defining characteristics.

As it is likewise said in the Tantra of the Equal Union of All Buddhas: "Without beginning or end, peaceful, the chief is without being and without nonbeing; emptiness and compassion are inseparable, and this is called the awakening mind." Therefore the meaning of this vajra word is to be realized and understood in this way.

"From the two waves of enjoyment, with one's own right and left hands, with thumb and ring finger, the yogin now presses." Here the skilled vajra master keeps it secret with secrecy from the disciple who stands in the stream of flowing water on the two sides of his own banner. Likewise, by the power of whatever samādhi one has pressed, it goes by the right and comes by the left; this is the meaning. And likewise, if for some persons wholly bound by conceptual thought the master actually presses with his right and left hands at the right and left of the site of the wheel of complete enjoyment, then wisdom will arise from it. What arises from it? "It is like the joy of a youth, or like the dream of a mute." Here this is distinguished by a difference among three states, and the distinction is that it is different from the realm of expression. For example, a monk who has attained the absorption at the peak of the fourth meditative concentration has a bliss, and what arises is something even more excellent than that; this is the sense. This meaning is also stated in the root tantra called the Supreme First: "Bliss gained through youthful vigor is the great bliss of one's own awareness; likewise, without absorption one cannot speak of bliss." The meaning is to be understood fully.

"The supreme is free of extremes and of joy, in the center." This was shown extensively above. "Empty and not empty, Heruka": the sense is that it will be realized, and the words are to be construed accordingly. Empty is that by which one crosses over; not empty is existence, that is, it does not abide in the maṇḍala of the thirty-two. This is the meaning.

This concludes the fifth chapter, the extensive explanation of the arising of Hevajra, from the Extensive Explanation of the Definitive Meaning of Hevajra.

Having paid homage to the wondrous, marvelous one who has a form in order to tame beings, Vajragarbha writes out the sequence of the "debt." Now, in order to introduce childlike persons, and in order to show an artificial maṇḍala on cloth and the like, in distinction from the maṇḍala as it truly is, the text first says, "Having first embraced the goddess and experienced the bliss of union," and so on. It should be construed thus: the Blessed One, having brought to completion an immeasurable treatise on the dance, taught the rite.

Of these, first, the meaning of the five mudrās taught in the chapter on conduct is to be distinguished as outer and inner and held by those who abide in the yoga of conduct, as was well explained in that very context. In this context of drawing the "debt" painting, in order to show that the master should not be disparaged on account of his own five pledges, and should be served in every respect, the text begins by saying: "First, the five mudrās being distinguished, the lama, the master, and the chosen deity are honored; the wheel is taught for the sake of homage," and on through "the belt itself for the sake of serving the mudrā," and so on. Of the distinction into outer and inner, the outer is just as the words say, as taught in the tantra. The definitive meaning is as stated in the root tantra itself. "The lama, master, and chosen deity" means that, in order to realize that the source of weighty qualities abides in the maṇḍala of the thirty-two, it is marked by the wheel for the sake of reverence. In order to turn back unruly persons who revile that very thing, and so that one does not decline from one's own abode, it is marked by the earrings. In order to strive to keep the life-wind from perishing, it is marked by the necklace. So as not to cut the life of the awakening mind, it is marked by the bracelets. So as not to transgress the maṇḍala of the sixty-four grounds of bliss, it is marked by the belt.

Therefore it is said: "Always seal the body with the mudrās of the five buddhas." In meaning, what is subtle in the five abodes of the life-wind of all embodied beings, that is to be understood as "always seal the body with the mudrās."

Then "having burst into laughter," and so on, through "the painting of Kye's vajra itself, the method of making it, was spoken by great bliss": this is to be connected as the question asked by Nairātmayā about how one draws the painting for the sake of the child. The answer is shown by "Here the painter is one who keeps the pledges, and the practitioner too is one who keeps the pledges; the painting, too, is the drawing of the terrifying," and so on. In this way, the practitioner, the painter, and whoever and whatever engages in the work of the picture are to be those who mostly abide in the path of the inseparability of emptiness and compassion, and who have supreme faith in the way of secret mantra. This is how it is to be construed.

Now the meaning of the limbs is shown. The root text says: "In the skull-vessel of a man, five colors, with a brush of a corpse's hair, one should paint the unsurpassed painted image." The sense is this. The five colors are placed in a skull-vessel of a man, and a brush is made from the hair of a man who has died. The five colors, according to their natural qualities, are set in the skull of that particular man.

Likewise: "In the yoga of the pledge and the blessing, on the fourteenth day of the dark half of the lunar month, in a deserted house, with the mind of a fierce one who has split it open," and so forth. What is meant is this. Whatever objects are needed, one should bless them and put them to use as the lord of the practitioner, the master, instructs. On the fourteenth, the new-moon day of the dark half, one enjoys the feast in a secluded place. The painter and the practitioner himself should be naked, adorned with bone ornaments and smeared with ash, and should paint while eating the impure pledge substances.

Likewise, further: "A woman of good countenance who possesses compassion, who has beauty, youth and good fortune, adorned with flowers, delights the practitioner. One should place one's own consort on the left." That is, the practitioner or the painter places on his left a consort like himself, such as Nairātmyā. Then, abiding in the undivided path, he paints the image for the sake of his aim. This is the definitive meaning according to the Vajra-holder.

This is the sixth chapter, the extensive explanation of painting for the sake of one's aim, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Homage to Kye-vajra, who shows the gross and the subtle directly. The Vajra Heart sets down the extensive explanation through the collection of the sūtra volumes and through the good discipline.

Now, in order to show the stages for writing the volume of Hevajra, the feast gathering taught in the chapter on empowerment, and the stages of the vehicle that children may realize, the text says: "Then the goddess asked him," and so forth. Having satisfied her with the treatise on painting for one's aim, he declared: "I shall explain the volume. Great goddess, of great fortune, listen." The meaning is this. O great goddess, a pledge-holder who writes should write the volume, twelve finger-widths in size, with the hot blood of a great bee and with a pen made from a human bone. In this way, the essence of the sun and the moon, thoroughly purified, is mixed into the blood. The volume is made to measure twelve finger-widths, purified as the twelve links of dependent origination. What is made in this way gives the accomplishment of joy by the power of its natural qualities. That is the definitive point.

"If one without good fortune sees the volume or the painted image, he will have no accomplishment in this life, and in other worlds it will not be his domain." Thus, a volume or a painted cloth accomplished flawlessly through the oral instruction of the master and the blessing of my own power, if shown even once to a person of childish mind who lacks good fortune, causes both kinds of accomplishment to be lost. Therefore the text says: "It should be guarded everywhere with effort."

"To one who has genuine faith, show it only occasionally." This means that one shows it for an instant to a person who has faith and devotion. When offerings, reverence and so forth come first, the showing is not stained by the fault of flaws.

"On the road, in travel, hide the volume in the hair and under the arm." This means that when traveling on roads or to other lands one hides the volume in the hair. The painting itself is put inside a smooth, beautiful, shining case and carried under the left arm.

Now, in order to show the special features of the feast offering, he says: "Having arranged the bhaga and liṅga, repeatedly make the cry 'O!'" and so forth. By its power it destroys plague, white hair, wrinkles and the like, delights ordinary people, and increases radiance with flesh and blood. That is what is to be explained.

Therefore he declares: "Listen to the food of the feast gathering, O wide-eyed goddess. By eating it, all desires and the accomplishments of the practitioner come about." The meaning of this vajra word should be understood in two ways, as definitive and as provisional.

First, for the place of the outer feast food, the text indicates: "A charnel ground, the shelter of a mountain bird, likewise an uninhabited city, or a solitary place, or the shore of the ocean." The meaning is that one begins in a place where no non-Buddhists and the like, nor any wild ordinary people, ever come. Now, in these outer places, eating meat such as that of the bola and drinking liquor, and joining in union with the female organ, cannot bring about the desired accomplishments. If such things were to become the desired accomplishments of those people, then the eighty-four thousand heaps of Dharma would be pointless, and the perfect effort of the yogī would be destroyed. Therefore the teaching that one obtains the desired accomplishments by honoring with a feast of food, drink and so forth is merely a provisional teaching for ordinary people.

As the definitive meaning, relying on some place not stained by any conceptual thought, one is intoxicated by the essence prepared and burned in the fire of life force. Eating to satisfaction and abiding there increases life, and one is given a radiance like that of Vajradhara. That is the definitive meaning.

"This food is the supreme food. For a seat, consider nine corpse forms, or else a tiger skin, or likewise a charnel-ground cloth." Regarding this, one who wishes to perform this feast gathering should seat monks, nuns, householder yogīs, elders, and the rest each in their own separate rows, and should carefully guard against unruly people. Likewise, one invites yoginīs of the families of Gaurī and the rest. One is placed to the left of the chief figure, and the remaining eight are invited to sit in order, in the petal directions and the intermediate directions. For each of them, a human skin one cubit in size, with her own form painted on it, is offered as a seat. For the chief figure, the skin of a tiger, an elephant or a cow is offered as a seat.

Or else, for all of them, one may offer simply human skin alone, or simply tiger skin alone, or simply elephant skin alone, or simply cow skin alone, or simply cloth from the charnel ground alone, offering to each whatever can be found. For this reason it was said at length:

In the center, the form of Hevajra.
Knowing the placement as before,
in the directions and the intermediate directions as well, then arrange the yoginīs.

In the same way, all the food too should be laid out upon tiger skins and the like, as much as is available. Likewise:

Having eaten there again and again,
there too the mothers are to be honored.

This means that the outer foods and drinks are purified, realized, and transformed, made into nectar, and then eaten, and that, again and again, one realizes bliss with the goddesses through union (mithuna). As for the yoginīs, it is certain that one first purifies them well, in terms of earth, water, fire, wind and so on, as sisters, daughters, female companions, nieces, wives and the like, and then makes offerings to them. In the same way:

Having always honored them well,
the maṇḍala of the gathering will be accomplished.

To honor them well means this: if one honors with the awakening mind that does not turn back, those who are unseen and unknown to outsiders, such as the mother and the sister, then one honors well, and it is certain that the maṇḍala of the gathering will be accomplished. In the same way, the drinking vessels are to be skull fragments of a person, each a single piece, filled with grape wine and the like, and offered.

Offer to the guru the share of the greatest portion.

Having bowed, drink oneself as well.

What is taken with the lotus hand, with that same hand it is offered.

Bowing deeply again and again,
there the practitioner is to act.

This means that the yoginīs, and the yogins together with the chief, should partake well in this way. All of them, with palms joined at the crown as the preliminary, bow to the master, and having made the offering with the lotus hand, they then partake as they please. In the same way, the cup is to be passed around the entire circle by the lotus hand, and then taken back by that same hand. In terms of the definitive meaning, the drink that is like nectar is passed continuously from the wheel of bliss up to the tip of the banner, and then sent back to its own place, so that one is satisfied by the taking. This is the instruction of the Tathāgata.

This is the seventh chapter, the extensive explanation of writing the book and of the feast-gathering foods, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

Then the yoginī asked:

What is the great mudrā like?

Please explain bliss and the rest through the form of the conventional aspect.

Thus the yoginīs and the rest made their request to the Blessed One, the great bliss, that is, they questioned Hevajra. Here the meaning of what was asked is this: Kye, Blessed One, the intrinsic nature of the great mudrā abides in nothing at all, is inexpressible, without support, without object, and abides nowhere. Since there is no doubt about it, how are those who are covered by the stains of self and what belongs to self to realize the way of it? The Blessed One then spoke again:

Neither very long nor short, neither black nor white,
like the form of a lotus petal.

and so on. In this way, one should rely on consorts born from the four families, from the twelfth year of age up to the twentieth, and she will become the sign, not otherwise. Their characteristics are these: the body is neither very tall nor too short; neither as deeply dark as eye-salve nor as very white as ash. This concerns the distinctions of complexion, and the extremes of their coloring are to be avoided. What, then, is it like? One should take one with a slightly bluish tinge that stays steady. Likewise, the eyes are like lotus petals, white mixed with red, somewhat long. The breath of the mouth is supremely fragrant, and the blood of the moon-sign has a fragrance like perfume. The lotus of the birth place, from time to time, gives off a scent like sarjarāja resin, and sometimes a scent like a lotus, and from time to time a scent like the utpala and like black agarwood. The wise should recognize these as good fragrances and take such a woman. Likewise, the signs of natural abiding are these: her deportment is gentle and free of coarseness; she listens when others speak, speaks plainly yet slowly; her hair is dark and soft, thick at the partings and long; and in the middle of her forehead there are three lines present by nature. One of this kind is highly praised by the Sugatas, as was also said, "the secret limb." If, applying all effort, one practices with her according to the guru's instruction, one will without doubt attain the accomplishment of the great mudrā. Moreover, as for such a consort, ordinary worldly people who do not know her take her to have the ordinary birth place of a woman. She is not like that, for it is said:

The one with form, born together.

And:

Having found her, accomplishment will come.

This means that if one finds a consort endowed with such perfect qualities and practices relying on her according to the guru's instruction, the accomplishment of the great mudrā will come about. This is the certainty of the Tathāgata. Such a consort is explained as the great mudrā possessing conventional form. That is the meaning.

Then the yoginī Nairātmyā asked: Blessed One, how should aspirations be made? Nairātmyā said this: Kye, Blessed One, how should those who dwell in this great secret of Hevajra make their aspirations? Having thus asked, the Blessed One then spoke again as follows.

May I be born in the family of those who drink the nectar of the pledge, free from madness. May I be born as one who shows the Kye Vajra, keeping the pledge, endowed with compassion and devoted to the guru. May I ring the vajra bell in my hand, teach the profound Dharma, and share and partake of the consorts' seed. May I be born as one who eats it.

This is what was said. One who is intoxicated by the liquor of the bliss that flows is mad; but one who has the bliss of drinking without emission is free of madness. Therefore the meaning is: may I be born into the family of those who drink the nectar of the pledge, free from madness. Never separated from the pledges of the sixteen compassions, may I teach the Dharma to all sentient beings through the expression "Kye" and through the symbol called "vajra." May I have undivided compassion for all sentient beings, and likewise the focus on all sentient beings, the focus on phenomena, and the absence of focus, which is the quality of the waxing moon. Because the cause that brings the state of Vajradhara the Great comes from the vase of the venerable guru's mouth, may I always be devoted to the guru. May I take in hand the vajra and bell, the nature of the path of sun and moon, emptiness and compassion made inseparable and perfectly pure, and may I make them resound. May I always have the practice of reading the scripture of the Kye Vajra itself, which shows that very reality. The recitation of the life-wind through the gates of the vowels and consonants is the reading of the profound Dharma, so may I read such Dharma. And may I eat, from birth to birth, bringing into balance the blissful seed of consorts such as Rūpavajrā and others such as the Mistress of the Expanse of Space. By this, the aspiration is to be made. Such is the meaning.

Then the goddess, pleased, asked these very words again: By what means can the unfortunate beings, hard to tame, be tamed? So says the text. Nairātmyā again asked the Blessed One: Blessed One, in the latter time, when strife flourishes, by what means shall I bring the hard-to-tame, unruly beings into the Kye Vajra? And the Blessed One spoke again:

First give the restoration ceremony. After that, the ten bases of training. Then teach the Vaibhāṣika, and likewise the Sautrāntika. Then the Yogācāra itself, and after that, teach the Madhyamaka.

This is what he said. When bringing hard-to-tame people to the Kye Vajra, one should first teach and train them well in the restoration ceremony. One should cultivate taking up the ten virtues and fully cut off the ten non-virtues. To a person established in that, one should then teach the doctrines of the several philosophical schools. In this way: space, analytical cessation, and non-analytical cessation, these three, are unconditioned, and everything other than them is of the nature of the moment. They are empty of intrinsic nature, and there is no agent at all. By a cognition relying on a sense faculty without images, these accumulated subtle particles come to be known directly. One should teach that this is what the Kashmiri Vaibhāṣikas assert. Likewise, one should teach that the Sautrāntikas hold that the arising of a cognition endowed with an aspect, as the Vaibhāṣikas assert, is not so: appearances are not the domain of the senses, being like a flower in the sky or the son of a barren woman; cessations are like space; the three times have no pursuit; and a form deprived of tangibility that obstructs does not exist either. And likewise, one should teach that the Yogācārins say that a composite substance made of an assembly of subtle particles does not exist; that individual appearance without subtle particles is not apprehended, being like the experience of a dream; and that consciousness, free of the stains of grasped and grasper, like pure crystal, self-aware, exists ultimately. The wise do not accept that consciousness exists ultimately, because it lacks the reasoning of the one and the many in its nature, and so is like a flower in the sky. Thus mind and word are neither existent nor nonexistent, and beyond existence and nonexistence. That suchness, liberated from the four extremes and so forth, is what the great yogic Madhyamikas hold. After thus teaching all the philosophical tenets, if one then brings the person into the Kye Vajra, he will certainly succeed. Such is the meaning.

When the disciple receives it with devotion, there is no doubt that he will succeed in this. So it says, meaning that unfortunate beings are to be led in just this sequence, and not otherwise. Likewise it is said in the Net of Illusion: By three vehicles one emerges; by one vehicle one abides in the fruit.

This concludes the eighth chapter, the extensive explanation of taming, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Kye Vajra.

Having prostrated to the Sovereign Lord, the great king of the enjoyment body, complete body, and emanation, the extensive explanation of the collected mantras will be written by Vajragarbha. Then the characteristics of distinguishing and joining will be rightly explained. So it begins, and so on. If one knows as it is the nature of the mantras of the vowels and consonants, then all wished-for accomplishments, worldly and beyond the world, will be in the palm of one's hand. About this it says: By the mere awareness of whom the practitioner obtains accomplishment, at the root of the navel of the one to be accomplished, one seizes it with the hand of one who keeps the observance. This is said so that whoever harms the Buddha's teaching, or destroys the forms of buddhas, gurus, and so on, is to be petitioned to the Sage Guru and killed through great compassion, and not otherwise.

In the same way, in the center of the maṇḍala of the sixty-four accomplishments to be achieved, one invites the co-emergent deity by the hand of the practitioner's own meditative absorption, and the practitioner himself, as the verse says, "With Heruka in equal union, by the mind that is the inner demon," becomes the Heruka maṇḍala together with Nairātmyā. By the vajra words "the color is to be differentiated according to the type of action," one generates the entire maṇḍala assembly in the color black, in the family of aversion. If one then slays, even a buddha will inevitably be destroyed.

"As when seeing the form of a beast, vomiting blood, trembling, with hair loosened, with the mouth downward, one should meditate." This means: one sees the person as like the form of a beast, vomiting blood from the mouth, the body trembling, the hair loosened, and one imagines him sitting before oneself in a crouch. In the same way, through his lower opening, one makes many forms blazing like needles of fire enter; and if one visualizes in his heart a fire maṇḍala with the letter raṃ, then without any doubt he will be destroyed in that very instant. So it was taught.

The definitive meaning of this should be understood from what the root tantra says: "The one who consumes offerings, the fire god, is stirred by the wind; the awakening mind, haṃ, looks downward. When one is intoxicated with bliss, one trembles and the face looks downward."

"In this tantra there is no fire offering, no binding of mudrās, no activity; it is accomplished by reading the great tantra; it will be accomplished by meditation alone." This means: it is not accomplished by outer fire offerings, by binding mudrās with the hands, by reading the tantra as words, or by the deity yoga alone. Rather, one binds the mudrā of the lion's play in the fire of non-anger, recites with the breath of one's own life-force, and accomplishes it through meditation like space. This is what is shown.

"The giver of nonconceptual accomplishment, delightful in the union of existence, I shall explain by the supreme secret. Listen, goddess of fair form." This means: the Blessed One Vajradhara says, "I shall explain to you, goddess, the great secret of all the buddhas, the means of utterly purifying existence itself."

"See, goddess, the garland blazing with the splendor of jewels, disarrayed. Unstrung, it is without union; strung, it gives delight." This is an example: when a garland of jewels blazes with radiant light and is delightful, if it is not strung it does not perform its function, but if it is strung it accomplishes every function.

"Thus, for one who desires saṃsāra, the jewel endowed with the five qualities, when impure, becomes poison; when pure, it becomes like nectar." This means that the natures of saṃsāra are neither pure nor impure; by the difference in the practitioners' attitudes they abide as poison or as nectar. Therefore, if one has faith, by the guru's instruction, that saṃsāra, which is like poison, is like nectar, then "the aspect of saṃsāra is Heruka, the chief liberator of beings, he who has become form." This means that existence itself is the cause of nirvāṇa.

Moreover, one should apprehend it thus: "The eye of compassion is red; from the heart of loving-kindness the limbs are black." The yogī should take such signs as these in faith and teach them to others too. Up to the passage "the bones are the four truths," it is shown in this way; and one should understand, as a provisional and as a definitive meaning, that by virtue of the qualities of its nature it is gathered into the sides of father and mother.

Now, in order, comes the method of gathering the mantras. Nairātmyā asked Hevajra, "How is the mantra to be gathered?" and so forth. The Blessed One then replied, "I shall explain the mantra to you; listen, goddess of great wisdom." The extensive meaning of this is taught at length in the root tantra of five hundred thousand verses, so one should enter into it from there.

"One who wishes to know the mantras as they are should bow to the master, bow down with supreme faith, and request, 'Grant me the reality of the mantra.' Then the fortunate guru, in a place without outsiders, should smear the ground well with pure cow dung, and draw well, with a string of powdered stone, the supreme maṇḍala of Hevajra, with eight petals and a pistil, adorned with four doors and four porticoes, fully endowed with eight pillars. Then he should lay out the two groups of syllables. In the center are Hevajra and Nairātmyā, drawn in the form of the skull cup and the curved knife. On its first petal the skilled one writes the sixteen vowels; on the second the five beginning with ka; on the third, the wise one writes the five beginning with ca; on the fourth he writes the five beginning with ṭa; likewise on the fifth the five groups beginning with ta; on the sixth the group of the waters; on the seventh he writes the semivowels; on the eighth he writes the group of the warm sounds. At the four doors he draws the hook, the noose, and the rest. Contemplating the eight goddesses well, he places the master's consort at the left. Having honored well with various kinds of offerings, he gathers the secret mantra. Then the supreme disciple is made to receive it with great reverence. Whoever takes it otherwise, on his own whim, has no result and is ruined."

"First give Vairocana": this is om̐. "The fourth of the ūṣmas" is ha. "Adorned with the Pukkasī's consonant" means adorned with u. "Pressed down by the empty" means that its crown is adorned with a drop. "White in color; at the end add svāhā. By this, with a hundred thousand recitations, one always paralyzes beings." This means: first recite the number of syllables, one hundred thousand, according to the guru's instruction, and if one performs the preliminary approach with the ten-part fire offering, one paralyzes the three worlds.

"First place the lord of the letters": this is om̐. "Then Khecarī" is am̐. "At the end add svāhā. Even buddhas are brought under control." This means: if one recites according to the above instruction and even buddhas are brought under control, what need to speak of lesser beings.

"Give the first of the Vedas": this is om̐. "The second of the first" is kha. "With the empty" means adorned with a drop.

At the end it is joined with svāhā. The buddhas themselves are driven out by one who has wisdom. This is the gathering of the mantra that expels, as before.

At the beginning place Vairocana. That is om̐. In the third of the second set. That is ja. Joined with ra: that is, ja adorned with the letter ra. Adorned with Caurī: adorned with the vowel i. With the zero: above it, adorned with the drop. Svāhā well joined with ra. It makes all people hateful. This is the gathering of the mantra that causes hatred.

At the beginning set the lord of letters. That is om̐. The third of the fifth set: that is ba. With the zero: adorned with the drop. Joined with the ḍākinī: at its end the vowel u is subjoined. At the end svāhā, the great fierce rite. This is the gathering of the letters of the fierce rite.

Again give the head of the letters. That is oṃ. Hūṃ is like blood: after it place hūṃ. At the end svāhā: after that, svāhā is to be joined. If one recites it, Tilottamā and Dga' bzang ma and others are always summoned. Thus it is taught. This is the gathering of the letters that summon. If one recites it according to the rite, even a divine maiden such as Tilottamā is drawn, so what need is there to mention other women?

The family of delusion is placed at the beginning. That is oṃ. Ghuḥ is well and thoroughly joined: after oṃ, ghuḥ is placed. At the end, well joined with svāhā. It kills gods and humans. That is, ghuḥ with svāhā at its end is the gathering of the letters that kill. If one recites it according to the rite, even one like a buddha can be made to fall, so what need is there to mention the lesser gods and humans of the three worlds? They would be killed.

At the beginning place Vairocana. That is oṃ. The first of the first set: that is ka. Joined with the vajra ḍākinī: below that ka, subjoin u. The second of those standing at the end: that is ra. Endowed with the vajra ḍākinī: subjoin u to that ra. Again, on the tip of the first: that is ka. Endowed with the vajra ḍākinī: subjoin the letter u to it. The third of those standing at the end: that is la. Again, well joined with that same: again subjoin that same u to it. Adorned above with Caurī: that is, adorn it above with e. After that, adorned with hrīḥ: at the end of those mantras, place hrīḥ. At the end again, svāhā is done. This is the gathering of the mantra of Kurukullā.

Oṃ at the beginning. The third of the fourth set: that is da. Adorned with Caurī: adorned with e. The fourth of those standing at the end: that is va. Join bi, cu, vajra: after va, subjoin pi, cu, vajra. The fourth of the sibilants: that is ha. Adorned with puk-ka-sī-sa: that ha is to be adorned with u. Pressed down by the zero and tripled: crown that ha with a drop, and set that same hūṃ, so adorned, three times. The second of the fifth set: that is pha. The first of the third set: that is ṭa. At the end svāhā: at the end of these mantra lines svāhā is to be joined. This is the gathering of the heart mantra of Hevajra.

Vairocana first, then jvala twice: first place oṃ, and after it join jvala twice. The fourth of the fifth set: that is bha. Joined with the first of those standing at the end: subjoin ya to that bha. Adorned with gha-sma-rī: adorn that same with o. The fourth of the sibilants: that is ha. Adorned with the vajra ḍākinī: subjoin u to the sibilant. Pressed down by the zero: press it above with a drop. Tripled: set that same letter three times. The second of the fifth set: that is pha. The first of the third: that is ṭa. At the end svāhā: at the end of the mantra lines so spoken, svāhā is to be joined. This is the gathering of the mantra of the four-armed one.

First Vairocana: that is oṃ. The first of the first: that is ka. Adorned with the inner Gaurī: adorned with i. The first of the third: that is ṭa. Adorned with the inner Gaurī: adorn it with i. Doubled: that same is recited twice. The third of the fifth set: that is ba. The third of the second set: that is ja. Adorned with fire: subjoin ra to that ja. Joining three hūṃs: after those mantra lines, three hūṃs are to be joined. The second of the fifth: that is pha. The first of the third: that is ṭa. At the end svāhā: at the end of those mantra words svāhā is to be joined. This is the gathering of the mantra of the six-armed one.

First Vairocana: that is oṃ. The first of the fourth set: that is ta. Well joined with Yamī: subjoin ra to that ta. Adorned with Vetālī: above that ta, adorn it with e. The third of those standing at the end: that is la. Adorned with gha-sma-rī: on its tip adorn it with o. The first of the first: that is ka. The first of those standing at the end: subjoin ya to ka. Adorned with Vajrā: subjoin a to it. Kṣa adorned with Caurī: adorn that letter with e. The first of the fifth: that is pa. The fourth of the sibilants: that is ha. Adorned with the vajra ḍākinī: subjoin u to ha. Pressed down by the zero: above it, adorn it with a drop. Tripled: set that same letter three times. Phaṭ, and at the end svāhā: at the end of those mantra lines phaṭ and svāhā are to be joined. This is the gathering of the mantra of the two-armed one.

Nairātmyā: that is a. The first of the first: that is ka. The first of the second: that is ca. The first of the third: that is ṭa. The first of the fourth: that is ta. The first of the fifth: that is pa. The first of those standing at the end: that is ya.

The first of the heat letters is "śa." The words "first Vairocana, at the end svāhā" mean this: at the beginning of those mantra lines place oṃ, and at the end add svāhā; recite the mantra a hundred thousand times, according to the number of its syllables, and burn the materials required for that fire offering. If one has first done the preliminary approach, one can throw into turmoil even a dense, richly arrayed city that is like the dwelling place of the buddhas, so what need is there to speak of the cities of ordinary beings of the three worlds being thrown into turmoil.

"The second of the final-standing letters" is "ra." "Kṣaye, doubling the line" means that this very letter is to be written twice. "Endowed with three forms of HŪṢ" means that after it three HŪṢs are to be added. "At the beginning Vairocana, with phaṭ, bring it inside, at the end svāhā" means that at the beginning of the preceding mantra lines om̐ is placed and at the end svāhā is added, and after that, joined with phaṭ, this is the mantra for purifying the ground. This completes the gathering of the mantra.

"First Vairocana" means om̐. "Then that of Vajrā" means āḥ. "At the end HŪṂ" means that after this the HŪṂ itself is added. "Blessing food and drink" means that food and drink are to be blessed with the three syllables of body, speech, and mind; this is to be understood in terms of both the provisional and the definitive meaning.

"First Vairocana" means that om̐ is placed first. "Then akāro mukhaṃ" means that these are added after it.

"The third of the heat letters" is "sa." "The fourth of the final-standing letters" is "va." "Above, adorned with the form of fire" means that above it is placed "ra." "Dharmāṇām, then Vajrā" means that after it dharmāṇām is added, and then āḥ is placed, and then "dyānutpannatvāt" is placed, so that these syllables are inserted. After that, again, om̐ āḥ HŪṂ phaṭ svāhā is the gathering of the mantra of the tormā offering for all spirits.

So when the mantra is gathered and recited with such a ritual procedure, one will attain accomplishment as taught in the tantra, and not otherwise. This is the meaning.

This is the ninth chapter, the extensive explanation of the gathering of the mantra, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra.

Bowing in reverence to the one who holds the vajra, who is like the weapon of Śakra (Indra), I shall set forth in detail the varieties of the rosary, so that beings may take up the path. Then the Blessed One, in whom all phenomena are gathered as one, was called Vajrasattva. Having joined in union with Nairātmyā, he taught the distinctions concerning the objects of recitation.

On the conventional level, just as fire arises from the striking of stone against iron, from rubbing wood against wood, or from a crystal exposed to moonlight or a sun-crystal exposed to sunlight, through the force of their natural qualities, so too the accomplishments of the world arise from dependent origination, it is taught. Here too the tantra should be understood in the same way.

"Recitation with crystal for pacifying; for subjugation, red sandalwood; with the thorn-apple seed for fierce rites; with nirasa for hatred" is what is taught. The person who wishes to accomplish the rite of pacifying should recite with a crystal rosary, and through the earth-kasiṇa concentration at the navel maṇḍala the accomplishment will come about. The person devoted to yoga who wishes to subjugate should recite with a red sandalwood rosary, endowed with the meditative absorption of fire at the maṇḍala of the throat, and accomplishment will come about. Likewise, one who wishes to devote himself to fierce rites should recite with thorn-apple seed, endowed with the earth concentration. The yogin devoted to the rite of causing hatred should recite with a rosary of human bone, likewise endowed with the earth concentration. One who wishes to devote himself to the rite of banishing should recite with horse bone, endowed with the wind concentration at the heart. One who wishes to devote himself to the rite of summoning should recite with the bone of a brahmin, endowed with the water concentration at the forehead. One who wishes to devote himself to the rite of bringing down rain should recite with elephant bone, endowed with the water concentration at the forehead. One who wishes to devote himself to the rite of killing should recite with buffalo bone, endowed with the space concentration at the crown of the head.

Likewise, for the rite of pacifying, because the body is to be made soft, one should partake of milk. "For subjugation, partake according to one's own wish" is what is taught: milk and so forth, whatever is suitable, and as one desires, one should partake of. "For killing, siṃhala" is taught: for the rite of killing one should partake of siṃhala or blood. Likewise, for summoning, what is called "the four equal ones"; likewise, for causing hatred, what is called sālija; and for banishing, the navel of a deer, one should partake of. Or else: "the flesh of the end" means horse flesh; "the first flesh" means dog flesh; "na, the first" means human flesh; "ga, the first" means cow flesh; and "ha, the first also" means elephant flesh. In this way one should partake of whatever is appropriate. This is the meaning.

This is the tenth chapter, the extensive explanation of the objects of recitation, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of the Hevajra.

For the benefit of all sentient beings, to engage in the aims of the buddhas, I bow to Hevajra and write the extensive explanation of the practice of innate union. Embracing Kye-vajra tightly, kissing with lips pressed, "the form of the families of embodied beings": thus Nairātmyā made her request. In this and what follows, Nairātmyā, having well honored the Blessed One Hevajra with offerings that have reached the far shore of great bliss, asks: on the conventional level, by the force of natural qualities, how are the marks of the families of embodied beings to be indicated? To this the Blessed One replied to Nairātmyā: "Having placed the liṅga in the bhaga, the lord of the maṇḍala spoke thus," and so on. "I shall explain the families of embodied beings: Perfection of Wisdom, listen." This is what is taught. On the conventional level, by the force of nature and qualities, whatever mark belongs to whichever family, that I shall explain to you, goddess. "Kye, goddess, listen well and respectfully." This is the meaning.

This means that when a man or a woman has, at the joint at the root of the thumb, a line like a nine-pointed vajra, that person is blessed as belonging to the family of Akṣobhya. By the force of natural qualities, that person's complexion also stays dark, and the rite of killing succeeds.

"One becomes of the wheel of Vairocana."

In the same way, when someone has a line like a white eight-spoked wheel, that person is blessed by Vairocana. By the force of natural qualities, that person's complexion also stays white, and the rite of pacifying succeeds.

"The measure of the span of Amitābha's light."

In the same way, when someone has a line like a red eight-petalled lotus, that person is blessed by Amitābha, the Boundless Light. By the force of natural qualities, that person's complexion stays white tinged with red, and the rite of attracting succeeds.

"The jewel of Ratnasambhava."

In the same way, when someone has a line like a yellow eight-cornered jewel, that person is blessed by Ratnasambhava. By the force of natural qualities, that person's complexion stays yellow, and rites such as the rite of paralyzing succeed.

"The sword of the family of Karma."

In the same way, when someone has a line like a sword, bluish-green in color, that person is blessed by Amoghasiddhi. By the force of natural qualities, that person's complexion stays bluish-green, and rites such as the rite of expelling succeed.

"The yogī who is white and yellow belongs to the family of the sattva."

In the same way, one whose complexion is white and yellow is blessed by Vajrasattva, and all rites will succeed for that person.

"People who have reached the culmination of yoga, who are not broken by pride and not puffed up with arrogance, abiding in conventional form, will belong to the family of the Sugata."

This means that, in this way, all these men and women are blessed by the buddhas of the five families, or of the six families, and so on. Therefore they should not be angry with or hostile toward one another, for without doubt they all possess the natural qualities of heroes. As this same Condensed Tantra says: "Merely by harming beings one will not attain the accomplishment of the mudrā."

Furthermore: the vajra family is at the crown; the Amitābha family is at the forehead; the jewel family is at the throat; the Amoghasiddhi family is at the heart; the Vairocana family is at the navel; the family of the sattva is at the secret place. Likewise, in the eight-petalled lotus of the heart: the east is the family of Amoghasiddhi; the south is the family of the jewel; the west is the family of Vairocana; the north is the family of Amitābha; the center is the family of Akṣobhya. Likewise, the vowel A is in the center; I is in the east; Ṛ is in the south; Ḍ is in the west; U is in the north. Furthermore, wind is in the east, fire in the south, earth in the west, and water in the north; space should be understood to be in the center.

This means that, just as the signs and colors of the heroes are described in relation to men, so they should be shown for women. Therefore, for whatever man or woman one desires the accomplishment of the karma mudrā, one should recognize the forms, marks, and signs that have been taught, and take hold of them. This is the Tathāgata's instruction.

"By way of conventional convention, one becomes also of that family."

This means that, conventionally, by the force of natural qualities, one succeeds by taking up the family appropriate to each person.

"Having made the liṅga in the bhaga, the Great Vajra, pleased with it, was addressed by Nairātmyā, who made the intention known. Listen, goddess, to the supreme worship."

This means: having recognized one another's families as described above, one should seek the supreme place of the great mudrā; listen, it will be taught. The root tantra also says that all desired accomplishments arise from the rite of joining the bhaga and the liṅga, so one should become skilled in union by the method of the bhaga and the liṅga.

Furthermore, the same tantra says: "However the nature of beings may be tamed, in just that way one should purify desire and the rest for the sake of beings." And again: "For the benefit of beings and for the sake of the buddhas' teaching, even if one conceals everything from beings, one is not stained by sin." And: "There is no bliss like desire; offer it to the Victor. By relying on another's wife for the sake of beings, one will gain merit." This and more is taught at length.

Therefore, in order to seek the innate wisdom in a consort who has the proper family, one should also practice the methods of embrace: "In a grove, in a place without people, or within one's own house, naked, having made the great mudrā, the yogī who knows should always worship." This means one should rely on her in these places, and as long as wisdom has not arisen, one should keep relying on her, with conduct that has elaboration. Otherwise, as the root tantra teaches, "Impure, abandoning the rites, without regard for food, clothing, and the like, in one's own house or elsewhere, one should always focus on this wisdom." This meaning should be thoroughly understood.

Furthermore, the characteristics of the treatise on passion, beginning "Having embraced with milk," and continuing through "looking above and below," are an extension of the meaning of the verses and a half. They should be treated in the manner of a chapter of a treatise on desire. Since this has no end, I do not elaborate here. I ask pardon of the heroes, the heroines, and the female sovereigns.

"Having obtained abundant accomplishments, one becomes equal to all the buddhas. There one should drink the camphor."

This means that, relying on whichever consorts there are, of the vajra family and so on, one should drink the stainless camphor, but not the stained; with the stained there is no accomplishment.

"For the sake of the camphor, one should eat meat, and above all, liquor."

This means that, in order to bring forth the stainless camphor in every respect, one should partake of all meats and all liquors, having purified them, realized them, and kindled them, and made them into nectar. By this the camphor will increase, such is the meaning.

Here ends the eleventh chapter, the extensive explanation of the chapter on the coemergent, from the extensive explanation of the definitive meaning of Hevajra.

I pay homage to the one who is neither existent nor nonexistent, nor both existent and nonexistent, who is freed from the four alternatives. The extensive explanation of the four, Vajragarbha has taken pains to write. Then the Vajra-holder spoke the very meaning of the four empowerments, and so on. This meaning is also clear in the root tantra of five hundred thousand verses, so one should enter into that. As it is said:

Divided into worldly and beyond the world, empowerment is spoken of as twofold. The desired fruit is twofold, and is said to arise from this very basis. Divided into body, speech, and mind, there are the vase, the secret, and the wisdom of discernment: three empowerments are taught. For the sake of body, speech, mind, and wisdom, there are four empowerments: the vase, the secret, the discerning wisdom, and the fourth, the wisdom empowerment.

Therefore:

The tantra of the Primordial Buddha, the tantras in seven, ten, and eleven parts, the great tantras of five hundred thousand verses and the rest, whatever there is, is taught there; here it is merely condensed.

Therefore the sequence, the purpose, and the purifications of the four empowerments, the eleven, and so on are made clear in those great tantras. Here the meaning is only briefly presented, so one should understand those sources.

As for the "fourth" here: by way of the provisional and the definitive, it exists in both the worldly and the transworldly. This statement gives the name "fourth" to the definitive, transworldly empowerment, the eleventh, because this very tantra says that everything is by fours.

The vajra is consecrated, the vajra itself. Hold the great bell as well. Today you become a vajra master. Make it your task to gather disciples. This is clear in the root tantra, so one should enter into that. As it is said:

You are blessed as emptiness and compassion. Emptiness and compassion are unbroken. Hold the vajra and the bell as symbols, and as you do, so teach others. You are the perfect master, you too are the venerable elder. You have become cool and unclouded, a monk, an arhat whose defilements are exhausted. Having wholly abandoned leaking desire, you have drawn out every thorn. You are the supreme person who benefits others, you are the buddha's own son made manifest.

From this, one should understand the meaning.

Just as the buddhas of the past gave empowerment to the bodhisattva sons, so by the great secret empowerment I empower the continuum of your mind. This means: just as the buddhas of the past empowered the bodhisattva sons of all buddhas with the fourth, the great secret of the buddhas, so, my son, I empower the continuum of your mind as a vajra, such is the meaning.

Goddess who grants joy and grants abiding, of varied form, pleasing to the mind: take it, take it, great being; take it and make offerings to it. Here, the one who grants joy and abiding is the emptiness of one's own awareness. "Varied" means that, abiding in this vajra path of emptiness, one teaches the Dharma with varied forms and with varied, pleasing sounds. "Take it" means to hold that in mind. "Make offerings" means that, by its power, the selfless woman of the family, with no arising of excrement, urine, and the like, becomes the offering.

"This wisdom is exceedingly subtle" means that it is hard to realize for ordinary people attached only to the bliss of the two organs. It is like the vajra, which is said to be like the expanse of space: it is hard to realize that space is without shape and substance. By clearing away the dust of the stains of affliction, such as leaking, and bestowing the state of peace, it is dustless, ultimate, and utterly peaceful. Because it arises from the limit of each realizing one's own mind, it is said, "you yourself are its father."

The consecration of the vajra and the lotus means that the ordinary bhaga and liṅga are consecrated into an indestructible nature, and that the rasanā and the lalanā channels are consecrated into the path of indestructibility, free of every kind of leaking. Oṃ means gathering in the breath.

Padma sukha dhāra mahā rāga sukha daṇḍa: this is because it bestows freedom from stain through the nature of leaking. Catura ānanda bhāga viśva hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ kāryaṃ kuru śāme: this is because, through the stainless empowerment of the four joys, one is able to teach the wheel of Dharma of varied kinds to all beings. Oṃ vajra mahādveṣa catura ānanda dāyaka means that, having vanquished ordinary aversion, one reveals the meaning of the four joys in great vajra aversion. Khagamukhaikāra sonātha hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ kāryaṃ kuru śāme: because the joy of all that is full arises in the sky, the faces of those who go there gather and become of one taste, and so one becomes the protector and refuge of the three existences; therefore it says, "Do what is to be done for me."

"At the crown, the form of oṃ" is the vajra of body, the channel through which the moon moves. "At the heart, the form of hūṃ" is the vajra of mind, the channel through which Rāhu moves. "At the navel, the form of āḥ" is the vajra of speech, the channel through which the sun moves. Thus, because everything is gathered into body, speech, and mind, it shows that one should not seek the meaning elsewhere.

The Veda, water, flowers, and the roots of dūrvā grass, the Brahmins' offering of ghee: these a buddhist should not accept. Fearing that empowerment, mantras, and the like would be harmed and fall into decline, one should not give a drink even to those of bad lineages and the like.

Vajragarbha wrote down the meaning of the explanation of Hevajra, which is the very self of the five hundred thousand verses, and also of the Great Tantra, the Supreme Primordial, the Tantra of a Hundred Thousand, the Abhidhāna, and others. What is explained here is for the most part the individual explanation of the root text. Thus whatever this tantra teaches at any time, in each case is shown clearly by this.

I have not taught this fully to hearers, who are ordinary people. Likewise it is not for the sake of solitary buddhas, nor is it for non-Buddhists. Nor is it for unruly and wicked kings, nor for those who revile the great secret. I have not taught this to those who revile the bodhisattvas or the guru.

To one who is deeply devoted to the supreme secret, who reveres the master and guru, and who knows how to conceal his own reality, to such a one, whoever he may be, I have taught this.

I am the glorious Vajragarbha, supreme lord of the tenth ground. Having been well urged by heroes and heroines, I explained this so that yogins may take up the path.

The glorious Hevajra, a jewel hard to find, is well condensed here from the root tantra of five hundred thousand verses. Through whatever stainless virtue I have gained by writing well this work called the Extensive Explanation of the Definitive Meaning of its connection, may the secret of Hevajra be well understood. May my vajra brothers and others who follow the guru who teaches this, endowed with all the commitments, speak well to one another and bear no grudge. May discussion and questioning dwell at ease through the vajra of the commitments.

Whatever people do the evil deeds of the unruly, who break their commitments, and do not seek out yogins, may they not keep company with those, may they not even see them, and may they make offerings to their own dear guru, the vajra master. In this age of strife, may those who reveal the great secret, who destroy the wrong views of wicked non-Buddhists, and who afterwards recite the views of those same people, may they be the leaders who tame them.

Apart from this explanation, one should not trust the explanations composed by arrogant people who have not seen reality. One should remain trusting in a commentary such as this one, which establishes well the definitive and the provisional meanings of all the root tantras.

The Extensive Explanation of the Definitive Meaning of Hevajra, composed by the great lord of the tenth ground, the bodhisattva Vajragarbha, is complete.

It was translated by the Tibetan translator, the monk Drogmi Śerab Drakpa, after he made many requests to the Indian preceptor and great guru Maitrī and listened to it well.

The Extensive Explanation of the Condensed Tantra of Hevajra, composed by the bodhisattva Vajragarbha. This text, hard to find, had not been translated in the earlier commentary up to the chapter on reality. Later, in the great city of the land of Nepal called Rolpa, the translator, the monk Drogmi, found it with the paṇḍita Maitrī, brought the manuscript to Tibet, and translated it at the request of the monk and yogic practitioner Wangchuk Drakpa.

Translator's Notes

- This is the opening of Toh 1180, the commentary on the Hevajra tantra. The introductory verses use dense symbolic language (Evaṃ, the sixteen hands as the sixteen emptinesses, the fifty syllables), which I kept close to the Tibetan. The passage on "urine and semen" is a tantric symbolic equation (the substances stand for the buddhas' mudrās) and is rendered literally. "Vajra One" at the end I take as Hevajra, speaking in answer to Nairātmyā. The verse about the bodhisattvas "in as many bodies as there are world realms" is condensed in the Tibetan, and the rendering is slightly interpretive. The phrase "those who have the limit of the bases of training" is obscure; I kept it literal.
- This piece is largely verse set in an unsettled, probably corrupt text, and several lines are obscure; I have rendered the most natural sense. The passage "The great illusion, the great fierce one..." and the Viṣṇu lines ("Whenever on this earth the Dharma becomes weak...") are cited as non-Buddhist views, echoing Bhagavadgītā 4.7-8; they are taken as quotations. The terms kodrava (an inferior grain) and śāli (fine rice) are kept in Sanskrit for the agricultural simile. The phrase "twelve links" refers to the twelve limbs of dependent origination.

- This passage is dense and its opening verses are partly obscure; I have kept the verses as verses and followed the Tibetan closely. The line on the four reliances alludes to the standard set (meaning, not letters; Dharma, not person; definitive, not provisional; wisdom, not consciousness), of which only the first is named here. The verse phrase "Essence of Hevajra" renders the speaker as Vajragarbha. The "six-thousand-verse commentary" and the "short tantra with its half" (seven hundred verses) are rendered literally.

- Syllable-to-deity correspondences follow the Tibetan as given; some syllable spellings (such as SMIN and RBA) are as transmitted and may reflect transliteration irregularities. The "great Hevajra" tantra's chapter lists are summarized as given. Rendering of the passage on dwelling in the "bhagas" retains the technical tantric sense of the sacred locus of the consort.

- The syllables in the first part are mantra-letters of the thirty-seven-deity maṇḍala, and I have kept them as transliterated sounds. Several of the deity epithets there are rendered literally as best they can be identified, for example the goddess "who makes stiffness," the goddess "of deep blue," and "Gaṇḍa's beauty." The last is uncertain. "Ender" renders the Tibetan for Antaka. The line "the exhaustion of the fourth" refers to the fourth state beyond waking, dream, and deep sleep.

- This is a commentary on the Hevajra tantra. The Tibetan text is difficult in places, where verse lines are quoted and glossed with some textual irregularity. In the passage on the six aggregates and the six sense sources I have followed the Tibetan as given. "Great Lord, Īśvara" renders dbang phyug che. The phrase "sbyor ba" within a verse, rendered "union," may elsewhere carry a ritual sense.

- This is a densely allusive commentary; the phrase "the thing, and the non-thing too" renders a deliberately cryptic verse fragment, taken here as the commentary glosses it (wisdom and means). The Sanskrit grammatical phonology (the visarga and the letter groups) is rendered as it stands. "Dākinījālasaṃvara" is a reconstruction of the Tibetan title referred to as the second examination chapter.

- The Tibetan names the zodiacal junctions by animal: chu srin is Capricorn (makara), bum pa Aquarius, nya Pisces, lug Aries, glang Taurus, 'khrig pa Gemini, karkaṭa Cancer, seng ge Leo, bu mo Virgo, srang Libra, sdig pa Scorpio (vṛścika), gzhu Sagittarius. The Sanskrit letter groupings in the opening lines are somewhat garbled in transmission and are rendered as they stand. The verse on lalanā and rasanā is quoted in the Hevajra tradition.

- This passage concerns the subtle-body channels in the Hevajra tradition, and the Sanskrit letters mapped to lunar days are partly garbled in the transmitted Tibetan. The Tibetan transliterations of the vowels and semivowels (for example "Lā Vā Rā Yā Hā") are given as they stand. The channel names given in Tibetan (Mi phyed ma, Phra gzugs ma, Mchog ma, G.yon ma, Thung ngu ma, Rus sbal skyes sgom, Dbang bskur ma, Skyon Idan ma, Bshang ba ma, Mtshan mo ma, Ma mo, Bsil sbyin ma, Drod ma) are left in transliteration because I could not reliably reconstruct the Sanskrit. The word "stuka" is left untranslated, since its sense is unclear. "Hanging one" renders the Tibetan for the drop-bearing channel, probably Sanskrit lambikā.

- Several of the channel names in the opening list (Jalmā, Varṇasthā, Spyimā, Rgyusbyinmā, Saṃyogavirahā, Sdugumā, Pācīkā, Manobhadṛā, Trisaṅkarā, Icchā, Grhā) are my reconstructions from Tibetan renderings and are uncertain. "The conqueror of Māra" for the central channel is a literal rendering of a name whose Sanskrit I could not confirm. The ordinal "fourth" for the navel state is the fourth state (turīya). Pāṇḍarā is the standard Sanskrit for the white-robed goddess. The "moments" and "joys" are rendered by their standard Hevajra sense, with "the one without characteristics" translating a term whose exact counterpart is uncertain.

- This is a verse-heavy exposition of the channels, wheels and fierce fire (caṇḍālī, gtum mo) practice. Some verses are cryptic, and the "cattle" (phyugs, paśu) terminology is rendered literally. The final line of the passage lists organs (eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and what "hangs," 'phyang ba) and is rendered literally; the identification of that last item is uncertain. The terms rkyang ma, ro ma and Avadhūtī correspond to lalanā, rasanā and avadhūtī, and I have kept rkyang ma and ro ma in transliteration, because the Tibetan renderings are used here as technical names.
- This section, on the body as a calendar, the channels, and the signs of death, is highly technical and its numbers are often obscure, so some figures are rendered close to the Tibetan. Terms such as "house," "petals," and "the three qualities" may be technical Kālacakra usage that I have not interpreted. Several lines (for example "four by four" and the passages on the five elements) are elliptical in the source.
- This passage is dense with Hevajra-tantra symbolic and physiological language. The sense of the lines on the Wheel of Time and the counting of breaths is somewhat compressed; I have translated closely and kept the technical terms. The phrase rendered "the sixfold treasury" and the identification of Dhruva and the Seven Sages follow the Tibetan renderings literally.
- The passage is cryptic and partly corrupt in its Sanskrit transcriptions. "Piṭu-vajra" is reconstructed from Tibetan pi tsu bajra and may be a variant of Pīṭhavajra or similar. "Trailokyākṣepa" follows the Tibetan trai lo kyā kṣe pa. The sentence "the recitation of the mantra's coded signs is that of the neuter" is literal and obscure. "Disc of Rāhu" renders sgra gcan.
- The sequence of the wrathful kings follows the standard Hevajra tradition: Yamāntaka, Prajñāntaka, Padmāntaka, Vighnāntaka, Acala, Ṭakkirāja, Nīladaṇḍa, Mahābala, Uṣṇīṣa, Sumbharāja. The identification of [Sanskrit text] and the central syllable work is a reconstruction. Several mantra syllable strings are given as in the Tibetan transliteration. The phrase "with the divisions of the staff" ([Sanskrit text]) is uncertain. The final syllables of the kālī list are given as in the source; the last cluster is corrupt-looking in transliteration. The line "the sun disc of the hoped-for" ([Sanskrit text]) is rendered literally. "Triple-excellent vajra" translates [Sanskrit text], uncertain.
- This is a very obscure passage on mantra theory, with several technical items I could not identify with confidence. These include "lungthang," "pothi leaf," and the "jewel" as a recitation instrument. The line about the "Brahmā gate" and the continent descriptions follow the standard continent shapes: Videha round, Jambudvīpa three-cornered, Godānīya four-cornered, Kuru half-moon. The Tibetan "dkyil 'khor" for the wind maṇḍala applied to the east is as given in the source. "Aggregates, six elements, form, and so on" are listed as thirty-six offerings in the source.
- The passage is a technical, corrupt-looking account of phonemes and elements; some letter lists and a few lines (the "tail" of earth, the "hare-marked" one, and the "pole star") are rendered tentatively. The line "Ar" and "Al" stand for the diphthong-like guṇa forms of Ṛ and Ṛ̥. Several lines that appear to correspond to Sanskrit rite terms (immobilizing, pacifying, and so on) follow the six-rite scheme.
- This passage is highly technical (Sanskrit phonology, elements, lunar days, zodiac). Several zodiac sign names are inferred from the Tibetan (chu srin = Capricorn, bum pa = Aquarius, nya = Pisces, lug = Aries, glang = Taurus, 'khrig = Gemini, ka rka ṭa = Cancer, seng ge = Leo, bu mo = Virgo, srang = Libra, sdig pa = Scorpio, gzhu = Sagittarius). "Empty and the rest" (stong pa sogs) refers to the vowel signs; "dbyu gu lnga" is rendered "five vowel signs". Some lines of the original are obscure, especially the section on the practitioner's two letters and the six rites of striking, bringing down, burning, drawing out, increase, and pleasing, and are rendered cautiously.

- The verses on mantra syllables and the five eyes are terse and the commentary's wording is elliptic. "The Protector" in the line on the five eyes may refer to the Buddha as the one who gathered the teachings; this is a judgment call. In the passage on "ྔ་ལྷོ་སྐྱིད་མེ་ཤིང་།" I took it as orpiment (or yellow substance) and ash producing red, which is the least certain sentence here. The Ananta/nāga-king passage is a rain rite; "bdud rtsi" is rendered "nectar" and the "five nectars" here are milk, curd, honey, butter and sugar as the text itself lists them.
- Several mantra syllables are obscure and I have transliterated them as they stand. The phrase about measures "from the middle of the eyebrow to the end of the navel" and the quotation "of those who come and go" are rendered literally; their precise sense is uncertain. "Ten-fold abiding" is a literal rendering of an unclear ritual phrase. The final planet-and-constellation line is rendered as "Pushya" (Tibetan: king of the constellations), and "full moon" for "ཁྲི་ལྗན་" ("fish"/lunar day), both uncertain. The last sentence is cut off mid-passage.
- Several names in the rites are uncertain and left in transliteration or literal form: the mantra word beṭuyā and the animal-repelling formulae, "Nor skyong dul ba" (a mudrā name), and "the Ḍoms." The goddess names in the yoga section follow the Hevajra retinue as best identified: rdo rje ma = Vajrā, gau ri = Gaurī, chu yi rnal 'byor ma = Vetālī (here "water yoginī"), bdag med ma = Nairātmyā, sa spyod ma = Bhūcarī, mkha' spyod ma = Khecarī, gtum mo = Caṇḍālī, g.yung mo = Ḍombī, ri khrod ma = Śavarī. "The pra" is left untranslated, since the term refers to a divinatory practice (pra-bringing-down) whose exact sense is uncertain. The phrase "sprinkled/spread out (bdar bas)" in the eclipse rite is uncertain. The text's Tibetan rendering of the ritual vessel measurements may be imprecise.
- The passage runs through a very corrupt stretch of the commentary, and the Tibetan transliterations of the goddess names in the first quotation (for example "White Dbang to Yama, Caurī") are garbled. I rendered the clearer names (Gaurī, Caurī, Vetālī, Ghasmarī, Pukkasī, Śmaśānī, Caṇḍālī, Ḍombī) by identification, and left the first offering sequence close to the Tibetan. "Rephā" and the "ten substances" pill are uncertain readings. The four verse lines at the end (eleven hubs, eleven feet of the sun) are obscure in the source.
- This is a hard verse passage with a number of corrupt or cryptic lines. The listing of implements in several places is compressed and ambiguous, so the allocation of implements to right and left hands follows the apparent sense. "Vajrahūmkāra" renders rdo rje hūṃ mdzad, and "Sumbharāja" for gnod mdzes rgyal po is a conventional identification. "King of desire" (Kāmarāja) for 'dod pa'i rgyal po is a literal rendering of the epithet. "Daṇḍa" for the northwest figure is inferred from the club. The identification of Ṭakkirāja follows the Tibetan transliteration.
- This passage contains mantra syllables and verse from a commentary on the Hevajra Tantra, partly in corrupt or compressed form; the mantras are given in transliteration. The list of eight goddess names (Gaurī, Caurī, Vetālī, Ghasmarī, Pukkasī, Śavarī, Caṇḍālī, Ḍombī) reconstructs the standard Hevajra set from the Tibetan epithets. The passage "He preserves a portion of them" (afflictions, māras, equipoise, cognitive obscuration) is doctrinally compressed in the source; the sense given follows the plain Tibetan. "Gokus" is left in transliteration as it is uncertain.
- Moharati (the Tibetan names the goddess Delusion Vajrā) is rendered Moharati/Mohavajrā tentatively as the goddess corresponding to the eye sense source. "Mirror-like wisdom" is supplied from the standard list, since the Tibetan reads "mirror, wisdom of equality." The verse beginning "Pukkasī and Ḍombinī" renders the standard Sanskrit names of the Tibetan sound-forms, with the line order following the Tibetan.
- The opening verses on cause, effect and alchemical stages are obscure, and some lines are rendered closely; the "cow's yellow pigment" (bo lci, Skt. gorocanā) is my reading. The line

"twice-born and others being born again" is rendered literally. The closing section begins a new commentary on the fifth chapter ascribed to Vajragarbha.

- Some identifications of the female figures and elements rest on the commentary's own sequence and are somewhat uncertain. I read the terms for the brahmin woman and the Caṇḍālī as the names of the yoginī classes. The mantra-like closing "Avadhūtī" is kept as in the source.
- This passage is dense with tantric commentarial enumerations; some names of the months and seasons (Mṛgaśīras, Makara) are my identification of the Tibetan sequence (mgo can, chu srin). "Chandoha" renders the Tibetan transliteration for one of the pīṭha classes. The phrase "upper-and-lower readings" (ཡུལ་འཕྲུལ་འཕྲུལ་) is a literal rendering of a place-class name (Skt. upaśmaśāna-type categories); the identification is uncertain.
- This passage is the Hevajra commentary's exposition of the reversal of the descending bodhicitta. The translation of "ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་" as "the moon, the nectar" and "ལྷ་ལྷ་" as "dust" (here in the sense of the red constituent, in opposition to the white) follows the passage's own logic. "ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་" and "ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་" involve a wordplay on "buddha" as awake (sad / sangs), which cannot be fully preserved in English. The verses of the Recitation of Names are cited only in part, so the epithets are rendered literally where I could not match them securely to the standard Sanskrit forms.
- The lines on the sister, daughter, and so on are rendered according to the commentary's own gloss; the kinship terms are technical for the elements of the body. The line "Vajragarbha" at the end renders the author's name as the standard Sanskrit form. The count "five hundred thousand verses" follows the Tibetan "bum phrag lnga". The last lines on the verses of each chapter are summarized numerically as in the Tibetan.
- The opening colophon-like passage is garbled in places in the source, especially the clause about the translator Lodrö Tenpa, which breaks off before its verb; I rendered it with an ellipsis rather than invent a continuation. The passage actually belongs to the colophon of the preceding commentary, and the Hevajra commentary by Vajragarbha begins at "Here begins the commentary." The six seminal fluids and winds and their associations are as given in the commentary; the correspondence of the six wheel-ornaments is given here only as the text states it.
- The "five and a half deathless ones" (mi 'chi bcu phyed) and the "head and the rest" are tantric substances. The text gives their outer sense here and refers the definitive meaning to the root tantra. "Bya" (hair) is uncertain; I rendered it as a name for the hair as the text gives it. "Ministers" renders rje'u rigs, here taken as the vaiśya/commoner-ministerial class distinct from "commoners" (dmangs rigs); the exact reference is uncertain.
- In the verse "the crest ornament from the hair of thieves," the commentary's gloss (a root that steals virtue) is rendered as given. The lines on "Full and Excellent" (gang ba, bzang po) allude to the fifteen-day groups of the waxing moon and are obscure in the Tibetan; I have kept them close to the wording. "Don yod" in the belt passage is Amoghasiddhi, as the earlier context implies.
- The verse line rendered "should bow directly to the master as a accomplished one" is slightly obscure in Tibetan; I have followed the plain sense. The phrase "sixteen half-measures of the drop" in the closing verse is rendered literally and may carry a technical sense I could not pin down. "Tsotsma" (མཚོ་མཚོ་) is a transcription I could not identify with certainty.
- This is the commentary on the chapter on signs. The quoted verses are the root tantra's. "The Dark One" renders mun can ma, a name of a channel; reading uncertain. "Treatises on dance" translates gar gyi bstan bcos, as in the Tibetan. "Kye" is left as the Tibetan vocative.
- Chandoha, the fifth of the twelve sites, is left in Sanskrit transliteration. The term "the six syllables" is taken literally from the Tibetan and not expanded.
- Kurukullā is given in Sanskrit for the Tibetan ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་. The passage mixes verse rgyal ba. "Bliss-like experiences" for the worldly joys is interpretive.

[illegible]

- The quoted verse on the innate is cited from the root text and I have kept its flow as close to the Tibetan as the sense allows. The phrase "the six victors" refers to the families linked to attachment and the other afflictions; the exact enumeration is not given in this passage.
- The syllables bo, la, ka, kko in the root-tantra verse are kept as given, since the tantra uses them as seed-syllable symbols. The phrase "free of any gem-like substance" renders a difficult phrase (nor bu'i stong pa dang bral ba) and is a tentative reading. The Mahāvairocana passage is attributed in the text to the Empowerment of Magical Display tantra, as the Tibetan states.
- The passage depends on a series of quotations from the root tantra, which the commentary glosses. I have kept the commentary's own terms "the Great Powerful One" and "the powerful one" for the lord of the central direction, without identifying him further. The final sentence is hard to follow and my rendering is somewhat tentative.
- The "na, ga, ha, śva, śva" substances are explained by the commentary as first letters of the words for man, cow, elephant, horse, and dog (human, cow, elephant, horse, dog flesh, in the Sanskrit sources). I rendered the ritual code as the Tibetan gives it. The five nectars bi, mu, ma, ra, śu are likewise coded syllables (excrement, urine, blood, marrow, semen). The "limbs" and "four glances" are left as in the Tibetan. The passage on "the seventh birth" contains some obscure phrasing, notably the closing statements about those who committed immediate-retribution sins; I followed the Tibetan as it stands.
- The mention of "Ku, Ru, Ku, Lle" refers to the Kurukullā mantra syllables; their glosses are rendered as given. The quoted lines from the two Lotus Family tantras are rendered as verse-prose within the sentence. In the expression "vital breath," the Tibetan is srog gi kun du spyod pa (conduct allied to the life-breath), a technical yogic reference rendered literally.
- The mantras are given in reconstructed Sanskrit and some syllables are uncertain (for example "sādhī-dhaṃ gaccha hyabhuka" and "Cege-mo", the latter taken as an address to the goddess). The phrase "wheel whose nature is space" at the crown follows the Tibetan literally. "Utpala" is blue lotus.
- The verse lines on the timeless nature of the Lord of Secret Mantra are rendered closely; "the Lord of Secret Mantra" (gsang sngags mgon po / dbang phyug) is taken as an epithet of Hevajra in the verse. The phrase about taking a companion to the place of meditation is rendered literally from a difficult commentarial gloss. The "woman of awareness" (rig ma) is glossed as wisdom-consort, in keeping with the commentary.
- Terms such as Cegemo (ཅེ་གེ་མོ་), kakkola, and bola are retained as technical designations; their precise identification is uncertain. "The ruin" renders རྫོག་པོ་ (ruin/destruction), apparently a technical term for the dissolving bliss; the translation keeps this reading with some uncertainty.
- The verse line "bde ba bsngo" is rendered "dedicated bliss"; the reading is uncertain, and the color series may originally have been a different term. The passage is dense and elliptical commentary; the Tibetan is fairly terse in places, and a few sentences are rendered closely to preserve ambiguity. The line rendered "ripened" earlier in the passage as "purified" (mchog tu dag) follows the Tibetan as given.
- This section is from the Hevajra commentary, with verses whose lines are partly obscure. The quotations are given as the Tibetan stands. The phrase "the supreme of the first, free of joy" renders a compressed technical line on the four joys. "Even so" before "though done, trust it" is a hard line, rendered closely.
- The quoted verses are the Hevajra Tantra's, and the commentary glosses them in its own manner. The terms "bo la" and "kakkola" appear to be Sanskrit-derived substance or organ names whose sense follows the commentary's own gloss (vajra and lotus union); I have left them untranslated. "Great lord of sweetness" renders a Tibetan epithet whose Sanskrit original I could not securely identify.

- The arithmetic of the letters (the 180s and the 21,600 breaths) is rendered as the text gives it; the passage on the vowel augmentation is grammatically technical and its details are condensed in the Tibetan. "Leaf-Clad One of the charnel ground" is a literal rendering of the Tibetan epithet for Parṇasāvārī, which I could not confirm with full certainty.
- This passage is from a commentary on the Hevajra Tantra and treats sexual-yogic empowerment imagery in esoteric terms; some lines are cryptic by design. The reversed-order verses (the verse beginning "The ripening is the reverse of that") are said in the text to be deliberately scrambled, so their literal sense is uncertain. The terms "kunduru" and the line "Kun tu ru gyis rdo rje 'dzin" are rendered tentatively. The reading of the word usually translated "Samantabhadra-like" here is doubtful, since ku-n-du-ru may be a technical term of the union posture or a corrupted form.
- The verses are cryptic and quote the Hevajra Tantra. "Bola" and "kakkola" are tantric terms, left transliterated. The passage repeats the explanation of "essence" and "wheel" in the Tibetan, and I have kept the repetition. The word rendered "Ender" (Antaka) is the Tibetan mthar byed. The name Parṇasābarī is my identification of "the mountain-dwelling leaf-clad yoginīs" (ལྔ་སྐོར་གྱི་མཚན་འཛིན་ཀླུ་མཚན་ལྷ་མོ་ཡི་སྒྲིབ་ཀྱི་མཚན་འཛིན་).
- The syllable assignments to the objects follow the Tibetan as given, though the vowel-to-sense correspondences are probably corrupt in places. The final sentence about the "lower portion of the day" is obscure and rendered literally.
- The ritual-language terms (Malayaja, Kheṭaro, Nirāmśu and so on) are reconstructed from the Tibetan transliterations and are partly uncertain. The line about "the ram and Kapilavastu" in the Tīndhinam verse is obscure in the Tibetan. "Saṃpuṭa" renders "bsdus pa'i rgyud" tentatively. The verse "Kakkola" is rendered along its glossed etymology.
- The Tibetan renderings of the Prakrit song (Kolla irishṭi and so on) are given as transliterated and are uncertain. I have kept the pīṭha, chandoha, and pīlava as technical place-names of the tantric sites, without translating them. Yuñmo, Rangtsedma, and Kyegyi are left as given, since I could not securely identify them with Sanskrit names. The lines about families and elements follow the Tibetan's own pairing.
- The first sign-smell, rendered "the garlic-like plant," is uncertain, since the Tibetan text there is difficult. The Tibetan glosses rendered as Pukkasī, Śmaśānacārī and Śvapacī (the sixth to eighth of the fifteen goddesses) are my identifications from the usual Hevajra sequence; the Tibetan names are descriptive. The seed-syllable sequence follows the Sanskrit vowels. The reading of "the ten" for the fourth yoginī is as in the Tibetan. The arithmetic of the channels and of the sixteenth part follows the commentary's own argument.
- This passage is a commentary on Hevajra material. The sexual and ritual imagery is rendered literally but discreetly. "Bola, kakkola, and kunda" are rendered by transliteration or familiar names; "kunda" is jasmine, left untranslated. The line about wiping away "like a conch shell with fish" is obscure, and I followed the Tibetan wording closely.
- The two verses of the non-Buddhists give the nine substances and six categories of the Vaiśeṣika (Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika) school, which I take as the target. In "bola," the "bliss of the bola is the great mudrā," I kept the Tibetan transliteration used earlier in the text. "Lalanā, Rasanā, Avadhūtī" restore the three channels from the Tibetan transliterations; the Tibetan text writes "ro ldan ma" for Rasanā and "ala" or "lalanā" for the first. The line "Mind and its nature Dharma" is rendered as "The nature of mind is Dharma." The phrase "dust and flakes" translates a list of tiny beings and is somewhat uncertain.
- This passage is a terse, partly allusive commentary on the Hevajra Tantra; some lines are quoted fragments, and the fourfold "results" and the "four great schools" are given in compressed form. Rendering of "dbugs btang" as "drew breath" follows the physiological context. "Sthavira" is kept for the "elder" school. The sentence "How could they arise from the mother?" is a tentative rendering of an obscure line.

- The passage is a commentary on Hevajra Tantra verses, and the counting of vital forces and channels is technical and numerically obscure; I translated it as it stands. Names such as Pukkasī, Ḍombī and Caṇḍālī are reconstructed from Tibetan descriptions (ri khrod ma, gdol pa mo). Yungmo is rendered by the name given in the preceding material. The final two lines abbreviate quoted tantra text.
- The mantra syllables are given in transliteration as in the source. Several verse lines are obscure, notably "three years and a half moon, and two", "the other seizer", and the "Envy" and "bliss" items in the six-affliction list. Translated as literally as the Tibetan allows. "Mañjuvajra" renders མཎྜུབའ་རྒྱལ་པོ་; the identification is probable but not certain. "Go-ku" is left untranslated as an unexplained ritual term.
- Several clauses in this commentary on the Hevajra Tantra are terse and dense in tantric technical sense. The phrase "by the two paths he shows the mastery of awakening" is rendered cautiously. The reading of "the ground of the aeon" for རྒྱལ་པོ་འཇིག་རྟེན་ is tentative, and the sense may rather be "ground of rousing." The passage on the sixteen and a half drops is rendered literally, as the arithmetic is not spelled out in the Tibetan.
- Several terms in the passage are obscure or garbled in transmission: the animal list (thick-bellied/pot-bellied one, śarabha, cat), "Arali," "Gaṭṭogdma" (from gtogs 'dod ma, unidentified), and the names of the transformed queens. I rendered them as they stand where no Sanskrit equivalent could be securely identified. The eight guardians of the directions are given in Tibetan as Yama, Kubera, Nairṛti, Varuṇa, Brahmā, Indra, Īśāna, and the wind god (the Tibetan has "thags bzangs ris," read here as Varuṇa/wind-god region); the list is somewhat uncertain.
- The names in the empowerment list are translated according to their Tibetan renderings. Several are obscure (for example the Sow, Nāsikācchedā, Mahābalā, the Young Sound, Mahāprabhu, and the Tawny Purple One) and rest on uncertain identification. Kuberā is the Tibetan "Kubera-ma". The mantra is given in the Sanskrit transliteration as it stands in the Tibetan; its spelling is partly corrupt in the transmission, so its Sanskrit is only approximate. The line "arddhenduvaṃṣṭriṇe" is a reconstruction.
- Several quoted verses are cryptic, and the "empty of the hollow" praise line and the Bhulai attribution are rendered tentatively. "Boar-rooted earth" translates the Tibetan "so phag" (lit. "tooth-boar"), which I also gave as "tooth-marks of boars" in the verse; the sense is earth rooted up by boars. "Camphor" renders ga bur as a ritual substance, understood in the commentary as the awakening mind.
- The "debt" (bu lon) painting refers to the cloth-painting rite of the Hevajra tradition; the sense of "debt" here follows the commentary's own usage and is somewhat obscure. The passage on pressing with hands is deliberately cryptic and is rendered closely.
- The commentary on the root-text phrase about "a mountain bird's shelter" and the listing of the places (charnel ground, uninhabited city, ocean shore) follows the Tibetan as given. The identification of "the bola" as a meat is retained from earlier usage in the text, as is "bhaga and liṅga" for the female and male organs.
- Some terms in the commentary's passage on the consort (the sarjarāja resin, the "moon-sign" blood) are rendered cautiously. The phrase "the wheel of bliss up to the tip of the banner" in the definitive-meaning explanation is kept literal.
- The last verse is obscure in the Tibetan: its link to the preceding explanation of the mantra's nature is unclear, and the rendering of the final comment follows the Tibetan's literal sense. The phrase on the "sixteen compassions" is kept literal.
- This passage is a commentary on Hevajra Tantra II.v and related verses, with some verses cited in compressed form. I took "།" as marking the extent of a quotation ("up to"). The identification of the mantra syllables follows the commentary's own glosses; some letter-lore is terse. The Kye-rdor "Pukkasī" gloss for the vowel u is rendered as given.
