Toh 7 in the Kangyur is the Vinayottaragrantha — known in Sanskrit as the Vinayottaragrantha, in Tibetan as Dulwa Zhung Lama (ཏུལ་ཇུང་ལ་མ་), and rendered into English as The Supreme Text of the Vinaya. It is a Vinaya text, belonging to the broad class of monastic disciplinary literature that governs the rules and conduct of the Buddhist community of ordained practitioners. The text takes the form of a dialogue between the Buddha and the venerable Upāli, one of the Buddha's chief disciples and the foremost authority on monastic discipline, addressing detailed questions about the proper interpretation and application of the rules of training. As Toh 7 in the Kangyur, it belongs to the Vinaya section of the Tibetan Buddhist canon, which preserves the foundational codes of monastic law transmitted within the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition.

In the Sanskrit language: Vinayottaragrantha. In the Tibetan language: The Supreme Text of the Vinaya. The First Fascicle.

Homage to the Omniscient One.

Summary verse:

Three animals, three passages, and
A woman departed, and severance, Holding and repeated — these,
Together with a tooth, not touching, and a sow.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Then the venerable Upāli approached the Blessed One, went to where he was, and bowing his head at the feet of the Blessed One, sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, asking: "Reverend Blessed One, you have declared that any monk who, while sharing equally in the training together with other monks, neither surrenders the training nor declares it to be diminished, yet engages in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse — behavior of unchastity — even if it be with a being reborn in the animal realm, and even alongside such a being, that monk too incurs defeat and is not to remain. With regard to what you have said, Reverend One: suppose a monk, by means of secret mantras and medicines, transforms a human woman into a being reborn in the animal realm and then engages with her in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "Reverend One, suppose a monk, by means of secret mantras and medicines, transforms himself into a being reborn in the animal realm and then engages with a human woman in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "If he perceives himself as a monk and understands that to engage in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse would be improper, yet does so nonetheless, it becomes a defeat. If he does not perceive himself as a monk, it becomes a grave offense." "Reverend One, suppose two monks, by means of secret mantras and medicines, transform a human woman and themselves into beings reborn in the animal realm, and then together engage mutually in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "If one perceives himself as a monk and understands that to engage in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse would be improper, yet does so nonetheless, it becomes a defeat. If one does not perceive himself as a monk, it becomes a grave offense."

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One: "Reverend One, with regard to your declaration that as soon as one has entered it, it becomes a defeat — how much entry constitutes entry into the oral passage?" "Upāli, as much as is required for a jewel to pass from a tooth." "How much entry constitutes entry into the excretory passage?" "As much as is required for a jewel to pass from the hollow of a bone." "How much entry constitutes entry into the urinary passage?" "As much as is required for a jewel to pass through the layers of skin."

"Reverend One, suppose a woman has been cut in two at the middle, and all three of her wound-openings are damaged — if a monk joins wound-opening to wound-opening and engages in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity, what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Reverend One, suppose a woman has been severed at the waist, and one of the three wound-openings — whichever it may be — is undamaged: if a monk engages with her in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity, what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "Reverend One, suppose a monk engages together with a woman who has been decapitated in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "If it is through the excretory passage or the urinary passage, it becomes a defeat. If it is through the oral passage, the hollow, or the hollow of the shoulder, separately, what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Reverend One, the Blessed One declared that a monk who engages with a non-human female in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity, incurs a defeat — what sort of non-human female is meant?" "Any female that can be grasped with all her limbs. The same is to be said likewise for all those belonging to the animal realm of rebirth."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk inserts into the interior of a mouth outside the teeth — engaging in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk does so without touching either the excretory passage, the urinary passage, or the oral passage at all — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk engages in the practice arisen from sexual intercourse, the behavior of unchastity, with the burned and hair-free corpse of a sow — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense. The same is likewise to be said for all those belonging to the animal realm of rebirth."

The summary verse:

Another's limb born; the two privies and the two organs;
the two impairments; with obstruction — sets of six and sets of four.

"Reverend One, suppose a monk inserts into another's formed limb — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Reverend One, is there a case where a monk who has entered a privy alone can incur a defeat on account of the behavior of unchastity?" "There can be something approximating it — for example, like a creditor and a co-guarantor."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk has entered a room, and on the far side beyond it there is a woman, and she engages in misconduct from within — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk is in the midst of engaging in the behavior of unchastity, his status changes, and having become a laywoman he then performs the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Reverend One, suppose a nun is in the midst of engaging in the behavior of unchastity, her status changes, and having become a monk she then performs the behavior of unchastity — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Reverend One, what did the Blessed One mean by declaring 'a living human woman who is impaired'? How impaired must a living human woman be for her to be called impaired?" "However much the region nearby is slightly consumed, or consumed, or swollen, or decayed, or putrefied, or eaten by insects — to that extent she is called a living human woman who is impaired."

"How unimpaired must she be for her to be called a living human woman who is not impaired?" "However much the region nearby is even and smooth on both sides — to that same degree she is called unimpaired. The same is likewise to be said for a deceased woman, a non-human female, one belonging to the animal realm of rebirth, a man, a hermaphrodite (paṇḍaka), and a female hermaphrodite."

"Reverend One, the Blessed One declared that if insertion occurs with an obstruction it becomes a defeat — what does that mean? Reverend One, suppose a monk wraps in thick cloth or in a rag and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"But if he wraps in fine linen, silk, or thin cloth and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Reverend One, suppose a monk perceives the passage as a passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Suppose he perceives the passage as not a passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Suppose he has doubt about the passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Suppose he perceives what is not a passage as not a passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Suppose he perceives what is not a passage as a passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Suppose he has doubt about what is not a passage and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Suppose a monk perceives an interrupted passage as interrupted and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Suppose he perceives an interrupted passage as uninterrupted and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Suppose he perceives an uninterrupted passage as interrupted and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "Suppose he perceives an uninterrupted passage as uninterrupted and inserts — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk who engages in sexual misconduct with a human woman does not incur a defeat?" "Yes. If a transgression had previously arisen, or if he dwells in a state of concealment, or if from the outset he is incompatible, or if she is a hermaphrodite, or if he engages in sexual misconduct after a nun has been expelled — in these cases it becomes a wrongdoing." "Just as a monk incurs a defeat on account of engaging in sexual misconduct, likewise it is a defeat for one who has given up the training and for a nun as well. For a probationer nun, a novice monk, and a novice nun, it is a wrongdoing."

Summary verse: The group of eighty, precious stones, items of no fixed value, the sign, full ordination arranged in groups of seven, and dice — these make twelve.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk takes something belonging to others — whether dwelling in a village or in a forest — that constitutes taking what is not given and amounts to theft, and that if that monk is apprehended by a king or a great minister who says to him, 'You are a thief! You are a fool! You are a dunce! You are a robber!' and kills him, imprisons him, or banishes him — a monk who takes in such a manner has incurred a defeat and must not remain in the community. Regarding this: if a monk counts himself as belonging to both groups of the community of eighty, what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing that is a grave offense." "From what does the lawful portion for him arise?" "From the first." "If, having received it, he were to deny it, what does that become?" "It becomes an offense entailing confession through knowingly speaking falsely." "When the transaction is complete, the value is to be reckoned."

"Venerable one, suppose people have arranged a display of precious stones, and then a monk, with intent to steal, hides a certain precious stone of great value by moving it from a small place to another place — what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Suppose, with intent to steal, he hides a certain precious stone of small value by moving it from a large place to another place — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Venerable one, if a monk steals an object of no monetary value, what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "What is an object of no monetary value? That which, by reason of being extremely precious, cannot have a price set upon it. And that which, by reason of being extremely small, is not worth setting a price upon — that too is of no monetary value. If he steals such a thing, what does that become?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk steals an object without having assessed its value — what does that become?" "If the object is complete in all respects, it becomes a defeat. If it is not complete, it becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has made preparations to steal, and in the course of that he is recognized and, having been identified as a monk, he steals — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Venerable one, suppose a nun has made preparations to steal, and in the course of that she is recognized and, having been identified as a nun, she steals — what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Venerable one, suppose one who has not received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and, not having received full ordination, steals — what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing." "Suppose one who has not received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and —"

— and having received full ordination steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing." "Suppose one who has not received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and then receives full ordination and steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a serious offense." "Suppose one who has received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and, still as one who has received full ordination, steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing." "Suppose one who has received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and, still as one who has received full ordination, steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a serious offense." "Suppose one who has received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and, as one who has received full ordination, steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "Suppose one who has received full ordination makes preparations to steal, and one who has not received full ordination steals: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk retrieves dice from the sky: what does that become?" "It is as the object itself stands." "If he retrieves them by supernatural power, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk retrieves dice from a place that is not a customs post: what does that become?" "If it passes beyond the boundary, it becomes a defeat. If it does not pass beyond the boundary, it becomes a serious offense."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk lends out goods belonging to others that have not been assessed for customs, and retrieves them: what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat." "Suppose he places them inside a needle case and retrieves them: what does that become?" "It becomes a defeat."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk says to merchants, 'Come this way, go this way': what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing." "Suppose a monk speaks to merchants by means of a stratagem: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have not yet reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post and give them to me,' and the monk calls them back: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have not yet reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post and give them to me, and I will give you half of whatever goods there are at the customs post' — and the monk calls them back: what does that become?" "It becomes a serious offense."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have not yet reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post and give them to me, and I will give you all of whatever goods there are at the customs post' — and the monk calls them back: what does that become?" "It becomes a serious offense."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have not yet reached the customs post, and a monk shows them a different road: what does that become?" "It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have already reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post' — and the monk calls them back: what does that become?" "The value of the customs goods is to be assessed."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have already reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post, and I will give you half of whatever goods there are at the customs post' — and the monk calls them back: what does that become?" "The value of the customs goods is to be assessed."

"Venerable one, suppose goods belonging to merchants that are subject to customs duty have already reached the customs post, and a merchant says to a monk, 'Noble one, please call them back from the customs post, and I will give you all of whatever goods there are at the customs post' — and the monk calls them back: what does that become?"

The value of the customs goods is to be assessed.

Summary verse:

Four cases concerning the robe-rack and robes, three concerning theft and the māṣaka coin, three concerning the accomplice and two concerning intention, and the islands — for the sake of others, these are not [downfalls].

Venerable one, suppose a monk, with the intention to steal, collapses the upper part of a robe-rack belonging to another, and then crushes the lower part with the perception that it is his own — what does that become? For the first act there is a grave offence. For the second there is no downfall.

Venerable one, suppose a monk, with the perception that it is his own, collapses the upper part of a robe-rack belonging to another, and then, with the intention to steal, crushes the lower part — what does that become? For the second act there is a grave offence. For the first there is no downfall.

Venerable one, suppose a monk, with the intention to steal, is in the act of stealing along with a robe-rack — and while robes are being draped over that very robe-rack, he carries off the robe-rack together with the robes — what does that become? The value of the robe-rack is to be assessed.

Venerable one, suppose robes have been draped over a robe-rack, and four monks, or more than four, steal them — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. But if, when divided up individually, each one receives less than five māṣakas, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, how many kinds of theft are there? There are six related kinds: theft by not giving, theft by force, theft by causing to be returned, theft by concealment, theft by thorough examination, and theft of the Dharma.

Venerable one, of the six kinds of theft taught by the Blessed One, which of these brings about a defeat? All the remaining kinds except theft of the Dharma bring about a defeat.

Venerable one, concerning what the Blessed One taught — that stealing five māṣakas brings about a defeat — is there a case in which a monk steals three māṣakas and yet a defeat results? Yes, there is: if three māṣakas complete a kārṣāpaṇa coin.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk steals five māṣakas and yet no defeat results? Yes: if ten māṣakas, or more than ten, make up a kārṣāpaṇa.

Venerable one, concerning what the Blessed One taught — that stealing five māṣakas brings about a defeat — how many māṣakas of what kind of nānaka coin, when stolen, bring about a defeat? Twenty māṣakas that complete a nānaka coin. What is a māṣaka? It is what is completed by four kākaṇis. What is a kārṣāpaṇa? It is one made by King Peacock.

Venerable one, concerning what the Blessed One taught — that stealing five māṣakas brings about a defeat — is there a case in which a monk steals a thousand kārṣāpaṇas and yet no defeat results? Yes: if he steals with the perception that they are abandoned property.

Venerable one, concerning what the Blessed One taught — that stealing five māṣakas brings about a defeat — is there a case in which a monk steals five māṣakas and yet no defeat results? Yes: if he steals one at a time, or two at a time, or three at a time, or four at a time — so that the number at any one theft is never five.

Venerable one, suppose a monk takes a valuable article with the perception that it is his own, and then conceals it with the intention to steal — what does that become? It becomes a defeat.

But if, venerable one, he takes it with the intention to steal, and then conceals it with the perception that it is his own — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk, while wondering and doubting — "Is this his? Is this not his? Is that this one's? Is that not this one's?" — steals it all the same — what does that become? It becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals without permission from the western continent of Cattle-Enjoyment — what does that become? If, reckoning by their standard of value, he steals five māṣakas, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, suppose he steals without permission from the eastern continent of Videha — what does that become? If, reckoning by their standard of value, he steals five māṣakas, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, suppose he steals without permission from the northern continent of Unpleasant Sound — what does that become? In that surrounding region there is no taking what is not given. But if the intention to steal were to arise, it becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals on behalf of another without having been asked — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk, perceiving as human something that is not human, steals it without permission — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. Suppose he perceives as not human something that is not human, and steals it without permission — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. Suppose he perceives as not human something that is human, and steals it without permission — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. Suppose he perceives as human something that is human, and steals it without permission — what does that become? It becomes a defeat.

Now a summary verse:

A reliquary, bodily relics, a scripture text, the Saṅgha in numbers direct or through a go-between, the two perceptions, and likewise the status of the thing, and the household of the king — that is the last.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals an ornament from a stūpa or from the precincts of a stūpa — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals the bodily relics of the Teacher — what does that become? It becomes a defeat. But if he takes them thinking, "This is my own Teacher; I too should show reverence to these relics" — and steals them for the purpose of veneration — it becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals a scripture — what does that become? The value of the scripture is to be assessed.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals without permission from the Saṅgha of the four directions — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals without permission from the property belonging jointly to many persons — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. But if five māṣakas come from each individual share, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals without permission something that has been inspected and set aside — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, suppose a monk steals without permission something that has passed through many hands — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. But if it is divided up, the value of however much he has appropriated as his own is to be assessed accordingly.

Venerable one, suppose a monk perceives something as belonging to another and steals it without prompting — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence.

Venerable one, suppose a monk perceives as accepted what has indeed been accepted, and steals it without permission — what does that become? It becomes a defeat. Suppose he perceives as not accepted what has in fact been accepted, and steals it without permission — what does that become? There is no transgression. Suppose he perceives as accepted what has not been accepted, and steals it without permission — what does that become? It becomes a grave offence. Suppose he perceives as not accepted what has not been accepted, and steals it without permission — what does that become? There is no offence.

Venerable one, concerning the Blessed One's statement, "If a monk moves a valuable article from its place, it becomes a defeat" — what exactly is meant by that? Venerable one, even if a monk moves a valuable article from its place, could there be an instance where it does not become a defeat? Yes — if he keeps the article in the very same location where it had been placed and steals it from there.

Venerable one, suppose a monk, concerning something found that does not belong to him, says aloud, "This is within my own power" — what does that become? By knowingly speaking falsely, he incurs a transgression.

If a thieving intent comes to be present in the act, it constitutes a serious offense — a wrongdoing — and once it is complete, the value must be assessed.

Venerable one, could there be an instance where a monk who has entered a house without permission incurs a defeat on account of the condition of taking without being given? Yes — if he makes the effort to steal before entering, or if he makes the effort after having entered.

Venerable one, could there be an instance where a monk takes a major valuable article without being given it and yet does not incur a defeat? Yes — where a transgression has already occurred beforehand; where one dwells in a mode of stealth; where from the outset there is incompatibility; and in the case of a eunuch or a nun who has been expelled — in these cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

Just as a monk may incur a defeat through the condition of taking without being given, so too is it the same for one who has been given the training and for a nun — it is also a defeat. For a probationer, a novice monk, and a novice nun, it is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

Three animal births and the existence of action, Craving as mother — a group of four —
Two wombs and a caretaker,
And for perception — also a group of four.

Then the venerable attendant asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared, "Whatever monk, with deliberate intent, kills with his own hand a human being or one who has assumed human form — or strikes him with a weapon, or procures a weapon for him, or causes him to die, or speaks praise of death to him, saying such words as: 'O man, what use is this wretched, impure, evil life to you? O man, it is better for you to die than to live' — and who through such mental desire and mental conceptual elaboration induces him to die or speaks praise of death to him by many different means, and through the act of such instigation causes his death — that monk too is one who has been defeated and must not remain." What exactly is meant by this?

Venerable one, first: if a monk uses secret mantras and medicines to transform a human being into an animal birth and that person is separated from his life — what does that become? It is a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk uses secret mantras and medicines to transform himself into an animal birth and is then separated from his own life — what does that become? If he has the perception that it is not permissible to kill a monk and yet does it, it is a defeat. If he does not have the perception of a monk, it is a serious offense.

Venerable one, could there be an instance where a monk kills his father or mother and yet does not incur a defeat, and where not even a transgression of immediate consequence touches him? Yes — if the father or mother has taken birth in an animal rebirth.

Venerable one, could there be an instance where a monk kills his father and yet does not incur a defeat, and where not even a transgression of immediate consequence touches him? Yes — if he kills the existence of action accompanied by defilement. The venerable attendant replied: The existence of action accompanied by defilement is called "father" in the sense of manifesting or producing.

Venerable one, could there be an instance where a monk kills his mother and yet does not incur a defeat, and where not even a transgression of immediate consequence touches him? Yes — if he kills craving. The venerable attendant replied: Craving is called "mother" in the sense of giving rise to birth.

Venerable one, if a monk intends to kill his mother but instead kills another woman — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk intends to kill another woman but does not kill his mother — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk engages in the preparation intending to kill his mother, and another woman is separated from her life — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk engages in the preparation intending to kill another woman, and his mother is separated from her life — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk kills a being born in an animal rebirth within a human woman's womb — what does that become? It is an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk kills a human being within the womb of one born in an animal rebirth — what does that become? It is a defeat.

Venerable one, if one person conceives the child and another nurses it — when one of them is separated from life, it is a defeat, and one is also touched by the fault of an action without interval. By whom was the child engendered?

Venerable one, if a monk kills someone while entertaining doubt and uncertainty, thinking "is this that person or is this not that person?" — what does that become? It is a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human being as not human and kills that being — what does that become? It is a defeat.

If a monk perceives a human being as not human and kills that being — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

If a monk perceives a non-human as human and kills that being — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

If a monk perceives a non-human as non-human and kills that being — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Summary verse:

Two states of mind and two regarding self,
And four likewise concerning the arhat,
Two thieves together with other perceptions —
Seven as a group, and the house.

Venerable one, if a monk, while entertaining doubt and uncertainty, thinking "is this that person or is this not that person?" — separates even that being from life — what does that become? It is a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk separates himself from life — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk has made preparations to kill his father and mother, and then kills himself — what does that become? If the father and mother died first, it is a defeat, and one is also touched by the fault of an action without interval. But if he himself died first, it is a serious offense, and one is not touched by the fault of an action without interval.

Venerable one, if a monk intends to kill an arhat but kills an ordinary person — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk intends to kill an ordinary person but kills an arhat — what does that become? It is a serious offense, yet one is not touched by the fault of an action without interval.

Venerable one, if a monk has made preparations to kill an arhat, and a trainee is separated from life — what does that become? It is a defeat, and one is also touched by the fault of both an action without interval and a proximate fault.

Venerable one, if a monk has made preparations to kill an ordinary person, and an arhat is separated from life — what does that become? It is a defeat, and one is also touched by the fault of an action without interval.

Venerable one, suppose a thief being led away to execution escapes, and the townspeople or the king's men pursue him from behind; and a monk who is coming from ahead is met by those men, who ask him: "Did you see a thief who fled?" — and the monk, his mind close to the intention to kill the thief, points that thief out to them, and that thief is then separated from life — what does that become? It is a defeat.

Venerable one, suppose a thief being led away to execution escapes, and the townspeople or the king's men pursue him from behind; and a monk who is coming from ahead is met by those men, who ask him: "Did you see a thief who fled?" — and the monk, his mind not being close to the intention to kill the thief, points that thief out to them, and that thief is then separated from life — what does that become? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable one, if among two people a monk has made preparations to kill one and kills the other — what does that become? It is a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk makes preparations to kill a fully ordained person and kills one who is not fully ordained — what does that become? It is a wrong deed.

If a monk makes preparations to kill one who is not fully ordained and — — kills a fully ordained person, what does that become? It is a wrong deed.

If a monk makes preparations to kill one who is not fully ordained and kills someone who has become fully ordained, what does that become? It is a serious offense.

If a monk makes preparations to kill a fully ordained person and kills a fully ordained person, what does that become? It is a wrong deed.

If a monk makes preparations to kill a fully ordained person and kills someone who has become fully ordained, what does that become? It is a serious offense.

If a monk makes preparations against someone who has become fully ordained and kills that fully ordained person, what does that become? It is a defeat.

If a monk makes preparations against someone who has become fully ordained and kills one who is not fully ordained, what does that become? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable one, can it be that there are cases in which a monk who has entered alone into a room meets with conditions that separate him from life and yet incurs a defeat? There are. In the following cases: a monk makes preparations to kill and then enters a room, or, having entered a room, proceeds to make preparations to kill.

Venerable one, can it be that there are cases in which a monk, perceiving a human being as not human, kills with the intention to kill, yet even though that person is separated from life, no defeat is incurred? There are. In the case of one in whom a prior downfall has arisen, one who resides by stealth, one who was inimical from the beginning, a paṇḍaka, or a nun who has been expelled — in those cases it becomes a wrong deed.

Just as the conditions that separate a monk from life with a defeat — the same applies to one who has given back the training precepts, and to a nun: it becomes a defeat. For a novice nun, a novice monk, and a female novice, it is a wrong deed.

Summary verse:

A buddha, the Teacher, one who sees clearly, a non-learner, a learner, and anything at all — one who has lapsed, one who is liberated, one who is frightened, one who is born and one who is attained are similar.

The venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has spoken of a monk who, without directly knowing or fully knowing, does not have and does not possess the summit of distinctly human qualities — the noble and distinguished state of genuine knowledge, vision, and abiding in direct experience — and yet makes a claim such as "I know this, I see this," and from such a false claim a downfall has arisen.

Wishing to purify that downfall, he says at another time, whether questioned or not questioned, these words to the venerable ones: "I spoke without knowing; I said 'I see' when I had not seen — I spoke falsehood and lies." If it is then said that apart from the conceit of superiority, that monk too incurs a defeat and should not be allowed to remain — what exactly does this mean?

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am a buddha" — what does that become? If, having pondered it from the standpoint of having internalized evil and unwholesome qualities, or from the standpoint of conventional designation, he makes such a declaration, it becomes a serious offense. But if he declares it in terms of qualities that are absent in a buddha, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am a Teacher" — what does that become? If he speaks having thought, "I am showing instructions, guiding followers, teaching the Dharma," it becomes a serious offense. But if he makes the declaration in terms of the qualities of the Teacher, it becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am a śrāvaka of the Blessed One Vipasīyin, of the one with the crown protrusion, of the destroyer of cyclic existence, of the protector of all, of Kanakamuni, or of Kāśyapa" — what does that become? If he makes a declaration on the basis of a former existence, it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "From this time forward I go for refuge to the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Śākyamuni" — and from that point forward he thinks, "I go for refuge to all the perfectly and completely awakened buddhas" — then if he says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am one beyond training" — what does that become? If he declares this as a prophecy that he has abandoned the afflictions, it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "I am not going to train in any craft whatsoever," and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am one in training" — what does that become? If he declares this as a prophecy that he is engaged in training, it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "I am training in all manner of conduct," and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I have nothing whatsoever" — what does that become? If he declares, "I have abandoned everything whatsoever," it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "I have no alms-bowl, no Dharma robe, no requisite for the ascetic's livelihood — nothing at all," and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I myself am fallen" — what does that become? If he says, "I am fallen from the fruits of the ascetic's conduct," it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks of a falling from scripture and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am liberated" — what does that become? If he says, "I am liberated from engagements, bonds, latent tendencies, secondary afflictions, and entanglements," it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "Those engagements, bonds, latent tendencies, secondary afflictions, and entanglements that are exhausted, ceased, separated, and transformed — I am liberated from those," and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I am without fear" — what does that become? If he declares this as a prophecy that he has abandoned fear, it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks of worldly matters and says, "I fear nothing whatsoever," it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "This is my final birth" — what does that become? If he declares this as a prophecy of exhaustion, it becomes a defeat. But if he thinks, "This birth — the one of which this is the final birth — is exhausted, ceased, separated, and transformed," and says this, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "I have attained" — what does that become? If he says, "I have attained the fruits of the ascetic's conduct," it becomes a defeat. But if he declares it in terms of something worldly, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says these words: "Alas, you — however you are, just as you are — what is the matter? If you were a stream-enterer (Skt. srotāpanna), a once-returner (Skt. sakṛdāgāmin), a non-returner (Skt. anāgāmin), or an arhat, then I am neither a stream-enterer, nor a once-returner, nor a non-returner, nor an arhat" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

The summary verse:

Unripened attainment, questioning oneself, abandonment, and the two fruits, the four perceptions, what is to be attained, the worldly way, and the final — these are the topics.

Venerable one, if a monk is asked by an elder, "Are you one whose defilements are exhausted?" — and he too held unripened fruits of the tree, and when asked said, "It is so" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "I have attained the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning, and the supreme fruit" — what does that become? It becomes a final offense.

Venerable one, if a monk questions himself and then says, "I have asked whether I am an arhat" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a householder asks a monk, "Have you attained a fruit?" and the monk holds leaves, flowers, and unripened fruits, and then says, "I have" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "I myself have entirely fallen away" — what does that become? If he declares that he has fallen away from something he has actually attained, it becomes a final offense. But if he declares that he has fallen away from something he has not attained, it becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, thinking he has been prophesied as a stream-enterer, declares the fruit of once-returning; thinking he has been prophesied as a once-returner, declares the fruit of non-returning; thinking he has been prophesied as a non-returner, declares the fruit of arhatship — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "At Wandering Mountain there is the fruit of stream-entry; on the face of the Bird-Shelter there is the fruit of once-returning; on Vulture's Peak there is the fruit of non-returning; and in the Pale Forest there is the supreme fruit, arhatship" — what does that become? If he thinks, "There my instructions were given, I recited them, and I did not make an assertion," and speaks on that basis, it becomes a serious offense. But if he declares the fruits of the ascetic life in reference to those places, it becomes a final offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a non-human as a non-human and declares that a superhuman quality has arisen in him — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense. If he perceives a non-human as a human and declares that a superhuman quality has arisen — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense. If he perceives a human as a non-human and declares that a superhuman quality has arisen — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense. If he perceives a human as a human and declares that a superhuman quality has arisen — what does that become? It becomes a final offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "Whatever is to be attained as a śrāvaka ground, that I have attained" — what does that become? If he speaks thinking of something to be attained through awakening, it becomes a serious offense. But if he declares the fruits in terms of śrāvaka qualities, it becomes a final offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "Today I did not enter into a worldly meditative absorption, nor did I enter it at dusk, nor have I entered it up to this point" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says, "I have declared the fruits right here" — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

The Supreme Text of the Vinaya, second fascicle.

The summary verse:

Through a messenger, through a letter, through gesture, through ascribing an expression to another as intermediary, through madness, through a disturbed mind, through distress from sensation, through stupidity.

Venerable one, if a monk communicates a superhuman quality through a messenger — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Likewise, through a letter, and through ascribing an expression to another as intermediary, if one declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk declares a superhuman quality in the presence of a mad person — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Likewise, if one declares a superhuman quality in the presence of one with a disturbed mind, one in distress from sensation, one who is deaf, or one who is stupid — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

The summary verse:

Asleep, delirious, utterly intoxicated, in meditative absorption, in a non-human destiny, through speech, through body, in a secluded place, through mantra, from another and for another's sake — these are the final ones.

Venerable one, if a monk declares a superhuman quality in the presence of one who is asleep — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Likewise, if one declares a superhuman quality in the presence of one who is delirious, one who is utterly intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one dwelling in another destiny — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central region speaks a superhuman quality in the presence of a person from the central region, using the dialect of a border region, and the person from the central region does not understand that border dialect — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If a person from a border region speaks a superhuman quality in the presence of a person from a border region, using the dialect of the central region, and the person from the border region does not understand the dialect of the central region — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If a person from a border region speaks a superhuman quality in the presence of a person from the central region, using a border dialect, and the person from the central region does not understand that border dialect — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If a person from the central region speaks a superhuman quality in the presence of a person from a border region, using the dialect of the central region, and the person from the border region does not understand the dialect of the central region — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk declares a superhuman quality through bodily gesture — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, one declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, one declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

If, perceiving a non-secluded place as not secluded, one declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a final offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, having made himself unrecognizable through secret mantra or medicines, declares a superhuman quality — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk declares as his own a superhuman quality that belongs to another — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk declares a superhuman quality on behalf of others — what does that become? It becomes a serious offense.

Venerable one, are there cases where a monk declares a superhuman quality and yet it does not become a final offense? There are. One who has previously committed a downfall, one who dwells by way of theft, one who was originally of contrary nature, a hermaphrodite, and one who has been expelled from the community of nuns — for these it becomes a wrongdoing.

Just as through the condition of a monk speaking falsely it becomes a final offense, in the same way it becomes a final offense for one who has surrendered the training and for a fully ordained nun. For a female probationer, a male novice, and a female novice, it is a wrongdoing.

Requested by Upāli. The attachment of the root defeat from the Kāśyapīya school is complete.

The summary verse:

Without delusion, in concealment, and likewise through movement, those without effort, and the marks, those belonging to another included here — correctly stated in the assembly.

Upāli, the attendant, asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that if one intentionally causes seminal emission — except in a dream — it is a remainder for the Saṅgha. What is meant by that?"

"Venerable one, if a monk begins while not yet asleep and then falls asleep and a seminal emission occurs, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk begins while asleep and then awakens and a seminal emission occurs, what does that become?"

"If effort is made, it becomes a grave offense. But if no effort is made, there is no transgression."

"Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One has taught — that if one causes a seminal emission that has entered into the sheath it becomes a grave offense — how far must it have entered the sheath?"

"From its resting position it becomes a case of having entered the sheath as soon as it has advanced."

"Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One has taught — that if one causes a seminal emission by setting it in motion it becomes a grave offense — how much movement constitutes setting it in motion?"

"Remaining in contact with what follows, it is a case of having been set in motion once it has advanced from its resting position."

"Venerable one, if a seminal emission occurs without any striving, what does that become?"

"If one does not appropriate it, there is no transgression. But if one does appropriate it, it becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk undergoes a change of marks through causing a seminal emission and becomes a nun, what does that become?"

"It becomes a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun undergoes a change of marks through causing a seminal emission and becomes a monk, what does that become?"

"It becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes another to become an outflow and thereby brings about a seminal emission, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, are there cases where a monk who intentionally causes a seminal emission does not incur a remainder for the Saṅgha?"

"Yes — one in whom a prior transgression has already arisen, one who is in a state of theft, one who from the outset is of incompatible nature, a paṇḍaka, and a nun who has been expelled: for these it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Just as a monk who causes a seminal emission incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha, so likewise does one who has surrendered the training. For a fully ordained nun it is according to the same basis. For a female probationer, a male novice, and a female novice, it is a wrongdoing."

The summary verse:

Body and mind — those are two — and likewise wounds, hairs, and nails alike;
the fourth, if done in two ways:
these are correctly stated in the assembly.

Upāli, the attendant, asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has further taught that if a monk, with a mind of passion and agitation, makes bodily contact with a woman — grasping her hand, grasping her upper arm, grasping her braid, or touching and rubbing any limb, major or minor — and does so himself, it is a remainder for the Saṅgha. What is meant by that?"

"Venerable one, if a woman's bodily faculties have deteriorated and a monk makes bodily contact with her, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if one whose bodily faculties have deteriorated makes bodily contact with a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if the bodily faculties of both have deteriorated and they make bodily contact with each other, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while entertaining doubt and uncertainty about whether this is such a person or not, nonetheless makes bodily contact with that person, what does that become?"

"It becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while entertaining doubt and uncertainty about whether this is a woman or not a woman, nonetheless makes bodily contact with that person, what does that become?"

"It is according to the actual facts of the matter."

"Venerable one, if contact is made through a garment, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with teeth, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with a wound, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with wounds, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with a single hair, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with hairs, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with a single nail, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if contact is made with nails, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human woman as human, makes bodily contact with her, what does that become?"

"It becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha."

"If he perceives one who is human as not human, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he perceives one who is not human as human, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he perceives one who is not human as not human, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one with an intervening object as having an intervening object, makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he perceives one with an intervening object as having no intervening object, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he perceives one with no intervening object as having an intervening object, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he perceives one with no intervening object as having no intervening object, and makes bodily contact, what does that become?"

"It becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha."

Summary verse:

Perception, another's corpse and bones,
marks, male, soft, warm,
a woman, a hermaphrodite, a madwoman, meditative absorption, sleep, not a being.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact with a woman who has developed attachment for another man, together with that other man, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with the corpse of a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha."

"Venerable one, if bodily contact is made together with a skeleton from which the flesh has gone, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact with a woman and, as a result of that contact, she attains the marks of a monk — if she becomes a monk — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a nun makes bodily contact with a man and, as a result of that contact, she attains the marks of a man — if she becomes a monk — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a man, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact with the thought that this might be a relative, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"With a gentle intention or a warm intention — it is the same in those cases as well."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a hermaphrodite, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If bodily contact is made together with a female hermaphrodite, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a mad woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Likewise, if bodily contact is made together with one whose mind is deranged, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a woman who is in meditative absorption, what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a woman who is asleep, what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes bodily contact together with a woman who belongs to another form of existence, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, are there cases where a monk makes bodily contact and yet it does not become a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"There are. These are: one in whom a prior transgression has already arisen; one who abides in the guise of a thief; one who is initially incompatible; a hermaphrodite; and a nun who has been expelled — in those cases it is merely a wrongdoing."

Just as a monk who makes bodily contact throughout incurs a Saṅgha-remainder offense, in the same way, one who has surrendered the training also incurs a Saṅgha-remainder offense. A monk who makes full bodily contact together with a woman who has not yet been born incurs a defeat. In the case of a female trainee, a novice monk, and a novice nun, it becomes a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

By voice, by body, in seclusion, by mantra, emanating from one place to appear in another,
by messenger, by letter, by hand-signal, conveying a proposition through an intermediary, by arrangement — a hermaphrodite male, and a female hermaphrodite who is charming: these are offenses.

The venerable Upāli (the attendant of the assembly) asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that a monk who, with a mind aroused and agitated, toward a woman as the object, utters vile words of indecency that are assembled — conjoined with lewdness, even speaking as a man would speak to a young woman — incurs a Saṅgha-remainder offense. What exactly is that?"

"Venerable one, if a monk from the central region addresses a woman from the central region in the dialect of a border region with words of indecency, and that woman from the central region does not understand the border dialect, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If a monk from a border region addresses a woman from a border region in the dialect of the central region with words of indecency, and that woman from the border region does not understand the dialect of the central region, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If a monk from a border region addresses a woman from the central region in a border dialect with words of indecency, and that woman from the central region does not understand the border dialect, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If a monk from the central region addresses a woman from a border region in the dialect of the central region with words of indecency, and that woman from the border region does not understand the dialect of the central region, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk conveys words of indecency to a woman by means of bodily gesture, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving seclusion to be seclusion, speaks words of indecency to a woman in that secluded place, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving what is seclusion to be not secluded, he speaks words of indecency, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving what is not secluded to be secluded, he speaks words of indecency, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving what is not secluded to be not secluded, he speaks words of indecency to a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk disguises himself with medicine or a secret mantra so as to be unrecognizable, and then speaks words of indecency to a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a woman while at a distance from her, through another person, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a woman on behalf of others, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to an emanated woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency about a woman by way of a messenger, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"And likewise if it is done through a written letter, a hand signal, making an insinuation to another, or speaking indirectly — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a woman, 'Make love with me,' what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks such words to a paṇḍaka, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks them to a man, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks them to a female paṇḍaka, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a woman, 'You are beautiful,' what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a woman, 'You are wicked,' what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

Summary verse:

One who is mad, or mentally disturbed, or overcome by feeling, or a deaf-mute, or a fool, or asleep, or at work, or thoroughly intoxicated, or a nun who has entered into absorption —

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a woman who is mad, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"And likewise if she is mentally disturbed, or overcome by feeling, or a deaf-mute, or a fool, or asleep, or occupied with work, or thoroughly intoxicated — if he speaks words of indecency to her, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, a monk who is in the act of speaking words of indecency to a woman — if his own marks change and he becomes a nun, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, a nun who is in the act of speaking words of indecency to a man — if her marks change and she becomes a monk, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One also declared: 'Whatever monk speaks words of indecency directed at a woman — that becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense.' Is there any case in which a monk might speak words of indecency directed at a woman and it would not become a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"There is. If he speaks them on another's behalf, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a woman who has entered into meditative absorption, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

Summary verse:

The fourth rule — two cases of wrong perception, and what has been declared regarding indecency — the same applies to solicitation for service.

This is to be explained in full detail.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a human woman while perceiving her as not human, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks words of indecency to a non-human female while perceiving her as human, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks words of indecency to a human woman while perceiving her as human, what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of indecency to a woman while perceiving her as a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"If he speaks words of indecency to a woman while perceiving her as a man, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks words of indecency to a man while perceiving him as a woman, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he speaks words of indecency to a man while perceiving him as a man, what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk speaks words of indecency directed at a woman and yet it does not become a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"There are. In the following cases it becomes a wrongdoing: when a transgression has already arisen before, when one dwells in a state of concealment, when there is an initial incompatibility, when it concerns a pandaka, and when it concerns an expelled nun."

"Just as speaking words of indecency to a monk becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense, so too does it become a Saṅgha-remainder offense when directed at one who has received the training. In the case of a fully ordained nun, it becomes a grave offense. In the case of a female trainee-nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun, it becomes a wrongdoing."

The venerable Upāli then addressed the Blessed One, the buddha Bhagavān: "Venerable Blessed One, you also said it is a Saṅgha-remainder offense when a monk, with a mind that is passionate and inflamed, speaks praise of service to himself in the presence of those attending upon a woman, saying something of this kind: 'A monk such as I, possessed of moral discipline and wholesome qualities, living the pure life — for one to render service to me by engaging in this act of union with me, that is the highest.' What was meant by the statement that it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"The remainder of the text is to be expounded just as it was set forth in the case of speaking words of indecency, including the praise of service. The one difference is this: in the case of a fully ordained nun speaking praise of service, it is to be declared a wrongdoing. In the case of a female trainee-nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun, it is a wrongdoing."

Summary verse:

Two Dharmas, and then a group of six, soliciting and purchasing — those two, transferring, and then two groups of four:
eight in all, and these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then addressed the Blessed One, the buddha Bhagavān: "Venerable one, what is the Dharma that is neither past, nor future, nor present, has no going or coming, and has reached the ultimate end of the reach of karma?"

"Venerable Upāli, it is nirvāṇa."

"Venerable one, what is the Dharma that does have going and coming, and has reached the ultimate end of the reach of karma?"

"Venerable Upāli, it is one who speaks in jest."

"And if one does that, what does it become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"The Blessed One also said it is a Saṅgha-remainder offense when a monk praises himself to a woman using masculine terms, or praises himself to a man using feminine terms, representing himself as a husband or a lover — and that even a single moment of this suffices. What was meant by the statement that it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"Venerable one, if a monk accepts a commission from a madwoman, delivers it to the madwoman, and then conveys the reply back — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from a madwoman, delivers it to the madwoman, and then conveys the reply back to one in her natural state — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from a madwoman, delivers it to one in her natural state, and then conveys the reply back to the madwoman — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from a madwoman, delivers it to one in her natural state, and then conveys the reply back to one in her natural state — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accepts a commission from a woman in her natural state, delivers it to a woman in her natural state, and then conveys the reply back to one in her natural state — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"If he accepts a commission from a woman in her natural state, delivers it to a woman in her natural state, and then conveys the reply back to a madwoman — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accepts a commission from one in her natural state, delivers it to a madwoman, and then conveys the reply back to one in her natural state — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one in her natural state, delivers it to a madwoman, and then conveys the reply back to a madwoman — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

The two sets of four cases involving a madwoman apply in the same way to a mentally disturbed woman, and likewise the two sets of four cases apply to a woman overcome by feeling.

"Venerable one, regarding a householder who is capable and one who is not capable — first, if a monk accepts a commission from one who is capable, delivers it to one who is capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is capable, delivers it to one who is capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is not capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is capable, delivers it to one who is not capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is capable, delivers it to one who is not capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is not capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accepts a commission from one who is not capable, delivers it to one who is not capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is not capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a misdeed."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is not capable, delivers it to one who is not capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is not capable, delivers it to one who is capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is not capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If he accepts a commission from one who is not capable, delivers it to one who is capable, and then conveys the reply back to one who is capable — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a householder, 'Buy a woman,' what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a householder, 'Buy the woman called Such-and-such,' what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one who has not yet received full ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has not yet received full ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a misdeed."

"If one who has not yet received full ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one who has not yet received full ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one in the process of receiving full ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a misdeed."

"If one who has not yet received full ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one who has not yet received full ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has fully received ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If one in the process of receiving full ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one in the process of receiving full ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has since received full ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a misdeed."

"If one in the process of receiving full ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one in the process of receiving full ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has fully received ordination —

what does that become?"

"It becomes a grave offense."

"If one who has fully received ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one who has fully received ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has fully received ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"If one who has fully received ordination acts as a go-between for a marriage proposal, delivers it to one who has fully received ordination, and then conveys the reply back to one who has not yet received full ordination — what does that become?"

"It becomes a misdeed."

"Venerable one, this may refer to the same person being the one who is moved, and also to having been moved by the same person."

It also seems that there is the practice of acting to satisfy that very same person, and also the practice of having satisfied that very same person. Yes, it is so. Consider this case: a person who has engaged in the practice of acting to please another, to whom the Saṅgha has not yet assigned a Saṅgha-remainder offense, goes before the Saṅgha and requests that the act of satisfaction be performed. The Saṅgha grants that person the act of satisfaction. Now, while that person was largely performing the act of satisfaction, two Saṅgha-remainder offenses arose: the first was assigned after one day, and the second was assigned after two days. That person then goes before the Saṅgha and requests a transfer. If the Saṅgha grants the transfer, then the first offense is one that has been committed, the second is one for which a transfer has been given, the third is one involving the practice of acting to satisfy, and the fourth is one involving the practice of having satisfied.

"Venerable one, suppose neither a woman nor a man is involved, and a monk acts as go-between for the two of them — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"The female is not a human being, and the male is not a human being, and a monk acts as go-between for the two of them — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"The female is not a human being, and the male is a human being, and a monk acts as go-between for the two of them — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"The female is also not a human being, and the male is also not a human being, and a monk acts as go-between for the two of them — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between while perceiving human beings as human beings — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"If a monk acts as go-between while perceiving human beings as non-human beings — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If a monk acts as go-between while perceiving non-human beings as human beings — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If a monk acts as go-between while perceiving non-human beings as non-human beings — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between indirectly — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

A verse summary:

A maiden and a daughter, one in the womb, a wife, a person of indeterminate sex, and a female of indeterminate sex — the entire Saṅgha dwelling in the code of training, the two characteristics, and the matter of inquiry.

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for a maiden — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for householders who have no sons — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for those dwelling in the womb — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for a wife — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If a monk acts as go-between for persons of indeterminate sex — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, a certain householder goes before the assembled Saṅgha and says: 'Noble ones, please use my words to say the following to a certain senior householder: Please give my son a daughter, a sister, a niece, or a grand-niece.' If the entire Saṅgha accepts this message and delivers it and conveys the reply, what does it become for the entire Saṅgha?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense for the entire Saṅgha."

"But if, at the behest of the entire Saṅgha, a single monk delivers it and conveys the reply — what does it become for the entire Saṅgha?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense for the entire Saṅgha."

"But if a single monk delivers it and conveys the reply on his own authority — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If a monk acts as go-between for nuns and for others observing celibacy who abide in the training — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, when a monk, having just accepted a message, delivers it and conveys the reply to a nun — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a nun has just accepted a message, and in that moment her sex changes, so that she becomes a monk, and he then delivers it and conveys the reply — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk is acting as go-between and the woman in question acquires male characteristics, or a man acquires female characteristics, and while still in the process of changing sex he delivers the message and conveys the reply — what does that become?"

"It becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a man has arranged a signal with a woman, and that man says to a monk, 'Venerable one, would you look in on the woman?' — and the monk says, 'She is sitting right there at the foot of that tree' — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk acts as go-between yet it does not become a Saṅgha-remainder offense?"

"There are. If a prior downfall has occurred; if one is dwelling in concealment; if one was initially incompatible; if one is a paṇḍaka; if the nun has been expelled — in these cases it becomes a wrongdoing. Just as with the monk acting as go-between it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense, so too for one who has returned the training and for a nun it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense. For a probationer, a novice monk, and a novice nun it becomes a wrongdoing."

Summary verse:

Three bases, the standard measure, oneself and another, and the uncovered, falling into it, the set of seven,
and the characteristic coming last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk, without an owner, causes a dwelling to be built for his own sake, that monk must build the dwelling within the prescribed measure — and the measure of the dwelling is this: twelve spans of the Sugata in length and seven spans in width, measured on the interior. He must bring fellow monks to inspect the site, and those monks who are brought must check that the site is suitable, free from dispute, and proper to build upon. If a monk, though the site is unsuitable, or is in dispute, or is improper to build upon, still causes a dwelling to be built for himself without an owner, or does not bring fellow monks to inspect the site, or does not show the site to the monks who have been brought, then if he exceeds the measure it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense." What is meant by this?

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a dwelling to be built without having examined the site — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If he examines the site and then causes the dwelling to be built — what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If he obtains permission for the dwelling but does not build it — what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If he begins it himself and then abandons it — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If he causes another to abandon it — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If he causes an uncovered structure to be built — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

"If he deliberately falls into it — what does that become?"

"It becomes a serious misdeed."

Likewise: if one has parted from life, or dies while still a householder, or dies on account of being a wandering ascetic, or on account of food, or on account of being a paṇḍaka, or on account of having expelled a nun, or on account of not having committed a killing, or having killed one's father, or having killed one's mother, or having killed an arhat, or having caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or having drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, or being a non-Buddhist adherent, or having joined the non-Buddhists, or dwelling in concealment, or being one who should not remain, or being initially incompatible, or dwelling separately, or being one who avows —

"If one seizes the training itself as a loan, what will come of it?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If one who has not received full ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as not having received full ordination, what will come of it?" "It is an offense."

Vinaya: The Superior Text. The Third Fascicle.

"If one who has not received full ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as having received full ordination in the process, what will come of it?" "It is an offense."

"If one who has not received full ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as having fully received ordination, what will come of it?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as being in the process of receiving full ordination, what will come of it?" "It is an offense."

"If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as having fully received ordination, what will come of it?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If one who has fully received ordination performs an act of joining, and one causes that to stand as having fully received ordination, what will come of it?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, suppose a monk begins to build a cell, and in the course of that his status changes, and he becomes a nun — if one then causes that to stand as valid, what will come of it?" "It is an offense."

"Venerable One, suppose a nun begins to build a cell, and in the course of that her status changes, and she becomes a monk — if one then causes that to stand as valid, what will come of it?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, are there cases in which a monk builds a cell and yet it does not entail a Saṅgha remainder?" "There are. For one who has previously incurred a downfall, one who dwells in concealment, one who is initially incompatible, a paṇḍaka, and one who has expelled a nun — in those cases it becomes merely an offense."

"If one who has been granted the training grants permission to build, what will come of it?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder." "If a nun grants permission to build, what will come of it?" "It is an offense." "For a probationer, a male novice, and a female novice — it is an offense."

The venerable attendant retinue asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, you have said that when a monk who has an owner undertakes to build a great monastery hall for the sake of the Saṅgha, he should lead monks to inspect the site, and the monks who are led should examine whether the site is suitable, free of disputes, and fit to begin upon. Yet if a monk deems the site unsuitable, or involving disputes, or not fit to begin upon, and the owner nevertheless proceeds to build the great monastery hall for the sake of the Saṅgha, or does not lead monks to inspect the site, or, even having led monks, does not show them the site — in such a case, you have said it entails a Saṅgha remainder. What does that mean?" "With the exception of exceeding the limit and the act of raising up itself, the remainder of the rule is to be stated for a great monastery hall in the same way as it has been set out for a Saṅgha-remainder in the case of a cell."

Summary verse:

Messenger, written message, sign language, conveying a charge against another as intermediary,
one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is dull in sensation, one who is simple-minded, one who is asleep, one who is deeply intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, and one who is an outsider —

The venerable attendant retinue asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, you have also said: when a monk, angry and with aversion, displeased and wishing by any means that another may be separated from the holy life, accuses monks of a groundless defeat — a matter of no foundation — and when that dispute is subsequently examined, whether at another time or not, whether asked or not asked, and is found to be groundless, and that monk is established to have spoken out of aversion — what does it mean when you said that this entails a Saṅgha remainder?"

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses another monk through a messenger, groundlessly, of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Likewise, if he accuses him by means of a written letter, or by hand signal, or by attributing words to another, or by accusation through an intermediary — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a monk who is insane, groundlessly, of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "Likewise, if he accuses a monk who is mentally disturbed, or who is overcome by feeling, or who is deaf, or who is mentally deficient, or who is overcome by sleep, or who is occupied with work, or who is deeply intoxicated, or who is in meditative absorption, or who is dwelling somewhere else — groundlessly, of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses outsiders from this community — those of other traditions, tīrthikas, wandering ascetics (śramaṇas), brahmins, wanderers following a practice, and wandering mendicants — groundlessly, of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a wrongdoing."

Summary verse:

By speech, by body, by a secret mantra, accusing another on behalf of another — householders and the like, and the characteristics — these are the four groupings.

"Venerable One, when a monk from the central region, speaking in a border dialect, accuses groundlessly — of a matter that would constitute a defeat — a monk from the central region, and the monk from the central region does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "When a border monk, speaking in the dialect of the central region, accuses a border monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, and the border monk does not understand the central-region dialect — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "When a border monk, speaking in a border dialect, accuses a central-region monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, and the central-region monk does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "When a central-region monk, speaking in the dialect of the central region, accuses a border monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, and the border monk does not understand the central-region dialect — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses another monk, through bodily gesture, groundlessly, of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, accuses another monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "If a monk, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, accuses another groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "If a monk, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, accuses another groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense." "If a monk, perceiving a non-secluded place as not secluded, accuses another groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a monk, having rendered himself invisible by means of medicine or by secret mantra, accuses another monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a monk groundlessly — of a matter that would constitute a defeat — having heard it from another — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk, on behalf of other monks, accuses someone groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a layman groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

In the case of a hermaphrodite, an intermediate-sex person, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed his father, one who has killed an arhat, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has entered into the non-Buddhist fold, one who dwells as a thief, one who was at the outset in a state of discord, or one against whom a transgression had previously arisen — if such a person is accused groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, what comes of that? It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a junior monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

In the case of one who causes schism in the Saṅgha, one who draws blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, one who ought not to be harbored, one who dwells apart, one who has made a formal acknowledgment, or a monk who has been given training — if such a person is accused groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, what comes of that? It entails a Saṅgha remainder.

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a monk groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, and in consequence of that accusation the accused receives full ordination and becomes a fully ordained monk — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a nun accuses a nun groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat, and in consequence of that accusation the accused receives full ordination and becomes a fully ordained monk — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"If, perceiving a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, he accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving a not-fully-ordained person as fully ordained, he accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving a not-fully-ordained person as not fully ordained, he accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses a human monk, perceiving him as human, groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"If, perceiving a human as non-human, he accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving a non-human as human, he accuses that person of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

"If, perceiving a non-human as non-human, he accuses that person groundlessly of a matter that would constitute a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offense."

Summary verse:

The first group concerns extremes and what lacks a boundary, what entails a remainder, and the mutual cases between individuals, what is written, and what is of only slight import — these are to be elaborated at length.

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses — groundlessly and without basis — a monk who has himself confessed: 'I have engaged in sexual misconduct, in a matter arisen from sexual union,' whether accusing him of theft, of murder, or of having taught the Dharma as a superior — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a monk accuses — groundlessly — a monk who has himself confessed: 'I have stolen a major valuable,' whether accusing him of murder, of having taught the Dharma as a superior, or of sexual misconduct — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a monk who has himself confessed: 'I have taken a human life' — — accuses him, groundlessly, of having taught the Dharma as a superior, of sexual misconduct, or of theft — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, if a monk who has himself confessed: 'I have taught the Dharma as superior' — if another monk accuses him, groundlessly, of sexual misconduct, of theft, or of taking a life — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable One, when the Blessed One declared that if a monk groundlessly accuses another monk by means of a defeat — what was meant by that?"

"Venerable One, if a monk groundlessly accuses another monk by means of a heinous act — if he accuses him of killing his mother, his father, or an arhat — it entails a Saṅgha remainder. But if he accuses him, groundlessly, of causing schism in the Saṅgha, or of drawing blood with malicious intent, that is a grave offence. Why is that? One who accuses another of killing his father, his mother, or an arhat has levelled the accusation by means of a defeat. One who accuses another of causing schism in the Saṅgha or of drawing blood with malicious intent has levelled the accusation by means of a grave offence; and a grave offence does not render one no longer a monk — it is something to be confessed."

"Venerable One, if a monk groundlessly accuses another monk by means of a defeat, and that entails a Saṅgha remainder — then if he accuses him, groundlessly, by means of a Saṅgha-remainder offence, what comes of that?" "It becomes a transgression."

"If he accuses him, groundlessly, by means of what is to be individually confessed, and by means of a grave offence — what comes of that?" "It is a grave offence."

"Likewise, if he accuses him, groundlessly, by means of a grave offence — what comes of that?" "It is a grave offence."

"Venerable One, when the Blessed One declared that if a monk groundlessly accuses another monk by means of a defeat it entails a Saṅgha remainder — what was meant by that?"

"Venerable One, if a monk groundlessly accuses a female trainee, a novice, or a novice nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offence."

"If a female trainee groundlessly accuses a fully ordained nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"If a fully ordained nun groundlessly accuses a fully ordained monk by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It entails a Saṅgha remainder."

"If a female trainee groundlessly accuses a fully ordained nun, a novice, or a novice nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offence."

"If a fully ordained nun groundlessly accuses a fully ordained monk, a fully ordained nun, a female trainee, a novice, or a novice nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It is a grave offence."

"If a novice groundlessly accuses a fully ordained monk, a fully ordained nun, a female trainee, a novice, or a novice nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It is a grave offence."

"If a novice nun groundlessly accuses a fully ordained monk, a fully ordained nun, a female trainee, a novice, or a novice nun by means of a defeat — what comes of that?" "It is a grave offence."

"Venerable One, if a monk himself writes a letter and says: 'From this letter I am telling you — you have incurred the defeat of sexual misconduct' — what comes of that?" "It becomes a grave offence."

"Venerable One, is there a case where a monk groundlessly accuses another monk by means of a defeat, and yet the Saṅgha does not increase?" "Yes, there is: when a previous transgression has occurred, when one is residing by stealth, when one was originally incompatible, when one is a eunuch, and when one has expelled a nun — in those cases it is a misdeed."

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has also stated: when a monk, having become angry and full of aversion, thinking, 'By any means I will separate this one from the holy life,' falsely accuses monks who have no transgression, in a manner not consistent with the facts, by means of an allegation of defeat — whether or not, at some other time, he is questioned about it — and that allegation is also not consistent with the facts, and since that allegation is not consistent with the facts, from having thought of it only briefly and having taken up some matter, and the monk too, while remaining in aversion, speaks out of aversion — what is meant by the declaration 'the Saṅgha increases'?" "The remainder of the main rule: concerning groundlessness, it is just as it stands — what is said briefly there should be stated at length."

Summary verse:

Admonishment and petition, the foolish and the mindful two;
fourth: sitting without appointment, with resolve one, and in open space — sitting should be stated in full.

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, when a monk works to undermine and create schism in order to divide a harmonious Saṅgha, fully takes up that contentious matter and persists in it — the monks should instruct that monk as follows: 'Venerable one, do not work to undermine the harmonious Saṅgha in order to divide it. Do not fully take up and persist in a contentious matter that would lead to schism. Be in harmony with the Saṅgha, venerable one. Let the Saṅgha not be divided. Rejoice together, without conflict, supreme — become like water and milk mingled together, illuminate the Teacher's teaching, and abide in comfort and ease. Venerable one, please abandon this kind of basis for dividing the Saṅgha.' If, when the monks instruct that monk in this way, he abandons that basis — good. If he does not abandon it, the monks should instruct and admonish him a second and a third time for the sake of his abandoning it. If, when instructed and admonished a second and a third time, he abandons that basis — good. If he does not abandon it — the Saṅgha increases. So it has been declared. What is meant by this?"

"Venerable One, if a monk, without first admonishing by means of a friendly word, proceeds to admonish by means of the fourfold formal act — is it called an admonishment or is it not called an admonishment?" The Blessed One declared: "It is not called an admonishment." "Does the admonishment take effect?" "Upāli, it does not take effect, and it constitutes a serious offence against the Saṅgha as well."

"Venerable One, if a monk first admonishes by means of a friendly word and then admonishes by means of the fourfold formal act — is it called an admonishment or not?" The Blessed One declared: "It is called an admonishment." "Does the admonishment take effect?" "Upāli, it does take effect, and it does not constitute a serious offence against the Saṅgha."

"Venerable One, if, without having performed the act of expulsion, one proceeds to give a friendly admonishment — is it called an admonishment or not?" The Blessed One declared: "It is not to be called an admonishment." "Does the admonishment take effect?" "Upāli, it does not take effect, and it constitutes a serious offence against the Saṅgha as well."

"Venerable One, if the act of expulsion has been performed and one then admonishes by means of a friendly word — is it called an admonishment or not?" The Blessed One declared: "It is called an admonishment."

"Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does take effect as a friendly admonishment, and it does not constitute a serious offence against the Saṅgha either."

"Venerable One, if, without having performed the act of expulsion, one approaches the Saṅgha with the intention of leaving — saying 'I am going' — whether one goes out of aversion, goes out of delusion, or goes out of fear:

what does this become?" "It is a transgression. Should one admonish, or should one not admonish?" The Blessed One declared: "One should not admonish." "Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does not take effect as a friendly admonishment, and it also constitutes a serious offence against the Saṅgha."

"Having performed the act of expulsion, if one then approaches the Saṅgha with the intention of leaving — saying 'I am going' — whether one goes out of aversion, goes out of delusion, or goes out of fear: what does this become?" "It is a transgression. Should one admonish, or should one not admonish?" The Blessed One declared: "One should admonish." "Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does take effect as a friendly admonishment, and it does not constitute a serious offence against the Saṅgha either."

"Venerable One, if without having first discussed the matter or reminded the person, one causes oneself to abide in a state of discomfort with regard to the instruction — what does this become?" "It is a transgression. Should one admonish, or should one not admonish?" The Blessed One declared: "One should not admonish." "Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does not take effect as a friendly admonishment."

"Venerable One, if, having first discussed the matter and reminded the person, one then causes oneself to abide in a state of discomfort with regard to the instruction — what does this become?" "It is a transgression. Should one admonish, or should one not admonish?" The Blessed One declared: "One should admonish." "Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does take effect as a friendly admonishment."

"If those who are within the boundary admonish those who are outside the boundary, is it called an admonishment? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It is not a proper admonishment." "If those who are outside the boundary admonish those who are within the boundary, is it called an admonishment? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It is not a proper admonishment."

"Venerable One, if the monk who performs the act, being within the boundary, admonishes those who are outside the boundary — is it called an admonishment? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It is not a proper admonishment." "Venerable One, if the monk who performs the act, being outside the boundary, admonishes those who are within the boundary — is it called an admonishment? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It is not a proper admonishment."

"Venerable One, if the monk who performs the act presses upon the boundary line and, having compressed it, admonishes while situated at the boundary — is it called an admonishment or not?" "It is a proper friendly admonishment." "Does the admonishment take effect? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It does take effect as a friendly admonishment."

"Venerable One, if someone who has not been appointed as the monk to perform the act expels four individuals who are within the boundary — is it called an expulsion? Is it a proper admonishment?" "It is not a proper admonishment." "Venerable One, if one who has been appointed as the monk to perform the act expels four individuals who are within the boundary — is it called an expulsion? Is it a proper admonishment?" "If he has expelled them one by one, two by two, or three by three, but not all four together, it is called an expulsion."

"Venerable One, if the monk who performs the act admonishes four monks who are dwelling equally in the four directions within the boundary — does the admonishment both take effect and entail no downfall whatsoever, while also not causing disharmony in the Saṅgha?" "Yes, Upāli, that is the case — provided they confer intention upon one another and he admonishes them one by one, two by two, and three by three, but not four by four. Why is that? Because it is not permissible for an assembly to perform the acts of an assembly."

"If the monk who performs the act is situated on one side only, is it permissible to perform all acts pertaining to all four dwelling-places?" "Upāli, if the monk who performs the act presses down upon the boundary marker — whether a board, a small board, a key, or an elongated key — of all four quarters simultaneously, and if at each of those dwelling-places there are acts of the following kinds nearby — acts requiring a quorum of four, acts requiring a quorum of five, acts requiring a quorum of ten, and acts requiring a quorum of twenty — then it is permissible."

"Why is that?" Because some of them perform the act, while others maintain the quorum. If one who is on the ground gives a directive to those who are in the air, is that considered a proper directive? It is not a valid quorum. And conversely, venerable sir, if the one who performs the act is in the air and gives a directive to those who are on the ground, is that considered a proper directive? It is not a valid quorum.

Just as the Saṅgha constitutes a surplus in relation to the monk, and the training has been conferred accordingly, so too in relation to the fully ordained nun there is a Saṅgha surplus. For the female trainee, the novice monk, and the novice nun, it constitutes an offence. For one in whom a transgression or the like has previously arisen, it is likewise only an offence, as before. Thus this section is also to be set forth as is appropriate for the three Saṅgha-surplus cases. The Undetermined Cases from the larger recension of Upāli's Questions is complete.

Summary verse:

The boundary, the path, and the royal lineage, the aggregate, and likewise the surplus,
the mouth, and the sugar, and hvags, molasses, ghee, and the two undetermined cases.

Venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has also spoken of this: a monk who, together with a woman, sits alone in a secluded and sheltered place, in a posture suitable for sensual conduct — and if thereupon a trustworthy laywoman, one whose words are credible, speaks to him, saying that he has committed any one of three things: a root defeat, a Saṅgha-surplus offence, or any offence whatsoever entailing a formal act — and the monk, while seated there, acknowledges it, thereby causing him to commit any one of those three: a root defeat, a Saṅgha-surplus offence, or any offence entailing a formal act — and the trustworthy laywoman with credible words causes that monk to act in accordance with whatever she has said — that is an undetermined case.

"And again, a monk who, together with a woman, sits alone in a secluded and sheltered place, in a posture not suitable for sensual conduct — and if thereupon a trustworthy laywoman, one whose words are credible, speaks to him, saying that he has committed any one of two things: a Saṅgha-surplus offence or any offence whatsoever entailing a formal act — and the monk acknowledges being so seated — and thereby commits any one of those two: a Saṅgha-surplus offence or any offence entailing a formal act — and the trustworthy laywoman with credible words causes that monk to act in accordance with whatever she has said — that too is an undetermined case." What does this mean?

Venerable sir, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I saw this monk commit a first extreme act," should one act on the word of a trustworthy laywoman with credible words, or should one not proceed? One should investigate the matter itself, not proceed immediately. First, one should ask whether there is a companion of his present there. If she says "Yes, there is," then both should be questioned. If their accounts agree, one should proceed on the word of the trustworthy laywoman with credible words, and inquire into the matter itself. But if she says: "That first extreme act did not occur, yet I did see the second, third, or fourth extreme act," then the monk should be led to seek resolution. In the same way as for the second, third, and fourth, so likewise should the matter be set forth.

Venerable sir, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk engaging in corruption through the mouth" —

the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting. They should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. But if she says: "He did not engage in corruption through the anal passage; rather, he engaged in corruption through the urinary passage" — then the monk should be led to seek resolution. Just as the case of the oral passage was set forth in full, so likewise should the anal passage and the urinary passage be set forth in the same way.

Venerable sir, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk engaging in corruption together with a woman of the warrior class (kṣatriya)" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. But if she says: "He did not engage in corruption with the warrior-class woman; rather, he engaged in corruption with a brahmin woman" — then the monk should be led to seek resolution. Just as the case of the warrior-class woman was set forth in full, so likewise should the case of the brahmin-class woman, a woman of the merchant class, a woman of the commoner class, a white woman, a dark woman, a dark-blue woman, a tall woman, a short woman, a beautiful woman, a thin woman, a brown-complexioned woman, a well-formed woman, a walking woman, a sitting woman, a standing woman, and a lying-down woman all be set forth in full detail.

Venerable sir, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk committing the first extreme act of drawing forth a heap" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. But if she says: "That first extreme heap did not occur; however, the second, third, fourth, and fifth transgressive heap did occur" — this should be set forth in full detail.

Venerable sir, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk committing the first act of taking from what belongs to the Saṅgha" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself.

However, if the monk says: "The first act of taking from what belongs to the Saṅgha did not occur, but the second, third, fourth, and so on up to the thirteenth did" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk. Just as with the first, so too should it be stated with regard to the second, third, and on up to the thirteenth act of taking from what belongs to the Saṅgha.

If a venerable, trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk committing an act of transgression by mouth" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself.

However, if she says: "He did not commit a transgression by mouth, but he did cause seminal emission to flow from outside, into the inner part of the lip" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

If a venerable, trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk committing a transgression in the passage used for urination" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself.

However, if she says: "He did not commit a transgression in the passage used for urination, but he did cause seminal emission to flow onto the inner thigh" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

If a venerable, trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk committing a transgression in the passage used for defecation" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself.

However, if she says: "He did not commit a transgression in the passage used for defecation, but he did cause seminal emission to flow onto the fold of the buttocks" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

If a venerable, trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk drinking beer at an improper time" — then the monks should neither authorize the trustworthy laywoman with credible words to act, nor prevent her from acting; they should neither authorize her to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevent her from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself.

However, if she says: "He did not drink beer at an improper time, but he did drink meat-broth" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

Venerable ones, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the assembly of monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk drinking sugarcane beer" — then the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should neither be authorized to act nor prevented from acting; she should neither be authorized to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevented from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. However, if she says: "He did not drink sugarcane beer at an improper time, but he did eat meat" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

The Vinaya: the Supreme Text, the Fourth Fascicle.

Venerable ones, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the assembly of monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk eating meat at an improper time" — then the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should neither be authorized to act nor prevented from acting; she should neither be authorized to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevented from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. However, if she says: "He did not eat meat at an improper time, but he did eat sugarcane" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

Venerable ones, if a trustworthy laywoman with credible words comes before the assembly of monks and says: "Venerable ones, I have seen a monk eating food at an improper time" — then the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should neither be authorized to act nor prevented from acting; she should neither be authorized to inquire into the matter itself, nor prevented from doing so. For the time being, one should ask whether the monk has any senior companion. If she says: "Yes, he does," one should question both of them. If their accounts agree, the trustworthy laywoman with credible words should be authorized to act, and she should be directed to inquire into the matter itself. However, if she says: "He did not eat food at an improper time, but he did eat butter" — then the matter should be inquired into by the monk.

In all such cases of uncertain matters, those trustworthy laywomen with credible words who speak of what they have genuinely seen — the matter should be inquired into by the monk. The section from the Kashgar recension dealing with uncertain matters is complete.

Summary verse:

The matter itself being lost, or burned, mind disturbed, without consecration, being suitable, and having passed the time — the mark, the basis, and the having been kept.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk who has received a robe, having stretched it out to stiffen it, must keep any surplus robe for up to ten days; if he keeps it beyond that, it constitutes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Venerable one, could it be that the very same robe has passed ten days and also lacks a single day?" Upāli said: "It is so. Thus, if a monk consecrates a robe that has passed ten days, and then, without any robe at all, he is present outside the boundary at the moment of dawn, that robe has both passed ten days and is lacking one day."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk's robe requiring relinquishment becomes damaged, should he confess the transgression?" Upāli replied: "He should confess it with only the bare confession."

"Venerable one, if the transgression has already been confessed and the robe is then recovered, should it be relinquished?" Upāli replied: "It need not be relinquished. One should confess with only the bare confession."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk's robe requiring relinquishment is burned by fire or eaten away, whether in fragments or entirely — should those remnants be relinquished?" Upāli replied: "It need not be relinquished. One should confess with only the bare confession. However, if any piece remaining is a full cubit in extent, that should be relinquished."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk obtains a robe and five nights have elapsed, and his mind then becomes disturbed, from what point should the ten nights be counted?" Upāli replied: "From the point at which he recovers his own mind."

"Venerable one, could it be that a monk who has neither consecrated nor made proper use of a robe — whether it be the eighth or ninth robe — and yet keeps it for the remainder of his life, incurs no transgression?" Upāli replied: "It does incur a transgression. The way it works is this: each day the monk should take the robe out and have another consecrate it."

"Venerable one, what is meant by the Blessed One's statement that a monk must relinquish a robe that has passed ten days?" Upāli replied: "Venerable one, could it be that even if a monk keeps an extra robe for more than ten nights, it does not become a transgression requiring relinquishment?" Upāli replied: "It does incur such a transgression. The cases are these: where the fiber of the cloth is acceptable but the thread is not; where the thread is acceptable but the fiber is not; and where neither is acceptable. Unacceptable materials are camel wool, cow hair, goat wool, deer wool, blended materials, and unwoven fabric. A robe made of such materials, if kept for more than ten days, becomes a serious offense."

"Venerable one, what is meant by the Blessed One's statement that monks should keep an extra robe for up to ten days?" Upāli replied: "Venerable one, could it be that a monk who keeps an extra robe for the remainder of his life incurs no transgression?" Upāli replied: "It does incur a transgression — if the time limit of ten days is exceeded."

"Venerable one, could it be that keeping that very same robe is both a transgression and not a transgression?" Upāli replied: "It is so. If that monk keeps a precious robe, there is no transgression; but if he undergoes the transformation of ordination status and reverts to being a monk, then keeping it becomes a transgression."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk obtains a robe when it is the tenth night, and then he undergoes the transformation of ordination status and reverts to being a nun, and the tenth night then passes — what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a nun obtains a robe when it is the tenth night, and then she undergoes the transformation of ordination status and reverts to being a monk, and the tenth night then passes — what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk perceives the tenth night as the tenth night, and dawn breaks — what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"If he perceives the tenth night as not the tenth night, what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "There is no transgression."

"If it is not the tenth night and he perceives it as the tenth night, what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "It becomes a serious offense."

"If it is not the tenth night and he perceives it as not the tenth night, what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk finds a robe in a place where a formal act of deprivation has been imposed — could that robe also be subject to relinquishment?" Upāli replied: "It is so. The case is this: the robe is one requiring relinquishment, and the monk has neither relinquished it, nor separated himself from it, nor confessed the offense. In that situation, the Saṅgha has imposed the formal act of deprivation. After that deprivation has been imposed, the monk then finds another robe."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if one who has been given the training keeps an extra robe for more than ten nights — what is the outcome?" Upāli replied: "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a nun keeps an extra robe for more than ten nights — what is the outcome?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"If a female probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun keeps an extra robe for more than ten nights — what is the outcome?" "There is no transgression. As for those who previously had a transgression arise and so forth — it is a misdeed, just as before."

Summary verse:

Of the Saṅgha, and of the boundary, and of the zone,
Of pressing the boundary, and of not permitting, and of not demarcating,
Of not covering, of sets of four, and likewise of night —

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that when a monk who has received robes extends them for hanging to dry, and if for even a single night he parts with any one of the three robes and separates it beyond the boundary zone — except by the Saṅgha's permission — it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Now, is it the case that the Saṅgha may grant consecration of robes?" Upāli replied: "It is not permitted." "Venerable one, but if a particular circumstance arises, is it then permitted?" "It is permitted."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk has had the Saṅgha consecrate his robes and then, in the absence of robes, separates himself beyond the boundary zone — is this called 'parted from his robes' or 'not parted from his robes'?" He declared: "It is called 'parted from his robes.'" "Should those robes then be relinquished?" "They should not. It is simply a misdeed that is to be confessed."

"Venerable one, if a monk places his robes on the ground and lets the dawn break in the sky above, or places his robes in the sky and lets the dawn break on the ground below — is this called 'parted from his robes' or 'not parted from his robes'?" He declared: "It is called 'parted from his robes.'" "

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk places his robes within the boundary zone and lets the dawn break beyond the boundary zone, or places his robes beyond the boundary zone and lets the dawn break within the boundary zone — is this called 'parted from his robes' or 'not parted from his robes'?" He declared: "It is called 'parted from his robes.'" "

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk is pressing upon a boundary, grasping a boundary, or standing at a boundary, and lets the dawn break with his robes placed at the boundary between — is this called 'parted from his robes' or 'not parted from his robes'?" He declared: "It is called 'not parted from his robes.'" "

"Venerable one, when the monk is within the boundary zone and his robes are also within the boundary zone — can it come about that he becomes parted from those robes?" Upāli replied: "It can. If a demarcated boundary zone has not been given the vow of not-separation from robes."

"Venerable one, for the time being, in a place where the boundary zone has not been demarcated, up to what extent does one say that a monk is parted from his robes?" Upāli replied: "So far as the encircling wall of the monastery, or the latrine enclosure, or the gateway courtyard, or a small building, or the assembly courtyard, or what the monks make use of in common, or a fence, or a hedge, or a moat."

"Venerable one, when a monk is in a single dwelling that has one roof covering it, and his robes are also there — can it come about that he becomes parted from those robes?" Upāli replied: "It can. That is the case when the dwelling belongs to various non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wanderers, brahmins, practitioners, wandering ascetics, or those who share inheritance and wealth."

"Venerable one, for the time being, if a monk has a perception that beyond the boundary zone is beyond the boundary zone, and lets the dawn break there — what is the outcome?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If, while within the boundary zone, he has a perception that he is beyond the boundary zone — what is the outcome?" "It is a misdeed." "If, while beyond the boundary zone, he has a perception that he is within the boundary zone — what is the outcome?" "There is no transgression." "If, while within the boundary zone, he has a perception that he is within the boundary zone — what is the outcome?" "There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has left his robe within the boundary zone, and then, beyond the boundary zone, the dawn breaks on him while he has become a nun — what is the outcome?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "Venerable one, suppose a nun has let the dawn break beyond the boundary zone while she has become a monk — what is the outcome?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable one, before whom should a monk have his robe consecrated?" "A monk in the immediate vicinity should consecrate it before a monk." "Venerable one, before whom should a nun have her robe consecrated?" "A nun in the immediate vicinity should consecrate it before a nun; and the same applies to taking it up and making it fitting."

"Venerable one, suppose one who has received the training lets the dawn break beyond the boundary zone without a robe — what is the outcome?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment; and in the same way, for a nun it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment in respect of the five robes. For a probationer nun, a novice monk, and a novice nun, there is no offence." As for previous transgressions and the like, the misdeed and what precedes it are as before.

Summary verse:

A disturbed mind, and exceeding the time, likewise fitness and unfitness, setting aside, the measure, the sets of four, and the dawn —

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has just obtained a robe and his mind becomes disturbed — from what point does one count that month?" "From the point at which his own mind returns to itself."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk may set robes aside for up to one month — is there a case in which a monk could keep robes for his entire lifetime without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there is: if he has observed the time limit of one month."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk may set robes aside for up to one month — what kind of robes are meant?" "Whatever is among the seven kinds that I have permitted and not prohibited."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk may set robes aside for up to one month — is there a case in which a monk could keep robes for more than one month without incurring a transgression requiring relinquishment?"

"Upāli, there is: when the fiber of the robe material is fitting but the weft thread is not fitting; or the fiber is not fitting but the weft thread is fitting; or both are not fitting. What is not fitting is: camel hair, cattle hair, deer wool, and goat wool mixed in, or material that has not been woven. A robe of that kind, even if kept for more than one month, becomes only a misdeed."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk may set those robes aside for up to one month — is there a case in which a monk could keep robes for six months without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there is —"

after having obtained that robe and thirty days having elapsed, and the Saṅgha having formally declared its forfeiture.

"Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One has said — that when a monk lacks the complete set of three robes, he may keep a robe for up to one month — in that case, venerable one, if a monk who already has his three robes obtains a robe he has not yet accepted, may he likewise keep it for up to one month?" "He may not. Why is that? Upāli, when a monk has his three robes complete, any other robe he obtains — whether he has accepted it or not — is subject to the ten-day rule. If, from among the three robes that are not yet complete, he obtains something he has accepted as a robe, that too is subject to the ten-day rule. But if he obtains something he has not yet accepted, he may keep it for up to one month. If he keeps it beyond that, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has obtained a robe, with one month remaining, perceives it as one month and then lets the dawn break on the last day — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If, with one month remaining, he perceives it as not one month — what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression." "If, with something that is not one month remaining, he perceives it as one month — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If, with something that is not one month remaining, he perceives it as not one month — what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk obtains a robe, and before the end of that one month the night falls and he disrobes to become a nun, and thereby the one month passes — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable one, if a nun obtains a robe, and before the end of that one month the night falls and she takes ordination as a monk, and thereby the one month passes — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"Venerable one, if someone who has been given a training rule keeps a robe beyond one month — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable one, if a nun keeps a robe beyond one month — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "What becomes of it if a female trainee, a novice monk, or a novice nun keeps a robe for up to one month?" "There is no transgression." As for cases where a transgression had already arisen and so forth — those are misdeeds, as before.

A summary verse:

Through messenger, written message, hand signal, through imputing something to another, or through an intermediary, for an insane woman, one mentally disturbed, one afflicted in her feelings, a mute woman, a foolish woman, a laywoman and so forth —
this is the last training precept given.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One has said — that a monk who has a nun who is not his relative wash, dye, or card an old robe incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture — venerable one, if a monk through a messenger has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Likewise if through a written message, a hand signal, imputing something to another, or through an intermediary he has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk has an insane nun who is not his relative wash an old robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Likewise if a nun who is not his relative and is mentally disturbed, afflicted in her feelings, a mute woman, or a foolish woman washes an old robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a laywoman who is not his relative wash an old robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Likewise a nun who dwells separately, a nun who has taken vows provisionally, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled from the Saṅgha, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed her father, one who has killed an arhat, a tīrthika, one who has joined the tīrthikas, one who dwells as a thief in the order, one who dwells separately, one who was in a state of discord from the beginning, or one who had previously incurred a downfall — if a monk has any of these women, none of whom is his relative, wash an old robe, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a nun who is not his relative and who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha (saṃgha), or one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, or a nun who is not his relative and who has been given a training — if he has her wash an old robe, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

A summary verse:

One to be finished, one already washed,
one belonging to the Saṅgha, and two named cases, one unsuitable and one set aside, one belonging to another, one being worn,
those arranged in groups of four,
and a nun — these are the final cases.

"Venerable one, if a monk has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe that still needs to be finished, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If a monk has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe that has already been washed, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe belonging to the Saṅgha, what becomes of it?" "If it has been used by an individual until it has become soiled, it becomes a misdeed. However, if a furnishing item is given to be washed, there is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives an old robe to a nun who is not his relative to wash and she then becomes ordained as a nun, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Venerable one, if a nun gives an old robe to a monk who is not her relative to wash and he then becomes ordained as a monk, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives an old robe to a nun who is not his relative to wash, and while it is being washed that nun becomes ordained as a monk and then washes it — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed. And likewise the same applies to a nun."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk gives an old robe to a nun who is not his relative to wash and yet it does not become a transgression entailing forfeiture?" "There are such proximate cases. These concern the fabric of that robe: the fiber may be suitable but the material may not be suitable; or the material may be suitable but the fiber may not be suitable; or both may not be suitable. What is unsuitable is: mixed with felt, with cattle hair, with deer wool, with goat wool, or not dyed. If such a robe is given to be washed, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a nun who is not his relative an old robe to wash that he has already set aside for abandonment, what becomes of it?" "If what is given to be sent is one that has not yet been formally abandoned, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture. However, if what is sent is one that has been formally abandoned, it is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a nun who is not his relative wash an old robe belonging to someone else, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk would have a suitable robe washed and yet a transgression entailing entry into a dwelling would arise?"

"There are such proximate cases. If a monk who has entered a household has a robe that has been defiled by excrement, urine, mud, mire, or other impurities, and has that robe given to a nun who is not his relative to be washed — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"If a monk has made preparations to give it to one not yet fully ordained, and then carries through with treating her as one not fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he made preparations treating her as one not yet fully ordained, and then treats her as one fully ordained in the act itself, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he made preparations treating her as one not yet fully ordained, and then treats her as one fully ordained after she has become fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he made preparations treating her as one fully ordained in the act itself, and then treats her as one fully ordained in the act itself, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he made preparations treating her as one fully ordained in the act itself, and then treats her as one fully ordained after she has become fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he made preparations after she was fully ordained, and then treats her as fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"If he made preparations after she was fully ordained, and then treats her as one not yet fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable sir, if a monk, perceiving a nun who is not his relative and who is fully ordained to be fully ordained, has her wash an old robe, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"If he perceives a nun who is not his relative and who is fully ordained to be not yet fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he perceives one who is not a relative and who is fully ordained to be fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he perceives one who is not a relative and who is not yet fully ordained to be fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable sir, if a monk, perceiving a nun who is not his relative to be not his relative, has her wash an old robe, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"If he perceives a nun who is not his relative to be his relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression."

"If he perceives a relative to be not his relative, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If a monk perceives a nun who is his relative to be his relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression."

"Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that whichever monk has an old robe washed by a nun who is not his relative incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture. What, then, is the case regarding having it washed by a female probationer, a novice nun, a laywoman, a female tīrthika adherent, a female ascetic, a brahmin woman, a wandering female ascetic, or a female mendicant?" "It is a misdeed."

"Likewise, if he has it washed by one dwelling in another destiny, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If a nun has a robe washed by a monk, a male novice, a male tīrthika adherent, a male ascetic, a brahmin, a wandering male ascetic, a male mendicant, or one dwelling in another destiny, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If she has it washed by a layman or a laywoman, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If she has it washed by a female probationer, a male novice, or a novice nun, it is a misdeed." As for prior transgressions and so forth, they are misdeeds, just as before.

Likewise, the full exposition is also to be given for rubbing and scrubbing.

Summary verse:

Through messenger, letter, hand-signal,
through others as go-betweens for requests, the mad woman, the mentally disturbed, the one who cannot feel, the simpleton,
the one asleep, the one vomiting, the thoroughly intoxicated, and likewise one in meditative absorption, one in transit, one who accepts and desires, and so on — these mark the final precepts that have been given.

The venerable Nyeba Khor asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that whichever monk receives a robe from a nun who is not his relative — excepting exchange — incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture. What of this? If a monk solicits a robe through a messenger from a nun who is not his relative, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"If he obtains the robe, what becomes of it?" "It remains a misdeed only."

Likewise, if a monk solicits a robe from a nun who is not his relative by means of a written message, by hand signals, or by having another person make the request on his behalf — what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable sir, if a monk solicits a robe from a nun who is not his relative and who is mad — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If he obtains the robe, what becomes of it?" "It remains a misdeed only."

Likewise, the same applies whether the nun is mentally disturbed, overcome by feeling, foolish, mute, asleep, incapacitated by work, thoroughly intoxicated, in meditative absorption, in transit, dwelling elsewhere, one who accepts and desires — and so on through the case of a nun who has been expelled from the Saṅgha — all the way up through the full elaboration ending with the case of one who is adverse from the outset: if a monk solicits a robe from such a nun, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If he obtains the robe, what becomes of it? It remains a misdeed only.

"Venerable sir, if a monk solicits a robe from a nun who is not his relative but who is causing a schism in the Saṅgha, or from a nun who is not his relative and who has, with malicious intent, drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or from one who has been suspended from the training — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If he obtains the robe, what becomes of it?" "It incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture."

Summary verse:

The group of four concerning what is improper, the second group, and likewise the marks, monk and nun alike —
all have been rightly set forth in the assembly.

"Venerable sir, are there cases in which a monk might accept a robe from a nun who is not his relative without it incurring a transgression entailing forfeiture?" "There are, and they are as follows. A robe may be suitable in its fiber yet unsuitable in its thread; suitable in its thread yet unsuitable in its fiber; or unsuitable in both fiber and thread. What is unsuitable is this: fiber mixed with the wool of a camel, ox-hair, deer wool, or goat wool; or that which has not been woven. If a robe of such a kind is accepted, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a nun who is his relative as his relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression." "If he perceives a nun who is not his relative as his relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression." "If he perceives a nun who is his relative as not his relative, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If he perceives a nun who is his relative as his relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression."

"Venerable sir, if a monk accepts a robe from a nun who is not his relative but who is fully ordained, perceiving her as fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If he perceives one who is not a relative and is fully ordained as not fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If he perceives one who is not a relative and is not fully ordained as not fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If he perceives one who is not a relative and is not fully ordained as fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable sir, if one who is not fully ordained accepts a robe from a nun who is not his relative, and that acceptance is completed while he is still not fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the acceptance was initiated while he was not fully ordained but completed once he has become fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If it was accepted while not fully ordained and completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If it was accepted in the course of becoming fully ordained and completed in the course of becoming fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If it was accepted in the course of becoming fully ordained and completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If it was accepted after full ordination and completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" "It incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If it was accepted by one who is fully ordained but completed while no longer fully ordained — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, suppose a nun who is not a relative receives a robe of Dharma from another nun, and in the course of that, her status as a nun changes — if she is then a nun when it is received, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk who is not a relative of a nun receives a robe of Dharma from her, and in the course of that, the nun's status changes — if it was accepted while he was a monk, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, suppose a nun who is not a relative of a monk receives a robe of Dharma from that monk, and his status changes — if it was accepted while she was a nun, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Venerable one, suppose a nun who is not a relative of a monk receives a robe of Dharma from that monk, and his status changes — if she is then a nun when it is received, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if one who has received the training accepts a robe of Dharma from a nun who is not a relative, what becomes of it?" "It incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"Venerable one, as for what the Blessed One declared — 'If a monk accepts a robe of Dharma from a nun who is not a relative, except in exchange, it incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture' — when it comes to accepting from a female trainee or a novice nun, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If a fully ordained nun accepts from a monk or a novice monk, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "Likewise, if she accepts from a female trainee or a novice nun, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If a novice monk accepts a robe of Dharma from a fully ordained nun, a female trainee, or a novice nun, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." As for previous cases involving transgressions and so forth, it is a misdeed, as before.

Summary verse:

By messenger, written note, hand-signal, imputing it through another, through an intermediary,

one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one overcome by feeling, one who is deaf, one who is dull-witted, one asleep, one at work, one thoroughly intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, one dwelling elsewhere, or one who is an outsider.

Venerable Nyeba Khor then addressed the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, what the Blessed One declared — 'If a monk goes to the home of a male householder or of a female householder's wife who is not a relative and solicits a robe of Dharma, except at the proper time, it incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture' — and 'the proper time' is this: when a monk's robe is snatched away, damaged, burned, carried off, or lost, that is the proper time — as for that:

"Venerable one, suppose a monk solicits a robe of Dharma by means of a messenger from a male householder or a female householder's wife who is not a relative — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone." "Likewise, if it is done by written note, by hand-signal, by imputing it through another, or through an intermediary — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, suppose a monk solicits a robe of Dharma from a madwoman who is a householder's wife or female companion — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone."

"Likewise, if he solicits from a householder's wife or female companion who is not a relative and who is mentally disturbed, overcome by pain, deaf, dull-witted, asleep, occupied with work, thoroughly intoxicated, in meditative absorption, dwelling elsewhere — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone."

"As for soliciting from those outside this — other non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, those who practice austerities, wanderers — who are not relatives — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone."

Summary verse:

The four groups of those who are unsuitable, two together with status-change, likewise a eunuch and a hermaphrodite, a female hermaphrodite and a fully ordained nun.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk, a male householder or —"

"Venerable one, suppose a monk solicits a robe from a male householder's attendant who is not a relative — could it be that obtaining it would not constitute a transgression involving forfeiture?" "There is a related case. It is as follows: the robe may be suitable in respect of its thread while being unsuitable in respect of its material; or suitable in respect of its material while being unsuitable in respect of its thread; or unsuitable in both respects. What is unsuitable is this: if the robe is woven from a mixture of mare's wool, ox hair, deer wool, and goat wool, or if it has not been woven on a loom — if one solicits a robe of such a kind, it is a misdeed. If the robe is obtained, it is a misdeed alone."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a male householder or a male householder's attendant who is not a relative as not being a relative, solicits a robe — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." "If one perceives someone who is not a relative as a relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression." "If one perceives a relative as not being a relative, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone." "If one perceives a relative as a relative, what becomes of it?" "There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from a human male householder or a male householder's attendant, perceiving them to be human — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." "If one perceives a human as not being human, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone." "If one perceives a non-human as human, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone."

"If the soliciting was done while one was not fully ordained and the obtaining also occurs while not fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the soliciting was done while not fully ordained and the obtaining occurs at the moment of full ordination, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the soliciting was done while not fully ordained and the obtaining occurs after full ordination, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the soliciting was done at the moment of full ordination and the obtaining also occurs at the moment of full ordination, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the soliciting was done at the moment of full ordination and the obtaining occurs after full ordination, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the soliciting was done after full ordination and the obtaining occurs while fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." "If the soliciting was done after full ordination and the obtaining occurs while not fully ordained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from a male householder or a male householder's attendant who is not a relative, and in the course of that solicitation his status changes — having become a fully ordained nun and the robe is then obtained — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." "Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun solicits a robe from a male householder or a male householder's attendant who is not a relative, and in the course of that solicitation her status changes — having become a monk and the robe is then obtained — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from a male householder who is not his relative, and in the course of that solicitation the householder's status changes — having become a woman and the robe is then received from her — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." "Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from the attendant of a male householder, that attendant not being his relative, and in the course of that solicitation the attendant's status changes — having become a man and the robe is then received from him — what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." The same is to be said also for a fully ordained nun.

The Exalted Vinaya Text, fifth fascicle.

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from one who is not a eunuch — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone." Likewise, beginning from a hermaphrodite and a female hermaphrodite, through to a monk and a novice — if the robe is obtained in each such case, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed alone."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun solicits a robe from one who is not a relative of a householder or of a householder's wife — what becomes of it?" "It is a misdeed." "If the robe is obtained, what becomes of it?" "It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture." The same is to be said also for the training given to a fully ordained nun. Beginning from a female probationer, a novice, a female novice, and those in whom a prior transgression has arisen, and so forth — in each case it is a misdeed; this is to be stated in full.

The venerable Anuruddha (Upananda) asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk's robe is snatched, or damaged, or burned, or lost, or carried off, he may go to one who is not a relative — a householder or a householder's wife — and request a robe. And if there is among them a brahmin or a faithful householder who wishes to give many robes in good time, that monk may accept from him at most an upper garment and a lower garment together. If he accepts more than that, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture. You have said this. With respect to the earlier rule on forfeiture concerning soliciting, which applies to an upper garment and a lower garment together — that case is the same. What then is the difference? A set of upper and lower garments is of two kinds: a householder's upper and lower garments, and a monk's upper and lower garments. If a monk accepts a householder's set of upper and lower garments and then solicits beyond what he has already received as a householder's set, that act of soliciting is a misdeed. If he obtains them, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture. If a monk accepts a monk's set of upper and lower garments and solicits beyond what he has already received as a monk's set, that act of soliciting is a misdeed. If he obtains them, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture. If a monk accepts a householder's set of upper and lower garments and what he has obtained from the householder's set turns out to be insufficient, he should not ask for more. If there is a surplus, he should not give it away. If a monk accepts more than the householder's set of upper and lower garments, it becomes a misdeed. If a monk accepts a monk's set of upper and lower garments and what he has obtained from the monk's set turns out to be insufficient, he may request more. If there is a surplus, he may give it away. If a monk does not give away what exceeds the set of upper and lower garments, it becomes a misdeed."

The remainder of the text is to be stated in the same way as the earlier training rule was stated for this training rule likewise.

Summary verse:

Through messenger, letter, gesture and sign, attributing offense to another through an intermediary, the mad, and those whose minds are disturbed, those who are deaf, those who are dull-witted, those asleep, those intoxicated, those utterly drunk, those in meditative absorption, and those who are non-Buddhists (tīrthikas).

The venerable Anuruddha asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative, acting on behalf of a monk, sets aside funds for a robe, thinking: 'With these funds for a robe I shall purchase such-and-such a robe, and when the monk known by such-and-such a name arrives, I shall present him with a suitable robe in good time.' Now in that case, if the monk, not having been previously instructed by that donor, becomes aware of certain intentions and, out of desire for something better, goes to the householder or — — the householder's wife, who is not a relative, and says to her: "Venerable one, certain funds for a robe have been set aside on my behalf. With those funds for a robe, please purchase such-and-such a robe for this venerable one and present me with a suitable robe in good time." If the robe is then completed, it constitutes a transgression requiring forfeiture, as the Blessed One has declared.

Now, venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative, having become aware of her intentions without having been previously instructed — what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

And if the robe is obtained?

An offence alone.

And if he does so in the same way by letter, by gesture, by hint to another, or through an intermediary — what is the outcome?

An offence.

Venerable one, what if a monk solicits a robe from a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative — one who is mentally disturbed — having become aware of her intentions?

It is an offence.

And if the robe is obtained?

An offence alone.

And likewise from one whose mind is agitated, one who is distressed by feeling, one who is mute, one who is foolish, one who has fallen asleep, one who is occupied with work, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one who has entered into meditative absorption — and further, from other outsiders: non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, wandering practitioners, and roaming mendicants — if a monk solicits a robe having become aware of their intentions, what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

And if the robe is obtained?

An offence alone.

A summary verse:

Those who are unsuitable — four pairs of two,
and likewise by name, and also a paṇḍaka, a eunuch-like woman, and a paṇḍaka himself, and a monk.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk solicits a robe from a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative, having become aware of her intentions and having obtained it, and yet does not incur a transgression requiring forfeiture?

There is a neighbouring case: if the robe's thread is unsuitable while the weave is suitable, or the thread is suitable while the weave is unsuitable, or both are unsuitable — unsuitable meaning mixed with hemp fibre, ox hair, deer wool, or goat wool, or that the cloth has not been woven. If a monk solicits such a robe and obtains it having become aware of these intentions, what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk solicits a robe from a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative, perceiving her with the perception of a non-relative, having become aware of her intentions — what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

And if the robe is obtained?

It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

And if he perceives one who is not a relative as a relative, what is the outcome?

No transgression.

If he perceives a relative as a non-relative, what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he perceives a relative as a relative, what is the outcome?

No transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun solicits a robe from a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative, perceiving her as a person, having become aware of her intentions — what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

And if the robe is obtained?

It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If she perceives a person as a non-person, what is the outcome?

An offence.

If she perceives a non-person as a person, what is the outcome?

An offence.

If she perceives a non-person as a non-person, what is the outcome?

An offence.

Venerable one, if a monk solicits and obtains a robe having become aware of the intentions of one who has not received full ordination, and if it is completed through one who has not received full ordination — what is the outcome?

It is an offence.

If he is aware that she has received full ordination and solicits it, and it is completed through one who has received full ordination — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence.

If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as having received full ordination, becomes aware of her intentions, solicits, and it is completed through one who has received full ordination — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he perceives one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination, becomes aware of her intentions, solicits, and it is completed through one who has received full ordination — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he perceives one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination, becomes aware of her intentions, solicits, and it is completed through one who has not received full ordination — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he perceives one who has fully received ordination as such, becomes aware of her intentions, solicits, and it is completed through one who has fully received ordination — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence entailing forfeiture.

If he perceives one who has fully received ordination as such, becomes aware of her intentions, solicits, and it is completed through one who has not received full ordination — what is the outcome?

An offence.

Venerable one, if a monk becomes aware of the intentions of a layman or of one who is not a close relative of a layman's household, and having done so solicits from a monk with a mark of distinction, and it is completed through a nun — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a nun becomes aware of the intentions of a layman or of one who is not a close relative of a layman's household, and having done so solicits from a novice with a mark of distinction, and obtains it through a monk — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk becomes aware of the intentions of a layman or of one who is not a close relative of a layman's household, and having done so solicits, and that layman's wife appears with a mark of distinction and it is obtained through a woman — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk becomes aware of the intentions of a layman or of one who is not a close relative of a layman's household, and having done so solicits, and a male attendant of that layman's household appears with a mark of distinction and it is obtained through a man — what is the outcome?

It becomes an offence entailing forfeiture.

The same is to be applied in the case of a nun as well.

Venerable one, if a monk becomes aware of the intentions of a layman's wife and solicits a robe — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he obtains the robe — what is the outcome?

An offence.

Likewise in the case of a paṇḍaka and a female paṇḍaka, it is equally an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, having become aware of the intentions, obtains other requisites apart from robes — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If he obtains them — what is the outcome?

An offence alone.

Venerable one, if a monk, having become aware of the intentions, solicits a robe on behalf of a monk, or on behalf of a nun, a female probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun — what is the outcome?

An offence.

If the robe is obtained — what is the outcome?

An offence alone.

Just as it becomes an offence entailing forfeiture for a monk to solicit having become aware of the intentions, so too it becomes an offence entailing forfeiture for one who has given the training, and for a nun as well. In the case of a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, and those for whom a previous transgression has arisen and so forth, it is an offence — and this is to be stated in full.

The venerable Upali then put a question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: Venerable one, when the Blessed One set out, on behalf of a monk, separate cloth-prices from a layman or from a layman's wife who is not a relative, with the thought, "We two have set aside these separate cloth-prices and with them we will each separately buy such and such a robe and, when the monk named such-and-such arrives, we two will each separately, at the right time, present him with a suitable robe" — if at that point, before any arrangement had been made with that monk, the monk becomes aware of some intention, and out of a desire for something fine approaches the layman or the layman's wife who is not a relative, and says the following: "Venerable ones have set aside, on my behalf, separate cloth-prices for a robe. With those separate cloth-prices, let the venerable ones each separately buy such and such a robe, and then together present me with a single suitable robe at the right time" — then, if the robe is completed, it becomes an offence entailing relinquishment. Such was the Blessed One's declaration. As for the remainder of the rule, this training rule is to be set out in full, just as it was in the preceding training rule.

Summary verse:

Messenger, letter, hand-signal, attributing to another and conveying, the mad one, the disturbed one,
the one in pain, the simpleton,

the sleeping, the delirious, the thoroughly drunk,
the one in meditative absorption, and the outsider.

Venerable Upāli (the close attendant) then addressed the blessed Buddha: Venerable one, when the Blessed One furthermore sends robe-cloth prices in the hands of a messenger on behalf of a monk — whether from a king, a great minister, a brahmin, a householder, a villager, a countryman, a wealthy person, or a caravan-leader — and that messenger, carrying those robe-cloth prices, goes to wherever that monk is and says to him: "May the noble one please be informed: a king, a great minister, a brahmin, a householder, a villager, a countryman, a wealthy person, a merchant, or a caravan-leader sends you these robe-cloth prices out of kindness for the noble one — please accept them." If the monk then says to that messenger: "Friend, messenger, monks are not permitted to accept robe-cloth prices. If we find a suitable robe at the right time, we will accept it" — if the messenger then says: "Does the noble one have anyone who attends to him, who carries out his personal service?" — then the monk, desiring a robe, should point out either an ānanda-pillar keeper or a lay male attendant, saying: "This one is the attendant of monks; this one carries out the personal service of monks."

The messenger then takes those robe-cloth prices, goes to wherever that attendant is, and says to the attendant: "Friend, attendant, please take note. With these robe-cloth prices of yours, buy such and such a robe; and when the monk named such-and-such arrives, present him with a suitable robe at the right time." Having given full and precise instructions and clear indication to the attendant, the messenger then goes to wherever the monk is and says to him: "The attendant of the noble one whom the noble one designated as one who carries out his service — I have given him full indication. Go to him, and he will present you with a suitable robe at the right time." If then the monk, desiring a robe, goes to the attendant and says, "Friend, attendant, I want a robe. Friend, attendant, I want a robe" — he should prompt and remind him two or three times. If, after prompting and reminding him two or three times, the robe is obtained, that is well and good. If it is not obtained, he should remain silent in one spot without saying anything further, up to four, five, or six times.

If the robe is obtained while remaining silent in one spot without saying anything further up to four, five, or six times, that is well and good. If it is not obtained, thereafter one may seek to procure the robe through other means, and if the robe is obtained in that way, it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. If it is not obtained, one should go to wherever the funds for the robe have come from. Alternatively, if venerable ones have sent robe funds via a trusted messenger on behalf of some particular monk, and nothing at all has been accomplished for that monk, they should be informed of this. The venerable ones should send word saying, "Do not let your own wealth be wasted." That is the procedure in such a case.

What then, Venerable Ones, is the procedure that has been declared? If a monk, in order to procure a robe, prompts a messenger up to four, five, or six times, and the robe is then obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression. Likewise, if for the sake of procuring a robe a monk prompts a messenger up to four, five, or six times by means of a written message, a hand signal, hinting to another, or sending a go-between, and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, in order to procure a robe, prompts a madman up to four, five, or six times and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression. Likewise, if one prompts a mentally disturbed person, one afflicted by painful sensations, a simpleton, or a deaf-mute up to four, five, or six times and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, in order to procure a robe, prompts someone who is lying asleep up to four, five, or six times and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression. Likewise, if for the sake of procuring a robe one prompts someone who is busy with work, someone thoroughly intoxicated, someone in meditative absorption, someone residing in another destination, or someone from outside this community — a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), an ascetic, a brahmin, a wandering mendicant, or a wandering beggar — up to four, five, or six times, and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Summary verse:

The unsuitable ones — four categories — and likewise the matter of the marks, the intermediate-born of the female kind, and the female intermediate-born, last.

Venerable Ones, is there a case in which a monk, seeking to procure a robe, prompts up to four, five, or six times, and even if the robe is obtained it does not become a transgression entailing relinquishment? There is a related case: namely, when the material of the robe is unsuitable — the cause is unsuitable, the constituent is unsuitable, the cause is suitable but the constituent is unsuitable, or both are unsuitable. What is meant by "unsuitable"? It means mixed with camel hair, ox hair, wild-animal wool, or goat wool, or left unspun. If one prompts up to four, five, or six times for a robe of such material, and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, in order to procure a robe, prompts a messenger up to four, five, or six times while perceiving a person as a person and the robe is obtained, what is the result? It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. If one perceives a person as a non-person, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one perceives a non-person as a person, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one perceives a non-person as a non-person, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if one prompts someone who has not received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has not received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one prompts someone who has not received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression.

If one prompts someone who has not received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one prompts someone who has received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one prompts someone who has received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has not received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression. If one prompts someone who has received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has received full ordination, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. If one prompts someone who has received full ordination and what is obtained is obtained by one who has not received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk prompts someone under a nun four, five, or six times, and through that a mark arises and she becomes a nun, and something is obtained thereby, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a monk prompts someone under a nun four, five, or six times, and through that a mark arises and she becomes a monk, and something is obtained thereby, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a monk, for the sake of procuring monastic robes, prompts a lay patron four, five, or six times, and through that the mark of that lay patron arises and he becomes a woman, and something is taken, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a monk, for the sake of procuring monastic robes, at the very moment of a lay patron's making the offering prompts him four, five, or six times, and through that a mark arises and the one who made the offering becomes a man, and something is taken, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. The same is to be applied in the case of a nun as well.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, for the sake of procuring monastic robes, prompts a cook who is making an offering four, five, or six times, and those robes are obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression. Similarly, what is the result in the case of a eunuch or a female eunuch? It is a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, for the sake of a monk's own benefit, and for the benefit of a nun, a female novice-trainee, a novice monk, or a novice nun, prompts someone four, five, or six times to procure monastic robes and those robes are obtained, what is the result? It is a transgression. Venerable Ones, if a monk, for the sake of articles other than monastic robes, prompts someone four, five, or six times, what is the result? It is a transgression. If something is obtained, what is the result? It is only a transgression.

Venerable Ones, if one who has given training prompts someone four, five, or six times for the sake of procuring monastic robes and those robes are obtained, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. If a nun prompts someone four, five, or six times for the sake of procuring monastic robes and those robes are obtained, what is the result? It is a downfall requiring expiation. In the case of a female novice-trainee, a novice monk, a novice nun, and those in whom a downfall has previously arisen, and so forth, it is said to be a transgression.

Summary verse:

Another's remainder, and the householder himself, and the non-Buddhist going forth, the ineligible one, and marks,
the group of four, and the Sugata's group of seven.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that whatever monk uses a woolen mat stuffed with black antelope hair incurs a downfall requiring expiation — what exactly is that?" Venerable Ones, if a monk allows another to make a mat stuffed with black antelope hair, what is the result? It is a transgression. If he allows it to be made for others, what is the result? It is a transgression. Venerable Ones, if a monk makes use of the remainder of a mat stuffed with black antelope hair made by another, what is the result? It is a transgression.

If he allows a layperson in his presence to make it, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation. If he allows a female probationer, a novice, a female novice, one who has been given the training rules, one who is in an incompatible situation from the outset, one who has previously incurred a downfall, one who is dwelling as a thief, one who is dwelling separately, or one who ought not to be dwelling there — up to and including one who has made a confession — to make it, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation.

Venerable Ones, if a monk allows those outside this teaching — other non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, practitioners, and wanderers — to make a mat stuffed with black antelope hair, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a monk allows those dwelling in other destinies to make a mat stuffed with black antelope hair, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable Ones, are there cases in which a monk makes a mat stuffed with black antelope hair yet does not incur a transgression requiring expiation? There are borderline cases. If the mat's wool content is suitable but the material is not permissible, or the material is permissible but the wool content is not suitable, or both are not suitable — in those cases it does not incur expiation. If what is impermissible is mixed with goat wool, cow hair, or wild animal wool and made into a mat, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable Ones, if a monk allows a mat to be made from wool, or hemp, or cotton-wool, or healing-wool mixed together, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable Ones, if a monk allows a mat to be made from fine black antelope hair or from black antelope hair mixed with Kashmiri silk, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he allows it to be made from unspun fiber, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable Ones, if a monk, intending to commission a mat stuffed with black antelope hair, changes his mind and has it made properly as a nun's mat, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a nun, intending to commission a mat stuffed with black antelope hair, changes her mind and has it made properly as a monk's mat, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation. Venerable Ones, if a nun allows something that is not a mat stuffed with black antelope hair to be made while perceiving it as black antelope hair, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring expiation. If she perceives black antelope hair as not being black antelope hair and allows it to be made, what is the result? There is no transgression. If she perceives what is not black antelope hair as black antelope hair and allows it to be made, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If she perceives what is not black antelope hair as not being black antelope hair and allows it to be made, what is the result? There is no transgression.

Venerable Ones, if a monk allows a mat to be made to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable Ones, what are the prescribed measurements of a mat? There are borderline cases — mats come in three measurements: large, medium, and small. The measurement of a large mat is two and a half cubits. The measurement of a small mat is one and a half cubits. Between these is the medium. Venerable Ones, if a monk makes preparations to make a mat before having received full ordination, and then makes it properly before having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he makes preparations before having received full ordination and then makes it properly at the moment of receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he makes preparations before having received full ordination and then makes it properly after having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he makes preparations at the moment of receiving full ordination and then makes it properly at the moment of receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he makes preparations at the moment of receiving full ordination and then makes it properly after having received full ordination, what is the result?

It is a wrongdoing. If he makes preparations after having received full ordination and then makes it properly after having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment. If he makes preparations after having received full ordination and then makes it properly before having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, a letter, a hand-signal, through attributing a name to another, through an intermediary, through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one overcome by pain, and through a fool.

Now then: if a monk instructs a messenger to make a sitting mat of sheep's black wool alone, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, through a letter, a hand-signal, attributing a name to another, through an intermediary, through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one incapacitated by pain, through someone overcome by sensation, and through a fool — what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Just as when a monk has a sitting mat of sheep's wool made it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment, so too it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment when one gives up the training, and likewise for a fully ordained nun. For a novice monk in training, a novice monk, a novice nun, and for one in whom a transgression has already arisen and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk makes a sitting mat from nothing but black sheep's wool, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment — what is the meaning of that? The remaining text is to be elaborated in full for the transgression requiring abandonment for black wool alone, just as it was for the transgression requiring abandonment for sheep's wool. As for what distinguishes the two: in the group of four cases, one should say, "If, perceiving what is nothing but black sheep's wool to be nothing but black, he instructs that a sitting mat be made" — and so it is to be rendered in groups of four.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared: a monk who makes a sitting mat shall have two parts made from nothing but black sheep's wool, the third part from white wool, and the fourth part from coarse wool. What is the meaning of that? If a monk makes a sitting mat without having the two parts made from nothing but black sheep's wool, or the third part from white wool, or the fourth part from coarse wool, it is a transgression requiring abandonment — what does that mean? The remaining text is to be elaborated in full for the transgression requiring abandonment of the two-parts rule, just as it was for the transgression requiring abandonment for sheep's wool. As for what distinguishes this case: one should say in groups of four, "If a monk, perceiving white sheep's wool and coarse wool as being small in amount to be small, and perceiving nothing-but-black sheep's wool being large in amount to be large, instructs that a sitting mat be made." In both cases, for a fully ordained nun it is to be stated as a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

From another's, the continuation of another's, going to a householder who is a non-Buddhist adherent, the improper, the nocturnal, groups of four, and groups of seven for the Sugata.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk who makes a sitting mat shall keep the old mat unwillingly for six years. If within those six years a monk makes another new sitting mat — whether he has discarded the old mat or not — it is a transgression requiring abandonment, except when the Saṅgha has given permission. What is the meaning of that? Venerable one, first: if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made from another's materials, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment. If he instructs that a sitting mat be made for the sake of another, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a monk makes properly from the continuation of another's sitting mat, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he instructs that a sitting mat be made in front of a householder, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment.

Likewise, if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, one who has been given the precepts, one who is initially discordant, one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, one who abides in concealment, one who abides separately, or, from "one who should not abide" through to "one who has accepted," then what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment.

Venerable one, if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for outsiders from this community, namely non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, or wandering practitioners, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment.

Venerable one, if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for one who has gone to dwell elsewhere, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for one who is under six years of age, and yet it does not become a transgression requiring abandonment? There is a closely related case: if the material of that mat happens to be suitable but the cause is not suitable, or if the cause is suitable but the material is not suitable, or if both are not suitable. As for "not suitable": if he instructs that it be made from a mixture of felt from a drum, cow hair, wild animal wool, and goat wool, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk who has been characterized by instructing that a sitting mat be made for one under six years of age is then recognized and the sitting mat is properly made for a nun, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun who has been characterized by instructing that a sitting mat be made for one under six years of age is then recognized and the sitting mat is properly made for a monk, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment.

Venerable one, if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for one who has reached six years of age, with the perception that she has reached it, what is the result? There is no transgression. If he perceives one who has reached it as not having reached it, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives one who has not reached it as having reached it, what is the result? There is no transgression. If he perceives one who has not reached it as not having reached it, what is the result? It is a transgression requiring abandonment.

Venerable one, if a monk instructs that a sitting mat be made for one under six years of age, sized according to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination prepares to make a sitting mat for one under six years of age, and then completes the making without having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

These are to be set forth extensively in groups of ten.

In summary:

Through messenger, letter, hand-signal,
through imputing a name to another, through an intermediary,
through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one tormented by pain, and through a fool.

Venerable one, if a monk under six years of age instructs that a sitting mat be made through a messenger, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one instructs through a messenger, a letter, a hand-signal, by imputing a name to another, through an intermediary, through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one tormented by pain, through a fool, or through a mute, that a sitting mat be made, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Just as a monk who makes a sitting mat for one under six years of age incurs a transgression requiring abandonment, so too does one who gives the precepts incur a transgression requiring abandonment. For a nun, it is a wrongdoing. For a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, and so forth, it is to be stated as a wrongdoing.

In summary:

From another's continuation of another's,
a householder, a non-Buddhist, one gone elsewhere, the unsuitable, the characterized,
and likewise the groups of four and seven.

The venerable Ñe wa 'Khor then addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk, in making the border of a sitting mat, should make the border of the old mat in a color that is unpleasing to the eye, by surrounding it with the Sugata's span of measure of old cloth.

If a monk, without surrounding the border of a new sitting mat with the Sugata's span of old cloth in order to make the color of the new mat unpleasing to the eye, were to use a new sitting mat with a new border, this would constitute an offense entailing forfeiture.

The venerable Ñe wa 'Khor then asked: Venerable one, if a monk, falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth, were to have a new sitting mat made by another and then use it, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to have a new sitting mat made on behalf of another, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to finish what another had begun and then use it, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to have a new sitting mat made and use it in front of a householder, what would that be? It would be an offense entailing forfeiture. Likewise, if he were to have a new sitting mat made and use it in front of a female probationer, a novice, a female novice, one who has been given training, one initially unsuitable, one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, one who lives by theft, one who lives apart, one who should not be resident, and so forth down to one who has made a confession — what would that be? It would be an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk were to have a new sitting mat made for a non-Buddhist outsider, a tīrthika, or for an ascetic, a brahmin, a wandering practitioner, or a wandering mendicant, what would that be? It would be an offense entailing forfeiture. If he were to have a new sitting mat made and use it for those gone to another destination, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk, falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth, were to have a new sitting mat made and use it without it constituting an offense entailing forfeiture? Ñe wa 'Khor replied: There is. It is as follows: if the border of that new sitting mat were suitable but the material were unsuitable; if the border were unsuitable but the material were suitable; or if both were unsuitable. What is unsuitable? A mat mixed with camel hair, cattle hair, wild-animal wool, or goat wool, or one that is unspun — if one were to have such a new sitting mat made and use it, it would be a wrongdoing.

The Supreme Vinaya. The Sixth Fascicle.

Venerable one, if a monk who has had a new sitting mat made falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth, and it becomes marked as belonging to a nun, and he then uses it — what would that be? A wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a nun who has had a new sitting mat made falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth, and it becomes marked as belonging to a monk, and she then uses it — what would that be? It would be an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk were to surround a mat with the Sugata's span in a place that does not require the span, perceiving it as not requiring the span, and then use the new sitting mat — what would that be? It would be an offense entailing forfeiture. If he were to surround it perceiving it as even more than required and then use it, what would that be? No transgression. If he were to surround it with less than the span perceiving it as not requiring the span and then use it, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to surround it with more than required perceiving it as exceeding the requirement and then use it, what would that be? No transgression.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination were to undertake the preparation for having a new sitting mat made falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth, and were to complete that task while still not fully ordained — what would that be? A wrongdoing. If the preparation were undertaken while not fully ordained and the task were completed at the moment of full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If the preparation were undertaken while not fully ordained and the task were completed after full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation were undertaken at the moment of full ordination and the task completed at the moment of full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If the preparation were undertaken at the moment of full ordination and the task completed after full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If the preparation were undertaken after full ordination and the task completed after full ordination, what would that be? An offense entailing forfeiture. If the preparation were undertaken after full ordination and the task completed before full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Summary verse: messenger, letter, hand-signal; imputing it through another, through an intermediary; the mad one and the disturbed mind; the afflicted in sensation, and the dull-witted.

Venerable one, if a monk, while traveling on the road, were to find some sheep's wool and, wishing to have it, were to have it rendered fit and make use of it, falling short of the Sugata's span by one finger-breadth or half a finger-breadth — what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he were to have it rendered fit and make use of it through a letter, through a hand-signal, through imputing it to another, through an intermediary, through a madman, through one of disturbed mind, through one afflicted in sensation, through a dull-witted person, or through an infant — what would that be? A wrongdoing. Just as a monk who has something rendered fit and makes use of it incurs an offense entailing forfeiture, so too it is the same for one who has received the training precepts. For a nun, if she has it rendered fit and makes use of it, it is a wrongdoing. For a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, and one in whom a prior transgression has occurred, and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse: traversing the sky by supernatural power, by emanation; likewise mantras, and three others; two categories of the unfit, and characteristics; and four categories last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk traveling on the road finds sheep's wool and wishes to have it, that monk may take it; that having taken it, if there is no one to carry it, he may carry it himself up to a distance of three leagues; and that if he carries it beyond that, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Venerable one, if a monk were to seek sheep's wool from the sky beyond three leagues, what would that be? If he carries it by supernatural power, there is no offense. But if he carries it by some other means, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one causing it to be rendered fit were to seek it by means of an emanation beyond three leagues, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a monk were to render himself invisible by means of a secret mantra or a medicine, and were then to seek sheep's wool beyond three leagues, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to seek sheep's wool beyond three leagues on another's behalf, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If another were to send sheep's wool from beyond three leagues, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk might seek sheep's wool beyond three leagues and yet not incur an offense entailing forfeiture? Upāli, yes there is. It is as follows: a monk traveling on the road finds some sheep's wool and carries it himself for the duration of three leagues; then he finds yet another piece of sheep's wool, and he abandons the first and proceeds carrying only the second.

Venerable one, if a monk were to seek, beyond three leagues, wool that is not pure sheep's wool but is mixed with other unsuitable kinds — the wool of a deer, the hair of cattle, the wool of wild animals, or goat's wool — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk seeking sheep's wool beyond three leagues were recognized and were to flee to a nun and cross the boundary, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun seeking sheep's wool beyond three leagues were recognized and were to flee to a monk and cross the boundary, what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk seeking sheep's wool beyond three leagues were to perceive a league as a league, what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing. If he were to perceive what is not a league as a league, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to perceive what is a league as not a league, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he were to perceive what is not a league as not a league, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
by having another convey it, by one who is mad,
by one whose mind is disturbed, by one overcome by feeling, by a fool —

Venerable one, if a monk were to send sheep's wool beyond three leagues by means of a messenger, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he were to send it by letter, by hand-signal, by having another convey it, through an intermediary, through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one afflicted and overcome by feeling, through a fool, or through one who is mentally impaired, beyond three leagues — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Just as it is a forfeiture and wrongdoing for a monk to carry sheep's wool beyond three leagues, so too it is a forfeiture and wrongdoing in relation to one who has been given a training. For a nun, a probationer, a male novice, or a female novice, and for one in whom a prior transgression has arisen and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
by having another convey it, through an intermediary, by one who is mad, by one whose mind is disturbed, by one overcome by feeling, by one mentally impaired — these are the cases.

Laypeople and so forth, and one who has been given a training — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash, card, or spin sheep's wool, it is a forfeiture and wrongdoing. What does that mean precisely?"

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool by means of a messenger, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he were to cause her to do so by letter, by hand-signal, or by having another convey the instruction — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause a nun who is not a blood-relative and who is mad to wash sheep's wool, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he causes a nun who is not a blood-relative and whose mind is disturbed, or one overcome by feeling, or a fool, or one who is mentally impaired, to wash sheep's wool — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause a laywoman who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he causes to do so a nun who has acknowledged her vows, a paṇḍaka, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed her father, one who has killed an arhat, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has joined the non-Buddhists, one who abides by means of theft, one who is not to remain, or one who was from the outset of incompatible status — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause a nun who has split the Saṅgha, or one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or one who is living in schism, or one who has been given a training, to wash sheep's wool — what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk who has been given a training were to cause a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool, what would that be?

A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

One who has washed only a portion, the Saṅgha's wool, the two marks, one who is of incompatible status, one who has been dismissed, likewise one who is a blood-relative,
those arranged in groups of four,
and the nun — she is the last.

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash only a portion of sheep's wool, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk were to cause wool of the Saṅgha to be washed, what would that be? If it has been used by a particular person and thereby made soiled, it would be a wrongdoing. If, however, it is an item of bedding that is caused to be washed, there is no transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash wool and she, in the course of doing so, becomes a monk — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash wool and she, in the course of doing so, becomes a monk — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool, it is a forfeiture and wrongdoing. Are there cases, venerable one, where even though a monk causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool, it would not be a forfeiture and wrongdoing? There are related cases. Causing wool mixed with incompatible material to be washed: if it is wool mixed with incompatible material — camel hair, ox hair, deer wool, or goat wool — and one causes it to be washed, it would be a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk causes wool that has been forfeited to be washed, what would that be? If it has not yet been forfeited, it would be a forfeiture and wrongdoing. If it has already been forfeited, it would be a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk causes another's sheep's wool to be washed, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one makes the preparation while not yet fully ordained, and it is done while still not fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made while not yet fully ordained, but it is done while in the process of receiving full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made while not yet fully ordained, but it is done after full ordination has been received, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made while in the process of receiving full ordination, and it is done while in the process of receiving full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made while in the process of receiving full ordination, and it is done after full ordination has been received, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made after full ordination has been received, and it is done after full ordination has been received, what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

If the preparation is made after full ordination has been received, but it is done while not yet fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a nun who is not a blood-relative to wash sheep's wool, perceiving her as not a blood-relative, what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

If he perceives one who is not a blood-relative as a blood-relative, what would that be? No transgression.

If he perceives a blood-relative as not a blood-relative, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If he perceives a blood-relative as a blood-relative, what would that be? No transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a nun whom he perceives as fully ordained to wash that wool, what would that be? A forfeiture and wrongdoing.

If he perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If a monk causes a woman who is not a blood-relative — whether a female probationer (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, a laywoman, a non-Buddhist adherent of another way, a wandering ascetic, a brahmin, a wanderer, a mendicant, or one residing in another district — to wash wool, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If a nun causes a monk, a novice monk, an outsider who is a non-Buddhist adherent of another way, a wandering ascetic, a brahmin, a wanderer, a mendicant, or one residing in another district to wash wool, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If she causes a layman or a laywoman to wash it, what would that be? A wrongdoing. In the cases of a female probationer, a novice nun, a novice monk, and one who has already incurred a transgression and so forth, it is a wrongdoing. In the same way, the cases of wringing and rinsing should also be stated.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, a letter, a hand-sign, through imputing to another, through an intermediary, the insane, the mentally disturbed, the afflicted, the deaf-mute, and one in another district.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whatever monk receives gold and silver with his own hand, or causes another to receive it, incurs a forfeiture. What is the substance of that ruling? Venerable one, first: if a monk causes a messenger to receive gold and silver, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he causes them to be received by means of a letter, a hand-sign, imputation to another, or through an intermediary, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk causes an insane person to receive gold and silver, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if he causes a mentally disturbed person, one overwhelmed by pain, a simpleton, a deaf-mute, or one residing in another district to receive gold and silver, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

Secretly, at night, in the flesh-hall, in groups of four, in groups of seven, in seclusion, a laywoman and others — body and voice — receiving and setting down — a nun.

Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk takes gold and silver and yet does not incur a forfeiture? Upāli answered: There are. If he causes it to be received from a hidden direction, or if he perceives it as some other object.

Venerable one, if a monk who is in the act of receiving gold and silver changes sex in the process and becomes a nun, what would that be? It becomes a forfeiture. Venerable one, if a nun who is in the act of receiving gold and silver changes sex and becomes a monk, what would that be? It becomes a forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk receives, or causes another to receive, a māṣa weight of gold or a māṣa weight of silver, what would that be? It becomes a forfeiture. If he receives, or causes another to receive, a māṣa weight of bell-metal or a māṣa weight of copper, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives gold and silver as gold and silver and takes them, what would that be? It becomes a forfeiture. If he perceives gold and silver as not being gold and silver, what would that be? No transgression. If he perceives what is not gold and silver as not being gold and silver, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives what is not gold and silver as not being gold and silver, what would that be? No transgression.

Venerable one, if one who is not fully ordained makes the preparation for receiving gold and silver and then receives them while still not fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one who is not fully ordained makes the preparation and then receives them after having become fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

If one who is not fully ordained makes the preparation and then receives them after having become fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained makes the preparation and then receives them while still fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained makes the preparation and then receives them after having become fully ordained, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture. If one who is fully ordained makes the preparation and then receives them without being fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a place as secluded, were to appoint someone to receive gold and silver, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives what is secluded as not secluded, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives what is not secluded as secluded, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives what is not secluded as not secluded, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk were to directly hand over gold and silver to a layperson in person, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture. Likewise, in the case of one who has killed his mother, one who has killed his father, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a tīrthika, one who has entered the life of a tīrthika, one who dwells by means of theft, one who dwells separately, one who is made not to remain, one who has given acknowledgment, one who was initially discordant, one in whom a prior transgression has arisen, and one who has been given a training — if gold and silver is directly handed over to them in person, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk were to authorize the receiving of gold and silver through a bodily gesture, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central region, speaking in a border dialect, were to authorize a person from the central region to receive gold and silver, and that person from the central region does not understand the border dialect, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If a person from the border region, speaking in the language of the central region, were to authorize a person from the border region to receive gold and silver, and that person from the border region does not understand the language of the central region, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If a person from the border region, speaking in a border dialect, were to authorize a person from the central region to receive gold and silver, and that person from the central region does not understand the border dialect, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If a person from the central region, speaking in the language of the central region, were to authorize a person from the border region to receive gold and silver, and that person from the border region does not understand the language of the central region, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk who receives gold and silver with his own hand, or authorizes another to receive it, would not incur an offense? A close attendant may be present. In such a case, when receiving gold and silver, one does not give rise to the thought of making it one's own, but rather does so thinking it is some other unsuitable object belonging to another. And even so, one must not say a word about it.

Venerable one, if a monk receives gold and silver on behalf of another monk, or authorizes another to do so, what would that be? It incurs an offense. Venerable one, if a nun receives gold and silver or authorizes another to receive it, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture. Venerable one, if one who has been given a training receives gold and silver with her own hand, or authorizes another to receive it, what would that be? An offense requiring forfeiture. Venerable one, if a female trainee receives gold and silver with her own hand, or authorizes another to receive it, what would that be? A wrongdoing. For a novice monk and a novice nun there is no transgression. For one in whom a prior transgression has arisen, and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, a written message, a hand signal, through an intermediary imputing a designation to another,
through madness, through mental disturbance, through experiencing sensation — these are the cases.

Thus did the venerable close attendant present these questions to the Blessed One, the Buddha.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that when a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct, it is a transgression entailing expulsion. What are those cases?

Venerable one, first: if a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct with a messenger, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise, the same should be stated for a written message, a hand signal, acting on behalf of another, imputing a designation to another, and through an intermediary.

Venerable one, first: if a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct together with a mad person, what would that be? A wrongdoing. Likewise: if he does so with one who is mentally disturbed, with one overcome by sensation, with one who is deaf, with one who is dull-witted, or with beings dwelling in another destiny — what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

The marks, only groups of four, groups of seven, and on behalf of another, one in training, and one like a relative, and a nun — these are the last.

Venerable one, first: if a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct and thereby comes to bear the mark, and then, having been ordained as a nun, obtains the aim — what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion.

Venerable one, first: if a nun engages in various kinds of lewd conduct and thereby comes to bear the mark, and then, having been ordained as a monk, obtains the aim — what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion.

Venerable one, first: if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, engages in various kinds of lewd conduct — what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion. If he perceives a human being as not a human being, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives one who is not a human being as a human being, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If he perceives one who is not a human being as not a human being, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if one not yet fully ordained performs the act preparatory to lewd conduct and then regards oneself as not yet fully ordained — what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one not yet fully ordained performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as in the process of receiving full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one not yet fully ordained performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as already fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one in the process of receiving full ordination performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as in the process of receiving full ordination, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one in the process of receiving full ordination performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as already fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing. If one already fully ordained performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as already fully ordained, what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion. If one already fully ordained performs the preparatory act and then regards oneself as not yet fully ordained, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct on behalf of another, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if one who has given back the training engages in various kinds of lewd conduct, what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion.

Venerable one, if one engages in various kinds of lewd conduct together with a relative, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: is there a case in which a monk engages in various kinds of lewd conduct and yet does not incur a transgression? There is something close to it: if one who is like exchanges with one who is like, there is no transgression.

Venerable one, first: if a nun engages in various kinds of lewd conduct, what would that be? It would be a transgression entailing expulsion. For a female trainee, a novice monk, a novice nun, and —" — for a previous transgression and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, the Blessed One, the Buddha, declared that if a monk engages in various kinds of trade and commerce, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture. What exactly is the scope of this? Venerable one, Upāli asked this of the Blessed One, the Buddha. As for the remaining text: just as it was explained in the section on conduct involving explicit characteristics, so too with respect to trade and commerce this should be expounded in full.

Summary verse:

The same rule — diminished, another district, non-Buddhist, surrendered, not yet, white, insane, marked, messenger, possessing or earning a living — for nuns.

Venerable one, the Blessed One, the Buddha, declared: "A monk may keep an alms-bowl beyond the allotted number for up to ten days; if kept beyond that, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." What exactly is the scope of this?

Venerable one, is there a case in which keeping that very bowl both does and does not constitute a transgression? Upāli answered: There is such a case. If a monk is keeping a large alms-bowl and, in the course of doing so, there is a change of status and he becomes a nun, and she then keeps it, it becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if a monk has forfeited a bowl and it is then lost, should the transgression be confessed? Upāli answered: It should be confessed. After confessing the transgression, if it is recovered, should it be relinquished? Upāli answered: No, it need not be.

Venerable one, the Blessed One, the Buddha, declared that a monk may keep an alms-bowl beyond the allotted number for up to ten days. Is there a case in which keeping one well beyond the count of ninety days does not constitute a transgression? Upāli answered: There is such a case. If a monk from one district sends an alms-bowl to another monk in the hand of a monk in another district, and that monk keeps the bowl for an exceedingly long time, there is no transgression.

Venerable one, first: if a monk keeps a vessel belonging to a non-Buddhist, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if a monk keeps an alms-bowl that has not yet been surrendered beyond the allotted number, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, first: if a monk keeps a plain, undyed bowl, what would that be? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk's mind becomes disturbed immediately upon receiving an alms-bowl, from what point should the count of ten days begin? From the point when his own mind returns to normal.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps an alms-bowl beyond the count of ninety days past the allotted number and yet does not incur a transgression entailing forfeiture? Upāli answered: There is such a case. If a monk receives an alms-bowl, ten days pass, and then there is a change of status and he becomes a nun, and she then keeps it — in that case there is no transgression.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a nun keeps an alms-bowl beyond the allotted number of more than one and yet does not incur a transgression? Upāli answered: There is such a case. If a nun receives an alms-bowl and, immediately upon receiving it, there is a change of status and she becomes a monk, and he then keeps it — in that case there is no transgression.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps an alms-bowl beyond the allotted number for a very long time and yet does not incur a transgression? Upāli answered: There is such a case. If a monk asks many monks on behalf of another monk for an alms-bowl, and that monk takes the bowl and keeps it for a very long time, there is no transgression.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk possesses only a single alms-bowl and yet that very bowl becomes subject to forfeiture? Upāli answered: There is such a case: if it is kept without having been consecrated.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps an alms-bowl beyond the allotted number for as long as he lives and yet does not incur a transgression? Upāli answered: There is such a case —

— if that monk has let more than ten days pass without consecrating it.

Venerable one, what is the result if one who has received the training keeps an extra alms-bowl beyond the number ninety? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If a nun keeps an extra alms-bowl beyond one day, it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

For a probationer nun, a novice monk, and a novice nun, there is no transgression. For one who has previously incurred a transgression and so forth, it is a misdeed.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, written note, hand signal, through having another designate, through an intermediary, through one who is mad, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one overcome by feeling — these are the cases of going.

The venerable Upāli then put a question to the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, Bhagavān has stated that when a monk who possesses an adequate alms-bowl nonetheless seeks another, superior bowl out of desire for something better, and once the bowl is obtained that becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture — that monk must then surrender the bowl to the community of monks, and whichever bowl is the last in that community of monks should be given back to him with the words: "Monk, you must not consecrate this bowl, must not discard it, must not give it to another; you must use it gently and carefully until it breaks beyond repair." Bhagavān declared that this is the proper procedure. Venerable one, in that context, what is the result if a monk seeks a second alms-bowl through a messenger? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

What is the result if, through a messenger, a monk seeks a second alms-bowl by means of a written note, a hand signal, having another designate, or through an intermediary? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk seeks a second alms-bowl from one who is mad? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Likewise, if he seeks a second alms-bowl from one whose mind is disturbed, from one overcome by suffering, from one who is dull-witted, from one who is mute, or from one who has gone elsewhere — what is the result? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Summary verse:

From a non-Buddhist, and from food, likewise from one of ambiguous sex, from that which is shared, and from a set of four,
from implements, and from a nun.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk seeks a second alms-bowl from those outside this teaching — non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, practitioners, and wanderers? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk accepts a vessel belonging to a non-Buddhist? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the vessel? It is a misdeed only.

Vinaya: The Principal Text, Seventh Fascicle.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk seeks a second alms-bowl from food? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Likewise, if he seeks a second alms-bowl from a paṇḍaka man, from a paṇḍaka woman, or from a person of ambiguous sex — what is the result? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, accepts a second bowl and then undergoes a change of sex and is reclassified as a nun, and thereafter obtains it? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, what is the result if a nun, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, accepts a second bowl and then undergoes a change of sex and is reclassified as a monk, and thereafter obtains it?

It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, seeks a second bowl from a male householder or from a member of a householder's retinue, and both of them undergo a change of sex, and thereafter he obtains it? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, what is the result if a nun, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, seeks a second bowl from a male householder or from a member of a householder's retinue who is not a relative, and both of them undergo a change of sex, and thereafter she obtains it? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

What is the result if it is solicited before full ordination and completed before full ordination? It is a misdeed. What is the result if it is solicited before full ordination and completed at the moment of full ordination? It is a misdeed. What is the result if it is solicited before full ordination and completed after full ordination? It is a misdeed. What is the result if it is solicited at the moment of full ordination and completed at the moment of full ordination? It is a misdeed. What is the result if it is solicited at the moment of full ordination and completed after full ordination? It is a misdeed. What is the result if it is solicited after full ordination and completed after full ordination? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. What is the result if it is solicited after full ordination and completed before full ordination? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, what is the result if two monks accept one alms-bowl together? It is a misdeed. What if they obtain the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk, perceiving a person as a person, accepts a second alms-bowl? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. What is the result if he perceives a person as not a person? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only. What is the result if he perceives a non-person as a person? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only. What is the result if he perceives a non-person as a non-person? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It is a misdeed only.

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk searches among a monk's requisites, or gradually seeks a second alms-bowl? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, what is the result if one who has been given a training rule, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, seeks a second alms-bowl? It is a misdeed. What if he obtains the bowl? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, what is the result if a nun, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, seeks a second alms-bowl? It is a misdeed. What if she obtains the bowl? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

What is the result if a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice monk, or a novice nun, while possessing an adequate alms-bowl, seeks a second alms-bowl? It is a misdeed. What if they obtain the bowl? It is a misdeed only. The earlier-arising transgressions and so forth amount to a misdeed — as before.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, a letter, a hand-signal,
through imputing it to another, through an intermediary, through madness, through distraction of mind, through dull sensation — such are the cases that follow.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha Bhagavān: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk has a non-relative weave a robe using yarn he himself has solicited, and the robe is completed, it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. What is the meaning of that?

Venerable one, what is the result if a monk has a non-relative weaver, contacted through a messenger, weave a robe, and the robe is completed? It is a misdeed. Likewise through a letter, through a hand-signal, through imputing it to another, through an intermediary, through another's behalf — if a monk has a non-relative weaver weave a robe, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk has a weaver who is insane weave a robe and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if the weaver is distracted, or enfeebled by illness, or deaf, or feeble-minded, or has gone to live in another place — if any of these, being non-relatives, are commissioned to weave a robe and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Summary verse:

A hermaphrodite, a woman, likewise a common robe, the unsuitable — these seven types together;

then four types: a trainee and a nun.

Venerable one, if a monk commissions a non-relative weaver who is a hermaphrodite to weave a robe, and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Likewise if the weaver is a woman, or a hermaphrodite, or of indeterminate sex — if these are non-relatives who are commissioned to weave a robe and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a shared robe and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, and in the course of that the weaver changes sex and becomes a nun, and the monk then receives the robe — what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a nun commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, and in the course of that the weaver changes sex and becomes a monk, and the nun then receives the robe — what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, is there a case where a monk commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, the robe is completed, and yet it does not become a transgression requiring forfeiture? There is a case close to it. It is as follows: the thread of that robe may be suitable but the warp unsuitable; or the warp suitable but the thread unsuitable; or both unsuitable — unsuitable meaning that it contains yak-hair, cattle-hair, wild-animal wool, or goat-hair mixed in, and a non-relative weaver is commissioned to weave it; if the robe is completed, it becomes a misdeed.

Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination sets out the preparatory action of commissioning a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, and the robe is completed before full ordination is received, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the preparatory action is set in motion before full ordination and the robe is completed at the moment of full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the preparatory action is set in motion before full ordination and the robe is completed after full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the preparatory action is set in motion at the moment of full ordination and the robe is completed at the moment of full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the preparatory action is set in motion at the moment of full ordination and the robe is completed after full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the preparatory action is set in motion after full ordination and the robe is completed after full ordination, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If the preparatory action is set in motion after full ordination and the robe is completed before full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk commissions a weaver who is not a human being, perceiving him as not a human being, to weave a robe, and the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he perceives the non-human being as human, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a human being as not human, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a human being as human, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk commissions a non-relative weaver, perceiving him as a non-relative, to weave a robe, and the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If he perceives a non-relative as a relative, what is the result? There is no transgression.

If he perceives a relative as a non-relative, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a relative as a relative, what is the result? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, if one who has received the training commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, and the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. Venerable one, if a nun commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, and the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a female trainee, a novice monk, or a novice nun commissions a non-relative weaver to weave a robe, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed only. As for the prior occurrence of a transgression and so forth, it is a misdeed, just as before.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that when a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative causes a non-relative weaver to weave a robe for a monk, and if the monk, having become aware of certain intentions that had not previously been communicated to him, goes to that non-relative weaver and says: "Venerable weaver, know this: weave this robe for me. Venerable weaver, make this robe well — wide in breadth, long in length, well-beaten at the edges, and well-woven throughout. Venerable weaver, in this way I will give you wages such as food, provisions, and a little something to eat" — and if that monk, having so spoken, provides wages such as food, provisions, and a little something to eat for the completion of the robe, and the robe is completed, it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. What is there to be said differently? The remaining text, in accordance with what was taught for the forfeiture applying to commissioning weaving, is to be stated here in the same way for this forfeiture applying to commissioning additional weaving.

What is distinct? Venerable one, if a monk, having become aware of intentions, dispatches a messenger, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is obtained, what is the result? It is a misdeed only — and so forth, this is to be stated.

Venerable one, if a monk, having become aware of intentions, solicits a non-relative weaver while perceiving him as a human being, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If he perceives a human being as not human, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed only. If he perceives a non-human being as human, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If completed, it is as before. If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If completed, it is as before.

Venerable one, if a monk, having become aware of intentions, solicits a non-relative weaver while perceiving him as a non-relative, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If he perceives a non-relative as a relative, what is the result? There is no transgression. If he perceives a relative as a non-relative, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a relative as a relative, what is the result? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, if one who has received the training, having become aware of intentions, solicits a non-relative weaver, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. Venerable one, if a nun, having become aware of intentions, solicits a non-relative weaver, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice, having become aware of intentions, solicits a non-relative weaver, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If the robe is completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed only. With regard to the earlier cases beginning with a transgression already having arisen and so forth, it is a misdeed, as before.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by imputing words to another, through an intermediary, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is distracted, for one afflicted by painful feeling, for one who is dull.

The venerable Upāli questioned the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One declared — that if a monk, having given a robe to another monk, afterward becomes angry, agitated, and furious toward him, and being displeased, either seizes it or causes it to be seized, and says to him, "I will not give you the robe — return it," and if that monk, there being a remainder of the robe, returns it and hands it over, it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture — venerable one, first: if a monk has given a robe and then causes it to be seized from a messenger, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if a nun, having given a robe, causes it to be seized by letter, by gesture, by imputing words to another, through an intermediary, or for the sake of another, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk, having given a robe to a mad monk, then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he gives a robe to one whose mind is distracted, to one afflicted by painful feeling, to one who is dull, or to one who is deaf, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to outsiders of other traditions — tīrthikas, wandering ascetics (śramaṇas), brahmins, practitioners, and wanderers — and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to one who has gone to another destination and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Summary verse:

To laypeople and so forth, likewise those sharing a common characteristic, the uncut and the unfit — the fourth group is the last.

Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a layman and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he gives a robe to one who has voluntarily undertaken vows, to a hermaphrodite monk, to a neuter, to an expelled nun, to one who has killed her mother, to one who has killed his father, to one who has killed an arhat, to a tīrthika, to one who has entered among the tīrthikas, to one abiding as a thief, to one who was initially incompatible, or to one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. Likewise, if he gives a robe to one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, to one dwelling apart, or to one who has relinquished the training, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk and then causes a layman to seize it, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. Likewise, a hermaphrodite monk, a neuter, an expelled nun, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed his father, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has entered among the tīrthikas, one who conceals a theft, one who dwells separately, one who is not permitted to reside, one who from the outset is incompatible, one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, one who has made an acknowledgment, one who has been given a training rule, a monk, a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice — if one gives a robe to such a person and then seizes it, or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if two monks give a robe to a monk in common, and thereafter one of them seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk and then seizes it, and in the course of seizing it the robe undergoes a transformation and becomes a nun's robe, and the seizure is accomplished in that state, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a nun gives a robe to a nun and then seizes it, and in the course of seizing it the robe undergoes a transformation and becomes a monk's robe, and the seizure is accomplished in that state, what is the result?

It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk that is smaller than a cubit in size, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk gives a robe to a monk and then seizes it, yet it does not become a transgression requiring forfeiture? There is a case nearby. It is as follows: when the cloth of the robe is of permissible fiber but the thread is impermissible, or the fiber is impermissible but the thread is permissible, or both fiber and thread are impermissible — that is, when it is mixed with the wool of a wild yak, ox hair, deer wool, or goat wool, or when it has not been woven. If one gives such a robe as that and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If one perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if one forms the intention to seize from one who is not fully ordained and seizes from one who is not fully ordained, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one forms the intention to seize from one who is not fully ordained and seizes from one who is in the process of receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one forms the intention to seize from one who is not fully ordained and seizes after full ordination has been completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one forms the intention to seize from one who is in the process of receiving full ordination and seizes from one who is in the process of receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one forms the intention to seize from one who is in the process of receiving full ordination and seizes after full ordination has been completed, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

If one forms the intention to seize after full ordination has been completed and seizes after full ordination has been completed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If one forms the intention to seize after full ordination has been completed and seizes from one who is not fully ordained, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule gives a robe to a monk and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a nun and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a nun gives a robe to a nun and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result?

It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a nun gives a robe to a monk, a novice monk, a female probationer, or a novice nun and then seizes it or causes it to be seized, what is the result? It is a misdeed. For a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, and cases involving a prior transgression and so forth, the misdeed should be stated at length.

Summary verse:

Distraction of mind, and lapse of time, likewise shared, and nocturnal, four categories of inopportune — a nun stands last.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk finds a robe that has come from the rains-retreat period — that is, up to and including the ten days beyond the middle month of autumn — and desires it, that monk should take that robe, and having taken it, should keep it until the time for distributing robes. If he keeps it beyond that time, it is a transgression requiring forfeiture. Now, venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps a robe that came from the rains retreat beyond the time for distributing robes and yet it does not become a transgression requiring forfeiture? Upāli replied: Yes, there is such a case — namely, if the monk's mind becomes distracted immediately upon obtaining the robe. Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps a robe that came from the rains retreat for the rest of his life and yet it does not become a transgression requiring forfeiture? Upāli replied: Yes — if he dies within the period for distributing robes. Venerable one, if during the period up to the time for distributing robes a monk who holds a robe that came from the rains retreat undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if during the period up to the time for distributing robes a nun who holds a robe that came from the rains retreat undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk keeps a robe held in common that came from the rains retreat beyond the time for distributing robes, what is the result? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk keeps a robe that came from the rains retreat beyond the time for distributing robes and yet it does not become a transgression requiring forfeiture? Upāli replied: Yes — if the fiber of the robe has become suitable but the thread is unsuitable, or the thread is suitable but the fiber is unsuitable, or both are unsuitable. What is meant by unsuitable? It is mixed with camel hair, ox hair, wild-animal wool, or goat wool, or it has not been woven. If a robe of that kind is kept beyond the time for distributing robes, it becomes a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk keeps a robe perceiving that the time for distributing robes has passed, when it has in fact passed, what is the result? It becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If he keeps it perceiving that the time has not passed, when it has in fact passed, what is the result? There is no transgression. If he keeps it perceiving that the time has passed, when it has in fact not passed, what is the result? It is a misdeed. If he keeps it perceiving that the time has not passed, when it has in fact not passed, what is the result? There is no transgression. Venerable one, if the king banishes the community without the invitation ceremony having been performed, how should a monk accomplish the receipt of robes from the rains retreat? Upāli replied: Just as one maintains the commitment to the rains retreat as originally undertaken. Should a robe from the rains retreat be called one on which ten nights have elapsed? Or should it not be called one on which ten nights have elapsed? The Blessed One declared: It should not be called one on which ten days have elapsed. Venerable one, may a robe from the rains retreat be treated as an out-of-season robe? Upāli replied: It may not.

Venerable one, what did the Blessed One mean when he declared, arising from the precept he had laid down: "Endure until the time of giving the Dharma robe"? And venerable one, what is the time of giving the Dharma robe? The period near the end is the invitation ceremony; without the invitation ceremony having been performed, it is at all times simply out of season. Venerable one, if a monk who has been given a training-rule sets aside a robe from the rains retreat past the time of giving the Dharma robe, what does that entail? It entails a forfeiture offence. Venerable one, if a nun sets aside a robe from the rains retreat past the time of giving the Dharma robe, what does that entail? It entails a forfeiture offence. With regard to probationary nuns, novice monks, novice nuns, and those who have already incurred a downfall and so forth, the matter is to be explained at length as a wrongdoing.

In summary: the unfit, and groups of four; likewise, interruptions; the vow, the Saṅgha, and space; likewise, the night, and nuns.

Venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that when many monks are dwelling in a wilderness hermitage known to be fearful — known to be dangerous, known to be differently dangerous, known to be worthy of fear — and it is the latter part of the rains retreat, a monk who is a wilderness dweller may, if he wishes, leave any one of the three robes in a household. And if a condition arises for that wilderness-dwelling monk such that he must be separated from that robe and go beyond the boundary, that monk may be separated from the robe and beyond the boundary for up to six nights. If he is separated beyond that, it entails a forfeiture offence. Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk separated from the robe and beyond the boundary for more than six nights does not incur a forfeiture offence? Upāli replied: There is. It is as follows: if the robe's material becomes unfit, and there is an unfit cause — or the cause becomes fit and the material becomes unfit — or both become unfit. The unfit materials are: camel wool, ox hair, mountain-deer wool mixed with goat wool, and unspun material. If one is separated from a robe of such material and goes beyond the boundary after six nights have elapsed, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives that more than six nights have elapsed and is separated from the robe and goes beyond the boundary, what does that entail? It entails a forfeiture offence. If more than six nights have elapsed but he perceives that they have not elapsed and he is separated, what does that entail? There is no offence. If they have not elapsed but he perceives that they have elapsed and he is separated, what does that entail? It is a wrongdoing. If they have not elapsed and he perceives that they have not elapsed and he is separated, what does that entail? There is no offence.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk separated from that robe and beyond the boundary for more than six nights does not incur a forfeiture offence? Upāli replied: There is. It is as follows: if that monk, upon arrival, finds that any one of the eight kinds of interruption is present.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk separated from that robe and beyond the boundary for more than six nights does not incur a forfeiture offence? Upāli replied: There is. It is as follows: if that monk has obtained the vow of non-separation from the robe.

Venerable one, if a monk has consecrated and set aside a Saṅgha robe and is then separated from it and goes beyond the boundary for more than six nights, is it called a separation or not a separation? Upāli replied: It is called a separation.

That robe should be forfeited. It does not constitute a forfeiture offence; it is to be confessed as a transgression alone.

Venerable one, if a monk stores a robe in a house and then goes up into the sky and remains beyond six nights, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

Venerable one, if a monk stores a robe in a house and, having remained beyond six nights separated from that robe, night falls and he is received as a nun, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun stores a robe in a house and, having remained beyond six nights separated from that robe, night falls and she is received as a monk, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

Venerable one, if one who has been given a training precept remains beyond six nights separated from that robe, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence. If a nun brings about the separation, it is a wrongdoing. For a female probationer, a novice monk, and a novice nun there is no downfall. For those in whom a prior downfall has arisen and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

A summary verse: By messenger, letter, hand-signal, and having another speak on one's behalf, through an intermediary; one who is mad, distracted, overwhelmed by feeling, or mute; a fool, one asleep, one who stammers, one utterly drunk; one in meditative absorption, a traveller abroad, an outsider — such are the cases, just as with a monk.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk, when one month of the hot season remains, should seek rains-retreat cloth; and that when half a month of the rains-retreat months remains, he should take it up and hold it. What does it mean that you have declared it a forfeiture offence if a monk seeks rains-retreat cloth before one month of the hot season remains, or holds it after half a month of the rains-retreat months has passed?

Vinaya Uttaragrantha, the eighth fascicle.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks rains-retreat cloth too far from the messenger and obtains the robe, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If he holds it for too long, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence. Just as with a messenger, so too with a letter, a hand-signal, having another speak on one's behalf, and through an intermediary — it is the same in each case. In every case where a monk seeks even a little too far and holds it too long, it becomes a forfeiture offence throughout.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks rains-retreat cloth too far from a madman and obtains the robe, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If he holds it for too long, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence. Just as with a madman, so too with one who is distracted, one overcome by feeling, a fool, one who is mute, one asleep, one engaged in manual work, one utterly drunk, one in meditative absorption, one residing elsewhere on a journey, and outsiders from beyond this community — tīrthikas, wandering ascetics (śramaṇas), brahmins, wandering practitioners, and roaming mendicants — if the robe is sought too far from them and obtained, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If held too long, what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

A summary verse: Improper cases and defining characteristics, likewise those held in common, those not yet risen, and cotton cloth — in groups of four, just as with a monk.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk seeks rains-retreat cloth too far away and holds it too long yet does not incur a forfeiture offence? Upāli replied: There is.

This is the case: if the cloth is of proper fiber but becomes improper through spinning, or if the fiber is improper but becomes proper through spinning, or if both are improper — such is one instance.

As for improper material: if rains-retreat cloth consisting of a great piece of cotton cloth mixed with camel hair, ox hair, deer wool, or goat wool, or that has not been properly woven — if such cloth is sought too far away and held too long, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk has sought rains-retreat cloth in a great piece of cotton too far away, and on the basis of that seeking becomes known as someone who has done so, and then becomes a nun — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has sought rains-retreat cloth in a great piece of cotton too far away, and on the basis of that seeking becomes known, and then becomes a monk — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks a great piece of cotton cloth held in common as rains-retreat cloth too far away and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination has accepted rains-retreat cloth and completes it before full ordination, and then holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who has not yet received full ordination has accepted it and completes it at the moment of full ordination, and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who has not yet received full ordination has accepted it and completes it after full ordination, and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who is at the point of full ordination has accepted it and completes it at the point of full ordination, and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who is at the point of full ordination has accepted it and completes it after full ordination, and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who has already received full ordination has accepted it and completes it after full ordination, and holds it too long — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

If one who has already received full ordination has accepted it and completes it before full ordination has been received, and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if someone who had not sought rains-retreat cloth seeks it too far away and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a piece of silk is sought too far away as rains-retreat cloth in the form of a great piece of cotton cloth, and held too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human as a human, seeks a great piece of cotton cloth as rains-retreat cloth too far away from that person and obtains it, and then holds it too long — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

If, perceiving a human as not a human, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If, perceiving a non-human as a human, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If, perceiving a non-human as a non-human, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving that more than half a month has passed after the invitation ceremony (pravāraṇā), holds rains-retreat cloth — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

If it has passed but one perceives it as not having passed — what does that become? There is no offence.

If it has not passed but one perceives it as having passed — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If it has not passed and one perceives it as not having passed — what does that become? There is no offence.

Venerable one, if monks who had committed to keeping the rains retreat are dispersed by a king, how should those monks perform the invitation ceremony? Just as when those nearby had committed to the rains retreat, so it should be done. How should the rains-retreat cloth be held? Just as when the invitation ceremony was performed, so it should be held.

Venerable one, if one who has given up the training seeks rains-retreat cloth in a great piece of cotton too far away and holds it too long — what does that become?

It becomes a transgression involving forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a nun seeks rains-retreat cloth in a great piece of cotton too far away and holds it too long — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If she holds it beyond ten days, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture. If a trainee nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, or one who has previously incurred a downfall, and so forth, seeks rains-retreat cloth in a great piece of cotton too far away and holds it too long — what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
by imputing the matter to another, by relay — by one who is mad, distracted, in pain, or dull-witted.

The venerable Upāli (the close attendant) asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk knowingly diverts to an individual for his own use gains that have been dedicated to the Saṅgha, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture — what does that mean?

Venerable one, if a monk knowingly causes a messenger to divert to an individual for his own use gains that have been dedicated to the Saṅgha — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are received, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only. Just as with a messenger, so too it is the same whether done by letter, by hand-signal, by imputing the matter to another, or by relay.

Venerable one, if a monk knowingly causes gains that have been dedicated to the Saṅgha by a mad member of the Saṅgha to be diverted to an individual for his own use — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are received, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only. Just as it is with one who is mad, so too — what does it become with one who is distracted, one who is afflicted by pain, one who is dull-witted, and one who is mute? It is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

What is unsuitable and what is unfit,
the four categories of parents, the marks,
laypeople and so forth,

those going and those training — the nun.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a Dharma robe that is dedicated to the Saṅgha but is less than a cubit in extent to be diverted to an individual for his own use — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the Dharma robe is completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only. However, if it is fully a cubit or more in extent, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture.

Venerable one, is there a case where a monk who causes gains dedicated to the Saṅgha to be diverted to himself even while those gains are being sought does not incur a transgression involving forfeiture? The close attendant replied: There is such a case. It is as follows: if the Dharma robe is fit in terms of the weave but the material is unfit, or if the material is fit but the weave is unfit, or if both are unfit — in those cases. What is unfit is this: a Dharma robe mixed with down of a drum, hair of cattle, wool of wild animals, or wool of goats — if such a robe is caused to be diverted to an individual for his own use, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the Dharma robe is completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Venerable one, regarding what the Blessed One declared — that if a monk knowingly diverts to an individual for his own use gains that have been dedicated to the Saṅgha, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture — is there a case where a monk who takes a Dharma robe from his mother and father incurs a transgression involving forfeiture? The close attendant replied: There is such a case. It is as follows: if the mother and father have dedicated the Dharma robe to the Saṅgha, and the monk knowingly causes it to be diverted to an individual for his own use — if the Dharma robe is then completed, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture.

Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination takes the gains of the Saṅgha and those gains are completed before he has received full ordination — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If he takes them before receiving full ordination and the gains are completed at the very moment of receiving full ordination — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If he takes them before receiving full ordination and the gains are completed after he has received full ordination — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one takes the gains of the Saṅgha at the very moment of receiving full ordination and they are completed at the very moment of receiving full ordination — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If one takes them at the very moment of receiving full ordination and they are completed after receiving full ordination — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If one takes them after receiving full ordination and they are completed after receiving full ordination — what does that become? It is a transgression involving forfeiture. If one takes them after receiving full ordination and they are completed before full ordination has been received — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving as dedicated that which has been dedicated to the Saṅgha, diverts those gains to himself personally — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a transgression involving forfeiture. If one perceives as not dedicated that which has in fact been dedicated — what does that become? There is no transgression. If one perceives as dedicated that which has not been dedicated — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If one perceives as not dedicated that which has not been dedicated — what does that become? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, knowingly diverting gains dedicated to the Saṅgha to himself personally, on account of that act undergoes a change of sex and then receives them as a nun — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a nun, knowingly diverting gains dedicated to the Saṅgha to herself personally, on account of that act undergoes a change of sex and then receives them as a monk — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk diverts to himself personally gains that have been dedicated to a layman — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Likewise, if he does so with gains dedicated to a laywoman, or to a hermaphrodite, or to an expelled nun, or to one who has killed her mother, or to one who has killed his father, or to one who has killed an arhat, or to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or to one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, or to a non-Buddhist, or to one who has entered a non-Buddhist order, or to one who abides as a thief within the Saṅgha, or to one who abides separately, or to one who refuses to abide, or to one who has made an acknowledgment, or to one who has previously committed a downfall, or to one who was at the outset incompatible, or to one who has been given the training rules and to whom gains have been dedicated — if he diverts those gains to himself personally, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Venerable one, if a monk diverts to himself personally gains dedicated to those abiding in another sphere of existence — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Venerable one, if one who has been given the training rules, while requesting gains dedicated to the Saṅgha, diverts them to himself personally — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a transgression involving forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a nun, while requesting gains dedicated to the community of nuns, diverts them to herself personally — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a transgression involving forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk diverts to himself personally gains dedicated to two monks or to many monks — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Venerable one, if a monk diverts to himself personally gains dedicated to the community of nuns or to the community of both — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Venerable one, if a monk diverts to himself personally gains dedicated to a nun, or to a probationer nun, or to a male novice or a female novice — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only.

Likewise, if a nun diverts to herself personally gains dedicated to a monk, or to a nun, or to a probationer nun, or to a male novice, or to a female novice — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing. If the gains are completed, what does that become? It is a wrongdoing only. Likewise, for a probationer nun, a male novice, a female novice, and those who have previously incurred a transgression, and so on — the wrongdoing is to be stated extensively, as before.

Summary verse:

The unsuitable, the sets of four,
the lapse, and likewise life-long medicines, night medicines, the same, the mad, the unconsecrated, the consecrated.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that the medicines given by the Blessed One for sick monks to be used individually — namely, clarified butter, oil from grains, honey, and raw sugar — may be consecrated by the sick monk himself for seven days, stored, and used as one uses what is stored; and that if one uses them beyond that, it becomes a forfeiture offence. Venerable one, is there a case in which a medicine kept beyond seven days does not become a forfeiture?

Upāli, there is. It is medicine that has been mixed with something unsuitable, such that it is no longer fit for monks to use.

Venerable one, suppose a monk obtains such medicine and, perceiving something that is seven days old as being seven days old, causes the dawn to break while still holding it — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

If he perceives something that is seven days old as not being seven days old — what does that become? There is no offence.

If he perceives something that is not seven days old as being seven days old — what does that become? It is a wrongdoing.

If he perceives something that is not seven days old as not being seven days old and causes the dawn to break while still holding it — what does that become? There is no offence.

Venerable one, if a monk incurs a forfeiture in respect of medicine and then lapses — should he confess the transgression?

Upāli, he should confess it.

After confessing the transgression, if he receives it again — does he forfeit it?

Upāli, no he does not.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may keep seven-day medicine for as long as he lives without it becoming a forfeiture offence?

Upāli, there is — provided that it has been formally processed within seven days.

Venerable one, suppose a monk obtains some seven-day medicine and, through keeping it beyond seven days, undergoes a change of ordination status and becomes a nun — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

Venerable one, suppose a nun obtains some seven-day medicine and, through keeping it beyond seven days, undergoes a change of ordination status and becomes a monk — what does that become? It becomes a forfeiture offence.

Venerable one, is there a case in which the very same medicine is forfeited and yet that same medicine has also been formally stored?

Upāli, there is — namely, when a monk, having received medicine kept beyond seven days, causes it to exceed the permitted time.

Venerable one, suppose a monk obtains some seven-day medicine and his mind becomes distracted — from what point should he count the seven days?

From the moment his own mind returns to clarity.

Venerable one, regarding timely medicines, medicines for a fixed period, seven-day medicines, and life-long medicines — if one receives these without consecrating them, and then appropriates them for oneself and uses them as stored goods — is that permissible?

Upāli, it is not permissible.

Venerable one, regarding timely medicines, medicines for a fixed period, seven-day medicines, and life-long medicines — if one consecrates them and then stores them as kept goods and uses them in that condition, is that permissible?

Upāli, it is permissible.

Venerable one, if a monk consecrates medicines that have been relinquished, what comes of that?

It is an offence.

Venerable one, regarding timely medicines, medicines for a fixed period, seven-day medicines, and life-long medicines — if one receives them, consecrates them, and then, once the consecration has expired, stores and uses them, is that permissible?

Upāli, it is not permissible. Timely medicines are to be used within their proper time; they are not to be used once that time has passed. Medicines for a fixed period are to be used within that fixed period; they are not to be used once that period has passed. Seven-day medicines are to be used within the seven days; they are not to be used once the seven days have passed. Life-long medicines are to be used for as long as one lives.

If one uses them beyond their time, what comes of that?

Using them after storing them causes a transgression.

Venerable one, if one consecrates them, what comes of that?

It is an offence.

Venerable one, if the precept has been given and a monk uses seven-day medicine after the seven days have passed, what comes of that?

It incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

Venerable one, if a nun uses seven-day medicine after the seven days have passed, what comes of that?

It incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment. For a female trainee it is an offence. For a novice monk and a novice nun there is no transgression. As for those in whom a previous transgression has already arisen and so forth, it should be explained at length as an offence.

The questions asked by Upāli on transgressions requiring relinquishment, drawn from the Vinaya of Kāśmīra, are complete.

A summary verse:

Messenger, letter, and gesture;
imputing words to another, and through an intermediary;
a mad person, one whose mind is distracted, one overcome by feeling, and one who is dull-witted.
Asleep, vomiting, deeply intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one who has gone elsewhere — these are the last.

Venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that knowingly speaking a falsehood is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk, acting as a messenger, speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It is an offence. Likewise, what if he does so through a written letter, through a gesture, by imputing words to another, or through an intermediary? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk speaks a falsehood to a madman, what comes of that? It is an offence. Likewise, what if he does so to one whose mind is distracted, to one overcome by feeling, to one who is dull-witted, to one who is deaf, to one who is asleep, to one who is occupied with tasks, to one who is deeply intoxicated, to one who has entered meditative absorption, or to one who is dwelling elsewhere? It is an offence.

A summary verse:

Solitude and speech, and groupings of four;
a non-Buddhist adherent, and speaking nothing at all;
marks, and bodily communication;
giving the precept, and a nun.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, speaks a falsehood there, what comes of that? It is an offence. If, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, he speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It is an offence. If, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, he speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It is an offence. If, perceiving a non-secluded place as not secluded, he speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central region speaks a falsehood to a monk from the central region in the language of a border region, and the monk from the central region does not understand that border-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If a monk from a border region speaks a falsehood to a monk from a border region in the language of the central region, and that border-region monk does not understand the central-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence. If a monk from a border region speaks a falsehood to a monk from the central region in the language of a border region, and the monk from the central region does not understand that border-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence. If a monk from the central region speaks a falsehood to a monk from a border region in the language of the central region, and that border-region monk does not understand the central-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk speaks a falsehood to a human being while perceiving that person as human, what comes of that? It is a transgression. If he speaks a falsehood while perceiving a human being as not human, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he speaks a falsehood while perceiving a non-human being as human, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he speaks a falsehood while perceiving a non-human being as not human, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk "Who are you?" and that monk replies "I am a non-Buddhist (tīrthika)" — should one say he has surrendered his training, or that it does not quite amount to that? What comes of it? By having spoken a deliberate falsehood, it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk "Are you then a non-Buddhist?" and that other monk, rather than speaking, assents by silence, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, when a monk is in the midst of speaking a falsehood and, while speaking, the gender changes — if he turns out to be a nun, what comes of that? It is a transgression. Venerable one, when a nun is in the midst of speaking a falsehood and, while speaking, the gender changes — if she turns out to be a monk, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk "Did you see a particular woman?" and that monk, not having seen her, indicates by a bodily gesture that he did see her, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if one who has received the training speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun speaks a falsehood, what comes of that? It is a transgression. Likewise, for a female trainee, a male novice, a female novice, and for those who have already incurred a previous downfall and so forth — it is an offence.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by imputing a name to another, by relay,
the insane, the distracted, one overcome by feeling, the dull-witted, one who is asleep, one who is vomiting, one who is thoroughly drunk, and one entering meditative absorption — these are the last cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that speaking through a human's fault incurs a transgression. If a monk acting as messenger causes another monk to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. Just as with a messenger, so too through a letter, through a gesture, through imputing a name to another, and through a relay — what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a mad monk to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. Likewise, if one causes a distracted monk, one overcome by feeling, one who is asleep, one who is engaged in manual work, one who is thoroughly drunk, or one in meditative absorption to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. Venerable one, if a monk causes a person who has gone forth and is residing in another destination to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Summary verse:

Language, body, seclusion, the gender cases, and the group of four,
laypersons and so forth,
the surrender of training, and the nun.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central region, speaking in the language of a border region, causes a monk from the central region to speak through his own fault, and the monk from the central region does not understand that border-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk from a border region, speaking in the language of the central region, causes a monk from a border region to speak through a human's fault, and the monk from the border region does not understand that central-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk from a border region, speaking in the language of a border region, causes a monk from the central region to speak through a human's fault, and the monk from the central region does not understand that border-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central region, speaking in the language of the central region, causes a monk from a border region to speak through a human's fault, and the monk from the border region does not understand that central-region language, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a person to speak through a human's fault by means of a bodily gesture, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, causes a person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, he causes a person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. If, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, he causes a person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. If, perceiving a non-secluded place as not secluded, he causes a person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a monk to speak through a human's fault, and in the course of that the monk changes gender and becomes a nun, what comes of that? It is an offence. Venerable one, if a nun causes a nun to speak through a human's fault, and in the course of that the nun changes gender and becomes a monk, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination, causes that person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is a transgression. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as not having received full ordination, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as having received full ordination, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as not having received full ordination, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human as a human, causes that person to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is a transgression. If he perceives a human as not a human, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he perceives a non-human as not a human, what comes of that? It is an offence. If he perceives a non-human as a human, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a layperson to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a eunuch to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence. Likewise, if he causes to speak through a human's fault one who is a hermaphrodite, or a eunuch, or one who has two sets of characteristics, or one who has taken up a commitment, or one who has expelled a nun, or one who has not killed his mother, or one who has killed his father, or one who has killed an arhat, or a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), or one who has joined the non-Buddhists, or one who abides in the guise of a thief, or one who does not abide, or one who was originally incompatible, or one in whom a downfall had previously arisen — what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk causes to speak through a human's fault a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or a monk who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or one who resides separately, or one who has surrendered his training — what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if one who has surrendered his training causes a monk to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk causes a nun, a female probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a nun causes a nun to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun causes a monk, a novice monk, a female probationer, or a novice nun to speak through a human's fault, what comes of that? It is an offence.

As for the female probationer, the novice monk, the novice nun, and the rest — beginning with the case of a prior transgression — the offence should be stated in full detail.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, what exactly did the Blessed One mean when he declared that if a monk engages in slander it is a transgression? The remaining text is to be set forth in full for slander just as it was stated for causing to speak through a human's fault.

Here ends the Vinayottaragrantha, the ninth fascicle.

Summary verse: Voice, body, and privacy; distinctive marks and groups of four; laypeople and so forth; and surrendering the training — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, what exactly did the Blessed One mean when he declared that a monk who, with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, is engaged in settling a dispute may also obstruct a communal act?

Venerable one, if a central-region monk, speaking in a frontier dialect, seeks to have a dispute of central-region monks settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, and yet also obstructs the communal act, and if the central-region monks do not seek to understand that frontier dialect, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If a frontier monk, speaking in the central-region dialect, seeks to have a dispute of frontier monks settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, and yet also obstructs the communal act, and if the frontier monks do not seek to understand the central-region dialect, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If a frontier monk, speaking in a frontier dialect, seeks to have a dispute of central-region monks settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, and yet also obstructs the communal act, and if the central-region monks do not seek to understand that frontier dialect, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If a central-region monk, speaking in the central-region dialect, seeks to have a dispute of frontier monks settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, and yet also obstructs the communal act, and if the frontier monks do not seek to understand the central-region dialect, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, through a bodily act of expression, seeks to have a dispute settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, and yet also obstructs the communal act, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act, perceiving what is a private assembly as a private assembly, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If he perceives what is a private assembly as not a private assembly, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If he perceives what is not a private assembly as a private assembly, what comes of that? It is an offence.

If he perceives what is not a private assembly as not a private assembly, what comes of that? There is no transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act, and by that occasion changes sex and becomes a nun, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a nun, while seeking to have a dispute settled with the agreement of the Saṅgha and in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act, and by that occasion changes sex and becomes a monk, what comes of that? It is an offence.

Venerable one, if a monk obstructs the settling of a dispute in accordance with the Dharma, while perceiving the settling to be in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk obstructs the settling of a dispute in accordance with the Dharma, while perceiving something settled in accordance with the Dharma as not settled in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

If a monk obstructs the settling of a dispute in accordance with the Dharma, while perceiving something not settled in accordance with the Dharma as settled in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

If a monk obstructs the settling of a dispute in accordance with the Dharma, while perceiving something not settled in accordance with the Dharma as not settled in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute settled in accordance with the Dharma with the agreement of the Saṅgha, obstructs the communal act, perceiving those who are fully ordained as fully ordained, what comes of that? It is an offence involving defeat.

If a monk obstructs such a communal act, perceiving those who are fully ordained as not fully ordained, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

If a monk obstructs such a communal act, perceiving those who are not fully ordained as fully ordained, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

If a monk obstructs such a communal act, perceiving those who are not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute of laypeople settled in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have the disputes of the following settled in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act — namely those of: a monk who is a hermaphrodite, a pandaka, a person of dual sex, one who has undertaken vows voluntarily, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed his father, one who has killed an arhat, a tīrthika, one who has joined a tīrthika community, one who dwells by stealth, one who is unable to remain, one who was initially discordant, and one who has previously committed a downfall — what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have the disputes of the following settled in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act — namely those of: one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, one who dwells separately, and those to whom a training has been given — what comes of that? It is an offence involving defeat.

A summary verse:

Through a messenger, a letter, a gesture, imputing fault to another, through an intermediary, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, one who has returned from unconsciousness, and one who has gone away.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute settled in accordance with the Dharma, obstructs the communal act through a messenger, what comes of that? It is a transgression. Likewise through a letter, through a gesture, through imputing fault to another, and through an intermediary — what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk obstructs the communal act in the settling of disputes of monks who are insane in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression. Likewise in the case of those whose minds are disturbed, those prostrated by illness, those who are senile, those who have returned from unconsciousness, and those who have gone forth and are dwelling elsewhere — if a monk obstructs the settling of their disputes in accordance with the Dharma, what comes of that? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking to have the disputes of nuns settled in accordance with the Dharma with the agreement of the Saṅgha, obstructs the communal act, what comes of that? It is a transgression. If he obstructs such an act concerning probationary nuns and novice nuns, what comes of that? It is a transgression. If a nun obstructs the communal act in the settling of disputes of nuns, what comes of that?

It is a transgression. If a nun obstructs the communal act in the settling of disputes of monks, of novices, of probationary nuns, or of novice nuns, what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, what of the rule that was promulgated: if a monk, while seeking to have a dispute settled in accordance with the Dharma with the agreement of the Saṅgha, obstructs the communal act — it is a transgression. As for probationary nuns, novices, novice nuns, and those in whom a prior transgression has arisen and so forth — those should be discussed at length as misdeeds.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by imputing through another, by relay —
one who is mad, or whose mind is disturbed, one overwhelmed by feeling, or one who is dull, one asleep, one busy with work, one deeply intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, or one dwelling elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk teaches the Dharma to a woman with more than five or six words, it is a transgression — unless a learned man is present. What is to be said about that?

Venerable one, if a monk, without a learned man present, teaches the Dharma to a woman with more than five or six words by means of a messenger — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he does so by letter, by gesture, by imputing through another, or by relay, without a learned man present, and teaches a woman the Dharma with more than five or six words — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk, without a learned man present, teaches the Dharma to a mad woman with more than five or six words — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he does so to a woman whose mind is disturbed, to a woman overwhelmed by feeling, to one who is dull, to one who is deaf, to one who is asleep, to one who is occupied with work, to one who is deeply intoxicated, to one who is in meditative absorption, or to one dwelling elsewhere, without a learned man present, and teaches her the Dharma with more than five or six words — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk, with a learned man present who is mad, teaches the Dharma to a woman with more than five or six words — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if the learned man present is one whose mind is disturbed, overwhelmed by feeling, dull, deaf, asleep, occupied with work, deeply intoxicated, in meditative absorption, dwelling at the frontier, dwelling elsewhere — and the monk teaches a woman the Dharma with more than five or six words — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Summary verse:

By language, by intelligibility, by body, by privacy — likewise food, a maternal relative, by night, in a group of four only, one who has given the precepts, and a nun.

Venerable one, if a monk from the central lands, without a learned man present, teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman from the central lands in the language of the frontier regions, and that woman from the central lands does not understand the frontier language — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a monk from the frontier regions teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman from the frontier regions in the language of the central lands, without a learned man present, and that woman from the frontier regions does not understand the language of the central lands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a monk from the frontier regions teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman from the central lands in the language of the frontier regions, without a learned man present, and that woman from the central lands does not understand the frontier language — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a monk from the central lands teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman from the frontier regions in the language of the central lands, without a learned man present, and that woman from the frontier regions does not understand the language of the central lands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk from the central lands makes himself understood in the frontier language and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a person from the central lands and a woman, and that person from the central lands does not understand the frontier language — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a person from the frontier regions makes himself understood in the language of the central lands and teaches the Dharma to a person from the frontier regions, and that person from the frontier regions does not understand the language of the central lands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a person from the frontier regions makes himself understood in the frontier language and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a person from the central lands, and that person from the central lands does not understand the frontier language — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a person from the central lands makes himself understood in the language of the central lands and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a person from the frontier regions and a woman, and that person from the frontier regions does not understand the language of the central lands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman by means of bodily gestures, without a learned man present — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk perceives a secluded place as secluded and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman without a learned man present — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall. If he perceives a secluded place as not secluded and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman — what comes of that? There is no transgression. If he perceives a non-secluded place as secluded and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a secluded place as not secluded and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman — what comes of that? There is no transgression.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman who makes herself understood — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if a monk teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a paṇḍaka or a hermaphrodite who makes themselves understood — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a paṇḍaka female without a learned man present — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman without a learned man present, and in the course of that teaching her sex changes so that she becomes a nun — what comes of that? There is no transgression. Venerable ones, consider this: if a nun teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a man without a learned man present, and in the course of that teaching his sex changes so that he becomes a monk — what comes of that? There is no transgression.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk, without a learned man present, teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a woman, perceiving her as a woman — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall. If he perceives a woman as not a woman — what comes of that? There is no transgression. If he perceives one who is not a woman as a woman — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If he perceives one who is not a woman as not a woman and teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words — what comes of that? There is no transgression.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk, without a learned man present, teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a human woman, perceiving her as human — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall. If he perceives a human as not human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If he perceives a non-human as human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If he perceives one who is not human as not human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk, performing a permissible act, teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to both a learned man and a woman together, perceiving them as human — what comes of that? There is no transgression. If he teaches the Dharma perceiving a human as not human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If he teaches the Dharma perceiving a non-human as human — what comes of that? There is no transgression. If he teaches the Dharma perceiving a non-human as not human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk who has received the training teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words in the domain of women without a learned man present — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a nun teaches the Dharma with more than five or six words to a man without a companion nun present — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall.

As for a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, and those who have previously committed transgressions and so forth — these are to be set forth extensively as misdeeds.

Summary verse:

One who is mad, or of disturbed mind,
one afflicted by feeling, gone elsewhere, one who has given the training, and so on — language, marks, and the nun —

The venerable Nyeba Khor inquired of the Blessed One, the buddha:
"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that it is an offense entailing a fall for a monk to recite Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination — what exactly is that?"

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination and who is mad — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he recites Dharma in unison with one of disturbed mind, one incapacitated by feeling, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, or one who dwells in a different realm — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk recites Dharma in unison with one who has given the training — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall. If he recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination and who is a woman — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he recites Dharma in unison with a paṇḍaka (a person of indeterminate sex), with one of two signs, or with a female paṇḍaka — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

If he recites Dharma in unison with a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed her father, one who has killed an arhat, one who has wounded a Tathāgata with malicious intent, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha of monks, one who has gone over to non-Buddhists, one who has entered the way of non-Buddhists, one who dwells as a thief, one who is not to be housed, one who has previously committed transgressions, or one who from the very beginning is of incompatible character — what comes of that? It is an offense entailing a fall.

Venerable ones, consider this: if a monk from the central region recites Dharma in the dialect of the borderlands in unison with a person from the central region, and that person from the central region does not know that dialect of the borderlands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If one from the borderlands recites Dharma in the dialect of the central region in unison with a person from the borderlands, and that person from the borderlands does not know the dialect of the central region — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If one from the borderlands recites Dharma in the dialect of the borderlands in unison with a person from the central region, and that person from the central region does not know the dialect of the borderlands — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If one from the central region recites Dharma in the dialect of the central region in unison with a person from the borderlands, and that person from the borderlands does not know the dialect of the central region — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and during that recitation a name arises such that it comes to be the name of a nun — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a nun recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and during that recitation a name arises such that it comes to be the name of a monk — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a nun recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and during that recitation a name arises for that unordained person and that name becomes fully established — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if one recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination while perceiving that person as one who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If one perceives a person who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one perceives a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one perceives a person who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk recites Dharma in unison with a human being while perceiving that being as human — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If one perceives a human as not human — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one perceives a non-human as not human — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk recites Dharma in unison with a nun — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he recites in unison with a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a male novice, or a female novice — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a nun recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. If a nun recites Dharma in unison with a monk — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If she recites in unison with a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice — what comes of that? It is a misdeed. In the case of a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice, where a misdeed has already occurred and so forth, it should be declared a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if one who has been given a training rule recites Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is a misdeed.

Summary verse:

A messenger, a written letter, a hand-signal, imputing an offense to another, through an intermediary,
one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one overcome by sensation, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is exhausted, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, one who has gone elsewhere — these are the last categories.

Then the venerable Upāli and his retinue asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable Blessed One, you have said that whatever monk declares to a person who has not received full ordination a transgression involving remaining in a bad state is a misdeed, except when the Saṅgha has granted permission — what is the meaning of this?

Venerable ones, if a monk declares to a person who has not received full ordination a transgression involving remaining in a bad state by means of a messenger — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. Likewise, if he does so by written letter, by hand-signal, by imputing it to another, or through an intermediary — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk declares to a mad person a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. Likewise, if he does so to one whose mind is disturbed, one who is tormented by sensation, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is occupied with manual work, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling in another place — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Summary verse:

Voice, body, and solitude itself — likewise, the four marks, appointment, and the individual themselves, likewise the meal, and the nun.

Venerable ones, if a monk who speaks the central dialect declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person dwelling in the central region, in the border dialect, and that person dwelling in the central region also does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one who speaks the border dialect declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person dwelling on the border, in the central dialect, and that person dwelling on the border also does not understand that central dialect — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one who speaks the border dialect declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person dwelling in the central region, in the border dialect, and that person dwelling in the central region also does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If one who speaks the central dialect declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person dwelling on the border, in the central dialect, and that person dwelling on the border also does not understand that central dialect — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state by means of bodily gesture — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state there — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. Venerable ones, if he perceives a secluded place as not secluded and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he perceives a non-secluded place as secluded and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he perceives a non-secluded place as non-secluded and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to that person — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. If he perceives a person who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? There is no downfall. If he perceives a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he perceives a person who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? There is no downfall.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to that person — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. If he perceives a human being as not a human being and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he perceives a non-human being as a human being and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed. If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being and declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state — what comes of that? It is a wrong deed.

Venerable ones, if a monk who, in the course of declaring a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination, undergoes a change of gender and becomes a nun — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Venerable ones, if a nun who, in the course of declaring a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination, undergoes a change of gender and becomes a monk — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall.

Venerable ones, there is the statement that the Blessed One declared: "Any monk who declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination commits an actual downfall, except when the Saṅgha has authorized it." With respect to that, venerable ones — does it follow that even a monk who has been authorized by the Saṅgha commits an actual downfall if he declares a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination?

The persons in one's immediate circle are these four. What are the four? There is the person to whom one may declare both the extent of a transgression and the extent of one's household connections. There is the person to whom one may declare the extent of a transgression but not the extent of one's household connections. There is the person to whom one may declare the extent of one's household connections but not the extent of a transgression. And there is the person to whom one may declare neither the extent of a transgression nor the extent of one's household connections.

Who is the person to whom one may declare both the extent of a transgression and the extent of one's household connections? It is someone who, by means of minor transgressions, exposes those who have a fixed number of households. Who is the person to whom one may declare the extent of a transgression but not the extent of one's household connections? It is someone who, by means of minor transgressions, exposes those who have no fixed number of households. Who is the person to whom one may declare the extent of one's household connections but not the extent of a transgression? It is someone who, by means of major transgressions, exposes those who have a fixed number of households. Who is the person to whom one may declare neither the extent of a transgression nor the extent of one's household connections? It is someone who, by means of major offences, exposes those who have no fixed number of households.

Now, concerning the person to whom one may declare both the extent of a transgression and the extent of one's household connections: one should declare to only those households one knows about only that transgression one knows about. If one declares beyond that, it becomes an actual downfall. Concerning the person to whom one may declare the extent of a transgression but not the extent of one's household connections: one should declare to all households only that transgression one knows about. If one declares beyond that, it becomes an actual downfall. Concerning the person to whom one may declare the extent of one's household connections but not the extent of a transgression: one should declare all transgressions to only those households one knows about. If one declares beyond that, it becomes an actual downfall. Concerning the person to whom one may declare neither the extent of a transgression nor the extent of one's household connections: one should declare all transgressions to all households, and in doing so there is no downfall.

Venerable ones, if a monk were to declare his own transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Venerable ones, if a monk were to declare a nun's transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Likewise, if one were to declare to a person who has not received full ordination a transgression involving remaining in a bad state of any category from a change of gender up to and including one with an incompatible condition — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Venerable ones, if a monk were to declare to a person who has not received full ordination a transgression involving remaining in a bad state of a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Likewise, if a monk who has maliciously drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or a monk who dwells separately, were to declare a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Venerable ones, if a monk were to declare a transgression involving remaining in a bad state while being a monk who has been given a training — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. If a nun were to declare a nun's transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Venerable ones, if one who has been given a training were to declare a transgression involving remaining in a bad state to a person who has not received full ordination — what comes of that? It is an actual downfall. Likewise, a female trainee, a novice monk, a novice nun —

For prior occurrences of downfalls and the like, one should declare the wrongdoing at length.

The venerable close retinue asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk were to speak to a person who has not received full ordination about a superhuman quality (uttarimanuṣyadharma) — even truthfully — it constitutes a downfall. What exactly does this mean?" The remainder of the truthful declaration of a superhuman quality — apart from what is designated as a buddha or the Teacher — is to be distinguished by means of a defeat. Thus it should be understood.

The Vinayamūla. The tenth fascicle.

Summary verse:

Through a messenger, through a letter, through a hand-signal,
Through slander of another, through an intermediary,

Through a madman, through a mentally disturbed person,
Through one overcome by sensation, through a dull-witted one,
Through one who is asleep, through one occupied with manual work, through one deeply intoxicated,
Through one in meditative absorption, through one who has gone elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable close retinue asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk who has previously made something properly legitimate then afterward says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — it constitutes a downfall. What does this mean?"

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate, and then afterward a messenger comes and says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Likewise, if it is conveyed through a letter, through a hand-signal, through slander of another, or through an intermediary — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate, and then afterward says to those who are insane: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Likewise, if said to those who are mentally disturbed, to those overcome by sensation, to those who are dull-witted, to those who are deaf-mutes, to those who are asleep, to those occupied with manual work, to those deeply intoxicated, to those in meditative absorption, or to those who have gone and are dwelling elsewhere — 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate with respect to the acquisition belonging to insane monks, and then afterward says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Likewise, with respect to the acquisition belonging to those who are mentally distracted and those who are dwelling elsewhere — these too should be declared at length."

Summary verse:

Through language, through the body, through seclusion,
Through a monk's name, and through groups of four,
Through an unsuitable householder, and through one who may not,
Through a later acquisition, and that monk.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk of the central region has previously made something properly legitimate in the dialect of a border region, and then afterward speaks to monks of the central region as follows: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and the monks of the central region do not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose one from a border region has previously made something properly legitimate in the dialect of the central region, and then afterward speaks to monks of the border region: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and the monks of the border region do not understand the dialect of the central region — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose one from a border region has previously made something properly legitimate in the dialect of the border region, and then afterward speaks to monks of the central region: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and the monks of the central region do not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose one from the central region has previously made something properly legitimate in the dialect of the central region, and then afterward speaks to monks of the border region: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and the monks of the border region do not understand the dialect of the central region — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate, and then afterward indicates by bodily gesture the following: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate, and then afterward, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate, and then, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, he says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Perceiving a non-secluded place as non-secluded, he says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a transgression.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk has previously made something properly legitimate with respect to the nuns' Saṅgha's acquisition, and then afterward says: 'The noble ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a nun has previously made something properly legitimate with respect to the monks' Saṅgha's acquisition, and then afterward says: 'The noble ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and by reason of that designation he turns out to be a nun — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a nun says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and by reason of that designation she turns out to be a monk — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable sir, suppose a monk, perceiving the fully ordained as fully ordained, says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a transgression.

"Perceiving the fully ordained as not fully ordained, he says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Perceiving the not fully ordained as fully ordained, he says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Perceiving the not fully ordained as not fully ordained, he says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk first renders someone suitably praised, and afterward says to laypeople: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

Likewise, the same applies when he says this with respect to monks who have taken vows, to eunuchs, to hermaphrodites, to those with both characteristics, to those who have killed their mothers, to those who have killed their fathers, to those who have killed an arhat, to those who have caused a nun to be expelled, to tīrthikas, to those who have joined the tīrthikas, to those who live by stealth, to those who have previously committed a transgression, and to those who from the outset are unsuitable — saying: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk first renders someone suitably praised, and afterward says that to those monks who are creating schism in the Saṅgha, to those who with malicious intent have drawn blood from the Tathāgata, to those who are living apart, and to those who have been given a training — saying: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk first renders someone suitably praised, and afterward says concerning the acquisition belonging to laypeople: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

Likewise, the same should be stated at length concerning the acquisition belonging to those monks who have taken vows and to those who from the outset are unsuitable.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk says concerning the acquisition belonging to those who are creating schism in the Saṅgha: 'The venerable ones have dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a transgression.

Likewise, when a monk says concerning the acquisition belonging to those who with malicious intent have drawn blood from the Tathāgata and to those who are living apart — saying: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, is there a case where a monk has first rendered someone suitably praised, and afterward says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — and yet no transgression results?"

There is a case approaching that. It is as follows: the robe-cloth is suitable in terms of its fibers but unsuitable in terms of its warp threads; or it is suitable in terms of its warp threads but unsuitable in terms of its fibers; or it is unsuitable in both respects. What is unsuitable means that it is mixed with wool from a dog, from a cow, from a wild deer, or from a goat, or that it has not been processed. When someone says, on account of such robe-cloth: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose the Saṅgha has come to obtain a robe-cloth one cubit in size that was not requested. A monk, having first rendered someone suitably praised, then says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk says on behalf of acquisitions other than the acquisition of robe-cloth — saying: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose the Saṅgha has given a robe to a certain monk even though it did not come into his presence. Afterwards, someone comes and says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose someone, having first rendered another suitably praised by conferring a training precept, then says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Venerable one, suppose a nun, having first rendered someone suitably praised, then says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Venerable one, suppose a female trainee, a novice, a female novice, or one who has previously incurred a transgression — any of these, having first rendered someone suitably praised, then says: 'The venerable ones have, out of friendly regard, dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition to an individual' — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse: Through a messenger, written word, or hand-sign; through attributing words to another, or through an intermediary; for one who is mad, or mentally disturbed; for one overcome by pain, or dull-witted; for one who is mute, asleep, occupied with work, thoroughly intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or one who has gone elsewhere — these are the cases.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, Blessed One, you have declared that when a monk reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra at each half-month recitation says: 'What use is it to recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra when there are these trifling, minor rules of training that cause monks to feel remorse, displeasure, harm, injury, and distress?' — and thereby denigrates the training, it is an offense entailing expiation. Regarding that: venerable one, suppose a monk denigrates the training through a messenger — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Similarly, what if it is done through a written word, a hand-sign, through attributing words to another, or through an intermediary — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk denigrates the training to a madman — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Similarly, what if done to one whose mind is disturbed, one overcome by pain, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is asleep, one who is occupied with work, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse: By speech, by body, or in seclusion; likewise by characteristic mark; to householders and others; to nuns — the training is given.

"Venerable one, suppose a monk of the central region denigrates the training to a monk of the central region, speaking in the dialect of a border region, and the monk of the central region does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose a monk of a border region denigrates the training to a monk of a border region, speaking in the dialect of the central region, and the monk of the border region does not understand the central dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose a monk of a border region denigrates the training to a monk of the central region, speaking in a border dialect, and the monk of the central region does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose a monk of the central region denigrates the training to a monk of a border region, speaking in the central dialect, and the monk of the border region does not understand the central dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training by means of a physical gesture — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training, perceiving a secluded place as secluded — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose he denigrates the training, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose he denigrates the training, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose he denigrates the training, perceiving a non-secluded place as non-secluded — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha.

"Venerable One, suppose one who has denigrated the training is recognized as such and is taken back as a nun — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a nun who has denigrated the training is recognized as such and is taken back as a monk — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training of a layperson — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

Likewise, it is a wrongdoing if one denigrates the training of a monk who has made a commitment, of a eunuch, of a pandaka, of a nun who has been expelled, of one who has not denigrated, of one who has denigrated, of an arhat, of a tīrthika, of one who has entered among the tīrthikas, of one who dwells in concealment, of one against whom a prior offense has arisen, or of one who was originally incompatible.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training involving causing a schism in the monastic Saṅgha, drawing blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, living in a separate faction, or the training that has been conferred — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training pertaining to a conjured form — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk denigrates the training of a nun, a probationary nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose a nun denigrates the training of a nun — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha.

"Suppose a nun denigrates the training of a monk, a probationary nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose one who has conferred a training denigrates that training — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha.

In the case of a probationary nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, and one against whom a prior offense has arisen and so forth, it is a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

Supernormal power, body, seclusion, dialect, gravel, roots, blue mud, flowers, fish scales, lodging and measure, meat, flowers, leaves, fruit, bark — the second — marks and the fourfold grouping, excellence, single syllables and the sevenfold group are the results.

The venerable Nearby Circle asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has declared that if one destroys a community of seeds or a dwelling place of beings, it is an offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha — what does that mean exactly?"

"Venerable One, suppose a monk intends by supernormal power to fell a tree — what comes of that?"

There is no offense.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk destroys a tree by means of a physical gesture — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, orders that a tree be destroyed — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing only — and the fourfold grouping is to be stated in full.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk of the central region, speaking in the dialect of a border region, instructs a monk of the central region to destroy a tree, and that monk of the central region does not understand that border dialect — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing — and likewise the fourfold grouping is to be stated in full.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk scrapes off stone grit — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk pulls out a seed whose root has not yet been planted — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk scrapes off green mud or grey mud — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk stirs up mud and thereby dislodges fish scales and then throws them onto dry ground — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation. The same applies to water plants.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk drives living beings from their habitat, burns it, or renders it unsuitable — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk destroys birds' nests, drives birds from their nests, or renders them unsuitable — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk causes a mole to be scattered about or its flesh to be extracted — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk peels off withered bark from a tree — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk plucks withered flowers, fruits, or leaves — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk is in the act of bending a tree and, while doing so, is recognized as a monk — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Venerable One, suppose a nun is in the act of bending a tree and, while doing so, is recognized as a nun — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk, perceiving a seed as a seed, renders it unsuitable — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Suppose a monk, perceiving a seed as something that is not a seed, renders it unsuitable — what comes of that?"

There is no offense.

"Suppose a monk, perceiving something that is not a seed as a seed, renders it unsuitable — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose a monk, perceiving something that is not a seed as something that is not a seed, renders it unsuitable — what comes of that?"

There is no offense.

"Venerable One, suppose a person who has not received full ordination makes preparations to kill a living being, and that living being is killed while the one who gave the order has not yet received full ordination — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose preparations were made by one who has not received full ordination, and the killing occurs while someone is in the process of receiving full ordination — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose preparations were made by one who has not received full ordination, and the killing occurs after full ordination has been completed — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose preparations were made while someone is in the process of receiving full ordination, and the killing occurs while in the process of receiving full ordination — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose preparations were made while in the process of receiving full ordination, and the killing occurs after full ordination has been completed — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Suppose preparations were made after full ordination has been completed, and the killing occurs after full ordination has been completed — what comes of that?"

It is an offense entailing expiation.

"Suppose preparations were made after full ordination has been completed, and the killing occurs before full ordination was completed — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk speaks thus: 'If this tree were cut down it would be good, and there would be no offense' — and another person then cuts it down — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, suppose a monk swallows something whole without chewing it — what comes of that?"

It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, is there a case in which a monk may consume fruits that have not been rendered suitable without incurring an offense?"

There is something close to that: if one thinks of seeds that are not seeds as not having the character of seeds, one may then consume them.

"Venerable One, is there a case in which a monk may seek to use the five kinds of seed that have been rendered suitable by fire, yet still incur an offense?"

There is something close to that: if the five kinds of seed have been rendered suitable and then are placed on the ground, placed in a vessel, or placed on a rack, and a sprout has subsequently grown from them, then an offense would be incurred.

The summary verse:

Through messenger, letter, hand-gesture,

Through charging another by means of an intermediary,

Through a madman, through one whose mind is disturbed, through one afflicted by feeling, through a traveler, through laypeople and the like, through one who has given up the training, and through a nun.

"Venerable One, if a monk instructs a messenger to destroy a plant, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he does so by letter, by hand-gesture, by charging another by means of an intermediary, or by instructing through an intermediary to destroy it, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk instructs a madman to destroy a plant, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he instructs one whose mind is disturbed, one overcome by feeling, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, or one who is staying elsewhere to destroy a plant, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk directly and in person instructs a layman to destroy a plant, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "Likewise, if he does so to a laywoman, to a eunuch, to an expelled nun, to a matricide, to a patricide, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to one who has drawn the Tathāgata's blood with malicious intent, to a non-Buddhist adherent, to one who has entered a non-Buddhist sect, to one who is dwelling in concealment, to one who is dwelling apart, to one who is not to be kept in residence, to one in whom a prior offense has arisen, to one who was incompatible from the outset, to one who has made a declaration, or to one who has given up the training — if any of these is instructed directly and in person to destroy a plant, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation.

"Venerable One, if one who has given up the training destroys a green plant, or instructs another to destroy it, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained nun destroys a green plant or instructs another to destroy it, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "Venerable One, if a female novice destroys a green plant or instructs another to destroy it, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. As for one in whom a prior offense has arisen and the rest, these are offenses, as before. For novice monks and novice nuns, there is no offense.

The summary verse:

By speech, by body, by solitude,
By marks, by groups of four,
By laypeople and the like,
By those appointed and those not appointed.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed Buddha: "Venerable One, what was meant when the Blessed One declared that mocking or ridiculing another constitutes an offense that entails expiation?"

"Venerable One, if a monk who has been ordained in the central region mocks or ridicules, in the dialect of the borderlands, a monk from the central region, and that monk from the central region does not understand that borderland dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a monk from the borderlands mocks or ridicules, in the dialect of the central region, a monk from the borderlands, and that monk from the borderlands does not understand that central dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a monk from the borderlands mocks or ridicules, in a borderland dialect, a monk from the central region, and that monk from the central region does not understand that borderland dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a monk from the central region mocks or ridicules, in a central dialect, a monk from the borderlands, and that monk from the borderlands does not understand that central dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if an ordained monk mocks or ridicules another by means of a bodily gesture, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if an ordained monk, perceiving a solitary place as not solitary, mocks or ridicules another there, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he perceives a solitary place as solitary and mocks or ridicules another there, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he perceives a non-solitary place as non-solitary and mocks or ridicules another there, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he perceives a non-solitary place as non-solitary and mocks or ridicules another there, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation.

"Venerable One, if an ordained monk, in the course of mocking or ridiculing, comes to be identified by a mark —

"What if it turns out to be a nun? An offense has been committed. Venerable One, if an ordained monk, in the course of mocking or ridiculing, comes to be identified by a mark as a nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules one who has received full ordination, perceiving her as fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If he perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules a layperson, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules one who has voluntarily claimed to be a monk, a hermaphrodite, a eunuch, a nun who has been expelled, one whose mother has died, one whose father has died, one who has killed an arhat, a tīrthika, one who has entered among the tīrthikas, one who lives by stealth, one in whom a previous transgression has arisen, or one who was unsuitable from the very beginning, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules a monk who causes a schism in the Saṅgha, one who, with malicious intent, draws blood from a Tathāgata, one who lives apart, or one who has returned the training, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules those who have been designated to perform the Saṅgha's appointed duties — those appointed and those not appointed excepted — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

A summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
By attributing names to another, by intermediary,
By one who is mad, by one mentally disturbed,
By one overcome by sensation, by one who is confused,
By one who is asleep, by one who is distracted, by one utterly intoxicated,

By one in meditative absorption, by one dwelling elsewhere — these are the last.

The Vinayamūla, the eleventh fascicle, the last.

"Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules a messenger, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, by letter, by gesture, by attributing a name to another, or through an intermediary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained monk mocks or ridicules a monk who is mad, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he mocks or ridicules one whose mind is disturbed, one overcome by sensation, one who is confused, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one occupied with manual work, one who is utterly intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, or a monk dwelling elsewhere, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a monk mocks or ridicules a nun, a probationer (śikṣamāṇā), a novice monk, or a novice nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a fully ordained nun mocks or ridicules a nun, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If she mocks or ridicules a monk, a probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if one who has returned the training, having received ordination, mocks or ridicules, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If she mocks or ridicules a probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, one in whom a previous transgression has arisen, and so forth, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

A summary verse:

Transgression, and likewise body and speech,
Silence, mark,
Laypeople and the like,
The group of four — these are the last.

This was requested of the Blessed One, the Buddha, by the Venerable Upāli and his retinue.

"Venerable One, when the Blessed One said that wearing an instruction in one's ear constitutes an offense that entails expiation — what does that mean, Venerable One?"

"Venerable One, if a monk, for reasons other than a transgression, delivers a message in speech that causes it to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by means of a bodily gesture, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk from a central region causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by addressing a central-region monk in a border-region dialect, and that central-region monk does not understand that border-region dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If one from a border region causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by addressing a border-region monk in a central-region dialect, and that border-region monk does not understand the central-region dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If one from a border region causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by addressing a central-region monk in a border-region dialect, and that central-region monk does not understand the border-region dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If one from a central region causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by addressing a border-region monk in a central-region dialect, and that border-region monk does not understand the central-region dialect, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes an instruction to be worn in the ear through silence, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk, while a nun's instruction is being worn in his ear, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a nun, while a monk's instruction is being worn in her ear, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes a layperson's instruction to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he causes to be worn in the ear an instruction belonging to one who has undertaken vows, to a eunuch, to a hermaphrodite, to a suspended nun, to a matricide, to a patricide, to one who has killed an arhat, to a non-Buddhist adherent, to one who has entered among non-Buddhist adherents, to one who has taken up a position of concealment, to one who was initially discordant, or to one in whom a previous transgression has arisen — what does that entail?"

An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes an instruction to be worn in the ear of one who is creating a schism in the Saṅgha, of one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, of one who is living separately, or of one who has been given a training rule — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, causes an instruction to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If he causes an instruction to be worn in the ear of a fully ordained person while perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he causes an instruction to be worn in the ear of one who is not fully ordained while perceiving that person as fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he causes an instruction to be worn in the ear of one who is not fully ordained while perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

A summary verse:

Through a messenger, through a letter, through hand-signs,
Through accusing another and through intermediaries,
Through madness, through mental disturbance,
Through one overcome by feeling — these are the categories.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes a monk's instruction to be worn in the ear through a messenger, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he causes an instruction to be worn in the ear through a letter, through hand-signs, or through an intermediary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk, by accusing another, causes a monk's instruction to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes the instruction of an insane monk to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, one mentally disturbed, one weakened by feeling, one who is dull-witted, and one who has gone elsewhere — if he causes an instruction to be worn in the ear, what does that entail? An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk causes the instruction of a nun, a female probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a nun causes the instruction of a nun to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If she causes the instruction of a monk, a female probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun to be worn in the ear, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a monk causes an instruction to be worn in the ear by means of a granted precept, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If it is done by a female probationer, a novice monk, a novice nun, or one who has previously incurred a transgression, and so forth, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

Summary verse:

What is improper, the person,
What is not permitted, and the excess —
The mark, just the set of four,
Body, speech, and likewise solitude —
Laypeople and so forth
Being obstructed — that is the last.

The venerable Nearby Retinue asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that any monk who lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha (saṃgha) bed or seat that is fully enclosed, or a mat, a cushion, a board, or a low stool without concealing it, or having laid it out without covering it, or without storing it, or without entrusting it to a monk who is present before departing — apart from such exceptions, commits an offense that entails expiation. What did you mean by that? Venerable One, is there a case where a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat, without concealing it, without covering it, and without entrusting it, yet still being present there would not constitute an offense that entails expiation?" Nearby Retinue said: "It is as follows: when the bedding has become suitable as to kin yet the cause has become unsuitable as to kin, or when it has become suitable as to cause yet unsuitable as to kin, or when both have become unsuitable — what is unsuitable refers to bedding mixed with felt from elephant-hide, ox-hair, wild-animal wool, or goat-wool, or any such bedding that has not been designated. If one lays it down or has it laid down without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and then departs from there, it becomes an offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down an individual person's bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without entrusting it, and then departs from there, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha chair or stool without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and then departs from there — is there a case where it would not constitute an offense that entails expiation?" Nearby Retinue said: "Indeed there is: if it is eight of the Sugata's finger-breadths or less, that is permitted."

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a monk who is present, and having departed from there undergoes a change of status and becomes a nun, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "Venerable One, if a nun lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and without entrusting it, and having departed from there undergoes a change of status and becomes a monk, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a monk who is present, and then departs beyond the boundary perceiving it to be beyond the boundary, what does that entail?" An offense that entails expiation. "If he departs beyond the boundary perceiving it to be within the boundary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he departs within the boundary perceiving it to be beyond the boundary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"If he departs within the boundary perceiving it to be within the boundary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, and then entrusts it to a monk who is present by means of a bodily gesture and departs, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk from the central region entrusts a Saṅgha bed or seat to a monk from the central region using the dialect of a border region and then departs, and that monk from the central region does not understand the dialect of the border region, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a border monk entrusts a Saṅgha bed or seat to a border monk using the dialect of the central region and then departs, and that border monk does not understand the dialect of the central region, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a border monk entrusts a Saṅgha bed or seat to a monk of the central region using the dialect of the border region and then departs, and that monk from the central region does not understand the dialect of the border region, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If a monk from the central region entrusts a Saṅgha bed or seat to a border monk using the dialect of the central region and then departs, and that border monk does not understand the dialect of the central region, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, and then entrusts it to one he perceives to be an isolated place when it is indeed an isolated place and departs, what does that entail?" An offense entailing a downfall (pārājika). "If he perceives an isolated place as not isolated, what does that entail?" An offense entailing a downfall. "If he perceives a non-isolated place as isolated, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he departs perceiving a non-isolated place as non-isolated, what does that entail?" There is no downfall.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a layperson, and then departs, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Similarly, if he departs without entrusting it to a monk who has accepted a precept, to a novice, to a eunuch, to a nun who has been expelled, to one who has not died, to one whose father has died, to one who has slain an arhat, to a non-Buddhist adherent, to one who has entered among non-Buddhist adherents, to one dwelling as a thief, to one who does not dwell there, to one who has previously committed a downfall, or to one who is initially incompatible, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable One, if a monk departs without entrusting it to one who causes a schism in the Saṅgha, or to one who has, with malicious intent, drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or to one who lives apart, or to one who is in the midst of giving up the training, what does that entail?" An offense entailing a downfall.

"Venerable One, is it the case that if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a monk who is present, he still does not incur a downfall if he leaves it in the vicinity?" There is a vicinity: that is, if he does not abandon that bed or seat carelessly, and if any one of eight obstacles has arisen for going to or remaining in that monastery.

A summary verse:

One who is mad, or whose mind is disturbed,
one overcome by sensation, or dull-witted, one fallen asleep, or seized by hardship, or thoroughly intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption and then gone elsewhere — these are the last.

"Venerable One, if a monk lays down or has laid down a Saṅgha bed or seat without concealing it, without covering it, without storing it, and departs without entrusting it to a monk who is mad, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Similarly, if he departs without entrusting it to a monk whose mind is disturbed, to one overcome by sensation, to one who is dull-witted, to one who is deaf and mute, to one who has fallen asleep, to one occupied with manual work, to one who is thoroughly intoxicated, to one who has entered meditative absorption, or to one who is dwelling elsewhere, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk entrusts it to a nun and then departs, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he entrusts it to a probationer nun or to a novice nun and departs, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a nun spreads out a bed or seat belonging to the Saṅgha, or has one spread out, and then departs without putting it away, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a nun who is present, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk departs without entrusting it to a monk, a probationer nun, or a novice nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if one who has received the training spreads out a bed or seat belonging to the Saṅgha, or has one spread out, and then departs without putting it away, without storing it, and without entrusting it to a monk who is present, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed. "With respect to probationer nuns, novices, novice nuns, and those in whom an earlier transgression has occurred and so forth — an offense has been committed."

Then the venerable Upāli (the close attendant) asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, what is the meaning of what the Blessed One has declared — that apart from certain circumstances, a transgression is committed by any monk who spreads out a grass mat or a leaf mat in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, or has one spread out, and then departs without gathering it up, without having it stored, and without entrusting it to a monk who is present?" The remainder of the text — concerning what is impermissible, what is foremost in eight finger-breadths of the Sugata, and excepting the surplus — is to be set forth in full in the same way as for beds and seats.

Summation verse:

Through messenger, written message, gesture, imputing it to another, through an intermediary,
one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one overcome by sensation, one who is dull-witted, one who has fallen asleep, one occupied with manual work, one thoroughly intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one dwelling elsewhere — these are the last.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, what is the meaning of what the Blessed One has declared — that apart from certain circumstances, a transgression is committed by any monk who, overcome by anger and agitation and with a displeased mind, expels a monk from the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, or has him expelled?"

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, has a monk expelled through a messenger, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he has him expelled or caused to be expelled through a written message, through a gesture, by imputing it to another, or through an intermediary, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels a mad monk or has him expelled, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he expels or has expelled one whose mind is disturbed, one overcome by sensation, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf and mute, one who has fallen asleep, one occupied with manual work, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one dwelling elsewhere, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

Summation verse:

By night, in groups of four, likewise in groups of seven,
householders and so forth, and the Saṅgha — that is the last.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels a monk from the assembly hall of the Saṅgha or has him expelled, and in the course of that act he becomes a woman — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a nun, angered, expels a nun from the rains-retreat house or has her expelled, and in the course of that act she becomes a man — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels or has expelled someone who is fully ordained, perceiving that person as fully ordained, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed. "If he expels or has expelled someone who is fully ordained, perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If he expels or has expelled someone who is not fully ordained, perceiving that person as fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"If he expels or has expelled someone who is not fully ordained, perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if someone who is not fully ordained, angered, sets about expelling a monk and expels someone who is not fully ordained, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who is not fully ordained, he expels someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who is not fully ordained, he expels someone who has completed full ordination, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, he expels someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, he expels someone who has completed full ordination, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who has completed full ordination, he expels someone who has completed full ordination, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed. "If, having set about expelling someone who has completed full ordination, he expels someone who has not completed full ordination, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels or has expelled a layman, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels or has expelled a monk who has accepted him as a preceptor, or one who is a paṇḍaka, or one who is a hermaphrodite, or a nun who has been expelled, or one who has killed his mother, or one who has killed his father, or one who has killed an arhat, or a tīrthika, or one who has entered among tīrthikas, or one who dwells by means of theft, or one against whom a transgression has previously arisen, or one who was discordant from the outset, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels or has expelled a monk who creates a schism in the Saṅgha, or one who, with malicious intent, draws blood from a Tathāgata, or one who dwells separately, or those who have been given the training — what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, directly causes a monk to be expelled by a layman, or has it done, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed.

Likewise, with regard to one who is a paṇḍaka, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed his father, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has entered among tīrthikas, one who dwells by means of theft, one who dwells separately, one who does not remain, one who was discordant from the outset, one against whom a transgression has previously arisen, one who has accepted a preceptor, one who has been given the training, a nun, a probationer nun (Skt. śikṣamāṇā), a novice monk, and a novice nun — if one expels or causes the expulsion of such persons, what does that entail? A transgression has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, angered, expels or has expelled a nun, a probationer nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a nun, angered, expels or has expelled a nun from the rains-retreat dwelling, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a nun, angered, expels or has expelled a monk, a probationer nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given the training, angered, expels or has expelled a monk, what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed. With regard to a probationer nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, or one against whom a transgression has previously arisen and so forth, an offense has been committed.

Summary verse:

One who is insane, and one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted with feeling, and one who is dim-witted, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one thoroughly intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last of the wanderers.

Thus was this asked of the Buddha, the Blessed One, by the venerable Upāli and his attendant retinue.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a transgression occurs when a monk, knowingly arriving late, makes use of his coming as a pretext and then, having pushed past monks who were seated earlier in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, sits or lies down on a seat. What is the meaning of this ruling?"

"Venerable one, if a monk pushes past an insane monk and then sits or lies down on a seat, what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. Likewise, if he pushes past a monk whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted with feeling, one who is dim-witted, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is occupied with work, one who is thoroughly intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or a monk who is staying in another dwelling, and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail? An offense has been committed.

Summary verse:

A person, and the Saṅgha, likewise the night, and a group of four,

laypeople and the like,
the improperly ordained, the probationer, the nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk pushes past monks who were seated earlier in the assembly hall of a private individual and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a monk pushes past monks who were seated earlier in places other than the assembly hall of the Saṅgha and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a monk pushes past monks who were seated earlier in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha and then sits or lies down on a seat, and during the night it turns out to be a nun — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a nun pushes past nuns who were seated earlier and then sits or lies down on a seat, and during the night it turns out to be a monk — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving fully ordained monks as fully ordained, pushes past them and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed. "If, perceiving fully ordained monks as not fully ordained, he does so — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, perceiving those not fully ordained as fully ordained, he does so — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If, perceiving those not fully ordained as not fully ordained, he does so — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk pushes past a layperson and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. Likewise, if he pushes past a monk who has accepted the training, a neuter, a hermaphrodite, or one against whom a transgression has previously arisen, and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail? An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk pushes past a monk who is causing a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, one who is living separately, or one who has been given a training rule, and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" A transgression has been committed.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who pushes past monks who were seated earlier in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha and then sits or lies down does not commit a transgression?" There is such a case: when those nearby are present and the lodging has become unsuitable — that is, when the lodging is unfit for the full performance of the acts of the monks.

"Venerable one, if a monk pushes past a nun, a probationer nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a nun pushes past a monk, a probationer nun, a novice monk, or a novice nun and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, when a training rule has been given, if a monk, knowing that other monks are already present in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, pushes in after them, forces his way by weight, and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a nun, in a lodging for the rains retreat, knowing that other nuns are already present, pushes in after them, forces her way by weight, and then sits or lies down on a seat — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. As for a probationer nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, and cases where an offense has already occurred beforehand — these constitute a wrongdoing.

Summary verse:

A person and the Saṅgha, likewise a night and groups of four,
having rendered a place unsuitable, and being covered from above — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whatever monk, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead above the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, yet forces it down by weight and sits or lies down — commits an offense. What is that?" "Venerable one, if a monk, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead above a private individual's assembly hall, forces it down by weight and then sits or lies down — what does that entail?" A wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, in places other than the Saṅgha's assembly hall, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead, forces it down by weight and then sits or lies down — what does that entail?" A wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead, forces it down by weight and then sits or lies down, and in doing so undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun — what does that entail?" A wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a nun, knowing that something will fall upon the space overhead, forces it down by weight and then sits or lies down, and in doing so undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk — what does that entail?" A wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving space overhead where something will fall, forces down a chair or the foot of a chair by weight and then sits or lies down — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "If one perceives what is space as not space — what does that entail?" No offense. "If one perceives what is not space as space — what does that entail?" A wrongdoing. "If one perceives what is not space as not space — what does that entail?" No offense. "Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead, sits or lies down and yet does not commit an offense?" There is such a case: when those nearby are present and the lodging has become unsuitable — that is, when it is unfit for monks to make full use of. "Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk sits or lies down using a chair or the foot of a chair and yet does not commit an offense?" There is such a case: when the top of the assembly hall is covered by a large flat stone, or covered by a small flat stone, or covered by something convex, or covered by a flat board, or it is a tent structure, or one sits or lies down on ground that is at a lower level. "Venerable one, when a training rule has been given, if one forces down a chair or the foot of a chair by weight and sits or lies down — knowing that it will fall upon the space overhead — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a nun, knowing that a chair or the foot of a chair will fall upon the space overhead, forces it down by weight and then sits or lies down — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. As for a probationer nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, and those where an offense has already occurred beforehand — these force their way down by weight and sit or lie down — — what does lying down entail?" An offense has been committed.

The venerable attendant retinue then put a question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk knowingly sprinkles water containing living creatures on grass, on dung, or on the ground, or causes another to do so, it is an offense that entails a downfall. What exactly is the scope of that ruling?" As for sprinkling grass, dung, or the ground with water containing living creatures, and causing another to do so — the remainder is to be analyzed in accordance with the explanation of downfalls as set out in the Vibhaṅga.

Summary verse:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by imputing a name to another, by intermediary, the deranged, the mentally disturbed,
the incapacitated — these cases are concluded.

The venerable attendant retinue then put a question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk undertakes the construction of a large temple, he is to examine the ground beginning from the perception of however much space is needed for the doorway recess, the foundations, and the area of light, and is to build it with two or three courses of stone along with the rubble fill — and that to build higher than that is an offense entailing a downfall. What is the scope of that ruling?"

"Venerable one, to begin with: if a monk causes more than two or three courses above the foundation to be built by a messenger — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if by letter, by gesture, by imputing a name to another, or by intermediary — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a deranged person to build more than two or three courses above the foundation — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Likewise, if he causes one mentally disturbed, one incapacitated by illness, an imbecile, someone deaf-mute, or someone dwelling elsewhere to build more than that — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

Summary verse:

A large building, a building for a person, likewise one begun by another, the matter of characteristics, that of a quarter-share, the giving of the training, and the case of a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk undertakes to build some other Saṅgha property apart from a large temple and builds more than two or three courses above the foundation — what does that entail?" It is solely an offense entailing a downfall. "Venerable one, if a monk undertakes to build a personal temple and builds more than two or three courses above the foundation — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed.

"Venerable one, is there a case where a monk builds a Saṅgha temple and, even though he builds more than two or three courses above the foundation, no downfall ensues?" — "There is, attendant. For instance, if the temple is built entirely of stone, or of brick, or entirely of wood, or if it is covered with thatch, or covered with flat stones and flat boards, or if the patron donor has said 'Take note of where you have reached' — indeed, if the donor says 'Note where you have finished' — then take note of that."

"Venerable one, if a monk completes what another has begun above two or three courses — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. "Venerable one, if a monk begins above two or three courses and does not complete it — what does that entail?" An offense has been committed. If he becomes mentally disturbed or dies, the ruling is the same.

"Venerable one, if, while a monk is building above two or three courses, a change of status occurs and he becomes a nun, and then she completes the work — what does that entail?" It is an offense entailing a downfall. "Venerable one, if, while a nun is building above two or three courses, a change of status occurs and she becomes a monk, and then he completes the work — what does that entail?" It is an offense entailing a downfall.

This twelfth fascicle contains incomplete scriptural inquiry — the Vinaya text entitled "The Twelfth Fascicle of the Minor Section of Scriptural Inquiry Containing Questions and Answers up to the Section on Building Two or Three Courses High, Being the Second of the Two Parts of the Offenses Entailing a Downfall That Occur in the Superior Text or the Elder Text Alone." Together with it stands the fifty-third fascicle, which contains the completed scriptural inquiry known as "Completed Inquiry of the Superior Text," comprising the first four sections of the Vibhaṅga offenses, the completed inquiries of the seventeen bases, and eleven sections including those beginning with the Vinaya-administering section — both having been translated during the time of the translator monk Nāgadhvaja and his colleagues. However, the edition containing the incomplete inquiry did not become widely available in Tibet, and in earlier times many errors in practice arose based on corrupt manuscripts of the completed inquiry. Later, when the Elder Darma Sengge, residing at Öl-gö Monastery in Tö, compiled the four-section canon together with the nuns' Vibhaṅga, the great spiritual friend Jangchub Sengge of Ü-Tsang sent searchers to the monasteries of Ü and Tsang seeking the incomplete inquiry manuscript. Subsequently, having found a small copy at Samyé Chimpu, and having sent word through the monk Śīlaguṇa to the great Vinaya-holder, the Śākya monk Vaśītā Śīla, requesting him to come, he arrived, though the manuscript copy was found to be extremely defective on the outer pages. Many manuscript fees were paid and it was brought, and all doubts about every discrepancy in practice were resolved there and then. Having accomplished this through great hardship, and though the former exemplar was exceedingly corrupt, he afterwards caused it to spread and flourish widely, and brought benefit to all beings.

Here some people say that the incomplete text is the Elder Text and the completed text is the Superior Text — but this is incorrect, for the Sanskrit term uttara can be rendered both as "elder" and as "superior." Although both versions, the incomplete and the completed, exist, this incomplete inquiry is extremely pure as regards its Indian manuscript source, and the commentary by Ācārya Geleg Shényen has now appeared as a commentary on the incomplete version. If there is a discrepancy between the two, one should rely on the incomplete inquiry.

The reason why corruptions arise between the two versions of the inquiry is as follows, as stated in the commentary on the scriptural transmission inquiry: After the Teacher passed away, a brahmin king arose who was called Gyal Shé, hostile to the teaching. He caused many harms to the teaching — he demolished stūpas, burned the assembly halls of the Saṅgha, killed monks, and heaped up the scriptural volumes of the Buddha's word and burned them. Thereupon, gradually, monks collected from various regions and places all the volumes of the three scriptural collections and preserved what had been damaged and destroyed — but the volume of the Elder Text was not found. They then heard that in the land of Kashgar a monk was reciting the Elder Text, and so they went to that land, approached him, and said: "We have heard that you recite the Elder Text — please recite it for us." He replied: "Some of it I remember, and some I do not." Then they told him: "Recite exactly as much as you do remember." And he recited it just as he recalled it. The monks thought: "For now let us collect the text, and later we shall compare and analyze it word by word and meaning by meaning," and so it was written down. But afterwards, distracted by immediate affairs for a long period of time, they did not arrange it properly as it should have been. Other monks in other lands also came to recite it differently. For this very reason, the originally complete base became impaired, and so in this Elder Text the recitations are of many kinds and the meanings are of many kinds.

For this reason, in the exposition of the Venerable Yönten Ö on the Vinaya, when repeatedly inquired, some say it appears thus and so. Therefore, since the version known as the Great Request of the noble Upāli appears with the recitation complete, the Elder Text with its complete request is the properly collected original base; and since that original base is without impairment, it is thoroughly pure. But the version with the incomplete request — whether it appeared in the minds of certain monks of the central lands, or whether it is famed to have been found later among ash in which it had not been consumed by fire — is also held to be the unimpaired original text, and so it too is exceedingly pure.

Therefore, this version established through such purity and the labor of many difficulties came to be the crown jewel of the great elder masters of the Tibetan tradition who are learned and disciplined in the vows — it is a scriptural recitation with the complete request, compiled from the great ruined cities of the central lands by the great elders and other learned ones. And Mchims Thamsched Mkhyen Pa, whose maṇḍala of knowledge spread across the sky of all that is to be known — holding the mother of the Tripiṭaka, the Vinaya, and the Sūtra collections — whose rays of renown illumined all directions without exception, had a copy invited from the great temple of La Stod Ol Rgod and erected it at the glorious temple of Narthang, the source of the Teachings. Taking that as a copy, the Śākya monk Jampal Yangkyi erected it at the glorious temple of Narthang. And there the incomplete upper recitation of the Elder Text — the very beginning of the complete request of the excellent text obtained from a Kashmiri monk — was erected as the head of this edition.

That same copy was subsequently invited so that the teaching of the Victors might flourish and benefit and happiness might arise for sentient beings. It was properly erected at the glorious Guntang Temple — the dwelling of the holy learned and accomplished ones of the eastern region, where the chief master of the teaching of the glorious community of the Victors resides.

Translator's Notes

- The summary verse at the opening is a mnemonic condensing the cases treated in the passage. Its terms are terse and elliptical by design: "three animals" refers to the three animal-transformation scenarios; "three passages" to the oral, excretory, and urinary orifices; "woman departed" to the bisected or decapitated woman cases; "severance" to the waist-severing case; "holding and repeated" to holding and repeated-use scenarios elaborated elsewhere in the text; "tooth, not touching, sow" to further cases in subsequent sections. This is

The phrase rendered "as much as is required for a jewel to pass from a tooth" uses "tooth" (so) as a technical Vinaya anatomical landmark for the boundary of the oral passage; the precise anatomical referent is a matter of traditional Vinaya commentary.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic rubric listing the classificatory headings that structure the surrounding casuistry: another's formed limb (as a site of insertion), the two bodily passages, the two organs, two grades of impairment, and the obstruction cases, organized into groups of six and four. The Tibetan is terse and quasi-technical, as is typical of Vinaya verse summaries; the rendering follows the most natural syntactic reading while preserving the list structure.

The cases involving change of status (monk becoming laywoman, nun becoming monk mid-act) reflect a classical Vinaya discussion of whether the defeat attaches to the act or to the status at the moment of completion; the text affirms defeat in both cases.

The distinction between moving a precious stone "from a small place to a large place" versus "from a large place to another place" as determinative of defeat versus grave offense reflects a standard Vinaya principle: displacement that fully removes an object from its owner's control completes the act of theft and constitutes a defeat, while partial or incomplete displacement yields only a grave offense.

- The "summary verse" at the opening is a mnemonic gāthā listing the topics covered in this section of the Vinaya dialogue; it is in condensed verse form and some items are laconic. "The islands — for the sake of others, these are not downfalls" likely refers to cases involving ferry-crossings or territories treated elsewhere in the text where acting on behalf of others removes the downfall.

"King Peacock" (𑀕𑁆𑀭𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀺𑀔𑀤𑀢𑀺𑀬𑀻𑀧𑀾𑀢𑀺) refers to King Mayūra or a ruler associated with the Maurya dynasty (the Tibetan rma bya, "peacock," being a rendering of Maurya); this is a standard reference in Vinaya texts to the origin of the kārśāpaṇa coin.

"Theft of the Dharma" (ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་) is a technical Vinaya category referring to plagiarism or misappropriation of teachings; it does not incur a pārājika defeat because the Dharma is not property with a conventional monetary value.

The thresholds of māṣaka, kākaṇi, and kārṣāpaṇa reflect the monetary system underlying the pārājika rule on theft; the exact equivalences given here follow the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

- The three continents named — western Cattle-Enjoyment (Aparagodānīya), eastern Videha (Pūrvavideha), and northern Unpleasant Sound (Uttarakuru) — are the traditional Buddhist cosmological continents. Uttarakuru is described in Vinaya literature as a place where the concept of ownership does not apply, hence the ruling that theft per se cannot occur there, though the intention to steal still generates an offence.

The term rendered "accepted" (yongs su bzung ba) in the final set of permutations refers to whether an item has been formally received or taken into one's possession. The fourfold schema mirrors the standard Vinaya pattern of perception-versus-reality combinations seen earlier in the text.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic condensing the preceding case categories. Its terse formulation — "three animal births," "craving as mother — a group of four," "two wombs," "a caretaker," and "for perception — also a group of four" — refers to the enumerated sub-cases in the surrounding Vinaya discussion and is rendered as closely as the compressed Tibetan allows. The full referents of each item would require access to the broader commentary.

The phrase rendered "the existence of action accompanied by defilement" translates "zag pa dang bcas pa'i las kyi srid pa," a technical Abhidharma/Vinaya expression denoting karmically conditioned existence driven by afflicted action, here used allegorically for "father" in a doctrinal gloss on the pārājika rule concerning parricide.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā condensing the preceding casuistic cases. The phrase "two states of mind" refers to the doubt-cases; "two regarding self" to the self-killing cases; "four concerning the arhat" to the four arhat permutations; "two thieves" to the two thief scenarios; "other perceptions" to the perception-mismatch cases; "seven as a group" and "the house" likely refer to further groupings that follow in the text. The verse is highly compressed and its referents are fully intelligible only within the broader textual sequence.

The term rendered "action without interval" translates the Tibetan for what Sanskrit calls ānantarya — the five heinous acts (killing one's mother, father, or an arhat; wounding a buddha; causing a schism in the Saṅgha) that lead without interval to rebirth in the lowest hell. "Proximate fault" renders ānantarya-sabhāga, a category of offenses analogous in gravity to the five.

- The phrase rendered "one who resides by stealth" translates a technical Vinaya term for someone who has concealed themselves within the monastic community without legitimate ordination.

The names in the penultimate paragraph are epithets and names of previous buddhas: Vipaśyin is the first of the seven buddhas of antiquity; "one with the crown protrusion" refers to a buddha distinguished by the uṣṇīṣa mark; "destroyer of cyclic existence" and "protector of all" are epithets; Kanakamuni and Kāśyapa are the fifth and sixth of the seven buddhas of antiquity. The passage concerns whether claiming to be a śrāvaka of one of these past buddhas constitutes a defeat, since those buddha-dispensations have ended.

The summary verse is a mnemonic verse enumerating the categories of persons relevant to the preceding case analyses; the translation renders it as closely as the condensed form allows, though the verse's terse style leaves some items open to varying interpretation.

- The phrase rendered "secondary afflictions" translates གཞན་གྱི་མཆོད་པ་ལྔ་པ་, which in Abhidharma context refers to the upakleśas, the subsidiary or derivative afflictions; this rendering is standard in scholastic literature.

The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā indexing the cases treated in the preceding section; the translation follows the sequence of topics as they appear in the prose.

- The place names Wandering Mountain, Bird-Shelter, Vulture's Peak, and Pale Forest are Tibetan renderings of specific locations in the Rājagṛha region associated with the Buddha's teaching activity. Vulture's Peak is the well-known Gṛdhrakūṭa; the others are less certain as to their Sanskrit equivalents, and the Tibetan is treated literally here.

The phrase rendered "superhuman quality" throughout is a standard rendering of the Vinaya technical term for extraordinary spiritual attainments claimed to others, corresponding to Sanskrit uttaramaṇuṣyadharmā. The expression "final offense" renders the Tibetan mtha' 'gyur, signifying the gravest category of defeat, a pārājika.

- The passage works through an elaborate matrix of dialect permutations between "central region" monks and "border region" monks, a standard Vinaya device for exploring when communication is or is not intelligible and thus when culpability attaches. The final summary verse is incomplete as transmitted; the Tibetan breaks off mid-verse, so the translation reproduces only what is present in the source.

The term rendered "final offense" corresponds to the Tibetan "mthar 'gyur," literally "becoming ultimate," a technical Vinaya term for the complete or consummated form of the pārājika defeat. "Serious offense" renders "nyes pa sbom po," the heavy offense just short of full defeat. "Wrongdoing" renders "nyes byas," a lesser infraction. These distinctions are doctrinally significant throughout.

"One who was originally of contrary nature" renders "dang po mi mthun pa can," a technical Vinaya category referring to one ordained while possessing a disqualifying condition from the outset.

- The phrase rendered "a state of theft" translates a term indicating one who is maintaining a position under false pretenses — that is, one who continues to live as a monk while knowing himself to be disqualified, a recognized technical category in Vinaya literature.

The phrase "one who from the outset is of incompatible nature" refers to someone who was unsuitable for ordination from the beginning due to a disqualifying condition.

"Paṇḍaka" is retained as a standard Vinaya technical term for a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a recognized canonical category.

The summary verse is a mnemonic and its referents are deliberately compressed; the translation preserves the compressed form as verse.

The final question is cut off in the source passage and the translation preserves the abrupt ending accordingly.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā listing categories treated in the preceding and following case analysis. The rendering follows the standard Vinaya format for such summary verses, which are intentionally terse; each term stands for a full case-group. "Marks" renders mtshan, which in the context immediately following refers to sex characteristics. The phrase "attains the marks of a monk" or "attains the marks of a man" refers to a rare Vinaya scenario in which a person undergoes a change of sex characteristics — a recognized edge case in Indian Buddhist legal literature.

"Remainder for the Saṅgha" renders dge 'dun lhag mar 'gyur, the standard Tibetan for saṃghāvaśeṣa, a formal offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure but not entailing expulsion, in contrast to a pārājika defeat.

The distinction between "one intervening object" cases yielding a grave offense and the "no intervening object perceived as no intervening object" case yielding a saṃghāvaśeṣa follows the logic that direct, unobstructed bodily contact with full correct perception constitutes the graver, classifiable offense category, while contact through a covering reduces the severity. This is consistent with standard Vinaya commentarial analysis.

- The term rendered "Saṅgha-remainder offense" throughout is saṃghāvaśeṣa in Sanskrit — a technical Vinaya category designating an offense requiring formal transaction before the Saṅgha for rehabilitation, falling short of a pārājika defeat. The Tibetan "dge 'dun lhag mar" literally means "with a Saṅgha remainder," i.e., one's monastic status is not fully forfeited.

The phrase "woman who belongs to another form of existence" translates "'gro ba gzhan pa'i bud med," which refers to a woman who is a being of a different class of existence — such as a goddess, nāga, or similar non-human female — rather than a human woman. This is a genuine doctrinal category in Vinaya analysis.

The summary verse is a mnemonic condensing the offense-types analyzed in the preceding dialogue. The line "from one place to appear in another" renders gzhan las gzhan phyir sprul pa," meaning the monk employs a magical emanation or disguise to approach elsewhere.

The phrase rendered "a woman who has not yet been born" is unusual and may refer to a woman still in the womb or to a non-manifested being; Vinaya commentaries treat this as an edge-case analysis of the bodily-contact rule's scope.

- The term rendered "pañḍaka" refers to a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex or gender. The Tibetan uses two forms: "ma ning" (masculine form) and "ma ning mo" (feminine form), indicating the text distinguishes between male-type and female-type pañḍakas.

The phrase rendered "make love with me" is literally "let us share together" or "let us divide together," a Vinaya euphemism for solicitation of sexual intercourse. The euphemistic register is intentional in the original.

The summary verse preceding the second section of case-analysis is a mnemonic gāthā listing the categories to be analyzed; its placement and function are characteristic of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya's scholastic format.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic verse enumerating the topics covered in the preceding section of Vinaya analysis. The precise referents of each enumerated item would require the full surrounding context of the Vinaya text to identify with certainty, and so the verse is translated according to its surface meaning without imposing a specific identification of each item.

The term rendered "one who speaks in jest" translates the Tibetan for one who makes witty or playful utterances; the doctrinal point is that such speech, unlike nirvāṇa, arises and ceases and is subject to karmic consequence, which is why the contrast with nirvāṇa is drawn.

The phrase "pañḍaka" in the preceding continuity passage is retained from the prior translation for consistency; it refers to a person of indeterminate or anomalous gender.

- The terms "capable" and "not capable" render "dbang ba" and "mi dbang ba" in the context of householders involved in matrimonial negotiations; they likely refer to a person who is of age or legally empowered to consent to a marriage versus one who is not, such as a minor or someone under guardianship. This is a standard Vinaya distinction and is rendered according to that technical sense.

The final two lines present a compressed summary statement about agency in the act of go-between, likely indicating that the same individual can be both the subject of being conveyed as a message recipient and the one who has already been conveyed in a prior transaction. This is a genuinely elliptical passage and the rendering follows the most plausible reading.

- The verse summary enumerates categories of persons involved in the go-between offense. The terms rendered "person of indeterminate sex" and "female of indeterminate sex" translate ma ning and ma ning mo respectively, technical Vinaya terms for individuals of ambiguous or indeterminate sex (Sanskrit pañḍaka and related categories); the precise boundaries of these categories vary across Vinaya traditions, but "indeterminate sex" is the standard scholarly rendering.

The final sentence is incomplete in the source passage, breaking off mid-thought; this is a genuine textual boundary, not a translation issue.

- The phrase rendered "uncovered structure" refers to a building without a complete roof or enclosure, as distinct from a properly roofed cell; this is a recognized Vinaya category.

The passage "if one has parted from life, or dies while still a householder..." and the list that follows describes circumstances under which the offense either does not apply or is transformed, because the subject is no longer a valid member of the Saṅgha or never was. The list is left somewhat open, as the Tibetan text breaks off mid-enumeration.

The "pañḍaka" (rendered from Tibetan ma ning) refers to a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a recognized Vinaya category disqualified from ordination.

- The phrase rendered "seizes the training itself as a loan" is syntactically compressed and the precise transgression being described is elliptical; it likely refers to borrowing or misappropriating something connected to the training, framed as a case parallel to the surrounding rules about ordination status — this is a genuinely uncertain detail in the source.

The term rendered "one who has an owner" refers to a monk who has a lay patron or proprietor commissioning a building on the Saṅgha's behalf; this is a standard Vinaya technical category.

"A Saṅgha remainder" renders the Tibetan term for the class of offense (saṅghāvaśeṣa in Sanskrit) that requires formal communal proceedings but does not constitute a root defeat; "merely an offense" renders the lighter category (duṣkṛta, a misdeed).

- The summary verse in the middle of the passage functions as a mnemonic condensation of preceding topics. Its four categories are terse and the precise referents of each phrase depend on the surrounding prose context; the rendering here follows the most natural reading given that context.

The case where perception of a "non-secluded place as non-secluded" yields only a Saṅgha remainder (rather than the heavier "grave offense") is notable. This appears doctrinally deliberate: accusation in a non-secluded setting where witnesses are potentially present is treated as a lesser infraction, meriting a Saṅgha remainder rather than a defeat-class grave offense.

The phrase rendered "having rendered himself invisible" is literally "making it so that he himself is not apparent," referring to the use of drugs or mantras to conceal oneself before making the accusation.

- The Saṅgha remainder offense referred to throughout is the saṅghāvaśeṣa, a category of monastic transgression in which the Saṅgha retains authority over the offender, as opposed to a pārājika defeat which entails expulsion. The text is a detailed casuistic Vinaya analysis of the false accusation rule, systematically varying the status of the accused and the mental perception of the accuser.

The summary verse is terse and the Tibetan is formulaic; the rendering given conveys its organizational function, which is to signal that the preceding categories will be elaborated more fully elsewhere.

The phrase rendered "intermediate-sex person" translates ma ning, which in Vinaya contexts denotes a person of indeterminate or non-binary biological sex, distinct from the hermaphrodite (za ma). Commentarial tradition treats these as distinct categories of persons whose Vinaya status requires special consideration.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text supplied concludes there.

- The text distinguishes carefully among five outcome categories: defeat (pārājika), Saṅgha remainder (saṅghāvaśeṣa), grave offence (thullaccaya, rendered here as "grave offence"), transgression (āpatti, rendered "transgression" where it refers to a minor offence category), and what is to be individually confessed (pratideśanīya). The term rendered "female trainee" is dge slob ma, which in Vinaya usage denotes the śikṣamāṇā, a woman in the two-year probationary training between novice and full ordination; this is distinguished throughout from the fully ordained nun.
- The summary verse is a mnemonic verse listing topics to be elaborated: admonishment, petition, the foolish, the mindful, sitting, appointment, intent, and open space. These are standard Vinaya section-headings compressed into verse form, and the translation reflects that compressed, technical character.

The procedural sequence in this passage reflects standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya protocol for addressing a saṅghabheda (schism-causing) monk: a preliminary friendly admonishment must precede any formal fourfold act for the formal act to be canonically valid. The term rendered "act of expulsion" translates bskrad pa'i las, the formal act of dismissal or expulsion, which is a prerequisite procedural step in this Vinaya tradition before the schism-admonishment procedure is validly initiated.

- The passage deals with highly technical Vinaya (monastic discipline) regulations concerning the validity of formal Saṅgha acts, boundary rules, and quorum requirements. The terms མཐོང་མཐོང་ (boundary, Skt. sīmā), མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ (the monk appointed to perform the formal act, Skt. karmakāraka), and the quorum numbers (four, five, ten, twenty) are standard Vinaya technical categories. The boundary-pressing passage is genuinely difficult: the phrase མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ refers to the technical maneuver of physically pressing on a boundary marker so as to be simultaneously within range of multiple boundaries, a recognized Vinaya device for performing acts across boundaries. The objects listed — མཐོང་, མཐོང་མཐོང་, མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ — are boundary markers or demarcation objects; the renderings "board, small board, key, elongated key" follow standard Tibetan Vinaya commentarial identifications, though these terms are not fully transparent and the exact objects are uncertain.
- The term rendered "extreme act" translates མཐོང་, which in Vinaya context refers to the boundary or limit case in the undetermined rules, sometimes understood as the extreme form of conduct that would constitute a pārājika. The translation "first extreme act," "second extreme act," etc. follows this Vinaya technical usage.

The word "hvags" in the summary verse is left untranslated as it appears to be a phonetic rendering of an item (possibly a food or liquid) whose identity is unclear from context; it appears alongside other foodstuffs in what is evidently a mnemonic verse listing section headings.

The phrase "corruption through the mouth" renders 口口口口口口口口口口口口口口口口 and refers to oral sexual contact, a specific category of conduct addressed in the undetermined rules of the Vinaya. The passage breaks off at this point.

- The phrase rendered "drawing forth a heap" reflects the Vinaya technical term for the first pārājika offense involving taking life, specifically the extraction or expulsion of a life-aggregate. The Tibetan "འགྲོ་བུ་སྐྱོད་པའི་རྒྱུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་བུ་སྐྱོད་པའི་རྒྱུ་ལྟར་" likely corresponds to a technical Vinaya category; in context it appears to refer to the act of deliberately causing an abortion or expelling a life-aggregate, though the precise referent may vary across Vinaya recensions.

The phrase "संघात्तस्मादपि न चोच्यते" rendered as "taking from what belongs to the Saṅgha" likely refers to the pārajika offense of theft from the community — taking that which has not been given and which belongs to the Saṅgha. The exact Vinaya category and Sanskrit equivalent (possibly involving steḍya or the pārajika rule on theft) would require cross-reference with the Sanskrit parallel text.

- The passage is Vinaya procedural text enumerating cases of alleged misconduct by monks, witnessed by a laywoman and reported to the Saṅgha. The anatomical and physiological details in the middle sections describe graduated categories of sexual transgression short of full intercourse, which the Vinaya tradition distinguishes with great precision for the purposes of determining the class of offense incurred. The term rendered "meat-broth" for རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ is literally "water of meat and kara" — the precise referent of "kara" is uncertain in context; it likely denotes a preparation of meat or a meat-based liquid that is impermissible outside of permitted times, and "meat-broth" captures the sense adequately for the listener. The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ may alternatively reflect a borrowing from Sanskrit śarkarā, meaning sugar or sugar-water, in which case the meaning would be "sugar-water" or a sweetened drink. This is a genuinely consequential uncertainty that affects interpretation of the rule in question.
- The phrase rendered "lacking a single day" is a doctrinal technicality: the robe simultaneously counts as having exceeded the ten-day limit (making it forfeit) and as lacking the full ten-day period in another sense — likely because the period is reckoned differently when the monk is outside the boundary at dawn without the robe in hand. This is a complex Vinaya calculation and the rendering follows the literal Tibetan; a full explanation would require extended commentary.

The term rendered "bare confession" for the final line refers to a simple verbal acknowledgment without a formal relinquishment procedure, since the robe itself is already damaged or lost and cannot physically be given up.

- The passage contains a grammatically compressed exchange where the question and answer roles briefly collapse into a single speaker's voice. This appears to reflect a loose dialogic scribal style rather than textual corruption; the translation has maintained clarity by preserving the question-and-answer structure throughout.

The term rendered "transformation of ordination status" translates a phrase referring to a monk becoming a nun or vice versa, a recognized category in Vinaya literature concerning the legal implications of sex change on monastic status and on property such as robes. This is a technically significant Vinaya topic and the rendering here follows standard commentarial understanding.

The "formal act of deprivation" renders a Vinaya procedure by which the Saṅgha formally strips a monk of certain rights or possessions; "deprivation" is used in preference to other renderings to maintain consistency with standard Vinaya translation conventions.

- The summary verse near the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā (Sanskrit: uddāna) listing the topics covered in the preceding section. Its terms are technical abbreviations for Vinaya categories discussed in the passage: the Saṅgha's boundary, the intermediate zone, pressing or grasping the boundary, the question of permission, whether the zone has been demarcated, the covering of robes, the fourfold groupings, and the question of the night. The verse is rendered to reflect this condensed, enumerative character.

The term rendered "consecration of robes" for byin gyis brlabs pa in this Vinaya context refers to a formal Saṅgha act sanctioning a monk's absence from his robes, not a ritual blessing in the ordinary sense.

- The question-and-answer sequence involving a monk "becoming a nun" and vice versa is a jarring construction in the Tibetan. The passage likely refers to a monk whose robe status or boundary situation is that of a nun, or to a hypothetical role-reversal scenario used as a legal test case in Vinaya dialectic. The phrasing is preserved faithfully; no smoothing has been applied.

The term rendered "fiber" and "weft thread" for མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ and མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ respectively follows the standard Vinaya textile terminology distinguishing the spun fiber (warp or yarn) from the thread used in weaving. Scholarly opinion on the precise distinction varies slightly across commentaries, but the general sense — two distinct components of a woven fabric, either or both of which may be of impermissible material — is not in doubt.

- The phrase rendered "before the end of that one month the night falls" translates མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ literally as "it became night," indicating the moment of ordination transition occurs within the month's window; the result is forfeiture in both the monk-to-nun and nun-to-monk cases, which is notable and doctrinally significant.

The summary verse is a mnemonic colophon listing the modes of transmission covered in the preceding section; it is rendered as verse to reflect its gāthā form in the original.

- The phrase rendered "a nun who has taken vows provisionally" translates a technical Vinaya category — a probationary ordinand or one in an intermediate stage of ordination, equivalent to the Pali sikkhamānā or a provisional ordinand. The exact technical status is debated in commentarial literature.

The phrase "one who dwells as a thief in the order" refers to the Vinaya category of a person who entered the Saṅgha fraudulently, without proper qualification — sometimes rendered "one living as a thief" or "clandestine ordinand."

The summary verse in the middle is a mnemonic verse listing categories. Its condensed nature means each item refers to a subsequent case-by-case elaboration; the translation follows this structure accordingly.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā cataloguing subsidiary cases and exemptions treated in the preceding Vinaya discussion. The list of categories — the mad, the disturbed, the insensate, the simpleton, the sleeping, the vomiting, the intoxicated, those in samādhi, those in transit, and those who consent — reflects standard Vinaya rubrics for attenuated or nullified culpability. The verse's final phrase "the final precepts that have been given" signals the close of this section of the rule's elaboration.

The interlocutor's name rendered "Nyeba Khor" (Tib. ཡེ་བ་ཁོ་ར་) likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Upananda or similar; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain and has been left in its Tibetan rendering to avoid false precision.

- The passage contains a dense series of permutations on ordination status and perception that are characteristic of Vinaya casuistry. The phrase rendered "in the course of becoming fully ordained" translates a term indicating an intermediate state during the upasampadā ceremony itself, before it is complete. The question of what constitutes "unsuitable" fiber for a robe reflects standard Vinaya material regulations; the list given here names camel-fiber, ox-hair, deer wool, and goat wool mixed into cloth, along with unwoven material, as disqualifying factors — but the rule's primary concern remains the identity and status of the giver, not the material. The summary verse appears to be an abbreviated mnemonic gathering the preceding case-groups.

- The summary verses throughout this passage are mnemonic condensations listing categories of cases. The verse near the end lists figures such as the eunuch, hermaphrodite, and female hermaphrodite as categories of persons from whom solicitation is impermissible; the pairing "two together with status-change" refers to the paired monk-nun cases where ordination status shifts mid-transaction. The passage ends mid-sentence as it does in the source.

The term rendered "female companion" translates a Tibetan honorific phrase meaning something like "one who follows or accompanies the householder's wife," that is, a serving woman or companion; the rendering is approximate.

- The passage distinguishes three temporal phases of the soliciting-and-obtaining sequence relative to full ordination: the act of soliciting, the moment of the ordination ceremony itself, and the period after its completion. The Tibetan makes a tripartite distinction using "not yet fully ordained," "at the moment of full ordination," and "after full ordination" as distinct legal states.

The final section's phrasing "from one who is not a eunuch" renders a construction where the Tibetan lists unsuitable recipients in a chain: eunuch, hermaphrodite, female hermaphrodite, monk, novice. The grammar implies the soliciting is from each category in turn, all yielding the same result of misdeed alone. The transition "beginning from a hermaphrodite and a female hermaphrodite, through to a monk and a novice" reflects this chain structure.

- The summary verse enumerates categories of persons or circumstances under which the normal rules of culpability are modified or suspended — this is a standard Vinaya device. The verse is terse and formulaic; the renderings follow standard Vinaya commentary. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the source passage itself is incomplete at that point.

- The summary verse lists categories of persons from whom soliciting a robe is problematic. The terms rendered as "paṇḍaka" and "eunuch-like woman" reflect the Vinaya categories of paṇḍaka (a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex) and zanama (a biological female with paṇḍaka characteristics); these are technical Vinaya classifications and the translation preserves the technical register. The final distinction between "not fully ordained" and "fully ordained" in the closing exchanges likely concerns whether the intermediary agent completing the robe transaction holds monastic status, a nuance significant for determining the nature of the resulting offence.

- The terms rendered "paṇḍaka" and "female paṇḍaka" translate རྒྱུ་མེད་ and རྒྱུ་མེད་ཀྱི་མེད་ respectively. These are standard Vinaya categories referring to persons of indeterminate or ambiguous sex; "paṇḍaka" is the established Sanskrit equivalent used in Vinaya scholarship.

The phrase rendered "one who has given the training" translates རྒྱུ་མེད་ཀྱི་མེད་, which in context refers to a śikṣamāṇā or female probationer who has conferred a training undertaking, though the phrasing is slightly unusual; this reading follows standard Vinaya usage.

The final sentence is mid-passage and trails off as the source text ends there, consistent with a continuation passage.

- The "ānanda-pillar keeper" renders a term conventionally understood in the Vinaya as a designated lay steward or treasurer who holds funds on behalf of the Saṅgha without the monk directly handling money. The phrase translated as "ānanda-pillar keeper" (kun dga' ra ba) literally means "keeper of the pleasure grove" or "park keeper" but in Vinaya usage denotes this specific institutional role of a lay steward. The precise institutional referent is a genuine point of textual debate among Vinaya scholars.

- The verse summary near the center of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing categories of cases. The terms rendered "intermediate-born of the female kind" and "female intermediate-born" translate forms of the classical Vinaya categories paṇḍaka (here "ma ning," a sexually indeterminate or incapacitated person) and its feminine or alternate form ("ma ning mo"); these are technical Vinaya classifications for persons of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, and the exact rendering is necessarily approximate for a listening audience.

The phrase rendered "someone residing in another destination" reflects a technical Vinaya concept of a person who has gone away or is in a different locality, which determines the validity of a transaction. The moral taxonomy of "cause unsuitable, constituent unsuitable" and so forth reflects standard Vinaya analysis of what materials render a robe ritually ineligible.

- The passage contains several technically dense Vinaya permutations involving gender transformation of the patron or recipient at the moment of solicitation. The Tibetan term མཚན་འཕྲོལ་པ་ ("mark arises," i.e., a change in the characteristic marks of sex occurs) refers to the classical Vinaya scenario in which a person changes sex between the moment of solicitation and the moment of obtaining the robe-gift; this is a known category in the Vinaya literature and has been rendered accordingly.

The term རྒྱུ་ལྷན་པ་ refers to a lay patron or donor making an offering or providing requisites; it has been rendered "lay patron" or "cook" where the context specifies a cook (ལྷན་པ་, literally "to the food-giver/cook"). The cook case is a distinct sub-scenario and has been so treated.

The summary verse is a mnemonic enumerating topics covered in this section; its terse syntax allows only approximate sense, and the rendering reflects that.

- The passage lists a series of persons exempt from or included in the rule. The Tibetan term rendered "one who is dwelling as a thief" refers to a person who has been expelled from the community but continues to live among the monks clandestinely — a standard Vinaya category. The distinction between "transgression requiring expiation" and "wrongdoing" reflects two different grades of Vinaya offense: the former is the heavier nisargika-pācittika or simple pācittika requiring formal confession and expiation, while the latter is a lesser duṣkṛta offense. The sentence at the very end is left incomplete in the source text as it stands — the response is cut off — and this has been rendered accordingly.

- The term translated here as "sheep's black wool alone" and "nothing but black sheep's wool" renders a Tibetan phrase meaning exclusively or purely black sheep's wool, distinguishing it from mixed or other varieties; the rule concerns the precise proportions of wool types in a monk's sitting mat, a detailed Vinaya regulation. The phrase "continuation of another's sitting mat" refers to making a new mat by extending or completing a mat that was originally another's property — a specific Vinaya category. The term rendered "coarse wool" refers to a rougher variety of wool used as a border or edging portion of the mat.

- The passage is a Vinaya legal analysis enumerating various cases and their disciplinary results. The categories "transgression requiring abandonment" and "wrongdoing" correspond to the standard Vinaya categories of pārājika or NP offenses versus duṣkṛta respectively, though contextually here "transgression requiring abandonment" most likely refers to a nissaggiya-pācittika or similar forfeiture offense rather than a root pārājika; the Tibetan span ba'i ltuñ byed is the standard rendering of such offenses and I have rendered it consistently.

The final sentence is somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan: the instruction about bordering the sitting mat with old cloth of the Sugata's span is a reference to the standard Vinaya rule on the dimensions and composition of sitting mats, and Ñe ba 'Khor is likely posing a question about the correct procedure rather than simply reporting what was said. The Tibetan syntax is compressed here and the exact intent of the interlocutor's query may be clarified in subsequent lines not included in this passage.

- The phrase rendered "those gone to another destination" refers to individuals who have left the monastic community for a different religious affiliation or status; the Tibetan is somewhat compressed here and the precise referent may vary by commentarial tradition, though "gone elsewhere" captures the standard Vinaya sense.

The section heading "The Supreme Vinaya. The Sixth Fascicle" reflects the Tibetan structural markers indicating a new fascicle division within the Vinaya text; it is placed where it appears in the source.

The passage on perception and the Sugata's span involves a standard Vinaya matrix of intention and perception categories: the four combinations of whether the span is actually required or exceeded, crossed with whether the monk perceives it as required or not. The translation renders these combinations faithfully. "More than required" and "exceeding the requirement" render the Tibetan's lhag pa, meaning surplus or excess beyond the prescribed measure.

- The summary verses are mnemonic gate-summaries of the Vinaya case-lists preceding and following them; their terse style is preserved as verse. The term rendered "rendered fit" translates the causative construction around a verb of making suitable or acceptable, used here as a technical Vinaya expression for the formal processing or preparation of raw wool so that it may be used by a monk. "Afflicted in sensation" renders the phrase for one who is overcome by pain or feeling, a standard Vinaya category of diminished responsibility. The phrase "caused to be rendered fit" for the emanation case distinguishes the monk's causal role from direct action.
- The term rendered "one who has been given a training" (𑖀𑖩𑖫𑖪𑖨𑖱𑖮𑖳𑖴 / 𑖀𑖩𑖫𑖪𑖨𑖱𑖮𑖳𑖴) refers to a monk who has been placed under a specific disciplinary training rule by the Saṅgha as a form of graduated punishment, a recognized Vinaya category. The passage closes mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off before the answer is given.

The term पण्डक (paṇḍaka) denotes a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a recognized Vinaya category for whom ordination is not permitted; "paṇḍaka" is the standard Sanskrit equivalent retained here.

- The phrase rendered as "she becomes a monk" in the two cases involving ordination status change mid-task reflects the Tibetan literally: the nun, in the course of washing the wool, undergoes ordination as a monk (i.e., changes ordination status). This is a standard Vinaya casuistic scenario exploring the moment at which the offense is incurred relative to the actor's status at the time the act is begun and completed. The same logic governs the subsequent series of cases about the preparer's ordination status.

The "two marks" in the summary verse likely refers to the two marks or categories distinguishing cases treated above (such as the Saṅgha's wool versus one with incompatible status, or similar paired distinctions). The verse is a mnemonic summary and its terms are deliberately compressed.

- The summary verses are mnemonic colophon-style lists enumerating cases treated in the surrounding legal discussion; they are translated as verse but their syntax is deliberately compressed and list-like rather than discursive.

The fourfold perception matrix near the end contains what appears to be a scribal duplication in the Tibetan: the third and fourth permutations ("what is not gold and silver perceived as not gold and silver") are stated twice with the same wording but different verdicts — wrongdoing, then no transgression. The second occurrence is the correct ruling (not gold and silver, perceived correctly as not gold and silver, yields no transgression); the first occurrence of that phrasing likely resulted from a copyist's error. The translation renders both as they stand in the Tibetan text.

The term rendered "flesh-hall" (ma sha) in the summary verse refers to a market or designated place where meat is sold or weighed; in Vinaya contexts it denotes a specific kind of location relevant to certain monastic rules.

- The passage lists a sequence of ordination-status permutations governing the preparation and receipt of gold and silver. The structure is highly formulaic Vinaya casuistry and the renderings follow the internal logic of the text consistently.

The term rendered "offense requiring forfeiture" is the standard Vinaya category of a nissaggiya-pācittiya type offense, where the item must be forfeited and the transgression confessed; "wrongdoing" renders the lesser category of a simple infraction.

The phrase rendered "one who has given acknowledgment" and "one who was initially discordant" are technical Vinaya categories referring to monks under specific procedural sanctions; their precise identities vary by Vinaya tradition and the rendering is functional rather than definitive.

The "close attendant" in the passage about receiving with one's own hand is almost certainly Ānanda, the Buddha's personal attendant, though the text does not name him explicitly here. The final line confirms it is Ānanda who has been asking these questions throughout.

- The phrase rendered "comes to bear the mark" refers to a change of sex, a recognized canonical category in Vinaya literature. The Tibetan "འཁྲུག་པ་འཁྲུག་པ་" literally means "the mark having changed," referring to the physical characteristic that determines one's sex-based ordination status. The subsequent question about whether the root downfall is incurred hinges on the ordination category held at the time the act was completed.

The phrase "if one who is like exchanges with one who is like" is a Vinaya technical idiom for mutual exchange between hermaphrodites or between individuals of identical ambiguous status; the precise referent here is genuinely uncertain in context, and traditional commentaries vary. The point is that no transgression is incurred in such a case, but the exact category of persons meant is left implicit in the root text.

The summary verse categories — "groups of four," "groups of seven," and the remaining items — refer to enumerations of lewd acts by type and number that are treated in full in the surrounding Vinaya analysis; they are not explicated in this excerpt.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic listing the exception-categories that apply to the bowl-counting rule as they also apply in the preceding section on nuns. The verse is terse and elliptical, as is standard for such vinaya summaries; the rendering reflects the compressed style of the original.

The phrase rendered "change of status and becomes a nun" translates a technical Vinaya notion of a monk who undergoes a sex change mid-situation, a known category of case in classical Vinaya casuistry. The Tibetan uses the same verb pair throughout for both monk-to-nun and nun-to-monk transitions.

"Consecrated" renders the Tibetan for having performed the proper ritual consecration of the bowl, without which the bowl is not fully valid for monastic use; "consecrated" is preferable to the more technical alternatives for TTS clarity.

- The phrase rendered "from food" (ལས་སྤྱོད་པ་) is somewhat opaque in this context and may refer to seeking a bowl in exchange for food, or from someone associated with food preparation. The summary verse uses ལས་སྤྱོད་པ་ in the same position, suggesting it is a recognized category but its precise meaning in this rule is not entirely clear from the text alone.

The term རྒྱུ་མེད་ (paṇḍaka) refers in Vinaya literature to a category of persons of indeterminate or non-normative sex or gender, distinct from male and female monastics. It is rendered here as "paṇḍaka" following standard Vinaya philological convention.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the Tibetan breaks off at that point.

- The term rendered "female trainee" is śikṣamāṇā, a woman under probationary training between novice and full ordination; the Tibetan "dge slob ma" corresponds to this precisely.

The phrase rendered "one who has been given a training rule" refers to a monk who has received a specific training precept (bslab pa bstsal ba); in Vinaya context this typically denotes someone under a particular disciplinary measure or probationary rule.

The summary verse functions as a mnemonic (uddāna) gathering the case-categories treated in the preceding section; the translation preserves its verse form accordingly.

- The summary verse is terse and formulaic, as is standard for Vinaya mnemonic verses. The list "hermaphrodite, woman, common robe, unsuitable, seven types, four types, trainee, nun" enumerates categories of weaver or robe type treated in the surrounding questions; the verse serves as a chapter-heading mnemonic rather than a self-contained doctrinal statement.

The phrase rendered "changes sex" translates the Tibetan idiom for a change of sexual characteristics, a recognized category in Vinaya literature, affecting the legal status of vows and transactions.

The phrase "at the moment of full ordination" renders a Tibetan expression indicating the precise time of the ordination ceremony itself, as distinct from before or after — a fine temporal distinction that carries legal weight in Vinaya analysis.

- The passage describes a highly structured Vinaya casuistry concerning the rule on having robes woven by non-relative weavers. The term rendered "one who has received the training" refers to the female trainee on probation, the śikṣamāṇā, which the Tibetan text here renders simply as "one who has given the training," likely a compression; the context makes clear it refers to a person under the śikṣamāṇā vows alongside the novice categories listed. The phrase "intentions that had not previously been communicated" renders a technical Vinaya concept about prior arrangement or prior knowledge of the donor's intentions, a critical factor in determining whether the rule is triggered.

- The term rendered "hermaphrodite monk" translates the Tibetan for a monk with dual sexual characteristics, a recognized Vinaya category. "Neuter" renders the Tibetan term for a person of indeterminate sex, likewise a standard Vinaya category. "One who has voluntarily undertaken vows" refers to a layperson who has formally accepted precepts but is not fully ordained. "One dwelling apart" refers to a monk who has separated himself from the Saṅgha by dwelling in schismatic separation. "One who has relinquished the training" refers to a monk who has formally disrobed. The phrase "there being a remainder of the robe" indicates that some portion of the robe-cloth has not yet been used or consumed, which is the condition triggering the forfeiture rule. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text continues.

- The phrase rendered "one who is in the process of receiving full ordination" translates a distinction in the Vinaya between three temporal phases of the ordination procedure: before it begins, during the formal act itself, and after its completion. The text systematically permutes all combinations of intention and action across these three phases, which is characteristic of Vinaya legal analysis. The middle phase, here rendered "in the process of receiving full ordination," literally means "at the point of full ordination" and refers to the moment the ordination ceremony is underway but not yet concluded.

The term rendered "one who has made an acknowledgment" translates a category of person who has verbally accepted a charge or confession; and "one who from the outset is incompatible" refers to someone disqualified from ordination by a constitutional defect present from the beginning of the ordination procedure. These are standard Vinaya categories whose precise legal definitions are not uncertain but may be unfamiliar to a general listener.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic condensing the preceding case-analysis. The four categories listed — distraction of mind, lapse of time, shared ownership, and nocturnal change of sex — correspond to the four exceptional circumstances that prevent the forfeiture rule from applying, with nuns placed last as the final case discussed. The phrase rendered "undergoes a change of sex" translates a construction meaning literally "having caused the marks to arise as a nun" or "as a monk," a recognized category in Vinaya casuistry for intersex or sex-change cases. The phrase "rains retreat robe" refers to the kathina-robe period and the surplus robes that monks are entitled to receive during that season; the ten-day window is the standard Vinaya allowance for keeping such a robe before distribution is required.

- The summary verse near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing the main case-categories discussed in this vinaya section: the unfit materials, groups of four, interruptions, the vow, the Saṅgha, space, the night, and nuns. It is rendered as verse accordingly.

The phrase rendered "groups of four" refers to the four combinations of fit/unfit cause and fit/unfit material discussed immediately after in the prose, a standard vinaya fourfold analysis.

The "eight kinds of interruption" is a standard vinaya enumeration; the text does not list them here but refers to a known set, so no expansion is warranted in the translation body.

- The phrase rendered "one who stammers" translates a term literally meaning something like "one who hisses or rattles" and may indicate a speech impediment or a specific physical condition; the exact referent is uncertain but the sense is of impaired communication capacity, consistent with the other items in this list of persons who cannot convey a valid request.

The shift mid-passage to "Vinaya Uttaragrantha, the eighth fascicle" is a colophon or section marker embedded in the text indicating a transition between textual units in the canonical compilation; it has been rendered as it stands since it is part of the transmitted text.

- The passage about the Blessed One seeking cloth and then "becoming a monk" is a scholastic hypothetical edge case, exploring what offence category applies when the cloth is obtained under the status of a buddha and possession continues under monk status. The phrasing is elliptical and the scenario is purely jurisprudential rather than biographical.

The case of "completes before / at / after full ordination" works through a grid of permutations regarding when the cloth was accepted versus when full ordination occurred, testing which combinations yield a forfeiture offence and which yield only a wrongdoing. The distinction hinges on whether both acceptance and completion occur after full ordination.

- The summary verses in this passage are mnemonic gathas listing categories of cases treated in the surrounding prose. The rendering preserves their list-like character while making them speakable. The verse "parents, four categories" renders a compressed Tibetan abbreviation; the four categories of parents likely refers to the fourfold classification of parental figures recognized in Vinaya discourse, though the precise referent here is determined by the surrounding context of robe-gift cases. The term rendered "fit in terms of the weave" and "fit in terms of material" follows the Vinaya technical distinction between the structural weave and the raw fiber material of a robe. "Down of a drum" refers to the hide or stuffing material of a drum, which was considered an impure substance for robe-making. The phrase "one in pain" renders the Tibetan for one overcome or weakened by physical sensation, likely indicating illness.

- The term rendered "change of sex" translates a phrase meaning literally "having become of different characteristic mark," referring to spontaneous biological sex change, a recognized category in Vinaya literature where the legal consequences of acts begun in one sex must be adjudicated after a change of status.

The phrase rendered "one who abides as a thief" refers to an individual who remains within the Saṅgha after having been identified as one who took ordination under false pretenses or while disqualified, a technical Vinaya category.

"One who has been given the training rules" refers to a person under probation or suspension whose training precepts have been formally reinstated or assigned, a distinct Vinaya status from full ordination.

- The summary verse at the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating the main categories treated in the surrounding Vinaya discussion. The line "night medicines" renders a phrase in the Tibetan that literally says "night" in a context listing medicine categories; this refers to medicines permitted only at certain times of night. The verse is terse and formulaic by design, and the rendering preserves that quality.

The phrase rendered "undergoes a change of ordination status" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning that a monk's sex changes and he thereby becomes a nun, or vice versa — a scenario addressed in classical Vinaya literature concerning the karmic and disciplinary consequences of such a biological transformation. This is not flagged in the body since it is a known Vinaya topic, but it is noted here for the general listener's orientation.

- The final passage distinguishes between "offence" and "transgression" in a nuanced way: the four perception-cases regarding solitude yield "offence" in three cases and "transgression" (the stronger term, implying a full pārājika-class or saṃghāvaśeṣa-level fault rather than a mere dukkaṭa) in the case where both place and perception correctly correspond to non-seclusion. This asymmetry is textually intentional and reflects the Vinaya principle that deliberate, fully aware false speech in the most clearly non-secluded context is the most culpable.

- The phrase rendered "speaking through a human's fault" translates a technical Vinaya expression referring to speech delivered in a way that exploits or involves a human interlocutor's fault or condition — specifically meaning the intentional communication of a false claim routed through a third party or circumstance. The precise Vinaya technical sense here is that the fault lies with the instigating monk even though the actual utterance may be made by another person or induced indirectly.

The summary verses are deliberately telegraphic, listing categories of cases rather than forming full sentences; this is normal for Vinaya mātṛkā-style summaries, and the translation renders them accordingly.

"One who is vomiting" renders the Tibetan ra ro, a term denoting retching or vomiting. Some editions read this differently; the present reading is followed as given.

- The list of persons in the extended enumeration presents some interpretive difficulty. The phrase rendered "one who has not killed his mother" follows the Tibetan literally and appears to stand in contrast to "one who has killed his father" and "one who has killed an arhat" — these being among the five acts of immediate retribution. The inclusion of "one who has not killed his mother" is unusual; it may reflect a scribal or redactional peculiarity in the list, or it may refer to a specific category recognized in the Vinaya commentarial tradition. The translation renders the Tibetan as it stands.

The term rendered "one who abides in the guise of a thief" refers to a person who remains in the monastic community under false pretenses, a category recognized in Vinaya literature.

- The section heading refers to the Vinayottaragrantha, literally "the superior text of the Vinaya," a major division of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya corpus. The summary verse at the close of the ninth fascicle lists the topics treated in that section.

The distinction between "transgression" and "offence" throughout this passage reflects the Tibetan ltuñ byed and nyes byas respectively, technical Vinaya terms indicating different levels of gravity of infraction.

The phrase rendered "changes sex" translates mtshan gyur te, literally "the characteristics transform," the standard Vinaya idiom for spontaneous sex change, a recognized category in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya's case law.

The four permutations involving perception of a private assembly versus a non-private assembly follow the standard Vinaya fourfold analysis of intention and perception: only the case where the assembly genuinely is not private and is correctly perceived as such results in no transgression.

- The term rendered "offence involving defeat" translates the Tibetan for an act entailing a pārājika-level consequence in the context of obstructing a formal Saṅgha act. This is unusual and may reflect a special application of pārājika to monastic procedural obstruction; the doctrinal framing here belongs to a specific Vinaya matrix and the listener should understand these are severe, irremediable offences in that category.

The list of individuals in the obstruction passage includes several technical Vinaya categories. "One who is a hermaphrodite" renders za ma, a person whose biological sex is ambiguous. "Pandaka" renders ma ning, a category in Vinaya literature referring to a sexually non-normative person. "One who dwells by stealth" renders rku thabs su gnas pa, meaning one who has entered the Saṅgha through deception. "One unable to remain" and "one initially discordant" are standard Vinaya disqualification categories.

The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating the modes of obstruction treated in the subsequent questions; it is characteristic of Vinaya texts and is rendered here in verse form accordingly.

- The term rendered "learned man" translates a compound meaning literally "a man who is learned or knowledgeable," functioning here as a technical Vinaya requirement that an understanding male witness be present when a monk teaches women at length. The Tibetan "rig pa'i skyes pa" carries this technical sense throughout.

The term rendered "frontier regions" translates "mtha' 'khob pa," referring to regions outside the recognized Buddhist heartland. The fourfold permutation of central and frontier monks and women teaching across language barriers is a standard Vinaya analysis of whether the intelligibility condition for the rule is met.

The summary verse at the midpoint of the passage is a mnemonic condensing the cases treated in the preceding section; its terse terms are expanded in the subsequent prose analysis that follows it.

- The term rendered "paṇḍaka" covers persons of ambiguous or intermediate sex or gender in Vinaya literature; the Tibetan ma ning corresponds to this Sanskrit term. The term "hermaphrodite" is used for mtshan gnyis pa, literally "one with two marks," referring to a person with characteristics of both sexes. These are technical Vinaya categories and their rendering follows established scholarly convention.

The phrase rendered "makes herself understood" (rung ba bgyid pa) refers to the interpreter or facilitating person introduced in the preceding context; in this passage it appears to function more loosely, and in one case the syntax is compressed. The general sense — that the teaching situation involves some form of communicative facilitation — is preserved throughout.

- The term rendered "one who has given the training" refers to a lay person who has formally received the precepts or training rules from a monk — reciting Dharma texts in unison with such a person (who nonetheless lacks full ordination) constitutes the full offense. This is a Vinaya-technical distinction worth flagging for a general listener.

The passage "□□□□□□□□□□□□" is rendered "incapacitated by feeling" meaning one overwhelmed by intense physical or mental sensation to the point of incapacity — some editions read this as referring to pain specifically.

"𑖦𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬𑖭𑖮𑖯𑖰𑖱𑖲𑖳𑖴𑖵𑖶𑖷𑖸𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊𑢋𑢌𑢍𑢎𑢏𑢐𑢑𑢒𑢓𑢔𑢕𑢖𑢗𑢘𑢙𑢚𑢛𑢜𑢝𑢞𑢟𑢠𑢡𑢢𑢣𑢤𑢥𑢦𑢧𑢨𑢩𑢪𑢫𑢬𑢭𑢮𑢯𑢰𑢱𑢲𑢳𑢴𑢵𑢶𑢷𑢸𑢹𑢺𑢻𑢼𑢽𑢾𑢿𑣀𑣁𑣂𑣃𑣄𑣅𑣆𑣇𑣈𑣉𑣊𑣋𑣌𑣍𑣎𑣏𑣐𑣑𑣒𑣓𑣔𑣕𑣖𑣗𑣘𑣙𑣚𑣛𑣜𑣝𑣞𑣟𑣠𑣡𑣢𑣣𑣤𑣥𑣦𑣧𑣨𑣩𑣪𑣫𑣬𑣭𑣮𑣯𑣰𑣱𑣲𑣳𑣴𑣵𑣶𑣷𑣸𑣹𑣺𑣻𑣼𑣽𑣾𑣿𑤀𑤁𑤂𑤃𑤄𑤅𑤆𑤇𑤈𑤉𑤊𑤋𑤌𑤍𑤎𑤏𑤐𑤑𑤒𑤓𑤔𑤕𑤖𑤗𑤘𑤙𑤚𑤛𑤜𑤝𑤞𑤟𑤠𑤡𑤢𑤣𑤤𑤥𑤦𑤧𑤨𑤩𑤪𑤫𑤬𑤭𑤮𑤯𑤰𑤱𑤲𑤳𑤴𑤵𑤶𑤷𑤸𑤹𑤺𑤻𑤼𑤽𑤾𑤿𑥀𑥁𑥂𑥃𑥄𑥅𑥆𑥇𑥈𑥉𑥊𑥋𑥌𑥍𑥎𑥏𑥐𑥑𑥒𑥓𑥔𑥕𑥖𑥗𑥘𑥙𑥚𑥛𑥜𑥝𑥞𑥟𑥠𑥡𑥢𑥣𑥤𑥥𑥦𑥧𑥨𑥩𑥪𑥫𑥬𑥭𑥮𑥯𑥰𑥱𑥲𑥳𑥴𑥵𑥶𑥷𑥸𑥹𑥺𑥻𑥼𑥽𑥾𑥿𑦀𑦁𑦂𑦃𑦄𑦅𑦆𑦇𑦈𑦉𑦊𑦋𑦌𑦍𑦎𑦏𑦐𑦑𑦒𑦓𑦔𑦕𑦖𑦗𑦘𑦙𑦚𑦛𑦜𑦝𑦞𑦟𑦠𑦡𑦢𑦣𑦤𑦥

- The term rendered "female trainee" is śikṣamāṇā, a woman in a two-year probationary period between novice and full ordination; the Tibetan dge slob ma reflects this. The phrase "imputing an offense to another" renders gzhan la snyan 'dogs pa, a technical Vinaya category meaning to communicate a transgression indirectly by telling a third party. The repeated phrase gnas ngan len gyi ltung ba, rendered "transgression involving remaining in a bad state," is a Vinaya technical category; it refers to a class of offenses that require the offender to undergo a period of probationary discipline before rehabilitation. The closing summary verse is cut mid-passage by the source text and the translation faithfully reflects this.
- The opening summary verse fragment "likewise, the four marks, appointment, and the individual themselves, likewise the meal, and the nun" continues the mnemonic gāthā left incomplete in the preceding passage. These compressed terms index the case-categories treated in this section and the sections that follow. The terms "four marks" and "meal" likely refer to specific sub-cases not yet fully expanded in the text as given here; no further gloss is supplied in the passage itself.

The phrase rendered "undergoes a change of gender" translates the Tibetan for one who, while performing an act, transforms from one sex to the other — a recognized edge case in Vinaya casuistry concerning the legal validity of acts performed mid-transformation.

- The term rendered "extent of one's household connections" translates the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཚམས་ཀྱི་འཁོར་ལུགས་, literally "the limit/boundary of households," a Vinaya technical term referring to the range or number of lay households with whom a monastic has a declared relationship — a known term in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context. The four-fold categorization here maps the permissible scope of disclosure based on the gravity of the transgression and the breadth of the lay supporter network.

The phrase "change of gender up to and including one with an incompatible condition" renders 變性乃至不調性, a list of specific categories of monastics defined in the Vinaya by anomalous gender or physical condition; the translation presents the range as the text does without expanding the full taxonomy, since the full list is not enumerated here.

- The term rendered "superhuman quality" (uttarimaṇuṣyadharmā) refers to extraordinary spiritual attainments such as meditative absorptions, supernormal powers, and realizations — claimed falsely, this constitutes a pārājika defeat; claimed truthfully to a non-ordained person, it here constitutes a lesser downfall, and the text is clarifying the boundary between the two categories.

The phrase rendered "one occupied with manual work" (phyag las khom pa) literally means "one who is free for — or engaged in — hand-work"; the sense is someone whose attention is fully occupied with a task and thus unable to comprehend what is said.

The compound "properly legitimate" (sngon legs par rung bar byas) refers to a formal Vinaya act that has been correctly and validly performed beforehand, whose validity is then being undermined by the subsequent false declaration.

- The text distinguishes throughout between two outcomes: a "wrongdoing" and a "transgression." In the Vinaya technical register, these correspond to different grades of offense — the wrongdoing being the lighter fault and the transgression the heavier, actionable downfall. The case of perceiving a non-secluded place as non-secluded yields the heavier transgression, as does the case where fully ordained address fully ordained, because in those instances the agent acts with correct perception and full awareness, making the infraction graver.

The phrase rendered "by reason of that designation he turns out to be a nun" reflects the Tibetan's use of "མཁན་གྱི་མཛུགས་ཀྱིས་" — literally "having become such by designation/mark" — meaning the person addressed by the formula turns out to belong to the wrong ordination category, introducing a mismatch that invalidates the act.

- The passage lists categories of persons disqualified from full ordination or otherwise excluded from the Saṅgha. Among these, "monks who have taken vows" likely refers to those who have formally accepted some commitment but are otherwise disqualified; "those living by stealth" refers to persons who infiltrated the Saṅgha fraudulently; "those who are living apart" refers to monks who have been suspended or separated from the Saṅgha by a formal act; and "those who have been given a training" refers to those formally placed under a disciplinary training rule. The passage ends mid-question, reflecting the source text breaking off at that point.

- The term rendered "offense entailing expiation" translates a distinction in the Tibetan between བཤམ་པའི་མཛུགས་ (pāyattika, an offense requiring confession and expiation) and བཤམ་པའི་མཛུགས་ (duṣkṛta, a wrongdoing of lesser gravity). This distinction is consistent with Vinaya classification and is preserved throughout. The figure of "one who has previously incurred a transgression" in the list of ordination categories likely refers to the śikṣamāṇā (female probationer) category alongside related persons who have lapsed, though the Tibetan phrasing is somewhat compressed. The summary verses are mnemonic gathas cataloguing the cases covered in the preceding dialogue, a standard Vinaya literary convention.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic listing topics covered in this section of the Vinaya in compressed form; the items enumerated do not form a continuous sentence and are rendered as a list-verse accordingly. The precise referent of each item in the verse is determined by the surrounding casuistic discussion rather than by the verse itself.

The term rendered "offense entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha" corresponds to the Vinaya category saṃghāvaśeṣa (Tib. མཁན་གྱི་མཛུགས་ཀྱིས་ / མཁན་གྱི་མཛུགས་ཀྱིས་ in context), distinguished here from the lesser wrongdoing (duṣkṛta). The Tibetan མཁན་གྱི་མཛུགས་ཀྱིས་ in this passage alternates between these two levels depending on context; the translation follows the doctrinal distinction accordingly.

The phrase rendered "probationary nun" (མཁན་གྱི་མཛུགས་ཀྱིས་) refers to the śikṣamāṇā, a woman undergoing the two-year probationary period before full ordination as a nun.

- The passage on killing and ordination status is technically about ordering or preparing the destruction of a plant-being, not killing a sentient being. The Tibetan verb "bkum" (killed / destroyed) in this context, combined with the preceding rules about living plants and beings, suggests the referent shifts to the ordered destruction of a living entity (a plant with the character of a seed or living being). However, in Vinaya literature such passages sometimes concern directing others to kill insects or small creatures disturbed in the course of tasks, and the ordination-status permutations parallel standard pārājika analysis. The precise referent is contextually ambiguous; the translation renders it as "killing a living being" to match the standard Vinaya parallel structure.

The final summary verse is incomplete in the source passage and represents a colophon-style gāthā that indexes the preceding topics; the translation renders what is present.

- The final sentence breaks off mid-passage in the source text, ending with "comes to be identified by a mark," and is left open accordingly.

The fourfold permutation of solitary and non-solitary with varying perceptions follows standard Vinaya casuistry; the repeated "non-solitary perceived as non-solitary" in the Tibetan appears to occur twice. The first instance likely belongs to a "non-solitary perceived as solitary" case, but since the Tibetan as given reads the same both times, I have rendered it faithfully without emendation, noting the probable scribal duplication here.

- The Tibetan term rendered "probationer" is རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷན་པུ་, the śikṣamāṇā, a woman undergoing the two-year probationary period between novice and full ordination; this is distinct from the nun who has received full ordination.

The phrase "one who has voluntarily claimed to be a monk" translates རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷན་པུ་ལྟར་བཤད་པུ་, literally "one who has accepted or acknowledged being a monk" — a technical category for someone who has self-declared monastic status without proper ordination.

The summary verses are in the compact mnemonic style standard to Vinaya texts; they enumerate case-categories rather than forming full sentences, and the translation preserves this telegraphic quality.

- The phrase rendered "worn in the ear" is a literal translation of the Tibetan idiom for receiving an oral instruction or message privately — that is, being the recipient of a secretly whispered or privately conveyed communication. In Vinaya context this refers specifically to the rule against conveying instructions or messages between monastics in irregular or prohibited ways.

The phrase "undergoes a change of marks" refers to a person whose physical sex characteristics change during the course of the act in question — a recognized Vinaya category affecting the applicability of rules.

"One who has taken up a position of concealment" renders the Tibetan for a person who has entered a monastic community under false pretenses with intent to conceal disqualifying factors.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of this passage.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating the key categories governing the preceding rule on making instructions heard; the individual line-items ("the mark," "the set of four," etc.) refer to specific subcases treated in the surrounding Vinaya discussion and are intentionally terse in the original.

The term rendered "Nearby Retinue" throughout this passage represents the proper name Upāli (Skt. Upāli), the great Vinaya-holding disciple, whose Tibetan rendering (འཇམ་མཁའ་ལྷན་པུ་) is a calque meaning "near retinue." The preceding continuous passage uses this rendering consistently; it is retained here for continuity.

The phrase "eight of the Sugata's finger-breadths or less" refers to the standard Vinaya measure: a stool whose legs do not exceed eight finger-breadths of the Sugata's measure (a canonical unit) is exempt from the prohibition, as it is considered too small to constitute a proper monastic seat.

- The summary verse lists nine categories of monks to whom entrusting is ineffective, ending with "one who has entered meditative absorption and then gone elsewhere." The verse marker indicates this is a mnemonic gāthā inserted into the Vinaya prose, a standard feature of the Tibetan Vinaya canonical style.

The phrase rendered "entrusts it to one he perceives to be an isolated place" is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan; it means he entrusts the item to a person whom he perceives to be in an isolated, unprotected location — the concern being whether the place is secluded and therefore the item at risk.

- The summation verse beginning "By night, in groups of four..." is a mnemonic rubric listing scenario-types for the expulsion rule; the precise referents of each item would be spelled out in the full commentary that follows. The Tibetan here is compact and formulaic, and the exact sub-cases each verse-item encapsulates are clarified only in subsequent prose.

The phrase rendered "one who is deaf and mute" (མཁྱའདྲུག་མཁྱའུ་གཤམ་པོ།) in the expulsion section restores the same term that appeared earlier in the bed-and-seat passage (preceding context), maintaining consistency.

- The phrase rendered "one who is in the process of receiving full ordination" translates a term literally meaning "at the point of full ordination" — denoting the liminal state during the ordination ceremony itself, between its commencement and completion. This reading follows standard Vinaya commentarial understanding of a technical distinction maintained throughout the passage.

The summary verse at the close is a condensed mnemonic listing categories of persons exempted from full culpability. The term rendered "wanderers" translates a word for "beings" or "migrants" in the standard doctrinal sense, here used to close the verse in a formulaic way. The list names conditions that mitigate or remove offense.

"Upāli and his attendant retinue" renders the Tibetan literally as "the venerable one and the near retinue" — traditional commentators identify this as Upāli, the Vinaya expert par excellence, whose interrogation of the Buddha frames these passages.

- The phrase rendered "one occupied with work" translates a term literally meaning "one freed from hand-work" or "one at leisure from tasks," but in Vinaya context it refers to someone engaged in or incapacitated by physical labor, and the rendering follows the parallel list structure. The distinction between "transgression" and "offense" follows the Tibetan distinction between lung byed and nyes byas, which correspond to pācittika-class and duṣkṛta-class infractions respectively, consistent with the preceding passage.
- The passage contains a summary verse listing the main case-categories covered in the preceding section. The verse's brevity makes its exact referents slightly compressed: "a person" refers to cases involving a private individual's dwelling, "the Saṅgha" to the communal assembly hall, "a night" to the overnight or temporal element, "groups of four" to the fourfold groupings of ordained persons, "rendered unsuitable" to the condition of the lodging, and "covered from above" to the overhead-covering cases just discussed. This is standard Vinaya mnemonic verse and the rendering follows the most coherent reading.

The phrase rendered "undergoes a change of sex" translates a construction indicating that during the act the person's sex transforms — a recognized Vinaya scenario discussed in classical commentaries regarding the legal status of acts performed under such circumstances.

The translation ends mid-sentence as the Tibetan passage itself ends mid-sentence at that point, breaking off before completing the enumeration.

- The phrase rendered "perception of however much space is needed" translates a technical Vinaya expression specifying that the monk must gauge the required dimensions of the doorway recess, foundations, and light-well before breaking ground; this is a standard building regulation in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya Vibhaṅga.

The term rendered "rubble fill" for "བུ་བོ་མ་ལོ་མ་ལོ་" (literally "children" of the main courses) refers to the rubble or fill material laid between or beneath the main stone courses; this is the standard technical usage in this Vinaya context.

The passage "note of where you have reached" and "note where you have finished" reflects a Vinaya exemption clause: when the patron explicitly marks the completion point, the monk is not liable for exceeding the two-or-three-course limit, since the patron has taken responsibility for the extent of the construction.

- The figure referred to as "Gyal Shé" (rgyal bshes) is the brahmin king hostile to the Dharma — this is likely a Tibetan rendering of the name Puṣyamitra Śuṅga, the Mauryan-era general-king traditionally held responsible for persecution of Buddhism in India, though the text does not identify him by that Sanskrit name explicitly.

The monastery name "Öl-gö" (འོ་གོ་མོ་སྐྱོང་གི་མཚན་ལྷན་པོ་) is a specific institution in the Tö (upper) region of Tibet; the rendering "Öl-gö Monastery" preserves the toponym without attempting a semantic translation, as it is a proper name.

- The phrase "found among ash in which it had not been consumed by fire" refers to a tradition that a text was discovered preserved in ash, unburned — a motif of miraculous textual survival found in Tibetan colophon literature. The exact circumstances are not elaborated in the passage.

"Mchims Thamsched Mkhyen Pa" is the thirteenth-century scholar Mchims Nam Mkha' Grags, whose full honorific title means "Mchims the Omniscient"; he is a historical figure associated with Narthang monastery and the Vinaya tradition.

"La Stod Ol Rgod" and "Guntang" are Tibetan monastery names rendered phonetically as they appear; they refer to specific institutions in the upper Tsang region of Tibet.
