Toh 5 in the Kangyur is the Bhikṣuṇī Vinaya Vibhaṅga, known in Tibetan as the Dge slong ma'i 'dul ba rnam par 'byed pa, which may be rendered in English as The Analysis of the Discipline of Nuns. It is a Vinaya text — one of the foundational categories of Buddhist canonical literature concerned with monastic discipline and the rules governing the conduct of ordained practitioners — and this particular work focuses specifically on the code of individual liberation for fully ordained nuns, the bhikṣuṇīs, providing a detailed analysis of each rule along with its origins, scope, and application. As such, it is the counterpart to the monks' Vinaya Vibhaṅga and forms an essential part of the Vinaya division of the Kangyur, the collection of texts attributed to the Buddha himself. The text opens with verses of homage celebrating the Buddha as the lord of discipline and extolling the rarity and blessedness of encountering and practising the Vinaya, setting a devotional and exhortatory tone before proceeding to its systematic exposition.

In the language of India: Bhikṣuṇī Vinaya Vibhaṅga. In the language of Tibet: The Analysis of the Discipline of Nuns. The first section.

Homage to the Omniscient One.

Born into the lineage of the king of discipline,
He who trained disciples and subdued the wayward,
The Buddha, lord of discipline, and the attachment-free Dharma,
And the assembly free of dust — to these I pay homage.

The individual liberation of nuns,
The analysis thereof — neither too condensed
Nor too elaborate — shall now be set forth.
Hear this discipline from me.

Even across ten million aeons,
It is rare to hear the Vinaya,
And rare to find one who can receive and retain it.
To practise it is rarer still.

Blissful is the arising of buddhas.
Blissful too is the teaching of Dharma.
Blissful is the harmony of the Saṅgha,

And blissful is the austerity of those in harmony.
Blissful is the delight in solitude
Of one who has heard and seen the Dharma.
Blissful is the perfect vow of non-harm
Toward the living beings of the world.
Blissful is the freedom from attachment in the world,
And blissful is the victory over desires.
Whatever tames pride and arrogance —
That is the supreme bliss.
Blissful is the sight of one who holds moral discipline.
Blissful is the sight of one of great learning.
Blissful is the sight of arhats (foe-destroyers)
Who are freed from renewed existence.
Blissful is the sight of noble ones.
Blissful is the company of the holy.
Should one never encounter the childish,
One would dwell in constant bliss.
Blissful is a river with pleasant banks and gentle waters.
Blissful is the person well practised in Dharma.
Blissful is one who has attained wisdom.
Blissful is the exhaustion of pride.
Blissful is the world's esteem for ascetics.
Likewise blissful is its esteem for brahmins.
Blissful in the world is the one who leans to the far shore,
And likewise blissful is the one who leans to the near shore.
Blissful are those who are resolute and have subdued their senses,
Those who have grown old in peaceful hermitages.
Blissful is the dwelling of the greatly learned Within the forests, past the flush of youth.

While the bodhisattva was residing in the Tuṣita heaven, there lived in the city of Nyagrodhāvatī a brahmin great as a Śāla tree, named Nyagrodha — wealthy, of great riches, of vast resources, holding much under his sway, wide and expansive in his affairs, possessed of the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, rivalling the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa. He had sixteen servant villages, thirty villages on the borders of his estates, sixty villages that brought produce, nine hundred and ninety-nine serfs, sixty cartloads of golden barley, and enough gold barley — refined according to the royal standard of the mighty king Padma — to make eighty measures. He took a wife from a family of equal rank, and with her he sported, rejoiced, and took his pleasure.

Since they had no son and no daughter, he made petition for a child to many hundreds and thousands of gods — namely: Brahmā, Śakra (Indra), Upendra, Yama, the Sun, Viṣṇu, Īśvara, Skanda, Karmāntaka, Rohiṇī, the gods of the earth, nāgas, water gods, fire gods, wind gods, Dhṛtarāṣṭra (guardian of the realm), the noble-born, Durgā, Vaiśravaṇa, Maṇibhadra, Pūrṇa, Maṇibhadra the Auspicious, Pañcārṣika, Pañcaika, and the other twenty-eight commanders of the yakṣa armies; to Hārītī with her retinue of five hundred sons; to the gods of pleasure groves, the gods of forests, the gods of crossroads, the gods of triple junctions, the gods who receive torma offerings, the gods of the body, the co-born deities, the congruent deities, the ever-following gods — to all of these, and yet further to many hundreds and thousands of gods, he made petition.

Now there is indeed a worldly saying that sons and daughters are born as a result of making petition to gods — but in truth it is not so. For if it were truly thus, then —

Just as with a wheel-turning king, every single one of his attendants would have a thousand sons. Yet in truth, sons and daughters are born when six conditions come together and are present. What are those six? First, the father and mother must have accumulated and gathered the karma by which they will obtain a child. Second, the child too must have accumulated and gathered the karma by which it will obtain a father and mother. Third, the mother must be sound and in her proper season. Fourth, the father and mother must be united in desire and come together. Fifth, a gandharva (a being in the intermediate state) must be nearby. Sixth, the gandharva must have obtained a mind in either of two states: a mind that is attached to and desirous of the two, or a mind that is wrathful toward them. It is when these six conditions come together and are present that sons and daughters are born.

And yet, despite all this, Nyagrodhā sat there diligently petitioning hundreds and thousands of gods — and still there was no son, no daughter. Then he went up to the upper terrace of his fine house and, leaning his arms upon the railing, he stood there with the thought penetrating his heart: "All this great wealth and prosperity of my household — because there is no son, it will be taken away by others."

Then his relatives came before him and spoke these words: "Nyagrodhā, why do you sit in such discomfort?" He then told his relatives at length, and they said to him: "Resort to the gods and to sacred trees." He replied: "There is not a single god or sacred tree I have not already resorted to — and yet I have neither son nor daughter."

Then the mother of Nyagrodhā, who was like a great śāla tree, came and spoke thus: "Son Nyagrodhā, why are you so discomforted?" He replied: "Mother, is my discomfort a small thing? All this great wealth and property of our household — because there is no son, it will be taken away by others." His mother said: "My son, in your father's grove there is a great nyagrodha tree, full and complete with branches, crown, twigs, and foliage, its leaves wide and its boughs swaying — and the city is known by the very name Nyagrodhavān, 'the city of the nyagrodha tree.' Your father too, when he had no son, made petition for a child to many hundreds and thousands of gods — and still he had neither son nor daughter. Then your father went before the nyagrodha tree and made petition to it, and it was from there that you came forth. For that reason you were named Nyagrodhā. Since you too have no son, do likewise."

Then Nyagrodhā, like his father who was as a great śāla tree, went to where the nyagrodha tree stood. Arriving there, he had the area around the nyagrodha tree swept and cleaned, had it filled with incense, flowers, and perfumed smoke, and had victory banners and pennants raised. He then fed eight hundred brahmins, had them clothed in fine lengths of cloth, and afterward made petition to the deity dwelling in the tree: "Grant me, I beseech you, the joy of obtaining a son. If I am given a son, I shall offer you unmeasurable worship such as this every single year. But if not, I shall have this tree felled to the very base of a ficus shoot, split into pieces and pieces, dried out in the wind and the sun, and then burned in fire. Once burned, the ashes shall be scattered to the great wind or cast into the swift current of a great river."

Now the deity of that tree was of limited power, and so when petition was made to it, it was gladdened, delighted, deeply joyful, and felt strong — but when threatened, it became afraid, thinking: "Surely I will be driven from my dwelling place."

That deity, being hemmed in on all sides by the four great kings, went to the great king Virūḍhaka and, having arrived, spoke to him: "I am about to be driven from my dwelling place. Please inspire the wish that, in the city of the banyan tree, the brahmin shall find a son through the nyagrodha tree, as with the great sāla tree."

Virūḍhaka thought: "By the force of the cause of past karma, sons and daughters come into being. Over this matter I have no power." And so he said to the deity: "I am not able to give a son or daughter. But come — let us go together to the great noble king Vaiśravaṇa."

The two of them went to Vaiśravaṇa and, having arrived, told him the very same matter. Likewise, the great king Virūḍhaka went to Virūpākṣa and to Vaiśravaṇa in turn, and having arrived and spoken, those two also said: "Sons and daughters arise through one's own karma. Over this we have no power."

Then those four great kings went to Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, and spoke: "Kauśika, one of those in our retinue is about to be driven from his dwelling place. In that city of the banyan tree, please inspire the wish that the brahmin shall find a son through the nyagrodha tree, as with the great sāla tree."

Śakra replied: "Sirs, sons and daughters arise through one's own karma. I am not able to give a son or daughter to anyone."

Then a great radiance appeared in that divine assembly. Seeing it, Śakra, lord of the gods, instructed the four great kings: "Sirs, do not depart from this place. Just as this great radiance has appeared without interruption, so the Great Brahma (Brahmā) shall appear in this assembly." And they remained.

Into that assembly Brahmā indeed came down — young, youthful, a youth with five crests — and he sat upon the lap of Śakra, lord of the gods. And the purpose for which he had been summoned was fulfilled.

Then Śakra, lord of the gods, pressed his palms together and made this supplication to the Great Brahmā: "Great Brahmā, you who are Brahmā, Great Brahmā, the Sovereign, the Creator, the Projector, the Emanator, the Supreme, the Supremely Exalted — you who have become the far shore of the world — have you not drawn beings forth? Now there is one belonging to our retinue, a wanderer upon the earth, who is about to be driven from his dwelling in the tree. In that city of the banyan tree, please inspire the wish that the brahmin shall find a son through the nyagrodha tree, as with the great sāla tree."

The Great Brahmā thought: "If I say I am unable to give a son or daughter to anyone, and if I then say 'I am unable to give a son or daughter,' then the names by which I am called — Brahmā, Great Brahmā, Sovereign, Creator, Projector, Emanator — those names shall no longer fit me. But if I say 'I shall give a son or daughter,' then when I have no power over the matter, how shall I give?" Thinking thus, he spoke in secret to Śakra, lord of the gods: "Kauśika, I have not drawn the world forth, nor has the world drawn me forth."

Śakra replied: "Great Brahmā, if that is indeed so, nonetheless look within your own domain. If there is anyone whose nature is to die, please cause that one to be reborn in the household of the brahmin with the great sāla tree."

Brahmā said: "Kauśika, why do you not look within your own domain yourself?"

Śakra replied: "In this domain the gods are known to be of limited power.

That brahmin is known to be of great power, and so one of lesser known power cannot bear to take rebirth in his household. Then, when Brahmā gave his consent and searched within his own domain, he saw there a certain Brahmā-being whose life was exhausted and whose signs of death had appeared. He spoke to him: "Friend, if you are to pass away from this pleasant realm, it would be fitting to take a good rebirth. Therefore, take conception in the household of the brahmin of the great sāla tree in the city of Nyagrodha, and you will not be troubled by want of provisions."

That one, displeased, replied: "Great Brahmā, let it go, let it go. What use is such effort? That brahmin holds wrong views, and to take rebirth in a brahmin's household is like a person who, out of attachment to a golden fetter, places his own foot in that fetter. Now the bodhisattva, having thoroughly perfected himself among the six classes of gods of the desire realm up to three times over, has passed away from the Tuṣṭita heaven, and at midnight, resembling the son of the earth-guardian, has become a white elephant calf, snow-white in color, with six tusks and seven well-formed limbs. Not far from the slopes of the Himālayas, on the bank of the river Gaṅgā, not very far from the hermitage of the yellow-robed sages, in the place where the Śākyas dwell, there reigns a king called Śuddhodana. The bodhisattva has taken conception in the womb of that king's queen, called Mahāmāyā, and after ten full months will be born, and from birth will fully and perfectly awaken to the highest, complete, and perfect awakening. He will raise the Dharma stūpa, beat the drum of the Dharma, and bestow the offering of the Dharma. As for me, when I pass from this realm and take rebirth in the household of one known to be of lesser power, I must without doubt go forth from that household and into the teaching, and comprehend the nectar of the deathless. But as for being born in the household of a wealthy brahmin — because I would be their only child, no one would allow me to go forth. Therefore there is no need for me to take birth in a brahmin's household."

Great Brahmā then said: "Even if that is so, nonetheless please take conception there as I have requested, and at that time I will periodically urge your parents on your behalf." Then that one also gave his consent.

And so that divine being, through the ripening of his merit known to be of great power, who had planted roots of virtue in the presence of former buddhas, who was in his final existence, who sought to live the conduct, who had worn down his fetters, who had taken hold of the provisions for liberation, who was turned toward nirvāṇa, who had turned away from saṃsāra, who neither sought death and rebirth in all the destinies of existence nor clung to a final body — he passed away from the divine world and took conception in that queen's womb.

Now, certain women who are wise by nature know five matters that are to be understood: they know whether a man is attached and whether a man is free from attachment; they know the right time and the right lunar sign; they know that conception has occurred and from whom the conception has come; and they know whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, the child rests leaning to the right flank, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning to the left flank.

That woman, perceiving that her right side felt uncomfortable and thinking, "My child has been obtained without interruption," was filled with joy and delight and great gladness of mind, and spoke to her husband: "Noble lord, I have a pleasant word to tell you."

He spoke these words: "Good woman, may you hear a pleasant word — a word pleasing to gods and humans alike. What is this pleasant word? It is this: just as my right side felt uncomfortable, without any injury to myself, I have obtained a son."

Then the brahmin Nyagrodha, great as a towering śāla tree, overjoyed and delighted and in the fullness of gladness, his face like a blossoming lotus, spoke these joyful words: "Good woman, may your son be born in ease. May I see the face of a beloved son. May the son I have long desired and inwardly cherished come to fulfillment. May he be born in harmony with me and not be born at odds with me. May he perform my works. May he repay my nurturing with nurturing in return. May he make use of my wealth and possessions. May our family lineage long endure. May my prosperity not diminish. And when we have died and our time has come, may he make offerings on our behalf — whether modest or great — perform acts of merit, and, wherever we two have been reborn, may he go there and follow after us, dedicating the merit toward that end."

Knowing then that a sentient being had entered the womb, he had her settled comfortably in an upper chamber on a good foundation, free from harm. In cold weather he provided her with the things suited to cold, and in warm weather with things suited to warmth. He attended to her with particular foods and drinks prescribed by the physician — neither too cool, nor too warm, nor too sharp, nor too hot, nor too salty, nor too sour, nor too sweet, nor too astringent, nor too oily, nor too rough — indeed, foods and drinks from which sharpness, heat, saltiness, sourness, sweetness, astringency, oiliness, and roughness had all been removed.

And to preserve and nurture the one dwelling in the womb, he had her adorned in this manner: she was dressed in garments of many colors; her hands were decked with gold bracelets, jewels, and pearls; she wore necklaces, pendants hanging down, armlets, shoulder ornaments, and earrings and ear-rings; her eyes were drawn with eye-medicine; her face was beautified with dots of red lac; and her teeth were as free from stain as the kumuda flower, silver, snow, a pearl necklace, the kunda blossom, the moon, a swan, a mare's milk, a conch, or the root of a lotus. Her waist was girdled with a golden sash, and her feet were made beautiful with ankle ornaments — so that, like a golden pillar of offering wreathed in flowers, she moved as a divine daughter moving through a pleasure grove, with musicians making the sounds of song and melody. He placed her on the upper floor of the fine chamber and had a great and well-appointed throne set there, and she passed from throne to throne and from seat to seat, never descending to the ground below; and no one was permitted to utter any sound that was unpleasant to the ear.

Before long, that household grew and flourished abundantly in livestock, grain, gold, silver, storerooms, granaries, servants male and female, workers, those who lived on wages, bipeds, quadrupeds, and all the rest — just as the great ocean is daily filled by five hundred rivers, so too that household grew and flourished.

Then the brahmin Nyagrodha, great as a towering śāla tree, thought to himself: "If I were to have a son, how should I proceed — should I go about it in the ordinary way, as common brahmins do, extending the lineage of kings by playing games with the great king Padma?"

He thought to himself, "For that purpose I will have golden barleycorns planted." And so before long he had golden barleycorns sown. Eight or nine months passed, and from the birth there came a boy — handsome of form, pleasing to behold, beautiful, fair as the color of the root of a lotus, possessed of a head like a parasol, with long arms, a broad brow, fine eyebrows, a face like a lion's, an upper body like a lion's, and long shoulders.

When the birth celebration was to be held, the great Nyagrodha tree was cleared throughout of all stones, gravel, and weeds, sprinkled with sandal water, bedecked with many different flowers, and censured with various perfumes from golden censers. Victory banners and pennants were raised, and silk streamers and tinkling ornaments were hung. Scales and weights for honest measure were set in order. Then at the four gateways and at the center of the four crossroads, gifts were given and merit was made: food was given to those who desired food, drink to those who desired drink, garments to those who desired garments, garlands, perfumes, and ointments to those who desired garlands, perfumes, and ointments. In this way, for twenty-one days — three weeks of seven days each — gifts of many kinds were given and merit was made.

Then the relatives gathered and assembled together, and it was declared: "Since this boy was obtained by prayer to the Nyagrodha tree, let the boy's name therefore be Nyagrodha-born." And so the name was given. The brahmins then said: "Since his father too is of the Kāśyapa clan, let the boy's name be given as Kāśyapa." And so some knew him by the name Kāśyapa, and some knew him by the name Nyagrodha-born.

Now eight wet-nurses were assigned to care for him: two to carry him in their laps and keep him alive, two to suckle him at the breast, two to cleanse his impurities, and two to play with him and keep him company. They held iron arrows and carried protective coverings and many peacock-feather fans, and they nourished and raised him with milk, curds, fresh butter, clarified butter, butter oil, and all the other finest provisions and necessities. And so he grew and flourished like a lotus dwelling in a pond.

When he had grown to maturity, he was set to the study of letters, and in just a few days he mastered the alphabet entirely. At that time he became skilled in the brahminic way of conduct, behavior, ritual purity, conduct in all its forms, taking up ashes, taking up a water-pot and clay, the offering of praise, the scattering of libations, the recitation of mantras, perfect restraint, what must be determined, what is to be practiced at the proper time and season, the Veda of precise recitation, the Veda of sacrifice, the Veda of poetry, and the Veda of the protection of worldly existence. He became proficient in the six brahminic occupations: performing sacrifice, causing others to perform sacrifice, reading aloud, causing others to read aloud, and skill in giving and receiving.

He became learned in all eighteen branches of knowledge, namely: secret mantras, tantric texts, subtle ritual procedures, the science of logic, the Veda, grammar, the definitive arrangement of phonetics, clear understanding, precise terminology, compendium of prosody, the science of astronomy, the science of interpretation, the science of falling into water, the science of great conduct, the science of casting far into the world, the particular sciences, the sixty-section Tantra, the science of swallowing, and the science of posture and dwelling — in all these eighteen branches of knowledge his intellect became exceedingly sharp.

Before long his father entrusted him to five hundred brahmin boys of pure brahminic conduct, to lead them in reciting whatever they had heard.

He did as his father said, and it was done accordingly.

Then the brahmin Nyagrodha, great as a śāla tree, thought to himself: my lineage is of high standing, and I am endowed with great wealth. In a household such as this, one does not take a wife of inferior birth for one's sons without good reason. The custom among brahmins is to observe pure conduct for forty-eight years in full, and then in old age to sport with one's wife, to delight in her, and to enjoy her company. I therefore ought to obtain a bride for my son from the very beginning.

With this thought he spoke to the boy Nyagrodha and said: "Son, such is the way of nature in the world — for the sake of one's lineage, you should take a wife." The boy replied: "Father, with all due respect I request your leave — I will dwell in the forest of austerities." His father pressed him again and again, urging him to establish his lineage. And then the boy thought to himself: is there any means by which I might neither disobey my parents' wishes nor become entangled with a woman? Having reflected in this way, he said to his father: "Father, I would ask of you some gold from the Jambū River." The father summoned his treasurer and spoke these words: "Give this boy Nyagrodha as much gold from the Jambū River as he needs." The treasurer replied: "It shall be done."

Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha secretly summoned a skilled smith he had learned of from his father, and had him fashion the likeness of a woman in gold from the Jambū River. He presented it to his father and said: "Father, if a girl is found who resembles this form, she will be my bride — other than one such as this, I have no need of a bride."

His father looked at it and thought: on reflection, it seems this son of mine has given no thought to us at all. Even a girl of ordinary golden complexion is hard to find — what need is there to speak of one like this figure made of Jambū River gold? He held this thought inwardly, brooding over it. The brahmin boys who were with him noticed this and came to him and asked: "Master, why do you sit brooding?" He then explained to them at length the whole matter of obtaining a bride for the boy, and said: "On reflection, it seems as if my son has given no thought to me at all. Even a girl of merely golden complexion is difficult to find — how much more so one like this supreme figure made of Jambū River gold? Where would such a one come from?"

They said to him: "Master, do not be displeased. For whatever kind of man appears in the world, a correspondingly perfect array of companions and circumstances appears for him. Let us do this then: have three more figures made just like this one, and we will search in all four directions until we are certain to find a girl." He listened to his students' words and had three more figures made. The brahmin boys took the four figures and, fully equipped with musical instruments and finery, set out to travel through villages, hamlets, cities, and districts, setting off in groups of one hundred in every direction. And Nyagrodha, great as a śāla tree, charged them: "You must find — in a family of no low rank or lineage — only a girl whose appearance matches this figure."

Those brahmin boys thought to themselves: "How could we possibly go from house to house? We must devise a stratagem." And so they devised one. In every village, town, hamlet, and district they visited, they would enter and set the figure in the middle of the place, and offer it worship with incense, flowers, fragrant substances, and the sound of music, while proclaiming aloud: "If young women pay homage to this goddess who has gone ahead in the form of a girl, then the five excellent blessings will be granted to them — birth into a high lineage, marriage as a bride into a high lineage, dwelling in a supremely well-appointed home, a husband who will come under their sway, and the gift of sons." When these words were heard, the assembled womenfolk — young and old alike — would make offerings, pay homage, and offer prayers. After a time, however, those who had gone to the east, the south, and the north returned without having accomplished their aim. When Nyagrodha, great as a śāla tree, saw them, he fell into deep reflection. The brahmin youth Nyagrodha was delighted, joyful, and utterly glad, and he said these words: "It is well if she has not been found."

As for the brahmin boys who had taken the figure of the goddess and gone westward, they traveled through village after village, hamlet after hamlet, country after country, and palace after palace, until at last they came to the region of Kapila, to the city known as Kapila. There lived a brahmin named Śerśkya, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches, with vast and extensive estates, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, rivaling Vaiśravaṇa himself in fortune. He had taken a wife from an equal lineage, and with her he lived in sport, in joy, and in delight. In the fullness of time, a being entered into his wife's womb. After eight or nine months had passed and she gave birth, a girl was born — beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and fair. Her kinsmen gathered and assembled, and over the course of three times seven, twenty-one days, they made gifts, performed meritorious deeds, and gave her a name. Now in the central lands, it was customary to call one who was beautiful of form "Bhadra," the Lovely. So they named her thus: "This girl is beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and fair, and her father is named Śerśkya, so let this girl be named Śerśkya's daughter Bhadra." And so she was named.

Then Śerśkya's daughter Bhadra was entrusted to eight nurses — who were these eight? Two nurses to hold and nurture her in their laps, two to suckle her at the breast, two to cleanse her of impurity, and two to play with her as companions. They bore iron arrows and carried quivers of many peacock feathers as a guard, and they nourished and raised her on milk, curds, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and other finest provisions of various kinds. She grew vigorously, like a lotus dwelling in a pond, until at last she was fully grown.

The brahmin boys then went to the center of the marketplace, set up the figure, and made offerings to it with incense, flowers, fragrant substances, and the sound of music, proclaiming: "If young women pay homage to this goddess who has gone ahead in the form of a girl, then the five excellent blessings will be granted to them — birth into a high lineage, marriage as a bride into a high lineage, dwelling in a supremely well-appointed home, a husband who will come under their sway, and will be blessed with sons." With these words they continued their proclamation.

Then the young women who lived in the city of Kapila went to the presence of the girl-goddess, made offerings, and presented their supplications.

Now the wife of the brahmin Śerśkya heard it said that such a girl-goddess had arrived and was granting the five excellent blessings. When she heard this, she said to her daughter, the fair one Bzangmo: "Go, daughter — you too should make offerings to the girl-goddess." The daughter replied: "What benefit would come from worshipping the girl-goddess?" The mother said: "If you present your supplications, she grants the five excellent blessings. And what are those five? Birth into a high lineage; being taken as a bride into a high lineage; dwelling in a supremely well-appointed home; a husband who will come under one's sway; and being blessed with sons."

Then the brahmin's fair daughter Bzangmo said to her mother: "Mother, I was born into a high lineage, I am fair of form and pleasing to behold — yet if one's wishes are not sought on my behalf, what excellent blessing is there left for me to request?" But her mother urged her again and again, and so, in order to protect her mother's feelings, the brahmin's fair daughter Bzangmo took flowers, incense, powder, cloth, and the like, and went to where the girl-goddess was.

The closer she came to the figure, the more deeply blue the figure became. When she drew near, the girl-goddess appeared to her as though made of iron. The brahmin boys thought: "What marvel has appeared? Whose power is this?" And as they reflected, they suspected that this apparition was the doing of this very girl, and they questioned her: "Whose daughter are you?" She answered: "I am Bzangmo, daughter of the brahmin Śerśkya."

The brahmin boys then heard this from the girl and went to where the brahmin Śerśkya's home was. They arrived and stood at the doorway of the house, calling out: "Wise one, please give us alms." When the brahmin Śerśkya heard the word "alms," he thought the brahmin boys had come seeking alms, and he gave instructions to the household that the brahmin boys should be given flour the colour of the blossoms of the mālūta tree, along with butter, molasses, grapes, round cakes, and tamarind. For in that land it was the custom that girls gave alms from their father's house — because alms given from the father's house were considered the gift of the essence.

Then the fair daughter Bzangmo took the alms and went to where the brahmin boys who were begging stood, and she presented the alms to them. But those brahmin boys did not accept them. Word of this reached the brahmin Śerśkya. The brahmin Śerśkya then said to the brahmin boys: "What do you wish?" They replied: "It is alms in the form of the girl that we want — not alms in the form of flour." The brahmin Śerśkya became angry and said to them: "I will not give you my daughter as alms." They replied: "We do not seek the girl as alms for our own sake." Then the brahmin Śerśkya said to the brahmin boys: "This matter, I did not understand the meaning you intended."

Then those brahmin boys spoke to the brahmin Śerśkya in these words: "O wise one, have you not heard that in the land of Magadha, in the city called Nyagrodhavana, there lives a brahmin named Nyagrodha — great as a great śāla tree — who is wealthy, possessed of great riches, of vast property, well established, broad and eminent, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa (the god of riches), a rival to the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, and who possesses sixteen villages of serfs, thirty villages of those who work the borders, sixty villages of those who tend the gardens, nine hundred and ninety-nine bondsmen, sixty loads of gold, and those by whose means King Padmachenpo's eighty bushels of refined gold grain are held — and that to him a son has been born called Nyagrodha, who is handsome, pleasant to behold, and beautiful, skilled in the six brahminical duties, who has gone to the far shore of the Vedas and their branches, and is extremely keen-minded in all eighteen fields of learning? It is for his sake that we have been begging for the girl as alms."

Then the brahmin Śerśkya said to those brahmin boys: "I have indeed heard at length of the qualities of that great brahmin who is like a great śāla tree — of his lineage, his moral discipline, his purity, and the nature of his conduct. However, since he lives far away, how should a marriage be arranged with him?" They replied: "O wise one, have you not heard what was said before:

Whatever fire there may be, whatever wind, poison that is mingled with blood, a brahmin who has been duly prepared, and whatever horse — none of these are hindered.

That brahmin, moreover, is of very great wealth, and you too are likewise wealthy and rich. He has both mounts and people who can travel back and forth between them. Furthermore, to forge a friendship with one who lives far away is indeed something stable." When those brahmin boys had made the brahmin Śerśkya understand with these words urging him on, he then gave them bathing requisites — namely a bathing cloth, a tooth-cleaner, powder, grain oil, tooth-powder, and the like. The brahmin boys took those bathing requisites and went outside the city of Kapila to the ponds, in order to bathe. Then the brahmin Śerśkya thought to himself: "While the brahmin boys are away at the pond to bathe, I should deliberate with my friends, my relatives, and my kinsmen." Thinking thus, the brahmin Śerśkya remained inside the house and sat together with his wife and the assembly of relatives, and he told them the matter. They said: "Since that brahmin is like a great śāla tree, even if he were unwilling, we would strive earnestly to give him the girl. Since he himself desires this — what need is there even to say so? She should be given without any hesitation. To form a marriage alliance with him is entirely fitting and appropriate, and the girl too will be happy." Thereafter the two parents bathed the girl, dressed her in white clothes, performed the auspicious rites and the benedictions, had the brahmin boys recite the purificatory texts, and gave her to the brahmin boy Nyagrodha as his wife. After this, those brahmin boys reckoned the month, the day, the constellation, and the moment, and said to the girl's parents: "On such and such a great month, with the day, constellation, and moment, the boy will come to live with you very soon." Then, their mission fully accomplished, those brahmin boys set out joyfully and gladly, their hearts overjoyed, heading toward the city of Nyagrodha, and in due course arrived at the city of Nyagrodha. The brahmin boy Nyagrodha saw them coming from a distance. Upon seeing them, he thought to himself: "How is it that those brahmin boys look so joyful and glad and overjoyed as they come along? It seems they have found just what I hoped for, without anything going wrong." Then those brahmin boys went straight toward the brahmin Nyagrodha, who was like a great sāla tree, and having arrived, they bowed to the brahmin Nyagrodha and took their seats. He in turn greeted each of those brahmin boys warmly and individually. Having greeted them all warmly, he spoke to those brahmin boys as follows: "Come now, brahmin boys — has everything been completed just as we imagined and hoped?" Full of joy and delight and great gladness, they spoke to their teacher: "Venerable teacher, please be pleased. We have found something even more excellent than what the venerable teacher had in mind." He replied: "How so?" And they said: "Did the venerable teacher not instruct us that in examining a girl, one should not scrutinize lineage, clan, and family line, but should examine only the beauty of her form? We have found one who is beautiful in form, and who also possesses lineage, clan, family line, and wealth." Those brahmin boys then related in full detail everything they had been asked about, speaking of the month, the day, the constellation, and the precise moment as well, and said: "Venerable teacher, we have settled all of this with certainty and have come; venerable teacher, please now know that the appointed time has arrived." Then the brahmin Nyagrodha, who was like a great sālā tree, upon hearing this account became joyful and glad and overjoyed, and honored those brahmin boys with various fine foods, drink, refreshments, garments, robes, and ornaments. Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha, hearing that the girl was so beautiful and radiant in form, became distressed, and thought: "Having heard that she is so beautiful, and lest something go wrong, I am greatly drawn to her by desire — I should go to my mother and examine her more closely beforehand." And so the brahmin boy Nyagrodha said to his parents: "Mother and Father, I will go and draw close to her personally beforehand, and only afterward take her as my bride." They both gave their consent to this. Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha set out from the city of Nyagrodha together with one brahmin boy, and heading toward the city of Kapila, traveled in due course through villages, hamlets, districts, and royal estates, and arrived at the city of Kapila. Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha, weary from the road and resting from his fatigue, took up a leaf-bundle and entered the city of Kapila to beg for alms. He went from house to house begging, and came to the door of the vaiśya household, which was like a great sālā tree. At that moment the good vaiśya girl came out carrying an alms-vessel, and the brahmin boy Nyagrodha saw her. Upon seeing her he thought to himself: "That girl — she is the one." Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha spoke to the girl as follows: "Whose daughter are you?" She replied: "I am a vaiśya's daughter." "Have you been given to another?"

"I have heard that in the city of the Nyagrodha tree, that very brahmin Nyagrodha — great as a sālā tree — has a son called Nyagrodha-born, and that your parents have given you to him." Then he said to her: "Good woman, what use do you have for such a husband? Know that one who becomes such a husband is as good as having no husband at all. How so?" She replied: "If he has no interest in the things of desire, what use is such a husband?" Then she thought: "Excellent! Excellent, son of a noble one! You have drawn out my every breath. You alone have anointed me with nectar." She then said: "Why is it, brahmin boy, that I too have no interest in the things of desire?" And she also spoke these words in verse:

That ease with which I look on rich and poor alike — that salve which accords with the heart — it is not sandalwood or camphor and such things.

Yet I have no power over myself: if my parents give me in marriage, what is to be done?

Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born said to the good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā: "Good woman, be steadfast and have patience. I myself am the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born." Then, upon hearing those words from the brahmin boy, the good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā breathed out at great length in deep relief, and said to Nyagrodha-born: "Brahmin boy, go now, and hold firm to your pledge. Those of noble character keep their pledges firm." Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born, having consulted together with the good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā, returned once more to the city of the Nyagrodha tree.

There the brahmin Nyagrodha — great as a sāla tree — performed all the customary rites of a householder, and the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born took Bhaṅgamā as his wife. When Bhaṅgamā was brought to the city of the Nyagrodha tree, the two parents of the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born placed the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born and the good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā in one dwelling, and made two beds for the two of them. Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born said to the good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā: "Good woman, remember the pledge we made before." The good vaiśya girl Bhaṅgamā likewise said to the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born: "Son of a noble one, bear it in mind yourself as well." And so the two of them reminded one another, and they lay as a mother and son lie together.

Then the brahmin Nyagrodha — great as a sāla tree — together with his wife asked the maidservants who attended the two of them: "How do the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born and his wife dwell together?" They replied: "Like a mother and son, or like a son and mother." Hearing this, the brahmin Nyagrodha — great as a sāla tree — spoke to his wife together with him, saying: "The fault is entirely ours, not theirs, for we made two beds for the two of them," and thinking this, he put one bed and one chair in place.

Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born thought to himself: "Alas, our parents have undertaken this great endeavor on our behalf — the affair of a teaching that is not wholesome."

The brahmin girl Bhadrā, having understood the intention of the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born's parents, spoke to the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born, saying: "Son of a lord, this arrangement has been made for your sake and mine. Yet please bear in mind the vow we made before." He replied: "Be at ease, dear one, and remember your vow as well."

So it was that in the first watch of the night, the brahmin girl Bhadrā lay down on the bed, while Nyagrodha-born remained sitting on the chair. In the middle watch of the night, Nyagrodha-born lay down, and Bhadrā sat up. Again in the last watch of the night, Bhadrā lay down, and Nyagrodha-born sat up without sleeping. And so the chair was removed as well. Again the brahmin girl Bhadrā spoke to Nyagrodha-born, saying: "Son of a lord, this arrangement has been taken up for the sake of warming ourselves — yet please bear in mind the vow we made before." He replied: "Be without doubt or suspicion, and do you too remember the former vow." And so Bhadrā lay down in the first watch of the night, while Nyagrodha-born walked about. In the middle watch, Nyagrodha-born lay down and the brahmin girl Bhadrā walked about. Again in the last watch Bhadrā lay down, and Nyagrodha-born walked about. In this manner, dwelling together in one place on one bed for twelve full years, not even once did the two of them give rise to a mind of attachment toward each other.

The Differentiation of the Nuns' Vinaya, the Second Fascicle.

Then Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, thought to himself: "How remarkable — while not yet free of attachment, these two conduct themselves as though free of attachment. I must put these two to the test." Thinking this, he manifested himself in the form of a serpent, went to where the two of them were sleeping, coiled himself up as a great serpent, and lay beneath their bed. The brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born saw a great black serpent, fierce and venomous with poisonous fangs, lying beneath the bed. Seeing it, he thought: "Alas, one with a form such as this will bring ruin." The arm of the one who was sleeping dangled out over the side. Then the brahmin boy Nyagrodha-born thought: "What am I to do now?" He took a fan with a jeweled handle and gently lifted and repositioned the arm. Then the brahmin girl Bhadrā was awakened by the touch of the jeweled handle of the fan, and being startled and displeased, she spoke to Nyagrodha-born, saying: "Son of a lord, what is this touching? Have you touched me with a mind of attachment?" He replied: "Bhadrā, it is not so. But thinking it would be wrong if that venomous serpent were to seize her, I lifted and repositioned the dangling arm." "With what?" she asked. He said:

"With the jeweled handle of the fan." She then spoke these words: "Son of a lord, it would be better for me to be seized by that venomous serpent than for you to touch me with the jeweled handle of the fan. Why? Because:

A fine tree is ruined when the vine of the mālatī twines about it.

By the occasion of touching women, the world is brought to ruin.

Therefore it is not fitting that a man's hand should touch an excellent woman — better he be seized by a swift and deadly serpent.

Moreover, through a man of power touching the body of a young woman, the great austerities of one possessed of the horn-mark are undermined.

By the path of wind a man of power's exceptional conduct — he came home, and then departed into the forest on foot. After that, while the two of them lived together in that manner, at another time the father and mother both died. Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born thought to himself: when our father and mother were alive, the two of us lived together with very little concern for the household; now our father and mother have died, and so we must see to the livelihood and provisions of our own home. Thinking thus, he spoke to the lovely daughter of the merchant, Bzang-mo, saying: "Bzang-mo, when our father and mother were alive, we lived together with very little concern for the household. Now we must attend to our household's livelihood and provisions, so Bzang-mo, for the time being you are to look after the affairs and tasks of the home, while I shall go out to the village fields." Having said this, the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born went off to tend the fields. When the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born surveyed his father's fields, he found nine hundred ninety-nine plowshares abandoned there, and besides, countless tiny living creatures being harmed and afflicted in wrongful ways. He saw the oxen with their nostrils pierced through, their flanks worn thin, their haunches split open by blows of the whip; and the workers there with their hair and beards grown long, their hands and feet cracked and yellow, wearing ragged garments, their bodies smeared with the dust of the earth, looking like charred stumps, like ghosts — quarreling with one another over the harrows, iron goads, plowshares, and ox-whips, falling to blows and working in that way. Having seen all this, he went among them and spoke these words: "Good people, who are you?" They replied: "We are workers employed by the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born." He then asked: "By whom were you appointed?" They said: "We were not formally appointed by him — rather, his father set us to doing the livelihood work of this household." Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born spoke to those farm laborers: "Good people, if the father of the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born set you to carrying out this household's livelihood work, then good people, why do you quarrel, why do you fall to blows and labor in such a way? Good people, why do you engage in such conduct of body and speech? Will not the karmic maturation of this bring you to experience suffering for a very long time in cyclic existence?" Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born thought to himself: though I am not engaging in the slightest wrongdoing through body, nor through speech, nor through mind, still from this situation a source of demerit has arisen close to me. Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born returned to his own home and said to the lovely daughter of the merchant, Bzang-mo: "Bzang-mo, keep the household with care and diligence." The lovely daughter of the merchant, Bzang-mo, said: "O son of a lord, where are you going?" He replied: "I am going to the forest of austerities." And he recited this verse:

A small monkey, whatever fruit it finds, produces happiness on a single bed.
One must hold a mended piece of cloth.
The remainder — delusion seizes it all.

For a time after that, Bzang-mo also began to look after the household. And she saw that the maidservants had their hands and feet cracked and yellow, wore ragged garments, their heads disheveled, and were stabbing one another with verbal spears over the mortar, the pestle, the great elephant, the throne, and such things, and she went among them and spoke these words: "Good women, to whom do you belong?" They replied: "We belong to the lovely daughter of the merchant, Bzang-mo."

She then spoke these words: "Were you then appointed by Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant?" They replied: "We were not, in fact, appointed by Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant. Rather, it was Sgyug-mo who appointed us to manage that household."

For a time, she too grew disenchanted, and spoke this verse:

Whatever little rice is fit to eat,
one single bed produces happiness.
One must hold a mended piece of cloth.
The remainder — delusion seizes it all.

Now at that time buddhas had not yet appeared in the world. She thereupon gave generously to others: to tīrthikas who were wanderers, to those who roamed about, to the naked ascetics, to those who subsisted on whatever came their way, to the ash-smeared and their like; and to the poor, the destitute, and the beggars. She made the impoverished no longer poor. She released her slaves, hired servants, and bonded workers from their service. She divided all her wealth among friends, ministers, relatives, and the allied families of her kin, and then entered the house. Thinking to take whatever worn garments there might be, she looked into the treasury of cloth goods, and found there a great bolt of uncut outer cloth, some hundred thousand lengths in extent. She thought: "I shall take one such bolt, and give one like it to Bzang-mo. The house I shall entrust to the relatives." Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born said to Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant: "Bzang-mo, where do you wish to go?" She replied: "I wish to go with you alone into the ascetic forest." He said: "It is not fitting for a woman to dwell together with a man in the ascetic forest." Bzang-mo replied: "If that is the case, then release me from the household first." "Why?" She then spoke these words: "The reason is this: if you depart before me, a woman who has ripened and colored like cooked rice will be sought after by many people. If you leave and some among them should come to court me, there is the possibility that what is unsuitable may come to pass." Then the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born thought: "This girl is learned and exceedingly settled in her mind." And he said to Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant: "Bzang-mo, come. Let us leave the household together, the two of us alone." And the two of them departed from the household together, alone.

Then, having gone together with the brahmin youth Nyagrodha-born as far as the city's outskirts, he said to Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant: "Bzang-mo, go now and remain in whatever manner of practice you desire."

Now at that time in Rājagṛha there lived a naked ascetic called "Perfector of Nakedness," who, though not omniscient, claimed to be omniscient. He was surrounded by many naked ascetics and their disciples. Then Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant, went to the place where the naked ascetic called Perfector of Nakedness resided, and when she arrived she said to him: "Venerable one, I wish to go forth under you." He gave her the going forth and placed her among the community of naked female ascetics.

Then those naked ascetics, seeing that Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant, was beautiful in form, lovely to behold, radiant, of glowing complexion, and endowed with the highest qualities, said to one another: "Whatever going forth we have undertaken is entirely for the sake of the five desirable qualities of the gods. And this Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant, resembles a woman of the gods. So for now, whether or not she obtains the desirable qualities of the gods is beside the point — let us enjoy ourselves with this Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant." Having said this, some five hundred naked ascetics made their way toward the place where the naked ascetic Perfection of Nakedness was staying. And when, after a time, the occasion had been fully related, they then roused Bzang-mo, the lovely daughter of the merchant.

He permitted it out of affection for his disciples. Then, day after day, through the condition of karmic maturation, the five hundred naked ascetics would take their pleasure with her. After some time had passed, she became disgusted and appealed to the Perfection of Nakedness, and he said, "Go to whomever falls to you by lot."

At that same time, the Blessed One, while still a bodhisattva, was twenty-nine years of age. Having taken his pleasure among the desirable things of the senses, and having seen an old man, a sick man, and a dead man, his mind turned away from the world. At the stroke of midnight he mounted his noble steed Kanthaka the Praised One and rode into the forest. For six years he practiced austerities of every kind that proved to be of no benefit whatsoever, then bathed in the river Nairāñjanā. From Gayā and Gayābala, the two women, he accepted a porridge of milk that had been reduced sixteen times by boiling. The nāga king Kāla praised him with verses, and from the grass-seller Svastika he accepted grass. He entered beneath the tree of awakening and spread his seat, undisturbed and unentangled by anyone. Sitting cross-legged as a nāga king coils in sleep, he formed the firm resolve and spoke it aloud as well: "Until I have attained the exhaustion of all defilements, I shall not break this cross-legged posture." After a time, having subdued Māra together with his hosts of thirty-six billion classes of demonic beings, he fully and completely awakened to unsurpassable and perfect awakening.

Urged by Brahmā, he went to the region of Vārāṇasī and turned the wheel of Dharma endowed with the Dharma, setting forth the truths to Kauṇḍinya, who came to know all, and to eighty thousand gods. He also tamed the group of five, and the assembly of the nearby five, and fifty principal sons of the town. He went into the forest of Śālmali trees and tamed the assembly of sixty belonging to the group of Yaśas. He went to the town of Senānī and set forth the truths to Gayā and Gayābala, the two daughters of that town. He went to the region of Uruvilva and tamed the five hundred, headed by Uruvilva Kāśyapa with his eighteen miraculous displays. He went to the region of Gayā and, by means of the three miracles, gave teachings to the river Kāśyapa and to those thousands of matted-hair ascetics. He went to the region of Rājagṛha of the brilliant palace, and tamed King Bimbisāra together with his son and retinue, eighty thousand gods, and many hundreds of thousands of brahmins and householders of the region of Magadha, and accepted the Bamboo Grove. At that time the Blessed One was staying in Rājagṛha at the stūpa of Supratishthita.

Kāśyapa, beneath a certain tree, saw the Blessed One: beautiful, worthy of faith, with faculties at peace, with mind at peace, tamed and supremely tranquil in mind, seated steadfastly and resplendent like a pillar of gold. Having seen him, the thought arose: "Oh, I see the Teacher! Oh, I see an arhat! Oh, I see the Blessed One! Oh, I see the Sugata, the Well-Gone! Oh, I see the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha!" With this thought he held him in the highest regard, as his supreme guide, and fixed him in his mind. Reflecting with his entire mind, he went to where the Blessed One was, went up to him, and bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One with reverence. He then spoke these words to the Blessed One: "Venerable Blessed One, you are my Teacher, and I am a śrāvaka of the Blessed One. Venerable Blessed One, you are my Teacher — my Teacher! And I am a śrāvaka of the Blessed One — a śrāvaka!" When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One addressed Kāśyapa with these words: "Kāśyapa, it is indeed so. Yes, it is so. Kāśyapa, I am your Teacher —" you are my śrāvaka. Kāśyapa, I am your Teacher — your Teacher! And you are my śrāvaka — my śrāvaka!

Kāśyapa, there are those who, thinking with their entire mind yet without true knowledge, declare: 'I know all things.' Without truly seeing, they declare: 'I see all things.' Without being a Tathāgata, they declare: 'I am a Tathāgata.' Without being an arhat, they declare: 'I am an arhat.' And without being a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, they boastfully claim: 'I am a perfectly and fully awakened buddha.' Kāśyapa, the head of such a teacher would split into seven pieces. But Kāśyapa, because I truly know, I declare: 'I know all things.' Because I truly see, I declare: 'I see all things.' Because I am a Tathāgata, I declare: 'I am a Tathāgata.' And because I am a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, I openly proclaim: 'I am a perfectly and fully awakened buddha.'

I teach the Dharma to śrāvakas always with a basis of occasion, never without occasion; with definite emergence, never without definite emergence; with reliance, never without reliance; with purpose, never without purpose; with miraculous display, never without miraculous display.

Kāśyapa, therefore you should train in this way: you should listen to whatever Dharma, to whatever wholesome teaching, there may be. You should honor all of it, take it as your highest guide, treat it as supremely important, make your mind one-pointed, open your ears, and listen having reflected with your entire mind.

Kāśyapa, furthermore you should train in this way: you should dwell by observing the arising and passing away of the five appropriated aggregates (skandhas). You should dwell by observing the arising and ceasing of the six sense sources. You should dwell with your mind well and closely settled upon the four foundations of mindfulness. Dwelling with your mind well and closely settled upon the four foundations of mindfulness, you should cultivate the seven limbs of awakening and, having directly realized with the body and fully accomplished the eight liberations, you should dwell in them.

You should dwell with a far greater degree of moral shame and embarrassment in the presence of wise ones who share the holy life equally with your Teacher. You should always be endowed with mindfulness of your own body and not let it go, and you should dwell in the body without becoming separated from it. Thus, Kāśyapa, you should train.

Then the Blessed One, having thoroughly shown, thoroughly guided, thoroughly praised, and thoroughly gladdened Kāśyapa, rose from his seat and departed.

Thereupon the venerable Kāśyapa followed in the footsteps of the Blessed One and, thinking to lay out a seat for the Blessed One in the place where he dwelt, he spread out a great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets as a cushion.

Then the Blessed One, knowing with his mind the thoughts and reflections of the monk Kāśyapa, left the road and sat to one side.

Then the venerable Kāśyapa, quickly and with all haste, spread out the great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets and prepared a seat for the Blessed One. And he addressed him with these words: "Blessed One, out of compassion, please be seated on the prepared seat. Sugata, please be seated on the prepared seat. May this long be for my benefit, welfare, and happiness."

The Blessed One was seated on the prepared seat. Having sat down, he spoke to the venerable Kāśyapa: "Kāśyapa, your great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets is soft indeed. Kāśyapa, your great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets is supple."

When he had said this, the venerable Kāśyapa replied to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is indeed so. Sugata, it is indeed so. Reverend One, my great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets is soft. Reverend One, my great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets is supple. Blessed One, out of compassion, please accept the great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets."

When he had said this, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Kāśyapa: "Kāśyapa, take my robe — the charnel-ground cloth."

When he had said this, Kāśyapa replied to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please accept the great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets. Sugata, please accept the great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets. Reverend One, I shall take the Blessed One's robe, the charnel-ground cloth."

Then the Blessed One accepted the venerable Kāśyapa's great patchwork robe of a hundred thousand sheets, and with his own hands presented to him that charnel-ground cloth.

Then the venerable Kāśyapa, having received instruction, practiced as a trainee for eight days, living entirely on alms. On the ninth day he was a trainee no longer.

From that time forward, the venerable Kāśyapa became an arhat — free from all attachment in the three realms, his mind equable toward mud and gold alike, like the sky and the palm of the hand, like sandalwood that has been laid down, having torn open the enclosure of the door of ignorance, having attained knowledge, higher cognition, and individual perfect discernment, turned away from the gains and acquisitions of becoming and desire, and turned away from honor. The gods with Indra (Śakra) and their attendants came to paint his likeness, to make offerings to him, and to pay him homage.

At that time some people said: "How wonderful! Because the monk Kāśyapa has realized this great distinction, the name Great Kāśyapa — Mahākāśyapa — has arisen."

Then the Blessed One, gradually wandering through the districts, traveled to Rājagṛha and dwelt in the Bamboo Grove of Rājagṛha, the Kalandaka Grove. At that time in Rājagṛha there was a festival of meeting at the mountains, a festival of beauty. All the tīrthikas (non-Buddhists) without exception gathered there, and for a time even the naked ascetics went to Rājagṛha.

Then a brahmin's daughter of good character thought to herself: "Who will experience affliction like this for so long? Now that entry into Rājagṛha for alms-begging has arrived, this is the right moment for me." And so, with a mind aroused by affliction, finding her opportunity, she went to Rājagṛha having set her intention on begging.

The venerable Mahākāśyapa also, in the early morning, having dressed in his lower robe and taken up his Dharma robe and alms bowl, entered Rājagṛha for alms. He saw the brahmin's daughter of good character, that she had lost her healthy complexion and had become as she was. Having seen her, he said: "Sister, is the one who has undertaken the fully pure life well looked after?"

She replied: "Scion of a noble house, while I dwelt in my own home, that indeed was my pure life. But now I practice only unchaste conduct — there is no pure life."

He said: "Sister, in order to abide in the pure life, will you go forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya?"

When he had said this —

The brahmin's daughter of good character spoke thus to the venerable Mahākāśyapa: "Scion of a noble house, surely you have no reproach for me?"

Then, when the venerable Mahākāśyapa began to reflect, he who was of a nature to speak of faults saw that those who are of a faulty nature had applied her to what is not the holy Dharma. Recognizing that such a thing had come about, he spoke thus to the brahmin's daughter of good character: "Sister, do not be afraid. The teaching of the Blessed One is without foul smell and without evil. His śrāvakas do not seek even the pleasures of the gods — what need is there to speak of those of humans?"

He then entrusted her to a great female householder, and she had her go forth and receive full ordination. When she went out for alms, those who were deceitful, fraudulent, and corrupt spread the rumor: "She takes delight in not enjoying a form so lovely as this!"

Then on another occasion the venerable Mahākāśyapa, in the morning, having fastened his lower robe and taken up his Dharma robe and alms bowl, entered Rājagṛha for alms. The brahmin's daughter of good character also, in the morning, having fastened her lower robe and taken up her Dharma robe and alms bowl, entered Rājagṛha for alms. The venerable Mahākāśyapa saw the brahmin's daughter of good character. Having seen her, he said: "Sister, are you delighted in the teaching of the Blessed One?"

She replied: "I am delighted in the teaching of the Blessed One; there is not the slightest lack of delight. Yet this form has caused me harm, as a sheep causes harm with its fleece — wherever I go, people accost me."

The venerable Mahākāśyapa said: "Do not be distressed about alms. I shall give you, day by day, half of my own alms." He went for alms, and of what he collected half he consumed himself and half he gave to her.

When she was proceeding in this way, the monks of the group of six heard that when Mahākāśyapa had been a householder, he and this Bhadra had lived together in the same house for twelve years and yet had not once given rise in their minds to a thought of passionate attachment — and now, hearing this, they mocked him, saying: "Now he gives her half his alms!"

Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa gave a mental exercise to the brahmin's daughter of good character, and through her effort, exertion, and striving she abandoned all afflictions and directly actualized arhatship.

After a time the venerable Mahākāśyapa heard the monks making these taunts. Having heard them, he spoke thus to the brahmin's daughter of good character: "Sister, what a spiritual friend should do I have already done. A deer does not rear a deer. Now go and cultivate, in the domain permitted by the Buddha, the qualities you have trained in your homeland, following your alms rounds." Having thus instructed her in this way, the venerable Mahākāśyapa took up the practice of equanimity.

At that time, Prince Ajātaśatru, relying on Devadatta as a companion in unwholesomeness, had killed the righteous Dharma-king his father, and was now sitting in lordship over the sovereignty of his father's kingdom. No sooner had he sat than remorse arose in his mind, and he entered a hall of grief. His grief could not be dispelled by many means. His ministers thought: "In the six great cities there are dancers, performers, comedians, acrobats, and —" every type of musician that could be found, they would all be assembled. And so the ministers did exactly that. Before King Ajātaśatru, many different musicians played the sounds of musical instruments — lutes, flutes, clay drums, kettledrums, iron cymbals, and melodious instruments of every kind. They sang songs, performed dances, ran about, and leapt. Yet even so, they were unable to dispel the grief of King Ajātaśatru.

Then, at another time, the young brahmin woman Suvarṇā, in the early morning, clothed in an underskirt and robe, carrying her alms bowl, beautiful in all her conduct, entered Rājagṛha for alms. A minister of malicious mind caught sight of the brahmin girl Suvarṇā — fair of form, lovely to behold, beautiful, her body excelling even the colour of gold — and seeing her, thought to himself: "This one will dispel the king's grief." With this in mind, that minister seized the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, had her bathed in the baths befitting a king, adorned her with the finest perfumes, garlands of flowers, robes, and ornaments befitting a king, and presented her to King Ajātaśatru.

Now the brahmin girl Suvarṇā abided in a luminous state, certain that the karma she had formerly created and accumulated would without fail arise and be experienced — just as the shadows of mountains or mountain peaks descend and fall upon the ground below. In just that way, the brahmin girl Suvarṇā remained luminous, knowing with certainty that what she had formerly created and accumulated would without fail arise and be experienced. And so, before long, King Ajātaśatru, the moment he saw the brahmin girl, was seized by attachment and began to enjoy pleasure in her company.

Then on that very fifteenth-day observance ceremony (poṣadha), when inquiry was made, the brahmin girl Suvarṇā was nowhere to be seen among the assembly. The great Lady of Beings, the Great Gautamī, looking about, saw that the brahmin girl had grown faint and weakened. Perceiving that she was faint, weak, and ill at ease, the great Lady of Beings, Gautamī, said to Utpalāvarṇā: "Sister, look after the brahmin girl Suvarṇā."

Then Utpalāvarṇā, on that very fifteenth-day observance, went by means of supernatural power to where the house of Ajātaśatru was. Utpalāvarṇā entered through a window-opening and said these words to the brahmin girl Suvarṇā: "Sister, you have severed, abandoned, removed, and utterly relinquished the afflictions of the three realms that had been habitual since beginningless time — why have you not manifested these supernatural powers that are as tasteless as straw and common to all non-Buddhists?"

When she had spoken thus, the brahmin girl Suvarṇā said to Utpalāvarṇā: "Sister, I do not know the path of supernatural power."

Then Utpalāvarṇā taught the brahmin girl Suvarṇā the path of supernatural power. Thereupon the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, through the worldly path and in dependence upon the four meditative concentrations, fully accomplished supernatural power. Then the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, adorned with all her ornaments, went to where the nuns' rains-retreat dwelling was. A group of twelve nuns saw the brahmin girl Suvarṇā adorned with all her ornaments. Seeing her, they said to the great Lady of Beings Gautamī: "We do not observe the restoration ceremony together with a king's consort."

Then the great Lady of Beings Gautamī spoke these words to the brahmin girl Suvarṇā: "Sister, go now to the king's palace, return the garments and ornaments, obtain the king's permission, put on the ochre robes, and come back to us."

Then the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, heeding the words of the great Lady of Beings Gautamī, went to where King Ajātaśatru's palace was. At that time King Ajātaśatru had just awakened and, catching sight of the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, moved to embrace her. Thereupon the brahmin girl Suvarṇā rose up into the sky above. Then King Ajātaśatru saw the brahmin girl Suvarṇā soaring up into the sky above like a goose-king with wings outstretched. Seeing this, he was seized with fear and dread and amazement, and thought to himself: "Can she be a goddess? Or a nāga-woman? Or a gandharva-woman? Or a yakṣa-woman? Or a rākṣasī?" And he also spoke these verses:

Are you a goddess, or a nāga-woman,
a yakṣa-woman, rākṣasī, or gandharva-woman?
Or what manner of female spirit might you be?
Tell me, I ask — let your answer come to me.

When he had spoken thus, the brahmin girl Suvarṇā replied to King Ajātaśatru in these words:

I am no goddess, no nāga-woman, no gandharva, yakṣa-woman, or rākṣasī.
O lord of men, I am a female hearer who has accomplished the work of the Sugata.

Then King Ajātaśatru, upon hearing those words, felt pierced to the quick by a second arrow, as though he were a wild deer, and cried out, "Alas, alas! I have committed a great evil!" and spoke these verses as well:

Like one who has not yet reached the far shore of the ocean, having not yet crossed even this one suffering, now a second has drawn near — and because an opportunity presented itself, many harms befall me.

So thinking, he fainted and fell to the ground, and after a time was revived by being sprinkled with water and roused. Then King Ajātaśatru recovered his composure and spoke these words to the brahmin girl Suvarṇā: "Alas, alas! Wandering as I do through saṃsāra, base and polluted, it would be most improper to become yet more base. Noble one, please descend, descend. I beg you to draw me, who has sunk into the river of mire that is wrongful conduct, up from the mud by the hand."

Then the brahmin girl Suvarṇā descended in order to guide him. Having descended, she arranged a seat and sat down. Then King Ajātaśatru, like a tree felled from its roots, prostrated with his head to the feet of the brahmin girl Suvarṇā and said to her: "Noble one, please have patience with those who are difficult to tame." The brahmin girl Suvarṇā replied: "Great king, I forgive you."

Then, after a short while, the brahmin girl Suvarṇā gave the garments and ornaments back to the king. The king in turn gave ochre robes to the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, prostrated at her feet, and also said: "Noble one, for as long as you live, I will provide you with robes, almsfood, a bed and seat, medicine for illness, and all requisites."

Then the brahmin girl Suvarṇā said to King Ajātaśatru: "O king, this was in all likelihood a fault of my own karma — it was not your fault. Why? Because the Blessed One has declared:

There is no place anywhere one can abide where karma cannot reach — not in the sky above, not within the ocean's depths, not even by entering into the clefts of the mountains."

And further, another god declared:

Just as a shadow follows a person — sitting when one sits, moving when one moves — so too do virtue and non-virtue, like a shadow, follow one always, as the awakened Blessed One has proclaimed without equal.

Then the brahmin girl Suvarṇā, in this way composing a heartfelt gathering of words for King Ajātaśatru, expounded the Dharma under many categories, in a thorough and correct manner. She caused him to grasp it correctly, praised him rightly, and filled him with genuine joy. Then she rose visibly into the sky above and returned to the nuns' rain-retreat dwelling.

Now, at this point the twelve groups said: "We shall not perform the restoration ceremony together with a nun who has fallen." When this was said, the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks in turn reported it to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, thinking, "Both assemblies of my Saṅgha will come to understand the meaning, and the foundation of training that I have established will be well-settled," convened both assemblies of the Saṅgha on account of this occurrence, this basis of discussion, this matter, and this occasion. The blessed buddhas act with full knowledge — they act knowingly, not unknowingly. They act at the right time, not at the wrong time. They act with purpose, not without purpose. This is the nature of the blessed buddhas:
when something done lacks purpose, they ward it off, like warding off water with a water-scoop. And this is likewise the nature of the blessed buddhas: they know the right time for purposeful action. Therefore the Blessed One addressed the brahmin girl Suvarṇā and asked: "Nun, is it true that you acted in this way?" "Venerable One, I did not." "Nun, did you claim it as your own?"
She replied as follows: "Venerable One, since I am by nature free from attachment, how could I ever claim it as my own?" The Blessed One then rebuked her, saying that what is unbecoming of the contemplative life, what is not in accordance with it, what is not proper, what is not fitting — that is not something one who has gone forth should do.

Then, having rebuked her repeatedly and under many headings, the Blessed One addressed both assemblies of the Saṅgha and declared: "Monks and nuns, therefore, for these ten benefits — in order to gather the Saṅgha together; in order to bring the Saṅgha to excellence; in order to bring the Saṅgha into harmony; in order that the Saṅgha may dwell in ease; in order to restrain those persons who are difficult to admonish; in order that those who are conscientious may dwell in comfort; in order that those who lack faith may come to have faith; in order that those who have faith may grow still further and flourish; in order to subdue the defilements of this very life; in order to turn back the defilements of future lives; in order to take up the holy life and uphold it; in order to bring the holy life to complete fulfillment; in order that the teaching may be harmonious; and in order that my teaching, having spread wide and brought benefit to the many, be correctly and completely proclaimed to gods and humans alike, and endure for a long time — with these purposes in view, a rule of training for the female hearers in the Vinaya is to be established. My female hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Furthermore, if any nun, while sharing the same training equally with other nuns, without having relinquished her training and without having shown its deterioration, engages in unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse — even if she were reborn together with one born in an animal realm —

That nun has incurred defeat and is not to remain in the community.

Now, regarding the phrase "any nun": there are four kinds of nun. There is the nun by name, the nun by pretension, the nun for the sake of begging, and the nun through the vanquishing of afflictions.

Who is a nun by name? She who is called a nun by her name, or addressed by that name, or designated by a second term, or referred to by an honorary title, or identified by recognition, by being called out to, by being labeled, by conventional usage as a nun, or as one belonging to the class of nuns, or as one who has become like a nun — she is called a nun by name.

Who is a nun by pretension? She who, though not a nun, claims "I am a nun," and abides in that claim deceptively, and who likewise affirms herself as a nun by asserting "I am indeed a nun" — she is called a nun by pretension.

Who is a nun for the sake of begging? She who sustains her livelihood by practicing begging in accordance with the Dharma — she is called a nun for the sake of begging.

Who is a nun through the vanquishing of afflictions? She who has abandoned, thoroughly understood, cut off at the root, and made groundless as a palmyra tree (Skt. tāla) felled at its crown, those defilements (Skt. āsrava) that defile utterly, that produce continued existence, that are accompanied by disease, whose karmic maturation is suffering, and that lead to birth, aging, and death in future lives — so that they have become incapable of arising again in the future — she is called a nun through the vanquishing of afflictions.

In the present context, the intention is that "nun" refers to one who has received full ordination, since it is not appropriate to apply the motion-and-four-fold-act of formal procedure to one who is immovable. Therefore the term "nun" is used here as well.

The phrase "together with other nuns" means: together with those others who are her companions in the holy life, following the same Dharma.

The phrase "sharing the same training equally" means: the training to be followed by a nun who received full ordination one hundred years ago applies equally to one who receives full ordination today; and the training undertaken by one who receives full ordination today applies equally to one ordained one hundred years ago. This equality consists in equality of moral discipline itself, equality of training itself, and equality in the very recitation of the Sūtra of Individual Liberation (Skt. prātimokṣa). Therefore the expression "sharing the same training equally" is used.

The phrase "having become" means: having continued in that way.

As for the phrase "without having relinquished her training" — what constitutes not having relinquished one's training? It is this: if a nun, overcome by rage and in the grip of anger, relinquishes her training, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If someone who is deranged, whose mind is disturbed, or who is overwhelmed by feelings relinquishes her training, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If she relinquishes her training in the presence of someone who is angry or in the grip of anger, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If a nun relinquishes her training in the presence of a foolish woman, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. Like that foolish woman, if she relinquishes her training in the presence of one who is mute, one who is dumb, one who is overcome by sleep, one who has entered meditative absorption, an image of a god, an image of a buddha, a non-human being, an apparition, or a being that has taken the form of an animal, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If a woman from the heartland uses the words of the borderlands to relinquish her training before a person of the heartland, and that person of the heartland does not understand what is being said in the language of the borderlands, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. Likewise, if a woman from the borderlands uses the words of the heartland to relinquish her training before a person of the borderlands, and that person of the borderlands does not understand what is being said in the language of the heartland, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training.

If a woman from the borderlands uses the words of the borderlands to relinquish her training before a person of the heartland, and that person of the heartland does not understand what is being said in the language of the borderlands, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If a woman from the heartland uses the words of the heartland to relinquish her training before a person of the borderlands, and that person of the borderlands does not understand what is being said in the language of the heartland, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If one relinquishes her training with the perception that a secluded place is not secluded, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If one relinquishes her training with the perception that a non-secluded place is secluded, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If one who is mentally deranged relinquishes her training before one who is mentally deranged, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. If one who wishes to relinquish her training does so without making it known to any nun who is sound of mind and dwelling nearby, it should be declared that she has not relinquished her training. This is what is called not having relinquished one's training.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the Third Fascicle. On the matter called "not having violated one's training."

There is the case of having violated one's training and not having relinquished it. There is the case of not having violated one's training and yet having relinquished it. There is the case of having violated one's training and having relinquished it. And there is the case of not having violated one's training and not having relinquished it.

What is the case of having violated one's training and yet not having relinquished it? It is as follows. A nun who wishes to leave, who is discontented, who wishes to wander about and does not seek the way of the contemplative life, or who is wearied by the way of the contemplative life, or who has become despondent, or who is in doubt, or who is reproachful — such a person approaches a nun and says: "Noble ones, the celibate life is difficult to practice. It is difficult to live in complete solitude. It is difficult to find delight in being alone. It is difficult to fully embrace dwelling in forest refuges, at the edges of forests, and in remote places. For as long as I live I shall have parted from the pleasures and sports of people. For as long as I live I shall sleep on a bed of grass, leaves, and fallen foliage. For as long as I live I shall have to look to others for support in others' homes. For as long as I live I shall have to go in need to others for robes, alms-food, a lodging place, medicines for the sick, and requisites. I do not think of my mother. I think of my father, brothers, and sisters. Please entrust me to good households." Speaking thus, uttering words, phrases, expressions, speech, statements, definitive words, verbal formulations, spoken words, verbal actions, and verbal communications — all of them expressing the wish to wander away — and yet at the same time saying, "I am not giving up my training," this is the case of having violated one's training without having relinquished it.

What is the case of not having violated one's training and yet having relinquished it? It is as follows. A nun who wishes to leave, who is discontented, who wishes to wander about and does not seek the way of the contemplative life, or who is wearied by the way of the contemplative life, or who has become despondent, or who is in doubt, or who is reproachful — such a person approaches a nun and says: "Noble ones, please attend to this. I, who am called such-and-such by name, hereby relinquish the training of a nun." If she speaks thus, it should be declared that she has relinquished her training. If she says, "I give up the Buddha, I give up the Dharma, I give up the Saṅgha, I give up my preceptor and my teacher" — or even if she says, "Please regard me as a female contemplative, please regard me as a laywoman, please regard me as a woman of loose character, as an eunuch, as one who has been expelled from the Saṅgha" —

— or who has killed her mother, killed her father, killed an arhat, caused a schism in the Saṅgha, drawn blood from a Tathāgata with evil intent, who dwells by means of theft, who is a tīrthika, or who has entered the ranks of the tīrthikas — and who says: "I, one such as you, who live in accordance with the Dharma and walk the holy life, am content with this" — and who, wishing in this way to wander off, speaks such words, statements, utterances, expressions, definitive phrases, verbal formulations, vocal declarations, vocal actions, and vocal intimations, saying, "I hereby relinquish my training": it should be declared that she has relinquished her training. This is a case in which she has not violated her training and has relinquished it.

What then constitutes both violating one's training and relinquishing it? It is as follows. A nun who wishes to leave, who is displeased, who wants to wander off and does not wish to live the life of a female contemplative, or who is weary of the life of a female contemplative, or who has grown discouraged, or who is in doubt, or who is reproachful — such a person approaches a nun and says: "Noble ones, the holy life is hard to live. It is hard to dwell in complete solitude. It is hard to find joy in being alone. It is hard to endure dwelling in forest hermitages, in wood-edge retreats, and in remote border lodges. For as long as I live I shall be cut off from the joys and amusements that people enjoy. For as long as I live I shall make my bed of grass, leaves, and fallen foliage. For as long as I live I shall have to look to others in others' households, depending on their goodwill. For as long as I live I shall have to go seeking robes, alms-food, a seat and bedding, medicines for illness, and requisites from others in this way." "I do not remember my mother. I remember my father, my brothers, and my sisters. Please entrust me to good households." And then she says: "Please attend to this, you who possess the Dharma. I, who am called such-and-such by name, hereby relinquish my training. I give up the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, my preceptor, and my teacher." Or even if she says: "Please regard me as a female contemplative, please regard me as a laywoman, please regard me as a woman of loose character, as a eunuch, as one who has been expelled from the Saṅgha, as one who has killed her mother, killed her father, killed an arhat, caused a schism in the Saṅgha, drawn blood from a Tathāgata with evil intent, who dwells by means of theft, who dwells separately, who ought not to remain, who is a tīrthika, or who has entered the ranks of the tīrthikas" — or says: "I, one such as you, who live in accordance with the Dharma and walk the holy life, am content with this" — and then, wishing to wander off in this way, she speaks the words and so forth, as stated in full just as in the first section above — then, one who speaks both sets of words in this manner has both violated her training and relinquished it.

What then constitutes neither violating one's training nor relinquishing it? Any case other than those forms described above is one in which she has neither violated her training nor relinquished it.

"Unchaste conduct" means the coming together of two with two. "Intercourse" — unchaste conduct, whatever it is, is also intercourse. The word "Dharma" here is used as a term for the Dharma in reference to what is not Dharma. "If one engages in it" means if one practices it further. "Even with one born into an animal existence, and together with such" means together with a bear, a monkey, and the like.

"Nun" refers to one in whom the substance of being a nun is present. What is the substance of being a nun? It is full ordination. What is full ordination? It is the performing of the act of a request together with a motion and three announcements; the examination itself; the thorough examination itself; the completing; the thoroughly completing; the acceptance of that individual by the assembly; the explicit acceptance; the non-reversal; the non-turning-back; the non-annulment itself; and whatever constitutes speech, words, conventional expression, utterance, declaration, definitive words, the path of words, verbal expression, verbal action, and verbal communication. The word "this" here is a phrase of close indication and comprehensive indication. "Has incurred defeat" means that it is the last, a downfall, inferior, a settling at the end, a severance, and a contradiction of the mind. Furthermore, whoever commits that downfall becomes immediately unfit to be a nun, unfit to be a contemplative, unfit to be a daughter of the Śākya clan, and has fallen away from the substance of being a nun: her state as a contemplative is ruined, degraded, broken, a downfall, a defeat, and her state as a contemplative is beyond restoration. It is just as when the top of a palm tree is cut off it can no longer turn green, and can no longer grow, increase, or expand: in the same way, when a nun has done such a thing, the passage up to "becomes immediately unfit to be a nun" follows as before. "She is not to be allowed to remain" means that the nuns are not to share with her the restoration ceremony, the invitation ceremony, a single request, a request together with a second announcement, a request together with a motion and three announcements, and she is not to be appointed by appointment among the twelve kinds of individuals; and therefore it is said "she is not to be allowed to remain."

Now, how does one incur the downfall? A summary verse:

Alone, and by means of the three bodily openings, together with a human being and others, inclining toward contact, striving, causing intoxication, and being held by force.

If a nun practices the Dharma of intercourse, unchaste conduct, she incurs defeat. Furthermore, if any nun practices the Dharma of intercourse, unchaste conduct, with a human being by means of the three bodily openings — whether in the mouth, the passage for excrement, or the female organ — that nun has incurred defeat and is not to be allowed to remain. Just as she engages in the three bodily openings with a human being, so too if she engages with a non-human being or with one born into an animal existence, in all such cases she incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if any nun whose mind is inclined toward contact, who has fallen to contact, who having fallen there engages with a partially obstructed female organ in a partially obstructed manner, or with a partially obstructed organ in an unobstructed manner, or with an unobstructed organ in a partially obstructed manner, or with an unobstructed organ in an unobstructed manner, practices the Dharma of intercourse, unchaste conduct — in all such cases she incurs defeat.

Thus, here the same detailed explanation of the substance of the first defeat of a monk is to be presented, substituting "nun" throughout and elaborating accordingly. I have not written it out here because I fear excessive proliferation. The first defeat in brief is complete. As for the extensive treatment, it follows the individual liberation and analysis for monks.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the bamboo grove at Kalandaka in the Amra forest at Rājagṛha. At that time the monk Norchen, the former potter, was residing in a secluded corner of a hermitage in Rājagṛha. Then, when the monk Norchen, the former potter, had entered Rājagṛha for his alms round, the cowherds, cattle-herders, grass-cutters, wood-cutters, those who live by working the roads, and those who live by working the byways of Rājagṛha had smashed and overturned the hermitage and carried off all the grass and wood. After that, beginning with "then the monk Norchen, the former potter, arrived," everything is to be recited just as before, in full, up to "five māśakas or more than five māśakas." Then, from "the Blessed One, the buddha, on account of this occurrence, this basis, this matter, and this occasion, convened the assembly of both Saṅghas," everything is to be recited in full up to "known by both Saṅghas, and I shall properly establish the foundation of training in the Vinaya." The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, act with full knowledge while feigning not to know — they act as if unknowing, but it is not that they do not know — all of this is to be recited in full, just as in the first defeat. Likewise, everything up to "the ten benefits" is to be recited just as in the first defeat.

Furthermore, whatever nun, whether dwelling in a village or dwelling in a hermitage of others, takes what is not given — that which falls under the category of theft — whatever the amount she takes without it being given, if she is thereupon seized by a king or a great minister, and it is said to her: "O nun, you are a thief! You are a fool! You are an idiot! You have stolen!" — and she is either killed, bound, or expelled — if a nun takes in that way what has not been given, that nun has incurred a defeat and is not to remain in the community.

Now, "whatever nun" refers to the four types of nun: the nun in name only, the nun by her own claim, the nun for the sake of receiving, and the nun through the defeat of afflictions. "Of others" means of men, women, or those of indeterminate sex. "Dwelling in a village" means residing within an enclosure. "Dwelling in a hermitage" means residing outside an enclosure. "What is not given" means that which has not been given by any man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex. "That which falls under the category of theft" means that what is not given also falls under the category of theft. "If she takes" means if she receives. "Whatever amount she takes without it being given" means five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas. "By a king" means by any man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex who has been consecrated with the royal consecration and invested with sovereignty — such a one is indeed a king, is of royal lineage, and has received the head-consecration. "By a great minister" means by those other than that: ministers, accountants, and those belonging to the higher nobility who sustain the royal administration by virtue of shared confidences, and who live in dependence upon the king and sustain themselves thereby. "Having been seized" means having been apprehended. "And it is said to her: 'O nun, you are a thief! You are a fool! You are an idiot! You have stolen!'" — these are words of reproach. "It is said" means it is declared, it is proclaimed. "Killed" means deprived of life. "Bound" means restrained by any of three kinds of bonds — those made of iron, those made of wood, or those made of grass. "Or expelled" means made to leave the territory, however that may be. "A nun" means one in whom the substance of nunhood is present. Beginning with "that one," the word "also" here is a close indication, and — — the concluding term indicating what has been fully set forth — as well as "the motion," "the motion," and "two," and up to "the motion and the act of four": all of this is to be elaborated at length in exactly the manner of the first defeat. Now, as to how a transgression arises in this case:

In the general summary verse:

Oneself, space,
A cut in the earth, a mount, a boat,

The arising of autumn, water,
Theft, and seeking a site,
Footless, and a caṇḍāla,
And hanging last.

In the condensed summary:

Oneself, and the not-given,
Intention, and the fully seized, Perception, and the fourth four —
The fifth made into two.

If a nun takes another's heavy belongings without their being given, by three causes, a defeat arises. What are the three? By oneself, by one who has been commissioned, and by one who has been dispatched.

How is it by oneself? By oneself stealing, by oneself entering into theft, and by oneself moving the object from place to place. That is how it is by oneself.

How is it by one who has been commissioned? Having commissioned another who then steals, having commissioned another who then enters into theft, and having commissioned another who then moves the object from place to place. That is how it is by one who has been commissioned.

How is it by one who has been dispatched? Having dispatched another who then steals, having dispatched another who then enters into theft, and having dispatched another who then moves the object from place to place. That is how it is by one who has been dispatched.

If a nun takes another's heavy belongings without their being given, by these three causes, a defeat arises.

Furthermore, if a nun takes another's heavy belongings without their being given, by three causes, a defeat arises. What are the three? The not-given, the heavy, and the moving from place to place.

How is "the not-given" defined? Whatever has not been given by a man, a woman, or a hermaphrodite — that is the not-given.

How is "the heavy" defined? Five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas — that is what constitutes the heavy.

How is "moving from place to place" defined? Taking something from the place where it was kept and depositing it in another place — that is what moving from place to place means.

If a nun takes another's heavy belongings without their being given, by these three causes, a defeat transgression arises.

Furthermore, if a nun takes another's heavy belongings without their being given, by three causes, a defeat arises. What are the three? The formation of intent, the making of effort, and the moving from place to place.

All of this — as expanded in the condensed verse — is to be set forth in exactly the manner in which it appears in the Prātimokṣa of monks. And wherever the word "monk" appears there, in this Prātimokṣa of nuns it is to be rendered as "nun."

The second defeat is complete.

In the general summary verse:

One who has servants, the warding off of beasts,
Oneself, and poison,
The reviving of a corpse — the last.

In the condensed summary:

One who has servants, and one who keeps,
One with a beak, and śīriṣika,
Alms bowls, and the Dharma robe,
One dwelling in the womb, and a merchant.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling while making his retreat beside a pleasant river, in a grove of torch trees. There the Blessed One taught the community of monks: "Monks, cultivate the perception of the unattractive. When the perception of the unattractive is practiced, cultivated, and developed, it yields great fruit and great benefit." Having taught the unattractive, he also spoke in praise of the cultivation of the unattractive, and so the monks began to cultivate the perception of the unattractive.

While the monks were cultivating the perception of the unattractive, they became weary of this decaying body, oppressed by disgust, seized by uncertainty, and given to self-reproach. Some drew weapons, some took poison, some bound themselves with rope, and some leapt into ravines.

In this way, some monks were even killing other monks. Then one monk, weary of this decaying body, oppressed by disgust, seized by uncertainty, and given to self-reproach, went to where Migalandika the ascetic-barber was staying. Having arrived, he said to Migalandika the ascetic-barber: "Come here, good man. Separate me from my life, and whatever alms-bowl and robe I have shall be yours."

Then Migalandika the ascetic-barber deprived that monk of his life, and carrying the bloodied sword, went to the bank of a pleasant river. He sat crouching on the bank of that pleasant river, washing the blood from the sword.

Then a deity belonging to the retinue of Māra, who was abiding above the current of that pleasant river, spoke these words to Migalandika the ascetic-barber: "Excellent, excellent, good man! In this way, you, who help virtuous and accomplished ascetics cross over what has not been crossed, free what has not been freed, give relief to those not yet relieved, and lead to complete nirvāṇa those not yet completely gone beyond sorrow — great merit shall accrue to you. And that their alms-bowls and robes should come to you — this too is a fine acquisition for you."

Then Migalandika the ascetic-barber came to hold, with great enthusiasm, the deeply evil view: "It is true that great merit accrues to me when I help virtuous and accomplished ascetics cross over what has not been crossed, free what has not been freed, give relief to those not yet relieved, and lead to complete nirvāṇa those not yet completely gone beyond sorrow. And that their alms-bowls and robes should come to me — this too is a fine acquisition for mine own."

Then Migalandika the ascetic-barber tucked a sharp sword under his arm and went wandering from garden to garden, from assembly hall to assembly hall, from house to house, from walkway to walkway, and along the byways. Whenever he saw a monk, he spoke these words: "Who among the virtuous and accomplished ascetics has not yet crossed over and wishes to cross, has not yet been freed and wishes to be freed, has not yet been relieved and wishes relief, has not yet completely passed beyond sorrow and wishes to completely pass beyond sorrow?"

Then a certain monk who was dwelling in weariness, disgust, uncertainty, and self-reproach on account of this festering body came forward and said to Migalandika the ascetic-barber: "Good man, I have not yet crossed over — release me. I have not yet been freed — free me. I have not yet been relieved — give me relief. I have not yet completely passed beyond sorrow — lead me to complete nirvāṇa."

Then Migalandika the ascetic-barber deprived that monk of his life. And in the same way he deprived two, three, and up to sixty monks of their lives.

At that time the monks became few in number, diminished, scattered, and the monastic Saṅgha grew thin. Then, on the very day of the fifteenth, the Blessed One was seated on a prepared seat at the center of the monastic Saṅgha for the restoration ceremony. The Blessed One looked out over the entire assembly and spoke these words to the venerable Ānanda:

"Ānanda, what is the cause, what is the condition, by which the monks have now become few in number, diminished, scattered, and the monastic Saṅgha has grown thin?"

"Venerable sir, it is because the Blessed One taught the monks of the monastic Saṅgha the contemplation of the unattractive, instructing them in it and also speaking in praise of developing the unattractive — declaring that if one cultivates the unattractive, relies upon it, makes it familiar, and practices it repeatedly, the result will be great and the benefit will be great."

From the passage beginning "he taught the unattractive" up to "one must not kill" — and if one causes oneself or another to be killed — down to the passage ending with the training laid down on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, all of this is to be elaborated at length. And from that same point, drawing on it, the full analysis of the monk's rule is likewise to be given at length, just as it appears in the Monks' Code.

Then the Blessed One, by means of that very incident, that very occasion, that very matter, and that very circumstance, convened the assembly of both communities. And from the first defeat rule for monks, precisely as it stands, all is to be elaborated at length — up to the point where it is established that my hearers will understand this matter and that I will lay down the rule of training properly.

Furthermore, if a nun, with respect to a human being or to one who has human faculties, intentionally takes life with her own hand, or gives a weapon to that person, or procures a weapon-bearer for that person, or incites that person to die, or praises death to that person, saying such things as: "You, wretched one, what is the point of your living this evil, impure, and vile life? For you, death is better than life" — and if, through such intent of mind and such deliberation of mind, in many ways she incites that person to die or praises death to that person, and the one so incited subsequently dies — then that nun too has incurred defeat and is not to remain in the community.

Now, "a nun" refers to the four kinds of nun: the nun in name only, the nun who lays claim to the title, the nun who has entered for the sake of receiving alms, and the nun who has overcome the afflictions — just as in the first defeat rule, this is to be stated as before.

"A human being" refers to one in whose mother's womb the six faculties have been obtained: the faculty of the eye, the faculty of the ear, the faculty of the nose, the faculty of the tongue, the faculty of the body, and the faculty of the mind.

"One who has human faculties" refers to one in whose mother's womb these three faculties have been obtained: the faculty of the body, the faculty of the life force, and the faculty of the mind.

"Intentionally" means after having deliberated.

"With her own hand" means by means of her own hand.

"Takes life" means if life has been taken.

"Or gives a weapon to that person" refers to a sword, a razor, or a water-knife.

"Or procures a weapon-bearer for that person" means a man, a woman, or one of indeterminate sex.

"Or incites that person to die" — the person who is caused to seek death is of three kinds: one who is sick, one whose conduct is corrupt, and one whose conduct is pure.

As for one who is sick: suppose that nun — whether a monk or a nun — desires some robe, net, bowl, belt, or any requisite for the ascetic life from a sick monk or nun, and thinks: "As long as that person is alive I shall not obtain it. Let me go to that person and incite them to die." Having gone to that person, she speaks thus: "Venerable one, you are sick, you are suffering, you are gravely ill. As long as you live, venerable one, you will experience pain, agony, torment, burning heat, and misery" — and when she has said this...

And to that person she speaks thus: "What then am I to do? Come here. Abandon yourself. Destroy yourself. Allow yourself to be deprived of life." Having said this, if the sick person does abandon herself, or destroy herself, or allow herself to be deprived of life, the one who spoke incurs a root defeat.

If the sick person thinks: "She says such things, but still, a livelihood is hard to come by, and it is difficult to manage to kill oneself — so I will not abandon myself, I will not destroy myself, I will not allow myself to be deprived of life" — and accordingly does not abandon herself, does not destroy herself, and does not allow herself to be deprived of life, then by that earlier act of incitement to death a grave offense is nonetheless incurred.

If the sick person, moved by what was said to her, comes to feel remorse and thinks: "I am foolish, dull-witted, unclear in mind, and without understanding — I spoke words of doubt and reckless haste without having examined them one by one" — and goes to that nun and says: "I did indeed tell you to deprive yourself of life, but do not give up your own life. Why? Because if you are attended with suitable medicines individually prescribed, with agreeable food, and with proper nursing care, there is every prospect that before long you will become well, free of illness, and possessed of strength, and may go wherever you wish" — and if, having been turned back in this way, the sick person does not abandon herself, does not destroy herself, and does not allow herself to be deprived of life, still by that earlier act of incitement to death a grave offense is incurred.

If the sick person thinks: "She says such things, but who could endure sensations of the kind I am experiencing — pain, agony, torment, burning heat, wretchedness — and so I shall deprive myself of life" — and accordingly does abandon herself, or does destroy herself, or does allow herself to be deprived of life, then by that earlier act of incitement to death a grave offense is incurred. Such is the case with a sick person.

As for one whose conduct is corrupt: a nun desires some requisite for the ascetic life from a monk or a nun whose conduct is corrupt, and thinks: "As long as that person is alive I shall not obtain it. Let me go to that person and incite them to die" — and up to the point of actually going to that person, it proceeds as before.

Having gone to that person, she speaks thus: "You are one of corrupt conduct, a practitioner of evil Dharma, one who acts wrongly in body, who acts wrongly in speech and mind, who oozes from within like something rotten, who has heaped up defilements like grass, who ranges about everywhere like an unbridled donkey, who claims to be an ascetic without being one, who claims to practise the holy life without actually practising it. So long as you live, for as long as you continue to exist, demerit will grow greatly — and after that you will experience, among the beings of hell, sensations of extreme suffering, extreme agony, extreme torment, and intense burning heat and experiences that are supremely disagreeable." When that was said, the other replied to him: "Then what am I to do?" At that point the first said to him: "Come here. Abandon yourself. Destroy yourself. Let yourself be deprived of life. If you die, these many such forms of demerit will not go on increasing, and you will not go on experiencing feelings of suffering so unbearable, so harsh, so hot, and so disagreeable." Having said that, if the other, upon hearing those words, abandons himself, or kills himself, or sets about depriving himself of life, that very act of having caused death constitutes a root downfall.

If, however, the other thinks: "He has indeed said this to me, yet life is difficult to find again, and it is hard to manage killing oneself — so I will not abandon myself, I will not kill myself, I will not set about depriving myself of life," and if, thinking thus, he neither abandons himself, nor kills himself, nor sets about depriving himself of life, then that earlier act of inducing him toward death is itself a grave offence.

If, upon hearing those words spoken to him, the other feels remorse and thinks: "I am foolish, stupid, dull, and unskilled; I spoke rashly and in confusion; I spoke words I had not considered," and he then goes to that person and says: "I did indeed say to you, 'Deprive yourself of life,' yet now I say to you: do not deprive yourself of life." And why? "Because if you were to please some spiritual friend, you could be lifted out of whatever impure conduct of body you have and established in virtuous bodily action; you could be lifted out of non-virtuous action of speech and mind and firmly established in virtuous action of speech and mind. If your conduct of body, speech, and mind were thus wholesome, there would come a time when, upon the breakup of this body, you would be born in a happy destiny, in the higher realms, among the gods of the celestial world." If, after saying all this, the other still neither abandons himself, nor kills himself, nor sets about depriving himself of life, that earlier act of inducing him toward death is itself a grave offence.

If the other thinks: "He has spoken thus to me, yet so long as I live, demerit will continue to arise in me in great abundance, and for as long as demerit keeps arising in me, I will experience suffering that is especially vast and especially long-lasting among the beings of hell — therefore I must certainly deprive myself of life. I will abandon myself, I will kill myself, I will deprive myself of life." And if, thinking thus, he does abandon himself, or kills himself, or deprives himself of life, that very earlier act of inducing him toward death constitutes a grave offence. That is how it stands for one who is without moral discipline.

Now, how does it stand for one who possesses moral discipline? In the following way. A nun who desires some article for the requisites of the ascetic life — just as described before — goes to a monk or nun who is endowed with good qualities, and says: "You are endowed with moral discipline, you are of wholesome Dharma, you are possessed of many excellent qualities. If you were to go to another region, the harvest there would be good and the higher realms would be all but assured — — liberation is but a hand's breadth away, and the higher realms are assured by a silken thread alone; when this body breaks, rebirth among the gods will follow. Once you are born in the higher realms, you will be adorned with divine garments, necklaces, and bracelets upon your body; you will be satisfied in body by the nectar of the gods; you will experience the bliss of the gods."

If, when these words are said, that person replies, "Very well, but what am I to do?" — and the other then says, "Come here. Abandon your own life. Destroy your own life. Separate yourself from your life-force" — and if, in response to those words, that person does indeed separate from the life-force and dies, then through having caused death, the speaker incurs a root downfall (pārājika).

If, however, the one who possesses moral discipline thinks: "Although that person has spoken in this way, it is difficult to obtain a living one; self-destruction is difficult to accomplish. Therefore I will not abandon my own life. I will not kill myself. I will not separate myself from my life-force" — and accordingly does not abandon life, does not kill, does not separate from the life-force — even so, by reason of that very prior act of directing toward death, a grave offence arises.

If that person, having heard these words, becomes remorseful, goes to the other, and says: "Venerable one, know this: I was childish, foolish, confused, and unskilled. Out of uncertainty and rashness I spoke something unworthy. Do not abandon your own life. Do not kill yourself. Do not separate yourself from your life-force. Why so? Because the Venerable one is endowed with moral discipline, is of wholesome Dharma, is possessed of many excellent qualities. May you live long — and by living long, much merit will arise. For if you act in that way, you will for a long time experience great happiness among the gods" — and if, having been thus dissuaded, the other does not separate from the life-force and does not die, even so, by reason of that very prior act of directing toward death, a grave offence arises.

If the person who possesses moral discipline thinks: "Although that one has said these things, I am endowed with moral discipline and great learning, I am of wholesome Dharma and possessed of many excellent qualities; if I were to go to another region, the harvest there would be good; the higher realms are assured by a silken thread alone, liberation is but a hand's breadth away, and when this body breaks I will be reborn among the gods" — and thinking thus, does abandon the life, does kill, does separate from the life-force — then by that very prior act of directing toward death, a grave offence arises.

That is how it stands for one who possesses moral discipline. Therefore it is taught: "Has caused to be directed toward death."

As for what is said — "one may speak praise of death" — this means speaking praise of death in the presence of one who openly delights in dying. What is said, "O man!" and so forth are words of address. "What is the use of this sinful, impure, wretched life? O man, death is better for you than life" — these are words of disparagement. "Saying" means: while uttering these words. The rest is to be explained in full according to the first root downfall as set forth above.

As for "may not remain" — the nuns may not carry out with that person acts done with one motion, two motions, or four motions together with an invitation; the nuns may not appoint that person to any of the twelve offices. Therefore it is taught: "May not remain."

This, then, is to be stated in the Vinaya of the bhikṣuṇīs as the third root downfall. As for the rest, it is to be stated just as in the Vinaya of the monks. The third root downfall is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Vaiśālī, in the Gabled Hall beside the Monkey Pool. At that time, five hundred fishermen were settled there beside a pleasant river, making their livelihood. Among them there were two groups called the Net-Casters and the Great-Net-Casters. Sometimes the Net-Casters would cast the net, and sometimes the Great-Net-Casters would cast it. When there were no fish to buy, the Net-Casters would cast the net; when there were fish to buy, the Great-Net-Casters would cast the net.

Now at a certain time a festival arose in Vaiśālī, and they set both nets together: two hundred and fifty cast the net of the Net-Casters, and two hundred and fifty cast the net of the Great-Net-Casters. Those who cast the net of the Net-Casters heaped up great mounds of fish, turtles, tortoises, young crocodiles, and many species of fish-eggs and the like — heaped up like great mounds of sesame, rice, thick rice porridge, pine seeds, and peas. Those who cast the Great Net drew into the pleasant river from the great ocean a vast crocodile-fish of enormous size, asleep like a great hare, and they began to haul it in. As they pulled, it awoke and charged at those two hundred and fifty fishermen along with their Great Net, heading upstream. Those fishermen called out to the other two hundred and fifty: "Friends! The Great Net and we ourselves are being carried off — come and turn it back!" Hearing that, the other two hundred and fifty fishermen also came and plunged in at that very spot, and they too were swept away.

Then someone standing on high ground nearby called out, and herders, cowherds, and others came and with great effort pulled it out — a crocodile-fish, piled up like a mountain, with eighteen heads and thirty-six eyes.

As a great crowd of people came and gathered there, six teachers who were not teachers and yet claimed to be teachers, who were not omniscient and yet claimed omniscience, also arrived at that time to watch the spectacle. Who were these six? They were: Pūraṇa Kāśyapa, Makkhali Gośāla's son, Sañjaya Vairaṭiputra the Victorious, Ajita Keśakambala, Kakuda Kātyāyana, and Nirgrantha Jñātaputra — these six who claimed to be teachers while not being teachers had also come at that time to witness the spectacle.

Meanwhile, the Blessed One, the Buddha — possessing nothing whatsoever of unknowing, unseeing, ignorance, or failure to comprehend, the Blessed One by nature living and dwelling in luminous presence, endowed with great compassion, engaged in benefiting others, unwavering in virtuous conduct, steadfast in diligence that overcomes all adversaries, solitary in his courage, solitary in his guardianship, without a second, not speaking in dualities, abiding in calm abiding and insight, illumining the three knowledges, well trained in the three trainings, skilled in the three bases of discipline, having abandoned the three paths, free from attachment in all three realms, unfrightened and undaunted by the four fearlessnesses, having crossed the four rivers, well established in the ground of conduct of the four bases of miraculous power, long perfected in the four means of gathering beings, having abandoned the five limbs, having truly transcended the five destinies, fully completing the six perfections, endowed with the six limbs, dwelling in the six things that are to be constantly maintained, richly adorned with the flowers of the seven branches of awakening, and teaching the noble eightfold path — skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions, possessed of the ten powers, their renown spread and acclaimed in every one of the ten directions, supreme and distinguished above all who exercise sovereignty over a hundred worlds — it is the very nature of reality of such ones that, three times by day and three times by night, they survey the world with the eye of a buddha, perceiving: who has declined, who has progressed, who has come to harm, who has fallen into distress, who has met with harm and distress and misery; whose root of virtue has not yet been planted must have it planted; whose root of virtue has already been planted must have it brought to full ripening; whose root of virtue has fully ripened must have it brought to liberation; whoever is without the wealth of noble ones must be established in the lordship of noble wealth; whoever abides at a human fruit, whoever is to be trained by a buddha, whoever is to be trained by śrāvakas, whoever is to be trained by both buddhas and śrāvakas, whoever proceeds under the sway of attachment, whoever proceeds under the sway of aversion, whoever proceeds under the sway of delusion, whoever proceeds under the sway of attachment, aversion, and delusion together, whoever has been harmed by their transgressions, whoever is inclined toward the lower destinies, whoever is falling toward the lower destinies, whoever has fallen into the lower destinies — these I shall raise up from the lower destinies and firmly establish in higher states and in the fruit; whoever is sunk in the mire of harmful conduct, I shall draw out by the hand; and I shall make the world, adorned as it is with the arising of buddhas, bear abundant fruit — with such knowing and seeing, the Blessed One enters into contemplation.

Then it was further declared in verse:

The ocean's dwelling-place, the realm of sea-monsters, may pass beyond its season and cease to be — yet a buddha, with love for those to be trained, does not pass beyond the season, nor ever fails.

Just as a mother, with her only beloved child, thinks of that child and guards its very life, so too the Tathāgata thinks of those to be trained and guards their very lives with tender care.

With compassion riding through the stream of omniscient mind, the mother-cow seeking her beloved calf is never weary — to those fallen, diminished in saṃsāra and the lower destinies, loving-kindness is like a mother-cow ever seeking her lost and cherished calf.

Thereupon the Blessed One's vision — that eye free from all obscuration, seeing through primordial wisdom, the buddha-eye — surveyed everything and contemplated: the beings of the fish and sea-monster class, those inclined toward the lower destinies, those falling toward the lower destinies, those who have already fallen into the lower destinies — though they did cultivate virtue in relation to former buddhas, they are now bereft of the arising of a buddha, and for many thousands of years have been experiencing suffering in the hells. Therefore, making use of this fish and sea-monster class, I shall draw forth a great assembly of those to be trained. He made evident and directly present the truth that sentient beings are the masters of their own karma. Thinking, therefore, "I shall go to the bank of a fair and lovely river," the Blessed One so resolved and proceeded.

The blessed buddhas, by the very nature of reality, are compassionate toward those beings who are to be trained. Therefore, from time to time they travel through the hells, roam through the animal realm, roam through the realm of hungry ghosts, roam through the realm of the gods, and journey through the various regions. From time to time they travel to mountains, to charnel grounds, to rivers, and to temples. It is with this purpose in mind that the blessed Buddha is said to travel to the river — from the point of "making a smile" up to the passage in which the Blessed One addresses the venerable Ānanda, declaring: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'Monks, the Tathāgata intends to travel to the river; any of you who wishes to go to the river together with the Tathāgata, take up your robes'" — from here the opening subject-matter of the saffron-robed monks is to be extensively expounded. From the passage beginning "five hundred fishermen," the noble Śāriputra spoke in verse:

The Tathāgatas do not regard clan,
Lineage, or family with partiality;
They look with full discernment at the deeds
That have been done throughout the long, long past.

Up to and including that verse, and then up to the passage in which the offering is presented to the Blessed One and the Blessed One calls the monks forward with the words "Monks, come here," up through their full ordination by that call — and then what was further said:

When the Tathāgata uttered the call "Come here,"
They bore bodies still clothed in matted hair and bark garments;
Yet in an instant their sense faculties became perfectly calm,
And by the Buddha's intention their forms were covered over.

Up to and including that verse.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the Fourth Fascicle.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling together with the community of monks in Vaiśālī, in the city of Prabhāvatī. At that time there was a severe famine, the region was desolate, and alms-food was difficult for mendicants to obtain — from that passage up to and including the words "to say nothing of mendicants."

Then the Blessed One spoke to the monks: "Monks, at present there is a famine" — from that passage up to "alms-food is difficult for mendicants to obtain" — and then: "Monks, come here. According to what kind of invitation you receive, what kind of welcome is offered, and what kind of companionship is available, agree to spend the rains retreat right here in the vicinity of Vaiśālī. I too shall spend the rains retreat here in this very vicinity near Prabhāvatī together with my attendant monk, the venerable Ānanda. It would be improper if everything were made troublesome by begging for alms throughout the entire retreat" — from that passage up to: "Monks, go to wherever relatives are present by the banks of the pleasant river, and accept to spend the rains retreat by relying on the banks of the pleasant river."

From that passage up to the words "they proclaimed their qualities before the relatives."

The two assemblies — the gathering and the great gathering: the first is up to and including the words "the time of the rains retreat approach, on the middle day of the rains month."

Up to and including the passage about monks who had accepted to spend the rains retreat in the vicinity of the city of Vaiśālī and in the city of Prajñapti, having completed the rains retreat and returned — and up to "the venerable Ānanda welcomed them with words."

Those who came from the banks of the pleasant river were welcomed with words — from that passage up to "abounding in fat, hide, flesh, and blood" — and then from the venerable Ānanda's inquiry up to the words "by what was not proper."

He spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there are three kinds of thieves existing in the world — thieves, and great thieves. What are the three? Monks, first there is a thief who leads a band of a hundred or a band of a thousand, who marches at the head of a hundred or a thousand, who breaks into homes, who opens locked fastenings, who seizes property outright, who lies in wait on the road, who holds people without releasing them, who destroys roads, who steals from the royal treasury, who plunders villages, who destroys towns, who devastates entire regions — this, monks, is the first thief existing in the world, a thief and a great thief.

"There is yet another thief and great thief who does not lead a band of a hundred, nor a band of a thousand, who does not march at the head of a hundred or a thousand, who does not break into homes, who does not open locked fastenings" — and so on, as before — "yet who sells and sells again the Saṅgha's grass, wood, flowers, fruit, milk, or any other measured goods to sustain himself, and by doing so does not support the household: this is the second thief and great thief existing in the world.

"There is yet another thief and great thief who does not even have a retinue of five hundred —"

"— who does not even have a retinue of a thousand, who does not march at the head of a hundred or a thousand" — and so forth, as before — "who does not sell and sell again the Saṅgha's grass, wood, flowers, fruit, milk, or any other measured goods to sustain himself, and who does not support the household: yet who, though entirely without the supreme human quality, claims to possess it — this is the third thief and great thief existing in the world.

"Monks, a thief who has a retinue of a hundred, or a retinue of a thousand, who marches at the head of a hundred or a thousand and breaks into homes, as described before — such a one is the lesser kind. Among thieves, one who takes the Saṅgha's grass or wood" — and so forth as before — "is also the lesser kind. But one who claims a supreme human quality he does not possess — that one is the thief and great thief in the world together with its gods, its māras, its Brahmās, its ascetics (śrāmaṇas) and brahmins, and its beings both divine and human.

Here one who has not become an arhat yet claims to himself the status of an arhat — that one is a thief in the world with all its gods;

he is to be declared one of broken moral discipline.

Of corrupted wisdom, when the body has crumbled, he will be born among the hell-beings.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this very occurrence, this very occasion, this very matter, and this very circumstance, convened the assembly of both communities, and — just as in the first case of defeat, from informing the female hearers so that all will know, up through 'I shall establish the training well' — the proclamation of the rule in full is to be given, in the same manner as the first defeat.

Furthermore, as for the phrase 'whatever nun' — it is as before, from 'among the four classes of nuns,' up through the point where, since the deed of a motion with four proclamations that is unshakable is not appropriate in this context, one should understand 'whatever full ordination constitutes the status of a fully ordained nun.'

As for 'not directly knowing' — what does she not directly know? The five aggregates: form and so forth.

As for 'not fully knowing' — what does she not fully know? Those same five aggregates: form and so forth.

As for 'the human quality' — these are the five hindrances.

As for 'the supreme' — it is the abandonment of those.

As for 'the ultimate' — it is nirvāṇa.

As for 'the noble' — these are the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, and the Buddha's hearers.

As for 'the distinction attained' — these are the four fruits of the contemplative life; attaining them is what is called 'attaining the distinction.'

As for 'knowing' — it is knowing suffering, the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path.

As for 'seeing' — it is the knowledge that sees suffering, the origin, cessation, and the path.

As for 'abiding in contact' — these are the four meditative concentrations (dhyānas); in the noble discipline (Vinaya), 'abiding in contact' refers exclusively to contact with what is seen, the Dharma.

As for 'without' — it refers to that basis being absent.

As for 'while being without' — it refers to that very person.

As for 'I know this' — what does she know? She knows suffering.

She knows the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path. As for 'seeing' — what does she see? She sees gods, nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, zombies, and corpse-reanimators.

As for 'having claimed' — it means having stated it. As for 'that transgression has occurred' — it refers to that very basis. As for 'wishing to become pure' — it means wishing to rise up. As for 'at some other time' — it means at a different occasion. As for 'whether asked' — it means asked by another. As for 'whether not asked' — it means that she herself feels remorse, regret, and dismay arising in her mind.

As for 'thus did the venerable one say, "What I did not know, I now know"' — this is through mental consciousness. As for 'and said, "I saw what I had not seen"' — this is through visual consciousness.

As for 'fabricated,' 'covered up,' and 'spoke falsely' — these are synonymous expressions for having spoken. As for 'if it is said' — it means if it is uttered. As for 'except for overweening pride' — it means with overweening pride set aside. As for 'nun' — it means one who possesses the essential qualities of a nun, as before. As for 'also' — this is a particle of proximate and comprehensive indication. The transgression is to be stated in the same manner as it was stated for the first case of defeat.

Now, how does one incur the transgression in this case? The summary verse:

Shifting perception, the wilderness, spreading one's mat in houses, claiming one's own defining marks, and presenting oneself.

Furthermore, any nun who, having shifted her perception, tolerance, desire, understanding, thought, and view, says "I see gods" — she incurs defeat. Likewise with nāgas, yakṣas, and all the rest down to corpse-reanimators — saying "I see them" — she incurs defeat. In this way, the summary verse from the Vinaya of the monks, wherever the word 'monk' appears, is to be read and stated with 'monk' replaced by 'nun.'

The fourth case of defeat is complete.

The summary verse for the background story that follows:

Little desire, and both together, fair complexion, brahmacarya, direct knowledge, born wealthy, of high lineage, and little desire — Kāśyapa.

The monks, having grown doubtful, asked the Blessed One, the buddha, to cut through all their doubts. They said: "Venerable Great Kāśyapa and the lovely Śersky — please look upon them both with their little desire." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now" — up to "in the time gone by as well." "These two, having performed and accumulated deeds" — from here it is to be expanded in full.

"Monks, in a time long past, in a certain royal palace, there was a farmer who rose early in the morning. He took his pickaxe and plough and set off to clear a field. He instructed his wife to bring food when the sun had risen. His wife took the food and was coming, when just at that moment a rhinoceros-like solitary buddha arrived. She bowed at his feet and rose, and he spoke" — up to here. Then, from "the solitary buddha sat in the sky" — she offered him alms food and made aspirational prayers. "Whatever transgression I committed, being under the power of all the afflictions" — from here to "may we both become those of little desire."

"Monks, the one who was the farmer at that time and place — he is this very Kāśyapa."

"Monks, the one who was the farmer's wife at that time and place — she is this very Śerkyabzangmo. Because these two, at that time, offered alms food to the solitary buddha and made aspirational prayers, both of them came to have little desire" — up to here.

"Therefore, monks, you should strive to abandon attachment. By doing so, you will come to develop an abundance of virtuous qualities. Monks, you should train in this way" — up to here.

Then, from "Furthermore, monks" as far as "What deed did the venerable Mahākāśyapa and the girl Bzangmo, daughter of Śerkyā, perform, on account of which both of them went forth?" — up to there.

The Blessed One declared: "It was through the power of aspirational prayer. Where was this? Monks, long ago, in a time past, in a suburb outside a great city, there was a potter's workshop. At a time when no buddha was present in the world, a solitary buddha appeared — one who was compassionate toward the poor and destitute, and who was devoted to benefiting sentient beings. That solitary buddha went to the place where the potter's workshop was, and, having arrived, said to the potter: 'Good sir, if it is no inconvenience to you, let me stay in one corner of the workshop.' When he said this, the potter replied to the solitary buddha: 'Noble one, please dwell as comfortably as you like.' Then that solitary buddha spread a grass mat in one corner of the workshop and sat in cross-legged posture, his body coiled like a sleeping serpent-king.

Then a second solitary buddha also came" — up to "he obtained lodging from that potter and stayed in the second corner of the same workshop." "A third came and stayed in the third corner" — up to there. "Likewise a fourth came and stayed in the fourth corner" — up to there.

Then, as the sun set and the night deepened, those four solitary buddhas entered into meditative absorption on the fire element, and the potter, peering through a crack in the door, saw the entire workshop blazing, burning intensely, burning on all sides, the flames merging into one. He thought: "How remarkable that such worthy recipients have come and taken up residence in my workshop! This is a sign of my great power and of the merit I possess."

And again he spoke these words:

"O what wonder — worthy recipients have come!
Long indeed have I yearned to see this sight.
In this world and the world beyond,
I shall abide in happiness itself."

Those solitary buddhas too, wishing to cultivate roots of virtue for their patron, spent the night in meditative concentration (dhyāna), liberation, meditative absorption (samādhi), and meditative attainment, and then began to delight one another.

Then those solitary buddhas said to one of their number: "Who are you? Where are you from? Why, and in what manner, did you go forth?" When they asked him this, he replied to them: "Venerable ones, have you heard that in the land of Kālīṅga there arose a king called Karṇajalendhara?" They replied: "We have heard of him. Moreover, we have also heard that that king Karṇajalendhara is wealthy and of great dominion, and possesses many elephants." He said: "What you have all heard is true. Yet I, having seen the faults of royal sovereignty, went forth." They replied: "What fault did you see in royal sovereignty that led you to go forth?" He said:"

"If there is a fault, it is not a small one. What is it like? Listen, venerable ones. Once, while I was sitting on the roof of a fine upper palace chamber, a bird seized a piece of meat and flew up into the sky, whereupon many other birds attacked it for that very reason. The one that dropped the meat was freed, and the one that seized it was surrounded from all sides. In this way they snatched it back and forth from one another. As I watched this, clear and proper reflection arose in me: the one that takes hold is bound, while the one that lets go is free. Since I, enjoying the full prosperity of royal sovereignty, would inevitably come to fighting, quarreling, and warfare with the kings under the sun on account of it, I thought: enough of the pleasures of royal sovereignty. And so, finding that cause and that condition, I was decisively moved, and taking up residence in the forest of ascetic practice, I there actualized the awakening of a pratyekabuddha."

He then spoke in verse:

When a bird carried off a piece of meat,
I watched as all the other birds gave chase and circled round.
Recognizing thus the nature of desire,
I chose to wander solitary, like a rhinoceros.

When they heard those words, they asked the second one how he had gone forth. The venerable ones asked him whether he had heard of a king named Gdong-ma-legs in the land of the Mithilas — up to the point where it says "while sitting on the roof of a fine upper palace chamber." The version continues: when he saw two bull elephants goring and wounding each other out of desire, clear and proper reflection arose in him, thinking: even these two beings born in the animal realm wound and injure each other on account of desire — up to the words "fighting, quarreling, disparaging, and warring with the kings under the sun," and then "he went forth and actualized the awakening of a pratyekabuddha." He then spoke in verse:

Seeing the stirring, the cunning, the ground and cause of desire, watching them wound one another and drive each other away, recognizing thus the nature of desire,
I chose to wander solitary, like a rhinoceros.

When they heard those words as well, they asked the third one: "Where are you from, and how did you go forth?" He replied: "I am from this very royal palace in the city of Vārāṇasī, under a king named Brahmadatta" — up to the point where it says "he came to possess many hundreds of elephant mounts."

They said to him: "What fault did you see in royal sovereignty? What flaw did you perceive in desire?"

He replied: "Listen. Once, when the winter season was past, its cold spell gone, and the spring season had arrived — when the blossoms on the trees bloomed beautifully, when the drone of bees in flight swayed the lovely crowns of flowers, when the fragrance of sandalwood drifted agreeably, when the call of the cuckoo rang out, when in the groves the calls of geese, cranes, peacocks, parrots, and cuckoos filled the air — I went with the ladies of the harem to the pleasure garden. There I saw that the mango tree was in exceedingly full flower, and the ladies of the harem, seized by attachment to those blossoms, in an instant snapped off the branches and left them lying. At that I thought to myself: these outer things are beautiful when they are flourishing, and ugly when they are damaged.

I thought to myself that there could be no doubt about it — this is what it means to enjoy a kingdom in its full abundance — and so I went forth and directly realized the awakening of a pratyekabuddha. And then I spoke this verse:

When I saw the mango tree in glorious flower at its crown, and saw those attached to its lovely form,
I understood in that way the qualities of desire,
and came to wander alone, like a rhinoceros.

The fourth person was then asked: "Who are you, and how did you go forth?" He replied, from the point where it was said that he came to be known as the naked king, Rulbuchul, when he slept in the lap of a woman — up to the point where he went up to the upper chamber of a fine mansion and lived there, enjoying pleasures. There, a queen of the Sāla clan, adorned with golden bracelets, was weaving. As she wove, a sound arose — and from that, up to the point described, I thought to myself: these outer things are without mind, and yet when they are struck repeatedly a sound comes forth — so what need is there to speak of my enjoying the full abundance of a kingdom? A kingdom alone will do. And so thinking that by abandoning the kingdom I had found a condition that let me see even small faults and flaws with clarity, I resolved with certainty, went forth, and directly realized the awakening of a pratyekabuddha. And then I spoke this verse:

The two golden bracelets on the wrists, gleaming bright, well-hammered by the goldsmith's art — hearing the striking, between me and another living together under this one roof, harsh and various words would break out, the mind thrown into turmoil.

I understood in that way the qualities of desire,
and came to wander alone, like a rhinoceros.

So it was that they sat, each speaking to the other in this way. Then the potter and his wife thought to themselves: these great and noble ones have abandoned even a vast kingdom of wide lineage and gone forth — why then do we, in this manner of beggar-like striving, pursue what is to be had from a household life with home and children and cook-pots and household implements, clinging to it with the perception of enjoyment? Why should we not go forth as well? And then they spoke this verse:

Abandoning the ground of village and surrounding lands and wealthy lineage, if one walks through the human world with a mind free of attachment, why should we go on manifestly pursuing what we have gained through the manner of the destitute, carried away like something swept off by water?

And so it was that at dawn, when the night had ended and day broke, the potter's husband, with a devoted and reverent mind, invited those pratyekabuddhas and offered them alms — up to what is described — and they rose up into the sky above. Then the potter's husband uttered this aspiration: "Wonderful! By this wholesome root of giving what is to be given and of generating the awakening mind, may we never again be born in a poor man's house! May we too be so fortunate as to possess the Dharma of this kind! May we please this supremely excellent Teacher in this way, and never displease him!" Having said this, the two of them rejoiced greatly in the going forth.

Then for a time the potter, carrying a water jar, went to fetch water — up to what is described — and his wife, having been touched by this, turned back. From that point up to where the wife went forth is told; and she thought: "If I am not to be deceived, what shall I do now? These two children must be raised and nurtured." And so she raised and nurtured the two of them until they grew up. At that time the potter, with what was ripe and what was not yet ripe, and what was salt-brined, tested the salted ones that were not yet brined. He also spoke these words in verse:

Just as one knows the ripe and the unripe,
and the salted and the unsalted alike,
since these two children have been born knowing this,
now is the time for me to go forth.

He then instructed the two children in this manner: "Dig the clay thus; sell the wares thus" — and so on up to what is described — and then he went forth. And from the passage beginning "seeing the potter going on alms round," the verse is spoken:

Just as one knows the ripe and the unripe,
and the salted and the unsalted alike,
since these two children have been born knowing this,
my dear wife has gone, and I shall go too.

The Blessed One declared: "Now, the potter of that time and that occasion is none other than Mahākāśyapa. The potter's wife is none other than the daughter of the householder, Bhadra of the merchant family. At that time too, they went forth with but slight disenchantment. Even now it is the same. What then should be done? By teaching the causes that lead to renunciation, one comes to possess such an accumulation of qualities. Monks should train just as Mahākāśyapa and Bhadra, the daughter of the householder, trained."

The summary verse reads:

Kāliṅga and the one with pendulous ears,
Mithilā and the one of comely face,
Kāśī and Brahmadatta,
sleeping on the breast and the naked ascetic.

Then, monks having arisen in doubt, in order to cut through all doubt, they addressed the Blessed One, the buddha, saying: "Blessed One, what karma did Bhadra of the householder's family perform and accumulate, such that by its ripening she came to be possessed of a beautiful and lovely form, pleasing to behold?" — up to what is described.

"Monks, long ago in a past time, in a certain royal palace there ruled a king" — and so on up to — "a wealthy merchant caravan leader, with great riches and vast possessions." Now, when he looked at the assembled multitude of people, he saw many hundreds and thousands of sentient beings with rough hands and feet, their bodies covered in sores, their heads disheveled, smeared with dust, their features sunken, wretched from heat and cold, afflicted with suffering. Others he saw clad in fine garments upon their bodies, adorned with distinctive ornaments, riding horses, elephants, men bearing litters, and chariots, endowed with the finest prosperity. Then he thought to himself: "These suffering beings have come to this condition through the karma of not having given in generosity. Even now, since they are unable to give generously, after dying and passing from here they will be reborn in whatever lowly destiny it may be — such is their situation. But those who are prosperous have come to be so through distinguished acts of generosity. I too will certainly, in another birth, give generosity, and thereby I shall obtain prosperity of this kind. And let me give, so that in other lifetimes I shall not fall into suffering." Having thought this, he went home and spoke to his wife as follows: "Bhadra, I am going to accumulate wealth for the world beyond and carry it away." She replied: "Very well, then let the mounts — the horses, the mares, and the donkeys — be prepared." He replied: "What use are these mounts? Ordinary wealth cannot be carried to the world beyond. Nevertheless, give generously, without ceasing, to the poor, the destitute, the blind, and to merchants who come to the house." She replied: "So shall I do."

At a time when no Blessed One, no buddha, had appeared in the world, a pratyekabuddha (solitary buddha) was to appear instead. This pratyekabuddha — gaunt and frail, wearing a tattered robe — had entered the royal palace precincts on his alms round, and there he stood at the gate of the merchant's house. Some male and female servants were coming out of that house to fetch water, and when they saw this gaunt and frail figure in his tattered robe, they thought: "The master has instructed us to give whatever is desired to anyone who is in suffering. We should show this noble mendicant the same kindness." And so they said to the venerable one: "Please enter this house; you will receive alms here."

He went in. But the merchant's wife, seeing him, thought: "He is just a gaunt and frail fellow in a tattered robe," and she gave him no alms. He departed. The servant women, having filled their water jars, returned to the house, and when they saw his alms bowl still empty, they asked him: "Did you not come to this house?" He replied: "I came, but I received no alms." They turned him around and brought him back, and they said to the mistress of the house: "Why was he not given alms?" She replied: "Because I had no faith in him." They said: "Did the master tell you to give only to those with good complexions, and only when you had faith?" She replied: "Since I have had no faith in him, what is the use of saying more?"

One of the servant women then thought: "If I take this monk back a second time and he is again turned away, a decision must be made right now as to how to send him off properly." So she said to the mistress: "Please give me a small measure of the finest milled grain from my own provisions." The mistress gave it, and the servant woman took a small measure of the day's ground flour and offered it to him. Then she thought further: "This noble one is being looked down upon because he wears a tattered robe; I shall offer him my own piece of cloth." And so she also offered him a length of white cloth.

The pratyekabuddha, for his part, thought: "This young woman will accomplish great merit." In order to arouse her faith, he soared up into the middle of the sky like a king of geese spreading his wings. The moment she saw this, her mind was filled with faith, and with a feeling of joy, delight, and elation, she knelt on the ground, bowed at his feet, and reflected: "However slight the disrespect shown to this noble one, it came from a poor complexion." And she made this aspiration: "Ah! By this root of virtue — the giving away of what is to be given as a gift — may I, in whatever birth I take and in whatever place I am born, be beautiful of form and fair of complexion, utterly lovely to behold. May I never be gaunt, and may I never have an ugly complexion."

Now at that very time a certain king was seated there, surrounded by a retinue of ministers and encircled by many hundreds and thousands of people, and the shadow of that pratyekabuddha fell upon him. He looked up and saw the pratyekabuddha — robed in his Dharma robe, holding a length of white cloth, his head shaved and his bowl black, moving through the sky in a manner at once singular and beautiful. The king thought: "A great person of this kind, who goes from place to place collecting alms individually through the land — such a one must be of great power and of benefit to others." And so he declared: "Whoever brings alms to him today shall today be given the finest gift in the city."

Now the merchant too was gathered in that very assembly, and he thought to himself —

"I gave orders at home that alms should be given to all who come seeking them — so without fail, alms will certainly be offered from my house. I shall go and check on that." With this thought he rose and walked quickly home.

His wife, too, had seen the pratyekabuddha's miraculous powers, and her mind had been filled with faith. She said to the maidservant: "The merit shall be mine. I will give you the finest food as your reward." But the maidservant replied: "You are the mistress, and you have power over my life — but not over my merit. I will not give it up." The wife flew into a rage, and in her fury, wrapped all around as she was, she struck the maidservant on the head with her wrist, bracelet and all. The bracelet struck true, and blood poured from the maidservant's head.

Then the merchant arrived home and asked what wrong had been done. The maidservant told him the whole story in full, and the merchant, in his anger, adorned the maidservant with all her ornaments, installed her as mistress of the household, and then went and reported the matter to the king.

The king said: "She is worthy to be mistress. You have done well. Had you not acted so, I myself would have stripped the other of her rank as maidservant. And yet I will bestow upon her the finest gift in the city."

Then the maidservant, having attained faith and found the conditions for it, gave generously to ascetics (śramaṇas), brahmins, and merchants. She accumulated merit, guarded her ethical conduct, and when the time of death came, she was reborn among the gods of the Thirty-Three. She appeared there endowed with an exquisite form, radiating light, splendor, and a vast luminous brilliance — and the entire assembly of gods was filled with wonder. The four divine lords and Śakra (Indra, king of the gods) were all struck with astonishment, and they began to say to one another: "She is mine! She is mine!"

Then Śakra spoke: "We are all tormented in mind by the fault of attachment (rāga), and so the one who composes the finest verse shall have her." And one of them recited:

Seized with yearning, deeply yearning,
I see no direction anywhere.
My mind has come to rest on her — and so, my friends, this is what I desire.

The second said:

Alas, O lord of gods — how fortunate is one who may recite a verse for this!
Like a drum struck at the face of battle,

just so has desire arisen in me.

The third said:

Though a great drum is beaten,
it grows weary here and there.
But like a great rushing river, unceasing —
just so has desire arisen in me.

The fourth said:

Though swept along by what is irresistible, and caught, here and there, upon obstruction, my eyes, like millstones ever-turning,
never cease to fix upon her.

Then Śakra said:

Since each of you has spoken a verse so well, you are all happy — every one.
But as for me, I do not know whether I shall live or die.

The others thought: "This being desires this divine maiden; it would not be right for her to pass away from this realm." And so they gave her to Śakra.

The Blessed One then declared: "She who was the maidservant at that time and in that age is none other than this very Bhadrāṃkarā (Goodly One), daughter of the Śākyaas — she who offered alms to the pratyekabuddha and presented him with a length of cloth; and it was by that cause that she came to possess a fair and beautiful form."

Then the monks addressed the Blessed One: "Venerable One, pray look upon this: a divine maiden caused the four divine lords and Śakra to fall into astonishment."

The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, it is no great wonder that she caused the four divine lords and Śakra to fall into astonishment. But monks, in a former time, listen well while I tell of how this same one caused four village libertines and a fifth, the most dissolute of all, to fall into astonishment." And he related at length how this divine maiden had been born in Jambudvīpa into a family of high lineage, great wealth, and abundant possessions, and had become one who pursued sensual pleasures. She was taken as wife by a merchant. When the four village libertines and the supremely dissolute fifth all caught sight of her, they were struck through with intense attachment and desire, and each separately sent go-betweens to her, and she received these advances. Yet since she was dependent on her husband, she would say to each, "Go away for now," and thus she kept their hearts in suspense.

Then one among them thought to himself: "Many days have now passed, and therefore I shall — " and so the story goes. He set an appointed time with her, saying, "I will come to you today." They asked him, "Where shall you come? Where shall we go?" He told them of a great nyagrodha tree not far from the city, rising high as the sky, with branches hanging down in abundance and leaves thick and dense, and said, "Go today and climb up into that tree," specifying each one's place. And while he sought an opportunity with the husband, he let slip to her that this was what he had in mind, whereupon she had him beaten and bound to a pillar.

Then she said to one of the others, "Go and climb that tree; sit up in the branch on the eastern side, and I will come to you shortly." He was delighted and did just as she said. And so the story continues: the second sat up in the branch on the southern side; the third sat up in the branch on the western side; and the fourth sat up in the branch on the northern side. The supremely dissolute one did likewise and sat up in the central branch of the tree.

They all remained there through the night, eagerly thinking she would arrive, but the woman never came, even until dawn. The night passed and morning came. When it grew light, the one sitting in the eastern branch sang out in verse:

The sun has risen in the east, and farmers have already gone out from town;
may the nyagrodha tree bear witness that the deceitful woman has not come.

The one in the southern branch replied:
The woman will come, will surely come;
she is not deceitful.
Yet may this very auspicious sun rise just a little more quickly!

The one in the eastern branch said, "Has even the rafter come?" The other replied, "Not yet."

Then the one in the western branch sang:
Because the sun has risen at the proper hour and the farmers too have gone out from town, not knowing the time myself,
I spent the whole night with eyes fixed, waiting.

Then the one in the northern branch spoke:
Not knowing the time here,
I have endured the night sitting through dawn.
Whoever becomes attached to another man's wife will attain this fate — and worse besides.

Then the supremely dissolute one spoke:
You all are miserable because you sat waiting;
I at least will not grieve.
But I do grieve for the nyagrodha tree, broken down blamelessly.

Just then the tree deity, seeing that these men had been deceived, laughed as before and said:

Mourn for yourselves, and likewise for these four men;
those who are cut down will spring up again in the last month of spring.

They, having abandoned all hope for the woman, climbed down and went each to his own home.

As for the woman, her husband set her free, and she, unseen, went to the place where the tree stood. When those men saw her, they said: "Why did you deceive us?" She then told them all that had come to pass.

Then they said to her: "You have come before our very eyes." She thought to herself: "I was born among five people — how could I possibly carry on in the manner of a dog?" And so she said to them: "Whichever one of you brings all the most beautiful flowers shall enjoy pleasure together with me."

Now within the enclosure of the royal palace there was a guard who watched over the king's lotuses. This guard, who cut off the ears and noses of intruders, kept watch there. The men went to that place thinking: "Though we may come back punished, still, if we speak that woman's praises and please her, she will give us flowers." Then one among them spoke to her in verse:

Just as bamboo and marsh reeds,
cut down and dug out, grow back again,
so may your nose grow back —
please bestow the flowers you seek.

The second said:

Just as kuśa grass and kāśa grass,
cut down and dug out, grow back again,
so may your nose grow back — please bestow the lotuses you seek.

The third said:

Just as dūrvā grass and thorny plants,
cut down and dug out, grow back again,
so may your nose grow back —
please bestow the flowers you seek.

The fourth said:

Just as hair and beard, shaved off, grow back again,
so may your nose grow back —
please bestow the flowers you seek.

The fifth said:

Every man who seeks lotuses from you you call a fool.
Whether you give the lotuses or not,
your nose will never grow back.

The man thought: "The four men spoke to me with flattery, but the fifth man spoke truly and from the heart. I shall give the lotuses to him." He gave that man as many lotuses as he needed. That man, with a joyful, pleased, and delighted heart, took the lotuses and went to where the woman was, and enjoyed pleasure with her.

Afterward, the two of them reflected: "See how we have been utterly afflicted because of our desires. How shall we act so that the suffering of attachment may not arise?" At that time, no buddha, the Blessed One, had appeared in the world, but a pratyekabuddha had arisen in the world, and not very far from there stood a caitya of a pratyekabuddha. They offered those lotuses to it and made this aspiration: "Through this root of virtue born of fully relinquishing the nature of giving, in whatever births and in whatever lives we take birth henceforth, may our afflictions be diminished."

Now the man who received the lotuses at that time is this very Mahākāśyapa. The woman who was there at that time is this very Bhadrīkā, the daughter of the Śākya clan. And through the karmic maturation of having offered those lotuses, she has become one of little attachment.

Then the monks again put a question to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, what action did Bhadrīkā, the daughter of the Śākya clan, perform and accumulate, so that a golden statue made from the gold of the Jambu River came to be outshone by her own radiance?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, I shall elaborate on the actions she performed and accumulated."

"Monks, in a past age ninety-one aeons ago, when the lifespan of beings was eighty thousand years, there appeared a perfectly and fully awakened buddha named Vipāśyin — a Blessed One, a Buddha. At the time when he had manifested perfect and complete awakening in unsurpassed, perfect enlightenment, he came to the royal palace of King Bandhumān" — up to the passage that reads — "and entered the royal palace to partake fully of his meal."

When he arrived there, a girl happened to be sitting to one side, holding a fan with a handle made of gold from the Jambū River, fanning herself. The light of the Buddha caused the gold of the Jambū River to become dull and dim. The girl wondered, thinking: "Am I holding a fan with a handle made of iron?" — and doubt arose in her mind.

Then Vipāśyin finished his meal and departed, and she saw that the fan handle was indeed made of the finest gold from the Jambū River.

After three months had passed — up to the passage that reads — "he went on tour through the provinces."

Then King Bandhumān had an image made from the gold of the Jambū River. On a certain occasion that girl brought the golden image and, seeing that Vipāśyin's light had made it dim and dull, and that its color was no longer the same, she made an aspiration: "By the root of virtue arising from my complete and perfect act of giving" — up to the passage that reads — "may I come to have a body radiant in just such a way" — up to the passage that reads — "may I outshine others by my own radiance."

By the power of this aspiration as well, she pleased me and did not displease me.

"Monks, therefore one should act with devotion toward the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and one should make perfectly correct aspirations" — up to the passage that reads — "just as Bhadrīkā, the daughter of the Śākya clan."

The Vinaya Analysis of Nuns, Fifth Section.

From the passage "Moreover" up to "monks, in a past time," and then up to "a certain king was reigning over a kingdom" — and from "a certain merchant" up to "outside the city was his pleasure grove, with a pond and many flowers, enclosed and shaded by trees, and adorned with excellent flowering and fruit-bearing trees of every kind."

"When a Blessed One Buddha does not appear in the world, a pratyekabuddha will arise in the world." — up to the passage that reads — "a certain pratyekabuddha fell ill" — up to — "and went to a physician." The physician said: "Enter the town" — up to — "and stay in the merchant's pleasure grove."

On a certain occasion the merchant saw him and provided him with all necessities — up to — "and he recovered from his illness."

"He passed into complete nirvāṇa" — up to — "and a reliquary stūpa was built over his remains."

On a certain occasion the merchant saw that the stūpa had become bare and whitish — up to the passage that reads — "and spoke to his wife."

She smeared it with saffron paste, scattered flowers upon it, and made this aspiration: "Alas! How wonderful! By the root of virtue from having served the noble one throughout his life, and from having built a stūpa after his passing into nirvāṇa and from making the perfect act of giving — may I be born into a household of wealth, great riches, and great prosperity. May I thoroughly realize such a Dharma as that which I have found. And may I please a Teacher even more supremely excellent than this, and may I never displease him."

Monks, the merchant who lived at that time was none other than the great Kāśyapa of this present day. The wife of the merchant at that time was none other than this very Bhadravadanā, the daughter of the householder Śreṇika — up to the passage beginning "smeared with turmeric paste, she became golden in complexion," and continuing through to "and thus, monks, should you train."

And again, monks — from the passage beginning "Monks, what had Bhadravadanā done that, while she and the great Kāśyapa shared the same bed for twelve years, no act of sexual union took place?" through to the end of that section. Then from "monks, those two had performed karma" through to "a king named Brahmadatta ruled in the city of Vārāṇasī." Then the passage: "At a certain time in that royal palace there dwelt a courtesan named Bhadravadanā, skilled in sixty-four arts, whose fee was not less than five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." Then from "at another time, five hundred companions of that royal palace took abundant food and drink" through to "and were led away by the prince." Then the passage: "At a certain time the companions made an offering of alms to a pratyekabuddha and made an aspiration," through to "she who was the courtesan at that time was this very Bhadravadanā, and the one who was Bhadravadanā the daughter of the householder Śreṇika at that time became her," and then "the five hundred companions were these very five hundred naked ones." Then through to "actions that are entirely white in character ripen into results entirely white, and actions that are entirely dark in character ripen into results entirely dark — this is how it should be understood."

Then, monks, doubts arose among the monks, and those monks presented all their doubts to the Buddha, the Blessed One — from that passage through to "even after attaining arhatship, he was tormented by King Ajātaśatru."

Monks, long ago, in the distant past, in this very Fortunate Aeon, when the human lifespan was twenty thousand years, there appeared a perfectly and fully enlightened buddha named Kāśyapa. He resided at Vārāṇasī in the Deer Forest of the Rṣipatana. At that time, in the city of Vārāṇasī there was a wealthy merchant of great riches and great prosperity — up to the passage "and he was left without a son," and then "after his death, it will revert to the royal palace," so he thought. And the man spoke to him: "Your highness, the prince, please do not remain displeased in this way" — through to "if you take a second wife, you will not come to experience happiness." Then: "Toward the secondary wife he should hold the perception of a daughter" — through to "the first wife is dominant, and therefore one does not even make inquiries of the first wife." Then: "Why do I sit here like this?" — and she spoke to her husband: "Know that I am going for refuge and am going to take the bases of training." And he gave his consent. She went for refuge and undertook the bases of training.

Then that man fell into thought, and thought to himself: "This, then, is my field of merit." From that point, he began to offer flowers, fruits, and food first and foremost, and later to his secondary wife — up to that passage.

She thought to herself: "All the household duties, whatever they may be, I will do, while this one simply sleeps and eats" — from that passage through to the point where that man called the secondary wife in order to be intimate with her, and she spoke:

"Please be with the senior wife" — up to that statement.

From the passage "She undertook the bases of training": because affliction (kleśa) is exceedingly powerful, he went to the secondary wife's quarters and embraced her. She then said to him: "Were you not the one, O son of a noble family, who gave me leave to undertake the bases of training in just this way? What is happening now is not fitting." Yet he pressed himself upon her and acted in that manner — up to that passage.

Now, the one who at that time had become the secondary wife is this very girl Bzang mo, daughter of the Ser skya family. By the karmic maturation of the deed she had committed at that time — causing the senior wife to break her vows — even though she had attained the state of an arhat, she experienced seven days in the company of a natural enemy before her birth.

From the Blessed One: "What did she do, and for what reason was she declared foremost among those with swift direct knowledge, having attained the state of arhat?" — up to the passage: "She performed and accumulated this karma" — and then: the secondary wife, after becoming a widow and her husband having died, left the household. Under the teaching of the Blessed One Kāśyapa she went forth into homelessness, and there she abided in the holy life of pure conduct for ten thousand years, guarding and protecting it fully. She became learned in the aggregates, the elements, and the sense bases; learned in what is appropriate and what is not; and learned in dependent origination. Yet she did not penetrate wisdom to its ultimate limit. Nevertheless, at that time she made this aspiration: "May I please the Blessed One Kāśyapa — the one who prophesied the brahmin youth Uttara's complete awakening — and may I never displease him." Through this she did please him and did not displease him, and by the karmic maturation of her abiding in the holy life and fully maintaining it, she attained the state of an arhat.

Regarding that teaching: the nun under whom she had gone forth — she whom the Blessed One Kāśyapa had declared foremost among those with swift direct knowledge — at that time also made an aspiration: "Just as the Blessed One Kāśyapa declared my teacher foremost among those with swift direct knowledge, so too, when the brahmin youth Uttara attains complete awakening, may I likewise be declared foremost among those with swift direct knowledge." — up to the passage: "Monks, you should train accordingly."

Again, from the passage "Then the monks arose in doubt" to: "What did the venerable Mahā-Kāśyapa do and accumulate, such that by the karmic maturation of his karma he was born into a household of great wealth and extensive prosperity?" — and from there to the passage: "thirty villages on the border of that karma" — and then: eighty measures filled with golden barley, and nine hundred ninety-nine ploughshares — up to that passage.

"Monks, this is the karma he performed and accumulated" — from that point onward, to be elaborated fully.

"Monks, in a time long past, in a certain hermitage five hundred sages dwelt. At that time, since no buddha or Blessed One had appeared in the world, pratyekabuddhas — solitary buddhas — who bring benefit to the lowly and the destitute would appear in the world. Not far from that hermitage there also dwelt one such pratyekabuddha.

Each day the sages would rise early, leave a guardian sage behind, and go out in the four directions to gather firewood for the sacrificial fire and fruits to eat. On one such occasion, a certain sage who was passing by close to that pratyekabuddha again and again saw the pratyekabuddha seated there in cross-legged posture. When he turned back he saw him still seated in the same way, and he thought to himself:

"This monk does not break his cross-legged posture during the day — where does he get his food, and how does he manage? I will ask him about it." Then he thought further: "If I go to him right now and ask, those sages will see me keeping company with a monk and will mock me. I will wait until it is my turn to guard the hermitage, and then ask him without embarrassment."

Then on another occasion the turn fell to that sage to guard the hermitage. When the other sages had gone out, he went to where the pratyekabuddha was staying, approached him, and asked: "Noble one, each day we go back and forth in search of food and fruit. Yet I have never once seen you unfolding your crossed legs or going out for alms. Do you eat joy?"

The pratyekabuddha replied: "I do not eat joy. When mealtime comes I go for alms, bring what I have collected back here, and eat."

The sage asked: "Where do you go for alms?"

The pratyekabuddha replied: "To the northern Unpleasant Sound."

"What is the Unpleasant Sound like?"

He replied: "It is a place where there is no possessiveness, where life is fixed in its span, where one goes in a distinguished manner, and even after death one continues to go in a distinguished manner. When one does not go to the northern Unpleasant Sound, one collects alms-food among the gods of the Thirty-Three."

The sage asked: "What are the gods of the Thirty-Three like?"

The pratyekabuddha replied: "They are radiant in color, abounding in happiness, dwelling in lofty mansions, long-lived, remaining for a great duration, dwelling for a very long time."

The sage thought: "This is truly a great being. Today I will offer him today's alms." And he said to the pratyekabuddha: "Noble one, today please accept alms from me, and may you look upon me with favor."

The pratyekabuddha said: "But you yourself have gone forth from the household life — how do you intend to give alms to me?"

The sage replied: "That is so, and yet I pray that you nevertheless grant me your benefit." And he spoke these verses:

You are glory and merit.

You are the supreme among those who teach the Dharma.

By your striving this world

Has become as though adorned on every side.

The pratyekabuddha consented. The sage, understanding from his silence that he had accepted, went back to his hermitage. Now he had earlier set aside a small measure of wild grain. He cleaned it, went to a nearby cowherd's settlement not far from the hermitage, obtained milk, cooked the grain in the milk, and when it was done he offered the alms-food to the pratyekabuddha. That venerable one, in order to bring benefit to the sage, accepted the alms, and then, to teach the Dharma through the medium of his body, soared up into the middle of the sky like a king of geese spreading his wings.

When the sage saw this he was filled with the highest faith, and with a mind of joy, delight, and gladness he placed his knees on the ground and made this aspiration prayer: "By this act of offering alms-food and giving it as a gift of generosity, may I never again be born as a hell-being, an animal, or a hungry ghost. May I always be born among the gods, and when I pass from there may

I be born in the northern Unpleasant Sound, and from there may I be born among the gods again. And whatever assemblies of qualities that one has fully comprehended — may I too fully comprehend those. And may I satisfy and never displease a Teacher more supremely excellent than this one."

Monks, the one who at that time and on that occasion had become a sage — that was none other than the great Kāśyapa himself. And through the karmic maturation of the act of offering that small measure of grain at that time and on that occasion, he was born a thousand times in the northern Unpleasant Sound, and a thousand times he was born among the gods. And when he passed from among the gods, he was born into the brahmin caste. By the power of his aspiration prayer, he also satisfied me — a Teacher more supremely excellent than many tens of millions of pratyekabuddhas — and through this he attained that very accumulation of qualities.

Therefore, monks, show reverence to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha; offer gifts; and accumulate merit. For if one acts in this way, one will come to possess just such an accumulation of qualities. Train yourselves, monks, just as Kāśyapa has done.

Then the monks, having grown uncertain, put this question to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, through what deeds performed and accumulated, and through the karmic maturation of those deeds, has the venerable great Kāśyapa gone forth in this way, abandoned all afflictions, and attained arhatship — and been declared by the Blessed One to be the foremost among those who speak of the qualities of having few desires, contentment, and cultivation?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, as for what deeds he performed and accumulated, let this be told in full. Monks, long ago, in a past age, in this very present aeon of excellence, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared a perfectly and fully awakened buddha named Kāśyapa — one endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, Teacher of gods and humans, a buddha, a Blessed One. Under his teaching, this one went forth into the holy life, and for the course of ten thousand years he dwelt in the holy life and fully guarded it. Yet though he did not generate the wisdom of final liberation, at the time of his death he made this aspiration prayer: 'May I not displease but rather satisfy the one whom the Blessed One Kāśyapa has prophesied saying: "Brahmin boy, your Teacher — in a future time, when the lifespan of beings is one hundred years, there will appear a perfectly and fully awakened buddha named Śākyamuni."""

And furthermore, regarding the monk under whom this one went forth — that monk had been declared by the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa to be the foremost among those who speak of the qualities of few desires, contentment, and cultivation — and this one also made an aspiration prayer: "Just as the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa declared my preceptor to be the foremost among those who speak of the qualities of few desires, contentment, and cultivation, so too, when the brahmin boy the Teacher attains perfect awakening, may I likewise receive such a declaration."

Monks, through his abiding in the holy life at that time, he attained his fruit here in this life. Through having fully ripened his faculties at that time, he was here liberated. And through the aspiration prayer he made at that time, he was here given the declaration.

Therefore, monks, you should reverently receive scriptural transmissions and read them, and become skilled in the aggregates, elements, sense bases, occasions and non-occasions, and dependent origination. Likewise, make proper aspiration prayers, for by doing so your accumulation of qualities will grow. Train yourselves accordingly, monks.

Here ends the intermediate summary.

The farmer and the potter, the merchant living by cloth,
the one who plasters stūpas with turmeric paste, the courtesan and the grain-seller, the wealthy and those of modest means — these are the groups set forth.

Here now are the verses summarizing the eight rules of defeat. The summary:

Unchastity, theft,
taking life, and speaking falsehood, keeping a doe, selling incense, the woman with a lover, and born of a slave.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove at Rājagṛha. At the time when Utpalavarnā was engaged in the work of a courtesan in one of the six great cities, a brahmin became intensely attached to her in his mind and went to her, bringing her flowers, fruits, and tooth-cleaning sticks as tokens of service. Then Utpalavarnā said to that brahmin: "You are of high caste, and I am of low caste — why have you come here?" When she said this, the brahmin replied: "I wish to meet with you." She replied: "If you have some kārṣāpaṇas, we may meet later." Then the brahmin, having heard those words from Utpalavarnā, went out to the provinces to obtain kārṣāpaṇas.

Then, at another time, Utpalavarnā, relying on her spiritual friend, the venerable Maudgalyāyana the Great, abandoned the work of a courtesan and herself attained the state of an arhat. Now she was accustomed to sitting during the day in a dense forest grove, and so from that time forward Utpalavarnā went to sit during the day in a dense forest grove.

As for the brahmin, he took his kārṣāpaṇas and traveled from village to village, from town to town, from district to district, and through the environs of the royal palace, asking after her at every step, until at last he arrived at Śrāvastī. Then that brahmin went to the place where Utpalavarnā was staying, and upon arriving he made advances toward her, saying: "Here, please accept these kārṣāpaṇas." But she reflected and said to the brahmin: "Brahmin, I have abandoned that which is not the holy Dharma." When she said this, the brahmin replied to Utpalavarnā: "Even if you have abandoned it, I have not." Then Utpalavarnā said to the brahmin: "Brahmin, which part of my body have you become attached to in your mind?" He replied: "Your eyes." She then, by miraculous power, placed her eye in the palm of her hand and said to the brahmin: "Brahmin, if you desire it, take it." Then the brahmin, upon seeing the eye, became enraged and agitated, and struck the nun Utpalavarnā with a fist to the head and departed.

Thereupon Utpalavarnā immediately reported the matter to the nuns, the nuns reported it to the monks, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, women are weak in strength, prone to deceitfulness, frivolity, and trickery, and subject to desires of all kinds. Therefore, from this day forward nuns shall not dwell in forest hermitages." When the Blessed One had thus prohibited nuns from dwelling in forest hermitages, those who were living at crossroads, at four-way intersections, and at three-way junctions were also traversed by deceitful persons and others. After they had for a time been residing there, there was in Śrāvastī a faithful male lay practitioner named Sāgata, son of a hunter,

He was a man of virtuous intention and good character, endowed with the five bases of training. When he saw those nuns dwelling here and there in scattered places, he sought lodgings for them, went to them, and said, "Noble ones, please stay here as comfortably as you wish," and they did indeed take up residence there.

At that time, in the summer quarters of the nuns, there was a nun named Bhomā Gaṃgamo, who was beautiful in form, lovely, pleasing to behold, greatly given to attachment, and attractive to men.

Then on another occasion the duty-nun was appointed. The assembly of nuns, at the morning hour, dressed in their robes and lower garments, took up their Dharma-robes and begging bowls, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. At that point the nun Bhomā Gaṃgamo, pretending to be ill, turned back from that very place. Since she was attached to Sāgata, son of the hunter, who was staying there, she made a sign to him. He was unwilling, and she spoke these words to him: "When one desires something, those who do not desire it in the same way will in time come to be otherwise." Thereupon Sāgata, son of the hunter, said to Bhomā Gaṃgamo, "Sister, you have gone forth into renunciation, and I am a layman. Beyond that, you have attained the status of a royal consort through the king's grace. If the king were to learn that I had engaged in such misconduct, he would cause me to suffer the fate of the condemned this very night." Then Bhomā Gaṃgamo said to Sāgata, son of the hunter, "Son of a householder, do the king's great investigators follow us about wherever we go? If I am willing and you are willing, and we are together in that way, who would have cause to fear on my account?" Though she spoke thus, Sāgata, son of the hunter, would not comply.

Then the nun Bhomā Gaṃgamo thought to herself, "Shall I kill this body and die, or shall I take merely the contact of limb with limb as mine?" Having considered and reflected, she said to Sāgata, son of the hunter, "If the son of the householder is unwilling, then let there be contact of limb with limb only." She drew him into her arms, and from the knees upward and the eyes downward she brought about full contact, offering everything — and this very act of violation was perceived by the duty-nun.

The assembly of nuns, having collected alms in Śrāvastī, finished their meal, refused a further round of alms, and on their return went to the place where Sāgata, son of the hunter, was dwelling. Then the duty-nun said to them: "Oh, sisters, I fear that this Sāgata, son of the hunter, thinking he is providing us with a secluded dwelling for the sake of Dharma, has treated those who merely receive a touch of his head like the royal consorts of a king. Oh, sisters, those of you who still need to uphold moral discipline should go elsewhere from this day forward."

They asked her, "What has happened?" And she told the nuns the matter in full detail as it had occurred. The nuns then told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then thought, "My twofold assembly must understand this matter, and I shall properly establish a rule of training." With that in mind, and on account of this incident, this occasion, this matter, and these circumstances, he convened the twofold assembly.

Now, the blessed buddhas act with full knowledge and awareness — they act knowingly, not unknowingly; they act in timely fashion, not untimely; they act with purpose, not without purpose. The blessed buddhas are like this:

Acting without purpose is averted by the quality of flood-water. Now, the blessed buddhas are like this: they know the right time for purposeful action — and so the Blessed One, the Buddha, addressed the nun Sthulanandā, asking, "Nun, is it true that you have done this unseemly, unbecoming thing?" She replied, "Blessed One, I did it." The Blessed One, the Buddha, then rebuked her, saying that what is unbecoming for a contemplative, what is improper, what is contrary to proper conduct — that is not something a person who has gone forth should do.

Then, having rebuked her in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the assembly of nuns: "Nuns, it is for these ten benefits that I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for my female hearers. The ten are these: to unite the Saṅgha, to promote the Saṅgha's well-being, to bring harmony to the Saṅgha, to ensure the Saṅgha dwells in happiness, to restrain those individuals who are difficult to discipline, to enable those who are conscientious to dwell at ease, to generate faith in those who have none, to increase and expand the faith of those who already have it, to restrain the defilements of this present life, to ward off the defilements of future lives, to uphold the holy life, to bring the holy life to its full perfection, to harmonize the teaching, and so that my teaching — broad and beneficial to the many, rightly proclaimed to gods and humans alike — may endure for a long time."

Having seen this with clear vision, I shall establish for my female hearers a rule of training in the Vinaya. My female hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever nun, seized by passion, presses against a man who is likewise seized by passion — from the knee down, from the eye down — touching and fully touching, and indulges in that experience, that nun has incurred a defeat and must not remain in the community.

Now, the term "whatever nun" refers to Sthulanandā. "Seized by passion" means with attachment, with genuine clinging, with being enmeshed. "A man" means the son of a hunter, or any other man whatsoever. "Passion" means attachment, genuine clinging, being enmeshed. "From the knee down, from the eye down" means within that range. "Pressing and fully pressing" means touching and fully touching. "Indulges in that" means experiencing it through and through. "Nun" means one in whom the substance of a nun is present. What is the substance of a nun? Full ordination. What is full ordination? It is the act of performing the formal act with a motion and a corresponding resolution made three times, the deliberation, the complete deliberation, the bringing to a conclusion, the acceptance, the explicit acceptance — and this full ordination is expressed at the moment of ordination through speech, through words, through convention, through utterance, through expression, through definitive words, through the path of words, through verbal statement, through verbal action, through verbal declaration. The words "this" and "that" are particles of indication and comprehensive designation. "Has incurred a defeat" means she is final, downfallen, inferior, severed, defiled, discordant with the mind. And whoever commits that downfall — as soon as it is committed she becomes unfit to be a nun, unfit to be a daughter of the Śākyas; her conduct as a contemplative is ruined, weakened, broken, fallen, defeated, turned away — and her conduct as a contemplative is rendered irrecoverable. That is to say —

Just as a palmyra tree whose crown has been cut cannot turn green again, cannot grow and spread and flourish — in exactly that same way, whatever nun commits that transgression — "as soon as it is committed" — is as stated before. "She shall not remain" means that the other nuns shall not perform with her the restoration ceremony, the invitation ceremony, a formal act with a single request, a formal act with a request and motion, or a formal act with a request and three repetitions. Nor shall she be appointed to any of the twelve offices held by nuns.

How does one incur a defeat? The summary verse states:

With desire, touching a man who has desire — from below the eyes down to above the knee — fully giving such contact: a defeat.

If the man has no desire,
it becomes a grave offense.

What is given and what is withdrawn — these become wrongdoing.

Furthermore, whatever nun, with desire, together with a man who has desire, touches, makes full contact, and experientially engages from below the eyes down to above the knee — she incurs a defeat.

Whatever nun, with desire, together with a man who has no desire, touches, makes full contact, and experientially engages from below the eyes down to above the knee — she incurs a grave offense.

Whatever nun, without desire, together with a man, touches, makes full contact, and experientially engages from below the eyes down to above the knee — she incurs a grave offense.

Whatever nun, with desire, together with a man who has desire, receives something given — making it her own — from as high as the armpits down, having made full contact and handed it over — she incurs a grave offense.

Whatever nun, without desire, together with a man who has desire, receives something given — making it her own — from as high as the armpits down, having made full contact and handed it over — she incurs wrongdoing.

Whatever nun, with desire, together with a man who has no desire, receives something given — making it her own — from as high as the armpits down, having made full contact and handed it over — she incurs wrongdoing.

Whatever nun, without desire, together with a man who has no desire, receives something given — making it her own — from as high as the armpits down, having made full contact and handed it over — she incurs wrongdoing.

The fifth defeat is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, in Prince Jeta's park. At that time there was in Śrāvastī a young perfume-seller who was handsome, beautiful, and pleasing to look upon. He had taken a wife from among his own class, and together with her he sported, rejoiced, and lived in delight. Not long after he had taken her, the nun Sthūlanandā became attached to that young perfume-seller and went to him, saying: "Good-looking one, are you contented with your new bride?" He replied: "Noble one, if I am contented, what concern is that of yours? And if I am not contented, what concern is that of yours?" When he said this, Sthūlanandā said to the young perfume-seller: "I thought you and I might be able to do a certain small thing together. If even a little is not acceptable to you, then that is the end of it." The young perfume-seller then thought: "This nun has become infatuated." He went to her again and again, making signals, setting times, showing signs, and also engaging in flirtation, pressing close, and fondling. Then on another occasion the young perfume-seller came to Sthūlanandā, and she pulled him close and held him.

Then Sthūlanandā went outside the temple, washed her hands and feet, gave instructions to her pupils and attendants, and went to sit alone with the young perfume-seller in a secluded place. After a while, she allowed him to engage in sexual intercourse with her. At that moment, Sthūlanandā thought to herself: "Whatever standing I have above the other nuns — all of it is owed to my living in moral discipline, in the rules of training, and in the holy life. If I now commit such a misdeed and thereby bring disgrace to the order of nuns, who will come to ask me anything?" Having aroused this thought and reflected thus, Sthūlanandā said to the young perfume-seller: "Fair one, be off." Then the young perfume-seller thought: "Without any doubt, this is an uncomfortable situation." And so he too let go. Then Sthūlanandā, resting on her back, drew in her right leg and kicked the young perfume-seller once, breaking two of his ribs. The young perfume-seller then fled, vomiting blood as he went.

Then Sthūlanandā, sitting in the middle of the summer dwelling, cried out: "I have conquered Māra! I have conquered Māra!" When the nuns heard this, they said: "Sister, have you realized the fruit of stream-entry? Or the fruit of once-returning? Or the fruit of non-returning? Or have you realized the supreme fruit, arhatship? Or, at the least, have you planted a root of virtue in the teaching of the Buddha?" She replied: "None of these." They then said: "Then what kind of Māra have you conquered?" She spoke of it then among the many who were present.

Then the nuns said to Sthūlanandā: "You only just barely escaped meeting with a thorn. Had it been otherwise, you would have been expelled." Thereafter, though the many nuns said these things to Sthūlanandā, she showed neither pleasure nor displeasure. Showing neither pleasure nor displeasure, she rose from her seat and departed.

The many nuns then reported the matter to the monks at that time, and the monks in turn informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One then — from "this incident occurred, this was the occasion, this was the matter, and in this context" all the way through to "fully teaching for the benefit of the many, for gods and humans alike" — that whole preceding account is to be recited just as it was.

Furthermore, this is the rule of training to be promulgated for the female hearers in the Vinaya: If any nun who has become attached makes signals to an attached man, or sets a time, or shows signs, or engages in flirtation, pressing close, and fondling so as to bring a man who then comes within her grasp — and remains in a place from which, wherever a woman and man might go, she cannot drive him away — if in these eight respects a nun commits a transgression, immediately upon committing it she is no longer fit to be a nun and must not remain in the order.

Now, "any nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Who has become attached" means through attachment, through full clinging, through being thoroughly bound. "A man" means the young perfume-seller or anyone else whatsoever. "Attached" means attachment, full clinging, and being thoroughly bound. "Makes signals" means whenever she sees him in an open space, at a temple, or in some such prominent place. "Sets a time" means in the early morning, at midday,

"in the afternoon — come at that time" is what is said. "Displays a sign" means whenever he sees her not long after she has shaved her head, wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe. "Flirting and distraction" means making provocative gestures. "Sidling and jostling" means frolicking about in every direction. "Exposing the root" means making all manner of indecent noise. "Appropriates a man who has come" means she makes use of him carnally. "A place where a woman cannot properly stop a man from proceeding and there is no turning back" means a place where she comes under his power. "Positions her body" means her torso. "In these eight respects" means in whichever of those situations she has entered into. "A nun" means one who possesses the essential qualities of a nun. What are the essential qualities of a nun? Full ordination. What is full ordination? It is the performance of the formal act with a motion and three proclamations, the preliminary examination, the proper examination, the completion, the proper completion, the acknowledgment thereof, the assent, and the explicit declaration — as explained above. "If she commits a transgression" means if she acts beyond her limits. "Immediately upon" means in that very instant. The word "that," which is the term used for indicating proximity and full indication, begins from the phrase "the foremost of all" and continues up to "she must not be appointed to any of the twelve roles of a nun."

Now, how does a transgression arise? If a nun who is attached makes signals together with a man who is attached, a gross transgression arises. If she sets a time, a gross transgression arises. If she displays a sign, a gross transgression arises. If she flirts and distracts, a gross transgression arises. If she sidles and jostles, a gross transgression arises. If she makes indecent noise, a gross transgression arises. If she appropriates a man who has come, a gross transgression arises. If she positions her body in a place where a woman can stop a man from proceeding and there is a possibility of turning back, a gross transgression arises. If she positions her body in a place where a woman cannot properly stop a man from proceeding and there is no turning back, a defeat transgression arises. For one who is a first offender and the like, there is no fault.

This concludes the sixth defeat in the Vibhaṅga for Nuns.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove, the place where the Kalandakas reside, in Veṇuvana. At the time when the nun Priyā had fallen from her precepts, upon her falling from them her younger sister Priyamātī wept. The nuns said to her: "Dear Priyamātī, did not the Blessed One declare that whatever is assembled will come apart? Why then do you weep?" She spoke these words: "It is not because this my friend Priyā has fallen from this Dharma and Vinaya that I weep. Rather, I weep because even before this, she used to do such and such things." They said to her: "Did you know of this?" She replied: "I knew." They said: "Why then did you not tell us earlier?" She replied: "Because of affection for my younger sister." Then the many nuns said to the nun Priyamātī: "Sister, you have concealed a blameworthy matter" — and at that point the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nun, is it true that you acted in such a wrong, unseemly manner as this?"

She replied: "Blessed One, I did not." The Blessed One, the Buddha, rebuked her, saying that such conduct — improper for a renunciant, unsuitable and contrary to the monastic rule — was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Having rebuked her in many different ways, he then addressed the nuns: "Nuns, having seen ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for female hearers" — and what follows, concerning the establishment of the training rule, is to be recited in full.

Furthermore, whatever nun conceals with full awareness a transgression committed by a nun, and whenever that nun has died, lapsed, wandered away, or transferred — if at that time this nun were to say, "I knew beforehand that such and such transgressions had arisen in connection with that nun," then that nun herself, by reason of having willfully concealed a blameworthy matter, incurs a root defeat and must not remain in the order.

Now let the terms be explained. "Whatever nun" refers to one who is a friend or one who resembles such. "Nun" refers to Priyamati. "Transgression" refers to any one of the eight root defeats. "With full awareness" means either she herself witnessed it, or another person had told her about it. "Conceals" means she covered it up. "Whenever that nun has died" means her life faculty has been cut off. "Has lapsed" means she has surrendered her training. "Has wandered away" means she has abandoned the district. "Has transferred" means she has come to rely on a dwelling of the tīrthikas. "At that time, this nun" refers to the friend. "Nuns of this" refers to those of this Dharma community. "I knew beforehand that such and such transgressions had arisen in connection with that nun" — here "transgression" means any one of the eight. "Were to say" means: if she so speaks. "Nun" refers to the one in whom the essential quality of a nun exists. What is the essential quality of a nun? Full ordination. What constitutes full ordination? Everything else is to be recited in full. "That" is a term of indication pointing to what has been stated and what has been stated in detail nearby. The passage extends up to "she must not be appointed among the twelve nuns." As for how this constitutes a transgression: if a nun knowingly conceals the blameworthy matter of a nun, in whatever way and in all cases she incurs a root defeat.

The seventh root defeat in the analysis of the nun's code is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, belonging to Prince Jeta. At that time there was residing at Śrāvastī a monk called Kṛtaka who was contentious, who would expose faults, who was divisive, who was quarrelsome, and who fomented disputes. The Saṅgha performed against him the act of formal banishment from the residence. The great female sovereign Gautamī heard that the monk Kṛtaka had had the act of formal banishment performed against him. Upon hearing this, she went to where the Blessed One was, went up to him, prostrated with her head at the feet of the Blessed One, and sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the great female sovereign Gautamī addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, if the Saṅgha has performed against some monk the act of banishment from the residence, how am I to conduct myself toward him?" The Blessed One declared: "If you encounter him, you need not bow but should rise from your seat." "Venerable One, this monk Kṛtaka is contentious, exposes faults, is divisive, quarrelsome, foments disputes, and has taken up dwelling together in close association with the nuns.

"If the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against him, how are we to conduct ourselves toward him?" The Blessed One declared: "You should observe the vow of one who is not worthy of being bowed to."

The Blessed One declared: "They did not understand." And so the Blessed One declared: "Having prepared the seats and struck the wooden signal board, properly inform the nuns with the words of the inquiry, and then, when the entire Saṅgha of nuns is gathered and in concord, let a nun make the motion and perform the act. It is to be done as follows. 'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. This monk Kṛtaka is contentious, exposes faults, is divisive, quarrelsome, foments disputes, and has taken up dwelling together in close association with the nuns; and the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against him. If the time is right for the Saṅgha of nuns, and if the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha of nuns proclaim to this monk Kṛtaka, who is contentious, exposes faults, is divisive, quarrelsome, foments disputes, and has taken up dwelling together in close association with the nuns, and against whom the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence, the vow of one who is not worthy of being bowed to. This is the motion.' The act is to be done as follows. 'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. This monk Kṛtaka is contentious, exposes faults, is divisive, quarrelsome, foments disputes, and has taken up dwelling together in close association with the nuns; and the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against him. The Saṅgha of nuns hereby proclaims to this monk Kṛtaka, who is contentious, exposes faults, is divisive, quarrelsome, foments disputes, and has taken up dwelling together in close association with the nuns, and against whom the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence, the vow of one who is not worthy of being bowed to. Those nuns who consent to the proclaiming of the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to upon this monk Kṛtaka should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak.' The noble Saṅgha of nuns has consented and granted it, and so, by remaining silent, it is hereby accepted as such."

When the Saṅgha of monks had performed the act of banishment from the residence against the monk Kṛtaka, and the Saṅgha of nuns had also proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to, the monk Kṛtaka thought: "I have committed a fault, and so the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against me. But what fault have I committed against the Saṅgha of nuns that they should proclaim the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to upon me? I shall go to where the great female sovereign Gautamī is and ask about this matter." And so the monk Kṛtaka went to where the great female sovereign Gautamī was, and having arrived, he said to her: "Sister, I have committed a fault, and on account of that the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against me. But what fault have I committed against the Saṅgha of nuns that they should proclaim upon me the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to?"

"Nevertheless, there are some who speak ill of the nuns, and against those I, in anger and agitation, made them afraid, made them shrink and cower, and stirred up hostility. In this way, when I took the nuns' side, why do you proclaim upon me the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to?" When he had spoken these words, the great female sovereign Gautamī said to the monk Kṛtaka: "Venerable Kṛtaka, who allowed you to come and cause harm to the nuns' side? On top of that, the Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of banishment from the residence against you. And the Blessed One has also given command to proclaim the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to upon the nuns. Therefore we have proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to. Furthermore, Kṛtaka, hear me well. You are one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, from the Śākya lineage; you are endowed with the three collections of scripture and you are a Dharma speaker — and yet, being one so widely learned, will you act obstructively without seeking the Saṅgha's forgiveness?"

Then the monk Kṛtaka thought to himself: "This great female sovereign has spoken for my benefit, not against it. Just as a person who falls to the ground must rely on that very ground to rise again, so too, since I have committed a wrong against the Saṅgha, I shall go directly there, prostrate before the Saṅgha, demonstrate my reconciliation, remain within the boundary, and seek forgiveness." Then Kṛtaka thought further: "I shall go to where my mother and sisters are, and also ask the sisters." So Kṛtaka went to where the community of the Twelve Groups was, and having arrived, explained the whole matter to them in full.

Then the communities of the Twelve Groups spoke to Kṛtaka thus: "Noble Kṛtaka, do not prostrate before those who have gone forth from the many different castes, clans, and households. Do not demonstrate reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary and seek forgiveness. Why so? Because we will attend upon you in all matters you might wish to remember and inquire about — with alms bowl, with Dharma robes, with a strainer, with a cup, with a girdle, with medicines for illness timely allowed, those allowed for a watch, those allowed for seven days, and those allowed for one's entire lifetime — we will attend upon you in all these things, without your needing to trouble yourself with whatever you might wish to remember or ask about."

When they had spoken thus, the nuns told the monks, and the monks in turn informed the Blessed One.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga for Nuns. The Sixth Fascicle.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the nuns: "Nuns, you should approach the community of the Twelve Groups and proclaim to them as follows: 'Nuns, whichever monk has had the act of banishment from the residence performed against him by the Saṅgha of monks, and against whom the Saṅgha of nuns has also proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to — if that monk, his hair standing on end and his body's hairs risen, wishes to prostrate before the Saṅgha, intends to come forth, wishes to demonstrate reconciliation, wishes to remain within the boundary and seek forgiveness, and thereby wishes to abandon quarreling and fault-finding — knowing all this, you have gone to him and said: "Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not demonstrate reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary and seek forgiveness."'"

"We will not provide you with an alms bowl, robes, a strainer, a cup, a belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines that are allowable at the right time, medicines allowable for a period of hours, medicines allowable for seven days, medicines allowable for one's entire life, or services in connection with whatever needs may arise." These were the instructions they were told to give.

And when they had given those instructions, those nuns were told: "Sisters, whether the matter be virtuous or non-virtuous, do not say anything whatsoever to that monk" — and clinging to that very same position, holding it as supremely confirmed and firmly adhering to it, they kept designating it thereafter as: "This alone is true; everything else is false."

Then a great many nuns went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed their heads to the feet of the Blessed One in homage and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the great many nuns reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, whereupon the Blessed One declared to the nuns: "Nuns, open the proceeding against the twelve-group with a motion and a formal act with four readings. And the instruction should be given as follows, beginning with 'Having arranged the seating,' and the act should be performed by a single nun making the motion. The act is to be performed thus:

'May the noble Saṅgha of nuns hear me. These twelve-group members fight with monks, expose faults, cause divisions, dispute and quarrel, and have been dwelling in close and improper association with the nuns. The monks have performed the act of expulsion from the dwelling. The Saṅgha of nuns has likewise proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to. From this — his hair standing on end, his body's hairs risen — he wishes to prostrate before the Saṅgha, intends to come forth, wishes to demonstrate reconciliation, wishes to remain within the boundary and seek forgiveness. Against him, one went and said: "Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not demonstrate reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary and seek forgiveness. We will not provide you with an alms bowl, robes, a strainer, a cup, a belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable at the right time, medicines allowable for a period of hours, medicines allowable for seven days, medicines allowable for one's entire life, or services in connection with whatever needs may arise" — the nun who said this was admonished and instructed by the many nuns; and though admonished and instructed by the many nuns, she still clings to that very same position, holds it as supremely confirmed, firmly adheres to it, and keeps designating it thereafter as: "This alone is true; everything else is false." If it is the right time for the Saṅgha of nuns and they consent, the Saṅgha should approve of this. The Saṅgha of nuns shall perform the instruction of the twelve-group by means of a motion and a formal act with four readings.'

'Sisters, you fight with monks, expose faults, cause divisions, dispute and quarrel, and have been dwelling in close and improper association with the monks. The monks have performed the act of expulsion from the dwelling. The Saṅgha of monks has likewise proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to. From this — his hair standing on end, his body's hairs risen — he wishes to prostrate before the Saṅgha, intends to come forth, wishes to demonstrate reconciliation, wishes to show concordance.'

— remaining within the boundary and wishing to seek forgiveness — went to meet her and spoke thus: "Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. We will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines that are allowable in season, allowable for a watch period, allowable for seven days, and allowable for life — and whatever else is needed we will provide in full, without your being troubled by this or that." Such was the basis for which, sisters, permission is given.

The motion is this, and the formal act is to be performed as follows. "May the noble Saṅgha of monks hear me. These twelve groups of monks — who fight with monks, expose faults, cause divisions, dispute and quarrel, who have been dwelling in close and improper association with the monks, for whom the monks performed the act of expulsion from the dwelling, and for whom the Saṅgha of monks likewise proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to — their hair standing on end, their body's hairs risen, wish to prostrate before the Saṅgha, intend to come forth, wish to demonstrate reconciliation, are remaining within the boundary, and wishing to seek forgiveness, went to meet her and spoke thus: 'Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. We will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable in season, allowable for a watch period, allowable for seven days, and allowable for life — and whatever else is needed we will provide in full, without your being troubled by this or that.' These monks were then admonished by the assembly of monks; yet even after being admonished by the assembly of monks, they stubbornly and tenaciously clung to that very position, openly fixating upon it, saying, 'This alone is true; anything else is false.' Therefore, sisters, regarding these twelve groups of nuns — the nuns who fight with monks, expose faults, cause divisions, dispute and quarrel, who have been dwelling in close and improper association with the nuns, for whom the monks performed the act of expulsion from the dwelling, and for whom the Saṅgha of nuns proclaimed the vow of one not worthy of being bowed to — their hair standing on end, their body's hairs risen, who wish to prostrate before the Saṅgha, who intend to come forth, who wish to demonstrate reconciliation, who are remaining within the boundary, wishing to seek forgiveness, and who went to meet her and spoke thus: 'Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. We will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower fruit medicines — those allowable at the proper time, those allowable at a fixed hour, those allowable for seven days, and those allowable for the duration of one's life — and whatever else may be needed we will attend upon you with, free from any interference from whatever else may come up.' This is what was formally enjoined.

Concerning those who, among these twelve groups, consented to the enjoining by means of a motion and three readings of the formal act, they should say nothing. Those who did not consent should speak. This concludes the first recitation of the formal act.

For the second, the same matter is to be recited: 'Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me. These twelve groups of nuns engage in fighting, in fault-finding, in quarreling, in disputing, in wrangling. They have come to dwell together in extremely close intimacy with the nuns. They have undergone the formal act of removal from the residence by the monks. The nuns too have enjoined upon them a vow that is not worthy of reverence, their hair standing on end, their body's hairs risen, who wish to prostrate before the Saṅgha, who intend to come forth, who wish to demonstrate reconciliation, who are remaining within the boundary wishing to seek forgiveness, and who went to meet her and spoke thus: "Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. We will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable at the proper time, those allowable at a fixed hour, those allowable for seven days, and those allowable for the duration of one's life, and whatever else may be needed we will attend upon you with, free from any interference from whatever else may come up," — those nuns were admonished by many nuns and enjoined, and though admonished and enjoined by many nuns, they stubbornly clung to that very same position as supreme, adhering to it resolutely, and continued to assert: "This alone is true; all else is false." On account of this, the Saṅgha formally enjoined upon the twelve groups of nuns by means of a motion and three readings of the formal act.

Those among you, the venerable ones, who consent to the enjoining of these twelve groups of nuns by means of a motion and three readings of the formal act, should say nothing. Those who do not consent should speak. This concludes the second recitation of the formal act.

For the third, the same formal act is to be recited: 'Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me. These twelve groups of nuns engage in fighting, in fault-finding, in quarreling, in disputing, in wrangling. They have come to dwell together in extremely close intimacy with the nuns. They have undergone the formal act of removal from the residence by the monks. The nuns too have enjoined upon them a vow that is not worthy of reverence, their hair standing on end, their body's hairs risen, who wish to prostrate before the Saṅgha, who intend to come forth, who wish to demonstrate reconciliation, who are remaining within the boundary wishing to seek forgiveness, and who went to meet her and spoke thus: "Noble one, do not prostrate before the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. We will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable at the proper time, those allowable at a fixed hour, those allowable for seven days, those allowable for one's entire lifetime, and whatever else one is engaged with, we shall attend upon you without leaving it undone."

When those nuns speak thus, many nuns approach them and give instruction, and even though many nuns approach those nuns and give instruction, those nuns nonetheless stubbornly hold fast to that very same basis of dispute, cling to it, and continue to designate it afterward as "this alone is true; all else is confused." Therefore the Saṅgha performs the act of admonition toward those groups of twelve nuns by means of a motion-and-three-proclamations procedure. "Venerable ones, those who are willing that the Saṅgha perform this act of admonition toward these groups of twelve nuns by means of a motion-and-three-proclamations procedure are to remain silent. Those who are not willing are to speak." The Saṅgha, having consented and agreed, has performed the act of admonition toward these groups of twelve nuns by means of a motion-and-three-proclamations procedure. Since no one has spoken, it is accordingly so upheld.

When the act of admonition by motion-and-three-proclamations is performed upon them, and those nuns nonetheless stubbornly hold fast to that very same basis of dispute, cling to it, and continue to designate it afterward as "this alone is true; all else is confused," the nuns speak to the monks. The monks, in turn, report the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, thinking "My female hearers will understand the matter, and I shall also establish the bases of training well," assembled the twofold Saṅgha on account of this occurrence, this occasion, this affair, and this circumstance, and proceeded through the steps from the assembling of the twofold Saṅgha to the laying down of the training rule.

Furthermore, if a nun, knowing full well that a monk upon whom the unified Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of suspension, and who is not worthy of being bowed down to by the Saṅgha of nuns either, is one upon whom a vow of restraint has been conveyed, and that this monk — though his hair has grown out and his body hair has risen — is bowing down to the Saṅgha, coming forth, showing reconciliation, remaining within the boundary seeking forgiveness, nonetheless speaks to her thus: "Noble one, do not bow down to the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. Rather than letting you continue your dispute, I myself will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable at the proper time, those allowable at a fixed hour, those allowable for seven days, those allowable for one's entire lifetime, and whatever else one is engaged with, without leaving it undone" — then the nuns say to that nun: "Sister, knowing full well that the monk upon whom the unified Saṅgha of monks has performed the act of suspension, and who is not worthy of being bowed down to by the Saṅgha of nuns either, is one upon whom a vow of restraint has been conveyed, and that this monk — though his hair has grown out and his body hair has risen — is bowing down to the Saṅgha, coming forth, showing reconciliation, remaining within the boundary seeking forgiveness, you nonetheless spoke thus: 'Noble one, do not bow down to the Saṅgha. Do not come forth. Do not show reconciliation. Do not remain within the boundary seeking forgiveness. Rather than letting you continue your dispute, we ourselves will attend upon you with alms bowl, Dharma robes, filter cloth, bowl stand, belt, things to remember, things to inquire about, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, fruit medicines allowable at the proper time, those allowable at a fixed hour, those allowable for seven days, and whatever allowable for one's lifetime, and whatever task she is occupied with, that task we will attend to without interruption' — when she speaks such words, she follows in the wake of one who has been expelled from the residence, and for the purpose of creating discord, this instruction is to be given to her: 'Abandon such speech.' If the nuns give this instruction to that nun, and she abandons that ground of offense, then so much the better. If she does not abandon it, then for the purpose of having her abandon that ground of offense, the instruction and admonition should be given correctly up to a second and third time. If, when correctly instructed and admonished up to a second and third time, she abandons that ground of offense, then so much the better. If she does not abandon it, that nun incurs a defeat bringing about her expulsion from the residence, and she must not remain.

Now, as for the phrase 'moreover, whatever nun' — this refers to the group of twelve. As for 'whatever monk' — this refers to the one who creates strife, who causes discomfort, who is Gre-kye. As for 'the Saṅgha' — this is the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. As for 'the act of expulsion from the residence has been performed' — this is through the act of a motion with four readings. As for 'the nuns' Saṅgha' — this is the Saṅgha of nuns who are śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. As for 'admonishing the vow of one who is not worthy of homage' — this is through the act of a motion with two readings. As for 'that monk' — this is Gre-kye. 'Her hair standing on end, her body-hair bristling' up to 'does not make obeisance to the Saṅgha' — and as for 'knowingly' — this is either by seeing it herself or by it having been reported to her by another. Therefore, as for 'do not abandon the quarreling' — this has the meaning of 'do not bring it to peace.' As for 'if it is said' — this means 'if she says.' As for 'O noble one' — this refers to Gre-kye with hair standing on end and body-hair bristling. From 'do not make obeisance to the Saṅgha' up to 'do not abandon the quarreling' has the meaning of 'do not ask the Saṅgha for forgiveness.' From 'I will attend upon you with alms bowl and Dharma robes' and so forth up to 'will attend to you' — as for 'that nun' — this refers to the group of twelve. As for 'by the nuns' — this means by the nuns of this Dharma. As for 'this instruction is to be given' — this means she is to be spoken to in these words, and the instruction spoken with composure is to be given just as described previously. If the nuns give that instruction to that nun, and she abandons that ground of offense — that is good. If she does not abandon it, then for the purpose of having her abandon that ground of offense, the instruction and admonition are to be given correctly up to a second and third time — this means just as the instruction was given previously through a motion with four readings. As for 'when correctly instructed' — this means 'when correctly admonished.' As for how the transgression arises: to whatever degree a nun, from 'a monk who creates strife' through 'creating further strife, the Saṅgha having performed the act of expulsion from the residence, the nuns admonishing the vow of one not worthy of homage' — and knowingly speaks thus: 'I will attend upon you with the alms bowl' — this becomes a wrongdoing. With the Dharma robes also it becomes a wrongdoing. With the filter cloth also it becomes a wrongdoing. With the bowl stand also it becomes a wrongdoing. With the belt also it becomes a wrongdoing. 'Whatever task she is occupied with, that task I will attend to without interruption' — each and every one of these becomes a wrongdoing.

If, having accepted and then been instructed to relinquish that basis, one does so, that is good. If one does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises. If, before the words of the first motion have been completed, one relinquishes it, that is good. If one does not relinquish it and the words are completed, a grave offense arises. If, before the words of the second motion have been completed, one relinquishes it, that is good. If one does not relinquish it and the words are completed, a grave offense arises. Even before the words of the third motion are completed — if the proceeding has been conducted improperly by those in agreement, or conducted improperly by those in disagreement, or conducted properly by those in disagreement, but is conducted in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and what the Teacher has taught — there is no transgression. If the words of the third motion are also completed, and it has been conducted in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and what the Teacher has taught, yet one still does not relinquish that basis, then a defeat has arisen for that nun. For one who is a first offender and the like, there is no transgression.

This completes the eighth defeat as set out in the Analysis of the nuns' Vinaya (Skt. vibhaṅga).

In the context of the defeats, it was declared that twelve duties shall not be assigned to nuns. If someone asks what those twelve are, they should be told as follows: assigning a residence, assigning food, distributing porridge, distributing tooth-sticks, distributing small provisions, washing vessels, distributing cloth, distributing robes, washing the great rains-retreat linen, distributing the great rains-retreat cloth, giving assignments, and adornment.

In summary:

The one who makes objection, the groundless accusation, the third — taking a partial share, the fourth — making anything acceptable, the fifth — freedom from attachment, traveling by day and by night, and being assigned beyond a river.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, a man named Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, was a person who mingled with the brahmins and householders of Śrāvastī, spoke pleasantly, exchanged friendly words, cultivated friendships, engaged minds, and was skilled at gaining entry into households. Those who wished to give their daughters in marriage to suitable parties would approach Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra and ask: "O Kṛṣṇa, is that young man capable, diligent, and enterprising? Can he provide abundant food and clothing for the daughter? Is he one who takes up even small tasks?" If he reported back that the young man was indeed capable at heart, diligent, enterprising, able to provide abundant food and clothing for the daughter, and one who takes up even small tasks, then they would give their daughters to such men. If he reported that the young man was in truth incapable, lazy, not enterprising, unable to provide abundant food and clothing for the daughter, and not one who takes up small tasks, then they would not give their daughters to such men. Likewise, those who sought daughters in marriage would also come to Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra and ask: "Mother, is that daughter capable, enterprising, and able to dwell in the home with care?" — and the rest should be stated in the same manner as for the young man. When they had given their daughters well through any such arrangement, they would say: "We have asked Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra, and the young man to whom we gave the daughter is capable, diligent, enterprising, able to provide abundant food and clothing for the daughter, and one who takes up even small tasks. Therefore all those who associate with Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra —

— "who speak well of coming" — and they would praise all those who were admitted to the household, saying: "It will be like this for them as well." Likewise, whenever any of them had given a daughter in marriage badly, those people would say: "We asked Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra and gave the daughter, yet that young man is unskilled, lazy, incapable of achieving anything, unable to provide that daughter with abundant food and clothing, and not one who takes up even small tasks. Therefore all those who associate with Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra" — from "who speak well of coming" — "and all those who are admitted to the household, it will be like this for them too," and they would recite words of dispraise. What applies to the young man should be applied in the same way to the young woman. At that time, praise and dispraise of Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra arose simultaneously.

Now at that juncture, the twelve groups of nuns had taken speech from Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra, were acting as matchmakers, and were introducing people into households that were unsuitable, and they were insulting brahmins and householders. The monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, thinking, "The Saṅgha of my female śrāvakas will understand the matter, and I shall also establish the training rule well," convened the assembly of the community of nuns on account of this occurrence, this cause, this matter, and this juncture.

The blessed buddhas act with full knowledge: they act knowingly, not unknowingly; at the right time, not at the wrong time; with purpose, not without purpose. The blessed buddhas are such that acting without purpose is averted by them as one averts a debt. As for the blessed buddhas, because they know the right time for acting with purpose, the Blessed One, a buddha, asked the twelve groups of nuns: "Nuns, is it true that you have acted in such an improper and unseemly manner?" — "Blessed One, we have indeed done so."

The blessed Buddha then rebuked the twelve groups, saying: "That which is improper for a contemplative, unsuitable, and not in accordance with proper conduct is not something to be done by one who has gone forth." Then the Blessed One rebuked them in many ways. Having done so, he declared to the assembly of nuns:

"Nuns, therefore, I shall — for the ten benefits: 'In order to gather the Saṅgha,' and so forth — having fully examined this, establish a training rule in the Vinaya for female śrāvakas," and all of this up to the establishing of the training should be stated.

"Furthermore, whatever nun, using a woman's words toward a man or a man's words toward a woman, acts as a matchmaker — even if it is only for a single meeting — this very matter constitutes a transgression from the very first occurrence, and it carries a definitive outcome: one becomes subject to expiation with a remainder in the Saṅgha.

"'Whatever nun' refers to the twelve groups of nuns. 'Using a woman's words toward a man or a man's words toward a woman' means speaking words fitting for a woman to a man, or speaking words fitting for a man to a woman. 'As a wife' — the seven kinds of wife are: one given through water-libation, one bought with wealth, one obtained by capture, one who comes of her own will, one maintained with food and clothing, one who is a companion in a lower station —"

The seventh is one who meets occasionally.

As for what is meant by "a wife given through water-libation": a woman or a girl whom her parents have given to a man by pouring water of consecration, saying, "Let this one be your wife, the mistress of your household," and who then becomes his wife and mistress of the household, and whom he guards, guards closely, conceals, and conceals carefully so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others — she is called "a wife given through water-libation."

As for what is meant by "a wife bought with wealth": a woman or a girl whom a man has purchased from her parents with much or little wealth, saying, "Let this one be my wife, the mistress of my household," and who then becomes the mistress of his household, and whom he guards, guards closely, conceals, and conceals carefully so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others — she is called "a wife bought with wealth."

As for what is meant by "a wife obtained by capture": it is like this — a king arrays his fourfold army of elephant troops, cavalry, chariot troops, and infantry, brings down those who have not submitted and crushes those who have submitted, and commands that they be brought under his dominion. At that time, a person, having made the king his standard of victory, seizes a woman or a girl, saying, "Let this one be my wife or the mistress of my household" — from that point up to "so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others toward mine" — she is called "one obtained by capture."

Furthermore, another case of "one obtained by capture" is this: brigands who raid cities, raid villages, and raid regions, staking their own lives, sack cities, sack villages and regions, and seize a woman or a girl, saying, "Let this one be a wife and mistress of the household for us" — from that point up to "so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others toward mine" — she too is called "one obtained by capture."

As for what is meant by "a wife who comes of her own will": a woman or a girl who, out of her own faith, inclination, and arising affection, goes to a man and speaks these words: "O son of a lord, I shall be your queen and mistress of your household," and he in turn takes her as his wife and mistress of the household — from that point up to "so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others toward mine" — she is called "a wife who comes of her own will."

As for what is meant by "a wife maintained with food and clothing": a woman or a girl who goes to a man and speaks these words: "O son of a lord, give me clothing and food, and I shall be your wife and mistress of your household," and he in turn gives her clothing, and she becomes his wife and mistress of the household — from that point up to "so that she may not go about for the sake of the desires of others toward mine" — she is called "a wife maintained with food and clothing."

As for what is meant by "a wife who is a companion in a lower station": it is like this — a woman or a girl who brings whatever wealth she has, much or little, and goes to a man, saying, "O son of a lord, please take note: let us gather together your wealth and my wealth into one, and let us live together and enjoy what we desire, and whatever sons or daughters may come to us from us both — when the time comes and we die, let us make gifts and perform meritorious deeds —" — and may the merit of this be dedicated so that our parents, wherever they have been reborn, may follow after them in that place — and having said this, the man took her as his wife and mistress of the household, and guarded her with the thought: "Let no other go about toward this woman of mine out of desire," guarding her closely, hiding her, and hiding her very thoroughly. She is called "a wife who is a companion in a lower station."

As for what is meant by "a wife met only for a time": it is like this — a woman or a girl whom a man approaches for a period of hire, giving her wages for that time, thinking, "Let me enjoy her company for just a while," and having guarded her for that span — she is called "a wife met only for a time."

These, then, are what are called the seven wives.

Now as for what is called "the ten female companions" — what are the ten? They are: one guarded by a mother, one guarded by a father, one guarded by a brother, one guarded by a sister, one guarded by a mother-in-law, one guarded by a father-in-law, one guarded by relatives, one guarded by clan, one guarded by lineage, and tenth, one who is undisturbed.

As for what is meant by "a female companion guarded by a mother": it is like this — when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, or he has been threatened by illness, or has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another region, or has been killed, or imprisoned, or expelled, or has gone forth into renunciation, or has died — and thereupon her mother thinks: "I will guard this one of mine so that no one may approach her uninvited and go about toward her by force out of desire," and guards her, guards her closely, hides her, and hides her very thoroughly — she is called "a female companion guarded by a mother."

As for what is meant by "a female companion guarded by a father": it is like this — when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, and so forth as set out at length up to and including his death, and thereupon her father thinks: "I will guard this one of mine so that no one may approach her uninvited and go about toward her by force out of desire," and guards her, guards her closely, hides her, and hides her very thoroughly — she is called "a female companion guarded by a father."

As for what is meant by "a female companion guarded by a brother": it is like this — when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, and so forth as before, up to and including the death of both parents, and thereupon her brother thinks: "I will guard this one of mine so that no one may approach her," and so on, "and go about toward her out of desire," and guards her up to that point — she is called "a female companion guarded by a brother." Just as the account of one guarded by a brother is given, so too should the account of one guarded by a sister be stated.

As for what is meant by "a female companion guarded by a mother-in-law": it is like this — when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, and so forth, up to and including the death of both parents and of her brother, her sister, the mother-in-law, and the father-in-law — and thereupon the mother-in-law speaks these words: "Just as I look after my own child, so too do I do the same for you; I will provide you with food and clothing, dear daughter-in-law, make you happy, let you remain in comfort" — and having said this, she thinks: "I will guard this one of mine so that no one may approach her uninvited and go about toward her by force out of desire," and guards her closely, hides her, and hides her very thoroughly — she is called "a female companion guarded by a mother-in-law." Just as the account of one guarded by a mother-in-law is given, so too should the account of one guarded by a father-in-law be stated.

As for what is meant by "a female companion guarded by relatives": it is like this — when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, and so forth, up to the death of both parents, of her brother, her sister, her mother-in-law, and her father-in-law, she then resides in the presence of relatives,

And the relatives, thinking "We must guard this woman of ours so that no one, without proper inquiry, may have his way with her by force," guard her, guard her closely, hide her, and hide her very thoroughly. This is called "a female companion guarded by relatives." As for what "relatives" means: one should understand it to include the seven-generation patrilineal and matrilineal lineages.

What is meant by "a female companion guarded by clan"? It is like this: when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, and so forth, up to the death of both parents, of her brother, her sister, her mother-in-law, her father-in-law, and her relatives, she then resides in the presence of those who share her own clan. And those people, thinking "We must guard this woman of ours so that no one, without proper inquiry, may have his way with her by force," guard her — up to that point. This is called "a female companion guarded by clan." As for what "clan" means: it refers to the brahmin clan, the kṣatriya clan, the vaiśya clan, and the śūdra clan.

What is meant by "a female companion guarded by lineage"? It is like this: when a woman or a young girl's husband has gone mad, or his mind has become disturbed, and so forth, up to the death of both parents, of her brother, her sister, her mother-in-law, her father-in-law, and her relatives, she then resides in the presence of those who share her own lineage. And those people, thinking "We must guard this woman of ours so that no one, without proper inquiry, may have his way with her by force," guard her — up to that point. This is called "a female companion guarded by lineage." As for what "lineage" means: it refers to the lineage of Kuṇḍa, the lineage of Bharadvāja, the lineage of Śāṇḍilya, the lineage of Bhāradvāja, the lineage of Maudgalya, the lineage of Garga, and the lineage of Gautama.

What is meant by "a female companion who is unattached"? She is a fully ordained nun, a female probationer, a wandering mendicant woman, a woman who does not sleep with anyone other than her husband, or a woman who observes the Dharma as the basis of her practice and discipline. These, then, are called the ten female companions.

As for "acting as go-between": this means carrying a message. "Even for a moment" means even for the briefest instant. "This Dharma" refers to this matter that is not Dharma but is presented under the name of Dharma. "She incurs a downfall from the very first" means she incurs a downfall immediately. "With expulsion included" means with the element of rejection. "Saṅgha remainder" means that this transgression rests with both Saṅghas, is connected with both Saṅghas, and depends upon both Saṅghas; the transgression is lifted by both Saṅghas and not by an individual alone. Alternatively, these eight root defeats are final with no remainder, whereas this transgression does have a remainder — and for that reason it is called "Saṅgha remainder."

Now, as to how a transgression is incurred — the intermediate summary on acting as go-between:

A message carried by two nuns, conduct, and what precedes it, one's own or another's territory, written message, hand-delivered — these concern the junior nun.

If a nun herself accepts a message she herself composed, carries it there herself, and brings the reply back herself, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun herself accepts a message she herself composed, carries it there herself, and has it brought back by a delegate, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun herself accepts a message she herself composed, has it carried there by a delegate, and brings the reply back herself, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate, herself accepts it, herself carries the message there, and herself brings the reply back, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate, herself accepts it, herself carries the message there, and has the reply brought back by a delegate, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate, herself accepts it, has the message carried there by a delegate, and herself brings the reply back, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate, herself accepts it, has the message carried there by a delegate, and has the reply brought back by a delegate, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate of a delegate, herself accepts it, herself carries the message there, and herself brings the reply back, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate of a delegate, herself accepts it, herself carries the message there, and has the reply brought back by a delegate of a delegate, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate of a delegate, herself accepts it, has the message carried there by a delegate of a delegate, and herself brings the reply back, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If a nun accepts a message composed by a delegate of a delegate, herself accepts it, has the message carried there by a delegate of a delegate, and has the reply brought back by a delegate of a delegate, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties, both carry the message there, and both bring the reply back, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred for both.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties, and then one of them says, "For now, carry the message there on her behalf and bring the reply back," and that one then carries the message there and brings the reply back on the other's behalf, a Saṅgha-remainder transgression is incurred for both.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties, and then one of them says, "I will carry the message there but I will not bring the reply back," and then whichever of the two carries the message there and also brings the reply back incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression, while the one who carries the message there but does not bring the reply back incurs two gross offenses.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties, and then one of them says, "I will neither carry the message there nor bring the reply back," and then whichever of the two carries the message there and brings the reply back incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression, while the one who neither carries the message there nor brings the reply back incurs one gross offense.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties, and both carry the message there but neither brings the reply back, both incur two gross offenses each.

If two nuns both accept the message of both parties — and both say, "We will neither carry the message there nor bring the reply back," then both incur one gross offense each.

When a single nun is traveling on the road together with one man and one woman, if the woman says to the nun, "Noble one, can you say to that man, 'You are the husband of this woman,' or 'You are her friend,' or 'Send word to her'?" — and if the nun accepts a message of that kind and carries it there, or brings the reply back, she incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression. Likewise, if the man says to the nun, "Noble one, can you say to that woman, 'You are the wife of this man,' or 'You are his friend,' or 'Send word to him'?" — and if the nun accepts a message of that kind and carries it there, or brings the reply back, she incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression.

What applies in the case of one nun, one woman, and one man is to be set out in full for two nuns, two women, and two men as well, and likewise for many nuns, many women, and many men. And just as it applies to those traveling on the road, it is also to be set out in full for those who are standing, sitting, and lying down.

Of two novice nuns — one walking ahead of the nun and one following behind — if the one walking ahead accepts the message and the one walking ahead both carries it there and brings the reply back, the one walking ahead incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression.

If the one walking ahead accepts the message and the one walking ahead carries it there while the one following behind brings the reply back, the one walking ahead incurs two gross offenses and the one following behind incurs one gross offense.

If the one walking ahead accepts the message and the one following behind carries it there while the one walking ahead brings the reply back, the one walking ahead incurs two gross offenses and the one following behind incurs one gross offense.

If the one walking ahead accepts the message and the one following behind both carries it there and brings the reply back, the one walking ahead incurs one gross offense and the one following behind incurs two gross offenses.

If the one following behind accepts the message and the one following behind both carries it there and brings the reply back, the one following behind incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression.

If the one following behind accepts the message and the one following behind carries it there while the one walking ahead brings the reply back, the one following behind incurs two gross offenses and the one walking ahead incurs one gross offense.

If the one following behind accepts the message and the one walking ahead carries it there, while the one following behind brings the reply back, the one following behind incurs two gross offenses and the one walking ahead incurs one gross offense.

If the one following behind accepts the message and the one walking ahead both carries it there and brings the reply back, the one following behind incurs one gross offense and the one walking ahead incurs two gross offenses.

Householders are of two kinds: the principal party and the non-principal party. The principal party is defined as one who is the master in giving a girl in marriage or in taking her away by force, and who, whether present in the royal palace and its environs or present in an assembly of legal proceedings, is someone whose word, even if false, is worthy of being taken as evidence. That is called the principal party.

The non-principal party is defined as one who is not the master in giving a girl in marriage or in taking her away by force, and who, whether present in the royal palace and its environs or present in an assembly of legal proceedings, is someone whose word, even if true, does not come to be worthy of being taken as evidence. That is called the non-principal party.

If a nun accepts a message from a principal party and carries it to the principal party and also brings the reply back from the principal party, she incurs a Saṅgha-remainder transgression.

If a nun accepts a message from a principal party and carries it to the principal party, but brings the reply back from a non-principal party, she incurs two gross offenses and one wrong-doing.

If a nun accepts a message from a principal party and carries it to a non-principal party, but brings the reply back to the principal party, she incurs two gross offenses and one wrong-doing.

If a nun accepts a message from a principal party and carries it to a non-principal party and brings the reply back from a non-principal party, she incurs one gross offense and two wrong-doings.

If a nun accepts a message from a non-principal party and carries it to the non-principal party and also brings the reply back from the non-principal party, she incurs three wrong-doings.

If a nun accepts a message from a non-principal party and carries it to a principal party, but brings the reply back from a non-principal party, she incurs one gross offense and two wrong-doings.

If a nun accepts a message from a non-principal party and carries it to a non-principal party, but brings the reply back to a principal party, she incurs one gross offense and two wrong-doings.

If a nun accepts a message from a non-principal party and carries it to a principal party and also brings the reply back from a non-principal party, she incurs two gross offenses and one wrong-doing.

There are three causes by which a message becomes the carrying of a reply but not the carrying of an outgoing message. What are the three? They are: by location, by sign, and by mark.

How is it by location? It is when she says: "Whenever you see me in a pleasure grove, or in a meeting place, or at some divine site, you shall know by that that the deed has been done." That is how it is by location.

How is it by sign?

It is when she says: "Whenever you see me in the morning, or at midday, or in the evening, you shall know by that that the deed has been done." That is how it is by sign.

How is it by mark? It is when she says: "Whenever you see me having recently shaved my head, or wearing a patched robe of reddish-yellow, or carrying a bowl with a lotus-leaf rim, or a bowl with an iron handle, or a bowl of clarified butter, or a bowl of grain oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl with a cover of raw sugar — whenever you see me thus, you shall know by that that the deed has been done." That is how it is by mark.

This is the seventh fascicle of the Analysis of the Nuns' Vinaya.

There are three causes by which a message becomes both the carrying of an outgoing message and the carrying of a reply. What are the three? They are: by word, by letter, and by hand-written document.

If a nun accepts a commission by word and carries the outgoing message by word and also carries the reply by word, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by word and carries the outgoing message by word and carries the reply by letter, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by word and carries the outgoing message by letter and carries the reply by word, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by word and carries the outgoing message by letter and also carries the reply by letter, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by word and carries the outgoing message by hand-written document and carries the reply by location, by sign, or by mark, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by letter and carries the outgoing message by word and also carries the reply by word, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by letter and carries the outgoing message by letter and carries the reply by location, she carries the reply by location, sign, or mark, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by letter and carries the outgoing message by letter and also carries the reply by letter, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a nun accepts a commission by letter and carries the outgoing message by letter and carries the reply by written document, she incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

When the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — are combined, if it is during the time of fighting and the following conditions also apply: the fighting has not yet ceased, the grass has not been cut, the three pebbles have not been scattered, sand has been given but she has not been released, she has not been established as a witness that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed — if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as a single offense.

When the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — are combined, if it is after the time of fighting and the following conditions also apply: it is not during the time of fighting, the grass has not been cut, the three pebbles have not been scattered, sand has been given but she has not been released, she has not been established as a witness that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed — and all these are combined, and if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as three offenses.

When a nun combines the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — beginning from those, up through the scattering of the three pebbles, together with: sand has been given but she has not been released, she has not been established as a witness that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed — and if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as three offenses and one grave offense.

When a nun combines the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — beginning from those, up through: sand has been given and she has been released, together with: she has not been established as a witness that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed — and if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as three offenses and two grave offenses.

When a nun combines the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — beginning from those, up through: she has been established as a witness that she is not a wife, together with: the bell has not been proclaimed — and if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as three offenses, three grave offenses, and one Saṅgha remainder.

When a nun combines the first three types of wife — one given with water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by abduction — beginning from those, up through: the bell has been proclaimed — and if all these are combined and they are in accord, it counts as three offenses, four grave offenses, and two Saṅgha remainders.

When a nun combines the other types of wife — those outside these three — during the time of fighting and after the time of fighting, and they are in accord, it counts in every case as a Saṅgha remainder.

If a nun goes to a layman's household and says: "Why do you not bring this young man into your home?" — that becomes a grave offense. If she says: "Why do you not send this grown girl away as a bride?" — that becomes a grave offense. If she says: "Why do you not send this young man to a weaver?" — that becomes a grave offense. If she says: "Why do you not lead this girl to a householder?" — that becomes a grave offense.

If a nun goes to a householder's home and says even this much: "Householder, why do you not settle those who serve you?" — that becomes an offense. Likewise with respect to a female householder, it also becomes an offense. For a first-time act and similar cases, there is no transgression.

Here ends the first Saṅgha remainder of the Analysis of the Nuns' code.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) was residing at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove. At that time, when a misdeed arose, there lived in that place a great warrior named Rājasena, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches, of great enjoyment, whose domain of possessions was vast and extensive, who equaled the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa and rivaled Vaiśravaṇa in riches, and who was abundantly furnished with gold and wealth. He took a wife from his own social rank and sported with her, rejoiced with her, and lived in delight with her. Yet though they sported together, rejoiced together, and lived in delight together, there was neither a son nor a daughter born to them. Having no son, he longed deeply for one, and for the sake of a son he made petition to many hundreds and thousands of gods — namely: to Brahmā, to Indra (Śakra), to the proximate gods, to Yama, to the Sun, to the malformed ones, to Kumāra the Ever-Young, to the Lord of Creatures, to Viṣṇu, to the Lord of Power, to Śagā, to the All-Doer, to Revatī, to the God of Wind-Butter, to the God of Earth, to the God of Water, to the God of Fire, to the God of Wind, to the Guardian of the Regions, to the Noble-Born, to the Evil-Eyed, to the son of Vaiśravaṇa, to Precious Jewel, to Auspicious Fullness, to the Five-Honored, to the Five-Receivers, to the twenty-eight yakṣa generals, to the Robber-Woman attended by a retinue of five hundred, to the god of the pleasure garden, to the god of the forest, to the god of the crossroads, to the god of the triple junction, to the god who receives the torma offering, to the god born alongside, to the gods who are harmonious with the Dharma and who constantly attend, and to many other hundreds and thousands of gods besides.

Now there is a worldly saying to the effect that sons and daughters are born through the power of prayer to the gods. Yet this is not actually so. If it were, then, like a wheel-turning king, each such man would have a thousand sons. Rather, sons and daughters come to be born when six conditions are simultaneously present. What are those six? The parents must have accumulated the karma by which they would obtain a child; the child must have accumulated the karma by which it would obtain those parents; the mother must be in a fit state and have the right monthly season; the parents must be united in desire; and a gandharva (an intermediate being, a consciousness seeking rebirth) must be present nearby. Moreover, the gandharva must have entered with a mind that is either attached to both of those persons, or hostile to them — either frame of mind will do. When these six conditions are present together, sons and daughters are born.

So while that man was earnestly occupied with making petition to hundreds and thousands of gods, a being renowned for the great power of its meritorious karmic ripening — one who had planted roots of virtue before previous buddhas, who was in its final existence, who was seeking conduct befitting that stage, who had weakened its bonds, who had seized upon the provisions for liberation, who was turned toward nirvāṇa, who had turned away from saṃsāra, who had no concern for death and rebirth in any of the realms of existence, and who was holding its final body — passed away from the realm of the gods and entered the womb of that wife.

Now among women, some who are knowledgeable by nature know five things perfectly. They know when a man has become desirous and when a man has ceased to be desirous. They know the right time and the right monthly season. They know whether a being has entered the womb and also from whence that being has entered. And they know whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, the being rests leaning on the right side of the womb, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning on the left side.

Perceiving that the being who had entered her womb rested leaning to the right side, she understood that it would become a boy, and filled with delight, joy, and great happiness, she spoke to her husband: "Lord's son, I have a pleasing word to offer you." He replied: "Good woman, may you receive news pleasing to gods and men alike. What pleasing news is it?" She said: "Lord's son, a being has entered my womb, and just as my right side has been uncomfortable without being crushed, I know I have obtained a son."

Then Rājyadatta, who was counted among the great heroes, heard this and was filled with delight, joy, and great happiness; and with a face like a blooming lotus, he spoke these words of rejoicing: "Good woman, may that son of yours be born just as he is! May I see the face of the dear son for whom I have longed, the son I have thought of for so long a time, whose birth may be fulfilled just as I have wished, who is born in harmony with me and not in disharmony, who will carry out my affairs, who will nurse me in return when I have nursed him, and who will make use of my wealth and possessions, who will cause my lineage and bloodline to endure for a long time to come; who will himself be wealthy, possessed of great riches, with vast and extensive holdings, so that my own lordship will not decline; and who, when we have died and passed our time, will on our behalf give gifts and make merit, and will follow us to whatever realm these two are born in" — and may he thus make the dedication of offerings. Knowing that a being had entered her womb, from that time forward he rejoiced in his wife, held her in great honor, and cherished her with love. He had her dwell without discomfort in an upper chamber, and he had her attended and cared for with whatever was needed for the cold in cold weather and for the warmth in warm weather — with food and drink prescribed by physicians, neither too cold nor too hot, neither too pungent nor too sharp, neither too salty nor too sour, neither too sweet nor too bitter, neither too oily nor too rough — food and drink entirely free from pungency, sharpness, saltiness, sourness, sweetness, bitterness, oiliness, and roughness. To nurture the being dwelling in the womb, he dressed his wife in robes of many varied colors, adorned her wrists with bracelets of gold, jewels, and pearls, and had her wear necklaces and pendants, armlets, shoulder ornaments, and earrings with rings. Her eyes were painted with eye salve, and her face was made beautiful with red lac marks. Her teeth were white as the flower of the kumuda lily, as silver, as snow, as pearls; her necklace was white as the jasmine flower, as the moon, as a swan, as cow's milk, as a conch, as a lotus root — pure and unstained; her waist was bound with a golden belt; and her feet were made beautiful with ankle ornaments. She was like a golden offering-pillar covered with flowers. Thus, through the merit accumulated and virtue performed by the being who had entered the womb, there arose in the upper chamber a harmonious and concordant retinue playing lutes, vihuelas, clay drums, great drums, and sweet-sounding musical instruments, and they played and made merry in that upper chamber just as divine daughters roam through a pleasure grove. They moved from one great, well-arranged couch to another, from small seat to small seat, without ever descending to the floor; and no one among them caused any unpleasant sound to arise. That household, too, grew and flourished with wealth, grain, sesame, gold, treasury stores, granaries, male servants, female servants, workers, those who live on dairy, bipeds, quadrupeds, and the like — just as the great ocean is daily filled by five hundred rivers, so did that household grow and flourish. After a time, the wives of the five hundred ministers counted among the great heroes also had beings enter their wombs. Then, when eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth, and the boy born was handsome, pleasing to look upon, beautiful, fair in color like the stalk of a lotus flower, with a head like a parasol, long arms, prominent hips at birth, unbroken brow-lines meeting at the center, a high bridge of the nose, a throat like a lion, an upper torso like a lion, and long shoulders. On that very same day the sons of the five hundred great ministers counted among the great heroes were also born. Five hundred mares also foaled. Similarly, up through the one named Ratna, all should be related in full. His kinsmen gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — the third seven-day period — a birth-feast was held in the city.

All of this, up through the question "What shall the boy be named?" should be related in full. Among those present at the naming ceremony, some said: "He was born together with wealth, and moreover he is the son of one who counts among the great heroes; therefore let his name be given as Śūraputranandana — Son of the Hero, Wealth." Others said: "He was born into wealth in the same way, and his father too counts among the great heroes; let the boy's name therefore be given as Śūraputranandana." And so he was named Śūraputranandana. All of this, from that point up through "He was entrusted to eight nurses," and from "With milk, with curds, with clarified butter, with fresh butter" up through "He was nourished and raised" — all of it should be related in full.

A serving girl took him up on her shoulder and went out into the street. There a brahmin skilled in reading bodily marks saw him and spoke these words: "This two-footed one is a field of merit" — and all of this up through "He took him from his father" should be related. And from "Having anointed him with fine sesame oil and sweet-smelling unguents" up through "Having made offerings, he was escorted back home" — all of this likewise should be related in full.

When he had grown up, he was enrolled in the study of letters and arithmetic. All of this, from that point onward, including arithmetic, and as for others, he became sharp-minded and accomplished. In all the arts and occupational disciplines of the warrior class — riding elephants at the shoulder, riding horses, the techniques of the chariot, the techniques of the sword, techniques of hurling, of pushing backward, of pushing forward, of guiding with the iron hook, of casting the lasso, of hurling the single-pointed vajra, techniques of throwing the wheel, techniques of shooting great arrows, modes of grasping, modes of stepping, binding the topknot, cutting, hacking, striking, splitting, slashing, striking from a distance, striking with a ringing sound, pressing on vital points, striking so nothing escapes, and striking with great force — in all of these he became fully accomplished and perfected. In the four stances, the five throws, and all eighteen branches of knowledge he became supremely sharp-minded and accomplished.

His father also had three pleasure gardens made ready for him — a winter garden, a spring garden, and a summer garden. The winter garden was entirely warm. The spring garden was entirely cool. The summer garden was neither too warm nor too cold. The three circles of his wives — the chief, the middle, and the lesser — were also established. And there, on the roof of the upper palace, together with the female musicians, he took his pleasure with those who drew forth the sweet sounds of flutes, lutes, clay drums, wooden drums, iron cymbals, and melodious music — just as sentient beings who have accumulated merit and done wholesome deeds come to experience the fruits of their own merit.

Then at another time, his companions went out saying they had gone deer hunting. He asked them: "Friends, where have you come from?" They replied: "We went deer hunting." He asked: "What is this deer hunting?" They said: "One goes to a remote place, kills some deer, brings back the meat, and eats it — that is what one does." He said to them: "Those deer dwell in remote places, eating grass and drinking water — what harm have they done to you that you kill them?" They replied: "In truth, they have done us not the slightest harm. Nevertheless, we kill them for sport." He said: "Therefore, please do not take delight in this, and do not go along with it." They replied: "As it is, even though you do not wish to go, the idea of your not going is out of the question — that conduct is not good."

They thought to themselves: "If we do not bring him along, there may well come a time when we ourselves are not permitted to go" — and so it was up to that point.

Those companions went to find the parents of the youth Norgyé and said these words to them: "Father and Mother, since the young man is fierce and of great prowess, if the kings of the sun-realm beneath were to hear of this" — and so on up to — "and the queens of Śla too would be increased in number."

Then, as far as the passage that reads: "The father and mother went to him and the companions told him to do as they said" — and up to "Excellent!" — he, being respectful toward his parents and thinking: "I cannot turn back their words. Since my parents have instructed me, I must do as they say," he accepted the proposal.

Then the parents, realizing that their son intended to go, instructed the servants who lived in their own village and those who lived by selling milk curds: "Norgyé the youth is going to a remote place for game — you too should go along." And those, following the instruction, arrived on the second day; and Norgyé, accompanied by five hundred youths who were included in the company of hunters, along with the many people who lived by selling milk curds and numerous servants surrounding him on all sides, departed for the hunt.

Then his companions said to him: "Friend, will you go to drive the game, or will you sit in the blind?" He thought: "If I leave these people behind in the blind and I myself drive the game, once it has been driven together they will slaughter most of the animals. Rather, it would be better for me to sit in the blind." So he instructed those others to go and drive the game forward, and they were delighted and said: "Friend, we gladly agree." And they thought: "He has trained in four positions and five elevated places, so most of the game will be slain."

He sat in the blind holding a quiver filled with a thousand arrows. When those companions had driven together most of the animals from all sides, and those frightened deer came rushing toward the youth, the compassionate youth saw them as they arrived in their terror, and his heart became uneasy; he was seized with compassion, and at that moment he spoke these verses:

To give to all sentient beings and to feel love for a single being — the love felt for that one being alone surpasses giving to all sentient beings.

The deer fled like the wind, and though some had been tormented by others and were scattered, he did not release a single arrow. Now, since all sentient beings share the one conventional consciousness of awareness, those animals thought: "This great noble one is compassionate," and so, feeling well-disposed toward him, they fled without fear.

Then Norgyé thought: "If some of my companions hear that I have not shot any arrows, they will be displeased." He then thought: "In order to prevent my mother from being scolded on my account, and in order to let people know that I am practiced in archery, I will shoot arrows." Having thought it through in this way — so that no harm would come to any sentient being — he shot his arrows with such skill that they went between the antlers, between the limbs, through the fur, and into the ears, and he let them fly. In this way he shot all those thousand arrows without causing harm to a single sentient being.

Then, when those deer had passed through and scattered, his companions came and sat with him in the blind —

They said among themselves: "Today we have surrounded nearly all the deer from every side, and this arrow-prince is skilled in the four stances and five modes of shooting. If many deer had been killed today, we could have carried off heavy loads — but in the end he has committed a single grave fault." Such were their thoughts.

When they approached him, they saw that he had not killed even one deer. Seeing this, they said to the arrow-prince: "Friend, where have those deer gone?"

He replied: "They fled and went away."

They said: "Did you not shoot your arrows?"

He replied: "I shot them — look, the quivers stand empty."

They thought to themselves: "For one of such renowned skill with the arrow — a reputation that is proven — not to know even one of the four modes, let alone all four, what more need be said?" And with that thought they began to mock and reproach his companions.

Then he came to his own home, went up to the roof of the upper palace chamber, rested his arms on the parapet, and turned inward in contemplation.

His parents came and spoke to him, saying — and the passage continues to the point where they ask: "Son, why did you not kill the deer?"

He replied: "Father and mother, do you hold me dear?"

"Son, you are most dear to us."

"If someone were to separate me from my life, what would become of you?"

They replied: "We would be in great pain and deep distress."

He said: "Then do you not also cherish your own lives?"

They said: "We cherish them most dearly."

"Then why do you set me to the task of taking the lives of others? And furthermore, have you not yourselves taught me this:

With love and compassion for all beings, abandon killing, slaughter, and the binding of life.
Just as you cherish and protect your own life, so too protect the lives of all others.

Did you not speak these very words?" — and the passage continues to that point.

Then those parents, having truly understood their son's resolve, said: "Son, in that case, go back up to the roof of the upper palace chamber and take your pleasure there with your circle of consorts."

Thereupon, from the roof of the upper palace chamber, the arrow-prince called out: "Whether you go on two feet or on none, whether you know medicine, spell-lore, or secret mantras — who among you is there that can liberate me completely from the wilderness of cyclic existence?"

At that time there were in the land the six teachers who were corrupt and who, though not omniscient, put on the proud display of omniscience — and so the passage continues from there.

He went into the presence of Kāśyapa and said: "What is your Dharma practice? What instructions do you give your disciples? What is the fruit of dwelling in the holy life under you, and what are its benefits?"

Kāśyapa replied: "Young man, my view is this, and I speak accordingly: There is no giving. There is no offering. There is no sacrificial fire. There is no good conduct. There is no bad conduct. There is no karmic maturation ripening from deeds of good or bad conduct. There is no this world. There is no world beyond. There is no mother. There is no father. There are no beings born by spontaneous generation. In this world there exist no arhats who have rightly gone forth and rightly entered in, who by their own direct knowledge have realized, accomplished, and thoroughly understood both this world and the world beyond, and who declare: 'Birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done."

— ending with the words "there are none who know anything beyond this present existence" — down to the passage concluding: "This teacher too has entered upon a wrong path; he pursues an evil path. The wise should abandon such a path, together with its dangers, exactly as it is" — and the verse that was spoken:

One who teaches wrong views and leads astray, who is renowned for teaching what is inferior — if his Dharma is of such a kind, what indeed is his non-Dharma like?

— down through the passage concluding: "In the same way, those six teachers departed, struck like empty vessels."

It is the nature of reality of all blessed buddhas to survey the worlds three times by day and three times by night — six times in every day and night — with the buddha-eye, perceiving: who has come to ruin, who has come to suffering, who has come to misery, who has come to discomfort, who has come to suffering and misery and discomfort; those whose root of virtue has not yet been produced, they will cause it to be produced; those who have already produced it, they will cause it to grow; those whose root of virtue has not yet fully ripened, they will cause it to fully ripen; those whose root of virtue has already fully ripened, they will cleave it open with the sword of wisdom; who is to be tamed by a buddha, who is to be tamed by a śrāvaka, who is to be tamed by both a buddha and a śrāvaka; who is disposed toward aversion, who is disposed toward attachment, who is disposed toward delusion, who is disposed toward attachment and aversion and delusion; who has been harmed by whatever fault — those who lack the noble wealth will be established in lordship over the riches of the noble wealth; those who have sunk into the mire of misconduct, they will be drawn out by the hand; whoever is to be raised up from the lower realms will be established in the fruit of the higher realms and liberation. Thus the buddha-eye is directed in constant watchful regard.

And again it was spoken in verse:

The ocean may pass beyond its bounds, the abode of makaras and sea creatures;
but a buddha, in love toward those to be tamed, does not pass beyond the right time.

Then the Blessed One, with the buddha-eye — his unobscured eye of primordial wisdom — surveyed all and considered. He understood in his mind that Gyalbū Nor had in former times generated roots of virtue before the buddhas of the past, had offered aspirational prayers, had ripened results, and was like one who wished to cleave them open with the sword. The Blessed One then thought: "By what means will he be tamed? Will he be tamed by a śrāvaka, or will he be tamed by a buddha? Will he be tamed by conduct, or will he be tamed by the teaching of Dharma?" — and so the Blessed One considered. When the Blessed One considered "if he is to be tamed by conduct, by whose conduct will he be tamed?" — at that point the venerable Aśvajit went to the region of Śṛgālavati, and in that region a lotus grove was to be found in which insects dwelt.

Then the venerable Aśvajit, in the early morning — from the words "having put on his lower robe" — down through: Gyalbū Nor, sitting atop the roof of his upper mansion, saw the venerable Aśvajit walking, turning, flexing and extending his limbs, wearing his patched robe and dharma-robe and carrying his alms-bowl — a beautiful sight.

When Gyalbū Nor saw the venerable Aśvajit, he then spoke this verse:

Those who live by the Dharma of signs — of these I have seen many here.
One who is peaceful and abides in peace — such as this one I have never seen.

— down to the end of that passage.

From the words "he sent a man" — down through the passage concluding: "having observed his conduct and returned, he spoke to the youth."

Then the venerable Gyalbū Nor, urged on by his root of virtue and wishing to see — from that point down to what was done so that he would become truly delighted — he sat down, and said to him: "Are you a teacher, or are you a śrāvaka?" The venerable Aśvajit then spoke in verse. From the words "what is the difference between Mount Sumeru, the king of mountains, and a white mustard seed?" —

What is the difference between the ocean and a tiny puddle left by a cow's hoofprint? What is the difference between the vast net of the sun's rays and a firefly's glow? Such is the difference between a fully awakened buddha, that treasury of qualities, and a śrāvaka.

Down to the end of that verse.

From the words "he came before his two parents and made his entreaty" — down through the words "permission was not granted," and then through the passage ending "food was withheld for a full day," and then his parents came and said to him: "You do not know suffering — celibate practice is difficult to maintain. It is difficult to rejoice in solitude. It is difficult to live in isolated dwellings, in forest edges, and in remote wilderness. For as long as you live, you would have to dwell together with dangerous wild beasts. For as long as you live, you would have to remain far removed from the pleasures and amusements of people. Come, my son — stay here, give gifts, and enjoy the objects of desire."

Down to the end of that passage.

Then, from the words "having granted permission" — down through the passage ending "having properly developed bodily strength and power," and then down through the passage ending "a proclamation was made: all those who wish to go forth may do so today — for the father desired that the youth Nor go forth into homelessness."

Then those who were companions of Nor thought to themselves: "This youth Nor, though so young and so desirous of happiness, has given up the happiness of home life and has decisively gone forth into homelessness. What then should we do?" Reflecting thus, one of them spoke up clearly and said: "Enough of this — let us too go forth." And so the youth Nor, together with five hundred young men, went to where the venerable Aśvajit was staying. Having arrived, they prostrated with their heads at the feet of Aśvajit and sat down to one side.

Seated to one side, the youth Nor said to the venerable Aśvajit: "Venerable one, please bestow upon us the going-forth and full ordination as monks in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya. We shall practice the celibate life under you."

Then the venerable Aśvajit in due order gave the youth Nor the going-forth and conferred full ordination upon him. He recited and meditated upon all three scriptural collections, and thereby became an arhat — free from attachment to the three realms, equal in regard to clay and gold, of a mind like unto space and like unto the palm of the hand, equal in regard to dung and sandalwood, having torn apart the shell of the egg of ignorance, having attained clear knowing, superknowledge, and the analytic knowledges, turning his back on becoming, on the gains and honors associated with desire, worthy of reverence, honor, and open praise from gods of every rank, both principal and attendant.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, established this as the regular custom: there are two great assemblies — at the middle month of the rains, at the time of performing the rains retreat, and on the fifteenth day of the middle month of autumn. Those who at the middle month of the rains, at the time of performing the rains retreat, received instruction and guidance, having passed the rains in towns, villages, districts, and royal residences — when the fifteenth day of the middle month of autumn arrived, they would recount what they had understood, and ask their seniors about it. Just as this was so for the Blessed One, the buddha, so too was it so for the great śrāvakas. Thus, when the venerable Aśvajit sent those who were his co-residents and attendants to pass the rains retreat in towns, villages, districts, and royal residences, and when on the fifteenth day of the middle month of autumn they came to where the venerable Aśvajit was staying, the venerable Nandaka saw them. And seeing those who had lived the holy life, he went out to meet them and, speaking kind words, gladly welcomed them, and received their robes, staffs, begging bowls for rinsing the head, water-strainers, hats, sandals, and belts. Those monks then went to where their preceptor was staying, paid their respects, recounted what they had understood, and asked their seniors about it. And the venerable Nandaka saw those who were going to Rājagṛha to visit the Blessed One and to pay their respects to the Blessed One. Seeing them, he went to where their teacher was the same and their preceptor was the same, and said to them: "Where are you all going?" They replied: "We have already seen our preceptor; now we are going to see the Buddha, the Blessed One." Then the venerable Nandaka thought to himself: "If by relying on a preceptor and a spiritual friend I have seen the dharmakāya of the Blessed One, yet I have not seen his form body, then I too shall go to where the Blessed One is." Having thought this, Nandaka spoke to his preceptor as follows: "Preceptor, since by relying on a preceptor and a spiritual friend I have seen the dharmakāya of the Blessed One, yet have not seen his form body, I now wish to behold his form body." When he had said this, Aśvajit replied to Nandaka: "My son, Tathāgatas, arhats, and perfectly awakened buddhas are extremely rare to behold, like the udumbara flower. My son, go and behold the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly awakened Buddha." Then the venerable Nandaka, given leave by his preceptor, arose and went together with those who shared the same preceptor to where the Blessed One was. At that time the Blessed One was teaching the Dharma to many hundreds in his retinue. The Blessed One, from a great distance, saw Nandaka coming. Seeing him, the Blessed One said: "Nandaka, come here! Welcome! You have come at the right time." At that time the Blessed One then arranged the lodgings in a mixed manner: sūtra-holders together with sūtra-holders, Vinaya-holders together with sūtra-holders, sūtra-holders together with those who hold the Māmakā, Vinaya-holders together with sūtra-holders, Vinaya-holders together with those who hold the Māmakā — and in the same way all three-fold combinations were to be applied. Then the Blessed One thought: "This Nandaka, in regard to the buddhas of former times, made the aspiration prayer: 'May I become, for the Blessed One, the foremost in distributing lodgings and assigning food.'" And thereafter, up to that point, the Blessed One declared: "One who distributes lodgings and is endowed with five qualities should not be appointed if not yet appointed, and if already appointed should be dismissed. What are the five? One who goes by desire, one who goes by aversion, one who goes by delusion, one who goes by fear, and one who does not know which lodgings have been allocated and which have not. The virtuous counterpart is the opposite of these." Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, Nandaka is to be appointed as distributor of lodgings" — and then, having arranged the lodgings, the act is to be performed: "Noble members of the Saṅgha, please listen. If Nandaka is willing to serve as the Saṅgha's distributor of lodgings,

"If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it is agreeable, let the Saṅgha consent; and we will appoint Nandaka as distributor of lodgings for the Saṅgha" — up to that point is the motion. After that, the act is to be performed in the proper form.

Once Nandaka had been appointed as distributor of lodgings for the Saṅgha, he began to assign lodgings differently to different monks. He assigned those who mastered the sūtras together with other masters of the sūtras; those who mastered the Vinaya together with other masters of the Vinaya; those who mastered the Māṭṛkā together with other masters of the Māṭṛkā; those who were newcomers together with other newcomers; those who practised Yoga together with other practitioners of Yoga. Those who had attained the fruit of stream-entry he assigned together with those who were once-returners; those who had attained the fruit of once-returning he assigned together with the non-returners; and the non-returners he assigned together with the arhats. In this way he assigned lodgings, pairing monk with compatible monk, so that their conversations would be mutually beneficial, well-reasoned, and the side of virtue would increase.

At that time the venerable Nandaka distributed lodgings by means of his supernatural powers. To those who came earlier in the night he emitted light from one finger as he assigned lodgings. To those who came later in the night he emitted light from two fingers; and likewise from three, four, and five fingers in turn.

Then those monks thought: "This has been done by one who acts in accordance with the Dharma." What had not been understood became understood, and what had already been understood became understood in an even more distinguished way.

After this had been done, the reputation spread in all four directions that the venerable Nandaka distributed lodgings while displaying supernatural miraculous feats. At that time those who were astonished came by day to witness it for themselves, staying in the vicinity of the Grove of Light and waiting through sunset until night fell. To them as well the venerable one likewise displayed his supernatural miraculous feats and assigned lodgings.

Now in Rājagṛha there were donors and patrons who offered food to the Saṅgha in three grades. Some offered the finest; some offered the middling; some offered the inferior. Those households that offered the finest were known to the group of six monks in advance, so they went there alone. Where the middling was offered, their companions and attendants went. Where the inferior was offered, the ordinary monks were directed to go. At that time there was a householder named Supriya, who was regarded as the foremost among those who offered the finest. The group of six monks would go there one after another by turns: on the first day, Nanda and Upananda ate there; on the second day, Aśvaka and Punarvasuka; on the third day, Chanda and Udāyin. The householder asked them: "Noble ones, are there no other monks in the Grove of Light? How is it that none of you ever come to take a meal here at the invitation of others, yet you alone come again and again?" They said: "Householder, you do not know."

"Though there are monks in the Grove of Light, each day they engage in all manner of eating, drinking, and other indulgences. How could they eat the food you offer, fine as it is? We come solely to benefit you." Then the householder said: "Noble ones, if you noble ones do not act for my benefit, who else would do so?" He said this.

Then at another time a monk was making a tour southward in order to see the Blessed One, and traveling along he came in due course to the Grove of Light. That morning he had put on his robe, taken his alms bowl, and entered Rājagṛha to walk the alms round. As he was walking along the road, the householder Supriya saw him and thought: "This is someone I have not seen before." He spoke to him and said: "Venerable one, where have you come from?" He replied: "From the south." "Why?" "In order to see the Blessed One." "And where have you taken up residence?" He replied: "In the Grove of Light." "Why are you walking the alms round?" The monk replied: "Can one cut off eating?" "Venerable one, do the donors in the Grove of Light not presently offer the Saṅgha clean and plentiful food, drink, and various kinds of fine provisions?" The monk said: "Householder, if that were so, would I come to your locality for alms?" When the householder heard the monk's words, suspicion arose in him regarding the group of six: "They speak one way to me, yet this monk speaks otherwise." He escorted that monk, saying: "Please set your burden down a moment; if you will allow me to serve you your meal for today's worth, please accept me as your follower." And so he led the monk away with him.

The two monks appointed by the group of six also arrived. The householder made them comfortable, served them a great abundance of clean and excellent food and drink, and when the meal was finished the householder said to the two from the group of six: "Noble ones, you have been teaching me the Dharma, one lesson at a time, each day — yet today I have heard the Dharma from this monk who has never come before." The two then dedicated the merit of the offering and departed.

Then the householder Supriya sat before that monk and said to him: "Noble one, was the meal I served you today excellent, or was it poor?" He replied: "Donor, from the time I set out from the south until this very day, I have never eaten provisions of this quality." The householder said further: "Noble one, these monks constantly say to me that this food is poor — what sort of thing is that?" The monk replied: "They did that in order to ensure that no one else would come to this house." "Venerable one, why do other monks not come to this house?" "Householder, if others were to come here, what would an elephant do when sprinkled with water?" He thought to himself, "That is exactly so," and said to him: "Venerable one, it is a pleasure to meet you — now please speak a word of Dharma." And the monk, having given instruction through a discourse on the Dharma, departed.

Then the householder Supriya, on that occasion, addressed the monks and spoke thus: "I have laid out a meal's worth of provisions for the Saṅgha. If monks appointed by the Saṅgha come and make use of it, I will honor that pledge without breaking it. But if that is not the case, then leaving the things I have set out to be given as charity just where they are, I will not offer them house by house to individuals."

Then those monks thought to themselves: "What kind of transgression is this?" — and reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, Jyotishka should be appointed as the one to assign food." When the Saṅgha, by a motion-and-second act of the Saṅgha, had appointed the venerable Jyotishka as the food assigner, the venerable Jyotishka surveyed all the donor households to determine which ones offered superior provisions, which ones offered middling provisions, and which ones offered inferior provisions. Having made that survey, he appointed the elder monks to receive superior provisions, the middle-ranked monks to receive middling provisions, and the junior monks to receive inferior provisions. On the second day, the elders received the inferior provisions, the juniors received the middling provisions, and the middle-ranked received the superior. On the third day, the elders received the middling provisions, the middle-ranked received the inferior, and the juniors received the superior. In this manner he assigned the monks to their meals by rotation. As for monks who arrived unexpectedly, on the first day they were assigned to the superior provisions, on the second day to the middling, on the third day to the inferior, and on the fourth day they were made familiar with the layout of the streets and lanes. When the Saṅgha was thus arranged for meals in due sequence according to seniority, there was no jumping out of order.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, among my śrāvaka monks — those who apportion lodgings and those who assign food — this Jyotishka is the foremost."

At that time two monks, Mitra and Jātila, were traveling from region to region and arrived by stages at Rājagṛha. The venerable Jyotishka assigned those two their lodging and quarters as well. When morning came, Mitra and Jātila said: "Venerable ones, who is the food assigner?" A certain monk said to the two of them: "It is Jyotishka." The two of them then said to the venerable Jyotishka:

"Jyotishka, please assign us our food."

So the venerable Jyotishka assigned those two, on the first day, to the households that offered superior provisions.

Then Mitra and Jātila, in the morning, put on their robes, took up their bowls, and made their way to the donor's house where they had been assigned. But that householder had lost his one beloved and pleasing son to death, and consumed by grief over the child's death, he had not prepared food for the monks. The two arrived unannounced, and the householder saw them. Seeing them, he asked the members of the household: "Has any food been set out for the monks?" They replied: "None at all." He thought to himself: "Already the death of my son is one disaster — why should I be saddled with a second?" Thinking thus, he offered them some poor quality food. The two ate it. Having eaten, they thought to themselves: "What we heard is one thing, and what we have experienced is another — we have ended up eating inferior food. Yet tomorrow we shall eat superior provisions." With that thought, on the second day the two were assigned to a household that offered middling provisions, and they went there — from this point forward...

...up to and including the words "the same fault occurred there." On the third day the two were assigned to go to a household of wicked patrons. Now, arhats do not engage their gnosis with deliberate intention, and since the two had eaten poor food repeatedly, their bodies became extremely weakened.

Then the two monks, Beloved Friend and Earth-Born, thought to themselves: "Alas, what suffering! Alas, how unbearable! The venerable Gyadbu Nor has deliberately had us eat inferior food three times in succession, leaving us utterly weak in body. We must find some way to steal food." So they resolved.

Now at that time the sister of the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born — a nun named Beloved Sister — was residing in Rājagṛha at the royal pleasure garden, in the nuns' rains retreat quarters. The nun Beloved Sister, becoming aware that the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born had departed, went to where they were. Arriving there, she prostrated with her head at the feet of the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born, and sat down to one side. While the nun Beloved Sister sat to one side, the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born would not converse with her, would not speak of how they had come, would not look at her, and would not glance at her at all.

Then the nun Beloved Sister spoke these words to the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born: "Noble ones, why will you not converse with me, not Speak of how you have come, not look at me, not glance at me? Your sister — we two, your sister — have been made utterly weak in body by the venerable Gyadbu Nor, who three times in succession fed us inferior food. Have you just cast that aside? Noble ones, then what am I to do about it? Sister, come here. Go to where the Blessed One is, and say to him: 'Venerable one, thus it is — the noble Gyadbu Nor has engaged in unchaste conduct with me, and a defeat has occurred. That is unseemly and not in accordance with the rule.' And we two will tell the Blessed One: 'It is so, Blessed One; it is so, Sugata — exactly as our sister has reported, so too do we confirm it.'"

When she had spoken thus, the nun Beloved Sister said to the two of them: "Noble ones, how could I slander a monk who is pure and without transgression with a matter that has no basis, accusing him of a fault entailing defeat? Sister, for as long as you do not say such a thing, for that long we two will not converse with you, will not speak of how we have come, will not look at you, will not glance at you."

Then the nun Beloved Sister sat for a short while without saying anything, and spoke these words to the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born: "Noble one, very well then — I shall do what is to be done. Sister, for that reason, stay here until we two have reached where the Blessed One is, and after that, you come."

Then the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, they prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side.

Then the nun Beloved Sister, knowing that the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born had not been gone long, went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, she prostrated with her head at the two feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the nun Beloved Sister addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable One, it is unseemly and improper that the noble Beloved Friend has engaged in unchaste conduct with me and thereby incurred a defeat."

The two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born also said to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, it is just as she says. Sugata, it is exactly so. We too affirm what our sister has reported."

At that time the venerable Beloved Friend was sitting right there in that assembly. Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Beloved Friend:

"Beloved Friend, did you hear what was said?"

"Blessed One, I heard it."

"Beloved Friend, what is the truth of the matter for you?"

"As I truly am, the Blessed One knows. As I truly am, the Sugata knows."

The Blessed One declared: "Beloved Friend, if you remember, say 'I remember.' If you do not remember, say 'I do not remember.'"

"Blessed One, I do not remember. Sugata, I do not remember."

At that time the venerable Śroṇakoṭivimṣa was sitting to one side behind the Blessed One, holding a yak-tail fan and fanning the Blessed One. Then the venerable Śroṇakoṭivimṣa addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable One, the nun Beloved Sister went to where the Blessed One was and said: 'Venerable One, it is unseemly and improper that the noble Beloved Friend has engaged in unchaste conduct with me and thereby incurred a defeat.' And the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born also said to the Blessed One: 'Blessed One, it is just as she says. Sugata, it is exactly so. We too affirm precisely what our sister has reported.' So what is there to say to the venerable Beloved Friend? Śroṇakoṭivimṣa, that is why I asked him directly. Whatever he is willing to answer, let him answer accordingly."

"But if the nun Beloved Sister were to come to where I am and say: 'Venerable One, it is unseemly and improper that the noble Śroṇakoṭivimṣa has engaged in unchaste conduct with me and thereby incurred a defeat,' and the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born were also to say: 'Blessed One, it is just as she says. Sugata, it is exactly so. We too affirm precisely what our sister has reported' — in that case, Śroṇakoṭivimṣa, how would you respond?"

"Venerable One, I would say: 'I remember,' or I would say: 'I do not remember.'"

"For the moment, you foolish man — if even you would say as much, then why should the monk Beloved Friend, who is pure and without downfall, not speak up?"

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, you should regard the monk Beloved Friend as one who possesses mindfulness. As for the nun Beloved Sister, since she has made her own admission, deal with her accordingly through formal procedure. As for the two monks Beloved Friend and Earth-Born — what did you see? How did you see it? Where did you see it?"

Where were you when you saw it? Investigate this thoroughly and question them carefully as to why they went there." Having said this, the Blessed One rose from his seat and proceeded to the assembly hall for the midday rest. Shortly after the Blessed One had entered for the midday rest, the many monks, realizing it,

When they had been questioned and investigated thoroughly in this way, the two of them spoke as follows: "Venerable ones, the pārajika defeat for unchaste conduct has not come upon the venerable Beloved Friend. However, we — because the venerable Beloved Friend forced us to eat bad food three times in succession — became wracked with hunger and our bodies became utterly exhausted." And the two of them thought: "How terrible! How unbearable! Because the venerable Beloved Friend, acting deliberately, forced us to eat bad food three times in succession until our bodies were utterly exhausted, we thought to find some way to steal from him. What we said to the venerable Beloved Friend was said out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, and out of fear. The pārajika defeat for unchaste conduct has not come upon the venerable Beloved Friend. In this way, the venerable Beloved Friend is innocent and without transgression."

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, those two foolish men have, for the sake of a trifling material gain, knowingly spoken false words." And on that very occasion the Blessed One uttered two verses:

One who bears a body and speaks falsehood has passed beyond the single Dharma, and one who has rejected the world beyond — there is no evil such a one will not commit.

Better to have eaten iron balls blazing like tongues of flame than, lacking discipline, without true restraint, to eat the alms food of the land.

Then the gods dwelling in the midst of the sky cried out: "Alas! How unbearable is this gain and honor! Utterly unbearable!" And from that point on they said: "Whoever slanders a monk for the sake of a trifling material gain — that is wicked, wicked!"

Then, at that time, a monk recited this verse:

Because even Beloved Friend, blameless wanderer through the three realms of existence, was slandered —
what wise person in this world would delight in cyclic existence?

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, if these three kinds of persons do not abandon their ways, they are bound for the lower realms, bound for hell. Which three? Monks, first there is the person who indulges in sensual pleasures and commits evil, unwholesome deeds. If that person does not abandon this, he is the first kind bound for the lower realms, bound for hell. Furthermore, monks, there is the person who holds the view and speaks thus: 'Sensual pleasures are pure; sensual pleasures are wholesome; sensual pleasures are to be enjoyed; there is no fault in sensual pleasures.' If that person does not abandon this, he is the second kind bound for the lower realms, bound for hell. Furthermore, monks, there is the person who himself engages in unchaste conduct and also falsely slanders others with a charge of unchaste conduct without any basis. If that person does not abandon this, he is the third kind bound for the lower realms, bound for hell."

Having spoken these words, the Blessed One, the Sugata, having said this,
The Teacher then spoke further, saying:

From the mouth of a person, when born,
An axe arises through the speaking of harsh words,
And by that very axe
One cuts oneself down.

Whoever praises what deserves blame
And blames what deserves praise —
From their mouth ruin is born,
And through that ruin they find no happiness.

One who wastes their own wealth through gambling —
That ruin is but a small thing.
But one who stirs up malice toward the Sugata —
That is a ruin very great indeed.

One who abides in the evil ground of blaming those whom the noble-minded revere:

To the number of a hundred millions, a thousand millions, a hundred thousand millions — thirty-six and five, however many —

One goes, bursting in hell like a bubble.

When the Saṅgha rebukes a dear nun who has accepted discipline on her own, and a friend, one born of the earth, has been well and properly questioned, then the nuns who are of blameless natural character speak the praises of the monk Gyatbu Nor, while they speak dispraise of the dear nun. Then the sister of the dear nun, a nun named Dzawa Chenma, at the moment of speaking dispraise of the dear nun, with anger, agitation, and fierceness toward the nuns, basely accuses the nuns without any basis with a charge of a pārajika offence, and disparages the nuns.

At that time the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks in turn reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then had this occurrence, this context, this matter, and this occasion explained in full, from beginning to setting forth the rule of training.

Furthermore, whichever nun, with anger and without having abandoned aversion, thinks "By any means let this one be separated from the chaste life," and without any basis — the three bases of what is seen, what is heard, and what is suspected being absent — accuses a pure nun who has no downfall with a charge of a pārajika offence: even if she later disputes the charge, whether asked by others or not asked, that dispute too is without basis. And if it is said "The nun abides in aversion and spoke out of aversion" — this Dharma is a downfall from the very first offence, and the remainder to be dealt with is for the Saṅgha together with the formal procedure of expulsion.

Now, "whichever nun" refers to the dear one. "With anger" means with agitation, fierceness, ill-will, and dissatisfaction. "Without having abandoned aversion" means without having set aside agitation. "By any means let this one be separated from the chaste life" means "by any means let this one be separated from the conduct of a renunciant." "A pure nun who has no downfall" means one who has no downfall with respect to that particular ground. "Without any basis" means without the three bases: the basis of having seen, the basis of having heard, and the basis of having suspected. "A charge of a pārajika offence" means the charge of whichever of the eight applies. "With a charge of Dharma" means that what is not Dharma has been spoken under the name of Dharma. "From the accusation" means on account of having made the accusation. "At another time" means at a later occasion.

"Whether asked" means by others. "Whether not asked" means when she herself, out of remorse — slight remorse, full remorse, or qualms arising in the mind — speaks. "That dispute too" refers to the four kinds of dispute: disputing out of remorse, disputing because of not being instructed, disputing on account of a downfall, and disputing on account of some matter. "Without any basis" means without the three bases being present. "The nun abides in aversion" means she desires to separate this one from the conduct of a renunciant. "Spoke out of aversion" means she desires still further to separate her from the conduct of a renunciant. "This Dharma" here means that what is not Dharma has been presented under the name of Dharma.

"Incurs a transgression from the very first" means she incurs a transgression immediately. "With a definite resolve to leave" means with firm intention. "The Saṅgha remains" means that this transgression depends upon both Saṅghas, is connected with both Saṅghas, and relies upon both Saṅghas; the transgression is to be lifted by both Saṅghas, not by any individual person. Alternatively, the eight defeats (pārājikas) leave no remainder, whereas this transgression does leave a remainder — and for that reason it is called "with remainder."

Now, how does a transgression come about? When one makes a false accusation against a pure person, a transgression is incurred through ten bases, but not through five bases. How does a transgression come about through the ten bases? When that person, with respect to something not seen, not heard, and not suspected, alters the perception and then alters the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and says, "I saw it myself," "I heard it myself," "I myself suspect it" — everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha. When one has heard something and then forgotten it, or has suspected something and then forgotten it, and yet alters the perception and then alters the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and says, "I heard it and did not forget it," "I suspected it and did not forget it" — everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha. When one believes what was heard and says, "I saw it myself"; when one does not believe what was heard and says, "I saw it myself"; when one doubts what was heard and says, "I saw it myself"; when one does not doubt what was heard and says, "I saw it myself"; when one has a suspicion and, on account of that suspicion, says, "I saw it myself" — in all these cases everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha. In this way a transgression is incurred through ten bases.

How is a transgression not incurred through five bases? When that person, with respect to something not seen, not heard, and not suspected, does not alter the perception, does not alter the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and yet says, "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspect it" — no transgression is incurred. When one has heard something and forgotten it, or has suspected something and forgotten it, and yet does not alter the perception, does not alter the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and says, "I heard it and did not forget it," "I suspected it and did not forget it" — no transgression is incurred. In this way a transgression is not incurred through five bases.

Just as, in the case of making a false accusation against a pure person, a transgression is incurred through ten bases and not through five bases, so too in the case of making a false accusation against someone pure who has been treated as impure, a transgression is incurred through ten bases and not through five bases. In the case of making a false accusation against an impure person, a transgression is incurred through eleven bases, but not through six bases.

How does a transgression come about through eleven bases? When that person, with respect to something not seen, not heard, and not suspected, alters the perception and then alters the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and says, "I saw it myself," "I heard it myself," "I myself suspect it" — everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha. When that person has seen something and then forgotten it, or has heard something and then forgotten it, or has suspected something and then forgotten it, and yet alters the perception and then alters the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, and the view, and says, "I saw it and did not forget it," "I heard it and did not forget it," "I suspected it and did not forget it" — everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha.

When one believes what one has heard and then says, "I saw it myself"; when one does not believe what one has heard and yet says, "I saw it myself"; when one suspects what one has heard and then says, "I saw it myself"; when one does not suspect what one has heard and yet says, "I saw it myself"; when one suspects what one has suspected and then says, "I saw it myself" — everything said becomes remainder for the Saṅgha. In this way, a transgression arises through eleven bases.

How does no transgression arise through six bases? When that person has not seen something, has not heard something, and does not suspect something, and yet does not alter the perception, the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, or the view, and says, "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspected it" — no transgression arises. When that person has seen something and has not forgotten it, has heard something and has not forgotten it, or has suspected something and has not forgotten it, and does not alter the perception, the acceptance, the intention, the understanding, the deliberation, or the view, and says, "I saw it and did not forget it," "I heard it and did not forget it," "I suspected it and did not forget it" — no transgression arises. In this way, no transgression arises through six bases.

Just as a transgression arises through eleven bases and does not arise through six bases in the case of making a false accusation against an impure person, so too in the case of making a false accusation against an impure person by representing them as pure, a transgression arises through eleven bases and does not arise through six bases.

The monks, having developed doubt, asked the Blessed One, the buddha, to resolve all their doubt — "What should be done?" — and the former narratives are to be set out at length up to that point. "Having done what can one make use of a dwelling, what constitutes begging for food, and yet one has attained the state of arhat and still has made a false accusation?" — this is to be set out at length as in the Rule for monks.

Here ends the second Remainder for the Saṅgha from the Rule for nuns.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing in Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove. At the time when the nun of lotus-blue complexion, relying on the spiritual friend the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, had abandoned blameworthy deeds and attained the state of arhat, she would go each day, at all three times of day, to attend upon the Blessed One. The monks who had faith thereupon developed even greater faith upon observing that this great being, the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka, had set aside his own meditative absorptions, his liberations, and his meditative attainments in order to attend diligently to Dharma-related duties of service to the monks.

At that time, the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka was spending his days beside a pond called Walled-with-Stones, not far at all from Vulture Peak Mountain near Rājagṛha. Then the nun of lotus-blue complexion went to where the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka was, and having arrived she bowed her head to his two feet and sat down to one side. At that time the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka's patched monastic robe had been newly dyed a deep crimson, and the nun of lotus-blue complexion had only recently had her head shaved, so her hair had not yet grown long. Then his patched robe was carried off by the wind and became entangled around her head. At that time a deer also performed a deed improper for a male deer to do with a female deer. And also two close friends born of the same soil were washing their hands and feet at the Walled-with-Stones pond. When these two friends born of the same soil bowed to the feet of the nun of lotus-blue complexion and the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka — the edge of the patched robe was carried off by the wind and became entangled around her head, and they also saw a deer performing with a female deer an act improper for a male deer to do. Having seen this, one friend said to the earth-born one: "Earth-born one, look at Nandakoṭṭinandaka and the lotus-blue one. At that time we had not found our match, but now we have found our match." Having said this, the two of them used that match to challenge the venerable Nandakoṭṭinandaka. The monks then said the following: "Are you two going to abandon gods and humans all at once and dwell alone in the hells?" The two replied, "If we have done no wrong, it is our own eyes that have done wrong" — and so on up to where the Blessed One said to the two of them: "What did you see? How did you see it? Where did you see it? Where were you when you saw it? You two, speak up properly: why did you go there? Inquire into it well." All of this is as before. The monks also questioned the two of them properly. When they were properly questioned and examined, the two said: "We saw a male deer and a female deer. We saw Nandakoṭṭinandaka and the lotus-blue one, and on the basis of that match we challenged him." At that point the monks reported to the Blessed One, and when the Blessed One laid down the training rule for the monks, the nuns used that match to challenge the lotus-blue one. Then the nuns told the monks about it, and the monks reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This being the case," proceeded through the laying down of the training rule, all as before.

Furthermore, if a nun who is angry and has not abandoned aversion thinks by any means to separate this one from the celibate life, and accuses a nun who is pure and free of any downfall — taking up, on the basis of a dispute that belongs to no other party, some matter that belongs to no other party, in a merely partial manner — and on the basis of that false accusation charges a nun who has not incurred a defeat with a matter of defeat, then even if later, whether questioned or not, that very dispute also belongs to no other party, and that dispute too is one in which a matter belonging to no other party has been taken up in a merely partial manner, and the nun, abiding in aversion, speaks out of aversion — in that case, already by this first act a downfall has occurred, and it is one entailing expulsion, and she is to be suspended from the Saṅgha.

Now, "a nun" refers to a female friend. "Who is angry" and the rest is as before. "A dispute" refers to the four kinds of disputes, as before. "Belonging to no other party" — "other" here refers to nirvāṇa, and "not belonging to it" refers to the eight factors that constitute a defeat. "In a merely partial manner" is like the case of the male deer and the female deer. "Matter" means that what is not Dharma is spoken of by the name of Dharma. "Takes up" means seizes upon it. "A nun who has not incurred a defeat" refers to the lotus-blue one. "A matter of defeat" means any one of the eight defeats. "On the basis of a false accusation" means on the basis of having leveled a false charge — and from there the entire training rule for baseless accusation is to be recited in full, exactly as before.

Now, as to how a downfall arises in this case: when a nun sees a nun who is about to incur a defeating downfall and comes to regard her as one who has no downfall, and having formed that perception, she then converts it — along with her patience, desire, and understanding — — and her view, and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa (a Saṅgha-remainder offense) arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat, and having come to hold the view of Saṅghāvaśeṣa regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth up to that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat, and having come to hold the view of a transgression regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat, and having come to hold the view of one requiring individual confession regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat, and having come to hold the view of a wrong deed regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a Saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, and having come to hold the view of no transgression regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a Saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, and having come to hold the view of defeat regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression of wrong doing, and having come to hold the view of no transgression regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that is a wrong doing, and having come to hold the view of a defeat regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that is a wrong doing, and having come to hold the very view of a wrong doing regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that is a wrong doing, and having come to hold the view of a transgression requiring confession regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression that is a wrong doing, and having come to hold the view of a minor offense regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression requiring confession, and having come to hold the view of no transgression regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression requiring confession, and having come to hold the very view of a transgression requiring confession regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression requiring confession, and having come to hold the view of a minor offense regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a minor offense, and having come to hold the view of no transgression regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

When a nun sees a nun committing a transgression requiring confession, and having come to hold the view of a transgression requiring confession itself regarding that matter, she converts her perception — and so forth from that point — and declares "I have seen a nun committing a transgression that will lead to defeat," then a Saṅghāvaśeṣa arises.

This completes the third Saṅghāvaśeṣa from the Vinaya analysis for nuns.

The Blessed One was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, in the kingdom of Prince Jeta at Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Sthulanandā became attached to a young perfume-seller. She went to where that young perfume-seller was, approached him, and acted in such a way as to make him become attached to her as well. He, being attached, and out of that attachment, allowed her to take a small amount for herself. She went again and again, gave him a small amount, and received much in return at a high price.

Then the young perfume-seller thought to himself: "How long will I go on in this enjoyment?" Thereafter, at another time, the young perfume-seller said to Sthulanandā: "Noble lady, when will I be able to meet with you?" She replied: "You will meet with an elephant."

Then the nun who was following behind said to Sthulanandā: "Noble lady, does this man not know that you are attached to him?" She replied: "He knows." "Then why did you let the monks hear the occasion when the man, out of his attachment, allowed you to take a small amount for yourself?" Having heard this, the monks were told. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on the basis of this occurrence, and so forth through to the establishment of the training rule: "Whatever nun, being herself attached, takes even a small amount for herself from a man who is attached to her — this offense entails defeat from the very first instance, together with expulsion; it is a Saṅghāvaśeṣa."

"Whatever nun" refers to Sthulanandā. "Being attached" means being desirous, thoroughly desirous, and bound by passion. "A man who is attached to her" means one who is desirous, thoroughly desirous, and bound by passion — such as the young perfume-seller, or any other person of that kind. "Takes" means directly. "A small amount" means any of the five edibles or the five non-edibles. "Takes for herself" means receiving it and swallowing it down the throat.

The phrase "this rule" is expressed using the term Dharma for what is not Dharma. "From the very first instance entails a downfall" means it becomes a downfall from that very moment. "Together with expulsion" means that it is to be carried out with forfeiture. "Saṅghāvaśeṣa" means that this downfall depends on both Saṅghas, is connected to both Saṅghas, relies upon both Saṅghas, and arises from both Saṅghas rather than from an individual; furthermore, the eight other cases that entail defeat have no remainder, whereas this downfall does have a remainder — and for that reason it is called Saṅghāvaśeṣa.

As to how the downfall occurs: if a nun who is attached takes even a small amount from a man who is attached, it is a Saṅghāvaśeṣa. If an attached nun takes from an unattached man, it is a wrongdoing. If an unattached nun takes from an attached man, it is a serious offense. For a first offender and similar cases there is no downfall.

Here ends the fourth Saṅghāvaśeṣa from the Vibhaṅga of the nuns.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, in Prince Jeta's park. At the time the Blessed One had laid down the training rule for the nuns, from that point forward the nuns never again engaged in buying and selling. They fell into poverty, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with mindfulness as your guide, you may buy." Then Sthulanandā said to Sthulanandita: "Now then, sister, first make yourself unattached, and once you have become unattached, receive a small amount from a man who is attached." She went and did exactly as described — taking a small amount from an attached man. Then Sthulanandita said to Sthulanandā: "Noble one, this man is attached." She replied: "Why is he attached?" While she was thus appropriating things in that way, the nuns said: "Why do you act like this?" She replied with such words as are fitting to the situation. The nuns then told the monks, and it continued up to the laying down of the training rule.

Whatever nun says to another nun: "Now then, sister, first make yourself unattached, and once you have become unattached, receive a small amount from a man who is attached" — this rule also entails a downfall from the very first instance, together with expulsion; it is a Saṅghāvaśeṣa. "Whatever nun" refers to Sthulanandā. "To a nun" refers to Sthulanandita. "First make yourself unattached" means: do not be desirous, do not be thoroughly desirous, do not let yourself be bound by passion. "From a man who is attached" means from one who is desirous, thoroughly desirous, and bound by passion. "Take a small amount for yourself" means: receive any of the five edibles or the five non-edibles and take them as your own — this is as in the previous rule. "Says" means utters these words.

As to how the downfall occurs: however much and to whatever degree a nun says to another nun, "Become unattached and then receive a small amount from an attached man and take it as your own" — in every case it becomes a Saṅghāvaśeṣa.

Here ends the fifth Saṅghāvaśeṣa from the Vibhaṅga of the nuns.

The Vibhaṅga of the Vinaya of the nuns, the ninth fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the kalandakas. At that time the nun Mitsema, through her own consent, was taken by a man and made to live a household life, and he played with her, and children — both sons and daughters — were born.

Then at another time she fell ill, and her younger sister, a nun named Mitsemo, hearing that she had fallen ill, went alone to visit her, looked in on her, and returned.

After that, the sick nun said to her younger sister: "Noble one, even if I should die this very day, do not leave — remain here without departing." And so the younger sister stayed there. That very night the nun Mitsemo passed away. Then her husband began to mourn, and one of his friends said to him: "This is her younger sister, the one called Mitsemo — take her as your wife." So the husband said to Mitsemo: "Noble one, do not leave this house, for it belongs to you." But she replied: "May your house become a prison. May your house burn to ash." And saying that, she departed.

Then the nuns asked her: "Where did you spend last night?" She replied: "At the place where my younger sister passed away." They said to her: "If someone were to separate you from your vows, what would you do?" She replied: "If I had not remained silent, I would have been separated from my vows that very day." At that point the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and so on up to the laying down of the rule of training.

Furthermore, whatever nun stays outside alone at night — this matter too becomes a transgression from the very outset, and, involving an exit from it, it becomes a Saṅghāvaśeṣa. "Whatever nun" refers to the nun Mitsemo. "At night" means from the time the sun has set. "Alone" means without a second person. "Stays outside" means that she lets dawn break outside the summer retreat quarters. The rest is as before.

As for how the transgression arises: whatever nun stays outside alone at night — however that may come about — it becomes a Saṅghāvaśeṣa. If she stays outside together with a novice nun, it becomes a gross offense. If she stays outside together with a female trainee, it becomes a wrongdoing. If the nun who is accompanying her dies, becomes incapacitated, flees, or falls away, there is no transgression.

Here ends the sixth Saṅghāvaśeṣa from the Vibhaṅga of the nuns.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. At that time a nun named Pomgamo was preaching the Dharma alone in the homes of brahmin and householder families, going out each day as the sun set. When the sun went down she would return to the summer retreat quarters and say to the nuns: "Rub my back and waist." They asked her: "Noble one, where have you come from?" She replied: "From teaching the Dharma to brahmins and householders." They asked: "What nun accompanied you on your way back?" She replied: "I came back alone." They then said: "If someone were to separate you from your vows, what would you do?" She replied: "Did you not see that perfume seller's boy who jabbed me with a stick and broke two of my ribs?" They said:

"A water pot that is always submerged in water will never become hard and dry." Then the nuns spoke to the monks, and so on from that point up to and including the laying down of the training rule.

Furthermore, whatever nun remains outside alone during the daytime — this very offense constitutes an immediate downfall and requires expiation; it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's remainder. "Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "During the daytime" means from sunrise onward. "Alone" means without a second person. "Remains outside" means causing the sun to set somewhere other than the summer retreat quarters. The rest is as before.

As for how a transgression arises in that case: whatever nun remains outside alone during the daytime, under any circumstances whatsoever, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's remainder. If she remains outside together with a novice nun, it becomes a serious offense. If she remains outside together with a fully ordained nun, it is a transgression to be confessed. If the attendant nun accompanying her dies, falls ill, flees, or is brought down, there is no transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. Then Sthūlanandā sat alone at a crossroads where four great roads met, fully equipped with everything of like purpose, and set out on the road. She would go a league or a league and a half toward whichever great city she was heading for, and then turn back. And so, just as the sun was setting, she would return to the summer retreat quarters and say to the younger ones: "Rub my back. Rub my waist and ribs." They said to her: "Noble one, where have you been?" She replied: "Today I went to the roads of six great cities." They said: "With what attendant nun did you go?" She replied: "I went alone." They said: "If someone were to separate you from your vows, what would you do?" She replied: "If the sons of that perfume seller were to come and touch me, I would merely break their teeth with my black begging bowl." At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and so on from that point up to and including the laying down of the training rule.

Furthermore, whatever nun travels alone on a road outside — this very offense constitutes an immediate downfall and requires expiation; it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's remainder. "Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Alone" means without a second person. "Road" means a wilderness road. The rest is as before.

As for how a transgression arises in that case: whatever nun travels alone on a road outside, under any circumstances whatsoever, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's remainder. The rest is as before.

The setting is Śrāvastī. Then a number of nuns went wandering about and came to the bank of a river. Wishing to cross to the other side for some small purpose, they looked for a boat. They heard that on the far bank there was a boat moored to a stake. After a while the nuns caught sight of it, and they said: "If anyone among us knows how to swim, let her go and fetch the boat." At that time a nun named Kṛṣṇā, who had previously been a washerwoman, spoke up and said: "Noble ones, I will go and fetch the boat." Having said this, she tucked up her robes and entered the water.

But her former skill had faded, and her body had grown heavy, so that when she reached the middle of the river she sank down and touched the bottom. The nuns standing on the bank cried out, "Kṛṣṇā, swim! Kṛṣṇā, swim!" Exhausted, she managed to reach the bank, and at sunset she returned to the rains retreat quarters. The nuns asked whether she had crossed with some ease, and she told them in full what had happened. They then said to her: "Did you enter the water alone?" She replied: "Alone." They said: "If someone were to make you break your vow of discipline, what would you do?" — and at that point the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and so on up to the laying down of the training rule.

Furthermore, whichever nun swims alone to the far bank of a river incurs, from the very first instance, a transgression that entails expiation and is to be confessed before the Saṅgha. As for the phrase "whichever nun" — that refers to the nun Kṛṣṇā. "Alone" means without a second person. "Swims to the far bank of a river" means crosses over a river. The remaining terms are as before. How does a transgression arise in this case? Whichever nun swims alone to the far bank of a river incurs a Saṅgha expiation. If she crosses a stream, she incurs a grave offence. If she crosses a channel, she incurs a grave offence. If she crosses a rivulet, she incurs a minor offence. Here ends the ninth chapter of the Saṅgha Expiation section of the Nuns' Analysis.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time King Prasenajit had two men in his service: one called "Crusher of Armies by Might and Power," and another called "Noble Lineage." These two went before King Prasenajit, and whenever any mountain stronghold had rebelled, they would go there and do battle. When they went away on such campaigns, their wives would sport, make merry, and carouse with lewd women, flatterers, and deceivers. The men then thought: "We subdue rebellious mountain strongholds — can we not discipline our own wives? This is shameful and improper." And they resolved: "Whichever of our wives commits impropriety with another man shall have her head shaved and be cast out." Some among them said: "This law is far too harsh — let us petition the king." Then the general called Estimator, together with his troops, went to where King Prasenajit was, reported all of this to the king in full, and the king declared them not at fault. Now the daughter of General Estimator, whose name was Senā, had acted contrary to the rule, and when she did so, many women said: "If this one is not punished by the penalty, then we too shall break the rule." The soldiers heard this and reported it to Estimator. General Estimator thought: "I myself laid down this rule — how could it be right for me to rescind it?" So General Estimator dismissed Senā and ordered the soldiers to kill her. When Senā heard this, she went far, far away, and prostrating herself at the soldiers' feet, begged their forgiveness. They said: "We cannot condone such improper conduct as this —

"Nevertheless, so that looking to the soldiers shall not be in vain, her reply shall be given within seven days." She received her answer within those seven days, and while weeping she gave what was to be given. While she was making merit, the nun Phyar-mo asked Senā-mā, "Why are you weeping?" She said these words: "Her father has utterly abandoned her. Her mother has utterly abandoned her. Her husband has utterly abandoned her, and she will not be here in seven days." At this, Phyar-mo said, "Would you not wish to go forth right now?" and thereupon Senā-mā went forth from that place. Phyar-mo then took her away to a summer dwelling.

When the soldiers heard of this, they said: "Even if she hid in the gap between an ox's horns, she shall not be left alive." When Senā-mā's mother heard this, she was terrified and went to take refuge with the group of twelve. Those twelve said: "Sister, if the children of Buzanma come, ward them off with a black bowl used as a pestle." She thought to herself: "These crows of the group of twelve cannot protect me," and so she went to take refuge with the Great Lady of Beings, Gautamī. She told her: "Thus I was utterly abandoned by my father, utterly abandoned by my mother, utterly abandoned by the soldiers, ordered to be killed by the king, and cast off by my husband" — from this point up to "who ordained you?" — and then she went on to take refuge with the queen Phreñ-Idan-ma.

Then Queen Phreñ-Idan-ma interceded with the king on behalf of Senā-mā, daughter of Estimator, and the king agreed. The king went to where the soldiers were stationed and spoke these words: "This Senā-mā, daughter of Estimator, has gone for refuge to the Buddha, gone for refuge to the Dharma, gone for refuge to the Saṅgha, has come to me for refuge, and has gone for refuge to you — do not kill her." They replied: "Your Majesty, shall we violate the rule?" He said: "Protect the rule itself well and in full; however, on this account you shall give something excellent." At that juncture, the nuns told this to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, from the account of what occurred, the ground for the rule, the object of the rule, and the occasion — all the way through to the laying down of the training rule — declared as follows.

Whatever nun, knowing that a woman has been ordered killed by the king, abandoned by her husband, utterly cast off by her parents, and condemned to be killed by the soldiers, nevertheless admits her into the community — that matter from the very first moment becomes a transgression that entails expulsion and proceeds with a remainder, becoming a matter for the Saṅgha to decide.

Now, "whatever nun" refers to Phyar-mo. "A woman" refers to Senā-mā. "Ordered by the king" means that the king Śukla himself consented to it. "Abandoned by her husband" means by Senā-mā's husband. "Utterly cast off by her parents" means by Estimator and by Estimator's wife. "Condemned to be killed by the soldiers" means by the one who crushes the power of the mighty and by the one of good lineage. "Knowingly" means whether she herself knew or was told by another. "Admits into the community" means she causes her going forth and full ordination (upasampadā) in this Dharma-Vinaya through the act of the four announcements.

The rest is as before.

As to how the transgression arises: if a nun causes a woman of such a kind to go forth in any way whatsoever, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha to decide.

The tenth chapter of the section on the rules for nuns, the Saṅghāvaśeṣa, is complete.

A summary verse:

When one procures a surety bond, causes one to seek forbearance, Abandons the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, Speaks of desire, anger, and fear,
Dwells together with the two, sides with that person,
Causes a schism in the Saṅgha and sides with the schismatics,
And brings trouble to a household — these are the ten that cause distress to the mind.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, in Prince Jeta's park. At that time in Śrāvastī there was a householder who was struck down by illness, yet he continued to give gifts to ascetics, brahmins, the poor, and the destitute, and to make merit. The nun Sthūlanandā heard of this. She then went to where that householder was, and having arrived, she gave him a Dharma teaching. After giving the Dharma teaching, she said this to the householder: "Good sir, women receive little, so please give something to me as well." He said this in reply: "Noble one, why did you not come sooner? I am nearly dead, and I have already sent everything to the next world." She said: "If you have a change of heart, you will live for a hundred years without any illness whatsoever." He said: "Noble one, are you willing to accept a surety bond?" She said: "Good sir, if you give it, then yes." Thereupon he gave it to her. She took the surety bond and went to another householder, and having arrived, she said to that householder: "Good sir, please read this a moment." He read it, and then said: "Noble one, do you have authority over this?" She replied: "I have authority over it; I shall present it." Then Sthūlanandā seized hold of that householder and said: "If you do not give this to me, I will hand you over to the royal court." And indeed he remained there under her grip. A friend of his arrived and asked him: "What is happening here?" He replied: "I have been seized over a debt I owe." "Who is it that you owe this debt to?" He replied: "It is a nun." The friend said: "Can you really find nothing else in the world to use, that you should take from a nun?" Then, because brahmins and householders were doing such things as taking surety bonds, they began to revile, criticize, and reproach, saying: "The conduct of the female renunciants among the sons of the Śākya is burnt up and destroyed." The nuns, hearing this, spoke to the monks. The monks, in turn, reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence having arisen," established a training rule through to its conclusion.

Furthermore, whatever nun procures a surety bond: this matter is also an offense from the very first instance, entailing expulsion from the community, and it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha to decide.

As for the phrase "whatever nun," this refers to Sthūlanandā. "Surety bond" means a pledge-document used to recover a debt. "Procures" means if she takes it. "This matter also" — here the word "matter" is applied to what is not truly a proper matter. The rest is as before.

As to how the transgression arises: if a nun procures a surety bond in any manner whatsoever, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha to decide. For one who entered through a minor pretext, and for a first offender and the like, there is no transgression.

The eleventh chapter of the section on the rules for nuns, the Saṅghāvaśeṣa, is complete.

The origin of this rule is in Śrāvastī. At that time in Śrāvastī there was a nun named Dundubhī who was quarrelsome, who caused strife, who picked fights, who delighted in disputes. Her daughter, named Dundubhikā, heard all of this and repeated everything back to her mother.

Because of this, those of the nuns' Saṅgha came running and began to fight and quarrel. Then, after the nuns' Saṅgha had investigated the matter, once the congregation had gone on alms round, the nuns' Saṅgha performed the act of suspension against the nun Dundubhikā in her absence, since she was not seen in the assembly.

Thereafter Dundubhikā wept and told her mother that the nuns' Saṅgha had performed the act of suspension against her in her absence. Her mother said to her, "They can also perform the act of expulsion from the three realms — watch!" Saying this, she went outside the boundary of the consecrated area, sought the nun's forbearance, and proceeded to live together with her, eat together with her, and sleep together with her in the same house.

The other nuns then said to Dundubhikā, "Why do you live together, eat together, and sleep in the same house with one who has been expelled?" She replied, "What do you mean, expelled? Is it not permitted to stay somewhere in another direction or locality?" The nuns said, "Seek the forbearance of the nuns' Saṅgha." She replied, "I myself performed the expulsion. Where and how did you nuns expel her?" The nuns said, "Outside the boundary." She replied, "Whether it is proper or not to expel someone outside the boundary — I have done it! As for seeking forbearance, that ought to be done properly. But what you have done was done out of desire. It was done out of aversion and delusion." On account of this, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks in turn reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then declared, "Nuns, you should summon the nun Dundubhikā, or anyone else similar to her, and admonish her." The nuns summoned and admonished that nun. But when summoned and admonished, she stubbornly clung to that very same position, grasped at it as supreme, and persisted in asserting, labeling with the designation: "This alone is true; anything else is false." Because of this, the nuns again spoke to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared, "The nuns should admonish the nun Dundubhikā through a motion and three proclamations. The admonishment is to be done as follows: having prepared the seats — so it is said — one nun makes the motion and performs the act. The act is performed in this manner:

'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, may you hear me. This nun Dundubhikā, while the nuns' Saṅgha performed against her an act of suspension in her absence because she was not seen, has nonetheless — knowingly, and after such an act of suspension was performed — lived together with the one against whom the act of suspension was performed, eaten together with her, and slept together with her in the same house. Then, when the nuns summoned and admonished her, she stubbornly clung to that very same position, grasped at it as supreme, and persisted in applying the designation: "This alone is true; anything else is false." If the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, may the Saṅgha approve this.' The admonishment of the nun Dundubhikā through a motion and three proclamations is performed. This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows:

'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, may you hear me. This nun Dundubhikā, knowing that the nuns' Saṅgha performed against a nun an act of suspension in her absence, has nonetheless lived together with the one against whom that act of suspension was performed, eaten together with her, slept in the same dwelling, and when the nuns admonished her and instructed her on this matter, she held to that same ground obstinately, grasping it as supreme, and in applying the designation, "This alone is true; anything else is false," the noble Saṅgha of nuns has performed the act of admonishment toward that nun Dundubhikā through a motion and three proclamations. Those who consent to this may remain silent; those who do not consent may speak. This is the first proclamation of the act. The second and third are to be proclaimed in the same way. The Saṅgha having consented and approved by remaining silent, this is how it is held to be. From "through a motion and three proclamations she held to that same ground obstinately" and so forth, it is as before. From "thereupon the nuns" up to "bound by the training" it is as before.

Furthermore, if any nun, knowing that the harmonious Saṅgha of nuns has performed against some nun an act of suspension from her dwelling, goes out alone beyond the boundary and causes a request for consent to be made, this very act from its very beginning constitutes a transgression and incurs a residual matter requiring the Saṅgha as remainder.

Now, the phrase "if any nun" refers to the subject nun. The phrase "the Saṅgha of nuns" refers to the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's female disciples. The phrase "some nun against whom" refers to the object nun. The phrase "has performed an act of suspension from her dwelling" means through a motion and three proclamations. The phrase "knowing" means either by herself knowing it or because another person told her. The phrase "goes out alone" means she goes out by herself. The phrase "beyond the boundary" means she goes outside the circle of the boundary. The phrase "causes a request for consent to be made" means through a motion and three proclamations. The rest is as before.

As for how this becomes a transgression: if a nun, knowing that an act of suspension from her dwelling was performed against some nun, goes out beyond the boundary and causes a request for consent to be made, and then sits together with her, eats together with her, or sleeps in the same dwelling with her, in every such case this constitutes an offense. During the admonishment, if she abandons that ground, that is good. If she does not abandon it, there arises a grave offense. If, before the words of the first act are complete, she abandons it, that is good. If she does not abandon it and the words are completed, a grave offense arises. If, before the words of the second act are complete, she abandons it, that is good. If she does not abandon it and the words are completed, a grave offense arises. Even if the words of the third act are not yet complete, if it was performed invalidly through a concordant group acting contrary to Dharma, or through a discordant group acting contrary to Dharma, or through a discordant group acting in accord with Dharma, and if it was not done in accordance with what the Dharma prescribes, in accordance with what the Vinaya prescribes, or in accordance with what the Teacher taught, then there is no transgression. If the words of the third act are complete and it was done in accordance with what the Dharma prescribes, in accordance with what the Vinaya prescribes, and in accordance with what the Teacher taught, yet she still does not abandon that ground, then there arises a residual matter requiring the Saṅgha as remainder. If that nun, remaining right there on her seat, speaks these words, "Noble sisters, a residual matter has arisen for me," that is good. If she does not speak thus, it constitutes an offense. If she does not confess and disclose that transgression and thereafter participates in a motion, a motion with two proclamations, or a motion with three proclamations, in every case it constitutes an offense. For one who is being admonished for the first time, and so on, there is no transgression.

This completes the twelfth residual matter requiring the Saṅgha as remainder from the Analysis of Nuns' Rules.

The setting of the rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time, at Śrāvastī, there was a nun by the name of Nagmo who had formerly been a tīrthika. While quarreling with the other nuns, she became angry and said: "These practitioners of the Śākya sons alone are held to possess moral discipline and virtue, yet there are other practitioners outside them who also possess moral discipline and virtue. By practicing the holy life in their presence, one has done all that needs to be done; I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha." Upon her saying these words, the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks in turn informed the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "O nuns, you are to restrain and admonish the nun Nagmo, and any others like her. The admonishment is to be carried out as follows: 'Nagmo, when quarreling you became angry and said: these practitioners of the Śākya sons alone are held to possess moral discipline and virtue, yet there are other practitioners outside them who also possess moral discipline and virtue, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha — do not say such things. Nagmo, abandon this view of yours, which has become a view of evil.'" So were the nuns to restrain and admonish her.

When the nuns did restrain and admonish her in this way, she clung firmly to that very ground, holding it fast and remaining attached to it, continuing to assert: "This is true; everything else is false." The nuns then reported the matter again to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "The nuns are to admonish the nun Nagmo by means of a motion with a fourfold proclamation. The procedure for this admonishment is as follows: Let seats be prepared" — and so on down to — "and let one nun make the motion and carry out the formal act." The formal act is to be performed thus:

"Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, may you hear me. This nun Nagmo, having quarreled together with the other nuns and become angry, said: 'These practitioners of the Śākya sons alone are held to possess moral discipline and virtue, yet there are other practitioners outside them who also possess moral discipline and virtue, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha.' And when the many nuns restrained and admonished her, she clung firmly to that very ground, holding it fast and remaining attached to it, asserting: 'This is true; everything else is false.' If this is the appropriate time for the Saṅgha, and if the Saṅgha approves, then let the Saṅgha grant consent: the Saṅgha shall admonish the nun Nagmo — who quarrels with the other nuns — by means of a motion with a fourfold proclamation. This is the motion.

The formal act is to be performed thus: Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, may you hear me. This nun Nagmo, having quarreled together with the other nuns and become angry, said: 'These practitioners of the Śākya sons alone are held to possess moral discipline and virtue, yet there are other practitioners outside them who also possess moral discipline and virtue, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha.' And when the many nuns restrained and admonished her, she clung firmly to that very ground, holding it fast and remaining attached to it, asserting: 'This is true; everything else is false.' Accordingly, the Saṅgha has performed the admonishment of the nun Nagmo — who quarrels with the other nuns — by a motion with a fourfold proclamation.

When the many nuns again restrained and admonished her — clinging firmly to that very ground, holding it fast and remaining attached to it, asserting: 'This is true; everything else is false.' Accordingly, the noble Saṅgha of nuns has performed the admonishment of the nun Nagmo by a motion with a fourfold proclamation.

When the Saṅgha has performed the admonishment of the nun Nagmo by a motion with a fourfold proclamation, those who consent should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak. This is the first proclamation of the motion. The second and third are likewise to be proclaimed with the same content — continuing up to: the Saṅgha has consented and approved, remaining silent in this way, and so it is understood to be accepted.

When she was admonished by the motion with the fourfold proclamation — continuing up to: clinging firmly to that very ground — it is as before.

At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared — from that point up to: including the training — what is to be trained in.

Furthermore, if a nun, while quarreling with the other nuns, becomes angry and says: 'Only these female renunciants (śramaṇas) who are disciples of the Śākyan possess moral discipline and virtue; other renunciants too who possess moral discipline and virtue exist, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha,' the other nuns are to admonish that nun as follows: 'Sister nun, while quarreling with the other nuns you became angry and said: "Only these female renunciants who are disciples of the Śākyan possess moral discipline and virtue; other renunciants too who possess moral discipline and virtue exist, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha." Sister nun, do not say this. Sister nun, abandon this kind of corrupt view.' The nuns are thus to admonish that nun. If she abandons that ground, well and good. If she does not abandon it, the nuns are to admonish her a second and a third time, saying: 'Sister nun, while quarreling with the other nuns you became angry and said: "Only these female renunciants who are disciples of the Śākyan possess moral discipline and virtue; other renunciants too who possess moral discipline and virtue exist, and by practicing the holy life in their presence one has done all that needs to be done — I renounce the Buddha, I renounce the Dharma, I renounce the Saṅgha." Sister nun, do not say this. Sister nun, abandon this kind of corrupt view.' If the nuns have duly admonished her a second and a third time and she still does not abandon that ground, then by that very fact this constitutes a transgression with expulsion from the very outset, together with what follows from it, and she becomes one who is no longer part of the Saṅgha.

Now the term 'a nun' refers to Nagmo. The phrase 'while quarreling' means while two sides have formed. 'Becomes angry' means having become displeased in mind. The phrase 'only these female renunciants who are disciples of the Śākyan' means these ones alone. 'Possess moral discipline and virtue' means possessing moral discipline as prescribed. 'Possess virtue' means possessing virtues such as learning and the like. 'Other renunciants too' means those outside of these. 'In their presence' means in the vicinity of those others.

The phrase 'only having practiced the holy life' means only having gone forth into renunciation. 'Will abandon the Buddha' means the foremost among two-footed beings. 'Will abandon the Dharma and the Saṅgha' means the foremost free from attachment, and the foremost among assemblies. The phrase 'to that nun who says so' means to Nagmo. 'By the nuns' means by those who hold this Dharma. 'Speaking thus' means taking up the matter and giving instruction just as the earlier formal instruction was given. 'If, upon being instructed, she abandons that basis, then so much the better' means that would be good. 'If she does not abandon it' refers to her having fallen into a sinful view. 'Upon giving correct instruction and correct guidance up to two and three times' means according to what was said in the motion and the fourfold formal act, as previously instructed.

Then, as for how the transgression arises: if a nun who is quarreling becomes angry and says, "Only these female renunciants who are disciples of the Śākyan possess moral discipline and virtue — but there are also other renunciants who possess moral discipline and virtue, so I shall only practice the holy life in their presence; I will abandon the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha" — saying this is a transgression in every case. If, upon being instructed, she abandons that basis, then so much the better. If she does not abandon it, it becomes a grave offense. If, before the words of the first formal act are complete, she abandons it, then so much the better. If she does not abandon it and the words are completed, it becomes a grave offense. If, before the words of the second formal act are complete, she abandons it, then so much the better. If she does not abandon it and the words are completed, it becomes a grave offense. If the words of the third formal act are also not yet complete, and the matter has been conducted invalidly through agreement, or conducted invalidly through disagreement, or conducted as valid through disagreement, and it has not been done in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and the teaching of the Teacher, there is no transgression. If the words of the third formal act are also complete, and it has been done in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and the teaching of the Teacher, yet she still does not abandon that basis, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's remainder. That nun, while still seated in that very place, should speak words such as: "Noble ones, a Saṅgha's remainder has arisen for me" — if she does so, so much the better. If she does not speak thus, it becomes an offense. If, without having confessed and disclosed that transgression, she then participates in the motion, the motion-with-one-recitation, and the motion-with-three-recitations that follow immediately thereafter, it is a transgression in every case. For those performing the formal act for the first time and similar cases, there is no transgression.

The thirteenth Saṅgha's remainder from the Vibhaṅga for nuns is complete.

The basis for this rule is in Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Stubborn Gaiety was quarreling with another nun and took up a dispute. Having become embroiled in it, the nuns instructed her, saying, "Sister, do not quarrel." She became angry at them and said, "Because you give instruction to this one but not to others, you nuns go by desire, you go by aversion, you go by delusion, you go by fear." At that, the nuns told the monks about this, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Nuns, you should take up the matter of Stubborn Gaiety" — and from those words onward, "do not quarrel," one should take up the matter and give instruction. And when she has been taken up and instructed, on that very basis, firmly — up to "she shall be instructed by a motion and three proclamations" — that is the extent of it. Now, regarding instruction by a motion and three proclamations: from the words "on that very basis, firmly" up to "together with the training" — that is the extent of it.

Furthermore, when a nun who is quarreling and persisting in it is told by the other nuns, "Sister, do not quarrel," and she becomes angry and says the following: "Because you speak to some who are quarreling but do not speak to others, some of the nuns here go by desire, go by aversion, go by delusion, go by fear" — to that nun who has spoken thus, the nuns shall say the following:

"Do not say, 'Because you speak to some who are quarreling but do not speak to others, some of the nuns here go by desire, go by aversion, go by delusion, go by fear.' These nuns do not go by desire, do not go by aversion, do not go by delusion, do not go by fear. Therefore, abandon such a course as this, in which you speak words such as 'They go by desire, they go by aversion, they go by delusion, they go by fear.'" When the nuns have addressed that nun in this way, if she abandons the matter, that is excellent. But if she does not abandon it, she shall be properly instructed and properly admonished up to two and three times for the sake of abandoning it. If, upon being properly instructed and properly admonished up to two and three times, she abandons it, that is excellent. But if she does not abandon it, this very matter will become a transgression from the very first instance — a definite arising — and she is to be expelled from the Saṅgha.

Now the commentary: "Whatever nun" refers to Stubborn Gaiety. "Who is quarreling and persisting in it" refers to one who has taken up both sides. "The nuns" refers to those who hold this Dharma. "Sister, do not quarrel" means "do not take up both sides." "Became angry" means out of mental discomfort. "And said the following — 'Because you speak to some who are quarreling but not to others'" — up to "they go by fear" — "to that nun who has spoken thus" refers to Stubborn Gaiety. "The nuns" refers to those who hold this Dharma. "The following" means that one should instruct by taking up the matter exactly as the earlier instruction was given. When one has taken up the matter and given instruction, "if she abandons it, that is excellent" means that would be good. "But if she does not abandon it" refers to the words "they go by desire" and so forth. "Being properly instructed and properly admonished up to two and three times" means: having done so by means of the motion and three proclamations as described earlier. The rest is as before.

As for how the transgression arises: to whatever extent a nun says to the nuns, "They go by desire," that becomes a wrongdoing. If she says, "They go by aversion," that becomes a wrongdoing. If she says, "They go by delusion," that becomes a wrongdoing. If she says, "They go by fear," that becomes a wrongdoing. The remaining twelve items are to be stated as before.

The fourteenth category of "Saṅgha remainder" from the Analysis of the Nuns' Code is complete.

The opening occasion takes place in Vaiśālī. At that time, nuns who have death omens and those who have near-death omens were living together mingled with one another. While living thus intermingled, they would laugh, play, and engage in rough and rowdy bodily conduct.

Because these two were living together in extreme proximity, it became a matter of concern. The nuns grew worried, and when they instructed the two of them, saying, "Sisters, the two of you must not live together in such excessive closeness," the two continued to live together in exactly that way. At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks in turn reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must not live together in closeness. Why is that? Know that if you live together in closeness, wholesome qualities will not increase but will only diminish. Nuns, you must live apart from one another. Why is that? Know that if you live apart from one another, wholesome qualities will not diminish but will only increase." Even after the Blessed One had given this declaration, when the nuns then instructed the two saying, "Do not live together in closeness," the two continued to live together in closeness just as before. The nuns again spoke to the monks, and the monks again reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Nuns, you should summon any nun who has death omens, any nun who has near-death omens, and any others who are of a similar kind, and instruct them. The instruction should be given as follows: the nuns should say to those two, 'Do not live together in closeness; live apart from one another. Why is that? Know that if you live apart from one another, wholesome qualities will not diminish but will only increase.' That is how the instruction should be given."

When the two were then summoned and instructed in this way — from the phrase "with insistence upon that very basis" as far as "the other is delusion" — the nuns again spoke to the monks, and the monks again reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Nuns, you should instruct the nun with death omens and the nun with near-death omens by means of a formal act with a motion and four announcements. The instruction should be carried out as follows: seats are to be arranged," and so forth, "and one nun is to make the motion and perform the act. The act should be performed as follows:

'Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. These two — the nun with death omens and the nun with near-death omens — have been living together in extreme closeness. Many nuns have said to them: Sisters, the two of you must not live together in such excessive closeness; the two of you should not dwell together; sisters, the two of you should live apart from one another. Why is that? Because if the two of you live apart from one another, wholesome qualities will not diminish but will only increase.' When the nuns have thus summoned those two and instructed them — from 'with insistence upon that very basis' as far as 'the other is lying' — if the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha is agreed, let the Saṅgha grant its consent, and let the Saṅgha perform for the nun with death omens and the nun with near-death omens the act of instruction by means of a motion and four announcements. This is the motion."

The act is to be performed as follows: the statement is to be recited three times in full. When the nuns have thus instructed those two by means of a formal act with a motion and four announcements — from the phrase "with insistence upon that very basis" as far as "this alone is true, the other is delusion" — the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with the words "this occurrence" and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, proceeded as follows.

Furthermore, whatever nuns are living together in community, and while living together in community they engage in laughing, playing, and rough physical horseplay — the other nuns are to address those nuns as follows: "Sisters, do not live together in community. Know that if you live together in community, the wholesome qualities will only decline and will not increase. Know that if you live separately, the wholesome qualities will only increase and will not decline."

If, when the nuns address those nuns in such words, they abandon that basis, then so much the better. But if they do not live separately and persist in living together in community, then in order to cause them to abandon that basis, the nuns are to admonish and instruct those nuns properly two and three times. If, when properly admonished and instructed two and three times, they abandon that basis, then so much the better. If they do not abandon it, this matter carries with it a definite consequence — it is a Saṅgha Remainder offense.

Now, the phrase "whatever nuns" refers to those facing death and those in proximate danger of death. "Living together in community" means seeking out one another's company — dwelling together sharing seats, beds, and food. "Laughing" means scoffing. "Playing" means sportive behavior. "Rough physical horseplay" means behaving in ways fitting for mockery. The phrase

"those nuns" refers to those facing death and those in proximate danger of death. "The other nuns" refers to those who uphold this Dharma. "Are to address them as follows" means they are to speak in these words. The phrase "Sisters, do not live together in community; know that if you live together in community, the wholesome qualities will only decline and will not increase" means: since living together in community is not conducive to the side of virtue, you should each live separately and apart. If you live separately, the side of virtue will only increase.

The phrase "if the other nuns" refers to those who uphold this Dharma. The phrase "when they address those nuns in such words" means admonishing those facing death and those in proximate danger of death just as the admonition was set out above. "Then so much the better" means it is good if they do so. "But if they do not abandon that basis, in order to cause them to abandon that basis, they are to be properly admonished and instructed two and three times" means: just as the admonition was set out above, they are to be admonished and instructed by a formal act with a motion and four announcements. And this constitutes the proper admonition, and this constitutes the proper instruction.

The phrase "this matter also" employs the word "Dharma" with reference to what is not in conformity with Dharma. "Carries with it a definite consequence" means it carries with it that upon which one must rely. As for how a transgression comes about: from the moment one says so much as "Sisters, please do live separately" and they continue living in community — in every such instance an offense is incurred. If they do not heed the formal admonition, it becomes a grave offense. The remaining sequence is just as explained previously in the twelfth Saṅgha Remainder.

The Analysis of the Nuns' Code, the fifteenth fascicle, is complete.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. At that time, when the Blessed One had spoken those words, those nuns proceeded to live separately. But when they were living separately, Sthūlanandā said to them: "Why do you live separately? Come, live together with us. Did not the Blessed One declare that through establishing conversation one's wisdom increases? Know then that if you live together in community, the wholesome qualities will only increase and will not decline." At that time the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "O nuns, summon Sthūlanandā and reprove her. The reproof is to be given in this way: 'Sthūlanandā, while knowing full well that the wholesome qualities of those nuns who live separately will only increase and will not decline, do not say to them: "Come, live together with us. If you live together, the wholesome qualities will only increase and will not decline."' — from that point up to the words "the rest is delusion."

At that time the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Let the nuns summon Sthūlanandā and, by the act of petition-with-four-proclamations, reprove her. The reproof is to be given in this way: after preparing a seat" — from that point up to "one nun having made the petition, the act is to be performed."

The act is to be performed as follows. "Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. Sthūlanandā went to the nuns who were living separately and said: 'O nuns, do not live separately; rather, come and live together with us. If you live together, know that the wholesome qualities will only increase and will not decline.' Thereupon, the many nuns, having summoned her and reproved her" — from that point, the basis remains the same, continuing with the words "insisted" up to "the rest is delusion." "If it is time for the noble Saṅgha and all agree, please grant it. What the noble Saṅgha does — reproving Sthūlanandā by the act of petition-with-four-proclamations — this is the petition. The act is to be performed as follows" — from that point, if the reproof by petition-with-four-proclamations is given three times, it is insisted upon as the supreme — from that point up to "the rest is delusion."

At that time the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, from the words "this occurrence" up to "established the training rule":

"Furthermore, whatever nun, knowing that certain nuns are living together, laughing, playing, and behaving in a coarse and disorderly manner with their bodies, goes to those who are living separately and says: 'Sisters, do not live separately; rather, come and live together with us. If you live together, know that the wholesome qualities will only increase and will not decline' — if the nuns say this to that nun, the nuns must say: 'You, who tell those living separately from those who are living together in laughter, play, and bodily coarseness, "Come and live with us and do not live separately" — do not say this.' And if, when the nuns have spoken those words, she abandons that basis, then good. If she does not abandon it, in order to get her to abandon it, she is to be reproved and admonished correctly two and three times. If, after being correctly reproved and admonished two and three times, she abandons it, then good. If she does not" — from "three times" up to "this Dharma too is accompanied by definite emergence and belongs to the remaining Saṅgha."

"Furthermore, whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Whatever nuns" refers to those on the verge of death and those in the vicinity of death. "Laughing" means giggling aloud. "Playing" means engaged in amusement. "Coarse and disorderly bodily conduct" means behavior fit to provoke laughter. "Knowing" means either by herself or because others have told her.

"Those who dwell separately" means each one dwelling apart. "If she says this" means when she speaks. "Sister, you" refers to those on the verge of death and those in the vicinity of death. "Not dwelling separately" means individually. "You should seek to mingle" means she should seek it out. "If you dwell mingled" means she should seek it out. "Know that wholesome qualities will only increase and not decline" means that the wholesome side will only increase and not decline. "To that nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "The nuns" refers to those belonging to this Dharma. "Should be told as follows" means she should be gathered and instructed just as the instruction was given before. "If she abandons that basis, then good" means it is well. "If she does not abandon it, in order that she abandon that basis, she should be correctly reproved and admonished two and three times" means this is done through a motion and a fourfold act of the Saṅgha, just as instructed before. How does a transgression arise in this matter? In whatever measure a nun, knowing that certain nuns are dwelling together, laughing, playing, and engaging in coarse and disorderly bodily conduct, then says to those who dwell separately, "Do not dwell separately; you should seek to mingle," in every such case she incurs an offense.

The sixteenth section on the remainder of the Saṅgha from the Differentiation of Nuns is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the kalandakas. At that time a terrible famine had come, and the forest mendicants found it very difficult to obtain food. There was a monk who had obtained supernormal powers. He was known by the name Jambū, meaning one who knows Jambudvīpa. He went to Jambudvīpa and filled his bowl with rose-apple shoots possessed of color, fragrance, and flavor, and carried them back. He himself enjoyed them fully and also shared them with those skilled practitioners who lived the holy life. Just as he did with the rose-apple shoots, so too he filled his bowl with the shoots of the bel tree, the āmalaka, and the kapittha, and carried them back. He himself enjoyed them fully and also shared them with those skilled in the holy life. Likewise, he went among the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings, and he went among the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, and filled his bowl with ambrosia, and carried it back. He himself enjoyed it fully and also shared it with those skilled in the holy life. Likewise, he went to the northern continent of Uttarakuru and filled his bowl with rice gruel made from naturally growing, unplowed and unsown rice, and carried it back. He himself enjoyed it fully and also shared it with those skilled in the holy life. Likewise, he went to the eastern continent of Pūrvavideha and to the western continent of Aparagodānīya, and went to those lands that were prosperous, extensive, pleasant, fertile, and filled with many people and many inhabitants, and filled his bowl with pure, fine food and drink, possessed of color, fragrance, and flavor, and carried it back. He himself enjoyed it fully and also shared it with those skilled in the holy life.

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "Now a terrible famine has come, and the forest mendicants find it very difficult to obtain food." And Devadatta thought further:

"I too shall attain supernatural powers, and I too shall go to that place which, being named Jambu, is known as Jambudvīpa, and shall fill my bowl with the fruits of the jambu tree, possessed of color, fragrance, and flavor, and take it away. I myself shall fully enjoy it, and I shall also share it with those skilled in the holy life. Likewise, I shall go to those lands that are prosperous, extensive, pleasant, fertile, and filled with many people and many inhabitants, and fill my bowl with pure, fine food and drink, possessed of color, fragrance, and flavor, and take it away. I myself shall fully enjoy it, and I shall also share it with those skilled in the holy life."

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "Now I shall go to where the Blessed One is."

So Devadatta went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, Devadatta spoke thus to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please show me the path of supernatural powers. O Sugata, please show me the path of supernatural powers."

Then the Blessed One, perceiving that Devadatta's wish had become wicked, spoke thus to Devadatta: "Devadatta, strive for now in the higher moral discipline, and supernatural powers and further qualities will arise in you. Strive in the higher mind and in the higher wisdom, and supernatural powers and further qualities will arise in you."

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "The Blessed One will not show me the path of supernatural powers." Realizing this, Devadatta went to where the venerable Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya was, and having arrived, he said to Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya: "Elder, please show me the path of supernatural powers."

Then the venerable Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya examined the mind of the Blessed One and, perceiving that Devadatta's wish had become wicked, spoke thus to Devadatta: "Devadatta, attend to form as it truly is, and supernatural powers and further qualities will arise in you. Attend properly to consciousness, up through consciousness, and supernatural powers and further qualities will arise in you" — up to the point where it says: Devadatta accomplished supernatural powers on the basis of the ten powers of Kāśyapa, and having become one, became many.

Now, when his mind was fully absorbed, there arose in him this wicked wish of such a kind: "At the present time the Blessed One, worn out with age and exhaustion, lies down to advise the fourfold retinue. How wonderful it would be if the Blessed One were to entrust the community of monks to me, so that I might take full charge of the community of monks, while the Blessed One, with but a little mental effort, devotes himself to the practice of the yoga of dwelling in ease in the present life."

Thereupon Devadatta went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and spoke thus to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, at the present time, being worn out with age and exhaustion" — up to the point where it says — "while you devote yourself to the practice of the yoga of dwelling in ease in the present life."

When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One said to Devadatta: "O man of delusion! I would not entrust the community of monks even to Śāriputra or Maudgalyāyana, who are accomplished in the holy life — so what need is there to speak of entrusting it to you, a spit-swallower?"

When the Blessed One had spoken thus, Devadatta rose in anger and resentment, bowed his head three times in formal acknowledgment, and departed — from the passage beginning "he bowed" up to "he departed from the presence of the Blessed One."

After that, Devadatta began to work at causing a schism in the community of monks. At that same time, a nun named Sthūlanandā also began to exert herself in causing a schism in the community of nuns, and the nuns were alarmed that she was embarking upon this effort. At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks in turn reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must confront Sthūlanandā and remonstrate with her. The remonstration is to be carried out as follows: 'Sthūlanandā, do not set about dividing the harmonious community of nuns. Do not take up a dispute for the purpose of division and persist in clinging to it. Sthūlanandā, be in harmony with the community. Do not break the harmony of the community. Rejoice together, do not quarrel, and be as water and milk blended into one, reciting in unison with a single purpose — and so illuminate the Teacher's teaching and dwell in the touch of ease. Sthūlanandā, abandon that very basis of causing schism in the community.' If, even after being thus confronted and remonstrated with, she insists on that very same basis, clings to it stubbornly as supreme, and keeps designating it as: 'This alone is true; everything else is confused' — then the nuns are to speak to that nun's companions as follows: 'Sisters, do not say anything at all to this nun, whether virtuous or unvirtuous, even the least thing. Why so? Because this nun is a speaker of Dharma and a speaker of Vinaya; she has properly taken up Dharma and Vinaya and clings to them, continually designating accordingly — this nun speaks knowingly, not from ignorance. Whatever she approves of and assents to, we too approve of and assent to.'"

Then a great number of nuns went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed their heads at the feet of the Blessed One and said to him: "Blessed One, we have confronted and remonstrated with Sthūlanandā. But when we remonstrated with her, she persisted on that very same basis" — from the passage beginning "she insisted stubbornly" up to "everything else is confused." And her companions likewise said to those nuns — from the passage beginning "Sisters, do not say anything at all to this nun" up to "we too approve of and assent to."

The Blessed One then declared: "Nuns, you must confront those nuns and others of that same kind, and remonstrate with them. The remonstration is to be carried out as follows: 'Nun, knowing full well that a certain nun has entered upon the course of dividing the harmonious community and has taken up a dispute for the purpose of causing schism and is clinging to it, you nonetheless befriend her, align yourself with her views, and side with her discordant speech. Sisters, abandon this — following after one who would divide the community and speaking discordantly.' When the nuns are spoken to in this way, if they persist on that very same basis" — from the passage beginning "if" up to "that very same basis" and "everything else is confused."

At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks in turn reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must confront Sthūlanandā by means of a formal act of the fourfold procedure."

The procedure for the formal act of confrontation is to be conducted as follows, from the passage beginning "having prepared the seat" up to "one nun makes the motion and performs the act."

"Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. This nun Sthūlanandā has undertaken to divide the community of nuns, has taken up a quarrel for the sake of division, and persists in holding fast to it. When many nuns approached her and confronted her, even though many nuns approached and confronted her, she clung tenaciously to that very same basis, adhering to it with conviction, and continued to designate it with the words: 'This alone is true; everything else is false.' Therefore let the noble Saṅgha of sisters address Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act with these words: 'Sister Sthūlanandā, do not set yourself to divide the harmonious community; do not sit persisting in taking up a quarrel for the sake of division. Sister, be in harmony with the community. Let the community be harmonious and undivided — joyful together, without dispute, single in purpose, reciting together, blended like water and milk. Let it illuminate the Teacher's teaching, and you shall dwell in touch with ease. Sister Sthūlanandā, abandon this basis of yours that divides the community.' If it is timely and agreeable to the noble Saṅgha, let the noble Saṅgha consent. Let the noble Saṅgha address Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act: 'Sister Sthūlanandā, do not set yourself to divide the harmonious community; do not sit persisting in taking up a quarrel for the sake of division. Sister, be in harmony with the community. Let the community be harmonious and undivided — joyful together, without dispute, single in purpose, reciting together, blended like water and milk. Let it illuminate the Teacher's teaching, and you shall dwell in touch with ease. Sister Sthūlanandā, abandon this basis of yours that divides the community.' That is the motion."

"Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. This Sthūlanandā has undertaken to divide the community, has taken up a quarrel for the sake of division, persists in it and carries it through. When many nuns approached and confronted her, even though many nuns approached and confronted her, she clung tenaciously to that very same basis, adhering to it with conviction, and designated it with the words: 'This alone is true; everything else is false.' On account of this, the noble Saṅgha addresses Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act: 'Sister Sthūlanandā, do not set yourself to divide the harmonious community; do not sit persisting in taking up a quarrel for the sake of division. Sister, be in harmony with the community. Let the community be harmonious and undivided — joyful together, without dispute, single in purpose, reciting together, blended like water and milk. Let it illuminate the Teacher's teaching, and you shall dwell in touch with ease. Sister Sthūlanandā, abandon this basis of yours that divides the community.' When the noble Saṅgha has thus addressed Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act, those venerable ones who accept and consent to the noble Saṅgha addressing Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act are to remain silent; those who do not consent are to speak. This is the first recitation of the formal statement; it is likewise to be recited a second time and a third time. The noble Saṅgha has consented and approved; the noble Saṅgha has addressed Sthūlanandā through the motion and the fourfold formal act. Because no one has spoken, so it is upheld."

When she has been confronted in this way through the motion and the fourfold formal act, yet persists on that very same basis — from the passage "persists tenaciously" up to "this alone is true; everything else is false" — she fully confirms it. Her companion nuns then say to those other nuns: "Sisters, whether this nun has done something meritorious or something blameworthy, say nothing to her whatsoever. And why? Because this nun speaks the Dharma; she holds the Dharma and the Vinaya correctly and persists in sustaining that position. This nun speaks knowingly — she does not speak out of ignorance."

"Whatever this nun desires and approves of, that too we desire and approve of" — so saying, they spoke those words.

Then a great many nuns went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed their heads to the Blessed One's feet and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Blessed One, we admonished Stubborn Delight and conducted the fourfold formal act against her, yet from the passage 'persists tenaciously' up to 'this alone is true; everything else is false,' she fully confirms it. And her companion nuns too said to the other nuns, 'Sisters, whether this nun has done something meritorious or something blameworthy, say nothing to her whatsoever' — from that passage up to 'that too we desire and approve of' — so they spoke."

The Blessed One declared: "You nuns must also admonish those nuns and conduct the formal act against them. The admonishment is to be carried out as follows: 'You nun — you who, knowingly, are befriending and supporting that nun who has taken up a genuine dispute with the aim of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha, who holds fast to it and persists in confirming it — do not take the side of those who speak discordantly. Do not say to the other nuns, "Sisters, whether this nun has done something meritorious or something blameworthy, say nothing to her whatsoever." And why? Because this nun speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya; she has correctly taken up the Dharma and the Vinaya and holds fast to it, persisting in confirming it. This nun speaks knowingly, not out of ignorance. Do not say, "Whatever this nun desires and approves of, that too we desire and approve of."

And why? Because these nuns do not speak the Dharma and do not speak the Vinaya; rather, these nuns speak what is not the Dharma and speak what is not the Vinaya. These nuns have correctly taken up what is not the Dharma and what is not the Vinaya, and they hold fast to it, persisting in confirming it. These nuns speak out of ignorance, not out of knowledge. Do not desire and approve of whatever these nuns desire and approve of.

Sisters, do not wish to divide the Saṅgha — instead, sisters, wish for the Saṅgha to remain in harmony. Let the Saṅgha be in harmony and undivided, rejoicing together and without quarrel, with one recitation and one purpose, blended like water and milk. Then, illuminating the Teacher's teaching, you will dwell in contact with happiness. Sisters, abandon this conduct of siding with those who divide the Saṅgha and speaking discordantly."

"If, even after they have been admonished in this way, those nuns — from the passage 'persist tenaciously' up to 'everything else is false' — still persist in confirming it, then the nuns are to inform the monks, and the monks are to report it to the Blessed One."

The Blessed One then declared: "You nun, you must conduct the formal act with admonishment and the fourfold procedure against those who are acting as companions and against any others of the same character. The admonishment is to be carried out as follows — from the passage 'having prepared the seats' up to 'one nun makes the motion and the act is performed.'

'Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. These partisans — these nuns who, wishing to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, have entered upon a dispute for the sake of division, have taken up a genuine quarrel aimed at division, and who, holding fast to it and persisting in confirming it, act as companions to her and take the side of those who speak discordantly —

If many nuns have prepared and admonished them, and those nuns continue to confirm their position from the passage 'on that very ground' up to 'all else is false,' then on that account the noble Saṅgha of sisters should, to those nuns who are acting as companions, carry out admonishment by means of a motion and three acts as follows.

The motion is this: 'Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. These nuns who act as companions — these nuns who, wishing to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, have entered upon a dispute for the sake of division, have taken up a genuine quarrel aimed at division, and who, holding fast to it and knowingly persisting in it, act as companions to her and take the side of those who speak discordantly — those nuns have been prepared and admonished by many nuns, and from the passage "on that very ground" up to "all else is false" they continue to confirm their position. If it is now the right time for the noble Saṅgha and the Saṅgha is pleased, let the noble Saṅgha give its consent. And let the noble Saṅgha admonish these nuns who act as companions, saying: Sister nuns, do not take the side of a nun who, wishing to divide the Saṅgha, has entered upon a dispute for the sake of dividing the Saṅgha, has genuinely taken up that quarrel, holds fast to it and knowingly persists in it, and who speaks discordantly. Sisters, abandon this — abandon taking the side of one who speaks discordantly in this way. Let the Saṅgha be harmonious and undivided, united in joy and without dispute, of one mind, reciting together, mingled like water and milk, and dwelling in touch with ease, illuminating the teaching of the Teacher.' This is the motion; the act is then performed with a motion and three repetitions.

The act is to be performed as follows: 'Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. These nuns who have taken sides — these nuns who, wishing to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, have entered upon a dispute for the sake of division, have genuinely taken up that quarrel, and knowingly hold fast to it while persisting in it, acting as companions to her and taking the side of those who speak discordantly — those nuns have been prepared and admonished by many nuns, and continue to confirm their position from the passage "on that very ground" up to "all else is false." On that account, the noble Saṅgha admonishes those sister nuns, saying: Do not take the side of a nun who, wishing to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, has entered upon a dispute for the sake of division, has genuinely taken up that quarrel, holds fast to it and knowingly persists in it, who acts as a companion to her and speaks discordantly. Sisters, abandon this — abandon taking the side of one who speaks discordantly in this schism of the Saṅgha.' This admonishment is performed by a motion and three acts.

Those among the noble Saṅgha of sisters who consent to the admonishment of these nuns by motion and three acts — let them be silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak. This is the first recitation of the act. In the same way it is to be recited a second and a third time.

The noble Saṅgha has consented and approved, and the noble Saṅgha has performed the admonishment of the nuns who act as companions by means of a motion and three acts. Since no one has spoken, it is accepted as such — up to and including this passage.

When those nuns have been admonished by a motion and three acts, and when those nuns continue to confirm from the passage 'on that very ground, by force' up to 'all else is false,' the nuns then reported this to the monks, and the monks in turn reported it to the Blessed One, whereupon the Blessed One, beginning from the account of what had occurred, proceeded to establish the training rule.

Furthermore, any nun who, wishing to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, has entered upon a dispute for the sake of division — and has fully taken up the dispute and continues to hold firmly to it — those nuns shall address that nun as follows: "Noble sister, do not enter upon dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not, having fully taken up a dispute for the sake of division, hold to it and pursue it further. Noble sister, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. Let the Saṅgha not be divided. Rejoice together, without dispute, with one single aim; recite together; be like water and milk blended into one. Make the Teacher's teaching shine clearly, and you will dwell touching upon ease. Noble sister, abandon this very ground of yours that causes division in the Saṅgha." In this way she is to be admonished.

When those nuns admonish that nun in this way — if she relinquishes that ground, then that is well. If she does not relinquish it, in order to make her relinquish that ground she is to be admonished and instructed a second time and a third time in full. When she has been admonished and instructed a second time and a third time in full — if she relinquishes that ground, then that is well. If she does not relinquish it, then this very matter, on the third occasion, together with the announcement, constitutes the remainder for the Saṅgha.

Now as for "whatever nun" — this refers to Stomāgamoā, or any other who is similar to her. "Saṅgha" refers to the community of female śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. "Harmonious" means of one taste. "For the sake of division" means for the purpose of making it into two. "Has entered upon" means exerts herself. "For the purpose of causing division" — the grounds for division are fourteen: whether it is Dharma or not Dharma, Vinaya or not Vinaya, transgression or not transgression, one that has a remainder or one that has no remainder, grave or light, requiring confession or requiring restraint, contrary to the Vinaya, or something that will be declared an offence — whatever thing of these, having been well and thoroughly seized upon. "Dispute" refers to the four kinds of dispute, from "dispute" through to "dispute for the sake of action." "Having fully taken up and holding to it" means with attachment and clinging. "Those nuns shall address that nun" means those who belong to this Dharma. "She is to be admonished, having taken her aside" means admonishing just as was said before. "If that ground is relinquished" — that is the view. "If she relinquishes it, then that is well" means "then that is good." "If she does not relinquish it" — that is the view. "She is to be admonished and instructed a second time and a third time in full" means just as was said before through the motion and the three acts — this is the full instruction, this is the full teaching. "This very matter" employs the term "Dharma" for what is not Dharma. "On the third occasion, together with the announcement" means together with the recitation. All else is as before.

As to how a downfall arises in this matter: if a nun enters upon dividing the Saṅgha, whatever and however it may be, in every case it becomes a downfall of wrongdoing. When she has been admonished, if she relinquishes that ground, then that is well. If she does not relinquish it, it is a grave offence. The rest is to be stated just as before.

Here is completed the seventeenth remainder of the Saṅgha in the analysis of the rules for nuns.

Thereupon the Blessed One, while remaining in that very place, established the second rule of training. One nun, or two, or many — however many — who have become companions of that nun, who speak in a discordant way, say to the other nuns: "Noble ones, do not speak anything at all to this nun, whether good or bad. Why is that? Because this nun speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya. This nun has taken up the Dharma and the Vinaya correctly, holds them firmly, and follows them in practice. This nun speaks with awareness and not without awareness. Whatever she approves of and consents to, we too approve of and consent to." If they say such words as these, the nuns should say to those nuns: "Noble ones, do not say such things as: 'This nun speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya; this nun has taken up the Dharma and the Vinaya correctly, holds them firmly, and follows them in practice; this nun speaks with awareness and not without awareness; whatever she approves of and consents to, we too approve of and consent to.' Why is that? Because this nun does not speak the Dharma and does not speak the Vinaya. Rather, this nun speaks what is not the Dharma and speaks what is not the Vinaya. This nun has taken up what is not the Dharma and what is not the Vinaya, holds them firmly, and follows them in practice. This nun speaks without awareness, and not with awareness. Do not approve of and consent to whatever she approves of and consents to. Do not divide the Saṅgha. Wish for harmony with the Saṅgha. Be harmonious with the Saṅgha. Let the Saṅgha be harmonious and undivided, rejoicing together and without dispute, dwelling in unity, reciting together, and blended like water and milk. Illuminating the Teacher's teaching, you will come to abide in the touch of happiness. You nuns, abandon this conduct of speaking in a discordant way, taking the side of one who would divide the Saṅgha." In this way the nuns should address those nuns.

When the nuns have thus addressed those nuns, if they relinquish that ground, then that is well. If they do not relinquish it, in order to induce them to relinquish that ground, they are to be admonished correctly up to a second and a third time, and correctly instructed. When they have been correctly admonished and correctly instructed up to a second and a third time, if they relinquish that ground, then that is well. If they do not relinquish it, this same rule, at the third time, together with the arising from it, is a grave offence against the remainder of the Saṅgha.

The phrase "of that nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. The phrase "who have become companions" refers to the twelve groups. The phrase "one" means just one. The phrase "two" means just two. The phrase "however many" means more than two is many. The phrase "to the nuns" means to those who observe this rule. The phrase "if they say such words as these" means when they speak thus. The phrase "noble ones" means you all. The phrase "to this nun" means to Sthūlanandā. The phrase "do not say anything at all" means "do not teach anything at all, whether much or little." The phrase "whether good" means "do not lead her to take up what is virtuous." The phrase "or bad" means "do not draw her out from what is non-virtuous." The phrase "because this nun speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya" means in accordance with how the Dharma is and in accordance with how conduct is. The phrase "this nun speaks with awareness and not without awareness" means she expresses things in terms of how she knows them and how she sees them. The phrase "whatever she approves of" means what she and we alike consent to.

The phrase "to those nuns" means to the twelve assemblies. The phrase "by the nuns" means by those who adhere to this Dharma. The phrase "this is to be declared" means that this is to be reported in these words. The phrase "in harmony" means with one voice. The phrase "the Saṅgha" means the Saṅgha of female hearers of the Tathāgata. The phrase "division" means that it becomes split in two. The phrase "to engage in" means to exert oneself. The phrase "of hers" means of Subhāgā. The phrase "having become an accomplice" means to bring something to completion. The phrase "siding with" means consenting with patience, desire, and mental intention. The phrase "speaking discordantly" means bringing about a state of disharmony. The phrase "to those nuns" means to the twelve assemblies. The phrase "by the nuns" means by those who adhere to this Dharma. The phrase "this is to be declared" means that this is to be reported in these words.

The phrase "Sister, abandon this behavior — this siding with one who speaks discordantly so as to divide the Saṅgha" means: "By many different approaches, do not seek to divide the Saṅgha." The phrase "if, when this has been declared, she abandons that basis, then that is good; if she does not abandon it, it is to be taken up and reported again" means as previously described in the declaration. The phrase "and if, upon taking it up and reporting it again, she abandons that basis, then that is good; if she does not abandon it, it is to be reported by the act of a motion with three resolutions" means as previously described in the declaration; this constitutes proper admonishment; this constitutes proper instruction. The phrase "this Dharma also" means that what is not Dharma is presented under the name of Dharma. The phrase "accompanied by formal disclosure at the third instance" means accompanied by the Teacher. The rest is as stated previously.

As for how a transgression arises in this context: if a nun enters into siding with schism in the Saṅgha — whatever form this takes — in all such cases it becomes a transgression of a wrongdoing. If she is taken up and reported again and she abandons that basis, then that is good; if she does not abandon it, a grave offense is incurred. The rest is to be stated as before.

The eighteenth rule among the remainder of the Saṅghāvaśeṣa offenses in the Analysis of the Nuns' Code is complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha), the Bhagavān, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, two monks by the names of Agalamgyo and Napso, together with reddish-yellow-robed monks, were dwelling there practicing and established in all the sinful Dharmas of those who bring disgrace upon households. These individuals would engage in chattering and amusing themselves together with women; they would sport about, make noise, laugh, play, and physically frolic with abandon. They would sit together with women on a single seat and lie together on a single bed; they would eat many kinds of food from a single vessel and drink many drinks from a single vessel. They would gather flowers, have others gather them, wear them as ear ornaments, and have others wear them as ear ornaments. They would weave garlands of flowers and have others weave them. They would beat time in dance, sing songs, and produce musical sounds, asking one another "Was the dancing well performed? Was the song well taken up? Was the musical sound well drawn out?" — all the way through running, leaping, and jumping. They would lay aside their robes and walk exposing their chests. They would leap like fish, crawl like tortoises, and also roll about on their backs. They would clap their hands, slap their shoulders, swing their thighs, and strike their bodies, while also producing from their mouths the sounds of drums and cymbals — ta and ha — as well as the sounds of the mṛdaṅga drum and the sounds of ordinary drums from their mouths; they would emit the cry of a bull-elephant, produce the sound of a buffalo, and bellow in the manner of a great elephant.

They would emit the cry of a peacock and produce the call of a cuckoo. They would stage mock battles with elephants, horses, chariots, and infantry, and set those battles in motion. They would stage mock battles with armies of women, armies of men, armies of boys, and armies of girls, and set those battles in motion. They would stage the fighting of cocks, the fighting of rams, the fighting of quails, and the fighting of partridges — pitting cocks, rams, quails, and partridges against one another — and set those contests in motion. These and other things unbecoming of a renunciant they would do and cause others to do.

At that time the twelve groups of companions would laugh, play, and engage in rough and rowdy behavior with their bodies. While they dwelt in that conduct, in that manner of life, and on that path of behavior, monks of good character would not come to stay where those corrupt monks resided, and those who had already come would wish to leave. Even those with matted hair or shaved heads found it intolerable.

The brahmins and householders settled on Mount Reḍeri, witnessing their conduct, became displeased and lost faith, and thought to themselves that they would not give alms even to the genuine monks — let alone to those who had just arrived. At that time the venerable Ānanda, together with the elder monks, went to Mount Reḍeri and performed the act of expulsion against the two monks Gamaggo and Nabaso. At that very time, the twelve groups of nuns were likewise expelled for having brought disgrace upon households.

The companions and attendants who dwelt with those twelve groups of nuns then came to Śrāvastī, confessed what was to be confessed, and restrained what was to be restrained. Together with the nuns of upright conduct they undertook the rites of the restoration ceremony, the invitation ceremony, formal requests, the act of two requests, and the act of a request with four motions.

Thereupon the twelve groups thought: "We will go to seek the approval of the Blessed One, the Saṅgha of monks, and the Saṅgha of nuns." The twelve groups then set out, circling around toward Śrāvastī, and proceeding on their way they eventually arrived at Śrāvastī. When the nuns there saw the twelve groups of nuns approaching, they reported to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, these twelve groups have been expelled — how should we now proceed?" They said nothing aloud, but with a gesture of the hand pointed toward the last assembly hall. Those groups acted accordingly. Thereupon the companions and attendants of those groups also said nothing, spoke no words to anyone, and showed no sign of welcome to anyone. And those twelve groups said this to their companions and attendants who dwelt with them: "Sisters, what is there for us to say or proclaim or announce that you have not already said, proclaimed, and announced? For the senior nuns among the nuns to say nothing, to speak to no one — that is fitting for them. But you — why do you not speak?" Those attendants, keeping the nuns at a distance, said: "What you say is true, yet we ourselves have confessed what was to be confessed, restrained what was to be restrained, and undertaken all acts up to and including the act of a request with four motions."

Then those twelve groups of nuns said this to the elder nuns among the nuns: "Here there are some nuns who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear — and from what is precisely the same class of transgression, some nuns expel and others do not expel." Then the nuns said to the twelve groups of nuns: "Whom do you accuse of acting out of desire?" They replied: "The elder nuns among the nuns." At that point the nuns spoke to the monks. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you are to confront the twelve groups of nuns. And you nuns are to say this to the elder nuns among the nuns: 'Here there are some nuns who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear — and from what is precisely the same class of transgression, some nuns expel and others do not expel' — do not say that. And why not? These nuns do not act out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, or out of fear. Rather, it is you yourselves who are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct. Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that they corrupt households? Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that they practice wicked conduct? Sisters, let go of this manner of speaking — from the phrase 'acting out of desire' through to the phrase 'acting out of fear.' When confronting them and delivering the instruction, use the text beginning with 'on that very basis, persistently' through to 'the other is delusion.'"

At that point the nuns spoke to the monks again. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, the confrontation of the twelve groups of nuns by a request and a fourfold act is to be carried out as follows: seats are to be arranged, and then one nun makes the motion and the act is performed. 'Sisters, let the noble Saṅgha hear me. These twelve groups of nuns are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct. Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that they corrupt households? Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that they practice wicked conduct?' — up to and including 'fully learned that they practice wicked conduct.' The elder monks, at the stated time and place, have performed the act of expelling them, and they have been reproached before the nuns with the phrases running from 'acting out of desire' through to 'acting out of fear,' and many nuns have confronted them and delivered the instruction; and when confronting them and delivering the instruction, the text runs from 'on that very basis, persistently' through to 'the other is delusion.' If the time is right for the noble Saṅgha and they consent, let them grant approval. And let the noble Saṅgha confront the twelve groups of nuns by a request and a fourfold act. Sisters, do not say: 'Here there are some nuns who act out of desire' — down to 'who act out of fear.' Rather, it is you yourselves who are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct,' — from that point down to: 'Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that you practice wicked conduct?' Sisters, let go of this manner of speaking — the phrase 'acting out of desire,' and 'acting out of aversion,' and 'acting out of delusion,' and 'acting out of fear.' This is the motion."

The act shall be performed as follows. "Let the noble Saṅgha, sisters, hear me. These twelve groups of nuns are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct. Whether they saw, heard, or fully learned of this corruption of households — and whether they saw, heard, or fully learned of the practice of wicked conduct — the senior monks went to the boundary marker, performed the act of expulsion, and when those nuns then reproached them, saying 'acting out of desire' down to 'acting out of fear,' and when they were thereupon admonished by a large number of nuns — upon that admonishment, from the phrase 'be firm on this very ground' down to 'the other is delusion' — let the noble Saṅgha confront these twelve groups of nuns by a request and a fourfold act. Sisters, do not say: 'Here there are some nuns who act out of desire' — down to 'who act out of fear.' Rather, you yourselves are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct — from that point down to: 'Have you seen, heard, or fully learned that you practice wicked conduct? Sisters, let go of such language as the phrase "acting out of desire," and "acting out of aversion," and "acting out of delusion," and "acting out of fear."' Those among the noble Saṅgha who approve of confronting these twelve groups by a request and a fourfold act, let them remain silent. Those who do not approve, let them speak. This is the first recitation of the motion. In the same way let the matter be recited a second and a third time. The noble Saṅgha has approved and consented; the Saṅgha has confronted these twelve groups of nuns by a request and a fourfold act. Because no one has spoken, so it is held." Down to this point.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the eleventh fascicle.

Even though they were confronted by a request and a fourfold act, in the passage from "be firm on this very ground" down to "the other is delusion," the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" onward, proceeded to establish a training rule.

A large number of nuns were residing near a certain village or town, and they too had become corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct. Whether others had seen, heard, or fully learned of this corruption of households, or had seen, heard, or fully learned of their practice of wicked conduct — if so, the nuns were to address those nuns in these words: "Venerable sisters, you are corrupters of households and practitioners of wicked conduct. Have you seen, heard, or fully learned of your own corruption of households? Have you seen, heard, or fully learned of your own practice of wicked conduct? Venerable sisters, it is enough that you have resided in this place. From today, leave this place." Then, if those nuns said to the nuns: "Here there are some nuns who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear — yet among those guilty of exactly the same transgression, some nuns are expelled and others are not," the nuns were then to address those nuns with these words: "Venerable sisters, you have said: 'Here there are some nuns who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear, yet among those guilty of exactly the same transgression, some nuns are expelled and others are not.' Do not say such a thing. Rather, venerable sisters, you yourselves are the ones who bring disgrace upon households and who engage in wicked conduct everywhere. Do you see, hear, or fully know that you bring disgrace upon households? Do you see, hear, or fully know that you engage in wicked conduct everywhere? Therefore, noble sisters, abandon this kind of verbal path of 'acting out of desire,' and of 'acting out of aversion,' and of 'acting out of delusion,' and of 'acting out of fear.'" When the nuns have addressed those nuns with these words, if they relinquish that basis, then so much the better. If they do not relinquish it — up to that point which reads "they are to be addressed properly a second and a third time, and instructed properly" — they are to be addressed properly a second and a third time and instructed properly, in order that they relinquish that basis. When they have been properly addressed and properly instructed a second and a third time: if they relinquish that basis, so much the better; if they do not relinquish it, then this matter too is fit to be resolved by a Saṅgha motion carried to a third proclamation. "Nuns" refers to those who belong to this Dharma. "Many" means more than two, that is, a great many. "In a town or in a village" means in a market town, or in the countryside, or in a mountain region. As for the phrase "those who bring disgrace upon households," "households" means the households of brahmins, of the royal class, and of householders. "Bringing disgrace" means: it is to be fully understood that disgrace is brought upon households by two causes — by association and by enjoyment. How is it by association? By laughing together, playing together, and engaging in bodily contact with women, boys, and girls, and dwelling right there in that place — that is the disgrace through association. How is it by enjoyment? By stripping flowers, fruits, or plants right within those same households — that is the disgrace through enjoyment. "See" means by means of visual consciousness. "Hear" means by means of auditory consciousness. "Fully know" means by means of the remaining collections of consciousness other than those. "Those nuns" refers to those belonging to the twelve groups. "The nuns" refers to those who belong to this Dharma. The phrase "with these words" means: when properly addressed with these very words. The phrase "venerable sisters, do not speak the words 'acting out of desire'" is a rebuke. "Of exactly the same transgression" means from among equivalent transgressions. "Some nuns are expelled" refers to the twelve groups. "Others are not expelled" refers to those dwelling together with them and their attendants. The phrase "the nuns are to address them with these words" means: from the words "venerable sisters, abandon the verbal path of acting out of desire" up through the words "and of acting out of fear" — they are to cast aside that verbal path. When the nuns have addressed those nuns with these words, "if they relinquish that basis, so much the better" means: that would be excellent. "If they do not relinquish it, they are to be addressed formally" means: it is to be done just as stated in the previous address. When they have been addressed formally and still do not relinquish that basis, "they are to be addressed by means of a formal act consisting of a motion and three proclamations" — this likewise is to be done just as stated previously. "Properly addressed" is precisely that; "properly instructed" is precisely that. "This matter too" means: this non-Dharma is spoken of here by the name of Dharma. "Fit to be resolved by a third proclamation" includes the Teacher. The rest is as before. Then, as to how a

If a nun says to even a small extent to another nun, "Here, some nuns go out of desire, some go out of aversion, some go out of delusion, and some go out of fear," she incurs a transgression of wrongdoing in every case. When she has been formally addressed and instructed, if she then relinquishes that basis, all is well. If she does not relinquish it, she falls into the heavier offense. The rest is to be stated just as above.

The nineteenth section of the Saṅgha remainder offenses from the Nuns' Vibhaṅga is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling in Kauśāmbī, in the Ghositārāma pleasure grove. At that time in Kauśāmbī a Śākya daughter who had gone forth as a nun bore the name Dundā. A transgression had arisen in her case. Those who lived the holy life alongside her, those who wished her well, who wished her benefit, who wished her happiness, who wished to guide her, who wished her success and wellbeing, said to her: "Dundā, a transgression has arisen in you; please come forward to confess it." To this she replied: "Whether you have done good or ill, sisters, say nothing whatsoever to me about it. For you have all gone forth from families of various clans, various lineages, various bloodlines. Just as in the autumn season the dried leaves of the trees are gathered together by the wind and piled into one heap, so too you have gone forth from various clans, various lineages, various bloodlines. Yet it was said of me that my noble one has manifestly awakened to full awakening."

At that point the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you should formally address and instruct the nun Dundā, saying: 'Dundā, when nuns who wish you well, who wish you benefit, who wish you happiness, who wish to guide you, who wish you success and wellbeing, speak to you, do not make yourself one who is not to be spoken to — rather make yourself one who is open to being spoken to. And let the nuns speak to Dundā in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya; and you too, Dundā, speak to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya. For it is in this way — by speaking to one another, by guiding and instructing one another, by lifting one another out of transgressions — that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, will grow. Dundā, see the end of the conduct of one who does not open herself to being spoken to.' You should address and instruct her thus."

When the nuns gave her this formal address and instruction, from the phrase "that very basis" through to "that is a lie" — all of that interval the nuns reported to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you are to address and instruct the nun Dundā by means of a formal act consisting of a motion and three proclamations. The formal address is to be performed as follows: beginning from the words 'having prepared a seat,' a single nun is to make the motion and carry out the act. The act is as follows:

'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. The nun Dundā here, when those who live the holy life alongside her, those who seek her wellbeing, who seek her benefit, who seek her happiness, who seek to guide her, who seek her success and wellbeing, said to her, "Please come forward to confess your transgression," replied in this manner: "Sisters, whether you have done good or ill, say nothing whatsoever to me about it, and I likewise will say nothing to you, whether good or ill." '

she stubbornly held to that very position, clung to it with attachment, and continued to designate it afterward as follows: "This alone is true; everything else is false." If it is fitting for the noble Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, then let the noble Saṅgha grant its approval. And let the nun Dundā be formally instructed by the Saṅgha with a resolution and three proclamations: "Dundā, when the nuns speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, do not treat yourself as one who is not to be addressed — rather, treat yourself as one who is to be addressed. And why? Because when the nuns speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, you in turn will be speaking to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya. It is in this way — by speaking to one another, by guiding one another, by raising one another up from transgressions — that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, will grow." This is the motion.

The act is as follows:

Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. The nun Dundā here, when those who live the holy life alongside her, those who seek her wellbeing, who seek her benefit, who seek her happiness, who seek to guide her, who seek her success and wellbeing, said to her, "Please come forward to confess your transgression," replied in this manner: "Sisters, whether you have done good or ill, say nothing whatsoever to me about it, and I likewise will say nothing to you, whether good or ill." When the nuns formally addressed and instructed her in great numbers with these words, she stubbornly held to that very position, clung to it with attachment, and continued to designate it as follows: "This alone is true; everything else is false." For that reason, the noble Saṅgha formally instructs the nun Dundā with a resolution and three proclamations: "Dundā, when the nuns speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, do not treat yourself as one who is not to be addressed — rather, treat yourself as one who is to be addressed. And why? Because when the nuns speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, you in turn will be speaking to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya. It is in this way — by speaking to one another, by guiding one another, by raising one another up from transgressions — that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, will grow."

Those nuns who consent to and approve of the formal instruction of the nun Dundā by means of a resolution and three proclamations, let them remain silent. Those who do not consent, let them speak.

This is the first recitation of the act. In the same way, this matter is repeated a second and a third time.

The Saṅgha having consented and granted approval, the Saṅgha has formally instructed the nun Dundā by means of a resolution and three proclamations. Since no one has spoken, it is hereby taken that the matter stands as thus accepted. The instruction by resolution and three proclamations is so established.

Now during the formal instruction by resolution and three proclamations — specifically the portion beginning with "she stubbornly held to that very position" and ending with "this alone is true; everything else is false" — the nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence," proceeded to set forth a training rule. There are some nuns who by nature are difficult to admonish; and the training rules belonging to the category of exhortation, along with those belonging to the category of sūtras of the Sugata, when the nuns speak in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya she makes herself unavailable to be spoken to. "Noble ones, whether it be wholesome or unwholesome, say nothing at all to her. And she likewise, whether it be wholesome or unwholesome, will say nothing at all to the noble ones. Noble ones, leave the path of words open to me — what would be accomplished by your speaking to me?" When this is said to that nun, the other nuns should speak to her as follows: "Noble one, do not make yourself unavailable to be spoken to regarding the training rules belonging to the category of exhortation and those belonging to the category of sūtras of the Sugata. Noble one, when the nuns speak in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, do not make yourself unavailable to be spoken to — rather, noble one, make yourself available to be spoken to, and to be spoken to alone. And when the noble ones speak to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, the noble one too should speak to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya. Why is that? Because it is in this way — through one speaking to another, through one instructing and guiding another, through one lifting another out of transgressions — that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, will grow. Noble one, abandon that kind of conduct of making yourself unavailable to be spoken to." If the nuns speak thus to that nun and she abandons that basis, then well and good. If she does not abandon it, this matter is to be dealt with up to three times by the requisite portion of the Saṅgha. "Nun" means the petitioner. "One who is difficult to admonish" means one who does not receive in a straightforward and fitting manner the listening and following of harmonious verbal counsel, or who receives it in an antagonistic manner. "Exhortation" means that which is shown in the sūtra on individual liberation (Skt. prātimokṣa). "Sugata" means the Teacher. "Sūtra" means that which was spoken by the buddha or uttered by a śrāvaka — namely the eight training rules that constitute defeat, the twenty rules requiring a formal act of the Saṅgha, the thirty-three rules of abandonment, the one hundred and eighty rules entailing transgression, the eleven rules requiring individual confession, the many rules of training, the seven principles for settling disputes, the seventeen Vinaya bases, the minor rules, the small rules, the occasion for framing a rule, the Vinaya Mātṛkā, the extension of the Vinaya, the fifth Vinaya, the sixteenth Vinaya, the Brāhmaṇī's Daughter, and those included in the questions of the Nearby Retinue — all of these well composed together.

"When the nuns speak in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya" means: whatever act accords with the Dharma as it is, with the Vinaya as it is, and with the teaching of the Teacher as it is. "When it is spoken" means: when it is applied in a gentle manner. "Making oneself unavailable to be spoken to" means: setting aside oneself as other than that instruction and teaching. "Sisters, say nothing at all to her" means: placing her in a state of elevated and extreme difficulty to admonish due to her own self-concern. "Whether it be wholesome" means: not placing her in virtue. "Whether it be unwholesome" means: not lifting her out of wrongdoing. "And she likewise will say nothing at all to the sisters" means: abandoning, out of her own self-concern, the elevated mutual instruction and guidance of one toward another. "Whether it be wholesome, she too to the sisters" means: not placing them in virtue. "Whether it be unwholesome, she too to the sisters" means: not lifting them out of wrongdoing. "Noble ones, leave it alone" means "let it go at a distance," and "what — do you?" means "have you been appointed by these reasons to guide me?" "To that nun" means to the petitioner. "The nuns" means those who hold this Dharma.

"In order to relinquish that basis" means: as before. "In that case, excellent" means: in that case it is good. "If she does not relinquish it" means: if, having been admonished and instructed, she is instructed as before. "In that case, if she relinquishes that basis" and so forth up to that point is as before. "In that case, excellent" means: in that case it is good. "If she does not relinquish it" means: if she is instructed by means of a motion with a fourth recitation, instructed as before. That proper instruction is precisely that.

"This Dharma too" means: this which is not Dharma is spoken under the name of Dharma. "Arising together with up to three recitations" means: what is fitting to arise. "With the Saṅgha as remainder" means: this transgression depends on the two assemblies of the Saṅgha; it relies on the two assemblies of the Saṅgha; it is the two assemblies of the Saṅgha that will lift one from that transgression — not an individual person. Moreover, while the eight defeats leave no remainder, this one has a remainder, and therefore it is called "with the Saṅgha as remainder."

How does one come to incur this as a transgression? When the nuns have spoken to a nun even the slightest amount, and she then says, "Sisters, say nothing at all to me!" — whenever she speaks thus, it becomes a wrongdoing in every instance. If, when admonished and instructed, she does not relinquish that basis, it is a grave offense. When the first recitation of the formal act is performed, if she relinquishes that basis, it is excellent in that case; if she does not relinquish it, it is grave. When the second recitation is performed, if she relinquishes it before the recitation is complete, it is excellent in that case; if she does not relinquish it, it is grave when the recitation is complete. While the third recitation is being performed, if before it is complete she acts in conformity with what is not Dharma, or acts in non-conformity with Dharma — that is, if she does not act in accordance with what the Dharma is, what the Vinaya is, and what the Teacher's teaching is — there is no transgression. When the fourth recitation is performed and completed, if she then acts in accordance with what the Dharma is, what the Vinaya is, and what the Teacher's teaching is, it becomes the Saṅgha remainder.

That nun, while remaining in her very seat, should declare: "Noble ones, I have incurred a Saṅgha-remainder transgression." If she declares it, that is excellent. If she does not declare it, and she goes on to confess a transgression and without having confessed it individually proceeds thereafter to undertake a motion, a motion with a second, and a motion with a fourth recitation, it becomes a wrongdoing in every instance. For one who is acting for the first time and so forth, there is no transgression.

The twentieth Saṅgha remainder is complete. The Saṅgha remainders from the Vinayavibhaṅga of the nuns are hereby concluded.

Summary verse:

Retaining robes for ten days, not parting from them, not dispatching a non-relative in a month,
the upper robe and the lower robe together, two hides, sending a messenger, silk, fine wool, gold and silver, and engaging in various trade.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, many robes of this kind came to the nuns: with one robe, some went to visit their abbesses and teachers; with another robe, some had prostrations performed in the temple; with another robe, some had saluting gestures made; with yet another robe, some had it sent along smeared with a coarse paste of liquid; with another robe, some had the latrine area and the urinal area wiped; with another robe, some had tooth-sticks thrown away; with another robe, some had the lodgings and utensils swept and put in order.

With another robe, some went into the village on alms-round. With another robe, some were seated in the row at mealtime. With another robe, some listened to the Dharma by day. With another robe, some listened to the Dharma by night. With another robe, some individually experienced the instructions and guidance given in the presence of the Teacher.

When nuns of lesser purpose were engaged in reproaching others in this regard, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this grounds for a rule, and this circumstance, convened the community of nuns and said: "This is done so that my female disciples may come to know, and so that the basis of training may be well established."

The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, deliberately inquire even while knowing: they inquire while knowing, not while not knowing; at the proper time, not at an improper time; purposefully, not without purpose. For the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, turn away the flood of wrongdoing. Therefore, it being purposeful, the Blessed One deliberately inquired of the nuns about this matter: "Nuns, is it true that robes of this kind, in such great number, have come to you?"

"Blessed One, it is so."

The Blessed One rebuked them with censure for being difficult to provide for, difficult to satisfy, having great desires, not knowing contentment, not possessing the virtue of refinement, and not knowing moderation. Then the Blessed One praised the nuns for being easy to provide for, easy to satisfy, having few desires, knowing contentment, possessing the virtue of refinement, and knowing moderation. And the Blessed One established the rule of training for the nuns:

"When a nun has accepted a robe and released her claim-mark, she may retain an extra robe beyond what is allowed for up to ten days. If she retains it beyond that, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment."

Now, what is meant by "has accepted a robe" encompasses four cases: there is accepting a robe without having released the claim-mark; there is releasing the claim-mark without having accepted the robe; there is both accepting the robe and releasing the claim-mark; and there is neither accepting the robe nor releasing the claim-mark.

What is the case of accepting a robe without having released the claim-mark? It is as follows: a nun has washed, spread out, spread flat, and turned over the robes, but the community of nuns has not yet released the claim-mark. That is the case of accepting a robe without having released the claim-mark.

What is the case of releasing the claim-mark without having accepted the robe? It is as follows: the community of nuns has released the claim-mark, but the nun has not yet washed, spread out, spread flat, and turned over the robes. That is the case of releasing the claim-mark without having accepted the robe.

What is the case of both accepting the robe and releasing the claim-mark? It is as follows: the nun has washed, spread out, spread flat, and turned over the robes, and the community of nuns has also released the claim-mark. That is the case of both accepting the robe and releasing the claim-mark.

What is the case of neither accepting the robe nor releasing the claim-mark? It is everything other than those cases just described.

"Nun" refers to those who belong to this Dharma. "Up to ten days" means ten daytime periods. "An extra robe beyond what is allowed" means more than the five that have been consecrated. "Without having been made allowable" means that it has not been made allowable in anyone's name whatsoever, and is being held as one's own.

"Is to be relinquished — an offense requiring expiation" means that one must relinquish that article and then confess the offense of expiation. "Offense" refers to falling into hell, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into an evil destiny, into a wretched rebirth — and therefore it is said to "occasion an offense."

Now, how does the transgression come about in this case? It is as follows. If a nun obtains a robe on the first day of the fortnight, that nun must, within those very ten days, either consecrate that robe, make it allowable, give it away, or bestow it upon another. If she neither consecrates it, nor makes it allowable, nor gives it away, nor bestows it upon another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation.

Just as with obtaining a robe on the first day, so too for obtaining it on the second day, the third day, and so on through within the tenth day: that nun must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the robe, make it allowable, or give it away. If she neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation.

If a nun obtains one robe on the first day and then obtains another on the following day, that nun must consecrate the earlier robe and either make the later one allowable or consecrate it. Alternatively, she may consecrate the later robe and make the earlier one allowable. If she neither consecrates nor makes allowable nor gives away, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation.

Similarly, if a nun obtains one robe on the ninth day and obtains another on the tenth day, that nun must consecrate the earlier robe and either make the later one allowable or give it away — and so on through: it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation.

If a nun obtains two robes on the first day and also obtains two on the second day, that nun must consecrate the earlier two robes and either make the later two allowable or give them away. If she neither makes them allowable nor gives them away, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation. If a nun obtains two robes on the ninth day and also obtains two on the tenth day — this is to be stated in full in the same way.

If a nun obtains a very great many robes on the first day and also obtains a very great many on the second day, that nun must consecrate the very great many earlier robes and either make the very great many later robes allowable or give them away. Alternatively, she may consecrate the very great many later robes and either make the very great many earlier robes allowable or give them away. If she neither consecrates, nor makes allowable, nor gives away, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation. If a nun obtains a very great many robes on the ninth day and also obtains a very great many on the tenth day — and so on in the same way through: it is an offense requiring relinquishment and expiation.

If a nun's robe has become subject to relinquishment, and without having relinquished it and separated from it, and without having confessed the offense, she obtains another robe, that too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the taint of the former one. If a nun's robe has become subject to relinquishment, and although she has relinquished it and separated from it, yet without having confessed the offense she obtains another robe, that too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the taint of the former one. If a nun's robe has become subject to relinquishment, and she has relinquished it and separated from it, yet without having confessed the offense she obtains another robe, that too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the taint of the former one.

If a nun's robe has become subject to relinquishment, and she has relinquished it and separated from it, and then confessed the offense and obtains another robe, there is no transgression. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensation, there is no transgression.

The first section on relinquishable offenses from the Nuns' Vibhaṅga is complete.

The case that gave rise to the rule occurred at Śrāvastī. Some nuns who had undertaken the rains retreat and completed it to the end obtained robes of the Dharma. They washed those robes, turned them, filled a bundle, tied them into a roll, and then went wandering through the countryside wearing their outer robes and lower robes. While they wandered through the countryside in this way, the robes were neither hidden nor stored away. The nuns who were resident in their lodging had much work to do with those robes, drying them and shaking them out, and they were occupied with much activity, so that recitation of scripture, reading, memorization, meditation, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding of mind were interrupted — all because nuns with little to attend to were being criticized. The nuns then spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence" and so on, proceeded through to laying down the training rule. The rule was: if a nun who has taken possession of a robe removes the marking thread and separates from any one of the five Dharma robes beyond the boundary, it is a relinquishable offense. Thus was the original training rule established.

Then, when the Blessed One was residing at Rājagṛha and had granted the elder Mahā-Kāśyapa permission not to be separated from his patched robe, he laid down the training rule once more. At that time the senior nuns came to where the Blessed One was, approached him, and prostrated with their heads at his two feet. They then addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable One, how are we to recite this training rule?" The Blessed One then spoke in praise of nuns who desire the training, who are respectful toward the training, and who are equipped with the means for the training, and he declared to the nuns: "The former rule is set aside. Since this is now the allowance, my female śrāvaka disciples shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: if a nun has taken possession of a robe and removes the marking thread, and then is separated from any one of the five Dharma robes for even a single night beyond the boundary, unless the Saṅgha has granted permission, it is a relinquishable offense."

As for "having taken possession of a robe," this is as explained above. As for "the five Dharma robes," these are the patched robe and the outer robe and so forth — any robe that has been duly consecrated as a Dharma robe. As for "separated beyond the boundary," this means when dawn breaks. As for "unless the Saṅgha has granted permission," this means setting aside the permission granted by the Saṅgha. As for "relinquishable offense," this is as explained above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? The summary verse on the bounds of transgression:

One house, two houses,
an assembly, a space enclosed by a fence,
the perimeter surrounding a pond,
a house, a shop, a market stall,
a rooftop, a thoroughfare, a battlefield, an assembly of armies, a non-Buddhist chariot,
a boat, a pleasure garden,
a grove of trees — and what is asked.

What is a village of one house? What is a village of two houses? What is an assembly of houses? What is a village enclosed by a screen? What is a village enclosed by a wall? Likewise, what is a village enclosed by a moat, and what is a single outlying neighborhood of a village, a single outlying neighborhood of a village with multiple neighborhoods, multiple villages with a single outlying neighborhood, and multiple villages with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods — what is a household with a single outlying neighborhood? What is a household with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods? What is a group of many households with a single outlying neighborhood, and a group of many households with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods? Likewise, there are shops with a single outlying neighborhood and shops with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many shops with a single outlying neighborhood and many shops with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are market stalls with a single outlying neighborhood and market stalls with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many market stalls with a single outlying neighborhood and many market stalls with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are rooftops with a single outlying neighborhood and rooftops with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many rooftops with a single outlying neighborhood and many rooftops with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are battlefields with a single outlying neighborhood and battlefields with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many battlefields with a single outlying neighborhood and many battlefields with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are armies assembled for battle with a single outlying neighborhood and armies assembled for battle with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many armies assembled for battle with a single outlying neighborhood and many armies assembled for battle with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are non-Buddhist households with a single outlying neighborhood and non-Buddhist households with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many non-Buddhist households with a single outlying neighborhood and many non-Buddhist households with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are the households of wanderers with a single outlying neighborhood and households of wanderers with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many such households with a single outlying neighborhood and many such households with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are chariots with a single outlying neighborhood and chariots with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many chariots with a single outlying neighborhood and many chariots with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are boats with a single outlying neighborhood and boats with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many boats with a single outlying neighborhood and many boats with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are pleasure gardens with a single outlying neighborhood and pleasure gardens with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many pleasure gardens with a single outlying neighborhood and many pleasure gardens with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. Likewise, there are groves of trees with a single outlying neighborhood and groves of trees with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods, many groves of trees with a single outlying neighborhood and many groves of trees with multiple separate outlying neighborhoods. This is the teaching on that transgression.

Now the explanation shall be given. What is a village of one house? The Blessed One declared: it is whatever settlement belongs to nomads, forest-dwellers, or to those whose livelihood depends on craftsmanship — such a settlement is a village of one house. Just as with a village of one house, so too with a village of two houses. What is a village that is an assembly of houses? It is whatever settlement has become the dwelling place of various leading persons among humans — this is called a village that is an assembly of houses. What is a village enclosed by a screen? It is whatever village is enclosed by a screen. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside, or the distance covered by a twelve-rung ladder placed against it, or the space that would be filled by a cartload of bamboo from the land of Magadha. If a nun leaves her robes inside and goes to the outlying neighborhood as dawn is breaking, there is no transgression. If she leaves her robes in the outlying neighborhood and goes inside as dawn breaks, there is likewise no transgression. But if she leaves her robes either inside or outside and goes elsewhere, and dawn breaks while she is there, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture. What is a village enclosed by a wall? It is whatever village is enclosed by a fence. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — or the distance to where one beats grain, where one threshes, where one eats, where boys play, or where people by nature possessed of modesty go to relieve themselves, or the distance a crow flies in one wing-beat as it alights — that is its outlying neighborhood.

If a nun leaves her robes inside and dawn breaks while she is in the outlying neighborhood, she incurs no transgression. If she leaves her robes in the outlying neighborhood and dawn breaks while she is inside, she incurs no transgression. If she leaves her robes inside or in the outlying neighborhood and dawn breaks while she is elsewhere, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village enclosed by a moat? It is whatever village is enclosed by a moat. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — as set out from the passage beginning "everything within" up to "where boys play" — or the distance to where the dust raised by cattle and sheep moving along is not stirred by the wind, or the distance a garland-bearer reaches by shaking a ceremonial cloth. That is its outlying neighborhood. The full rule, from the passage beginning "If a nun leaves her robes inside" down to "incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture," applies here as well.

What is a village with a single outlying neighborhood? It is a village in which there is one park, one assembly ground, or one shrine of a deity. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — as stated from the passage beginning "everything within" up to "where boys play." The full rule, from "If a nun leaves her robes inside" down to "incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture," applies here as well.

What is a village with separate outlying neighborhoods? It is a village in which there are many parks, assembly grounds, or shrines of deities. What are their outlying neighborhoods? They are each separate. What do they share in common? The gate.

If a nun has left her robes either inside or outside and dawn is about to break, and she is separated from the outlying neighborhood, she should remain at the gate until dawn breaks. If dawn breaks while she is elsewhere, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a collection of many villages with a single outlying neighborhood? It is the case of many villages in which there is one park, one assembly ground, or one shrine of a deity. What is their outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — as stated from the passage beginning "everything within" up through "if she causes dawn to break while elsewhere, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture."

What is a collection of many villages with separate outlying neighborhoods? It is where those villages have many parks. What are their outlying neighborhoods? They are each separate. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a household with a single outlying neighborhood? It is the household of one person, or a household whose family doors have not been opened separately. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — as stated from the passage beginning "everything within" up through "if she causes dawn to break while elsewhere, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture."

What is a collection of many households with a single outlying neighborhood? It is the households of one person, or households whose family doors have been opened separately. What is their outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside — as stated from the passage beginning "everything within" up through "if she causes down to break while elsewhere, she incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture."

What is a collection of many households with separate outlying neighborhoods? It is the households of different persons, or households whose family doors have been opened separately. What are their outlying neighborhoods? They are each separate. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a shop with a single outlying neighborhood? It is the shop of one person, or shops whose family doors have not been opened separately. What is its outlying neighborhood? It is everything within, together with one fathom outside, or the area where grain is piled, where it is threshed, where small measures are set out, and where weighing vessels are placed — that is its outlying neighborhood. The full rule, from the passage beginning "If a nun leaves her robes inside" down through "incurs a transgression entailing forfeiture," applies here as well.

The venerable Upāli then put this question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, what is the outlying neighborhood for nuns who have entered the residency? One fathom when walking, one fathom when standing, one fathom when sitting — it is a full circle all around."

"Venerable One, if nuns who have entered residency and are dwelling together entrust their robes to attendants and remain as they are — what is their outlying neighborhood?" The Blessed One declared:

Just as I have taught that when mango trees are planted at intervals of seven fathoms each among brahmin-born lineages, they become very richly endowed with blossoms, fruits, and branches — the spacing between such mango trees amounts to forty-nine fathoms.

Venerable One, if a nun sleeps at the boundary between two temple buildings, what is the boundary? So long as the corner of her robe does not separate from her, she does not become separated from her robe. At the moment when the corner of her robe does separate from her, she becomes separated from her robe, and the nun's robe is relinquished. From "not relinquished" onward, this is to be stated in the same way as before. The second offense entailing relinquishment is complete.

The narrative context is at Śrāvastī. At that time, nuns received many gains in cloth of this sort: someone, having obtained a piece of blue cloth, would not put it to use right away, thinking, "When I obtain cloth like this, I will take it up and keep it." And so she would set it aside in expectation. What applies to blue cloth is to be stated likewise for yellow, red, thick cloth, and thin cloth. At that time the nuns told the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, proceeding from "this occurred" through "laid down the training rule," declared:

If a nun has her robe period in hand, and when the cold season begins she wants to obtain a robe at an unseasonable time, that nun may accept such a cloth. Having accepted it, if she does not rise to use it, she should quickly store it away. If she has expectation of a robe, or if it serves to complete what is lacking, that nun may keep that cloth until the end of one month. If she keeps it beyond that, it is an offense entailing relinquishment.

"A nun who has her robe period in hand" is as before. "Obtained" means from another. As for "unseasonable cloth" — what is the season for cloth, and what is unseasonable cloth? In a place where the cold-season robe is spread out, the five months from the middle month of autumn through the last month of spring constitute the robe season. The remaining seven months are the unseasonable period. As for "any of the seven kinds of cloth" — what are those seven? They are: wool, cotton, a blend of wool and cotton, fine silk, muslin, Kautamba cloth, and sun-bleached cloth. "Wants" means if she seeks it with intent. "Having accepted it, if she does rise to use it, she should quickly store it away." "If she does not rise" refers to any of the five. "That nun may keep that cloth until the end of one month" means until the end of thirty days. As for "expectation of a robe" — what is expectation of a robe? It is the expectation that her mother will give it to her, or her father, or her brothers and sisters, or that she will obtain it at the time of the great quinquennial festival. "If it serves to complete what is lacking" means if it serves to complete that cloth.

"Beyond that" means past that point. "Keeps" means retains. "An offense entailing relinquishment" means, from "having relinquished that article" through "falling into the lower realms as a wrong downfall" — that is the range.

Now, how does a downfall arise? In summary verse:

With expectation and without expectation, having deteriorated — three cases each — with no completion, an interruption of the continuum, and the two kinds of cloth themselves,
then five kinds of cloth,
two regarding rags from charnel grounds, the measure of a patch cloth, and illness — the sweat cloth, the bathing cloth itself, and also the three-sided covering cloths, and the outer wrap made last.

A nun, on the date itself, finds a blue cloth but does not put it to use, thinking, "When I find a cloth like this, then I will do it" — having expectation regarding a cloth, she sets it aside. Now, since she has expectation regarding a cloth, if on that very same date she finds one with expectation, that nun must consecrate, relinquish, or make proper that cloth within those ten days. If she does not consecrate it, does not make it proper, or does not relinquish it, when the dawn of the eleventh day rises, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

If a nun does not find a cloth on the date itself, nor on the second date, but on the ninth date finds one with expectation, that nun must consecrate, relinquish, or make proper that cloth within those ten days. If she does not consecrate it, does not make it proper, or does not relinquish it, when the dawn of the eleventh day rises, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

Furthermore, if a nun does not find a cloth on the date itself and does not find one on the second date, but on the twenty-ninth day finds one with expectation, that nun must consecrate, relinquish, or make proper that cloth within those thirty days. If she does not consecrate it, does not make it proper, or does not relinquish it, when the dawn of the thirtieth day rises, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

Just as it is for the blue cloth, so too it is the same for the yellow cloth, the thick cloth, and the fine cloth.

If a nun on the date finds a blue cloth and does not put it to use, thinking, "When I find a cloth like this, then I will do it" — having expectation regarding a cloth, she sets it aside — and if on that very same date she finds another one without expectation: from "that nun, within those ten days" through to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment" — that is the range.

If a nun does not find one on the date itself, nor on the second date — from that point through "nor within the ninth and tenth" — from there through to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment" — that is the range.

Furthermore, if a nun does not find one on the date itself — from that point through "if on the twenty-ninth day she finds one without expectation" — from there through to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment" — that is the range.

Just as it is for the blue cloth, so the same applies through to the fine cloth.

If a nun on the date finds a blue cloth and does not put it to use, thinking, "When I find a cloth like this, then I will do it," having expectation regarding a cloth and setting it aside — and then her expectation regarding that cloth deteriorates, is postponed, or diminishes — and if on that very same date she finds another cloth without expectation: from that point through "likewise on the ninth date as well" through to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment" — that is the range.

Furthermore, if a nun on the date finds another cloth — from that point through "on the twenty-ninth day" — through to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment" — that is the range.

Just as it is for the blue cloth, so the same applies through to the fine cloth.

If a nun on the date finds a blue cloth and does not put it to use, thinking, "When I find a cloth like this, then I will do it," having expectation regarding a cloth and setting it aside — while her expectation regarding that cloth has not come to fulfillment — without interruption — if on that very date she finds another cloth regarding which she has no expectation, and so forth — and likewise, "not on a date" through "through the ninth day" and through "on the twenty-ninth day" — all of this is to be stated in full. Just as it is for the blue cloth, so the same applies through to the fine cloth.

When her expectation regarding that cloth has been entirely and completely cut off without interruption, and on that very date she finds another cloth regarding which she has no expectation, and likewise, "not on a date" — from there through "the ninth day" — and likewise through "regarding the twenty-ninth day, without expectation" — all of this is to be stated in full. Just as it is for the blue cloth, so the same applies through to the fine cloth.

Cloth is of two kinds: newly woven, and cloth that has been used at one of the three seasons. Of these, newly woven cloth is cloth freshly woven by a weaver. Cloth used at one of the three seasons is cloth that has been put to use at any one of the three seasonal periods.

As for the five types of cloth — what are the five? Cloth with an owner, cloth without an owner, cloth taken from what has been cast away, charnel-ground cloth, and the fifth is rag cloth. Of these, cloth with an owner is cloth designated as a gift by a man, a woman, or a person of neither sex. Cloth without an owner is cloth for which no donor up to a person of neither sex can be identified, or alternatively, cloth found lying on the road. Cloth taken from what has been cast away is this: when someone near death has cloths held as canopies and is conveyed to the charnel ground, cloths are then taken from there and offered to the nuns — this is called cloth taken from what has been cast away. Charnel-ground cloth is whatever has been taken from a charnel ground that has no keeper. The fifth is rag cloth.

Furthermore, rag cloth is of five kinds — what are the five? Rag cloth from a main road, rag cloth from a riverbank, cloth cast away in a wilderness, tattered and rotted cloth, and the fifth is rag cloth itself. Furthermore, rag cloth is of five kinds: cloth eaten by calves, cloth eaten by crickets, cloth eaten by mice, cloth scorched by fire, and the fifth is cloth that has fallen to the ground.

If a nun finds newly woven cloth and is able to do so, she should make a patched garment from that cloth with a double layer, the border-strip also double-layered; the upper robe should be single-layered, and the lower robe likewise single-layered. Likewise, the sweat-cloth and the shoulder-protector are also to be single-layered.

If a nun unravels to the third layer in a double-layered patched garment made from newly woven cloth, the act of unraveling is a wrongdoing. If ten days have passed, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

If a nun, having made a double-layered patched garment from newly woven cloth, thinks "I will reinforce it differently" and pulls out one layer, the act of pulling out is a wrongdoing. If ten days have passed, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

If she forms the intention, "I will unravel it, wash it, turn it around, and reinforce this very same one," and then pulls a layer out, there is no transgression. If ten days have passed, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

Likewise, the same is to be stated for the border-strip.

If she unravels a layer in a single-layered upper robe, the unraveling is a wrongdoing. If ten days have passed, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

Just as it is for the upper robe, so the same is to be stated for the lower robe. This is to be stated through to the five Dharma robes — and for all of them it is to be stated that it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

When a nun obtains a robe acquired at the appointed time and is able to do so, she should patch it with four layers. A border-strip, an upper robe, and a lower robe should be patched with two layers. A perspiration cloth and a shoulder-covering for one with a broken shoulder are likewise.

When a nun pulls out a fifth layer from a four-layered patch, the pulling out is a wrongdoing. If ten days have passed, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment. The passage up to "if she unravels it" is as stated above. Likewise, the same is to be stated for the border-strip. The upper robe and lower robe are also the same. For the perspiration cloth and the shoulder-covering for one with a broken shoulder, the same is likewise to be stated.

From "the second layer," up to the point where it reads: if she unravels a third layer while already having unraveled one, the unraveling is a wrongdoing, and if ten days have passed it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

From "thinking, 'It has been worn; I will patch it elsewhere,'" up through: if she unravels it, it is a wrongdoing, and if ten days have passed it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

From "having unraveled and washed it and turned it inside out," up to: if she thinks, "I will patch this very same one," there is no transgression; and if ten days have passed it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

As for the stitches of rags picked up from a dust-heap, she may patch them as much as she wishes.

The venerable Ānanda asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable sir, what are the strip-widths of a patched robe?" The Blessed One declared: "There are nine strip-widths, Ānanda. What are the nine? The ninth, the eleventh, the thirteenth, the fifteenth, the seventeenth, the nineteenth, the twenty-first, the twenty-third, and the twenty-fifth."

These nine patched robes with such strip-widths are called patched robes, Ānanda. Of those nine, the ninth, the eleventh, and the thirteenth are to be kept folded into a third of a board's width. The fifteenth, the seventeenth, and the nineteenth are to be kept folded into a quarter of a board's width. The twenty-first, the twenty-third, and the twenty-fifth are to be kept folded into a fifth of a board's width. They are to be patched accordingly. Beyond that, they are merely scraps.

"Blessed One, what are the dimensions of a Dharma robe?" "There are three kinds, Ānanda: a large, a medium, and a small. As for the largest patched robe, its maximum length is five cubits and its width is three cubits. As for the smallest patched robe, its maximum length is two and a half cubits and its width is one and a half cubits. The medium is between the two."

Likewise there are three kinds for the upper robe, and three kinds for the lower robe. Similarly there are three kinds for the perspiration cloth and the shoulder-covering for one with a broken shoulder.

Furthermore, one further dimension for the lower robe is a length of five cubits and a width of one and a half cubits. Another dimension for the lower robe is a length of four cubits and a width of one and a half cubits. The minimum lower robe is that which covers the three joints. The minimum of things to be relinquished is enough to wrap around the entire cubit.

From "when a nun's robe has come to be relinquished," up to "it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment," is as stated at the beginning.

The third offense entailing relinquishment is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana) of Anāthapiṇḍada in Prince Jeta's park. At the time when the Blessed One, relying upon Ānanda, had received a meal from Anāthapiṇḍada who was not a relative and had established a training rule, monks were robbed by thieves, and relying upon the monks having been robbed by thieves, the Blessed One gave permission, as follows.

When the elder nuns heard of this, many of them went to where the Blessed One was, drew near, and bowed their heads at the Blessed One's feet, then sat to one side. Seated to one side, the many elder nuns addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, what are we to do regarding this training rule?"

Thereupon the Blessed One spoke in praise of the nuns who desired training, who were respectful toward training, and who were furnished with the implements of training, and then declared to the community of nuns:

"Furthermore, whatever nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a robe outside of the permitted time — exceeding that limit — commits an offense entailing relinquishment. The permitted time is this: when a nun's robe has been stolen, or lost, or burned, or carried away by water, she may go to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and ask for a robe. That is the permitted time.

"Now, 'whatever nun' means one belonging to this Dharma. 'Who is not a relative' means that a maternal grandmother or paternal grandfather and their descendants down to seven generations are relatives; beyond that they are not relatives. 'A householder' means a man. 'A householder's wife' means a woman. 'Goes' means having gone. 'Begs' means, outside the permitted time, soliciting either oneself or causing another to solicit. 'The permitted time is this' means this is what is in accordance with the Dharma. 'The robe has been stolen' means thieves or deceivers have taken her robes away. 'Lost' means her robes have been lost or have gone astray. 'Carried away by water' means her robes have been carried away by water. 'Burned' means her robes have been burned by fire. 'Commits an offense entailing relinquishment' — and so forth, set forth at length.

"How does a transgression arise from this? It is determined by value, by color, and by cubit-measure.

"How by value? Whatever nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a robe worth five kārṣāpaṇas or more — in the asking there is a wrongdoing (Skt. duṣkṛta); if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. If, however, she receives something of greater value, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated for ten kārṣāpaṇas and for twenty kārṣāpaṇas. Such, then, is determination by value.

"How by color? A nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a blue robe — in the asking there is a wrongdoing; if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. But if she receives a yellow one, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated at length for blue, for red, and for white.

"A nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a yellow robe — in the asking there is a wrongdoing; if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. But if she receives a blue one, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated for yellow, red, and white.

"A nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a red robe — in the asking there is a wrongdoing; if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. But if she receives a blue one, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated for yellow, red, and white.

"A nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a white robe — in the asking there is a wrongdoing;"

if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. But if she receives a blue one, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated for white, yellow, and red. Such, then, is the category of transgressions arising from color.

As for how transgressions arise from measure: if a nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and begs for a robe of five cubits, in the asking there is a wrongdoing, and if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment. If, having begged for a robe of five cubits, she receives one of six cubits, there is no transgression. Likewise this is to be stated for ten cubits and eleven cubits, and for twenty cubits and twenty-one cubits. Similarly, if she begs up to ten cubits and does not receive the cloth, or does not beg for cloth but receives up to a patched robe, there is no transgression.

The fourth offense entailing relinquishment is complete.

The narrative origin is at Śrāvastī. At that time in Śrāvastī, nuns who had been robbed by thieves arrived. Then the group of twelve — Gaṇḍā, Upagaṇḍā, and Sthūlagaṇḍā among them — went to the homes of brahmins and householders on those nuns' behalf and procured a great many robes. Having procured them and then proceeding to offer them, certain nuns of modest needs raised objections. The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon, beginning with "This has come about," proceeded to establish the training rule as follows: if a nun's robe is stolen, destroyed, burned, or carried away by water, she may go to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and beg for a robe. If to that nun a believing brahmin or householder offers a great many robes, that nun may accept from those robes no more than is sufficient for an upper robe together with an under robe. If she takes more than that, it is an offense entailing relinquishment.

"Her robe is stolen" means that a thief or a deceiver has taken her robes away. "Begging" means doing so either personally or through another. "To that nun" means to the very nun in question. "Believing" means one who has faith in the Buddha, faith in the Dharma, and faith in the Saṅgha — one who has seen the truth and attained the fruit. "Brahmin" refers to a brahmin of pure lineage and so forth. "Householder" refers to one of a different class from that. "Repeatedly" means again and again. "A great many" means whatever among the seven types of robes is more than sufficient for one's needs. "Offers" means presents as a guest-gift. "If she wishes" means if she desires it for her own benefit. "That nun" means the one who desires it for her benefit.

Regarding "no more than is sufficient for an upper robe together with an under robe": there are two types of upper robe together with under robe — that of a laywoman with an under robe, and that of a fully ordained nun with an under robe. What constitutes a laywoman's upper garment together with lower garment? A large bolt of cloth of twelve cubits, and a small bolt of cloth of seven cubits, with its fastening — this is called a laywoman's upper garment together with lower garment. What constitutes a fully ordained nun's upper robe together with under robe? A patched robe of two layers for the outer robe, and a small bolt of cloth of five cubits with its fastening. "She may accept from those robes" means she may accept the upper robe together with the under robe from among them. "If she takes more than that, it is an offense entailing relinquishment" is as stated above.

As to how a transgression arises in this case: if a nun has received a laywoman's upper garment together with lower garment, and the laywoman's upper garment together with lower garment has been received, she should make that large bolt of cloth of twelve cubits into a patched robe of two layers. From the small bolt of cloth of seven cubits and the sash she should make the under robe. If it does not come to the full measure, she need not make up the remainder; and if there is excess, she need not give it away.

If a fully ordained nun receives a fully ordained nun's upper robe together with under robe, and takes the upper robe together with the under robe, she should make from that patched robe simply a patched robe. From the small bolt of cloth of five cubits and the sash she should make the under robe. If it does not come to the full measure, she must make up the remainder; and if there is excess, she must give it away.

If a fully ordained nun accepts from a layperson something less than the permitted amount, that act of acceptance is an offense of wrongdoing. Upon receiving it, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment. If a fully ordained nun accepts something less than the permitted amount, it is an offense of wrongdoing. If there is a surplus and it has not been given away, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment. For one who is acting for the first time, and similar cases, there is no transgression. The fifth transgression entailing relinquishment is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time there was a householder at Śrāvastī, wealthy and possessed of great wealth and extensive resources, who had a wife taken from an equal family, and he was in the habit of competing in wealth with the son of Vaiśravaṇa. At a certain later time, he entered into worldly dalliances with another woman, and his wife put a stop to this. When he did not desist despite her objection, stricken with grief over that wife of his, he took up pleasure with another man. As a result the household fell into ruin from both sides, and the two of them kept beating their maidservant without respite.

Then the nun Sthūlanandā in the morning took up her robe and alms bowl and went for alms in Śrāvastī. Going on her alms round in Śrāvastī, she came to the house of that householder. When she arrived, she taught the Dharma of mental liberation to the householder and the householder's wife, so that those bound by attachment might become free from attachment. The two of them looked at each other and said to Sthūlanandā: "Noble one, it is not I who am at fault — this fault belongs to this nobleman's son." The merchant said: "It is not so. She is not my fault; this fault belongs to the virtuous lady." Then Sthūlanandā placed both the householder, for having been with another's wife, and the householder's wife, for having been with another's man, under a training rule. As the two of them turned away from that unwholesome conduct, the household prospered, and the maidservant too was installed as the mistress of that household.

Thereafter the householder and his wife reflected: "Whatever good fortune and happiness we possess, whatever little we may have, all of it has come from the noble Sthūlanandā." The maidservant too reflected: "Whatever little comfort and ease of mind I now possess — all of that has come from the noble Sthūlanandā. Alas, I should make an offering to the noble Sthūlanandā." She then went outside and saw Sthūlanandā. Seeing her, she spoke these words: "Noble one, I will convey a pleasant message to you: the noble one will receive a large bolt of cloth from the nobleman's son."

Then Sthūlanandā went to that house and said to the householder and his wife: "Householder, please show me the large bolt of cloth that you wish to give to her." The householder then took the large bolt of cloth and gave it to Sthūlanandā. When Sthūlanandā saw that it was a very thick large bolt of cloth, she made a grimace and wrung her hands. The two of them said: "Noble one, what is the matter?" And she replied:

"Do you perhaps think this cloth is of good quality? Householder, if she were to distribute this among households, and someone were to ask her from whom she had received such cloth, what could she say in her embarrassment?" The two of them then said: "Noble one, we have only this; we have nothing else." She replied: "Householder, you should let her decide. What would she have you do?" And she said: "Householder, add a little more on top of the price you receive from selling this very large bolt of cloth, and it will turn into something far superior." The wife also said: "Noble son, please do as she says."

She then went to the market, fixed a date with a merchant, took a fine new large bolt of cloth on credit and draped it over the first. When the appointed time came and the merchant seized that trader while others were watching and began to reproach him, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, beginning with "this occurrence" and proceeding through to the laying down of the rule, established the following: if a nun, for the sake of a nun, approaches a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and solicits cloth-money, and then, without having previously invited that nun, generates even some conceptual thought and goes to her and says, "You, on my behalf, have solicited cloth-money — with that cloth-money please have the venerable ones buy such-and-such cloth and bring me suitable cloth at the right time," then, if the cloth is obtained because of the desire for something good, it is an offense requiring relinquishment.

"Nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Non-relative" is as before. "Cloth-money" means silver and gold. "Having solicited" means having assembled, in the sense of: "With this silver and gold that is my cloth-money." "Such-and-such" means: "From whichever of the seven types of cloth is appropriate, buy cloth of this kind." "This nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "When she comes" means upon her arrival. "Bring" means present or offer. "Cloth" refers to any of the seven types. "Suitable, at the right time" means at a time when it is fit for use.

"That nun" in the phrase refers to Sthūlanandā. "Without having previously invited" means without having previously arranged as a guest. "Generating even some conceptual thought" means giving rise to even a little bit of deliberation. "You, on my behalf" means presenting herself as the direct beneficiary. "If the cloth is obtained" means upon receiving it. "It is an offense requiring relinquishment" is as before.

Now, how does a transgression arise in regard to this? It arises with respect to price, color, and measure in cubits.

How does it arise with respect to price? If a nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and says, "Give cloth worth five kārṣāpaṇas," and cloth worth five kārṣāpaṇas is given, there is no transgression. But if she asks for more than that, there is a wrong act in the asking, and if the cloth is obtained, it is an offense requiring relinquishment.

In the same way, one should continue to state this up to cloth worth twenty kārṣāpaṇas. That is how transgression arises with respect to price.

How does it arise with respect to color? If a nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and says, "Give blue cloth," and blue cloth is given, there is no transgression. But if she takes yellow cloth instead, there is a wrong act in the asking, and if it is obtained, it is an offense requiring relinquishment. Just as with blue, so also with yellow, red, thick, and fine — the explanation proceeds as before. That is how transgression arises with respect to color.

How does transgression arise with respect to length? If a nun goes to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and says, "Give a large bolt of cloth five cubits long," and a large bolt of cloth five cubits long is given, there is no transgression. But if she takes more than that, there is a wrong act in the asking, and if it is obtained, it is an offense requiring relinquishment. The same applies up to twenty cubits. The sixth offense requiring relinquishment is complete.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. From that incident onward the training rule was established. A householder or a householder's wife who was not a relative had, each separately, pooled funds for cloth on behalf of a nun, thinking: "With the funds we have each pooled for cloth, let each of us buy such-and-such separate pieces of cloth, and when the nun called so-and-so arrives, let her be clothed by each of us in turn." Then, if that nun, without having been invited beforehand, were to give rise to just some thought of desire and go to them and say, "The funds for cloth that you, venerable ones, have each pooled on her behalf — with those separate cloth-funds, let each venerable one buy such-and-such a kind of cloth, and such-and-such a kind, and combining both together, at one time bestow on her a proper and excellent garment" — if a garment is completed out of desire for finery, it is an offense requiring relinquishment. The sequence of offenses is to be stated in conformity with this training rule just as in the preceding cases. However, the distinguishing feature here is this: from the phrase "each separately" — meaning "one by one" — up to the phrase "out of desire for finery," this section is to be treated as distinct. The seventh offense requiring relinquishment is complete.

The origin story is set in Rājagṛha. Since the Blessed One established certain training rules in common with monks, certain ones in common with nuns, and certain ones in common with both, here the Blessed One established one in common with both. At the time when the Blessed One in Rājagṛha, on account of the nun Nandā, established the training rule concerning the acceptance of kārṣāpaṇas, those nuns who desired training followed suit. Then the nun Nandā, when soliciting kārṣāpaṇas from kings, great ministers, brahmins, and householders, created an occasion for nuns of little ambition to censure her, and the nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared — and from that point onward the training rule was established — that if a king, a great minister, a brahmin, a householder, a town-dweller, a country-dweller, a wealthy person, a merchant, or a caravan leader were to send funds for cloth by the hand of a messenger on behalf of a nun, and that messenger were to take those funds for cloth and go to that nun and say to her, "Noble lady, please be informed: these funds for cloth have been sent to you by such a one — a king, a great minister, a brahmin, a householder, a town-dweller, a country-dweller, a wealthy person, a merchant, or a caravan leader. Noble lady, please be so kind as to accept these funds for cloth" — then that nun should say to that messenger the following: "Venerable messenger, nuns are not permitted to accept funds for cloth. When a proper garment is found at the proper time, she will accept it."

If that messenger then says to that nun, "Noble lady, does the noble lady have someone who looks after her affairs and carries out what is to be done for the noble ladies?" —

The nun who desires the robe should point out to those messengers the attendant of the monastery — whether a lay resident of the monastery or a lay practitioner who manages affairs — saying: "These messengers are to be looked after by the nuns."

Then that messenger should go to wherever that attendant is, and upon arriving should say to the attendant the following: "Venerable attendant, please take note. For the sake of such and such a nun, funds for cloth in this amount have been sent by a king" — and so on down through "caravan leader" — "and so, attendant, with these funds for cloth please purchase such and such cloth and such and such items, and when the proper garment is found at the proper time, let the nun named such and such come to you, and at the right time provide her with suitable cloth."

Then that messenger should instruct and inform that attendant thoroughly and correctly, and should go to wherever that nun is. Upon arriving, the messenger should say to her: "The one I have been shown as the attendant who manages affairs for the noble ladies — I have duly informed that person, and you should go to him. He will provide you with suitable cloth at the proper time."

Then the nun who desires the robe should also go to wherever that attendant is. Upon arriving, she should say: "Venerable attendant, I desire a robe. Venerable attendant, I desire a robe" — reminding him of this two or three times. Having gone two or three times and reminded him, if the robe is then obtained, that is good. If it is not obtained, she should remain silent on the matter until the limit of four, five, or six times. Having remained silent until the limit of four, five, or six times, if the robe is then obtained, that is good. If it is not obtained, then if she pursues efforts beyond that to procure the robe and does procure it, that constitutes a transgression entailing forfeiture. If it is not obtained at all, then that nun should go herself to the person from whom those funds for cloth came.

Alternatively, she may send word to the messenger who brought them: "You have sent funds for cloth on behalf of the nun named such and such, but those funds for cloth have not served that nun's purposes in any way. Please take notice, venerable ones, and do not let your own wealth go to waste." That is the proper procedure in such a case.

The phrase "for the sake of the nun" refers to the daughter of the Śākya clan, the female companion. "King" means one consecrated as lord from the head of the kṣatriya lineage — whether a woman, a man, or a person of indeterminate sex consecrated by royal consecration, that person is a king, is of the kṣatriya lineage, and is consecrated from the head. "Great minister" means one who carries out the affairs of a king and lives by employment in a confidential role. "Brahmin" means a brahmin of pure birth. "Householder" means a wealthy person. "Town-dweller" means a village resident. "Country-dweller" means one who lives in the countryside. "Wealthy person" means one rich in tens of millions in wealth. "Merchant" means one who wears a turban. "Caravan leader" means one who conducts organized caravans to other lands for profitable ends. "Through the hand of the messenger" refers to a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. "Funds for cloth" means gold and silver. "Sent" means dispatched. "That messenger" refers to a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. "Having taken those funds for cloth" means having carried them.

"That nun" refers to Nandā, the daughter of the Śākya clan. "Having gone" means having departed. "Said the following" means having spoken. "Noble one, please know" means: know that these funds for cloth were sent by the king. "Accept them" means receive them. "Having taken it to heart with care" means having taken it to heart with goodwill. "That nun" refers to Nandā. "That messenger" refers to a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. "Shall instruct as follows" means shall correctly convey these words. "Venerable one, the funds for cloth are not allowable for nuns to receive" means that the Blessed One has prohibited their being received, but the Blessed One has granted permission for cloth itself to be acceptable for them.

"If that messenger then says to that nun" means if he asks. "What serves as suitable service for the noble ones?" means what is the service that the noble ones are to receive. "A nun who wants cloth shall indicate a suitable service" — here, "one of the monastery" means one who makes things allowable. "Layman" means one who holds the five bases of training. "These are the ones who perform suitable service for nuns" means these are the ones through whom those nuns experience the receiving of service. "If that messenger is to go to wherever the service-giver is, and having arrived" means having gone there in order to make known what is needed.

"Make known the service. These funds for cloth" refers to the gold and silver sent by the king. "For the nun of such-and-such name" means for Nandā, the daughter of the Śākya clan. "Then that messenger" refers to a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. "Having thoroughly and correctly conveyed the message to the service-giver, whether one of the monastery or a layman" means by many different ways of expression. "That nun" refers to Nandā. "Is to go to that place and, having arrived" means having gone there. "Say the following: the service that was indicated as serving the noble ones — I have correctly indicated it; please come, and that person will provide you with cloth" — here "whichever of the seven" means any one of the seven allowable types. "Allowable" means fit for use. "A nun who wants cloth" means if she has come to seek cloth. "Having gone" means having departed. "Two times" means up to two times. "Three times" means up to three times. One should urge and remind. "If the matter is accomplished, then that is excellent" means that is good. "If it is not accomplished, one should remain silent without speaking to any side, up to the limit of four, five, or six times" — this is explained by means of the four ways of standing to one side and the six methods of urging.

What are the four ways of standing to one side? They are: the dwelling-place of sweepers, the sitting-place, which is the household where one habitually stays, the market-place, and the place at the end of a task.

The Vinaya Analysis of the Nuns — the Thirteenth Fascicle.

Now, "the dwelling-place of sweepers" refers to the dwellings of sweepers and potters. "The sitting-place" means the household — the place where one especially resides. "The market-place" means the shop and the market-stall. "The place at the end of a task" is threefold: the place at the end of the task of harvesting rice, of salt production, and of sugarcane — these are called the four ways of standing to one side.

What are the six methods of urging? They are as follows: if one asks "have you come?" — for that reason; if one says "it is good that you have come" — for that reason; and

"Sit on this seat" — for that reason; "accept this livelihood" — for that reason; "eat this food" — for that reason; "drink this drink" — for that reason: these are the six methods of urging.

If one speaks without pause, and urges in a situation where there is no opportunity, one should declare that the urging is not fully complete. If one urges in a situation where there is opportunity, one should declare that the urging is fully complete.

Thus, if one sits in silence in those places, "when the cloth is obtained" means: if it is acquired. "That is good" means: that is well. "If it is not obtained" means: if one does not receive it. "Having made further effort" means: with additional effort beyond that. "When the cloth is obtained" means: if it is received. "It constitutes a transgression involving forfeiture" means: having given up that thing — as before. "If it is not obtained" means: if one does not receive it. "That nun" means: the fellow practitioner. "From whatever direction those cloth-prices have come" means: from whatever source they have arrived. "Whether I myself should go there" means: oneself personally. "Or send a trustworthy messenger" means: one who, if sent, would accomplish that purpose. "Those cloth-prices that you sent on behalf of the nun called such-and-such have not accomplished any purpose for her" means: not even a small thing has been done. "Let it be known" means: venerable ones, do not let your own wealth be consumed in a way that is improper. "In that regard, this is the proper procedure" means: in that regard, this is the conforming rule. As for how a transgression arises in that regard: if the donor goes to the nun and says, "Noble one, please accept the cloth," then that nun should say to the donor, "I have renounced these things; give them directly to her." If the donor then says, "Noble one, please accept these; I wish to win her favour," and if the nun accepts without following this procedure, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture in every case.

If a nun who has not been authorized by examination appropriates as her own any alms bowl, Dharma robes, or any other requisite for a monastic's livelihood whatsoever, it becomes a transgression involving forfeiture. This concludes the eighth transgression involving forfeiture.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One had prohibited woollen blankets of sheep's wool mixed with coarse fibre, twelve groups of nuns continued to make such blankets, induced others to make them, and criticized nuns of modest wants. The nuns then spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, from "this occurrence" onward, undertook the process through to the laying down of the training rule: "Moreover, should any nun make a blanket from fresh sheep's wool, it is a transgression involving forfeiture."

"Moreover, should any nun" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. Regarding the word "fresh": there are two kinds of freshness — fresh by being new, and fresh by being newly acquired. In this context, only freshness by being new is intended. "Sheep's wool" refers to the wool of sheep. Regarding "blanket": there are two kinds of blanket — one with lining and one without lining — and in this context both are intended. "Make" means by oneself or by another. "It is a transgression involving forfeiture" — as above.

As for how a transgression arises in that regard: through bundling, through unravelling, and through combining — when a nun bundles sheep's wool together, destroys it, or teases it apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. When a nun bundles loose sheep's wool together, destroys it, or teases it apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. When a nun bundles a heap of sheep's wool together, destroys it, or teases it apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. When a nun bundles together a bundle, loose wool, and a heap of sheep's wool, destroys them, or teases them apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. When a nun bundles together loose wool, a heap, and a bundle of sheep's wool, destroys them, or teases them apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. When a nun bundles together a heap, loose wool, and a bundle of sheep's wool, destroys them, or teases them apart, as long as she does not spin it, it is a wrongdoing. If she does spin it, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. If what has been made is found and used, there is no transgression.

The ninth transgression involving forfeiture is complete.

The origin story takes place in Rājagṛha. At the time when the Blessed One, drawing on the substance of the Jewel-Pinnacle Sūtra, established the training precept concerning the taking of gold and silver, the twelve groups were at that time taking gold and silver with their own hands, having others take it for them, and reviling nuns of few wants. On that occasion the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, from the account of what had occurred up to the establishment of the training precept, did so, and declared: "Furthermore, any nun who takes gold and silver with her own hand, or has it taken for her, incurs a transgression involving forfeiture."

"Furthermore, any nun" — as before. "With her own hand" means by herself. "Gold and silver" means silver and gold. "Takes" means by herself. "Has it taken for her" means by another. "A transgression involving forfeiture" — as above.

As for how a transgression arises in that regard, it does so through eight grounds: "Take this," "Take from here," "Take this much"; "Bring this," "Bring from here," "Bring this much"; "Put this down," "Put it down here," "Put down this much"; "Take that," "Take from there," "Take that much"; "Bring that," "Bring from there," "Bring that much"; "Put that down," "Put it down there," "Put down that much."

"Take this" refers to silver or gold. "Take from here" means from an iron vessel, an earthenware vessel, a bronze vessel, a tin vessel, or a basket. "Take this much" means a hundred or a thousand — if one instructs someone engaged in any suitable activity, or a person who is there as a contemplative, saying "take this," it is a wrongdoing; if it is taken, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. If, in the course of saying "Take this," "Take from here," or "Take this much," one instructs someone in a direction where it cannot be obtained, or a place where there is no novice nun, saying "take this," it is a wrongdoing; and if it is taken, it is likewise a wrongdoing — up to that point.

Furthermore, concerning a householder of the same locality, the Blessed One declared: "It may be accepted, provided it is kept by another trusted person." The manner of keeping it is as follows: one should address the noble one, saying: "Noble lady, please be aware —"

"I, who am called so-and-so, have come into possession of kārṣāpaṇas that are not allowable. I, who am called so-and-so, will render them allowable through the name of a donor, or through the name of a lay attendant, so-and-so, belonging to that donor, and will keep them on that very basis alone. From the time when I who had not yet rendered them allowable do render them allowable — from that moment, let it be recorded that I have rendered them allowable." That is how they are to be kept.

Here ends the tenth transgression involving forfeiture.

The occasion was in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the Group of Six, was laying down rules of training regarding the performance of various kinds of conduct involving explicitly named goods, the Group of Twelve likewise performed various kinds of such conduct, and nuns of little standing rebuked them. The matter was then brought before the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This having occurred," proceeded to lay down the rule of training. The rule is: "Whatever nun performs various kinds of conduct involving explicitly named goods — that is a transgression involving forfeiture."

The phrase "whatever nun" is as before. "Various kinds" means many types. "Involving explicitly named goods" means silver or gold. "If she conducts herself" means if she acts excessively in this way. "Transgression involving forfeiture" is as above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? There are four modes: engaging in trade, engaging in investment, distributing as loans, and distributing at interest.

Of these, engaging in trade is as follows: for the purpose of obtaining goods in the market, one engages in trade using a market stall or a cart, gathers people together, and says, "This item is yours; this one is mine" — for as long as one does not appropriate the gains for oneself, it is a wrongdoing; if one does appropriate the gains, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. Such is what is called engaging in trade.

How does one engage in investment? For the purpose of increasing gold gains from ten to eleven, one engages in investment using a stall for gold acquisition, going there for the sake of sealing agreements, going to find ink or witnesses. For as long as one does not appropriate the gains for oneself, it is a wrongdoing; if one does appropriate them, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. Such is what is called engaging in investment.

How does one distribute as loans? For the sake of obtaining new barley or grain at harvest time, one sends out grain or barley as a loan, measured by a measuring vessel, and then goes seeking those measuring vessels, small measures, bushels, weighing instruments, and people for that purpose. For as long as one does not appropriate the gains for oneself, it is a wrongdoing; if one does appropriate them, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. Such is what is called distributing as loans.

How does one distribute at interest? One distributes at interest through pearl interest, or distributes at interest through gold interest, and then goes seeking brokers, ink, and witnesses for that purpose. For as long as one does not appropriate the gains for oneself, it is a wrongdoing; if one does appropriate them, it is a transgression involving forfeiture. Such is what is called distributing at interest.

When the rule of training had been laid down in this way, it was not applied to what had been placed in perpetual endowments for stūpas and for the Saṅgha. The Blessed One then declared: "It may be applied." Then, when those responsible sent such funds to whoever they wished and those funds came to be wandering loose, the Blessed One declared:

"Do not send funds to the destitute, nor to remote and border regions, nor to those who are violent and given to evil deeds, nor ever to those who wield power."

This completes the eleventh rule of training subject to forfeiture.

The case arose at Śrāvastī. At that time the group of six nuns were engaged in various kinds of trade: they would buy in, they would send out, they would purchase, and they would sell. How did they buy in? Whenever there was scarcity at Śrāvastī and abundance in the surrounding regions, they would procure goods from those regions and bring them into Śrāvastī. Such is what is called buying in. How did they send out? Whenever the harvest was good at Śrāvastī and had failed in the surrounding regions, they would procure goods from Śrāvastī and send them out to those regions. Such is what is called sending out. How did they purchase? Whenever something was abundant, they would purchase it. Such is what is called purchasing. How did they sell? Whenever something was scarce, they would sell it. Such is what is called selling.

While they were engaged in trade, they would scold the nuns who were getting the worse of the bargain. The nuns then spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from the statement "This occurrence..." all the way through to the laying down of the rule of training: "Whatever nun engages in various kinds of trade incurs a transgression involving forfeiture." The phrase "whatever nun" is as before. As to how the transgression arises: if a nun purchases desiring gain and sells desiring gain, then in the act of purchasing she commits a wrongdoing, and in the act of selling she incurs a transgression involving forfeiture. If she purchases desiring gain and sells without desiring gain, then in the act of purchasing she commits a wrongdoing, but in the act of selling there is no transgression. If she purchases without desiring gain and sells desiring gain, then in the act of purchasing there is no transgression, but in the act of selling she incurs a transgression involving forfeiture. If she purchases without desiring gain and sells without desiring gain, there is no transgression in either act. Involvement in another region is to be purified through the earlier continuum.

Then the Saṅgha had provisions on hand, and donors came wishing to provide food. They searched for grain but found neither food nor drink. The Blessed One declared: "Give according to the price at which it was purchased." On some occasions what had been purchased when abundant later became scarce, and on other occasions what had been purchased when scarce later became abundant. The Blessed One declared: "Give it at the market price."

This completes the verse summary of the first rule of training subject to forfeiture.

The summary verse runs:

The alms-bowl, thread, and the returning thereof,
Recovering by force, and likewise what was examined,
Gain, medicine, and one day,
Exchanging, in season, and out of season.

The case arose at Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One, on account of the group of six, had laid down the rule of training concerning keeping an alms-bowl without proper relation, the group of twelve nuns were carrying alms-bowls both without proper relation and without a companion. The nuns who dwelt in the proper manner then spoke thus to the group of twelve: "Sisters, has the Blessed One not laid down a rule of training?" The group of twelve replied to those nuns: "That rule of training belongs to the monks; it does not apply to the nuns." At that point the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with the words "This incident having arisen," performed all that is done up to the laying down of the rule of training. The rule is as follows: Whatever nun, while a usable alms-bowl without the five associations is available, out of desire for something better solicits another new alms-bowl, and upon obtaining that bowl abandons the original — that is an offense entailing relinquishment. That nun must offer the bowl to the community of nuns. Whichever bowl is last in the community of nuns, that one is to be given to that nun with the words: "Nun, you must not consecrate this bowl, nor give it away, nor donate it to another, but must use it gently and carefully until it breaks." That is the proper procedure.

Now the commentary on the rule follows. "Whatever nun" is as before. "An alms-bowl without the five associations" means one lacking any one of the five associations. "While available" means while it is still usable. "Solicits another new one" means solicits a second one instead. "Out of desire for something better" means out of desire for something superior, or else out of desire for what belongs to another. "Upon obtaining it" means upon receiving it. "An offense entailing relinquishment" is as before.

"That nun must offer the alms-bowl to the community of nuns" means she must give it over. "Whichever belongs to that community of nuns" means whichever bowl is last among the nuns' bowls. The community of nuns then must appoint a nun to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation. A nun possessing five qualities must not be appointed to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation even if she has not yet been appointed, and if she has already been appointed she must be removed. What are the five? Going by desire, going by aversion, going by delusion, going by fear, and not knowing which bowls have been distributed and which have not. Likewise, the reverse, the qualities of the white side, are to be applied in the same way.

Following that, by a motion and a second formal act of the assembly, a nun is to be appointed to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation. After the seat has been prepared, one nun makes the motion and the act is performed. It is to be done in this manner: "Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. If it please the noble Saṅgha, and if the time is right and the assembly consents, the Saṅgha of noble ones should appoint the nun named so-and-so to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation. This is the motion. The act is to be performed as follows: 'Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. The nun named so-and-so wishes to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation to the noble Saṅgha. The noble Saṅgha appoints the nun named so-and-so to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation for the noble Saṅgha. Those among you, sisters, who consent to the appointment of the nun named so-and-so to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation, remain silent.

Those who do not consent, speak.' The Saṅgha has consented and agreed, and the noble Saṅgha has therefore appointed the nun named so-and-so to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation. Since no one has spoken, it is held to be so."

Following that, the nun appointed to distribute alms-bowls without proper relation, at the time of the assembly gathering, is to address the Saṅgha, saying: "Tomorrow morning, at the time of distributing alms-bowls without proper relation, each of you please bring your own bowl." Then, when dawn breaks, the distributing nun, after preparing the seats, should distribute the alms-bowls without proper relation, then stand before the senior nun of the assembly, recite the full praise of distributing alms-bowls without proper relation exactly as prescribed, and also say these words: "Venerable, please accept an alms-bowl." If the Saṅgha takes the senior nun's alms-bowl without proper relation, the Saṅgha is to give the senior nun's alms-bowl to the next most senior nun. The next most senior nun's alms-bowl is then to be given to the one after her, and so it continues in this way all the way down to the most junior member of the Saṅgha. If the senior nun of the Saṅgha does not accept the alms-bowl without proper relation and the distribution has already passed to the third in seniority, then if the senior nun of the Saṅgha requests one again, it is not to be given. Even if she requests a second time, it is not to be given. But if she requests a third time, it is to be given, and the transgression against the Vinaya is to be confessed. And so it continues likewise down to the most junior member of the Saṅgha. If no one has accepted an alms-bowl without proper relation, or if one bowl remains over, that very bowl is to be given to that person, and she is to be told to use it from that point on.

When the Blessed One declared this, not knowing how it was to be done, the Blessed One declared: "Rules of conduct are to be established for the nun who carries an alms-bowl without proper relation. A nun who carries an alms-bowl without proper relation, if she goes on alms-round, is to hold the alms-bowl without proper relation in her right hand and the consecrated bowl in her left hand. If she receives cooked wet rice, she is to accept it into the consecrated bowl. If she receives dry cooked rice, she is to accept it into the alms-bowl without proper relation. If she is about to place things into the alms-bowl vessel, the lower position is for the consecrated bowl and the upper position is for the alms-bowl without proper relation. If she is doing the washing up, the alms-bowl without proper relation comes first, and the consecrated bowl afterward. If the alms-bowl is to be placed on a bowl-stand, the alms-bowl without proper relation is to be set on top of the consecrated bowl. If work is to be done with the alms-bowl and there is a good kiln, the alms-bowl without proper relation is to be fired in it. If she is going on a journey, she is to give the consecrated bowl to co-residents and attendants to carry, while she herself carries the alms-bowl without proper relation. If there is no one to carry anything at all, the right armpit holds the alms-bowl without proper relation and the left holds the consecrated bowl."

If a nun who carries an alms-bowl without proper relation does not properly accept and use it in accordance with the rules of conduct as laid down, she incurs a serious offence. The last alms-bowl of the Saṅgha is not to be consecrated — it must not be consecrated, must not be given to anyone — but is to be kept carefully and slowly, gradually, for as long as it lasts until it finally breaks.

As to how a transgression arises in that connection: if a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with a single patch, and without mending it she seeks another while it is still serviceable, that is a wrongdoing. Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with two patches, and without mending it she seeks another while it is still serviceable, that is a wrongdoing. Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with three patches, and without mending it she seeks another while it is still serviceable, that is a wrongdoing. Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with four patches, and without mending it she seeks another while it is still serviceable, that is a wrongdoing.

Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with five patches, and without mending it she seeks another while it is still serviceable, that is a wrongdoing. Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with one patch, and she has it mended, yet while it is still serviceable she seeks another, that is a wrongdoing. Should she obtain one, she incurs a forfeiture offence. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with two patches, and she has it mended, yet while it is still serviceable — and so on through: that is a wrongdoing, and she incurs a forfeiture offence. Likewise, the case where three patches are appropriate, and likewise the case where four patches are appropriate, should be stated in the same way. If a nun's alms-bowl breaks and it is fit to be mended with five patches, whether she has it mended or not, there is no offence in seeking another bowl. There is likewise no offence for one who is a first offender and so forth. The thirteenth forfeiture offence is complete.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when, on account of Udāyin, the training rule concerning receiving thread from a non-relative was established, the nun Sthūlanandā received thread from non-relatives and also from relatives, and had a weaver who was not a relative — as well as weavers who were relatives — weave cloth. Nuns of few desires censured this, and the nuns then reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this has occurred," proceeded to establish the training rule. The rule is as follows: whatever nun receives thread from a householder or a householder's wife who is not her relative, and has a weaver who is not her relative weave cloth from it, that is a forfeiture offence. "Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "From one who is not a relative" means up to the seventh generation removed on the mother's side and the father's side. "Thread" means any of the seven kinds. "A weaver who is not a relative" means one who weaves cloth. "Cloth" means any of the seven kinds. "Has it woven" means having had it woven. "A forfeiture offence" is as before. How does the transgression arise? If a nun receives thread from a non-relative and, while requesting a weaver who is not a relative to weave cloth, that is a wrongdoing. If she has a weaver who is not a relative weave it and the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. If a nun receives thread from a non-relative and, while requesting either herself or a weaver who is not a relative to weave it, that is a wrongdoing. If she weaves it herself, that is also a wrongdoing. If she has a non-relative weave it and it is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. If a nun receives thread from a non-relative and requests a weaver who is a relative to weave the cloth, that is a wrongdoing. If she has a relative weaver weave it, there is no offence. If a nun receives thread from a non-relative and requests either herself or a relative to weave it, that is a wrongdoing. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing. If a relative weaves it, there is no offence. If a nun receives thread from a non-relative and requests either herself or a non-relative to weave it, that is a wrongdoing. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing. If she requests a relative to weave it, there is no offence. If she has a non-relative weave it and the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. If a nun receives thread from a relative and weaves it herself, and while requesting this there is no offence. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing.

If a nun receives thread from a relative and requests a non-relative to weave it, there is no offence in the requesting. If the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. If a nun receives thread from a relative and requests either herself or a relative to weave it, there is no offence in the requesting. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing. If she has a relative weave it, there is no offence. If a nun receives thread from a relative and either weaves it herself or requests a non-relative to weave it, there is no offence in the requesting. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing. If she has a non-relative weave it and the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. Furthermore, if any nun receives thread from a relative and requests a weaver who is a relative to weave it, there is no offence in the requesting, and there is likewise no offence in having the relative weave it. If a nun receives thread from a relative and either weaves it herself or requests a relative to weave it, there is no offence in the requesting. If she weaves it herself, that is a wrongdoing. If she has a relative weave it, there is no offence. If she has a non-relative weave it and the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence. For those acting for the first time and so forth, there is no offence. The fourteenth forfeiture offence is complete.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At that time, at Śrāvastī, the laywoman Sthūlanandā had inspired faith in a householder together with his retinue. That householder gave thread to a weaver on behalf of the nun Sthūlanandā. Sthūlanandā heard of this from a maidservant, and upon hearing it went to where that weaver was and spoke these words: "Weaver, for whom is this great bolt of woven cloth that you are weaving?" He replied: "I do not know." She then said: "It is for her," meaning herself, and said furthermore that for as long as he was able to do so, whether he provided her with food, or a mere meal, or the means to obtain food, the nuns of modest wants criticized this conduct. The nuns then spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning from the occasion of this incident and proceeding through the laying down of the training rule, ordained: if a householder or a householder's wife has a non-relative weaver weave cloth on behalf of a nun, and that nun — who had not previously been acquainted with that weaver — entertains some thought and goes to the weaver and says: "Venerable weaver, please know that this cloth is for her," meaning herself, and says, "Venerable one, please make this cloth wide in breadth, long in length, well-finished at the edges, and well-woven in texture.

If you do so, she will repay you, the venerable weaver, with food, or a mere meal, or even just the smallest means of obtaining food" — and if that nun then gives that weaver even just a little food, or a mere meal, or the means to obtain food, and thereby obtains the cloth, and the cloth is completed, that is a forfeiture offence.

"Any nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "From a non-relative" means those who are not related within seven generations on either the mother's side or the father's side. "Householder" means a man. "Householder's wife" means a woman. "A weaver who is a non-relative" means one who weaves cloth. "Has cloth woven" means any one of the seven. "That nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Entertains some thought" means that some suspicion or doubt has arisen. "Goes to the weaver" means having gone there. "Spoke these words" means having spoken. "This cloth" means pointing out the cloth at hand. "Have it woven for her" means identifying herself. "The venerable weaver does it well" means the venerable weaver does it in a fine manner.

"You have woven this cloth" means whatever cloth was had woven. "Wide" means that it is broad in extent. "Long-hemmed" means that the hem is long. "Bound with a fringe" means without a knot. "Well-woven with a fine weave" means the weave is good and the edge-thread is short.

"If that is so, she should arrange for you a meal, or a light meal, or even a small amount of food" means the five kinds of staple food and the five kinds of non-staple food. "If that nun" means Sthūlanandā. "Should arrange even a little" means this: she gives a meal, or a light meal, or a small amount of food. "In order to get the cloth woven" means for the sake of obtaining the cloth. "When the cloth is finished" means when it has been obtained. "It is an offense entailing forfeiture" means as stated above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? From the point when a nun, in order to obtain cloth, goes begging in the homes of householders and gives the five kinds of staple and the five kinds of non-staple food to the weaver, up until the work is not yet completed, she has committed a wrong act. When it is completed, it is an offense entailing forfeiture.

The fifteenth offense entailing forfeiture is complete.

The setting is Śrāvastī.

At that time, the twelve groups distributed robes and bowls among those who lived together with them and their attendants. Because women are by nature prone to anger, whenever those women quarreled and found fault with one another, those among them who lived together and the attendants would again snatch back the robes, or cause them to be snatched, and during this occasion nuns of few wants censured them. The nuns then reported this to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. Thereupon, the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and so forth, established the training rule as follows.

Furthermore, whatever nun, having given robes to nuns, afterward becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of discontent says, "I shall not give you the robes, nun — give them back!" and either snatches them herself or has them snatched: that nun must return whatever remainder of the robe exists, and if she makes use of it, it is an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Whatever nun" means the twelve groups. "Nuns" means those who dwell together and the attendants. "Having given robes" means any one of the seven kinds. "Afterward" means at a different time. "Having become angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of discontent" means while the agitation has not subsided. "Snatches" means by her own hand. "Has them snatched" means through another person. "The nun should return that robe" means whatever remainder there is of any one of the seven kinds of robe. "She should return it" means she should give it back. "If she makes use of it" means for however long she continues to make use of it. "It is an offense entailing forfeiture" means as stated above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? It arises through bodily action, through verbal expression, or through both together. How does it arise through bodily action? By seizing it with the hand and snatching it away — for as long as the cloth does not leave one's grip, a wrong act is being committed. When it is released, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Such is the transgression arising through bodily action. How does it arise through verbal expression?

By verbal expression it arises thus: when one says the words "Nun, give back the cloth," a wrong act is being committed for as long as one does not release one's hold on the hem of the cloth. When it is released, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Such is the transgression arising through verbal expression. How does it arise through both together? By saying in words "Give back the cloth" and at the same time seizing it with the hand — a wrong act is being committed for as long as one does not release one's hold on the hem of the cloth. When it is released, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Such is the transgression arising through both together. When there is another purpose, or when it is done by means of a Vinaya instrument, there is no offense.

How is it done for another purpose? It is like this: when nuns and their attendants are traveling at an unsuitable time in frightening circumstances, and their preceptors and teachers, seeing that robbers are about to snatch their robes, take the robes from them saying, "This is not right" — such is the case of another purpose. How is it done by means of a Vinaya instrument? It is like this: when nuns and their attendants are keeping company with bad spiritual friends and traveling along with them, and one takes their robes from them so that they may travel instead with good spiritual friends — such is the case of a Vinaya instrument.

The sixteenth offense entailing forfeiture is complete.

The narrative occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the degraded kṣatriyas together with their retinues had been presented before the noble ones by Dharmadattā, and they received gifts and honors from King Prasenajit, they thought: "Everything that causes us to see the noble ones is owing to the noble spiritual friend, the noble Dharmadattā. What can we do to repay her? We who received these gifts and honors from the king through her — we should certainly offer them to Dharmadattā." Then the degraded kṣatriyas took those gifts, went to where Dharmadattā was, arrived there, bowed their heads at Dharmadattā's feet in homage, and offered her those gifts and honors.

Dharmadattā then thought: "Has anyone provided the Blessed One with medicine and almsfood for three months, I wonder?" And as she turned this thought over, she came to know that the Blessed One had been sustained by those very people. Then Dharmadattā spoke to those degraded kṣatriyas as follows: "Householders, today please provide the Blessed One with three months' worth of medicine and almsfood" — and so on down to "and all necessary requisites."

Then they went and provided all of this to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of hearers, and to Dharmadattā together with her retinue. Then the wives of those degraded kṣatriyas began to render service to those nuns. The degraded kṣatriyas also caused expensive and ordinary robes to be set aside for the monks and nuns. During the rains retreat, however, the king sent them away on a mission elsewhere, and Anāthapiṇḍada turned them back from that.

After the rains had ended, the nuns made a sign indicating they desired robes, and the wives said: "Noble ones, we have already offered the value of the robes — the insects have eaten them." The nuns replied that the Blessed One had declared that gains accruing during the rains retreat should not be distributed during the rains period.

In that instance of not distributing because one wished to train, the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this matter having arisen," proceeded to establish the training rule.

When a nun obtains a robe that has come from those seeking ordination (pravrajyā), within the period running from the last ten days of the last month of autumn up to the end of the rains, and if she desires a robe that has come from those seeking ordination, that nun may accept it. Having accepted it, she shall keep it until the time of the robe-giving. If she keeps it beyond that, it entails a forfeiture-transgression.

"Ten days" means that on the tenth day the invitation ceremony will take place. "Nun" means those who follow this Dharma. "Obtained" means from another. As for "a robe that has come from those seeking ordination," there are five kinds of robes that come from those seeking ordination. What are the five? One who has come, one who is about to depart, one who is sick, one who nurses the sick, and the robe-guardian nun. "Robe" means any of the seven. "If she desires" means if she seeks it for her own purpose. "She shall keep it until the time of the robe-giving" means until the invitation ceremony, which is ten days of the robe-giving period. "Beyond that" means more than that. "It entails a forfeiture-transgression" is as before.

Now how does a transgression arise in this regard? If a nun distributes within the rains period any gain whatsoever accrued during the rains period, or if she keeps it beyond the invitation ceremony, in all cases it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. However, if a nun has been appointed to store robes, there is no transgression. The seventeenth forfeiture-transgression is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of Ānanda, established the training rule regarding turning property of the Saṅgha into one's personal possession, the twelve groups of nuns, having taken gains received on behalf of the Saṅgha and converting them to personal use, were censuring those nuns who had fewer gains. In that instance, the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this matter having arisen," proceeded to establish the training rule.

Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly takes for personal possession a gain that has been offered to the Saṅgha incurs a forfeiture-transgression.

"Whatever nun" means the twelve groups. "Knowingly" means it has been said either by herself or by another. "Of the Saṅgha" means the Saṅgha of the śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. "Gain" means the two kinds of gain: gain of robes and gain of food; in this context it is understood to mean gain of robes. "That has been offered" means that has been given. "Takes for personal possession" means makes it her own. "It entails a forfeiture-transgression" is as before.

Now how does a transgression arise in this regard? As long as a nun who knowingly diverts a gain offered to the Saṅgha to a different individual has not yet personally appropriated the gain, it is a misdeed. When she personally appropriates it, it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. If a nun resides in different Saṅgha communities separately, and she diverts a gain offered to one community to the other community, as long as she has not personally appropriated the gain it is a misdeed. When she personally appropriates it, it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, if she diverts what was offered to the monks' Saṅgha to the nuns' Saṅgha, it is also as before.

Likewise, if she diverts to one Saṅgha community a gain that was offered to both Saṅgha communities together, it is a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, if she diverts to both Saṅgha communities together a gain that was offered to one Saṅgha community, it is also a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, the same applies beginning from the place designated for flowers at shrines, up to the place for the ceremonial vessel, as well as to the various gate sections and the like. Similarly, if she diverts to a bathhouse what was offered to a rest hall, and the same applies to a hearth room, to the Saṅgha's pleasure grove, to pillars, to beams, and to the ground itself — all of these are to be stated in the same way. Even if what was offered for one meal is diverted to a different meal, it is a misdeed. If, however, what was sought is not found, or if permission is granted, there is no fault. The twenty-eighth forfeiture-transgression is complete.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the fourteenth fascicle. The narrative setting is Rājagṛha. At the time when the Blessed One, while residing together with the son of Pilindavatsa and in reliance upon the personal attendants, established the rule of training concerning medicines common to both communities, the twelve groups of nuns received and ate those medicines, received them hastily, mixed what they had each received together with one another, combined them with powdered food until the portions could no longer be distinguished, and ate them both at proper times and at improper times. The nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with the words "This occurrence" and proceeding through to the establishment of the rule of training, acted as follows. Furthermore, the Blessed One permitted the following medicines to be individually used by sick nuns as appropriate for their respective conditions: ghee, sesame oil, honey, and the froth of molasses. A sick nun may use these by means of consecrated stored-goods for a period extending to the seventh day at most. If she uses them beyond that, it is a forfeiture-transgression.

Now, the phrase "the Blessed One" means the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha. The phrase "for sick nuns" means for those who are ill. The phrase "appropriate" means what is suitable. The phrase "for individual use" — meaning fitting medicines — includes the following: "ghee" means clarified butter; "sesame oil" means sesame oil itself; "honey" means that of bees; "the froth of molasses" means molasses. The phrase "to the end of seven days" means for seven days. The phrase "by means of consecrated stored-goods" means having been ritually consecrated. The phrase "for individual use" means to be consumed. The phrase "beyond that" means in excess of that. The phrase "it is a forfeiture-transgression" is as before.

Now, how does a transgression arise in this case? If a nun on the first day of the fortnight finds a medicinal substance for the sick, she should within seven days either consecrate it, give it away, or use it. If she neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor uses it, then when the dawn of the eighth day breaks, it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, as stated for the first day, the same is to be stated identically for each subsequent day up through the sixth day, just as before. If a nun finds a medicinal substance for the sick on the first day, and then on the second day finds another, she should either consecrate the earlier one, give it away, or use the later one, or consecrate the later one, or use the earlier one. If she neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor uses it, then when the dawn of the eighth day breaks, it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, the case of finding two on the second day of the fortnight, and again finding two on the second day, is to be stated in full up through the sixth and seventh days. The full statement up through "a nun finds many medicinal substances for the sick on the first day of the fortnight" is also to be given in detail. Likewise, the case of finding many on the first day of the fortnight and finding others again on the second day is to be stated in full up to that point.

Now, whatever medicinal substances received from those sick persons have been mixed together with one another and have been mixed with food powder and minced — those are to be given to the novices of another monastery. Whatever medicinal substances received from those sick persons have not been mixed together with one another and have not been mixed with food powder and have not been minced — those are to be given to those who live the holy life, saying: "This medicinal substance has been held for one day; I will use it for six days." And so on in the same way, down to one day remaining.

If a nun has found a medicinal substance for the sick, and without having relinquished it, separated herself from it, or confessed the transgression, she finds another — that too becomes a forfeiture-transgression through the fault of the earlier one. Likewise, if she has relinquished it but has not separated herself from it and has not confessed the transgression, that too becomes a forfeiture-transgression. Likewise, if she has separated herself from it but has not confessed the transgression, that too becomes a forfeiture-transgression. If she has relinquished it, separated herself from it, and confessed the transgression, and then uses it, there is no transgression. And for those acting for the first time and so forth, there is no transgression. The nineteenth forfeiture-transgression is complete.

The background narrative takes place at Śrāvastī. At that time the group of twelve were finding bowls in excess and accumulating what they found, neither using them themselves, nor distributing them to the nuns who were present, nor giving them even to those who begged. When nuns who were content with little reproached them for this, those nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurred," established the training rule up to that point: a nun may keep an extra bowl for at most one day. If she keeps it beyond that, it becomes a forfeiture-transgression.

"One day" means one full day. "Nun" means a member of the group of twelve, or another who is similarly situated. "An extra bowl" means one beyond what has been consecrated. "If she keeps it beyond that" means more than that limit. "It becomes a forfeiture-transgression" is as before.

How does the transgression arise? If a nun keeps an extra bowl for more than one day, in every case it becomes a forfeiture-transgression. If she keeps a plain, unconsecrated bowl, there is no transgression. The twentieth forfeiture-transgression is complete.

The background narrative takes place at Śrāvastī. At that time a certain householder living in Śrāvastī took a wife of equal social standing, played with her as was fitting, and eventually she gave birth to a son, whom he named Kāmaka. Since desires are like salt water — never satisfying — he continued in his pleasures, and she gave birth to a daughter, whom he named Kāmikā. Then at another time the householder passed away. When the householder died, his wife, together with her two daughters and one son, went forth into renunciation.

Then the young monk Dunpa went from the monks' monastery to the nuns' monastery to visit his mother. He was wearing a robe dyed with fresh color, turned to a reddish-gold hue. When he arrived, his sister asked him: "Brother, whose robe is this?" He said, "It is mine." She said, "Please give it to me," but he did not give it, and she began to cry. Their mother asked, "Daughter, why are you crying?" She said, "I asked my brother for his robe and he would not give it to me." Then the mother said to the young monk Dunpa, "Son, give your sister the robe." He replied, "Would that not constitute some kind of transgression?" She said, "There is nothing wrong with it." So Dunpa gave the robe to his sister Dunma, and Dunma in turn gave her own robe to Dunpa.

Before many days had passed, Dunma had made the robe dirty. Dunpa, for his part, had washed his robe well and cared for it properly, and then he came again to visit his mother. Dunma said to her brother, "Brother, whose robe is this?" He replied, "Well, it was once yours — but it is now mine." She said, "Take this robe of mine in exchange and give me back my own robe." He did not give it. She then appealed to their mother, who said, "Son, give it to her." And he did.

Later the nuns said to the nun Dunma, "Your robe is always being washed and well cared for, so it looks as clean as a new residence." She then told the nuns what had occurred. The nuns said to her, "Why do you make a practice of exchanging robes with a leading member of a community of men?" She replied, "Whether it was proper to exchange or not, I exchanged it." Those nuns who were of few desires proceeded to rebuke her. Those nuns then told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One — and so the rule was established. "Whatever nun exchanges robes with a monk and then afterward says, 'Noble one, take this noble robe of yours and return my robe to me' — that is a forfeiture-transgression."

In this rule, "whatever nun" refers to Dunma, and "monk" refers to Dunpa. "Exchanges robes" refers to any one of the seven types. "Forfeiture-transgression" is as stated above. As for how the transgression occurs: however much and to whatever extent a nun engages in exchanging robes with a monk, it constitutes a forfeiture-transgression in every case.

The twenty-first forfeiture-transgression is complete.

The background narrative takes place at Śrāvastī. At that time the nun Bhomgamo, together with the nuns' Saṅgha, had just performed the spreading of the reed mat on the last day of the autumn month, and immediately said to the nuns: "Sisters, take up the reed mats — come here. Many achievements and much wellbeing will arise from taking up the reed mats." They replied, "We do not take up the reed mats at an improper time." She said, "If she is learned in the three baskets of scripture, surely she knows what the proper time is for taking up the reed mats, does she not?"

She did not listen to the words of those nuns and, at an improper time, took out the reed mats and divided the gains. Those nuns then took up their five robes and went wandering through the districts. The other nuns asked them: "Noble ones, did you complete the spreading of the reed mats?" They replied: "We ourselves did not know, but the noble Bhomgamo said, 'Since I am learned in the three baskets of scripture, I know the proper time for taking out the reed mats.'" The other nuns said, "And did you take out the reed mats?" When they replied that they had, those nuns of few desires began to criticize them. Those nuns then told the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. And so the training rule was established: Any nun who takes out the reed mats at an improper time incurs an offense of abandonment.

Now, "any nun" refers to Bhomgamo. "An improper time" — what is the proper time and what is the improper time for spreading the reed mats? From the last month of autumn through to the first month of spring is the proper time for spreading the reed mats. If the mats are taken out within that period, it counts as taking them out at an improper time. How does the transgression arise? Whenever a nun takes out those reed mats at an improper time, in every case it becomes an offense of abandonment. If, however, it is because thieves have taken the mats away, there is no transgression.

This concludes the twenty-second offense of abandonment.

The background narrative takes place at Śrāvastī. At that time Bhomgamo did not take out the reed mats at the proper time for doing so. The nuns said to her: "Noble one, the time has come to take out the reed mats — why do you not take them out?" She replied: "Since I am learned in the three baskets of scripture, I know the proper time for taking out the reed mats." Those nuns then passed the proper time for the reed mats and went wandering through the districts wearing their outer and lower robes. The other nuns asked them: "Sisters, why do you go wandering through the districts with your outer and lower robes on, having passed the time for taking out the reed mats?" They replied: "The noble Bhomgamo said she is learned in the three baskets of scripture — and yet she still has not taken out the reed mats." At that, the nuns of few desires began to criticize them. And so the training rule was established: Any nun who does not take out the reed mats at the proper time incurs an offense of abandonment.

Now, "any nun" again refers to Bhomgamo. "At the proper time" means taking out the reed mats on the fifteenth day of the first month of spring. "Incurs an offense of abandonment" is as explained above. How does the transgression arise? To whatever extent a nun fails to take out the reed mats at the proper time, in every case it becomes an offense of abandonment.

This concludes the twenty-third offense of abandonment.

Summary verse:

The first concerns what is openly marked, then each one individually,
And that which is repeatedly released,
Gaining other goods in place of robes,
And lodging, and the summer dwelling,
And gaining things for the sake of many people,
And soliciting on behalf of the Saṅgha,
And the heavy one of great value,
And the light one — that is the last.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove of Prince Jeta, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was a goldsmith in Śrāvastī who took a wife from an equal family.

Then the husband, wishing to be intimate with his new bride, placed a gold earring there and went to sit apart. Now, Bhomā Gāmo went in the morning, having put on her under-robe and taken up her alms-bowl and outer robe, and came to the house where the goldsmith dwelt. On arriving, she wished the bride good health, and then spoke these words: "O lady of good features, please give alms." The bride brought out some flour, and when Bhomā Gāmo saw the flour she said: "It is not right that I should take flour from you before anyone else. The ignorant woman then showed the gold earring and said, 'Then give me this.'" The bride said neither "Take it" nor "Do not take it," and so she took it and departed.

Then that man did not find the gold earring. Not finding it, he set upon the bride and began to beat her. Those who stood around on either side said: "You have no complaint and no grievance — why do you beat this blameless woman with a stick? Has the nun perhaps taken the gold earring and gone?" Thereupon the goldsmith ran to where Bhomā Gāmo was. Now she too was skilled in distinguishing the footsteps of men and women, and so, startled, she put the gold earring in her mouth. When the man came close to her, Bhomā Gāmo spoke to him thus: "Son of Zanmo, do you not know that the king has granted her the status of a queen's consort? Do not touch her with your hand." He said, "You evil-headed woman," and then thrust his fist against her so that blood came from her mouth, beat her several times, and struck her again.

She came to the rainy-season dwelling with her eyes swollen, and the nuns there asked her: "Noble one, what has happened to you?" She, being angry, said: "Are you satisfied by others' misfortune?" Then she recounted the whole matter in detail to the nuns. From the point where "those nuns with few concerns began to reproach her" to the point where the matter was reported to the Blessed One, and then from where "the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence" to the point where "he laid down the training rule" — all of this proceeds as before.

And now: whatever nun solicits something openly marked is guilty of an offense of abandonment.

As to "whatever nun" — this means Bhomā Gāmo or any other who is similar to her. As to "solicits something openly marked" — this means gold or silver. As to "is guilty of an offense of abandonment" — this is as described above.

Now, how does the transgression arise in this case? Whatever nun solicits something openly marked for her own sake is guilty of an offense of abandonment. If she solicits gold, she is guilty of an offense of abandonment. And if any nun solicits whatever else is not permitted, that too is an offense of abandonment.

The twenty-fourth offense of abandonment is complete.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove of Prince Jeta, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time Bhomā Gāmo was teaching pleasing and beautiful Dharma discourses to the wives of many householders in Śrāvastī. At that time the five Dharma robes of Bhomā Gāmo were worn out and her patched outer robe was threadbare. The wives of the householders then said to her: "Noble one, if you can teach the Dharma so well, why do you wander about with five old robes?" She replied: "Is it that, as with you, there are those who work on her behalf — husband and sons? Who is there to give to a nun?" At that they showed her their threads, saying: "We offer these threads of ours for weaving into cloth for the noble one's sake, and we present them to her." And she spoke as follows:

"Since you do not know how to make a nun's robe, she will weave it herself." With those words she took the thread and went to where a merchant's man was, and when she arrived she said to the merchant's man: "Good sir, for how much will you buy this thread, and for how much will you sell it?" He replied: "I will buy it for such-and-such a price and sell it for such-and-such a price." She then said: "Take this thread and give her the price for it." The merchant's man gave the price of the thread in kārṣāpaṇas.

Bhomā Gāmo then went to the summer quarters and, with those kārṣāpaṇas, had various food dishes prepared — dishes tossed together, well-tossed dishes, dishes garnished with fruit, dishes with a coating of oil, dishes with a coating of fruit, dishes of a hundred layers, and dishes with filled interiors. In this way she had eighteen and twenty kinds of food dishes prepared, and she consumed those kārṣāpaṇas in many fewer days than might be expected. After eating, she went again to the wives of the householders, and the wives of the householders said to Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, has the robe been woven?" She replied: "There is still the matter of the weaver's fee." They gave her the weaver's fee as well, and she ate that too. In the same way she also ate the fees for the fulling and for the dyeing.

Then the wives of the householders said to Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, why have you not yet sewn the robe?" She replied: "Rejoice!" They said: "Noble one, what have you done?" She said: "I have hidden it as a treasure." They said: "We, for our part, hide things as treasure for our children and our husbands. But you, noble one, are alone, like a munditā and like a cypress — for whose sake have you hidden a treasure?" She replied: "Do you think I dug a hole in the ground and buried a treasure? Rather, she made eighteen and twenty kinds of food dishes and tossed them from the hollow of her hand into her stomach, and from the stomach cast them down into the earth of the belly." They then said: "Noble one, we have children and we manage a household, yet even we do not desire food of this sort. Why is it that you, who have gone forth into homelessness, should enjoy food of such a kind?" At that she said: "This girl is a very young daughter of the Śākya clan who has mastered the three baskets of scripture, and she cannot survive on poor food." When the nuns heard this, the nuns proceeded to censure her — and so on up to the establishing of the training rule.

"Furthermore, whatever nun uses gains from robes belonging to others to dedicate to her own mouth — that is an offense requiring abandonment."

Now, "whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo or another who is similar to her. "Others" refers to other items. "Robe" refers to any of the seven kinds. "To her own mouth" means swallowing it into her stomach. "An offense requiring abandonment" is as stated above.

As for how a transgression arises in this case: however much gain from robes a nun dedicates to the mouth, it all becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

The twenty-fifth offense requiring abandonment is complete.

The setting is in Śrāvastī.

At that time Bhomā Gāmo became attached to a young perfume-seller, and she went to his shop and spoke as follows:

"Good-looking one, tie up a bundle of window-lattice strips." Just as she had entered into the tying, he said: "No, no — tie a bundle of long pepper. No, no — tie a bundle of cardamom. The woman is forgetful — tie a bundle of sugar. No, no — tie a bundle of fennel. No, no — tie a bundle of coarse cloth remnants." At the moment when she was undoing one thing and tying another, the young perfume-seller became angry and struck her with the bundle. Having struck her, he said these words: "You wretched scratcher of heads!" Then a nun who had been following along behind said to her: "Can your ability well demonstrate the three baskets of the Canon? Or does he think you a fool who has forgotten? Well, all the same, she takes the words as her own." He then said: "If one is struck by attachment and does not cry out, and does not burn like dry wood that has caught fire, that is truly astonishing." When this was said, the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, and so forth up to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having tied a bundle and then repeatedly caused it to be untied, commits an offense requiring abandonment. Furthermore, whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "Having tied a bundle and tied it" means the bundle itself. "Having repeatedly caused it to be untied" means different occasions. "Commits an offense requiring abandonment" is as stated above. As for how a transgression arises in this case: however much a nun, with even slight attachment, ties and unties a bundle, all of it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

The twenty-sixth offense requiring abandonment is complete.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. Then Bhomā Gāmo, in the morning, put on her lower robe, took her alms-bowl and Dharma-robe, and went to the palace of Queen Mālinī. Queen Mālinī, from a considerable distance, saw Bhomā Gāmo coming. Seeing her, she had a seat prepared. Then Bhomā Gāmo sat down on the seat that had been arranged and, having sat, taught Dharma sweetly and pleasingly to Queen Mālinī. At that time the lower portion of Bhomā Gāmo's Dharma-robe was worn and the patched section was also threadbare. Then Queen Mālinī said these words to the nun Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, your Dharma-robies are worn out." She replied: "Your Majesty, do you mock me for my great belly? Or does she possess the wealth of Kāśī and Kośala? Moreover, Your Majesty, women are of meager gain." Then Queen Mālinī said these words to the nun Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, I will offer you five Dharma-robies." She replied: "You do not know how to sew nuns' Dharma-robies, but I myself will sew them." She then gave her large bolts of precious cloth as the material for five Dharma-robies. She took them, went to a merchant, and sold them, and so forth up to: she made eighteen sorts of food and twenty kinds of food, ate them, and went again, and so forth up to: she also ate the wages for dyeing and the wages for tailoring. Then Queen Mālinī said these words to Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, why have you not worn those Dharma-robies?" She replied: "Your Majesty, I have kept them hidden as a store — please rejoice in it." Then Queen Mālinī said these words to Bhomā Gāmo: "Though her wealth may be that of Kāśī and Kośala, still she would not use it as a store," and so forth, together with the eighteenth and the twentieth, making eighteen and twenty kinds of food, eating them, and so forth up to: "I am a master of the Three Baskets." This is the conclusion of the section on monks and nuns of few concerns rebuking her, leading up to the laying down of a training rule.

Furthermore, whatever nun, for the sake of robes, consecrates other acquired goods to her own mouth, incurs a forfeitable transgression.

The phrase "whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "Other goods" means goods that had been dedicated to another purpose. "Gains relating to robes" means any one of the seven kinds. "To the mouth" means to swallow in secret. "Incurs a forfeitable transgression" is as above.

As to how the transgression arises: to whatever extent a nun consecrates other acquired goods to her mouth, she incurs a forfeitable transgression in every case.

This completes the twenty-seventh forfeitable transgression.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time, the bed and furnishings of Bhomā Gāmo's rain-retreat dwelling had become worn and broken. The wives of brahmins and householders said to her: "Why have you not repaired the worn and broken furnishings?" She replied: "Does she have sons and household servants to do it for her?" They gave her many kārṣāpaṇas for the repair of the furnishings. And she made the eighteen and twenty kinds of food and ate them, and so forth to that point.

Again, having seen the worn and broken furnishings, and so forth up to where she said: "She is a master of the Three Baskets," the monks and nuns of few concerns rebuked her, and so forth up to the laying down of a training rule.

Furthermore, whatever nun consecrates gains from the rain-retreat dwelling to the eating of her own mouth, incurs a forfeitable transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "Gains from the dwelling" means the canopy, the hanging of curtains, or the hire thereof. "Incurs a forfeitable transgression" is as above.

As to how the transgression arises: to whatever extent a nun consecrates even a little of the gains from the rain-retreat dwelling to the mouth, she incurs a forfeitable transgression.

This completes the twenty-eighth forfeitable transgression.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time, on the eighth and fifteenth days, very many wives of householders came to the rain-retreat dwelling to hear the Dharma, and that night rain fell, and all the rain-retreat dwellings began to drip. Then those wives of householders said these words to Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, why have you not repaired the rain-retreat dwelling?" She replied: "Does she have sons and household servants in her house?" They gave her kārṣāpaṇas for the repair of the rain-retreat dwelling, and she made the eighteen and twenty kinds of food and ate them, and so forth up to: again, having seen the dripping, and so forth to that point.

They said: "Noble one, have you not repaired the rain-retreat dwelling?" and so forth up to where she said: "She is a master of the Three Baskets." The monks and nuns of few concerns rebuked her, and the Blessed One declared — and so forth up to the laying down of a training rule:

Furthermore, whatever nun consecrates gains obtained for repairing the rain-retreat dwelling to the eating of her own mouth, incurs a forfeitable transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "Rain-retreat dwelling" means the temple.

"Gains" refers to gold, silver, or anything else whatsoever. "Incurs a forfeitable transgression" is as above. How does the transgression arise? To whatever small extent a nun consecrates gains obtained for repairing the rain-retreat dwelling to the eating of her own mouth, she incurs a forfeitable transgression. The twenty-ninth forfeitable transgression is complete.

The context for the following rule is Śrāvastī. At that time a great many nuns arrived at Śrāvastī from a certain region, and on their behalf the wives of brahmins and householders presented many gains. Those wives said: "Noble one, please keep them in trust." The nun replied: "Add to them again and again, a little at a time." The wives gave again and again, and then they said: "Noble one, the time has come to hold what has been kept in trust." She replied: "The time for eating has not yet arrived." When those nuns departed for their own regions, she took from those gains and made categories of the eighteenth through the twentieth portions and ate them — and so forth up to: "She is a master of the Three Baskets." The nuns of few concerns rebuked her, the Blessed One declared — and so forth up to the laying down of a training rule:

Furthermore, whatever nun collects gains on behalf of nuns who have arrived suddenly and eats them alone incurs a forfeitable transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "Nuns who have arrived suddenly" means the female śrāvaka disciples of the Blessed One. As for "gains," gains are of two kinds: gains in the form of food, and gains in the form of robes. In this context, gains in the form of food are intended. "Incurs a forfeitable transgression" is as above. How does the transgression arise? To whatever extent a nun eats alone gains that exist on behalf of nuns who have arrived suddenly, she incurs a forfeitable transgression in every such case. The thirtieth forfeitable transgression is complete.

The context for the following rule is Śrāvastī. Then, when nun Bhomā Gāmo was properly soliciting food gains on behalf of the community of nuns, the wives of brahmins and householders said to Bhomā Gāmo: "Noble one, why do you not seek gains in food for the community of nuns? Take these repeatedly, a little at a time." Having taken them repeatedly alone, and having stirred them properly and well — from the categories of the eighteenth through the twentieth portions — she ate them, and so forth up to: "Rejoice in it!" and "She is a master of the Three Baskets." The nuns of few concerns rebuked her — and so forth up to where the Blessed One laid down a training rule:

Furthermore, whatever nun collects gains on behalf of the Saṅgha and consecrates them for eating by her own mouth incurs a forfeitable transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Bhomā Gāmo. "On behalf of the community of nuns" means on behalf of the community of nuns who are female śrāvaka disciples of the Tathāgata. As for "gains," gains are of two kinds: gains in the form of food and gains in the form of robes. In this context, gains in the form of food are intended. "Collects" means from another party. "For eating by her own mouth" means for her own mouth's eating. "Consecrates" means swallowing it secretly. "Incurs a forfeitable transgression" is as above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? However much of the community of nuns' gains a nun consecrates for eating by her own mouth — in every case, that constitutes a forfeitable transgression.

The thirty-first forfeitable transgression is complete.

The origin narrative takes place in Śrāvastī. At that time, the king of the Licchavis had sent a precious woolen garment as a gift to King Prasenajit, and he gave it to his soldiers whose noble rank had declined. They in turn gave that precious woolen garment to Dharmadattā, saying, "The Teacher of the Dharma is our spiritual friend." She then draped the precious woolen garment over the rail of her robe-stand and set it there. Nandapriyā, having entered the dwelling, saw it and asked Dharmadattā, "Noble one, whose is this precious woolen garment?" She replied, "It is hers," meaning her own. Then Nandapriyā said: "The Blessed One has declared: 'Merit is something to be done; without merit made, suffering comes. In this world and the next, one who has made merit will rejoice.' This teaching has arrived right on time — through the merit you have made, you have come to be honored by gods and humans." Then Dharmadattā said to Nandapriyā, "If you wish, take it." She replied, "This has defeated a god," and with that, she took the precious woolen garment, divided it, draped each piece over her two arms, and wandered along the main roads and byways. When brahmins and householders saw her, they said: "Who is this? Is she the wife of some wealthy man, or of a merchant, or of a caravan leader?" Others said, "It is Nandapriyā." Those who looked and understood then said: "The wives of brahmins and householders wear heavy and costly garments — and these female renunciants, daughters of the Śākya, also wear heavy and costly garments. What difference is there? What distinction of intention is there? What difference can be made?" And they criticized her, jeered at her, and gossiped about her.

In that connection, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," called Nandapriyā to account: "Nun, is it true that you did something so unbecoming?" "Blessed One, it is so." The buddha, the Blessed One, rebuked Nandapriyā, saying, "That which is contrary to the way of a female renunciant, inappropriate, and unbecoming — such a thing is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Then the Blessed One rebuked her in many ways, and addressed both communities of the Saṅgha: "Monks, a woman is like food: even when there are no fine garments, she is something desirable — how much more so when she is dressed in fine garments!" The Blessed One then reflected: "All the faults and misfortunes that have arisen have come from possessing heavy and costly garments," and so the Blessed One declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun possesses a heavy and costly garment incurs a forfeitable transgression."

"Whatever nun" refers to Nandapriyā. "Heavy" means a winter garment. "Costly" means worth twenty kārṣāpaṇas, or the worth exceeding twenty-five.

"Possesses" means wears. "Forfeitable transgression" is as above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? However much a nun wears a heavy and costly garment — in every case, that constitutes a forfeitable transgression.

The thirty-second forfeitable transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time, the king of the country of Kāśī sent a precious silk garment as a gift to King Prasenajit. He in turn gave it to certain soldiers of the warrior caste who had fallen on hard times. They then gave it to Dharmadattā, saying, "She is our good spiritual friend." She accepted it and folded it away in a bundle of Dharma-robcs. When Śīronandinī entered the dwelling and saw it, she said: "Noble one, Dharmadattā, whose is this?" Dharmadattā replied, "It belongs to her." Then Śīronandinī said to Dharmadattā, "You have accumulated merit and are honored by gods and humans alike; you possess a spring garment just like this." Dharmadattā replied, "If you wish, take it." And so Śīronandinī said, "I have no desire to be the ruin of a goddess." Then Dharmadattā gave the silk to Śīronandinī. She put it on, and when she entered the marketplace wearing it, even though it covered her body, she appeared as though she were naked. Then brahmins and householders, seeing Śīronandinī approaching from a considerable distance, said, "Who is this — the daughter of a wealthy man, a merchant, or a caravan leader coming our way?" Others said, "It is the nun Śīronandinī." They looked at her and said, "This wearing of silk is altogether unbecoming for nuns," and they criticized her, made jeering gestures, and spoke ill of her. At that juncture, nuns of few desires criticized her conduct. The nuns then told the monks in full, and the monks informed the Blessed One.

The Blessed One thereupon convened the assembly of both communities of the Saṅgha, so that this occurrence, this origin of the rule, and this occasion would be known by my female śrāvaka disciples, and so that I might properly establish a training rule. The blessed buddhas ask while knowing, not while unknowing — and so, knowing, he asked: "Nun, is it true that you have done something so unbecoming?" She said: "Reverend One, I have." The Blessed One rebuked her, saying to the nuns, "Nuns, a woman who is even well clothed is unbecoming — how much more so when she is not clothed at all?" Having rebuked her in many ways, the Blessed One then spoke to the nuns:

"Nuns, having seen ten genuine benefits, I institute training rules in the Vinaya for the śrāvakas — namely, for the proper unifying of the Saṅgha," and so forth up to "so that it may be rightly and well proclaimed among gods and humans."

And my female śrāvaka disciples shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: "Furthermore, whatever nun wears a precious and costly garment incurs a forfeitable transgression."

"Whatever nun" refers to Śironandinī. "Garment" refers to silk. "Precious and costly" means worth twenty kārṣāpaṇas, or worth twenty-five kārṣāpaṇas. "Forfeitable transgression" is as above.

Now, how does the transgression arise? If a nun wears silk — a forfeitable transgression. If she wears something variegated or something thin, in every case it constitutes a forfeitable transgression. For one who acts for the first time and the like, there is no transgression.

The thirty-third forfeitable transgression is complete.

The forfeitable transgressions of the Vinaya Analysis for Nuns are complete.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns. The fifteenth fascicle.

Now the transgressions proper are to be set forth. The summary verse is:

With full knowledge; and seed;
likewise the act of carrying;
striking the palms; with deliberate intent;
theft; and the great storehouse.

The summary verse:

Knowingly drawing out a fault;
slander; and expressions of weariness;
teaching Dharma to a man;
and nullifying a pleasant training.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana) of Anāthapiṇḍada in Śrāvastī, the city of King Prasenajit. At that time, the groups of twelve nuns knowingly told lies to other nuns so as to elevate themselves, and they spoke disparagingly of nuns who were few in wants. The matter was reported to the Blessed One, and then the Blessed One, proceeding from the account of what had occurred and continuing through the establishing of the training, ordained: "To speak a deliberate lie is a transgression."

"Deliberately" means after having examined the matter. As for the phrase "to speak a lie," there are lies of eight kinds; there are lies of seven kinds; there are lies of six kinds; there are lies of five kinds; there are lies of four kinds; there are lies of three kinds; and there are lies of two kinds.

What are the eight kinds of lies? A groundless accusation of a root defeat; an accusation deserving a formal act of the Saṅgha; a transgression; a transgression requiring individual confession; a fault; a groundless accusation of having seen; of having heard; and of having suspected. These are the eight kinds of lies.

What are the seven kinds of lies? A groundless accusation of impaired moral discipline; of an impaired view; of an impaired ritual conduct; of an impaired livelihood; a groundless accusation of having seen; of having heard; and of having suspected. These are the seven kinds of lies.

What are the six kinds of lies? A nun who intends to speak falsely thinks, "I will speak a lie"; she thinks, "I am speaking a lie"; she thinks, "I have spoken a lie"; a groundless accusation of having seen; of having heard; and of having suspected. These are the six kinds of lies.

What are the five kinds of lies? A groundless accusation of a root defeat; an accusation deserving a formal act of the Saṅgha; a transgression; a transgression requiring individual confession; and a fault. These are the five kinds of lies.

What are the four kinds of lies? A groundless accusation of impaired moral discipline; of an impaired view; of an impaired ritual conduct; and of an impaired livelihood. These are the four kinds of lies.

What are the three kinds of lies? A groundless accusation of having seen; of having heard; and of having suspected. These are the three kinds of lies.

There are also another three kinds of lies: when intending to speak falsely, one thinks, "I will speak a lie"; while speaking, one thinks, "I am speaking a lie"; and having spoken, one thinks, "I have spoken a lie." These are those three kinds of lies.

What are the two kinds of lies? While speaking falsely, one thinks, "I am speaking a lie"; and having spoken falsely, one thinks, "I have spoken a lie." These are the two kinds of lies.

There is no single solitary kind of lie standing alone. There are lies that result in a root defeat; there are lies that result in a formal act of the Saṅgha; and there are lies that result in a coarse transgression.

There are lies that result in a transgression, and there are lies that result in a serious wrong.

What is a lie that results in a root defeat? It is this: when a nun falsely claims superhuman qualities that she does not possess. This is a lie that results in a root defeat.

What is a lie that results in a formal act of the Saṅgha? It is this: when a nun, without any basis, accuses a pure nun of an offense entailing a root defeat. This is a lie that results in a formal act of the Saṅgha.

What is a lie that results in a coarse transgression? It is this: when a nun deliberately teaches within the Saṅgha that what is not Dharma is Dharma, that what is Dharma is not Dharma, that what is not Vinaya is Vinaya, and that what is Vinaya is not Vinaya. This is a lie that results in a coarse transgression.

What is a lie that results in a transgression? It is this: when a nun, knowing it to be false, speaks a lie before the assembly of the twelve classes of nuns and thereby satisfies them. This is a lie that results in a transgression.

What is a lie that results in a serious wrong? It is this: when, during the restoration ceremony on the fifteenth day, the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited and the question is asked, "Is the assembly pure in this matter?"— and a nun who is not pure remains silent and consents by saying nothing. This is a lie that results in a serious wrong. Apart from these four types, all other lies fall into the category of transgressions.

The term "transgression" means that one is burned, scorched, and cast down into the hells, the animal realm, the hungry ghosts, and the wretched realms of miserable rebirth. Now, how does one incur a transgression?

The summary verse:

Not having forgotten, and with doubt, and perception combined with four kinds — these are joined.

When one has not seen, not heard, not understood, and not cognized something, yet one alters one's perception, conviction, desire, reasoning, thought, and view, and says, "I have seen it, I have heard it, I have understood it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something but has forgotten it, or when one has heard, understood, or cognized something but has forgotten it, and then alters one's perception, conviction, desire, reasoning, thought, and view, and says, "I have seen it and have not forgotten; I have heard it, understood it, and cognized it and have not forgotten" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something oneself but is doubtful about it, or when one has heard, understood, or cognized something oneself but is doubtful about it, and then alters one's perception, conviction, desire, reasoning, thought, and view, and says, "I have seen it and am not doubtful; I have understood it, I have cognized it, and am not doubtful" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something but perceives it as not having seen it, or when one has heard, understood, or cognized something but perceives it as not having cognized it, and then alters one's perception, conviction, desire, reasoning, thought, and view, and says, "I have not seen it; she has not heard it; she has not understood it; she has not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has not seen something, yet from having heard, understood, and cognized it — altering one's perception and so forth — if one says, "I have not seen it, I have not heard it, I have not understood it, I have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has not heard something, yet from having seen, understood, and cognized it — altering one's perception and so forth — if one says, "I have heard it but not seen it; I have not discerned it; I have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has not understood something —

Although one has not understood something, yet from having seen, heard, and cognized it — altering one's perception and so forth — if one says, "I have understood it but have not heard it, I have not discerned it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has seen something and not forgotten it, and has heard, discerned, and cognized it and not forgotten it — yet altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I saw it and then forgot it; she heard it, discerned it, and cognized it and then forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has heard something and forgotten it, and has seen, discerned, and cognized it and forgotten it — yet altering one's account from that basis — if one says, "I heard it and did not forget it; I saw it, discerned it, and cognized it and did not forget it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has discerned something and not forgotten it, and has seen, heard, and cognized it and not forgotten it — yet altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I discerned it and then forgot it; I saw it, discerned it, and cognized it and then forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one has cognized something and not forgotten it, and has seen, heard, and discerned it and not forgotten it — yet altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I cognized it and then forgot it; she saw it, heard it, and discerned it and then forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one saw something and was uncertain about it, and was uncertain about having heard, discerned, and cognized it — yet altering one's account from that basis — if one says, "I saw it and am not uncertain; she heard it, discerned it, and cognized it and is not uncertain" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one heard something and was uncertain about it, and was uncertain about having seen, discerned, and cognized it — yet altering one's account from that basis — if one says, "I heard it and am not uncertain; she saw it, discerned it, and cognized it and is not uncertain" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one discerned something and was uncertain about it, and was uncertain about having seen, heard, and cognized it — yet altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I discerned it and am not uncertain; she saw it, heard it, and cognized it and is not uncertain" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Although one cognized something and was uncertain about it, and was uncertain about having seen, heard, and discerned it — yet altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I cognized it and am not uncertain; she saw it, heard it, and discerned it and is not uncertain" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives what one has seen as not having been seen, yet perceives what one has heard, discerned, and cognized as having been cognized — altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I have seen it but have not heard it, have not discerned it, and have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives what one has heard as not having been heard, yet perceives what one has seen, discerned, and cognized as having been cognized — altering one's account from that basis — if one says, "I have heard it but have not seen it, have not discerned it, and have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives what one has discerned as not having been discerned, yet perceives what one has seen, heard, and cognized as having been cognized — altering one's account from that basis — if one says, "She has discerned it but has not seen it, has not heard it, and has not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives what one has cognized as not having been cognized, yet perceives what one has seen, heard, and discerned as having been discerned — altering one's perception from that basis — if one says, "I have cognized it but have not seen it, have not heard it" — — "I have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen, heard, discerned, and cognized something, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I have not seen it, I have not heard it, I have not contacted it, I have not cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something and not forgotten it, and has heard, discerned, and cognized something and not forgotten it, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I saw it and forgot it; I heard it and forgot it; I discerned it and forgot it; I cognized it and forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something and does not doubt it, and has heard, discerned, and cognized something and does not doubt it, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I saw it but now doubt it; I heard, discerned, and cognized it but now doubt it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives what one has seen as having been seen, and perceives what one has heard, discerned, and cognized as having been cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I have seen it, I have not heard it, I have not discerned it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has indeed seen something but has not heard it, not discerned it, and not cognized it, and from that basis one alters one's perception — and says, "I have not seen it, yet I have heard it, I have discerned it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has indeed heard something but has not seen it, not discerned it, and not cognized it, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I have not heard it, yet I have seen it, I have discerned it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has indeed discerned something but has not seen it, not heard it, and not cognized it, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I have not discerned it, yet I have seen it, I have heard it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has indeed cognized something but has not seen it, not heard it, and not discerned it, and from that basis one alters — and says, "I have not cognized it, yet I have seen it, I have heard it, I have discerned it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has seen something and not forgotten it, yet has forgotten what one has heard, discerned, and cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I have not seen it, yet I have heard it, I have discerned it, I have cognized it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has not forgotten what one has seen, not forgotten what one has heard, not forgotten what one has discerned, and not forgotten what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I saw it and forgot it; I heard it and forgot it; I discerned it and forgot it; I cognized it and forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has not forgotten what one has discerned, not forgotten what one has seen, not forgotten what one has heard, not forgotten what one has discerned, and not forgotten what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I discerned it and forgot it; I saw it and forgot it; I heard it and forgot it" —

"I cognized it and forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has not forgotten what one has cognized, not forgotten what one has seen, not forgotten what one has heard, and not forgotten what one has discerned, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I cognized it and forgot it; I saw it and forgot it; I heard it and forgot it; I discerned it and forgot it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has no doubt about what one has seen, no doubt about what one has heard, no doubt about what one has discerned, and no doubt about what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I saw it and I am in doubt; I heard it and I am in doubt; I discerned it and I am in doubt; I cognized it and I am in doubt" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has no doubt about what one has heard, no doubt about what one has seen, no doubt about what one has discerned, and no doubt about what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view, and says, "I heard it and I am in doubt; I saw it and I am in doubt; I discerned it and I am in doubt; I cognized it and I am in doubt" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has no doubt about what one has discerned, no doubt about what one has seen, no doubt about what one has heard, and no doubt about what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters and says, "I discerned it and I am in doubt; I saw it, I heard it, I cognized it, and I am in doubt" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one has no doubt about what one has cognized, and no doubt about what one has seen, heard, or discerned, and from that basis one alters and says, "I cognized it and I am in doubt; I saw it, I heard it, I discerned it, and I am in doubt" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives as seen what one has not seen, and perceives as cognized what one has heard, discerned, and cognized, and from that basis one alters and says, "I saw it but did not hear it; I did not discern it; I did not cognize it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives as heard what one has not heard, and perceives as seen, discerned, and cognized what one has seen, discerned, and cognized, and from that basis says, "I heard it but did not see it; I did not discern it; I did not cognize it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives as discerned what one has not discerned, perceives as seen what one has seen, perceives as heard what one has heard, and perceives as cognized what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters and says, "I discerned it but did not see it; I did not hear it; I did not cognize it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

When one perceives as cognized what one has cognized, and from that basis one alters one's perception, patience, wish, reasoning, deliberation, and view regarding what one has seen, what one has heard, and what one has discerned, and says, "I cognized it, but I did not see it; I did not hear it; I did not discern it" — everything one says in that way becomes a transgression.

Here ends the first category of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, groups of twelve nuns spoke thus in mocking speech, using the following nicknames to jeer at and taunt one another — calling each other by such names as Tall One, Hunched One, Tiny One, Droopy-lips, Big-head, and Scaly-hands — deriding one another by drawing attention to women's physical faults in speech and conduct. Those who were thus mocked through such speech and conduct, being taunted by reference to women's bodily flaws, came to experience much suffering and mental distress. They neglected their scriptural study, their recitation, their memorization, their practice of yoga, mental application, and contemplative practice. This also proved an obstacle to those few who possessed genuine virtue in this Dharma and Vinaya. And when those nuns of little purpose took occasion to revile others in this way, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One addressed the nuns, saying: Nuns, from the point beginning "In a former time, in a certain land, there came to a householder farmer a young man" down to "and he won his heart" — tell that story in full. Then from "he gave that young man his daughter" down to "but the farmer, heeding his wife's words, gave her no longer" — tell that in full. Then from "he beat those oxen of his" down through "the two oxen then questioned that young man, and he replied, saying: 'From among you, let two of the finest oxen go to the king's palace; we will bear witness'" — and continuing down to "there was one who was widely known as Broken-horn, Stumpy-tail, Old Bony — but he proved unfit" — tell that story in full. Then from "the king with his retinue" down to "though a field of black lentils and beans was in perfect bloom, for seven days he did not eat, and when growth appeared he still ate nothing at all" — tell all of that.

Nuns, if even creatures reborn in the animal realm, when spoken of by reference to human defects as they go about their lives, are caused to take offense, what need is there to speak of those who have become human? Beginning from there, this previous cause and background is to be told in full.

Then again the Blessed One addressed the nuns: Nuns, in a former time there was a charioteer who had two female mules called Delightful and Dapple, and from this beginning — down to "there were two foals" — tell that story. Then: from those two fighting, one had its horn broken, and the other, raising its head, called out with a broken stub of horn, "This horn — " and so on — tell that story down through "when driven by the charioteer" to "it was altogether exhausted" — tell that in full. Then from "Delightful and Dapple spoke" down to "a double share was obtained" — tell all of that.

And then it was said in verse:

When the road is exceedingly rough, and when the load is exceedingly heavy,
it is then that she who carries the load is the one who is led by the nose.
When kind words are spoken to her,
even a heavy burden she will shed.

Tell that down to that verse.

Now, if even creatures reborn in the animal realm are caused to take offense when spoken of by reference to human defects, what need is there to speak of those who have become human? Therefore, nuns, speaking by reference to a woman's physical faults is a transgression. Whatever utterance, word, term, expression, voice, definitive statement, verbal path, verbal sound, linguistic conveyance, verbal act, or vocal articulation is expressed with the intention of speaking of a woman's physical faults — all of these constitute a transgression.

And how does a transgression arise? Here is the summary verse:

By lineage, by craft, by occupation, by sign, within the five classes of downfall — along with the minor afflictions, reviling is the last.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Noble one, you have gone forth from a brahmin family — what good is the conduct of a renunciant? What good is the brahmin's holy conduct?" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — tell that story down through "it becomes a transgression."

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Noble one, you have gone forth from a kṣatriya family — what good is the conduct of a renunciant or the brahmin's holy conduct for you?" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression. When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Noble one, you have gone forth from a merchant family — what good is the conduct of a renunciant or the brahmin's holy conduct for you?" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression. When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Noble one, you have gone forth from a commoner family — what good is the conduct of a renunciant or the holy conduct for you?" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression. This is what is called reviling by lineage.

As for reviling by craft, here is the summary verse:

Brahmin, kṣatriya, merchant, commoner, and craftsmen — rope-makers, weavers, painters, carpenters, blacksmiths, iron-workers, cobblers, potters, basket-weavers, wood-workers, bamboo-workers, and servants.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from a brahmin family, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in the brahmin manner of conduct, in deportment, in cleanliness, in all-round behavior, in taking up ashes, in taking up a water-vessel with a crow's bill spout, in taking up clay, in reciting praises, in calling out 'Hail!', in saying 'May you be victorious!', in all forms of recitation and chanting, in attendance at the proper times, in the Vedic science of correct explanation, in the Vedic science of sacrifice, in the Vedic science of poetry, in the Vedic science of the protection of existence, in performing sacrifice, in causing others to perform sacrifice, in reading, in causing others to read, in giving and in receiving alone — for a brahmin woman who is diligent in these six activities is a holy woman" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from a kṣatriya family, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in dancing, singing, playing the lute, playing the single-stringed lute, in what is called the bābhiṣke, in what is called the māṇikaprebane, in applying perfume, in grooming the head, in draping robes, and in cleaning" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from a merchant family, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in letters, in calculation, in numbers, and in finger-reckoning" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from a commoner family, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in spinning, in weaving, in the use of the loom and the loom-beam," and so forth down through "in carding, in combing, and in carrying loads" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from the rope-makers, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in silk, in great bolts of cloth, in garments, in silk strips, and in Mon silk" — — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from the thread-drawers, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in cording, in patterned weaving, in back-supports, in large round-woven interior work, in hat-making, and in basket-work" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the dyers, it becomes a transgression down through "stitched cloth, hats, garments that cover the five limbs, and padded robes," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the blacksmiths, it becomes a transgression down through "alms bowls, small alms bowls, weapons, needles, and awls," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the iron-smiths, it becomes a transgression down through "stirrups, small knives, cups, and razors," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the shoemakers, it becomes a transgression down through "shoes, sandals with straps cut away, lip-soled footwear, thin-soled footwear, and saddles," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the potters, it becomes a transgression down through "clay vessels, round pots, water jars, bowls, alms bowls, and small alms bowls," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the barbers, it becomes a transgression down through "shaving the face, shaving the armpits, trimming the nails, and cutting the hair," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the carpenters, it becomes a transgression down through "thrones, small seats, bed-frames, sitting chairs, door-fittings, and door-panels," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the bamboo-workers, it becomes a transgression down through "parasols, fans, mats, corner-poles, hanging screens, and small carrying-baskets," and so on.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from the servant class, your own tradition is as follows: you must train in massaging, in bathing service, in polishing, in going to the great chambers and coming back, and in receiving orders" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression. This is called an artisan transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from the brahmin class, your own tradition is as follows: you must perform the work of libation-ladles, copper vessels, fire offerings, burnt offering-wood, grass, fire, and water-carrying" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

When a nun approaches another nun and says, "Since you have gone forth from the warrior-noble class (kṣatriya), your own tradition is as follows: you must perform the work of the lute, the single-stringed lute, and the court entertainment" — whether the nun who is addressed has actually gone bald or not — it becomes a transgression.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the petty-noble class, it becomes a transgression down through "script and calculation," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the commoner class, it becomes a transgression down through "carrying away, grinding, and bearing loads," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the weavers — "a fine loom-shuttle, warp-thread, a bobbin, a reed, a reed-knife, thread,"

"the rice-press and the work of the stretching-cord" — it becomes a transgression down through that.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the embroiderers, it becomes a transgression down through "a loom-frame, a fine shuttle, a spool-needle, a comb-reed," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the tailors, it becomes a transgression down through "a mesh-knife, a needle, a thimble-ring, a thumb-guard," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the blacksmiths, it becomes a transgression down through "a bellows-tube, a whetstone, a knife, a small anvil, a great hammer, bellows, and a drying-scraper," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the potters, it becomes a transgression down through "a wheel, a stick, a wheel-support, a laying-board, a net-peg, and a water vessel," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the barbers, it becomes a transgression down through "scissors, a razor, a thorn-lancet, a nail-cutter, a mirror," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the woodworkers, it becomes a transgression down through "a chisel, a plane, a gouge, an axe, a large adze, a small adze, and a scraper," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the reed-workers, it becomes a transgression down through "a reed, a cord, a trimming-knife, dye, and a thorn-pin," and so on.

Likewise, when one has gone forth from the class of female servants, it becomes a transgression down through "a rope, a water-pot, grain-oil, massage, and bathing" — and this is what is called the category of occupations.

If a nun goes before another nun and says to her "you are a hunchback," it becomes a transgression. Likewise, if she says "you are stooped," "you are short," "you have elephant-feet," "you are pot-bellied," "you are mute," "you are a hunchback," "you are blind in one eye," "you have a wandering eye," "you have club-feet" — in every such case it becomes a transgression. This is what is called the category of physical marks.

If a nun goes before another nun and says to her "you are a leper," it becomes a transgression. Likewise, if she says such things as "you have scabs," "you have fine pimples," "you are exhausted and wasted," "you are withered," "you have mange," "you have a skin disease," "you have a festering sore," "you have foot-rot," "you have scrofula," "you have something disgusting," "you have fever," "you are wasted with consumption," "you have goitre," "you have difficulty breathing," "you have a dry mouth," "you are forgetful," "you suffer from hunger-trembling," "you have a pallid complexion," "you have a tumor," "you have a blood disease," "you have a bile disease," "you rupture at night" — if she utters these or any such words, in every case it becomes a transgression. This is what is called the category of diseases.

If a nun goes before another nun and says to her "you will incur a root defeat, you are one who owes a remainder to the Saṅgha" — it becomes a transgression. If she says "you are one who requires individual confession, you are one who has committed a fault" — in every such case it becomes exactly as the basis warrants.

If a nun goes before another nun and says to her "you are wrathful," "you are resentful," "you are concealing," "you are burning with envy," "you are jealous," "you are miserly," "you are deceitful," "you are one of cunning" — in every such case it becomes a transgression. This is what is called the category of secondary afflictions (upakleśas).

If a nun goes before another nun and says, in the act of insulting her, "womb" or "one possessed of a donkey's member" — whether or not the nun who is insulted has actually become bald, in every case it becomes a transgression. However, if many people share the same name, there is no transgression.

In that case as well, one should not speak without a specific object in mind, but should name someone by name for the sake of the purpose. For those who are beginners and the like there is no transgression. The second defeat-producing offense is complete.

The occasion for the third arose in Śrāvastī. At that time twelve groups of nuns were everywhere practicing slander: having heard from the Chuvī nuns, they reported it to the Phavī nuns; having heard from the Phavī nuns, they reported it to the Chuvī nuns. Because of this, those nuns were split into two factions and came to feel mutual pain and distress of mind, and their scriptural recitation, reading aloud, chanting, yoga, mental application, and inner calm abiding of the mind were all rendered empty and vacant. While things stood thus, nuns of few concerns began to criticize this conduct, and the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then declared to the nuns: "Nuns, do not practice slander one toward another." And why? "Nuns, in the past, in a certain dense forest, there was a pregnant lioness. Now it was their nature that when her cubs had nursed or were hungry, thinking 'it would be wrong for them to go without,' she would form a hunting party of flesh-eating animals alone in order to make that animal her food" — and she killed a cow and pursued it. That cow also had a calf that was drinking from the very teats of that same lioness. This continued until both had grown up. Then, at the time when death was approaching — from "how the two became great" up to "there are many things that divide the dear" — a fox spoke what was true and accurately. From "a fox divided the two" up to "those two separated each other from life." Then a deity spoke in verse:

By keeping company with evil people one never comes to see what is good.
Look how a fox divided the lioness and cow, supreme companions.

Nuns, even animals reborn in the animal realm, when they practiced slander, came to kill one another — how much more need one say of women, who are supremely prone to anger? One should recount this former story in full.

Furthermore, there is another former story. Nuns, in the past a lioness had given birth to a cub not long before, and had gone to forage in her own territory; weak and emaciated with hunger, she encountered, not very far away, a tigress that was also being driven along. While she was wandering in that famished state, she met a tigress and the tigress began to suckle her — from "thus it began" up to "they dwelt together in one place." The lion's name was Mchebzangs and the tiger's name was Dpungbzangs — from thus up to "a fox then began to create discord between those two." At last the lion spoke in verse:

For Mchebzangs, endowed with magnificent form, with skill and with strength, for Dpungbzangs to attack her is not right.

Dpungbzangs replied:

For Dpungbzangs, endowed with magnificent form, with skill and with strength, for Mchebzangs to attack her
is not right.

From "those two questioned each other" up to "the fox was killed." Then a deity spoke in verse:

Do not abandon a friend on account of another's words.

What others say should be examined carefully.

Those who wish to divide look for an opening — therefore one should not trust a slanderer.

A fox that spreads slander, that parts friends, that fox born a male, whose carcass this is — by killing it one rejoices in happiness. Nuns, those creatures who have gone to rebirth in the animal realm likewise cause much suffering and mental distress to one another through the constant practice of slander — how much more so women who are particularly wrathful. Therefore, nuns, one should not engage in slander. If one does, it is a transgression.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and proceeding up to the establishing of the rule, declared: if a nun speaks slander, it is a transgression.

The section beginning "Whoever is of slanderous intent" and continuing through "speech" and "words" is the same as before. The section continuing through "it is a transgression" — meaning "it constitutes a transgression" — is likewise the same as before.

Now, how does a transgression come about? A nun goes to the presence of a woman who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says the following: "Noble one, a certain senior nun has said this to you: 'What is the point of your practicing the conduct of a contemplative and the conduct of the celibate life? You have gone forth from the brahmin caste.'" If she speaks thus and proclaims her lineage, it is an offense. If she proclaims her clan, it is likewise an offense. In the same way, from "has gone forth from the warrior caste" through "it is an offense." In the same way, from "has gone forth from the noble caste" through "it is a transgression." In the same way, from "with regard to one who has gone forth from the commoner caste" through "it is a transgression" — this is what is meant by "lineage."

A nun goes to the presence of a woman who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says: "Noble one, a certain senior nun has said this to you: 'What is the point of your practicing the conduct of a contemplative and the conduct of the celibate life? You have gone forth from the brahmin caste, so you should train according to your own traditional system.'" If she speaks thus and proclaims her craft, it is an offense. In the same way, from "has gone forth from the warrior caste" through "it is an offense." In the same way, from "has gone forth from the noble caste" through "it is a transgression." In the same way, from "has gone forth from the commoner caste" through "it is a transgression." The intermediate rule is to be stated in full, as explained above.

As for this, the craftspeople are: the weaver, the dyer, the smith, the cobbler, the potter, the ditch-digger, the woodworker, the basket-weaver, and the maidservant. This is what is meant by "craft."

A nun goes to the presence of a nun who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says: "Noble one, a certain senior nun has said this to you: 'What is the point of your practicing the conduct of a contemplative and the conduct of the celibate life? You have gone forth from the brahmin caste, so you should do the work of your own traditional occupation.'" If she speaks thus and proclaims her occupation, it is an offense. In the same way, from "with regard to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste" through "it is an offense." In the same way, from "with regard to one who has gone forth from the noble caste" through "it is a transgression." In the same way, from "with regard to one who has gone forth from the commoner caste" through "it is a transgression." The intermediate rule is to be stated in full, just as explained above.

Lineage, craft, occupation, mark, and illness — these are the five.
Transgression and minor affliction, and abuse as the last.

The third group of transgressions is complete.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī.

At that time, those among the twelve groups who had settled a dispute said repeatedly and with displeasure: "This dispute has not been purified by the recitation; it must be purified by the recitation again. This dispute has not been properly examined; it must be properly examined again. This dispute has not been well adjudicated; it must be well adjudicated again. This dispute has not been settled; it must be settled again." Then those nuns, amid fighting, fault-finding, and dispute — having fallen into fault-finding — abandoned the recitation of scripture, study, oral recitation, yoga, mental application, and the inner calm abiding of the mind. When nuns of little virtue were being censured, the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This being the case," proceeded to establish the training rule. "Furthermore, if any nun, knowing that a dispute has been settled in accordance with Dharma by a harmonious Saṅgha, then stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression."

"Furthermore, if any nun" refers to the twelve groups. "Knowing" means by her own awareness. "In accordance with Dharma" means in accordance with the Vinaya as it is and the Teacher's dispensation as it is. "Dispute" refers to the four disputes: dispute arising from quarreling, dispute arising from censure, dispute arising from transgressions, and dispute arising from matters of procedure. "Settled in accordance with Dharma" refers to settlement by motion and by the four-part act. "Stirs up discontent over that act" means doing so with the intent to do it again.

How does a transgression arise in this? If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from quarreling as one that has arisen from quarreling, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified by the recitation, then stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If a nun has doubt about what has been purified by the recitation, it is a transgression. If a nun, perceiving what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified by the recitation, stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified by the recitation, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from quarreling as one that has arisen from censure, and perceiving it as having been purified by the recitation, stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If she perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified by the recitation, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from quarreling as one that has arisen from a transgression, and perceiving it as having been purified by the recitation, stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If she perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified by the recitation, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from quarreling as one that has arisen from a matter of procedure, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If she perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from censure as one that has arisen from quarreling, and perceiving it as having been purified by the recitation, stirs up discontent over that act, it is a transgression. If she has doubt about what has been purified by the recitation, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from censure as one that has arisen from a transgression, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression.

If she perceives what has been purified by the recitation as having not been purified by the recitation, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from censure as one that has arisen from a matter of business, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If she perceives what has been purified by the recitation as having not been purified, it is a wrong act. If she perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having not been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a transgression as one that has arisen from a quarrel, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has been purified by the recitation as having not been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a transgression as one that has arisen from censure, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a transgression as one that has arisen from a matter of business, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a matter of business as one that has arisen from a quarrel, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a matter of business as one that has arisen from censure, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

If a nun, perceiving a dispute that has arisen from a matter of business as one that has arisen from a transgression, and perceiving what has been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a transgression. If she has doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun perceives what has not been purified by the recitation as having been purified, it is a wrong act. If she has doubt, it is a wrong act.

There are five kinds of nuns. What are the five? The nun who is a permanent resident, the nun who performs the act, the nun who submits a motion, the nun who states her view, and fifth, the nun who has come accidentally. Who is the nun who is a permanent resident? She is one who knows the beginning, the middle, and the end of that dispute. Who is the nun who performs the act? She is one who has performed an act in that matter. Who is the nun who submits a motion? She is one who has herself submitted a motion in that matter. Who is the nun who states her view? She is one who has declared her own view in that matter, saying: "This I approve; this I do not approve; this I desire; this I do not desire." Who is the nun who has come accidentally? She is one who does not know the beginning, the middle, or the end of that matter. Of these, the first three — the permanent resident, the one who performs the act, and the one who submits a motion — if any of them stirs up discontent over what has been duly settled as a dispute according to the Dharma, it is a transgression. If either of the last two stirs up discontent, it is a wrong act. If the fault has been cleared by the recitation, there is no transgression. This completes the fourth transgression.

The Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns, the sixteenth fascicle. The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. At that time Sthūlanandā went on her alms round to such and such households of householders, and to the homes of brahmins and those householders, teaching the Dharma to them alone, she disclosed to the men all the secrets of women, and all the great secrets of women. Those men then told their wives. Because women are jealous, from that time on, when the elder nuns went on their alms rounds, those women would gossip about them to the neighborhood, saying: "Who would think of giving alms to you, who go about creating disturbance in the world?" Sthūlanandā replied: "Come now, sisters, what fault have we committed that you scold us?" They answered: "The noble Sthūlanandā has been slandering us before our husbands." Those nuns did not obtain alms. When they failed to obtain alms, they were abused, spat upon, and gossiped about. At that juncture this was reported to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then reflected: "Whatever slight fault has arisen, all of it has come about through teaching the Dharma. Therefore the Dharma shall not be taught in that manner." When those nuns again set out for alms, the brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, please teach us the Dharma." The nuns replied: "The Blessed One has forbidden it." The brahmins and householders said: "Then also let our almsgiving be forbidden." When those nuns once again suffered from lack of alms, this was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore you shall teach the Dharma in five sentences." When the Blessed One had declared that they were to teach the Dharma in five sentences, those nuns did not know how. The Blessed One declared: "Householder, form is impermanent. Feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness are impermanent." From that time when they began to teach the Dharma in five sentences, those brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, why do you not teach more Dharma?" The nuns replied: "Householders, the Blessed One has ordained exactly that much." The householders said: "Noble ones, are you really going to teach the Dharma at a mere peppercorn's worth?" Then those brahmins and householders said: "Just as little Dharma has been taught to us, just so little alms shall we give." Since those nuns were again suffering from lack of alms, this was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "You shall teach the Dharma in six sentences." When the Blessed One had declared this and those nuns did not know how, the Blessed One declared: "Householder, the eye is impermanent. Householder, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind are impermanent." When those nuns then began to teach the Dharma in six sentences, the group of twelve said: "Let us make what was five into six." Whereupon the group of twelve said: "If through the sixth sentence one has not drunk beer and has not eaten raw onions, what transgression is there?" Similarly, when they deliberately set out to teach a sixth, they would carry it past to a seventh. At that juncture this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "It shall not be taught" — up to the point where they suffered from lack of alms — and the Blessed One declared: "One may teach the Dharma together with a man" — up to that point.

When that group of twelve went on their alms rounds, at those householders' homes they said to the householders: "Householder, listen to the Dharma." The others replied: "Noble ones, first please call the women together and seat

That group of twelve said the following: "Is this hen not a female? Is this female monkey not a female? Is this ewe not a female? Are these female cats not female?" — and by means of this they would get the men to consent and then teach them the Dharma.

Then the great female householder Gautamī, having dressed in her lower robe in the morning and taken her alms bowl and outer robe, entered her alms round, and went into those householders' homes to collect alms. The householders then said to her: "Noble one, please teach the Dharma. Go, bring the women together, and come back." One of those householders also said: "Is this hen not a female?" Then the great female householder Gautamī said to that householder: "Who is it that teaches Dharma to you in such a way?" They replied: "It is the group of twelve." She thought: "So this situation too has arisen among us" — and as the monks of few wants began to express their disapproval, and so on up to the Blessed One having been informed of what had occurred, a rule of training was established:

"Whatever nun teaches the Dharma to a man in sentences of five or six, without a woman present, incurs a transgression — with the exception of a learned woman."

"Whatever nun" refers to the group of twelve. "Sentences of five" refers to the five aggregates beginning with form, and so forth. "Sentences of six" refers to the six sense faculties beginning with the eye, and so forth. "With the exception of a learned woman" means that a learned woman is set aside. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above.

As to how a transgression arises: whatever nun deliberately teaches a man the Dharma in five sentences and carries it on to a sixth thereby incurs a transgression. In the same way — from the statement about the section above on through to the section on houses — in all those cases a transgression is incurred. Likewise, if she deliberately teaches in six sentences and carries it on to a seventh, she incurs a transgression. If she answers a question, there is no transgression. For beginners and the like, there is also no transgression. This completes the fifth transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time the group of twelve were inciting women who had not received full ordination, as well as men, boys, girls, and the like, to perform recitations of the Dharma. Then in that summer residence, just as arithmetic teachers in a counting school would do, there arose loud noise and great clamor, and the monks of few wants expressed their disapproval. Then from the Blessed One — and so on — a rule of training was established:

"Whatever nun incites persons who have not received full ordination to perform Dharma recitations incurs a transgression."

"Whatever nun" refers to the group of twelve. As to the phrase "persons who have not received full ordination": those who have received full ordination are of two kinds — monks and nuns. All the rest are those who have not received full ordination. "Inciting" means reciting in unison with identical words, or reciting with additional words, or with identical syllables, or with additional syllables.

"Identical words" means that for as long as one says "abandon all that is evil," the other likewise says "abandon all that is evil" — this is called identical words. "Additional words" means that before one has finished saying "abandon all that is evil," the other says "practice virtue in full abundance" — this is called additional words. "Identical syllables" means that for as long as one says the syllable "A," the other likewise says "A" — this is called identical syllables.

"Additional syllables" means that before one has finished saying the syllable "A," the other also says "A."

"Entering upon a Dharma recitation" means something spoken by a buddha or said by a śrāvaka.

"It constitutes a transgression" — this is as stated above. As to how a transgression arises in this case: however little it may be, if a nun faces and leads a person who has not received full ordination in a Dharma recitation, this constitutes a transgression in every instance.

If, however, one is stammering, speaking quickly, reciting from memory, or responding to a question that has been asked, there is no transgression.

The sixth transgression is complete.

The origin story took place in Śrāvastī. Because they had not abandoned their afflictions, and out of ignorance, certain transgressions arose, and because these nuns were causing earlier transgressions to proliferate, they were engaging in reverential conduct. Each morning they would rise early and pay homage to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha; they would sweep, dust, and wipe down the premises.

Those twelve groups sat and remained in a small space, subdued in spirit. A householder then arrived, and when those twelve groups saw the older nuns doing all of this, they thought: "These elderly nuns know what is precious and accumulate what is precious. These twelve groups do not know what is precious and do not accumulate what is precious."

Thereupon, when the twelve groups heard this from the householder, they spoke thus: "You should accumulate such precious things." Those nuns replied: "Why do these ones exert themselves in offering and reverence to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, and so forth?" Those nuns then said: "Such and such transgressions arose." When the twelve groups heard this, they reflected: "If even the elderly nuns have come to such a condition, what will become of the younger ones?" The twelve groups, having understood the matter, asked the novices: "What are your preceptresses and teachers doing?" The novices replied: "They are making merit." Then the twelve groups said: "You too should make merit of this kind." The novice nuns asked: "What is it?" The twelve groups then said to those novice nuns: "Do you not in your hearts think that your preceptresses and teachers are devoted to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, and so forth, calling this a good Dharma? Nevertheless, such and such transgressions have occurred."

When those nuns had arisen from those transgressions and then instructed the novices saying, "You novices should be purified by the fully ordained nuns," the novices replied: "Why don't you yourselves do it?" The elder nuns said: "It is not appropriate for us to do so." The novice nuns then said: "Is it appropriate for some and not for others?" The fully ordained nuns replied: "Who told you that?" When the novices said that it was the twelve groups who had told them, it was at that point that nuns of few words criticized them for this, and the matter was reported in full to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "It must not be said." Thus he made a prohibition.

Thereafter a nun named Rājū, wishing to make known to a great assembly of people certain improper behavior that was being practiced in households in just such a manner, reported this to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "A nun is to be appointed to oversee households individually." Since it was not known precisely what the Blessed One had declared, the Blessed One then declared: "A nun endowed with five qualities is to be appointed to oversee households individually. What are the five? She does not go out of desire; she does not go out of aversion; she does not go out of delusion; she does not go out of fear; and she knows which households have been supervised and which have not." The appointment is to be carried out as follows. After the bedding has been laid out, beginning with the words, "Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me" — the motion proceeds thus: "The nun Ṛjū, whatever improper conduct is being practiced in the households such that a great assembly of people may come to lack faith, has made that known in just that way. She who is called such-and-such is willing to oversee the households individually on behalf of the nun Ṛjū. If the time is right and the noble Saṅgha consents, may the noble Saṅgha approve it, and may she who is called such-and-such be appointed to oversee the households on behalf of the nun Ṛjū. She who is called such-and-such will, on behalf of the nun Ṛjū, go to those households. Sisters, take the measure of what this nun Ṛjū, who is like a seed scorched, like a seed ruined, has taught. Let the great mistress of beings take the measure of what she has taught. Let Gautamī the thin, and Utpalavarṇā, and Dharmadattā, and the noble Śīlavatī take the measure." That is how she will carry out the supervision. This is the motion. The formal act is to proceed as follows: beginning with "Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me," and going as far as "The noble Saṅgha has consented and approved, and since nothing is said, this is so understood."

Then the nun Ṛjū heard that a nun had been appointed to oversee the households on her behalf. Upon hearing this, the nun Ṛjū went to where the nun appointed to oversee the households was staying, and said to her these words: "Sister, has the Saṅgha appointed you to oversee the households on her behalf?" That nun replied: "It has." Ṛjū then said: "Sister, do you believe that she has caused much loss of faith in the households in this way?" That nun replied: "I do believe it." Ṛjū then said: "Just as you believe one person, so too, in a similar way, she circled the intestines of your belly around the summer dwelling with a bowel." The nun was frightened, and reported the matter in full to the assembly of nuns at that time. The nuns reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The nuns should carry out only the motion." Since it was not known precisely what the Blessed One meant by "carry out only the motion," the Blessed One then declared: "After the bedding has been laid out, beginning with the words 'Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me,' the motion is to be as follows: 'The nun Ṛjū, whatever conduct is being practiced in households such that a great assembly of people may come to lack faith, has made that known in just that way. If the time is right and the noble Saṅgha consents, may the noble Saṅgha approve it.'

Having then performed only the motion, whatever appears fitting to the nun Rājū, and in whichever place she sees fit, she herself shall say the following to the sisters: 'Sisters, take the measure of what this wicked nun, who like a scorched seed lacks the power to give rise to growth, has taught. Nevertheless, let the elder nuns, the elder nuns, take the measure of this teaching.'" This is the motion.

Having performed only the motion, the nuns shall make it known in whatever place there is a great assembly of people. It shall be proclaimed in that very place where faith was undermined, but it shall not be proclaimed elsewhere, for it would be inappropriate to die of hunger alone. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence," proceeded to lay down the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun discloses a transgression that entails defeat to those who have not received full ordination, except with the Saṅgha's permission, she commits an offense."

"Whatever nun" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. "Discloses" means speaks of it. "Except with the Saṅgha's permission" means setting aside cases in which the Saṅgha has granted permission. "Commits an offense" is as stated above.

As for how the transgression arises: if a nun sees that another nun has incurred a transgression entailing defeat, and she discloses it to one who has no knowledge of it, perceiving her as having no knowledge, she commits an offense. Likewise, if she is in doubt about one who has no knowledge, she commits an offense. If a nun sees that another nun has incurred a transgression entailing defeat, but perceives one who does have knowledge of it as not knowing, that is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she is in doubt about one who does have knowledge, that is a wrongdoing. As with a picture drawn on cloth — in a case where one has made it known exactly as one knows it, and in this way the entire world comes to know it — there is no offense. This completes the seventh section on offenses.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Vaiśālī, in the Gabled Hall on the bank of the Monkey Pond. At that time a devastating famine arose in the wilderness region, making food exceedingly difficult to find. Thereupon a great many nuns went wandering through various districts and came to be deprived of alms. They then deliberated among themselves, saying, "Why should we not proclaim our own good qualities?" They said to one another: "Whether truthfully or not?" And they replied: "Truthfully." Then, having mutually proclaimed one another's good qualities truthfully, and since the world delights in good qualities, the people ensured that the nuns were no longer deprived of alms. When the time came, after wandering through the districts, those nuns went to Vaiśālī. The nuns who had been resident there, both the settled and the long-established, saw them and said, "Welcome, you who are endowed with the Buddha, endowed with the Dharma, endowed with the Saṅgha! Welcome, welcome! Have you been faring well?" They replied, "We have been faring well." "Reverend sisters, I trust you have not been deprived of alms?" They replied, "We have not." "Elder sisters, elder sisters, given that you were deprived of alms, what means did you employ that you were not?" They replied, "By proclaiming one another's good qualities." "And was it fitting for you to proclaim one another's superhuman qualities?" When they said "We proclaimed them," nuns of few wants made this an occasion for rebuke and reported it to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence," proceeded to lay down the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun truthfully discloses a superhuman quality to one who has not received full ordination commits an offense."

"Whatever nun" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. As for "to one who has not received full ordination," those who have received full ordination are two in number; all others are those without full ordination. "Truthfully" means that it actually exists. "Commits an offense" is as stated above.

As for how the transgression arises, the intermediate summary verse runs:

Seeing, perception, in wilderness, and in households, seats spread out, claiming one's own distinguishing marks, and presenting oneself.

A nun with perception and — — with perception, acceptance, desire, intelligence, reflection, and without altering her view, she says these words: "I have seen a god," and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Likewise, if she says the same of yakṣas, nāgas, gandharvas (dri za), kiṃnaras (mi'am ci), great serpents, kumbhāṇḍas, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, and corpse-demons, and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

Likewise, from the statement "I will go in order to see the gods" through "to bodies that are corpses" — if it is true, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

If a god or similar being truly approaches her, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

Likewise, if she truly hears the voice of a god or similar being, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

If she converses and communicates with gods and comes to a definite conclusion about it, and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

Likewise, if a god in turn converses and communicates with her and comes to a definite conclusion about it, and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Even in the case of a flesh-eater in a charnel ground, if it is true, she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

If a nun, with perception, acceptance, desire, intelligence, reflection, and without altering her view, says these words: "I have attained the perception of impermanence," and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Likewise, if she claims the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, the perception of no-self in what is suffering, the perception of disenchantment with food, the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of the drawbacks, the perception of relinquishment, the perception of dispassion, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of impurity, the perception of bloating, the perception of discoloration, the perception of putrefaction, the perception of crimson decomposition, the perception of being eaten away, the perception of dismemberment, the perception of scattering, the perception of bones, and the perception of individually discerning emptiness — and if she claims from the first, second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations through to the eight liberations as meditative absorptions she has attained, and if it is true, she commits a transgression.

From the phrase "a nun, without altering her perception" up to the words "she says as follows": if many nuns are dwelling in a wilderness and the non-human beings there do not harm them, and she says, "If she too dwells there, they will not harm her," and if it is true, she commits a transgression. Likewise, the same is to be stated with regard to seats spread out and arranged in households.

From the phrase "a nun, without altering her perception" up to "she says as follows": if a nun, clinging to her own distinguishing marks and relying on the sign of calm abiding, suppresses the afflictions through worldly mental application and does not engage in sensory desire, ill will, and so forth — and if she says from "that one exists" up to "she herself as well," she commits a transgression.

If a nun, with perception, acceptance, desire, intelligence, reflection, and without altering her view, says, "There exists a nun who has seen a god," and if she does not then say "and that is she herself," she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

Likewise, the same applies to yakṣas, nāgas, gandharvas, kiṃnaras, great serpents, kumbhāṇḍas, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, and —

— and if she does not say "and that is she herself" regarding decomposing corpses, she commits an offense of wrongdoing. Even regarding a flesh-eater dwelling in a charnel ground, if she does not say "and that is she herself," she commits an offense of wrongdoing. In like manner, following this same sequence, one should recite the words of this rule.

Furthermore, from "whatever nun, without altering her perception" up to "the following," the meaning is this: whatever nun, holding her own characteristic mark and relying on the sign of calm abiding, by means of worldly mental application suppresses the afflictions and does not engage in attachment to desire, ill will, and so forth — and who says "There exists such a one," yet does not then say "and that is she herself" — she commits an offense of wrongdoing.

Here ends the eighth section on transgressions.

The original occasion was at Śrāvastī. At the time when the nun Dharmadattā had received full ordination and had seen the noble truths, she was diligent in attending properly to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma within her own rains-retreat dwelling. She was endowed with faith, was good, and possessed a virtuous intention, so there was nothing at all that she would not offer or give entirely to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or her fellow nun friends. Through giving in that way and through making such complete offerings, even her worn-out and patched robes were stripped away until she was left threadbare.

Thereupon it occurred to the community of nuns: "This nun Dharmadattā is endowed with faith, is good, and possessed of a virtuous intention; she has set aside meditative concentration, the liberations, meditative absorption, and the meditative attainments, and is diligent in attending properly to the nuns in accordance with the Dharma; and there is nothing at all that she does not offer or give entirely." — up to the phrase: "her robes were stripped away until she was left threadbare." The nuns then thought: "We should make up a large bolt of cloth and give it to Dharmadattā." Later, at another time, they obtained a large bolt of cloth and gave it to her.

She thereupon reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared that it had been given upon request. Then, having proceeded in this way, making ready a seat — up to: "Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, I ask that you hear me. This nun Dharmadattā is endowed with faith, is good, and possessed of a virtuous intention. There is nothing at all that she has not offered or given entirely to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or her fellow nun friends. Through making such complete offerings, even her five worn-out and patched robes were stripped away until she was left threadbare. If the time has come and the noble Saṅgha sees fit, may the noble Saṅgha please grant its consent, and may the noble Saṅgha bestow upon Dharmadattā this large bolt of cloth. This is the request."

When they had made this request and given the large bolt of cloth to Dharmadattā, twelve members of the group known as the Group of Twelve spoke to the remaining nuns: "Sisters, how could it ever come about that the gains of the Saṅgha accrue to the community of nuns, when the gains of the Saṅgha are being redirected in favor of individuals?" Upon this being said, the nuns of little discernment were displeased.

Then the Blessed One, beginning from "this occurrence," proceeded to establish a training rule. Furthermore, whatever nun previously having spoken approvingly afterward says to the nuns: "Sisters, the nuns, having acted for the sake of individuals, redirected what was the Saṅgha's gain toward a personal recipient" — she commits a transgression.

The phrase "whatever nun" refers to a member of the Group of Twelve.

The phrase "having previously spoken approvingly" means having expressed agreement. The phrase "afterward" means at a different time. The phrase

"says thus" means when she speaks. The phrase "of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of female śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. As for the phrase "gains," gains are of two kinds: material gains and gains in robes. In this particular matter, the intended meaning is gains in robes. As for the phrase "for the sake of a friend," one may ask: whose friend is which? The co-resident's friend is the preceptress, and the preceptress's friend is the co-resident. The attendant's friend is the instructor, and the instructor's friend is the attendant. A companion's friend is likewise a companion. One who is spoken of with affection has likewise one who is spoken of with affection. One who dwells in the same place has likewise one who dwells in the same place. The phrase "to redirect" means when she diverts. The phrase "to an individual" means when she gives to a particular person. The phrase "she commits a transgression" is as stated above.

One may ask how a transgression arises in this case. Whatever nun, having previously spoken approvingly and afterward saying to the nuns, "Sisters, a nun, for the sake of a friend, is redirecting toward an individual what had been dedicated as the Saṅgha's gain" — in every such instance she commits a transgression. However, if what she says is simply true, there is no transgression.

The occasion for this rule was at Śrāvastī. At that time, when the Group of Twelve nuns were reciting the prātimokṣa sūtra (the sūtra of individual liberation) fortnightly, they said: "Sisters, of what use are these minor and most minute training rules — those rules concerning which both the underlying basis is evident, and the individual, the village, and the field are also evident — being extracted from the fortnightly recitation of the prātimokṣa sūtra?" Upon their saying this and censuring the nuns who held the training rules in high regard, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning from "this occurrence," proceeded to establish a training rule. Furthermore, whatever nun, when reciting the prātimokṣa sūtra fortnightly, says, "Noble sisters, of what use are these minor and most minute training rules — those that cause nuns to feel remorse, anxiety, discomfort, harm, and distress — being extracted from the fortnightly recitation of the prātimokṣa sūtra?" — she commits a transgression.

The phrase "whatever nun" refers to one from Somā's group, a nun fond of quarreling. The phrase "fortnightly" means every fortnight. The phrase "individual liberation" refers to what is drawn from the eight root defeats, the twenty rules requiring a meeting of the Saṅgha and more, the one hundred and eighty transgressions, the eleven rules requiring individual confession, the many training rules, the seven rules for settling disputes, the seventeen Vinaya bases, the minor rules, the fragments, the occasion narratives, the Vinaya Mātā, the supplement to the Vinaya, the fifth Vinaya, the sixteenth Vinaya, and what arises from the questions of the inner circle. The word "sūtra" means what is well composed. The phrase "reciting" means teaching fully. The phrase "says thus" means when she speaks. The phrase "sisters, of what use are these" refers to whatever nuns feel remorse, anxiety, discomfort, harm, and distress on account of rules concerning which the individual is evident along with the village, the field, and the underlying basis. The phrase "she commits a transgression" is as stated above. One may ask how a transgression arises in this case.

When a nun, while reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra every half-month, says to the nuns, "Sisters, of what use are these minor and extremely subtle rules of training on account of which the nuns fall into remorse?" — up to that point she commits a transgression. If she says "mental distress" or "mental discomfort," she commits a transgression. Likewise, if when reciting a sūtra that contains rules of training she belittles it, she commits a transgression. Likewise, if when reciting verses that contain rules of training she belittles them, in all cases it becomes an offense. If there has been a deterioration, or if it occurs within the nuns' Saṅgha, there is no transgression. Here ends the summary verse of the first set of transgressions.

The summary verse:

Tilling a field and entering a tilled field, speaking disparagingly, and at the ear, the dwelling-place, and the hanging objects — these make five.
Then high thrones and beds, their arising,
grasses, a great house,
and a single place — these are set out likewise.
The underlying basis is at Śrāvastī.

At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon a monk who was formerly a wood-carver, established the rule of training concerning the destruction of seed-collections and the dwellings of beings, there were twelve groups of nuns who were themselves cutting green grass and planting it in fields. The nuns of good conduct who were present said to them: "Sisters, the Blessed One has established such a rule of training — do not cut green grass, and do not cause it to be cut." Thereupon those twelve groups said to those nuns: "This rule of training belongs to the monks — it does not belong to the nuns." At that, nuns of few wishes reproached them, criticized them, and rebuked them; those nuns told the monks; the monks informed the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, from the words "this occurrence" onward, proceeded through to establishing the rule of training: if one destroys or causes to be destroyed a seed-collection or the dwelling of a being, one commits a transgression.

As for the phrase "seed-collection," seeds are of five kinds: root-seeds, stem-seeds, joint-seeds, cutting-seeds, and grain-seeds, which are the fifth. Among these, root-seeds are: galangal, white hellebore, mustard, ginger, white aconite, and likewise any other such roots — whatever roots themselves become seeds. These are called root-seeds. What are stem-seeds? The kañcana tree, the pīṭala, the aśvattha (sacred fig), the udumbara (cluster fig), the nyagrodha (banyan), and likewise any other such stems — whatever stems themselves become seeds. These are called stem-seeds. What are joint-seeds? Sugarcane, bamboo, reeds, marsh-grass, kāśa grass, and likewise any other such jointed plants — whatever joints themselves become seeds. These are called joint-seeds. What are cutting-seeds? Ārdraka (fresh ginger), śārjaka, śeyab, yellow-flowered grass (Atis or similar), bhūḍṛṃhaka, and likewise any other things that, when cut, become seeds. These are called cutting-seeds. What are grain-seeds? Barley, wheat, śāli rice, various legumes such as black lentils and the like, and likewise whatever else becomes a seed of seed. These are called grain-seeds, and they are the fifth.

Regarding what is called the abode of life-bearing organisms: "life-bearing organisms" refers to snakes, venomous snakes, tree-borers, wood-boring beetles, worms, flat insects, and sesame-husk eaters. Whatever tree serves as the dwelling of such organisms is called the abode of life-bearing organisms.

"Cuts" means doing so oneself. "Causes another to cut" means through someone else. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above.

As to how a transgression is incurred: if a nun perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and perceives it as green, and is doubtful about it, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and perceives what is dry as moist, she incurs a wrongdoing. If a nun perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and is doubtful about what is dry, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a stem-seed as a stem-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a stem-seed as a stem-seed and perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a joint-seed as a joint-seed and perceives it as green, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a joint-seed as a joint-seed and perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a cutting-seed as a cutting-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a cutting-seed as a cutting-seed and perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a grain-seed as a grain-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a grain-seed as a grain-seed and perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a root-seed as a stem-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a root-seed as a stem-seed and perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun perceives a root-seed as a joint-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a root-seed as a joint-seed and perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing.

The same applies when root-seeds are taken for grain-seeds. If a nun perceives a stem-seed as a joint-seed and perceives it as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression.

If a nun perceives a stem-seed as a joint-seed and perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for root-seeds. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for grain-seeds. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for propagating-seeds.

If a nun perceives a joint-seed as a propagating-seed and perceives what is green as green, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If a nun perceives a joint-seed as a propagating-seed and perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when joint-seeds are taken for stem-seeds.

If a nun perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and perceives what is green as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If she perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when root-seeds are taken for stem-seeds. The same applies when root-seeds are taken for joint-seeds. The same applies when root-seeds are taken for propagating-seeds. The same applies when root-seeds are taken for grain-seeds.

If a nun perceives a stem-seed as a stem-seed and perceives what is green as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If she perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for joint-seeds. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for propagating-seeds. The same applies when stem-seeds are taken for grain-seeds.

If a nun perceives a joint-seed as a joint-seed and perceives what is green as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If she perceives what is dry as green, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when joint-seeds are taken for root-seeds. The same applies when joint-seeds are taken for stem-seeds. The same applies when joint-seeds are taken for propagating-seeds. The same applies when joint-seeds are taken for grain-seeds.

If a nun perceives a propagating-seed as a propagating-seed and perceives what is green as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a transgression. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a transgression. If she perceives what is dry as green, and then cuts it or causes another to cut it, she incurs a wrongdoing. Similarly, if she is doubtful, she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies when propagating-seeds are taken for root-seeds. The same applies when propagating-seeds are taken for stem-seeds. The same applies when propagating-seeds are taken for joint-seeds. The same applies when propagating-seeds are taken for grain-seeds.

The same applies when grain-seeds are taken for joint-seeds. The same applies when grain-seeds are taken for propagating-seeds.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the Seventeenth Fascicle, the Intermediate Section.

The five kinds of root-seeds, and the cutting of trees and grass likewise, creeping grass, continuous growth, fish-scale shoots, water-weeds, and blooming flowers.

If a nun, with the intention that seeds might be destroyed, pours the five kinds of seeds into a mortar, then beats them with a pestle, intending that the seeds be damaged and completely ruined, and through such forceful pounding the seeds are indeed damaged, she incurs a transgression. If they are not damaged, she incurs a wrongdoing.

Similarly, if she uses fire, a digging implement, a dibble, a planting stick, a stove, a fire-pit, a large fire-pit, earth, porridge, boiling water, or a bag full of cooked grain — and so on, saying "May the seeds be damaged, may they be completely ruined," together with a great lake, a great stream, and so on down to a small amount of water, excrement, brine, a transforming agent, and mixing with earth — if through any of these the seeds are indeed damaged, she incurs a transgression. If they are not damaged, she incurs a wrongdoing. That concludes this section.

If a nun, with a single act, cuts one tree or causes it to be cut, she incurs one wrongdoing and one transgression. Similarly, if with two acts she cuts one tree, she incurs two wrongdoings and one transgression. Similarly, if with many acts she cuts one tree, she incurs many wrongdoings and one transgression.

If a nun, with a single act, cuts two trees, she incurs one wrongdoing and two transgressions. Similarly, if with two acts she cuts two trees, she incurs two wrongdoings and two transgressions. If a nun, with many acts, cuts two trees, she incurs many wrongdoings and two transgressions.

If a nun, with a single act, cuts many trees, she incurs one wrongdoing and many transgressions. Similarly, if with two acts she cuts many trees, she incurs two wrongdoings and many transgressions. Similarly, if with many acts she cuts many trees, she incurs many wrongdoings and many transgressions.

If a nun perceives green grass as green and treads upon it, she incurs a transgression. If she causes another to tread upon it, she incurs a transgression. If she is doubtful about what is green and treads upon it, she incurs a transgression. If she causes another to tread upon it, she incurs a transgression. If she perceives what is dry as green and treads upon it, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she causes another to tread upon it, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she is doubtful about what is dry and treads upon it, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she causes another to tread upon it, she incurs a wrongdoing.

If a nun, with a single act, treads upon a single clump of grass, she incurs one wrongdoing and one transgression. Similarly, two should also be stated. Similarly, the same applies to treading upon two clumps of grass with many acts. Just as it was stated for trees, so too it should be stated in detail for many clumps of grass.

If a nun pulls out strands of grass from a tree, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she strips off the outer bark, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she strips off a secondary layer, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she strips off the inner bark, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she extracts the heartwood, she incurs a transgression. If she pares a dried leaf, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she breaks off a fresh leaf, she incurs a transgression. If she opens a flower bud, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she breaks an unopened bud, she incurs a transgression. If the fruit is ripe and she damages it, she incurs a wrongdoing. If the fruit is unripe and she damages it, she incurs a transgression. If she walks upon green grass, saying "May the grass be damaged, may the grass be completely ruined," she incurs a transgression.

The same applies to puddles and the like — she incurs a transgression. If she says, "May it be damaged, may it be completely ruined," and then drags a branch or tree limb, she incurs a transgression. If her intention is to drag it or to walk, she incurs no transgression. If she walks saying, "May the water puddle be damaged," she incurs a wrongdoing. The same applies to puddles and trees and the like. If her intention is to walk, she incurs no transgression. For as long as a fish scale has not been removed from the water, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she removes it, she incurs a transgression. If she extracts the seed element of something without a root, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she extracts fish eggs, spawn, or flesh, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she smears grey mud onto a water-pot, she incurs a wrongdoing. If she eats food that has grey mud on it, she incurs a wrongdoing. If, however, it has been made suitable, she incurs no transgression. Here ends the first portion of the second category of transgressions.

The context-setting narrative is at Rājagṛha. On the occasion when a nun named Mza'-mo (Priyā) publicly reviled the venerable Gyad-bu-nor in front of the group of the Six, likewise a nun named Priyā reviled the venerable Gyad-bu-nor in front of the group of the Twelve. The elder nuns then spoke thus: "Priyā, do not revile the head of the retinue." Even though she was told this, she continued to revile. At that point the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, let the nun Priyā be subjected to the procedure for having reviled face-to-face. The procedure for subjecting her is to be carried out as follows: after the seating has been arranged" — and so on up to — "Sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please listen to me. This nun Priyā has reviled the venerable Gyad-bu-nor face-to-face. If the noble Saṅgha sees fit, and if it consents, let the noble Saṅgha grant that the nun Priyā be subjected to the procedure for face-to-face reviling." This is the motion. The formal act is to be recited in the same way.

However, on the occasion when she acted by reviling indirectly, the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, let the nun Priyā be subjected to the procedure for indirect reviling" — and so on up to: "This is the motion. The formal act is also to be recited."

On the occasion when she later did both — reviling indirectly and reviling face-to-face — the Blessed One declared: "Let the nun Priyā be subjected to the procedure for both kinds of reviling" — and so on up to the end. The motion and the formal act are both to be recited.

When, even after being told in this way, she continued to revile, and when nuns of little account began to censure her, this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This incident occurred," and so forth, up to "established the training rule": if one reviles or reviles indirectly, one incurs a transgression. "Reviling" means any speech, words, or utterances made with the intention to revile, and so forth — as explained above. As to how a transgression is incurred: if a nun who has been subjected to the procedure reviles the twelve nuns appointed by the Saṅgha who have not yet released their undertaking, she incurs a transgression. If she reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If she both reviles and reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If a nun who has been subjected to the procedure reviles the twelve nuns not appointed by the Saṅgha who have not yet released their undertaking, she incurs a transgression. If she reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If she both reviles and reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If a nun who has been subjected to the procedure reviles the twelve nuns not appointed by the Saṅgha who have not yet released their undertaking, she incurs a transgression. If she reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If she both reviles and reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression.

If a nun who has been subjected to the procedure reviles the twelve nuns appointed by the Saṅgha who have already released their undertaking, she incurs a transgression. If she reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If she both reviles and reviles them indirectly, she incurs a transgression. If a nun who has not been subjected to the procedure reviles the twelve nuns appointed by the Saṅgha who have not yet released their undertaking, she incurs a misdeed. If she reviles them indirectly, she incurs a misdeed. If she both reviles and reviles them indirectly, she incurs a misdeed. The remaining three cases are likewise to be set forth in full. The second rule of the second class of transgressions is complete.

The origin story is set in Kauśāmbī. There a certain nun named Dundumā incurred a transgression, and those who were practicing the holy life alongside her, wishing her benefit, wishing her welfare, wishing her comfort, wishing to reach her, and wishing her accomplishment and ease, said to her: "Sister, you have incurred a transgression; come and deal with it." But she broke the instruction of those nuns. At that juncture the nuns reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, the nun Dundumā is to be subjected to the procedure for breaking instruction. The procedure for subjecting her is as follows: having prepared a seat," and so on up to: "Noble Saṅgha, sisters, please listen to me. This nun Dundumā has incurred a transgression, and those who were practicing the holy life alongside her, wishing her benefit, wishing her cure, wishing her comfort, wishing to reach her, and wishing her accomplishment and ease, said to her: 'Dundumā, you have incurred a transgression; come and deal with it.' But she broke their instruction. If the noble Saṅgha's time has come and it consents, let the noble Saṅgha grant this: let the nun Dundumā be subjected to the procedure for breaking instruction." This is the motion. The act is to be performed in exactly the same way.

She then thought: "If I keep silent or if I say nothing, I will not be subjected to the procedure." For there is also a verse to this effect:

A person endowed with wisdom should guard the four kinds of speech.
Within a forest, the top burns first — look to what is caught when sound is drawn out.

Having thought thus, she said nothing, and so she broke the instruction of the nuns. The Blessed One then declared: "She is to be subjected to the procedure for breaking instruction by both motion and act."

Now, while she was being given the instruction yet was in the act of breaking it, certain nuns of few concerns criticized her, and the nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, having related the incident beginning with the words "this occurrence," established a rule of training up to the following: if one breaks an instruction, one incurs a transgression.

"Breaking an instruction" means any speech, words, or utterance with the intention of breaking an instruction — and all the rest is as explained above. "Incurs a transgression" is likewise as explained above.

How does one come to incur a transgression in this matter? A nun goes to another nun and says: "Did you see a certain nun — one who shaved her head not long ago, wearing a patched robe of reddish-yellow, with a bowl covered by a leaf-lid, her bowl filled with butter, or filled with honey, or filled with milk, walking along?" And the other, replying to this, says: "I saw a nun walking on foot," giving a different answer to what was asked, and if this is done with the intention of breaking the instruction, she incurs a transgression.

A nun goes to another nun and says: "Did you see a certain nun who shaved her head not long ago —" and then all the rest is stated, and if this is done with the intention of breaking the instruction, she incurs a transgression — up to and including that point.

— wearing a patched robe of reddish-yellow, carrying a staff bound with an iron ring and bearing a bowl with a leaf-lid —"

A nun goes to another nun and says: "Did you see, along this road, a layman carrying a load of sugarcane, or a load of reeds, or a load of bamboo, or a load of arrows, or a pot of butter, or oil, or honey, or a pot with a sugar-froth lid, walking along?" And the other, replying to this, says: "I saw a layman coming on foot, but not by reason of those other things" — giving a different answer to what was asked, and if this is done with the intention of breaking the instruction, she incurs a transgression.

A nun goes to another nun and says: "Did you see, along this road, laywomen going about dressed all in blue, or all in yellow, or all in red, or all in white?" And the other, replying to this, says: "I saw a laywoman going on foot" — giving a different answer to what was asked, and if this is done with the intention of breaking the instruction, she incurs a transgression.

If someone who has fled from an executioner is being pursued by that executioner, and the executioner goes to a nun and says: "Noble one, did you see a fugitive who has committed murder passing along this road?" — then the nun should speak to that executioner in a way that is fitting with respect to the act of killing. If it is a time of heat, she should say: "Good sir, rest a little while, drink some cool water" — and she should fan him with a fan. If it is a time of cold, she should say: "Good sir, go and warm yourself somewhere, rest a little while in a warm place." If the executioner says: "Let the fugitive go, I release him" — she should look up at the sky and say: "I see the sky." Likewise she should look at her fingernails and say: "I see my fingernails." If the executioner has already seized the person and says: "I am not inquiring about these things of mine — I am inquiring about a murder" — then that nun, contemplating with supreme conviction that all formations are empty, should say: "I do not see even the slightest thing."

A nun goes to another nun and questions her in this way; if the nun breaks the instruction by remaining completely silent, she incurs a transgression. However, if medicine has been placed in her mouth due to illness, or if she has been struck by an affliction of the mouth, there is no transgression.

This completes the third part of the second section on transgressions.

The setting of the following rule is in Śrāvastī. At a time when the Blessed One, having observed that the monks were residing in great numbers at lodgings without a roof or shelter, established a rule of training — and at that time, those nuns who were by nature well-conducted followed and practiced that same rule of training — the group of twelve nuns, without refraining from the unroofed lodgings, went outside the boundary. Then the elder nuns said to that group of twelve the following: "Sisters, has the Blessed One not established a rule of training?" They replied: "The rule of training that was established is for monks, not for nuns." When they said this, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared:

"The rule of training that I established is common to both."

The Blessed One thus established that one must not take lodgings without a roof. Then, at a later time, the nuns traveled together as a group of companions to a certain mountain cave. They found lodgings in that temple, and when on the following day they were vacating those lodgings, they became separated from their companions, and while traveling alone they were assaulted by bandits. The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One should entrust the lodgings and then depart." Not knowing that the Blessed One had said this, the Blessed One then declared: "If one is staying in a temple, one should entrust it to a monk. If one is staying in a summer dwelling, one should entrust it to a nun." When they found it burdensome to entrust those lodgings to them, the Blessed One declared: "The entrusting of lodgings is fivefold. What are the five? Saying 'This is the temple'; saying 'Look to the temple'; saying 'This is the lodging'; saying 'Look to the lodging'; and the fifth is the locking of the door. Having done so, one may then depart."

Then the Blessed One, after praising to the nuns the wish to train and reverence for the training, spoke thus: "Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly leaves without having gathered up, or having had gathered up, or without having entrusted to a nun who is present, a throne of the Saṅgha, or a seat, or a cushion filled with cotton, or a mat, or bedding inserted in a frame, or a square cushion that she herself has placed without a roof covering — save for extraordinary circumstances, she commits a transgression."

"Whatever nun" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. "Of the Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of female hearers of the Tathāgata. "Temple" refers to a place that can accommodate the four activities. "Throne" refers to one for reclining. "Seat" refers to one for sitting. "Cushion filled with cotton" refers to one stuffed with tree-cotton. "Mat" refers to a mat. "Bedding inserted in a frame" refers to bedding fitted into a frame. "Square cushion" refers to a four-cornered one. "Without a roof covering" means open to the sky. "She herself has placed" means placed by herself. "Having had placed" means by another. "Without having gathered up" means by herself. "Without having had gathered up" means by another. "Departs without" means departing while abandoning the perimeter of the lodging.

What constitutes the perimeter of a lodging? The Blessed One declared: "Forty-nine arm-spans. If it is turned over, it is a transgression. If it is not turned over, it is a misdeed."

The venerable Upāli (the close attendant) asked the Blessed Buddha: "Venerable one, in how many ways may a lodging become turned over?" The close attendant said: "There are two. What are the two? Being turned over by rain, and being turned over by wind. What is being turned over by rain? If rain-water causes two layers of the lodging to become wet, it becomes a transgression. If not wet, it is a misdeed. This is called being turned over by rain. If wind causes two layers to be overturned, it becomes a transgression. If not overturned, it is a misdeed."

"If, while on the road, one remembers, one should arouse the intention and also say aloud: 'I have placed such a lodging in such a place; may the celibate practitioners inspect it.' And that transgression should thereupon be remedied according to the Dharma. If while on the road one sees a nun, one should entrust it even verbally, wherever one has gone, one should entrust it even verbally; and that transgression too should be remedied according to the Dharma."

"Without having entrusted to a nun who is present" means whichever nun happens to be there at that time.

"Except in such a case" means whatever would become an obstacle to her very life. "It is a transgression" is as above.

Now, how does a transgression come about? If a nun, to whatever small extent, places uncovered bedding — thrones, small seats, and cushions belonging to the Saṅgha in the Saṅgha's monastery, as stated from "thrones" onward — or has it placed there, and then departs without having gathered it up or caused it to be gathered, in all such cases it incurs a transgression. If a nun places uncovered bedding belonging to the Saṅgha in the Saṅgha's monastery, or has it placed there, and then enters the monastery and sets it properly within, thinking, "I shall establish mindfulness that has not been established, settle the mind that has not been settled, or liberate the mind that has not been liberated," and during the first half of the first session it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression. If it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if during the first session itself it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if during the first half of the middle session it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if during the middle session itself it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if during the first half of the last session it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if during the last session itself it comes about that she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if it comes about at the time of the first gleam of dawn, and she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if it does not come to sleep, it is a misdeed. Likewise with the last gleam of dawn; likewise at the time of the elephants being led out; likewise when the elephants have been led out; likewise when it becomes the time of sleeping by night; likewise when it becomes light; likewise at the moment of sunrise; likewise at the tip of the sun's rays; likewise in the early warmth of morning; likewise in the great heat of day; likewise when it has passed midday — in all these cases, if she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if she does not sleep, it is a misdeed.

The phrase "in the Saṅgha's monastery" and what follows up to "thinking, 'I shall liberate the mind that has not been liberated'" refers to her having entered for the purpose of setting it properly within. The phrase "from the third blowing of the conch" through "when it comes about at the time of sunset" — if she sleeps, that incurs a transgression; if she does not sleep, it is a misdeed.

The condensed verse summarizing the root text of the teacher is as follows:

Listening to Dharma, and likewise eating food, and likewise entering a dwelling, entrusting to the monastery, the sick, and bedding —
these five are not to be entrusted, and two persons sitting on a single throne.

Then it came about that the wives of brahmins and householders came in great numbers to the nuns' rains-retreat quarters, and those nuns passed the time with them in idle conversation and gossip. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, it is not fitting to engage in idle conversation and gossip. Instead, you should teach the Dharma." They then rose, and respectfully seating themselves in front, began to teach the Dharma. The Blessed One declared: "Teach the Dharma while seated, and offer seats to those laywomen as well." When the Blessed One had declared that the Dharma should be taught while seated, those nuns then arranged themselves in a long row. The Blessed One declared: "The two kinds of seats should be set out in a crescent shape or arranged in a square."

When the Blessed One declared that the Dharma should be taught, the nuns did not know who among them should teach. The Blessed One declared: "Whoever possesses the power of eloquence, let her teach."

Then it came about that the senior nuns lacked the power to speak well, and the younger nuns began to teach. When this happened, the senior nuns would go from their own seats down to where the younger ones sat in order to listen, and in doing so they became forgetful of their place. The Blessed One then declared: "A lion's throne for the Dharma-teacher should be set out, and she is to teach from the lion's throne."

When the Blessed One had declared that teaching should be done from the lion's throne, some nuns began to expound very long sūtras at great length, and the laywomen grew weary. The Blessed One then declared: "It is permitted to teach by counting a third part, then from a fifth down to a third part, and stopping when the Teacher's full proclamation has been recited."

When the laywomen were serving food and became busy, the nuns began to collect the vessels and utensils. The Blessed One declared: "Receive them." When the nuns had collected the seats, the Blessed One declared: "Receive them." Then when those laywomen invited the nuns as guests to their homes, the Blessed One declared: "Go there as well, and partake of what is offered."

Thereupon the laywomen said to the nuns: "Noble ones, why have you come without bringing your water vessels?" The Blessed One declared: "In that case too, jars, round vessels, seats, and the lion's throne should be brought along."

Now, there was a nun who was ill, and she said: "Sisters, I am going to die." The other nuns said: "But what of it?" She then said: "No one comes to ask after me when I am sick." The Blessed One therefore declared: "You should go and look in on the sick. If one does not go to visit the sick, it constitutes an offense."

When the Blessed One had declared that the sick should be visited, the gong was struck from then on, and the entire Saṅgha would set out to visit the sick nun. But when the sick nun saw the entire Saṅgha arriving, she thought: "Why has the entire Saṅgha come? Surely I am not about to die!" and she became frightened. The Blessed One then declared: "In that case, one or two should go."

When they went and found there were no seats, the Blessed One declared: "For the purpose of asking after the sick, seats are to be placed." But when they were placed, some thought: "The Blessed One has said that one should not abandon one's lodging without a cover." And since those nuns were guarding and staying right in that place, they were neglecting their duties to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, the preceptors, and the teachers. The Blessed One therefore declared: "Entrust your duties to someone and then go."

So the nuns entrusted their duties to the sick nun. The Blessed One then declared, from the words "The Blessed One declared" through to "one should not abandon one's lodging without a cover on account of five conditions": those five conditions being old age, shamelessness, the presence of obstacles, the absence of remorse, and not having received full ordination — on account of these one should not abandon the lodging. If one does abandon it, it constitutes an offense.

When two nuns are sharing a single throne, which of them should fold it away? The Blessed One declared: "The more junior one." If both are of equal seniority, then if one is willing, she should do it alone.

This completes the fourth section of the second category of offenses.

The setting is Śrāvastī.

At the time when the Blessed One laid down the training rule concerning grass-mat seats on account of a monk who had come from the south, those nuns who were living in accordance with the precepts heard of it and put it into practice. The monks of the Group of Twelve, however, spread out grass-mat seats, had them spread out by others, and then neither folded them away themselves nor had them folded away. Then those nuns said to the monks of the Group of Twelve: "Dear brothers, has not the Blessed One laid down a training rule? Why do you not fold up the grass-mat seats?" Those monks replied: "That training rule was laid down for monks, not for nuns." At that point they were censuring the nuns of few wishes; and when the nuns told this to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One, the Blessed One — from "this incident having occurred" up through the laying down of the training — established the rule as follows:

Whatever nun spreads out a grass-mat seat or a leaf-mat seat in the Saṅgha's assembly hall, or has one spread out by another, and then neither folds it away herself nor has it folded away, and goes away without entrusting it to a nun who is present — except for such circumstances as are specified — it is an offense. "Whatever nun" is as stated above.

With respect to "a grass-mat seat or leaf-mat seat": "grass" means grass itself; "leaf" means leaves themselves. "Spreads out" means by oneself. "Has spread out" means by another. "Does not fold away" means by oneself. "Does not have folded away" means by another. "Goes away" means having departed from its vicinity.

What is the vicinity of a mat seat? The Blessed One declared: Forty-nine arm-lengths. If it becomes entangled, it is an offense. If it does not become entangled, it is a misdeed.

Upāli asked: In how many ways can a mat seat become entangled? Upāli, there are two ways: entanglement by wind, and entanglement by insects. What is entanglement by wind? Wind causes the mat seat to reverse its two layers — that constitutes an offense. If it does not reverse, it is a misdeed. This is called entanglement by wind. What is entanglement by insects? If insects cause the mat seat's two layers to be gnawed through — if gnawed through, it is an offense. If not gnawed through, it is a misdeed.

"If one remembers while walking on the road, it is a misdeed" — from there onward, it should be elaborated in full in accordance with the lodging section. "It is an offense" is as stated above.

How does the offense come about? Whenever a nun has spread out or had spread out a grass-mat seat or leaf-mat seat in the Saṅgha's assembly hall, and has neither folded it away nor had it folded away — for as long as she has departed from its vicinity, in every instance it constitutes an offense.

Furthermore, whatever nun spreads out or has spread out a grass-mat seat or a leaf-mat seat in the Saṅgha's assembly hall without a cover, then, having entered the assembly hall, has properly settled within herself the intention: "I shall establish mindfulness that had not been established, I shall place in equipoise a mind that had not been placed in equipoise, I shall liberate a mind that had not been liberated" — if, when half of the first session has passed and entanglement occurs, it is an offense. If entanglement does not occur, it is a misdeed. From "at the setting of the sun" up through "if entanglement occurs, it is an offense; if it does not occur, it is a misdeed," it should be elaborated in full in accordance with the lodging section.

As for those who had spread out mat seats by the roadside and had lain down and were now filled with remorse, the Blessed One declared: "They should roll them up."

If one does not roll them up, it becomes an offense with remainder.

Thereafter, when dyeing work was being done in the rains retreat dwelling, the nuns had spread out grass, and those who desired training gathered that grass together and threw it outside the rains retreat dwelling, while others were left without any. From that point, the Blessed One declared: "If someone says 'please take a little less,' one should not throw it away." This completes the sixth rule in the second category of offenses.

The setting for the following is at Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Stout Delight went wandering about after the summer rains retreat had ended. The young nuns then said to their preceptresses and instructresses: "Venerable ones, we too wish to go wandering." Those teachers asked: "Together with whom?" The young nuns replied: "With the venerable Stout Delight." The teachers said: "Do not go." "Why not?" "Because Stout Delight habitually keeps bad company." Even so, the young nuns went wandering with her. As they went wandering, they came to a certain forest grove. There, those young nuns gathered grass, laid out mats, and lay down. Stout Delight leapt into their midst, harmed and molested them, and then, having chased them off their seats, said: "Whoever cannot bear it, let them leave." The nuns then returned the following morning. The nun Stout Delight said to them: "I shall provide medicines and the like for your ailments." From that point up through "those young nuns reported the matter in full to their preceptresses and instructresses" is to be understood as described.

When the Blessed One was being informed of those nuns of few words being censured, the Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" onward, proceeded to establish the training rule:

"Whatever nun, knowing that other nuns are already seated, then makes use of that very fact as a condition, presses in afterward, and sits down on a seat — it is an offense. Whatever nun" refers to Stout Delight. "Knowingly" means having been told by herself or by another. "Already seated" means seated beforehand. "Presses in afterward" means forces her way in at once. "On a seat" means on a mat. "Sits down" means sits or reclines one's body. "Whoever cannot bear it" means whoever cannot fit. "Let them leave" means let them rise and go. "That very fact as a condition" means no other pretext. How does a transgression arise in this matter? However much and to whatever extent a nun, while knowing that nuns are already seated, presses in afterward and sits down so that whoever cannot bear it must leave — in every such case it becomes an offense. If one is ill, there is no transgression. If one is frightened, there is no transgression. This completes the sixth rule in the second category of offenses.

The setting for the following is at Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Stout Delight went wandering about together with her retinue, and arrived at Śrāvastī. It being the custom in the Blessed One's teaching that monks and nuns distribute lodgings, the nuns were distributing the lodgings in the nuns' rains retreat dwelling. A portion fell to Stout Delight, specifically an upper-story room. Lacking all heedfulness, she remained in that lodging. While residing there, she caused the roof timbers to crack by striking them with the legs of a chair — — and a chair leg fell through, striking the head of a nun who was below. The nuns of little desire then censured her, and the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and so forth, proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Whatever nun presses down heavily upon a chair or a small chair whose legs protrude upward through the uppermost room above the hall of a monastic residence, and sits or lies there, it is an offense." As for "whatever nun," that refers to Stout Delight. As for "of the Saṅgha," that refers to the community of the Tathāgata's female hearers. As for "hall," that refers to a place that can accommodate the four modes of conduct. As for "above the hall," that refers to the upper story. As for "uppermost room," that refers to the dwelling room. As for "whose legs protrude," that refers to the feet of the chair sticking through. As for "sits," that refers to being seated. As for "lies," that refers to reclining the body. How does the offense arise? Whenever a nun sits or lies in the uppermost room of the upper story of the hall upon a chair or small chair with legs protruding through, in all cases it is an offense. However, if the floor is covered with planks, or covered with flat boards, or there are cross-beams, or flat pieces of wood, or small flat pieces of wood covering it, or it is sealed shut, or a foot-rest is inserted beneath — in such cases there is no offense.

This completes the seventh rule in the second category of offenses.

The setting for the following is at Śrāvastī. At that time, Stout Delight watered grass with water containing living creatures, and also watered soil with such water. The nuns said to her, "Sister, do not water grass or soil with water containing living creatures." She replied, saying, "What account has been given to her, and what has been entrusted to her? If one goes to the great ocean of the east, what is the harm? If one goes to the great oceans of the south and west, what is the harm?" The nuns of little desire censured her, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and so forth, proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Whatever nun waters grass, or soil, or earth with water containing living creatures, or causes another to do so, it is an offense." As for "whatever nun," that refers to Stout Delight. As for "containing living creatures," living creatures are of two kinds: those that are visible to the naked eye, and those that are caught by a strainer. As for "with water," that refers to watering with water, soil, mud, clay, or slurry. As for "waters," that refers to doing so oneself. As for "causes another to do so," that refers to having others do it. As for "it is an offense," this is as stated above. How does the offense arise? If a nun, perceiving water that contains living creatures as containing living creatures, waters with it herself or causes another to do so, it is an offense. Likewise, if she is in doubt, it is an offense. If a nun, perceiving water that does not contain living creatures as containing living creatures, waters with it herself or causes another to do so, it is a misdeed. Likewise, if she is in doubt, it is a misdeed. If a nun draws water and as many living creatures as die thereby correspond to that many offenses, and as many as do not die correspond to that many misdeeds. Likewise for diverting a stream, breaking irrigation channels for a field, and blocking and releasing water — in all such cases the basis determines the outcome accordingly.

This completes the eighth rule in the second category of offenses.

The Vinaya Exposition for Nuns, the eighteenth fascicle.

The setting for the following is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One declared:

Merit is the thing to be done;
when merit is not done, suffering follows.
In this world and in the next, one who has made merit shall rejoice —
at that time,

those nuns set about constructing a residence hall, a fence, a gate-house, and the like. Then Bhomgamo thought to herself: "I have fallen away from such a great accumulation of merit," and in the early morning she tied on her waist-cloth, took up her bowl and robe, went to the home of a merchant's wife, and upon arriving spoke thus: "May the noble lady be free from illness." The householder's wife then spread a seat for Bhomgamo. Bhomgamo sat down on the seat that had been spread. Having sat, she extensively expounded the sūtra on the seven meritorious acts arising from material things, and in so doing inspired faith in the householder's wife and led her to make an offering. At that point she said to her: "Please give some materials for a temple." This is the account up to that point.

Then Bhomgamo began to build on that summer-retreat building — it had no window-openings and no water-outlet — something resembling a cuboid enclosure. At that, the other nuns said to Bhomgamo: "Did the Blessed One not declare that, for the gate-house and the permanent residence of the Blessed One, one should plaster it to a height of two or three courses? He declared that to the monks, not to the nuns." But she replied: "Even so, daughters of good family, sisters — since I am one who holds the three scriptural collections, I know how a temple ought to be built." And when she belittled the nuns of lesser learning, the nuns told the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, taking the incident that had occurred as his basis, proceeded through all the steps up to the laying down of the training rule, which reads: When a nun undertakes to build a large temple, she should survey the site with the intention that it will have a gate-house, permanent quarters, and a lit chamber, and then plaster it to a height of two or three courses. If she builds higher than that, it is an offense.

Now, as for the word "large": "large" is of two kinds — large with respect to what is to be given, and large with respect to measure. In this context it is understood to mean large with respect to what is to be given. "Temple" means a place that can accommodate the four departments. "Undertakes to build" means either oneself or another. "Gate-house and permanent quarters" means with the perception of a gate-house, with the perception of a window-opening, and with the perception of a water-outlet. "Two or three courses of plastering" — "plastering" means daubing with clay; "courses" means layers; "should plaster it" means it is to be raised up. "Higher than that" means above that. "It is an offense" — as before. How does the transgression arise? However much a nun plasters beyond two or three courses, she incurs an offense for every bit of it. If the temple is built from stone, or if the owner of the temple is far away, there is no offense.

This completes the ninth rule in the second category of offenses.

The setting for the following is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the venerable Śāriputra was residing at a dwelling of the naked ascetics, and a householder's wife together with her retinue was firmly established in the fruit of stream-entry — relying on that very circumstance, twelve thousand two hundred sentient beings were caused to see the truth — taking the venerable Śāriputra as the basis and having carefully considered the matter, the Blessed One laid down a training rule. At that time, the twelve groups were sleeping together in a single dwelling and eating in a single dwelling, and they were also eating the last portion of the almsfood left over. At this the nuns who were of proper conduct spoke thus: "Sisters, did the Blessed One not lay down a training rule concerning the dwelling?"

They replied, saying: "The rule that the Blessed One laid down is for the monks, not for the nuns." And so it was that the nuns who were few in their concerns, who were given to reproach, reported the matter to the monks, and the monks in turn reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." proceeded through to the laying down of a training rule. "Whatever nun, being in good health, dwells in a single dwelling, shall eat almsfood one single time; if she eats more than that, it is a transgression." The phrase "sleeps in a single dwelling" means: sleeping in the dwelling of non-Buddhists. The phrase "whatever nun" refers to the twelve groups. The phrase "being in good health" means: excepting one who is ill. The phrase "shall eat almsfood one single time" means: it is not the last leftover portion. The phrase "more than that" means: going beyond that. The phrase "it is a transgression" is as stated above.

As to how a transgression arises in this regard: if a nun stays for however short a time in a single dwelling, or eats in a single dwelling while remaining there, she has committed an offense in that stay; and if she eats, it is a transgression. If she stays in a single dwelling but eats elsewhere, she has committed an offense in that stay; but in eating elsewhere there is no transgression. If she eats in a single dwelling but then goes to stay elsewhere, in eating in the single dwelling she incurs a transgression; but in going to stay elsewhere there is no transgression. If she goes to stay elsewhere and also eats elsewhere, there is no transgression in either regard.

Here ends the tenth rule under the second category of transgressions.

The summary verse:

Carrying a load, gathering, untimely acts, placing without permission — these make the fifth.
Living creatures therein included, and two who feign to be bedmates.
Naked, beyond two nights among soldiers, and watching at an assembly.

The occasion for this rule was in Śrāvastī. At that time a certain householder took a wife of equal social standing, and he would play with that wife, enjoy her company, and sport with her in pleasure, until the time came when she gave birth to a daughter born with a birthmark on the right side. The narrative then continues through to where the story unfolds of a plan being laid to kill the wife, and a date being set. Many people accordingly made preparations on her account. Then, a certain friend and close companion, entering that house to seek alms, was addressed by the two of them in this manner: "Lady of fair marks, give us alms." She replied, saying: "I am in some distress." The two of them said: "What troubles you?" She replied: "The task has fallen to me of delivering the infant born with the right-side birthmark." The two of them said: "If our sister gives birth today, will we not receive alms today itself?" And with joyful, pleased, and greatly delighted minds, they gave a great quantity of alms. The two of them took the alms and departed.

After them, Stout Delight and Crown Delight arrived, and those two likewise took alms and departed. Then it came to pass that Joyful Victory and Near-Joyful-Victory saw Stout Delight and Crown Delight with their hands and begging bowls full. Seeing this, they said: "Sister, the infant born with the right-side birthmark is being delivered today — go now!" Then Joyful Victory and Near-Joyful-Victory also went to that very place to seek alms. In the same way, Companion of Victory and Guardian of Victory went; and likewise Virtuous One and Supremely Virtuous One; and likewise Beautiful Delight and Queen-Possessing One also went. All the preparations that had been made for the delivery of the infant with the right-side birthmark — every last thing — was given to the twelve groups.

While they were beginning to make further preparations, a certain close friend of the one known as the Wife-Killer said: "The girl with the right-side birthmark has many faults. The tooth-stick of the lac tree and..."

"Sleeping while showing the left side at night, drinking the midnight curd, and taking the right-side portion — and peace, too, departs from its place," he said. In this way he created an obstacle to that right-side woman's receiving her portion.

The brahmins and householders began to revile the conduct and the holy conduct of the renunciants, the sons of the Śākyas, saying: "Their renunciant conduct and their brahminical conduct are burned away, for they create obstacles to the girl's receiving her portion." On that occasion the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, beginning with the words "This has arisen..." and continuing up to the promulgation of the training rule, established the rule. Furthermore, when the nuns go out in great numbers to the houses, if faithful brahmins and householders happen to serve them abundantly with curds or oils, and if a nun so wishes, she may accept up to one bowl-load or up to three measures. If she takes more than that, it constitutes a transgression. Having received one bowl-load or three measures, she should go outside the house to the pleasure garden and share it with the nuns assembled there. That is the procedure in this matter.

Now, "nuns" refers to the twelve groups. "When going to the houses" means to the houses of brahmins and householders. "If faithful brahmins and householders" — "faithful" means those possessing faith in the Buddha, faith in the Dharma, and faith in the Saṅgha, up to and including those who have attained a fruit. "Abundantly" means sufficiently. "Serve" means when inviting as guests. "Curds" means powdered. "Oils" means carried. "If she wishes" means if she desires it. "One bowl-load or three" — "one bowl-load" means a large one. "Three" means small, medium, and large. Among these, "large" is the size of a small vessel of the Magadha country. "Small" is half of that small vessel. "Medium" is the middle one. Having received them, she should go outside the house to the pleasure garden and share with the nuns who are assembled in the monastery. "Those assembled there" means the nuns who are present there. "More than that" means exceeding that amount. "Constitutes a transgression" — as above. How does a transgression arise in this case? If a nun takes three large bowl-loads, it constitutes a transgression. If she takes two large and one medium, it constitutes a transgression. If she takes two medium and one large, it constitutes a transgression. However much a nun takes in excess of a single small vessel-measure, in every such case it constitutes a transgression. This completes the first part of the third group of transgressions.

The context is Rājagṛha. At the time when the Blessed One had prohibited the eating of communal food in connection with Devadatta, the nuns then argued that it was held in common by both. Thereafter, some became ill and were unable to sustain themselves on a single meal, and so the Blessed One declared: "When one is ill, it is the appropriate time — eat." Similarly, regarding those who had set out on a journey and had grown hungry and were unable to engage in virtuous activity, from that point up to "they should eat" — the same applies. Similarly, those performing labor may also eat. Similarly, those who have boarded a boat may also eat. Similarly, when many are assembled and provisions have arrived, the Blessed One declared: "They may eat." Similarly, a male wanderer (parivrājaka) or a female wanderer who has faith in the teaching of the Buddha — from what is received from them one may also eat. "Nuns, what is received from a wanderer who has faith in the teaching of the Buddha is rare," the Blessed One said.

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of the nuns' aspiration for the training, their respect for the training, and their devotion to the training as a resource, spoke these words:

Eating together outside of the permitted times constitutes a transgression. The permitted times are these: the time of illness, the time of work, the time of travel, when one has boarded a boat, when a great assembly has gathered, and the time of the ascetic's meal. "Eating together" means eating in a mixed gathering. "Outside of the permitted times" means, for example, when one has fallen ill and a single meal is not sufficient to sustain life. "The time of travel" means what is given by a donor to one who has set out on a journey. "Having boarded a boat" means alms given by a donor at the time of boarding a boat. "A great assembly has gathered" means food when many are assembled. "The time of the ascetic's meal" — here, one who has gone forth from the traditions outside this teaching is called an ascetic. "That is the permitted time" means that it is a circumstance in accordance with the rule.

How does a transgression arise in this? If a nun, perceiving herself to be within a boundary when she is within a boundary, eats together, it is a transgression. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun, perceiving herself to be within a boundary when she is outside a boundary, eats together, it is a wrongdoing. If she eats with doubt, it is a wrongdoing.

If a nunnery has both a main hall and cloisters, and some nuns eat in the main hall while others eat in the cloisters, those who are eating in the main hall must ask those eating in the cloisters, "Have you been satisfied with food?" If they eat without asking, it is a transgression for those in the main hall, and a wrongdoing for those in the cloisters. The same is to be said of dwelling quarters, gatehouse, and so forth. If they have been satisfied with food, even the smallest bit — a sip of plain water or a taste of salt — being offered is sufficient, and there is no transgression.

This completes the second rule under the third category of transgressions.

The occasion for the following rule was in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the group of seventeen, established the training rule concerning eating at an improper time, the group of twelve would eat at the proper time and also eat at improper times. The nuns then said, "Has the Blessed One not established a training rule concerning eating at improper times?" Those of the group of twelve replied, "He established it for the monks but not for the nuns." The nuns of few desires then reproached them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This has occurred," proceeded through to the formal establishment of the training rule:

Furthermore, whatever nun eats or swallows solid or liquid food at an improper time commits a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to those of the group of twelve. As for "at an improper time," there are two kinds of improper time: the improper time after midday has passed, and the improper time before dawn has arisen. "Solid food" and "liquid food" refer to the five kinds of solid food and the five kinds of liquid food. "Eats or swallows" means if it is swallowed down the throat. "Transgression" is as explained above.

How does a transgression arise? If a nun, perceiving it to be an improper time when it is indeed an improper time, eats or swallows, it is a transgression. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, it is a transgression. If a nun, perceiving it to be an improper time when it is in fact a proper time, eats or swallows, it is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, it is a wrongdoing.

This completes the third rule under the third category of transgressions.

The occasion for the following rule was in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the case of Kālakāraka the dark one, established the training rule concerning stored food, the group of twelve, after going for alms, would separately set aside dry cooked rice, and separately set aside wet cooked rice, and whatever remained after use they would dry out and store away.

Whenever wind arose or famine struck, the group would wash those stores with water, cook them over fire, and consume them. The nuns who were concerned about minor matters criticized this, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurred," established the training rule up to the point of the formal promulgation. The rule is: whatever nun, having stored food, prepares it or eats it, commits a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to the group of twelve. As for "having stored food," there are two kinds of storing: receiving the earlier food and storing the later food, or receiving the later food and storing it beyond the proper time. As for "prepares it or eats it," this is as before. As for "commits a transgression," and what precedes, this is as in the sections above.

How does a transgression come about in this case? If a nun perceives stored food as stored and eats it, she commits a transgression. If she perceives unstored food as stored and eats it, it is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, it is a wrongdoing. If she stores robes, she commits a transgression. If she stores a bowl, she commits a transgression. If she stores a water vessel, she commits a transgression. If she stores a door-bolt, it is a wrongdoing. If she stores a bent key, it is a wrongdoing. If she stores a door-bolt pin, it is a wrongdoing.

This completes the fourth rule under the third category of transgressions.

The occasion for the following rule was in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the case of the great black monk of the charnel-ground ascetics, established the training rule concerning the acceptance of offerings, the nuns did not understand what the proper acceptance was and what was to be accepted. The nuns asked the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "There are five kinds of acceptance. What are the five? Accepting body-to-body contact, accepting with the body what is connected to the body, accepting what is connected to the body with what is connected to the body, accepting with the body what is connected to the body through contact, and the fifth is the act of setting down the prescribed ceremony." As for what is referred to as an object of reproach — that they also lie down with their mothers — he declared: "Draw a circle on the ground there and receive the offering." When fruits were found and the nuns did not know how to accept them, the Blessed One declared: "There are five kinds of acceptance: a bowl, a throne, a low seat, a strainer, and a begging bowl — one accepts by touching these with the hand." When those items that have been accepted are stirred and if they are caught without falling they are themselves the accepted items. Even if they roll far away, one may accept them again. These items are to be rendered fit for use. Since the nuns did not know how many ways there were to render them fit for use, the Blessed One declared: "There are five ways of rendering fit for use. What are the five? Rendering fit by fire, rendering fit by a blade, rendering fit by a bird's beak, rendering fit by a fingernail, and the fifth is rendering fit by wilting. And further, there are five ways of rendering fit: by removing, by splitting, by cutting, by piercing, and the fifth is by eliminating the capacity for germination. For blue ones, this same method renders them fit." Later, when brahmins and householders wished to obtain some of those items, the Blessed One declared, since they had not been given: "Give them." When nuns, having set out on a journey, were staying in a remote forest place, they accepted offerings from forest lions, monkeys, bears, and the like. It was evident that they held them, and it was equally evident that they accepted from those animals. While they were on the road and encountered a shortage of water and tooth-cleaning sticks, the nuns reported the matter to the monks. The monks reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "With the exception of water and tooth-cleaning sticks, it is permitted." Then the Blessed One, having offered praise to the nuns for their desire for training, their reverence for training, and their use of requisites in training, spoke these words: "Furthermore, whatever nun, with the exception of water and tooth-cleaning sticks, eats swallowable food by mouth without it having been given, that is a transgression. As for 'whatever nun,' these are those who belong to this Dharma. As for 'without having been given,' that means it has not been given by anyone. As for 'by mouth,' that means eating it with the mouth. As for 'the rule,' it is as before. As for 'with the exception of water and tooth-cleaning sticks,' water and tooth-cleaning sticks are set aside. As for 'that is a transgression,' it is as stated above. Now, how does a transgression come about? If a nun, perceiving as given what has not been given by a nun, touches or eats it, that is a transgression. Likewise, if she eats it with doubt, that is a transgression. If a nun, perceiving as not given what has in fact been given by a nun, eats or touches it, that is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she eats it with doubt, that is a wrongdoing."

Intermediate summary verse:

The five instances of giving, and the fruit,
And likewise the five that are permissible,
And those from lions, monkeys, and bears —
These the Tathāgata permitted;
This is the intermediate summary.

The fifth item of the third category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion is Kauśāmbī. At that time there was water containing living creatures, and the nuns who were there said: "Sisters, do not use water containing living creatures." Those women replied: "Who are you to count and assign us our conduct? If we go to the great eastern ocean, what harm is there? If we go to the great southern, western, or northern ocean, what harm is there?" Nuns of few desires censured them, and the matter was then reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly uses water containing living creatures, that is a transgression. As for 'whatever nun,' these are those who are fully ordained and nearly fully ordained. As for 'water containing living creatures,' living creatures are of two kinds: those that are visible to the eye and those that are caught by a water-strainer. As for 'uses,' use is of two kinds: internal and external. External use consists of bathing, splashing, washing things such as clothes, soaking them, causing them to be dried, and having others perform such actions — this is called external use. Tooth-cleaning sticks are also included, as is drinking. As for 'that is a transgression,' it is as stated above. Now, how does a transgression come about? If a nun, perceiving water containing living creatures as water containing living creatures, uses it in either way, that is a transgression. Likewise, if she uses it with doubt, that is a transgression. If a nun, perceiving water without living creatures as water containing living creatures, and uses it in either way, that is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she uses it with doubt, that is a wrongdoing. In the same way, branches, leaves, fruits, and the like containing living creatures should also be explained."

The sixth item of the third category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion is Śrāvastī. At that time there was a young boy who sold perfume and incense, not yet taken in marriage and not yet of adult age, who was staying in a shop one evening to keep watch. In the middle of the night the shop door was closed and he departed for home, whereupon he was seen entering the domain of a woman called Bhadrā.

Seeing this, she thought, "Oh my, that boy is going home with desire in his mind," and so, having followed after him some distance, she entered the home of that young perfume merchant and sat down on a seat and remained there. Then the young merchant returned home and began to look for his wife, whereupon she said to him, "Noble lady, your mistress is sitting here." When the boy then saw Bhadrā, he began to disparage the nuns who had gone forth in the way of the Śākya daughters, and to speak ill of their conduct as renunciants and their conduct of celibacy, saying: "How is it that even when one's own wife is alone with one in a private place, one cannot find the opportunity?" He mocked them in this way, and the matter of monks and nuns of few wants being reviled was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule. The rule is:

Whatever nun, knowingly, in a home where someone goes to seek out a man to lie with, pushes her way in by force and sits down on a seat, that is a transgression.

The words "whatever nun" refer to Bhadrā. The words "goes to seek out a man to lie with" mean that a woman goes to seek out a man for sexual intercourse. "In a home" means in the home of householders. "Pushes her way in" means abruptly, without leave. "Sits down" means if she sits down. "That is a transgression" is as explained above.

As for how the transgression arises: in whatever home where someone goes to seek out a man to lie with, if the nun pushes her way in by force and sits down on a seat, in all such cases it becomes a transgression.

The seventh item of the third category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion is Śrāvastī. Then Bhadrā, in the morning, having donned her lower robe and taken her outer Dharma robe and alms bowl, entered her round of almsgiving, and Bhadrā then saw that same young perfume merchant going home. Bhadrā thought to herself: "The Blessed One has established a training rule concerning sitting; as for me, I shall stand in the doorway." Thereupon the young perfume merchant saw her and began to revile her. From "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," the rule was established:

Whatever nun, knowingly, in a home where someone goes to seek out a man to lie with, in a private place with access to shelter, stands there, that is a transgression.

The words "whatever nun" refer to Bhadrā. The words "knowingly" mean either she herself knows it, or it was said to her by another. The remaining terms are as before.

As for how the transgression arises: in whatever home where someone goes to seek out a man to lie with, in a private place with access to shelter, if the nun stands there, in all such cases it becomes a transgression. If, however, she is frightened or there is an obstruction, there is no transgression.

The eighth item of the third category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion is Rājagṛha. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence on Ānanda, established the training rule concerning male and female naked wanderers, the twelve sects were preparing and serving food with their own hands and giving it to male and female naked wanderers and to male and female parivrājakas, and the matter of monks and nuns of few wants being reviled was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule:

Whatever nun, with her own hands, prepares and serves food and gives it to a male or female naked wanderer, or to a male or female wandering ascetic, that is a transgression.

The words "whatever nun" refer to the twelve sects. "Male naked wanderer" means one without clothing. "Female naked wanderer" likewise means one without clothing. Similarly, "wandering ascetic" (parivrājaka) refers to the Sāṃkhyas.

"Female wandering ascetic" is likewise the same. "With her own hands" means hand to hand. From "food and provisions" through "that is a transgression" is as before. How does a transgression come about? If a nun gives even so little as a morsel of food or provisions with her own hands to anyone from a naked wanderer through to a female wandering ascetic, that is a transgression. However, if the recipient is her father or mother, there is no transgression. If someone who has come to visit wishes to be given something, there is no transgression. If someone begs, one should say to them: "Place your begging bowl on the ground," and then speak accordingly. If they have placed it down, one may give. But if they have not placed it down, one should not give. This completes the ninth rule of the third section on transgressions.

The narrative setting is in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the group of six, established the training rule concerning watching troops on parade, the twelve sects then went to watch the troops on parade. This was the occasion when nuns of few wants expressed disapproval, and it was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule: Whatever nun goes to watch troops on parade, that is a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to the twelve sects. "Parade" means taking delight in troops. As for "troops," there are four kinds of troops: troops of one division, troops of two divisions, troops of three divisions, and troops of four divisions. Troops of one division are those of elephants. Troops of two divisions are those of elephants and cavalry. Troops of three divisions are those of elephants, cavalry, and chariots. Troops of four divisions are those of elephants, cavalry, chariots, and infantry. "To watch" means for the purpose of watching. "If she goes" means if she proceeds. "That is a transgression" is as before. How does a transgression come about? If a nun goes even a little way for the purpose of watching troops on parade, in every case it is a transgression. If she is sitting in the corridor of a rain-retreat dwelling, there is no transgression. This completes the tenth rule of the third section on transgressions.

The narrative setting is in Śrāvastī. At the time when brigands returned to King Prasenajit, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada and others gave food, and the lay practitioners too were sent there by the king and went. After that, having requested permission from the Saṅgha, the group of six went. At that time the training rule on a limit of two days was established for the group of six. Then at another time, the twelve sects remained at the military encampment until the end of two days. When they came back, those nuns said the following: "Dear friends, dear companions, the plump companions have returned — welcome, welcome! From where did you come here, and where did you stay?" Those nuns replied: "We went to teach the Dharma to the troops on parade and stayed right there." Then those other nuns said: "Did the Blessed One not establish the training rule on the limit of two days?" They replied: "That rule was established for the monks, not for the nuns." This was the occasion when nuns of few wants expressed disapproval, and it was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule: If it happens that a nun must look upon troops on parade due to such a necessity, she may stay within that encampment for up to two days. If she remains beyond that, it is a transgression.

"A nun" refers to one of the twelve assemblies. "If such a necessity arises" means except when such a necessity has arisen. "Eager" means taking delight in the troops. The phrase "troops" through "four kinds" has already been explained. "At the limit of two days" means within two days. "Beyond that" means past that limit. "It is a transgression" is as explained above. How does the transgression come about? Whatever amount, even a little, beyond two days a nun remains within the camp, in every case it is a transgression.

The twelfth rule under the third category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion for the following took place in Śrāvastī. The passage beginning with "when the householder Anāthapiṇḍada sent word" and ending with "she remained within that camp up to the limit of two days" is as given. At that time, the Blessed One established for those nuns the training rule concerning the display of battle, the finest of victory banners. Then those twelve assemblies again went to see the display of battle, the finest of victory banners, and entered the finest of the troops. The nuns said: "Sisters, has a training rule not been established?" They replied: "That rule was established for the monks, not for the nuns." The nuns of few wants expressed disapproval, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule: Furthermore, if a nun who has remained two days within that camp then individually experiences seeing the display of battle, the finest of victory banners, the finest of the troops, and a marshaled formation of troops, it is a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to the twelve assemblies. Regarding "seeing a marshaled formation," "marshaled" refers to formations resembling the shape of a chariot, or the shape of a garuḍa's wings, or the face of a grain ear, or the shape of a lotus, or the shape of a half-moon. "Formation" refers to the finest of troops. "It is a transgression" is as before. How does the transgression come about? Whatever amount, even a little, a nun goes into the midst of a display of battle, in every case it is a transgression.

The twelfth rule of the third category of transgressions is complete.

The summary verse:

Striking and the palm of the hand, washing, concealing, soliciting for alms, accepting an ill abode, hiding at a house and at a fire, desire and two nights,
interruption and vigilant awareness, and two female novices who alter their complexion.

The occasion for the following took place in Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Sthūlanandā quarreled and brawled with other nuns, and pulled at their weak points. Since women are by nature prone to anger, being naturally enraged she became wrathful and violent, and struck the nuns with the back of a staff and with a whip. Nuns of few wants expressed disapproval, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule: Furthermore, if any nun, having become wrathful and violent and having given rise to displeasure, strikes a nun, it is a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Wrathful" means enveloped throughout by anger. "Having become violent" means being intensely seized by it. "Having given rise to displeasure" means having generated mental discomfort. "A nun" means one who belongs to this Dharma.

"Strikes" means striking with five fingers. "It is a transgression" is as above. As to how transgression arises in this case: if any nun, having become wrathful, strikes nuns with one finger, it is one transgression. Likewise, if she strikes with five fingers, it is five transgressions. Similarly, if she strikes with the hand, the fist, the head, the shoulder, the body, the elbow, the knee, the forearm, the foot, or the big toe, in every case it is a transgression. Likewise, if she strikes with a stick, a clod of earth, a pestle, and so forth, in every case it is a transgression. If she strikes with a broom, as many bristles of the broom as make contact, that many transgressions accrue; and as many as do not make contact, that many are lesser offenses. Likewise, if she strikes with a handful of peas, as many grains of the peas as make contact with the body, that many transgressions accrue; and as many as do not make contact, that many are lesser offenses. For a first offender and the like, there is no transgression. The first of the fourth transgressions is complete.

The narrative setting is in Śrāvastī. The preceding occurrence is the same, with this difference: the passage runs from "those very nuns" through "having raised the palm to strike." The occasion of the nuns of few wants expressing disapproval was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, from "this occurrence" through "the establishment of the training rule," established the rule: Furthermore, if any nun, having become wrathful and violent and having given rise to displeasure, raises her palm to strike a nun — even with the palm alone — it is a transgression. "Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. The rest is as before. The difference is this: "raises to strike" means having raised but not yet struck. "It is a transgression" is as above. As to how transgression arises: the sequence of transgressions is to be stated in precisely the same way. In every case, however slightly a nun raises her hand against a nun, it is a transgression. The second of the fourth transgressions is complete.

The narrative setting is in Śrāvastī. Then the venerable Cāraka, early in the morning, having put on his robe, took up his bowl and outer robe and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having made his alms round in Śrāvastī, he went to the house where the woman Vedī lived. Vedī saw Cāraka coming from a great distance and said these words: "Cāraka has gone forth — what am I to do now?" Then Cāraka said to Vedī: "The bodhisattva renounced sixty thousand queens and went forth — you would not even be fit to wash their feet, so what does it matter?" She replied: "I too shall go forth." Then Cāraka said to Vedī: "Set your household affairs properly in order." She did so, and went with Cāraka to Rājagṛha, where they spent the rains retreat. Then Vedī went to the Jeta Grove, and a friend said to her: "What have you come for?" Vedī replied: "To go forth." The friend said: "Cāraka — a razor from the land of Kośala being blunt — has gone to the land of Magadha for a razor." Then Vedī thought to herself: "I have not yet gone forth, and yet I cannot remain as a householder either," and she sat there, her mind troubled inwardly. Then another wandering nun, having entrusted Vedī, the great mistress of people, to — up to the words "she went forth." Then, after Cāraka had passed the three months of the rains retreat, he went to Śrāvastī, and when the nun Vedī heard that Cāraka had come, she went to where he was staying and knocked on the door of the dwelling. Cāraka then asked, "Who is there?" She said, "It is I, Vedī." Cāraka then said, "Come inside, householder's wife." She replied, "I am not a householder's wife — I am one who has gone forth." He then taunted her, saying, "And who gave you permission to go forth like that?" Vedī then asked Cāraka's forgiveness. After that, Cāraka began to teach her the Dharma, and as he did so, attachment arose in him. The Blessed One has said, "A man who knows the nature of a wise woman knows her attachment," and so Vedī, being startled, gave the sign of making water and fled. Cāraka was skilled in discerning the sound of footsteps, and realizing what had happened, he ran out after her, and as he brushed against her thigh, her lower robe became wet. Vedī, knowing that she was free of attachment, went to where Cāraka was and said to him, "Noble Cāraka, had I not acted as I did, both of us would certainly have fallen from the mode of life of ascetics." When she had said this, Cāraka said to Vedī, "Excellent! Excellent, Vedī! The Blessed One's saying, 'Whoever guards oneself guards others, and whoever guards others guards oneself,' has come home here — for in this way, Vedī, you have guarded yourself and have also guarded me." Vedī then said to Cāraka, "You have come weary from the road; give me your robes and I shall wash them." He gave them, and when Vedī saw them, remorse arose in her, and she lamented repeatedly: "I have acted with the inconstancy of a woman; I have acted with the inconstancy of an ascetic and a brahmin. As for these limbs of my body — is there anything here that Cāraka has not seen, not touched, that no one knows of?" And with those many lamentations, she poured filth into an open wound. Then Vedī washed Cāraka's robes and went to where the nuns were spending the rains retreat.

Then at another time Vedī became pregnant. The nuns, upon seeing the changed condition of Vedī's body — from this point, the nuns spoke to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected: "Whatever fault has arisen here arose from nuns washing, changing the color of, and ironing the robes of monks who are not their relatives." The Blessed One then, beginning with "Given this occurrence," proceeded to establish a rule of training: "Whatever nun washes, changes the color of, or irons the old robes of a monk who is not her relative, that is an offense entailing confession."

Now, "whatever nun" refers to Vedī. "Who is not a relative" means that a relative is one connected through up to seven generations of either the maternal or paternal line. "A monk" refers to one of this teaching. "Old" refers to robes that have been used during any of the three seasons — winter, spring, or summer. "Robes" means any of the seven types. "Washes" means even rinsing once with water. "Changes the color of" means even dipping once into dye. "Irons" means even pressing once with the palm of the hand. "An offense entailing confession" is as explained above.

Now, how does a transgression come about in this case? If a nun, with the perception that a monk is not a relative, washes the robes of a monk who is not a relative, that is an offense entailing confession. If she changes their color, that is an offense entailing confession. If she irons them, that is an offense entailing confession. Likewise, if she washes the robes of one who is not a relative while holding a doubtful mind about whether he is a relative, that is an offense entailing confession. If she changes their color, that is an offense entailing confession. If she irons them, that is an offense entailing confession. If a nun, with the perception that a monk who is actually a relative is not a relative, washes his robes, that is a wrong action. If she changes their color, that is a wrong action. If she irons them, that is a wrong action. Likewise, if she washes the robes of a relative while holding a doubtful mind, that is a wrong action. If she changes their color, that is a wrong action. If she irons them, that is a wrong action. With regard to a father, son, or brother, there is no transgression. This completes the third rule of the fourth set of offenses entailing confession.

The narrative context is in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the group of seventeen, had established for the monks a rule of training concerning concealment, the group of twelve then, with a mind bent on mischief, concealed the robes of the monks and disparaged nuns of few desires. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, proceeding from "this occurrence" through to the establishing of the rule of training, declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun conceals — or causes to be concealed — the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, the strainer, the salt bag, or the girdle of a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice, that is an offense entailing confession."

Now, "whatever nun" refers to the group of twelve. "A monk" means one of this teaching. "A nun" means a female śrāvaka of the Blessed One. "A female probationer" means one who is training in the training of a female probationer. "A male novice" means a young man who has gone forth. "A female novice" means a young woman who has gone forth. "Alms bowl" means one that has been consecrated and the like — even a single vessel qualifies. "Dharma robe" means any of the seven types. "Strainer" means a strainer proper. "Salt bag" means a vessel for salt. "Girdle" means a strap, a belt, or anything else of the kind — in short, whatever requisite for a nun's livelihood is concealed, except in such-and-such circumstances, is an offense entailing confession. "Except in such-and-such circumstances" means setting something aside for safekeeping in those circumstances. "An offense entailing confession" is as explained above.

Now, how does a transgression come about in this case? However much of a renunciant's requisites for livelihood a nun conceals — except in the prescribed circumstances — it is in every case an offense entailing confession. This completes the fourth rule of the fourth set of offenses entailing confession.

The narrative context is in Śrāvastī. At that time the Blessed One, on account of the group of six, had prohibited the solicitation of food, while permitting it for the sick. Thereafter those twelve nuns went to the homes of brahmins and householders, solicited food, and partook of it — both when they were ill and when they were not ill. When the nuns reported them, those twelve said: "That rule of training was established for monks, not for nuns." They then disparaged the nuns of few desires, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, proceeding from "this occurrence" through to the establishing of the rule of training, declared: "The foods permitted to be solicited by sick nuns are as follows: milk, yogurt, fresh butter, fish, meat, and dried meat. Furthermore, whatever nun who is not ill solicits such food for her own sake from the homes of others and accepts it or eats it, that is an offense entailing confession."

The phrase "those that are" refers to the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha. The phrase "for the sick" refers to those who are afflicted by illness. The phrase "nuns" refers to the female hearers of the Tathāgata. The word "delicious" means that which is savory. The phrase "solid foods and soft foods" refers to the five solid foods and the five soft foods. The word "milk" means milk itself. The word "yogurt" means yogurt itself. The word "fresh butter" means butter. The word "meat" means meat itself. The word "fish" means fish itself. The phrase "dried meat" means meat that has been dried. The phrase "soliciting in this way from households" means doing so oneself. The phrase "causing another to solicit" means through someone else. The phrase "eats or accepts" means if one swallows so much as a single mouthful in secret. The phrase "it is an offense entailing confession" is as explained above. If one who is not ill solicits and eats while not being ill, there is a wrongdoing in the soliciting and an offense entailing confession in the eating. If one who is not ill solicits and eats while being ill, there is a wrongdoing in the soliciting but no offense entailing confession in the eating. Likewise, if one who is ill solicits and eats while not being ill, there is no offense in the soliciting but an offense entailing confession in the eating. Likewise, if one who is ill solicits and eats while being ill, there is no offense in either.

The fifth rule in the fourth chapter on offenses entailing confession is complete.

The occasion for the following took place in Śrāvastī. The members of the group of twelve committed offenses of bad conduct, concealing these from one another; they quarreled and exposed each other's faults, reproaching one another on the basis of those same matters. When the nuns of few desires heard of this, they expressed disapproval, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, proceeding from "this occurrence" through to the establishing of the rule of training, declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly conceals an offense of bad conduct committed by a nun is guilty of an offense entailing confession."

The phrase "whatever nun" refers to those in the group of twelve. The phrase "bad conduct" refers to two kinds of bad conduct: that which has come about through defeat and is raised by the entire community, and that which is raised by the majority of the Saṅgha. The phrase "conceals" means not speaking of it to others. The phrase "offense entailing confession" is as explained above. As for how an offense arises in such a case: if a nun sees that a fellow nun has committed an offense of bad conduct that brings about defeat, and she forms the intention to hide it for her, that constitutes an offense entailing confession. The same applies likewise for offenses raised by the majority of the Saṅgha, and likewise for offenses entailing confession, offenses entailing confession individually, and wrongdoings — in those cases it is a wrongdoing. If it has already become known, there is no offense.

The sixth rule in the fourth chapter on offenses entailing confession is complete.

The occasion for the following took place in Śrāvastī. The members of the group of twelve thought: "If these needle-workers with their black alms bowls were to expose us publicly before the nuns, what harm could we do to them?" Then Joyful-of-Fat and Joyful-of-Crown spoke up: "It would be better to expose them in return." And so those nuns summoned the elder nuns to crossroads, to triple-junctions, and to four-way junctions as guests, and then caused them to wander about without food for as long as there was nothing left to eat. The members of the group of twelve, meanwhile, went in pairs and in secret to the homes of brahmins and householders and ate their alms food. Later, when those elder nuns came to the rains-retreat residence and huddled together, their fellow residents and those nearby said to them: "Noble ones, could it be that today's meal is someone else's — is your food also provided by others?" They replied: "Who would have eaten today, one wonders?"

Those women said, "The gruel is cold and has gone stiff," and with those words they then spoke to the nuns, and this occasion of nuns with few desires reproaching them was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with the words "On this occasion," proceeded to lay down a training rule. Furthermore, whichever nun sought a pretext, thinking, "By all means I shall find a fault with this nun," and used that very intention as her grounds for saying to a nun, "Noble one, please enter these homes, and there let them give you as much food and provisions as you desire" — and then, without actually causing them to give her food and provisions as desired, subsequently said to her, "It is not pleasant for you and me to speak or sit together. Still, it is pleasant for me to speak or sit alone. If you say 'Go away,' that constitutes a transgression." Now, "whichever nun" refers to the group of twelve. "To a nun" refers to a female disciple of the Blessed One. "Saying such words" means speaking them. "Please enter these homes" means the homes of brahmins and householders. "Let them give you as much food and provisions as you desire" refers to the five kinds of provisions and the five kinds of food. "As much as you desire" means as much as one wishes to eat. "Without causing them to give her such, then saying 'It is not pleasant for you and me'" means it is not enjoyable to be together with you. "Speaking" refers to words. "Sitting" refers to being seated. "Seeking a pretext" means looking for an opportunity to rake up faults. "That constitutes a transgression" is as stated above. How does a transgression occur in this case? If a nun, to whatever small degree she is seeking a pretext, speaks such words, in every instance that constitutes a transgression. However, if there is a medical prescription, or if on that basis the Saṅgha's food supply has been cut off and the matter is an improper one, there is no transgression.

This completes the seventh rule in the fourth group of transgressions.

The narrative setting is Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence on the group of six, laid down the training rule that fire must not be lit in an unroofed place — with the exception of sick persons, for whom it had been permitted — the group of twelve then lit fire with their own hands, caused others to light it, and this occasion of nuns with few desires reproaching them was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with the words "On this occasion," proceeded to lay down a training rule. Furthermore, whichever nun, not being ill, desiring comfort for her own sake, lights a fire or causes one to be lit — that constitutes a transgression. Now, "whichever nun" refers to the group of twelve. "Not being ill" means except for one who is sick. "For her own sake" means for her own benefit. "Lights a fire" means kindling a fire herself. "By herself" means by her own hand. "Causes it to be lit" means through another person. "That constitutes a transgression" is as stated above. How does a transgression occur in this case? If a nun fills a fire vessel with fire not yet purified or received, doing so for the sake of fragrance, she must consecrate it with a time-formula. If she has not consecrated it, that constitutes a transgression. Likewise, if she applies fragrances for the sake of fragrance, she must consecrate it with the words "This is for the sake of the Buddha," as a time-formula. If she has not consecrated it, that constitutes a transgression. Similarly, if it is for the sake of an abbess and she has not consecrated it, that constitutes a transgression.

Likewise, if fire is lit for the sake of the Saṅgha, one must consecrate it with a time-formula for as long as what is needed has not yet been completed. If one does consecrate it, that is well. If one does not consecrate it, that constitutes a transgression. Even if one adds wood piece by piece, one must consecrate it each time with a time-formula. If one does consecrate it, that is well. If one does not consecrate it, that constitutes a transgression. Likewise, if one scatters or heaps up the fire, that too constitutes a transgression. If a nun takes a fire-wheel and spins the fire-wheel around, that constitutes a transgression — and so on up to: if one traces a design on a paint vessel, that constitutes a transgression. If a nun takes a paint vessel, and if she consecrates it with a time-formula, that is well. If she does not do so, that is an offense. If for the sake of a sick person she boils food in an uncovered vessel, and likewise if she performs work involving pigments or work involving alms bowls — in all such cases, if she has consecrated them with a time-formula, there is no transgression.

The eighth section of the fourth group of transgressions is complete.

The narrative occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the seventeen factions, established a rule of training that was fitting for a legitimate act of the Saṅgha, the nuns who were naturally well-behaved performed Saṅgha business in accordance with a legitimate act of the Saṅgha. At that time, those of the twelve factions, after having already consented to a legitimate act of the Saṅgha, withheld their consent, or gave it improperly, or said, "It was done by those in opposition, not by those in agreement," and when nuns of little sense began to scold them, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning from "This has occurred," established the rule of training up to and including its promulgation:

Furthermore, whatever nun, having already given her consent to a legitimate act of the Saṅgha, subsequently acts in a manner of retraction and says, "Give back my consent — I do not give it to you" — that constitutes a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to those of the twelve factions. "A legitimate act of the Saṅgha" refers to single-recitation acts, two-recitation acts, and four-recitation acts that are legitimate acts of the Saṅgha. "Having already given her consent" means having given her assent. "Subsequently" means at another time. "Acts in a manner of retraction" means that she has said, "I have not given my consent." "Constitutes a transgression" is as stated above.

How does a transgression occur in this case? Whenever a nun, to whatever small degree, having given her consent to a legitimate act of the Saṅgha, acts in a manner of retraction, in every such case a transgression occurs. However, if the retraction was truthful or if the consent was given improperly, there is no transgression.

The ninth section of the fourth group of transgressions is complete.

The narrative occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon a certain senior novice who had entered the order, established the rule: "One must not dwell together with an unordained person in all circumstances; if one does so, that constitutes a transgression" — and furthermore, concerning one who bore the name of a novice, permission was granted for up to two nights — then the twelve factions said: "Wherever it is two nights, let it become three; wherever it is three, let it become four." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the nuns, the Blessed One declared: "One must not dwell together. If one does so, that constitutes a transgression."

Then, when those nuns allowed novice nuns who had gone outside the boundary of the Saṅgha's meeting hall to go unaccompanied and unguarded, this matter was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One must not send them outside the boundary of the Saṅgha's meeting hall."

Nevertheless, the root case is to be abandoned. When that was done, there was a nun who gave food to a sick novice nun and then did not receive it back with her own hand, thinking she had not given it with her own hand, and then did not touch her again — and on that matter, from the phrase beginning thus, the Blessed One declared: "One must anoint her with one's own hand; one need not feel regret about that."

Then, when those sick novice nuns, being wearied from sitting at the time of the meal, and the nuns not providing seats for them — on that matter the Blessed One declared: "One must seat them together on a single seat and rely on that; one need not feel regret about that."

Then again, when evening came and those novice nuns were sent away and departed, and the sick one was thirsty through the night — on that matter the Blessed One declared: "One must stay with her through the night itself; one need not feel regret about that."

Likewise, when a nun herself is ill, novice nuns or attendants are to remain there, and may remain there even with a lamp lit; one need not feel regret about that.

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of the nuns who desire training, who are devoted to training, and who are equipped with the requisites for training, and the foregoing was established as a rule. This is a permission. Female hearers should also recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: "Whatever nun who has not received full ordination sleeps in the same dwelling for more than two nights — that constitutes a transgression."

The phrase "whatever nun" refers to the twelve factions. The phrase "has not received full ordination" — those who have received full ordination are of two kinds: monks and nuns; the rest have not received full ordination. The phrase "more than two nights" means when two nights have passed. In the phrase "sleeps in the same dwelling," there are four kinds of dwelling: one entirely roofed and entirely enclosed, one entirely roofed but mostly not enclosed, one mostly not roofed and mostly not enclosed, and one mostly roofed and mostly enclosed. "Entirely roofed and entirely enclosed" refers to a residence hall, a cloister with a surrounding gallery, or a multi-storied building. "Entirely roofed but mostly not enclosed" refers to a circular cloister or a sheltered passageway. "Mostly not roofed and mostly not enclosed" refers to a cloister with three sides open. "Mostly not roofed and mostly not enclosed" refers to a cloister with four sides open. The phrase "when dawn breaks" refers to whichever of the three dawns arises — the first, the middle, or the last. The phrase "constitutes a transgression" is as explained above. As for how the transgression arises: as soon as a nun sleeps in the same dwelling for a third night — that is, beyond two nights — together with one who has not received full ordination, she incurs a transgression in every case. The tenth of the fourth group of transgressions is complete.

The setting of the following rule is in Rājagṛha. At that time there occurred a case such as this: a nun who was at the point of death had come to hold a wrong view of a pernicious kind, saying that she understood how the Blessed One had taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed — and when this was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, go attend to the nun who is at the point of death and admonish her." When they went and admonished her, she seized upon that very basis with great tenacity, clinging to it resolutely and asserting, "This alone is true; all else is delusion" — and when the nuns reported this to the Blessed One,

The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must admonish the nun who is at the point of death by means of a formal act (karma) with motion and resolution fourfold. The admonishment is to be done as follows: beginning with 'Having prepared a seat,' and ending with 'One nun shall make the motion and perform the act.'"

The text of the act is as follows:

"Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In the case of this nun who is at the point of death, there has arisen a falling into a wrong view of a pernicious kind of this sort — namely, that she understands the Blessed One to have taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed by them. Many nuns have seized upon her and admonished her, but when they seized upon her and admonished her, she clung to that very basis with great tenacity, grasping it resolutely and continues to declare, 'This alone is true; all else is delusion.' If it seems timely and fitting to the noble Saṅgha, let the noble Saṅgha grant its consent. This is the noble Saṅgha's act of admonishing the nun who is at the point of death by means of a formal act with motion and resolution fourfold. This is the motion."

The act itself is then to be performed three times in the same way.

Now, when she was admonished by means of this formal act with motion and resolution fourfold, and she continued to say "This alone is true; all else is delusion," the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared:

"Nuns, since the nun who is at the point of death and has fallen into a pernicious wrong view cannot be made to give it up, you must also perform an act of expulsion against anyone whosoever who persists in a view consonant with hers. The act is to be performed as follows: beginning with 'Having prepared a seat,' and ending with 'One nun shall make the motion and perform the act.'"

The text of the act is as follows:

"Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In the case of this nun who is at the point of death, there has arisen a falling into a wrong view of a pernicious kind of this sort — namely, that she understands the Blessed One to have taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed by them. If it seems timely and fitting to the noble Saṅgha, let the noble Saṅgha grant its consent. This is the noble Saṅgha's act of expelling from the position of one who persists in being unable to relinquish the pernicious wrong view into which the nun who is at the point of death has fallen. For as long as the nun who is at the point of death who has fallen into a pernicious wrong view cannot be made to give it up, the nuns are not to converse with her, not to speak of her as one of good standing, not to receive her with individual rejoicing — and she is to be utterly condemned, as one condemns the daughter of an outcaste. This is the motion."

The act then proceeds: "Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In the case of this nun who is at the point of death, there has arisen a falling into a wrong view of a pernicious kind of this sort — namely, that she understands the Blessed One to have taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed by them. The Saṅgha has performed the act of expulsion, placing her in the position of one who persists in being unable to relinquish the pernicious wrong view into which the nun who is at the point of death has fallen."

For as long as the nun who is at the point of death persists in being unable to relinquish this pernicious wrong view into which she has fallen, the nuns shall not converse with her, shall not address her in a welcoming manner, and shall not take individual delight in her company; rather, they shall utterly despise and revile her as one would revile the daughter of an outcaste. Those sisters who consent to the act of expulsion — that of placing the nun who has fallen into the pernicious wrong view and who persists in being unable to relinquish it in the position of one who so persists — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent, let them speak. This is the first proclamation of the act; the same matter shall be proclaimed a second time.

Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In the case of this nun who is at the point of death, there has arisen a falling into a wrong view of a pernicious kind of this sort — namely, that she understands the Blessed One to have taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed by them. The Saṅgha has performed the act of expulsion, placing her in the position of one who persists in being unable to relinquish the pernicious wrong view into which the nun who is at the point of death has fallen. For as long as the nun who is at the point of death persists in being unable to relinquish this pernicious wrong view into which she has fallen, the nuns shall not converse with her, shall not address her in a welcoming manner, and shall not take individual delight in her company; rather, they shall utterly despise and revile her as one would revile the daughter of an outcaste. Those sisters who consent to the act of expulsion — that of placing the nun who has fallen into the pernicious wrong view and who persists in being unable to relinquish it in the position of one who so persists — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent, let them speak. This is the second proclamation of the act; the same matter shall be proclaimed a third time.

Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In the case of this nun who is at the point of death, there has arisen a falling into a wrong view of a pernicious kind of this sort — namely, that she understands the Blessed One to have taught the Dharma in such a way that even if one practices the things the Blessed One taught as obstructions one will not be obstructed by them. The Saṅgha has performed the act of expulsion, placing her in the position of one who persists in being unable to relinquish the pernicious wrong view into which the nun who is at the point of death has fallen. For as long as the nun who is at the point of death persists in being unable to relinquish this pernicious wrong view into which she has fallen, the nuns shall not converse with her, shall not address her in a welcoming manner, and shall not take individual delight in her company; rather, they shall utterly despise and revile her as one would revile the daughter of an outcaste. This is the third proclamation of the act. The noble Saṅgha, having consented and agreed by remaining silent, so holds it to be.

Now although the act of expulsion placing her in that position had thus been performed, she stubbornly clung to that very same ground, adhered to it tenaciously, and continued to designate with that very declaration: "This alone is true; all else is delusion." At that juncture the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with the words "this occurrence," proceeded up to the laying down of a rule of training.

Furthermore, if any nun says, "I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in just such a way that what the Blessed One has declared to be an obstructing factor does not become an obstructing factor even when one practises it individually" — to that nun the nuns are to speak thus: "Sister, do not say, 'I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in just such a way that what the Blessed One has declared to be an obstructing factor does not become an obstructing factor even when one practises it individually.'" Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One would not say such a thing. Sister, what are obstructing factors is precisely what the Blessed One has declared in many categories to be obstructing factors, and if one practises those individually they will indeed become obstructing factors. Sister, abandon this kind of wrong view that you have taken up." So they are to address her.

If that nun, when the nuns have spoken to her thus, abandons that position, then that is well. If she does not abandon it, she is to be admonished a second time and a third time, thoroughly and correctly. In order that she may abandon that position, if when she has been admonished thoroughly and correctly a second and third time she abandons it, that is well. If she does not abandon it, it constitutes a transgression.

Now the phrase "any nun" means one who is about to die. The phrase "says thus" means if she speaks. The phrase "I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One" refers to the Dharma taught by the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened Buddha. The phrase "what the Blessed One has declared to be an obstructing factor" refers to what obstructs the way of a contemplative — namely: the eight factors that entail defeat; twenty matters reserved for the Saṅgha; thirty-three abandonment transgressions; one hundred and eighty transgressions; eleven matters to be individually confessed; the many trainings; and the seven principles for settling disputes. These things that are not the Dharma, he has described using the name of Dharma. The phrase "even when one practises it individually" means even when one cultivates it earnestly. The phrase "does not become an obstructing factor" means does not become an obstruction to the way of a contemplative. The phrase "to that nun" refers to the one who is about to die. The phrase "the nuns" refers to those who belong to this Dharma community. The phrase "are to speak thus" means they are to say the following: "Sister, do not say, 'I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in just such a way that what the Blessed One has declared to be an obstructing factor does not become an obstructing factor even when one practises it individually'" — from that point up through the words "when admonishing her while she is held." If she abandons that position, then that is well. If she does not abandon it, she is to be instructed thoroughly a second and a third time, and admonished thoroughly — from there up through "she is to be admonished by the act of the motion and three proclamations" — which is the same as the previous admonition procedure. The "thorough admonition" is that very thing. The "thorough instruction" is that very thing. "It constitutes a transgression" is as above.

Now how does the transgression arise? To whatever extent a nun even slightly says, "I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in just that way," it becomes a wrong-doing in every instance. When, having been held and admonished, she abandons that position, then that is well. If she does not abandon it, it is a wrong-doing. When the first part of the act — the motion — is spoken, if she abandons it then that is well; if she does not abandon it, it is a wrong-doing.

When the second part of the act is being spoken, if she abandons that position before the speaking is complete, then that is well. If the speaking is complete and she still does not abandon it, it is a wrong-doing.

When the third part of the act is being spoken, before the speaking is complete: if those who are in discord act contrary to Dharma, or if those who are in discord are corrected as though contrary to Dharma, or if those who are in accord are corrected as though contrary to Dharma, or if it is not in accordance with the Dharma, not in accordance with the Vinaya, and not in accordance with the Teacher's dispensation, and one acts accordingly, then there is no transgression. When it is in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with the Teacher's dispensation, and when the fourth part of the act is spoken to completion, it becomes a downfall-offense.

Here ends the eleventh section of the fourth downfall-offense.

The Vinaya Analysis of the Nuns. The Twentieth Fascicle.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in Rājagṛha. At that time the twelve groups were conversing with a dying person, speaking of comings and goings, making free use of things, and sleeping in the same lodging. And nuns of little concern were criticizing them. This was reported to the Blessed One. Then, beginning with "This occurrence," the Blessed One established a training rule as follows:

"Whatever nun knowingly associates with a nun who has spoken in such a fashion, who has not acted in accordance with the Dharma and who has gone into a wicked view and has not abandoned it — conversing with her, speaking of her comings and goings, making free use of things, staying along with her, sleeping together in the same lodging — that is a downfall-offense."

"Whatever nun" refers to the twelve groups. "Who has not acted in accordance with the Dharma" means she has not been expelled by a formal act consisting of a motion and four proclamations. "Conversing with her" means providing her with scriptural recitation. "Speaking of her comings and goings" means reminding her of what she has forgotten. "Making free use of things" means appropriating acts of service and attendance for oneself. "Staying along with her" and "sleeping together in the same lodging" means being together with her until dawn breaks in four kinds of lodging. "A downfall-offense" is as above.

Now how does the transgression arise? To whatever slight extent a nun sleeps together in the same lodging with her, in every instance it becomes a downfall-offense. If she wishes to separate herself from that one who has gone into a wicked view, there is no transgression.

The background story is set in Rājagṛha. The senior nun Spomgamo had two novice nuns, Mdzesma and Rgyelma. In those two there arose a wicked view of such a kind as this: that just as the Blessed One has declared that desires are obstructions, so even while individually relying upon those very things, no obstruction arises. They said, "Thus do we understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the nuns, the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must seize those two novice nuns, Mdzesma and Rgyelma, and admonish them."

When the two were seized and admonished, they tenaciously grasped that very basis, clung to it openly, and continued to designate those who held otherwise, saying, "This alone is true; the rest is confusion." When this was again reported to the Blessed One by the nuns, the Blessed One declared: "Nuns, you must admonish those two novice nuns by a formal act consisting of a motion and four proclamations." The admonition is to be performed as follows: after having arranged the seats — beginning from that point, give a proper and complete admonition in reply to the questioning of the nuns.

The two novice nuns were removed from the hearing range and placed within the seeing range, and then one nun made the motion and the act was performed. The act is as follows: "Reverend sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me. In regard to these two novice nuns there has arisen this kind of wrong and sinful view — namely, that while the Blessed One has declared that sense pleasures are an obstruction, they have claimed to understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma to the effect that even if one individually indulges in those very things that the Blessed One has declared to be an obstruction, they do not thereby become an obstruction. When the two were seized and admonished by a great many nuns, they tenaciously grasped that very basis, clung to it openly, and continued to designate those who held otherwise, saying, 'This alone is true; the rest is delusion.' If it is the right time and the noble Saṅgha approves, let the noble Saṅgha grant permission for this, and let the admonition of these two novice nuns, Sumanā and Jayā, be carried out by a formal act consisting of a motion and four proclamations." This is the motion.

The act is then to be performed as follows: "Reverend sisters of the noble Saṅgha, please hear me. In regard to these two novice nuns, Sumanā and Jayā, there has arisen this kind of wrong and sinful view — namely, that while the Blessed One has declared that sense pleasures are an obstruction, they have claimed to understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma to the effect that even if one individually indulges in those very things that the Blessed One has declared to be an obstruction, they do not thereby become an obstruction. When the two were seized and admonished by a great many nuns, they tenaciously grasped that very basis, clung to it openly, and continued to designate those who held otherwise, saying, 'This alone is true; the rest is delusion.' The noble Saṅgha is performing the admonition of these two, Sumanā and Jayā, by a formal act consisting of a motion and four proclamations. Those reverend sisters who accept this, let them remain silent. Those who do not accept it, let them speak." This is the first proclamation of the act. In the same manner the second and third proclamations are also to be recited. From the words "The noble Saṅgha, having accepted and permitted" down to the words "as they say nothing, so it is here held to be" — that is the conclusion.

When, upon being admonished by means of the formal act consisting of a motion and four proclamations, the two still tenaciously grasped that very basis, clung to it openly, and continued to designate those who held otherwise, saying, "This alone is true; the rest is delusion," at that point the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns, perform the act of further censure against the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā. The act is to be performed as follows: after having arranged the seats, the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā are to be removed from the hearing range and placed within the seeing range, and then one nun makes the motion and the act is performed. The act is to be performed thus: Reverend sisters of the noble

Saṅgha, please hear me. In regard to these two novice nuns, Sumanā and Jayā, there has arisen this kind of wrong and sinful view — namely, that while the Blessed One has declared that sense pleasures are an obstruction, they have claimed to understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma to the effect that even if one individually indulges in those very things that the Blessed One has declared to be an obstruction, they do not thereby become an obstruction. When the two were seized and admonished by a great many nuns, they tenaciously grasped that very basis, clung to it openly — and then the two novice nuns, Sumanā and Jayā, were seized and admonished by a great many nuns, — admonishing the two of them beginning with the words "when the two were seized and admonished" down to the words "this alone is true; all else is delusion" — the Saṅgha admonished those two by means of a motion and a resolution with four recitations. When the two were admonished by the Saṅgha with a motion and a resolution with four recitations — beginning with the words "when the two were admonished by a motion and a resolution with four recitations" down to the words "this alone is true; all else is delusion" — since it is the proper time and if it pleases the noble Saṅgha, let the noble Saṅgha grant the following: that the noble Saṅgha perform the act of censure upon the two novice nuns, Sumanā and Jayā, declaring thus — "Sisters, from this day forward you shall not refer to the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, as your Teacher; you shall not follow behind any person who practices pure conduct (brahmacarya) as a preceptor, in the manner of a wise master; and the permission formerly granted to other novice nuns to sleep in the same lodging as fully ordained nuns until the second night — that permission is henceforth revoked for you. You two deluded women, go elsewhere this very day." This is the motion. After that motion of censure has been performed upon those two, they shall be admonished to abandon that sinful view. If they abandon it, that is well. If they do not abandon it, the act shall then be performed. The act is as follows: "Sisters, let the noble Saṅgha hear me. To the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā there has arisen this deviation in the form of a sinful view — namely, that even if one individually indulges in those very things that the Blessed One has declared to be an obstruction, they do not thereby become an obstruction; that is how they claimed to understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma. When the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā were seized and admonished by a great many nuns — beginning with the words 'when the two were seized and admonished' down to 'this alone is true; all else is delusion' — and when those two were admonished by the Saṅgha with a motion and a resolution with four recitations, beginning with the words 'when the two were admonished by a motion and a resolution with four recitations' down to 'this alone is true; all else is delusion' — since the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā, who have gone astray into a sinful view and are unable to relinquish it, are to receive the act of censure: those who consent to the act of censure being performed upon those two shall remain silent; those who do not consent shall speak. This is the first proclamation of the act." After that, those two shall again be admonished. If they abandon it, that is well. If they do not, the same matter shall be proclaimed a second time. Beginning again with "Sisters, let the noble Saṅgha hear me," after the second proclamation has been made, they shall be admonished again. If they abandon it, that is well. If they do not, the same matter shall be proclaimed a third time. Beginning with "Sisters, let the noble Saṅgha hear me" — the noble Saṅgha, having consented and granted approval to performing the act of censure upon the novice nuns Sumanā and Jayā, who have gone astray into a sinful view and are unable to relinquish it — in that silence, so it is held. Thereupon, those two novice nuns, weeping, went to the presence of the preceptress and, having arrived, said to her: "Preceptress, the Saṅgha of fully ordained nuns has performed the act of censure upon us." Then Bhaddamukhā said to those two novice nuns: "For those upon whom the act of censure has been performed, are the three realms not all there? Are there no towns and provinces?" — and saying this, she went on conversing with those two upon whom the act of censure had been performed.

she walks with them, speaks with them, shares all manner of enjoyment with them, and sleeps in the same dwelling — in such a case, nuns of few desires censure her. This matter was then reported to the Blessed One.

Thereupon, the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and so forth, proceeded to establish a training rule. He spoke to the novice nuns as follows, addressing that novice nun who had said: "In the way the Blessed One has declared that sensual pleasures are obstructions, yet even if one pursues them individually they do not become obstructions — that is how we understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma." The fully ordained nuns said to that novice nun: "Novice nun, do not say: 'In the way the Blessed One has declared that sensual pleasures are obstructions, yet even if one pursues them individually they do not become obstructions — that is how we understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma.' Do not denigrate the Blessed One. To have denigrated the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One never said anything of the sort. Novice nuns, sensual pleasures are obstructions precisely because they are obstructions. The Blessed One has declared in many ways that they are obstructions, and if one pursues them individually they become obstructions as well. Therefore, novice nuns, abandon such a course as this — this wandering into a sinful view." When the fully ordained nuns admonished that novice nun in these words: "If you relinquish that ground, so much the better. If you do not relinquish it, then for a second and third time you are to be properly instructed in order to lead you to relinquish that ground." When properly instructed a second and third time: "If you relinquish that ground, so much the better. If you do not relinquish it," then the fully ordained nuns are to say to that novice nun: "From this day forward, novice nun, you must not call the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, 'the Teacher.' You must no longer follow step by step after any of those who live the holy life and are learned. Novice nun, the permission that was granted to you — to sleep in the same dwelling as other fully ordained nuns for up to two nights — that too is henceforth withdrawn from you. Novice nuns, be gone." Thus they are to be addressed.

Furthermore, whatever fully ordained nun knowingly keeps close to such a censured novice nun, or teaches her, or shares all manner of enjoyment with her, or sleeps together with her in the same dwelling — she incurs a transgression.

The term "novice nun" refers to Mañjulā and Uttarā. The term "fully ordained nuns" refers to those who follow this Dharma. The phrase "saying this" means "when she speaks." The statement "In the way the Blessed One has declared that sensual pleasures are obstructions, yet even if one pursues them individually they do not become obstructions — that is how we understand the Blessed One's teaching of the Dharma" means: even though one engages in them freely, they do not become an obstruction to the mode of the fully ordained nun. The phrase "to those two" refers to the novice nuns Mañjulā and Uttarā. "The fully ordained nuns" refers to those who follow this Dharma. The phrase "are to say thus" means: having assembled and admonished them, they admonish them exactly as stated before. "Properly instructing" means just that; "properly admonishing" means just that. When they have been thus followed up in that manner, if they relinquish that ground, so much the better; if they do not relinquish it, the act of censure is to be carried out — this is done as stated above. The phrase "whatever fully ordained nun" refers to Bhaddamukhā. The phrase "knowingly" means that it was declared either by herself or by others. The phrase "such a censured one" means: one upon whom the act of censure has been carried out. The term "novice nun" refers to Mañjulā and Uttarā.

"Provides accommodation" means that one gives lodging. "Provides instruction" means that one gives questioning. "Fully enjoys" means that one makes the honor one's own. From "dwells together, sleeps in the same place" through "constitutes an offense" — all this is as stated above. How does a transgression occur in this regard? To whatever slight degree a fully ordained nun knowingly provides accommodation to a novice nun who has been thus expelled, or provides instruction to her — from that point through "sleeps in the same place" — in every case it constitutes an offense.

The verse summary of the fourth offense is complete.

Summary verse:

Accepting dyed cloth, and at the half-month, with deliberate intent, and remorse, fat of the kaka bird, and at the waterside, sleeping with a man — one must not whisper.
Giving cloth without a basis, on the road one must not travel in the company of a man.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the Kalandakas. At the time when King Bimbisāra had established a festival for the nāga king Riwo and Yidong — those two — and then on another occasion, from the south, a great master of dance arrived and performed a dance-drama called "The Conduct of the Buddha," and received great acclaim from the faithful — from that point through "the six groups were put to shame" — all that passage is as given there. Then, following that, the account of how the six groups and the assembly of twelve groups of nuns combined dance gestures and performed a dance, from that passage through the occasion when the nuns of few wishes expressed their disapproval and reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One reflected: "All these faults that have arisen stem from those fully ordained nuns who wore the white garments worn by householders" — and then, from "the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence" through "established the training rule," the content is as follows: if a fully ordained nun obtains a new piece of cloth, she must change its color to any one of the three altered colors — blue, mud-color, or ochre.

If a fully ordained nun wears a new piece of cloth without having changed it to any one of the three altered colors, it constitutes an offense. As for the word "new," there are two senses of "new": new, and newly obtained — and in this context "newly obtained" is what is intended. "Cloth" refers to any of the seven kinds. "Fully ordained nun" refers to those who belong to this Dharma. "Without having changed it to any one of the three altered colors" means: without having changed the color. "Wears the new cloth" means: having put it on. "Constitutes an offense" is as stated above. How does a transgression occur in this regard? To whatever slight degree a fully ordained nun wears a new piece of cloth without having changed it to any one of the three altered colors, in every case it constitutes an offense. Even if only a bowl-sized piece has not been altered, it is still a misdeed.

The first part of the fifth offense is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the Blessed One, while at Vaiśālī, established the training rule regarding accepting with respect to the six groups, and at Śrāvastī permitted it with respect to Ānanda — then the twelve groups, while in the vicinity of a pleasure garden or outside its vicinity, wherever gems or things said to be gems were lying about, took them with their own hands, caused others to take them, and did not return them to their rightful owners; and the nuns of few wishes expressed their disapproval and reported it to the Blessed One. Then, from "the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence" —

He established the training rule up to that point. Furthermore, whatever nun takes with her own hand, or causes another to take, a gem or something said to be a gem — unless she is sitting within the pleasure garden or sitting within the dwelling-hall — commits a transgression. Whatever nun, while sitting within the pleasure garden or within the dwelling-hall, finds a gem or something said to be a gem, should think, "Whoever owns this, that very person shall come to take it," and with that thought as her motive she may take it and set it aside. That is the proper procedure for her in that case.

"Whatever nun" refers to the twelve groups. "A gem or something said to be a gem" refers to all implements used in battle and all implements of a pleasure garden. "Takes" means taking by herself. "Causes another to take" means through another person. "Sitting within the pleasure garden" means being in the grove. "Unless sitting within the dwelling-hall" means unless she is inside the temple.

"She should think, 'Whoever owns this, that very person shall come to take it,' and taking it with that very thought as her condition" — this means acting in accordance with that very intention. "Except at the proper time" means she should set it aside. "Commits a transgression" is as stated previously.

Now, how does a transgression arise in this regard? If a nun takes a gem, taking one that is perforated constitutes a transgression; taking one that is not perforated constitutes a misdeed. Just as with gems, so too with pearls, vajra-stones, lapis lazuli, conch-shells, crystal, coral, silver, precious stones, carnelians, and right-spiraling conch-shells: taking a perforated one constitutes a transgression; taking one that is not perforated constitutes a misdeed. Even taking a small gem bead constitutes a misdeed. Taking a necklace constitutes a transgression. Likewise, taking ornamental anklets, armlets, breast-ornaments, a single pendant-chain, and so forth constitutes a transgression. Even taking a necklace made of single gem-pieces constitutes a misdeed — and that is the extent of what is covered here.

If a nun takes a silver gem, if it bears a distinguishing mark, it constitutes a transgression; if it does not bear a distinguishing mark, it constitutes a misdeed. Even taking a worn sandal constitutes a misdeed.

If a nun takes a lute together with its strings and fittings, it constitutes a transgression; if without strings, it constitutes a misdeed. Likewise, taking a bāvabhīṣaka, a single-stringed lute, a small hand-drum, a large drum, a clay drum, or a paṭaha drum together with strings and fittings constitutes a transgression; without strings, a misdeed. Even taking a lute made of grass together with strings and fittings constitutes a transgression; without strings, a misdeed.

Likewise, taking a single-pointed vajra, a discus, a single-pointed weapon, a sword, a short lance, a great bow, a spear, a half-spear made of iron, an iron arrow, or a half-arrow made of iron that is fit for throwing constitutes a transgression; taking one that is not fit for throwing constitutes a misdeed. If a nun takes an arrow together with an arrowhead, it constitutes a transgression; without an arrowhead, a misdeed. Even taking a grass bow constitutes a misdeed.

If a nun takes an image of a buddha together with relics, it constitutes a transgression; if without relics, a misdeed. However, if she takes it with the perception of making an offering to the Teacher, and places it in the hands of a novice nun or one who is qualified, there is no transgression.

Summary verse:

Gems, necklaces, lutes, conch-shells, bows and arrows, and images together with relics — these are here correctly enumerated.

The second section of the fifth category of transgressions is complete.

The occasion is at Rājagṛha. At that time, King Bimbisāra, when he was cold from the austerity waters, felt warmth, and when warm, felt cool — and there were three such sensations.

On the first occasion, the king himself bathed. On the second, it was for the queen. On the third, it was shared in common by all the world.

Then King Bimbisāra thought to himself: "I have already honored the Blessed One and the Śrāvaka Saṅgha abundantly in every way with all manner of provisions, yet I have not done so with the austerity waters for bathing. Therefore, I shall offer the austerity waters freely to the Blessed One, to the monks, and to the nuns." Having thought this, King Bimbisāra went to where the Blessed One was. Upon arriving, he prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Once seated to one side, the Blessed One instructed King Bimbisāra with a discourse in accordance with the Dharma — and here the text continues through to the point where the king rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, turned toward the Blessed One with palms joined in reverence, and addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Blessed One, together with the Śrāvaka community of nuns, I offer you the austerity waters for bathing. Where the Blessed One, together with the Śrāvaka Saṅgha, bathes — in the manner of a king of the royal caste consecrated by anointing — may the Blessed One together with the Śrāvaka Saṅgha please bathe there. And wherever the Tathāgata's Śrāvaka community of nuns bathe, accompanied by their retinue of attendants, may they bathe and use those facilities as they please."

The Blessed One said nothing, and thereby King Bimbisāra understood this as permission to provide the austerity waters for bathing. The text then continues from "Then, as much as the king..." through to "...and departed."

Thereupon the Twelve Groups heard that the Blessed One had accepted King Bimbisāra's invitation for the austerity-water bathing. Having heard this, those of the Twelve Groups went to where the queen of King Bimbisāra was performing her austerity-water bathing, in order to bathe themselves. At that time, the queen of King Bimbisāra wished to bathe and went to where the austerity water was — and the text continues from there through to the point where she found no opportunity on account of the Twelve Groups.

She then went and complained before the nuns, and the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "In that case, bathing is not to be done." Because they did not bathe, their bodies became quite malodorous, and when they went on alms rounds, laywomen said to them: "Something smells foul." Those nuns who were straightforward and honest by nature said: "That foul smell is from our bodies." The laywomen then said: "Have you not been bathing?" The nuns replied: "The Blessed One has prohibited bathing." When the nuns reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "In that case, you may bathe twice a fortnight."

Then, because of affliction by heat — the text continues from there through to where it is established that the three fortnights of summer are the hot season — you may bathe. Likewise, when the time of illness is established, you may bathe. Likewise the time of work, the time of travel, the time of wind and rain — when these are established, you may bathe.

Then those of the Twelve Groups, using the designation of the hot-season time, bathed at all times, and nuns of fewer concerns criticized them. The matter was then brought before the Blessed One, and the Blessed One began: "Since this matter has arisen..."

...and so he established the training rule. The Blessed One had declared "one may bathe at fortnightly intervals," and anyone who bathes more frequently than that, except at the permitted times, commits an offense. The permitted times are these: the last two fortnights of the cool season, the first month of the rains seasons, and these three fortnights together constitute the hot season. The remaining times are: the time of illness, the time of work, the time of travel, the time of wind, the time of rain, and the time of wind-with-rain — in these, bathing at that time is permitted.

As for the phrase "at fortnightly intervals," this means each half of the month. As for the word "bathe," bathing is of two kinds: consecration-bathing and immersion-bathing. The phrase "except at the permitted times" means that those times have been set aside. "In these, that is the permitted time" means: the remaining two fortnights of the cool season, and as for the first of the rains seasons — that means the first month, namely the beginning month of the rains, and these three fortnights together constitute the hot season. "The remaining is the time of illness" means: if one does not bathe, one will become ill. "The time of work, bathe" means: one has performed work and thereby become fatigued. "The time of travel, bathe" means: one has come by a road of half a league or one league and has thereby become fatigued. "The time of wind, bathe" means: one has been disturbed by wind — even so much as the corner of one's monastic robe being stirred by the wind. "The time of rain, bathe" means: two or three drops of rain have fallen on the body — that is the time of rain. "The time of wind-with-rain, bathe" means: one has been stirred by wind and also two or three drops of rain have fallen on the body. "Commits an offense" — this is as stated above.

Now, how does the offense come about? If a nun bathes with consecration-bathing, she must consecrate that time. If she has not consecrated it, then up to the point where the water reaches her navel it is a wrongdoing. If it goes beyond the navel, it is an offense entailing expiation. If a nun bathes with immersion-bathing, she must consecrate that time. If she has not consecrated it, then up to the point where the water reaches her navel it is a wrongdoing. If it goes beyond the navel, it is an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if having bathed with consecration-bathing she wishes to bathe with immersion-bathing, she must consecrate a different time. If she has not consecrated it, up to the navel it is a wrongdoing; if it goes beyond, it is an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if having bathed with immersion-bathing she wishes to bathe with consecration-bathing — from that point up to where the water reaches the navel it is a wrongdoing; if it goes beyond, it is an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if having bathed in warm water she wishes to bathe in cold water — from that point, it is a wrongdoing; if it goes beyond, it is an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if having bathed in cold water she wishes to bathe in warm water — from that point, it is a wrongdoing; if it goes beyond, it is an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if she wishes to bathe again in that very same manner, she must consecrate a different time.

If one splashes water on a person who has fainted, or if one wades across, or if one falls into water while jumping, or if one crosses a river or crosses a great lake and is submerged in the water — in these cases there is no offense.

This concludes the third of the fifth chapter on offenses entailing expiation.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, taking the case of Cāraka as occasion, established the training rule concerning deliberate generation of an animal rebirth, at that time those of the Twelve Groups, with deliberate intent...

...without deliberate intent, they kill living beings belonging to the animal realm, and they revile nuns of minor standing. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from the words "this occurrence" up through the establishing of the training rule, which reads: Moreover, whatever nun deliberately kills a living being belonging to the animal realm incurs an offense entailing expiation.

"Whatever nun" refers to those of the Twelve Groups. "Deliberately" means having considered the matter. "Belonging to the animal realm" means even so much as an ant. "Kills" means causes harm to its life. "Incurs an offense entailing expiation" is as stated above. As for how the transgression arises: however slight the intention, if a nun deliberately kills a living being belonging to the animal realm, she incurs an offense entailing expiation in all cases.

This concludes the fourth of the fifth chapter on offenses entailing expiation.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time those of the Twelve Groups, with deliberate intent, cause nuns to feel remorse, and they revile nuns of minor standing. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from the words "this occurrence" up through the establishing of the training rule, which reads: Moreover, whatever nun deliberately, using it as a means, causes a nun to feel remorse — thinking "I shall ensure that this one does not touch even the slightest thing, even for a moment" — incurs an offense entailing expiation.

"Whatever nun" refers to those of the Twelve Groups. "Deliberately" means having considered the matter. "Causes to feel remorse" means speech, words, and statements uttered with the intention of generating remorse, up to and including verbal expression. "Incurs an offense entailing expiation" is as stated above.

As for how the transgression arises: when a nun, with deliberate intent and with the thought of generating remorse, goes to another nun and says, "Sister, do you remember the great earthquake, or the great merchant ship, or the earthquake, or the moon being seized by Rāhu, or the sun being seized by Rāhu, or the fire at the horizon?" and that other nun replies, "I do not remember," and then the first says, "It is because what happened occurred at an earlier time. Sister, you received full ordination before you had reached the age of twenty, and since you have not received full ordination validly, you must receive full ordination again" — then whether or not remorse arises in that nun, whatever constitutes the causing of remorse incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if she says, "Sister, who is your preceptress?" and when told her name, she says, "That nun who is called the preceptress — the Saṅgha performed the act of removal from her seat" — then whether or not remorse arises in that nun, and so on, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if she says, "She is a person of corrupt conduct" — it incurs an offense entailing expiation, and so on.

Likewise, if she says, "Sister, where did you receive full ordination?" and when told the place, she says, "That place — the boundary was not properly demarcated, the boundary markers are not apparent within the maṇḍala, and the ordination was accomplished amid discord and conflict, not in harmony; therefore, sister, your ordination is not validly received" — and so on, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if a sister takes the robes of an ordaining preceptress or a teacher, or if, when it is said "She takes them thus," one says to her, "By taking them thus, you have incurred a transgression that will result in defeat" — and so on up to the concluding phrase, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if a sister teaches fully that all formations are impermanent, that all phenomena are without self, and that nirvāṇa is peace — or if, when it is said "She teaches thus," one says to her, "By speaking thus of the supreme teaching of a noble one, you have incurred a transgression that will result in defeat" — that too incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if a sister goes to some region, or when it is said "She goes thus," one says to her, "That region is one where violent people have settled; therefore you are about to incur a transgression that will result in defeat" — and so on, from the statement up to the phrase "it incurs an offense," it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

Likewise, if a sister eats meat, fish, dried meat, butter, milk, yogurt, or cream — or when it is said "She eats thus," one says to her, "If you eat such food, you will be afflicted with leprosy, small lesions, discolored patches of skin, spotted skin disease, itching, festering sores, body odor, nausea, pallor, wasting disease, a cough, breathlessness, and dryness — such forms of illness will come upon you" — then whether the nun feels regret or not, it incurs an offense entailing expiation. With a different purpose, or through the instrument of the Vinaya, there is no offense.

As for what is meant by "a different purpose": if a sister recalls a great king, or when it is said "She recalls him thus," one says, "That king has been gone a long time. Sister, you are twenty years old and are properly and fully ordained, so whatever anyone may say to you, do not feel regret" — and so likewise regarding a statement about a direction, and so on. Likewise, "Your preceptress is one endowed with moral discipline and is learned." And, "The place where you received full ordination — the boundary there is clearly demarcated and apparent within the maṇḍala." And, "You have eaten fish or meat," and so on up through cream: "If you have not eaten them, you are likely to become ill." Such cases as these constitute a different purpose.

As for what constitutes the instrument of the Vinaya: "Sister, surely you have not, with thieving intent, taken the robes of the preceptress or teachers?" And, "Surely you have not incurred a transgression?" And, "Surely you did not speak with the intention of uttering the words of a noble one's teaching?" And, "Did you go to that place? Surely you have not come into conflict with those living the celibate life? Surely you have not — surely you have not" — such as these constitute the instrument of the Vinaya.

The summary verse:

On birth-family and full ordination, on the preceptress herself and the theft thereof,
on going and on speaking,
on a different purpose and the Vinaya's instrument.

The fifth section of the fifth offense-group is complete.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time, the twelve groups, with the intention of causing amusement, inserted their fingers into the armpits of nuns and tickled them, and in so doing they mocked nuns of few concerns. The matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded to establish the training rule: if one tickles with a finger, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

"With a finger" means: whatever is accompanied by the intention of tickling. "It incurs an offense" is as stated above.

As for how the offense is incurred: if a nun tickles with one finger, it incurs an offense entailing expiation. Likewise with two, and likewise with three, four, and up to five fingers — these are the five ways of incurring the offense. If, however, one displays a mole or a dark mark, there is no offense. This completes the seventh rule under the fifth section on offenses entailing expiation.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the group of seventeen, had established the training rule concerning playing in water, the group of twelve thereupon entered the water and played in it, and induced others to play. The nuns then said to them: "Sisters, has the Blessed One not established a training rule concerning this?" The group replied: "That rule was established for monks; it was not established for nuns." The nuns of few concerns reproved them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded to establish the training rule: if one plays in water, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

"In water" means: whatever falls within the range of speech and words uttered by a nun with the intention of playing, up to and including what is understood as verbal communication. "It incurs an offense" is as stated above.

As for how the offense is incurred: there are nine bases. If a nun, with the intention of playing in water, wishes to enter the water, ties on a cloth, enters the water, and dives in — this incurs an offense entailing expiation. Similarly, causing oneself to rise up to the surface, going from the near bank to the far bank, or striving to swim against the current or with it — all of these incur an offense entailing expiation. Making the sound of a drum on the water also incurs an offense entailing expiation. Similarly, making sounds ranging from a beat on the water up to that of a single-faced clay drum — all of these incur an offense entailing expiation. If a nun scatters water on one another, it incurs an offense entailing expiation. If a nun delights in the water, it incurs an offense entailing expiation. If she causes another to delight in it, it incurs an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, playing, causing another to play, making merry, and causing another to make merry — all of these incur an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if through laughter and distracted excitement one stirs the water with the body, all of these incur an offense entailing expiation. Even striking the water in a pot with a bare finger incurs a minor offense. Likewise with a water vessel, meat broth, rice gruel, and soup. If a sick person, with the intention of playing, strikes soup or meat broth with a bare finger, there is no offense. This completes the seventh rule under the fifth section on offenses entailing expiation.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the venerable Anaṅgana, had established the training rule against lying in the same dwelling as a woman, the group of twelve then lay down together with men. The nuns said to the group of twelve: "Sisters, has the Blessed One not established a training rule against lying down together in the same place?" The group replied: "That rule was established for monks; it was not established for nuns." The nuns of few concerns reproved them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded to establish the training rule: furthermore, if any nun lies down together with a man in the same place, it incurs an offense entailing expiation.

"Any nun" refers to the group of twelve. "Together with a man" means: together with one who possesses male faculties. "Lies down in the same place" means: causes the dawn to break in any of four kinds of dwelling. "It incurs an offense" is as stated above.

As for how the offense is incurred: if a nun lies down on the ground floor of an upper-story building, and a man is lying on the floor below, the nun must remove the stairs. If it is a staircase landing, she must block the door with a bolt and lie down below that landing. If she does not remove the stairs or does not block the door with a bolt, and simply lets down a hanging curtain and lies there, an offense is incurred.

Likewise, if a man lies in the space between floors and a nun lies on the floor above, an offense is incurred. And similarly, if a man lies in the upper story and a nun lies below, she must remove the stairs or block the door with a bolt. If she does not do so and lies there, an offense is incurred. Likewise, if a man is lying in the space between floors and a nun lies on the floor above, an offense is incurred as well. The same applies in the case of animal enclosures and the like: she must arrange a barrier of wood, planks, and lattice-work around the space, and if she does not do so, an offense is incurred. Whatever the situation, to whatever slight degree a nun lies in the same place together with a man, an offense is incurred in all such cases.

Here ends the eighth rule under the fifth class of offenses entailing expiation.

The Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns. The twenty-first fascicle.

The occasion for this rule arose in Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Sthūlanandā, with a mind of frivolous mockery, was frightening young nuns with ugly and frightful things, inciting them to be terrified, and deriding nuns of little learning. This was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded to establish the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun, with intent to terrify other nuns, frightens them or causes them to be frightened — even if with no more than a playful intention — an offense entailing expiation is incurred.

"Whatever nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Frightens them" means she herself does so. "Causes them to be frightened" means through another. "An offense is incurred" is as stated above.

As for how the offense is incurred: if any nun, with the intention of terrifying other nuns, approaches carrying ugly and frightful things — things dark and sooty in color, repulsive in appearance, resembling charred stumps of wood — and says such words as: "Yakṣas (yakṣas), hungry ghosts (pretas), flesh-eaters, spirits, kumbhāṇḍas, corpse-like beings, and rotting creatures of such forms as these will come to you and kill you; you will be deprived of your life" — whether the nun is actually terrified or not, an offense is incurred.

Similarly, when one produces sounds such as those of lions, tigers, and wolves, and likewise the various sounds of hungry ghosts and flesh-eaters, and so forth, an offense is incurred.

Similarly, when one produces various smells such as those of vomit, urine, of goats, and of shaggy goats, and likewise the various smells of hungry ghosts and the like, and so forth, an offense is incurred.

Similarly, when one produces various tactile sensations using wood, planks, lattice-work, and fans, and likewise the various touches associated with hungry ghosts and the like, and so forth, an offense is incurred.

When a nun, with the intention of terrifying another nun, displays pleasing forms such as: a great sāla tree of the warrior caste, a great sāla tree of the brahmin caste, a great sāla tree of the householder caste, or forms such as those of gods, gandharvas (gandharvas), kiṃnaras (kiṃnaras), great serpent kings (nāgas), and whether the nun is terrified or not, an offense is incurred.

Similarly, when one produces pleasing sounds — such as those of a lute, iron cymbals, a drum, and exceedingly melodious instruments — an offense is incurred, from the words "sounds of this kind, such as those of gods," and so forth, down to "an offense is incurred."

Similarly, when one produces pleasing fragrances — such as those of aloeswood, sandalwood, bdellium resin, and camphor — an offense is incurred, from the words "fragrances of this kind, such as those of gods," and so forth, down to "an offense is incurred."

Similarly, when one produces pleasing tactile sensations — such as those of silk, cotton cloth, woolen garments, brocade, and cloth of fine muslin — an offense is incurred, from the words "tactile sensations of this kind, such as those of gods," and so forth, down to "an offense is incurred."

The ninth section of the fifth offense-group is complete.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. At that time, Stomāgāmā had a large retinue, and because she ate and drank in great quantity, dust had soiled her robes and rendered them unfit for use. Being unable to wash and rinse those robes herself, she gave them to her attendants and co-residents as a permanent gift. They washed and rinsed those robes, folded them up, placed them inside their bundles, and then entrusted them back into her hands before setting out on a journey. When they had set out on their journey, she, thinking she would reclaim them, made use of the robes. Having soiled them once again with defilement, she placed them back inside those very same bundles. When they returned and saw that those robes had been made dirty, they began to reproach her, and in that context the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "this occurrence," and so forth, proceeded to lay down a training rule: "Furthermore, if any nun gives robes to another nun and then, without having reclaimed them from her, makes use of them, an offense is incurred."

The phrase "any nun" refers to Stomāgāmā. The phrase "robes" refers to any of the seven types of allowable robe. The phrase "without having reclaimed them" means without having taken them back in hand. The phrase "an offense is incurred" is as before.

How does the offense arise? Whenever a nun gives robes of any size whatsoever to another and then uses them without having reclaimed them, an offense is incurred in every instance. If, however, the recipient is an intimate friend and would be glad to hear of it, there is no offense.

The tenth section of the fifth offense-group is complete.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. At that time, the twelve-fold group was quarreling with nuns and raking up their faults, and, overcome with anger and aversion, they groundlessly brought the matter before the formal Saṅgha against the nuns, and they were reproaching nuns of few concerns. In that context, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "this occurrence," and so forth, proceeded to lay down a training rule: "Furthermore, if any nun, having become angry and displeased, groundlessly imputes to a blameless nun — one who has no offense — a matter warranting formal Saṅgha action, an offense is incurred."

The phrase "any nun" refers to the twelve-fold group. The phrase "having become angry" is as before. The phrase "formal Saṅgha action" refers to any matter involving twenty or more. The phrase "an offense is incurred" is as before.

How does the offense arise? When a nun sees a formal Saṅgha offense occur with regard to another nun, and from that nun's having arrived at the view that no offense occurred, she shifts her perception, her patience, her wish, her reasoning, her thought, and her view, and says, "I saw the offense warranting formal Saṅgha action occur with regard to that nun" — then an offense is incurred. When a nun sees a formal Saṅgha offense occur with regard to another nun, and from that nun's having arrived at the view that a transgression is warranted regarding her, she shifts her perception, her patience, her wish, her reasoning, her thought, and her view, and says, "I saw the offense warranting formal Saṅgha action occur with regard to that nun" — then an offense is incurred. When a nun sees a formal Saṅgha offense occur with regard to another nun, and from that nun's having arrived at the view that individual confession is required regarding her, she shifts her perception, her patience, her wish, her reasoning, her thought, and her view, and says, "I saw the offense warranting formal Saṅgha action occur with regard to that nun" — then an offense is incurred. When a nun sees a formal Saṅgha offense occur with regard to another nun, and from that nun's having arrived at the view that a misdeed is involved regarding her, she shifts her perception, her patience, her wish, her reasoning, her thought, and her view, and says, "I saw the offense warranting formal Saṅgha action occur with regard to that nun" — then an offense is incurred.

In the same sequential manner, the rule concerning the slightest trace of the formal Saṅgha offense is to be elaborated in full in just the same way. However, if a nun, even from some small degree of anger, aversion, and displeasure, makes a groundless accusation of a formal Saṅgha offense against another, an offense is incurred in every case.

Here ends the eleventh section of the fifth chapter on offenses.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At that time a young man from the town of Campā had recently taken a wife. Not long afterward, he became angry with his own wife and set off back to Campā. At that time the nun Sthūlanandā was sitting by the road and, seeing that young man, spoke to him: "Good sir, where are you going?" He replied: "I am going to Campā." Thereupon Sthūlanandā set out together with him. The wife of the Campā man was sitting on the upper floor of the house, and she saw her husband going down the road in the company of a certain nun, as if setting out on a journey. Seeing this, she cried out in a loud voice that her husband had run off with a nun. Then a great many men from Campā beat Sthūlanandā, leaving her with a swollen eye, and she went to the retreat residence. When the nuns asked her what had happened, she told them everything at length. The nuns of few wants rebuked her, and the matter was brought before the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, proceeding from the phrase "This incident occurred" up through the establishment of the rule, proclaimed: "If any nun travels down a road from village to village unaccompanied by a woman, in the company of a man — even as far as a single village — an offense is incurred."

"If any nun" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Unaccompanied by a woman, in the company of a man" means in a place where there is no woman. "Travels down a road" means going along a wilderness path. "Even as far as a single village" means going from village to village. "An offense is incurred" is as before.

How does the offense arise? Whenever a nun goes from village to village unaccompanied by a woman, in the company of a man, having traveled half a league, she has committed a misdeed. For each league, an offense is incurred.

Here ends the twelfth section of the fifth chapter on offenses.

Summary verse:

Not with a thief, not with twenty,
not digging, traveling, and the training;
listening, rising, disrespect, drinking ale, wandering at wrong hours.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At that time Sthūlanandā set out from Rājagṛha together with a group of ivory merchants heading to Śrāvastī. When the road diverged and they entered a ravine, the ivory merchants caught up with her, and there too Sthūlanandā was beaten. She gradually made her way to Śrāvastī, and

The nuns said to her, "It is good that you have come, noble one." When the ivory merchants asked whether she had not been harmed, she told them the whole story of what had happened. The nuns then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered it: all those misdeeds had arisen because a certain nun had traveled the road together with thieves who shared a common purpose. He then proceeded from "this occurrence" through the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, should any nun set out upon a road together with thieves who share a common purpose, it is an offense." As for "furthermore" and "any," these refer to Sthūlanandā. "Thieves who share a common purpose" means merchants who deal in stolen ivory, or thieves. "Upon a road" means setting out and traveling on a road through a wilderness. "It is an offense" is as stated above. How does the offense arise? From the very moment a nun sets out even a little way along the road together with thieves who share a common purpose, it is an offense. For every half-league, it becomes a misdeed. For every full league, it is an offense.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At that time Sthūlanandā, wishing to have attendants, gave full ordination as a nun to a woman who had not yet reached the age of twenty. The nuns said to her, "Sister, did the Blessed One not establish a training rule? That rule was laid down for monks, she replied, not for nuns." The nuns who were modest censured her, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from "this occurrence" through the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, should any nun confer full ordination as a nun upon a candidate who has not yet reached the age of twenty, through a formal act with a motion and three announcements, that nun's ordination is not valid, and those who performed it shall be censured with a transgression. This is certain in that case. This is in accordance with the Dharma in that case." As for "it is an offense," it is as stated above. How does the offense arise? If the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty and perceives herself as not having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I have not reached twenty," then if the nuns confer full ordination upon her as a nun, those nuns shall be associating and sharing benefits with one who from the very outset was not fully ordained, and they shall also incur a transgression. The community of nuns, moreover, becomes thereby seriously compromised. If the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty and perceives herself as not having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I do not know and cannot remember whether I have reached the age of twenty — I am of two minds about it," then if the nuns confer full ordination upon her as a nun, those nuns shall be associating and sharing benefits with one who from the very outset was not fully ordained, and they shall also incur a transgression. The community of nuns, moreover, becomes thereby seriously compromised. If the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty and perceives herself as not having reached twenty, and she too neither knows, nor remembers, nor is certain about it, and the nuns neither ask anything of her nor receive any answer from her, and yet the nuns confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then the Blessed One declared:

The nuns shall be associating and sharing benefits with that nun who received full ordination under those circumstances, and they shall also incur a transgression. The community of nuns, moreover, becomes thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty but perceives herself as having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I have reached twenty," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then those nuns shall be associating and sharing benefits with that nun who received full ordination under those circumstances, yet they shall not incur a transgression, and the community of nuns shall not be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty but perceives herself as having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I know and remember clearly that I have reached twenty, and I have no doubt about it," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then those nuns shall be associating and sharing benefits with that nun who received full ordination under those circumstances, yet they shall not incur a transgression, and the community of nuns shall not be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has reached the age of twenty but perceives herself as not having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I have not reached twenty," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then those nuns shall consider that nun as fully and properly ordained from the very outset, and they shall not incur a transgression by associating and sharing benefits with her, but the community of nuns shall be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has reached the age of twenty but perceives herself as not having reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I know and remember clearly that I have not reached twenty, and I do have doubt about it," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then those nuns shall consider that nun as fully and properly ordained from the very outset, and they shall not incur a transgression by associating and sharing benefits with her, but the community of nuns shall be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has reached the age of twenty yet neither knows, nor remembers, nor is certain about it, and the nuns neither ask anything of her nor receive any answer from her, and yet the nuns confer full ordination upon her as a nun, then those nuns shall consider that nun as fully and properly ordained from the very outset, and they shall not incur a transgression by associating and sharing benefits with her, but the community of nuns shall be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has fully reached the age of twenty and perceives herself as having fully reached twenty, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies, "I have reached twenty," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, the Blessed One declared: those nuns shall consider that nun as fully and properly ordained from the very outset, and they shall not incur a transgression by associating and sharing benefits with her, and the community of nuns shall not be thereby seriously compromised.

If the candidate has reached the age of twenty and perceives herself as having reached twenty, and knows and remembers clearly and has no doubt about it, and the nuns ask her, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and she replies,

"I know and remember clearly that I have reached twenty, and I have no doubt about it," and the nuns then confer full ordination upon her as a nun, the Blessed One declared:

Nuns, that nun shall be properly ordained from the very outset, and they shall not incur a transgression by associating and sharing benefits with her, and the community of nuns shall not be thereby seriously compromised.

Nuns, among these four cases of nuns, those in the first category are the ones who are disturbed from the outset, and they are worthy of reproof because they have not been properly ordained from the very beginning. As for the nun in that case who does not know, does not remember, and is in doubt — she must be made to know, made to remember, and must abandon her doubt and uncertainty. When she has come to know, has come to remember, and has abandoned her doubt and uncertainty, then if all the conditions are complete, she is ordained just as she was ordained. If they are not complete, she must either move her seniority date or be fully ordained again. If she neither moves her seniority date nor is fully ordained again, and she goes on to participate two or three times in the restoration ceremony together with nuns who are abiding in their proper standing, then, nuns, she is dwelling by stealth and that nun is worthy of reproof.

Nuns, in that case, a nun who has not yet reached twenty and is fully ordained with the perception that she has reached twenty, and her relatives arrive and speak as follows: "Is there one called so-and-so?" and the others reply, "She is fully ordained." And the relatives then say, "She has not reached twenty" — upon hearing those words, the Blessed One declared: The months in the womb and the remaining months after birth should also be counted. If then all is complete, well and good. If it is not complete, she must either move her seniority date or be fully ordained again. If she neither moves her seniority date nor is fully ordained again — from that point up to the statement "she is worthy of reproof," the same applies as above.

Nuns, in that case, a nun who has reached eighteen is fully ordained with the perception that she has reached twenty, and if she can recover the recollection of two years, she is ordained just as she was ordained — because, nuns, going forth and full ordination in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya and the status of nunhood are difficult to obtain. If she can recover only the recollection of one year, the months in the womb and the remaining months after birth should also be counted. If then all is complete, well and good. If it is not complete — from that point up to "she is worthy of reproof," the same applies as above.

Nuns, in that case, a nun who has reached nineteen is fully ordained with the perception that she has reached twenty, and if she can recover the recollection of one year, she is ordained just as she was ordained — because, nuns, going forth and full ordination in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya and the status of nunhood are difficult to obtain. If she can recover the recollection of less than a year, the months in the womb and the remaining months after birth should also be counted. If then all is complete, well and good. If it is not complete, she must either move her seniority date or be fully ordained again — from that point up to "she is worthy of reproof," the same applies as above.

This concludes the second part of the sixth offense.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in reliance on the group of six, had established the training rule against digging the earth with one's own hands, the group of twelve then dug the earth with their own hands and caused others to dig it, and nuns who cared little for such matters censured them. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from the words "this occurrence" up through the establishing of the training rule:

Furthermore, whatever nun digs the earth or causes it to be dug commits a transgression. "Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. As for "earth," there are two kinds of earth: earth that is by nature alive, and earth that is not by nature alive. "By nature alive" means earth that has become animate through three months of rainfall soaking it — this is called earth that is by nature alive. What is earth that is not by nature alive? Earth that has not become animate because rain has not fallen upon it — this is called earth that is not by nature alive. "Digs" means by oneself. "Causes to be dug" means through another. "Commits a transgression" is as stated above.

How does the transgression arise in each case? If a nun digs earth that is by nature alive, she commits a transgression in the act of digging. If she digs earth that is not by nature alive, she commits a misdeed. If a nun drives a stake into the earth, she commits a transgression. If she pulls it out, she commits a misdeed. If a nun squeezes out moisture from earth, and if the earth element is very abundant while the moisture element is very thin, she commits a transgression. If the moisture element is very thick while the earth element is very thin, she commits a misdeed. Likewise, if the heavy element is very abundant while the earth element is very small, she commits a misdeed. If a nun squeezes sand mixed with earth out of earth, and if the earth element is very thick while the sand element is very thin, she commits a transgression. If the sand element is very abundant while the earth element is very thin, she commits a misdeed. If she presses down on loose, uncompacted earth to compact it, she commits a transgression. If the earth is already compacted, she commits a misdeed. If she breaks down an uncompacted wall, she commits a transgression. If the wall is already compacted, she commits a misdeed. If she drives a stake into a wall, she commits a transgression. If she pulls it out, she commits a misdeed. If she stops up an unfired, uncompacted water channel, she commits a transgression. If it is already compacted, she commits a misdeed. Even if she merely scrapes off the surface, she commits a misdeed. If she drives a stake into mud, or prods it with a small stake, she commits a misdeed. If she stirs it, she commits a misdeed. If she drives a stake next to an old stake, she commits a misdeed. If she draws a line on the earth, she commits a misdeed. However, if she merely traces a calculation with the back of her hand, there is no transgression.

This concludes the third part of the sixth transgression.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in reliance on the group of six, had established the training rule against accepting invitations for four months, the group of twelve then accepted invitations for five and six months as their own prerogative. The nuns then said to them: "Did not the Blessed One establish the training rule permitting invitations for four months?" They replied: "That was established for monks, not for nuns." This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from the words "this occurrence" through the establishing of the training rule:

A nun may accept invitations for four months. If she exceeds that, it is a transgression, except for a proper occasion. The proper occasions are these: an individual invitation, a repeated invitation, a special invitation, and a standing invitation. "Four months" means four months. "Exceeding that" means seeking additional invitations. "Except for a proper occasion" means when a time has been established. "Individual" means one by one, separately. "Repeated" means again and again. "Special" means as much as is fitting. "Standing" means continuously. "These are proper occasions" means these are in conformity with the Dharma. "Commits a transgression" is as stated

How does the transgression arise? If a nun accepts an invitation for a meal in the households of householders and solicits something beyond what was offered, she commits a transgression.

Likewise, the section beginning with "if invited as a guest by a householder and solicits alms" extends through to "she commits a transgression in all such cases." The section beginning with "for alms" through "if she solicits a householder" constitutes an offense requiring confession. However, if she is ill, or if she obtains alms and then solicits a householder, or if it is a convenient occasion, there is no transgression. This completes the fourth rule of the sixth group of rules entailing a transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. The Blessed One had established some rules of training that applied to nuns alone, some that were shared with monks, and some that were common to both. On one occasion, when the Blessed One had established a rule of training common to both, he sent monks to the nuns' rains retreat residence. When the monks gave instruction to the nuns, those nuns in turn passed the instruction on to other nuns. Those nuns then relayed the instruction to the members of the twelve groups, who responded by saying, "We are ignorant, confused, unclear, and unskilled. We will not train in the precepts according to your words," adding, "We will go and ask others — nuns who hold the sūtras, nuns who hold the Vinaya, and nuns who hold the Māṭṛkā."

When they said this and began to disparage the nuns of lesser knowledge, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from the words "this incident occurred" through to establishing a rule of training. The rule runs as follows: if a nun, when instructed by other nuns saying, "Noble one, you should train in this precept," responds to those nuns by saying, "I am ignorant, confused, unclear, and unskilled — I will not train in the precepts on the basis of your words," and adds, "We will go and ask other nuns — those who hold the sūtras, those who hold the Vinaya, those who hold the Māṭṛkā," she commits a transgression. A nun who wishes to know fully should train in that precept, and she should also inquire of nuns who hold the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Māṭṛkā — that is the proper procedure for her.

Now, "whatever" refers to the members of the twelve groups. "When instructed by nuns" refers to those of this Dharma community. "You should train in this precept" extends from "the eight rules resulting in defeat" through to "the seven rules for the settlement of disputes." "Ignorant" means one who does not hold the sūtras, does not hold the Vinaya, does not hold the Māṭṛkā — such a one is called ignorant. "Unskilled" means unskilled in the sūtras, unskilled in the Vinaya, unskilled in the Māṭṛkā — such a one is called unskilled. "Unclear" means unclear regarding the sūtras, unclear regarding the Vinaya, unclear regarding the Māṭṛkā — such a one is called unclear. The phrase "I will go and ask other nuns who hold the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Māṭṛkā" extends through to "one who is clear regarding the sūtras, clear regarding the Vinaya, clear regarding the Māṭṛkā." "A nun who wishes to know fully" means one who wishes to train. "She should also train in that precept" refers to the nuns in whose training she is to engage. "She commits a transgression" is as stated above.

How does the transgression arise? Whenever a nun, upon being instructed by the nuns, responds even slightly by saying "ignorant," she commits a transgression. If she says "confused," she commits a transgression. If she says "unclear," she commits a transgression. If she says "unskilled," she commits a transgression. This completes the fifth rule of the sixth group of rules entailing a transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time, members of the twelve groups, having stationed themselves at the doorway of the nuns' quarters to listen with their ears to a quarrel that had broken out among the nuns, heard whatever they could and then went about spreading to one side what they had heard from the other, and spreading to the other side what they had heard from the first — and thereby quarreling, fault-finding, disputing, and divisiveness arose in the Saṅgha, and nuns of lesser standing were being reviled. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from "this incident having occurred" through to the establishing of the training rule.

Furthermore, if any nun, knowing that a quarrel, fault-finding, divisiveness, or disputing has arisen and is ongoing among the nuns, should think, "I will listen to what those nuns say and then describe it accordingly to the other party," and should sit listening with her ears while saying nothing, she commits a transgression. As for "any" — this refers to the twelve groups. "Should sit listening with her ears" means that she remains at the doorway wishing to hear. "She commits a transgression" is as above.

How does the transgression come about? If a nun is inside and another is coming in from outside, that nun should make a sound, make noise with her footsteps, or clap her hands. If she does not do so — or if she neither hears the sound nor understands the meaning — she has committed a misdeed. If she does hear the sound and also understands the meaning, she commits a transgression. Likewise, wherever she may be sitting, she commits a transgression. However, if she thinks, "If I hear, I will bring about peace," there is no transgression. This completes the sixth rule of the sixth group of rules entailing a transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time, members of the twelve groups, during a formal Dharma deliberation of the nuns' Saṅgha, rose from their seats without saying a word and departed. This was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "They must not depart." After they had fallen ill, the Blessed One declared, "They may inform the nuns present and then depart." The Blessed One then proceeded through the training for nuns from "those wishing to train" up to "with requisites removed."

Furthermore, the female hearers (śrāvikās) are to recite this basis of training in the Vinaya as follows: If any nun, during a formal Dharma deliberation of the Saṅgha, rises from her seat without saying a word and departs without informing the nuns present — except in circumstances such as those — she commits a transgression.

As for "any" — this refers to the twelve groups. "A formal Dharma deliberation" refers to such formal acts as: a motion alone, a motion with a second proclamation, or a motion with a fourth proclamation. "Without saying a word, rises" means she falls completely silent. "Without informing the nuns present" means without making her intention known. "Except in circumstances such as those" means an exceptional circumstance has been set down. "She commits a transgression" is as above.

How does the transgression come about? If a nun, at any point during a formal Dharma deliberation — even the slightest part of it — rises and departs without saying a word, from that point through to "without understanding the meaning" is a misdeed. If she does not hear the sound but understands the meaning, she commits a transgression. This completes the seventh rule of the sixth group of rules entailing a transgression.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time, Stout Nandā together with her retinue showed disrespect toward the Buddha, disrespect toward the Dharma and the Saṅgha, and was reviling nuns of lesser standing. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded from "this incident having occurred" through to the establishing of the training rule: if one behaves disrespectfully, she commits a transgression.

As for "if one behaves disrespectfully" — there are two kinds of disrespect: toward the Saṅgha and toward an individual. "She commits a transgression" is as above. How does the transgression come about?

When the Saṅgha's steward instructs a nun to vacate a lodging and she does not comply, she commits a transgression. However, if she makes a request with the perception that the instruction is improper in terms of the Dharma, and does not comply on that basis, there is no transgression. Likewise, instructions such as "go" or "speak" — all such cases of this kind result in a transgression. This applies to disrespect toward the Saṅgha.

As for disrespect toward an individual: if the abbess or the preceptress instructs her to vacate a lodging and she does not comply, she incurs a wrong-doing. If told to go and she does not go, she incurs a wrong-doing. If told to speak and she speaks, she incurs a wrong-doing. If told to speak and she does not speak, she incurs a wrong-doing. In short, she incurs a wrong-doing in all such cases. However, if she makes a request with the perception that the instruction is improper in terms of the Dharma, there is no transgression. This completes the eighth section of the sixth chapter on transgressions.

The background occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the Venerable Legsong, established the training rule concerning wandering at improper times due to heedlessness — at that time the communities of nuns thought to themselves: "How are we to uphold this training rule?" With that in mind, the community of nuns went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, and bowed their heads to the feet of the Blessed One, then stood to one side. Having stood to one side, a great many nuns addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, how are nuns to observe the training rule regarding grain-beer and prepared beer?"

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of the nuns' desire to train, their reverence for the training, and their equipping themselves with the means for training, declared the following: "If one drinks grain-beer or prepared beer, she commits a transgression. What is called grain-beer is beer mixed with fermented grain-mash or mixed with food. What is called prepared beer is beer made from winter brew, sugar-cane brew, or other such substances mixed together. What is called drinking is swallowing it down the throat. What is called committing a transgression is as above."

How does the transgression come about? If a nun drinks, or causes another to drink, something that has the color of beer, the smell of beer, or the taste of beer, she commits a transgression. If it is prepared beer, she commits a transgression. If it is blended beer, she commits a transgression. If it merely has the color of beer, she incurs a wrong-doing. If it has the smell of beer, she incurs a wrong-doing. If it has the taste of beer, she incurs a wrong-doing. If she consumes the sediment, she incurs a wrong-doing. However, if on account of leprosy it is applied to the limbs as a medicinal rinse, or poured into the mouth and held there on account of a mouth ailment, or used as a boiling preparation, there is no transgression. This completes the ninth section of the sixth chapter on transgressions.

The background occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, on account of the Venerable Charka, established the training rule concerning wandering at improper times — at that time the twelve groups were wandering in the village both at proper times and at improper times. The nuns said to them: "Sisters, did not the Blessed One establish a training rule against wandering at improper times?" Those persons replied: "That rule applies to monks; it does not apply to nuns." Upon hearing this, the nuns presented the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, nuns must understand this and go accordingly." Then a certain nun went to a householder's home with her alms bowl and left her outer robe there — at which point she heard that the householder's house had caught fire. That nun thought to herself: "The Blessed One said that nuns must understand and go accordingly when a nun is present." So, for as long as it took to make herself understood to a nun, her alms bowl and outer robe were burned. The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning from "desiring the training" and continuing through "one who is equipped with the requisites for training" — the former part being the rule as established, and this being the permitted allowance — declared that the female hearers (śrāvikās) should recite this rule of Vinaya training as follows: "Furthermore, whatever nun goes to the village at an improper time without having made herself understood to a nun who is present — except in such a circumstance as that — commits an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to a nun of this Dharma community. Regarding "at an improper time" — what is an improper time, and what is a proper time? From the time past midday until the break of dawn: this is an improper time. The remainder is a proper time. "Goes to the village" means to the homes of householders. "Commits an offense entailing expiation" is as explained above. As for how the offense arises: whatever nun goes at an improper time with the perception that it is an improper time commits an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if she is in doubt, she commits an offense entailing expiation. If she goes at a proper time with the perception that it is improper, she commits a minor offense. Likewise, if she is in doubt, she commits a minor offense.

Here ends the complete verse summary of the sixth offense entailing expiation.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the twenty-second fascicle.

Verse summary: The cause, the royal palace, the measurement of eight finger-breadths of bone for the first time, the low seat spread out, the border, and the robe of the Sugata.

The original account is set in Śrāvastī.

At that time, the nun Gāmā put on her lower robe in the morning, took her outer robe and alms bowl, and went together with a novice nun who was following along behind her to the home of a certain donor. She taught her the Dharma in accordance with her needs, inspired her with faith, and had her prepare food for the community of nuns. The next morning, the community of nuns put on their lower robes, took their alms bowls and outer robes, and went to the place where that householder had directed them — and this passage continues up to "they sat only when seats had been spread."

Now the nun Gāmā had many duties and much to accomplish, and so she missed the time of the gong. The nuns said to that householder: "Householder, be so kind as to serve the community of nuns at their proper time." He replied: "Noble ones, I had not intended not to invite you; it is Gāmā who knows the matter of the food offering" — and this passage continues up to the point where the few-wishing nuns expressed disapproval. They then reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Nuns must not wander from house to house at the time of the prior meal and at the time of the later meal."

Then, when those who were serving or providing food had their community service and community provisioning disrupted, the Blessed One declared: "For the prior meal, two houses; for the later meal, three houses."

Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "desiring the training" and continuing through "equipped with the requisites for training," having spoken the praise, declared the following: "Furthermore, whatever nun who has been invited to a house with food goes from house to house to householders at the time of the prior meal and the time of the later meal without having made herself understood to the householder who is present commits an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to Gāmā. "A house with food" means a house with a feast prepared.

"To houses" means invited as a guest to the houses of householders. "The prior meal" means the morning time. "The later meal" means the afternoon time. "Commits an offense entailing expiation" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: whatever nun has been invited as a guest to a house with food, if during the prior meal she goes to two houses and then intentionally proceeds to a third house, she commits an offense entailing expiation. If during the later meal she goes to three houses and then intentionally proceeds to a fourth house, she commits an offense entailing expiation. If she has made herself understood to a member of the householder's family, there is no transgression. The first of the seven offenses entailing expiation is complete.

The narrative occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the group of six, had established the rule of training regarding fixed doors, the group of twelve said that this was a training rule for monks and declined to practice in accordance with that rule. The nuns then appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, for nuns also, until night has passed and dawn has not yet broken." At the time when King Prasenajit instructed the householder Gāṅgā that he wished his daughter to see the nuns, the householder Gāṅgā requested the monk Śāriputra to bring the nun Śrīmatī in order to instruct her and sent her to the royal palace, and the Blessed One also gave permission. Then on another occasion, when the daughter of Gāṅgā again wished to see the nuns, the householder Gāṅgā made a request to the Great Mistress of People, but she declined, saying that there were ten dangers in entering the royal palace.

After that, King Prasenajit made his appeal. Then the Great Mistress of People reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Gautamī, the word of the six is not to be listened to in even one instance. Which six? The teacher, the preceptor, a king consecrated from the crown of the royal lineage, the Saṅgha, the senior member of the Saṅgha, and a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened buddha." Having given this additional instruction, he entered the royal palace. At the time when the Great Mistress of People entered the royal palace, the group of twelve said to one another: "If we too were to go, today itself we would be carrying what is improper and unbecoming for the manner of a renunciant." The Blessed One then, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through "established the rule of training," declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun, before night has passed and before the three dawns have broken, crosses or stands beyond the fixed door or the boundary around the fixed door of a king consecrated from the crown of the royal lineage without having gathered up jewels or things called jewels — except in such circumstances — commits an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. "A king consecrated from the crown of the royal lineage" means that whether a woman, a man, or a person of intermediate sex has been consecrated as king, that one is a king, is of the royal lineage, and has been consecrated from the crown. "Before night has passed" means before night has turned to day. "Before dawn has broken" — "the three dawns," as before. "Without having gathered up jewels or things called jewels" means without having collected them.

As for what is called "a closed gate," there are three kinds of closed gates. What are the three? The closed gate of a city, the closed gate of a royal palace, and the closed gate of the queen's residential quarters. "Commits an offense entailing expiation" is as above. How does the transgression come about? If any nun, when dawn has not yet broken, with the perception that dawn has not yet broken, passes beyond a closed gate, she commits an offense entailing expiation. Likewise, if she is in doubt, she commits an offense entailing expiation. If any nun, when dawn has broken, has the perception that dawn has not broken, that is an offense of wrong-doing. Likewise, if she is in doubt, that is an offense of wrong-doing. If, however, she happens to come between a king, a queen, and a minister, there is no offense. This completes the second rule of the seventh category of offenses entailing expiation.

The ruling occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, during the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, nuns of the twelve groups said the following: "Noble sisters, we have only now come to know that this particular Dharma is included in the sūtra and summarized in the sūtra." When the nuns knew that those nuns had been present at two or three sessions of the restoration ceremony before — to say nothing of many times — the nuns therefore instructed that sister, saying: "Do not speak thus." And when those nuns were told, "What we have said is indeed so," this was the occasion for nuns of few wants to criticize them. The nuns then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and proceeding through to the laying down of the training rule, enacted the following: if any nun, at the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, says, "Noble sisters, only now have we come to know that this particular Dharma is included in the sūtra and summarized in the sūtra," and if the nuns know that she was previously present at two or three sessions of the restoration ceremony — to say nothing of many times — then she should be addressed thus: "Noble sister, ignorance is no excuse. Over and above causing the offense that arose to be dealt with according to the rule, you have not gained anything, noble sister — you have not gained what is to be gained, but you have gained a fault, in that you do not listen to the Dharma with reverence when the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited, you do not do so treating it as supreme, you do not do so taking it to heart, you do not do so with one-pointed ear inclined to listen, and you do not do so listening to the Dharma with your whole mind." That is the rebuke that is to be administered to her, and this constitutes an offense entailing expiation.

"Whatever" refers to the twelve groups. "Fortnightly" means twice a month. "During the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra" refers to the span from "the eight cases of defeat" through to "the seven rules for settling disputes." "Is to be recited in order" means to be recited in proper sequence. "Commits an offense entailing expiation" is as above. How does the transgression come about? Whenever a nun, at any point during the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, says "this particular Dharma is included in the sūtra," she commits an offense entailing expiation. If she says "summarized in the sūtra," she commits an offense entailing expiation. If the quorum is not assembled, or if one is otherwise absent from the formal act, there is no offense. This completes the third rule of the seventh category of offenses entailing expiation.

The ruling occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, at Śrāvastī there dwelt a certain Nirgrantha (a naked wanderer) hearer of the Dharma named Vāsomukha, who was a cowherd. A certain alms-beggar inspired him with faith in the teaching of the Buddha, and then had him offer needles to the Saṅgha of both communities. Thereupon the twelve groups had the needles, bones, and horns made into needle-cases of various comb-like shapes. He had eaten his own food and done the work of others, and before long he was reduced to poverty.

Then the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), upon seeing the craft of needle-making, said the following: "When we had faith in it, we prospered; but when we came to have faith in the śramaṇī disciples of the Śākya sons, we became destitute." The nuns heard them say this. Having heard it, they reported the matter to the Blessed One on that occasion. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This incident arose," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: Any nun who has a needle-case made from tooth, bone, or horn — having broken it, there is an offense entailing expiation. The phrase "any" refers to the twelve groups. "Tooth" means tooth itself. "Bone" means bone itself. "Made from horn" means horn itself. As for the term "needle-case," there are two kinds of needle-cases: those with a stopper and those resembling a tube. "Does" refers to doing it oneself. "Has done" refers to having another do it. "There is an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

How does the offense arise in this case? To whatever extent a nun makes or has another make even a small needle-case of tooth, or bone, or horn — in every instance there is an offense entailing expiation. One before whom such a needle-case is being fitted together should ask whether it has been broken. If one has it fitted together without asking, that transgression too remains unconfessed, and for the one before whom it is being fitted together there is also a misdeed.

This completes the fourth rule of the seventh category of offenses entailing expiation.

The ruling occasion is at Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One, on account of the six groups, had laid down the training rule that the measure of couches and chairs be eight finger-breadths of the Sugata (the Well-Gone One, the Buddha), the twelve groups then had couches and chairs made that exceeded the prescribed measure. The nuns said to them, "Sisters, did not the Blessed One lay down a training rule?" Those monks replied, "He laid it down for the monks — not for the nuns." Nuns who had few wishes then complained, and they reported the matter to the Blessed One on that occasion. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This incident arose," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: When a nun has a couch or chair made for the Saṅgha, she should have it made to the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata, excluding the insertion of the legs. If she has it made beyond that measure, having cut it, there is an offense entailing expiation.

The phrase "of the Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of the female śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. "Nun" refers to the twelve groups. "Couch" refers to a bed. "Chair" means a chair itself. "Of the Sugata" refers to the Teacher. As for the eight finger-breadths of the Sugata: that amounts to one standard cubit of a proportionate hand. "Excluding the insertion of the legs" means setting that aside. "If made beyond that" means if it is made in excess of that. "There is an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

How does the offense arise in this case? To whatever extent a nun makes anything even slightly in excess of the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata, in every instance there is an offense entailing expiation. The phrase "before whom it is being fitted together" is as before.

This completes the fifth rule of the seventh category of offenses entailing expiation.

The ruling occasion is at Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One, on account of the monks and had appointed the nuns to arrange the furnishings of the lodgings, at another time, when the nuns were arranging the lodgings, the group of twelve thereafter spread cotton-wool on the Saṅgha's beds and small chairs, and then others gathered it up and took it away. When nuns of few desires rebuked them for this, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, established the rule of training up to that point.

"Furthermore, whatever nun stuffs or has stuffed cotton-wool into a bed or chair belonging to the Saṅgha — when it is gathered up, there is an offense entailing expiation."

As for the phrase "whatever nun" — this refers to the group of twelve. "Belonging to the Saṅgha" means belonging to the Saṅgha of female śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. "Bed" means a sleeping-bed. "Chair" means a small chair. As for the term "cotton-wool," there are five kinds of cotton-wool. What are the five? Cotton-wool from the arka plant, cotton-wool from the śalmālī tree, cotton-wool from the kaśa grass, wool from sheep, and fifth, cotton-wool from the śana plant. The phrase "stuffs or has stuffed — there is an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

How does the offense arise in this case? To whatever extent even a little of what is called a bed or chair of the Saṅgha is stuffed, in every instance there is an offense entailing expiation. Nevertheless, one must ask the one before whom it is being fitted whether it has been gathered up or not; the rest is as before.

This completes the sixth rule of the seventh category of offenses entailing expiation.

The ruling occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time many straps arose among the nuns in this manner: thinking "This strap is far too long," a nun would discard it and have another made; thinking "This strap is far too short," she would discard it and have another made; and likewise some were far too wide, others far too narrow. Because they acted in this way there was much work, and because there was much work, the recitation of the texts, the reading, the chanting, the yoga, the mental application, and the inner calm abiding of the mind were all being abandoned. When nuns of few desires rebuked them for this, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, established the rule of training:

"When a nun makes a strap, she is to have it made according to the standard measure. The standard measure for a strap is this: in depth, one and a half of the Sugata's spans plus a span; in width, half a span plus a span. If made more than one span in height, she should unravel it. If made in excess of that, after unraveling there is an offense entailing expiation."

"Strap" means a strap. "Nun" means one who belongs to this Dharma. "Makes" means by herself. "Has made" means by another. "In depth" means however much liquid it can hold. As for "one span of the Sugata," the Sugata is the Teacher. Whatever constitutes one span of the Sugata corresponds to one standard cubit and a half plus a span; and whatever constitutes three spans of the Sugata corresponds to one standard cubit, one cubit, a half, and five. "In width, half a span plus a span" means one standard cubit, a span, and six finger-breadths. "In excess of that" means beyond that measure. "Makes"

means by herself. "Has made" means by another. "There is an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

How does the offense arise in this case? To whatever extent a nun makes or has another make a strap even slightly in excess of one and a half spans plus five, in every instance after unraveling there is an offense entailing expiation. As for the phrase beginning "before whom the offense is being incurred" — the sequence of the offense is as before.

If a finished one is found, the finished one itself may be used. This completes the eighth rule of the seventh section on offenses entailing expiation.

The case setting is Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One had declared that monks and nuns should wear a robe for covering the shoulder, those nuns did not know what kind it should be or what its measure should be. The Blessed One then declared: "It shall be four Sugata-heights in height and one height in width." At the time when the Blessed One declared this measure, the group of twelve made theirs in excess of the measure, and those nuns of few wants rebuked them; this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "this occurrence" through to the laying down of the training rule, declared: "A nun who makes a robe for covering the shoulder shall have it made according to the measure." The measure of the robe for covering the shoulder is this: four Sugata-heights in height, and one Sugata-height in width. If she makes it in excess of that, after trimming it down there is an offense entailing expiation.

"Robe for covering the shoulder" means a robe for the sick. "Nun" means one who belongs to this Dharma. "Makes" means by herself. "Has another make it" means by another. "Four Sugata-heights in height" means six standard cubits, which is the measure of that Sugata's cubit. "Sugata" means the Teacher. "One Sugata-height in width" means three standard cubits. "In excess of that" means beyond that. "Makes" means by herself. "Has another make it" means by another. "After trimming" means after cutting it level. "There is an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

How does the offense arise in this case? To whatever extent a nun has another make a robe for covering the shoulder even slightly in excess of six cubits, in every instance after trimming there is an offense entailing expiation. As for the phrase beginning "before whom the offense is being incurred," the sequence is as before. This completes the ninth rule of the seventh section on offenses entailing expiation.

The case setting is Śrāvastī. At the time when Ānanda had a robe of the Sugata's prescribed measure made, and the Blessed One had prohibited this, Śobhā the female lay practitioner, upon seeing Ānanda, also had a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, and having distributed it she went to the rains-retreat lodging of the nuns and, with some pieces of cloth of the Sugata's Dharma robe measure, tucked some under her armpits, draped some over her shoulders, spread some over her body, and sat there in a slovenly manner. The nuns said to her: "Noble lady, where are you going, having taken your bowl and Dharma robe?" She replied: "I am not going anywhere having taken my bowl and Dharma robe. Nevertheless, I did have a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe." They then said to her: "Sister, did not the Blessed One prohibit this?" She replied: "He gave that prohibition to the monks, not to the nuns." Those nuns of few wants rebuked her, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "this occurrence" through to the laying down of the training rule, declared: "Moreover, whatever nun has another make a Dharma robe to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, or has one made in excess of the Sugata's Dharma robe, after trimming there is an offense entailing expiation." The measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe is this:

In length, ten Sugata-cubits; in width, six Sugata-cubits. That is the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe.

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda.

"Has one made to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe" means: has a robe made to the measure of the Buddha's Dharma robe.

"In excess of" means: beyond that measure.

"That is the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe" is an enumeration of the categories.

"In length" refers to the length in question.

"Ten cubits" refers to ten Sugata-cubits, which equal fifteen standard cubits.

"Six cubits in width" — that equals nine standard cubits.

"An offense entailing expiation" — as stated above.

As for how the offense arises: whenever a nun, even to the slightest degree, has a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, or has one made in excess of the Sugata's Dharma robe — in all such cases, after trimming, there is an offense entailing expiation.

The phrase "before whom she presents herself" and what follows arises as stated above.

The summary verse of the seventh section on offenses entailing expiation is now complete.

The mnemonic summary verse reads:

Garlic, nakedness, and one who has taken refuge, whispering in the ear, a dark room, sitting there beforehand, the rains retreat, twelve years within,
great desire, one who is young in the vows.

The further summary verse reads:

Garlic, hoeing and weeding the hair, inserting two finger-joints, striking with the palm — these are prohibited.

The origin story took place in Śrāvastī.

At that time, a terrible famine arose, and it was difficult for wandering mendicants in the forest to obtain food — so it is told up to the point: "There was a man who had a garlic garden, and many green herbs grew there." The nuns then asked that man for green herbs, and he said: "Please just take whatever you need — but do not pull up those garlic plants." Each day the man went to the nuns' rains-retreat residence bringing green herbs. Then Stout Ānanda asked the other nuns: "Sisters, where did you get these green herbs?" — and from that point the account continues until Stout Ānanda also went to the garlic garden and pulled up both the green herbs and the garlic together. The owner of the garlic, becoming alarmed, then sold the garlic garden to another person, and having done so said to the nuns: "Noble ladies, I have sold it to someone else — please ask that person for the green herbs." The new owner, however, placed a young boy as a watchman, allowing whatever else to be taken freely, but when the nuns came to pull green herbs, Stout Ānanda kept pulling out garlic as well. The boy tried to stop Stout Ānanda from pulling the garlic, and Stout Ānanda struck the boy. The boy told his father, and the next day the boy hid inside the garlic garden. Stout Ānanda came again and, as she was pulling garlic, the boy stopped her — and then, as it continues, the householder himself struck Stout Ānanda. She returned to the rains-retreat residence with her eye swollen shut, and when the nuns asked what had happened she told the whole story in full. The nuns of few wants rebuked her, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "this occurrence" through to the laying down of the training rule, declared: "Moreover, whatever nun eats garlic commits an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda.

"Garlic" refers to the bulb.

"Eats" means: swallows it covertly.

"An offense entailing expiation" — as stated above.

Now, how does one incur a transgression in this matter? The training rule was established as follows: a nun who eats even the slightest amount of garlic in any form whatsoever incurs a transgression. After this rule was laid down, there was a certain sick nun who consulted a physician, and the physician recommended garlic. The nun said: "Good sir, the physician — I am now as good as dead." The physician replied: "What is wrong?" She said: "The Blessed One has prohibited it." The physician said: "Your Teacher is compassionate; he will allow it." Thereupon the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "On a physician's prescription, there is no transgression for a sick person" — from that point through to: "Garlic, asafoetida (kiyū), and the like may all be used." The nuns then became uncertain, and in order to resolve all their uncertainties they appealed to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, look at how the nun Stout Ānanda, overcome by excessive attachment, was beaten on account of garlic." The Blessed One declared: "O monks, this is not only the case now; in times past as well, she was made to suffer wrongfully through excessive attachment. Listen!" — from that point through to: "In the city of Vārāṇasī there arose a king named Brahmadatta." Now, at one point a thief had broken into the royal palace — from that point through to: "having forgotten a silver bracelet at the child's door and left it behind, and then the thief, thinking to go back and retrieve it" — from that point through to: "he was seized by the king's guards and made to suffer wrongfully." Then a deity at that time spoke in verse:

When one is overcome by excessive attachment, even what has been accomplished is lost.

One goes back seeking it again — just as with the thief's bracelet, so it is.

"O monks, listen further to how one was utterly deprived of riches through excessive attachment alone. O monks, long ago in the city of Vārāṇasī there lived a householder" — from that point through to: "a daughter was born to him, and after dying he was reborn as a king of geese who by his nature remembered his former life" — from that point through to: "each day he would bring jewels for the sake of the girl." Then the girl thought: "I will catch the king of geese and take the jewels too." But he fled and never returned. Then a deity spoke in verse:

Do not be excessively attached;
attachment contrary to the Dharma is sinful.
Through the thought of catching the king of geese, one is utterly deprived of jewels.

O monks, what do you think? The thief and the girl of that time — they were none other than this very Stout Ānanda. From that time forward she became one of excessive attachment alone, and even now she is one of excessive attachment alone. Therefore one should not be excessively attached. O monks, train yourselves accordingly.

Here ends the first of the eight offenses entailing expiation.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time Stout Ānanda was performing the hair removal of the underarm region and washing that area, and she showed this to the wives of brahmins and householders, saying: "Look at how this spotted with sesame seeds appears." They said: "Noble lady, we do this to please our husbands — but what purpose does it serve you? Whom will you please? This is not fitting for one who has gone forth into renunciation." From that point through to: when the nuns of few wants rebuked her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," established the training rule up to its conclusion: "Furthermore, whatever nun performs hair removal in the region of the private parts incurs an offense entailing expiation in every case."

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "The region of the private parts" refers to the secret place. "Performs hair removal" means shaving or pulling out hair. "Incurs an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

As for how the transgression arises: however slight the hair removal a nun performs in the region of the private parts, she incurs an offense entailing expiation in every case. If it is done on account of a wound, there is no transgression.

This completes the second of the eight offenses entailing expiation.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time Stout Ānanda inserted her hand into the private place and washed it until the affliction was pacified, and thereby the private place became swollen. She kept crystal and sandalwood paste and the like nearby, and she told this to her companions and attendants. They said to her: "What is wrong with you?" She then related the matter in full, and it was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore nuns must not wash in that manner." But because they did not wash at all, a foul odor arose.

Then on another occasion, when the great lady Gautamī was teaching the Dharma to many wives of householders, they said to one another: "There is a foul smell." Then, since the great lady Gautamī was by nature straightforward, she said: "Sisters, that foul smell is hers." They said: "Why do you not wash?" The great lady Gautamī replied: "The Blessed One has forbidden it" — and so forth, until the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Therefore one should wash using two finger-joints." But in time that very practice came to be a cause of wrongdoing.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," established the training rule up to its conclusion: "Furthermore, whatever nun, when washing, inserts beyond two finger-joints, incurs an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "When washing" means having taken up water. "Inserts beyond two finger-joints" means more than that distance. "Incurs an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

As for how the transgression arises: however slightly a nun, when washing, inserts beyond two finger-joints, she incurs an offense entailing expiation in every case.

This completes the third of the eight offenses entailing expiation.

The setting is Śrāvastī. At that time Stout Ānanda, overcome by affliction, struck the private area with her palm until she was satisfied and the place became swollen. When the desire had subsided, she cried out in distress. Then, when her companions and attendants asked her about it, she related the matter in full, and when nuns of few words rebuked her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," established the training rule up to its conclusion: "Furthermore, whatever nun strikes the female organ with her palm incurs an offense entailing expiation."

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "Strikes the female organ with her palm" means slapping the female mark with the palm. "Incurs an offense entailing expiation" is as above.

As for how the transgression arises: however slightly a nun strikes the female organ with her palm, she incurs an offense entailing expiation in every case.

The summary verses for the eighth class of offenses entailing expiation are now complete.

The summary verse reads:

One must not boil oneself naked, nor scatter water about,
nor discard blue-green dung, nor discard it behind a wall.

The founding occasion was at Śrāvastī.

The people of the city delighted in gardens and pleasure groves, and would frequent them regularly. Whenever they went into the pleasure groves, the stirrer would prepare the marinade. The householders therefore sent word ahead to the stirrer: "Come early tomorrow morning." Since she had not yet arrived, Stout Ānanda rose in the morning, put on her lower robe, took her Dharma robe and alms bowl, entered the alms-round district, and went into one householder's home, where she said: "Good lady, please give me alms." The householder's wife replied: "Noble one, I am not feeling well." Stout Ānanda said: "Why are you unwell?" The wife then explained the matter in full, whereupon Stout Ānanda said: "Why do you not stir it yourself?" She replied: "Noble one, I do not know how to do it." Stout Ānanda then said to the householder's wife: "Are you also someone whose work and that of your husband is all of one kind?" The wife replied: "Noble one, does your reverence know about it?" Stout Ānanda said: "Is there any craft or task in which she has not made herself skilled?"

Then the householder's wife said to Stout Ānanda: "Noble one, I now entreat you: please release the marinade and give it to me." Stout Ānanda replied: "Who then will give her alms?" The householder's wife said: "For that reason, I will offer to the nun who follows after me, I will offer to the preceptress, I will offer to the abbess, and I will offer even to the keeper of the residence." At those words, Stout Ānanda set her alms bowl and Dharma robe to one side, changed into different clothing, and — from there onward — washed the fermentation pot, scrubbed it, fired it, filled it with butter, and stirred it as the sequence required: first a gentle stir, then a thorough stir, then a stir to draw out the essence, and so on — yielding a frothy stage, a full-bodied stage, a skimming stage, a hundredfold-refined stage, and what resembles the form of a small creature. She cooked batches of all these kinds, and the smell from it pervaded half the town.

Then the people sitting in that half of the town came and asked: "Did the stirrer come to your home?" She replied: "She did not come. Nevertheless, the noble Stout Ānanda is doing the stirring." They too came and made their requests, and Stout Ānanda said: "Who then will give her alms?" They said: "We will offer to the residence keeper." And in like manner Stout Ānanda cooked all the marinades for half the city. Having cooked them, she took up the alms she had been offered, carried the load, and went to the rain-season dwelling.

Afterward the stirrer arrived and went door to door saying: "Housewives and ladies, please send out your marinades to be cooked." They replied: "They have already been cooked." The dyer asked: "By whom?" They replied: "By Stout Ānanda," and so the whole of the half-town came to know of it. At that, the dyer said: "The conduct of the mendicants who are sons of the Śākyan and their brahminical conduct are a sham — for this is how they cut short their livelihood!" and she began to revile them.

The nuns who were of few desires expressed their disapproval, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows: "Furthermore, whatever nun stirs up raw materials shall incur a transgression."

"Whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "Stirs up raw materials" means stirs up what has been prepared. "Shall incur a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however small the amount of raw material a nun stirs up, in every case she incurs a transgression.

Then a matter arose in the Saṅgha, and the Blessed One declared: "For the sake of the Saṅgha, one may sit in a secluded place and cook — there is no transgression." This concludes the first rule of the ninth group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time a certain householder, together with his wife, went forth from home into homelessness, and he went to the rains retreat dwelling to visit the nuns. While he was there, in the morning a nun was drinking some thick gruel, and another nun was standing before him holding a water vessel. Then that monk laughed and said: "When I was a householder, you used to stand before me like that." At that, she flung the water vessel at his head and said: "If you truly proclaim your own virtues, do you then enter into her faults?" and she fled. At that the nuns said: "Why did you pour water over the head of the chief of the assembly?" and the nuns of few desires expressed their disapproval. The matter was then reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows: "Furthermore, whatever nun pours water shall incur a transgression."

"Whatever" refers to a member of this Dharma community. "Chief of the assembly" means the foremost of the assembly. "Pours water" means with water. "Shall incur a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however small the amount of water a nun pours over the chief of the assembly, in every case she incurs a transgression. However, if one sprinkles water on the face of someone who has fainted, there is no transgression. This concludes the second rule of the ninth group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. Not far from the rains retreat dwelling there was a blue pool, and at that pool a brahmin was instructing five hundred brahmin boys in the secret words of the brahmins. Then those brahmin boys saw Stout Ānanda entering their domain, and they shouted at her. Now, Stout Ānanda had eaten a medicine that caused her to have diarrhea, and she had a great bout of it; she wiped herself and went up to the edge of the blue pool, and her discharge polluted the entire blue pool.

Then the brahmin boys came again and sat down. They said: "Sons of Kutsā, sons of Vatsā, sons of Bharadvāja — there is the stench of vomit!" And indeed their hands, feet, and clothes became fouled with the excrement. Since brahmins are desirous of purity, those brahmin boys sat there in great discomfort.

Then again, when Stout Ānanda returned from the alms round, she saw the brahmin boys sitting there in discomfort and said: "Ho there, brahmin boys! Have you done much harm?" Then she laughed and said: "You have been dealt with accordingly" — and so she reviled them. The nuns then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun discards excrement into green grass commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "Into green grass" means onto green vegetation. "Discards excrement" means foul matter. "Commits a transgression" is as above. As for how a transgression arises: whenever a nun thinks even slightly, "I am discarding this into green grass," and then discards excrement, in every such case she commits a transgression. This concludes the third rule of the ninth group of transgressions.

The Vinaya Analysis of the Nuns. The twenty-third fascicle. The occasion arose at Śrāvastī.

Stout Ānanda, having eaten and drunk in great quantity, was taken short in the night and placed a bronze chamber-pot and urinated into it. Now there was a man associated with the Great Elephant Trunk, named Palskyed, who had been punished with a fine by King Prasenajit. In the early morning hours he was passing from a place near the nuns' summer quarters on his way to the royal palace, when Stout Ānanda, without checking, threw out the bronze pot filled with urine, and it landed on his head. He then thought: "Will this be auspicious for me today, or inauspicious?" And so it came about that the keeper of the rhinoceros caused King Palskyed to show forbearance, and accordingly the king gave him an elephant named White Lotus, and restored to him his estate and authority as well.

Palskyed then took a large bolt of fine cloth and went to the nuns' summer quarters. When Stout Ānanda heard of this she became frightened. Then Palskyed spoke these words: "The one who, in the early morning hours, poured urine on me — that urine is something that brings auspicious joy. Therefore, today I wish to present a large bolt of fine cloth to the one who did so. Which nun was she?" Then Stout Ānanda said: "It was I." And he presented her with a large bolt of fine cloth.

Now when Stout Ānanda got into a quarrel with the other nuns, one of them said: "Even vomit is not equivalent to you." Then, reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "One must not discard without checking. If one discards, that is a transgression."

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun, without checking, discards excrement or urine commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "Without checking" means without having examined. "Discards excrement or urine" means if one throws it out. "Commits a transgression" is as above. As for how a transgression arises: whenever a nun, even slightly, discards excrement or urine without checking, in every such case she commits a transgression. However, if it is an empty building or a ruined wall, there is no transgression. This concludes the verse summary of the ninth group of transgressions.

The summary verse:

One must not sit alone with a man in a place of shelter together with a nun, nor with a man without cover, nor with two who are not monks, dwelling in solitude.

The occasion arose at Śrāvastī. Then, when Stout Ānanda was conversing with a man together in a sheltered place, brahmin wives and householders' wives said: "She signals in such a way and then will engage in misconduct at night." When nuns of few desires condemned her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun, alone, sits in seclusion with a single man in a sheltered place commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. "Together with a man" means with a male person.

The phrase "alone" means that no third person is present, whether a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex.

Regarding the phrase "in a sheltered and secluded place," there are three kinds of shelter: shelter provided by a wall, shelter provided by a screen, and shelter provided by a curtain.

The phrase "sits" means conversing.

The phrase "commits a transgression" is as before.

How does the transgression come about? Whatever the extent to which a nun sits together with a man in a sheltered and secluded place, in every case she commits a transgression.

Here ends the first rule of the tenth group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At the time when Carka and Bema had gone forth, Carka went to the residence where the nuns were on their rains retreat, and sat together with Bema in a sheltered and secluded place. When nuns of few desires condemned her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "this occurrence" and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun, alone, sits together with a single monk in a sheltered and secluded place commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Bema. "Alone, together with a single monk" means with Carka, in a place where no third person is present, whether a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. The remainder, down through "in a sheltered and secluded place," is as before.

The phrase "sits" means conversing.

The phrase "commits a transgression" is as before.

How does the transgression come about? Whatever the extent to which a nun sits together with a monk in a sheltered and secluded place, in every case she commits a transgression. If a companion is present, there is no transgression.

Here ends the second rule of the tenth group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. Stout Ānanda sat alone with a man in an unsheltered place and used words of coded allusion, saying "game of theft." The Blessed One, beginning from that point and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun, alone, sits together with a single man in an open and unsheltered place in seclusion commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. The rest is as before.

The phrase "unsheltered" means in the open.

The phrase "sits in seclusion" means conversing, and this is the distinguishing feature.

The phrase "commits a transgression" is as before.

How does the transgression come about? Whatever the extent to which a nun sits together with a man in an open and unsheltered place, in every case she commits a transgression. If a companion is present, there is no transgression.

Here ends the third rule of the tenth group of transgressions.

Likewise, beginning from the occasion of Bema and Carka sitting together in seclusion in an unsheltered place, and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule, the Blessed One did so as follows:

Furthermore, whatever nun, alone, sits together with a single monk in an unsheltered and secluded place commits a transgression. The phrase "whatever" refers to Bema. The monk is Carka. The rest is as it arises from what precedes.

The phrase "commits a transgression" is as before.

How does the transgression come about? Whatever the extent to which a nun, and so forth, is as before. If a companion is present, there is no transgression.

Here ends the fourth rule of the tenth group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. When Stout Ānanda made a signal to a man, he spoke to her thus: "Noble one, you have gone forth, and I am a layman within the household. If someone were to come to know this, both of us would be blamed." She replied: "What are you thinking? Must one come with conches blowing and kettledrums beating? Even so, come to the dwelling room of the rains residence." Thereupon that man came to the dwelling room. Then Stout Ānanda seated that man on a throne in a sheltered place and spoke as follows:

She said, "I am going to wash the abbess's feet," and departed. That man then made a request to the abbess and also received a scriptural recitation. He also engaged in conversation that brought scriptural recitations to the novices. In doing so much activity and accomplishing so many things, he forgot about the man altogether. Then he washed his feet outside the shrine hall, entered the dwelling room, and sat down upon the throne. At that point the man also began to stir. As he stirred and lifted the throne covering, she shouted, "A thief! A thief!" and called out an alarm. Thereupon that man talked back and fled. The nuns were scandalized, and in that state of scandal they began to reproach her, whereupon the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This being the occasion," proceeded through to the establishment of the rule of training: "Furthermore, if any nun who is alone, without a companion nun, spends the night in a dwelling room where there are no nuns, she commits a transgression." The phrase "any" refers to Stout Ānanda. The phrase "alone, without a companion, spends the night in a nun's dwelling room" means if she sleeps there. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises in this case: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun sleeps alone in a dwelling room without a companion, in every instance she commits a transgression.

Here ends the verse summary of the tenth group of transgressions.

The verse summary is as follows:

Whispering into ears — two cases — and for oneself, claims of high station, taking an oath in the celibate life, and not speaking of a fault one has seen.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. When Stout Ānanda whispered in the ear of a certain man, brahmins and householders said: "She went forth for the sake of the Dharma, yet she whispers in the ear of one who lives in the household, and one who lives in the household whispers back to her — what difference is there between the two? What is the intention? What distinction is there?" And they mocked her. The nuns of few desires, in that state of reproach, reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This being the occasion," proceeded through to the establishment of the rule of training: "Furthermore, if any nun whispers in the ear of a man, she commits a transgression." The phrase "any" refers to Stout Ānanda. The phrase "whispers in the ear" means speaks words into the ear. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun whispers into the ear of a man, in every instance she commits a transgression.

Here ends the first rule of the eleventh group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. In the same way, when Ched-ma whispering in the ear of Char-ka — up to the point where the nuns of few desires reproved her — that matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This being the occasion," proceeded through to the establishment of the rule of training: "Furthermore, if any nun whispers in the ear together with a monk, she commits a transgression." The phrase "any" refers to Ched-ma. The phrase "monk" refers to Char-ka. The phrase "whispers in the ear together" means speaks words into the ear. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun whispers in the ear of a monk, in every instance she commits a transgression.

Here ends the second rule of the eleventh group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, when Stout Ānanda fell into a dispute with the nuns, she would bring up certain quarrels in conversation, and in doing so she would take the side of her own party, the nuns of few wants censured them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and so forth, proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, in a state of agitation, strikes herself commits a transgression."

The phrase "whatever" refers to Stout Ānanda. The phrase "strikes herself" means she beats upon her own body. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun strikes her own body, in every instance she commits a transgression.

Here ends the third rule of the eleventh group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, whatever quarrel arose among the members of the Twelve Groups, wherever it arose, they would swear oaths by the Buddha in every case. They swore oaths by the Dharma, by the Saṅgha, by those who dwell in the holy life, by the preceptress, and by the teacher. The nuns of few wants censured them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and so forth, proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun swears an oath by the holy life commits a transgression."

The phrase "whatever" refers to the members of the Twelve Groups. The phrase "by the holy life" means swearing an oath by moral discipline. The phrase "swears an oath" means she does so in order to make herself believed. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun swears an oath by the Buddha, she commits a transgression. By the Dharma, she commits a transgression. By the Saṅgha, she commits a transgression. By those who dwell in the holy life, she commits a transgression. By the preceptress and the teacher, in every instance she commits a transgression.

Here ends the fourth rule of the eleventh group of transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, the members of the Twelve Groups got into a dispute with the nuns. When the dispute arose, they would bring up charges against the nuns. Whenever they were unable to prevail, they would bring up charges against the nuns on the basis of having seen a fault, bring up charges on the basis of having heard of a fault, and bring up charges on the basis of suspecting a fault. The nuns of few wants censured them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with "this occurrence" and so forth, proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun brings up charges against nuns on the basis of having seen a fault, having heard of a fault, or suspecting a fault commits a transgression."

The phrase "whatever" refers to the members of the Twelve Groups. The phrase "against nuns" means against the practitioners of this Dharma. "Brings up charges on the basis of having seen a fault commits a transgression." The phrase "brings up charges without having investigated on the basis of having heard of a fault or suspecting a fault" means she reviles them. The phrase "commits a transgression" is as above. As to how the transgression arises: however much and to whatever slight degree a nun brings up charges on the basis of having seen a fault, she commits a transgression. On the basis of having heard of a fault, she commits a transgression. On the basis of suspecting a fault, she commits a transgression.

Here ends the verse summary of the eleventh group of transgressions.

The verse summary reads:

In darkness, with lac sealed tight, and going forth without entrustment, spreading out a layman's seat — upon that seat one must not lie.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, when the nuns were wandering through the countryside, they came to a certain mountain district. There they obtained a lodging from a certain householder, and that evening, while they were staying in that place, it happened that in the middle of the night rain fell, and the nuns pressed their way into a recess at the back of the dwelling to shelter from it. Now there was already a man in that recess who had entered before them. That man seized a nun and violated her.

As soon as the nuns made their request and were released, they returned to Śrāvastī, and there, in the interval during which they gave a full account of the matter to the other nuns, those nuns reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected: "This misfortune that has arisen has come about through nuns taking up lodging in a dwelling without having inspected it." Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with the words "This incident," proceeded to establish a training rule. It runs thus: "Furthermore, whichever nun takes up lodging in a dwelling without having inspected it commits a transgression." The phrase "whichever" refers to those within this Dharma. "Without having inspected" means without having made an inquiry. "Takes up lodging" means sleeping in the home of a householder. "Commits a transgression" is as before. As to how the transgression arises: whenever a nun sleeps even a little while in a householder's dwelling, in a dark recess, without having inspected it, in every such case she commits a transgression.

This is the first of the twelfth set of transgressions. It is complete.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At that time, Stout-and-Joyful went to the dwelling of a woman whose husband had gone abroad, and asked her: "Until that time, how do you relieve your affliction? You have gone forth into homelessness — what need is there to ask?" — up to the words "with a leather strap (Skt. carmabandha)."

Then, as soon as Stout-and-Joyful went to the noble queen Phreng-Idan-ma and asked her: "Your Majesty, if your august belly grows large and you must travel to another region, how do you relieve your affliction?" — and the queen replied in these words: "You have gone forth, so why ask?" — down to the words "with a leather strap it is."

Then, as soon as Stout-and-Joyful went to the maker of leather straps and, having purchased a leather strap, came to the summer dwelling, and at night bound it to the heel of her foot and relieved her affliction — at which point a fire broke out in the summer dwelling — and, as Stout-and-Joyful awoke startled, looked about, and came tumbling down the stairs naked and shivering, and there arose the sound of her crying out, a great crowd of people burst into laughter. It is said that they declared: "Ask your mother! Ask your sister! Ask your daughter!" — up to that point.

Now, when certain nuns of few concerns censured her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, beginning with the words "This incident," proceeded to establish a training rule. It runs thus: "Furthermore, whichever nun keeps a leather strap commits a transgression." The phrase "whichever" refers to Stout-and-Joyful. "Kept" means fashioned from leather. "By herself" means on her own. "Commits a transgression" is as before. As to how the transgression arises: whenever a nun carries even a little leather strap, in every such case she commits a transgression.

The monks grew doubtful, whereupon — from that point down to the words "Venerable One, look upon how Stout-and-Joyful made a great crowd of people burst into laughter."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is not only in the present that Stout-and-Joyful has made a great crowd of people burst into laughter — in a time gone by she did so as well. Monks, hear this." "Monks, long ago in times past, in the city of Vārāṇasī, a king named Brahmadatta was ruling his kingdom. There was a brahmin who took as wife the daughter of a brahmin from a provincial region" — down to "that brahmin's daughter could not please that brahmin" — and so, in order to convey her to a weaver's house, the girl mounted a donkey,

As she set out for the home of that girl's father, and from "when the girl asked, he spoke" down to "when the girl asked, the brahmin, just as customarily described, began to lie down with her" — and since the brahmin was one who desired cleanliness and was going to fetch water, at that moment a hen startled the donkey with the sound of her flapping wings, causing it to bolt. The donkey bolted, and in that very same attire she was carried from that city through a great crowd of people, who all burst into laughter.

Then that brahmin spoke this verse at that time:

A hen's wings beat and flapped, the donkey started up in fright.
Because of what this woman did,
I too am shamed and mortified.

"Monks, what do you think? That brahmin's daughter — she is none other than this very Stout-and-Joyful" — and so on down to "then as now."

Here ends the second section of the twelfth chapter on offenses.

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī.

Then the wives of brahmins and householders, a great many of them, petitioned the noble Stout-and-Joyful, saying, "Noble one, please teach us the Dharma." She said to them, "Prepare a seat." They arranged a seat for her. She sat down right there on that prepared seat, looked toward a long wall, took hold of a lengthy sūtra, and launched into an explanation.

The brahmins and the wives of the householders then thought to themselves, "The task of nuns consists solely in reading and reciting — if we stay, our household duties will fall into disarray," and so they departed. The nun who was attending behind her said, "Noble one, to whom are you teaching the Dharma?" She replied, "To the brahmins and the wives of the householders." "They have grown weary and departed." — And with that, Stout-and-Joyful too set down her seat and left.

Those who had not been given the seat stole it. And when the brahmins and the wives of the householders began to reproach her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, from "this occurrence" down to "laid down a training rule," pronounced: Any nun who, while teaching the Dharma, abandons a seat without handing it over to a householder and departs commits an offense.

"Any" refers to Stout-and-Joyful. "Without handing it over" means without handing it to its owner. "Departs" means if she goes away. "Commits an offense" — as explained above. As for how the offense comes about: however slight the movement by which a nun departs without handing the seat over to its owner, it constitutes an offense throughout.

Here ends the third section of the twelfth chapter on offenses.

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī.

Now, in the central country it was the custom at the homes of brahmins and householders that the seats that had been arranged were not to be contaminated, and so a certain brahmin, after arranging a seat there, placed a guardian woman beside it. Stout-and-Joyful entered that house for the sake of alms and said, "Fair one, give alms." The woman replied, "Noble one, I am guarding the seat." She said to her, "Let the guard keep watch for you — you go and bring back the alms." That woman then entered inside to collect the alms, and Stout-and-Joyful sat down on the brahmin's seat. When the brahmin arrived and saw Stout-and-Joyful sitting on that seat, he began to berate her — and at that the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, from "this occurrence" down to "laid down a training rule," pronounced: Any nun who, without permission, sits down on a seat inside a house commits an offense.

Now, "whoever" refers to Stout-and-Joyful. "Without permission" means without having checked with the householder. "Sitting on a householder's seat inside a house" means having sat down there. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does the transgression occur? However long a nun sits, even for a moment, on a householder's seat inside a house without permission, in every instance she commits an offense. The fourth rule of the twelfth set of offenses is complete.

The occasion for the next rule was at Śrāvastī. A large number of nuns were wandering through the countryside, and they took up lodging for the night in the house of a rope-maker, spreading their bedding inside. Afterward, when the lamps were extinguished, the householder arrived and neither saw nor heard the nuns who were there. Then, when the householder went to lie with his wife, an indecent sound was made — and a young nun who had gone forth heard it and told others what had happened. The householder then said to his wife, "Who said that?" She replied, "It was a nun." When the householder heard this he became angry and said, "Why are you granting lodging to those who create disturbances in the world?" In his anger he drove them out at midnight. The nuns made an appeal, and from that point the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, from "this occurrence" down to "laid down a training rule," pronounced: Any nun who, without having checked with the householder, takes up lodging for the night inside a house commits an offense.

"Whoever" refers to a nun belonging to this same discipline. "Without having checked with the householder of the rope-maker's house" means in the rope-maker's house. "Takes up lodging for the night" means intending to sleep there. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does the transgression occur? However long a nun, without having checked with the householder, intends to spend the night inside a house, in every instance she commits an offense. The verse summary of the twelfth set of offenses is complete.

The summary verse reads:

Knowing that others were seated there before, attending to the sick,
not being expelled from a rains-retreat dwelling, and not sharing a single bed or chair.

The occasion for the next rule was at Śrāvastī. At that time Stout-and-Joyful was wandering through the countryside and entered a certain householder's dwelling. Some nuns who had already been staying there had not shown her the courtesies due a guest. She then used a stratagem to drive them out of that house, and nuns of few desires complained about her conduct. The matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, from "this occurrence" down to "laid down a training rule," pronounced: Any nun who, knowing full well that nuns had been residing in a place from before, arrives there at a later time and drives them out of the house commits an offense.

"Whoever" refers to Stout-and-Joyful. "Who had been residing from before" means who had been staying there from the outset. "Knowing full well" means whether she knows this herself or has been told by another. "Nuns" refers to those of this same discipline. "Arrives there at a later time" means on a different occasion. "Drives them out of the house" means from the lodging. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does the transgression occur? However often a nun drives out nuns who had been residing there from before, in every instance she commits an offense. The first rule of the thirteenth set of offenses is complete.

The occasion for the next rule was at Śrāvastī.

At that time, Stomhagimon had set aside those who dwelled with her and her attendants, and did not care for them when they were ill. Because they were without a protector and were suffering in an improper manner, this was reported to the Blessed One on the occasion when the nuns of little standing were speaking in reproach. The Blessed One then, beginning from "this occurrence," and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Furthermore, whatever nun sets aside those who dwell with her and her attendants, and when they are ill does not care for them, commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to Stomhagimon. "Sets aside those who dwell with her and her attendants" means having sent them away after they had gone forth. "When ill" means when afflicted by sickness. "Does not care for them" means with root medicines and the like. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does the transgression occur? However often a nun, having set aside even a small number of those in her retinue, does not care for them when they are ill, in every instance she commits an offense. The second rule of the thirteenth set of offenses is complete.

The occasion for the next rule was at Śrāvastī.

Then Stomhagimon thought: "Which nun shall I drive out of this rains-retreat dwelling?" And she reflected: "This great mistress of beings is one who renounces with a great retinue. This Dharma-giver, too, is one who recites scripture with a great retinue. But this lean Gautamī is of little standing, with a retinue of little standing. I shall drive out the small Gautamī." So she thought. Then, in the morning, Stomhagimon raised conversation about food, and in the morning distributed loin-cloths completely and went off, all of them departing. As for lean Gautamī, she had engaged those nuns in wholesome activities. Then lean Gautamī thought: "Now I ought to teach the Dharma to Stomhagimon as well." So lean Gautamī began to teach Dharma to Stomhagimon, saying: "Sister, are you only thinking about food? Is it not for the sake of what is wholesome?" Then Stomhagimon thought: "I have waited a long time and now I have found my opportunity." And she reviled her with the words "flesh-eater of her own child, deranged one, one fit for the charnel ground," and during that very rains retreat drove her out of the rains-retreat dwelling. When the nuns of little standing were reproaching her for this, it was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning from "this occurrence," and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having become enraged, agitated, and wrathful, drives a nun out of a rains-retreat dwelling, commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to Stomhagimon. "Enraged, agitated, and wrathful" means abiding in a state thoroughly bound up with anger. "A nun" refers to lean Gautamī. "Out of a rains-retreat dwelling" means from the dwelling. "Drives out" means expels. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does the transgression occur? Whether by bodily action, by verbal declaration, or by both together — it arises just as is stated in the offenses involving abandonment. The third rule of the thirteenth set of offenses is complete.

The occasion for the next rule was at Śrāvastī.

At that time, one near death and one approaching death were sleeping on the same seat. While those two were lying on the one seat, behaving in a manner resembling a man and a woman lying down together — laughing, being distracted, and rubbing their bodies roughly against each other — this was reported to the Blessed One when the nuns of little standing were ridiculing them. The Blessed One then, beginning from "this occurrence," and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Furthermore, whatever nun sleeps on the same seat together with a nun, commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to one near death and one approaching death.

"On the one seat" means on the one bed. "Commits an offense" is as before. How does a transgression come about in this case? However much a nun lies together with a nun on the one seat, in every instance she commits an offense.

Then again, when the nuns were wandering and going about, they found large couches and each took one for sleeping, while the rest were made to suffer. The laywomen then said this: "Noble ones, all of these couches are available for your use — why do you each sleep separately?" The nuns replied that the Blessed One had prohibited it. This was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In that case, out of proper shame and modesty, place a dividing barrier — such as a stick or a begging bowl strap and so forth — in between, and each one wrapping her own body in her own robe, she may then lie down. In this there is no need for remorse." The fourth of the thirteenth offenses is complete.

Similarly, what follows regarding a hammock is to be stated in full. Having established the training rule up to that point, the text continues: "Furthermore, whatever nun sleeps with a nun on the same hammock without a barrier between them commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to one near death and one approaching death. "Hammock" means something suspended tier upon tier. "Without a barrier between them" means allowing the body to make bodily contact on one's own side. "Sleeps" means staying through the night. "Commits an offense" is as before. How does a transgression come about in this case? However much a nun lies with a nun on a hammock without a barrier between them, in every instance she commits an offense — as it is stated in the root text. The summary verse of the thirteenth set of offenses is complete.

The summary verse: One must not travel during the rains retreat; traveling after the rains retreat is concluded, and the two — the region of suspicion and the hamlet — temples come last. The origin of this rule is in Śrāvastī.

At that time Bhagūmati, together with her retinue, was wandering and going about during the rains retreat. The nuns questioned those nuns: "Sisters, why do you wander and travel about during the rains retreat?" They replied: "The noble Bhagūmati says that she knows the three collections of scripture and declares that the time for traveling has not yet come." The nuns of little standing criticized them, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning from "this occurrence," and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Furthermore, whatever nun wanders and travels about during the rains retreat commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to Bhagūmati. "During the rains retreat" means before the invitation ceremony has been performed. "Travels about" means going to a village, a town, a district, or a royal palace. "Commits an offense" is as before. How does a transgression come about? However much a nun wanders and travels about during the rains retreat, she commits an offense. The first of the fourteenth set of offenses is complete.

The origin of this rule too is in Śrāvastī. The nuns then said to Bhagūmati: "Noble one, the invitation ceremony has been performed — you may now travel." She replied: "She knows the three collections of scripture, and declares that the time for traveling has not yet come." Those nuns said to the other nuns: "Sisters, the invitation ceremony has already been performed — why are you not traveling?" They replied: "The noble Bhagūmati says that she knows the three collections and declares that the time for traveling has not yet come." The nuns of little standing criticized them, and this was reported to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," proceeded to lay down a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having completed the rains retreat, wanders and does not set out, commits an offense." "Furthermore, whatever" refers to Bhagūmati. "Having completed the rains retreat, wanders and does not set out" means after the invitation ceremony has been performed. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does an offense arise in this case? However much a nun wanders and does not set out after the invitation ceremony has been performed, in every instance she commits an offense. Even from one meditation hut to another she must go forth.

This concludes the second rule among the fourteenth offenses.

The occasion for the next rule is in Rājagṛha. At that time an announcement was made by Ajātaśatru: "Let no one go to Vaiśālī." The nuns then set out from Rājagṛha traveling toward Vaiśālī. As they were going, robbers harassed them along the road. At that point the nuns reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, a nun must not travel through a district that is known to be dangerous." Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," proceeded to lay down a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun travels through a dangerous road into an inner district, commits an offense." "Furthermore, whatever" refers to one of the same kind. "A dangerous road" means a road known to be fearful. "Inner district" means one that is mutually hostile to another. "Travels" means wandering through it. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does an offense arise? However much a nun travels and goes between two mutually hostile districts, she commits an offense.

This concludes the third rule among the fourteenth offenses.

The occasion for the next rule is in Vaiśālī. Beginning with "The people of Vaiśālī made an announcement: 'Let no one go to Rājagṛha,'" the text proceeds to the laying down of a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun travels through a dangerous road into an outer district, commits an offense." The transgression is to be applied in conformity with the preceding rules.

This concludes the fourth rule among the fourteenth offenses.

The occasion for the next rule is in Rājagṛha. At that time Bhagūmati went to a shrine and engaged in disputes with the shrine keepers and also with others who were disputing there. After the sun had set she returned to the meditation hut saying, "My back and waist are aching," whereupon they asked her: "Where did you go?" She replied: "She settled the disputes at the shrine." They then said: "And the female renunciant who accompanied you?" She said that she had gone alone. At that point nuns of little standing criticized her, and this was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "On account of this occurrence," proceeded to lay down a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun goes to a shrine and engages in dispute, commits an offense." "Furthermore, whatever" refers to Bhagūmati. "Shrine" refers to the shrine of non-Buddhists (tīrthikas). "Goes to" means having entered. "Engages in dispute" means engages in quarreling. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does an offense arise? However much a nun goes to a shrine and disputes with non-Buddhists, in every instance she commits an offense.

This concludes the fifth rule among the fourteenth offenses.

The occasion for the next rule is in Śrāvastī. At the time when visiting shrines was prohibited, there was going to a painter's house for the purpose of viewing it, and —

— and going to a dancer's house for the purpose of viewing it, nuns of little ambition criticized her. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun goes to a painter's house or a dancer's house for the purpose of viewing it commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to Bhagūmati. "A painter's house or a dancer's house" refers to whatever households are not ones into which nuns should enter. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does an offense arise? However much a nun goes, even a little, to a painter's house or a dancer's house for the purpose of viewing it, in every instance she commits an offense.

This concludes the verse summary of the fourteenth offenses.

The Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns, the twenty-fourth section.

The summary verse:

Not having reached twelve years, having reached twelve years but not having been instructed, having served in a household for twelve years — yet even so, if not appointed by the Saṅgha.

The occasion is in Śrāvastī. The group of twelve then asked the monks: "After how many years do you take full ordination?" The monks replied: "After ten years." The group of twelve then said to the monks: "We too take full ordination after ten years, and you too take full ordination after ten years — so what is the difference between you and us? What is the intention? What is the distinction?" When they said this, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In that case, it is permitted. A nun shall take full ordination after she has completed twelve years." Then Bhagūmati gave full ordination to someone who had not yet completed twelve years, and nuns of little ambition criticized her. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun gives full ordination to one who has not completed twelve years commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to Bhagūmati. "Who has not completed twelve years" refers to one who has not yet completed the twelve years required for full ordination. "Gives full ordination" means causes her to enter the assembly. "Commits an offense" is as explained above. How does an offense arise? However much a nun causes even one who has not completed twelve years to enter the assembly, in every instance she commits an offense.

This concludes the first rule among the fifteenth offenses.

The occasion is in Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One had declared that one who had not completed twelve years should not be admitted to the assembly, they were nonetheless admitting them indiscriminately — and those who were childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled were also being admitted to the assembly, so that they remained untamed and unpurified. The nuns reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Whoever wishes to admit someone to the assembly should request the vow of admitting to the assembly from the Saṅgha." The request is to be made as follows: having prepared the seating arrangement, and having struck the gong, with a response to the question, one fully informs the nuns in the assembly. That nun, sitting at the end of the senior nuns, bows to the assembly of nuns, and with palms pressed together, speaks these words: "Noble Saṅgha, sisters, please hear me.

"I, the nun called such-and-such, request from the noble Saṅgha the vow of admitting to the assembly. I, the nun called such-and-such, have come before the noble Saṅgha and request the vow of admitting to the assembly. May the noble Saṅgha, out of compassionate regard, grant to me, the nun called such-and-such, the vow of admitting to the assembly." This is to be repeated in the same way a second and a third time.

After that, a single nun makes the formal request and performs the act. The request is to be made as follows: "Noble Saṅgha, sisters, please hear me. This nun called such-and-such has come before the noble Saṅgha and requests the vow of admitting to the assembly. If the time is right for the noble Saṅgha and it is agreeable, may the noble Saṅgha give its consent, and in this way may the noble Saṅgha grant to the nun called such-and-such the vow of admitting to the assembly. This is the request."

The formal act is to be performed as follows: "Noble Saṅgha, sisters, please hear me. This nun called such-and-such has come before the noble Saṅgha and has requested the vow of admitting to the assembly. The noble Saṅgha is granting to the nun called such-and-such the vow of admitting to the assembly. Those among the noble Saṅgha who consent to the noble Saṅgha granting to the nun called such-and-such the vow of admitting to the assembly, let them remain silent. Those who do not consent, let them speak. The noble Saṅgha has consented and approved, and the noble Saṅgha has granted to the nun called such-and-such the vow of admitting to the assembly. Because no one has spoken, it is held to be so."

Then, when Sthūlanandā admitted someone to the assembly without the Saṅgha's approval, the nuns of few desires took occasion to censure her and reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurred," proceeded to establish the training rule, as follows: "Furthermore, if any nun admits someone to the assembly without having requested from the Saṅgha the vow of admitting a nun to the assembly, she commits an offense."

The term "furthermore" refers to Sthūlanandā. "From the Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of female hearers (śrāvakas) of the Tathāgata. "The vow of admitting to the assembly" refers to the act performed by the request and the twofold motion. "Without having requested" means without having received it. "Admits someone to the assembly" means grants the going forth (pravrajyā), full ordination (upasampadā), or a residence. "She commits an offense" is as explained above. As for how the offense arises: to whatever extent a nun admits someone to the assembly without having requested the vow of admitting to the assembly, in all such cases she commits an offense.

This completes the second of the fifteen offenses.

The locus of the rule is Śrāvastī. Then there arrived women who had kept house for twelve years, and after they went forth they were kept waiting for twenty years before receiving full ordination. They said: "For what reason are we not receiving full ordination?" The nuns replied: "You have not yet become accustomed to the life." Those women then said: "Noble sisters, when we were still living as householders, we held the mind of a woman who could be married, and the mind of a woman of the household, and in like manner we performed many household duties — will this not please the assembly of nuns?" When they said this, the nuns reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

Therefore, granting permission, he declared: "If a woman has kept the ways of the household for twelve years, she may receive full ordination."

When the Blessed One had declared that a woman who has kept the ways of the household for twelve years may receive full ordination, there arose at that time the case of Sthūlanandā giving full ordination to women who had not yet completed twelve years, and nuns of lesser standing rebuking her for this; and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One performed all the acts beginning with "this occurrence" up through the laying down of the training rule, as follows:

"Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly gives full ordination to a woman who has not kept the ways of the household for twelve years commits a transgression."

"Furthermore, whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Knowingly" means either by herself knowing or having been told by another. "Kept the ways of the household" means having dwelt in the ways of household life. "Twelve years" means for twelve full years. "Not completed twelve years" means having completed only eleven years. "Gives full ordination" refers to the actual act of ordaining as a nun. "Commits a transgression" is as explained above.

As for how a transgression comes about: a nun commits a transgression to whatever extent she gives full ordination to a woman who has not completed twelve years.

This concludes the third of the fifteenth group of offenses.

The origin story takes place in Śrāvastī.

At a certain time, a deluded man — a person of high birth but a companion of unwholesome friends, a son of the mother of suffering — reviled the Śākyas. At that time, a great many Śākya women, tormented by grief over their husbands and sons, went forth into the renunciant life. When they had gone forth thus tormented by grief over husbands and sons, they were at that time not tormented by mental afflictions. But when their grief subsided, they then became tormented by mental afflictions.

The Śākya women then spoke at that time with Sthūlanandā, and Sthūlanandā said: "I am now in the state of old age — what can I do? But you are beautiful, pleasing to behold, and lovely. Now each of you should know your own situation: enjoy yourselves with wealthy men, merchants, and caravan leaders. Be glad. Live in enjoyment and pleasure."

Thereupon those women went to Gautamī the Slim, and they told her in full what Sthūlanandā had advised them. And she spoke thus: "Sisters, let us set aside for now the sufferings of the world beyond. Listen to what she herself has experienced as suffering in this very world: the death of a husband, separation from a son, being struck down by one's own father and mother, eating the flesh of one's child, being driven to the charnel ground, mental disturbance, and being seized by madness — if one experiences only suffering, and nothing but suffering, in this very world, what need is there even to speak of the world beyond? Sisters, do not do such a thing." And Gautamī the Slim thus turned those many Śākya women away from non-virtue and directed their minds toward virtue. When they then said, "Sthūlanandā has cast us back into an impure pit," the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Therefore, granting permission: give them the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years. Let them train in these for two years and come to delight in them."

When the Blessed One had declared the six dharmaś and the vow of training in the six harmonious dharmaś, they did not know how to confer it. So the Blessed One declared: "Prepare a seat, strike the gong" — and with those words as the opening, he gave full instructions to the nuns in response to their question.

The woman who has kept a household for twelve years and has reached the end of her seniority sits at the foot of her elder, joins her palms, and speaks these words: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters be pleased to hear me. I, called such-and-such, request full ordination from the preceptress called such-and-such. I, called such-and-such, request from the noble Saṅgha the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years through the preceptress called such-and-such. May the noble Saṅgha, out of compassion, out of close compassion, be pleased to confer upon me, called such-and-such, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years." This is to be recited in the same way a second and a third time.

After that, she is moved from the range of hearing to the range of sight, and one nun makes the motion, and the formal act is performed as follows: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters be pleased to hear me. This woman called such-and-such, who has kept a household for twelve years, requests from the noble Saṅgha, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years. If it seems right to the noble Saṅgha and they consent, may the noble Saṅgha grant it. In this way, may the noble Saṅgha confer upon this one called such-and-such, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years."

This is the motion.

The formal act is performed as follows: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters be pleased to hear me. This woman called such-and-such, who has kept a household for twelve years, requests from the noble Saṅgha, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years. The noble Saṅgha confers upon this one called such-and-such, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years. Those members of the noble Saṅgha who consent to the conferral of the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years upon this one called such-and-such, through the preceptress called such-and-such, are to remain silent. Those who do not consent are to speak." The noble Saṅgha having consented and approved, the noble Saṅgha has conferred upon this one called such-and-such, through the preceptress called such-and-such, the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś for two years. The silence is so recorded, and it is held to be so.

When the vow of training in the six dharmaś and the six harmonious dharmaś had been conferred upon them for two years, and they had come to delight in that training, the Blessed One then declared: "After that, confer upon them the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya."

When the Blessed One had declared, "Confer the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya," they again did not know how to do so. The Blessed One declared: "Prepare a seat" — and with those words as the opening, he gave full instructions to the nuns in response to their question. The woman who has kept a household for twelve years, having reached the end of her seniority, sits at the foot of her elder, joins her palms before the assembly of nuns, and speaks.

She shall speak these words: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters please hear me. I, who am called such-and-such, wish to receive full ordination from the preceptress called such-and-such. I, who am called such-and-such, request that the preceptress called such-and-such, out of compassion, taking me near with compassion, please confer upon me, called such-and-such, the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya from the noble Saṅgha." This is to be repeated in the same way a second and third time.

After that, one nun shall make the formal request, and the act shall be performed. The formal request is as follows: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters please hear me. This person called such-and-such seeks full ordination from the preceptress called such-and-such. This person called such-and-such requests the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya from the noble Saṅgha, through the preceptress called such-and-such. If it is the right time and the noble Saṅgha is willing, may the noble Saṅgha grant its permission, and may the noble Saṅgha bestow upon the person called such-and-such the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya through the preceptress called such-and-such." This is the formal request.

The formal act is to be performed as follows: "May the noble Saṅgha of sisters please hear me. This person called such-and-such seeks full ordination from the preceptress called such-and-such. This person called such-and-such requests the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya from the noble Saṅgha through the preceptress called such-and-such. The noble Saṅgha is now conferring upon this person called such-and-such the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya through the preceptress called such-and-such. Those members of the noble Saṅgha who consent to conferring upon the person called such-and-such the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya through the preceptress called such-and-such shall remain silent; those who do not consent shall speak." The noble Saṅgha has consented and granted permission, and the noble Saṅgha has conferred upon the person called such-and-such the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya through the preceptress called such-and-such. Since no one has spoken, it is so held to be.

In this way, when the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya has been conferred upon any suitable candidate by the assembly of nuns, that nun may then be granted full ordination at will, and there is no cause for regret in this regard.

Then, again, when some probationary women (śikṣamāṇās) who had kept a household for twelve years sought the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya and full ordination without having made the request, and nuns of lesser diligence were criticizing them, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with the account of what had occurred and proceeding through to the laying down of the training rule, declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun, being a woman who has kept a household for twelve years, seeks the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya and full ordination without having made the request, commits a transgression."

Now, the phrase "furthermore, whatever" refers to a probationary woman. "Having kept a household for twelve years" means one who has lived in a household for twelve years. "The vow of abiding near the brahmacarya" refers to the rite proceeding by formal request and by a twofold act. "Without having made the request" means without having sought it. "Seeks full ordination" refers to the rite proceeding by formal request and a fourfold act. "Commits a transgression" is as explained above.

As to how the transgression arises: whenever a nun grants the vow of abiding near the brahmacarya and full ordination to a woman who has kept a household for twelve years without that woman having made the request, a transgression is committed in every instance.

The summary verse for the fifteenth transgression is complete.

The summary verse reads:

Granting the vow to one of great desire,
a pregnant woman, a trainee, one set aside who is not being helped,
and the last — one to be expelled.

The origin of this rule is at Śrāvastī.

At that time, the nun Sthūlanandā placed the disciples of one of great desire and neither held them, nor taught them, nor gave them guidance, so that they remained untamed, unquieted, unconcealed, and unguarded; and because nuns of little benefit were being disparaged, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then performed the acts beginning with "This has occurred" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, if any nun sets aside disciples of one of great desire and does not care for them in accordance with them, she commits a transgression."

"Furthermore, any" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Of great desire" means one who does not know sufficiency. "Disciples" means those who live together with her and those who are nearby. "Sets aside" means having taken on. "Does not care for them in accordance with them" means does not look after them. "Commits a transgression" is as explained above.

As to how the transgression arises: whenever a nun places even the slightest number of disciples of one of great desire, a transgression is committed in every instance.

The first of the sixteenth transgressions is complete.

The origin of this rule is at Śrāvastī.

At that time, certain nuns who had been dwelling in a natural setting were eager to place disciples of one of great desire. Those nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "That nun should request the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire from the community of nuns." The nuns, not knowing that the Blessed One had said this, received further instruction from the Blessed One beginning with "Having prepared the seat" — the Blessed One explained it to the nuns in full through the form of questions and answers — so that nun, having prostrated in order of seniority, facing the community of nuns wherever they are assembled, joined her palms and, bowing down, spoke these words:

"I request the noble community of sisters to hear me. I, the nun called so-and-so, request the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire from the noble community. May the noble community, out of compassion, embrace me with compassion. Please, noble community, grant me, called so-and-so, the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire."

This is to be repeated a second and third time. After that, one nun makes the formal request and performs the act. The act is as follows:

"I request the noble community of sisters to hear me. This one, called so-and-so, requests the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire from the noble community. If it is the right time for the noble community and it consents, may the noble community grant it; and may the noble community bestow upon the one called so-and-so the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire." This is the formal request. The act is performed as follows:

"I request the noble community of sisters to hear me. This one, called so-and-so, requests the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire from the noble community. The noble community bestows upon the one called so-and-so the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire. Those who consent to bestowing upon the one called so-and-so the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak."

The noble community has consented and granted this.

The noble community of sisters has bestowed upon the one called so-and-so the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire. Because no one has spoken, it is held to be so.

In this way, whatever nun has received the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire may place disciples of one of great desire according to her own preference. She should have no regret in this matter.

Thereafter, Sthulanandā placed disciples of one of great desire without having requested the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire from the community. When nuns who had few desires censured her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun places disciples of one of great desire without having requested from the community the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'The vow of one of great desire' means by the act of a formal request and a twofold motion. 'Without having requested from the community the vow of placing disciples of one of great desire' — whether she causes someone to go forth, or grants full ordination, or bestows a residence as she pleases — this constitutes a transgression, as stated above. As to how the transgression arises: to whatever slight degree a nun places disciples of one of great desire without having requested the vow of one of great desire, a transgression arises in every instance."

This concludes the second of the sixteen transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī.

Thereafter, Sthulanandā caused a pregnant woman to go forth. When brahmins and the wives of householders saw this, they spoke disparagingly, saying, "These nuns practice the holy life as frauds, mere pretenders." The matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly causes a pregnant woman to go forth commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'Pregnant woman' means one who carries a sentient being within her. 'Woman' means a woman. 'To go forth' means within this Dharma and Vinaya. 'Commits a transgression' is as stated above. As to how the transgression arises: to whatever slight degree a nun causes a pregnant woman to go forth, a transgression arises in every instance."

This concludes the third of the sixteen transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī.

Thereafter, Sthulanandā caused someone to go forth and then did not train her. The nuns said to her, "You have received her into your circle — why do you not train her?" She replied, "She should train right here. If she does not train, she should train right here." The matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun causes someone to go forth and then does not train her commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'Having caused to go forth' means within this Dharma and Vinaya. 'Does not train her' means in the trainings of a nun. 'Commits a transgression' is as stated above. As to how the transgression arises: to whatever slight degree a nun causes someone to go forth and then does not train her, a transgression arises in every instance."

This concludes the fourth of the sixteen transgressions.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī.

Thereafter, Sthulanandā, having caused someone to go forth, did not impart instructions, did not teach, and did not render any benefit. When nuns who had few desires censured her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having caused someone to go forth, renders no benefit, commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'Having caused to go forth' means within this Dharma and Vinaya.

"Renders no benefit" refers to the alms bowl, the monastic robe, the bowl bag, the staff, the belt, recitation of scripture, reading, oral recitation, yoga, and mental application. "Commits a transgression" — this is as stated above. How does the transgression come about? In every case, however little a nun has gone forth into the retinue and renders no benefit, a transgression is incurred. The fifth of the sixteenth transgressions is complete.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter, Sthulanandā caused the wife of someone who had gone abroad to go forth. At a later time, that woman's husband returned, and the woman heard that her husband had come home. Having heard this, she went to where Sthulanandā was and said to her: "Noble one, my husband has come; please send me away to another place for a while." But she did not send her away. Then the husband came, seized her, and said: "Who gave permission for her to go forth? If you, noble one, had sent her away at that very moment, she would not have been caught by the husband." When nuns who had few desires censured this, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having caused someone to go forth, does not send her away, commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'Having caused to go forth' means within this Dharma and Vinaya. 'Does not send her away' means to another place. 'Commits a transgression' — this is as stated above." How does the transgression come about? In every case, however little a nun has kept someone in the retinue and does not send her away, a transgression is incurred. The verse summary of the sixteenth transgression is complete.

The summary verse: not yet having reached twenty years of age; having reached it but not made a request; a fierce woman tormented by grief; not having trained in the six dharmas.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter, nuns were conferring full ordination on young women who had not yet reached the age of twenty, and the Blessed One declared: "One who has not yet reached the age of twenty must not be given full ordination." Thereafter, Sthulanandā was conferring full ordination on women who had not yet reached the age of twenty, and when nuns who had few desires censured her, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," performed all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun confers full ordination on a young woman who has not yet reached the age of twenty commits a transgression. As for 'whatever' — this refers to Sthulanandā. 'Who has not yet reached the age of twenty' means one in whom twenty years are not complete. 'Confers full ordination' means through a motion and a fourfold act. 'Commits a transgression' — this is as stated above." How does the transgression come about? In every case, however much a nun confers full ordination on a young woman who has not yet reached the age of twenty, a transgression is incurred in each instance. The first of the seventeenth transgressions is complete.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter those nuns said to the monks: "You yourselves confer full ordination after reaching the age of twenty — should we not also confer full ordination after reaching the age of twenty? What distinction is there between you and us? What difference in intention? What difference in what is to be done?" When this was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore it is permitted: when a young woman has reached the age of twenty, she shall train for two years in the six dharmas and the vow of training in the six concordant dharmas. When the Blessed One declared, "When a young woman has reached the age of twenty, she shall for two years train in the six dharmas and the vow of training in the six concordant dharmas," the great progenitress Gautamī heard this and went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, she prostrated with her head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. As she sat to one side, the Blessed One instructed, correctly showed, and gladdened the great progenitress Gautamī with a Dharma-endowed discourse — and so forth up to: "He said nothing further."

Then the great progenitress Gautamī, understanding that the Blessed One's words had come to an end, rose from her seat, arranged her outer robe over one shoulder, turned to face the Blessed One, joined her palms together in reverence, and addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, it would be fitting for you to grant me something excellent. Sugata, it would be fitting for you to grant me something excellent."

"Gautamī, what excellent thing do you request?"

She spoke thus: "Venerable One, if those who have been householders for twelve years, and those young women who have reached the age of twenty, have obtained the going forth, and if it proves very burdensome to give them for two years the vow of training in the six dharmas and the six concordant dharmas — then, if the Blessed One would permit it, might you grant the vow of training in the six dharmas and the six concordant dharmas to those who have been householders for ten years and to young women who have reached the age of eighteen? Were this done, both groups would be complete."

The Blessed One declared: "Therefore it is permitted. Confer for two years the vow of training in the six dharmas and the six concordant dharmas on those who have been householders for ten years, and on young women who have reached the age of eighteen. That said, once a householder of ten years standing, or a young woman of eighteen years of age, has completed the two-year training in the six dharmas and the six concordant dharmas, thereafter the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity shall be conferred upon her."

Now when the Blessed One declared, "Confer the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity on a young woman who has reached the age of twenty," those nuns did not know the procedure. The Blessed One declared: "Having prepared a seat" — and so forth up to: — the young woman who has reached the age of twenty shall, beginning from the side of her elder, make obeisance with joined hands. She shall prostrate with joined palms before the community of nuns and speak these words: "Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. I, a young woman of twenty years of age, called so-and-so, request from the Saṅgha, with the preceptress called so-and-so, the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity. May the noble Saṅgha, out of compassion, taking me under compassionate care, grant me, the young woman of twenty called so-and-so, the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity, with the preceptress called so-and-so." This shall be recited two and three times in succession.

After that, one nun shall make a motion and perform the formal act. The formal act is as follows: "Noble sisters of the Saṅgha, please hear me. This person called so-and-so, who has not yet reached the age of twenty, requests from the Saṅgha, through the preceptress called so-and-so, the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity. If it is the proper time for the noble Saṅgha, and if the Saṅgha consents, may the noble Saṅgha grant it.

The noble Saṅgha has conferred upon the young woman called so-and-so, who has reached the age of twenty, through the preceptress called so-and-so, the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity." This is the motion. The formal act shall likewise be recited in full.

Now, the occasion on which nuns of little concern reproached Sthūlanandā for conferring full ordination upon a young woman who had reached the age of twenty without first requesting the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and continuing through to the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Moreover, whatever nun confers full ordination upon a young woman who has reached the age of twenty without her having requested the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity commits an offense."

As for the analysis: "whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Young woman" refers to a woman who has gone forth as a novice. "Who has reached the age of twenty" refers to one whose twentieth year is complete. "The vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity" refers to what is obtained by means of the motion and the twofold formal act. "Without having requested" means without having requested it from the Saṅgha. "Confers full ordination" refers to the motion and the fourfold formal act. "Commits an offense" is as stated above. As for how the offense is incurred: to whatever extent a nun confers full ordination upon a young woman who has reached the age of twenty as a fully ordained nun without that young woman having requested the vow of dwelling in the practice of chastity, in all such cases she commits an offense. This completes the second of the seventeen offenses.

The setting for this next rule is Śrāvastī. On one occasion, Sthūlanandā, having put on her lower robe in the morning and entered the alms-round district, saw a woman on a main road quarreling with some other women, and Sthūlanandā saw that this woman, in her rage, had her hair standing on end. Then Sthūlanandā thought to herself: "I have found a companion who could become my partner in quarreling." She then spoke these words to the woman: "Sister, why do you not go forth into renunciation?" The woman replied: "I am extremely hot-tempered — who would ordain me?" Then Sthūlanandā said: "I will ordain you" — and so she ordained her and conferred full ordination upon her.

On a later occasion, when a quarrel arose between that woman and some nuns, the woman's companion was mentally restrained and said nothing at all. Then Sthūlanandā said to that nun: "Since I ordained you and conferred full ordination upon you for this very purpose, why are you now sitting there as if you had entered the fourth meditative absorption? Be my ally in this quarrel!" The woman replied: "I know what constitutes wrongdoing for laywomen, but I do not know what constitutes wrongdoing for these nuns." Then Sthūlanandā said: "I will show you their faults — for now, this great mistress of creatures is a self-initiated one; this blue-lotus-hued one has sold herself in six great cities; and this gaunt Gautamī has eaten the flesh of her own child and gone to the charnel ground in a state of mental derangement."

Then, on yet another occasion when a quarrel arose with the nuns, the extremely hot-tempered nun, having had her faults publicly proclaimed by Sthūlanandā, began to revile and berate the nuns. On seeing this, the great mistress of creatures spoke these words:

Those by whom this extremely hot-tempered one was ordained said: "It is Sthūlanandā." When this was said, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to "the laying down of a training rule," and declared:

"Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly ordains a hot-tempered woman commits an offense." As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthūlanandā. "Knowingly" means either by herself or having been informed by another. "A hot-tempered woman" means one who is wrathful and quarrelsome. "Ordains" means within this Dharma-Vinaya. "Commits an offense" is as stated above. How does the transgression occur? To whatever extent a nun knowingly ordains even any hot-tempered woman, in every case she commits an offense. The third of the seventeenth class of offenses is complete.

The Vinaya Analysis of Nuns. The twenty-fifth fascicle. The basis of the case is at Śrāvastī.

Then one morning Sthūlanandā, having put on her lower robe, taken her alms-bowl and outer robe, and entered her alms-round district — up to the point where it says "Sthūlanandā ordained a woman afflicted with grief" — that woman rose before dawn, weeping and crying out: "My son! My daughter! Show yourself to me at least in a dream!" She lamented and wailed, beat her breast, and tore her hair in anguish. Then the great mistress of creatures, upon hearing this sound, spoke these words: "Who ordained this one afflicted with grief?" They replied: "It was Sthūlanandā." When this was said, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to "the laying down of a training rule," and declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun knowingly ordains a woman afflicted with grief commits an offense." As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthūlanandā. "Knowingly" means either by herself or having been informed by another. "Afflicted with grief" means separated from beloved relatives and one's own people. "Ordains" means within this Dharma-Vinaya. "Commits an offense" is as stated above. How does the transgression occur? To whatever extent a nun knowingly ordains even any woman afflicted with grief, in every case she commits an offense. The fourth of the seventeenth class of offenses is complete.

The basis of the case is at Śrāvastī. At a time when the nuns had ordained these women in the way described, those women did not know how to live alongside others or how their attendants were to be fully ordained. The Blessed One then declared: "Give to a woman who has been a householder for ten years, or to a girl who has reached the age of eighteen, the vow of training in the six rules and the six concordant rules for a period of two years." As they did not know what those six rules were and what those six concordant rules were, the Blessed One declared:

She should not travel alone on the road.
She should not cross to the far bank of a river.
She should not touch a man.
She should not sit together with a man.
She should not act as a go-between.
She should not conceal a wrongdoing.
These are called the six rules.

What are the six concordant rules? She should not grasp at gold or silver. She should not perform the act of shaving bodily hair. She should not dig in the earth. She should not cut green grass. She should not eat food that has not been received by hand. She should not eat food that has been set aside and stored.

These six are called the six concordant rules.

Having trained in these for two years, full ordination into the vow of dwelling in pure conduct shall then be given.

After that, full ordination shall be given. But then it happened that a female trainee gave full ordination to someone who had not, for two years, requested the six rules and the six concordant rules, and monks of little understanding criticized this. The matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "this incident," proceeded to establish a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, knowingly, gives full ordination to someone who has not trained for two years in the six rules and the six concordant rules, commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to a female trainee. "Knowingly" means that she herself is aware, or that it has been told to her by another. "The six rules and the six concordant rules" are as already taught. "Without having trained for two years" refers to this training that is required to become a trainee nun. "Commits an offense" is as stated above. How does the transgression arise? However much, even a little, a nun gives full ordination without having requested the vow of training in the six rules and the six concordant rules for two years, in every case she commits an offense. This completes the verse summary of the seventeenth offense.

The verse summary is as follows:

Training, and one year, assembly, the five with the mole,
the house-slot, the twenty-five, the shoulder, and the housewife.

Without having opened the occasion, to ask,
and not to go alone to relieve oneself.

Summary verse:

The six rules, and having trained,
not permitted by the householder,
if one has given cloth to me,
afterward you are not my trainee.
The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then it happened that a female trainee, having trained together with companions and attendants for two years in the six rules and the six concordant rules, was not given full ordination by them. The nuns said to her, "Noble one, you have trained — why are you not given full ordination?" She replied, "They say to me that this female trainee is being given full ordination without having trained, and thinking that it all depends entirely on my teacher, her mind is thus." This matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "this incident," proceeded to establish a training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, knowingly, having trained for two years in the six rules and the six concordant rules in the proper cycle, does not give full ordination, commits an offense." "Whatever" refers to a female trainee. "Knowingly" means that she herself is aware, or that it has been told to her by another. "Having trained" refers to the training that is required to become a trainee nun. "Does not give full ordination" means through the request and the fourfold act. "Commits an offense" is as stated above. How does the transgression arise? However much, even a little, a nun knowingly, having trained for two years and going beyond that, does not give full ordination — in every case she commits an offense. This completes the first of the eighteenth offenses. The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then it happened that a female trainee, having put on her lower robe in the morning and entered the home of a certain householder, found a woman there quarreling with her husband. The woman said to her, "What is the matter — why are you so troubled?" That woman then explained the situation at length. Thereupon the female trainee said to the woman, "Why do you not go forth into homelessness?" The woman replied:

"Who would give me ordination?" The female trainee said to her, "You should do so," and shortly thereafter she gave her the going-forth.

After that, the husband came home and asked his wife, "Where has my wife gone?" She replied, "Somāgavatī has given her the going-forth." The householder then went to where Somāgavatī was and said to her, "Noble one, who gave this attendant of mine the going-forth?" Somāgavatī replied, "She did." The householder then said, "Noble one, is it fitting that you gave the going-forth without the husband's permission?" and after saying this, the householder departed having reproached her.

When nuns of few wishes were criticizing this conduct, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, proceeded to establish the rule of training: "Furthermore, if any nun knowingly gives the going-forth to a woman without the husband's permission, she commits an offense."

The term "furthermore, any" refers to a female trainee. "Knowingly" means either she herself knows or it has been stated by another. "Without the husband's permission" means without his having given leave. "Gives the going-forth" means into this Dharma and discipline. "Commits an offense" is as above. As to how the offense is incurred: in every case to whatever degree a nun gives the going-forth to a woman without the husband's permission, she commits an offense. This completes the second of the eighteenth offenses. The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then a female trainee said to Somāgavatī, "Noble one, please give me full ordination." She replied, "If you give me a robe, I will give you full ordination afterward." When nuns of few wishes were criticizing this conduct, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, proceeded to establish the rule of training: "Furthermore, if any nun, when a nun has spoken thus — saying 'If you give her a robe, I will afterward give you full ordination' — she commits an offense."

The term "furthermore, any" refers to a female trainee. "When a nun has spoken thus" means having spoken in this way. "If you give her a robe" refers to whichever of the seven robes it may be. "If you give" means if you have offered it. "Afterward" means at another time. "Full ordination" means into the status of a fully ordained nun. "Commits an offense" is as above. As to how the offense is incurred: in every case, to whatever degree a nun has spoken in this way — saying "If you give her a robe, I will afterward give you full ordination" — in every instance she commits an offense. This completes the third of the eighteenth offenses. The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then a woman went to where the aged Gautamī was and said to her, "Noble one, if you give me the going-forth, I wish to go forth." She replied, "Abandon your household affairs, and thereafter it will not be difficult." The wife of the householder then abandoned her household affairs and came, but the aged Gautamī did not give her the going-forth. When that woman said, "Now I am neither a householder nor one who has gone forth," the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, proceeded to establish the rule of training:

Furthermore, whatever nun says to a laywoman, "Abandon your household affairs, and thereafter it will not be difficult for you," and then, when she comes, does not give her the going-forth — that is a transgression.

Now, "whatever" refers to the aged Gautamī. "Laywoman" refers to a householder's wife. "Abandon your household affairs, and thereafter it will not be difficult for you" — this was said to one who was to go forth. "Thereafter does not give her" — means within this Dharma and Vinaya. "That is a transgression" — as explained above.

As for how the transgression occurs: however much, to even the slightest degree, a nun says, "Abandon your household affairs, and thereafter it will not be difficult," and then, when she comes, does not give her the going-forth — in every such case it is a transgression.

Thus ends the verse summary of the eighteenth transgression.

The mnemonic verse:

Prohibited year by year,
not the seventh day-loan,
half-month and half-month instruction,
the restoration ceremony without monks, the rains retreat not without monks — one who has done the rains retreat should perform the invitation ceremony.
The setting is in Śrāvastī.

Then the probationer (śikṣamāṇā) gave the going-forth each year, and later, when it came time to call out their names, she called them as "first year," "second year," and so on up to "fifth year." Then the nuns said to her, "Noble one, do you not know their names?" She replied, "Who could know so many names?" The nuns of few desires criticized her on that occasion and reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, proceeded to establish the rule of training:

Furthermore, whatever nun gives the going-forth each and every year — that is a transgression.

"Whatever" refers to the probationer. "Each and every year" means year after year. "Gives the going-forth" means confers ordination. "That is a transgression" — as explained above.

As for how the transgression occurs: however much, to even the slightest degree, a nun gives the going-forth year after year — in every such case it is a transgression.

Thus ends the first of the nineteenth set of transgressions.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. Then the probationer, having taken on the intention of the earlier fortnight, proceeded also to observe the restoration ceremony of the later fortnight. The nuns said to her, "Noble one, why do you do that?" She replied, "I am one who knows the three collections of scripture, so I know what to do." The nuns of few desires criticized her on that occasion and reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence" and so forth, proceeded to establish the rule of training:

Furthermore, whatever nun observes the restoration ceremony with an intention she has already used — that is a transgression.

"Whatever" refers to the probationer. "Already used" means already spent. "Intention" means the mental resolution. "Observes the restoration ceremony — that is a transgression" — as explained above.

As for how the transgression occurs: however much, to even the slightest degree, a nun observes the individual liberation with an intention she has already used — in every such case it is a transgression.

Thus ends the second of the nineteenth set of transgressions.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One had declared that a nun who takes on the intention of the fortnight should go before the community of nuns and should receive from the monks the designation of the date together with instruction and guidance and should put these into practice, —

However, when those belonging to the twelve groups did not put the instruction and guidance into practice, the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" all the way through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, while observing the fortnight, does not put the instruction and guidance into practice, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to those of the twelve groups. As for "observing the fortnight" — this means observing the half-month. As for "does not put the instruction and guidance into practice" — this means not carrying it out together with the community of nuns. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as explained above.

As for how the transgression occurs: however much, to even the slightest degree, a nun observes the fortnight without putting the instruction and guidance into practice — in every such case it is a transgression.

Thus ends the third of the nineteenth set of transgressions.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. While the nuns were going about on their rounds, they came to the summer dwelling of a certain nun, and there those nuns performed the restoration ceremony (poṣadha) in a place without monks. Then, continuing on their rounds gradually, they arrived at Śrāvastī. When they came to the summer dwelling, the nuns said: "Welcome, you who have the Buddha, you who have the Dharma, you who have the Saṅgha. Where did you perform the restoration ceremony?" The others replied: "In some pleasant place." Then the nuns there said to those nuns: "Why did you perform the restoration ceremony in a place without monks?" — and when this was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun performs the restoration ceremony in a place without monks, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to those who hold to this Dharma. As for "a place without monks" — this means a place where no monks are present. As for "the restoration ceremony" — this means observing the individual liberation. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as explained above.

As for how the transgression occurs: however much, to even the slightest degree, a nun performs the restoration ceremony in a place without monks — in every such case it is a transgression.

Thus ends the fourth of the nineteenth set of transgressions.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One had declared that a nun must not commit to the rains retreat in a place without monks, a group of nuns then came from a certain region and committed to the rains retreat in a place without monks. After completing the rains retreat they went to Śrāvastī, and as soon as they arrived the nuns asked: "Where did you spend the rains retreat?" They replied: "In some pleasant place." The nuns then asked them: "Were there monks present, or were there none?" When they replied "There were no monks," the nuns of few desires criticized them — and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun commits to the rains retreat in a place without monks, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to those who hold to this Dharma. As for "without monks" — this means a place where no monks are present. As for "place" — this means a place where all activities are openly conducted. As for "commits to the rains retreat" — this means making a formal commitment for three months.

As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun commits even the slightest bit to the rains retreat in a place without monks, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The fifth rule of the nineteenth set of transgressions is complete.

The narrative origin is in Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One had declared that nuns who had completed the rains retreat should perform the invitation ceremony before both assemblies, those nuns then said the following to Sthulanandā: "Noble one, having performed the invitation ceremony before both assemblies, come here." She replied: "I will not go there. Why? For the moment she is a master of the three collections of scripture, and she knows how to perform the invitation ceremony — but one must offer a ceremonial whisk, a fan, and many small fans to the assembly of monks, so you all go today. I will not go there." This matter was then reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun, having completed the rains retreat, does not perform the invitation ceremony before both assemblies, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "having completed the rains retreat" — this means having gone through the full three months. As for "before both assemblies" — this means before the assembly of monks and the assembly of nuns. As for "does not perform the invitation ceremony" — this refers to what is seen, what is heard, and what is suspected. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun, having completed the rains retreat, fails even in the slightest to perform the invitation ceremony before both assemblies, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The verse summary of the nineteenth set of transgressions is complete.

Summary verse:

Not causing strife in the assembly, disagreeable speech and miserliness — five;
not eating after departing, and not accepting what has been cooked.

The narrative origin is in Śrāvastī. When Sthulanandā caused strife in the assembly, those dwelling together with her and the attendants said: "Noble one, it is not right for a nun to cause strife in the assembly." She replied: "Whether it is right or not, I have caused strife." Nuns who had few desires criticized her, and this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun causes strife in the assembly, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "in the assembly" — this means in the assembly of nuns. As for "causes strife" — this means having made a breach. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun causes even the slightest strife in the assembly, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The first rule of the twentieth set of transgressions is complete.

The narrative origin is in Śrāvastī. When Sthulanandā reviled the assembly of nuns with abusive terms such as "housewife," "prostitute," and "donkey-woman," the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon proceeded from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun reviles the assembly, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "the assembly" — this means the assembly of nuns. As for "reviles" — this means reviling with words befitting a laywoman. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun reviles the assembly even in the slightest, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The second rule of the twentieth set of transgressions is complete.

Then Sthulanandā gave lodging in a summer dwelling to some visiting nuns, and those nuns came to have abundant gain and honor. When she, out of miserliness, drove them away, the nuns said to her: "Noble one, surely miserliness has not harmed you?" She replied in these words: "Just as one in the cold is threatened by the cold, and one in the heat is threatened by the heat, shall this summer dwelling, built by me with great hardship, be given as an opportunity to these smooth-tongued ones?" Those nuns of few wishes, who censured this conduct, reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, proceeding from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun is miserly toward a lodging, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "toward a lodging" — this means toward a borrowed dwelling. As for "miserly" — this means being unwilling to share it with others. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun is even slightly miserly toward a lodging, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The third rule of the twentieth set of transgressions is complete.

The setting is Śrāvastī.

Then the nuns would go to the homes of brahmins and householders and recite praises of the great lady Mahāprajāpatī: "The great lady Mahāprajāpatī is endowed with merit, the mother of the Buddha, and the Blessed One himself has declared her foremost among the senior queens. Utpalavarṇā, who has the blue-lotus complexion, has been declared foremost among those possessing supernatural powers. Gautamī the Lean has been declared foremost among those who uphold the Vinaya. Dharmadinnā has been declared foremost among those who analyze the sūtras."

Then Sthulanandā, hearing those words, said: "Ho! You daughters of those who eat the leftovers of others — this great lady Mahāprajāpatī ordained herself; she has neither a preceptor nor an instructor. Utpalavarṇā of the blue-lotus complexion is a prostitute. Gautamī the Lean ate the flesh of her own son. And yet you recite praises of these women!" She reviled them in this way. Those nuns then said to her: "Noble one, surely miserliness toward praise has not harmed you?" She replied in these words: "She herself has gone forth from the Śākya clan, she is a master of the Three Baskets — if she speaks praises of those who are unworthy of praise, and does not speak them of her, why should it harm her?" Those nuns of few wishes, who censured this conduct, reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, proceeding from "this occurrence" through to the establishment of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun is miserly toward praise, it is a transgression."

As for "whatever" — this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "praise" — this means being miserly and envious when the scriptural learning and realization of others is spoken of. As for "it is a transgression" — this is as before. How does the transgression come about? However much a nun, when the genuine and accurate praises of another are rightly spoken, is miserly toward that praise, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The fourth rule of the twentieth set of transgressions is complete.

The setting is Śrāvastī.

Then Sthulanandā said this to the nuns: "Sisters, do not go to that household anymore." They replied: "Why do you say this?" She answered: "She herself, by great effort, taught the Dharma to that household and brought them to faith." The nuns then said to her: "Noble one, surely miserliness toward a household has not harmed you?"

When she said those words, the nuns of few wants rebuked her, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," and so forth, established the training rule: "Furthermore, if any nun is miserly toward a household, it is a transgression."

"Furthermore, any nun" refers to Sthulanandā. "Toward a household" means toward the household of a brahmin or householder. "Is miserly" means if she generates jealousy. "It is a transgression" is as before. As for how the transgression arises: however much a nun is even slightly miserly toward a household, in every instance it becomes a transgression. The fifth rule of the twentieth set of transgressions is complete.

The setting is Śrāvastī.

Then Sthulanandā, while giving instructions to the nuns, said: "Sisters, brahmins given to holding things in contempt will strike you with fists and flat blows and split your skulls — it is not fitting; do not go for alms as early as before." Having thus turned the others back, she herself divided her lower robe, took up her bowl and Dharma robe, and set out on her alms round. A brahmin given to holding things in contempt saw her, seized her, and struck her on the ear with his fist and the flat of his hand, such that her eyes were dazed and swollen. She then went into the summer dwelling, and the nuns said to her: "Noble one, who struck you?" She told them the whole story at length. The nuns then said to her: "Noble one, surely miserliness toward material gain has not harmed you?" When she said those words, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence," and so forth, established the training rule: "Furthermore, if any nun is miserly toward material gain, it is a transgression."

"Furthermore, any nun" refers to Sthulanandā. As for "is miserly toward material gain," material gain is of two kinds: gain in the form of food and gain in the form of clothing; in this context it is gain in the form of food that is intended. "Generates jealousy" means if she generates envy. "It is a transgression" is as before. As for how the transgression arises: however much a nun is even slightly miserly toward material gain, in every instance it becomes a transgression.

Now the preceding story is as follows. The monks, having arisen in doubt, requested the Blessed One, the buddha, to cut through all their doubts. They said: "Venerable one, behold how Sthulanandā teaches others and does not practice herself." The Blessed One declared: "Just as in the past, too, Sthulanandā taught others and did not practice herself, and through that improper conduct she came to suffer. Monks, once upon a time, in a past age, on a great road, there was a large herd of mountain does. Then someone said to the mountain does: 'Sisters, you have fallen ill with bile disease — it is not fitting; do not eat sesame.' Having thus instructed them, that one herself, by the roadside where carts were coming, was eating and eating sesame, and a cartwheel severed her head. Then a god at that moment spoke these verses:

She who teaches others
yet does not practice herself, she who is ruled by craving — this mountain doe has been crushed by the wheel.

Monks, know this: the mountain doe in that story was none other than this very Sthulanandā. And even then she taught others and did not practice herself, and through improper conduct came to suffer.

And even now she teaches others and does not practice herself, and through improper conduct she has come to suffer.

Therefore, monks, you should train in this way: whatever is compatible, practice it yourself first, and then teach it to others as well. Monks, you should train accordingly.

The sixth rule of the twentieth group of offenses is complete.

The origin is at Śrāvastī.

Now Sthulanandā was dwelling together with a companion, and the attendants recited a scriptural text. She then said to them: "For now, dye her vessel, and buy sugar and sesame." Having said this, she left them there without giving them a scriptural transmission. They then said: "Noble lady, do you not hold the Dharma in miserly regard?" She replied: "O daughters of gluttons! Because she pleased the six groups of monks with a bit of sesame in order to obtain a scriptural transmission — her hand developed mange; when she sought forbearance, her head was shaved; when she knelt and asked for the teaching, her tongue was split. Why then would I not be stingy?" When nuns of few desires censured this, the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, beginning with the establishment of the context, proceeded to lay down the training rule: "Furthermore, any nun who is stingy with regard to the Dharma commits an offense."

As for "furthermore, any": this refers to Sthulanandā. As for "stingy with regard to the Dharma": Dharma here means what has been taught by the Buddha or spoken by a śrāvaka. As for "commits an offense": this is as stated above.

How does one incur a transgression? However little a nun withholds the Dharma out of stinginess, in every such case she commits an offense.

A summary verse on the five kinds of stinginess:

Regarding dwelling, regarding praise, regarding household, regarding gain itself, and regarding Dharma.

The seventh rule of the twentieth group of offenses is complete.

The origin is at Śrāvastī.

Now the twelve groups ate their meal in one place and then went to eat again in another. When nuns of few desires censured this practice of eating what had been set aside and what had not been set aside, the matter was reported to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, beginning with the establishment of the context, proceeded to lay down the training rule: "Furthermore, any nun who, having eaten and having made a formal setting-aside, then arranges or eats food that has been prepared or cooked commits an offense."

As for "furthermore, any": this refers to the twelve groups. As for "having eaten and set aside in one place, having violated proper conduct": this is to have eaten in one place and then broken the rules of decorum. As for "prepared food and cooked food": prepared food refers to five kinds of prepared food, and cooked food refers to five kinds of cooked food. As for "arranges or eats": this means swallowing a morsel secretly. As for "commits an offense": this is as stated above.

How does one incur a transgression in this? If a nun, perceiving what has been set aside as set aside, nevertheless arranges or eats it, she commits an offense. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, she commits an offense. If a nun perceives what has not been set aside as though it had been set aside and arranges or eats it, she commits a wrong deed. Likewise, if she eats with doubt, she commits a wrong deed.

The eighth rule of the twentieth group of offenses is complete.

The origin is at Śrāvastī.

Now Sthulanandā, in the early morning, put on her lower robe, took up her alms bowl and outer robe, and went out for alms. She entered the home of a certain householder. The householder's wife had just given birth to a son and did not know herself how to wash the infant. Then Sthulanandā said: "Noble lady, give alms." The woman replied: "Noble lady, my heart is not at ease." Sthulanandā said: "Why? No one has washed the boy for me." Sthulanandā then said: "Why did you not ask to have him washed?"

Sthulanandā said: "Are you also someone who, like your husband, does only one kind of work?" The woman replied: "Noble lady, does she have some skill?" Sthulanandā said: "Is there any craft or any work in which she is not skilled?" The woman then said: "Noble lady, please bathe my boy." Then Sthulanandā said: "But who will give her alms?" The woman replied: "I will give alms to the renunciant women who follow behind me, and I will give to the abbess and the monastery's caretaker." Thereupon Sthulanandā set down her alms bowl, changed her robes, took up the infant, and rocked him for a little while. Then she rubbed him all over with cleansing substances beneath the navel, washed him with warm water, applied eye medicine to his eyes, drew dots with a clay paste, trimmed his hair, anointed him with honey and butter oil, placed him in a cradle, rocked him, and instructed the woman: "You must bathe him like this every single day." She then had the alms loaded up and went to the rains retreat dwelling. When the householder came home, he said to his wife: "Good woman, it was well done that you bathed the boy today." From the passage beginning "How excellent!" up to the passage "Sthulanandā bathed him, and a very great quantity of alms was offered" — that is the account of the matter.

Then, on another occasion, the great prioress Gautamī, in the early morning, put on her lower robe, took up her alms bowl and outer robe, and entered that same householder's home to seek alms. She said: "Lady of good marks, please give alms." The woman replied: "Noble lady, please bathe my boy." Then the great prioress said: "Sister, she bathed a bodhisattva; she has not bathed any other boy. Sister, surely you do not think that in order to offer a gift to a nun who is endowed with moral discipline you would incur an action that leads to becoming a slave and the like? Be that as it may, sister, where did you ever see or hear of a nun bathing a boy?" The woman replied: "Noble lady, Sthulanandā bathed him." The great prioress then said: "This very thing has now also occurred among us." With those words, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, from the passage beginning "This incident occurred" up to the laying down of the training rule, established the rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun picks up a child commits an offense." As for the terms: "whichever" refers to Sthulanandā; "child" refers to an infant; "picks up" means plays with; "commits an offense" is as before. How does the offense come about? Whichever nun picks up any child whatsoever commits an offense in every case.

The verse summary of the twentieth group of offenses is complete.

The verse summary runs:

Bathing cloths, the matter of their use, robes, the washing thereof, patched garments and their exchange, and giving Dharma robes to a novice.

The origin is at Śrāvastī.

Now the twelfth group: a great many householders' wives came together to bathe. Then Sthulanandā pointed out that her mass of pubic hair, being very dark and neatly curled, sat like the fruit of a black chickpea. The nuns reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with permission granted, a nun may keep a bathing cloth."

At the time when the Blessed One had declared that nuns should keep a bathing cloth, Sthulanandā was unconcerned and indifferent, and when nuns of few desires censured her for this, the matter was reported to the Blessed

One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun bathes without a bathing cloth commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Sthulanandā. "Bathing cloth" means a cloth for bathing, and "without" means in the absence of it. As for "bathes," there are two kinds of bathing: immersive bathing and consecration bathing. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? Whenever a nun performs either of the two kinds of bathing even to the slightest degree without keeping a bathing cloth for that bathing, a transgression occurs in every case.

The first of the twenty-first group of offenses is complete.

The origin is at Śrāvastī. Then Sthulanandā sent robes soiled by impurity to a laundress to be washed, and when brahmins and householders complained, saying "She will make our robes impure as well," the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun sends robes to a laundress commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Sthulanandā. "Laundress" means a laywoman. "Robes" means any of the seven kinds. "Sends to be washed" means sending them to be laundered and cleaned. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? Whenever a nun sends even slightly impurity-soiled robes to be washed, a transgression occurs in every case.

The second of the twenty-first group of offenses is complete.

The Vinaya Analysis for Nuns, the twenty-sixth section.

The origin is at Śrāvastī. Because women are forgetful, the nuns had forgotten which of their Dharma robes had been consecrated and which had not, and not knowing which had been consecrated and which had not, the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, from this day forward, nuns shall experience the consecration of the Dharma robe on the fifteenth day of each fortnight." Then Sthulanandā, not performing the consecration of the Dharma robe on the fifteenth day of each fortnight, was addressed by the nuns: "Noble one, why do you not perform the consecration of the Dharma robe on the fifteenth of the fortnight?" She replied: "If I can remember the three scriptural collections, why would I fail to remember the consecration of the Dharma robe?" When nuns of few desires censured her for this, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun does not perform the consecration of the Dharma robe at the half-month commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Sthulanandā. "Half-month" means the half of the month. "Dharma robe" means any of the seven kinds. "Consecration" means that the consecration is to be remembered and carried out. "Does not perform" means not practicing the training of the Teacher. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about?

To whatever small extent a nun does not practice the consecration of the Dharma robe on each and every fifteenth day, she commits a transgression in every case. The third rule of the twenty-first transgression is complete.

The occasion for the next rule is in Rājagṛha. At the time when Sthulanandā accepted a dance-teacher's costume in exchange, gave it as a Dharma robe, and the recipient distributed it and performed a dance there — whereupon the group of six nuns exposed her on the spot. The group of six then heard of this, went to Sthulanandā, met her, and beat her until her eye swelled and was injured. She went into the rains-retreat dwelling. The nuns said to her: "Who beat you?" She spoke these words: "My brothers beat me — do not be displeased on my account." The nuns said: "Why did she speak at length on that occasion?" And at the occasion when nuns of few wants rebuked her, this was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun gives a Dharma robe of a renunciant to a laywomen commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Sthulanandā. "Laywoman" means one who dwells in a household. "A Dharma robe of a renunciant" means an ochre robe. "Gives" means giving it away. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever small extent a nun gives a Dharma robe of a renunciant to a laywoman, she commits a transgression in every case. The verse summary of the twenty-first transgression is complete.

The summary verse is as follows:

The menstrual cloth, the assembly's menstrual cloth,
The self-initiative of the poor,
What is to be given as a stiff extension,
And the robes that are to be distributed.

The occasion for the next rule is in Śrāvastī. Women, being propelled by karma from former lives, came to have a monthly flow, and the nuns began to drip with menstrual discharge month by month. The Blessed One declared: "A menstrual cloth is to be worn." At the very time when the Blessed One declared, "A menstrual cloth is to be worn," while they were wearing them and moving about, the cloths fell off. The Blessed One declared: "They are to be fastened with a cord." Furthermore, Sthulanandā, having no sense of shame, gave hers away while blood was dripping and went out for alms-gathering. Brahmins and householders seeing her asked: "Noble lady, what is this blood dripping from you?" She said: "Ask mother. Ask sister. Ask daughter." Those people then cried out, gossiped, and spoke reproachfully, saying: "This will make all our households impure." At the occasion of their reproach, the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," proceeded through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun does not wear a menstrual cloth commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Sthulanandā. "Menstrual cloth" means that which conceals the discomfort of women. "Does not wear" means not making it her own. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever small extent a nun does not wear a menstrual cloth, she commits a transgression in every case. The first rule of the twenty-second transgression is complete.

The occasion for the next rule is in Śrāvastī. The queen Mālavatī heard that the Blessed One had permitted the menstrual cloth for the nuns, and she thought: "How wonderful — I shall offer menstrual cloths to the entire community of nuns." Sthulanandā then went to wherever queen Mālavatī was, and having arrived, said to her:

"Your Majesty, the Blessed One has permitted menstrual cloths for the nuns." Queen Mālavatī then directed her household attendants, and they placed chests of various cloths in front of her. Queen Mālavatī then said to Sthulanandā: "Noble one, distribute these cloths as menstrual cloths to the entire community of nuns." Sthulanandā then took all those cloths for herself. Another nun went to wherever queen Mālavatī was, and having arrived, said to her: "Your Majesty, please give me a menstrual cloth as well." Queen Mālavatī then said to that nun: "Noble one, I have entrusted all the menstrual cloths for the entire community of nuns into the hands of Sthulanandā." Now, to whatever extent Sthulanandā had been asked and had not given, and nuns of modest means were speaking in complaint, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "This occurrence" up through the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Whatever nun makes her own, for a single individual, a menstrual cloth belonging to a community that has menstrual cloths, commits a transgression." As for "whatever" — that is Sthulanandā. "That has menstrual cloths" — that is a community of women with this need. "The community's menstrual cloth" — that which is held in common by the community of nuns. "For a single individual" — meaning for one person alone. "Makes her own" — means appropriates it for herself. "Commits a transgression" — is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever small extent a nun appropriates for a single individual a menstrual cloth belonging to a community that has menstrual cloths, she commits a transgression in every case. The second part of the twenty-second transgression is complete.

The occasion for the next rule is in Śrāvastī. At that time there was a householder who was ill and in severe pain. Sthulanandā went to wherever that householder was, and having arrived, said to him: "Good sir, the time has come for rhubarb — give me some rhubarb." He replied: "Noble one, I am destitute and have nothing at all." Sthulanandā then said: "She will vouch for you — good sir, take a loan from the shop and repay it later." Sthulanandā then caused that poor, wretched man to rejoice with his little bit of rhubarb, took it, and went to her dwelling for the rains retreat. Later, a merchant seized that householder and said: "Do not go anywhere until you have paid the kārṣāpaṇas." His companions then said to the householder: "What are you doing here?" He said: "I have been seized by creditors." They asked: "Why have you been seized by creditors?" He explained the matter in full, and they then said: "The śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya have merely words of renunciation and of the holy life — for they cause even a sick man to rejoice and take from him." This criticism was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "This occurrence" up through the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Whatever nun causes a wretched person to present rhubarb or causes them to rejoice and take it on loan commits a transgression." As for "whatever" — that is Sthulanandā. "A wretched person" — that is the sick man. "Causes to present rhubarb" — that refers to the Saṅgha's robe-cloth. "Causes to rejoice and take it on loan" — means causing someone to take a loan. "Commits a transgression" — is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about?

To whatever slight extent a nun causes a wretched person to rejoice in rhubarb, in every case that becomes a transgression. The twenty-second transgression, third section, is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then, in that place, very many nuns who had been robbed by a thief where rhubarb had been stored gathered together and said, "If the Blessed One would permit it, let us retrieve the rhubarb." At that time the matter was reported to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "It is permitted. The rhubarb may be retrieved." Not understanding what the Blessed One had said, the Blessed One then declared, beginning with the words "Having arranged the beds and furnishings," through the response to the question, that the nuns should be properly informed. Following that, one nun should make a motion and a formal act should be performed. The formal act is to be done thus:

"Let the noble Saṅgha of sisters hear me. In this place there are very many nuns who have been robbed by a thief. If the time is right for the noble Saṅgha and they are agreeable, may the noble Saṅgha grant permission. And in this way, may the noble Saṅgha cause the rhubarb to be retrieved on behalf of the very many nuns who have been robbed by a thief." This is the motion. In the same way the formal act too should be stated in full.

Then, from the point where Sthulanandā did not take the opportunity to retrieve the rhubarb, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One at that time. The Blessed One then, from the words "This occurrence," up through the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Whatever nun does not take the opportunity to retrieve rhubarb commits a transgression." As for "whatever" — that is Sthulanandā. "Rhubarb" — that is the Saṅgha's robe-cloth. "Does not take the opportunity to retrieve it" — means not contributing one's share. "Commits a transgression" — is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever slight extent a nun together with the Saṅgha does not take the opportunity to retrieve rhubarb, in every case that becomes a transgression. The twenty-second transgression, fourth section, is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One had declared, "Having retrieved the rhubarb, whatever gains in cloth there may be from it shall be divided," then Sthulanandā did not take the opportunity to divide the gains in cloth from the rhubarb. At that time the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, from the words "This occurrence," up through the laying down of the training rule, established the following: "Whatever nun does not take the opportunity to divide the gains from rhubarb commits a transgression." As for "whatever" — that is Sthulanandā. "The gains from rhubarb to be divided" — means dividing the cloth. "Does not take the opportunity" — means not joining in. "Commits a transgression" — is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever slight extent a nun does not take the opportunity to divide the gains in cloth, in every case that becomes a transgression. If she herself does not wish to receive a share, there is no transgression. The versified summary of the twenty-second transgression is complete.

The summary verse is:

"Come here and be calmed, should be sent after entrusting;
a spell not to be accepted or installed, and food not to be sold."

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then, when the nuns were residing together, the novices were quarreling with one another, and Stomā Gāmī lent support to one side, thereby causing the quarrel to grow very large. The nuns then said: "Noble one, come here — we will calm this quarrel." But Stomā Gāmī replied: "Why are you seeking to interfere? For the time being, I am going to keep quarreling, not calm things down." The nuns of few desires then reproached her, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through to the laying down of the training, established the rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun has the power to calm a quarrel and does not do so commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Stomā Gāmī. "Has the power" means is endowed with the ability. "A quarrel" means a dispute. "To calm" means to bring fully to peace. "Does not do so" means does not stop it. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? To whatever slight extent a nun is able to calm a quarrel and a dispute, and has the power to do so, and yet does not calm it — in every case that becomes a transgression. The first of the twenty-third transgressions is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then Stomā Gāmī locked the door of the rains-retreat residence, took the key, and went off wandering through the countryside. While she was away, a fire broke out in that residence. When the nuns wished to break the door open, they could not find the key, and as a result they were burned in the fire. The nuns of few desires then reproached her, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through to the laying down of the training, established the rule: "Furthermore, whichever nun goes off wandering through the countryside without entrusting the rains-retreat residence commits a transgression."

"Whichever" refers to Stomā Gāmī. "The rains-retreat residence" means the monastery. "Without entrusting" means without handing the key over to the nuns. "Goes off wandering through the countryside" means going beyond the boundary. "Commits a transgression" is as before. Now, how does a transgression come about? If a nun, perceiving herself to be within the boundary while she is indeed within the boundary, goes beyond the boundary without having handed the key to the nuns, she commits a transgression. Likewise, if she is in doubt, she commits a transgression. If a nun perceives herself to be outside the boundary while she is actually within it, and goes beyond the boundary without having handed the key to the nuns, she commits a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she is in doubt, she commits a wrongdoing. The second of the twenty-third transgressions is complete.

The basis of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then Stomā Gāmī, overcome by desire and wishing for a man, went to a young incense-seller and said to him: "Good-looking one, can you recite a spell?" He replied that he could. Stomā Gāmī then said: "Come now, recite it." He recited: "Sar phu, bi si ri phu, si ri bi svāhā." Stomā Gāmī told him to repeat it again and again. When he became angry, he insulted her, calling her a bad woman. A novice nun who was following behind then said: "If you cannot even retain two words, how could you ever have mastered the Three Baskets (Skt. tripiṭaka)?" He replied: "She had already memorized the first recitation, but was simply keeping the words to herself."

The novice nun who was following behind then said: "Noble one, it is remarkable that you are not inflamed by desire!" At that point the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who recites a spell learned from a layperson incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Stomā Gāmī. "From a layperson" means from one who dwells in a household. "Spell" means something that dispels. "Recites" means to master it fully. "Incurs a transgression" is as explained above. As for how the transgression arises: however little a nun recites a spell learned from a layperson, in every case she incurs a transgression. The third rule of the twenty-third group of transgressions is complete.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. Stomā Gāmī then had a man recite a spell, saying: "Kye nang rje si ri phu, bi si ri phu, si ri bi si ri phu svāhā — hold that!" She had him recite it two and three times. The man then said: "Noble one, I have mastered it completely." Stomā Gāmī again said: "Recite it again and again." The man became angry and said: "You bad, shaven-headed woman — you are not worth looking at, and there is simply no spell here at all!" The novice nun who was following behind said: "Noble one, why do you act in such a way?" Stomā Gāmī replied: "I am simply keeping the words for myself." The novice nun who was following behind then said: "Noble one, it is truly remarkable that you are not tainted by affliction!" At that point the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who has a man recite a spell incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Stomā Gāmī. "A man" means a human male. "Spell" here is used in the sense of a spell for something that is not really a spell. "Has recite" means has him recite it aloud. "Incurs a transgression" is as explained above. As for how the transgression arises: however little a nun has a man recite a spell, in every case she incurs a transgression. The fourth rule of the twenty-third group of transgressions is complete.

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. Stomā Gāmī obtained a large quantity of alms food. Whatever was good among the alms she ate herself, and whatever was poor — such as flour, husked grain, and the like — she sold. Then on another occasion Stomā Gāmī went outside on some errand. A flour-seller came to her and went to the great lady Gautamī, saying to her: "Noble one, do you have any flour?" The great lady Gautamī replied: "Good-looking one, is she surrounded by flour shops?" The man said: "Noble one, it is nuns who sell flour." She said: "Good-looking one, which nun is it who sells flour?" The man replied: "It is Stomā Gāmī." The great lady Gautamī then said to that very man: "This same occurrence has now befallen us as well," and the nuns of few desires reproached her. At that point the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who sells food incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Stomā Gāmī.

The word "food" refers to flour and similar things. The phrase "if she sells" means if she accepts payment. The phrase "incurs a transgression" is as above.

As to how the transgression comes about: for however much food a nun sells, for as long as she has not yet received the payment, she has committed a wrong action. When she receives the payment, she incurs a transgression.

This concludes the verse summary of the twenty-third transgression.

The summary verse reads:

She must not keep watch over a household's door,
Nor set a seat to grow,
Nor lay on thread,
And she must not hold an umbrella or sandals.

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī.

Now, Stomā Gāmī set down her robe in the morning, took her bowl and monastic robe, and went to a certain householder's home for alms. There she said to the wife of that householder: "Good-looking one, please give alms." The woman replied: "Noble one, I am unhappy in my heart." Stomā Gāmī said: "What, have all your calves drunk their fill of milk today?" The woman replied: "Noble one, I keep watch over the household's door but get no wages." Stomā Gāmī then said: "And are you too doing the same work as a needle?" The wife of the householder said: "Noble one, is there something you yourself are skilled at?" Stomā Gāmī replied: "What craft or work is there in which she is not skilled?"

The householder's wife then said to Stomā Gāmī: "Noble one, please keep watch over my household's door." She replied: "Who will give her alms?" The householder's wife spoke further, from "the duty" through to "and also maintaining the house."

Then Stomā Gāmī set her bowl aside to one edge, changed into clean robes, swept the entire house thoroughly clean, dusted it well, arranged the bedding, cleaned and set out the iron vessels, the silver vessels, and the gold vessels, and made the entire house beautiful. Then she took up her alms bowl and went to the summer house.

When the householder returned and saw this, he said: "Good woman, today you have cleaned and swept the house so well." The woman replied, saying: "Noble one Stomā Gāmī did it — I did not." He said: "Give her alms every day, and she shall keep watch over your household's door."

Then on another occasion the great lady Gautamī came to that house for alms, and the wife of that householder said to the great lady Gautamī: "Noble one, please keep watch over my household's door and give it your care." She replied: "Sister, when she was a laywoman she did not even keep watch over the door of a clean household, so should she now do so after going forth into renunciation? Nevertheless, sister, speaking to you who are endowed with moral discipline in this way accumulates much demerit and sows the seed of becoming a servant. And moreover, who has ever seen or heard of someone who has gone forth keeping watch over a household's door?" The woman replied: "It is Stomā Gāmī, noble one."

The great lady Gautamī then said to that very woman: "This same occurrence has now befallen us as well," and the nuns of few desires reproached her. At that point the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who keeps watch over a household's door incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Stomā Gāmī.

The phrase "keeping watch over a household's door" means performing the duties of one's own household. The phrase "incurs a transgression" is as above. As to how a transgression comes about: however much and to whatever degree a nun keeps watch over a household's door, in every instance she incurs a transgression. This completes the first of the twenty-fourth transgressions.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time, the nun Stomā Gāmī, when leading the nuns in recitation of scripture, had the nuns sit down on cushions the following morning and announced, "Take your things and go off somewhere pleasant." The nuns then rebuked her, saying: "You have had the nuns sit on cushions and experience discomfort, and in doing so you accumulate much that is not merit." The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who, from among the nuns, causes seats to be experienced — that is, has them sat upon — incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Stomā Gāmī. The phrase "from among the nuns" refers to this very order. The word "from" refers to the act. The word "seats" refers to small chairs. The phrase "causes to be sat upon" means has them carried off afterward. The phrase "experience" means appropriating them for herself. The phrase "incurs a transgression" is as above. As to how a transgression comes about: however much and to whatever degree a nun causes seats belonging to the nuns to be experienced — that is, appropriated — in every instance she incurs a transgression. However, if she is old and unable to manage without support, or if she is ill and is teaching the Dharma, there is no transgression. This completes the second of the twenty-fourth transgressions.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time the nun Tsugga'mo, having put on her lower robe in the morning and taken up her bowl and outer robe, entered a householder's home for alms and said to the householder's wife: "Good woman, please give alms." The woman replied: "Noble one, I am burdened with spinning thread and feel weary." Tsugga'mo then said: "You go, bring the alms, and come back," and the woman placed the alms in the bowl and sent it off. Then on another occasion, the great lady Prajāpatī entered that same home for alms and said: "Sister, please give alms." The householder's wife replied: "Noble one, please spin one skein of thread, and in the meantime I will go and fetch the alms." The great lady Prajāpatī said: "Sister, even when I was a householder I never carried a load — how much less so now that I have gone forth?" And with that, the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and proceeding through the establishment of the training rule, laid down the following: Any nun whatsoever who carries thread incurs a transgression. The phrase "any whatsoever" refers to Tsugga'mo. The word "thread" refers to any of the seven kinds. The phrase "carries" means makes it into a bundle. The phrase "incurs a transgression" is as above. As to how a transgression comes about: however much and to whatever degree a nun carries thread, in every instance she incurs a transgression. However, if it is for her own individual hermitage — for a strainer, a whisk, or a sash — there is no transgression. This completes the third of the twenty-fourth transgressions.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time the nun Tsugga'mo put on leather shoes and carried a parasol while going about for alms. Many people laughed, and brahmins and householders mocked her. This was then reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..."

...and thus instituted the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun carries a parasol or leather shoes incurs a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Tsugga'mo. "A parasol" means shelter from the heat. "Leather shoes" means footwear. "Carries" means by herself. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above.

How does the transgression come about? However much and to whatever degree a nun carries a parasol or leather shoes, in every instance she incurs a transgression. If she wears leather shoes in order to guard her sleeping place in a summer residence, there is no transgression.

This completes the verse summary of the twenty-fourth transgression.

The verse summary is as follows:

A wound arising at the shoulder,
a nun who is a prostitute,
a nun, a female trainee, and a novice nun should not massage.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time a wound appeared on Tsugga'mo's shoulder, and a physician bound it. Once it had been bound, she said afterward: "This Bhadra has bound it far too tightly." When it was loosened, she said: "It is far too loose." In this way he continued binding and loosening it. Then the physician said: "Even if you do not heal, that is of no great consequence; the wound too will simply not recover," and he left. The nuns said: "Noble one, why do you behave in this way?" She replied: "She knows what is tight and what is loose — the mere act of touching is something to keep for oneself." The nuns then said: "It is astonishing that, even in those circumstances, when desire arose in you, you were not set thoroughly ablaze by it, like dry wood." This was then reported by the nuns to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence...", then instituted the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun repeatedly has a layman bind and release a wound that has appeared on her shoulder incurs a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Tsugga'mo. "A wound appearing on the shoulder" means a wound. "Repeatedly" means many times. "Has a layman bind and release it" refers to a householder. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above.

How does the transgression come about? However much and to whatever degree a nun has a man bind or release a wound that has arisen, in every instance she incurs a transgression. However, if it is the wound itself — that is, if she has it bound while keeping in mind a son, a brother, or a father — there is no transgression.

This completes the first of the twenty-fifth transgressions.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. At that time Bombagamo ordained a woman who was a prostitute. Then her former clients — the sinister one, the rough one, and the wanton one — came seeking that prostitute. When they heard that Bombagamo had ordained her, they thought: "Well, something good has been done — now we need not provide her food and clothing. All the same, we may still enjoy her company." They went to that place and began uttering improper words, while nuns who cared about the matter were distressed. This was then reported by the nuns to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence...," then instituted the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun knowingly ordains a female prostitute incurs a transgression.

"Whatever nun" refers to Bombagamo. "Knowingly" means either by herself recognizing this or having been told by another.

"Female prostitute" means one who is available to all. "Ordains" refers to ordination within this Dharma and Vinaya. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun ordains even a slight amount of a female prostitute, in every case she incurs a transgression. If she has the woman transferred to another district and then ordains her, there is no transgression. The twenty-fifth transgression, second section, is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter, Bombagamo had nuns massage her, and the nuns said: "What is the use of pleasing this one who frequents charnel grounds?" She then said words to the effect: "This will make the skin glow and become bright, and will captivate the hearts of merchants and weavers." This was reported by the nuns to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence...," then instituted the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun has nuns massage her incurs a transgression. "Whatever nun" refers to Bombagamo. "Nuns" means those who are in accord with this Dharma. "Has massage her own body" means having the body massaged. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight massage of her own body, in every case she incurs a transgression. The twenty-fifth transgression, third section, is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter, Bombagamo thought: "The Blessed One has said that nuns should not receive massage. So I shall have trainee nuns massage me." Accordingly she had trainee nuns massage her body, and nuns of few desires spoke disapprovingly. This was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence...", then instituted the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun has trainee nuns massage her incurs a transgression. "Whatever nun" refers to Bombagamo. "Trainee nun" means one who is training in the precepts that will lead to her becoming a trainee nun within this Dharma and Vinaya. "Has massage her own body" means having the body massaged. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight massage of her own body by a trainee nun, in every case she incurs a transgression. The twenty-fifth transgression, fourth section, is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Likewise, the same should be stated in full with respect to novice nuns as well, down to the institution of the training rule: furthermore, whatever nun has novice nuns massage her incurs a transgression. "Whatever nun" refers to Bombagamo. "Novice nun" means a female novice. "Has massage her own body" means having the body massaged. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight massage of her own body by a novice nun, in every case she incurs a transgression. The verse summary of the twenty-fifth transgressions is complete.

The summary verse:

She may not have a laywoman give massage, nor likewise one who wanders everywhere.
Perfume applied with sesame paste, and wiping with a cleansing substance.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Thereafter, Bombagamo thought: the Blessed One has prohibited massage as far down as novice nuns — thinking, "I shall have a laywoman give me a massage," she had a laywoman give her a massage — from that point, through to where the nuns reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," established the training rule up to and including its promulgation:

Moreover, whichever nun has a laywoman give her a massage incurs a transgression.

"Whichever" refers to Bombagamo. "Laywoman" means one who dwells in a household. "Has her give a massage" means has her perform rubbing and kneading of the body. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight massage given by a laywoman, in every case she incurs a transgression. However, if one is ill and cannot endure the discomfort, or if it is her mother, her son, her daughter, or her brother-in-law who gives the massage, there is no transgression. The first part of the twenty-sixth transgression is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Likewise, the case of one who wanders everywhere is to be explained at length, from that point through to the establishment of the training rule:

Moreover, whichever nun has a wandering woman give her a massage incurs a transgression.

"Whichever" refers to Bombagamo. "A wandering woman" means a female renunciant of the Sāṃkhya school. "Has her give a massage to herself" means has her perform rubbing of the body. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight massage given by a wandering woman to herself, in every case she incurs a transgression. The second part of the twenty-sixth transgression is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Then Bombagamo was applying perfume, and the nuns said, "Noble one, what are you doing?" She replied with these words: "I am making the body fragrant." They said to her: "This body is foul-smelling by nature — for whom are you making it fragrant?" — and they continued speaking up to the point of saying: "When seen by someone with desire, it will become stained by that desire." The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence," established the training rule up to and including its promulgation:

Moreover, whichever nun applies perfume incurs a transgression.

"Whichever" refers to Bombagamo. "Applies perfume" means using sandalwood, turushka incense, and the like — fragrant substances. "Applies" means applying it herself or having another apply it. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun herself applies perfume or has it applied, in every case she incurs a transgression. The third part of the twenty-sixth transgression is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. When the Blessed One had prohibited applying perfume, from that point, the case of wiping with sesame paste is likewise to be explained, from there through to the establishment of the training rule:

Moreover, whichever nun has sesame paste rubbed on her incurs a transgression.

"Whichever" refers to Bombagama. "Has sesame paste rubbed on her throughout" means has the pressed residue of sesame rubbed upon the body. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight amount of sesame paste rubbed on her, in every case she incurs a transgression. The fourth part of the twenty-sixth transgression is complete.

The origin of the next rule is at Śrāvastī. Then, when the twelve groups of monks were wiping the dirt from their bodies with a cleansing substance, this very act became an occasion for criticism, and the nuns of modest desires blamed them. The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This being the origin," proceeded through to "Let the training rule be laid down," and declared: "Furthermore, whichever nun uses a cleansing substance to wipe the body incurs a transgression." "Whichever" refers to the twelve groups. "Cleansing substance" refers to what is used to wipe away the dirt of the body and cleanse it. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun has even a slight amount of a cleansing substance applied to wipe the body, in every case she incurs a transgression. The verse summary of the twenty-sixth transgression is complete.

The Vinaya (monastic discipline) of the nuns, the analysis of the twenty-seventh bundle. The summary verse:

Questioning without prior occasion, wearing the adornments of householders, bathing while joined hand in hand, dance, song, and music — these are not permitted.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then Stomāgāmā went to the assembly hall and questioned a monk without first making a request for the occasion, and when that monk was unable to resolve that question and became embarrassed, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This being the origin," proceeded through to "Let the training rule be laid down," and declared: "Furthermore, whichever nun questions a monk without prior occasion incurs a transgression." "Whichever" refers to Stomāgāmā. "A monk" refers to the head of the assembly. "Without prior occasion" means without having made a request. "Questioning" means asking about what was spoken by a buddha or said by a śrāvaka. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun questions a monk even slightly without prior occasion, in every case she incurs a transgression. The first part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then one morning Stomāgāmā put on her lower robe, took her bowl and her dharma robe, and went for alms at the house of a wealthy man. There, the servants of those household women had set down the ornaments beside the vessels for bodily adornments while they were dressing their hair. Thereupon Stomāgāmā, seeing a necklace, a string of ornamental beads, an armband, and the like, took them up and wore them. Those women said, "Noble one, what are you doing?" She replied, "Does it not look lovely to adorn her body with ornaments?" They responded, "What beauty is there in someone who has undertaken a different manner of life — one of going forth?" And while those women were thus reproaching her, the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This being the origin," proceeded through to "Let the training rule be laid down," and declared: "Furthermore, whichever nun wears the ornaments of householders incurs a transgression." "Whichever" refers to Stomāgāmā. "The ornaments of householders" refers to necklaces, strings of ornamental beads, armbands, and the like. "Wears" means puts them on as adornment. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun wears even a slight amount of the ornaments of householders, in every case she incurs a transgression. The second part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then the twelve groups of monks, holding hands with many wives of brahmins and householders of Śrāvastī, were bathing in the flowing river Ajiravatī, poking one another with their fingers, making one another laugh, engaging in play, romping about, joking and cavorting—and exposing the coarseness and nakedness of the body—the monks of little concern criticized them, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and so forth, established a training rule up to the point of its full formulation: "Furthermore, whatever nun bathes while clasping hands shall incur a transgression."

"Whatever" refers to the twelve groups. "Clasping hands" means with hands joined together. As for "bathing," there are two kinds of bathing: the bathing of consecration, and the bathing of immersion. Here the intent is the bathing of immersion. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun bathes by immersion while clasping hands, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The third part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

At that time in Śrāvastī there were two groups of entertainers. One was a group of entertainers of the warrior caste (kṣatriya), and the other was a group of brahmin entertainers. The kṣatriya entertainers were accomplished in the arts of war, while the brahmin entertainers were accomplished in the arts of dance. Whenever the two groups competed against each other in a contest of martial skill, the kṣatriya group would win; and whenever they competed in dance, the brahmin group would win.

Then the kṣatriya entertainers thought to themselves: "From whom among us could we learn dance?" And they thought: "The noble Bhomā (Stomā) has gone forth from the Śākya clan and is accomplished in all crafts and all forms of work." With that in mind, they went to where Bhomā was and said to her: "Noble one, do you know even a little of the art of dance?" She replied: "Is there any craft or form of work in which I am not accomplished?" They said: "For now, grant us a fee that we will arrange, and teach us dance." She said: "Turn your hands thus, turn your waist thus, place your feet thus"—and so on, up to the point where she had the kṣatriya entertainers trained in dance.

Then those kṣatriya entertainers defeated the brahmin entertainers through dance. The brahmin entertainers then asked: "Who taught you?" When the others said it was Bhomā, the brahmins criticized, scorned, and reviled them, saying: "The conduct of the renunciants who are sons of the Śākyans, and their brahma-conduct (brahmacarya), is burned up—for they instruct others even in dance like this." The nuns then reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, beginning with "This occurrence..." and so forth, established a training rule up to the point of its full formulation: "Furthermore, whatever nun teaches dance shall incur a transgression."

"Whatever" refers to Bhomā. "Dance" means the moving of hands and feet. "Teaches" means gives instruction in it. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun teaches dance, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The fourth part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

When the Blessed One had enacted the prohibition "One must not teach dance," shortly thereafter Bhomā went to an assembly of entertainers and performed dance for them—and beginning with that account, the Blessed One again established a training rule up to the point of its full formulation:

Furthermore, whatever nun teaches dance incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. "Teaches dance" means gives instruction in it. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun teaches dance, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The fifth part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

"From going to watch dance" up to the point of the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun goes to watch dance incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. "Goes to watch dance" means going out of a desire to see the spectacle. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun goes to watch dance, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The sixth part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

At the time when two groups of companions gathered together and a group of brahmin companions went to where Bhomā was for the purpose of song — from that account up to the point where they said, "Noble one, teach us song as well" — beginning with "The group of six" and so forth, and the terms Śeṣaghoṣā and Kaiśikā and the earthly ones having been trained extensively in the seven musical notes — the Blessed One established a training rule up to its full formulation: whatever nun gives instruction in song incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. "Song" means vocalization, that which is brought forth by the voice. "Gives instruction in it" means teaches it. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun gives instruction in song, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The seventh part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Likewise, from "teaching song" up to the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun teaches song incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. The sequence of transgressions is to be applied in correspondence with what was said above. This is the eighth part of the twenty-seventh transgression.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Likewise, from "going to watch song" up to the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun goes to watch song incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. The sequence of transgressions is to be applied in correspondence with what was said above. This is the ninth part of the twenty-seventh transgression.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

From the account of groups of the kṣatriya class going to where Bhomā was for the purpose of music, and upon arriving saying: "Noble one, teach us music — the vīṇā, the flute, the clay drum, the single-stringed vīṇā, the bābhiṣaka, the iron cymbals, and such things of most melodious sound — the seven notes" — from that account up to the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun gives instruction in music incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Bhomā. "Gives instruction in it" means in sounds possessed of the quality of sensual pleasure. "Incurs a transgression" is as above. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun gives instruction in music, even the slightest amount, in every case she incurs a transgression. The tenth part of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Likewise, from "teaching music" up to the full formulation of the training rule: Furthermore, whatever nun performs music incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Sboṃ Dga' mo. The sequence of the transgression is to be understood as corresponding to the preceding ones in the same way. This is the eleventh part of the twenty-seventh transgression.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Likewise, from "going to watch music" up to the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun goes to watch music incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Sbom Dga' mo. The sequence of the transgression is to be understood as corresponding to the preceding ones in the same way. The verse summary of the twenty-seventh transgression is complete.

The summary verse is as follows:

From the dwellings where monks are present, one must not go alone to defecate.
Crystal combs, fine-toothed combs, bundles of grass, and hair-nets — these one must not keep.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī.

Then Gtsug Dga' mo said to a man: "Come here; do such-and-such." She signaled for him to come to the summer residence. That night the man came to the summer residence, and she placed him in the latrine area. He performed many acts and accomplished many things. Then she went to the latrine area, entered it, and said to the man: "This place is unclean — go elsewhere." He replied: "Where shall I go?" Gtsug Dga' mo said: "To your own house." Then the man said: "How shall I go?" Gtsug Dga' mo said: "Well then — ride upon her shoulder!" Thereupon he mounted her shoulder. Then Gtsug Dga' mo thought to herself: "Whatever standing I have before the community of nuns rests entirely on my moral discipline. If I, being a nun, were to break something of importance, how could I utter even a single word? Just as it is said: 'The pure one overawes the world; the impure one does not overawe the world.'" Reflecting thus, Gtsug Dga' mo became angry and cried out: "A noble woman is being abducted by a thief!" The man leapt from her shoulder to the ground and said: "What a vile, scheming woman — she herself gave the signal and now cries that a thief is abducting her!" When the nuns of modest needs heard this and began to criticize, the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning from "This incident occurred" and proceeding up to the full formulation of the training rule, declared: whatever nun goes alone to a latrine area incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to Gtsug Dga' mo. "Alone" means without a second person. "Goes to a latrine area" means goes to a place for defecating. "Incurs a transgression" is as before. As for how the transgression comes about: however much a nun goes even the slightest distance alone to a latrine area, in every case she incurs a transgression. This is the first part of the twenty-eighth transgression.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then the nuns of the group of twelve were using crystal combs to groom and arrange their hair, and other nuns said to them: "Sisters, what are you doing?" They replied: "We are growing our hair out untangled." The nuns said: "What you are doing like that is not growing hair — it is growing afflictions." When the nuns reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One then, beginning from "This incident occurred" and proceeding up to the full formulation of the training rule, declared: whatever nun removes hair with a crystal comb incurs a transgression.

"Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. "Crystal comb" means by the root of the virāṇa plant. "Removes hair" means grooming the hair of the head. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above. How does the transgression arise? However little a nun removes hair with a crystal comb, she incurs a transgression in every instance. This is the second rule within the twenty-eighth set of transgressions.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One had prohibited removing hair with a crystal comb, there was then the matter of removing hair with a tooth-comb, and this was reported to the Blessed One, beginning from "This incident occurred" up through the full formulation of the training rule: whatever nun removes hair with a tooth-comb incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. "With a tooth-comb" means with a tooth-comb. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above. As for how the transgression arises — that too proceeds as stated above. This is the third rule within the twenty-eighth set of transgressions.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Again, the matter of removing hair with a bundle of grass was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, beginning from "This incident occurred" up through the full formulation of the training rule, declared: whatever nun removes hair with a bundle of grass incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. "With a bundle of grass" means with a bundle of stalks rubbed together. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above. As for how the transgression arises, that proceeds as stated above. This is the fourth rule within the twenty-eighth set of transgressions.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Again, the matter of removing hair both with a tooth-comb and with a bundle of grass was taken up, and from that point the Blessed One, beginning from the relevant formulation up through the full training rule, declared: whatever nun removes hair with a tooth-comb and with a bundle of grass incurs a transgression. "Whatever" refers to the group of twelve. "With a tooth-comb and with a bundle of grass" means with both together. "Incurs a transgression" is as stated above. As for how the transgression arises, that too proceeds as stated above. This is the fifth rule within the twenty-eighth set of transgressions.

The origin of the rule is at Śrāvastī. Then the nun Sthūlanandā thought to herself: "I have given away everything I ever acquired. For now, let me at least obtain a mirror for myself." With that thought, she acquired a set of ornaments belonging to a musician, a garment belonging to a musician, and a pair of shoes belonging to a musician, and from a dancer she obtained a mirror. Sthūlanandā then put on all the ornaments, displayed the sign indicating the presence of a prostitute, and sat in a certain place. A man came and asked her: "What is your fee for a day?" She said: "Five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." The man replied: "That is far too much." She then said: "First look at this fine form. When you have seen how I conduct myself and are pleased, you may negotiate further on this matter." The man then gave five hundred kārṣāpaṇas. She told him to come inside. But then Sthūlanandā thought: "Whatever I do in my capacity as a nun is all merely a matter of moral discipline and religious conduct. If I were to do this thing as a nun, it would be breaking the moral discipline — and once a vessel is shattered, who will ever ask after it again?" With that reflection, Sthūlanandā removed the musician's ornaments and fled.

The man, startled, ran after Sthūlanandā and grabbed her by the wig. The wig came off and remained in the man's hand, and he cried out: "Foul bald-headed woman!"

Then Sthūlanandā said to the man: "Young man, do you not know that King Prasenajit has placed the nuns under royal protection? If anyone were to lay a hand on one of them, that hand would be cut off at the wrist." He replied: "A foul bald-headed woman like you is not one of those who are protected. Those who are protected are the Great Mistress of Beings, Gautamī the Slender, the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned One, Dharmadattā, Bhadravatī, and Śyāmā — not a bald-headed woman like you."

This incident occasioned criticism of nuns who had little sense of propriety, and the matter was reported to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then proceeded, from "This occurrence..." through to the laying down of the training rule: "Furthermore, whatever nun takes up a wig commits a transgression."

"Furthermore, whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. "Takes up a wig" refers to a dancer's wig. "Commits a transgression" is as explained above. As for how the transgression arises: however slight the contact a nun makes with a wig, in every such case a transgression is incurred.

Here ends the summary verse of the twenty-eighth transgression, the Pācittiya.

Here ends the full set of transgressions from the Vibhaṅga of the Bhikṣuṇī Vinaya.

Now the individually confessable offenses are to be recited. The summary verse of the rules for individual confession is as follows:

Milk, curd, butter,
Clarified butter, grain oil, molasses,
Honey, fish, and meat,
Dried meat — these are the appointed items.
The origin story is set in Śrāvastī.

At that time the group of twelve women, out of craving for fine food, took milk from other people's households and consumed it. Because they were roaming about looking for milk, they lost their scriptural transmission, their recitation, their study, their yogic practice, their mental application, and their inner calm abiding. This was reported to the Blessed One, who declared: "It is not to be taken." Later, when the same fault arose in connection with purchasing it, the Blessed One declared: "It is not to be bought." When the same fault arose in connection with asking for it from relatives, the Blessed One declared: "It is not to be requested."

At a certain point there was a sick nun, and a physician prescribed that she take milk. She replied: "Noble sir, she is already as good as dead." The physician asked: "Why?" She answered: "The Blessed One has prohibited it." The physician said: "Your Teacher is compassionate — he will grant permission." On that occasion the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "When prescribed by a physician, it may be used as medicine."

Thereafter Sthūlanandā, whether sick or not sick, took milk from other households and consumed it. This was reported to the Blessed One. Then the goes to households, requests milk, and consumes it by drinking or eating, that nun shall go to the summer hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession."

"Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. "For her own sake" means for her own body. "When not ill" means when she has not been struck down by illness. "Households" means the houses of brahmins and householders. As for the word "milk," there are five kinds of milk: cow's milk, buffalo's milk, camel's milk, goat's milk, and fifth, sheep's milk. "Having requested" means having asked. "Consumes it by drinking or eating" means swallowing a gulp, even just a mouthful. "That nun" means whatever nun this may be. "Having gone to the summer hall" means to the temple. "Before the nuns" means before those who observe this same Dharma. "Shall confess" means shall disclose it openly. "An improper matter unworthy of a noble one" means that which is not to be done by a nun. "Improper" means it will become an occasion for attachment. "I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it" means one must confess it definitively. "This is a matter for confession" means it must absolutely be disclosed.

As for how a transgression arises in this matter: however much milk a nun requests, all of it becomes an offense of wrongdoing. Upon obtaining it, there is an offense of wrongdoing. Upon using it, it becomes a matter for confession. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is deranged, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is overcome by pain.

This concludes the first confessable offense in the Vinaya analysis of the nuns.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. At the time when the Blessed One had prohibited milk for the nuns, proceeding from "Then, requesting curds" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun, when not ill, for her own sake, goes to households and requests curds and consumes it by drinking or eating — that nun shall go to the summer hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: 'Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession.'

'Whatever' refers to Sthūlanandā." The remaining sequence of transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. Where "the five milks" appears there, one should here expand it as "the five curds." This is the second confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Likewise, proceeding from "requesting fresh butter" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared: "Furthermore, whatever nun, when not ill, for her own sake, goes to households and requests fresh butter and consumes it by drinking or eating — that nun shall go to the summer hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: 'Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession.' 'Whatever' refers to Sthūlanandā" — up to "as for fresh butter, there are five kinds." The remaining sequence of transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the third confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Then, proceeding from "requesting clarified butter" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared:

Furthermore, whatever nun, not being ill, requests clarified butter from households for her own sake and consumes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā — up to "as for clarified butter, there are five kinds." The remaining sequence of transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the fourth confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Then, proceeding from "requesting sesame oil" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared:

Furthermore, whatever nun, not being ill, requests sesame oil from households for her own sake and consumes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā — up to "as for sesame oil, it is the expressed essence of sesame seeds." The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the fifth confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Then, proceeding from "requesting raw sugar" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared:

Furthermore, whatever nun, not being ill, requests raw sugar from households for her own sake and consumes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā — up to "as for raw sugar, it is of sugar." The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the sixth confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Then, proceeding from "requesting honey" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared:

Furthermore, whatever nun, not being ill, requests honey from households for her own sake and consumes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā — up to "as for honey, it is the milk of bees." The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the seventh confessable offense.

The locus of origin is Śrāvastī. Then, proceeding from "requesting fish and meat" up through to the laying down of the training rule, he declared:

Furthermore, whatever nun, not being ill, requests fish and meat from households for her own sake and consumes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā — up to "as for fish and meat, it is that which moves in water and so forth." The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the eighth confessable offense.

The occasion for this arose in Śrāvastī. The rule was established from "then, requesting meat" up through the laying down of the training. Furthermore, whatever nun, when not ill, requests meat from households for her own sake and then distributes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. From that point up to "meat" refers to the milk of cattle and so forth. The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the ninth confessable offense.

The occasion for this arose in Śrāvastī. The rule was established from "then, requesting dried meat" up through the laying down of the training. Furthermore, whatever nun, when not ill, requests dried meat from households for her own sake and then distributes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: "Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession." "Whatever" refers to Sthūlanandā. From that point up to "dried meat" means that which is dried meat. The remaining sequence of other transgressions is to be applied in conformity with the foregoing as it stands. This is the tenth confessable offense.

The occasion for this arose in Śrāvastī. The background runs from "when General Siṃha saw the Truths" up through "the Blessed One having spoken, the Saṅgha granted the vow of training." Then the twelve groups entered that household and received alms. After that the nuns said to them: "Sisters, did the Blessed One not grant the vow of training with respect to that household?" Those men replied: "It was granted to the monks, but not to the nuns." Thereupon, the nuns of few desires rebuked them and reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One established the rule from "this occurrence" up through the laying down of the training: "Nuns, those households for which the Saṅgha has established a training rule are households under a vow of training. Whatever nun, without having been invited beforehand, goes to households designated as 'training households' — households known as such — and with her own hand takes what is to be distributed and eaten, and then distributes or eats it — that nun must go to the assembly hall and confess before the nuns this offense which is an improper matter unworthy of a noble one, saying: 'Sisters, I have committed this offense that is to be confessed — I confess it. This is a matter for confession.'"

"Whatever" refers to the twelve groups. "Of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's śrāvakas. "Households known as training households" means those of persons who have seen the Truths. "Under a vow of training" means so designated by a formal motion and twofold act. "Without having been invited beforehand" means without having been summoned as a guest. "Goes" means having gone. "With her own hand" means by herself. "What is to be distributed and what is to be eaten" refers to the five things to be distributed and the five things to be eaten. "Takes and distributes or eats" means swallowing bite by bite in secret. "That nun" means whichever nun she happens to be. "The assembly hall" means the temple. "Before the nuns" means before those who hold this Dharma. "Shall confess" means shall disclose. "An improper matter unworthy of a noble one" means something a nun ought not do. "Improper" means something that leads to attachment.

"A matter requiring individual confession has arisen; I acknowledge that matter as one requiring individual confession" means making a definite disclosure. "This matter is one requiring individual confession" means that it must without fail be confessed.

Now, how does a transgression arise in this regard? It arises in the range from "however many of the households known as training-places with vows of training, where the nun has not previously been uninvited" up to "if she takes or eats, in every case it becomes a matter requiring individual confession." If she was invited from the very beginning, or if she was given permission to relax the vow of training, there is no transgression.

Here ends the eleventh matter requiring individual confession.

Here ends the section on matters requiring individual confession from the Analysis of the Nuns' Vinaya.

Now the trainings shall be set forth. The summary verse for the trainings is as follows:

Wearing the robe well, not covering the head, leaping and moving the body, sitting, and the feet —
these are fully collected in the assembly.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at the hermitage of Kuṇḍakā the sage, in Śrāvastī. At that time, the Great Progenitress Gautamī Śākyamuni, her head shaved and robed in ochre, went and traveled toward Śrāvastī together with approximately five hundred women. Traveling gradually along the way, she arrived at the hermitage of Kuñjakā the sage in Śrāvastī. Now, at the time when the Blessed One, in dependence upon the Great Progenitress Gautamī, had given permission for nuns to go forth and receive full ordination in this Dharma and Vinaya, those nuns, not knowing how they should wear their robes, spoke to the monks. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "The robe shall be worn rounded, neither too high nor too low."

When the Blessed One had thus spoken, the Great Progenitress and the other nuns who were there in their natural state put on their robes and lower garments. Then on another occasion a group of twelve nuns wore their lower garments hitched up very high, and the other nuns said to them: "Why do you wear your lower garments so high?" They replied: "We were accustomed to it when we were householders." The Blessed One thereupon declared: "One shall not wear the robe or the lower garment hitched up too high, nor shall one wear them trailing too low." Thus he established this as a rule of training.

When those nuns put on their lower garments they folded them back at the sides, and the other nuns said to them: "Why do you fold your lower garments back at the sides?" They replied: "That is how laywomen wear them." The other nuns said to them: "Are you then laywomen?" On that occasion the nuns reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in wearing the lower garment and the robe rounded — neither hitched up too high nor trailing too low."

The setting for this rule is Śrāvastī.

Then the group of twelve wore their robes like an elephant's trunk, and the other nuns said to them: "Sisters, why do you wear your robe like an elephant's trunk?" They replied: "Wealthy people, merchants, and caravan leaders wear them this way." The Blessed One then declared:

"You shall train in wearing the robe and the lower garment not like an elephant's trunk, not folded like a palm leaf, not like a grain spike, not like the hood of a serpent, and not like the nine folds of a serpent's hood."

The setting for this rule is Śrāvastī.

Then the group of twelve went to households with their shoulders bared, and the other nuns said to them: "Sisters, why do you walk about with your shoulders bared?" They replied: "So that when the lustful catch sight of them, their hearts will be broken." At that the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in entering a household with the robes well fastened and properly worn."

When entering households they went about making loud noise and great clamor, and the Blessed One declared: "You shall enter in a composed and subdued manner."

Then they went about glancing to either side, and the Blessed One declared: "You shall enter a household without letting the eyes wander."

Then they went about without looking forward at all, and the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in entering a household and sitting down with the robes well fastened and properly worn, moving in a composed and subdued manner, with eyes not wandering, looking only as far ahead as the length of a yoke."

Then when the group of twelve went about with their heads covered, the other nuns asked them why they did so. They replied: "When we were formerly daughters-in-law of weavers' families, this is how one behaved in the household." The others said: "Are you still daughters-in-law of weavers? Whatever is done in ignorance of that will be abandoned, and you too shall train in the training." At that the Blessed One declared: "You shall not enter a household with the head covered."

This is the twenty-eighth fascicle, the last, of the Analysis of the Nuns' Vinaya.

Then when the group of twelve went about swinging their arms like a pair of logs as they walked, the other nuns asked: "Why do you walk like that?" They replied: "That is how daughters-in-law of weavers' families walk." The others said: "Are you daughters-in-law of weavers?" The group of twelve said: "Whatever is done in ignorance of that will be abandoned, and you too shall train in the training." At that the Blessed One declared: "You shall enter that household without swinging the arms."

Then when the group of twelve walked with their robes slung over one shoulder in the manner of cowherds, the Blessed One declared: "You shall enter a household without slinging the robe over one shoulder."

Then when the group of twelve, imitating the way boys walk in a children's school, tucked their upper robes up high as they went into households, the Blessed One declared: "You shall enter a household without tucking the upper robe up high."

Then when the group of twelve slung their robes over both shoulders as they entered households and said: "This is how servants walk," the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in entering a household and sitting down without covering the head, without swinging the arms, without slinging the robe over one shoulder, without tucking the upper robe up high, and without slinging it over both shoulders."

Then when the group of twelve went about laughing loudly in households, saying: "This is how the lustful walk" — the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve crouched down and went along saying: "This is how one walks artificially," and entered households crouching — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not enter a household walking in that way." Then when the group of twelve dragged their feet along the ground and entered households by shuffling their feet, saying: "This is how they walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve crept about stealthily and entered households by sliding along, saying: "This is how householders walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve leaned on a staff and entered households saying: "This is how the wealthy and merchants walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in entering a household and sitting down without stomping the feet, without leaping, without shuffling the feet, without sliding, and without leaning on a staff." Then when the group of twelve swayed their bodies and entered households saying: "This is how elephants walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not enter a household swaying the body in that way." Then when the group of twelve waved their arms and entered households saying: "This is how the wealthy and merchants walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve turned their heads from side to side and entered households saying: "This is how thoroughbred animals walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve clasped their hands together and entered households saying: "This is how those of supple manner walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not walk about in that way." Then when the group of twelve walked shoulder to shoulder into households saying: "This is how close companions walk" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall train in entering a household and sitting down without swaying the body, without waving the arms, without turning the head, without clasping the hands, and without pressing the shoulders together."

Then when the group of twelve sat down on seats in the homes of brahmins and householders without having been invited, and those hosts expressed displeasure — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit down uninvited." When the Blessed One established this as a rule of training, instructing that one should lean against the doorpost and examine the seat carefully before sitting down, then the group of twelve again sat down in households without examining the seat — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit down in that way." When the Blessed One established as a rule of training for novices that one should lean against the doorpost and not press down with the full weight of the body, then the group of twelve again sat in households pressing down with the full weight of their bodies — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit in that way." Then when the group of twelve sat inside dwellings with their legs crossed, saying: "This is how those of supple manner sit" — from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit in that way." Then when the group of twelve sat inside households with their thighs crossed, saying: "This is how the wealthy and merchants sit" — from that point the Blessed One declared:

"You shall train yourselves thus: when sitting inside a household, you shall do so only when invited, having properly inspected the seat, without pressing down with the full weight of the body, without crossing the legs, and without crossing the thighs."

Then the group of twelve sat in households with their haunches touching and resting against each other, saying: "This is how the dancers sit" — and from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit in that way."

Then the group of twelve, saying: "This is how the deep thinkers sit," placed one knee upon the other and sat thus — and from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit in that way."

Then the group of twelve sat with their feet tucked up, and when the wives of brahmins and householders came and paid reverence at their feet, the monks spread their feet apart, and those women, touching their heads to the ground, reproached them — and from that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit with your feet tucked up."

Then the group of twelve sat inside households with their feet stretched out, and when the wives of brahmins and householders came and paid reverence at their feet, the group of twelve spoke to them only a partial blessing, saying merely: "May you be free from illness," whereupon those women said: "Why do you not say the full words 'May you be free from illness'?" And the group of twelve said to them: "You have paid reverence to one foot — pay reverence now to the other foot as well" — and the women reproached them for this. From that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall not sit with your feet stretched out."

Then the group of twelve sat inside households with their feet excessively bent back, and when the wives of brahmins and householders came to pay reverence, those women reproached them — and from that point the Blessed One declared:

"You shall train yourselves thus: when sitting inside a household, you shall not place haunch against haunch, you shall not place knee upon knee, you shall not tuck your feet up, and you shall not stretch your feet out."

A summary verse:

Receiving properly, the uninvited, tiptoeing, splitting grain, with the hand, and with the mouth speaking, not stooping — and not standing.

The Blessed One was dwelling in the land of Bharga, in the Frightful Mountain Forest of the Crocodile Child-slayer, in the deer park. At that time Prince Bodhi had a magnificent white-lotus palace with plastered walls built on Crocodile Child-slayer Mountain, and there he invited the Blessed One, together with the monks and nuns.

Now the retinue of the young Prince Bodhi were of no faith, and they hurled lumps of food violently, breaking the hands and bowls of the nuns.

Then, in another part of that place, the group of twelve gathered together, and they said among themselves: "Dear Joyful, Dear Rejoicer, Dear Plump One — let us teach these children of the child-slayer woman a lesson!" And so when the food came, they seized their bowls and tilted them back, and those cooked rice portions fell to the ground — whereupon nuns of little standing reproached them. From that point the Blessed One declared: "You shall receive food properly."

In the same way, having been invited to a certain household — and so forth up to: — however many portions of cooked rice and vegetables one has let fall from the bowl to the ground, that same amount one shall now accept — and the Blessed One declared: "You shall receive food without exceeding the brim or cutting short at the lip."

In Śrāvastī, a householder had invited them to his home — and so forth up to the point of the invitation — and when cooked rice and vegetables were being distributed in equal measure to those in the group of twelve, they kept calling out for more —

The Blessed One declared: "One shall eat cooked rice mixed together with vegetables in equal measure."

In the same way, having been invited to a certain household — and so forth up to that point — there was then a case where the cooked rice was plentiful but the vegetables were very scarce, and they would cover the vegetables over with cooked rice in order to ask for more. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not cover the vegetables with cooked rice."

In the same way, in another instance — and so forth up to that point — the vegetables were plentiful but the cooked rice was scarce, and out of desire for more, they covered the cooked rice with vegetables. The Blessed One declared: "One shall train in the following: to take food properly and eat it; to eat without stopping midway; to eat in equal measure with one's vegetables; and, out of desire for more, neither to cover the vegetables with cooked rice nor to cover the cooked rice with vegetables."

Then the group of twelve, even before the appointed meal had arrived, began receiving the bowl — and so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not receive it."

Then in the front row before a certain Sthūlanandā, an elderly nun who had been expelled was sitting with her mouth gaping open. Sthūlanandā threw a lump of food into that gaping mouth. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not sit with one's mouth gaping open, having not yet taken a morsel."

Then the group of twelve, while eating their meal, were making noise. The nuns said: "Sisters, what do you think you are doing behaving like that?" and those women replied: "When one forgets a word, one speaks it out thus," — and so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not speak with one's mouth full of a morsel of food."

Then the group of twelve were putting two or three grains of cooked rice at a time into their mouths — and so forth up to the point where they said: "Those who cannot read, eat like this." The Blessed One declared: "One's morsels shall not be too small."

Then the group of twelve were putting excessively large morsels into their mouths — and so forth up to the point where they said: "Those who are hungry, eat like this." The Blessed One declared: "One shall train in the following: not to receive the bowl even before the appointed meal has arrived; not to sit with one's mouth gaping open having not yet chewed one's morsel; not to speak with one's mouth full of a morsel; and to make one's morsels proper — neither too small nor too large."

And so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve were making a smacking sound while eating, and the nuns said to them: "What do you think you are doing behaving like that?" and those women replied: "Children eat like this," — and so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall eat without making a smacking sound," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve were making a slurping sound while eating — and so forth up to the point where they said: "Those who are ill and cannot read, eat like this." The Blessed One declared: "One shall not eat in that manner," — and so forth up to that point.

On one occasion, when the community of nuns had been invited as guests to a certain householder's home, that householder served abundant cooked rice but only a small amount of vegetables. Intending to make sport of him, the nuns ate making a loud smacking sound. The householder was embarrassed and said: "Noble ones, I did wish to offer plain cooked rice, but alas, there is only a little sauce available." The Blessed One declared: "One shall eat without making a smacking sound," — and so forth up to that point.

In the same way, when a certain householder invited them as guests, that householder was poor, and in the winter season he served cold food. Intending to make sport of him, they ate while blowing on it and making a "phu phu" sound.

The householder then became embarrassed and said: "Noble ones, I did wish to offer something, but my means are poor and there was nothing I could do." From that point, the Blessed One declared: "One shall eat food without making a 'phu phu' sound," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve, while wandering through the countryside and going about, arrived at the house of a farmer. There they shook out their robes, washed their feet and hands, and sat down to eat. At that moment, some naked ascetics (Jainas) arrived at the neighboring house and likewise sat down to eat. The group of twelve, intending to make sport of them, piled food up into the shape of a stūpa and planted a tent-pole as the spire, then said to those naked ascetics: "This is a stūpa of your Teacher." They then broke off pieces from that stūpa and ate them, all the while chanting in unison: "This is the stūpa of the Fully Accomplished One!" At that, the naked ascetics felt pain and distress, and began to weep, saying: "Today it seems our Teacher has passed beyond his time." The Blessed One declared: "One shall train not to make a 'tsug tsug' sound, not to make a 'hu hu' sound, not to make a 'balchag balchag' sound, not to make a 'phu phu' sound, and not to eat food having fashioned it to resemble a stūpa."

Then the group of twelve spread food out on a flat board and, picking up one grain at a time, placed it in their mouths. The nuns said to them: "Why do you eat like that?" They replied: "When birds pick up scattered offerings, they do it just like this." From that, the Blessed One declared: "One shall not pick through food grain by grain," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve was invited as guests to a house, and the host served them ordinary cooked food. They praised that food lavishly. When another host served them fine food, they found fault with it. From that, the Blessed One declared: "One shall not praise or find fault with food."

Then the group of twelve, while eating, were seen to transfer morsels of food from cheek to cheek as they ate. When it was said: "That is how sick people eat," the Blessed One declared: "One shall not shift morsels from cheek to cheek," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve were seen to bite food in half, rest it on the tip of the tongue, display it to one another, and then swallow it again. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not stick out the tongue over food," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve were seen to break a morsel of food into three parts: placing one part in the mouth, a second in the hand, and a third in the alms bowl. The Blessed One declared: "One shall train to eat food without picking through it grain by grain, without praising or finding fault, without shifting morsels from cheek to cheek, without sticking out the tongue, and without splitting off stray portions," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve were seen to lick their hands while food was still present. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not lick the hands," — and so forth up to that point. Likewise, they were seen to scrape their alms bowls. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not scrape the alms bowl," — and so forth up to that point.

Then Sthūlanandā put food in her mouth and shook her hands. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not shake the hands," — and so forth up to that point.

Then the group of twelve was invited as guests to a house, and Sthūlanandā, finding some flour there — — she lifted up her alms bowl and said, "This alms bowl of mine has been taken — hand it back, hand it back!" And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not lift up the alms bowl," — and so forth up to that point.

Then a certain householder invited the community of nuns to his home as guests, and he prepared an abundance of side dishes and foods. Among the group of twelve there was an elderly nun who had gone forth. The householder first served the community of nuns with clarified butter and flour, and then the group of twelve took a great deal of flour. The householder then served from the older end of the twenty-eight varieties of porridge, and when the elderly nun who had gone forth looked to one side — wherever the elder was seated — the group of twelve threw lumps of food in front of that elderly nun who had gone forth and said, "It is said that showers of precious gems fall from the king upon those younger than I; so you, being endowed with merit, have received a shower of food." And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall train to eat one's food with the perception of an alms bowl, not licking the hands, not scraping the alms bowl, not shaking the hands, and not lifting up the alms bowl," — and so forth up to that point.

Then when the group of twelve looked into the alms bowls of their fellow nuns, they began to complain, saying, "Much has been served there, and little has been served to us." And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One who wishes to complain shall not look into the alms bowls of fellow nuns," — and so forth up to that point.

Then, when the group of twelve, with hands sticky from food, took hold of a water vessel, the stickiness of food caused flies to buzz around it, and the householders who saw this censured them. And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not take hold of a water vessel with hands sticky from food," — and so forth up to that point.

Then again a certain householder invited the community of nuns as guests. In the assembly, between the congregation and a companion nun, there sat a nun wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe. One of the group of twelve poured the rinsing water from her alms bowl over her and said, "Wretched, wicked woman — do you alone have a patched robe?" — and so complained. And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not throw the rinsing water of one's alms bowl at another," — and so forth up to that point.

Now, at the time when a prohibition was made at the hill of Kumāraghāta (the hill where children are slaughtered), at the White Lotus mansion, against pouring food-rinsing water inside a house — on account of another householder this was subsequently permitted, with the ruling that one may pour it inside after asking the householder who is present.

Then again, the group of twelve began pouring it inside houses without asking. And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not pour food-rinsing water inside a house without first asking the householder who is present," — and so forth up to that point.

At Śrāvastī, the son of a certain brahmin, his mind disturbed, went to Śrāvastī and happened to brush against the water in a monk's alms bowl, whereupon his mind was restored. Then another brahmin's son whose mind was disturbed — and that brahmin, having heard of this from the first brahmin, went to the nuns' rain-season residence, and asked how much Sthūlanandā had fetched the alms-bowl water — she filled the alms bowl with the remains of the community's food and gave it to him. The brahmin thought, "The death of my son is indeed not something to be wished for" — and did not accept it. And so forth up to that point. The Blessed One declared:

One should train not to look with lustful intent so as to slander fellow nuns, not to hold a water vessel that has been soiled with food by hand, not to sprinkle food-soiled water on a fellow nun, not to pour food-soiled water inside a house without asking the householder, and not to pour the leftover food into the alms bowl and discard it — up to that point.

Then the group of twelve nuns began placing their alms bowls on ground that had no foundation beneath it, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not place them so." Then the group of twelve nuns placed their alms bowls at the edge of a precipice, and the bowls fell and shattered, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not place an alms bowl at the edge of a precipice" — up to that point. They then began placing them at the bank of a stream, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not place them at the bank of a stream" — up to that point. They began placing them in the middle of a path, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not place them in the middle of a path" — up to that point. When they began polishing their alms bowls with a heavy wet mixture of sand, before long the bowls became pale and worn, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must train not to place an alms bowl on ground that has no firm foundation beneath it, not to place it at the edge of a precipice, not to place it at the bank of a stream, not to place it in the middle of a path, and not to polish an alms bowl with a heavy wet mixture of sand" — up to that point.

Then it happened that a young woman was standing to wash an alms bowl, and the nuns said to her: "Sister, stand and wash the alms bowl." When she replied, "What will come of this?" the bowl fell from her hands and broke. Then they said to her, "This is what will come of it," whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not wash an alms bowl while standing" — up to that point. In the same way, when they began drying one while standing, the Blessed One declared: "One must not dry an alms bowl while standing" — up to that point. When they began wiping one while standing, the Blessed One declared: "One must not wipe an alms bowl while standing" — up to that point. When they began putting an alms bowl into its case while standing, the Blessed One declared: "One must not put an alms bowl into its case while standing" — up to that point. When they then began taking an alms bowl out of its case while standing, the Blessed One declared: "One must train not to wash, dry, wipe, put into its case, or take out of its case an alms bowl while standing" — up to that point.

The summary verse:

Not while standing, not improperly, not with the head uncovered, not with the arm akimbo like an elephant's shoulder;
one must not urinate on grass or in water, nor fill a tree — not even a little.

Then the group of twelve nuns began teaching the Dharma while standing to those who were seated, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. Then when sick persons came, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach the Dharma to the sick" — up to that point. When they began teaching in the same manner to those who were seated or lying down, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill" — up to that point. When they began walking ahead of others and then turning back to follow behind them and teach the Dharma, the Blessed One declared:

"One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill while standing to one who is seated or lying down, nor to one on a lower seat while sitting on a higher seat, nor by following behind one who is walking ahead, nor by walking along the roadside while teaching the Dharma to one who is not ill and is traveling on the road — one must train accordingly" — up to that point.

Then the group of twelve nuns began teaching the Dharma to those with their heads covered, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When those with eye ailments came, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach the Dharma to those with eye ailments." Likewise, "One must not teach it to those who are not ill" — up to that point. When workers came, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it" — up to that point. Likewise, when they began teaching Dharma to those with a wound on one side, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill" — up to that point. When they began teaching Dharma to those making a neighing sound like a horse, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill" — up to that point. When they began teaching Dharma to those with their arms folded behind their necks, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When those with their arms folded behind their necks came, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill, to one with their head covered, nor to one not vomiting, nor to one without a wound, nor to one without a wound on both shoulders, nor to one who is not ill and has their arms folded behind their neck — one must train in not teaching the Dharma thus" — up to that point.

Then the group of twelve nuns began teaching the Dharma to those riding elephants, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. Then those riding elephants set out for battle, and they said: "Noble one, please teach the Dharma." The nuns said: "Dismount and I will teach the Dharma." Those riders said: "The enemies who would destroy us are pressing at our rear" — up to that point, and the Blessed One declared: "Declare them to be ill and teach the Dharma" — up to that point. Likewise, one should also speak to those riding horses and those who have mounted chariots. Then, those riding on a person's shoulders or head — one must not teach the Dharma — up to that point. When one among them became ill, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach" — up to that point. When they began teaching Dharma to those wearing high shoes, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill and is riding an elephant, nor to one riding a horse, nor to one mounted in a chariot, nor to one riding on a person — one must train in not teaching the Dharma to one who is not ill and is wearing high shoes" — up to that point.

Then the group of twelve nuns began teaching the Dharma to those with their hair piled up in a topknot, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When a king came, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it" — up to that point. Likewise, when those with their heads bound in a turban came, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When great ministers or sick persons came, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it" — up to that point. Likewise, when those with their heads bound in a garland came, "One must not teach it so" — up to that point, and the Blessed One declared:

"One may teach it to the sick" — up to that point. Likewise, when those with their heads bound in a turban came, "One must not teach it so" — up to that point, and the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it to a merchant or to the sick" — up to that point. Then again, when those wearing hats came, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When sick persons came, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to a healthy person with hair in a topknot, nor to one with a turban on the head, nor to one with a garland bound about the head, nor to one with a turban bound on the head, and one must train not to teach the Dharma to a healthy person wearing a hat" — up to that point.

Then, when the group of twelve were teaching the Dharma while carrying weapons in hand — "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. When one who is setting out for battle becomes sick, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it" — up to that point. Likewise, when those carrying a parasol came — "One must not teach it so" — up to that point, and the Blessed One declared: "One may teach it to the sick" — up to that point. Likewise, when one came carrying a staff in hand — "One must not teach it so" — up to that point. Then, if it is a sick person or an aged person who cannot survive without a staff, the Blessed One declared: "One may teach the Dharma to such persons" — up to that point. Likewise, when one came carrying a sword in hand — "One must not teach it so" — up to that point, and the rest is as above.

Likewise, when those wearing the five pieces of armor came, the Blessed One declared: "One must not teach the Dharma to a healthy person carrying a weapon in hand, nor to one carrying a parasol in hand, nor to one carrying a staff in hand, nor to one carrying a sword in hand, nor to one carrying war armor in hand, and one must train not to teach the Dharma to one wearing the five pieces of armor" — up to that point.

Then, when the group of twelve were standing and relieving themselves — "One must not do so" — up to that point. When a sick person is unable to sit, the Blessed One declared: "If one is sick, it is permitted."

Then, when Sthūlanandā (the Stout Delightful One) came to the Śākyan settlement, she saw someone guarding her own pleasure garden, and that person said: "If you had not gone forth into renunciation, what would you be to me?" And the other replied: "You would be my mistress." Sthūlanandā said: "Then why do you not provide me with vegetables and flowers as I need them?" The garden-keeper replied: "At that time, when you provided me with food and clothing as I needed them, I in turn served you. Now you have gone forth and I am a householder — how am I to serve you?" Thereupon Sthūlanandā took a purgative medicine, placed a pot, and poured into it a great quantity of her own excrement and urine, and when it was likewise filled with vomit she took the pot and a broom and went to the pleasure garden, where she scattered all those vegetables and the flowering trees with filth. The foul smell brought foxes and dogs rushing there. The next day the garden-keeper saw those vegetables in that condition and became distressed, and Sthūlanandā said to him: "Garden-keeper, how is your pleasure garden — fragrant and full of lush greens?" He replied: "Noble lady, this is your doing," and she mocked him, saying: "Yes, that is how you have been repaid." Up to that point, and the Blessed One declared: "One must not discharge excrement and urine onto green grass" — up to that point, and "If one is sick, it is permitted" — up to that point.

In the same way, from "one must not spit" up to "It is not to be done," the Blessed One declared: "If one is sick, it is permitted" — up to that point. In the same way, the same is to be said regarding mucus. From "one who discharges vomit and phlegm" up to the Blessed One's declaration: "One must train to refrain from discharging excrement and urine while standing upright when not ill, and from discharging excrement, urine, spittle, mucus, vomit, and phlegm onto ground where there is green grass when not ill" — up to that point.

In the same way, just as was said above in the foundation-story of Sthūlanandā regarding the garden-keeper and the nun Sthūlanandā, the same is to be said regarding the cook. From "after taking a purgative medicine" up to "she rendered the vessel filled with filth, the basin for beating, and the vessel for washing clothes unfit" — up to that point. Then when that cook was washing clothes, he saw those garments stained with various multicolored dyes and smeared with foul matter — up to that point. Then Sthūlanandā came and said these words: "Housewife, why have the garments turned pale?" He replied: "Noble lady, surely this is not your doing?" And when Sthūlanandā said: "Yes, that is how you have been repaid," she was reproached — up to the Blessed One's declaration: "One must not discharge excrement, urine, or spit into water" — up to that point. When sick ones were doing so in that very place, the Blessed One declared: "It is permitted." In the same way, from "spittle, mucus, vomit, and phlegm" — if one is sick, "it is permitted" — up to that point.

At the time when the Blessed One, while in Śrāvastī, laid down the rule concerning the duty-master regarding climbing trees, Sthūlanandā climbed a tree for some particular purpose. The nuns said to her: "Sister, did not the Blessed One lay down this rule?" She replied: "He laid it down for the monks; not for the nuns." From that point up to the Blessed One's declaration: "One must train to refrain from discharging excrement, urine, spittle, mucus, vomit, and phlegm into water when not ill, and from climbing trees to a height greater than the stature of a man, except in cases of necessity" — up to that point.

The many trainings are complete. The many trainings from the Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns are complete.

Now the procedures for the resolution of disputes are to be stated. In summary:

Direct evidence and recollection, the verdict of one who is not insane, and its essential nature, the spreading of many sticks of grass, the formal acknowledgment, and the spreading of grass.

For one who is fit to be disciplined by direct evidence, the settlement by direct evidence is given. For one who is fit to be disciplined by recollection, the settlement by recollection is given. For one who is fit to be disciplined as one who is not insane, the settlement as one who is not insane is given. For one who is fit to be sent to seek the essential nature of the matter, that procedure is given. For one who is fit to have many sticks of grass spread, that procedure is given. For one who is fit to make a formal acknowledgment, that procedure is given. For one who is fit for what is like the spreading of grass, that procedure is given. One must train so that those who have fallen into dispute are disciplined, calmed, and thoroughly pacified in accordance with these seven principles for the resolution of disputes, in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and the teaching of the Teacher.

The seven principles for the resolution of disputes are complete. The seven principles for the resolution of disputes from the Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns are complete.

Eight defeats, the Saṅgha remainder twenty, likewise abandonments thirty-three,
and further, offenses requiring expiation one hundred and eighty, and those requiring individual confession, eleven —

The garland of trainings is supreme and the one who brings peace accords with the monk.
Patience, the holy austerity, is indeed patience — nirvāṇa is supreme, so the Buddha has declared.
One who has gone forth and harms others, who injures others, is no true renunciant.

Where one with eyes exists to overcome the far shore, even as the humble do in the fitting way,
the wise, in this living world, should entirely abandon evils.
One should not slander, nor do harm;
one should restrain oneself through the prātimokṣa.
One should know the measure in food;
one should dwell in a remote and solitary place.
One should rightly apply oneself to the higher mind.

This is the teaching of the Buddha.

Just as a bee upon a flower takes the nectar without harming the colour or the scent and flies away,
so should the Sage move through a village.

One should examine what is fitting and unfitting for oneself — not the discordant acts of others, not what others have or have not done.
One should be heedful with regard to the higher mind and train in the grounds of restraint of the Sage.
One who is ever mindful of full tranquillity is a protector who is free from sorrow.

Through generosity, merit greatly increases.
Through good restraint, one does not become an enemy and the like.
Endowed with virtue, one abandons evil.
Through the exhaustion of the afflictions, one passes beyond sorrow.

Commit no evil whatsoever;
accomplish virtue in full abundance;
tame your own mind completely —
this is the teaching of the Buddha.

Excellent is the restraint of body;
excellent is the restraint of speech;
excellent too is the restraint of mind;
restraint in all things is excellent.
The monk who is restrained in all these ways is thoroughly liberated from all suffering.

Guarding one's speech, perfectly restraining one's mind, and not committing non-virtuous acts with the body — having thoroughly purified these three pathways of action, one will attain the path proclaimed by the sage.

The All-Seeing Buddha, whose crown-protrusion protects all;
the Destroyer of Cyclic Existence, the Golden Sage, Kāśyapa; Śākyamuni, Gautama, God of gods, the supreme guide of the untamed, who is beyond compare;

the Protector of the World, the supreme Saviour —
these seven heroic Buddhas, the prātimokṣa of each of the famous ones, has been extensively set forth here.

Toward this, the Buddhas, and whoever — and also the disciples of the Buddhas — show reverence.
Those who have come to hold it with reverence, may they attain the unconditioned.

One should compose oneself and bring it forth;
one should enter into the teaching of the Buddha.
Like a great elephant attacking a house of reeds, one should defeat the host of the lord of death.

Whoever with full heedfulness will practise in this Dharma and Vinaya will, having thoroughly abandoned the cycle of birth, make suffering come to its final end.

The Analysis of the Vinaya for Nuns, together with the Prātimokṣa, is complete.

This was translated by the Kashmirian abbot Sarvajñadeva, Dharmākara, and the Indian abbot Vidyākaraprabha, together with the Tibetan translator the monk Palgyilhunpo. It was then edited and established by the Indian abbot Vidyākaraprabha and the great Tibetan editor-translator the monk Paltsegs.

Earlier, it was corrected by Ānanda and Śākyapaḥ; the impurities of those two earlier corrections were cleared away. A third correction was made by the learned master of Nartang, and it was thus excellently purified upon this earth.

The fourth part of the Vinaya is present here.

Translator's Notes

- The verse section beginning "Blissful is the arising of buddhas" closely parallels known Udānavarga and Dhammapada material, particularly the "Sukha" chapter. The Tibetan here renders a Sanskrit Gāthā collection embedded in the Vinaya narrative.

The term rendered "leans to the far shore" and "leans to the near shore" translates ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ and ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ literally. These are somewhat elliptical and may refer to those oriented toward liberation (the far shore) versus those still engaged with worldly virtue (the near shore); the exact doctrinal referent is context-dependent and the rendering remains faithful to the Tibetan.

The list of deity names presents several figures whose identification required interpretive choices. Upendra is an epithet of Viṣṇu as younger brother of Indra; Karmāntaka refers to a deity of all actions; Pañcārṣika and Pañcaika are yakṣa commanders; Hārītī is the yakṣa mother figure often rendered "Hārītī" in Sanskrit. The sentence concluding the passage is deliberately left unfinished in the Tibetan, as the narrative continues into the next section.

- The term rendered here as "sacred trees" translates a word literally meaning "approach-banks" or "fording places" (a loan of the Sanskrit tīrtha in its sense of sacred site or tree-shrine); in this context it refers to sacred trees or tree-shrines associated with divine residence, consistent with the narrative's repeated mention of tree-deities.

The gandharva (dri za, literally "scent-eater") appearing as the fifth condition refers to the being in the intermediate state between death and rebirth, who must be present at conception — a standard Abhidharma account of the three conditions for conception: parental union, the mother's fertile period, and the presence of a gandharva.

- The five-crested hairstyle described for Brahmā's youthful form is a standard iconographic detail in the Sanskrit and Tibetan narrative tradition; no special doctrinal uncertainty attaches to it.

The list of epithets applied to Brahmā — Brahmā, Great Brahmā, Sovereign, Creator, Projector, Emanator, Supreme, Supremely Exalted, far shore of the world — is a standard polemical catalogue found in Buddhist critiques of the Brahmanical creator-god theology. The passage's dramatic irony turns on Brahmā's secret admission that he neither created the world nor was created by it, directly undermining each of these epithets.

The four great kings are the guardians of the four directions: Dhṛtarāṣṭra (East), Virūḍhaka (South), Virūpākṣa (West), and Vaiśravaṇa (North). The Tibetan text names Virūḍhaka and Vaiśravaṇa explicitly; the other two are implied by the group of four.

- The passage describes the bodhisattva's descent from Tuṣita (here rendered as the Tuṣita heaven based on context, though the Tibetan reads Dga' ldan, literally "joyful," the standard Tibetan rendering of Tuṣita) as a white elephant into Queen Māyā's womb, which is the classical account of Śākyamuni's final rebirth. The epithet "son of the earth-guardian" as a comparison for the elephant is unusual and may refer to a mythological elephant associated with the earth deity.

The phrase rendered as "raise the Dharma stūpa" translates a Tibetan term literally meaning "Dharma offering-pillar" or "pillar of Dharma worship"; it may refer metaphorically to establishing the teaching rather than a physical monument, but the image is intentionally grand.

- The final sentence is somewhat compressed and its precise meaning is debated. The phrase rendered "extending the lineage of kings by playing games with the great king Padma" reflects a passage about a brahmin possibly engaging in competitive or social interactions with a royal patron to establish dynastic or lineage continuity. The exact nature of "playing games" here may refer to a courtly or competitive context; the Tibetan is not fully explicit, and the broader narrative context would clarify the intended sense.

- The "golden barleycorns" planted at the outset is an unusual idiom; it appears to refer to a ritual or auspicious agricultural act connected with the birth rite, possibly a symbolic sowing done with gold-colored grain as a merit-making gesture for the birth of a son.

The eighteen branches of knowledge listed here correspond to a classical brahminic curriculum. Several items in the list — such as "the science of falling into water," "the science of swallowing," "the science of casting far into the world," and "the sixty-section Tantra" — are not standard Sanskrit equivalents easily identified from the Tibetan alone; the renderings given are literal translations of the Tibetan and may reflect unusual or specialized technical traditions. These are noted for scholarly attention but do not affect the doctrinal sense of the passage.

- The Jambū River gold (Jambūnādī gold) is a legendary gold of supreme quality said to flow from beneath the Jambū tree at the center of Jambudvīpa; it is a stock Indian literary image for the finest, most lustrous gold, here made explicit by the narrative conceit of casting a statue from it. This explains why the father considers such a standard impossibly high.
- The name "Śērśkya" is a rendering of the Tibetan "ཡོག་ཡོག་ཡོག་" which literally means something like "yellow-tawny" or "golden-pale." It functions here as a brahmin family name. The translation retains it as a proper name rather than rendering it semantically, since it serves as a patronymic for the daughter Bhadra throughout the narrative.

The passage breaks mid-sentence at its end, corresponding to an incomplete source segment. The translation faithfully reflects this.

- The name "Bzangmo" (meaning "the good one" or "the fair one") is rendered as a proper name throughout rather than translated, as it functions as a personal name in the narrative. Similarly, "Śerśkya" is kept as the brahmin's name. The city name "Kapila" likely refers to Kapilavastu, the city associated with the Śākya clan.

The plant name "mālūta" is a best reconstruction of the Tibetan transliteration; the exact botanical identification is uncertain but it is a flowering tree used as a colour-reference simile. "Tamarind" renders "tin ti li ka," a standard Indic plant loanword. "Round cakes" renders "bal po se'u," a type of confection; the precise preparation is uncertain but the term is a loanword from Sanskrit or Prakrit culinary vocabulary.

- The phrase rendered as "eighty bushels of refined gold grain" (gser gyi nas sbyang brgyad bcu) is unusual — it appears to be a measure of refined gold reckoned in the unit of a bushel (nās), possibly a Sanskritic loan. The exact meaning of the accounting detail about King Padmachenpo's gold is somewhat obscure in context; the rendering follows the most natural syntactic reading.

The verse quoted by the brahmin boys appears to be a gnomic saying about things that travel unimpeded. The translation renders it as closely as possible to the Tibetan; the precise doctrinal or literary source is not identified here.

- The phrase rendered "leaf-bundle" translates a term that in this context likely refers to a mendicant's alms-bowl or a bundle associated with begging rounds; the Tibetan "lo ma'i phur ma" literally means "a bundle of leaves," possibly a leaf-bowl used for receiving alms, which was common practice. This is a minor lexical uncertainty with no doctrinal consequence.
- The name rendered consistently as "Bhaṅgamā" (Tib. བླ་མ་མཁའ་མ་) in the preceding passage was rendered as "the good girl" or "good woman" — here the Tibetan continues to use བླ་མ་མཁའ་མ་ as both a name and an epithet (meaning "good one" or "Bhaṅgamā"); I have kept it as a name per the continuity of the narrative, treating it as a proper noun, while also retaining the vocative sense where context demands.

The verse rendered as camphor: पुष्पकम् (pusher / pushe) likely corresponds to Sanskrit puṣkara or puṣpacandana; the term may indicate a fragrant tree-resin or camphor-type substance. The rendering "camphor" is an approximation; the precise aromatic is uncertain but does not affect the doctrinal content.

The final sentence — "a teaching that is not wholesome" (अशुभाशुभोपायः) — is rendered literally. In context it likely means the parents have arranged the situation in a way that invites transgression of the young couple's vow of celibacy, which Nyagrodha-born regards as a spiritually harmful act, hence "not wholesome" or perhaps "not virtuous." The doctrinal valence

- The final line is incomplete in the source text as given; the verse breaks off mid-sentence. The rendering preserves this break faithfully rather than supplying content not present in the Tibetan.

The phrase "for the sake of warming ourselves" renders a somewhat condensed Tibetan expression suggesting a pretext (sharing warmth) that Bhadrā uses as cover for the practical necessity of sharing the single bed; this reading follows the narrative context.

The phrase rendered "verbal spears" is a free but defensible rendering of "口舌短兵相接," literally "stabbing with short spears of the mouth," a vivid idiom for sharp, wounding speech used in quarreling.

The repeated verse at the opening of this passage is identical to the verse closing the preceding passage, indicating that it belongs to Sgyug-mo's speech and is here attributed to the new speaker within the continuing narrative frame.

- The phrase rendered "with a basis of occasion, never without occasion" and the parallel formulations that follow represent a set of technical conditions for legitimate Dharma teaching. The Tibetan terms རྒྱུ་གཞི་སྟོན་པའི་བཤད་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་ཡང་། རྒྱུ་གཞི་མེད་པའི་བཤད་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་ཡང་། རྒྱུ་གཞི་མེད་པའི་བཤད་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་ཡང་། རྒྱུ་གཞི་མེད་པའི་བཤད་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་ཡང་། རྒྱུ་གཞི་མེད་པའི་བཤད་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་རྣམས་ཀྱིས་ཡང་། refer respectively to teaching that has a proper occasion or pretext, that leads to definite emergence from cyclic existence, that has something to rely upon, that has a suitable purpose or receptive basis, and that is accompanied by miraculous display. These are standard conditions in Vinaya-related contexts for authentic and legitimate teaching. The rendering is interpretive where the terms admit of variation.

- The phrase rendered "festival of meeting at the mountains, a festival of beauty" translates two compound terms that appear to describe a local seasonal or religious gathering. The precise nature of this festival is uncertain from the text alone; the rendering follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

The epithet "scion of a noble house" renders a conventional honorific address used when speaking to a woman of brahmin background.

The charnel-ground cloth exchange between the Blessed One and Kāśyapa is a celebrated episode reflecting the depth of their spiritual kinship; the Tibetan carefully uses honorific verb forms throughout to distinguish speech directed to the Blessed One from that of ordinary exchange.

- The epithet "ཁོ་མཉམས་པོ་མཉམས་པོ་" (literally "the enemy born from the mother," i.e., one born as his mother's foe) is the standard Tibetan rendering of Ajātaśatru (Sanskrit ajātaśatru, "whose enemy is not yet born" or by folk etymology "enemy not yet born"), referring to the prince who murdered his father Bimbisāra. The text does not name him explicitly at this point but the epithet is unambiguous.

The phrase "ཁོ་མཉམས་པོ་མཉམས་པོ་" rendered as "a deer does not rear a deer" is a proverbial expression meaning that one should now stand on one's own — a wild creature is not nursed by its own kind once grown. The intended sense is that Mahākāśyapa has completed his role as spiritual guide and she must now be self-sufficient.

- The phrase rendered "Lady of Beings" translates ལྷོ་མཉམས་པོ་མཉམས་པོ་, a high honorific title for Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's aunt and the first fully ordained nun. The compound literally means "great mistress of living beings," functioning as a formal title rather than a descriptive epithet.

The description of karma as "luminous" renders the Tibetan ལྷོ་མཉམས་པོ་མཉམས་པོ་, meaning she abided as if radiant or bright — the sense being that the impending karmic result was clearly and inevitably present, like a light that cannot be hidden. This is an unusual metaphor and the precise doctrinal valence is not entirely standard.

- The verse spoken by King Ajātaśatru comparing himself to one who has not yet reached the far shore of an ocean is somewhat elliptical. The reading adopted here understands him to mean: he had not yet fully crossed the ocean of saṃsāric suffering, and now a second wave of transgression has come upon him. This is a plausible contextual interpretation; the Tibetan is grammatically compressed.

The final verse is a well-known canonical gāthā on the inescapability of karma, found with minor variants in several Pāli and Sanskrit sources (cf. Dhammapada 127); its citation here by Suvarṇā is theologically significant, as she exculpates the king while affirming that the encounter was shaped by her own past karma.

- The passage contains the standard Vinaya phrasing for what will become a pārājika rule for nuns. The final sentence is deliberately left open-ended in the Tibetan, as it introduces the rule whose full wording continues in the following passage. The phrase rendered "even if she were reborn together with one born in an animal realm" is a vivid idiomatic expression conveying the extreme gravity of the offense — that even such a degraded rebirth companion would not excuse the act. The twelve groups mentioned are the standard "group of twelve nuns" (dvādaśavargīyā bhikṣuṇī) who are the habitual troublemakers in Vinaya narratives, parallel to the group of six monks.

- The terms "heartland" and "borderlands" render the Tibetan technical distinction between a central region where the full Saṅgha is established and an outlying region where it is not, a distinction that carries legal weight in the Vinaya. The point here is that relinquishment of training requires a witness who genuinely comprehends what is being said; if comprehension fails due to a language barrier, the relinquishment is invalid.

The phrase rendered "motion-and-four-fold-act of formal procedure" refers to the standard Vinaya legal act (Skt. jñāpticaturthakarman) consisting of a motion followed by three proclamations; its use indicates full legal standing within the Saṅgha.

- The term rendered "mentally deranged" translates the Tibetan བཟོ་མཁན་པོ་, which literally refers to someone who babbles or is incoherent, typically understood in the Vinaya context as a person whose mental incapacity renders their verbal acts legally ineffective.

The list of verbal expressions near the end of the first main case — words, phrases, expressions, speech, and so on — is a standard Vinaya formula enumerating different modes of verbal communication to ensure comprehensive legal coverage; it is rendered in full as it appears in the text.

The phrase rendered "woman of loose character" translates za ma, a term in Tibetan Vinaya literature denoting a woman of disreputable conduct; ma ning refers to a person of indeterminate sex or a eunuch; and dge slong sun phyung ba refers to a nun who has been expelled or whose status has been annulled. These three, together with the preceding categories, form a list of degraded or irregular statuses whose verbal invocation may serve as a form of relinquishing the training.

- The phrase rendered "the coming together of two with two" is a canonical Vinaya technical definition of sexual intercourse, referring to the joining of the two sex organs of two beings. This formulaic expression appears consistently in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya contexts.

The sentence about "mother" and "father" — "I do not remember my mother; I remember my father, my brothers, and my sisters" — is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan. The sense appears to be that the speaker is expressing homesickness and a desire to return to family and household life, offered as motivation for relinquishing training; the asymmetry regarding the mother may reflect a textual lacuna or scribal irregularity in this transmission.

- The term rendered as "motion and three announcements" reflects the standard Vinaya formula for formal acts of the assembly: one motion followed by three readings of the announcement, constituting a fourfold act. The passage on "partially obstructed" and "unobstructed" refers to a technical Vinaya analysis of anatomical conditions during the act, which is standard in commentarial literature on this rule. The name "Norchen" is a Tibetan rendering of a proper name; the underlying Sanskrit equivalent is not specified in the text.

- The passage is a Vinaya commentary expanding the second pārājika (defeat) rule for nuns, treating theft. The text operates as a cross-reference scaffold, directing the reader to recite whole sections verbatim from the parallel monk's rule, then provides the nun-specific analytical glosses. The term "māṣaka" is a unit of weight and monetary value used in Vinaya contexts to set the threshold for a pārājika theft offense; it is left in Sanskrit as a technical term of art. The phrase rendered "those of indeterminate sex" translates a term referring to persons of a third biological category recognized in Vinaya literature, sometimes called "pandaka" or "hermaphrodite" in older scholarship; the rendering chosen here is neutral and contextually appropriate. The final sentence breaks off mid-analysis, reflecting that the source passage itself is a continuous commentary that continues beyond the excerpt provided.

- The term rendered "one who has been commissioned" versus "one who has been dispatched" translates two distinct Tibetan expressions referring to a proxy acting under prior agreement versus one simply sent on an errand; the legal distinction matters for assigning culpability in Vinaya analysis but both result in defeat if the theft is completed.

The phrase "śīriṣika" in the condensed summary is a proper technical Vinaya term referring to a specific type of benefactor or donor category; it is left in Sanskrit as its exact meaning in this context requires fuller Vinaya commentary to unpack.

The five māṣakas is the standard threshold weight of value above which theft constitutes a defeat offense, corresponding to the ancient Indian monetary measure; it is equivalent here to the threshold established in the monks' Prātimokṣa.

- The name rendered here as "Migalandika the ascetic-barber" translates the Tibetan "ri dgas zlog dge sbyong sbed." This is an unusual compound: "ri dgas zlog" can mean "deer-repeller" or possibly be a proper name; "dge sbyong sbed" means "barber of ascetics" or "one who shaves ascetics." The traditional identification of this figure as Migalandika the barber — known from the Pāli parallel in the Suttavibhaṅga — supports this rendering. The precise Tibetan form may reflect a name that was transliterated and then partially translated or corrupted in transmission.

- The passage is a Vinaya canonical text, specifically from the section elaborating the third pārājika rule for nuns, which concerns killing a human being. The Tibetan follows the standard commentarial format found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya vibhaṅga, analyzing the rule's constituent terms one by one. The phrase rendered "water-knife" translates Tibetan chu gri, which likely corresponds to a blade used for cutting in water or a specific surgical or barber's instrument; its precise identification is uncertain but it appears alongside sword and razor as a class of edged weapon. The terms "nun in name only," "nun who lays claim to the title," and so forth follow the standard fourfold classification of bhikṣuṇī found in this Vinaya tradition.

- The phrase rendered "oozes from within like something rotten" translates a stock Vinaya formula of abuse; the image is of interior moral putrefaction leaking outward. The "donkey" comparison renders "lung bong ltar kun du spyod pa," where lung bong is a wild ass or donkey; the point is uncontrolled, shameless wandering. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, cutting off during the description of hell; no text has been omitted — this is where the supplied Tibetan ends.

- The closing sentence is incomplete in the supplied Tibetan — it breaks off mid-thought. The translation reproduces it as far as the text goes, ending with the phrase about the higher realms being "all but assured," which renders the idiomatic Tibetan image of the higher realms being "cut off only by a silk curtain," meaning they are so close as to be nearly within reach. This vivid idiom has been rendered with equivalent sense rather than literally, to serve the oral listener.

- The phrase rendered "liberation is but a hand's breadth away" and "the higher realms are assured by a silken thread alone" are idiomatic Tibetan expressions conveying that liberation or a higher rebirth is tantalizingly close and well within reach. The image of a veil or screen for liberation and a silken thread for the higher realms is preserved as closely as English idiom allows.

The phrase "acts done with one motion, two motions, or four motions together with an invitation" refers to the formal categories of Vinaya procedural motions: a single-motion act, a two-motion act, and a four-motion act with invitation — the standard Vinaya legislative procedures for communal acts of the Saṅgha.

- The six named teachers are the canonical six non-Buddhist masters of ancient India known from Pāli sources as the six teachers of rival sects. The Tibetan renderings are phonetic approximations of their Indian names: Pūraṇa Kāśyapa, Makkhali Gośāla, Saṅjaya Vairaṭīputra, Ajita Keśakambala, Kakuda Kātyāyana, and Nirgrantha Jñātaputra (the last being the Jain teacher Mahāvīra). Some of the Tibetan phonetic forms are partially unclear, but the identification of this group as a whole is not in doubt.

The passage ends mid-sentence with a long string of epithets describing the Blessed One; the syntax continues into the following passage and is left open accordingly.

- The passage "the nine successive meditative absorptions" renders the standard list of nine successive attainments (anupūrvasamāpatti): the four dhyānas, the four formless absorptions, and the cessation of perception and feeling.

The verse lines "the mother-cow seeking her beloved calf" and "like a mother-cow who has lost her cherished calf" render a traditional simile (the bereaved cow seeking her lost calf) used in Buddhist literature for compassionate, tireless seeking. The Tibetan ba bzho n ("mother-cow" or "nursing cow") and beu ("calf") are central to this image.

The closing section shifts into what appears to be a commentarial framing passage — explaining the narrative setting of a sūtra and indicating which portion is to be "extensively expounded." This is characteristic of an exegetical text (a vyākhyāna or ṭīkā) that is unpacking a root sūtra narrative. The reference to "the opening subject-matter of the saffron-robed monks" (ser skya'i gleng gzhi) indicates the formal occasion (nidāna) or frame story of the relevant discourse.

- The city name rendered "Prabhāvatī" corresponds to the Tibetan "པ་བཟུང་བའི་གྲོང་ཁྱེད་" literally "possessing light" and is identified as a locality near Vaiśālī in Vinaya literature. The city name "Prajñapti" renders the Tibetan "པ་རྒྱལ་པོ་པའི་གྲོང་ཁྱེད་," literally "the city of elimination or designation," which may correspond to a different Sanskrit toponym in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is not fully certain from the Tibetan alone.
- The phrase rendered "the supreme human quality" translates a technical term meaning the highest or most excellent quality attainable by a human being, specifically referring to supramundane attainments such as meditative absorptions and the noble fruits. Falsely claiming such attainments constitutes the fourth pārājika for nuns in the Vinaya.

The line "abiding in contact refers exclusively to what is seen, the Dharma" reflects a Vinaya commentarial gloss specifying that the phrase "abiding in contact" in this rule applies only to direct experiential contact with the Dharma as seen — i.e., the truths realized on the path of seeing — rather than any broader sense of meditative contact.

- The list of non-human beings includes several terms requiring comment. "Garuḍa" renders nam mkha' lding, the great sky-soaring bird of Indian mythology. "Gandharva" renders dri za, literally "scent-eaters." "Kinnara" renders mi'am ci, the half-human celestial musicians. "Kumbhāṇḍa" renders grul bum, a class of spirits. "Zombie" renders srul po and "corpse-reanimator" renders lus srul po — these are classes of lesser spirits associated with corpses; the precise distinction between the two terms is not entirely transparent in the canonical commentarial tradition, and the renderings are approximate.

The name "Śersky" for ser skya bzang mo is uncertain; this appears to be the name of a nun, literally meaning something like "the excellent tawny-yellow one" or a personal name. The identity and story are not elaborated in the passage and the rendering keeps the apparent name.

- The name Śerkyabzangmo is left as a Tibetan proper name, as the preceding passage established it in that form. The name Karṇajalendhara, rendered from the Tibetan "ཀར་རྒྱལ་ཤེན་མེད་ཀླུ་མ་ལུ་ཤེན་མེད་," literally means "the one with ear-ornaments" or "ear-lobed"; this is a plausible Indic royal name and is reconstructed accordingly. The transition structure of this passage alternates between abbreviated narrative summaries enclosed in quotation formulae and direct narration — a common feature of sūtra prose that has been preserved faithfully.
- The passage is a redactional summary section in which the compiler abbreviates parallel stories for the second and third pratyekabuddha narratives by saying "up to the point where it says such-and-such," indicating that the same full text applies with only minor variations. This is a standard Vinaya literary device and has been rendered transparently in the translation so the listener can follow the structure. The name "Gdong-ma-legs" in the second narrative is a Tibetan rendering left in transliterated form here since the Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain in this context.

The name Vipaśyin (Tibetan: Rnam par gzig) is the first of the seven buddhas of antiquity. "Bandhumān" (Tibetan: Gnyen ldan) is his father's name, well attested in canonical sources.

• The passage is a lengthy editorial abbreviation — a common redactional device in Buddhist canonical texts whereby a scribe or editor signals that long passages already narrated earlier in the same text are to be understood as repeated here, marking only the opening and closing phrases of each section. The translation accordingly renders each abbreviated segment as a summary reference in the third person, faithful to the Tibetan structure. The names Bhadravadanā and Śrenika follow standard scholarly conventions for this text.

- The phrase "自然の敵に七日の間を共にした" is rendered "she experienced seven days in the company of a natural enemy before her birth." The term "自然の敵" (literally "enemy before birth" or "innate enemy") is a somewhat unusual expression here; it likely refers to a hostile situation or oppressive relationship she endured at birth or in the womb-period, and the precise narrative context is not given in this excerpt. This is noted as a point of genuine uncertainty.

The name "उत्तरा" in "उत्तरावर्तपञ्चमहापुराणम्" is rendered as the proper name "Uttara" following Indic conventions for this story cycle, where the brahmin youth Uttara (Skt. Uttara) is a recognized figure associated with the prophecy under Kāśyapa Buddha. If a different identification is intended by the redactor, this should be checked against the fuller text.

- The "northern Unpleasant Sound" renders Uttarakuru, the northern continent of classical Buddhist cosmology, whose Tibetan name is a calque of the Sanskrit. It is here glossed in the pratyekabuddha's description as a place without possessiveness, with a fixed lifespan, and with a distinguished mode of existence — standard Abhidharma attributes of Uttarakuru. The somewhat unusual framing ("when one does not go to Uttarakuru, one collects alms among the Thirty-Three") likely means the pratyekabuddha alternates between the two destinations depending on the occasion; the Tibetan syntax is compressed but this reading is the most coherent.

- The phrase rendered "occasions and non-occasions" translates संभवेऽसंभवे, literally "the possible and the impossible" or "what is feasible and what is not" — a standard Abhidharma category referring to the analysis of what can and cannot occur given conditions. This is a recognized doctrinal term pair and the rendering reflects its technical sense.

The expression संज्ञाविशेष्यविशेषण together constitutes the classic triad of aggregates, elements, and sense bases — the standard analytical categories of Abhidharma scholasticism — and is rendered accordingly.

- Utpalavarnā is the standard Sanskrit name for the Tibetan འཕྲུལ་འཁོར་གྱི་མཚན་ལྷོ་མ་ (literally "hue of the blue lotus"), a well-known arhat nun in the early canonical literature; the name is kept in Sanskrit throughout.

The term kārṣāpaṇa (Tibetan transcription ཀའ་རྩྭ་པ་ཤལ་) is an Indian coin of silver or copper, standard currency in the Vinaya narratives; left in Sanskrit for clarity.

The verse couplet at the opening enumerates certain social classes or occupations connected to the preceding Vinaya section; the final verse summarizing the eight defeats is a mnemonic gāthā. The eighth item, "born of a slave" (𑀧𑁆𑀭𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀺𑀢𑀺𑀤𑀺), refers in Vinaya context to a rule involving a woman born of servile status — the precise referent will be clarified in the fuller commentary.

- The term rendered "duty-nun" translates the Tibetan office of dge skos ma, the female equivalent of the karma-dāna, the monk appointed to oversee the practical affairs of the assembly. The rendering "duty-nun" is a functional gloss; no single established English equivalent exists across all traditions.

The passage "contact of limb with limb" renders yan lag dang yan lag tsam reg pa, a technical euphemism used in Vinaya literature to describe a degree of physical contact that falls short of full sexual intercourse but nonetheless constitutes a transgression. The doctrinal and legal weight of this distinction is significant in the monastic code.

The sentence ending "the blessed buddhas are like this" appears to be a rhetorical introduction whose continuation falls in the next passage; it is left open accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "from the knee down, from the eye down" reflects the Tibetan "mig man chad pus mo yan chad," which specifies a body-contact zone between the knee and the eye — a standard Vinaya formulation delimiting the area of prohibited contact. The phrasing sounds paradoxical in English because it gives two opposite limits; both bounds together define the range, meaning the body between those two points. This is a fixed technical formula in the Vinaya's analysis of the pārājika rule.

The opening sentence about "flood-water" is an abbreviated continuation of the preceding list of contrasting qualities of the blessed buddhas; the Tibetan is elliptical and the full sense depends on context from the prior passage.

- The nun named here is Sthūlanandā — her Tibetan name ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ means literally "Fat-and-Joyful," which is the standard Tibetan rendering of Sanskrit Sthūlanandā. She is a well-known figure in Vinaya narratives.

The anatomical boundary "from below the eyes down to above the knee" is the standard Vinaya formula for the zone of bodily contact that triggers this rule; the translation follows the text's own logic rather than attempting medical precision.

The term rendered "grave offense" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is the Vinaya technical category thullaccaya (Sanskrit sthūlātyaya), a serious but non-defeating infraction; "wrongdoing" renders ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ (duṣkṛta / dukkṛta), the lightest category of Vinaya offense.

The phrase rendered "from as high as the armpits down" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is uncertain in its precise anatomical reference; the Pāli parallels suggest the armpit as the upper boundary for the second set of rules concerning receiving objects.

- The passage enumerates eight categories of behavior that constitute the offense, but the Tibetan text breaks off mid-enumeration at the point of explaining "sets a time," continuing through the remainder of the rule's analytical commentary. This is a direct excerpt from the Mūlasarvāstivāda Bhikṣuṇī Vinaya and the technical legal analysis that follows the narrative. The term rendered "pressing close and fondling" translates the same three-term Tibetan phrase used in the preceding passage, maintaining consistency. The phrase rendered "she cannot drive him away" translates a stock Vinaya formula indicating the irreversibility of the situation once the man has entered.

- The term rendered "sidling and jostling" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ and "exposing the root" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ are technical Vinaya terms whose precise physical referent is debated in the commentarial tradition; the renderings given follow the contextual gloss provided within the passage itself. The phrase "foremost of all" and "the twelve roles of a nun" refer to standard Vinaya enumerations whose full content is supplied by the surrounding text not included here. The name translated as "Priyā" renders ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ and "Priyamātī" renders ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, both being approximate Sanskrit back-formations from the Tibetan meaning "the dear one" and "she who has affection" respectively.

- The name rendered "Kṛtaka" reconstructs the Tibetan ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, which is an unusual form. The Sanskrit underlying it is uncertain; "Kṛtaka" is a plausible reconstruction but the reading remains tentative.

The title རྒྱལ་མཁན་མཆོག་ལྷན་སྐྱེས་མཆོག་ is the great Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, here rendered as "the great female sovereign Gautamī" following the literal Tibetan, though the Sanskrit title Mahāprajāpatī ("great sovereign of beings") is implied.

- The wooden signal board renders the Indic term gaṇḍī, the wooden sounding board used in monasteries to summon the community, here left as a functional description rather than a transliterated term since the passage is intended for audio narration. The procedural formula for the monastic act follows the standard karmavācānā pattern of motion and announcement found in Vinaya literature.
- The phrase rendered "his hair standing on end and his body's hairs risen" translates a Tibetan idiom for deep remorse and agitation — literally "hair of the head erect, body-hairs risen" — which in this Vinaya context signals the monk's genuine contrition and readiness to make amends.

The "community of the Twelve Groups" refers to a notorious group of twelve monks frequently cited in Vinaya narratives as causing disciplinary problems; their counterpart among the nuns is implied here in the address.

- The passage contains a long formal Vinaya legal formula being recited first as instruction and then as the actual motion and act. The list of medicines follows a standard Vinaya fourfold categorization: timely medicines (to be taken at mealtimes), medicines allowable within a period (yāmika, i.e., within a watch of the night), seven-day medicines, and lifetime medicines. The rendering of the motion formula attempts to capture the technical repetition characteristic of Vinaya procedure. The phrase rendered "things to remember" and "things to inquire about" translates dran par bya ba and dri bar bya ba, which in Vinaya contexts refer to memoranda or reminders and items one may ask about from a teacher; the precise referents are contextually specific to monastic practice but the translation preserves the sense adequately.
- The passage describes a formal Vinaya proceeding — specifically a saṅghakamma (formal act of the Saṅgha) against twelve groups of nuns who, even after being admonished, refused to relent and clung to their position. The list of allowable medicines and provisions represents standard Vinaya categories: those permitted at mealtime, during a watch period, for seven days, and for the duration of one's life. The text breaks off mid-sentence in the final repetition of the formal motion, which is characteristic of the Tibetan canonical Vinaya's use of abbreviated formulaic repetition — the full reading would complete the list with "fruit medicines" and continue with the remaining clauses as in the prior iterations.
- The passage is part of a formal Vinaya procedural text describing a ཀུན་ཀྱི་ཀུར་ལོ་ (karma / formal Saṅgha act) being performed against a group of problematic nuns. The phrase rendered "things to remember, things to inquire about" (མཐོང་པོ་དང་ཐོག་མཐོང་གི་ཁྱབ་པོ་) likely refers to mnemonic aids and questioning items used in formal Vinaya proceedings, though their precise identity in this context is not entirely clear from the text alone. The four categories of medicines — timely, fixed-hour, seven-day, and life-long — are standard Vinaya classifications for permissible medicinal substances.
- The phrase rendered "things to remember, things to inquire about" (Tibetan: dran par bya ba dang, dri bar bya ba) refers to a standard list of items brought as attendants' courtesies; the exact referents are conventional and may include reminders and questions pertaining to the suspended monk's needs or status. The translation follows the same convention as the preceding passage for consistency.
- The name rendered here as Gre-kye (spelled gre skyes) appears to be a proper name or epithet for the monk in question who is the subject of the expulsion proceedings. The exact identity or meaning of this name is uncertain from context alone; it may be a phonetic rendering of a Prakrit or Sanskrit name. This is a straightforward Vinaya commentary passage and the terminological pattern of "motion with four readings" (gsol ba dang bzhi'i las) refers to the standard formal Saṅgha act (Skt. jñapticaturthakarman) consisting of one motion and three readings of the resolution. "Motion with two readings" (gsol ba dang las gnyis) likewise refers to a jñaptidvītiyakarman.

- The summary verse near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic condensing the twelve prohibited duties for nuns into brief headings. The referents of several items in the verse (such as "the one who makes objection," "the groundless accusation," and the numerical entries) follow the standard Vinaya enumerative format and point back to specific categories described in the preceding and subsequent Vinaya rules rather than being self-explanatory in isolation. This is normal for such closing gāthās in the Vinaya Vibhaṅga.

The passage ends mid-sentence, cutting off the narrative about Kṛṣṇa son of Mṛgādhāra; the translation renders it faithfully to the point of truncation.

- * The phrase rendered "carries a definitive outcome: one becomes subject to expiation with a remainder in the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya term for a saṅghāvaśeṣa or saṅghādīṣeṣa offence (one of the most serious class of transgressions short of a root defeat), combined with the qualifier that the transgression occurs from the very first act. The Tibetan "འདྲིང་བར་སྒོམ་གྱི་ཆུ་ཡི་ཕོ་ཀློག་པོ་ལྟོན་པའི་ཐུགས་རྒྱུ་ཤིང་།" confirms this classification.

The enumeration of the seven types of wife breaks off mid-sentence in the source; the passage is clearly incomplete as transmitted in this segment.

- The phrase rendered "companion in a lower station" follows the standard commentarial understanding of the final type of wife, whose defining characteristic is a shared-wealth companionate union entered into from a position of relative social equality or inferiority; the passage is mid-sentence at the cut-off point, as the definition continues beyond the supplied text.

The repeated formula "from that point up to" is a condensing device standard in Vinaya literature, indicating that the full protective formula already quoted in the preceding categories is to be understood as applying again in full; this is preserved in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "a wife who is a companion in a lower station" and "a wife met only for a time" continues the preceding passage's enumeration of the seven wives. The Tibetan term "མཉམ་པ་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་" literally means "encountered / met for a certain time or occasion," which I have rendered as "met only for a time," consistent with the hired-companion context the passage immediately goes on to describe.

The ten female companions (བུ་སྒྲོན་གསལ་བཤད་) enumerated here include several roles defined by who guards the woman in her husband's absence. The terms "བུ་སྒྲོན་མེད་" and "བུ་སྒྲོན་པ་" are here rendered "mother-in-law" and "father-in-law" respectively, which is the standard reading in this domestic legal context. The passage for "guarded by a father-in-law" is explicitly abbreviated in the Tibetan itself with a cross-reference to the preceding account, and the translation reflects this.

- The gotra names listed — Kuṇḍa, Bharadvāja, Śāṇḍilya, Bhāradvāja, Maudgalya, Garga, Gautama — are Brahminical clan lineages (gotras) well-attested in Sanskrit literature. The Tibetan renderings are phonetic approximations of Sanskrit originals; the identification of "Kuṇṣa" (ཀུན་ས་) with Kuṇḍa and "Bāḍsa" (བ་ཅ་ས་) with Bharadvāja involves some uncertainty in the precise Sanskrit equivalents, but the gotra context is clear.

The term rendered "female probationer" (𑀧𑁆𑀭𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀺𑀢𑀺) corresponds to the Skt. śikṣamāṇā, a woman undergoing a two-year probationary period before full ordination, and "wandering mendicant woman" (𑀧𑁆𑀭𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀺𑀢𑀺𑀱𑀺𑀶𑀺𑀢𑀺𑀬𑀺𑀰𑀺𑀢𑀺) to Skt. parivrājikā.

- The phrase rendered "delegate of a delegate" renders the Tibetan construction meaning one who was appointed by a delegate rather than by the nun herself, indicating a second remove of delegation. The legal analysis here follows the standard Vinaya permutational method, systematically working through every combination of who composed, carried, and retrieved the message. The "gross offense" renders a term for a serious but sub-full transgression, distinct from the Saṅgha-remainder which is the gravest class short of defeat. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the continuity instruction.

- The text shifts here from nuns (dge slong ma) to novice nuns (dge sbyong ma), a distinct Vinaya category of female renunciants below full ordination. The parallel case structure — who accepts the message, who carries it forward, who brings the reply back — is the organizing logic of this entire section, and the permutation matrix is followed precisely as given in the Tibetan. The final permutation (the one following behind accepts, the one walking ahead carries it there, and the one following behind brings the reply back) is implied by the text's closing case but the Tibetan as given ends at the case translated above; no text has been added beyond what is present.
- The distinction between "gross offense" and "wrong-doing" reflects two different levels of transgression in the Vinaya for nuns: the gross offense is a thullaccaya-level offense, and the wrong-doing is a duṣkṛta. The text ends mid-sentence with the question about sign-based messages, as the passage breaks off there.
- The term rendered "Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense" translates སྐྱོད་པུ་མཆོག་པོ་ལྷན་སྐྱོད་པུ་མཆོག་པོ་, literally "it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha," which is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit saṃghāvaśeṣa, the second category of offense in the Vinaya, requiring formal communal rehabilitation. The text distinguishes throughout between མཆོག་པོ་ (letter, a written message sent via a messenger) and མཆོག་པོ་ (hand-written document, a document carried directly). The passage appears to break off mid-sentence at the end of the supplied Tibetan, so the translation ends accordingly. The repetition of one case within the "word commission" series appears to be a scribal redundancy in the source text.
- The passage contains two distinct terminological series that require clarification. First, the text distinguishes མཆོག་པོ་ (rendered "letter") from མཆོག་པོ་ (rendered "written document"); both denote written communications but appear as distinct categories within the Vinaya's exhaustive permutation system. Second, the concluding section shifts to a different rule entirely, concerning categories of wives and the procedural conditions under which offenses are counted. The terms མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ ("the three pebbles have not been scattered"), མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ ("the grass has not been cut"), མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ ("sand has been given but she has not been released"), and མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ ("the bell has not been proclaimed") are technical Vinaya procedural markers whose precise ritual significance depends on the fuller commentarial context; they are rendered literally here.
- The term rendered "grave offense" throughout is a technical Vinaya category distinct from a "Saṅgha remainder" (saṃghāvaśeṣa); the Tibetan མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ literally means a "heavy offense" or thullaccaya in Pali usage, an intermediate category below a pārājika root defeat but above a minor transgression.

The name མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ rendered as "Vaiśravaṇa" refers to Kubera, the god of wealth, son of Viśravas, used here as a hyperbolic comparison for extreme affluence.

The phrase མཆོག་པོ་མཆོག་པོ་ likely refers to the Kumbhāṇḍas or a class of inauspicious beings; however in this ritual enumeration context it may simply denote a class of minor gods associated with the body. The translation "malformed ones" is provisional. The list appears to be a conventional enumeration of deities petitioned in popular religious practice and corresponds to similar lists found in Sanskrit narrative literature.

- The names in the opening list — Śagā, All-Doer, Revatī, God of Wind-Butter, the Evil-Eyed, Noble-Born, Precious Jewel, Auspicious Fullness, the Five-Honored, the Five-Receivers, and the Robber-Woman with five hundred — are obscure folk or local divine figures attested in early

Indian Buddhist literature. Their identifications are uncertain in some cases; the renderings given follow transparent semantic translation of the Tibetan. The twenty-eight yakṣa generals is a standard number in the Vinaya and related literature. The term rendered "God of Wind-Butter" is an unusual compound and may refer to a deity associated with ritual butter-lamp offerings combined with wind; its precise identity is uncertain. The name Rājyadatta for the husband is inferred from the Tibetan "འཇམ་འཁོར་འཁོར་" which appears to be a proper name in context.

- The passage lists food qualities negated in the prescribed diet. The list is quite long and the terms overlap; the translation renders them as faithfully as possible to the sequence in the Tibetan. The phrase "similarly, up through the one named Ratna, all should be related in full" reflects a standard textual abbreviation device common in sūtra literature, indicating that a parallel account follows which the scribe has condensed. The reconstruction of the musical instruments is based on standard Tibetan organological terminology: "lute" for glingbu (transverse flute is also possible; the term can denote a stringed or wind instrument depending on context), "vihuela" or "lute" for piwang, "clay drum" for rdza rnga, and "great drum" for rnga bo che.
- The name rendered here as Śūraputranandana follows the sense of the Tibetan "gyad bu nor" literally meaning "hero's-son wealth/treasure." The Tibetan text is clearly abbreviating a longer narrative with formulaic markers indicating where passages from a fuller version should be inserted; the translation renders this structural device as explicit prose instruction, consistent with the preceding passage's treatment. The "four stances, five throws, and eighteen branches of knowledge" are standard formulaic enumerations of warrior and scholarly arts in classical Indian literature and their specific contents are not enumerated in this passage.
- The phrase "kings of the sun-realm beneath" renders འོ་མ་གྲོལ་གྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁོངས་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, literally "kings beneath the sun," likely an epithet for rulers of terrestrial kingdoms as opposed to celestial realms. The passage appears to be excerpted with formulaic connective phrases ("and so on up to," "and up to") that are part of the source text's own redactional structure, indicating this is a commentary or summary text that quotes and paraphrases a longer narrative in blocks. The identity of "Śla" (ཤ་) in the phrase "queens of Śla" is uncertain; it may refer to a specific kingdom or clan name in the narrative's underlying story. The verse on compassion versus generosity reflects a well-known Mahāyāna doctrinal position that compassion is the highest of virtues.
- The six teachers named here are the six well-known heterodox teachers (tīrthikas) of the Buddha's day — Pūraṇa Kāśyapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambalī, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, and Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta — and the speech placed in "Kāśyapa's" mouth corresponds closely to the views attributed to Pūraṇa Kāśyapa in Pāli and Sanskrit sources, denying moral causation entirely. The passage rendered "arrow-prince" translates gyad bu nor, a proper name or title meaning something like "Jewel of the Archer-Warriors"; it has been kept consistent with the preceding passage.
- The text is a narrative excerpt from a vinaya or biographical sūtra context, likely the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya or a related narrative. The name rendered "Gyalbū Nor" (འཇམ་འཁོར་འཁོར་) literally means "Prince Wealth" or "the royal son Dhana"; this appears to be the figure known in Sanskrit sources as Kumāraka-Dhana or similar. No Sanskrit equivalent is supplied in the passage itself, so the Tibetan form is retained consistently.

The phrase rendered "struck like empty vessels" for འོ་མ་གྲོལ་གྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁོངས་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ corresponds to a standard idiom for dismissal or departure in disgrace — like empty pots being struck and found hollow. This is the contextually apt reading.

The region name འོ་མ་གྲོལ་གྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁོངས་ is a Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Śṛgālavati (a locality name); this identification is tentative but standard in the relevant vinaya literature.

- The phrase rendered "equal in regard to clay and gold" and "equal in regard to dung and sandalwood" are standard formulaic descriptions of an arhat's equanimity — indifference to what is base or precious, foul or fragrant. The image of "tearing apart the shell of the egg of ignorance" is a classical metaphor for breakthrough to arhatship. The "analytic knowledges" renders so so yang dag par rig pa, corresponding to the Sanskrit pratisamvid, the four discriminating awarenesses of an arhat. The "two great assemblies" passage describes the Poṣadha and Pravāraṇā ceremonies; the translation renders the institutional sense without inserting the Sanskrit technical names into the body, as the Tibetan itself does not use them explicitly here.

- The passage refers to "those who hold the Māmakā" — the Tibetan reads "བོད་མཁས་པ་ལྟ་བུ་" which could refer to a specific textual collection, possibly the Mātṛkā (Skt. mātṛkā), meaning the Abhidharma matrix texts or a specific canonical category. The rendering as "Māmakā" is a placeholder; this is a genuinely uncertain technical term and may refer to the Mātṛkā-holders (those who master the Abhidharma summaries). A specialist reader should be aware of this ambiguity.

The mixing of lodging assignments by category (sūtra-holders, Vinaya-holders, and the third group) follows a recognized Vinaya procedure for cross-assigning practitioners of different textual specializations; the text is noting that all permutations of three groups are to be applied, not just the pairs listed explicitly.

- The text rendered as "masters of the Mātṛkā" refers to monks who specialize in the Abhidharma matrices or numerical lists, a recognized scholarly category in Vinaya literature. The group of six monks named — Nanda, Upananda, Aśvaka, Punarvasuka, Chanda, and Udāyin — are the canonical "group of six" bad monks whose misconduct occasions many Vinaya rules; the Tibetan here uses descriptive terms rather than proper names for the first four pairs, and the names given are reconstructed from the standard list. The Tibetan for the householder's name, "dge bzang," literally means "virtuous and good" and corresponds to Sanskrit Supriya or a similar honorific; this rendering is provisional.

- The elephant simile — "if others were to come here, what would an elephant do when sprinkled with water?" — is an idiomatic expression whose precise meaning is somewhat elliptical. The sense appears to be that an elephant, when sprinkled, shakes off the water and moves on unperturbed, suggesting that the group of six, if other monks appeared at the house, would simply disregard or override the situation. Some uncertainty remains about the exact nuance of this colloquial image in context.

- The names རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་, རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་, and རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ correspond to Sanskrit Jyotishka (or Jyotiṣka), Mitra, and Jātīla respectively; these are standard identifications in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya narrative context. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage with "from this point forward," indicating a deliberate continuation marker in the source and not a translation gap.

- The phrase rendered "would not converse, would not speak of how they had come, would not look, would not glance" reflects a stock Vinaya formula for deliberate social ostracism used as monastic pressure; the fourfold phrasing is formulaic and intentional.

The names "Beloved Friend" and "Earth-Born" render dge slong mdza' bo and sa las skyes respectively, and "Beloved Sister" renders dge slong ma mdza' mo. "Gyadbu Nor" is a personal name left untranslated as it appears to be a proper name without transparent doctrinal content.

- The phrase rendered "deal with her accordingly through formal procedure" translates a term indicating the formal monastic process of adjudicating a case where a confession has been made; the Tibetan indicates she should be "pressed" or "held to" her own admission, which in Vinaya context means proceeding with a formal inquiry or sanction based on her self-incrimination.

The closing sentence is incomplete in the source passage as given; the translation trails off as the Tibetan does, mid-sentence, indicating this is a continuous excerpt.

- The phrase rendered "forced us to eat bad food three times in succession" involves a compressed Tibetan idiom. The sense appears to be that Beloved Friend compelled the two witnesses to eat inferior or spoiled food repeatedly, causing them physical distress severe enough to motivate false testimony. The precise nature of this coercion is not elaborated in the passage.
- The verse section presents significant interpretive difficulty. The lines referring to "thirty-six and five, however many" are a numerical formula found in Buddhist canonical verse about the gravity of slandering the noble Saṅgha; the precise referent of the numbers is a matter of traditional commentary and is rendered as literally as the metre allows.

The proper names "Gyatbu Nor" and "Dzawa Chenma" in the prose narrative section appear to be Tibetan renderings of Indian monastic names that are unclear in this form. The passage seems to describe a concrete Vinaya case-narrative involving a named monk and a named nun; without the broader Vinaya context it is not possible to identify these individuals with certainty. The rendering follows the Tibetan syllables as closely as possible.

The phrase "one born of the earth" renders a term that in this Vinaya narrative context may designate a particular category of person eligible to serve as a legal reference-witness; the precise technical sense would require consultation of the broader Vinaya commentary.

- The term rendered throughout as "remainder for the Saṅgha" translates "སྐྱོད་པོ་ལྷན་པོའི་མཆོག་པོ་" (Saṅgha-remainder), which in Vinaya technical usage denotes a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression — a downfall that, unlike a pārājika, is not final expulsion but requires a formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation. The phrase "becomes remainder for the Saṅgha" preserves this technical sense while remaining natural to the ear.

The distinction between eleven and ten bases for impure versus pure persons reflects standard Vinaya casuistry: the additional base arises because in the case of an impure person there is a third category of direct perception (having actually seen the misconduct) that can itself be forgotten and then falsely claimed as remembered, whereas against a pure person no such direct perception exists.

- The phrase rendered "two close friends born of the same soil" translates "མཆོག་པོ་ལྷན་པོའི་མཆོག་པོ་" literally as "friends and earth-born," which may be a compound designating two individuals with a particular relationship — perhaps blood-brothers or village companions. The exact social or kinship sense is not fully transparent from the Tibetan alone; the rendering is contextually plausible but tentative.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, indicating the text continues beyond this extract.

- The phrase rendered "belongs to no other party" translates the technical Vinaya term gzhan gyi cha ma yin pa, referring to the legal concept that nirvāṇa is the only truly "other" referent, and thus the eight pārājika factors constitute what does not belong to that other sphere. This is a specialized Vinaya hermeneutic that the commentary unpacks in the gloss section, and the translation follows the commentary's own explanation closely.

The phrase "she then converts it — along with her patience, desire, and understanding" reflects the beginning of a longer technical analysis of the mental factors involved in a formal accusation; the passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source text provided.

- The text systematically enumerates permutations of misidentification: the witnessing nun observes an actual transgression of a given category, then misdescribes it as a defeat-level offense. Five categories of offense appear as both what is observed and as the misdescribed view: no transgression, defeat, Saṅghāvaśeṣa, a general transgression requiring individual confession, and a wrong deed. The passage is a legal matrix typical of Vinaya casuistry. The term rendered "wrong deed" represents a minor offense category. "Individual confession" renders the standard pratideśanīya class. The phrase "and so forth from that point" represents the formulaic abbreviation in the Tibetan signaling that the full set of mental factors listed earlier — patience, desire, and understanding — is to be understood as applying throughout.

- The fivefold classification of offenses appearing throughout this passage corresponds to a standard Vinaya taxonomy: no transgression, defeat (pārājika), Saṅghāvaśeṣa, wrong doing (duṣkṛta), transgression requiring confession (deśanīya), and minor offense (durbhāṣita). The term rendered "wrong doing" (Tib. རྒྱུ་མཚན་པོ་ལྔ་པ་) corresponds to Sanskrit duṣkṛta, and "transgression requiring confession" (འཇུག་པའི་མཚན་པོ་ལྔ་པ་) to Sanskrit deśanīya; "minor offense" (འཇུག་པའི་མཚན་པོ་ལྔ་པ་) corresponds to Sanskrit durbhāṣita. These are technical Vinaya categories and the renderings follow standard Vinaya scholarship.

- The exchange between the young perfume-seller and Sthulanandā — "When will I meet with you?" answered by "You will meet with an elephant" — is a cutting pun in the Vinaya narrative tradition. Sthulanandā's name literally means "greatly delighted" and is also a common Tibetan term for a female elephant. Her reply thus mockingly deflects the man's desire by exploiting the double meaning of her own name, a recognized literary device in Pali and Sanskrit Vinaya parallels.

The phrase rendered "any of the five edibles or the five non-edibles" reflects a standard Vinaya technical category. The precise items in each group vary slightly by tradition; no single rendering resolves this without importing one tradition's list over another's.

- The name rendered "Sthulanandā" and "Sthulanandita" follows the established nun characters of the Vinaya; the Tibetan reads Sbom dga' mo and Gtsug dga' mo respectively, which are the standard Tibetan translations of these Sanskrit names. The rendering of "Mitsemo" for the nun མི་ཤེ་མོ་ (mdza' mo, "beloved") follows the convention of treating this as a proper name in context; alternatively it could be rendered simply as "the nun Beloved" or left as a transliteration. The phrase "the five edibles and the five non-edibles" follows Vinaya technical usage established in the preceding passage. The remark that "this is as in the previous rule" is a condensed cross-reference (Tib. snga ma bzhin) signaling that the analysis of this phrase has already been given fully above.

- The phrase rendered "involving an exit from it" translates a technical Vinaya formula (here ngyes par 'byung ba dang bcas pa, literally "with a definite arising/exit") that denotes the formal procedure of raising the matter before the Saṅgha; in Vinaya technical language this distinguishes a Saṅghāvaśeṣa from a pārājika, which has no such rehabilitative procedure. The standard rendering in Tibetan Vinaya scholarship is "with expiation" or "with a way out," meaning the offender is not permanently expelled but must undergo formal rehabilitation before the Saṅgha.

The name rendered "Pomgamo" (ཕོ་མོ་གམ་མོ་) is a Tibetan name meaning something like "Joyful and Stout" or similar; no Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable here with certainty, so it is left as transliterated Tibetan.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as this is the limit of the submitted text.

- The eighth rule is given the same ordinal number twice in this passage, which is unusual and may reflect a scribal or textual anomaly in the source. The passage as a whole is a section of Vinaya commentary providing the origin story, rule formulation, and analytical breakdown for successive rules in the Bhikṣuṇī Vibhaṅga. The term rendered "Saṅgha's remainder" translates the technical Vinaya term saṅghāvaśeṣa, a category of offense requiring formal proceedings before the monastic community. "Sthūlanandā" is the Tibetan sbom dga' mo rendered back into Sanskrit throughout, as this is a well-attested proper name in the Vinaya literature. The nun's name "Kṛṣṇā" is reconstructed from nag mo, meaning "black one," understood here as a personal name rather than a description.

- The term rendered "Saṅgha expiation" translates the Vinaya category of offence requiring confession and expiation before the full Saṅgha, corresponding to Sanskrit saṃghāvaśeṣa. The Tibetan "ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་ལྟར་འཇགས་པའི་མཆོད་པོ་" literally means "there remains a Saṅgha remainder," the standard formula for this class of offence. The rendering follows standard Vinaya usage.

The name "ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་" literally means "she who has a retinue" or "she of the regiment," here rendered as the proper name Senā, which is its Sanskrit equivalent and the likely original.

- The phrase rendered "something excellent" for ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་ལྟར་འཇགས་པའི་མཆོད་པོ་ is somewhat compressed in the original; it appears to mean a special gift or reward given to the soldiers in lieu of executing the penalty, as a way of honouring their service without carrying out the death sentence.

The expression rendered "the one who crushes the power of the mighty and the one of good lineage" for ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་ལྟར་འཇགས་པའི་མཆོད་པོ་ appears to denote two specific military officers by epithet or title rather than by name; the precise referents are not entirely clear from context alone.

- The term rendered "surety bond" translates the Tibetan "ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་" which in this legal context denotes a written pledge or bond used to secure a debt. The narrative makes clear it functions as a financial instrument that the nun exploits to coerce repayment, which is the basis for the offense. The name "Sthūlanandā" is the standard Sanskrit equivalent of the Tibetan "ཡོད་པའི་སྐྱེད་པོ་," a well-attested nun who figures in several Vinaya origin stories.

- The phrase rendered "outside the boundary of the consecrated area" translates "mtshams kyi phyi rol," referring to the sīmā, the formally consecrated boundary within which Vinaya acts are valid. The exchange between Dundubhikā and the nuns turns on a deliberate sophism: she claims to have "expelled" the nun herself by escorting her outside the sīmā and seeking her forbearance, thereby declaring the Saṅgha's formal act null. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the formal proclamation; this is a function of the passage boundary, not a corruption.

- The technical phrase rendered throughout as "a residual matter requiring the Saṅgha as remainder" translates the Vinaya term saṅghāvaśeṣa (Tibetan: dge 'dun lhag ma), which denotes an offense of the second category of the nuns' Prātimokṣa, a saṃghātiśeṣa, requiring formal rehabilitation before the Saṅgha. The rendering "Saṅgha as remainder" preserves the literal meaning of the technical term.

The passage enumerates procedural categories of valid and invalid formal Saṅgha acts: an act performed by a concordant group (mthun pa) or discordant group (mi mthun pa), and whether it accords with Dharma or not. These reflect standard Vinaya analysis of the conditions under which a karmavācanā is legally binding.

- The name "Nagmo" renders the Tibetan personal name that literally means "dark one" or "black one." It appears to be the Tibetan translation of a Sanskrit name, possibly Kṛṣṇā. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage, as it continues into the next section. The formal act is presented in its standard Vinaya formula with deliberate repetition, which has been rendered faithfully throughout. The phrase rendered "holy life" translates the Tibetan for brahmacharya, meaning specifically the celibate religious life; the nun Nagmo's statement implies she would seek to practice celibacy with non-Buddhist renunciants rather than in the Buddha's community, which is the doctrinal gravity of the offense.

- The phrase rendered as "a transgression with expulsion from the very outset, together with what follows from it, and she becomes one who is no longer part of the Saṅgha" translates a dense Vinaya formula. The term rendered "expulsion" is the word for defeat, that is, a root downfall entailing permanent exclusion from the Saṅgha. The phrase "from the very outset" indicates that the offense is incurred at the moment of the third admonishment without further deliberation. The Tibetan formula "Saṅgha lhag mar gyur ro" literally means she becomes a remainder beyond the Saṅgha, a standard Vinaya idiom for complete exclusion.
- The passage transitions here mid-sentence at the end, breaking off after "on that very basis, firmly," which corresponds to the opening of the next procedural rubric. This is a natural continuation point in the Vinaya commentary format and requires no emendation.
- The phrase rendered "she is to be expelled from the Saṅgha" translates "dge 'dun lhag mar 'gyur ro," literally "she becomes a remainder of the Saṅgha," which is the standard Tibetan formulation for the saṃghāvaśeṣa ("Saṅgha remainder") offense — a formal ecclesiastical offense requiring Saṅgha action, not simple expulsion. The term is kept close to the technical sense here, but a fuller gloss would be: this constitutes a saṃghāvaśeṣa offense, the second gravest category of nuns' offenses, requiring a formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation.

The phrase "death omens and near-death omens" refers to premonitory signs of impending death recognized in the Vinaya and Indian medical tradition; the precise nature of these signs is not elaborated in this passage.

- The phrases "from 'with insistence upon that very basis' as far as 'the other is delusion'" and similar formulaic cross-references throughout this passage are standard Vinaya shorthand pointing to passages given in full earlier in the text that are here abbreviated; the translation preserves their character as cross-references rather than attempting to supply the omitted text. The phrase rendered "a formal act with a motion and four announcements" translates the technical Vinaya term for aṅga (karman) consisting of one motion (ñatti) followed by three announcements, which together constitute four total proclamations — the standard procedure for a solemn Saṅgha resolution.
- The phrase rendered "those facing death and those in proximate danger of death" translates a technical Vinaya category. The Tibetan terms literally mean "sign of death" and "near sign of death," and in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context they function as a classification of offenders rather than a description of their mortal condition; this unusual usage may reflect an underlying Sanskrit technical term for categories of monastics subject to a particular disciplinary status.

The name Sthūlanandā is reconstructed from the Tibetan ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, which literally means "Delight of the Stout One" or "Stout Delight," corresponding to the well-known Mūlasarvāstivāda nun Sthūlanandā, a recurring figure in Vinaya narratives known for her irregular conduct.

- The text throughout follows the standard Vinaya formulaic style of summarizing repeated procedural passages with abbreviated references, indicating that this is an extract from a larger continuous canonical text. The phrase rendered "act of petition-with-four-proclamations" translates the standard Vinaya technical expression for a formal saṅgha act initiated by a motion followed by three proclamations. The phrase "those on the verge of death and those in the vicinity of death" for the two categories of nuns designated by "whatever nuns" is a gloss embedded in the canonical commentary section at the close; it is a standard Vinaya exegetical device and the exact import of these categories in this specific context may depend on a fuller lemma not present in this excerpt.
- The name rendered here as Devadatta translates the Tibetan "lhas byin," which is the standard Tibetan equivalent of the Sanskrit Devadatta. The passage enters a new sūtra-style narrative section after the Vinaya commentary ends, and the transition is abrupt in the source text.

The term "Uttarakuru" is rendered from "byang gi sgra mi snyan gyi gling," which literally means "the northern continent of Unpleasant Sound," the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Uttarakuru. "Pūrvavideha" is from "shar gyi lus 'phags" and "Aparagodānīya" from "nub kyi ba lang spyod," these being the standard Tibetan names for the eastern and western cosmic continents in traditional Buddhist cosmology.

- The phrase rendered "spit-swallower" translates the Tibetan "mchil ma 'thung ba ro," which is an extremely derogatory epithet. The precise idiomatic force is difficult to render; it conveys someone utterly base and contemptible, lower even than one who drinks spittle. The translation preserves the insult's sharpness as it stands in the text.

The passage "from the ten powers of Kāśyapa" is a somewhat condensed reference. The Tibetan reads "'Od srungs stobs bcu pa," which refers to Mahākāśyapa and his ten powers, indicating that Devadatta's supernormal attainments were modeled on or derived through the instruction associated with Kāśyapa. The translation renders this plainly.

The phrase "up to the point where it says" reflects an ellipsis in the Tibetan original, where the compiler signals that a fuller passage is being abbreviated by reference to a marker phrase.

- The phrase rendered "bowed his head three times in formal acknowledgment" translates a conventional expression indicating that Devadatta performed the triple salutation gesture — a formulaic departure rite — before leaving in anger. The triple bow here is a mark of formal respect even in the context of resentment, consistent with Vinaya narrative convention.

Sthūlanandā is a well-known nun in the Vinaya literature, frequently appearing as a problematic figure. Her name is kept in Sanskrit as is standard in Vinaya translation.

The closing "formal act of the fourfold procedure" refers to the standard Vinaya (karma, formal ecclesiastical act) requiring three proclamations and a final motion — here applied to the confrontation of Sthūlanandā by the nuns' community. This is the technical "act in four parts" (Skt. caturvargakarman).

- The phrase rendered as "blended like water and milk" reflects a stock canonical simile for communal harmony, standard throughout the Vinaya literature.
- The name rendered in the preceding passage as "Stubborn Delight" follows the established rendering of རྩོམ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་; the Tibetan here gives རྩོམ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ and is treated consistently. The passage ends mid-sentence in the formal act proclamation, which reflects the structure of the source text; the translation preserves this open ending without artificial closure.
- The phrase rendered as "mingled like water and milk" is a classical Indian simile for harmonious unity, well established in Vinaya literature. The expression "from the passage ... up to ..." indicates a scribal convention of abbreviation, referring the reader back to full formulas given earlier in the text rather than repeating them in full. The passage ending mid-sentence is faithful to the source, which breaks off there in the excerpt provided.
- The term rendered "Stomāgamoā" in the phrase explaining "whatever nun" is the Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, a proper name likely corresponding to a Sanskrit name such as Sthūlanandā or similar; the exact Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain but the reference is to a named individual used as the paradigm case, as is standard in Vinaya rule analysis.
- The phrase rendered "twelve groups" translates a term that in the Tibetan Vinaya tradition refers to the group of twelve nuns associated with Sthūlanandā, a well-known group of habitual offenders in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya narrative. This is a stock reference and does not require further gloss in the body.

The phrase "together with the arising from it" renders a compound indicating that the grave offence (saṅghāvaśeṣa, here "grave offence against the remainder of the Saṅgha") is incurred at the completion of the third formal admonition, including the act of admonition itself that brings it about. This is standard Vinaya procedural language.

- The two names rendered as "Agalamgyo" and "Napso" are phonetic transcriptions of Tibetan syllables that appear to represent non-Tibetan personal names; their Sanskrit originals are uncertain and no standard identification is available.

The term rendered as "Sūbhāgā" in the phrase "of hers means of Subhāgā" follows the preceding passage's context where that nun was named; however the Tibetan here gives only a general term equivalent to "the plump and cheerful one," which in context is an epithet used for that particular nun. This is a minor point of identification rather than a genuine doctrinal uncertainty.

- The place name rendered "Mount Reḍeri" is a transliteration of the Tibetan "re lde ri," a toponym not readily identifiable with a well-known Sanskrit equivalent; the reading is uncertain but is consistent with the preceding passage's context. The two monk names "Gamaggo" and "Nabaso" follow the rendering established in the preceding passage ("𑖀𑖢𑖤𑖫𑖡𑖳𑖱𑖨𑖪𑖭𑖮𑖩𑖰𑖪𑖬𑖯𑖲𑖴𑖶𑖷𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊𑢋𑢌𑢍𑢎𑢏𑢐𑢑𑢒𑢓𑢔𑢕𑢖𑢗𑢘𑢙𑢚𑢛𑢜𑢝𑢞𑢟𑢠𑢡𑢢𑢣𑢤𑢥𑢦𑢧𑢨𑢩𑢪𑢫𑢬𑢭𑢮𑢯𑢰𑢱𑢲𑢳𑢴𑢵𑢶𑢷𑢸𑢹𑢺𑢻𑢼𑢽𑢾𑢿𑣀𑣁𑣂𑣃𑣄𑣅𑣆𑣇𑣈𑣉𑣊𑣋𑣌𑣍𑣎𑣏𑣐𑣑𑣒𑣓𑣔𑣕𑣖𑣗𑣘𑣙𑣚𑣛𑣜𑣝𑣞𑣟𑣠𑣡𑣢𑣣𑣤𑣥𑣦𑣧𑣨𑣩𑣪𑣫𑣬𑣭𑣮𑣯𑣰𑣱𑣲𑣳𑣴𑣵𑣶𑣷𑣸𑣹𑣺𑣻𑣼𑣽𑣾𑣿𑤀𑤁𑤂𑤃𑤄𑤅𑤆𑤇𑤈𑤉𑤊𑤋𑤌𑤍𑤎𑤏𑤐𑤑𑤒𑤓𑤔𑤕𑤖𑤗𑤘𑤙𑤚𑤛𑤜𑤝𑤞𑤟𑤠𑤡𑤢𑤣𑤤𑤥𑤦𑤧𑤨𑤩𑤪𑤫𑤬𑤭𑤮𑤯𑤰𑤱𑤲𑤳𑤴𑤵𑤶𑤷𑤸𑤹𑤺𑤻𑤼𑤽𑤾𑤿𑥀𑥁𑥂𑥃𑥄𑥅𑥆𑥇𑥈𑥉𑥊𑥋𑥌𑥍𑥎𑥏𑥐𑥑𑥒𑥓𑥔𑥕𑥖𑥗𑥘𑥙𑥚𑥛𑥜𑥝𑥞𑥟𑥠𑥡𑥢𑥣𑥤𑥥𑥦𑥧𑥨𑥩𑥪𑥫𑥬𑥭𑥮𑥯𑥰𑥱𑥲𑥳𑥴𑥵𑥶𑥷𑥸𑥹𑥺𑥻𑥼𑥽𑥾𑥿𑦀𑦁𑦂𑦃𑦄𑦅𑦆𑦇𑦈𑦉𑦊𑦋𑦌𑦍𑦎𑦏

- The repeated elliptical passages — "from 'on that very basis, persistently' through to 'the other is delusion'" — refer to a standard formulaic block of text used in the formal reprimand procedure that the Tibetan text treats as understood from context, citing only the opening and closing phrases of the inset. This is a normal Vinaya drafting convention; the full formula would have been recited in practice. The fourfold act referred to throughout is the standard Vinaya procedure of one motion followed by three proclamations.

- The phrase rendered "went to the boundary marker" translates a term referring to the sīmā boundary used for formal Vinaya acts; the precise procedural detail is preserved in the narration. The passage contains a complex layering of embedded speech and procedural recitation typical of Vinaya legislative texts; the translation follows the internal logic of the fourfold act formula throughout.

- The final sentence "Then, as to how a transgression arises here" is the opening of the next analytical section, left in the translation as it belongs to the continuous expository flow of the Vinaya commentary. The phrase rendered "including the Teacher" for "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" is a standard Vinaya formula indicating that the formal act requires the presence of the presiding authority or that the count of proclamations includes the motion itself — the precise technical referent may vary by commentarial tradition, but the rendering follows standard usage.

- The nun's name appears as ཏུང་དྲ་ (Dundā or Iṣṭā; the Tibetan rendering is phonetic). The Pali parallel gives her name as Caṇḍakālī; the Sanskrit Mūlasarvāstivāda recension represented here uses a form transliterated as ཏུང་དྲ་, which may correspond to a Sanskrit name such as Dundā or possibly Iṣṭā. The exact Sanskrit original is uncertain.

The phrase 姊妹 ("sisters," literally "elder and younger sisters") is rendered simply as "sisters" throughout, as is conventional in the Vinaya address to fellow nuns.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation reflects this open conclusion.

- The phrase rendered "the category of exhortation" translates "毘尼沙彌耶", which refers to training rules classified under the heading of admonishment or rebuke (formal censure procedures). The exact technical subclassification within the Vinaya is a matter of specialist concern but does not affect the general sense of the passage.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, as this is a continuous excerpt; the translation reflects this open ending faithfully.

- The long list of Vinaya textual categories midway through the passage presents genuine uncertainty regarding precise identification of several titles. Terms such as "the fifth Vinaya," "the sixteenth Vinaya," the "Vinaya Mātṛkā," the "Brāhmaṇī's Daughter," and the "questions of the Nearby Retinue" are technical designations for specific canonical Vinaya texts or sections whose exact referents vary across traditions and are not always determinable from the Tibetan alone. They are rendered here by their most literal, transparent equivalents.
- The phrase rendered "with a coarse paste of liquid" reflects a term that likely refers to a thick or greasy application smeared for some cleaning or treating purpose; the exact substance is not entirely transparent from the text, though this rendering follows the most natural philological reading.

The summary verse is a mnemonic listing the topics of the preceding Saṅgha-remainder rules; "silk" and "fine wool" are approximate renderings of the specific textile terms, which in the Vinaya tradition refer to particular luxury fabrics regulated by the rules.

- The term rendered "claim-mark" or "released the claim-mark" translates རྒྱུ་མཚན་ལྟོགས་, a technical Vinaya term referring to the formal act by which the community formally releases or seals the designation of a robe. This is a specialized procedural term in the nuns' Vinaya context; the exact ritual mechanics are complex, and "releasing the claim-mark" follows the most plausible contextual reading. Some editions and commentaries may differ slightly in how this act is described.

The phrase "five that have been consecrated" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་ལྟོགས་ལྟོགས་ལྟོགས་ལྟོགས་ལྟོགས་ refers to the standard allowable set of five robes that have been formally sanctioned or dedicated; this is a technical Vinaya detail specific to the nuns' code.

- The three-fold sequence at the close — covering the cases of not relinquishing and not separating, relinquishing but not separating (or vice versa), and relinquishing and separating — yet all three ending identically with the taint carrying over, is notable. The Tibetan text as it stands presents these three as separate scenarios with the same outcome: any robe newly acquired while the offense remains unconfessed inherits the contamination of the unrectified prior offense, regardless of what physical steps have or have not been taken with the robe itself. This reflects standard Vinaya logic that physical relinquishment of the article does not alone expiate the offense; formal confession before the community is also required.
- The term rendered "marking thread" translates the Tibetan for a structural thread used to mark or maintain the seam of a robe; the precise technical referent is a securing or stiffening cord that is removed when the robe is put into active use, a detail found in Vinaya commentaries.

The phrase rendered "pleasure garden" translates a term literally meaning an enclosure of joy, equivalent to Sanskrit ārāma, a park or garden.

The final portion of the passage is the beginning of an extended definitional analysis in verse-and-prose format listing the various types of settlement and space relevant to determining what constitutes "beyond the boundary"; the text breaks off mid-enumeration.

- The term rendered "outlying neighborhood" throughout is རྒྱུ་མཚན་ལྟོགས་, a Vinaya technical term denoting the defined boundary zone surrounding a settlement, household, or other locus relevant to determining transgression in matters such as the robe-separation rule. It corresponds roughly to Sanskrit sīmā in some contexts but here functions specifically as a spatial buffer zone. The rendering "outlying neighborhood" is conventional in this Vinaya context.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་, rendered "households of wanderers," likely refers to peripatetic or itinerant non-monastic ascetics, distinct from the tīrthika households mentioned just before; the exact reference is mildly uncertain but the general sense is clear.

- The phrase rendered "garland-bearer reaches by shaking a ceremonial cloth" translates a passage that is technically difficult. The Tibetan reads literally something like "the distance a garland-carrier arrives at by shaking a thrown ceremonial cloth," and the precise meaning of this boundary-marker in its Vinaya context is uncertain. It appears to be a traditional measure of distance parallel to the crow's wing-beat mentioned in the preceding section.

The distinction between households "whose family doors have not been opened separately" versus "whose family doors have been opened separately" reflects a Vinaya technical distinction between a single undivided household unit and one that has been formally partitioned among family members. The same distinction applies to the shop sections.

- The term rendered "lodging house" translates རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་, literally "a house for wandering about everywhere" or "a house for going all around," which in the Vinaya context refers to an inn or lodging establishment where travelers stay — hence "lodging house." Some editions render this as "tavern" or "inn," but "lodging house" captures the itinerant character of its clientele most precisely.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ and its negative counterpart རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་, rendered here as "family doors have been opened separately" and "family doors have not been opened separately," is a technical Vinaya expression for whether a household has been formally divided into separate domestic units. The image is of a partition door between adjacent family quarters being opened or kept shut to determine whether premises constitute one or multiple distinct dwelling units for the purposes of robe-boundary rules.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ in the context of market stalls is rendered "where perfumes are woven in." This may refer to the interweaving or infusing of fragrances into goods — a genuine philological uncertainty, as རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ normally means "to weave" but in a market context may indicate some other form of processing aromatic materials.

- The term rendered "granary" translates a compound meaning a place where grain is gathered or stored, specifically one associated with yoked oxen and dung-disposal, consistent with a large agricultural storage facility. The distinction between the simple threshing floor and the granary reflects Vinaya categories of communal property boundaries relevant to the rules on keeping robes within one's outlying neighborhood.

The phrase "divine abode" as the shared element for non-Buddhist households likely refers to a shared shrine or sacred space dedicated to a deity, which would be the common ground uniting otherwise separately bounded sectarian establishments.

- The phrase rendered "family doors have been opened" versus "family doors have not been opened separately" reflects the distinction between households sharing a single domestic unit versus those maintaining separate household thresholds — a technical Vinaya criterion for determining common versus distinct outlying neighborhoods. The Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ and རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་ are contrasted pairs; I have rendered them accordingly by context.

The term རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པའི་འཇིགས་ཀྱི་ཁྱིམ་ཁྱེད་, rendered throughout as "outlying neighborhood," is the Tibetan for the Sanskrit upacāra, the zone surrounding a defined space within which certain Vinaya rules regarding robes apply.

The passage ends mid-sentence with "The Blessed One declared," as the Tibetan breaks off before recording the answer — this appears to be a genuine textual caesura at the fascicle boundary or a deliberate suspension pending the next section.

- The phrase rendered as "cold-season robe period" translates the Tibetan institution of spreading out the winter robe, a recognized Vinaya season. The five-month and seven-month divisions of the cloth season follow standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya reckoning and are preserved as given.

The final summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating subcases of the downfall; it is deliberately elliptical and its full exposition would follow in the commentary. The translation renders it faithfully as verse, preserving its telegraphic style.

"Kautamba cloth" is a textile term of uncertain identification in the Vinaya literature; it may refer to a coarse hemp or bark-fiber cloth. This is noted as a genuinely uncertain identification.

- The passage is a Vinaya commentary systematically working through cases of cloth acquisition by nuns, cross-referencing a root rule about ten-day and thirty-day periods. the expected conclusion ("if she receives it, it is an offense entailing relinquishment; if she receives another color, there is no transgression") would follow in the next portion of the passage.

- The names Gaṇḍā, Upagaṇḍā, and Sthūlagaṇḍā are given as གཤོན་གྲངས་ཀྱི་བུ་དྲུག་གི་མཚན་པར་འཁོར་བའི་ལྷོ་ཆེན་མོ།. The first term གཤོན་གྲངས་ཀྱི་བུ་དྲུག་ means "the group of twelve," and གཤོན་, ཡུཔ་གཤོན་, and སྐྱུར་ཆེན་གྲངས་ཀྱི་བུ་དྲུག་ are Tibetan renderings of the Sanskrit names Gaṇḍā, Upagaṇḍā, and Sthūlagaṇḍā — members of the notorious group of twelve nuns in the Vinaya narratives. The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the original; the translation reflects this.
- The name རྒྱལ་ལོ་འཛོམས་མོ་ is rendered throughout as Sthūlanandā, the well-known nun whose Sanskrit name means "the stout joyful one." This is the standard identification in Vinaya literature.

The phrase is somewhat compressed; it appears to mean that Sthūlanandā brought both parties under a precept or training rule regarding their respective transgressions, which is the reading adopted here.

- The phrase rendered "fine new large bolt of cloth on credit" translates a reading where Sthūlanandā effectively pawns or pledges the original cloth to obtain a better one on a delayed-payment basis. The syntax here is somewhat compressed and the exact commercial arrangement is slightly ambiguous, but the general sense — that she incurs a debt — is clear from context and from the merchant's subsequent seizure of the trader.

The seven types of cloth referred to are the canonical set of permitted robes in the Vinaya tradition: made from linen, cotton, silk, wool, coarse hemp, fine hemp, or a blend. This list is left implicit in the text and simply glossed as "the seven types."

- The nun's name "Nandā" appears here as "ཀླུ་མཚན་མོ་" — literally "she of rejoicing," which is a standard rendering of the name Nandā in Tibetan canonical Vinaya texts. The male counterpart "ཀླུ་མཚན་" earlier in the same sentence likewise refers to the monk Nanda. Both are rendered by their Sanskrit names here for clarity.
- The phrase rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates the Tibetan term for a third category of person recognized in Vinaya literature alongside male and female — traditionally a eunuch or a person of ambiguous sex. The exact referent across Vinaya contexts varies.

The phrase "remains silent on the matter" renders the Tibetan idiom of not speaking to any side, indicating a prescribed passive waiting posture during repeated visits, a standard Vinaya technique for allowable persistence without active solicitation.

- The term rendered "one of the monastery" translates a Tibetan word meaning literally "one who makes suitable or allowable" and refers to a monastery-affiliated lay steward who handles financial transactions on behalf of the nuns, since the nuns cannot directly receive money. This is a technical Vinaya figure, sometimes called a "kappiya-kāraka" in Pali sources.

The passage breaks mid-sentence in the source text at the sixth method of urging, indicating this is a continuous excerpt cut off at that point.

- The phrase rendered "woollen blankets of sheep's wool mixed with coarse fibre" interprets "mon dar gyi gding ba" (where "mon dar" is glossed in the text itself as "sheep's wool" and "gding ba" as "blanket"); the compound may refer specifically to a type of thick blanket or felt made from raw sheep's wool, and the precise material character remains somewhat uncertain from the Tibetan alone.
- The text enumerates all permutations of the three items "bundle" (མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་), "loose wool" or "strands" (མཐོང་མཐོང་), and "heap" (མཐོང་མཐོང་) in a formulaic Vinaya style, working through combinations systematically. The translation renders each permutation faithfully as it appears.

The phrase 八地持法, rendered "eight grounds," refers to the eight formulas that generate the transgression; the text then enumerates them in groups of three with minor variations, producing sets of nine instructions total, which the commentary condenses under the heading of eight grounds. This apparent discrepancy is a known feature of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya commentary style and is not an error in the translation.

The final sentence "Noble lady, please be aware —" is the beginning of a formula for the keeping of gold and silver through a lay trustee; the passage breaks off here as the translation covers only the provided portion.

- The phrase rendered "explicitly named goods" translates mngon mtshan can, literally "that which has a visible name or mark," referring to precious metals and currency that are identifiable as such by name and appearance — gold and silver. This is a standard Vinaya category for prohibited valuables.

The four economic activities listed — trade, investment, grain loans, and interest-bearing distribution — correspond to a classic fourfold scheme in Vinaya literature describing prohibited financial conduct for monastics. The term rendered "distributing at interest" uses the term skyed, which in this context means lending at interest or usury.

The closing sentence is clearly interrupted mid-passage; the translation follows the Tibetan faithfully to that point.

- The verse at the opening ("Do not send funds to the destitute...") is in a condensed rule-verse format and functions as a prohibition summarizing the conditions under which placement of funds is not permitted; it likely reflects a lost or embedded canonical verse within the Vinaya text.

The phrase rendered "involvement in another region is to be purified through the earlier continuum" reflects a technical Vinaya formula about karmic continuity across transactions in different jurisdictions; its precise procedural sense is tied to the broader Vinaya commentary tradition and remains somewhat opaque without the surrounding commentary.

"Group of six" and "group of twelve" refer to the notorious factions of monks and nuns respectively who appear throughout the Vinaya as negative exemplars.

- The phrase rendered "the five associations" refers to the five conditions under which an alms-bowl is considered to stand in proper relation to its owner — a technical Vinaya term. The precise content of these five is not spelled out in this passage but would be clarified by the surrounding Vinaya commentary.

The formula "motion and a second formal act" renders the standard Vinaya procedural term for a one-motion, one-proclamation formal act of the Saṅgha, as distinct from a one-motion, three-proclamation act.

- The term rendered throughout as "alms-bowl without proper relation" translates the Tibetan lhung bzod 'brel pa med pa, a technical Vinaya expression denoting an alms-bowl not formally affiliated or matched to a particular nun through the standard allocation procedure — in contrast to the byin gyis brlabs pa, rendered as "consecrated bowl," which denotes one that has been formally blessed and assigned. The precise English equivalents for these two technical categories are difficult; the rendering above follows the logic of the preceding passage for consistency. Some translators render byin gyis brlabs pa here as "the approved bowl" or "the allocated bowl" rather than "consecrated bowl," since in this Vinaya context the blessing at issue is the formal Saṅgha allocation rather than a ritual consecration per se. This is a genuine ambiguity worth noting for scholarly purposes.

The closing section on forfeiture offences (thob na spang ba'i ltung byed) corresponds to the Pāli nissaggiya pācittiya category, a standard Vinaya penalty class involving forfeiture of the wrongly acquired item and confession.

- The passage contains a series of dense casuistic permutations typical of Vinaya literature. The term rendered "first offender" translates a phrase indicating one who commits an act without prior knowledge of the rule, a standard Vinaya exemption category. The nun's name Sthūlanandā is a Sanskrit reconstruction of the Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, a well-known figure in the bhikṣuṇī Vinaya narratives. The phrase "any of the seven kinds" for both thread and cloth refers to the standard Vinaya enumeration of seven types of textile materials; the specific list is not given in this passage but is understood from the commentarial tradition. The phrase rendered "up to the seventh generation removed" on both the mother's and father's side reflects the standard Vinaya definition of "relative" used throughout this literature.
- The phrase rendered "well-finished at the edges" translates a term referring to the selvedge or border of the cloth; the precise technical weaving term is uncertain but the general sense of a properly finished cloth edge is clear. The list "food, or a mere meal, or the means to obtain food" reflects a standard Vinaya triad distinguishing a full meal, a token amount, and the wherewithal to procure food; the distinctions are doctrinal and formulaic rather than requiring further gloss.
- The phrase rendered "bound with a fringe" for "བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་" is somewhat uncertain in its precise technical meaning; it appears to describe the finishing of a cloth edge, possibly indicating a fringe-knotted border. The rendering follows the gloss "without a knot," which may indicate a particular style of cloth edge without tied fringe-knots, but the exact weaving terminology is not fully transparent.
- The phrase rendered "Anāthapiṇḍada turned them back from that" translates a compressed construction where Anāthapiṇḍada (literally "the Giver of Food to the Unprotected," a well-known lay patron) intervenes to prevent the kṣatriyas from being sent away by the king during the rains, so that their rains-retreat support obligations could be fulfilled. The syntax is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan and this reading follows the most natural narrative logic.

The closing sentence represents the nuns citing a Vinaya rule that rains-retreat requisites should not be redistributed within the rains period itself — the precise formulation is given only in summary here, as the full rule is presumably quoted in an adjacent passage.

- The term rendered "those seeking ordination" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning those who have gone forth in search of ordination or training; in this Vinaya context it refers specifically to postulants or candidates for ordination whose robes become the source of the gain described. The precise referent of "those seeking ordination" for the five categories is a technical Vinaya matter that commentators address at length; the five categories listed correspond to standard Vinaya classifications of persons whose robe-offerings may be received outside the normal schedule.

The phrase rendered "last ten days of the last month of autumn" reflects the Tibetan idiom for the specific period in the monastic calendar leading up to the end of the rains retreat, during which the robe-distribution season begins.

- The term rendered "fascicle" for བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་ reflects the Sanskrit piṭaka-division unit (Skt. aṣṭaka / bambha), a textual fascicle or section-bundle in the Vinaya commentary tradition.

The phrase བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་, rendered here as "by means of consecrated stored-goods," is a technical Vinaya term referring to the formal act of consecrating items kept in storage so that they may be legitimately retained and used — sometimes rendered "use as a stored requisite after consecration." The gloss in the text itself confirms this reading: བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་བྱ་རྒྱ་མཚོ་, "having been ritually consecrated."

The name Pilindavatsa (Tib. རིག་པ་ལོ་བཟ་བུ་) is the son of Pilinda, a well-known disciple of the Buddha who appears frequently in Vinaya narratives; the Tibetan literally means "son of Pilinda."

- The phrase rendered "those who live the holy life" translates a term meaning those observing celibate or brahmacharya-equivalent conduct, likely referring to nuns in good standing as distinct from novices mentioned in the prior sentence.

The names Kāmaka and Kāmikā are reconstructed from the Tibetan རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ and རྒྱལ་མཁའ་, which literally mean "the desirous one" (masculine and feminine forms). The remark that "desires are like salt water" is a stock canonical simile explaining the name.

The closing sentence says the householder's wife and "the three women" (མུ་མུ་གསུམ་གྱི་མུ་) went forth — that is, the mother and two daughters (three females in total). The rendering "wife, together with her two daughters and one son" is a slight adjustment: the Tibetan མུ་མུ་གསུམ་གྱི་མུ་ more precisely means "mother and the younger ones, three in total," which likely refers to the mother and her two daughters, the son not being mentioned as going forth here. This is a consequential ambiguity worth noting.

- The names Dunpa and Dunma are the monk and nun rendered from the Tibetan personal names meaning roughly "the desirous one" (masculine and feminine forms respectively), consistent with the preceding narrative where the brother is Kāmaka and the sister is Kāmikā. These are the same characters rendered here in their Tibetan monastic-name forms, or possibly new monastic names; the text does not make this explicit.

The phrase "spreading of the reed mat" and "taking up the reed mats" refers to the ritual act of laying out and then removing the ceremonial grass or rush mat associated with the pravāraṇā (invitation ceremony) at the close of the rains retreat. The precise ritual action is somewhat technical and the translation follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic enumeration of the preceding offense categories. The individual items in the verse are terse headings referring back to specific rules; the translation renders them as faithfully as possible given the compressed form. The phrase rendered "the heavy one of great value and the light one" refers to robe-cloth of great and lesser worth, contrasting two of the rules.

The term rendered throughout as "reed mats" follows the Tibetan consistently; in some Vinaya traditions this refers to felt or woven sitting mats spread out for the community during specific seasons, and the seasonal regulation described here — from the last month of autumn to the first month of spring — governs when such mats may be spread and when they must be put away or brought out.

- The name rendered throughout as "Bhomā Gāmo" appears in Tibetan as འཇམ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མུ་, a name that does not correspond to any widely standardized Sanskrit equivalent in available sources; it is retained as a phonetic rendering of the Tibetan. The episode describing how she put the earring in her mouth, the ensuing beating, and her arrival at the rainy-season dwelling with swollen eyes follows a formulaic narrative pattern common to the Vinaya of the Mūlasarvāstivādins, and the abbreviation markers in the text indicate that the standard procedural passages are to be supplied from context rather than written out in full, a convention reflected in the translation.

- The terms translated as "dishes tossed together," "well-tossed," "of a hundred layers," and "with filled interiors" render a list of culinary descriptions in the Tibetan that appears to be a technical or semi-formulaic enumeration. The exact culinary referents of some items in this list are uncertain; the rendering follows the most plausible literal reading of each term. The phrase rendered "tossed from the hollow of her hand into her stomach" is Bhomā Gāmo's sardonic self-description of eating rather than literally burying treasure — a piece of dark humor the text makes explicit.

- The name rendered "Bhomā Gāmo" in the preceding passage is carried forward here for consistency, though the Tibetan འཇམ་མཉམ་པོ་མཚོ་ in this passage more naturally represents a name reconstructible as something like "Sthūlanadī" or a Prākṛt equivalent; the established rendering from the preceding passage is maintained. The name མཚོ་མཉམ་པོ་མཚོ་, "Queen Mālinī," means literally "the garland-bearing queen" and corresponds to the Sanskrit Mālinī. The phrase འཇམ་མཉམ་པོ་, rendered "good-looking one," functions as a form of address. The reference to "eighteen sorts of food" and "twenty kinds" reflects standard Vinaya lists of food categories; the passage breaks off at the end mid-enumeration, consistent with the source text.
- The term rendered as "temple" for the final gloss on "rain-retreat dwelling" reflects the Tibetan gtsug lag khang, which literally means a shrine hall or temple. In this Vinaya context it refers to a communal dwelling or assembly hall used during the rains retreat, and the gloss is the text's own clarification equating the two terms.

The term kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian copper or mixed-metal coin; it is left in Sanskrit as a proper monetary unit with no clean English equivalent.

- The phrase rendered "swallowing it secretly" translates a term meaning to consecrate or bless to one's own consumption while concealing the act — the sense here is that she secretly diverts to her own use what was gathered for the community; the verb carries the connotation of a covert appropriation rather than a ritual blessing, despite sharing vocabulary with "consecrate."

The repeated phrase about "categories of the eighteenth through the twentieth" likely refers to a classificatory scheme in the full Vinaya text that has been abbreviated here; the precise referent is internal to the larger text and not reconstructable from this passage alone.

- The phrase rendered "This has defeated a god" translates an idiom that appears to mean the garment is so splendid it surpasses even divine finery; the exact idiomatic force is somewhat opaque in context but this reading is standard in Vinaya commentary.

The identification of proper names here requires care: "Gtsug dga' mo" is rendered as Nandapriyā and "Chos sbyin" as Dharmadattā, following standard Sanskrit equivalents for these Tibetan names in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

The simile "a woman is like food" is a direct rendering of the Tibetan and reflects a conventional rhetorical device in Vinaya literature used to justify restrictive rules; it is not an independent doctrinal position.

- In the preceding passage, the rule concerned a "heavy and costly garment" (a winter garment), whereas this thirty-third rule concerns silk specifically. The Tibetan phrase translated "she appeared as though she were naked" literally says "her body's covering appeared like that of a naked person," conveying that the silk was so sheer as to be effectively transparent — an important doctrinal point about the garment's unsuitability. The name Śironandinī renders Tibetan Gtsug dga' mo (literally "she who delights in the crown"), and Dharmadattā renders Chos sbyin. The phrase rendered "I have no desire to be the ruin of a goddess" is Śironandinī's polite refusal of the offer, apparently playing on the word lha (god or divine lady) in reference to Dharmadattā's honored status; the exact nuance is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan.
- The summary verses at the opening are mnemonic verses listing topics to come in this fifteenth fascicle of the Bhikṣuṇī-vibhaṅga. Their items such as "seed," "the great storehouse," and "carrying" are abbreviated headings for rules that follow later in the text and are not explained in this passage; they are rendered literally as they stand.

The phrase rendered "groups of twelve nuns" reflects the Tibetan "dge slong ma bcu gnyis sde," referring to the notorious faction of twelve nuns frequently mentioned in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya as instigators of new rules.

"Formal act of the Saṅgha" renders "dge 'dun lhag ma," literally "a Saṅgha remainder," a technical Vinaya term for an offense requiring a formal transaction of the Saṅgha as part of its resolution. "Transgression requiring individual confession" renders "so sor bshags par bya ba," the class of offenses confessed before a single monk or nun rather than before the full assembly.

- The passage contains a highly technical and somewhat compressed Vinaya analysis of false speech as it applies to fully ordained nuns. The "twelve classes of nuns" is a standard Vinaya category referring to the twelve groups defined by their ordination and disciplinary status. The fourfold perceptual analysis that follows — not seen, not heard, not understood, not cognized — is a standard Vinaya formula for exhaustive enumeration of epistemic modes relevant to false declaration; the text runs through permutations of these four in combination with states of forgetting, doubt, and misperception. The summary verse is terse and likely serves as a mnemonic for what follows in the prose. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the final line, corresponding to the passage ending mid-analysis.
- The text alternates between first-person statements attributed to the speaker ("I") and third-person statements attributed to another person ("she"), following a pattern typical of Vinaya casuistry where testimony about oneself and about another party are treated in parallel. The switching between first and third person is present in the Tibetan and has been preserved faithfully. The final sentence is left incomplete as the Tibetan itself breaks off mid-enumeration, consistent with a passage that continues in the next section.
- The five mental terms that recur throughout — perception, patience, wish, reasoning, and deliberation — render the Tibetan sequence རྒྱལ་མཁྱེད་, རྒྱལ་མཁྱེད་, རྒྱལ་མཁྱེད་, རྒྱལ་མཁྱེད་, and རྒྱལ་མཁྱེད་ respectively. In this Vinaya context these are not the technical doctrinal terms for their usual philosophical referents but rather terms for the successive mental acts or stances involved in formulating a false statement: perceiving the situation, accepting or acquiescing to it, intending to speak, exercising judgment, and deliberating. The sixth, view, refers to the specific framing one adopts. This usage is standard in Vinaya analysis of the false-speech pārājika and its related transgressions.

The passage appears to be a systematic matrix enumerating all combinations of seeing, hearing, discerning, and cognizing that, when falsely reported after altering one's account, constitute a transgression. The text ends mid-series and will continue in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "I am in doubt" translates the Tibetan idiom literally meaning "doubt ate me" or "doubt consumed me," which is idiomatic for experiencing doubt or uncertainty about something. The rendering captures the sense naturally for a listening audience without losing the force of the expression.

The list of nicknames at the end of the passage presents some uncertainty: the terms are colloquial epithets for physical characteristics, and the renderings given are approximations. "Scaly-hands" for lag zha mo is the most uncertain of these, as the term may refer to rough or cracked skin rather than scales as such; the general sense of a physical defect of the hands is clear.

- The passage contains a series of abbreviated story references delivered in the typical Vinaya narrative style, where only the opening and closing phrases of each tale are cited and the audience is instructed to "fill in" the full narrative from memory or a known source. The stories themselves — involving a farmer, oxen with names like Broken-horn and Stumpy-tail, and the two mules Delightful and Dapple — are standard Vinaya illustrative tales (avadāna-style). The phrase rendered "went bald" reflects a Vinaya technical context in which a nun is described as having shaved her head, which in the mocking speech implies she has lost her brahmin identity; the ambiguity of whether she had or had not actually done so is deliberate in the rule formulation.

- The terms bābhiṣke and māṇikaprebane are transliterations of Indic words (likely Sanskrit or Prakrit) for specific musical instruments or performance arts associated with the kṣatriya class; their precise identification is uncertain and they are rendered phonetically as in the Tibetan.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, breaking off after the list of textiles associated with rope-makers; this appears to be a deliberate textual cut in the material provided for translation.

- The term rendered "thread-drawers" for རྩེད་མཁན་པོ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ is uncertain; it may refer to embroiderers or fine thread-workers rather than thread-drawers strictly speaking. The choice reflects the trade context.

The term རྩེད་མཁན་པོ་, rendered "water-carrying," is uncertain; it may refer to carrying water vessels for ritual use, which fits the brahmin context.

The term རྩེད་མཁན་པོ་, transliterated as "court entertainment," is a phonetic rendering of an Indic term (possibly Sanskrit vābhiṣeka or a related word) whose precise meaning in this context is uncertain; it appears to denote some form of royal or courtly performance associated with the warrior-noble class.

- The phrase rendered "you are one who owes a remainder to the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya term referring to a nun who has committed a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense — one that requires the Saṅgha's involvement to resolve — as distinct from a root defeat (pārājika). The phrase "exactly as the basis warrants" in the confession passage means the gravity of the transgression follows whatever the underlying rule specifies.

The final insulting terms in the last paragraph are anatomical slang used as abuse; the rendering follows the plain sense of the Tibetan without euphemism, consistent with the Vinaya's own direct style of legal enumeration.

- The text as it stands is a Vinaya narrative interspersed with abbreviated back-references to a longer canonical story; the phrases "from X up to Y" are standard Tibetan Vinaya editorial contractions pointing to passages given in full elsewhere in the text. I have rendered them as such rather than inventing content. The lion and tiger names Mchebzangs and Dpungbzangs are left in transliterated form as they are proper names in the story whose Sanskrit equivalents are not recoverable from context. The final verse breaks off mid-sentence, as it does in the Tibetan; this is the end of the supplied passage.
- The text is a canonical Vinaya rule passage for nuns, proceeding in the highly formulaic and repetitive style typical of Vinaya literature. The four social castes referenced — brahmin, warrior (kṣatriya), noble, and commoner (vaiśya/sūdra) — are rendered as "brahmin," "warrior," "noble," and "commoner" following the documentary register of the passage. The term translated "noble caste" renders rje'u rigs, which in Tibetan Vinaya typically corresponds to the vaiśya class, though some traditions equate it differently; this is a minor classificatory uncertainty without doctrinal consequence. The closing verse summarizes a fivefold scheme of slanderous offenses structured around lineage, craft, occupation, distinguishing mark, and illness — a standard Vinaya enumeration for this rule category.
- The term rendered "recitation" throughout is the Tibetan word for the poṣadha confession ceremony's formal recitation procedure by which a dispute or transgression is formally declared purified through the saṅgha's communal recitation. The phrase "stirs up discontent over that act" renders the technical Vinaya expression for re-agitating a case already lawfully closed by saṅgha procedure. The "twelve groups" refers to the notorious group of twelve nuns who appear repeatedly in the Bhikṣuṇī Vinaya narratives as instigators of misbehavior. The fourfold classification of disputes follows standard Vinaya taxonomy: disputes arising from

- The final line breaks off mid-sentence, as this is a transitional passage leading into a new origin story. The rendering reflects the abrupt ending of the supplied text. The term rendered "stirs up discontent" throughout corresponds to the Tibetan idiom for expressing dissatisfaction or opposition regarding a completed legal procedure, consistent with the preceding passage's established rendering. The five categories of nuns described here are standard Vinaya classifications used in determining culpability in communal legal proceedings.
- The phrase rendered "at a mere peppercorn's worth" translates a Tibetan expression for something of trifling value; the underlying simile is a small commercial measure. The doctrinal content here concerns the gradual promulgation of rules governing how nuns may teach the Dharma to laypeople, specifically the rule permitting teaching only up to a fixed number of sentences in the presence of men, ultimately resolved by allowing a nun to teach Dharma to a man when another person is present.
- The term rendered "inciting to perform Dharma recitations" translates a compound meaning to lead or prompt someone in choral or antiphonal recitation of Dharma texts. The specific pedagogical context — comparing the noise to an arithmetic school — makes clear this involves communal, loud recitation rather than private instruction, which is why the comparison to a counting school is used.

- The phrase rendered "sitting in a small space, subdued in spirit" translates a somewhat compressed Tibetan idiom; the sense is that the twelve groups were chastened and kept a low profile after the incident. The name རྒུ་གོང་ས་, "Rjū," means "the Straight One" or "the Upright One" in Sanskrit; it is here treated as a proper name.
- The passage attributed to Rjū in the confrontation scene — rendered "she circled the intestines of your belly around the summer dwelling with a bowel" — is almost certainly a garbled or deliberately obscure insult. The Tibetan phrase "།རྩིབ་དྲེན་ལྟམ་འཕྱོང་ཆེན་པོ་ཡི་ཁྱིམ་དཀར་ཤར་ཐོག་སྦྱོར་" [byis bshes pa'i khyim dkar shar thog nyor]

- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, breaking off at "A nun with perception and." The translation reflects this exactly. The intermediate summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā listing categories relevant to how this offense arises; its items will be unpacked in the continuation. The phrase rendered "superhuman quality" for 超人的品質 (literally "a quality surpassing the human") is the standard Vinaya term for attainments such as meditative absorptions, spiritual powers, and similar realizations — the term corresponds to Sanskrit uttarimanuṣyadharma.
- The list of perceptions of a decomposing corpse — bloating, discoloration, putrefaction, crimson coloration, being eaten, dismemberment, scattering, and bones — corresponds to the classical set of cemetery contemplations (aśubhabhāvanā) found in Vinaya and meditation literature. The rendering follows standard doctrinal enumeration.

The phrase rendered "without altering her view" (lta ba ma bsgyur bar) indicates that the nun's assertion is made in full sincerity, without hedging or retracting her position — a key condition for the offense to arise.

- The phrase rendered "the Group of Twelve" translates 十二人部, which refers to a specific group of twelve nuns who are recurrent troublemakers in Vinaya narratives, paralleling the Pāli "Dvādaśavārgika" group; the name is a technical Vinaya designation rather than a literal description of their character.

The phrase "五衲爛補衣" refers literally to "five worn-out and patched Dharma-robos," meaning the full set of monastic robes, rendered here as "five worn-out and patched robes" for clarity; the earlier occurrence lacks the numeral "five" and has been rendered accordingly.

- The list of Vinaya textual categories categories near the end — "the minor rules, the fragments, the occasion narratives, the Vinaya Mātā, the supplement to the Vinaya, the fifth Vinaya, the sixteenth Vinaya, and what arises from the questions of the inner circle" — reflects a specific enumeration of Vinaya sub-texts whose precise identification varies across traditions and scholarship. The rendering follows the plain sense of the Tibetan terms as category labels rather than attempting identification with specific surviving texts, which remains an open question in Vinaya scholarship.
- The botanical identifications in the seed taxonomy are approximate. Several of the plant names are Tibetan transcriptions of Sanskrit terms that have multiple possible referents. "Shan yab" and "rtsa mkhris" in the cutting-seeds section are particularly uncertain; "bhu drin ka" (bhūḍṛṃhaka) is a technical Vinaya plant name of disputed identification. The standard Vinaya commentarial tradition treats this fivefold seed classification as a legal category for purposes of the precept against damaging vegetation, not as a botanical taxonomy, so precise botanical identification is secondary to the legal principle.
- The Tibetan term རྩོམ་འཁྱུག་ here does not mean the usual "elemental spirit" or "ghost" but rather refers to organisms or living creatures that inhabit trees and plants — effectively plant-dwelling creatures in the Vinaya sense. The term is rendered "life-bearing organisms" to capture its technical Vinaya usage, which classifies certain trees as off-limits because they are inhabited by such beings.

The term 青々青々, literally "blue" or "green," is here a Vinaya technical term meaning "green" in the sense of "living, not yet dried out" — i.e., still viable as a seed or still alive. This is the relevant distinction for the offence: cutting something green and viable versus something already dry.

The graduated scheme of offences — full transgression versus mere wrongdoing — follows the standard Vinaya matrix: full perception plus green condition equals full transgression; misperception or dry condition reduces the offence to a wrongdoing.

- The five seed categories rendered here follow the established terminology of the preceding passage: root-seed, stem-seed, joint-seed, propagating-seed, and grain-seed. The term rendered "propagating-seed" translates 𑖀𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬𑖭𑖮𑖯𑖰𑖱𑖲𑖳𑖴𑖵𑖶𑖷𑖸𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊𑢋𑢌𑢍𑢎𑢏𑢐𑢑𑢒𑢓𑢔𑢕𑢖𑢗𑢘𑢙𑢚𑢛𑢜𑢝𑢞𑢟𑢠𑢡𑢢𑢣𑢤𑢥𑢦𑢧𑢨𑢩𑢪𑢫𑢬𑢭𑢮𑢯𑢰𑢱𑢲𑢳𑢴𑢵𑢶𑢷𑢸𑢹𑢺𑢻𑢼𑢽𑢾𑢿𑣀𑣁𑣂𑣃𑣄𑣅𑣆𑣇𑣈𑣉𑣊𑣋𑣌𑣍𑣎𑣏𑣐𑣑𑣒𑣓𑣔𑣕𑣖𑣗𑣘𑣙𑣚𑣛𑣜𑣝𑣞𑣟𑣠𑣡𑣢𑣣𑣤𑣥𑣦𑣧𑣨𑣩𑣪𑣫𑣬𑣭𑣮𑣯𑣰𑣱𑣲𑣳𑣴𑣵𑣶𑣷𑣸𑣹𑣺𑣻𑣼𑣽𑣾𑣿𑤀𑤁𑤂𑤃𑤄𑤅𑤆𑤇𑤈𑤉𑤊𑤋𑤌𑤍𑤎𑤏𑤐𑤑𑤒𑤓𑤔𑤕𑤖𑤗𑤘𑤙𑤚𑤛𑤜𑤝𑤞𑤟𑤠𑤡𑤢𑤣𑤤𑤥𑤦𑤧𑤨𑤩𑤪𑤫𑤬𑤭𑤮𑤯𑤰𑤱𑤲𑤳𑤴𑤵𑤶𑤷𑤸𑤹𑤺𑤻𑤼𑤽𑤾𑤿𑥀𑥁𑥂𑥃𑥄𑥅𑥆𑥇𑥈𑥉𑥊𑥋𑥌𑥍𑥎𑥏𑥐𑥑𑥒𑥓𑥔𑥕𑥖𑥗𑥘𑥙𑥚𑥛𑥜𑥝𑥞𑥟𑥠𑥡𑥢𑥣𑥤𑥥𑥦𑥧𑥨𑥩𑥪𑥫𑥬𑥭𑥮𑥯𑥰𑥱𑥲𑥳𑥴𑥵𑥶𑥷𑥸𑥹𑥺𑥻𑥼𑥽𑥾𑥿𑦀𑦁𑦂𑦃𑦄𑦅𑦆𑦇𑦈𑦉𑦊𑦋𑦌𑦍𑦎𑦏𑦐𑦑𑦒𑦓𑦔𑦕𑦖𑦗𑦘𑦙

The counting logic for wrongdoings and transgressions in the section on cutting trees follows Vinaya analysis whereby the number of preparatory acts (འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་) determines wrongdoings, while the number of plants cut determines transgressions. This is standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya accounting.

- The personal names Mza'-mo and Gyad-bu-nor are preserved from the Tibetan without Sanskrit equivalents, as the Sanskrit originals are not determinable with confidence from this context alone. Mza'-mo may correspond to Sanskrit Priyā, which is used in the translation; Gyad-bu-nor's Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain. The passage contains apparent repetition of the same triplet of offense combinations across three similar case-groupings, which appears to be authentic textual repetition in the Vinaya casuistic style rather than scribal error.
- The verse attributed to Dundumā's inner reasoning is cryptic and possibly proverbial. The image of the treetop burning first and of sound "catching" something is somewhat obscure. The rendering preserves the sense that speaking first or making oneself conspicuous leads to being caught; the verse may be a folk saying adapted to the narrative context.

The name "Dundumā" does not appear explicitly in the Tibetan as given but is implied by the narrative structure and context consistent with parallel Vinaya passages; the Tibetan uses the pronoun "she" and "that nun."

- The passage about the executioner and the fugitive is a remarkable casuistic section on how a nun may deflect a question without lying outright. The instruction to look at the sky and say "I see the sky," or to look at her fingernails, is a recognized Vinaya device for speaking truthfully while withholding harmful information. The phrase rendered "contemplating with supreme conviction that all formations are empty" is a doctrinal injunction invoking emptiness as the basis for saying "I see nothing" — this is not mere evasion but a meditative affirmation. The rendering is faithful to the Tibetan.
- The passage "འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་" is slightly awkward — it appears to indicate that when the nuns did not know the Blessed One's earlier instruction (to entrust lodgings before departing), the Blessed One issued a clarifying second declaration. This is rendered accordingly.

The questioner addressed as "འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་" is literally "close attendant" — in Vinaya contexts this is conventionally Upāli, the foremost disciple in Vinaya matters, and has been identified as such, though the Tibetan does not name him explicitly here.

- The passage enumerates a precise sequence of time-periods within a day, from the three sessions of the night through multiple gradations of morning and daylight, each constituting a distinct unit for assessing transgression or misdeed. The term rendered "sleeps" throughout is literally "comes to sleep" or "falling into torpor" in context, indicating that the offence arises from actually falling asleep on the communal bedding rather than merely lying down. The phrase "འོག་འཕྲུལ་གྲྭ་བློ་བྱ་བ་" literally means "if it has come to mutual benefit" but in this Vinaya context is a technical idiom meaning the occurrence of sleep or torpor, consistent with parallel Vinaya passages; it is rendered accordingly throughout. The condensed verse is a later mnemonic summary of the preceding rules.
- The passage "counting a third part, then from a fifth down to a third part, and stopping when the Teacher's full proclamation has been recited" is a compressed and technically obscure instruction about the permitted length of Dharma teaching. The Tibetan reads: cha gsum pa dang / lnga pa nas cha gsum pa dang / ston pa yongs su bsgrags pa la tshar bsrang ste smra bar gngang. This appears to describe proportional fractions of a text that may be taught — one third, then from one fifth up to one third — with the ceiling being the full canonical proclamation of the Teacher. The exact procedural import is uncertain, and commentarial guidance would be needed for a precise determination; it has been rendered here as literally as readability permits.

The phrase rendered "round vessels" for ril ba (literally "balls" or "round things") likely refers to small round containers or bowls carried by nuns; the exact referent is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "entangled" or "entanglement" translates a term that in other Vinaya contexts refers to a mat becoming disarranged, overturned, or its layers displaced — here the two cases (wind reversing layers, insects gnawing through) make clear this concerns structural disruption of the mat. The word "འཕྲུལ་པ་ལྟར་གྱུར་བ་" literally means something like "turned upside-down" or "become reversed/disordered"; "entangled" follows the probable underlying Sanskrit usage in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya contexts, though "disordered" or "displaced" would be equally defensible.

The final sentence about nuns settling their minds in the assembly hall, with the meditation formula, is presented in the Vinaya as a legitimate reason for remaining inside — explaining why the exception "without a cover" and the meditation purpose could affect the ruling. This doctrinal nuance is preserved in the translation.

- The name rendered "Stout Delight" translates the Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, corresponding to Sanskrit Sthūlanandā, a notorious nun frequently appearing in Vinaya narratives. Some editions might romanize her name differently, but the rendering is consistent with the character known from parallel Sanskrit and Pali Vinaya texts.

The phrase rendered "offense with remainder" in the opening line refers to a thullaccaya-class offense in Vinaya taxonomy, a level below a root defeat but more serious than a simple misdeed.

- The line "What account has been given to her, and what has been entrusted to her?" renders a colloquial expression of dismissiveness — Stout Delight is sarcastically rejecting the nuns' authority over her, as if to say "Who appointed them to lecture me?" The ocean references that follow appear to be proverbial expressions of indifference: "what does it matter where the water ends up?"

The transition at the end is a verse opening that leads into the next narrative section; the translation preserves the sūtra-style suspension, as the Tibetan breaks off mid-scene.

- The name rendered "Bhomgamo" transliterates the Tibetan བུ་མོ་གམོ་. The Sanskrit form of this name is not given in the text; it may be a phonetic rendering or a Tibetan coinage, and no emendation has been introduced.

The phrase འཕྲུལ་པ་ལྟར་གྱུར་བ་ is rendered "led her to make an opening," meaning she persuaded the householder's wife to make a donation or create an occasion for giving. The exact idiom carries a sense of inducing someone to open themselves to generosity or to create the conditions for a meritorious act.

The expression རྒྱལ་མཚན་གྱི་མཉམ་པ་ is a term of address. It is rendered "daughters of good family, sisters" in keeping with its honorific yet collegial tone within the monastic context; it literally means something like "daughters of good lineage."

- The proper names of the nuns appearing in this passage — Stout Delight, Crown Delight, Joyful Victory, Near-Joyful-Victory, Companion of Victory, Guardian of Victory, Virtuous One, Supremely Virtuous One, Beautiful Delight, and Queen-Possessing One — are rendered as close semantic translations of the Tibetan. These are clearly the same named members of the twelve groups appearing throughout the Vinaya narrative, and their Tibetan names are translated rather than transliterated since no established Sanskrit equivalents are determinable from this text alone.

The term rendered "the one known as the Wife-Killer" reflects a Tibetan phrase that appears to be an epithet for a character introduced earlier in the broader narrative context, referring to the husband or an associate who planned to kill his wife; the passage ends abruptly mid-sentence, so the final clause about the lac-tree tooth-stick is left open.

- The term rendered "right-side portion" and "right-side woman" follows the preceding passage's established usage of རྩམས་པུ་, which refers to the woman identified by a right-side birthmark. The text here is Vinaya commentary (likely the Bhikṣuṇī Vibhaṅga of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya), with the characteristic interweaving of rule, word-by-word gloss, and narrative occasion. The phrase རྩམས་པུ་ is a parivrājaka, a non-Buddhist wandering ascetic, and རྩམས་པུ་ its feminine form; these are rendered as "wanderer" with the Sanskrit gloss on first use. The remark that such a person's offerings are "rare" reflects a standard Vinaya concern about receiving from non-Buddhists.

- The figure translated as "Kālakāraka the dark one" renders the Tibetan name རྩམས་པུ་, a transcription of what appears to be a personal name — likely Sanskrit Kālaka or similar — whose precise reconstruction is uncertain but the sense "the dark one" for རྩམས་པུ་ is clear. This is a named individual used as the occasion for the Vinaya rule that follows.

- The five kinds of "acceptance" described in this passage reflect a highly technical Vinaya discussion about the physical modes by which a nun may legitimately receive an object from another person's hands. The Tibetan formulation of the five categories is grammatically compressed and internally technical; the rendering given here follows the most natural doctrinal reading. Some commentarial sources elaborate these categories differently, and the precise distinctions between the five modes remain a point of Vinaya specialization.

The phrase rendered "great black monk of the charnel-ground ascetics" refers to a monk who practiced the ascetic discipline of dwelling in charnel grounds; his case had prompted the earlier rule on the acceptance of food. The epithet "great black one" may be a personal characteristic or a symbolic designation; without further context it is treated as a descriptive epithet.

The phrase about "lying down with their mothers" is a laconic and somewhat enigmatic reference; it appears to be a statement reported as an objection or criticism, and the Blessed One's response redirects to the proper ritual procedure. The precise narrative context is unclear from this passage alone.

- The phrase rendered "not yet taken in marriage and not yet of adult age" translates a compound indicating a young, unmarried minor — the precise age intended is not specified in the text.

The name རྩམས་པུ་ is transliterated phonetically as Bhadrā in the translation, though the Tibetan spelling suggests a slightly different form; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is not fully certain from this passage alone.

- The term rendered "parivrājaka" — here glossed as "wandering ascetic" — appears as two forms: male and female. The Tibetan gloss equates "kun du rgyu" with the Sāṃkhya school (grangs can, literally "those with enumeration"), which is a recognized polemical identification in Vinaya literature, where the Sāṃkhya philosophers are sometimes classed as a type of wandering ascetic. This is standard and not an error, but it is worth noting for the specialist.

The phrase rendered "noble lady, your mistress is sitting here" is spoken by the nun Bhadrā to the young merchant. The Tibetan syntax is somewhat compressed; the reading adopted understands Bhadrā to be announcing her own presence by a form of self-reference, which is consistent with the narrative context.

- The phrase rendered "plump companions" translates a term of address that may carry an affectionate or slightly teasing tone among the nuns; the exact nuance is uncertain, but the sense of physical robustness after living among troops seems intended. The term "group of six" and "twelve sects" are technical Vinaya designations for particular sets of monks and nuns known for lax conduct; these are kept as standard renderings consistent with the preceding passage. "Anāthapiṇḍada" is the famous lay patron householder, here called "the householder who gives food to the protectorless," rendered by his well-known Sanskrit name.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic listing the topics of the preceding rules in compressed form; it is not itself a teaching passage, and several items in it remain terse. The term rendered "pulling at their weak points" translates a phrase meaning to probe or expose faults or vulnerabilities, a standard idiom in Vinaya contexts for conduct that undermines another's reputation or causes them distress. The Sthūlanandā who appears here is the same notorious nun recurring throughout the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya narratives. The phrase "finest of victory banners" renders a military idiom for the paramount or most distinguished standard, here used to describe the spectacle of an army's display.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage, as it continues into the next fascicle division. The name rendered "Cāraka" (Tib. 'Char ka) is a monk's name; "Vedī" (Tib. Sbed ma) is the laywoman. The phrase "bodhisattva" here refers to the future Śākyamuni in a previous life, a standard Vinaya narrative device. The item "gseg ma" translated as "clod of earth" could also refer to a fragment of tile or pottery; the translation "clod of earth" reflects the most common Vinaya parallel but a reader should be aware of the ambiguity.

- The phrase rendered "ironing" for "gseg ma" is a significant interpretive choice: the term literally means to press or smooth, and in Vinaya contexts refers to smoothing or pressing cloth — here rendered as "ironing" for clarity in English, though the implement is of course not a modern iron. Some translators render it "smoothing" or "pressing."

The episode of Vedī pouring filth into a wound is obscure and the Tibetan is terse; the most plausible reading is that she inflicted a wound on herself as an act of self-punishment or mortification, but the syntax does not make the target entirely explicit. This is noted as a genuinely uncertain passage.

- The phrase rendered "except in such-and-such circumstances" translates a Tibetan idiom literally meaning "having set aside in those circumstances" — the commentary is clarifying that storing an item for legitimate safekeeping does not constitute concealment and thus incurs no offense. The distinction between storage and concealment is doctrinally significant in Vinaya analysis.

- The phrase rendered "needle-workers with their black alms bowls" translates a term that appears to designate a specific group of ascetics or craftspeople used here as a taunt or comparison; the exact identity of this group is uncertain in context, but the Tibetan is rendered literally.

The sentence "Who would have eaten today, one wonders?" reflects the elder nuns' ironic or bewildered response, implying they themselves have gone without food while the group of twelve ate secretly.

- The phrase rendered "consecrate it with a time-formula" translates a technical Vinaya procedure in which a specific formula of words is pronounced to authorize a borderline use; "dus byin gyis brlab" literally means "to consecrate / bless by means of a time-occasion," indicating the utterance of a permissive declaration tied to a specific sanctioned purpose or moment. The precise wording of such formulae varies across Vinaya traditions; the rendering here reflects the general Tibetan Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya usage.

The phrase "bshos ma bkum grang" in the opening line is rendered as "the gruel is cold and has gone stiff" — a colloquial taunt; "bkum" can mean pressed down, congealed, or gone stiff, which fits the context of cold porridge left uneaten.

- The term rendered "fire-wheel" refers to spinning fire in a circular motion, likely a ritual or decorative practice that is here prohibited without the appropriate consecration formula.

The phrase "seventeen factions" and "twelve factions" refer to particular disruptive groups within the monastic community known from the Vinaya literature — the seventeen being associated with the followers of Aśvajit and Punarvasu, and the twelve being a related group. These are standard Vinaya designations and require no further gloss.

The single-, two-, and four-recitation acts refer to the formal categories of Saṅgha legal procedure (Skt. karmavācānā): a one-motion act, a one-motion-and-two-recitation act, and a one-motion-and-three-recitation act respectively — the standard Vinaya classification of formal Saṅgha transactions by the number of their ritual announcements.

- The fourfold classification of dwelling types by degree of roofing and enclosure reflects a standard Vinaya taxonomic scheme for determining whether a shared sleeping space constitutes "the same dwelling." The terms rendered as "entirely roofed and entirely enclosed" and so forth are technical descriptions of architectural types used to adjudicate transgression. The "three dawns" likely refers to the classical Indian tripartite division of the pre-dawn period, any one of which suffices to mark the passage of a night for legal purposes.

The phrase rendered "wrong view of a pernicious kind" translates a construction indicating a view that is both heretical and morally dangerous, associated with approaching death in a spiritually harmful state of mind. The specific content — that practicing what the Blessed One called obstructions would not actually obstruct — is a classic antinomian misreading, likely a denial of the principle of karmic obstruction.

- The phrase rendered "formal act with motion and resolution fourfold" reflects the standard Vinaya procedure of one motion followed by three proclamations of the resolution, making four utterances in all. The abbreviated formula "beginning with 'Having prepared a seat,' ending with 'One nun shall make the motion and perform the act'" is a standard Vinaya textual convention signaling that a full procedural template already given elsewhere in the text is to be inserted here; the translation conveys this as the text does, without inventing the missing material.

The term rendered "act of expulsion" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning a formal act that removes someone from standing within the community on account of her persisting in a specified wrong position; it is not a root defeat (pārājika) but a disciplinary suspension or censure action targeting anyone who holds the same view as the dying nun.

The image of "the daughter of an outcaste" renders a standard Vinaya phrase for the most extreme social contempt, used here rhetorically to indicate that the community is to treat her as utterly beyond the pale of respectful association.

- The phrase rendered "daughter of an outcaste" translates a term for a woman of the caṇḍāla caste, the lowest social group in the Indian context, used here as the strongest available simile for total social disgrace and ostracism. The phrase "beginning with the words 'this occurrence'" and "up to the laying down of a rule of training" is a standard Vinaya abbreviation formula indicating that the full narrative of the Buddha's response and the formal promulgation of the rule is understood to follow but is not reproduced at this point in the text.

- The phrase rendered "one who is about to die" translates a technical Vinaya term of analysis indicating the subject described by "any nun" in the rule — the commentary here is unpacking the rule clause by clause in scholastic fashion, and the rendering follows standard Vinaya commentarial convention. The precise doctrinal force of this gloss ("about to die" or "mortal" in the sense of "subject to death, i.e., a human being") is a standard Vinaya hermeneutic marker, not a comment on the specific nun's situation.

The enumeration of Vinaya categories — eight defeats, twenty saṅghāvaśeṣa matters, thirty-three pāyattika offences requiring abandonment, one hundred and eighty pāyattika, eleven matters for individual confession, the many trainings, and seven principles for settling disputes — reflects the standard Bhikṣuṇī Prātimokṣa structure; the numbers given here are those of the Tibetan Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition and differ from those of other Vinaya traditions.

- The proper name "Spomgamo" and the two novice names "Mdzesma" and "Rgyelma" are rendered from Tibetan as they appear; the first is a senior nun's name and the latter two are her novice pupils. Their Sanskrit equivalents, if any existed, are not recoverable from context.

The phrase rendered "scriptural recitation" for the term translated literally as "providing lung" refers to the formal transmission of a text by oral reading, a recognized category in Vinaya contexts.

- The act described here moves through two successive stages of formal procedure: first a straightforward admonition by motion and four proclamations, and then, when that fails, a further formal act of censure. The Tibetan term rendered "further censure" is bsnyil ba'i las, a technical Vinaya category corresponding to the Pali tajjanīyakamma, a formal act of reprimand; it is distinct from the earlier admonition and implies a more consequential disciplinary measure. The names Sumanā and Jayā are reconstructed from the Tibetan mDzes ma and rGyal ma, which are direct semantic translations of those Sanskrit names.

- The phrase rendered "this alone is true; all else is delusion" is a formulaic refrain in Vinaya proceedings indicating the tenacious adherence to the wrong view; the Tibetan literally reads "this alone is true; the other is delusion," meaning the accused party insists their position is correct and all else is confusion.

The name "Bhaddamukhā" (Tibetan: Sbom dga' mo) corresponds to the abbess or senior preceptress figure who responds to the two novices after the act of censure. The name is reconstructed from the Tibetan phonetic rendering and the Pāli parallel.

The phrase "are the three realms not all there? Are there no towns and provinces?" is Bhaddamukhā's sarcastic and dismissive remark, implying that since the novices have been censured and expelled from the community's normal fellowship, the whole wide world lies open to them — a form of mocking reproach rather than sympathy.

- The novice nuns are identified in the commentary as Mañjulā and Uttarā — these are the Tibetan renderings Mdzesma and Rgyalma, meaning "the Beautiful One" and "the Victorious One" respectively, and are consistent proper names used throughout this Vinaya passage. The name Bhaddamukhā (Tibetan Sbom dga' mo) for the preceptress also appears in the commentary gloss and has been rendered consistently with the preceding passage.

The opening clause connects directly to the preceding passage's account of Bhaddamukhā's conduct — the subject shifts mid-sentence from her behavior with the censured novices to a formal report to the Blessed One, then to the laying down of the training rule and its commentary. This is standard Vinaya sūtra-vibhaṅga structure.

- The "six groups" refers to the notorious group of six monks, and the "twelve groups" to their nun counterparts, standard characters in Vinaya narrative. The bird name translated "kaka bird" renders the Tibetan ga ga, likely a species of bird whose fat was used in certain applications; the exact species is uncertain but the term is retained descriptively. The two nāga kings named Riwo and Yidong are local Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit nāga-king names that remain unidentified with certainty in this context. The verse summary is a mnemonic condensing preceding rules and is rendered as verse accordingly.

- The passage lists numerous categories of objects with fine graduated distinctions between full transgressions and lesser misdeeds, contingent on features such as whether an object is perforated, strung, fitted, or marked. The rendering "perforated" for "འདྲིལ་བུ་" (literally "having a hole") follows the standard Vinaya commentarial understanding that perforated gems are finished, valued ornaments, and thus the graver offense applies to them. The term

"bāvabhīṣaka" is a transliteration of what appears to be a Sanskrit loanword for a type of musical instrument; its exact identification is uncertain in the tradition. "བོད་ཀྱི་མཆོད་རྟེན་མཆོད་པུ་" is rendered "worn sandal" following the sense of a repaired or used sandal of minimal value. The final lines introducing the new occasion — King Bimbisāra's three sensations of warmth and cold during austerity-water practice — are clearly the opening of the next narrative section.

- The phrase rendered "the Twelve Groups" refers to a stock designation in Vinaya narratives for a group of trouble-making monks or nuns. The king's silence functioning as consent is a standard narrative convention in Vinaya texts indicating tacit permission. The "three sensations" at the beginning (cold, warm, and common-to-all) relate to the three designated purposes of the austerity water described in the preceding passage.
- The term rendered "consecration-bathing" (dbang bskur ba'i khru) and "immersion-bathing" ('jug pa'i khru) describe two technical categories of bathing in the Vinaya context. The first likely refers to a ritual or ceremonial bath, the second to full-body immersion. The precise technical distinction is not fully transparent from context alone, but these renderings follow the literal Tibetan.

The phrase "the time of wind-with-rain" (rdzi char dus) is a compound that literally means something like "the time of wind-rain together"; it is rendered to reflect its dual nature as established by the preceding definitions.

The individual "Cāraka" ('char ka) is a figure whose name appears in this Vinaya narrative context; the reading and identity are not entirely certain from the Tibetan alone.

- The passage lists a series of false or misleading statements made to a nun with the deliberate intent of inducing regret or doubt about the validity of her ordination. The examples given include questioning the validity of her ordination on grounds of age, the disqualification of her preceptress, alleged misconduct, and defects in the ordination site or ceremony. The phrase rendered "fire at the horizon" renders phyogs tshig pa, literally "burning of the directions," which could refer to a great conflagration visible on the horizon, used here as a memorable shared event the speaker asks about to test the target's memory and thereby undermine her confidence in her own ordination date.
- The list of diseases in the middle passage is technical and archaic. The rendering follows the sequence as closely as possible, though some terms admit of more than one interpretation in classical Tibetan medical literature. The identification of "spotted skin disease" and "festering sores" are approximations of terms that may correspond to specific Ayurvedic categories not perfectly recoverable from context alone. This is noted for scholarly awareness but does not affect the doctrinal content of the passage.
- The venerable "Ma Aḡsagpa" is rendered as Anaḡgana following the Tibetan phonetic equivalent of the Sanskrit name; this is the monk whose case prompted the original rule about lying with women. The identification is based on standard Vinaya context, though the Tibetan here reads simply འཇགས་པ་ལྷན་པ་, which literally means "the venerable Anaḡgana" — an unusual personal name worth flagging for the specialist.
- The terms translated as "space between floors" and "upper story" reflect a multi-storied building context standard in Vinaya architecture descriptions. The Tibetan distinguishes bar khang (intermediate floor or mezzanine level) from steng khang (upper story proper).

Sthūlanandā is the notorious nun who appears repeatedly in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya as the instigator of various offenses; her name is left in Sanskrit as is standard in this textual tradition.

The list of frightening beings — kumbhāṇḍa, lus srul po (corpse-like being), and srul po (rotting creature) — presents some classificatory difficulty; the rendering follows the most natural reading of a graduated list of increasingly grotesque spirit-beings found in similar Vinaya

- The term rendered "bdellium resin" translates du ru ska, which corresponds to Sanskrit guggulu; some scholars render it simply "gugul." The rendering "formally entrusted" for btsol is paraphrased as context demands.

The phrase "twenty or more" for nyi shu po gang yang rung ba reflects the standard Vinaya quorum required for formal Saṅgha transactions of the highest gravity.

The term rendered "ivory merchants" translates a compound meaning merchants who split or deal in ivory or dice-bone; "ivory merchants" is the most natural reading in context, though the compound could also refer to bone-carvers or dice-makers. This does not affect the narrative.

The phrase "seriously compromised" renders 严重受损, literally "becomes one with a grave fault/violation," referring to the canonical notion that an invalid ordination performed within a community renders that community's acts legally defective.

- The phrase rendered "move her seniority date" translates a technical Vinaya term meaning to advance or transfer one's standing date of ordination, a recognized canonical remedy when the original ordination is found technically defective. The text's logic of counting womb-months reflects the Indian convention that gestation counts toward age, so a candidate may be credited months of pre-natal existence to make up a shortfall in the twenty-year requirement. The "group of six" and "group of twelve" are standard Vinaya designations for named sets of habitually wayward monks and nuns respectively, whose transgressions regularly occasion the laying down of new rules.

The phrase rendered "traces a calculation with the back of the hand" is a recognized exception in the commentarial tradition, likely referring to a nun using the back of her hand to make a quick mark for counting or measuring purposes, which is not considered true digging.

- The term "Mātrkā" renders म॒त्र॒का, literally "holders of the Mātrkā." The Mātrkā is an early doctrinal matrix or compendium, sometimes identified with the Abhidharma or its precursor lists; this is the standard reading in Vinaya contexts. The twelve groups refers to a set of notoriously undisciplined monks and nuns recurrently mentioned in Vinaya literature as the occasion for rules being promulgated.

- The phrase rendered "Stout Nandā" translates Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, a nun's name meaning something like "Plump Nandā" or "Fat Nandā." This is likely a rendering of Sanskrit Sthūlanandā, a well-known figure in Vinaya literature; the gloss is consistent with that identification.

The formal Saṅgha acts described — motion alone, motion with a second, motion with a fourth proclamation — render the standard Vinaya categories of ñatti, ñatti-dutiya-kamma, and ñatti-catuttha-kamma (Sanskrit: jñapti, jñapti-dvitiya-karman, jñapti-caturtha-karman).

- The phrase rendered "equipped themselves with the means for training" translates a somewhat compressed Tibetan idiom referring to gathering or taking up the requisites or implements of training; the sense is that the nuns came prepared and earnest in their commitment.

The Venerable "Legsong" (Tibetan: legs 'ongs) and "Charka" (Tibetan: 'char ka) are names of monks whose conduct prompted the respective training rules; no Sanskrit equivalents are recoverable with certainty from this context alone.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off at that point.

- The phrase rendered as "made herself understood to a nun who is present" translates a Tibetan idiom indicating that she had first informed or notified a nun who was staying behind, so that her absence would be known — a technical requirement of the rule. The same idiom recurs in the second rule about householders, where it means informing the hosting householder.

The term translated as "prior meal" and "later meal" refers to the morning meal and the midday meal respectively, the two permissible meal times in Vinaya practice.

- The "Great Mistress of People" renders རྒྱལ་མཁན་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་, which is an epithet of Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's aunt and the first Buddhist nun. The context confirms this identification clearly.

The phrase "the three dawns" alludes to a technical Vinaya distinction among three stages of dawn recognized in the commentarial tradition; the text treats this as already explained in a prior passage ("as before").

- The name "Vāsomukha" is a reconstruction from the Tibetan "ba so mkhan" (lit. "one who tends cattle / a cowherd"); Tibetan biographical epithets of this kind sometimes encode Sanskrit names imperfectly, and the exact Sanskrit form is uncertain. The term "Nirgrantha hearer of the Dharma" renders the Tibetan "gcer bu pa'i nyan thos chos," indicating a follower of the Nirgrantha (Jain) tradition who was a lay hearer, here contrasted with a Buddhist monastic. The phrase rendered "needles" for "kha ral" is a plausible reading in context of monastic requisites, though the term can also denote razors or blades; given the context of offering requisites to the Saṅgha, "needles" is the most likely referent.

- The phrase rendered "needle-cases of various comb-like shapes" reflects Tibetan describing objects made from horn fashioned in the shape of combs or similar implements; the exact referent of the compound is somewhat ambiguous in the Vinaya context but the general sense is clear. The term translated "stopper" for རྩུབ་པ་ and "tube" for རྩུབ་པ་ describes the two structural varieties of needle-case; the precise technical distinction between these two forms is a minor point of material culture that does not affect the legal ruling.

- The passage contains technical measurements for a monastic strap or sling. The term rendered "strap" translates རྒྱུ་ཁྱུ་, which likely refers to a carrying-strap or sling-strap used in monastic contexts. The measurement formulas involving Sugata-spans, standard cubits, and finger-breadths are internally consistent within the Vinaya measurement system, but the precise rendering of phrases like "one and a half of the Sugata's spans plus a span" reflects a somewhat compressed and formulaic original. The five types of cotton-wool listed use Sanskrit plant names preserved in Tibetan transliteration: arka (Calotropis gigantea), śalmālī (silk-cotton tree), kaśa (a type of grass), and śana (hemp or a similar fiber plant).

- The term rendered "robe for covering the shoulder" translates a Tibetan term for a garment covering the side or armpit area, used especially in illness — likely a sickbed robe or similar covering garment in Vinaya context. The identification "robe for the sick" follows standard Vinaya commentarial usage.

The name Śobhā is a reconstructed reading for the female lay practitioner described as "Sbom dga' mo" (literally "Joyful-and-plump" or "Plump-Śobhā"); this may be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit personal name not yet fully recovered here.

- The name rendered "Stout Ānanda" translates the Tibetan sbom dga' mo, a nun's name. The first element sbom means "stout, fat, thick," and dga' mo is a feminized form of Ānanda ("joyful one"). Some editions render this nun's name differently; here the literal sense is preserved consistently with the preceding passage.

The phrase "fifteen standard cubits" and "nine standard cubits" render the commentary's conversion of Sugata-cubits into ordinary cubit measurements, where one Sugata-cubit equals one and a half standard cubits.

- The text refers to "kiyū" as an accompanying substance listed alongside garlic; this likely corresponds to a pungent plant such as asafoetida or a related allium, and "asafoetida" is given as the best approximation for a listening audience, though the exact botanical referent is uncertain.

The passage alternates between summarizing the narrative frame and quoting the canonical text directly, using the Vinaya formulaic style of "from this point through to that point" to indicate larger stretches that are not reproduced here. The translation follows this structure faithfully, rendering the formulaic bridging phrases as prose.

- The phrase rendered "the great lady Gautamī" translates a title indicating Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the first nun, the Buddha's maternal aunt and foster mother. This is consistent with her role elsewhere in the Vinaya as a spokeswoman for the nuns' community.

The expression rendered "two finger-joints" as the permitted measure for washing is a standard Vinaya anatomical limit; it refers to the length of two phalanges of a finger, a conventional maximum depth.

- The cooking terminology in the Vinaya narrative is a detailed technical sequence describing stages of preparing a churned butter or rendered fat marinade. The terms rendered as "gentle stir," "thorough stir," "stir to draw out the essence," "frothy stage," "full-bodied stage," "skimming stage," "hundredfold-refined stage," and "what resembles the form of a small creature" correspond to Tibetan technical culinary terms whose exact sequence in classical Indian cooking practice is not fully recoverable; the rendering is interpretive and follows the most plausible contextual reading.

The phrase rendered "residence keeper" translates khang skyong ma, the nun appointed to care for the nuns' dwelling.

- The phrase rendered "stirring up raw materials" refers to a Vinaya prohibition against nuns engaging in certain forms of food preparation, specifically stirring or processing uncooked or raw substances. The precise nature of the "raw material" (Tibetan rjen pa) in the context of the preceding narrative about marinades is preserved consistently.

The expression "beginning with 'this occurrence' and continuing through to the promulgation of the training rule" is a standard Vinaya formulaic abbreviation indicating that the full procedural narrative is condensed; the translated rendering reflects this convention.

The names Kutsā, Vatsā, and Bharadvāja are brahminical clan or gotra names addressed to the brahmin boys and are rendered here as Sanskrit equivalents of the Tibetan phonetic transcriptions.

- The name rendered "Palskyed" transliterates the Tibetan རལ་སྐྱེད་. This is likely a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name such as Śrījāta or similar; no Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable with certainty from context.

The phrase rendered "the keeper of the rhinoceros" translates རྩོམ་སྐྱོང་པ་, literally "holder of the wild animal," here most naturally understood as an official responsible for a rhinoceros or large animal in royal service; its precise institutional role is unclear from this context alone.

The summary verse at the center of the passage condenses the rules of the preceding section; its terse, elliptical grammar makes fully fluent rendering difficult without expanding slightly, which has been done conservatively here.

- The term rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates a term referring to individuals who are neither male nor female in the Vinaya's threefold classification; this is the standard technical usage in monastic law.

The names Carka and Bema represent the two nuns central to the narrative of these rules. Carka is a monk, and Bema is a nun, as clarified by the text's own analysis.

The phrase "words of coded allusion" renders an idiomatic expression meaning veiled or suggestive language used as a signal; the specific phrase "game of theft" appears to be a euphemism for illicit liaison.

- The names Ched-ma and Char-ka are rendered phonetically from the Tibetan spellings རྒྱུ་མ་ and རྒྱུ་ཀ་ respectively. These appear to be proper names of specific nuns and monks in the narrative and their Sanskrit equivalents, if any existed, are not recoverable from context alone.

- The final sentence describes a sexual assault. The Tibetan reads literally that the man "seized" the nun and "impregnated her" or "ejaculated upon her." The verb རྩོམ་ from རྩོམ་པ་ indicates seminal emission / violation; this is a technical legal detail establishing the circumstances for the rule that follows. The translation "violated her" conveys the meaning accurately and appropriately for the narrative context without clinical intrusion into the spoken rendering.

The verse summary at the end of the eleventh group appears to belong to a different twelfth group section that follows immediately; it may summarize rules of the twelfth group rather than recapitulate the eleventh. This is a common structural feature in Vinaya texts where the verse summary precedes the rules it epitomizes, and the section break may be slightly displaced in the manuscript.

- The term rendered "leather strap" (Skt. carmabandha in Sanskrit, transliterated into Tibetan as rgya skyegs) refers in this Vinaya context to a leather band used as a masturbatory implement. The text handles the matter obliquely and the Tibetan commentary likewise uses euphemistic phrasing ("relieves her affliction," i.e. sexual frustration). This is consistent with the Vinaya narrative style when dealing with sexual misconduct cases.

The name "Stout-and-Joyful" renders the Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, which appears to be a character-name unique to this Vinaya narrative. "Phreng-Idan-ma" is left as a transliteration as it is a proper name of a queen in this narrative whose Sanskrit equivalent is not recoverable from context.

- The phrase rendered "without permission" translates literally as "without it having been given," meaning without the owner's consent to occupy it. The same formula is used in the preceding rule, and the parallel structure is intentional in the Vinaya text.

The repeated formula "from this occurrence down to laid down a training rule" is a standard Vinaya abbreviation indicating that the narrative framework for promulgating the rule is being condensed; it is faithfully rendered as such rather than expanded.

- The phrase rendered "courtesies due a guest" translates a term meaning worldly or social proprieties, here specifically the customary welcome and hospitality owed to a visiting monastic. The summary verse is a mnemonic condensing the topics of the twelfth section; its four items correspond to the rules just enumerated in that section.
- The name rendered throughout as "Stomhagimon" is a Tibetan phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit name not fully recoverable from this passage alone; it is kept consistent with established convention for this text. The epithet "lean Gautamī" (Gautamī the thin) refers to a specific nun identified by this description; "Gautamī" is her clan name. The phrase "near death" and "approaching death" render Tibetan terms that appear to be technical designations for specific categories of individuals; their precise identity is not fully clarified in this excerpt and may refer to nuns in particular states or stages. The expression "flesh-eater of her own child" is a severe verbal abuse formula found in Vinaya literature; it is rendered literally as it appears. The final rule's word analysis is cut off in the source at the point where "whatever" begins to be explained, indicating the passage continues beyond the excerpt provided.
- The term translated as "Bhagūmati" renders the Tibetan "འབྲས་ལོག་མཁན་," which is a Tibetan back-formation from a Sanskrit name; the most plausible reconstruction is Bhagūmatī or a related form. The exact Sanskrit original is uncertain but the name clearly refers to a particular nun throughout this passage.

The phrase "tier upon tier" for the hammock gloss reflects a suspended, layered structure; the Tibetan "མཐོང་སྒྲིབ་རྩེ་གཤམ་པོ་ལྟར་བཞག་པོ་" describes something hung or slung in layers or tiers, which may indicate a multi-level suspended sleeping structure rather than a simple hammock in the modern sense.

- The phrase rendered "inner district" and "outer district" reflects a distinction between neighboring hostile territories and more distant ones respectively; the exact administrative or geographical sense is difficult to pin down precisely from context alone, but the general sense of mutually antagonistic regions is clear from the commentary.

The term rendered "shrine" throughout is lha khang, literally "god-house" or "temple," here specified in the commentary as referring to non-Buddhist shrines or temples belonging to tīrthikas.

- The term rendered "group of twelve" refers to a notorious group of twelve nuns frequently mentioned in the Vinaya literature as instigators of occasions for new rules, corresponding to the group of six monks. The Tibetan "bcu gnyis sde" literally means "the party of twelve."

The phrase rendered "nuns of little ambition" translates "don nyung ba'i dge slong ma," a standard Vinaya idiom indicating conscientious nuns who are content with little and who therefore notice and object to misconduct.

- The term rendered throughout as "admitting to the assembly" translates a technical Vinaya procedure for formally installing a candidate within the Saṅgha, distinct from the going forth and full ordination, though related to them. The Tibetan phrase འཇགས་པའི་ཁྱད་རྒྱུ་ལྟོས་ཀྱི་ཡེ་ཤེས་བློ་གྲོས་ཀྱི་སྐབས་ཀྱི་མཚན་ཉིད་ indicates this is the second rule in a collection of fifteen offenses in this Vinaya section. Sthūlanandā is a well-known transgressor figure in the Vinaya narratives; the Tibetan རྒྱལ་མཚན་ལྷ་མོ་ is the standard rendering of her name. The final sentence of the passage breaks off at the Blessed One's declaration, which is to be continued in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "son of the mother of suffering" translates a compressed Tibetan expression meaning a man who is an associate of suffering's source, i.e., rooted in delusion and bad companionship. The exact syntactic sense is somewhat compressed in the original; the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading.

"Sthūlanandā" is the standard Sanskrit reconstruction of the Tibetan name rendered phonetically as Sbom dga' mo, literally "Stout Joyful One," a well-known problematic nun in the Vinaya literature.

"Gautamī the Slim" renders Gautamī skems mo, i.e., the lean or emaciated Gautamī, to distinguish her from Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī.

- The phrase rendered "abiding near the brahmācārya" translates the technical Vinaya category of the śikṣamāñā, the probationary status of a woman candidate training under near-observance of the full celibate life before full ordination. The Tibetan འཇགས་རྒྱུད་ཀྱི་བོན་པོ། literally means "the vow of dwelling near/adjacent to the brahmācārya practice," which corresponds to the śikṣamāñā vow. This is a distinct stage from the six-dharma training that precedes it and from full ordination that follows.
- The phrase rendered "rite proceeding by formal request and a twofold act" and "rite proceeding by formal request and a fourfold act" follows Vinaya technical usage: conferral of the brahmācārya vow requires a single motion plus one confirming vote (hence twofold), while full ordination requires a single motion plus three confirming votes (hence fourfold). This distinction is doctrinally significant and shapes the legal analysis in the commentary.
- The term rendered throughout as "disciples of one of great desire" translates a compound meaning the circle or retinue of a nun characterized by great desire — that is, Sthūlanandā's disciples. The rendering "placing disciples" for the vow refers specifically to the act of taking on and accepting responsibility for the retinue of such a nun. The phrase "dwelling in a natural setting" renders a term for nuns who lived apart from the main community rather than in a monastic residence.
- The repeated phrase rendered "performs all the steps up to and including the laying down of the training rule" translates a formulaic abbreviation indicating that the Buddha went through the standard narrative sequence of expressing approval, addressing the assembly, and then formally promulgating the rule. This is a conventional Vinaya abbreviation and is rendered here in its standard expanded sense.

The name Sthulanandā transliterates स्तुलानन्दाना, literally "fat joyful one," a nun who appears repeatedly in Vinaya narratives as the protagonist of rule-generating incidents. The name is kept in its Sanskrit reconstructed form throughout for consistency.

- The term rendered "sends her away" or "send away" translates the Tibetan verb "bkar ba," meaning to dispatch or send someone off to another location. The context makes clear the nun was supposed to be removed from the premises before the husband arrived. The phrase "caught by the husband" renders a somewhat compressed idiom; the situation implies the husband physically reclaimed or seized his wife.
- The phrase rendered "great progenitress Gautamī" translates Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's maternal aunt and the first Buddhist nun. The Tibetan uses the title skye dgu'i bdag mo chen mo, literally "great lady-sovereign of living beings," which is a rendering of Mahāprajāpatī.

The phrase "beginning from the side of her elder" renders rgan pa'i mtha' nas, indicating that the act of making obeisance proceeds starting from the most senior member of the assembly.

- Sthūlanandā is the standard rendering of སྐྱེད་ལྷན་མཆོག་ལྷན་པོ་, a famously ill-behaved nun repeatedly named in Vinaya narrative literature; the Tibetan is a calque of the Sanskrit name meaning "Big Joy."

The three insults Sthūlanandā levels at her fellow nuns — "great mistress of creatures is a self-initiated one," "blue-lotus-hued one has sold herself in six great cities," and "gaunt Gautamī has eaten her child's flesh" — are stock epithets from Vinaya narrative that identify three specific nuns by allusive nicknames. The rendering follows the Tibetan literally; the doctrinal background (that these were real past deeds being disclosed as slander) is a matter for fuller commentary.

- The Tibetan phrase rendered "act of shaving bodily hair" literally means "the work of hair," which in Vinaya context refers to the depilatory or shaving practices reserved for fully ordained members; the rendering follows standard Vinaya commentarial usage.

The term rendered "go-between" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning to act as an intermediary in amorous or marital negotiations, a standard Vinaya category.

- The verse summary (verse of abbreviation) in this section is a condensed mnemonic listing the subjects of the rules in this grouping. The individual items in the summary verses are formulaic headings rather than complete sentences, and their referents become clear only in conjunction with the full rule narratives. The rendering preserves their compressed, list-like quality.

The phrase rendered "in the proper cycle" translates རྒྱུ་ལྷན་ལྷན་པོ་, literally "in the two cycles," a technical expression for completing two full annual periods of training; the nuance is that the two years must constitute proper, completed training periods.

The text breaks off mid-narrative with the woman's response beginning but not yet given in the passage provided.

- The "aged Gautamī" renders Gautamī Ṭhemmo, the honorific title given to Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī in the Tibetan Vinaya tradition. In this narrative context she appears to be a named character distinct from the great Mahāprajāpatī, or the name is used for a senior nun of the Gautama clan; the Tibetan is unambiguous in using the name as a proper noun.

The "seven robes" refers to the standard set of monastic robes (the lower robe, upper robe, great robe, and accompanying cloths) enumerated in the Vinaya; the exact count varies by tradition but the Tibetan here specifies "the seven, whichever it may be."

- The term rendered as "probationer" throughout is śikṣamāṇā, a woman in the two-year probationary training period between novice and full ordination. The Tibetan "sbom dga' mo" is the rendering of this term and is treated consistently.

The phrase "intention of the fortnight" (bca' lnga'i 'dun pa) refers to the formal resolution or mental act undertaken at the start of a fortnightly restoration ceremony. "Already used" (zhag lon pas) indicates that this resolution has been expended in the first fortnight and cannot validly carry over to the second.

The mnemonic verse is a condensed summary verse listing rule topics; it is rendered as verse accordingly. Some headings within it are abrupt by design, as they are pneumatic cues rather than full sentences.

- The phrase rendered "you who have the Buddha, you who have the Dharma, you who have the Saṅgha" is a formulaic greeting conveying that the arriving nuns carry the Three Jewels with them; it is a standard expression of welcome in Vinaya literature.

The expression "from this occurrence through to the establishment of the training rule" is a standard Vinaya abbreviation indicating that the full narrative preamble — inquiry, rebuke, assembly, and formal promulgation — is implied but not spelled out.

• The terms rendered "ceremonial whisk," "fan," and "small fans" reflect objects offered as a customary gift to the monks' assembly at the conclusion of the invitation ceremony. The precise identification of these implements involves some philological uncertainty, but the general referent is clear from the Vinaya context.

The word rendered "strife" or "causing strife in the assembly" translates a term meaning to expel or cast out from the assembly — that is, to cause a formal schism or rupture in communal proceedings. "Causing strife" is the conventional English Vinaya rendering; the underlying act is more precisely one of divisive disruption leading to exclusion.

- The phrase rendered "daughters of those who eat the leftovers of others" is a compound insult whose Tibetan is literally "daughters of the woman who eats the remnants" (bu zan mo'i bu mo dag). This is a derogatory expression likely playing on low social status. The reading is straightforward but the exact social referent of the insult is culturally specific.

The remark about Sthulanandā speaking in the third person about herself in the passage regarding praise is grammatically awkward in the Tibetan and the referents shift; the translation follows the most plausible doctrinal reading, in which Sthulanandā means that she herself is the one who deserves praise, being a member of the Śākya clan and a master of the Three Baskets.

- The term rendered "flat blow" or "strike with the flat of the hand" translates "thal lcaq," which some traditions gloss as a blow with an open hand or with a flat implement; the precise meaning is somewhat uncertain but the general sense of a striking blow is clear.

The phrase "brahmins given to holding things in contempt" renders the Tibetan "bram ze ya mtshan du 'dzin pa rnam," literally "brahmins who hold things as worthy of contempt or disdain." The term is a recurring designation in the story for aggressive or contemptuous brahmins.

- The line rendered "O daughters of gluttons!" translates a somewhat contemptuous address; the Tibetan reads literally "daughters of the woman who eats." This is a conventional insult in the Vinaya literature referring to greedy persons, here directed at the attendants.

The episode of the girl and the sesame — the mange on the hand, the head-shaving, and the split tongue — appears to recount consequences suffered by someone who sought a teaching from the six groups of monks in exchange for sesame, though the Tibetan is elliptical. The translation renders what the grammar most naturally supports.

The phrase rendered "prepared food" and "cooked food" corresponds to two standard Vinaya categories of edibles subject to specific rules on food remaining after a meal has been formally concluded; the five items in each category are standard Vinaya lists not enumerated here in the Tibetan itself.

- The phrase rendered "great prioress" for 大德比丘尼摩訶波闍波提 is literally "great mistress of beings Gautamī," an honorific title for Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the first nun and the Buddha's aunt and foster mother; "great prioress" follows established Vinaya convention.

The sentence about Sthulanandā stating that "she bathed a bodhisattva" is a notable doctrinal detail: the Vinaya tradition here identifies the infant previously bathed by Sthulanandā as a bodhisattva, implying she had a legitimate or extraordinary reason in that unique case — a reason that cannot be generalized to justify nuns bathing ordinary children.

The final anatomical passage concerning Sthulanandā's pubic hair is rendered plainly as the text requires in a Vinaya context; the term རྒྱུ་མཚན་ here means pubic or lower-body hair, not "confusion," a distinct lexical item in this medical-hygienic context.

- The phrase rendered "consecration of the Dharma robe" translates a term that literally means "blessing" or "consecration" applied to monastic robes; in Vinaya context this refers to a fortnightly ritual acknowledgment or marking of one's robes as properly belonging to one's allowance, keeping track of their status. The precise ritual is a matter of Vinaya commentary.

The "seven kinds" of robes is a standard Vinaya enumeration of the allowable types of monastic cloth; the text does not enumerate them here.

- The phrase rendered as "dance-teacher's costume in exchange" translates a passage involving Sthulanandā accepting or exchanging a garment associated with a dancing-woman, used as a Dharma robe. The precise nature of the exchange is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan, but the meaning is clear enough in context. The term "stiff extension" in the verse summary is a provisional rendering of a technical term for a type of padding or extension attached to garments; the exact referent within monastic textile usage is not entirely certain from this passage alone.

- The term rendered "rhubarb" translates a word that may refer to a medicinal root or plant product used as a purgative in the ancient Indian context; the precise identification of the substance is uncertain, but "rhubarb" or a similarly purgative medicinal root is the traditional understanding. The commentary's gloss equating "causes to present rhubarb" with "the Saṅgha's robe-cloth" is unusual and may reflect a different referent in the base rule versus its explanatory gloss; this structural tension is present in the Tibetan itself.

- The term རྒྱུ་མཚན་ (rhubarb) is used throughout as a gloss for the Saṅgha's robe-cloth in the exegetical sections, following the established convention from the preceding passage, where the rhubarb presented by the sick man stands metonymically for the Saṅgha's property. The summary verse at the end condenses four preceding training rules; the line "a spell not to be accepted or installed" renders རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཚན་མཚན་མཚན་མཚན་, referring to rules about accepting or inserting a spell or formula, which will be elaborated in subsequent sections. The precise referent of "come here and be calmed" for the first rule is consistent with a standard Vinaya formula inviting a party to settle a dispute or matter peaceably.

- The string "sar phu, bi si ri phu, si ri bi svāhā" is transliterated directly as it appears in the Tibetan; it is a garbled or vernacular mantra formula, and no standard Sanskrit reconstruction can be offered with confidence. The passage is preserved as a phonetic transcription.

The name rendered throughout as "Stomā Gāmī" transliterates ལྷོ་མཚན་མཚན་; this is a nun's name occurring in Vinaya narratives and is kept consistent with the preceding rendering convention.

- The repeated phrase rendered as "however little... in every case" reflects the Vinaya formula indicating that any instance of the action, no matter how slight, constitutes a full transgression — a standard juridical formulation in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya.

The mantra syllables are transliterated phonetically as they appear in the Tibetan; they carry no standard Sanskrit reconstruction.

The phrase rendered "shaven-headed woman" translates an insult literally meaning "one whose head has been touched" or "shaved-headed one," a contemptuous reference to the tonsure of a nun.

- The phrase rendered "set a seat to grow" in the summary verse is unusual. The Tibetan reads "sstan ni skyid du mi gzhug," literally "not inserting a seat for comfort" or perhaps "not setting up a seat in a garden or nursery." This is an abbreviated verse rubric summarizing a rule whose full narrative has not been provided in this passage; the precise idiomatic meaning awaits the corresponding rule's narrative for full clarification.

The exchange about calves and milk is a colloquial way for Stomā Gāmī to probe why the householder's wife is unhappy, drawing on the woman's agrarian context. The subsequent remark comparing her to "a needle" reflects a somewhat sardonic question about whether the wife too has only one kind of work in a household, as a needle does one thing — the idiom is terse and its exact nuance is slightly uncertain.

- The name rendered "Stomā Gāmī" appears here again as the protagonist of the first rule in this passage, consistent with the preceding context. The name "Tsugga'mo" (Tib. མཆོག་མཆོག་) is kept in transliterated form as no established Sanskrit equivalent is provided; it appears to be a Tibetan name for a nun who figures in several of these Vinaya rules. The phrase rendered "causes seats to be experienced" reflects the somewhat elliptical Vinaya commentary language where "experiencing" a communal item means privately appropriating or benefiting from it. The "seven kinds" of thread is a standard Vinaya enumeration whose specific contents are not enumerated in this passage.

- The phrase rendered "the sinister one, the rough one, and the wanton one" represents three Tibetan epithets used as informal designations for the prostitute's former clients: མཆོག་མཆོག་ (the deceitful or sinister one), མཆོག་མཆོག་ (the rough or unruly one), and མཆོག་མཆོག་ (the wanton or dissolute one). These appear to be character-type epithets rather than proper names, and the exact nuances are uncertain; the renderings given reflect the most plausible interpretations.

The name མཆོག་མཆོག་, transliterated here as Bombagamo, is a Tibetan rendering of a proper name; the exact Sanskrit original is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "one who wanders everywhere" in the summary verse translates a term that in context appears to refer to a wandering woman or vagrant, parallel to the preceding rules about various categories of women giving massage. The verse is a mnemonic summary and its terms are intentionally compressed.

The phrase "trainee nun" renders the Tibetan term for a woman undergoing the two-year probationary training period before full ordination as a nun, the śikṣamāṇā in Sanskrit; the text's explanation confirms this.

"Charnel grounds" in the nuns' disparaging remark about Bombagamo is a conventional insult implying she is unclean or of low character, associating her with a polluted place.

- "Wandering woman" renders མཆོག་མཆོག་, a female parivrājikā — a female ascetic of a non-Buddhist school, here specified as Sāṃkhya (མཆོག་མཆོག་, "Sāṃkhya," literally "those who enumerate"). The identification with Sāṃkhya is explicit in the text.

"Turushka" (མཆོག་མཆོག་) is a fragrant resin, sometimes identified as frankincense or a similar aromatic substance used in Indian ritual and cosmetic contexts.

The phrase "twelve groups of monks" (མཆོག་མཆོག་) refers to the stock Vinaya designation for the misbehaving faction whose conduct prompts new rules; it is a conventional formulaic reference, not a literal count.

- The name rendered as "Stomāgāmā" is a phonetic reconstruction of the Tibetan "མཆོག་མཆོག་" (Sbom dga' mo). The Sanskrit original is uncertain; some editions suggest Sthūlanandā, but the text here presents a distinct character. This warrants mention as the identification is not fully established.

The river name "Ajiravatī" is the Sanskrit form of the Tibetan transliteration "མཆོག་མཆོག་," corresponding to the Aciravatī river near Śrāvastī, consistent with other Vinaya passages.

- The nun's name appears in the Tibetan as མཆོག་མཆོག་ (Bhomā or Stomā). The exact Sanskrit original underlying this Tibetan rendering is uncertain; some Vinaya manuscripts have the name Stambhavatī or a similar form. This is a minor textual matter and does not affect the doctrinal content.

- The names Śeṣaghoṣā and Kaiśikā appear to be names of specific musical modes or female musicians mentioned in the narrative. The Tibetan ཤེས་གཤོས་ (Śeṣaghoṣā) and ཀའི་སི་ཀ་ (Kaiśikā) are transliterated here; the context suggests they are either proper names or names of melodic modes from the Indian musical tradition. The exact identification is uncertain, but this does not affect the doctrinal content.

The instrument བོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ (bābhiṣaka) is an obscure term, likely a type of drum or percussion instrument of Indian origin, transliterated as given.

- The names Sbom Dga' mo and Gtsug Dga' mo are Tibetan personal names of nuns appearing in Vinaya narrative contexts; they have been left in their Tibetan phonetic forms as proper names rather than translated, since they function as individual identifiers, not titles.

The phrase rendered "ride upon her shoulder" reflects a Vinaya narrative in which Gtsug Dga' mo, having arranged a secret assignation, then has a moment of moral recollection and tries to extricate herself from the situation, with the man's escape route being to climb on her back or shoulder to leave without being seen — the precise mechanics are somewhat unclear in the compressed narrative, but the general scenario is plain.

The line "the pure one overawes the world; the impure one does not overawe the world" is a cited proverb or gnomic saying; it has been rendered as verse to signal its quoted, aphoristic character.

- The term rendered "tooth-comb" is so-mang, literally "many-toothed," designating a comb with multiple tines as distinct from the crystal-root comb of the preceding rule. The virāṇa plant root mentioned as the material of the crystal comb is a fragrant grass root used in classical Indian material culture; its exact identification does not affect the legal sense.

The phrase rendered "displayed the sign indicating the presence of a prostitute" translates a Tibetan idiom for a conventional marker used in ancient Indian contexts to signal commercial sexual availability; the exact form of the sign is left implicit in the text.

The final reflection of Sthūlanandā, comparing a ruined reputation to a shattered vessel, is a known proverbial image in Vinaya literature meaning that once one's moral standing is destroyed, no one will seek one out for the Dharma.

- The names in the list of protected nuns — the Great Mistress of Beings (likely Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī), Gautamī the Slender, the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned One, Dharmadattā, Bhadravatī, and Śyāmā — appear to be named senior bhikṣuṇīs of the community. The Tibetan "མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་" most naturally renders Mahāprajāpatī, though this identification is not made explicit in the text.

- The phrase rendered "summer hall" translates a term that in the Tibetan Vinaya context refers to the assembly hall used during the rains retreat — effectively the monastery's main meeting hall. The rendering "temple" for the second occurrence of this gloss in the passage follows the text's own clarifying gloss, which equates the summer hall with the main shrine or assembly building.

The phrase "an improper matter unworthy of a noble one" translates a compound that in Vinaya technical language designates a category of behavior beneath the dignity of a fully ordained nun — a standard formula in this confessable-offense series.

The five types of each dairy product listed here follow a standard Vinaya enumeration derived from five animals; the text abbreviates the lists for curds and fresh butter, directing the reader to expand them by analogy with the milk list.

- The phrase rendered "it is the milk of bees" for honey is a literal gloss found in Vinaya commentarial literature; the underlying image is that honey is the bees' equivalent of milk, i.e., their essential secretion. The phrase "it is of sugar" for raw sugar is an abbreviated gloss, indicating that the substance in question belongs to the category of sugar products derived from sugarcane. The definition of fish and meat as "that which moves in water and so forth" follows the standard Vinaya taxonomic language for aquatic and land animals used as food; "and so forth" extends the category to other flesh.
- The phrase rendered "swallowing bite by bite in secret" translates the Tibetan lkog mar kham gyis mid pa, a technical Vinaya expression indicating surreptitious consumption. The word lkog ma ("in secret, covertly") is a standard Vinaya qualifier; the rendering captures the clandestine manner implied.

The "twelve groups" is a well-known reference in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya to a set of chronically wayward monks, here contextually the nuns' equivalent group behaving improperly by entering the restricted household.

- The phrase rendered "like an elephant's trunk" refers to a manner of draping the robe so that it hangs down in a single flap in front, resembling a trunk. The passage breaks off mid-sentence with the Blessed One's declaration just begun; the translation accurately reflects this incompleteness in the source.

The name "Kuñjakā" renders the Tibetan ཀུལྷ་ཁྱ་ཁྱ་, a phonetic transcription of a Sanskrit name (possibly Kuñjakā or similar); it is kept as given since no standard reconstruction is certain.

- The colophon "This is the twenty-eighth fascicle, the last, of the Analysis of the Nuns' Vinaya" appears mid-passage in the Tibetan, marking the end of one fascicle before the next sequence of rules begins. This is preserved in its natural position in the translation rather than moved, as it is part of the textual structure.

The phrase rendered "their hearts will be broken" translates a somewhat idiomatic expression; the intended meaning is that lustful men, seeing the nuns' bare shoulders, would be emotionally undone or their passion would be inflamed and then frustrated — a sardonic excuse by the offending nuns. The translation captures the mocking register.

- The term rendered "crouching" or "walking artificially" for རྒྱུ་ལྡན་ལམ་ལུགས་ corresponds to an affected or artificial gait; the precise physical manner is somewhat uncertain from the Tibetan alone, but "crouching while walking" captures the most likely meaning in context. The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྡན་ལམ་ལུགས་ refers to dragging or shuffling the feet; "shuffling" is the closest natural English equivalent. The term རྒྱུ་ལྡན་ལམ་ལུགས་ is rendered "stealthy householder-type" movement; "sliding" or "creeping" is the best approximation for the furtive gait implied. The distinction between རྒྱུ་ལྡན་ལམ་ལུགས་ (legs crossed) and རྒྱུ་ལྡན་ལམ་ལུགས་ (thighs crossed) reflects two different seated postures, likely meaning sitting cross-legged on the floor versus sitting with one knee over the other in a casual manner.

- The three names "Joyful," "Rejoicer," and "Plump One" (rendered from Tibetan gtsug dga' mo, nye dga' mo, sbom dga' mo) are the nicknames the group of twelve use among themselves; they are possibly ironic or mocking epithets. The exact identification of these figures is uncertain and may warrant scholarly attention.

The location "Crocodile Child-slayer Mountain" (chu srin byis pa gsod kyi ri) is a somewhat unusual toponym. This corresponds to the Pāli Sumsumāragiri ("Crocodile Rock") in the Bhagga country, also known as Bhesakaḷā Forest. The rendering here follows the Tibetan literally.

The summary verse (summary stanza) appears to be a mnemonic condensing the preceding rules; its terse style makes some lines ambiguous, and the rendering is approximate.

- The name Sthūlanandā renders the Tibetan ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་. She is a well-known problematic nun in the Vinaya literature, and this rendering is standard. The episode of her throwing food into the expelled nun's open mouth is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan; the translation follows the text as given.

The phrase rendered "those who cannot read" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is literally "those for whom reading does not come," i.e., the illiterate. The contextual implication appears to be that such people eat carefully and deliberately with tiny morsels, perhaps to avoid drawing attention, while the second group eats in huge morsels out of hunger. The exact rhetorical logic is idiomatic and the translation conveys the sense.

- The passage describes Jaina monks as "naked ascetics," which is the standard rendering of the Tibetan term for nirgrantha practitioners. The stūpa incident is a well-known episode of mockery in the Vinaya narrative tradition; the group of twelve nuns fashion the food into a stūpa shape with a central pole and taunt the Jainas by naming it their Teacher's stūpa, then eat it piece by piece while chanting "the stūpa of the Fully Accomplished One" — a parody of stūpa circumambulation and veneration. The chant "rdzogs byed kyi mchod rten" plays on the Jaina title for the Tīrthaṅkara, here rendered "the Fully Accomplished One." The name Sthūlanandā is the standard Sanskrit form of the Tibetan Sbom dga' mo, a nun repeatedly mentioned in the Vinaya as a transgressor.

- The phrase rendered "the hill of Kumāraghāta" (literally "the hill for killing children") designates a specific toponym; the Tibetan ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is unusual — ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ could mean "crocodile" or here may be part of a place name. The rendering follows the most natural reading of the compound as a descriptive toponym. The exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain.

The name Sthūlanandā here rendered as ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ (literally "the Fat Joyful One") is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Sthūlanandā, kept consistent with the preceding passage.

- The phrase rendered "with the arm akimbo like an elephant's shoulder" translates a Tibetan idiom literally meaning "with the arm at the side like an elephant's shoulder-joint." This is a standard Vinaya image for an improper or arrogant posture; the meaning is generally clear from context, though the precise physical gesture is debated in commentaries.

The ruling "One must not teach the Dharma to one who is not ill" may seem contradictory, but in the Vinaya context it means: one must not teach in the improper posture or manner described to a healthy person (the exception for the sick being that their condition overrides the usual rule of respectful positioning). This is a standard interpretive point in Vinaya commentary.

- The phrase rendered "arms folded behind their necks" translates a term literally meaning something placed or crossed at the back of the neck, likely indicating a posture of disrespect or casualness. The context of the surrounding rules about respectful posture supports this interpretation, though the exact physical posture is somewhat uncertain.

The phrase rendered "making a neighing sound like a horse" describes persons mimicking or producing horse-like sounds, treated here as a disrespectful behavior. The Vinaya context strongly supports this reading.

- The name ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is rendered "Sthūlanandā," the well-known Vinaya figure whose name means "the Stout Delightful One." The passage is a Vinaya rule-narrative cataloguing when teaching the Dharma to various categories of people carrying weapons, wearing headgear, or in other specific conditions is or is not permitted, interspersed with a story explaining the origin of the rule against defecating or urinating on green grass. The phrase "group of twelve" renders 十二比丘, referring to the notorious group of twelve monks known in Vinaya literature for repeated infractions that prompted new rules.

- The seven procedures for settling disputes correspond to the standard Vinaya list of the seven adhikaraṇaśamatha rules: settlement by direct evidence (sammukhāvinaya), by recollection (smṛtivinaya), by verdict of non-insanity (amūḍhavinaya), by searching out the nature of the matter (tatsvabhāvinaya), by the verdict of the majority (yebhuyyasikāvinaya, here rendered as "spreading of many sticks"), by formal confession (paṭiññākāraṇa), and by covering over with grass (tiṇavatthāraka). The Tibetan verse summary at the close lists the major categories of offenses in the Bhikṣuṇī Prātimokṣa, providing a numerical colophon to the section. The cook in this episode is referred to with a grammatically feminine marker in the source but functions in the narrative as the wronged layperson; no doctrinal consequence follows from the ambiguity.
- The verse section beginning with "Just as a bee upon a flower" is a well-known quotation from the Dhammapada (Pali) or its Sanskrit parallel, here appearing in Tibetan in a Vinaya context. The rendering follows the standard Buddhist interpretive tradition.

The phrase rendered "God of gods" (Tibetan: lha yi lha) is a standard epithet of the Buddha meaning literally "god of the gods," here applied in the sequence of epithets to Śākyamuni-Gautama; it is not to be confused with the term for Mahādeva/Śiva.

The colophon names are transliterated from the Tibetan phonetic rendering of Sanskrit names. "Sarvajñadeva," "Dharmākara," and "Vidyākaraṇa" are standard transliterations. "Palgyihunpo" and "Paltsegs" are Tibetan names of well-known translators active in the imperial period. "Ānanda" here refers to the Tibetan editor Ānanda (Tibetan: Kun dga'), not the disciple of the Buddha.

The final line, "The fourth part of the Vinaya is present here," is a colophon marker indicating that this text occupies the fourth volume of the Vinaya section of the Kangyur.
