

Dhāraṇī of Ārya Tārā Subduing All Evil

Tāre tuttare ture sarvaduṣṭapraduṣṭadhāraṇī · Toh 729 · Derge Kangyur

དཀའ་ཁྲོ་མཆོག་གསུམ་ལ་ཕགྱ་འཇམ་ལ།

Toh 729 in the Kangyur is a short dhāraṇī text associated with the bodhisattva Tārā, known in Sanskrit as a Tārā dhāraṇī and preserved in Tibetan within the collection of tantric and dhāraṇī works. The text opens with homage to the Three Jewels and to Āryāvalokiteśvara, reflecting the close relationship in Buddhist tradition between Tārā and Avalokiteśvara, and proceeds immediately into a mantra formula invoking Tārā with the well-known syllables oṃ tāre tuttare ture, accompanied by commands to subdue, paralyze, bewilder, and bind all malevolent forces. As a dhāraṇī, it belongs to the broader class of ritual and protective texts within the Kangyur, functioning as a concentrated formula believed to carry the power and blessings of the deity. Its brevity and structure are characteristic of the many standalone dhāraṇī texts preserved in the Kangyur, intended for recitation in devotional and ritual contexts.

Homage to the Three Jewels.

Namo ratnatrayāya. Nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisattvāya mahāsattvāya mahākāruṇikāya. Tadyathā: oṃ tāre tuttare ture sarvaduṣṭapraduṣṭaṃ mama kṛte jambhaya stambhaya mohaya bandhaya hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ.

Translator's Notes

- This passage is a dhāraṇī text consisting almost entirely of Sanskrit mantra material transliterated into Tibetan script, prefaced by a brief Tibetan homage formula. The dhāraṇī combines an opening homage to the Three Jewels and to Avalokiteśvara as bodhisattva, great being, and embodiment of great compassion, followed by a mantra associated with Tārā and invoking powers of suppression, paralysis, delusion, and binding against all malevolent forces. Because the body of the passage is Sanskrit mantra rather than semantic Tibetan prose, it is rendered directly in standard romanized Sanskrit rather than translated, which is the appropriate treatment for liturgical mantra material of this kind.
