The Chapter on the Gradual Methods of Practice from the Great Tantra of Excellent Accomplishment, known in Sanskrit as Susiddhikara-mahātantra-sāadhanopāyika-ṭaḷa and in Tibetan as Legs par grub par byed pa'i rgyud chen po las sgrub pa'i thabs rim par phye ba, is a tantric scripture devoted to the methods by which practitioners achieve the many accomplishments of mantra. It takes the form of a dialogue in which a great wrathful being, after paying homage to Vajradhara, asks how those who recite mantras can swiftly attain accomplishment, and what the characteristics of a secret mantra are. The text belongs to the early, or kriyā-class, tantric literature and sets out the stages of practice in a graded way. It is Toh 807 in the Kangyur, where it is classed among the tantras.

In the language of India: Susiddhikara-mahātantra-sāadhanopāyika-ṭaḷa. In the Tibetan language: The Chapter on the Gradual Methods of Practice from the Great Tantra of Excellent Accomplishment.

Homage to the glorious Vajrapāṇi. Homage to the Blessed One, Mañjughoṣa, whose body is wisdom.

Then the great and mighty wrathful one bowed his head at the feet of Vajradhara as well, and with palms joined spoke these words:

Blessed One, I have heard of the maṇḍala of the king of awareness-mantras, of its power, of its subjugation of hostile forces, and of this gathering of the retinue. Blessed One, how will those who recite come swiftly to attain the many accomplishments, so variously distinguished through the many secret mantras? What are the characteristics of a secret mantra? What are the characteristics of a master? What kind of person is the practitioner? Likewise, please speak of the mantra attendants. What kind of place is approved? Please tell me which locations are proper. What are the disciplines and restraints for one who recites secret mantras? Which flowers are auspicious, and which fragrances are praised? What is the rite of the offering cake? What are incense and lamps like? What are the varieties of action, whether pacifying, enriching, or wrathful? What are the superior, middling, and lesser accomplishments?

Please teach at length the rite of invitation, the fixed rules of offering, the application of protective actions, and the manner of recitation. Please teach how to satisfy the deities, how to give empowerment, how to prepare the secret mantra, how to maintain it, how to take it up fully, how to make restitution, and how to generate radiance. Please teach the rite of the burnt offering, the fixed requisites of the practice, the full characteristics of the substances, and how the substances are to be gathered. Please teach the rite of purification, the fixed measures, and the rites for accomplishing all these, proclaimed without omission.

Out of compassion for me and for those who recite, the Blessed One has taught all of this. Please teach me chiefly the fixed rules concerning the guarding of accomplishment-substances, how to give instruction, and how to put them into use. Please explain at length how to summon back what has been stolen, how to protect, how to repel, and the omens that foretell obstructing spirits. Please explain at length the empowerment for the activities of accomplishment, the maṇḍalas to be established, and all the other great secrets. Please explain the mudrā and the secret mantra that are required in this rite, the signs of successful accomplishment, and the dreams of those who recite. Out of compassion for all beings, quickly tell me these things.

Then the glorious Vajradhara, praised by all the holders of awareness-mantras, spoke in his great radiance to the greatly diligent, great wrathful one:

Since you have asked me this, great wrathful one, well done, excellent! Therefore listen with one-pointed mind to all of the excellent, supreme rites.

This is called the king of awareness-mantras, greatly diligent, never to be harmed even by the fierce, the Excellent Accomplisher. It encompasses all that belongs to secret mantra. This mantra tantra accomplishes and likewise teaches everything without omission. Those who rely on it with the secret mantras will swiftly succeed. This is the powerful king of awareness-mantras of all the families. The skilled apply it to all actions, such as protection and repelling, offering and satisfying the deities. It teaches, and it urges others on, and it brings about the accomplishment of all secret mantras. Or else its essence, joined with three Hūṃs, is applied by the wise to protection and the other actions, in accordance with the rites taught in the tantras. Having first examined the tantras, the practitioner then attains the accomplishments as well.

The distinctions among the secret mantras of the supreme, middling, and lowest accomplishments should be understood. For the three families are all gathered together in this maṇḍala. Therefore I shall explain all the rites of the mantras taught there.

The Sugata (the Well-Gone One) is to pacify. Those born of the lotus family are to increase. Those born of the vajra family, with their secret mantras, are to perform the actions of wrathful, fierce conduct.

What arises from the upper part of the body is supreme; what arises from the navel downward is the lowest. The accomplishment of mantras arising from the middle of the body is taught to be middling.

Supreme, middling, and lowest as well all come from the power of conceptual construction. The skilled teach the rites of secret mantra as threefold in respect of the accomplishments.

The skilled should perform the actions in three modes even within each of the three families, through the distinctions of supreme and the rest as taught, and of pacifying and the rest. For the supreme accomplishment, the awareness-mantra is taught to be the master. For the very lowest, the skilled should know commissioning and compelling and the like.

Pacifying and increasing, and whatever is of wrathful, fierce conduct, in all three families as well, all of these should be known by the distinctions of secret mantra.

Increasing is done with the king of awareness-mantras. Fierce conduct is practiced with the wrathful ones. Pacifying is done with Locanā and the others. These are the rites of the three natures.

Even what is not explicitly mentioned should be known through the words and syllables of the secret mantras. A mantra that urges on a given action should be understood as accomplishing that action.

By the pacific, pacifying actions are done. By those endowed with power, the actions of increase are likewise performed with secret mantras. By the fierce, fierce conduct is to be practiced.

Above all, as for pacifying action, since the Victor has spoken of it, one should pacify. The actions of increase taught in the glorious Saṃvara tantra are auspicious to perform. And by the wrathful ones of fierce conduct, through teachings such as those, the action is proclaimed as threefold.

Since most secret mantras contain words of urging, the actions of this and that kind are to be accomplished thoroughly by those very mantras themselves.

The king of awareness-mantras, the Blessed One, called the Perfect Accomplisher, is the Great Glorious One, who in particular performs all actions. He is honored by all the holders of awareness-mantras. The glorious Vajradhara teaches all the awareness-mantra tantras and likewise brings about their accomplishment.

His messengers, great and small, the wrathful ones, with their secret mantras and hand-emblems, and his retinue in manifold forms, are renowned for subduing others.

Whatever many secret mantras of this god among gods are taught are of great splendor and especially noble; all of them perform all actions. In the Victor family and the lotus family as well, because he is appointed king here, he should be known as supreme. There is none equal to him.

Secret mantras of few syllables, and those endowed with svāhā and om̐, quickly bring about all the pacifying actions.

Those with hūṃ and phaṭ, and those with many syllables rā and kan, are the secret mantras that the skilled should apply throughout to fierce conduct.

Mantras other than these, with meaning and words that are peaceful, the skilled should apply well to all actions of increase.

For the action of bringing down spirits and the like, the skilled should act through messengers and the like. Whatever secret mantras perform that action are to be applied to this and that purpose.

In the detailed and extensive teaching of the rites of the secret mantras that perform all actions, the action mentioned first is shown to be the principal one. Whatever secret mantras are taught on the occasion of a given introductory setting, that very action is shown as principal for them. The remainder should be understood in other contexts.

Having considered family, intrinsic nature, powers, and the action as well, one then acts in accord with one's own mind.

Here the preparatory service of the secret mantras is begun. This is the chapter distinguishing, in order, the characteristics of the secret mantras.

Next, from other treatises as well, I shall explain, just as it has been taught, the characteristics of the master, who is held to be the very root of the rite.

He is complete in every limb and endowed with the marks. He is skilled in the glorious temples. He delights single-mindedly in the Dharma, and he abides in his own training. To keep company with such a one brings happiness. His very nature is compassion, and he is loving. He is of noble family and venerable, and free of conceit. He is intelligent, eloquent, and greatly patient. He has entered into the meaning of the Great Vehicle and has a special devotion to the profound meaning. He regards even the smallest transgression with dread and restrains himself well. He is especially diligent in reading the sūtras, the dhāraṇīs and the like. He is diligent in the practice of the secret mantras, and he teaches well the instructions concerning temples. His rites succeed, and he is devoted to recitation. He is skilled in the rites of the maṇḍalas. He is pleasing and teaches well. He aspires to what is great and is free of discouragement. In the great maṇḍalas his own master has properly conferred empowerment upon him, and from his master he has received the scriptural transmission. Such a one is declared to be a master.

He himself, according to the rite, draws the maṇḍalas, the pledges, and so on. Whatever the rites of the secret mantras may be, it is he who is fit to teach them. All the secret mantras taught by him will be accomplished without doubt. Otherwise, even if one performs the preparatory service, all the recitation is without fruit.

Just as one regards the Three Jewels and the sons of the Victor, so, by repeated practice, one should regard the master of great power in the same way, and honor him. He urges all beings on and bestows refuge and the other commitments. He is the cause of all that is virtuous and of every higher rebirth. With the master as support, accomplishments, even exceptional ones, arise swiftly. Right up to the fruit of awakening, he is declared to be the cause. When, through service and attendance, he has at some time been pleased, then the secret mantras and the knowledge-mantras will be accomplished without doubt.

This is the chapter distinguishing, in order, the characteristics of the master.

Next I shall explain further the characteristics of the reciter of secret mantras, the one devoted to the rites of practice, by which accomplishment comes swiftly.

He is pure, disciplined, and steady. He is not discouraged, and he is intelligent and very conscientious. He is eloquent and fearless, and he has spiritual friends. He is patient and honest, without deceit or trickery. He is free of illness, and speaks the truth. He is skilled and adept, and he does not waver. Such an intelligent one, complete in all these limbs, will be auspiciously successful.

Whoever has faith in the Three Jewels and also meditates on the Great Vehicle, and is diligent in the side of virtue, will swiftly accomplish the knowledge-mantras.

Whoever is a bodhisattva, reveres the secret mantras, and holds in high regard service and attendance, and has compassion for all sentient beings, will attain the fruit of the knowledge-mantras. One who delights in solitude and speaks the truth, who is very clean, peaceful, and with an undistracted mind, will attain the accomplishments of the knowledge-mantras.

For whoever has even heard of the great power of the Vajra-holder, and, turning back, delights in him, in that person's hand all accomplishments stand ready, quickly. One who has few tasks and small desires regarding food, seats, and bedding, who is diligent and does not know weariness, will certainly accomplish.

When the rite is read out at length, whoever's mind becomes joyful, or whoever's hair stands on end, is a vessel for the fruit of the knowledge-mantras. Whoever, as each is explained, becomes of the very nature of that, and gives up attachment, attains accomplishments even in dream. In such a one, too, accomplishment is present.

Toward the master who holds the knowledge-mantras and the pledges, regard him as the Teacher himself. Whoever has a reverent mind and wisdom, in that person's hand accomplishment abides. Even if one has begun and no fruit appears, whoever does not abandon the knowledge-mantras...

...whoever is wise, and whose mind does not grow weary, obtains accomplishment. This is the chapter distinguishing, in due order, the characteristics of the practitioner.

Now, furthermore, for the practitioner's ritual undertakings, I shall explain the characteristics of those mantra-assistants who are truly auspicious.

One of noble family, who practices the Dharma and has faith, strong of mind and bold in effort, truthful in speech and greatly reverent, whose limbs are whole and not despised, neither too tall nor too stout, not gaunt and not dwarfish, not too uniform in complexion, free of illness: such a mantra-assistant is truly auspicious.

One who endures all hardships and is steady, who is diligent in all tasks, who is patient and capable of austerity, who is agreeable and speaks pleasantly, who is wise, upright, and free of pride, who has abandoned mutual rivalry, who is learned and loving toward his companions, who is mindful and also bold in giving up, who knows the distinction between secret mantras and knowledge-mantras, who recites the secret mantras and has keen discernment, whom the skilled take as the mantra's assistant for the rites of protection and the like; who is well restrained and knows the pledges, who delights in the teaching and knows the signs of those who perform recitation, and who has such faith: such a one is desired as a companion.

One whose intention is good and who does not grow discouraged, who does not give up until success is achieved, if the reciter relies on a companion of great strength of mind, he will attain accomplishment.

One who is without attachment even to great possessions, who is reverent and delights in being of benefit, such a one is proclaimed a true friend. Even if others tempt him with the substances of accomplishment, he does not give up so much as a drop of water; by this one knows him to be a capable friend.

One who, until accomplishment is reached, works toward it without doubt, and who also acts with loving-kindness, such a one is a capable assistant. One who is not parted from you for a long time, and who, though troubled by various kinds of harm, does not grow weary, such a one alone is the true assistant.

The qualities of the supreme companion of the practitioner should be understood in just this way. In particular, such a person is skilled in the tantras and maṇḍalas. A wise one who surpasses the practitioner in any quality can by himself perform the remaining rites of accomplishment: the empowerment ritual, the fire offering, the ritual killing of Dri and the like, and whatever rites of protection and so on there are. These the wise one should perform.

By him, too, all the cherished practices, outer and inner, should be brought to perfect completion through the rituals taught in the tantras. If any lapse has occurred in the earlier rites of accomplishment, then, keeping in mind the task, he should engage in it so as to repair it.

In other rites involving substances as well, so that no obstacle arises, either he should praise himself, or the reciter, pure in conduct and eagerly pursuing the substances, even at times when he has set aside his recitation, should always strive diligently to recite that mantra.

The companion should not speak during the meditation, and should not undertake any vow of observance. Because that restraint is pure, one should therefore engage in it fully. Whatever food belongs to him, the disciple should eat it after him.

The characteristics of the master and of the practitioner, and the characteristics of the mantra-assistants, whatever has been taught of these: those very qualities are the qualities of the supreme companion of the practitioner. This is the chapter distinguishing, in due order, the characteristics of the mantra-assistant.

Now, furthermore, I shall explain the characteristics of the place: in which regions the practitioner should dwell so that accomplishment is quickly attained.

Where, having subdued the four mārās, the Blessed One became fully awakened and attained a wondrous state, the supreme of all the many accomplishments, on the bank of the river Nairañjanā, a place that is pleasing and free of harm: of the accomplishment of that supreme field, the Blessed One himself has spoken.

There, even many mārās are unable to bring harm. Therefore, in such a place, the practitioner should count on success and begin all his rites.

Wherever the Dharma was taught, wherever the Sage passed into peace, and wherever, for the sake of ripening beings, his birth was shown: in those places, accomplishment is proclaimed to be of all three kinds. It is stable, and obstacles are swiftly pacified.

Wherever the buddhas and their disciples, those of great fortune, have dwelt, and in whatever place of the meritorious, there too accomplishment is proclaimed.

A mountain endowed with many kinds of springs, adorned with many sorts of trees, abundant in flowers and fruit, is proclaimed for the sake of accomplishment.

In whatever region of the wilderness there are flowers and fruit and abundant water, and where the mind too becomes delighted, in those places accomplishment is taught.

A grassy place where herds of deer roam in auspicious joy, free of venomous snakes, is beneficial for those who recite.

Where living beings are free of harm from such things as epidemics, and where one becomes deeply glad, that place is taught for the sake of accomplishment.

Hillocks, ridges, and mountain peaks, mountain meadows, and slopes of yak pastures with gently flowing streams: a mountain endowed with such distinctive features is taught as especially suited to accomplishment.

Where there are many delightful forest groves, abundant flowers, and trees of aromatic wood, that place is proclaimed for the sake of accomplishment.

A stūpa containing relics, mountains, the shores of lakes, mountains of many kinds, forests of unbroken growth, a charnel ground with smoke rising, waterfalls and pools, a delightful spot on a riverbank, a cow pen, fresh green grass, a tree with a rounded crown all about, a lone tree, a crossroads, a pond, and a place with a spring: these are proclaimed for the sake of accomplishment.

Whatever lands have been frequented by the lord of men, since it is said that accomplishment arises there especially, accomplishment will surely come about there. Whatever places honor the teachings of the buddhas, those lands are taught for the sake of accomplishment; others are said to have lesser merit.

Wherever there are many people who are virtuous and noble, the practitioner who desires accomplishment should dwell in that very place.

Just as the sites of maṇḍalas are proclaimed to be distinguished according to the differences of family and their qualities, so too is it with the sites for accomplishments. Wherever the mind of the practitioner who is to accomplish becomes joyful, there, by the graded stages of purification, he should begin his rites.

This is the chapter distinguishing, in due order, the characteristics of the place.

Now, furthermore, I shall explain the discipline of reciting the secret mantra: by dwelling in accordance with it, those who recite will swiftly attain accomplishment.

The wise practitioner should feel no hostility toward any secret mantras, toward any of the deities, or toward a great-souled reciter. The wise should not invent their own mantras or mantra rites. Nor should one show contempt for people of bad character.

Even if the guru who shows the maṇḍala should behave badly, one should never disparage him, whether by speech or in thought.

The wise should never, in anger, use against the knowledge-mantras the acts of suppressing, binding, cutting, or punishing, nor any such fierce conduct.

One should not take up a secret mantra without the permission of another. A knower of the rites should not give a mantra to one who has not offered service and respect.

One learned in the tantras should not give secret mantras, mudrā, detailed rites, the explanation of the tantras and maṇḍalas, to one who has not entered the maṇḍala. Nor should one give any kind of weapon...

Likewise, one should not eat the likeness of living beings, nor the likeness of the various mudrās, and one should not trample upon them. The practitioner who has understanding should not slight those of lesser standing, should not touch what is unclean, and should not trample anything even with the foot.

One should not quarrel with followers of the Great Vehicle, nor with those who possess wisdom. Having heard of the great and mighty bodhisattvas, one should not turn away in rejection. One should never compete with fellow practitioners of mantra. For small faults one should not, in anger, resort to fierce conduct.

One who abides in the rites of recitation should not sing, dance, or play, and should not wear garlands or bright colors for the sake of adornment. Trampling, leaping, running, whispering, and taking up a bad posture arising from the body, all of these should be entirely abandoned. One who abides in the Dharma of truth should also abandon false speech, harsh words, words that sow discord, and idle talk. One should not dwell together with non-Buddhists, nor engage in disputes with them. One should not speak the recitation of secret mantras to outcastes and those of low birth.

When the wise one is reciting, except for a single attendant of the mantra, one should not speak with anyone at all, there being no need to be together with others.

One should not anoint the body with oil or butter, and one should not eat sesame. Radish, garlic, salt, the various kinds of sour spirits, ground cakes, bean dumplings, likewise lentil broth, and sesame cakes: one who desires accomplishment should avoid all of these. One should avoid all foods of the corrupting spirits, all food offerings of the torma, as well as kṛsarā and milk gruel, while reciting secret mantras.

One should not ride in chariots and the like, nor crush lotuses and the like. One should not touch with the foot the leftover or discarded food. All rites of coquettish display, wearing sandals, carrying parasols, and all bodily activities of that sort should be avoided while reciting secret mantras. One should not rub foot against foot, nor rub hand against hand. One should not cast excrement or urine into water, nor near it.

One should not eat from the cupped hands alone, nor eat from a broken vessel. Nor should one eat upon the back of a leaf. The wise should not eat food to which they are attached. On couches and small beds, the practitioner who has understanding should not sleep together with another who is unclean, nor lying on the back or face down.

One should not eat again and again, nor eat too little or too much. One should not refrain from eating altogether, and one should not eat what one doubts. One should not delight in marvels, nor look upon spectacles of any kind. Toward all women one should not be attached with a clinging mind that is infatuated with their wanton ways.

One who abides in the rites of mantra recitation should never be unrestrained in body, speech, or mind, in eating or likewise in conduct. A learned householder reciting mantras should not wear clothes of altered color. Likewise one should never wear a single garment that is old or dirty. One should not belittle oneself, nor be displeased with oneself, nor become despondent, nor trample others forcibly.

Except when one has been given a reply, one should not on one's own initiative send forth a secret mantra. One should not scorn it with a deluded mind, nor practice the visualization laxly. Unless the mind has strayed elsewhere, and unless it is filled with many thoughts, or with unclean attachment, the reciter should recite the secret mantra.

One should not perform the rites of possession by spirits, nor the rites of protection and of turning back. Whether by one's own mantra or another's, one should not by recitation perform the work of poison. Except for what is needed in practice, one should not use secret mantras for any other purpose. Nor should one apply secret mantras for the sake of rivalry or of provoking others.

The wise should recite at three times of the day, and bathe at the three times. Taking water from a lake or the like, one should bless it with the mantra and wash. Oṃ hana vajri vajrena hā. Recited three times over the ground, this is for anointing the upper body and the like.

Having completed all the actions of the body, the practitioner should bathe. Oṃ vajra-tāra hūṃ. The intelligent one, in every undertaking, should first cast this mantra upon the water, and so clear away obstacles at the outset; only then should the work be begun. Namo vajrāya. Hūṃ hana dhuna mathavi dhānsaya utsāraya phaṭ.

Then the wise one should stir the water with the hand and recite over it, and until the mind has become pure should also speak this secret mantra. Namo ratnatrayāya. Namaś caṇḍavajrapāṇaye mahāyakṣasenāpataye. Namo vajrakrodhāya mahādaṃṣṭrotkaṭabhairavāya. Tadyathā: Oṃ amṛtakuṇḍali, khakha khāhi khāhi, tiṣṭha tiṣṭha, bandha bandha, hana hana, daha daha, garja garja, visphoṭaya visphoṭaya, sarva vighna vināyakaṃ mahāgaṇapati jīvitāntakarāya svāhā.

With the water over which the secret mantra has been recited, one may then bathe as one wishes. While bathing, one should recite this mantra again and again in the mind. Oṃ amṛte hūṃ phaṭ.

When the bathing is finished, one should recite this same mantra over the water once more and pour three handfuls upon the crown of the head. While bathing, the practitioner should keep silent. Then, repeating this secret mantra, one should also bind up the topknot at the crown. Oṃ susiddhikari svāhā.

Then, having also done the purifying contact, one should guard oneself with great care by the secret mantra that accomplishes all actions, and recite one's own vidyā-mantra a hundred times. Oṃ kīli kīlaya vajra hūṃ phaṭ.

Having recited as much as one wishes, the wise one goes to the place of the deity. Until then, one should not be angry, nor become possessed of desire. With a mind devoted to the deity, one should go without distraction. One should take up the vows and guard the pledges with great care. Skilled in the rites of recitation, one should be diligent in recitation, constantly make maṇḍalas, and constantly read the sacred books. The wise should constantly make stūpas, and always do what is wholesome.

The practitioner of discernment should take refuge at the three times of the day, confess misdeeds at the three times, and generate the awakening mind at the three times. One who knows the rites as seen in the tantras should make aspirations at the three times. Whatever conduct the rites prescribe, one should do as far as one is able, according to one's wish.

One should be constantly diligent in giving, free of weariness and endowed with compassion, always patient and endowed with loving-kindness, and always possessed of diligence. One should also constantly meditate, with firm intention, on the six recollections. Having heard the Dharma in its many aspects, one should practice with devotion. One should read the secret mantra rites closely and honor the mantras and mudrās. As set forth in the rites, the one possessed of intelligence should draw the maṇḍala.

With right view made certain and the awakening mind made firm, the wise one should always keep close the fourfold assembly, monks and the rest. Having bound the pledge with the mudrā, one should teach one's own secret mantras and tantras. The wise should fully expand all the scriptural transmissions of secret mantra.

The practitioner should make offerings especially on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth days, and in the half-month of miracles. Recitation, fire offering, and worship, and likewise the taking up of vows, and especially merit: toward these one should be reverent and strive earnestly.

By means of this very mantra, praised a hundred or a thousand times, the wise one always holds the vajra of action. Oṃ dhuna vajra ha. Draw down the meteoric iron. With wood of the pāla tree, or neem, or a charred piece of wood from a charnel ground, or sandalwood, or whatever else is suitable, one should make a three-pronged vajra.

That which is called the "perfect accomplisher" is held by the wise one in the left hand, and it is to be taken up for the rites of recitation, fire offering, and the like. By holding this vajra, obstructors and misleading spirits, and all those who cause harm, are struck with terror and become fastened in place.

With that very same secret mantra the wise one should always make offerings. Having anointed it with red sandalwood, one sets it down and recites the mantra before it. This is called the vajra of action, and it performs even wondrous deeds. It is proclaimed to be uniquely precious for practitioners.

When engaging in the practice of recitation, one should always wear on the hand cords perfumed with incense and recited over a hundred times with this vidyā mantra: Oṃ kulandhari bandha bandha hūṃ phaṭ.

This great mudrā-mantra is renowned as Māmakī. It accomplishes all vidyā mantras, and likewise causes blessing and increase to flourish. By it one may perform all rites such as protection. It is the mother of all vidyā mantras and of the vajra-holders.

In the family of Vajrapāṇi, the cord should be made of rudrākṣa seeds. By the distinctions of the counting beads and so forth, one should understand it for the other vidyā mantras as well.

For the families of Uṣṇīṣa and Padma, the great vidyā mantra of Locanā, and the White-Robed One as well: whoever it may be, one should recite it in front of that deity. Oṃ ruru sphuru jvala tiṣṭha siddha locani sarva artha sādhanī svāhā.

Homage to the Three Jewels. Homage to the bodhisattva, the great being, Avalokiteśvara, the sovereign. Whether through seeing, hearing, touching, or even simply remembering, may I become the healer of all the illnesses of all sentient beings. Tadyathā: kaṭe vikaṭe nikaṭe kaṭa vikaṭa kaṭaṃ kaṭe bhagavati vijaye svāhā.

By these very mantras, one will not be overpowered by obstructors. By reciting them, one swiftly attains accomplishment and becomes pure.

With the three-syllable essence of the family, recited individually, and with a purification by kuśa grass as well, one should fasten the cord upon the hand: jina jik, ārolik, vajradhṛk.

For offerings, recitation, and fire offering, one should always hold it. When the practitioner is striving, by this the hands become pure.

A thread spun by a young girl is steeped in the juice of lebargan or in saffron, and recited over a thousand times. Then, having tied seven knots, one should bind it around one's waist with this vidyā mantra. By this, the one who repeats the mantra will always have his seminal fluid held back. Oṃ hara hara bandhani śukra dhāraṇī sindha artha svāhā.

For the rites of recitation and fire offering, one should always wear an upper garment. There is no fault in lying down or in being exposed, and this too should be especially praised. In outdoor places one should always wear wooden sandals. In the places of gods, teachers, and objects of worship, one should abstain from them.

Whoever, ever diligent, is a reciter who desires accomplishment should always honor the objects of worship with body, speech, and mind. On seeing a stūpa, pay homage; on seeing a monk, pay homage; on seeing the gods, offer service; on seeing one's teacher, make offerings. On hearing the profound Dharma explained, generate faith. Take great delight in the power of the supreme bodhisattvas. On hearing of the manifold rites of mantra, let the mind be gladdened. The practitioner who desires accomplishment should, being wise, arouse diligence. What is to be done and what is not to be done has been set out in the discipline of the vidyā mantras.

Reflect constantly, again and again, upon the vows of the training itself. Abandon, by day and by night, attachment to one's own comfort. Having done this, one should do that; let one become unwavering in this way. Whatever heedless acts were committed by day should be confessed individually at night; whatever was committed at night should be confessed at dawn. Take great delight in what has been done well. Perform recitation, fire offering, and purification. The practitioner should dwell with firm resolve in the supreme vidyā mantras, in self-restraint, and in the discipline of the vidyā mantras. This is the chapter on the gradual stages of the discipline of the vidyā mantras.

The pacifying, the enriching, and the wrathful activity that have been taught: without making any distinction among them all, I have proclaimed them in three kinds. Some secret mantras are noble, some belong to the gods, and some are said to belong to the earth-dwellers. All are gathered into three families.

For these, a wise person should offer flowers of many kinds, those born on dry land and those born in water, praising them and presenting them according to their classification.

"This flower of divine substance, born pure in a pure place, I offer with my faith. Having accepted it, be pleased with me."

Oṃ āhara āhara sarva vidyādhara pūjite svāhā.

"White, fragrant flowers I offer to the Buddha, the Blessed One. White water-born flowers I offer to noble Avalokiteśvara. Many exceedingly fragrant flowers I offer to Vajrapāṇi himself. To the others not mentioned, I offer whatever is suitable."

Sumanā, padma, pāṭalā, nāgakesara, campaka, bakula, kumuda, sālu, mālatī, kuruvaka, yūthikā, kuraṇṭaka, kāśa, pāli, kadamba, madhu, bundika, drina, śulyaṃ, aśoka, nāgapuṣpa, punnāga, navamālikā, damanaka, the mango blossom, kathara, mucukunda, kāñcana, the tree utpala, trika, utpala, tagara, kuṃḍa, and also karavīra and others. Flowers of these kinds, growing in villages and in forests, many born in water and on land, should be known according to the rites. Through distinctions of family and of activity, one skilled in worshiping the gods should apply them.

Sumanā, tagara, kunda, likewise mālatī and yūthikā, and nāgakesara: these are said to belong to the Tathāgata family. Utpala, kumuda, and padma, śāla, vṛtti, śepā, likewise tagara and punnāga: these are auspicious for the Lotus family. Blue utpala and the like, priyaṅgu, and the flower of the kuyi, and whatever else is declared suitable: these are said to belong to the Vajra family.

In particular, by distinctions of fragrance and of color, such as white, all flowers should be applied to the activities such as pacifying. For pacifying, the sweetest is supreme; for wrathful conduct, the bitter; others with other flavors should be known for the enriching activity.

Daśa, gelpa, shrubs, likewise trees and thickets, creepers and leaves, and flowers of many kinds, are auspicious for the earth-dwellers.

Sumanā is for the Tathāgata family; the lotus is auspicious for the Lotus family; blue utpala is declared supreme for the Vajra family. Flowers of the finest fragrance and color should be known for supreme activity; the inferior and the very inferior should be known for the remaining activities.

Flowers of various colors, and whatever tree-flowers there are, please any vidyā mantra that bears a female name. Red or, in particular, white karavīra pleases the wrathful ones, the female messengers, and all the radiant ones. Śāla, kilakuṭaja, kanyikāra, the supreme āsana, the flower of the bilva, and kathara: these suit all who perform every kind of activity. Many flower garlands are desired for all activities. By these very applications, scattered petals should also be understood.

Avoid flowers not named in the family lists, those with thorns, those with a foul smell, those that are acrid or hot, and those of ugly color. Adhimukta, mangola...

Avoid especially the flowers that are reviled, such as nīvāla and the like, as well as jāvā and keṭaka. Śamā flowers, priyaṅgu, rice, barley, sesame, and lebrgan paste, together with dūrvā grass and the like, are approved in all the secret mantra systems.

Where other offerings cannot be found, even grains of rice or kidney beans will do. Even this single item alone is said to suffice for making a good offering.

In place of other flowers, there are others as well: byeu-rug, danta, merupa, tamāla, kṛṣṇamālaka, madhulunga, and arjaka. Leaves of flowers and the like may also be offered. Roots such as balaka and the like, and fruits such as lishi and the like, may be offered in place of flowers, duly, according to the ritual.

When one cannot obtain this or that flower and offers something else instead, then even this is praised by the self-arisen knowledge mantra. If the wise one, skilled in the tantras, cannot obtain flowers, then what has been seen, heard, or done may serve. Make whatever offering is suitable. Even when abundant offerings are available, one should generate reverence in the mind, join the palms at the crown of the head, and bring forth all the offerings. Without doubt, the intelligent one, having thoroughly imbued the offerings with the mind, whatever is made through such thorough imbuing, that offering is supreme.

This concludes the chapter distinguishing the characteristics of flowers.

Now I shall explain the substances of fragrance: which scents are suitable, which bring auspiciousness to all secret mantras, and which are needed by those who recite.

Glāṅgang, kutra, naṭa, ruṇa, urshing, balika, agaru, incense resin, śarīvī, saffron, sandalwood, varṇaka, battra, dara, the lamp tree, sprib, shugpa, tila, parṇika, lishi, the tree tsakaliya, thang-shing, arju, priyaṅgu, saura, nanda, dalabaga, śilābaluka, devadāru, golden-hued phrom, śathika, pītha, kaṭuka, phali, nalī, śiva, campaka, suvarṇa, śakala, madhulunga with its bark, bālu, spang-spos, pupri, khenpa, mura, buruba, keśī, tamālabuna, suk-smel, bya-khra, naka, ushu, bashpila, bali, śatapuṣpa, hareṇu, jāti, phalaka, kakkola, katupala, tsarongka, sauniya, dhamaka, candana and turuṣka, pratara, thang-chu, rasa, and kesara: these and others are gathered together.

One who knows the lineage of fragrance preparations should compose them as one wishes. Flowers, fruits, and thang-chu together should be applied to the family of the Victor. Those that have bark, heartwood, and the like are taught as applied to the lotus family. Those made from stalks, roots, and the like are said for the vajra family. Where no distinction is drawn, they serve all who perform every kind of activity.

For the Tathāgata family, offer agaru alone, the supreme one. For the lotus family, the wise one should offer white sandalwood alone. Saffron alone is especially to be offered to Vajrapāṇi. Each of these alone suffices, and it is said to be perfumed with camphor.

For all the vajra holders, red sandalwood is approved. Scents such as priyaṅgu please the vidyā mantras bearing female names. Spang-spos and suk-smel combined with grains are proclaimed for the vidyā queens. Sandalwood, saffron, and agaru are for all the vidyā kings. Compounded with shugpa, they bring auspiciousness to the attendants and servants. For the others, if the offering is made with ordinary materials of another kind, it will please them all the more.

For all the general activities of all three families, black agaru alone is especially auspicious. A white color suits pacifying; yellow fits increasing. For wrathful and forceful conduct, bsung-med and a red color are very auspicious. For the great siddhis, use fragrances, thang-chu, and fruits combined. For the intermediate, the essences of flowers; for ordinary purposes, ordinary substances.

Living creatures, liquor, salt, mustard, and the odors of onions and garlic should never be mixed in.

Likewise, for powders and for ointments, and for the anointing of the offerings as well, the colors too should be known according to the manner of this teaching.

Then comes the verse of offering:

These supreme divine substances, these fragrances,
Pure, and arisen from what is pure,
I offer with my faith.
Accept them, and be pleased with me.

Then the mantra: Āhara, āhara, sarva-vīryadhara pūjite svāhā.

The practitioner should recite this mantra, together with the mantra of his own family, repeatedly, and having purified the fragrances with fumigation, he should offer them to the deities according to the rite. Whenever he cannot obtain other fragrances or other substances for offering, then with the secret mantra of his own awareness-family, he should offer even that, which is likewise highly praised.

This concludes the gradual exposition of the characteristics of fragrance.

Now, as to incense for all three families in general: sandalwood, agaru, and saffron are each, in due order, pleasing to the three families respectively, and all incense substances likewise.

Next come the standard ingredients: śrīveṣṭaka, pine resin, sarjarasa, guggul, śāllaki, camphor, ketaka pollen, lāmajjaka, honey, gutha, giricandana, brown sugar, tamāla leaf, agaru, haritakī, turuṣka, aguru, bhallātaka; sandalwood, lamp-tree, thang-shing, pārīpelava, nalakī, kharā, spang-spos, uśīra, and substances belonging to the fruit category, and others. Various combinations of these are taught as incense for the secret mantra rites.

Of these, śrīveṣṭaka is taught for mantras that include deities. Yakṣas desire guggul. The ketaka pollen pleases the vidyā mantras. All ordinary mantras are especially pleased by pine resin and its pollen. Śāllaki is for the female messengers, and resin for the attendants. The incense of the seven thang-chu is to be known as accomplishing all aims, and should be applied to all the activities beginning with pacifying. For the supreme, use the thang-chu incense; for the intermediate, the essences are taught. The remaining incense substances are for minor rites.

Camphor, turuṣka and agaru: these three are called the supreme fragrances. With sandalwood and brown sugar added, they make the five fragrances. If resin and curd are added, they are called the seven fragrances. These three excellent incenses are taught as chief for all activities. For all minor mantra rites, a blend of brown sugar, honey and haritakī, if combined as incense, will be suited to the lotus family.

Brown sugar, vajra, haritakī, kharā, and honey with pollen: this five-part incense should be applied in all rites beginning with pacifying. If one can obtain any single fragrance, one may offer it, whichever is available; or else one may prepare incense from whatever substances are at hand. The wise, having examined by this method what is suitable and unsuitable, should offer incense blended from fragrant substances according to the rite.

Incense comes in four forms: pills, lumps, powder, and sticks. Knowing the types of incense, one should apply them to the activities accordingly. For pacifying, pills are best; for increasing, lumps are best; for wrathful and forceful conduct, powder; and for all purposes, sticks are auspicious. Make pills with brown sugar; make lumps with honey and the like; mix powders with thang-chu; sticks are auspicious when made with butter. The wise should never compound incense with bad substances, with nails, with all kinds of resinous gums, with fats, with liquor, and the like.

Then the verse of offering:

This incense, increaser of fragrance, food of the gods,
This delightful essence of the forest,
I offer with my faith.
Please accept this incense.

Then the mantra: Āhara, āhara, sarva-vidyādhara pūjite svāhā.

The practitioner should first recite this mantra, together with the mantra of his own awareness-family, repeatedly, and having purified the incense with fumigation, offer it to the deities according to the rite. Whenever he cannot obtain other incense or other substances, then with the mantra of his own family he should offer even that, which is likewise highly praised.

This concludes the gradual exposition of the characteristics of incense.

Then, furthermore, for all the deities of the secret mantra,

Now I shall explain, in accordance with its meaning, the rite of the lamp offering, by which the deities are pleased.

If one makes the vessel that holds the lamp oil from gold, silver, copper, iron, or else from clay, the secret mantra deities will be wholly pleased.

According to the particular kind of rite being described, the wick should be made from the heart of cotton, from new cloth, from dūgūla silk, from cloth of fine quality, and the like. According to the distinctions of pacifying and the other rites, the oil should be fragrant: either oil from grain that is scented and pleasing, or else made with fragrant butter. Oil that comes from fragrant trees should be known as suited to pacifying activity. Sesame oil is for enriching, and mustard oil is auspicious for wrathful activity. For all the awareness-mantras, oil from the zarma plant; for secret mantras of the fruit family, oil from the khabi tree. For the common deities, it is universally praised. For the flesh-eaters, fish oil; for the yakṣas, fat is taught; for others of the very lowest sort, oil of the bhallātaka and the like. For all the dwellers in charnel grounds, and for the accomplishments of the raised corpse and so forth, the oil of the great fat is especially fitting. For all rites that are pure, reddish-yellow butter is taught as supreme. Or else, as stated in the tantras, one should examine it by the color of the cow. Oil that comes from medicinal substances is taught for all enriching rites. All fragrant oils are for pacifying; foul-smelling ones are for wrathful conduct. By this manner of rite, whether seen or unseen, the wise should arrange lamp offerings for all the secret mantras.

Then the verse of offering:

Destroyer of malignant spirits, auspicious, virtuous, and dispeller of all darkness,

With faith I offer this to you.

Please accept this lamp.

Then the mantra: Ālokaya, ālokaya, sarva-vidyādhara pūjite svāhā.

The practitioner should first recite this mantra, together with the mantra of his own family, repeatedly. Then, having purified the lamp with incense, he should offer it to the deities according to the rite. Whenever, lacking other lamps or other substances, he cannot offer them, then with the secret mantra of his own awareness he should offer even that, which is likewise highly praised.

This concludes the gradual exposition of the characteristics of the lamp.

Now I shall explain, just as before, all the rites of food offerings to the deities, by which, when they are offered, accomplishments are obtained.

Roots, fruits, and the like, such as fruits and radishes, are what is eaten. Foods together with their sauces are, in short, taught to be edibles. Gruels and drinks are the various kinds of beverages. Thus all four kinds are the subject of the rite of the torma offering.

The citron (bījapūra) alone is highly auspicious for all secret mantras. Likewise the apple and the mango should be known as suited to the three families. For pacifying, one offers what is sweet; for enriching, what is sweet and sour. Fruits of various kinds, with other flavors, are offered to those of wrathful and fierce conduct. The coconut, the tamāla, the bilva, the neem, and likewise things that are reviled, should not be offered to any secret mantra deities.

For the great accomplishments, abundant, precious, and delicious offerings are praised; for the middling, those of medium sweetness; and for the lowest, the lowest kinds. Fruits bearing the names of goddesses are especially pleasing to all awareness-mantras. The bitter forest fruit is auspicious for the awareness-kings. For the wrathful ones, the bilva; for yakṣas, what comes from the banyan; for all the glorious goddesses, the kapittha; for the messengers, the biyalaja. The remaining kinds, of various sorts, should be applied to those who desire the remainder.

The radishes of villages and wilds, if fragrant and flavorful, and the radishes of the vidārī, are praised for all rites. Those that are exceedingly sweet and that people especially crave, and radishes born on mountains, are particularly sweet. Bi, ri, kāśeru, bayañ-se, kukkuṭa, and ripened mon-pa do-ba should be offered to the Victor family. Radishes born in water are auspicious for all of the lotus family.

All the radishes that are medicinal, whether bitter, pungent, or any of the rest, should be offered to Vajrapāṇi himself. Or else, according to the particular rite, radishes endowed with fragrance, color, and flavor should be offered as suitable, for pacifying and the other activities. For the superior, middling, and lesser accomplishments, radishes of superior, middling, and lesser quality should be offered to each respectively. Just as with radishes, so too roots should be offered, as suitable, to the rites of pacifying and the others, and to the families and the accomplishments.

Garlic, the leek-like onion, bitter things, and pungent things, and those without flavor or of foul quality, are not to be offered to the secret mantras.

Pūpa, svasti, ulopi, and the kinds of vaṭaki; the varieties of ham-cho; various dishes of grain; various kinds of sweet drinks; various foods and edibles; laddus and fried cakes; the kinds called pinta, kośa, and phenaka; the fat-cake, vartā, and aśoka; khurba, guṭa, and piṇḍaka; the meat-fried and oil-fried purṇa; māṣa, buva, and vidagdha; purṣa, vartalava, and the gar-bhod and kari kinds; the house-bird, the goose-shaped, the makā; the sikta and the bow-shaped sweet; the śiri-purṇa and vistaka; the pangi, zangi, and zomshang; the burama, pupa, khajjuka; the buva, the speckled gartā; the three-cornered sugar cake, the barapaṭa; the kinds of pina made from sap; the nga-nga-gyal and the bung-ba lump; the butter purṇa and sarjaka; the kamotika and hondon; the bereg and the śatapa; those shaped like deer, birds, and fish; the various karṇaprīti; those shaped like leopards and water-buffaloes; likewise the karkapiṇḍaka; the garland, the bhalagharta, the śibtika, and the ox-ear; and those made from molasses, grain, and butter: all such foods should be offered, as suitable, to the family, the rite, the purpose, and the accomplishment.

For pacifying, the pītaka is praised. For increasing, those made of wheat are praised. Those made of māṣa and the like are praised for the wrathful and fierce practices. Having understood all these foods, and the distinctions among edibles and chewables, one should offer all of them to the deities of the secret mantras.

The śrīpeta is for the lotus family. Laddus are for the one who holds the vajra. For the yakṣas, bupaśi. For the female-passion rites and the vidyā mantras, one should follow the detailed ritual procedure, and having understood the distinctions among the secret mantras, one should offer even a little of whatever else is wanted, such as worldly offerings.

Svasti, ulo, and pupa are offered to the three families in order. The remainder should also be offered to the others, as suitable, laying down a foundation first.

Śāli rice, the sixteen-fold preparation, jutse, and khre, and well-prepared milk gruel: these dishes should be offered there. Various bean soups and the like, fragrant and pleasing, and well and thoroughly prepared, should also be offered as broths. Barley, sweet barley, and rice dishes are proclaimed for the principal rites. Whatever is somewhat inferior, and for the middling, śāli rice and the sixteen-fold preparation: the principal is the rite of pacifying, and the middling are those of increasing. For what is taught as lesser, the wrathful and fierce, apply the deity offerings in due order. Know the family according to what kind of rite, and the accomplishment according to what kind of family. By the sequence of distinguishing the secret mantras, all the rites are carried out here.

For pacifying, the sweet is praised first. For increasing, the sweet and sour. Bitter, pungent, and astringent broths and the like are for the wrathful rites. For pacifying, milk gruel is taught. Kṛsara is for the wrathful practices. Curds, rice porridge, and the others are all auspicious for increasing. The kinds of edibles are various; most of those of villages and wilds are explained here in small part, as the entirety and the full detail

Let it be known from other sources as well. Whatever is finest in the world, and whatever one's own self craves, all of that should first be offered to the buddhas by one who is wise.

Whatever foods and edibles are taught for the secret mantras, just those should be offered by the wise. If done otherwise, accomplishment will not be attained. Whatever is forbidden, or unmentioned, or somewhat foul, all of that is taught as especially to be offered in the wrathful practices.

Perfumes, incense, lamps, flowers, and food offerings: all of these are also taught, by this very rite, for pacifying. Having understood the nature of the secret mantras, together with their power and their function, one should offer the food offerings and edibles proper to them, as is fitting.

Svastika and ulopa, whatever edibles are at hand with raw sugar, fruits of the lotus root, and milk gruel are desired. The torma called "desired by all," which accomplishes every aim, should be known for all secret mantras, but it is not for the practice of fierce wrath.

Whatever is at hand from these same things is called the "many-colored." What is mixed with a little of something else is called the "varied torma." If from those first two, one has taken away a single kind, or added whatever more is available, it is taught as the "vast torma."

Rice, curds, milk, and butter are named the "three whites." Rice, milk, honey, and butter make the torma of "three sweets." Sayali and linka, with beans, the sesame cake called pistaka, and lotus root and fruits, each added in small amounts, together with flowers, parched rice, and water, offered with leaves, make the torma for all secret mantras. Its name is "for all spirits."

Milk gruel, parched rice, svastika, butter, honey, milk gruel, pija and pūra: these are always the food offerings of pacifying. Curds and "hand rice-gruel," raw sugar, ulopi, śrīvesta and similar foods are always the food offerings of increasing. Rice with butter, kotrava, edibles with sesame and pūpa, bean broth, and kṣara: these are always for the wrathful practices.

Fruits and roots with śāli rice, sweet drinks with honey, and many edibles with raw sugar: these are for the yakṣa torma. Foods with broth, drinks, and pūrṇabhṛstaka, with their various fruits, are the auspicious food offerings for all vidyā mantras.

Whatever is praised by many, fragrant, and craved by most, those things should be offered to the supreme practitioners and to the holy ones. The varied purposes are distinguished from these rites that have been taught. According to family, aim, and particular accomplishment, one should know the repetitions appropriate to each.

First, having spread a base of clean leaves or washed foliage, and knowing the distinctions of the rite, one should afterward offer the food offering. Lotus leaves, palāśa, or leaves of a milk-bearing tree, or else silk or cotton cloth, are praised as the spreading for pacifying. All water-born petals, or the clean leaves of trees, or a sheet spread on the ground, are for increasing, as are the broad leaves of the water tree. Arghabhalataka, or the leaves of the khabo tree, or whatever else the wise find suitable, should be spread for fierce purposes. Leaves bearing the names of the vidyā mantras should be spread by those mantras. For the attendants, grass is laid out; green leaves are laid on the ground.

The student too, by this rite, for the supreme, middling, and lowest, having smeared the ground and shown the manner, is taught to do whatever is fitting. Having made the special preliminary contact, one should begin the food-offering rites. In the food-offering rite, first one should distribute svastikas; then roots, tubers, and fruits; after those, the drinks; then the many edibles; and after that the foods are proclaimed as to be offered.

Last of all come curds and milk. These are taught as the offering foods for the deities in the rite. Whatever has not been named in this rite should also be understood as included. In maṇḍala rites and in the practice of accomplishment, one should make the offering foods with earnest diligence. Therefore the wise should make the offering foods of good quality and in generous abundance. At the time of the approach practice, the torma rite is taught to be performed as far as one is able, as taught, and in whatever quantity is available. At the seasonal junctures it should be done especially well.

From the substances to be burned, and from whatever food is one's own, one should first present the choicest portion. One who knows the rite should then recite the mantra. Whatever offering foods have been taught, and whatever kinds of substances one has obtained, once the wise have offered these, they should recite just as on a single day. Since the offering of food to the deities is said to be the meal of the secret mantra, one should always give food through it. Therefore the reciter should make the offering. Roots, tubers, fruits, and whatever small offering food one has, presented to the secret mantra at the three times of day, will bring the attainment of siddhi. If the reciter does not present the offering foods to the secret mantra, he will become rough and ill-complexioned, and be tormented by hunger. Without offering foods his mind will be filled with many discursive thoughts; the deities will not be accomplished, and obstructing spirits will also overpower him. Therefore, with great and earnest diligence, one should present well to the secret mantra with its retinue the offering foods, whatever one has obtained, at the proper seasons.

At the time of the approach practice, the reciter should respectfully offer the tormas to all the deities, and to the spirits, in the surrounding area outside the dwelling. Whatever substances are contrary or inauspicious, whatever are bad and despised, and whatever others are impure, all these should be avoided for the offering foods. In all things and in all rites one should make generous offerings. The foods offered to all the deities are praised by the secret mantra itself. Medicines and their essences are pleasing to the mind. With this one should say:

These essences of mantra-food I offer with my faith. Having accepted them, be pleased with me. Āhara, āhara. Sarva-vidyādhara-pūjite svāhā.

The practitioner should first recite this mantra and also his own mantra over the offering food, and then, after purifying it with incense, offer it to the deities as the rite prescribes. If at some time one cannot obtain the other kinds of offering foods and offers something else, then too it is praised by the self-arisen secret mantra. This is the chapter distinguishing the stages of the tormas rite.

Pacifying, enriching, and likewise the wrathful practice: in brief, the rites are proclaimed in all secret mantras as of three kinds. The rites by which the attainments of all three kinds come swiftly and are certain to be accomplished are explained here.

Having established the mindfulness of loving-kindness, one should be wholly devoted to the Three Jewels. Becoming peaceful, one should perform peaceful recitation or the fire offering. From the first day of the waxing moon, one should properly begin the rites, and especially in the evening, for that is the time of pacifying rites. Since the gods of the Pure Abodes look upon it everywhere then, the rites will swiftly be accomplished. Therefore one should begin everything then.

Wearing white clothes, seated on a seat of kuśa grass, facing north, pure and peaceful, one should perform the pacifying rite as taught. At the three times of day, one should smear the place with fresh cow dung, and if one scatters white flowers, it is most auspicious. Then barley, milk gruel, and curds, or rice, or sesame, or dūrvā grass or green kuśa grass, or priyaṅgu flowers, or sāli rice-grains or saffron, or white flowers, or kindling of śamī wood, or else fragrant water, or the wood of a tree growing at a shrine are suitable.

Let the fuel be moist sticks, leafy, with milky sap, cut from the tips of the sacrificial branches. Honey or else butter is also suitable. The rite taught in the Kalpa, this and that, one should employ. One who is intent on the pacifying rite should take a fire made from a milk-bearing tree, kept burning continuously, from a person who maintains it. Having made the fire in accordance with the rite, if one offers the burnt oblation for the pacifying action, it will bestow accomplishment abundantly.

On a fire of milk-bearing sacrificial wood, with sticks a span in length, one should mix milk, honey, and butter and make the burnt offering for the pacifying rite. Dung of cattle from the forest, and likewise good wood of the śamī, or else the fuel of fragrant trees, is auspicious for the pacifying rite.

Let the fire pit be dug in white earth, round on all sides, and make it a cubit in measure, twelve finger-widths deep. Above that, set a rim of four finger-widths, perfectly even. At its foot place a wheel, one finger-width in height. Seated in the lotus posture, practice meditation with the mind, make offerings and so on properly, and then perform the pacifying rite.

First make offerings to the Teacher, the Great Sage, to the Perfection of Wisdom, to the hearers free from attachment, and to the bodhisattvas. Make offerings to Maitreya, to the Tathāgata's Tuft of Hair, to the Invincible One of other knowledge-mantras, to the two nāga kings named Nanda and Upananda, and to the gods of the Pure Abodes. Let these be entrusted with the work, and offer to them constantly in pacifying. Then, having set out flowers, perfumes, and so on properly, perform the rites. Because it pacifies untimely death, sicknesses, epidemic diseases, harms, and likewise obstructing spirits and plague, it is called pacifying.

Place your own mind in equipoise and generate joy in the mind. Perform recitation or burnt offering with offerings of increase, that is, the rite of enriching. Begin on the full moon day and continue until the full moon of the following month. As the rite of enriching is taught, so long should the rite be performed. For the rites of enriching, the early morning is especially auspicious. The gods who accomplish that rite then bestow their blessing. Since all the gods without exception also move about at that time, every action to be done is most auspicious at that very time. If the gods are pleased at the time of the second watch, they grant the supreme gift. Therefore the wise should begin especially at that time.

Wearing a pair of white garments, seated in an auspicious cross-legged posture, facing east and with joy, one should carry out the rite of enriching with concentration. One should smear the ground with fragrant perfume three times a day, and it is taught that it is greatly adorned there with various scattered flowers.

Balls of the finest food, possessing the three sweets, or honey, butter, and curds mixed, or black sesame, or butter and curds, śatapušpā, bilva, sāli rice-grains, nāgakesara, lotus, karṇikāra with butter, parched grain and all the grains, and likewise offering fuel for the burnt oblation: with these and similar substances, perform the burnt offering of enriching in the proper manner.

A fire taken from the house of a warrior-class family, or from the house of a king, or a forest fire, or a great fire, is auspicious for the rites of enriching. Sacrificial sticks thick as a handful, at most a cubit in length, mixed with curds, butter, and milk, should be burned in the rites of enriching. The fuel for the fire should be taken from just those woods taught for the burnt-offering sticks. Or else trees bearing flowers and fruits are most auspicious as firewood.

The fire pit, in red earth, should be about two cubits in breadth, square, with a rim, and a cubit deep. For a span's height of the rim, it should also be smeared with red coloring. The lotus seal should be a handspan, and should be four finger-widths in height. As for what is needed in the matter,

Fixing the mind upon that very practice, one should first perform the rites that were taught at the beginning, and then undertake the rites of enriching. One should make offerings to Lotus-Handed Vajrapāṇi (Padmapāṇi) of great power, and also to Amoghasiddhi. One should make offerings to the holders of awareness-mantras and to the yakṣas, to all the goddesses of glory, to Brahmā, to the bodhisattvas, to the great-powered queens of awareness, and to the Plunderers, the great awareness-mantras. For the rites of enriching, such offerings should be made.

The wise one who has made offerings in this way, according to the rite, should himself receive empowerment directly, and then begin the rites of enriching. Whatever increases life and youth, wealth and power and strength, and whatever accomplishes good qualities and the things one desires, that is called enriching.

Then, abiding in the supreme and the wrathful, with firm resolve, one subdues enemies by reciting the fierce secret mantras or by performing the burnt-offering. For this there is no need to consider the lunar days or the lunar mansions, nor to observe a fast. Having made one's wrath firm, one should begin the fierce rites at once. Especially in the dark fortnight, or in the dark seasons, at midday or at midnight, one should begin the fierce rites. For at that time, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, spirits, and hosts of rākṣasas, being fierce, bless the rite, and therefore the rites are accomplished. At that time, the fierce rite will succeed, and so it is most auspicious. Or else, whenever one has become wrathful, at that very time one should begin the rite. For the fierce deities of the secret mantras bless the practitioner just when he is wrathful. Therefore, having generated wrath, one should perform the fierce rite.

For the most fierce rites, one should wear red clothing, or blue clothing, or clothing moistened with water or stained with blood, as has been taught. One should glare wide-eyed, frown in wrath, and bare the teeth, clenching them tightly. Pressing one foot upon the other, one should sit facing south. With one's own body, speech, and mind, firmly resolved, one should visualize the secret mantra as if directly present, and then perform the fierce rite.

In that rite, at the three times of day, one should smear the ground with black earth, or with the dung of donkeys, she-donkeys, and the like, or with ashes from a charnel ground. One should spread out fragrant flower petals, or else unscented ones, or spread blue or red flowers, or grain, or husks. Mustard seed, pungent, or one's own blood, or salt, or newly sprouted neem leaves, or earth from a footprint, or ashes, or the dung of bulls and the like, or cut hair, or crow dung, or peacock and other feathers, or fat, or urine, or thorns, or pieces of poison, or powdered bone, likewise the flesh of the great animals and the like, or kapitha cloth, or neem, or a charcoal fragment from the charnel ground, or thorny trees, or sticks of the khadira tree: with these the wise one, according to the rite, should perform the burnt-offering for the sake of the fierce rite.

Calling out the enemy's name, one should prepare all poisonous things and all kinds of salt, mixed together with blood, and perform the fierce burnt-offering. Fire blazing in a charnel ground, or fire taken from the house of an outcaste, or fire drawn from bones or from stones, is auspicious for fierce rites.

The sticks for the burnt-offering of wrathful confession, sharpened to a point at both ends and smeared with poison, blood, and mustard oil, should be made ten finger-widths long. The firewood should be bitter, hot, and foul-smelling, or dry wood; or for fierce rites anything taken from the charnel ground will do.

The fire pit, on black earth, should be triangular, facing away, twenty finger-widths in measure and half a cubit deep, as taught. Its rim should be three finger-widths, and should be smeared with ashes. At its base there should be a vajra eight finger-widths long, and a height of one finger-width should be set. For the materials of the burnt-offering, ashes, charcoal, husks and the like, or salt, newly sprouted shoots and the like, one should fashion an image of the enemies.

Pronouncing the name of that image as one's own, one should cut it and cut it again, and perform the burnt-offering. Or else, at the heart of that image, one should begin the burnt-offering rites from below. Just as in the burnt-offering, so too in the recitation, one should perform it while pressing down upon the image of the fierce one. Or else, it is taught, one should accomplish it according to the ritual procedure set forth in the Kalpa.

Whatever the matter held in mind, one should begin only after pointing it out to the deity. Having performed everything in accord with the rite, one carries out the fierce practice.

Vajrapāṇi the wrathful, and whichever wrathful ones one wishes, together with all the attendants, the Fierce and Radiant Noble One, Vidyā-vajra Aṅkuśā, the wrathful Vajra Thunderer, the Deathless One of Life, Hundred-Eyed Indra, the nāga, Kumbhīra, the rākṣasa, and others of this kind: for works of fierce practice, a wise person should first make offerings to them according to the rite, and having made protection, should begin.

Whatever rite destroys limbs, or drives someone away, or sows division, or sends disease, or brings ruin, or torments, or turns people into enemies, or else any rite of killing: all these are taught as fierce practice. Thus one skilled in such rites should generate wrath for the benefit of those who slander the words of the Sugata, those of evil nature and hatred, those who harm the Three Jewels, the holders of wrong views, the sinful, those of broken discipline, the quarrelsome, and those who deceive their teachers.

With the procedures embodied in the many Kalpas, the wrathful ones, messengers, and envoys, with fierce assemblies one performs fierce practice. For beings in misery one performs pacifying; for those living in comfort, enriching. Whatever works of fierce practice there are, these are to be applied against enemies.

The wise should perform fierce practice by means of the secret mantras of the earth-dwellers, devising the detailed rites, and apply it to those who are hateful and deceitful. One must accept thinking: "I myself must surely experience the many results of karma." In this very life, one should bring to ripeness all the wrongs that person has done. Thus the deities of the secret mantra, out of love for those of evil conduct, deliver them from the lower realms by such methods.

Harm to an enemy must also be fitting to the offense. For a small offense, one should not undertake what would cause death. Even if the heart is satisfied, having acted under the sway of anger, one should, in order to pacify it, perform the pacifying rite with a pacifying mantra. Or else, at that very fire, having fully recited the exhortation of that very mantra, one should make a pacifying burnt-offering with milk. The wise should recall the Sugata's nature of reality and the awakening mind; for the arrogant and the sinful, one should pacify immediately. Pacifying is done at a stūpa with relics; enriching, at a lotus pond; and the practitioner in particular should perform fierce practice at charnel grounds.

This is the chapter that distinguishes in order the rites of pacifying, enriching, and fierce practice.

Whatever works go upward, all of these should be fully understood. Those that are somewhat less apparent are taught as the middling rites. Whatever works are of the earth below, all of these are taught as the lowest. Now, therefore, let me distinguish the divisions of the works of the highest, middling, and lowest.

From the division of accomplishments into highest, middling, and lowest, the abodes of the sky, the intermediate space, and the earth are taught as threefold. These are: holding the vidyā-mantra and traveling in the sky; the accomplishment of manifold forms; likewise clairvoyance and seeing; a peaceful mind and the attainment of wisdom; mastery of all treatises and a clear intellect; eloquence and retention of what is heard; the accomplishment of raising corpses and of directing attention toward a goal; the accomplishment of yakṣiṇīs and the like; and earthly kingship, the wish-fulfilling jewel, and great treasures. These are the second; and the teachings of these and the like follow.

The accomplishment of the vidyā-mantra is the highest. Invisibility, strength, and diligence, and the accomplishment of the cave, taking the essence; the accomplishment of directing and commissioning the asuras, of flesh-eaters, and of the earth-dwelling bhañjikas; the attainment of knowledge through much learning, and the accomplishment of swift feet: these and the like are taught as belonging to the middling kind.

Delighting all beings, empowering the people of the world, and the rites of fierce and wrathful conduct, such as expulsion and all the like, together with whatever else is minor and ordinary, the wise should know as the lowest.

From a blazing substance, the supreme accomplishment arises. From smoke itself, the middling. From mere warmth, the lowest accomplishment. Thus there are three kinds of accomplishment. The great power of the secret mantras taught by the noble ones is renowned for achieving the supreme accomplishment. The mantras of the gods accomplish the middling. The earth-mantras are said to accomplish the lowest.

By the mantras of the vidyā of the Tathāgata, the great accomplishment is attained. By the secret mantras of the Lotus-Holder, the middling accomplishment is said to be attained. What is spoken by the Vajra-Holder is proclaimed to bring about the lowest accomplishment. The lowest of the supreme is not equal to the supreme of the lowest. The remaining two kinds of accomplishment follow that very same sequence of rites.

Among the three great divisions that teach the qualities of the result, the distinctions of the highest, the middling, and the lowest are fully proclaimed. Whatever secret mantras were spoken by the buddhas and bodhisattvas, the supreme accomplishments that arise from them come to be found even among the lowest.

Among the secret mantras taught in full detail, some accomplish only a single activity. Even for these, that activity is said to be highest, middling, or lowest. Some, without such gradation, give rise to accomplishments, as a lotus is born from mud, and as fire comes from sandalwood.

Among the highest, middling, and lowest, the accomplishment of the body is the highest. What is accomplished through substances is the middling. The accomplishment of enjoyments is the lowest.

If someone recites a mantra of the lowest class and does the full approach practice, then, having taken accomplishment from others, it will come to bestow even the supreme. Even for the highest, if someone does the approach practice without having been consecrated, that mantra gives only the lowest accomplishment. Therefore the approach practice is held most dear.

Among the gods too there are the poor; among hungry ghosts too there are the greatly powerful. In the same way, accomplishments also come in various kinds. Each of the highest, middling, and lowest is again divided into three kinds of accomplishment. Knowing the power of the secret mantras, begin the pursuit of accomplishment through the approach practice.

This is the gradual division of the defining marks that distinguish the accomplishments.

Recite as follows. First, enter the temple and settle in concentration. Sit facing the deity, join the palms and prostrate. Then arrange suitable flowers and clean fragrant water as offering water in due order. Fumigate well with incense, and after reciting seven times over that offering water, invite the deities. Having invited them with the secret mantra, make the offering after that.

The vessels may be of gold, silver, copper, stone, or wood, or of clay, conch, fish-skin, or even a leaf, cleansed. For the activities and accomplishments, whether pacifying, enriching, or wrathful, and whether highest, middling, or lowest, fitting vessels should be matched to each. From the descriptions of color and qualities, and in other ways as is suitable, whatever vessels one wishes should be used according to the desired enjoyment.

The pacifying offering water is accompanied by grain. For enriching, it is accompanied by sesame, since it is opposed to all else. For wrathful conduct, it is accompanied by the kotra plant. For the pacifying offering water, milk is used; for enriching, curd; and for the wrathful, cow urine, or else blood.

For the sake of wrathful and fierce conduct, it is auspicious. For all rites, whether highest, middling, or lowest, rice is auspicious. Incense, flowers, kuśa grass, and sesame are good, and waters of every kind, without distinction, are excellent. For the arghya offering, a copper vessel is supremely auspicious for all rites.

If one cannot gather all of this, then I ask that you be patient with me, and I shall do whatever I am able to gather. Whatever is taught in the mantra tantras, the Vidyārāja, the king of awareness mantras, has explained in due order the rite of invitation.

Or again, whichever mantra tantra it may be, whichever lord one follows, and whichever vidyā queen it may be, if one recites with both of these together, one then praises and invokes accordingly. In the same way, for the three families, one should invite all of them.

For those who are taught in their own tantras, that same procedure is explained. One declares the command of the lord, saying "Depart!" and, having repeated it, proclaimed it well, one sets out. And the moment the invitation is made, the secret mantra, delighted, will come.

In some cases, whatever the rite may be, those who teach the invitation and the return, having performed the rite of supplication, in great delight do just so. With the vidyā queen one performs the rite of invitation of the vidyā mantras; with the vidyārāja, the rite of invitation of the secret mantras; for the others, with both.

One recites once, or three times, or else praises and invokes seven times. Knowing the particular secret mantras, one may even recite twenty-one times. Having recited over the arghya according to the rite, one fumigates well with incense smoke. Respectfully placing both knees on the ground, one offers with hands, together with the implements of the rite, saying with faith and with samaya: "Come here, come here, Blessed One! Accept this arghya of mine, and be pleased with my offering."

For those secret mantras that are fierce and wrathful, and which subdue others, one should perform the rite of invitation with their own mantra alone. And for those which are among the common ones, and those which have become attendants, the rite of invitation is taught with their own mantra.

For the vidyārāja and the secret mantras, in brief, either with each one's own secret mantra, or for all of them with the essence mantra, the invitation is taught to be supreme. In short, the wise one, with the arghya and with the essence mantra of the general family, invites with the words "Come here." This is declared to be a secret.

One bows with deep faith, makes the supplication again and again, and the wise one respectfully invites the secret mantras and the vidyā mantras. Having recited, one joins both hands in equipoise, and if one offers the arghya, placed upon the crown of the head, to the supreme secret mantra, then indeed the invitation is accomplished.

For those of middling rank, one offers from the level of the chest; for the common ones, from the level of the navel, reciting the arghya offering according to the proper manner. In this way one should know the rite of invitation.

By reciting the arghya mantra, with regard to a drawn design or a figure, whichever secret mantra appears standing, one invites it standing; if it appears seated, one invites it seated; if it appears reclining, one invites it reclining. For the sake of the invitation, one should offer the arghya according to the rite.

For the abodes of some secret mantras, in whatever direction they lie, one first looks toward that direction, recites over the arghya, and faces that way. Having looked toward the direction of that rite, one then offers the arghya. This is another rite of invitation, explained in the supreme secret.

Whether with hands joined, with an arghya offering, with flowers, or with the mind, or even with water, it is acceptable. The wise one performs the rite of invitation in front of oneself, wherever it may be.

In this rite of all the secret mantras, what is taught as the rite of invitation, endowed with mantra and mudrā, is the general rule for all. The practitioner, having first completed the preliminary approach and the rites such as offering, and in performing the rites of the action, should perform the invitation with the mind, in accordance with whatever procedure is fitting.

The rite of invitation is taught for the sake of accomplishing every purpose. For minor matters, one may perform it in an ordinary way. Having invited the deity with recitation and pleased him according to the rite, the gods of the secret mantras, too, will do all that is beneficial and the rest. This is the division of the rite of invitation in sequence.

In all actions, the practitioner should first invite the deities, and then, in accordance with the sequential division of the secret mantras, begin the offering, knowing the rite. Say: "O Sugata, Blessed One, come here; please be seated here. Having accepted my offerings, please look upon me with your mind." And "I am endowed with reverence." Having entreated the deity again and again in this way, the practitioner of secret mantra should make offerings with this rite at the three times of day.

According to the scriptures of the earlier mantra tantras, one should first offer fragrances. Then come flowers, as is fitting. Then proclaim the incense aloud. Next, the food offering to the deity, as is fitting, and finally the lamps, properly arranged. The substances are to be purified by the King of the Wrathful Ones, and should be clean, not inferior, suitable, and of good quality. One who has understanding should offer them with reverence. With the individual secret mantra of each deity, one praises each one directly, and then offers the limbs of offering as one wishes. To each one separately, one presents the arghya water, saying, "Please accept this," taking the substance's name and presenting it. If the substances cannot be gathered, one may make images of them and present the arghya.

Through reverence and the offering of arghya, all the rites become complete. Joined palms, arghya, the offering with the mind, the very limbs of the rite, and its basis: all of these should be applied to every offering rite as is appropriate. One who is skilled in every aspect may always do whatever he is able to do. Since the Great Sage declared, "The mind is the forerunner of all phenomena," the mental offering is especially excellent, and one should begin it well. This is the sequential division of offerings.

Having settled the mind in deep equipoise, the remaining rites are said to be performed. First, the practitioner should drive away obstructers by means of the King of the Wrathful Ones. Or else one may use the awareness-mantra of each deity, the one that accomplishes all actions:

Namo ratnatrayāya. Namaścaṇḍavajrapāṇaye mahāyakṣasenāpataye. Namaścaṇḍavajrakrodhāya. Oṃ hulu hulu, tiṣṭha tiṣṭha, bandha bandha, hana hana, amṛte hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. Oṃ traṃ bandha svāhā. Namō mahāśriyai. Oṃ śame samaye saume siddhi siddha sādahaya śive śivaṃkari, āvaha sarvārtha sādhani svāhā.

This is the secret mantra that performs all actions of the three families.

With the wrathful secret mantra, together with its mudrā, one purifies the flowers and the other offerings. First, with water held in the left hand, one sprinkles for purification, doing so with the mantra of the lord, or else with the heart mantra of the family. In short, all secret mantras are to be used for purification together with their mudrās.

To purify oneself, one pours scented water into the palm, looks at it, recites its heart mantra, and sprinkles it on one's own crown. To purify the seat as well, one sprinkles scented water, using either the secret mantra that performs all actions or that of the King of the Wrathful Ones. With water over which the mantra has been recited seven times, one sprinkles in all directions of the ground. Purification and cleansing are accomplished by this secret mantra:

Oṃ kīli kīla, vajrī vajrī bhūr bandha bandha hūṃ phaṭ.

Then the wise practitioner, reciting this King of Awareness-mantras above, should purify the deities with incense, binding and cleansing them.

Oṃ susiddhikara jvalahi anantamūrtaye, jvala jvala, bandha bandha, hana hana hūṃ phaṭ. This is common to all.

Oṃ jvala hūṃ. This is for the Tathāgata family.

Oṃ padma-ni bhagavati mohaya jagan mohani svāhā. This is for the lotus family.

Then the wise practitioner thoroughly recites the heart mantra of the family.

With scented water, all around the enclosing circle, the directions are to be bound everywhere. By the heart of the King of Awareness-mantras, or by one's own King of Awareness-mantras, or by one's own secret mantra, with command and employment, the binding of the directions is to be done with reverence.

Bhrūṃ. Oṃ amṛtodbhava hūṃ phaṭ. Namo ratnatrayāya. Namaś caṇḍa-vajrapāṇaye. Mahā-yakṣa-senāpataye. Oṃ sumbhani sumbha hūṃ. Gṛhṇa gṛhṇa hūṃ. Gṛhṇāpaya gṛhṇāpaya hūṃ. Ānaya ho bhagavan vidyārāja hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. This is the mantra of the King of Awareness for the three families.

With the very hearts of these same mantras, the fence-posts too are to be properly applied. With the awareness-mantras of the families, the deities are to be protected on every side.

In all rites, everywhere, to dispel obstructors and the like, by the procedure of visualization, the nectar and the ash are to be properly applied. Around the outside of the house, the net, the fence, and the stakes, along with Kīli-kīla and Amṛta, the two wrathful ones, are always to be applied.

Whatever different protective secret mantras are taught in the ritual, those very ones are to be applied here. Or else, whichever one has faith in: the Blessed One's Eye, or the White-Robed Lady, or whichever awareness-mantra of Māmakī, these are to be recited first. By this, oneself and the deities too are protected, all sins are purified, obstructors are thrown down, even crushed, and the fruit of one's intention becomes manifest.

The awareness-mantra of Māmakī alone, even for the family of the Victor and the lotus family, the wise one regards as his own dhāraṇī, and it is to be applied to all. With the secret mantras taught in the ritual, the protective rites may also be undertaken. Or else, by a single hero, everything is to be done according to the ritual.

Thus all secret mantras are to be used as the ritual taught in the maṇḍala prescribes. At the time of preliminary recitation, too, the reciter should understand them from the complete instructions. Whether it be the secret mantra of the family lord, or the heart of the family, or the king of all secret mantras, or the king of the mantra tantras, the secret mantra that accomplishes all rites is, for all three families, properly to be recited by the reciter through these, with distinctions according to the rites of one's own family.

Protection, invitation, purification, binding, repelling, suppressing, fulfilling, pacifying, subduing, and urging, and all rites of that kind, for all three families, and for the accomplishments, are to be performed in every case by the practitioner with these mantras.

One's own secret mantra protects oneself also, through those very hearts. Taking the topknot, the garment, and the cleansing vessel, tie knots and recite three or seven times. Placing the tip of the thumb at the heart, recite for the sake of protecting oneself. Or else ash or white mustard seed with water may be used for one's own protection.

In wrathful rites, protection is to be made with the mantra of the lord. Even in pacifying rites, the practitioner should apply the wrathful secret mantra with firmness. The blessing of the deities will also come about through the lord's mantra. If one fears the lord's mantra, it is taught that protection is to be made by the lord.

The wise practitioner, in both cases, in all rites, should perform the procedures for protecting himself especially well, with purity.

Outside the temple of the deities, when one goes about alone at will, in order to protect the deities fully, one should act in all things as one would for oneself. Outside, in places of attachment and the like, and whenever there is impurity, protection is taught to be made at that time by the secret mantra of Krodha Acala.

Namo vajrāya. Oṃ vajrakrodha mahābala hana daha paca vidhvaṃsaya, ucchuṣma-krodha hūṃ phaṭ.

When bathing, protection from the enemies, the obstructors, is always to be made. When eating, protect with the lord's mantra. When lying down, protect with the awareness-mantra of the family. For all three families, constantly, all obstructors are on the watch for an opening.

By the awareness-mantra called "the King," protection is taught to be made. This is the division of the stages of protection.

Oṃ eka-jvāla vajrapāṇi hūṃ. Samaya manusmara hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Having made protection in this way, in all its parts without omission, one should settle one's own mind in equipoise and begin all the recitation.

The seat is of blue kuśa grass, four finger-widths in thickness, level, one cubit in width, and sixteen finger-widths in length. At the time of the preliminary approach recitation, all of these are taught to be done. If these are not available, kuśa grass, or else green reed grass, will also do. According to the particular activity, a seat made of wood is also suitable; in that measure, a well-made wooden stool is also most auspicious. Clean leaves of this or that kind, especially for all activities, by the instruction taught, a seat of leaves is likewise explained. With the distinctions of supreme and the rest, for all the general activities, the cross-legged posture is excellent and auspicious. These are the three ways of sitting.

The wise one, having sat there, and having properly performed the rite of offering, should generate reverence in the mind and praise the Blessed One, the Tathāgata. Then one should praise the Dharma and the Saṅgha; then Avalokiteśvara, the lord; then the great king of awareness, the Vajra-holder.

I pay homage to the Tathāgata, the protector endowed with great compassion, the all-knowing teacher, the field of the ocean of merit and good qualities.

I pay homage to the Dharma, become peace, the one supreme ultimate: through its purity one becomes free of desire, through its virtue one is liberated from the lower realms.

I pay homage also to the Saṅgha, the supreme field endowed with good qualities, who, having been liberated, have gained the path of liberation and abide well in the trainings.

I pay homage to the one whose name is invoked as Avalokiteśvara, praised by all the buddhas, gatherer of all supreme qualities, who constantly loves beings.

I pay homage to the Vajra-holder, great in power and fierce in force, the virtuous king of awareness-mantras, subduer of those hard to tame.

Having thus respectfully joined the palms, one should praise also the other sons of the Victor, praising them by the texts of the bodhisattvas.

Then one should confess each sin individually.

In all directions of the worlds, whatever Tathāgatas dwell there, and the arhats and bodhisattvas, may they all think of me.

Whatever sin I have committed in any lifetime, in other former lifetimes, in this life, and throughout saṃsāra, overcome by the power of attachment, by folly, and agitated by anger; toward the buddhas, the Dharma, or the Saṅgha, toward teachers and parents, toward arhats and bodhisattvas, toward any worthy recipient of offerings, and toward other beings, whether possessed of good qualities or not; whatever sinful deeds I have done, whatever I have caused to be done, and whatever I have rejoiced in even slightly; whatever, through heedlessness, even subtle deeds I have done by body, speech, and mind: gathering all of these together in my mind, before the perfect Buddha and his sons, as if now directly present, I pay homage with the utmost reverence.

With a mind made sorrowful, palms joined, I confess again and again each of my faults. Whatever non-virtue I have done, just as the perfectly awakened Buddha knows it, so I confess each one. Henceforth I shall never act so again.

For the sake of pacifying the suffering of living beings, for as long as I live, I go for refuge, with reverence and correctly, to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. Proclaiming their good qualities with respect, and touching my head to the ground, the one with understanding thus goes for refuge with reverence to the Three Jewels.

Then, the supreme seed which bestows liberation, the fruit of nectar, having been thoroughly cultivated, becomes supreme.

For the sake of accomplishment, I generate this awakening mind. For the sake of calming the suffering of beings, whose realms are without limit, for the sake of rescuing them from the lower destinies, and for the sake of freeing them from the afflictions, I think upon the many kinds of suffering that exist in the wretched round of existence. Therefore, in order to protect them entirely, I generate the awakening mind.

May I always be a refuge for all beings who are in want. May I be a protector of those without a protector, a support for those without support, a refuge for those without refuge. May I turn suffering into happiness, and may I bring the afflictions of all sentient beings to peace.

Whatever virtuous actions I have accumulated, in this life and in others, may they become the accumulation that is called by two names, merit and wisdom. Whatever diligent effort I undertake through the gateway of the six perfections, may that too bring benefit to all beings without exception. Whatever I may do, even a little, that extends the limit of life, in short, I strive to bring about the peace and liberation of all the afflictions of all sentient beings, and I take great joy in striving for awakening.

Then, in accordance with the rite, one should fully generate the mind of perfect awakening. Toward all beings let compassion and loving-kindness be made present. In order to train the mind well, through various methods one practices the six recollections, and with an inwardly peaceful nature one should meditate with one-pointed intention.

Just as the sons of the Victors of former times made their aspirations, so I too, with a virtuous mind, make aspiration in the same way. Resting in meditative equipoise upon the manifold enjoyments of the Dharma, I rejoice. May all sentient beings be happy, at peace, and free of illness. May I be capable in all that is to be done, and may I be endowed with good qualities. May I be wealthy, generous, and wise, patient, with faith in virtue, and in all my lifetimes among beings may I remember my births and be endowed with love.

Then, joining the palms together and paying homage to the guru, recalling the king of vidyā-mantras, the wise one should perform these rites. Taking up the mantra rosary and placing it in the hollow of the hand, one contemplates the king of vidyā-mantras once. Then one recites this secret mantra.

Namo ratnatrayāya. Namaścaṇḍa-vajrapāṇaye. Mahā-yakṣa-senāpataye. Oṃ kiri kiri raudrini svāhā. This is for the vajra family.

Namo ratnatrayāya. Oṃ adbhute vijaya siddhi siddhārate svāhā. This is for the Tathāgata family.

Namo ratnatrayāya. Nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisattvāya. Oṃ amitagame śriye śriyanili svāhā. This is for the lotus family.

With the thumb and the ring finger, for all rites the rosary is proclaimed. For the wise, in wrathful rites, the forefinger is declared to be the guide. For the Victor family, bodhi-seed beads are proclaimed as the mantra rosary. For the lotus family, lotus seeds. For the vajra family, rudrākṣa. For all three families, these beads are proclaimed. For all rites of recitation, these are said to be virtuous and supreme.

Also the fruit of the tāla palm, conch, and what arises from kham-pa, crystal, pearl, bas-o, likewise coral jewels, seeds of various kinds, and a rosary of bubbles are also permitted. Those mantra rosaries are proclaimed according to this rite. According to family and distinction, by preciousness and color as appropriate, the wise should understand them in this way. For wrathful conduct in particular, bones of various kinds are auspicious.

Then, by another secret mantra as well,

Praised for those who desire accomplishment. The first is the mantra of purification, and the second should be known as that for the sake of accomplishment.

Oṃ namo bhagavate, siddhe sādahaya sādahaya, siddhārtha svāhā. This is for the Tathāgata family.

Oṃ vasumati śriye svāhā. This is for the Lotus family.

Oṃ vajra acitañjaye svāhā. This is for the Vajra family.

These are the knowledge-mantras of the jewel of mantra.

Having taken the mantra jewels, the seals, according to the rite, one should hold the jewel at the heart and properly begin the recitation. With reverence, pay homage to the Three Jewels, to the bodhisattvas, and to the entire host of knowledge-mantras; after that, begin the recitation. With the mind, again and again, vividly visualize the deities of the secret mantra. Having cleared away evil thoughts, the wise one should begin the recitation.

For pacifying and for increasing, with oṃ and with homage, and especially with a peaceful mind, one should recite slowly, with full awareness. With a fierce mind, with hūṃ and with phaṭ, the recitation should be audible to others; this is excellent for wrathful conduct.

For the syllables of a secret mantra, up to fifteen in number, however many syllables there are in total, one should recite that many hundreds of thousands of times. For thirty-two syllables, three million recitations are taught. For mantras with more syllables than that, ten thousand preliminary recitations should be done. Having understood well the family, the rite, and the secret mantra, the wise one should begin the preliminary practice with fitting diligence.

The supreme rites are accomplished through special recitation. Even without preliminary practice, ordinary rites will come to be accomplished. For all secret mantras, and for all accomplishments, one should first recite in tenfold portions, and then make supplication to the deity. Having made supplication in this way, if the deity grants the request, then, by repeating the mantra according to the rite, begin the recitation after that.

If, through a sign or through words, the deity does not seem pleased with the recitation, one should perform the preliminary practice again and again, and make supplication up to three times. If the knowledge-mantra is pleased by the preliminary practice, then, thinking of the reciter, whatever was first commanded will quickly be accomplished. But if a deity does not take to heart the request, even when the wise reciter has made supplication three times, one should never recite that deity's mantra.

In a clean place, being clean, seated well in meditative composure, one should recite for as long as the mind does not grow weary.

For all the rites taught, having first purified the body, recite one session at dawn, and one session in the early evening. At midday recite half a session, or a third of a session, or a quarter, or the wise one may recite just a little. At night and before dawn, the wise one who recites half a session each is especially honored.

For all wrathful rites, for rites of invisibility and the like, and for rites of the charnel ground, reciting at night is always best. Those recitations taught for the daytime should have their fire offerings performed at night, and those recitations taught for the night should have their fire offerings performed by day. The best is to perform the fire offering at the conclusion of the recitation. For all secret mantras, if there is something to burn, one may do it both at the beginning and at the end.

The wise one who each day burns a portion of his food as an offering is taught to do so without distinction among lesser, middling, or higher rites. If one does so, the knowledge-mantras will for the most part be well pleased. By these very rites, the recitation that accompanies the fire offering is explained. While reciting, one should not become angry, and the lord of the region should not be made to rejoice.

Let go entirely of dejection, displeasure, and fear, of laughter and of pride. While reciting, one should speak of nothing at all, and should not make the limbs move about. Once thought, stirred by the winds, has begun to move, one should not dwell on anything whatsoever. At the time of reciting the mantra, apart from the deity of the knowledge-mantra, which has become the supreme object of meditation, one should not grasp at discursive thoughts and think of them.

When one has completed the recitation, one should recite the secret mantra of the lord of the family, or whichever goddess of the family is relevant, and so make the protection. Whether one has recited according to the stated number, or has even exceeded it, one should offer it respectfully, in the manner of making a request.

When the wise one is reciting the knowledge-mantra, and a sneeze, a spitting, or the like occurs, one should touch the body, prostrate, and begin everything again from the beginning. Likewise, when there are obstructors of the recitation, and when the wise one finds faults in the recitation, it is taught that one should begin everything again from the start of the count.

At the beginning and at the end of the jewel of mantra, the practitioner should always, with devotion and intelligence, make homage to the deities of the secret mantra. When the jewel of mantra is completed, one should gaze on all sides at a painted image, a statue, a stūpa, or the seats of these.

When one is wearied by reciting, again and again, through the instructions of the path of meditative concentration and through various methods, the intelligent one should awaken delight in the mind. Having made the intellect free of fault, one should rest in equipoise, one-pointedly, on the pure letters of the secret mantra, and perform the recitation at the three times of day. The wise one, even at these three times alone, should bathe and then recite. All the rites, such as offerings, are taught to be performed at the three times.

At the three times, the mantra practitioner should wash or fumigate the three garments, or else perform purification with incense and scattering of offerings. Except when sleeping and bathing, the mantra practitioner should not give up the lower garment. That garment, white and very soft, should be washed every day. The vessels needed for the deity should also be washed once each day. Old flowers should always be cleared away at the three times.

One should likewise read, at the close of the session, the volumes of the Perfection of Wisdom and the like, and attend to the stūpas and the maṇḍala at the three times.

If one cannot complete at the outset the preliminary recitations of the approach according to the stated number, one should practice the rite at one time of day, or at two. Whatever recitation is done under these conditions: when overcome by obstructors, tormented by illness, sluggish or heedless, or when body and mind are weary; when the rite is done as prescribed but beyond its prescribed time, or without restraint and in impurity, the wise one should not count such recitations toward the stated number. The recitations that are done according to the rite, and joined with meditative equipoise, are the ones to be counted.

The counts of the fire-offering rites and actions, and the rite of invitation, in which the jewel of mantra is not completed, should not be included in the count of the recitation. In maṇḍalas, one proceeds according to the rite.

One who has recited the secret mantra a thousand times when the sun or moon is seized by an eclipse has, without doubt, accomplished the approach. At all the places of the Uṣṇīṣa, at the great stūpas, and on the half-month of the great miracle, recitation is taught to be supreme.

The knowledge-mantra recitation obtained when the guru is pleased, and whatever he himself has granted, will quickly succeed. Whatever knowledge is quickly bestowed through a place with good qualities, through special offerings and the like, and through one's own mind being serene, though it succeeds quickly, if it is not upheld it will surely deteriorate, it is said.

Therefore, having completed the approach, one should strive for the sake of accomplishment. During the approach, as appropriate, one should strive toward the deities for the sake of accomplishment.

Outside the temple, at the junctures of the times, offerings should be made. At those junctures, the knowledge-mantras should be honored with special offerings. One should always keep to the virtuous practices, and likewise take up the vows.

Fill an auspicious vase with scented water and the like. Having praised it with the wrathful Vajra, one should apply it for the purpose of empowerment. If that cannot be arranged, fill an offering vessel with flowers and water. For the sake of completely dispelling obstructors, one should perform that empowerment close at hand.

Offer the deity's food offering in a special way. Perform the fire offering in a special way. Likewise perform the lamp rite in a special way, and the discarding of the remnants upon the ground.

If, during the recitation, a many-colored light should suddenly appear, then success is certain to come quickly. Hunger will be eased, and one will be freed from some illness. A special knowledge will also arise. An especially great radiance is taught to be a sign of mantra recitation.

Virtuous dreams in the night, seeing true things, and delighting in the work of recitation: these are the signs of mantra recitation. Little fatigue, a pleasant fragrance, a readiness to give, wholehearted acceptance of good qualities, and special reverence for the deity: these are the signs of mantra recitation.

After the mantra recitation as well, one should make special offerings. To the deities, as is fitting, one should also begin the fire offerings. Having duly completed the approach, in order to accomplish the knowledge-mantra, one should carry out the preliminaries and the establishing of the site, as the wise see fit.

If, having recited half in one place, one recites for another purpose elsewhere, then even if all the recitations are completed, all of them become meaningless. At such an opportunity, in accordance with the rite, one should recite more than a hundred thousand times. The master should recite a thousand times, or else begin the approach anew.

If, through carelessness, one has several times recited another deity's mantra, then having respectfully made supplication with the mind, one should begin the recitation again. If, through impurity or lack of the proper rite, one has carelessly recited a knowledge-mantra, then one should recite the mantra of the lord of that mantra family seven times in full.

The reciter, observing a fast for a day and a night at each half-month, should drink, at the half-month juncture, the five products of the cow, recited over one hundred and eight times. Through this the mantra reciter will take delight in the half-months, and whatever has been eaten that is not proper food, all of that is completely abandoned.

Namo bhagavate uṣṇīṣāya. Oṃ viśuddhe virāje śive śāntikari svāhā. This is for the Tathāgata family. Oṃ yaśoje svāhā. This is for the lotus family. Namō ratnatrayāya. Namaś caṇḍavajrapāṇaye. Mahāyakṣasenāpataye. Oṃ śikhi śikhi nirmale prabhe prabhāsare teje tejovati svāhā. This is for the vajra family.

Take the cow's milk, curds, butter, urine, and dung, each recited over individually, and a wisp of kuśa grass recited over one hundred times. Sitting silent and squatting, facing east, one should drink, in a medium measure of about three sang, what is mixed with the leaves of the palāśa tree. Or else drink it from any one of the vessels described for offering. This is taught as the rite for that.

If, during the recitation, a sudden impulse arises as to whether to do something or not, or if the deity himself gives a command, one possessing intelligence should examine it. Having taken protection and examined it, one should not do what is improper. Whatever fitting instruction is given, those things should be done by one who desires accomplishment.

If the reciter sees bad dreams, one recites the mantra of the lord of the family one hundred times. On that day, one does not recite the other.

It is not to be counted as part of the numbered recitation. For all counted recitations, an excess brings no fault. In that case, however, the mantra is not accomplished by it, and nothing is gained by merely completing the count. In brief, whatever rite of recitation has been taught for the reciters, by those very rites one will attain accomplishment through propitiating the vidyā-mantra.

This concludes the sectional exposition of the rite of recitation.

Next I shall explain another rite of satisfaction, by which whichever deity of the reciter's secret mantra is quickly pleased. On the junctures of the season or on other lunar days, one first bathes, especially in a fine pool, washing the head and so forth, and then performs the rite of offering. Reciting the secret mantra in the mind, one praises each one of a hundred jasmine flowers in turn, and the wise practitioner makes offerings to the three families. Twenty-one times, or else seven times in order, in accordance with the syllables of the secret mantra, one makes offerings to the deities.

Then perfumes and the like are offered, together with incense scented with fragrance. One presents the god-food as it has been taught, especially curds and raw sugar. Then one performs the fire offering properly. With a wick-wood one kindles the fire, and as the offering, one first offers a hundred wick-woods smeared with butter. Then one offers more than a hundred oblations of sesame, curds and butter mixed with honey. Next one offers a hundred burnt oblations of śāli rice cooked with butter and curds. One offers a hundred burnt oblations of the finest food made with cow's milk, together with butter. At the end, having filled the vessel of offering water, one recites a hundred times and presents it.

Having done the rite in this way for one day, or seven days, or twenty-one days, or else for three days at three times, or for five days, the vidyā-mantra, whether cut off, left unseparated, restrained, pinned with pegs, or written, or even in excess, is whatever the practice calls for. Whether restrained or pinned with pegs, the tormenting is greatly satisfied. If, from among these branches of the fire offering, one makes a burnt offering at the day's juncture with any one of them, one is satisfied after three days, and the deities become greatly pleased.

Having made a fine image in incense, one makes offerings with mātālī flowers. Having recited a hundred times at the three times, one finally fumigates with wood-decoction water. Placing it in milk with lotus and the like, one makes offerings through the night, offering also to the inner image, and after reciting, one entrusts it to a great river. By doing these rites the deities become completely pleased. Being pleased, they swiftly bestow great accomplishments.

This concludes the sectional exposition of the rite of satisfying the deity.

Fill a new vase of gold, silver, copper, or clay with flowers, jewels, fruit, grass, grains, and fragrant water. Bind a new cloth around its neck, and adorn its mouth with a new bough. Reciting a hundred times either the lord of one's own vidyā-mantra or the vidyā-mantra of the family, one first confers consecration upon the deity himself. Adorn an image of gold or other material well with ornaments, garlands, and garments, place the vidyā-mantra on a throne, and make offerings for the sake of consecration. Having made offerings with flowers and so forth, one offers with recitation and fire offerings. By this rite the power of the vidyā-mantras becomes exceedingly great. When the vidyā-mantra is endowed with power, it swiftly bestows great accomplishments.

At the junctures of the season, after inviting the vidyā-mantras and making offerings, it is taught that one should also perform consecration by praising the offering water. Even when bathing each day, the wise practitioner should reverently take water in the hollow of the hand, seven times or three, for the sake of consecration. After thoroughly washing with butter, milk, and the like for consecration, the vidyā-mantra's tormenting power increases, and by this one is especially satisfied.

This concludes the chapter distinguishing, in order, the rite for conferring empowerment upon the deity.

At the junctures of the season, one should observe a fast. For one night, or for three nights, one should be clean, wear freshly donned white garments, and abide in the preparation of recitation.

Even if it is not a seasonal juncture, if there is need, then on an auspicious day of the waxing fortnight, one should properly establish the preparation by means of the supreme mantra of pacification.

Having bathed with ointments of kuruvaka and the like, and with fragrant perfumed water, and having made contact, one should in the evening invite the buddhas and make offerings. Then offer the water of offering, praised with special praise, according to the rite.

Then, with white sandalwood, fragrant flowers, and garlands of mālatī, fumigate with incense and make offerings. Offer abundant, excellent tormas together with curd.

Then perform the butter fire offering, properly, one hundred and eight times, and in accordance with the activity of the mantra, offer a burnt oblation of sal resin.

Take a thread spun by a young girl and tie seven knots in it, praising it seven times. Bind it on the left upper arm. Spread out kuśa grass, lie down upon it, and having made the request for instruction, imagine well in your mind a form like that of your own deity. Silently reciting the mantra in the mind, rest upon a pillow of fresh kuśa grass, covered with many flowers, and lie down as comfortably as you can.

If, as you sleep, you see in a dream a deity belonging to the Teaching, or forms of the pratyekabuddhas, or even a lord of vidyā-mantras; or even just one of the Three Jewels, or offerings and the like made to them; or a great miraculous display of the Victor's sons; or the four kinds of retinue; or yourself performing the rite; or being clothed in garments: then the practitioner should know that accomplishment is near.

If you see mountains, elephants, flowing rivers, the ocean, fruit trees, birds such as geese, animals such as lions, a supreme bull, auspicious horses, a beautiful girl adorned, vases and other auspicious signs, in various forms on the right; or if you find wealth and garments, or see other such pure and excellent dreams, the wise one should know that success will come.

If in dreams you find curd, milk, rice, barley, spirits, flowers, fruits, roots, or even substances of accomplishment, or see forms of this kind, it is taught that the vidyā-mantra will succeed. Then the wise practitioner should begin the activities of approach or accomplishment.

If you obtain a mantra-jewel or the substances for accomplishment, then you should quickly begin the activities of approach or accomplishment. If you see yourself adorned with garments, bathing, and ornaments, then too you should properly begin the activities of approach or accomplishment.

Having made offerings to your own vidyā-mantra in the proper way, the consort of the family should be honored with a hundred fragrant flowers and a pair of cloths. Fumigate with sandalwood incense eight times in a day. Then the deity herself, in a dream, will give a reply as is fitting.

Place an image of uśīra in a vessel of anthill earth. Having made offerings and fully satisfied it, praise it eight times. Then place it in milk or in honey. Having made good offerings at the three times of day, in the evening once more make the request. By these very means, once joy has fully arisen, the deity herself will give the reply, whether one should do such a thing or not.

At a seasonal juncture when one wishes to fast, make offerings to the vidyā-mantra according to the rite. With seven kinds of water and five kinds of tree-essence, perform the burnt offering one hundred and eight times. Or if it is done by a set number of recitations, then by the vidyā-mantra itself...

He will declare it very swiftly. In this way, one who abides in the preliminary preparation will surely and swiftly attain accomplishment. This rite of abiding in the preparation has been proclaimed at length. This is the chapter on the rite of abiding in the preparation, which opens out the supremely secret stages.

Now the disciple, having paid homage to the maṇḍala, and above all having presented an offering, should receive the vidyā-mantra directly from the lips of the master. With the cupped hands filled with flowers, reverent and attending with proper service, the master first recites it three times. The disciple then recites it three times himself and takes it up.

Next, the mantra of many syllables is written plainly, just as taught, with gorocanā on sheets of paper. Then one may learn it by heart at one's ease. Once the master is fully pleased, at a seasonal juncture or on some other lunar day, the master examines the vidyā-mantra and bestows it, and the disciple receives it with reverence according to the rite. The disciple who receives it well will, before long and without obstruction, attain accomplishment. Even without the preliminary recitation, the deity always goes before him and stays close by him.

Or else, take a vase, of gold or of other material, new, clean, and excellent, free of every flaw, and make auspicious and wondrous adornments upon it. In it put only fragrant water. Having arranged it with special care and made it pure, observe a fast for one night or for three nights. Beginning in the evening, one should practice these rites.

The secret mantras and vidyā-mantras of the instruction are written on sheets of paper, with grain and the like, together with gorocanā, and the sheets are placed together. To the king of vidyā-mantras make proper offerings of incense, flowers, the finest perfume, likewise food offerings and lamps, and the offering of the burnt-offering rite.

Then, by these rites, for three nights of abiding in the preparation, make the request with special emphasis, by the power of truth and by the sacred pledge. Having praised it a hundred times, again and again, fumigate it well with incense. Having bathed in fragrant water and become clean, pay homage and focus the mind. With a hand that has been purified, draw out one of the sheets. Knowing which it is, pay homage and reverently place it upon the crown of the head.

The wise one should accomplish that mantra, and by that very mantra swift accomplishment comes. The wise one should not practice any other; if he does, he will even die.

If one who has accomplished a mantra bestows it, and it is received according to the rite, it is the practitioner's own deity; know that accomplishment comes to him through it.

Having made the request to the vidyā-mantra in mind, recite it a hundred times, and say, "Take this, take this," and offer fragrant flowers. Say, "Blessed One, perform the preliminary recitation of this for me, and go before me in it. Blessed One, I have taken hold of you; please go with me."

When the master and the disciple perform in this way the rite of bestowing and receiving the vidyā-mantra, the deity herself will surely be accomplished. The wise should know that every vidyā-mantra accomplishment is truly accomplished.

Thus, for one who has obtained the substances in the proper way, the preliminary recitation is not needed. When practitioners repeatedly recite the vidyā-mantra properly, whatever limit of preliminary recitation they have set and bestowed, even without that preliminary recitation accomplishment comes.

For the sake of siddhi, the secret mantra is the gift. Offer flowers, fruits and roots, incense, cloth, gold and curds, grain, jewels, a maiden, bedding, shoes, every kind of ornament, the implements of practice, elephants, cattle, horses and the like, many kinds of honors, and all one's possessions. With reverent homage, palms joined, offer oneself as well.

Thus, one who knows the rite, with whatever varied gifts are fitting, presents the offering to the master, and only then should receive the secret mantra.

This is the chapter that opens out the stages of fully receiving the vidyā-mantra.

The practitioner, by means of this rite, should recognize what is excessive and what is lacking, and with actions seen and unseen should fully restore the vidyā-mantra. Whatever limb of a secret mantra is excessive or deficient, if it is seen in dreams, this rite of restoring it is to be performed by those who recite the secret mantra.

And if here a doubt arises in someone that a syllable is in excess or is missing, the skilled one should perform the rite of restoring the secret mantra. On sheets of paper, with gorocana, write out the secret mantra with all its syllables complete. Having made offerings according to the rite, praise the king of vidyā-mantras.

Together with the king of vidyā-mantras, in a fire of yam wood, make the offering of burnt oblation, and with the mantra pour oblations of clarified butter into the fire, burning them a hundred times in a single sitting. Place the vidyā-mantra upon a seat, make supplication, and make a perfect offering.

Pay homage to the lord of the vidyā-mantras, to the vidyā-mantra queen of the mind, and to the Sugata with his sons. Having petitioned them for the restoration, lie down on a seat of kuśa grass, facing east, keeping the vidyā-mantra in mind.

That very king of vidyā-mantras, during the night, will certainly make the syllables clear. The sprout as well, in just the same way, and the gorocana likewise, and the sheets of paper too, in just that way, will fully supply what the secret mantra lacks, and will make what is excessive even. A secret mantra that is undiminished and balanced will not be questioned about this alone; yet where a secret mantra or vidyā-mantra is incomplete, he will surely make it whole by this. Or else, where the syllables are incomplete, he will reveal it in dreams. The reciters of the secret mantra should perform the rite of protection and then proceed.

This is the chapter that opens out the stages of fully restoring the vidyā-mantra.

All the vidyā-mantras gain splendor through the work of burnt oblation. With honey, milk-gruel, and butter, or with sesame mixed with butter, or with flowers dipped in butter as burnt oblation, or with burnt oblation of sāl resin, or of butter and tangshing water, the secret mantra comes to have great splendor.

Having ground the five products of the cow, and offered a hundred thousand flowers, as fits, on a mountain peak, one gives rise to splendor in the deity himself. For three days, at the three times, if one offers sweet perfumes, incense, and flowers, the secret mantra comes to have great splendor.

Kindle lamps of heartwood, and for seven days, at the three times, recite the mantra; then the secret mantras become supreme in great splendor. In this way, with recitation, burnt oblation, offerings, and food offerings to the deities, the one who wishes it, in particular, makes all the deities greatly resplendent.

This is the chapter that opens out the stages of the rite for generating the splendor of the deity.

Now, for those who recite the secret mantra, I shall give the entire rite of burnt oblation by which great siddhi is swiftly attained; let them practice it exactly. Outside the deity's place, not far in front of it, having examined the ground as is proper, carry out all these rites.

In the center dig a fire pit, square, with an edge, a cubit deep, or else make the fire pit round. Then place all the needed implements, the yam wood and the rest, on the right, and set the vessel of water on the left. Then, with the mantra that accomplishes all rites, purify and scatter offerings over them. Seated, the skilled one holds the secret mantras in mind and invites the deities. Having offered them the arghya water, reciting over it, with a single flower request the vidyā-mantra to abide right there.

Then, to purify the fire, purify and scatter offerings with the Wrathful King. With the wood prescribed in the rite, the wise one places it in the pit and kindles it. Seeing the fire blaze, first call to it with the secret mantras: Come here, come here, great being, god, seer, supreme among brahmins.

Having partaken of the burnt offering as food at the mouth, I request you to remain right here.

Oṃ agnaye havyakavya-vāhanāya svāhā.

Thus, having first invoked the fire, one should burn the three offerings of the burnt oblation.

Oṃ agnaye havyakavya vāhanāya dīpāya svāhā.

Then the skilled one, moving to the right, circles the fire and purifies it, and with his own mantra he should burn the three portions of the burnt oblation, beginning with butter.

For all burnt offerings, the practitioner should use the Wrathful King Kīlikīla. By that deity's mudrā, in the burnt offering, the fire and the other things should be purified.

Oṃ kīli kīli vajra bhīma raudra pātita, mahākrodha vijaya nikṛnta hūṃ phaṭ, bandha bandha svāhā.

Then one burns the fuel sticks. Then the fuel sticks go into the fire with butter. Then sesame and rice. These are the rites in brief.

Balāśa, nyagrodha, plakṣa, khadira, arka, bilva, kaṅkata, āmra, karmarī, śamī, apāmārga, udumbara, and aśvattha: these are taught as the twelve kinds of fuel wood.

Of these, sticks about a handspan long are to be burned in all rites. In all rites they are arranged in two bundles, and one burns them, tips first. Wood that is good, straight, and fresh, sprinkled with scented water and offered with scattered grains: for pacifying rites burn some of it, and likewise for enriching rites, and also some of one's own food. All of this is burned for all rites. Each day, or with the fuel sticks, one should always burn some of one's own food as well.

Having performed the burnt offering in accord with the mantra, one may then eat one's meal. As the recitation and the rite are taught, so the burnt offering is proclaimed likewise.

Having rubbed the palms against the inside of the knees, one should begin the burnt offerings. To bring out the radiance of all vidyā-mantras, take durvā grass and grains mixed with butter, and burn a piece of the pounded akara, four finger-widths long; this is said to purify. Or else gugul mixed with butter is always most auspicious for a burnt offering. Or, for particular secret mantras, a particular decoction with water on the ground is auspicious.

One who knows the rites of mantra accomplishment should, in every burnt-offering rite, first request the lord to be present, and only afterwards begin the burnt offering.

One who knows the rites of mantra accomplishment should, in every burnt-offering rite, first make protection with the family's vidyā-mantra, and then begin the actions.

One who knows the rites of mantra accomplishment should, in every burnt-offering rite, at the conclusion of the rite begin to generate radiance with the heart mantra of the family.

One who knows the rites of mantra accomplishment should, in every burnt-offering rite, at the beginning and at the end, always burn a full ladle of butter.

One who knows the rites of mantra accomplishment should, in every burnt-offering rite, recite the vidyā-mantra and heart mantra of the family's lord, and at the end present the offering water.

Since the complete rites of burnt offering for maṇḍalas have been proclaimed, by those same rites the burnt-offering actions are said to be performed here as well.

Reciting over water in the palm, one should scatter and drink it three times. At the close of the burnt offering, with one's own vidyā-mantra, one should purify and scatter offerings three times. Then, having burned everything in the fire, with that same vidyā-mantra that invited the deity, say "Depart, depart," and afterwards send the deity back. In keeping with the letters of the secret mantra, at the end one should begin the recitation.

Thus the rite of all burnt offerings has been explained in brief.

This is the chapter that sets out the rite of burnt offering in sequence.

Then, further, I shall explain the gathering of the auxiliary parts of the rite, by which one undertakes the secret-mantra rites of all vidyā-mantras. All the needed implements should be gathered together at the very beginning.

Then, one who has intelligence should begin the approach-practice or the accomplishment. Fragrant substances of this kind and that, and likewise the various kinds of incense, the essences, and the decoctions: these one should gather in particular. White mustard seed, clay, salt, poison, rock salt, and the thornapple; sesame, grain, oil and butter; a vase and a copper vessel; grains and the five kinds of precious things; medicines and honey; likewise thread of five colors spun by a young girl; a lamp-bowl for the lamp, with wick and lamp-essence; a bowl for the offering cake, and the materials for colored powders; likewise sandalwood stakes, and a stick for the offering of sacrifice; ladles of neem wood, a ladle for pouring, a bezoar, and a piece of iron from a dead man's tomb; red sandalwood too; cloth, and thread from a spinning wheel for sorcery; the fresh skin of a black antelope; barley and rice, yava, priyaṅgu, white sandalwood, and wooden sandals; muñja grass, kuśa grass, and śatapušpā; a flower-vessel, auspicious things, and the finest articles of offering; likewise a rosary and the like. These and others the wise practitioner should first gather, all the wealth and the auxiliary parts of accomplishment, and only afterwards begin the rites.

This is the chapter that sets out in sequence the rite of gathering the auxiliary parts of accomplishment.

Then, of the substances of accomplishment, all the characteristics that have been taught, I shall explain in brief, for the sake of the accomplishments of one who recites mantra.

The wish-fulfilling jewel, the excellent vase, the rain of wealth, the great gold, the wheel, the lapis lazuli, and the sword: these are the seven accomplishments. Mostly they are common, yet the special ones are supreme; the great ones are the best of the best. By them one gains a great heap of merit, and even kingship will be attained.

Furthermore, the supreme accomplishments are the three of the Uṣṇīṣa, the Lotus, and the Vajra, according to the distinctions among the families; these are mostly the ones proclaimed. By any secret mantra whatever, any accomplishment whatever may be gained; yet the higher cognitions and the knowledge of what lies beyond are proclaimed to be chief.

Of gold, silver, and the like, make a pillar one forearm in height. Upon it set a single great precious stone, or a jewel: a pure padmarāga, or else one born of crystal. Place it well upon a small stool, and let the practitioner perform the night rite of accomplishment. The preliminary rite of the secret mantra, and the empowerment of oneself as it has been explained: by that very rite, in its own manner, the excellent vase is said to be accomplished.

Of pure gold and silver and various precious things, in a circuit of five measures' distance, wealth is said to fall like rain. The great inexhaustible treasure is that filled with gold and the like; though one gives and enjoys and so on, and draws from it, it does not run out.

The wheel of iron from a dead man's tomb should be one handspan across, six-spoked, finely shaped, with a sharp edge; it is quickly accomplished and becomes great. Like the form of the rising sun, the gold is like refined gold, and in color like the karavīra flower; the lapis lazuli is said to be supreme.

The sword should have a small hilt, be tall, with a straight blade and no flaw, four finger-widths in breadth, sharp, like a leaf of the ciṣa; it has the nature of vengeance for the sake of accomplishment.

According to the rite of drawing mudrās, make the Uṣṇīṣa mudrā of gold, and make the pillar of the wish-fulfilling jewel; place it upon the great one and accomplish. Likewise the lotus, made of sandalwood or of gold and the like: one forearm in height, with a silver stem, with eight petals, and a beautiful heart. The vajra is made of iron from a dead man's tomb, or else red sandalwood will do; made of the three irons, sixteen finger-widths long, both ends should be made three-pronged.

The excellent gorocanā from cows, a bezoar like a golden pig's, heavy in weight, of beautiful color, is best for accomplishment. The cow-bezoar that arises from yellowish-white cattle is yellow in color. The cow-dung is golden-hued like turmeric, like the color of the bandhūka flower. Like a stacked termite mound, when it is ground, it has the color of the blue utpala, very soft, of this kind; and the collyrium (añjana) arises from a stream of water.

A fine, clean, soft cloth, large, dyed with saffron; the ashes of the dung of cattle of the wilds, anointed with camphor. For the sake of offering, a white thread, fine, spun threefold and well twisted; or else a thread of gold, spun threefold, with excellent qualities. A garland of flowers of the nose-ring, strung on a thread spun by a maiden. Sandals of śrīparṇa wood, a well-made staff with a thumb-rest. A peacock-feather parasol with a long bamboo handle, bound with gold. The three-pronged spear and the staff are carried. All of these have their own proper characteristics. So that accomplishment may come swiftly when one practices, these weapons are exceedingly auspicious.

Whatever kinds of substances to be accomplished were taught in the ritual text, examine their characteristics especially according to what is known in the world. Likewise, since the substances to be accomplished are of many kinds, through the many attainments, examine them thoroughly with your own judgment and with the judgment of the master.

A corpse free of disease, of fine complexion, with the body unimpaired, beautiful in form, without wounds, fallen in the prime of youth; the corpse of one who has himself died: the risen corpse is best for accomplishment. Or else, according to the variety of the rite, even those of low birth are very auspicious. For those who accomplish the risen corpse, fearlessness is supreme, and by that it is assured.

This is the chapter that sets out in order the ritual of the characteristics of substances.

Equipped with all the requisites, and having made offerings as is fitting, the substances to be accomplished are to be taken at the junctures of time, in the early morning. When the secret mantra has drawn near, and when one clearly knows the command of the teaching, at that time the wise should properly take the substances. Having bathed and become clean, having observed a fast, and having made auspicious and marvelous rites, the intelligent one should himself take the substances to be accomplished. Whatever one sees at the sources, one who is fearless should speak of once; the substances bought as one would buy at a stove are to be taken. Whenever, at the times of accomplishment, one knows that the secret mantra has drawn near, at that time the intelligent one should take the substances to be accomplished. Or else the wise one, who knows through scripture which substances are pure, which have many kinds of form, should take those according to the rite. Whatever good substances are suitable, having taken them according to the rite, he should at once draw the boundary fence and, being intelligent, begin the accomplishment.

This is the chapter that sets out in order the ritual of taking the substances.

Then all the substances to be accomplished should be purified as is fitting. Those which are to be examined and are hard are declared to be purified with the five products of the cow. With the five products of the cow in equal measure, the substances should be examined with a hammer and a stone. The gorocanā should be well examined with much pure milk. With much cow-urine the lī-khri; with much butter the bezoar. Substances with color from milk are purified with the collyrium alone. Substances such as swords and wheels are purified with cow-dung and much water. Substances such as wood and living things are all washed with cow-urine and water. Hides of the black antelope and the like are washed with cow-urine and ash. Having washed the substances in this way, they should then be rinsed with scented water. They should be rinsed completely with sesame together with cow-urine and with water. As for the purification suited to a substance, whatever is renowned in the world, with those the substances may be purified; or else everything may be done with scented water.

Or else, with the secret mantra that accomplishes all actions, or with the essence mantra of the family and of each family, the substances are known to be purified in accordance with the substance. By the awareness mantra of all the families, if one performs the sprinkling and offering, purification is taught. First one does it with the five products of the cow. After that, all should be thoroughly purified with sesame water.

This is the chapter on the orderly distinction of the rites for purifying substances.

Ornaments, weapons, garments, and all else that belongs to the class of substances: for the most part, the measure too is simply whatever is renowned in the world. As for the pounded mixture of costus root and the like, for the sake of accomplishment it is five sang. For the middling it is three sang, and for the lowest, one sang. Gorocana is one sang in measure; the bile of the cow is two sang. Collyrium is six zho; fresh butter is seven sang. Ash is five sang; saffron is equal to costus root. As taught for the invisibility rite, pills of various kinds are also made, and in particular the number seven, or up to twenty-one, is auspicious. Or again, according to need, even if the substances exceed the measure, when a wise person undertakes the practice, the substances are to be taken at that measure.

Whatever is taught in other mantra tantras, and whatever is taught in one's own ritual, and whatever is customary among the people of the world, all of these should be adopted. The measure of the preliminary retreat and the measures of the companions, and the measure of the substances as well, should be understood from the appearances of the awareness mantra. From the distinctions among the superior, middling, and lowest accomplishments, the measures of the superior, middling, and lowest substances are also taught.

This is the chapter on the orderly distinction of the rites concerning the measure of substances.

Now further, I shall explain at length the great secret: the rites for preparing the substances by which accomplishment is quickly attained. In order to practice, one should first reflect well in the mind on all that is required, and the wise practitioner should gather all the requisites well. By the rite of offering and burnt offering one should fully satisfy the secret mantra, and also perform the empowerment as the ritual teaches. Only then should one begin the practice.

First, having drawn the maṇḍala and made offerings well according to the rite, there the practitioner, in due manner, receives empowerment, and then begins the activities. Then, for the sake of the repeaters' accomplishment, whatever has been proclaimed regarding the maṇḍalas of empowerment that perform all activities, and whatever rites of the maṇḍala of the Awareness King were taught earlier, by these the purification of the ground and all the rest should be done in just the same way.

Of five, seven, or eight cubits, square, with four doors, with four corners marked out, a western door is opened and given a door-frame. By half of that measure, the outer enclosures of the maṇḍala are drawn around, and the maṇḍala is well drawn with powders of the five colors. The wise one, to its west, sets off a square space of five, four, or three cubits, and opens a door in the east and the four corners as well. In all the good rites, so that the practitioner may be directly empowered, the maṇḍala is made at half the measure of the root maṇḍala.

If the ground slopes toward the east, the door is opened in the west or north. If it slopes entirely toward the north, it is taught that the door is opened in the west. Having cast the lines everywhere, one draws with a single color. In the four outer corners one draws the three-pronged vajra. In all secret mantra practices, one first draws, in the center, a lotus with its heart, with eight petals, and then adorns it with auspicious signs. In all the doors place vajras, and in the corners set vases. For the outer maṇḍalas also, the same rite is taught to be performed.

In the maṇḍala of empowerment, the four filled vases should be placed without fail within the square outline. In the center, that of the mantra repeater...

Whichever king of vidyā-mantras it may be, one draws its mudrā, and upon that one places the vase. According to the families as they have been taught, the mudrā, the Uṣṇīṣa, the Lotus, and the Vajra are, in this order, supremely secret and sacred. If one is not practiced in these mudrās, then use the mantra that accomplishes all rites, or else, for the sake of all the deities, place the vase upon white mustard seeds.

Having carefully prepared the portion of woolen cloth, in the east one places the mudrā of the Blessed One. To its left is the Heart mantra. To its right one places the Mother of the family. In the same way, in the north, according to the rite, one should place the Holder of the Lotus. In the south is Vajrapāṇi, and in the west, Brahmā the Fierce.

On the two sides of one corner, one arranges Ānanda and Subhūti, Short Spear and Fang, together with the hosts of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras. On the two sides of another corner, one arranges Amoghasiddhi and Mahāteja, Śrī and the White-Robed One, together with the hosts of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras. On the two sides of another corner, one arranges Vajra, Vajradaṇḍa, Vajrakulikā, and the Lady of the Meteoric Iron, together with the hosts of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras. On the two sides of the last corner, one draws Raudrī in the fierce quarter and Mahāśrī in Brahmā's quarter, and the various hosts of deities.

As before, in the outer maṇḍala, one arranges the deities who guard the directions and intermediate directions, together with the other guardians, each in their proper order. Those not mentioned should be arranged as well. The nāga kings Nanda and Upananda should be placed on the sides of the door. Śobhana, Nanda, and Upaśobhana are placed at the outer door. In front, one sets up the fire pit with nectar.

As in the rite of the earlier maṇḍala, whatever the offerings and other rites may be, having performed these, one should properly begin the three kinds of fire offering. To crush obstructing forces, one engages in the fierce rite. For one's own prosperity, one engages in the increasing rite. For the sake of pacification, one performs the pacifying rite. It is taught that one should act according to what one sees as needed.

For the three families in common as well, whether by the mantra that accomplishes all rites or by the one who sets up the fire pit, the fierce rite is applied against obstructing forces. The increasing rite is done with the Heart mantra itself. With the vidyā-mantra of the pacifying family, or else with the one that accomplishes all rites, or by the particular rite of each, one should act, following the rite taught for the maṇḍala.

The skilled practitioner, on the right side of the door, performs the fire offering with butter and the other fire-offering substances. In each of the three rites, the skilled one, with the three kinds of secret mantra, in due order makes a hundred offerings each, or even more.

To satisfy the vidyā-mantras together with their lords, the practitioner makes a hundred fire offerings to each family, or else seven to each one individually. Whichever vidyā-mantra is to be accomplished, one places it before its own lord.

To Apahārī, Girikaṇṭhā, Śaṅkhinī, the fierce goddess, and Ekajaṭā, or in accord with the directions, one who wishes to make offerings should make them. Having offered well to all the deities and performed the fire offering as much as one wishes, one praises the previously arranged vase with its own mantra.

The vase that stands before the deity is recited over once with its own mantra. The one that stands in the center of the maṇḍala is recited over with the king of vidyā-mantras. The one that stands near the door is recited over with the wrathful Vajra mantra. The two vases in the eastern corner are recited over with the vidyā-mantra of the Heart family. The two vases standing in the western corner are recited over properly with the mantra that accomplishes all rites and likewise with all the other secret mantras.

Having recited for all the deities of the maṇḍala and properly performed the fire offering, one then makes offerings well, as much as one is able.

Then one should perform the circumambulation. Whatever rite is taught for the empowerment in the maṇḍalas, the auspicious articles and the rest, these too should be arranged here with great care.

A fine vase, together with jewels, grains, and medicinal herbs, flowers, fruits, and leaves, filled with water and adorned with a neck-cord and garland: for all the rites that follow from it, the empowerment is said to be conferred first.

The companion of the reciter, one who is keeping the fast, confers the empowerment. Or else one's own master, one who is especially learned in the scriptures, should do it. Let a wise person who has good qualities and is capable of austerity be engaged to perform this rite.

At the outset, in order to dispel obstructors, the empowerment is properly applied. In the middle, it is done by the intermediaries, and at the close one recites for oneself.

The recitation over white mustard seed, and likewise gorocana, fragrant perfume, and incense, together with threads, cords, and cloths, all these should be kept at hand here.

When the empowerment is complete, one oneself performs the pacifying fire offering, and then, without hesitation, according to the rite, requests the deities to depart once more.

Again, on level, fine ground, on a platform one cubit square, one should draw a small maṇḍala well, enlarged with a single color of pigment. The three mudrās are placed according to the directions, and likewise in the west the three-pointed spear. With the vase in the center of it, one performs the empowerment as before.

By this abbreviated rite, too, one confers empowerment upon oneself. When it is done in this way, there are no obstacles. This is the great secret of the reciter. The deities bestow their blessing, the obstructors are completely pacified, life and merit increase, and sins are wholly purified.

Therefore, the reciter who knows the method, having learned the extensive rite, should employ this secret empowerment everywhere for the sake of accomplishment.

This is the section that analyzes in sequence the rite of empowerment.

Next, furthermore, the mantra practitioner should, every day and at the three times of day, begin the fire offering that is taught as suitable to the mantra. According to the rite, one performs the fire offering with black sesame, curd, honey, and butter combined, or one offers it by hand, for twenty-one days, or seven days, or one month, as accords with the accomplishment of the secret mantra. This rite is taught to be performed in this way.

One fumigates it, and performs the purifying sprinkling and the scattering of offerings. One recites mentally and gazes upon it. With the hand holding the purifying implement, one recites the secret mantra and scatters it. With gorocana water and white mustard seed one performs the purifying and scattering offering, especially so. For the substances, at each season, one should make offerings as is fitting.

In the bright fortnight, one fit to practice should, being wise, do so on the full moon. In the dark fortnight, one fit to practice should do so on the fourteenth of the dark fortnight. The wise one should bring forth the blessing of the substances with the vidyā-mantra of the respective family. One should make offerings in a special way with perfume, incense, garlands, and the like.

With a cord tied on the hand, and the palm anointed with perfume, one recites throughout one night, from sunset until the sun rises, holding the ashes in the hand. On that same night too, with the secret mantra of the respective family, one brings forth the blessing of the substances, reciting one hundred times at each of the three times.

Thus the wise person, having taken up the substance entirely, recites at the three times until it is accomplished. When it is done thus, accomplishment will come.

Oṃ teja teja sani siddhi sādahaya hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the Tathāgata family.

Oṃ dībya dībya dīpayā āveśa mahāśriye svāhā. This is for the Lotus family.

Oṃ jvala jvala jvalaya bandhūri hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the Vajra family.

Red oleander, or malatī flowers, or even white mustard seed may be used. One should cast it well onto the substance, at the beginning, in the middle, or at the end, or when a sign appears, and throughout the intervals of diligent practice.

If it is cast upon the substance, the blessing is generated. At those times, according to the rite, one should perform, as is suitable, recitation over scented water, or with ghee and the like. By performing the purification with sprinkling and offering, the blessing is generated.

If the substances are not accomplished, that same rite is taught to be performed. Or else, having drawn this maṇḍala, one who knows the rite should generate the blessing.

With powders of the five colored pigments, draw the maṇḍala as before. Make it square with a single door, four cubits in measure.

First, in the east, place the wheel, and on its sides the Dharma robe and the alms bowl. Then in the north place the lotus, and the staff with its ring and its ladle. In the same way, in the south, place the wheel, and on its sides the staff and the vase. All the mudrā emblems are placed upon a platform, and made white in color.

Having arranged one's own mudrā, place the substance together with its vessel. Upon the substance placed there, generate the blessing with the mantra as before.

The Tathāgata's short spear; the Eye accomplished in the knowledge mantra; the Treasury of Splendor, Lord of secret mantras; likewise the one whom others cannot overcome; the Six-Armed One and Hayagrīva; the goddess Tārā and the one called Moon; Vajra-Hook and Bhṛkuṭī; and on the sides Kīli and Gaṇḍha-Beautiful; the great knowledge mantra Māmakī; the White-Robed One, whoever she may be; and the Unconquerable Lady of knowledge mantras:

these are to be set in the western direction.

The one who clears away all obstructers, the preparation of the ambrosia, is to be set in place. On the side of the door place one's own emblem, and honor it with offerings according to the rite as before.

One who knows the division of the directions should, in due order, in every corner, place the secret mantras that accomplish all activities, and the wrathful forms likewise in order. At the eastern side of the seat of substances, place the very deity who is to be accomplished. The emblems of the families and of the families' lords, whatever varied ones are desired, are also to be placed. With each one's own secret mantra, having invited them according to the rite, all the offering rites are to be performed as taught earlier in the maṇḍala.

As is suitable for each knowledge mantra, whether with the secret mantra spoken or with the knowledge mantra, one should perform the fire offering in particular. Then these rites are to be performed. First, by means of the fire offerings and the other activities, the substances are well blessed and generated again. For all of them, one praises with the knowledge mantra of the family, and at the end performs the sprinkling and offering.

The heart mantra of Māmakī, together with the four syllables of the lord of the family: with these, in particular, the rite of generating the blessing is taught to be performed.

Namo lokadhātrye. Namaḥ śaṃkare. Śāntikare. Ghuṭṭa ghuṭṭa ghuṭṭiṇi. Ghuṭṭaye. Ghuṭṭiṇi svāhā. This is the knowledge mantra of Māmakī.

Oṃ kulandhari bandha bandha hūṃ phaṭ. This is the heart mantra of Māmakī.

Oṃ vajra hūṃ dha. This is that of the lord of knowledge.

Oṃ jvala jvala yā. This is that of the Victors.

Siddhi sādahaya. This is that of the intermediate ones.

Dīpya dīpaya. This is of the intermediate secret mantras, and is the praise of the substance.

The word phaṭ is for all of them.

Splendid One, abide within the substance without going outside. Increase the splendor of all, and be pleased to make it blessed. Words such as these may be used, whether repeated, or unmixed, or interchanged, as one wishes; the wise one thus generates the blessing of the substance.

Red oleander flowers, white mustard seed, and then the flowers of the snāma plant: in this order the substance is blessed. First one should anoint it with perfume. Then one should fumigate it thoroughly with incense of flowers and white mustard. With scented water also one performs the sprinkling and offering. At the three times, with the scented water, using one's own mantra and the secret mantra of the master, one performs the sprinkling and offering, and with one's own mantra one recites at various moments.

Until the sun rises as well, one should perform the rite of generating the blessing. By this rite the vidyā mantras quickly come to success for the one who recites them. Thus the substance whose blessing has been generated becomes firm and quickly accomplished. Even a small amount of the substance of accomplishment will bestow great siddhi. Increase, radiance, and blessing, and complete purity, become manifest. By this rite one should generate the blessing again and again for the substances. Having taken hold of all the rites that are to be accomplished, by this rite that is taught to be secret, one generates the blessing of all the substances. Always, at the proper times and at the junctures between times, one should generate the blessing in just this way. Then afterwards, in a single night, one should begin the accomplishment well.

This was the section distinguishing, in due order, the rite of generating the blessing of the substance.

Then, further, whatever is seen of good times endowed with excellent qualities, the wise one should begin the rite for the sake of the accomplishment, in accordance with the ritual. In the lesser winter month, the middle autumn month, the first and the middle months of spring, and the first and the full-moon days of summer months: at these times one should begin the great accomplishment. In the first summer month the rain falls constantly. The middle spring month is a circle of winds. In the first spring month there are various obstacles. In the first winter month there are no obstacles. In the middle autumn month lightning flashes, and great sounds also arise. Obstacles are signs of success, so one should examine these matters accordingly. In those five months one should accomplish the supreme siddhi. The pacifying rites also should be begun well in those very months.

Of the five, in the waning half of the month, in the seasons that have been proclaimed, in these the siddhis of middle and lesser level are very auspicious to accomplish. When the moon is seized by a planet, one should accomplish the supreme substance. When the sun is seized by an eclipse as well, the wise one should accomplish the rites. On the fifth, the seventh, the first, the third, and the thirteenth lunar days, it is auspicious to perform all rites. When the lunar day is joined with an auspicious constellation, know that it becomes supreme. In general, and in particular, the constellation of the Victor is auspicious for all. Planets and brief moments serve fierce rites, the fierce ones. Whether taught in its own ritual, or urged on by the gods, in the half-month of miracles all rites are very auspicious. Whether on the lunar day on which the command was given, or on the thirteenth lunar day, either is suitable.

Pacifying rites are mostly auspicious in the autumn half; likewise increasing rites in the winter half; and in late spring the fierce and wrathful rites, in accordance with the ritual, are very auspicious to accomplish. In early spring one may perform all rites. In the summer half one may perform the rites. Autumn, winter, and late spring are the middle, the best, and the lesser. Each of these three is explained as being divided again into three. The siddhis of the three times are also mostly explained as of three kinds. The first arises from the evening time; the middle at midnight; the best time is the dawn, and there the siddhis come in due order. The times for pacifying, wrathful, and increasing rites are also proclaimed to be these same. The sequences of ritual for lesser, middle, and best are just these. According to the signs of the siddhis of the first, middle, and lesser, as one sees them in order, one should recognize the three distinctions. When the sun and moon are seized by an eclipse, no particular time is fixed. For fierce and wrathful conduct in particular, the time when they are seized is good to perform. According to the distinctions of best and so forth, three days, or two days, or even one day, is acceptable; fasting is taught for the beginning.

This was the section distinguishing, in due order, the times of accomplishment.

Then, further, from the Kalpa:

Perform the rite just as it has been taught. Because there is the fault of becoming exhausted, fasting is not auspicious. In the meantime, the practitioner should exert himself in recitation, in offerings, in the fire offering and its ritual, in praise, and in virtuous deeds.

Take a thread spun by a young girl and empowered a hundred times. Wind it many times over and anoint it with incense, and tie seven knots in it. Then the practitioner should recite this secret mantra one hundred and eight times, and in the evening bind it around his waist. By this, the loss of semen will be prevented.

Oṃ jaye kumāri śukra bandhani svāhā. Oṃ rakṣa kuru kuru gini svāhā. Oṃ kulandhari bandha bandha hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

For the mantra holder of the Sugata family, the Maiden; for the lotus-holder, Kurukullā; for the vajra family, Māmakī: in this way, according to the rite, prevent the loss of semen. Come hither, come hither, you of excellent vow! Enter swiftly into my body, and abiding as far as my feet, be pleased to move about here for a long time.

These three vidyā mantras that have been taught are common to all. In some cases, one should perform the rite with the mantras taught in the Kalpa. Maṇḍalas, inquiries, recitation, and the proper seasons, as well as the rites of consecration and so forth, should be bound for each single day.

First, with eye ointment empowered a hundred times, even sleep is dispelled. At the time of accomplishment too, that eye ointment should be applied well; so it is proclaimed. Combine into a paste: sugmel (cardamom), camphor, strong sroṭan, tsa, shingtsa, tatar, pippali, and kharata, and mix with water. It dispels sleep, drowsiness, and fear. Drink the scattered liquid again and again, then wash the face and wash the eyes. With the eyes anointed with that ointment, one can even see obstructing spirits at the time of accomplishment.

Oṃ jvala locani svāhā. This is for the Tathāgata family. Oṃ viloki-na svāhā. This is for the lotus family. Oṃ bandhuni ridhi vate svāhā. This is for the vajra family. These are the vidyā mantras for applying the eye ointment of the three families.

To dispel weariness and faintness, take a bowlful of scented water, perfumed with fragrances and empowered seven times each, and drink it by the bowlful. Then, having made the approach to the deity, the wise practitioner should examine the signs. Having seen a good sign, he should begin the accomplishment with reverence.

These signs indicate success: a wheel, a conch, an iron hook, a fish, a svastika, a lotus, a banner, an auspicious full vase, the śrīvatsa, a vajra, a garland, a girl adorned with ornaments, a pregnant woman or a woman holding a child, and a young person who is joyful and proud. A brahmin dressed in white, chariots, elephants, horses, roots, stones, various fruits, and anything greatly wondrous to behold. The sound of thunder, the chanting of the Vedas, cries of victory, and the sounds of conch, drum, and cymbals are supremely auspicious for success. Having heard the sweet cries of peacocks, cranes, geese, cuckoos, and other birds, one should undertake the work that bestows the siddhis.

Hearing all auspicious aspirations, words of merit, joy, and well-being, and all pleasing words, one should know that success will come. Lightning, clouds, falling rain, a shower of hail or flowers, a rainbow, and a sweet fragrance: these signs belong to the gods. All signs that arise from the sky should be known as middling. Signs arising from the earth are said to belong to the earth-dwellers. Through the gods, the siddhi is supreme; through the sky, it is middling; the siddhi of earth-dwellers is ordinary. Each of these three is further divided into three. These and similar signs are proclaimed for the sake of siddhi. In brief, for all secret mantras...

Through the reverse of these, nothing will succeed. Having first grasped the signs, and having made the mind truly joyful, with an attitude of complete contentment, one should then begin the practice. This is the division of the signs of accomplishment into stages.

For all the tantras of the maṇḍala, or for the rites of accomplishment as well, one should know the lunar days, even the shortest moment of time, and the signs in full detail. Where there is inauspiciousness, one should perform the offering and burnt offering of many substances with the appropriate knowledge-mantras of one's family. Then, having begun the rites, one will surely attain siddhi.

In whatever places one draws the maṇḍalas in due order, right there the practice may be done; that is the sequence which is taught. In places such as mountains, great siddhi is proclaimed to be attained. At lakes and the like, one attains the middling siddhi; in other places, only the ordinary. In accordance with the mantra, one begins the rites by reciting it. If one practices otherwise, siddhi will not be attained swiftly.

All stūpas containing relics are places where the secret mantras of all the Sugatas succeed. At the delightful Great Stūpa, at the great place of awakening, the site of accomplishment, and likewise at the eight places beginning with the Buddha's birthplace, there are no obstructors. All the procedures of ritual action are also fitting there. Māra can never create obstacles there. Therefore it is taught that all secret mantras will certainly succeed there.

Here, the fierce rites are well performed in charnel grounds. Or at a solitary tree, or an empty house, or a lone landmark. It is taught that on the banks of any flowing river, the practice of a knowledge-mantra will succeed. In pleasure groves, where yakṣiṇīs dwell, at lakes, the abodes of the lords of the nāgas, and in empty houses, for the sake of enjoyment; and for the mantras of servants, town guardians, and the like, and for cave mantras, in caves: if one practices there, success will come swiftly. It is for the swift success of mantras that this secret rite is taught. By this very instruction, the places should be settled and determined.

In any suitable place, one should first purify the ground by the rite of the maṇḍala as taught, or by the rite of the recitation of the ground. When the dwelling place of the gods is purified, it is blessed and they come to abide there. For the practice in particular, these further rites are taught.

Take four stakes of khadira wood, each a hand-span long and sharpened to a point, smeared with red sandalwood and bound round with red thread. One recites over them a hundred times, with the vajra-stake mantra. Whether in a dwelling or a house, one drives them into the four directions with a hum. First one uses the mantra that accomplishes all actions, or else the mantra of the enemies of obstructors. With white mustard seeds and the like, one should thoroughly dispel all obstructors on every side.

On a single white banner, one invokes it with the king of knowledge-mantras. Tied to the tip of a long bamboo pole, it is first set up facing east. One makes the fence with iron-filings powder, consecrated with the vajra fence mantra. With powder that has been consecrated a hundred times with the secret mantra of the vajra net, if one draws a vajra garland around the border, it becomes a vajra net.

At the first door within the maṇḍala, by the application of nectar and fire, one guards with the vajra mudrā. Or else, because others cannot withstand it, the guarding of the second maṇḍala is intended to be done by the Seizer goddess and the others. This rite is also proclaimed for the common practice of all three families. These three rites are also proclaimed as hard to withstand. Whether performed singly or all together, at the time of practice they remove all obstructors. For protection when accomplishing substances, this secret rite is taught. It is brief in summary, yet great in meaning, and precious in its sequence. The wise, with jewels and the like...

Make the ground firm and solid. For a hearth as well, whatever suits, one may place the substances beneath it too. In a clean-scented house or a fine house, the cleansing and the offering of torma have been taught. There it is not necessary to dig up the earth; such a rite is for the outside. If one begins the work on one's own, according to the rite, in a house that has been examined and prepared, then accomplishment there will come swiftly. One should not practice in pits, nor should one make the site uneven or hollow. Nor should the wise person begin the practice in a ruined house.

Then, with a mind of faith, in the evening, honor the mantra deities as though actually seeing them, and make the preliminary preparation well. As for the vidyā-mantra deities of the three families, together with their lords, whoever abide there, and those deities who have been proclaimed in this mantra tantra, and whichever mantra deities there may be, invite them with deep and strong feeling. When you have propitiated them through approach practice, recitation, and offerings in the fire according to this rite, then, after seven days, at the time of accomplishment, request them to bestow blessing and to come. Say: Here, gods and spirits, together with your retinues, having been honored with offerings as far as I am able, you who bring benefit to those who make offerings, be fully pleased, gather together, and swiftly grant me accomplishment.

In this way, respectfully, day by day, speak these words toward the four directions as well. Drawing the maṇḍala each day, or every second day, make the preliminary preparation of the mantra deities. Offer water for offering, flowers, and fragrant incense as well. This rite is taught for the practitioner to perform at the time of evening. By this same rite of the practitioner, make the preliminary preparation of the substances too: scatter them well with the hand and perfume them well with incense. Or else, the astrologers, having observed a fast on an auspicious day, draw the maṇḍala and perform the rite of preparing the substances.

For the practitioner of the earth rite, or for the mantra practitioner, within three days, it is to be done by young attendants. While reciting, one draws the maṇḍala, even with colored powders of many kinds. In a circular maṇḍala of many colors, surround it on the outside with two successive rings, and draw it with a single door. At its center draw an eight-petaled lotus, a cubit in size. As for the remaining measurements of the maṇḍala, make them however one likes. There place the three lords, and in the west set the amṛta cauldron.

In the west of the second maṇḍala, draw the Great Lord (Maheśvara) together with his consort; one figure as a mass of splendor; another as the Eye of the Practitioner; another as the Great Heroine; another as the Six-Armed Lady; another as the vidyā-queen Māmakī; another as the vidyā-king's essence; another as the wrathful Kīli; and another as the vajra goddess of the hook. All these as taught, arrange in the essence maṇḍalas. The mantras that perform all rites, in the outer directions, in proper order. When they are arranged thus, at the outer door draw also the one whom others cannot withstand. Then draw the guardians of the directions and the deities one desires.

Then, with each one's own mantra, in due order, invite the gazes of the deities. Honor the lords with their essence mantras beneath that. At the center of the lotus, with its own mantra, set the substance well and make offering. Upon the full vase, place the substances according to the rite. Or else place a bowl or a vessel filled with flowers and the like. Then scatter them with the hand, and beneath that cast a hundred or a thousand flowers over which one's own vidyā-mantra has been recited. Then offer incense of guggul and fragrant smoke mixed with butter. When one has recited over fragrant water, then slowly make the cleansing and the torma offering. Then, with one's own mantra and all those taught for the maṇḍala, recite over each one separately.

Perform also the fire offering as it has been taught. Make the fire offering with pure butter, or else with the milk of a cow. Or mix butter, honey, and sesame together, and with the ladle perform the concluding offering. Then, with all the secret mantras, let the skilled practitioner purify the substance with incense and torma offering. Draw the maṇḍala well, and in accordance with it, bring forth the blessing. Reciting mentally, and reciting as one who knows the rite, let one gaze upon the substance with the eyes. When this is done, the substance becomes one that has been prepared and set in place.

The fire offering, the rite, the sequence of torma, the offerings and all the rest, whatever they may be, are to be performed with recitation, in full, just as is taught in the tantra. This is proclaimed to be the rite of setting the substance in preparation. The substance that has been so prepared will quickly bring accomplishment.

By this very sequence of the rite one may also take hold of the substances, and take hold of the accomplishments. One may also bring forth the blessing of the substances. By these very rites, in the center of this maṇḍala, one may also perform the accomplishment of the substances. In this supreme maṇḍala, obstacles too will quickly be pacified. By the rite of purifying the substances and of empowerment, the practitioners too are to be empowered, and this is to be done in this maṇḍala.

In this maṇḍala that accomplishes all rites, the great secret was spoken by the Lord of Secrets. If this maṇḍala is drawn, accomplishments will quickly be attained.

This is the section on the rite of setting the substance in preparation, in its sequence.

Having taken hold of the substance, the practitioner, at the three times, should bathe, make offerings, perform the fire offering, and also scatter offerings with the hand. He should change his garments three times, and at the junctures of the periods keep a fast. The offerings and the god-offering rites he should perform especially well. At the three times he confesses misdeeds, rejoices in merit, and at the three times makes aspiration. He recites the sacred text three times at each of the three times. He does the maṇḍala three times. Three times he takes the vows. At the three times he also keeps guard. If he does thus, he will surely succeed.

If, through heedlessness, the rite of the three times falls away, then one should recite one's own vidyā-mantra twenty-one times. In this way, every day at the three times, the wise should always do so. If it is neglected, he will be ruined, and his accomplishments too will decline.

At the end of the recitation of the rite, one should recite a hundred thousand times, or else draw this maṇḍala. Having performed that secret rite, one should then begin the rites.

As before, mark the lines well. Draw well, according to the rite, a square with four doors, surrounded by an outer maṇḍala. In the center draw a wheel, and to the east of it set the Wheel-Turning King, the Mass of Splendor, the white Uṣṇīṣa, the Victorious One, and the Wondrous One. On the two sides too the skilled one draws the Sugata's Tuft of Hair, the Short Spear, the Buddha Maitreya together with the Eye, Ānanda and Subhūti, and likewise the Alms Bowl and Khakkhara. At the door he sets the one who accomplishes all rites. In due order, at the doors, he sets the Plunderer and the one whom others cannot withstand.

In the center of the wheel place the substances, or else the secret mantra deities. Then perform the rite of offering. It is taught that all fire offerings are to be performed. This maṇḍala is proclaimed to be set in place either as a mudrā or as a permanent one. One may invite the deities with each one's own rite, or perform with the general essence mantra. There, with one's own vidyā-mantra, kindle the fire as before. Then, from butter and honey, perform one hundred and eight fire offerings. Then perform one hundred fire offerings each of curd, of rice, and of sesame. The skilled one, at the end, recites a hundred times. This is the great secret rite.

With fragrant flowers, perfumes, and the like, offerings are to be made here. A great torma, well prepared from curd and raw sugar, is to be presented. By this rite the deities are swiftly and fully satisfied. Being pleased, they grant accomplishment to the practitioner without long delay.

Each month, or each half-month, or each day, or at the junctures of the seasons, even a poor person should draw this maṇḍala as best he can. All the procedures of the rite should be understood to apply to this maṇḍala as well. Make it perfectly round throughout, to whatever size one finds pleasing. Having drawn a lotus in its center, in its place place the king of vidyā-mantras, Hayagrīva, with his manifold forms, with three eyes, with four arms, six arms, or twelve arms. In the same way, place the one who brings about what is wished for, the glorious and renowned Great Śrī, and Tārā, and the goddess Candrahāsā (Moon-Smile). In the direction of the door, place Pāṇḍarā (the White One) and Śvetavāsini (the White-Robed One). At the door, place the one who performs all rites. This rite of the maṇḍala, which holds the lotus, was taught for the sake of accomplishment.

According to one's wish, the maṇḍala may also be well drawn as a square. As before, in the maṇḍala of the essence, the king of vidyā-mantras is to be placed. The great vidyā Māmakī, Krodha Amṛtakuṇḍalin, the great vidyā Aṅkuśī, Daṇḍa, and Mahābalā, Vajrakulikā, the vidyā queen, and Gaṇeśvarī are placed in due order. The limbs of the great wrathful deity, and Padavikṣepa (the Striding One), and the wrathful goddesses of fire, a wise person should place on the two sides. Within the direction of the door, place Vajrabhairava, Eye, and the Vajra Invincible One. At the door place the one who performs all rites.

The offerings for the second maṇḍala should also be performed as in the former rite. How the deities come to be pleased was fully explained by Vajrapāṇi.

Then, rising at dawn, examine one's auspicious dreams. Being clean, having bathed and put on white garments, begin the work of the fire offering. Make offerings to the deities according to the rite, and also perform auspicious and wondrous acts. As prescribed, kindle the fire and perform the fire offering as it was taught.

Having smeared the place with cow dung, arrange that place with particular care, with rice, barley, blue kuśa grass, and fragrant white flowers. To the right of it, set out fuel, curd, kuśa grass, butter, honey, rice, and sesame, as much of the substances to be burned as one can obtain. On the left, place a well-examined vessel for the water offering. In the center, place the ladle for pouring and the ladle for dipping, and well-melted butter. Having placed these, the skilled one purifies and scatters with the mantra of all rites.

As before, place the lord of the secret mantra in front and make offerings. Then invite the deities of one's own family, and with recitation of the water offering, request them to be seated. In front of oneself, place a purified vessel of butter. Between the butter and the fire, place the substance to be accomplished. The wise one should arrange these five in order: oneself, the butter, the substance to be accomplished, the fire, and the lord of the secret mantra. On the left is the vidyā-mantra consecrator, and on the right the one who performs all rites. In that place, apply all the protections as before.

Then, spreading fresh kuśa grass as a seat for oneself, present the deities' food of rice and barley, auspicious, together with rice cooked from sāli rice and curd. Then perfume everything all around with fragrant incense. After that, perform the fire offering as taught, as one wishes.

The substances should be placed in a vessel of gold, silver, copper, or stone, or of conch, pearl, or wood, or made from earth of an anthill. Leaves of the bodhi tree are auspicious as a spread for them. Leaves of a milk-bearing tree, or leaves of the arka plant, are also suitable.

Or else let the leaves of the water-tree lotus, or soft white cloth, or leaves born from a fragrant tree, make up the fifth kind of spread, as is desired. Then cover the substances as is fitting with flour, melted butter, and the like. Knowing the rite, settle in meditative equipoise and fumigate the substances well.

Mentally bless the substances, and offer the fire oblation of butter in an unbroken stream. Watching carefully, the wise practitioner should fumigate the substances by this rite. Recite over the substances, scatter the cleansing offering, take the ladle in hand, and slowly fill it well with butter. Over the substances recite the mantra, and repeat the oblation until the fire blazes. Pronounce "svāhā," drawing out the sound of the syllable "hā" in a long stream, and fumigate the substances with the tip of the ladle, a thousand times, or else a hundred times.

Thus the rite is taught to be performed again and again upon the substances. One should know the nature of the secret mantra and the greater and lesser accomplishments. Twenty-one repetitions are also held to be a rite of counting. If the substances cannot be used up, the wise one should recite the awareness mantra over a small portion, scatter the cleansing offering, set it down, and make offerings and watch.

The distinctions of superior and the rest, and the distinctions of the rites that have been proclaimed, should be followed as taught in the maṇḍala. If the fire blazes, that is a sign of success. For substances of very great importance, place them to the right of the fire, or place them on the left where the left is fitting, and press against them there.

Upon the heads of all beings, or upon one's own head, whatever substance one wishes to accomplish, the wise one should dedicate the fumigation and perform it. By this rite of fumigation, as before, with flour and butter, for the sake of some, for others in dedication, one should watch and perform the fire offering well.

If butter cannot be obtained, perform it with milk, as the rite prescribes. Or else the wise one may use milk, butter, and the three sweet things together. For some purposes, such as pacifying and the like, curd is also suitable. Or else, by relying on the substances to be burned, fumigate in whatever way is fitting.

For weapons, grain and butter; for fragrant decoction, añjana, and dūrvā grass and the like, grain and butter. The rite of fumigation is taught to be performed in these ways. According to the particular kinds of substances, with many different substances, and with fruits born of fragrant plants, the rites of fumigation may also be performed. For substances such as the great flesh, it is proclaimed that they be done with fat. Or one may make an image of the object, and perform it with the respective flesh and fat.

Either by this rite as taught, or by the rite taught earlier, the rite of fumigation has been fully explained so that accomplishment may come swiftly. By this rite, having fumigated the substances, one should also confer empowerment upon them. Having conferred empowerment, place them in the abode of the deity and make fine offerings.

Then, in order to obtain what the rite describes, gather a torma offering. Having bathed oneself thoroughly, begin this rite. Having anointed oneself with fragrant substances, and likewise with bathing paste and a new garment, bathe from midday onward. The wise one should recite fully over the substances.

Over threads, cords, garments, ashes, white mustard seed, and water, begin reciting the secret mantra over these substances for the sake of protection. Recite them first, and perform this rite swiftly. Therefore, whatever is needed at that time should be set out right at the beginning. Gather together whatever flowers and other offerings are available, place them in suitable places, and remain in the place of practice.

By the rite taught in the maṇḍala, the wise one should draw the maṇḍala, make offerings as is fitting, and begin the accomplishment of the substances. With the mantra that accomplishes all rites, upon a cord of five colors, Having recited it a hundred times, the wise one should first use it to bind the stakes. Reciting the mantra of the hearth rite, he should tie the cord loosely to the vase placed beside the door, and then set it down there. Keeping in mind the wrathful one who dispels the obstructors of the hearth rite, the cord's emerging from beneath and its entering are what is taught here.

Or else, the wise one may recite over the cord with that wrathful mantra, or, for the sake of protection, may recite any other knowledge-mantra he prefers. The rites of expulsion and the rest taught earlier should also be known, and it is said that these rites are to be performed in the vicinity of the maṇḍala.

As for the directions and as many guardians of the directions as there are, and the deities of each of the families, according to their direction and their order, all of these are to be honored with offerings on the outside.

Place a vajra in a vase, or else a vase adorned at its mouth with leaves. Having tied the cord to it, place it in the direction of the door. With the heart-mantra of the king of knowledge of each respective family, or else in whatever way is fitting, one protects on all sides when accomplishing the substances. Or else, with the knowledge-mantra of the family and the mudrā of each respective family, in order to pacify the obstructors, one protects everything here during the accomplishment.

Take a stake shaped like a vajra with a single point, or a thick single-pointed one, and recite over it a hundred times with the vajra-stake mantra. Then drive these in at all four corners outside the abode of the deities. Or else, having driven them in outside the maṇḍala, one performs the rites well. Know that this vajra-stake rite accomplishes all rites. When one accomplishes the practice here, there is no harm from obstructors, and the practitioner attains success.

Having drawn the maṇḍala well with fragrant powder or pir, with many-colored lines, then, with these rites, at the end of each directional border one is to make a three-pointed vajra, it is taught. On the central surfaces also, make a row of upright vajras. By the secret mantra of the vajra net, that rite is taught. Seated in its center, one should accomplish the substances. By this rite, make a net of vajra points, outer and inner. By the secret mantra of the vajra net, it becomes extremely hard to overcome.

Around all the door frames, and in front of the doors, the wise one should draw vajras, and then the rites are proclaimed to be performed.

On a painted cloth, a young person should draw the maṇḍala well. Having drawn the abbreviated rite, one should begin the accomplishment of the substances. Let it measure five, seven, or eight cubits, square, with four doors, in keeping with the success of the secret mantra; or it may be made larger. At all the doors place vajras, and at the corners place vases. The vases that accomplish all rites should be set beside the doors.

In the center arrange the wheel of Dharma and the five original kings. On the sides arrange the fang, the short spear, the eye, and the hair-tuft of the Victor. Arrange also all the mudrās of the Sugata, and at the door, the one who cannot be overcome by others. Subhūti and Ānanda, and the deities of the heart maṇḍala, are to be arranged according to the directions taught.

On the outside, it is said, arrange whatever deities one wishes. Amoghasiddhi, Mahābala, Mañjuśrī, the elephant, glorious Brahmā, Agni, likewise Indra, the Blessed One's messenger of the buddhas, and those and those deities, together with the various guardians of the directions, are to be drawn in the outer maṇḍala. Then, in the center, place the substances of the secret mantra, or of the heart maṇḍala.

All the rites of offering, and the actions of fire offering, are proclaimed as things to be done. In short, all the protective rites are to be applied just as they were taught for the maṇḍalas; and at the time of accomplishment, all of these should be joined in a special way.

This teaching on the maṇḍala ritual was spoken by the family of the Tathāgata. By means of it the substances are made ready for accomplishment, and success comes swiftly to the one who recites. Merely by entering there, obstructors are made to vanish, and the deities, in a special way, will bestow their blessing.

This is the detailed ordering of the maṇḍala ritual for accomplishing the substances of the Tathāgata family.

With the five colored powders, as before, draw the entire maṇḍala. Having drawn a lotus in the center, first, in the eastern direction, arrange the one who fulfills wishes. Then the six kings of secret mantra; below them, the White-Robed One; the seven Tārās and the seven heroines; the queen of awareness, the Renowned One. At the door, arrange the single-topknot vidyā mantra and also Hayagrīva. Place at the door the vase that accomplishes all actions. In the corners of the door draw vajras. Outside are Brahmā, the Eye of the Gods, the Great Lord, the Son of the Gods, the Stainless Prince, the one adorned with garlands of light, the nāga king Ananta, Mighty and Beautiful, and Joy; the king of mantra-holders, Great Diligence, and the Conch-Bearer. As before, arrange the guardians of the directions, and here too place the deities of awareness. As in the rite of the earlier maṇḍala, everything here too is said to be done. One who relies on this exposition will be hard for any obstructors to overcome.

This is the detailed ordering of the maṇḍala ritual for accomplishing the substances of the Lotus family.

Having struck the lines for a square, first draw the maṇḍala. Having drawn a vajra in the center, in the east first arrange the king of vidyā mantras, who brings perfect success. Then, on either side of him, draw the two queens of vidyā mantras. Place the jewel vajra and the meteoric iron vajra, and on the left the vajra Khucura. On either side of these arrange Kīlī and Gnodmdzes. Fully arrange the Vajra, the Vajra Staff, the Hammer, and Luguryud; the Jewel Vajra, the Iron Hook, and Māmakī. Then the king, the minister, and the other messengers, Vajramati and the rest, the Great Lord together with his consort, and the lord of wealth together with the yakṣas, all outside the vase that accomplishes all actions. Outside again are the vidyā mantras of the Vajrapāṇi family who wish to be born, spirits, rākṣasas, flesh-eaters, siddhas, and the great-bellied yakṣa. Arrange all the deities who guard the directions in their proper order.

Then perform the rite of offering and all the protective rites and so forth, together with the fire offering, as taught, and carry out whatever actions have been taught. The reciter should perform the invitation of the deities into the maṇḍala and the other actions, either with the heart mantra of the king of awareness or by distinguishing them in detail. All the filling of vases follows the ritual spoken for accomplishment, and the ritual taught for the accomplishment maṇḍala is said to be the same.

All beings of great power and renown do not transgress their pledge. So even if the protective rite has not been performed, one may accomplish in the maṇḍalas. The deities of the vidyā mantras, through their pledge, will bestow an exceptional blessing within the maṇḍala, and special signs will arise. By this ritual, which is to be honored always with devotion, they will be pleased.

The mantras bring about the bestowal of all the accomplishments that the practitioner desires. Here the essence of the family, the mother of the family, the king, and the general protective mantra as well, all bestow accomplishments swiftly. These three maṇḍalas are proclaimed to be great secrets.

This concludes the sequential exposition of the ritual of the maṇḍala for accomplishing substances, of the vajra family of messengers.

Now, furthermore, this maṇḍala, which has become the great secret essence, is to be drawn well, in due order, marked with vajras. In the center, having drawn the emblem of the family, one should place the awareness mantra upon it. Or else one may set down the filled vase, with the auspicious items as explained before. Upon it, place the bowl and the other vessels, and within the joined vessels place the substance as well.

In the east is the Buddha, the Blessed One. In the north is Avalokiteśvara, the Sovereign. In the south is the Blessed Vajradhara. In the west is the wrathful Lord of Wealth. In the manner of the kings of awareness, all are to be set upon their mudrās. To the right is the awareness mantra of the family, and to the left, the one who accomplishes all actions. On the two sides of the western direction, place the white-robed goddess and Śrī.

In the two eastern corners, draw the alms bowl and the monastic robe. In the northern direction, draw the staff and the water vessel of Padmapāṇi. In the southern direction, draw the vajra and the hammer of the Vajra-holder. In the two western corners, draw the three-pointed trident and the vase of wealth. At the gate, place the Invincible Goddess; in the east, place the Snatcher; in the south, the Mountain-Fortress Goddess; and in the north, draw the One with a Single Braid.

The placing of the outer deities is, in short, as one wishes. All the rites of offering the mantras are proclaimed just as before. It is said that when this exceedingly secret maṇḍala is being accomplished there are no obstructing spirits. All the substances and all the rites succeed as one wishes through one's own mantra. Even the mere act of entering and emerging cannot be harmed by obstructors.

Then begin the offering well, with perfumes, flowers, fragrant incense, bright lamps, and food offerings of many kinds. The recitation is as taught in the ritual, and whatever was shown for the maṇḍalas, likewise perform the offering ritual in a hall or in the maṇḍala. For the king of awareness mantras, the god-offering of food, the various essences, and whatever diverse offerings there are, it is taught that they should be done according to the ritual. Offer bright butter lamps, and offer the essences clearly. For the sake of leading beings onward, present the water offering to one's own awareness mantra.

Then, having praised the white mustard seeds with the king of awareness mantras, one should perform the secret protection against all diseases and epidemics. Either the awareness mantra that accomplishes all actions, or any other protective mantra will do. The white mustard seeds, thoroughly recited over, should be placed near the substances. By scattering them everywhere, one will be protected from obstructors.

On the left, one may set one's own mudrā, or else a sword that has been properly praised. Having set guardians of the directions in their directions, one should keep a fast and guard at that very time. A man of great mental strength, who is clean and wears clothing of the appropriate color, endowed with a strong body, vigor, youth, and good looks, holds a sword recited over with the mantra of Śrī. A garland hangs from his neck. He pours the white mustard seeds into the water. He is skilled at seeing obstructors. He is able to hurl the garland and the mustard seeds at the obstructors. Whether the obstructors appear from all sides or there is great danger, he drives them off fearlessly with the sword. If they come near and strike, he scatters mustard seeds and garlands and incense, and the obstructors will be completely pacified. Or else, in his own place...

Let him act with a sword that is firmly held in place. If the places around the circle are abandoned, an opening and a opportunity will be found, and obstructors will enter there. Therefore, generating earnest diligence, let him guard them. This is the work of protection, summarized from the rites for accomplishing those substances.

If the directional guardians, endowed with the qualities spoken of in the tantra, cannot be found, then recite over iron arrows, or over those who bear arrows, and set them toward the directions. A mantra practitioner who recites and practices austerities, who upholds the tantra and has knowledge, is the supreme companion in mantra practice. Let him recite and be stationed at the door. By him obstructors are turned back, and he should be engaged in all the rites.

Whatever seal of one's own is taught in the various tantras, whatever protection cannot be established by any means, having recited and made offerings to those, one should hold them oneself.

Against great and fierce obstructors, either recite those mantras, or else use the praised white mustard seeds together with whatever mantra is desired. Outside the deities' maṇḍala, make a tormā offering in whatever way is fitting, either to the serene and excellent ones, or else to all spirits.

Banishing, binding below, and binding above as well, and all around, let him seal the boundary and bind the directions, and make a vajra net and a fence. By the tantras and the teacher's instructions, let him protect the substances, himself, and the deities. By secret mantras, let him turn back all obstructors, whether outer or inner.

All these rites are taught to be performed in the afternoon. When the sun has set, let him begin the accomplishment of the substances. The wise practitioner, having gone outside, touches himself again and again, and drinks a handful of scented water over which the nectar rite has been recited. He drinks a little butter recited over with the heart mantra of the lord of the maṇḍala. All harm, such as fatigue and drowsiness, will be pacified. Resin, honey, and long pepper, recited over with the Buddha-eye mantra, or smeared on with the former mantra, quickly dispel the sleep caused by obstructors.

Restrained, he sits facing east. Having paid homage to the deities and made a mental request to all, let him then engage in the practice.

Having been seized by the three good signs through his recitation, with a mind greatly joyful, let him then engage in the practice. Just as the signs are, so the accomplishments are said to be. Then, through the signs of repetition, one should wish to be shown the accomplishment.

Thinking of the intention of the king of awareness called the One Who Brings to Perfect Accomplishment, he sets the vase at the door, and shows reverence to those in the circle as well. Having entered the deities' abode, he makes obeisance beneath them, and performs the offering of arghya to all, in order to proceed.

Whether with the king of awareness mantras, or the queen, or the general essence mantra, or with each one's own mantra as is fitting, let him perform the rite of invitation. As done in the maṇḍalas, let him display one's own mudrā well. When this is done, the awareness mantras and the great power of the secret mantras confer their blessing.

Some of the substances, once examined, are placed in the hollow of the hand, some are placed in an offering vessel, some on top of the vase, in an anthill or a clay bowl, or else placed on spread leaves. The one to be accomplished is placed on a stand. A vessel smeared with gorocana is set in place. Having placed it at the site of recitation, he protects it directly with white mustard seeds. The wise one who knows the rite makes offerings with tamāla flowers.

Stabilizing, protecting, and empowering, as taught, should be done to the substances in whatever way is suitable. It is proper that they not be left empty. Between the deity and the substances, nothing at all should be placed. On the right and left of the substances...

Place the protective seal and the white mustard seeds. Set out incense, offerings, water for the guests, the torma, curds, lamps, and the rest, and the substance to be accomplished as well. Then establish a place from which the maṇḍala can be seen. Look upon the substances with the eyes, or else scatter them with the hand. With the wavering mind brought to equipoise, let the wise one recite with the breath held within, as in a vase. Here too the rites of blessing and generation are to be performed at the appropriate moments, as before. Throughout the night until dawn, in the same way, recite without interruption. All the rites, the offerings and the rest, are taught to be performed at the three times of day. For those who need to scatter and drink, the assistant is placed for that occasion. When the practitioner is practicing, the assistant should always remain close at hand. Whatever remains of the rite, just as the practitioner would do it, the supreme companion in practice should perform. For turning back the great obstructors, the assistants should act. If they are unable, the practitioner himself should do it by reciting over white mustard seeds and the like.

From the east a great rain pours down, and a fearful thunder resounds. In the direction of fire, suddenly, the quarters light up as though the sky had risen. From the direction of Yama there comes a terrifying form of the Lord of Death, dreadful to behold, brandishing sword and club, uttering a mighty roar. He wears a garland of severed noses and leaves, and a human skull, and drinks human blood. His hair stands on end and blazes, and he rains down streams of urine; he destroys the works of protection. From the direction of Nirṛti come many beings of terrifying and varied forms. From the direction of the water god come the afflictions of the gods, thundering with clouds. From the direction of the wind a great tumult arises. From the north come yakṣas, male and female. From the direction of Īśāna comes a host of forms. From above the mighty gods appear, and below the earth is made to tremble by the earth-dwellers.

For the great accomplishment through substances, such obstructors come at midnight. For the great accomplishments, the obstructors too become great. For ordinary accomplishments, obstructors of every kind that accord with them appear.

The accomplishments of the three times are taught as lesser, middling, and supreme. If it occurs at the proper time it is most auspicious; repetition of it is inauspicious. Warmth, and rising smoke and blazing, are taught as signs of success. Of blazing, three kinds are taught; of smoke, two in sequence; from warmth there is only a single accomplishment, and that is taught to be the lowest.

Some, through the power of the secret mantras, find it swiftly descending. Or if, at the very beginning of the practice, light appears from certain accomplishments, then one should begin to suppress the accomplishment with the mantra of one's own awareness, the awareness-mantra. With the awareness-mantra of the Victor, the essence mantra, or with the syllable bā, if one scatters it by hand, the accomplishment is suppressed and becomes stable. One may also recite over butter, flowers, or other kinds of substances. Thus, if the instructions or the substances are used, qualities are obtained.

If it is accomplished at the first period, first establish it, and then, in the remainder of the night, the wise one may recite as much as he wishes. For middling accomplishments too, the same rite is taught. What is accomplished at midnight is taught to be used at that same time. The beginner uses it at evening; the middling ones at midnight; the best accomplishments are used at the time of dawn. The beginner's is the morning; for the other two there is no fixed rule. What is middling and used at night should not be used in the morning. For the lowest accomplishments there is no prohibition against using them in the morning. Beyond these time-rules, no other fixed procedures are known.

Whoever does not use it in the morning, and has not stabilized it either, discards it like something inferior, and it is called "already used up." For substances urged on by the practitioner, in which the splendor of the secret mantras is fully present, through the fault of passing beyond the proper time, most of them are entirely abandoned.

Those that have been suppressed may later again be used, until accomplishment is attained. As for substances that have been suppressed and set aside, one may use them as one wishes. If the accomplished substances have never been used, then at other times, at the junctures between the proper periods, one should also perform the recitation and then use them. For substances not yet accomplished, this very procedure is proclaimed. Even in each of the seasons, one should accomplish them by rites such as the generation of blessing. Whatever is not accomplished within three years will never be accomplished at all. For the substances of the supreme kind, this rite is fully proclaimed. In six months the middling ones will draw near to accomplishment. For the lesser ones, it is taught that there is no fixed rule about the times. This same rite is also taught for the deities of painted images. Rites such as the full taking up of the substance, and others besides these, may also be performed.

This is the section analyzing in order the rite for accomplishing the substances.

When substances accomplished through beings, whether visible or invisible, have been seized by others before they are accomplished, then this maṇḍala is to be drawn. No lunar dates are needed, nor lunar mansions, and it is said that no fasting is required. Abiding in the supreme wrathful state, one should at once draw this maṇḍala with the ashes of a charnel ground: a triangle, with its door opening to the west. Having drawn it thus, one should lay out around the outside the mantra-holder's mantras of accomplishment.

Then, in the east, is the Blessed One called the One Who Accomplishes Well, the fierce commander of the yakṣas, together with the Great Powerful Lord of Vidyā-mantras, Vajra Krodha, Vajra-daṇḍa, Vajra Hūṃkāra, and the Iron-Hook Mother, Vajra Kīli of terrifying form, Sera Kyā, the Thunderous One, Lukgyü Namgyal Nakpo, and likewise at the gate one places the Joy-Maker. Then the Vajra Family, Pungzang, and those renowned as the Great Wrathful Ones. Having arranged these in order, the wise one makes offerings according to the rite of offering: with red flowers and the like, and with a torma together with blood, as is taught.

This rite of fierce action should be done in all the ways taught earlier. The wise one should set his own vidyā-mantra deity facing directly toward the gate, and with fragrant flowers should also make offerings according to the rite. As for the outer maṇḍala, one may do as one pleases, in accord with that. And whichever fierce deity one wishes, one should make offerings and the like to him.

In the middle of the essence maṇḍala, make a fire pit for the activity of fierce action, triangular and with a rim, and begin the burnt offering. With blazing wood from the yam tree, or sengdeng wood, or neem, or wood grown in a charnel ground, and with a paste made of one's own blood, or fresh ashes from the charnel ground, or poison and blood mixed with white mustard, one then offers the burning libation, reciting the name of the victim. It is dedicated for the sake of seizing the substance. One may either stay above the effigy, or cut the effigy into pieces over and over, and at the end also perform the burnt offerings. One who knows the rite of the wrathful ones is taught to perform this rite.

Terrified by the recitation of the secret mantras, the one who seized the substance, even if far away, takes the seized substance, comes before one, and gives it back. If he does so, one grants him freedom from fear, and performs pacifying rites as one wishes. If the pacifying rite is not performed, then he will die at once. Alternatively, for those who are invisible, one also places the substance at the gate of the maṇḍala. Or for those who wish to recite, the substances will be given in abundance.

This is the section analyzing in order the rite for summoning at once the one who seized the substance.

When the substance has been seized and a long time has passed, this maṇḍala is to be drawn. It is common to all three families, and one performs all activities for the sake of accomplishment. In every case, the king of vidyā-mantras called the One Who Accomplishes Well is drawn in the center of the essence maṇḍala, and one draws and sets out the mudrā. Vajra Krodha, Mahākrodha, Māmakī, and the Iron-Hook Mother.

Vajra Hūṃkāra, Vajra Crest, Vajra Staff, and Hammer; the Terrifier, Lug-gyud, and Kīla; Vajra Intelligence, the Invincible Mother; the Wrathful Lord of the secret mantras, the Messenger Woman; the Wondrous Subduer of Others, and Fulfiller of Wishes, Hayagrīva; Vajrapāṇi, Face-Cloth, and Great Multitude; the Blessed Ones of manifold forms. All of these are to be set out in the maṇḍala of the essence.

Then the Renowned Lady and the Great Glorious Lady, the White Lady and the White-Robed One; Tārā, Moon, and the Glorious Lady Gaṅgā; the Wondrous Subduers of Others; the Wheel-Turner and the other Uṣṇīṣa deities; Urṇā, and the Sugata's Eye; Fang, Short Spear, and the Great Maitrī Lady; again the Wondrous Subduer of Others, the Invincible One, and the rest. These are the vidyā-mantras taught for the families, the secret mantras that perform all activities, those renowned as the great mudrās, and the gatekeepers who guard the outer region. Whatever belongs to the rite, the retinue of each family is to be brought in and set out with great diligence.

Outside, the world guardians, Brahmā, the Great Fire God, and the Great Lord (Śiva) together with his consort, with the assembled hosts; the Mothers, the Seven Nāgas, and likewise the lords of the asuras, all who delight in the teaching, and every Wondrous Subduer of Others; and whichever deities were spoken of in the earlier maṇḍalas, and whatever the secret mantra rite prescribes. All these are said to receive the outer offerings.

Then, after that, one kindles the fire as before according to the rite. Making an image of the one who seized the substance from a mixture of fat and clay, one places it upon the disciple, and the burnt-offering rite is to be performed. Placing it also upon the offering ground, one cuts it again and again with weapons, and at the end burns it properly. As before, the rite of offering is performed and the work of the tormā is proclaimed. All the wrathful rites of the Vajrapāṇi family are to be practiced; likewise one is to perform the wrathful rite with one's own vidyā-mantra.

If it has not been recovered within twenty-eight days, one uses wrathful action against the enemy for the sake of the substance. A rite performed on the fifth day of the waning moon is supreme. With switches and whips one beats the enemy, and likewise one torments him with fire. Adorned with various words, one pierces him with the sharp thorns of arrows. Having smeared him with mustard and salt, one cuts off his limbs as one wishes. Toward the enemy, with great anger, one punishes with whatever punishment one desires.

Wrapping the image in red cloth, one binds it with red thread. One makes offerings with red flowers, and for as long as it remains there, one urges it on for the sake of the substance, and torments it day by day. If, because of this, he gives the substance back, then the punishment is to be set aside.

By these prescribed means for the substance, one performs the burnt offering at midnight. One burns the twigs of kovidāra wood, and burns grains roasted in butter in the fire, together with one's own blood and poison, white mustard seeds with salt, and mustard smeared on them. One performs a hundred and eight burnt offerings. Speaking the name of the one who seized the substance, and his nature, one is said to make the burnt offering especially with salt mixed with blood.

If the substance is not given back, one examines here one's own wicked state, and then performs the burnt offering with all the rites that bring about death. When the substance has been given back, or if some other gift is made, and it causes harm to the practitioner, then the wise one should pacify it. If one has heard that it is lost, or if it has been squandered through carelessness, then to that frightened person the practitioner should quickly give confidence. Then, through the Noble Vajra Vanquisher, or the Great Wrathful One quickly, or the One Without Torment, one swiftly urges the work to completion by the burnt offering. By the wise, through all three families as well, the maṇḍalas are to be made according to the rite, in order to summon back what was seized.

This secret mantra is to be performed as before:

Namo ratnatrayāya. Namaś caṇḍavajrapāṇaye. Mahāyakṣasenāpataye. Oṃ hara hara vajra, matha matha vajra, dhuna dhuna vajra, hana hana vajra, daha daha vajra, paca paca vajra, dhara dhara vajra, dhāraya dhāraya vajra, dāruṇa dāruṇa vajra, dāraya vidāraya vajra, chinda chinda vajra, bhinda bhinda vajra, hūṃ phaṭ.

If, through reciting this, the substance is recovered, or if others are able to obtain it, then, as before, one should guard it at the proper time and put it to use.

Moreover, for the middling accomplishments, and even for the slightest of the lesser ones, the rite is taught to be applied appropriately by one who knows the procedure, in accord with what is fitting for each.

As the share of the Blessed One, first offer one portion of the substance. Then the one endowed with intelligence, having paid homage to the master, offers the second. The third is offered outside the maṇḍala to those who have previously attained accomplishment. The fourth is given to one's companions. The fifth the practitioner uses himself.

Even within these, the shares may be divided into halves, and one half is sent forth by oneself. For substances that are to be examined, these rites have been explained. The share of the Blessed One one should send forth oneself, having first presented the offering water. The rites of worship and the like are taught in order to avoid deceiving the buddhas.

If there is no master present, one takes the master's share oneself. Showing special reverence in this matter is a way of not deceiving him.

Outside the maṇḍala, the practitioner presents the offering water and proclaims three times: "You who have attained accomplishment, accept this share of your own substance."

If there are no mantra-accomplished ones, then by reciting the mantra with their share in mind, and with a mind free of doubt, one should give it to one's companions.

Companions in reciting the secret mantra should be sought out constantly and with reverence for the sake of the aim. Since they have been fellow practitioners through austerities, they have been accomplished from the very beginning. Therefore, because it is fitting to take the substance when they give it, one should take it, saying in agreement, "We have been accomplished from before."

Since it is widely declared that the substances of accomplishment are to be divided in this way, one should oneself divide the substances among them. Some accomplished substances are divided in whatever measure is suitable, for example the eye ointment (aṅjana) of every kind, and likewise gorocanā and the like. Some, by those who know the rite, are divided only in the mind, as when one sees a sword and the like, and one thinks of benefiting others with it. Some accomplished substances are to be used by one person alone, for example cloth and the like, which one sees and then thinks of how to benefit others by it. Among the varieties of accomplished substances, some are divided equally, for example pills and the like; for these there is no division into halves.

For most substances it is said that one person alone may send out many shares. As for the share, whether wealth or instruction, one should trust what is taught in the tantras. By reciting, "Do these things," or, "This property of mine is yours," one apportions to one's companion in just this way.

If accomplishment is attained, then the wise, following the rite, should themselves bestow benefit as is fitting, in whatever way is suitable. When many kinds of accomplishments have been attained, one should discern their division, especially, with an unclouded mind. At the supreme place of the share-holder, one should offer a petition by recitation. Having known that the command has been fulfilled, the division is taught to follow.

Thus it is taught that one should divide well, as is fitting, for all. And in brief, the same rite is to be followed for all ordinary accomplishments too. Showing reverence, and making offerings of wealth, one benefits by acting according to the command. The master's share of the accomplished substance and the like: this is how the matter of not deceiving is explained.

Having offered one's own offering gift, one should divide the substances well, according to the scriptural instruction. Having paid homage to the Lord of Mantras, and having shown reverence to the Queen of Mantras as well, one should practice with the mind full of devotion toward the deities of the secret mantras.

Once the intelligent practitioner has attained accomplishment, he may travel through the sky wherever he pleases. Or else, why should he not remain together with the accomplished ones? Constantly reciting the mantra of one's own deity within the mind, and constantly looking upon and remembering the substances one has accomplished: then those who seek to harm, the hateful ones, cannot withstand it.

When the wise one has recited the mantra a hundred times, he becomes honored by the accomplished ones. If one recites the mantra of one's own family, the practitioner is freed from every fear.

When one person meets another, the wise one should speak courteously. Upon seeing him, one should first say, "Have you come well? Are you at ease?" One should also show the pledge, the mudrā of one's family, and the accomplished substance. If he asks, "Where have you come from?", one should give an answer to the question.

One should never pass by any place of the gods, nor a lone tree, nor a crossroads, nor a place of austerity, nor a place of the powerful, nor a place of offering, nor a dwelling of brahmins, nor non-Buddhist teachers and other accomplished ones. If one passes them by in pride, one will be disturbed and will quickly fall.

Whether through heedlessness one has broken the pledge, and has fallen or is about to fall, if one recites with the Lord of Mantras himself, then one will rise up again at once.

Even in the formless sky, the one fully accomplished, possessing the divine eye, comes to know his own actions, and the yogins go about just as they please. Therefore, from now on, by magical emanation, he comes and goes along the path.

By the power of merit, because of his dwelling, a house too appears just as he wishes. It is adorned all around with many trees; various birds fly and soar; the ornaments of the goddesses as they wander ring with the sound of tinkling bells; by the sweet sound of their song and dance, the qualities of delight are made clear. It is filled with the three kinds of excellent flowers, and the light of lamps shines brightly. Wherever one imagines it, there too is a great wish-fulfilling tree, and the marks of wonder appear, in which all desires are fulfilled.

There are jeweled slabs of stone for resting, and streams flowing from a ground of jewels. The earth is adorned with soft grass and appears so everywhere. Ornaments and garments, the apparel of play, and the glorious tree bearing fruits such as nectar: all these arise from it. Thus for those who wish for accomplishment, all that they desire is accomplished.

Once accomplished, one should then strive to protect the attainment. One may delight in solitary pleasure groves, or on mountain peaks, or on islands of the ocean, or on islets in great lakes. Born of one's own magical emanation, one acts there for the joy of accomplishment, together with other accomplished ones, or even in the places of those accomplished in former times.

Even if one has practiced in this way, if one does not attain accomplishment, one should keep the substance guarded and set aside, or remain there according to the rite. Having done the preliminary service as taught, and even more intensively, the wise one should recite again and accomplish the substance as before.

Yet if the substance is not accomplished even after a hundred recitations, one should generate steadfast diligence and practice the accomplishment there once more. If one accomplishes the substance up to seven times and it is still not accomplished, then whoever performs this rite will surely attain accomplishment. The practitioner should live on alms food and devote himself to recitation.

With faith in the buddhas, pay homage to the great stūpa. With reverence recite the Perfection of Wisdom seven times, or else a hundred times. Or else offer a gift of special excellence to the Saṅgha.

On a sandbank where a river flows into the ocean, or on an island in the sea, the wise one should reverently make a hundred stūpas, each a cubit high. Sitting before each one in turn, and reciting a thousand times, he will see the last stūpa blaze with light, and from that sight he will surely attain accomplishment.

Even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution, if he does this a thousand times well, will surely see the stūpa blaze, and he will without fail attain accomplishment. If one recites a full ten million times for all purposes, accomplishment is certainly taught. Even one who has done a great evil will attain it in twelve years.

If the knowledge-mantra does not grant accomplishment because one has not performed the preliminary service according to the rite, then, in order to satisfy it, one should begin the fire offering that has been taught.

Or else, having drawn this maṇḍala, which accomplishes all actions and aims, one should perform the four kinds of fire offering within it. On a mountain peak, or in a cattle-pen, or on a sandbank of the Ganges, or on level ground, make the excellent maṇḍala as before. The intelligent one should make it one hundred and eight cubits across. Adorn its border all around with vases of equal number. Mark out four fine gateways at each of the doors. Adorn the border with banners of victory in many kinds. Adorn the gateways with pennants and fresh leaves. The intelligent one should cut and hang garlands strung on cords. Around the outer enclosure, light clear lamps of butter, and without interruption burn incense of many kinds.

The second maṇḍala should have a border of seven cubits, and the third a border of three cubits. Take up the rite in this way. Whatever the offerings and other rites may be, perform the maṇḍala rite as before. And besides, it is taught that one should perform the fire offering with additional ritual.

In the center, set down a full vase with one's own knowledge-mantra. In its four directions as well, perform the fire offering according to the rite. Draw all the families of the Tathāgatas in the eastern quarter. In the north, draw the lotus family, correctly and in due proportion. In the southern quarter the wise one should draw all the vajra families. In the western quarter draw the fierce ones and the yakṣa families, singly. The remaining portion, in order, is to be drawn outside, in black. Outside of that are the guardians of the world, and it is declared that others are to be made as well.

By reciting the secret mantra, one should first install the five lords. Then the king of knowledge-mantras, and the queen of knowledge-mantras so proclaimed, and the secret mantra that performs all actions, and the great and lesser messengers taught in the maṇḍalas, should be installed in the maṇḍala in due order. At the gateway, set the chief of the obstructors, the wrathful one, the one who prepares the nectar, and the goddess whom others cannot overcome. As for the rest, it is said to be done as one wishes.

Having thus installed the maṇḍala with insight into the meaning of the tantra, one should invite the disciple there, and it is taught that the remaining rites too are to be done. The wise one, having performed the fire offering by the rite for each of the four directions and families, should then, beside the vase in the west, make a fire offering of one's own knowledge-mantra. If it is done here according to the rite of fire offering, all will be satisfied. There one should make a generous offering of food. By this the deities will be pleased.

Having drawn this maṇḍala, one may perform recitation and fire offering as one wishes. Knowing one's own family, one should also make fire offerings of butter to the knowledge-mantra, either milk porridge mixed with butter, or

With sesame mixed with the three sweets, using the remainder of the night, one should make fire offerings of one's own family's knowledge-mantra through its own knowledge. By these rites the deity will surely and swiftly be accomplished, will be satisfied and pleased, and will also be well fulfilled.

Having drawn this maṇḍala, one should perform the fire offering in accord with the secret mantra. Having drawn it only seven times, one will surely succeed, without any doubt.

By the knowledge-mantra of the Knowledge-King, or likewise by the knowledge-mantra of the family, in dealing with hostile practitioners of knowledge-mantras, it is taught that one should do everything by subduing them. Having made a figure from fat, and having recited the knowledge-mantra over it, one should carry out the whole rite of the fire offering of wrathful practice by the proper procedure of the action. If it is poured out with mustard oil and the great mustard plant, a violent epidemic will be sent upon the foe. If it is placed face downward, the body will feel suffering. One may also strike the foe with an unfriendly blow, or beat the figure with flowers. It is taught that one should shake it as well, and that the threatening gesture may be made as one wishes.

If in this maṇḍala one subdues with secret mantras as one would a demon, then the accomplishments taught in the rite will also be bestowed. Here the deity, having actually come, will swiftly grant accomplishment to the practitioner himself. Once it has been granted, one should perform the pacifying rite.

But if things turn out otherwise, then mix poison, blood, salt, the great mustard plant, and white mustard, and in this maṇḍala burn the remainder of the night. One's own knowledge-mantra deity, swiftly coming as though in distress, cries out, "Hey, hey! I grant the supreme!" and offers it to the practitioner. If the deity, being heedless, does not come, then the practitioner, fearless, should for three days burn his own flesh, making three oblations of burnt offering there. Then the deity will surely come in person, will show affection toward the practitioner, and will grant whatever accomplishment is desired. The deity will have every fault declared.

Even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution, if he performs this rite for nine days, will succeed without being harmed by demons. Therefore one should undertake it well. Because this rite is meaningful, when confronting hostile knowledge-mantras one should be fearless in recitation, and should also perform the protections.

Here, if the accomplishment is well bestowed, one should pacify according to the rite. Whatever faults there are in the action, one should thoroughly dispel them and send the deity away. For all accomplishments of secret mantra, this maṇḍala is supreme. Concerning the fire offering rites taught, it is said that three kinds of fire offering should be performed. If all the rites are performed, the three kinds of accomplishment will be attained.

When one subdues hostile recitations of one's own knowledge-mantra as one would a demon, then day by day the materials should be made very fresh. The wise one should provide protection, should be attentive to the heedless, and should be one who knows the tantra and is endowed with ascetic discipline.

Thus ends the compendium of means of accomplishment from the great tantra that brings about excellent accomplishment.

[illegible]

"Lebargan" (ལེབ་རག་ནུ་བོ་) is an unidentified plant name, left in transliteration. The reading "his seminal fluid held back" follows the Tibetan words for semen.

- The passage breaks off mid-list at the end (adhimukta, maṅgola). The Sanskrit flower names are Tibetan transliterations, often corrupt, and some identifications (daśa, gelpa, śūlyam, drina, vṛtti, śepā, kuyi) are uncertain, so I have left them in reconstructed Sanskrit or Tibetan form. "Earth-dwellers" renders sa bla pa (bhauma/earth-dwelling spirits). The line about enriching activity follows the Tibetan pairing of sweet with pacifying and bitter with wrathful.

- Many plant names in this passage are Tibetan transliterations of Sanskrit with corrupt or uncertain spellings; I have given the nearest sound-renderings and left unidentified items as transliterated rather than guess. "Lebrgan paste" is an uncertain reading of ལེབ་རག་ནུ་བོ་ལྔ་པ་. In the first line, "reviled" renders ལྔ་པ་; the original sense may be "flowers of ill repute." The last line's list (living creatures, liquor, salt, mustard, onions and garlic) is a best reading of the final obscure phrases.

- Several botanical and substance names are transliterated Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit terms (for example, śrīveṣṭaka, sarjarasa, śāllaki, lāmajjaka, bhallātaka, uśīra) and their identifications are uncertain; I have given the Sanskrit reconstructions. Thang-chu and thang-shing, which also appear in the continuity passage, are left untranslated as their identification is uncertain. A few obscure items (gutha, pārīpelava, nalakī, kharā, spang-spos) are likewise left in transliteration. The passage ends mid-sentence, and the sentence is carried on in the next section.

- Several plant names are transliterated Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit whose identification is uncertain (zarma, khabi, bayañ-se, mon-pa do-ba, biyalaja), so I have left them as sound-renderings or tentative equivalents. The Tibetan rdo-gu, rendered here as radish, may denote a root or tuber more broadly. "Dūgūla" is the traditional silk or fine cloth named here. The verse of offering corresponds to the incense verse earlier, adapted to the lamp.

- Many food names are Sanskrit or Prakrit transliterations, some corrupt (for example bi, ri, kāṣeru, gar-bhod, ham-cho, nga-nga-gyal, jutse, khre). I have left them transliterated rather than guess. The identification of the lotus-family dish (śrīpeta) and of the offering to women is uncertain. The passage ends mid-sentence; the text continues in the next passage. The phrase "do-bdag" at the opening of the passage is taken as a general term for the remaining items of that class. "Radishes" renders the Tibetan for the root-vegetable class, consistent with the preceding passage.

- Several food names are untranslated Indian terms of uncertain identification (svastika, ulopa, kṛsara, sayali, linka, pistaka, pija, pūra, śrīvesta, kotrava, pūpa, pūrṇabhṛṣṭaka, arghabhalataka), left as transliterated. The line "Let it be known from other sources" continues the preceding sentence on the many kinds of edibles. "Hand rice-gruel" is a literal rendering of an obscure term. "Wrathful practices" and "fierce wrath" render two different Tibetan expressions for the same rite category.

- The mantra Āhara āhara sarva-vidyādhara-pūjite svāhā is given as transliterated in the Tibetan. "Self-arisen secret mantra" renders the Tibetan "self-aware secret mantra" (rang rig gsang sngags), a literal sense; the meaning is uncertain, possibly a mantra the practitioner's own tradition provides. "Pure Abodes" renders gnas gtsang ma (Śuddhāvāsa).

- Several terms are transliterated or reconstructed from Tibetan: Maitreyī for མཛེར་ཡི་, and "Tuft of Hair" for མཛེར་མཛེར་/མཛེར་, read as the Tathāgata's ūrṇā-related deity. The two nāga kings are identified as Nanda and Upananda from the epithet མཛེར་མཛེར་ and the standard pairing; the second name is inferred. The botanical Sanskrit (śatapušpā, bilva, nāgakesara, karṇikāra) is reconstructed from the Tibetan transliterations. Line breaks in the source sometimes cut across sentences; the final clause is left open because the passage ends mid-sentence.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence ("an image of the enemies...") and continues in the next section. The list of burnt-offering substances in the fierce rite contains several obscure items (for example kapitha cloth, "pieces of poison," and "the great animals") that are rendered literally from a corrupt-looking transmission. "Plunderers" translates the Tibetan for the female mantra-deities known as Apahāriṇī; this identification is probable but not certain.

- Several names in the list of wrathful ones are uncertain: "Fierce and Radiant Noble One" (བྱེད་པོ་དཔལ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་), "Vidyā-vajra Aṅkuśā" (འཁྱུ་ཤྱེད་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་), and "Vajra Thunderer" (བྱེད་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་) are rendered tentatively. The line "I myself must surely experience the many results of karma" is read as the practitioner's attitude of accepting responsibility. The final lines, which list accomplishments, look slightly corrupt in the Tibetan, and the order of "highest, middling, lowest" against the three abodes is not fully clear. "The Kalpa" is read as the kalpa/rtog pa ritual literature.

- Several lines are obscure and my renderings are tentative. "The accomplishment of the cave, taking the essence" probably refers to rasāyana-type practice, and "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" is taken as a class of earth-dwelling beings (perhaps a corrupt transliteration). "Earth-mantras" (ལྷན་པོ་) for the lowest class is uncertain. The line about enriching offerings "since it is opposed to all else" is obscure, and "kotra" is left untranslated as an unidentified plant. The final lines, which assign offering substances to the four activities, are possibly corrupt, and the passage breaks off before completing the list.

- Passage is dense with verse; several lines are elliptical, and the sense of lines such as "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" (from the navel) and "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" has been rendered conservatively. "Vidyārāja" and "vidyā queen" (rigs sngags rgyal po / rgyal mo) are the male and female mantra categories; "secret mantra" here denotes a mantra-deity in general. "Arghya" renders mchod yon.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, so the translation does the same. In the mantras, the Sanskrit is rendered from the Tibetan transliteration and is partly corrupt in places (for example "ni bhagavati" and "pa-" forms). I have given a plausible normalization without emending the sense. The line "the mind is the forerunner of all phenomena" is the Dhammapada-type saying, here attributed to the Great Sage (Thub pa chen po).

- The mantras are given in my reconstruction of Sanskrit from the Tibetan transliteration, and several syllables are uncertain: amṛtodbhava, sumbhani, gr̥hṇāpaya, and the final wrathful mantra (ucchuṣma-krodha). The term "lord" (bdag po) for the protective mantra is taken as the family lord; in the final mantra I have read Krodha Acala as the wrathful protector invoked by "the scattering wrathful secret mantra," though the Tibetan does not name him, and this identification is an inference. "The Blessed One's Eye" and "the White-Robed Lady" are rendered literally as the names of the awareness-mantras of Locanā and Pāṇḍaravāsīnī.

- The verses on the seat and its measurements are somewhat compressed, and the phrase about "supreme and the rest" refers to the classes of activity (supreme, middling, and so on); the translation keeps this literal. The "mantra of the King" (rgyal po) is the awareness-mantra king, here with a short Vajrapāṇi-style mantra. The final lines break off mid-sentence, as the passage ends there.

- The "six recollections" are rendered literally as the six recollections (Buddha, Dharma, Saṅgha, ethics, generosity, deities). In the first verse, the sense of the line about suffering in existence is slightly elliptic; I have followed the most natural reading. In the rosary section, the Sanskrit mantras are reconstructed from Tibetan transliteration and are approximate. The material names kham-pa and bas-o are unclear and left transliterated. In the verse about extending the limit of life, the syntax is compressed; the sense is given as best it can be reconstructed. The passage ends mid-sentence, as the Tibetan does.

- The final line is terse; the meaning of "the lord of the region should not be made to rejoice" is uncertain, and it may refer to not delighting or boasting before the local lord or ruler. "Wrathful conduct" and "fierce mind" render the same Tibetan idiom (drag shul). The "mantra of purification" in the first lines is translated literally as "mantra of cleansing" (sbyang ba); the

• The line on "the half-month of the great miracle" refers to the bright fortnight of the Great Miracle (the first half of the first month), a traditional period of heightened merit. "Uṣṇīṣa" renders gtsug tor can, the sites of the Uṣṇīṣa-bearing buddha. The line "make the protection" is rendered literally; the sense is a protective recitation closing the session. The final sentence of the passage is syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan and continues into the next section.

• The passage parallels the Susiddhikara Tantra and is somewhat corrupt in places. "Vajra" in the vase-consecration line likely refers to the wrathful Vajra mantra. "Palāśa" is a conjecture for "□□□□□□□□," and "sang" is a Tibetan unit of weight. The final line, "one does not recite the other," is elliptical and may mean the ordinary day's recitation is omitted.

• Several lines in the passage on the state of the vidyā-mantra (cut off, unseparated, restrained, pinned, written) and on "tormenting" (□□□□□□) are obscure and appear textually corrupt, with a duplicated line. I rendered them closely rather than smoothing them. "Mālatī" flowers and "wick-wood" are uncertain botanical or ritual terms. "The inner image" translates a doubtful reading (□□□□□□), perhaps an error for an image or vessel.

• The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, so the final line is left incomplete, as in the source. Several botanical and ritual terms are uncertain and were rendered by transliteration or tentative equivalents: kuruvaka for the Tibetan rendering of an ointment-herb (skyu ru ra), uṣīra for the root named in the Tibetan, and mālatī for the garland flower. The phrase "forms of the pratyekabuddhas" renders a term that may also be read as "forms of those who know each individually"; the sense is unlikely to differ. The "seven kinds of water" and "five kinds of tree-essence" are given as they stand, without identification of the specific items.

• The word rendered "preliminary preparation" (□□□□□□) and its derivative, "preliminary recitation" (□□□□□□□□, Skt. sevā or purascaraṇa), are treated here as technical terms of this tantra. The substance rendered "gorocanā" corresponds to the Tibetan gi wang; the identification is the standard one. The line "the deity herself" renders the Tibetan □□, which in this context refers to the female deity of the vidyā-mantra. "Bestows" and "accomplishment" for the siddhi language follow context. In the lines about the vidyā-mantra king, the Tibetan is terse, and the sense of "offerings" as the object follows the surrounding rite. The line "the secret mantra is the gift" may also be read as "the secret mantra is the (appropriate) reward," meaning the fee offered to the master is commensurate with the mantra received.

• Several lines are textually obscure, notably the repeated references to "the sprout" and "the gorocana" making the mantra complete; I have kept them literal. "Yam wood" (yam shing) is a tentative rendering of a fuel-wood whose exact botanical identity is uncertain. Likewise "tangshing water" (thang chu) is left untranslated because I cannot identify the substance with confidence. "The Wrathful King" is rendered generically; the specific wrathful mantra-king intended is not identified here.

• The Sanskrit mantras in the passage are Tibetan transliterations. I have restored them as best I can, but the readings of some syllables, such as the "dīpāya" of the second mantra and "pātita" in the Kīlikīla mantra, are uncertain. The wood names are reconstructed from Tibetan transcriptions; "kaṅkata" and "karmarī" are the least secure. The line about "akara" pieces and the "decoction on the ground" is obscure in the Tibetan, and my rendering follows the plain wording.

• Several botanical and material terms are uncertain: □□□ (rasa, here rendered "rock salt" following the sequence), □□□□□□□□, and the plant names yava, priyaṅgu, and śatapuṣpā are left as transliterated forms. "Lamp-essence" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is literal. "Iron from a dead man's tomb" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, a conjectural rendering. The "three irons" are unspecified. The "ciṣa" leaf in the sword simile (□□□□) is uncertain. The lines on the sword "having the nature of vengeance" and the "knowledge of what lies beyond" are rendered cautiously from a difficult text.

- This passage is textually corrupt and obscure in many places. Several terms are rendered tentatively or left transliterated, including lī-khri, the nose-ring flower garland, and the bezoar and gorocanā lines. The line about buying "as at a stove" is uncertain. Some lines may be misdivided in transmission, so the sense of the early verses is only approximate.
- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, which I have left as is. Weights (sang, zho) are Tibetan units left untranslated; the substances are rendered conventionally (costus root for ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་, gorocana for ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་, collyrium for ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་). The "five products of the cow" renders ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་. The sentence about the western space and eastern door is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan, and my rendering follows its sense as best it can be reconstructed.
- The names of the corner deities are rendered as Sanskrit reconstructions from the Tibetan and are tentative: Short Spear (mdung thung), Fang (mche ba), Mahāteja (mthu chen), Vajradaṇḍa (rdo rje dbyug pa), Vajrakulikā (rdo rje khu tshur), and the Lady of the Meteoric Iron (gnam lcags ma). The women's names in the offering passage (Apahārī, Girikaṇṭhā, Śaṅkhinī, Ekajaṭā) are likewise reconstructions from the Tibetan. The Tibetan "ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་" (fire pit arrangement) is read in two places as the fire pit and as a performer of the rite, following context. The opening "rig" at the start of the Tibetan appears to be a stray syllable and has been joined with the following words as "vidyā-mantra."
- The mantras are given in a corrupt Tibetan transliteration, so my Sanskrit forms are reconstructions and uncertain in places, notably "sani" and "bandhūri". The lines about who confers the empowerment at the beginning, in the middle, and at the end are terse, and my rendering of "intermediaries" is tentative. The "ashes in the hand" is a literal reading of the Tibetan and may reflect a slightly different original.
- The list of figures in the western quarter is a series of names in a compressed verse, and several are uncertain: the "Eye accomplished in the knowledge mantra" probably refers to a Buddhalaṅkāra-type figure; "Gaṇḍha-Beautiful" renders a name read as gnod mdzes; the "one called Moon" is a Tārā-related form. The "snāma" flower is a tentative reconstruction of an unclear plant name. The mantra syllables are transliterated as given, and a few forms are irregular in the transmitted text.
- This is a ritual-calendar passage with technical terms that are hard to pin down. "The first and full-moon days of summer months" renders a difficult line, and "the first summer month" and similar phrases for ལོ་ལོ་ are uncertain; it may mean the beginning of a month. "The constellation of the Victor" (ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་) is probably Puṣya (Tiṣya), but I have kept the literal rendering. "Circle of winds" is literal. The phrase about "a single night" may be read as "one night" or "once at night." The final words "from the Kalpa" are the start of the next section.
- The mantra syllables are rendered in transliteration as they appear and are only partly regular Sanskrit; some are corrupt, notably "viloki-na," "bandhuni ridhi vate," and "kulandhari." The Tibetan ingredient names (sugmel, sroṭan, tsa, shingtsa, tatar, kharata) are given in transliteration or with probable identifications, since their botanical identity is uncertain. The "loss of semen" prevention reflects the Tibetan khu chu, and the "girl" is the usual young virgin spinner of the thread. The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source does.
- The passage breaks off mid-sentence, as the continuation follows in the next section. "Seizer" renders ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ (Apaharaṇī?), a guardian goddess; the identification is not certain. The "eight places beginning with the birthplace" refer to the eight great pilgrimage sites of the Buddha's life. The "ground recitation rite" is a literal rendering of ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་.
- This is from a tantra of the Vajrapāṇi-type (the three families, the Seizer goddess, Māmākī, Kīli). Several lines are obscure or probably corrupt: "the Eye of the Practitioner" (a figure whose identity is unclear), "a mass of splendor" (possibly the name of a deity), and "the one whom others cannot withstand" (probably the deity Aparājītā). The role of the astrologers (gza' skar byed pa) is uncertain, and "young attendants" (yo lang chung ngu) is a tentative reading. The line "Whether the earth ... or the mantra practitioner" is syntactically unclear.

- Several names in the maṇḍala description are rendered literally from the Tibetan epithets of the Uṣṇīṣa deities (Wheel-Turning King, Mass of Splendor, white Uṣṇīṣa, Victorious, Wondrous, Tuft of Hair, Short Spear). The Sanskrit equivalents (e.g. Cakravartin, Tejorāśi, Sitāpatroṣṇīṣa, Jaya, Abhyudgata, Ūrṇā, Tīkṣṇoṣṇīṣa) are plausible but not certain. "The Eye" after Maitreya likely refers to Locanā. "Plunderer" and "the one whom others cannot withstand" are literal renderings of deity names (perhaps Apahāra and Aparājita). The "Alms Bowl and Khakkhara" is interpreted from the Tibetan lhung bzed and khar gsil. Others are possible.

- Several names are uncertain reconstructions from Tibetan epithets, and I have not given Sanskrit for every one: རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is rendered Candrahāsā; རྩམ་མཚོ་ and རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ are rendered Pāṇḍarā and Śvetavāsīnī; རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is Amṛtakunḍalin; རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is Aṅkuśī; རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is Vajrakulikā; རྩམ་མཚོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is rendered Gaṇeśvarī. The pair "Great Śrī and Tārā" presumes the verse intends distinct deities. The phrase "ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་" is taken as bathing, and "ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་" as rising at dawn. In the vessel list, "ལྷ་མོ་" is rendered as wood.

- Several terms in the verse are obscure and my renderings are provisional: ལྷ་མོ་ (rendered "water-tree"), ལྷ་མོ་ (rendered "fragrant decoction"), ལྷ་མོ་ (taken as añjana), and ལྷ་མོ་ (taken as dūrvā grass or possibly turuṣka). The phrase "press against them there" for ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is uncertain, as is the exact sense of "the great flesh" (ལྷ་མོ་), which in Indic ritual texts often refers to the flesh of animals held impure or of humans. The five kinds of spread are enumerated across this passage and the preceding one. The passage ends mid-sentence, continuing in the next section.

- Several lines are obscure or probably corrupt. "Pir" (ལྷ་མོ་) is left untranslated; it is likely a pigment or powder, and the exact sense is uncertain. The line on the cord's "emerging from beneath and entering" is cryptic, and the rendering is tentative. "The one who cannot be overcome by others" is probably the goddess Aparājītā, and "the elephant" is probably Gajarāja or Gaṇeśa; the identifications are uncertain. "Original kings" (ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་) probably refers to the five buddha-kings or primary Tathāgata-kings. "Young person" (ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་) is rendered literally.

- Several names in the maṇḍala lists are uncertain reconstructions or left approximate. "Gnodmdzes" (gnod mdzes, perhaps Hāriṇī or Sundara-yakṣa) and "Luguryud" (lu gu rgyud) are uncertain and may reflect corrupt readings. "Khucura" for khu tshur follows a Sanskrit guess. The "Eye of the Gods" and "Renowned One" are literal renderings of epithets. The six kings of secret mantra and the "one who fulfills wishes" are given as in the Tibetan without identification. The vajra implements named (vajra staff, hammer) follow the Tibetan literally.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at "Or else, in his own place," so it is left unfinished here. "Śrī" in the sword-mantra line renders ལྷ་མོ་, taken as the goddess Śrī whose mantra is recited over the sword. "Invincible Goddess" is a rendering of ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ (Aparājītā). The Mountain-Fortress Goddess and the One with a Single Braid (Ekajāṭā) follow the Tibetan names as given. "Water" for ལྷ་མོ་ in the mustard-seed line is a tentative reading.

- The text appears to be from a tantric ritual manual in the Mañjuśrīmūlakalpa or Susiddhi tradition, which I take to be the source of the "king of awareness called the One Who Brings to Perfect Accomplishment" (Susiddhi). The opening lines are somewhat elliptical; I have followed the syntax closely. The line on the directional guardians and "those who bear arrows" is ambiguous. "Pi pi ling" is rendered as long pepper (pippalī), and "gi wang" as gorocana. The passage ends mid-sentence, with the right and left of the substances left for the next section.

- Several verses in the middle (the directional omens) are cryptic: "the afflictions of the gods" renders lha yi bad ga, and the identification of the southwest and northeast guardians (Nirṛti, Īśāna) is inferred from the directional sequence (bden bral, dbang ldan). The line on "the breath held within, as in a vase" translates shub bur, taken as a vase-breath recitation. "The syllable bā" is a conjecture for ba yi gi wang. Several "recitation over substances" lines are terse, and the sense of "suppressing" the accomplishment (mnan pa) is rendered literally.

- The "yam" tree and "sengdeng" wood (ཡམ་ཤིང་, seng ldeng) are rendered by transliteration; the Sanskrit identification is uncertain. "Pungzang" (པུང་བཟང་) and "Lukgyü Namgyal Nakpo" (ལུག་ཡུ་འཇམ་གཡེན་འཁོར་པོ་) are retained as names whose Sanskrit forms I cannot securely reconstruct. The line "dedicated for the sake of seizing the substance" is ambiguous; the context of seized substances suggests it concerns recovering them. The phrase rendered "reciting the name of the victim" translates the obscure "skye tshe," taken here as a name-recitation. The line about "those who wish to recite" receiving abundant substances is syntactically compressed, and my rendering is tentative.

- Several names in the opening lists are transliterated or uncertain, so I rendered them as I best understood. Lug-gyud and Face-Cloth are tentative, and Hūṃkāra for the first deity is inferred from the Tibetan. The Sanskrit identity of the Great Multitude is uncertain. The names in the list of Tārā, Moon, and Gaṅgā are probably epithets of goddesses whose precise identity I could not fix. The line about the substance recovered through other means after harm to the practitioner is syntactically compressed, and I have given its likeliest sense.

- The mantra is given in a Sanskrit reconstruction from the Tibetan transliteration; some syllables (for example the "namaś" and the verb forms) are regularized. The translation of the verses on "not deceiving" (sluba) follows the sense that giving the shares properly avoids deceiving the buddhas and the master. The sense of "bgo ba" as mental apportioning of a substance such as a sword is somewhat compressed in the original, and my rendering is interpretive. The expression "supreme place of the share-holder" is a literal rendering and may refer to the location of the apportioned share.

- The verses are the closing section of a tantra on mantra practice, and the vocabulary is of an older ritual type. "The Lord of Mantras" and "the Queen of Mantras" translate the Tibetan rig sngags rgyal and rig rgyal mo (vidyārāja and vidyārājī); they are the male and female mantra-deities, not human rulers. "Substance" (rdzas) is the ritual material whose accomplishment is sought. The phrase rendered "place of the powerful" (byin can) is somewhat uncertain; it may refer to a place sacred to Indra. The line "why should he not remain together with the accomplished ones" is a rhetorical question in the Tibetan and may carry a sense of confidence rather than doubt.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end; the translation follows suit. The five acts of immediate retribution (mtshams med lnga, Skt. pañcānantarya) are the five gravest misdeeds. "Knowledge-mantra" renders rig sngags (Skt. vidyāmantra). Several lines on the placement of the lesser deities in the maṇḍala are terse, and the rendering of the guardian figures at the gateways follows the most natural reading of the verses.

- Several lines are obscure. The "three sweets" are conventionally sugar, honey, and molasses, or sometimes sugar, honey, and ghee. Skye tshe I read as "the great mustard plant," following the usual mustard-oil context, though the identification is uncertain. The "unfriendly blow" and the "shaking" in the wrathful section are rendered cautiously. The phrase about the deity having "every fault declared" is somewhat uncertain in its force. The Tibetan verse is rendered in prose paragraphs for narration.
