

The Tantra of the Goddess, the Great Net of Illusion

Devī-jāla-mahāmāyā-tantra-nāma · Toh 836 · Derge Kangyur

ལ་མོ་གཡུ་འཇམ་མེ་མོ་ཞེས་བ་བྱའི་རྩ་

The Tantra Called the Goddess, the Great Net of Illusion (Sanskrit: Devī Jāla Mahāmāyā Tantra; Tibetan: Lhamo Gyuthrul Draba Chenmo zhes jawé Gyü) is a Buddhist tantra, a scripture presenting esoteric teachings and practices centered on a feminine deity associated with illusion and the interwoven "net" of manifestation. It opens with homage to the Blessed One, the Great Secret, and frames the revelation as a discourse in which the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, is present with an assembly of great yogīs and yoginīs, each bearing a symbolic name such as Wheel of Yoga and Gathered into Vajra Itself. In the Tibetan canon it is Toh 836 in the Kangyur, the collection of texts attributed to the Buddha, where it belongs to the Tantra section.

In the Indian language: Devī Jāla Mahāmāyā Tantra. In the Tibetan language: The Tantra called the Goddess, the Great Net of Illusion.

Homage to the Blessed One, the Great Secret.

Thus it was spoken. At that time the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, was present together with the great yogī who is equal to space, with the great yoginī, with the great one of supreme devotion, with the one who guards those who have devotion, with the great consort who protects and thoroughly guards, who stays close, with the great pacified one, and the great one who brings about peace, beautiful and radiant in color, endowed with knowledge and refuge. They are these: the chief called Wheel of Yoga; the great yogī called Gathered into Vajra Itself; the great yogī called Equanimity; the great yogī called the One Who Brings Under Power; and the yogī who thoroughly holds the manner of the full expanse. In whatever form the Teacher showed, they were endowed with four colors, and in the manner of sitting they wore the five-fold crown. Unobscured, not obscuring, not blocking what obscures, from the unobscured expanse, in the great, truly present celestial palace, by the great vajra manner of equality, with the body unimpeded, the Blessed One dwelt, his activity inconceivable.

Moreover, each one thus clearly distinct, the great equal one with the retinue, great in resources, abiding in the nature of holding the burden of all, unmistaken through reliance, and without any multiplicity of two, is the dhāraṇī of the great yoginī. They are: the Great Awakened Lady called Space; the Great Awakened Lady called Space-Holder; the Great Awakened Lady called Earth-Guardian; the Great Awakened Lady, the Great Moistener; the Great Awakened Lady called Dispeller of Arrogance; the Great Awakened Lady called Accomplisher of Action; the Great Awakened Lady called Holder of the Great Intense Attachment of Vajra, who also slays non-attachment; the Great Awakened Lady called Thorough Dispeller of Bewilderment; and the Great Awakened Lady called Wheel of Speech.

They too are thus: of a color like a most vivid blue lotus, and with sapphire, beryl, ruby, and emerald, and other substances praised, they dwell noble and radiant, with none unripened. These are the yoginī Samantabhadrā together with her retinue.

Moreover there is great reverence, the secret; great reverence, the manifold fragrances; and great reverence, the one who commands, who is called Lord of Secrets. There is the one who holds clarity, the one who becomes the abode of fragrance, and the one who holds the form that makes sound. There is the faculty that causes seeing, the faculty that causes hearing, the faculty of the great one who causes smelling, and the faculty of the great one who causes tasting. There is the one who thoroughly releases, the one who thoroughly conceives, the great sovereign who thoroughly holds, and the one who thoroughly accomplishes, together with the consort who never abandons her form.

There is the one who conceives what exists, the one who dispels what does not exist, the one who brings about the perception of victory, and the great one who thoroughly destroys cessation. Bound as non-dual through the action of manifest conduct, they dwell in the great celestial palace of the expanse of phenomena (dharmadhātu), the great equality.

Then the Blessed One, delighted in the celestial palace of the great secret yoginī, with the great gathering of wisdom of the unborn expanse, complete with every ornament, a maṇḍala like the full moon pervading without center or edge, complete with all jewels, with corners, sides, colors, and shapes of immeasurable extent, with inconceivable wisdom, adorned in splendid manner, richly decorated with the ornaments of the great wish-fulfilling jewel.

Bearing the lineage of the Victors through their various distinctions, possessed of the four gates of great magical display, the outer yogas of the vehicles become the Great Vehicle, together with the supreme of the great virtue and vice, the very great secret, at the center of the great lotus, beautified by the distinctions of the four colors of the tongue, it became the maṇḍala of the great secret, in the manner of the four directions and the three tiers.

This is the first chapter, "The Supreme Dispelling of Obscurations, the Maṇḍala of All the Tathāgatas."

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption, the one that supremely dispels the torment of the great enjoyment. Delighted, with a great smile, to hold sway over the great passion, he caused the sky of the great secret yoginī to flourish with the color of the lotus of empowerment. By speaking "Om surata sukhe," the inconceivable vajra family came to be, together with the consorts. Then he spoke this verse in full.

The fourth is white in color and shining.

By the emanation and gathering of all equanimity,
the third is made fully clear,
and from those supreme gatherings of mudrās
he delights together with the queens.

The mudrā holds the vajra and bell.

In the manner of the thirteenth,
meditate it clearly, without large or small.

At the crown it bears the second syllable.

At the time of clear appearance,
from the jewel of the five-fold crown,
the family of ornaments becomes clear.

This is the mudrā called the Supremely Secret Sublime Ornament of All the Tathāgatas.

The third, a blazing dark-blue great syllable,
from the emanation and gathering of the jewel family,
appearing clearly as a mudrā, appears as a body.

He delights together with the queens.

Having abandoned all obscurations, he is united without sin.

From the second, the syllable "yi,"

it is clear as a syllable bearing the five-fold crown.

All minds are trained, a treasury like a wish-fulfilling jewel.

Holding the manner of an equal embrace,

it is clear as the mudrā of the jewel family.

This is the mudrā of the Supreme of All Actions, the Queen's Perfect Play.

The color is like a padmarāga ruby.

The dharmakāya, endowed with the crescent moon,
the beauty of its clear color brings all without exception under sway.

Through joining, generating, and gathering, appearing clearly as a mudrā, it is the body of empowerment.
He delights together with the consorts.

Through nondual union,
the crown bears the second syllable.

From the emanation and gathering of the jewel family,
the crown has the colors of the five families.

By the samādhi of "as it is,"
the mudrā's posture is the manner of the lotus.

Contemplating equality is the maṇḍala.

By the samādhi of nonseparation,
the perfect maṇḍala, the supreme gathering of all,
is clear as the mudrā of the lotus family.

Like a lamp dispelling darkness,
meditate speech and mind as clear and nondual.

Endowed with the light of the blossoming lotus,
with the play of glances and gestures,
delighted, arrange an offering of equality.

Thus, by clear visualization, empowerment too is complete.

This is called "Gathering All."

Such is the empowerment, the wisdom of the mudrā of all actions.

The great activity of the three times:

from the gathering of all families, the Sugata,
the samādhi "as it is" in equality,
the single syllable, supreme of all,
by explaining its distinctions, all actions are fulfilled.

Above the clear petals of the lotus,
that which appears nondually,
through the distinction of two aspects,
the gathering, appearing clearly, becomes the body.
It is neither desire nor attachment,

and the mind has no doubt,
and by appearing clearly as a mudrā, it is the Victor's body.
He delights together with the queens.
The crown bears the second syllable.
When vast generosity is filled,
one gathers to the place of one's own wish.
There is no difference of size or age.
It appears clearly, united without duality,
for it is endowed with equality at all times.

The secret offering is perfectly complete.
One meditates on the principal deity, like the full moon, together with the consort who, without attachment, gathers in desire.
This is the meaning of the sounds of the vowels and consonants.
Through the distinctions of mudrā and activity,
the manner of great bliss abides,
and all the Victors accord in just this way.
The hands are clasped in the knot of the vajra fist.
All of them together form the maṇḍala of the beings of awakening.
The mudrā is the joined palms, the vajra,
all of them wrapped around the back of the consort.
The two faces blossom in beauty,
and the two tongues are lovely as crescent moons.
With a conch-shell kīla, at the nape and the throat,
they are set and joined, and so they abide.
Approach and close approach, the empowerment, are complete.
This is the supreme body of all the Victors.
One meditates on the principal deity, who laughs and smiles, with the dhāraṇī.
The meaning of the great ascetic discipline of the yogī is to delight greatly in the secret conduct,
and by the secret itself to lead sentient beings.
It dispels the bewilderment of every one of them.
The special activity of the consort purifies all the stages of the grounds.
It subdues those, such as the śrāvakas, who have no power over food and clothing
and who dwell in cessation, and others like them.

With the great rain of the awakening mind,
it cuts off those bound by hardness.
The great pledge is the vow,
and it is the maṇḍala of all the Victors.
The supreme gathering of the great mudrā
is the pure and supreme lineage of meaning.
If one is swiftly and constantly undistracted,
success is attained without fail.
Within half a day of the gods of the desire realm,
one becomes equal to all the secrets.
This is the mudrā called Equality with the Secret of the Tathāgatas.
Samantabhadra, supreme among yogīs,
from the very expanse of the secret,
with the syllable A, together with the fierce Tsekdrak,
the heart-son of the yogī of great bliss,
blesses the form realm and the rest.
The hand-emblems appear clearly as a wheel,
and the Tathāgata is bliss and yoga.
Of the hue of refined gold,
like the light of the sun's rays,
the Blessed One shines brilliantly.
From the second syllable at his crown
a jeweled mansion blazes with sprouting radiance.
Beautifully adorned with the crown ornaments of the five buddhas,
he is complete with all the marks.
In the manner of the great perfection abiding,
and in accord with absorption, one focuses on beings.
Seated in the center of the lotus filaments,
he is endowed with the four drops and the four secrets.
Before him is the goddess Chagpamo, Passionate One,
twenty years of age and endowed with beauty,
delighting in the abode of Mahāsukha.
With graceful hands, in dance and adornment,
the manner of nondual abiding is to abide as one who relies upon the principal deity.
Behind him is the goddess Great Joy,
who acts in the manner of one who relies upon the buddha.

Holding him with joined palms, with steady body,
sixteen years of age, red in color,
she holds the buddha's seed and acts with passion.
She accords with those full of desire.
On the right is the goddess who tames aversion,
who delights in the union of vajra and lotus.
For the faithless, without their choice,
she unites fiercely and dispels aversion.
Great Passion is the Blessed One.
By union in nondual embrace,
the manner is taught of never letting go.
Dark blue and radiant, supremely distinguished,
fifteen cubits tall, full of passion,
she delights in union through endless time.
With coquettish and amorous bearing
she washes away the suffering of all sentient beings.
Those who are utterly parched and wasted, who have ceased,
are raised up and become sons of the Victor.
By the activity of Attvomaṇi,
all are made into great awakening.
When with eyes smiling and with a swollen form
she has been made to possess the sovereign power,
it is the desire for nondual union.
At the tip of the nose one holds the little finger.
Without releasing, one abides and strives.
Closing the teeth and opening the mouth is called "the moment has arrived."
When absorption moves clearly,
that is what is called "the moment has arrived."
Thus, in the absorption endowed with the sign,
if one does not bow to the bound women,
success will not come and the pledge is broken.
One will be ruined in all one's lives.
When one plays in this way,
with the four ways of rousing the flanks,
like a young man, in proper manner,

In the very junction of vajra and lotus,
joined with the union of the five sovereign spaces,
slowly, slowly one inserts,
and slowly, slowly one stirs it well.
When the fierce syllables are uttered,
the lotus is filled with the awakening mind.
With the thick, the empowering, and the five,
the consort receives it and offers it to the chief.
Through the near-approach and the other stages of approach,
one meditates on the lesser and greater approach to completion.
From the maṇḍala of the awakening mind,
one praises and honors with the eight offerings.
Thus, when enjoyment is complete,
in nondual union, just as the scripture teaches,
it is shown in the manner of an equal embrace.
The one who holds the longing of all three times is endowed with the good fortune of relying on the left side.
Delighting in the tamed and tender ones,
those like a stalk, of nineteen years,
she gazes with her eyes turned to the right and strives to make the bell ring with a sweet sound.
She is the Vajra Sounder, crowned with the five buddhas,
diligent in bringing about manifest union.
With a dance accompanied by signs,
she is the one who beseeches all the buddhas.
With a great cloud of awakening mind,
she delights them with a great offering.
She urges the inconceivable, limitless emanations
to turn the wheel of the three times.
With a radiance of passion that is distinct in each,
she makes offering with a dance full of joy.
In the order of the four-sided square,
the Hearer, the Illuminator, the Great Speaker,
the one endowed with Fragrance, and the others dwell together with their consorts
in the manner of nonduality.
Those who dwell in the four courtyards are the Hearing power, the Listening power,

the supreme Fragrance power, and the Seeing power.
The four times are the four goddesses,
who abide together with hosts of consorts.
Those such as the Destroyer of Aversion,
who abide at all the doors,
abide together with the mother of compassion.
The sun, the moon, the supreme lotus,
and the precious conch are there,
and the seat, lifted by Brahmā and Indra,
two beneath each side, is well established.
All of them abide in the great completion,
and it is shown that all are well established in the manner of the great bodhisattva's sitting.
The faces are everywhere radiant,
the minds everywhere luminous,
and the bodies are clear, pervading all.
Emaho, the supreme unborn and unceasing!
Emaho, the supreme that neither rejects nor takes up!
Emaho, conduct of gentle or wrathful power!
Emaho, accompanied by the manner of going!
Emaho, showing the removal of signs!
Emaho, proclaiming an ocean of scripture!
Emaho, arousing joy even in animals!
Emaho, the supreme inconceivable emanation!
Emaho, enacting the passing beyond sorrow!
Emaho, enacting the secret of definitive meaning!
Emaho, joined in union with dhāraṇī!
Emaho, the supreme that does nothing at all!
Through these wondrous clouds of activity,
the stages of the grounds will be perfected.
Thus, speaking of the manifest awakening of buddhahood itself, they were delighted.

This is the second chapter, called "The Wheel of Dharma," the secret of the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas, the yogī.

Then the Blessed One, delighting in entering Samantabhadrī, the yoginī of great bliss, reflected on the great intimacy. And Samantabhadrī the yoginī, smiling, said:

Emaho, the great drop of the bodhisattva
is taught as the antidote to all habitual tendencies.
There is no Dharma of entering apart from this.

Thus she spoke. Then he became joined in nonduality with the Great Secret One. Having delighted her in many ways of arousing the left, and having brought forth the arisings such as the hidden lotus, he rejoiced greatly and sang this song:

Emaho, born from supreme bliss, Vajrapāṇi!
In the clarity that all phenomena lack real existence,
the great source knows that wonder arises. Emaho, how marvelous!
Because the cause itself is empty, no result is sought.
Even cause and result themselves the Victors do not find.
This is the magic of passion delighting in emptiness.
Therefore the Victors have declared here that there is no arising and no ceasing.

From the undivided, the unaging, the nature of all phenomena, the joy of all arises, far more excellent than all the Victors.
Having spoken thus, Samantabhadra the yogi entered into the secret space,
and sang this most fierce song:

Surpassing all illusions, the undivided one works the manifold display.
Samantabhadra the yogi is the nourisher of all the great Sugata mothers.
Entering the Sugata mother, who purifies all suffering, is the heart commitment, the Victors have declared.
Om̐ hūṃ. Not obstructing anything, and yet not doing what is done, is equanimity, the Victors have declared.
By this song that has been sung,
the protector of all beings, gone beyond sorrow,
will attain, in the empty maṇḍala of the Dharma,
the great austerity.
Thus he spoke of non-duality.

Then:
The syllable of the supreme essence
is to be meditated upon in the first place.

That essence is the fourth syllable,
the great vajra, the supreme clarity.
The syllable A, endowed with the great drop,
is to be meditated upon as the gathering of all phenomena.
At first it is like a mirror,
blazing with a delighted color.
By the offering of embracing hands,
all appears clearly like it.
Om hūṃ surata sukha jñāna da, om āḥ hūṃ.
In the space of the Sugata queen, meditate that actions are accomplished through clear purity.
A lotus of a thousand petals,
adorned with the sound of exposition.
Above it, clear as the body of Dharma,
from the space that is like the full moon,
everything is gathered by the three gatherings.
Om surata sukha dharma dhātu svabhāva, om āḥ hūṃ.
The supreme syllable of non-duality,
the unborn, is endowed with A.
The abode of all the Victors' blessings is clearly endowed with the eight offerings.
Into the separately luminous space,
let the rays of hūṃ make contact.
Om surata sukha na prajñā bhakṣaṇa svabhāva, om āḥ hūṃ.
The great rain of the awakening mind,
the second syllable, is the red channel body.
When endowed with non-duality,
all the māras are utterly subdued,
and what is luminous in the bliss of the basic space,
by the manner of opening the door,
let the various openings of the lotus be made.
By emanating and gathering,
generate the wisdom of strenuous action.
Thus all the Victors act,
from inconceivable emanations,
with many offerings together with the goddesses.
Om surata sukha na duṣṭa jñāna vajra svabhāva, om āḥ hūṃ.

The great fortunate yogi
is said to be the nourisher of all the unfortunate.
The awakening mind of non-duality,
the substances of flesh, excrement and urine,
are the attainments free of doubt;
the Victor himself is honored by the Victors.

This is the third chapter, the discourse on non-duality, which settles the habitual tendencies, from the Secret Essence of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Secret Essence, with the vajra yoginī, spoke of the supreme mudrā of non-duality, as follows:

From the mudrā of the net of illusion,
the ten, father and mother, shine forth beautifully.
With fingers well interwoven with one another,
the vajra palms form the seal of awakening.
The supreme heart of the secret yogi,
the commitment and vow, is hard to transgress.
For the yogi, Ali shines clearly;
for Samantabhadra, Kali acts.

The five complete, endowed with the corner,
becoming one, are the ground of the dance.
Om hūṃ traṃ āḥ hūṃ. Mā ā kā hūṃ rā.
With the palms in the manner of equanimity,
at the edge of beauty perform the dance.
Bound at the heart, the yogi's meaning is the dance's mudrā and its very self;
having made it a dance, the palms are twisted,
and at the close one praises in the manner of offering.
From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
the left holds the three-pronged one, grasped by the right.
That very one is to be pierced elsewhere.
From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
endowed with a radiance of joy,

In the manner of bowing to the right,
the right hand is raised at the heart.
The left is in the manner of listening to the speech and holding it.

From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
having danced from the edge of beauty, gather it in from the other side and place the right and left.

From those vajra dances,
the right hand is lifted up,
and is to be examined in the manner of an offering.

From those vajra dances,
the eyes and head are inclined to the left.

In the manner of holding a small drum,
the making of offerings is praised.

From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
the body is turned to the right and to the left,
and from the dance the hands are released and drawn forth.

From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
the left grasps the elbow of the right.

The right is made in the manner of a cudgel.

That very one, in these vajra dances,
shows the scattering of the samaya mudrā.

From the mudrā of the vajra dance,
the samaya mudrā is turned upward.

From within that same left,
the right is scattered with the samaya mudrā.

That very one is joined with being drawn by the right.

That very one is grasped by the second.

That very one binds both palms together.

That very one is to be contemplated as holding the bell.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata, mukha kara sukhena oṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata samarāga stvaṃ sukhena hūṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata jvalaya nānāma mahā sukhena trāṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata dharma bhaśra sukhena hā hā hā.

That very one is joined with the mudrā of the chief.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata sarva buddha locana ātmanaṃ. Suratva sukhena maṇḍala pūjaya pūjaya. Oṃ oṃ oṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata mahā dhuja ja. Oṃ suratva sukhena bhandha bhandha. Pūjaya pūjaya. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ āḥ. Oṃ suratva sukhena manśa moha. Pūjaya pūjaya. Hrī hrī hrī. Oṃ suratva sukhena sarva tathāgata dharma dantra. Sādhaka kanda ho ho. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra lāsyē. Vajra garbhe sukhena pūjaya pūjaya. Oṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ a. Sarva tathāgata śrī vajra garbhe sukhena pūjaya pūjaya. Traṃ hraṃ five a. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra gandhe. Vajra garbhe sukhena. Dhepa dhepa. Pūjaya pūjaya. Hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ a. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra nirte vajra garbhe mahā tilaka sukena pūjaya pūjaya. A a a. Oṃ hūṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra dhūpe. Vajra garbhe sukhena pūjaya pūjaya. Oṃ taṃ taṃ taṃ hūṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra puṣpe vajra garbhe sukhena pūjaya pūjaya. Hāṃ hāṃ hāṃ aṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra āloka jṭhana maṇḍala tilaka. Buddha sukhena pūjaya pūjaya. Oṃ hrī hrī hrī oṃ āḥ hūṃ. Oṃ sarva tathāgata śrī vajra gandhe. Vajra garbhe mahā maṇḍala tilaka sukhe pūjaya bījaya. A a a.

Oṃ āḥ hūṃ.

This is the fourth chapter, the chapter on the dance, from the Supreme Delight of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, together with great joy, entered into the meditative absorption called the Adornment of the Unsurpassed Samaya. He knew that all abide in the vow. He spoke these great samayas.

The vehicles of each are inconceivable.

When each is without fault, there is happiness.

Over worldly people, the cutting of the sūtras is forceful.

For one who upholds the Vinaya, there is happiness if it is guarded.

Behave purely toward those who act purely.

If non-virtue is turned back, there are the ten virtues.

By practice one upholds a world that is higher still.

Through the absorption of one's own aim,

those who abide on the ground of awakening

do not decline; if not entrusted to another,

from that which does not decline, it too is accomplished.

The yogic practice is accomplished through practicing.

By becoming accustomed to words, one overcomes the vehicles.

Do not abandon the supreme spiritual friend,

and cultivate also reverence, honor, and supreme service.

To become accustomed to absorption, meditate on the form of appearance.

Do not interrupt the recitation of words.

Give rise to sorrow over those who break the sacred bonds of their vajra siblings.

The sacred bond of the body is beyond conception.

The sacred bond of speech is one that is praised.

The sacred bond of mind has been taught as the highest.
The sacred bonds that guard the five families,
if they decline, are exceedingly difficult to restore.
The sacred bonds of conduct and of substances,
if they decline, are quickly restored.
One who lets a decline go unrepaired through laziness becomes a great enemy of all the buddhas,
and is certain to be swiftly reborn
among the ten kinds of wanderers.
Therefore, noble sons, let the best,
the lowest, and the middling practitioners practice, the superior without any interruption,
the middling in cycles of years, months, and six-month periods,
and the lowest never allowing a year to pass without repetition.
So the Victors have most emphatically declared.

Vajra fragrance, the awakening mind,
rakta, great fragrance, and the great elixir:
one who is endowed with a pure vessel blesses these and drinks them.
This abides within the vow of the sacred bonds;
to transgress it brings great ruin.
All phenomena that are placed in equipoise, practiced with the knowledge of equality,
and when one is clear in equality itself,
one is called a yogic hero, so it is taught.

As for the vessels used by the yogī,
all the substances that are praised,
wash them well and sweep them clean,
making them gleam like the color of the kalapiṅka bird.
Bowls, ritual daggers, and containers of every kind,
wash away their stains and make them beautiful.
Medicine is to be compounded at three times of day.
First compound it in a silver bowl,
then in a bowl of rāgan (brass),
then compound it in a bowl of copper.
Of the medicines compounded by the measure of a sang,

mix copper, silver, rāga,
gold, and iron together well,
and compound the medicine for the disease of conceptual thought,
compounding it to the color of the mandārava flower.
If it has not taken on the mandārava hue,
it is never taught to be compounded.
When the sun and moon rise together at one time,
then, in accordance with the praise of the substances,
begin the compounding of the medicine properly.
When the medicines are fully assembled, visualize a boundless maṇḍala of light
as having the color of the kalapiṅka.

Whoever is not diligent in this has no integrity in the sacred bonds and holds no vow;
he is a demon estranged from his vajra siblings.
Whoever recklessly despises
the deity, the vajra master, or through delusion fails to see, or is distracted,
or does not hold the sacred Dharma dearer than life,
or scorns the buddhas, the seven Victors,
or does harmful deeds against the maṇḍala,
that being becomes one of the great hell beings.
Such a one is afflicted with disease and a short life,
and in this very world suffers many harms.
After death he is born in the hells and the lower realms.
Therefore, there is nothing at all that can lead beyond these vows.
By not transgressing them,
in this very life one abides on the ground of the Victor's body,
the spontaneously accomplished ground.
Thus all the Tathāgatas themselves greatly extolled and magnified this vow of the great sacred bond.

This is the fifth chapter, called the Supreme of All Vows, the Secret Bliss of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Great Samantabhadra, together with the yoginīs, abided in a single thought. He knew the great lord of yoga, endowed with supreme practice, to be the entirety of conduct and the meaning of the profound. Knowing this, he spoke this method of the great magical display.

Emaho! From the pure sphere of the dharmadhātu, buddhas and sentient beings both appear as a great marvelous display.

Though they appear as manifold from the gathering of wisdom,
they arise, perfectly emanated, from the illusion of all women.

That the two truths appear separately
the Victors have called the space of the Mother.

If one meditates on the great unerring path,
meditating on Samantabhadrī, one has entered the path.

The intent of all buddhas is wholly discerning wisdom, woman;
by honoring and serving her, great wisdom is accomplished.

The supreme accomplishment of the rite of drawing the maṇḍala,
through the very meaning of the vajra song,
becomes clear in the intent that is nondual.

Then Glorious Samantabhadra, the very self of all the Tathāgatas, spoke of this enjoyment of skillful means and wisdom.

The entry into the activity of manifest conduct is to delight in one another, abiding in the vow of the yogī.

The supreme offering to this is the union of perfect joining,
all-pervading, joined in everything.

Passionate attachment is the supreme pledge.

Therefore, for the Karma family, one possessed of the proper color, of sixteen years, tall in stature,
as though poured from a mold,
her body well formed and beautiful,
her forehead broad, her waist slender,
her breasts small, her fingers long,
her gaze slightly sidelong, her eyes long,
fair, with reddish veins glowing,
white teeth, the hair of her body fine,
short in her gathering, her voice deep and resonant:
such a woman is the supreme abode of Vajrasattva.

One who delights in her will, without fail, accomplish the Vajra family, and attain success in this very life.

Examine carefully in a secluded place.

Her flesh is fair, radiant, of fine complexion,
her body of middling size, round and well proportioned,
her teeth white and firm, her eyes long and round,
her voice fine, her complexion fair, her eyelashes long,
her forehead broad and well set,
her skin unblemished, and so forth:

such a woman constantly bows to the Dharma.

She belongs to the family of Brahmā's melody.

One who strives and practices with her,

in the samādhi of that same family,

if they delight in one another,

within a single dawn of Brahmā

will without fail attain success.

The delight of the yogī's union is said to be accomplished through diligent union.

A woman of excellent bearing

is of short stature, slender-bodied,

her hands and feet small, her voice clear,

her eyes fine, her face round, her veins strongly red,

devoted in her attachment, and without ignorance.

Her body is adorned with auspicious marks and moles,

her speech is clear, she dreams little,

her teeth are white, her lips fine, and she is full of faith.

Through the samādhi of one who contemplates the Dharma,

make the sun and moon light in the secret space

together with the vajra and lotus,

and if they delight in one another,

in an instant of a god of the desire realm success will come, without fail.

Her body is round and firm, with pride,

sharp in speech within, holding things in mind,

mindful of what is to be done and never neglecting it.

She trains slowly, dull of mind, heavy in flesh and bone,

her radiance shining; on examination she grows greater and greater.

She delights in giving and has faith in the Dharma.
Through the samādhi of the Jewel family,
cut through to the root with the seed-syllable of habitual tendency,
and when the samādhi is clear in the mind,
the time for accomplishment has come.
Then, with the utmost diligence,
open the lotus of the consort,
and with the play of bliss in the mind,
if they delight in one another,
the accomplishment of the Jewel family
will be attained in this very life.

By the particular quality of compassionate activity,
if one summons those of the lowest families in the world
and delights with them,
this is said to be the great conduct of the yogī
who possesses supreme compassion and skillful means.
Butchers, those of low caste, prostitutes,
those of base families, and their possessions:
it is said that if one acts swiftly
in the samādhi of the Subduer, success follows.

Hungry ghosts, yakṣas, animals,
dogs, tortoises, monkeys, and so forth,
and all the supreme abodes of humans and gods:
if one delights in each according to its fitting,
great peace comes to the arrogant.
Delight in diligence makes one diligent.
Of all the activities of skillful means this is supreme.
For the sake of these sentient beings, whatever they practice in error,
through varied acts of taming
there is nothing that is not done.
By a most fierce appearance
one brings all the fierce under control;
by a most peaceful appearance
one brings the arrogant under control;
by a most radiant appearance

one brings the minds of the passionate under control.

Wondrous! How marvelous!

Whatever it may be, why should one not reflect on it?

When this was spoken, all became endowed with great and supreme diligence.

The Blessed One, the Tathāgata, inconceivable and equal to space, whose mind, with an aspiration as numerous as the atoms of the finest dust, was intent upon listening, made them diligent. The chapter was composed in which Vajra Dharma Supreme and the rest, of inconceivable number among the families, were wholly embraced by supreme listening and supreme reverence.

Then the Blessed One, the great yogin, acted with the most intense diligence. With a mind of intense diligence, they delighted one another with joyful union, with embrace, with laughter and pleasure, and with an unsurpassed satisfaction.

Then, from the expanse of suchness, the body, speech, and mind of the vajra spoke this:

Oṃ hūṃ. The one endowed with the supreme yoga of wisdom bestows the supreme accomplishment on the fortunate.

To dispel utter bewilderment, he sets in motion every cessation.

That yogin, supreme and without a second, how wondrous this is!

The wish-fulfilling jewel, the dhāraṇī that holds sway over all, the dhāraṇī of Brahmā's radiance, once drawn forth, and practiced with diligence, will come to fruition. Joyful practice in this: a la la!

It is most possible; since it is said that practicing just so brings accomplishment,

those who abide on the grounds are surpassed by all.

Among all the Victors, Samantabhadra, the Victor, surpasses all.

And she too is Samantabhadrī, as all the Victors of old have said.

Free of all signs, never abandoning the union of utter joy, that very one is Vajrasattva, as all the Victors have said.

Whoever practices with diligence and takes up

these songs of Brahmā Supreme is an ascetic, a yogin, a samādhi-holder;

by a single warmth of the Brahmā Supreme,

accomplishment, it is said, comes without fail.

Thus it was spoken.

All the Tathāgatas, by the great, intense diligence, were made to become one in nature.

This is the sixth chapter, called The Secret Maṇḍala of All the Tathāgatas.

Then all the teachers of the three times, whose nature is that of the Sugatas, were pleased by the great offering, and they knew how to tame eighty-four thousand ignorances. Knowing this, they brought about the liberation of ignorance, and delighted in the complete liberation of aversion. By the nature of great equality, they liberated these beings through the means of taming, and by the union of the family of empowerment they guarded and protected them closely.

My own yoga is Samantabhadra.

Characteristics and imputations are not two.

If one unites in equality with all the Victors,
one abides on the ground of equality.

One's own mind abides in the center of the full moon;
this is the samādhi of Vajrasattva.

Through realizing the meaning, becoming clear,
it is the great and utter liberation.

The supreme abides in the lineage.

The miraculous display of the body is complete in every family;
the speech is the unsurpassed teacher;
the mind's activity is endowed with signs.

Through this samādhi becoming clear in this way,
in order to purify the bewilderment of mind and suffering,
through clarity without duality,
one gathers in with jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ.

One liberates through the activity of manifest conduct;
one comes to accomplish without duality.

With signs and knowledge perfectly complete,
the loving action, the yogin's mind,
with the offering of dhāraṇī in equality,
if one knows how to unite so as to please the Victors,
one honors oneself with great delight.

In the manner of truth, to purify the realization of mind itself,

which is inseparable,
by the force of samādhi all are liberated,
and one acts to free them through the activity of manifest conduct.
One unites everything in the sky of the secret.

This is the seventh chapter, called Offering, the very suchness, from the inconceivable deeds and conduct of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, delighting in protecting the retinue, received disciples of superior, middling, and lesser capacity, who had made many offerings, and admitted them into the maṇḍala. To cut off the hordes of obstructors, through the samādhi of Vajrasattva, he filled their palms with precious substance in the form of a face and had them recite this essence:

Oṃ sarva tathāgata pūjī dhi dha tiṣṭha hūṃ.

Having recited "Oṃ mahā-maṇḍala-devakara pūjaya pūjaya hūṃ a," he has them scatter the flower.

The spiritual friend then shows them where it has fallen. The mantras, the mudrās, and the samaya commitments are explained. Then, as the water of the samaya is poured, they are instructed to understand these words well:

The great form of sentient beings, action and the rest, is consecrated with empowerment. This is the empowerment as a son of the Victors. From this day onward, child, you must never give up these samaya antidotes, even for the sake of your life. Do not abandon your teacher, and make offerings to your companions. Listen to the command with reverence. If you transgress the command, you will be crushed, destroyed, tormented, and consumed by fire, and you will be born in the hells. Let this water that abides in the mind bring harmony to the four kinds of enlightened activity.

Having said this:

The vajra master, the maṇḍala, Samantabhadra, the vajra brothers and sisters, and the rest: bow at their feet and show them reverence. Do all that is taught in the tantra. Through reliance on the form of the one who accomplishes, success is attained.

Then the supreme son of the family is also given the empowerment of the secret name. That supreme son, full of reverence, offers kingship, the power of kings, his own body, his dwelling and the lands of his retinue, his sons, wife, and kin, precious jewels, crystal and silver, the seven kinds of precious things, wealth and possessions, horses, elephants, chariots, buffaloes and calves, whatever he has, treasures, goods, and whatever pleases the mind. With no doubt in his mind, he generates the supreme respect and service and presents these, and the Victors are pleased.

Then the empowerments are conferred, each according to the measure of the vehicle, in due order. The listening, the accomplishment, and the rest; the actions, the cymbals, and the victory banner; the eye, the vajra, the bearers of measure, the special appointments, and the others: of whichever secret empowerments have been received, for one who has reached the age of twenty or twelve, the robes, the crown ornament, food and drink, the mudrā, the bell, and so on, he visualizes clearly in this way as the maṇḍala, and all the Victors give their blessing. Spreading seats before them, he acts with delight. If the king confers the empowerment from above, he will surely obtain the siddhis. One should praise with excellent words.

Then that supreme son of the family bows at the feet and offers the gift of thanks. The vajra brothers and the dhāraṇī-holders declare: "You are a Victor of Victors, the great son of all of the three times. Engage in the conduct of all the three times. You are the liberator of all the three realms. Engage in the conduct of the supreme liberator. You are the one with excellent yoga, fortunate, abiding in the vows of samaya, drinking the water of signlessness, doing the work as commanded. You are renowned and distinguished above all. You uphold the lineage that will lead later generations. You abide on the ground of the net of magical illusion."

This is the eighth chapter, called Supreme Offering and Compassion, from the very suchness of the secret of the body, speech, and mind of the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One entered into the samādhi called Ornament of the Arrayed Secret Vajra, and remained in it. Having done so, he entered into equipoise without obstructing the many linkages of pacification and of agent and action. Then once more, by the samādhi of unmoving, he established the sufferings that depend on karma, each directly arising. Then he tamed the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) who hold the view of permanence, who cling to the fixed and eternal, by assuming the form of fixed permanence. To those who are called "those who do not want annihilation later," he caused them to enter equipoise through that very form. Having done so, to those whose extreme austerity of total restraint does not allow them to abide swiftly in happiness, he performed a great taming through the manner of great transformation of austerity. To those who delight in the forceful methods of violence, he tamed them by assuming the form of a spider-like weaver, a copper-patterned one. To the rulers who hold one-sided views and have no compassion for others, he performed taming through the samādhi of the wish-fulfilling jewel.

To those who do not know the virtue and vice of the four continents, he appeared as a great wheel-turning king and tamed them. Through the manner of the great antidote, the one with the face of copper, and the great executioner, he tamed those who bind and those who cut, who cook and who gnash their teeth, both great and small. And all of these he caused to abide in the great sameness of phenomena, the manner of awakening, the Vajra Vehicle, supreme above all vehicles, abiding in its own nature, the inseparability of means and wisdom, the inconceivable play. This activity of means is called the mudrā of the wrathful one's manifold transformation.

Then the Blessed One, the Great Samantabhadra, entered into the samādhi of transformation called Subduing Māra. Now there was a māra called Great Aversion, who for a thousand eons had taken on inconceivable suffering, and so had never generated the mind of awakening. He was exceedingly cruel, with a rough and stinking body, huge and hairy, harming beings with weapons and the cruelty of blood. With fangs like blades, his stench spread for a league. He killed, cut, devoured and drank, and in the midst of a blazing fire he shot cruel arrows. Shaking violently, he abode fierce and menacing on the brink of a precipice.

Then the Blessed One, saying nothing, smiled at Samantabhadrī. From the cloud of the awakening mind of the Father and Mother, with the utterance Oṃ dhu dhu dhu dhu ra dhu ra dhu ra ho ho, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ, ho ho, there arose, helpless and with perceptions of intense desire, the consorts of Brahmā, of Indra, of Viṣṇu, of Cakra, of the gods, of Rudra, of Garuḍa, of the Guardian of the Realm, of Vaiśravaṇa, of Virūpākṣa's kin, and of Virūpākṣa; and he gathered them together.

Again, from the cloud of the awakening mind, with the utterance Sattva Vajra Heruka, Mahāsamaya Sarva Siddhi, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, ho ho ho, he became adorned with the many forms of the Tathāgatas, and as he abode, each and every one of the assembled, the consorts of Brahmā and the rest, conceived an extremely great desire and clung to him. Clinging thus, from the playful awakening mind there arose inconceivable circles of water, which washed away and destroyed the world. Many circles of fire utterly burned the world.

Many circles of wind scattered the beings of the world.

Then, from the cloud of the awakening mind, he conferred empowerment to establish their lineage. Then, arising from non-duality, with the utterance Oṃ oṃ sarva viśuddhe śaṣṭha ja ja ja, the consorts of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and the rest were bound by dhāraṇī to be servants, took a pledge, and went back to their own abodes.

Then from that bodily form he caused abiding in the great sameness, and with the utterance Oṃ bhara mudrā mahā caṇḍa caturyoginī maṇḍala krodha hala hala hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ, each of the consorts and their sons and daughters became the great Vajra Slayeress. To the fierce great māra Aversion and the others she said, "Lord, take the pledge, arise!" and smeared blood on the body of the cruel māra. Even so, he could not be made to heed the pledge, and remained heedless and utterly dark.

Then the Blessed One gathered all the emanations into one, and with three heads, six arms and four feet, holding a hammer, a vajra, a small stone, a bow and arrow, a noose, and a threatening finger, embraced Samantabhadrī in the play of a tumultuous dance, and the three heads blazed forth.

Reciting "Sarva Bhūta Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ," he gathered beneath his feet the four māras, Brahmā, Indra, and the other great kings and protectors of the Dharma. With "Khāhi khāhi phaṭ phaṭ ruru ruru ruru hūṃ hūṃ" he slew them, and having filled the skull-cup (bhandha) with them, he drank them, so that none could remain.

Again, stretching out his right foot in the posture of standing embrace, he recited "Oṃ sarva tathāgata mahājñāna garbha ho dhu ho dhu ho dhu, caṇḍa bala mahā śrī heruka hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, trūṃ trūṃ trūṃ, hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ, phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ." Through this recitation, the consorts, sons and daughters of each were lifted up, helpless, and carried off. Then that great māra Aversion was likewise lifted up by his arrogant consort and carried off.

Once they had been carried off, the Blessed One, glorious Heruka, through the great qualities of body, speech, and mind, recited "Oṃ sarva tathāgata mahā samaya śrī heruka duṣṭaṃ dhaka hana, daha daha daha, paca paca paca, hā hā hā hā." Then the great sovereign ladies of vajra yoga came forth from the clouds of awakening mind in the secret space of the Mother: the Yoginī Who Impels, the Yoginī Who Slays, the Devourer, the Fierce Yoginī, the Great Accomplisher of Action, the Vajra Burner, and the Great Gatherer of Power. Seizing the host of wicked ones and the māras by the head, they stripped them of their weapons, slew them, tore their limbs apart, and carried them off and struck them down.

Then the Blessed One, the glorious great blood-drinking Vajra of great joy, turned to the retinue of beings, the classes of yakṣas and māras; the hungry ghosts; the great ogresses with horse bodies; the great owl-women; the great vulture-women; and tigers, lions, bears, wolves, dogs, jackals, monkeys, ravens, vultures, crows, pigs, and the like, together with the mātaṅgas and rudras, all dwelling in their places. He performed a union that clings to no sign, and recited "He he he he he, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ." From the clouds of awakening mind there came forth great lions with mighty strides, great tigers in their forms, intoxicating great horse-headed ones, owl-headed ones, ravens, vultures, and long-beaked ones, with colors not apart from the forms of ogresses. Reciting "Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ caṇḍa mahāmaṇḍala hūṃ phaṭ," he had the host of wicked ones slain, and with the manner of eating of birds, fanged beasts, and flesh-eaters, they seized and devoured them.

Then the Tathāgata, the glorious Great Illusion, spoke this teaching on the transcendence of karma, so that in the future it would not be obscured for the doctrine.

In the ten directions of the six worlds,
the great charnel grounds encircle all around;
blazing maṇḍalas appeared clearly.
For the sake of subduing the violent,
in the midst of that blazing maṇḍala
the blood-drinker, great primordial wisdom, spreads wide with three heads, six arms, and four feet,
a body yellow and black, great and terrifying, coiling with the Wrathful Queen of the Buddhas
in the manner of Mahāsukha.
With the three faces of liberation
he swallows and drinks all the three realms without remainder.
By the great compassion of his sacred pledge
he gathers them into the great maṇḍala of the body.
Holding the vajra skull-cup,
he stirs and drinks the great blood.
His terrifying hair coils upward
in the midst of the great blaze of the eon's fire.
The fierce sound of his wings shakes the thousand-fold world,

the fierce sound of his palate stuns living beings.
By his stamping, merit and body are destroyed,
and he unites in embrace with the Great Mother.
He cuts sins with small stones and a trident,
holds them in his hand and crushes them.
With postures, songs, mudrās, and mantra words,
he slays the ten fields and, in due manner,
with "Ha ha ha" he gives delight,
with "He he he" he plays with the Mother,
with "Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ" he sends down great rain,
with "Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ" he devours greatly.
With my peaceful foot he liberates and subdues the four māras.

The great dark-blue celestial mansion becomes the world of the three realms.
Many great nāga kings
adorn his body of supreme distinction.
The great hide of a mighty creature
he wears as a great loincloth.
He is a form that transforms into anything,
a terrifying body, a miraculous display.
By the fierce roar of his speech,
a great host that slays and drinks.
In his compassionate fury he drinks great streams of blood.
In the offering of slaying and union
he shows supreme and exceeding delight.
Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ha ha ha ha ha. Khāhi khāhi khāhi. Ha ha ha sa. Ru ru rakta.
Ka ka karma. Yoginī. Rulu rulu rulu hūṃ.

Of the great vajra family, he is the heart of Akṣobhya,
the great Vajra Blood-Drinker.
With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide,
upon a seat that crushes the great fields,
his four feet press down firmly on the four māras.
His body is dark maroon and greatly terrifying.
With the wrathful vajra queen
he is entwined in the manner of Mahāsukha, great bliss.
With his three faces of complete liberation

he swallows and consumes the three realms without remainder.
By his heart-commitment of great compassion
all is gathered into the great maṇḍala of his heart.
Bearing compassion's skull-bowl,
he stirs and drinks the great blood.
His fearsome hair coils upward
in the midst of the vast fire of the aeon's end.
The fierce sound of his wings shakes the thousand-fold world,
the sound of his palate makes all families faint and tremble.
By his stamping, merit and body are destroyed,
and he unites in embrace with the Great Mother.
He is the trident that pierces the mountain of sin,
holds it in his hand and drinks its blood.
With Samantabhadrī, the all-good buddha consort,
he unites in the manner of play.
With postures, songs, mudrās, and mantra words,
he slays and destroys the great fields.
With "Ha ha ha" he gives delight,
with "He he he" he plays with the Mother,
with "Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ" he sends down great rain,
with "Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ" he devours greatly.
The great dark maroon celestial mansion becomes the thousand-fold world.
Many great nāga kings
adorn his body of supreme distinction.
The great hide of a mighty creature
he wears as a great loincloth.
A great form that transforms into anything,
great, great is his glory.
Even the body of a buddha he devours greatly;
what need to speak of other living beings?
A terrifying body, a miraculous display,
by the fierce roar of his speech,
a great host that slays and drinks.
In his compassionate fury he drinks great streams of blood.
In the offering of slaying and union

he shows supreme and exceeding delight.
Except for the blazing blood-drinker,
he leaves not a single one alive.
Likewise, being of this very heart-commitment,
he delights exceedingly in the causes of slaying.
Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ha ha ha ha ha. Khāhi khāhi khāhi. Ha ha ha sa. Duru rakta. Ka ka karma. Yoginī. Rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu hūṃ.

Of the great jewel family, he is the body of qualities,
the great Jewel Blood-Drinker.
With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide,
he sits upon a seat of great and small corpses.
Stretching and drawing in his limbs upon the four māras,
he cuts down the five afflictions.
With the little finger and the tips of the claw-like fingers he adorns his radiant body with great, glistening nectars, amṛta and the rest.
His body is blue-black and greatly terrifying.
With the wrathful jewel queen
he is entwined in the manner of Mahāsukha.
With his three faces of complete liberation
he swallows and consumes the three realms without remainder.
By his heart-commitment of great compassion
all is gathered into the great maṇḍala of qualities.
Bearing the vajra skull-bowl,
he stirs and drinks the great blood.
His fearsome hair coils upward
in the midst of the vast fire of the aeon's end.
The fierce sound of his wings shakes the thousand-fold world.
By the sound of his palate the families of qualities are all destroyed.
By his wrathful gaze merit and body are destroyed,
and he is joined in union with the Great Mother.
He draws out and consumes the hearts and lungs of the demons.
In his hands he holds the enemy-subduing trident, the entrails, and the noose, and he drinks blood.
With the jewel queen Samantabhadrī
he joins in union in the manner of play.

By dance-gestures, songs, mudrās, and mantra-words
he brings about the cutting off of absolutely everything.
In the manner of great play
he sips even the great blood from his mouth.
With "ha ha ha" he gives delight.
With "he he he" he sports with the Mother.
With "hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ" he sends down a great rain.
With "phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ" he devours greatly.

In the blue-black great mansion
the thousand-fold world is transformed.
The many great nāga kings
adorn his body of supreme distinction.
The skin of a great living creature
he wears as a great loincloth.
His form is one that can change into anything.
Great, great is the glorious one!
He devours even the bodies of buddhas, greatly, greatly.
The many hosts of gods of the form realm
he has made into ornaments, a garland of heads.
His body is terrifying, a miraculous display;
with the resounding roar of his speech
there is a great assembly that slays and drinks.
With compassion and loving-kindness he drinks great blood.
In the offering of slaying and union
he shows supreme, great delight.
Except for the blazing blood-drinker,
not even one is left alive.
Likewise, because his heart-commitment is just so,
he takes the deepest joy in the work of slaying.
Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ha ha ha ha ha. Khāhi khāhi khāhi. Ha ha ha sa. Ru ru rakta.
Ka ka ka ra ma. Yoginī. Ru lu ru lu ru lu ru lu hūṃ.

For the sake of subduing the fierce,
in the directions of the blazing maṇḍala,
the great blood-drinking Padma possesses an unequalled distinction.
Three heads, six arms, four legs spread wide,

his body is red-black and greatly terrifying.
With the wrathful lotus queen
he is entwined in the manner of Mahāsukha.
With his three faces of complete liberation
he swallows and consumes the three realms without remainder.
By his heart-commitment of great compassion
all is gathered into the great maṇḍala of speech.
Bearing the vajra bhandha,
he stirs and drinks the great blood.
His fearsome hair coils upward
in the midst of the great fire of the aeon's end.
The fierce sound of his wings shakes the thousand-fold world.
By the fierce sound of his palate living beings faint.
By his wrathful gaze merit and body are destroyed,
and he is joined in union with the Great Mother.
Trident, stone club, entrails, and noose
he holds in his hands, and he consumes flesh and blood.
The many hosts of gods of the form realm,
arhats and bodhisattvas,
he has made into ornaments, a garland of heads.
He is intoxicated by the great, certain, forceful means of his intent.
With the intent of aroused attachment
he gathers all women, bodies of every form.
By the power of aroused pride
he overpowers all those endowed with merit.
With the intent of aroused jealousy
he gathers all forms, seizing and uniting them.
With the intent of aroused delusion his mind is resolved to make no distinction and no exclusion.
"I make offering, I make offering, O great power!
To me, my own offering is greatly pleasing."
In the wrathful lotus maṇḍala,
by terrifying gestures and dance,
the unbearable great expanse of the ḍākinīs arises.
By dance-gestures, songs, mudrās, and mantra-words
he slays the ten fields, and in due manner
makes of the actual substances a great enjoyment.

With "ha ha ha sa" he gives delight.
With "he he he" he sports with the Mother.
With "hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ" he sends down a great rain.
With "phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ" he devours greatly.
With his four feet he liberates and tramples the four māras.
In the red-black great mansion
the world of the three realms is transformed.
The many great nāga kings
adorn his body of supreme distinction.
The great hide of a great living creature

The great hide of a great living creature he wears as a mighty cloak, a great garment of the great expanse of the ḍākinīs. His is the great form that transforms into whatever is needed, a body of terror, a display of magical power. By the fierce thunder of his speech he gathers the great host that slays and drinks. With compassion and with wrath he drinks great rivers of blood. In the offering of slaying and union he shows the greatest delight.

Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ha ha ha ha ha. Khā he khā hi khā hi. Ha ha ha sa. Ru ru rakta. Ka ka ka ra ma. Yogini. Ru lu ru lu ru lu ru lu ru lu hūṃ bhyo hūṃ.

He bestows the fierce and powerful siddhis. In the blazing directions of the maṇḍala, the body, speech, and mind of the blood-drinking karma lord stand forth with three heads, six arms, and four feet. His body is dark green, great and terrifying. He is the conqueror of karma, with the wrathful queen, joined in the manner of Mahāsukha, the great bliss. With his three faces of liberation he swallows and devours the three realms without remainder. By his great compassionate commitment he gathers the many varied world-systems of the thousandfold universes into the great maṇḍala of his body. Holding the vajra bhaṃbhara, he stirs up and devours the great blood.

Terrifying, with hair bound upward in a topknot, in the midst of the great blaze of the eon's fire, the fierce sound of his wings shakes the three thousand worlds, and the fierce sound of his palate stuns living beings. By his expulsion he destroys the body of merit, and he unites with the Great Mother. He bears a net, a staff, a small stone, a trident, a plow, a goad, and a noose. With sharp fangs he devours as a great eater. By dance-gestures, songs, mudrās, and mantra-words he slays the ten fields, and in due manner makes of the actual substances an offering to the very maṇḍala of enlightened activity.

With "ha ha ha sa" he gives delight. With "he he he" he sports with the Mother. With "hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ" he sends down a great rain. With "phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ" he devours greatly. With his four feet he liberates and tramples the four māras. In the dark green great celestial mansion, the world of the three realms is transformed. The many great nāga kings adorn his body of supreme distinction.

The great hide of a great living creature he wears as a mighty cloak. His is the great form that transforms into whatever is needed. Great, great is his glory. Even the body of a buddha he devours, how much more other living beings. His is a body of terror, a display of magical power. By the fierce thunder of his speech he gathers the great host that slays and drinks. With compassion and with wrath he drinks great rivers of blood. In the offering of slaying and union he shows the greatest delight. Apart from the blazing blood-drinker, he leaves not one alive. Because he is truly of this commitment, he delights greatly in the work of slaying.

Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ha ha ha ha ha. Khā hi khā hi khā hi. Ha ha ha sa. Ru ru rakta. Ka ka ka ra ma. Yogini. Ru lu ru lu ru lu ru lu ru lu hūṃ bhyo hūṃ.

The wrathful queen of the buddhas, the Great Mother of all the buddhas, Krodheśvarī, of the Tathāgata family, stands with three heads, six arms, and four feet. Wrathful and scowling, with three eyes and bared fangs, her hair bound up in a topknot, adorned with many fresh skulls, her three eyes are terrifying and blazing. In the manner of a tawny-black glutton, with the bhanda vessel of blood, she coils about the chief in a manner of strength. In the midst of the great blazing fire of the charnel ground, she sits upon a seat of great fields, her four feet stretched and drawn in, treading down.

Spreading her vajra wings, with the tips of her ring finger and thumb she takes up the five, beginning with amṛta, and urges on the commitment. Delighted, she places it in the vajra lotus. For play she also makes the supreme embrace. She sports with delight in the kalagila. With stone staff, trident, and goad, with "a a hi hi" she fills the sky with laughter.

Within the maṇḍala of the commitment-body she gathers all the worlds that exist. She holds sway over all the three realms. The Great Mother of all the buddhas receives the glorious auspicious wealth of the great hide.

Save only for the blazing glorious one, all else she grinds to ash. When her wrathful compassion stirs, she devours even the great skillful means with a "chem, chem." The great delight of great aversion she also gathers under her sway through play, and offers it with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker. All living beings she consumes as food. Adorned with the great flesh, with the crescent-moon great offering she makes the Great Blood-Drinker smile. She shows a form that is pleasing to the mind, and if the commitment is broken, she utterly destroys. She is the great sovereign of yoginīs, who bestows accomplishment on those who keep the commitment. Turning the three realms into blood, she drinks it into her mouth with "hub, hub, hub." The many heaps of dust she swallows with "chem, chem, chem."

Strike, strike, glorious Mother! Plunder, plunder, glorious Mother! Seize, seize, glorious Mother! Burn, burn, glorious Mother! Bind, bind, glorious Mother! All the māras who do harm, draw them forth and, according to the rite, offer them with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker. Except for the blazing Blood-Drinker, she lets not one remain alive. Since this is her very heart-commitment, she delights greatly in the work of slaying.

Ha ha ha. Khā hi, khā hi, khā hi. Āho sarva tathāgata prajñāpāramitā. Siddha rūpe ja. Lohi nila śata cara na akhiya mehu bhoga yoka samayo bhava. Taru la sarva yogi mahā nara nṛ. Rakta jāya. So khya manu vilasi. Kava sama le ma kudha. Triśūla rakṣa bhoga yogini. Mahā sahu maṇḍala tilaka. Bandhana. Alalaho.

The great vajra mother, the sole Victor, Krodheśvarī, the glorious Mother, crowned with the five buddhas, endowed with the splendor of a hundred thousand suns, is seated upon a seat of a hundred thousand skeletons. In the manner of a dark maroon cast-off hide, she offers with power to the principal one, Bhandha Rakta. To please the great host of fierce ones, they coil about her body. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she glares with wrathful frowning eyes and bared fangs. Her hair is bound up in a topknot with muñja grass, and she is adorned with many fresh skulls. Her three eyes are fearsome, with glaring hatred. Having devoured the many hearts and lungs of cittas, she sits entwined with them. By the great skillful means of the dance of passion, she sends forth clouds of great ferocity, and delights greatly in the work of slaying.

In the midst of the great blazing fire of the charnel ground, she sits with legs outstretched and drawn in. Spreading her vajra wings, with the tips of her ring finger and thumb she takes up the five, beginning with amṛta, and adorns the serene body with them. Delighted, she places them in the vajra lotus. For play she also makes the supreme embrace. She sports with delight in the kalagila.

With the little vajra pellet-drum she beats, hurling the trident and goad, she fills the sky with laughter, "a a hi hi." Within the maṇḍala of the commitment-body she gathers all the worlds that exist. She holds sway over all the three realms. The Great Mother of all the buddhas receives the glorious auspicious wealth of the great hide.

Save only for the blazing glorious one, all else she grinds to ash. Because her wrathful compassion stirs, she devours even the great skillful means with a "chem, chem." The great obstructors of great aversion she also gathers under her sway through play, and offers them with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker. In the manner of a flayed hide, with the khaṭvāṅga as her support, in the bearing of one proud in play, she seizes and devours those who have transgressed the command. All living beings she consumes as food. Adorned with the great flesh, with the crescent-moon great offering she nourishes the color of the Blood-Drinker. She shows a form that is pleasing to the mind, and if the commitment is broken, she utterly destroys. She is the great sovereign of yoginīs, who bestows accomplishment on those who keep the commitment.

Having turned the three realms into blood,
with a slurping hup, hup, hup she consumes it.
The heaps of bone-dust and powdered skeletons
she devours with a chewing chem, chem.
Devour, devour, Vajra Mother!
Crush, crush, Vajra Mother!
Seize, seize, Vajra Mother!
Burn, burn, Vajra Mother!
Bind, bind, Vajra Mother!
The māras who bring harm
she draws forth, and according to the rite
offers them with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker.
Except for the blazing Blood-Drinker,
she leaves not one of them alive.
Because her very heart-commitment is thus,
she delights exceedingly in the work of slaying.

Oṃ hūṃ sattva-kara-rūpa,
rakta-jāla-sipaṅca-tathāgata-siddha-kāya-rūpa,
pañca-citta-tathāgata-rūpo,
tathāgata-bhaga-siddhi,

yoga-yogi-jāladha,
hana-bandhana-alalalaho.

Sole Queen, the Precious Wrathful One, endowed with the qualities of the four immeasurables,
she bestows treasure upon the hungry, the thirsty, and the destitute.
Her nature is a yogic wish-fulfilling treasure,
and since she has become an inexhaustible storehouse,
she is praised by the name Yoginī.

Wisdom Wrathful Lady, chief of wrathful sovereigns, mother of the Victors, complete in purity of the marks,
in the manner of dark-blue ink poured forth,
she offers with power to Bhandha-rakta, the Chief.
She who bears the radiance of a hundred thousand suns coils her body around the great host of many fierce beings in order to please them.

Her breasts rise high, upper and lower body set apart, standing erect;
with three heads, six arms, and four legs she stretches wide.

With the posture of standing to the left,
by a fierce cry of "phaṭ" she slays the fierce.

Wrathful, with staring eyes and bared fangs,
her hair bound in a topknot of muñja grass,
she is adorned with many fresh skulls.

Her three eyes are fearsome, glaring with hatred.

Having cut and hacked off their limbs,
she consumes them and is entwined in passion.

Through the great means of the dance of passion
she sends forth clouds of great fierce beings,
and delights exceedingly in the work of slaying.

In the midst of the great blazing fire of the charnel ground, in the great stance of stretching and drawing in the legs,
she sits upon a seat of corpses heaped like a field.

Spreading wings of precious corpse-cloth,
she raises her demon-hand and drinks great blood.

Delighted, she holds a vajra and a lotus.

For her play she also performs the supreme gesture of the breast.

Delighted by kalakila cries, she plays;

she holds a staff, a small drum, and a khaṭvāṅga.
She consumes the hearts and all the limbs,
and fills the air with the laughter "a a hi hi."
At the sound of her playful palate, thog thog, she trembles.
In the maṇḍala of the body of heart-commitment, delighted by the vajra's thrust,
she devours all the charnel grounds of slaying.
She who wields sovereignty over all three realms,
great mother of all buddhas,
partakes of the great hide, the splendor of majesty.
Except for the great blazing glory,
she grinds all else to ash.
When wrathful compassion stirs,
she devours even the great means, chem, chem.
Even the great obstructors of great hatred
she gathers under her power through play, and offers with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker.
The great mother, craving corpses,
seizes and consumes those who have transgressed the command.
All living beings she consumes as food.
Adorned with the great flesh,
with the crescent-moon great offering she makes even the Blood-Drinker smile.
By showing a form pleasing to the mind,
if the commitment is broken, she utterly destroys.
She is the great yogic mother, the great lady,
who bestows accomplishment on those who keep the commitment.
Having turned the three realms into blood,
with a slurping hup, hup she consumes it.
The many great and small corpses
she devours with a chewing chem, chem.
Devour, devour, Precious Mother!
Crush, crush, Precious Mother!
Seize, seize, Precious Mother!
Burn, burn, Precious Mother!
Bind, bind, Precious Mother!
The māras who bring harm

she plays with fully, and according to the rite
offers them with power into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker.
Except for the blazing Blood-Drinker,
she leaves not one of them alive.
Because her very heart-commitment is thus,
She takes the utmost delight in the work of slaying.

Oṃ hūṃ. Endowed with the inexhaustible ornaments of all the buddhas, in her very nature glorious Heruka, Great Mother, lady of the charnel ground and devourer, bearer of the treasury of qualities of all the Victors, she holds and drinks the sworn intent of the heart of awakening. Draw out those who are deluded and endowed with the five perversions, and by the rite let her overpower them. Sovereign of all, Great Mother endowed with power, play in all things. Let even the Blood-Drinking Hero play, dissolving into her body. Drinking the great blood, craving to eat the lung and heart, accomplish the work of all yogīs. Because she is endowed with the self, all the maṇḍalas without exception are complete. A la la la ho.

Yoginī endowed with body, speech, and mind, Buddha-Mother of the speech of Padma, lotus of passion, Rgya Tsigma, Great Mother Krodheśvarī, with the crowns of the five buddhas as her adornment, in a form of red and black. Three-headed, six-armed, four-legged, she stands wide. With the vajra bhandhara she stirs and drinks the great blood. Stretching out her palms in passion, she coils about the blood-drinking lotus body. With light that changes into a thousand lightning flashes, she dispels the dense black darkness. With glaring eyes of wrath and bared fangs she slays; striking with small stones, she devours great entrails. Flesh and blood dripping, she craves the corpse. By the power of her many deeds she crushes even the head of the Great God (Śiva), and the great hide of Mahābrahmā too the Great Mother consumes. With muñja-grass crown and matted hair, surrounded by a great host of fierce ones, adorned with garlands of fresh skulls, upon a seat of corpses, stretching and drawing in, with a dance of delighted abandon she moves in rapture and craves the corpse. Great Mother of all the buddhas, according to the rite she overpowers all the great obstructors into the mouth of the Great Blood-Drinker. In the midst of the great fire of the aeon she plays at the feast according to rite, and makes of the glad bodies her ornaments. Together with hosts of tchamngam and fierce, thunderous throngs, she takes the utmost delight in the work of the charnel ground. These are the commitments of her intent: "Liberate even what was not so done." Thus the sovereign king declared.

Oṃ pañca rūpai bhitarūpe bhitarūla padma mama Krodheśvarī samaya yoḍ bhavat. Sarva bhiśa rūpe samaya yoginī hūṃ. Bhiyuli gatha padma Krodheśvarī samaya yoginī. A ha ha mana samaya yoginī. Pañcarūpe siddha hūṃ. Tathāgata jñāna khāhi hi.

Great Mother of the action family, her body dark green-black, a terrifying form, two-armed, with a gesture of abandon she overpowers the chief with the bhandhara filled with blood. Rich in fat, she craves the corpse. Krodheśvarī, Great Mother, three-headed, six-armed, four-legged, stands wide, fierce and wrathful in appearance, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, radiant with the splendor of a hundred thousand suns. To please the great hosts of the fierce ones she coils about the body. With breasts full and high, upper and lower body parted, she stands leaning to the left in her posture, and with a mighty clap slays the fierce ones. Her hair is bound in muñja grass and adorned with many fresh skulls. Three-eyed, with terrifying angry eyes, she draws out the limbs, frees the inner parts, takes them into her mouth, and clings in passion. With the great dance of passion she sends forth clouds of great fierce ones, and takes the utmost delight in slaying as her work. In the midst of the great blazing fire of the charnel ground, with four legs stretched and drawn in, crossed as well, she sits upon a great seat of skeletons. She spreads the wings of the lotus-closed wings and drinks great blood from the skull-cup in flames. In delight she sets the vajra in the lotus; for her play she performs the supreme gesture of rapture. Delighted, she plays with the kalakila cry. She bears in her hands a sword, an axe, and small stones in a terrifying form. She draws the noose of entrails and devours them. With "a a hi hi" laughter she rejoices; with the sounds of her playful cries the thousandfold world trembles.

In the maṇḍala of her body and sacred pledge, which delights in the vajra's thrusting, all the three realms without exception are gathered. She is the sovereign who rules over all the three realms, the Great Mother of all the buddhas. She drinks the glory-fountain of the great skin, awesome and majestic. Excepting the blazing Great Glory, she reduces everything to ashes. When her wrathful compassion stirs, she devours even the great means in great mouthfuls. The great obstructors of great aversion she gathers under her sway through her play, and she lets them be devoured in the mouth of the blood-drinking Action. The Great Mother, ravenous for corpses, seizes and devours those who transgress the command. She devours all living creatures as her food. Her body is adorned with Mahāmāṃsa, the great flesh, and she partakes of the crescent-moon offering. By displaying a pleasing and lovely form, she brings utter ruin on those who fail their pledge. To the yogī, the one great Mother, and to the pledge-holders she grants accomplishments. Transforming the three realms into blood, she gulps it down with hub hub into her mouth. The many great and small stira spirits she devours in great mouthfuls, chem chem, into her mouth.

Slay, slay, Mother of Action. Seize, seize, Mother of Action. Gather, gather, Mother of Action. Bind, bind, Mother of Action. Burn, burn, and drink up, Mother of Action.

The maras who inflict harm she draws forth rightly and gives to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Excepting the blazing blood-drinker, she lets not a single one live. Since such is her sacred pledge, she delights greatly in the work of killing.

Ha ha khāhi khāhi. Oṃ hūṃ. Yoginī who delights in slaying through action, Great Mother who shines forth, who fulfills in her body all the families of the Sugata's action: with the ravenous manner of devouring and with dance, she offers to the chief. Endowed with the empowerment of all, sovereign over the body of merit, play and delight together with the host of many fierce attendants. Delighting in the supreme great red flesh and blood, be ready to receive them all; bestow blessing on the yogīs who hold the pledge. A la la ho.

From the heart of the blazing Great Glory arose a transformed form, a body able to become anything: the dark-blue yoginī Kauri. Wrathful, frowning, wide-eyed, with bared fangs, her coiled hair forms a muñja knot, adorned with a profusion of fresh skulls. She has three heads, six arms, and four legs stretched wide, and she drinks the glory-fountain of a fresh human skin. A host of many small stiras are strung together as ornaments of her body. From the fiery circle that burns the world, her great body, ravenous, sits upon a seat that crushes the great fields, in the manner of subduing the four maras. With the vajra bhandhara she stirs and drinks the great blood. In the manner of drawing out the great organs, the heart and lungs, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. In her hands she holds a staff and small stones. With a terrifying cry of the palate and with the thrusting of great delight, she joins in the twisted skein of entrails, draws out the ten fields rightly, and offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The Great Mother of all the buddhas, with dance-steps, songs, mudrās, and mantra words, in her ravenous body gathers rightly under her sway all the maras of wrong view. In the manner of one ravenous for corpses, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, yoginī. Slay, enjoy, yoginī. Scatter, purify, yoginī. Devour, devour, yoginī. Since such is her sacred pledge, she delights greatly in the work of killing. Draw forth, draw forth, jaḥ jaḥ. Bind, bind, hūṃ hūṃ. Gather, gather, ha ha. Play, play, phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The maṇḍala of her body is a treasury of emptiness, the Great Mother of all the buddhas: the yoginī Tsaūrī, yellow-black, bearing a terrifying form.

Wrathful, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, her matted hair coiled in a muñja knot, she is adorned with a host of fresh skulls. With three heads, six arms, and four legs, she stands wide-striding. She is clad in a freshly flayed human skin, and upon it she wears a great multitude of tiny bells, strung together as ornaments for her body.

In the midst of the fire that burns the world, in a great posture of stretching and contracting, she is seated upon a throne that crushes the great fields, in the manner of subduing the four maras. She who bears the vajra and the bowl churns and drinks great torrents of blood. As though drawing out the heart and lungs with a great pull, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. With a fierce spear and a drawn arrow she pierces the heart of the great glorious blazing one. In her hand she holds a small drum and a trident. With a terrifying cry of the palate and a roar of great delight, she pierces the heart of the great glorious blazing one.

Taking the form of the lion-cord and the twisted thread, she draws forth the ten fields, and as is proper she offers them to the body of the blazing blood-drinker. She is the Great Mother of all the buddhas. By her dance, her mudrā, and her mantra words, all the maras of wrong view, taking the form of the lion-cord and the twisted thread, are drawn forth from the ten fields, and as is proper she offers them to the body of the blazing blood-drinker. She is the Great Mother of all the buddhas. By her dance, her mudrā, and her mantra words, all the maras of wrong view, in a great mass of devouring, are brought properly under her sway. Having done so, in the manner of a ravenous corpse-eater, she offers them to the cauldron of the blazing blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, yoginī. Slay, enjoy, yoginī. Scatter, purify, yoginī. Devour, devour, yoginī. Since such is her sacred pledge, she delights greatly in the work of killing. Draw forth, draw forth, jaḥ jaḥ. Bind, bind, hūṃ hūṃ. Gather, gather, ha ha. Deliver, deliver, phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The wrathful yoginī, red-black in body, wrathful, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, with terrifying hateful eyes, her matted hair bound in a muñja knot, crowned with many fresh skulls, adorned with a garland of bells, clad in a garment of many fresh hides, wearing a flayed human skin as a skirt, three-headed, six-armed, and four-legged, wide-striding, she unlocks the treasury of the maṇḍala of speech. She is the Great Mother of all the buddhas, the great yoginī Pramoha.

In the midst of a great host of charnel grounds, in the middle of a great fire that burns the great offerings, in a great posture of stretching and contracting, she is seated upon a throne that crushes the great fields, in the manner of subduing the four maras. She who bears the vajra and the bowl churns and drinks great torrents of blood. As though drawing out the heart and lungs with a great pull, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. She strikes the makara banner and the small drum. With a terrifying cry of the palate and a roar of great delight, taking the form of the lion-cord and the twisted thread, she draws forth the ten fields, and as is proper she offers them to the mouth of the blazing blood-drinker. She offers them to the mouth that devours the three realms. She is the Great Mother of the speech of the lotus family.

From the great red-black palace, by her dance, her mudrā, and her mantra words, all the great obstructing demons are brought properly under her sway. Then, with the strength of the great dancer, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Wrathful yoginī, you play. Wrathful yoginī, you slay. Wrathful yoginī, you take and bind, and as is proper gather, purify, and hold them. Since such is her sacred pledge, whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

Ha ha ha. Khāhi khāhi khāhi.

The wrathful yoginī, her body dark blue-black, is Betālī, who devours great corpses. Her angry eyes bulge wide, her fangs are bared, and her hateful gaze is terrifying. Her hair is coiled in a topknot, and she is adorned with a garland of fresh skulls. She has three heads, six hands, and four legs spread wide. She wears a fresh human skin as her garment. A great multitude of small corpses is strung together and made into ornaments for her body.

In the fire at the center of the fire that burns the world, with the great stretching and contracting of her wild dance, she is seated upon the throne of the great field of corpses, in the manner of crushing the four mārās. With her vajra she cuts through the vicious elephant. Like a dragged and discarded corpse, she devours it with her skull-cup filled with blood, offering it to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. She eats great corpses and pounds out tiny dice. In the manner of drawing out the lungs and heart of great corpses, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

With a terrifying roar of the palate and the cries of great delight, she gathers them into a single braided cord. Drawing out the beings of ten fields, as is proper, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

She is the Great Mother of all the buddhas. By her dance, her mudrā, and her mantra words, all the demons of wrong view are properly brought under her sway by her wild dance. Then, with the manner of eating that craves the flesh, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, yoginī! Slay, enjoy, yoginī! Scatter, purify, yoginī! Destroy, destroy, yoginī! Since such is her sacred pledge, she delights greatly in the work of slaying.

Draw them in, draw them out. Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ. Bind them, bind them. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Gather them, gather them. Ha ha ha. Liberate them, liberate them. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever acts thus is himself destroyed.

The wrathful yoginī, her body dark green-black, is Ghasmarī, who devours the flesh of great corpses. Her angry eyes bulge wide, her fangs are bared, and her hateful gaze is terrifying. Her hair is coiled in a topknot, and she is adorned with a garland of fresh skulls. She has three heads, six hands, and four legs spread wide. She wears a fresh human skin as her garment. A great multitude of small corpses is strung together and made into ornaments for her body.

In the midst of the great fire of the great charnel ground, with the great stretching and contracting of her wild dance, she is seated upon the throne of the great field of corpses, in the manner of crushing the four mārās. With the vajra skull-cup she holds, she stirs the great blood and drinks it. In the manner of drawing out the lungs and heart of great corpses, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker. In the manner of hurling a trident, she casts a small dice and a noose. With a terrifying roar of the palate, with the cries of great delight, she gathers them into a single braided cord. Drawing out the beings of ten fields, as is proper, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

She is the Great Mother of all the buddhas. By her dance, her mudrā, and her mantra words, she draws forth all the demons of wrong view, and as is proper, with the manner of eating that craves the flesh, she offers them to the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, yoginī! Slay, enjoy, yoginī! Gather, purify, yoginī! Destroy, destroy, yoginī! Since such is her sacred pledge, she delights greatly in the work of slaying.

Draw them in, draw them out. Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ. Bind them, bind them. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Gather them, gather them. Ha ha ha. Liberate them, liberate them. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Khāhi khāhi khāhi khāhi khāhi.

The wrathful yoginī, her body yellow-black, is Caṇḍālī, who devours great corpses. The great fierce lady subdues aversion. Her angry eyes bulge wide, her fangs are bared, and her hateful gaze is terrifying. She draws out the inner organs of great corpses and drinks them. Her hair is coiled in a topknot.

She is adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she drinks the lifeblood of the freshly flayed. A great host of small corpses she has strung together as ornaments for her body. In the midst of the great charnel ground's blazing fire, with great stretching and contracting of her limbs, upon a seat of jewel-strewn corpses she dwells in the posture of crushing the four māras. Holding the vajra bowl, she stirs and drinks great torrents of blood. In her hand she carries a small trident staff. With terrifying cries of laughter and the roar of great delight, she is twined together in a braid with the bound ones. Drawing out the ten fields, she correctly gives them strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The great mother of all buddhas, with attitudes, songs, mudrās, and mantra words, draws forth all the māras of wrong views. With the manner of one craving corpses, she gives them strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, O yoginī! Since your heart's pledge is just so, you rejoice greatly in the work of slaying.

Draw them in, draw them in. Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ. Bind them, bind them. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Gather them, gather them. Ha ha ha. Liberate them, liberate them. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The wrathful yoginī, her body dark blue-black, is the great mother who devours great corpses. She is Śmaśānā, the great passionate lady. Her wrathful eyes bulge wide, her fangs are bared, and she has a terrifying, hateful gaze. In the manner of one drawing out great corpses in play, she gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Her hair is coiled in a topknot of munja grass, and she is adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she drinks the lifeblood of the freshly flayed. A great host of small corpses she has strung together as ornaments for her body. In the midst of the great charnel ground's fiery circle, with great stretching and contracting of her limbs, upon a seat of great fields of crushed corpses she dwells in the posture of crushing the four māras. Holding the vajra bowl, she again stirs and drinks great torrents of blood. Flinging knives and beating a small drum, with terrifying cries of laughter and the roar of great delight, she is twined together in a braid with the bound ones. Drawing out the ten fields, she correctly gives them strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. From the great dark blue-black celestial palace, the great mother of all buddhas, with attitudes, songs, mudrās, and mantra words, draws forth all the māras of wrong views. With the manner of one craving corpses, she gives them strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play, emanate, O yoginī! Cut them down, cut them down, O yoginī! Gather them, purify them, O yoginī! Destroy them, destroy them, O yoginī! Since your heart's pledge is just so, you rejoice greatly in the work of slaying.

Draw them in, draw them in. Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ. Bind them, bind them. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Gather them, gather them. Ha ha ha. Liberate them, liberate them. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The wrathful yoginī, her body red-yellow, is the slayer, the great corpse-devouring lady. The playful yogic lady is Pukkasī. Her wrathful eyes bulge wide, a single fang bites into the earth, and she has three eyes and a terrifying, hateful gaze. In the manner of one drawing out great corpses in play, she gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Her hair is coiled in a topknot of munja grass, and she is adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. Her body is adorned with great flesh and blood. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, in the form of a body of wisdom, she drinks the lifeblood of fearless union. A great host of small corpses she has strung together as ornaments for her body. The five, beginning with amṛta, are set upon the tips of the thumbs of her demonic hands, and her body is adorned with them at the tongue, the pathway, and the sense faculties.

A-ho! Delighted, she coils around. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and contracting, upon the seat of the great field of corpses, she is seated in the manner of crushing the four māras. She does not transgress the command, and she fulfills the heart-commitment. Because even the gods would perish if they transgressed, she smashes the brains of many great gods and savors them with relish, and she drinks the body of merit itself with relish. Holding the vessel, the vajra skull-cup, she stirs and drinks the great blood. With a sharp copper knife she cuts the limbs; she beats a small drum and hurls the khaṭvāṅga. She is the yoginī who eats flesh and blood. With a terrifying cry and a great roar of delight, she binds the foe-effigy into a twisted thread, draws forth the ten fields, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

From the great red and black celestial palace, the great mother of the buddha-body, with gestures of song, mudrās, and mantra words, draws in all the māras of wrong view with the hungering manner of one craving the corpse, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

Play! Emanate! Yoginī! Devour! Enjoy! Yoginī! Bind! Purify! Yoginī! Devour, devour! Yoginī! Apart from the blazing blood-drinker, she leaves not one alive. Since she is thus bound by her heart-commitment, she delights greatly in the work of slaying. Draw in, draw in! Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ! Bind, bind! Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ! Gather, gather! Ha ha ha! Liberate, liberate! Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ! Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

Oṃ hūṃ tathāgata supa ugo ba, krodha kili, samaya yoginī, mahāmaṇḍala, arghaṃ pratīccha, kāla kṣṣṇa pita lohita jāla sukhena yāmi, yoga kāya, sarva buddha la, mahāheruka, samaya yoga ru lu yottama jvalani, hana dha haru pe paja, sarva siddhi karuṇika, mahā sukhena, bathara sukhena, samaya yoga jāla asu ā, bhoga yogi siddhi, alala ho!

The Mukhā, slayer with the head of a lion, tawny-black, with the striding posture of a hunter, crosses her palms together, and gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Wrathful, frowning, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, three-eyed, with a fearsome, hateful gaze, she is made the mistress of a great host of fangs, the devourer who destroys aversion. Adorned with great blood, with three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, her dark blue-black lion's mane streaming, she is fully adorned with a host of fresh skulls. In the form of a body of wisdom, she drinks the lifeblood of fearless union. A great host of small corpses she has strung together as ornaments for her body.

From the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and contracting, she is seated upon the seat of the great field of corpses. She does not transgress the command, and she fulfills the heart-commitment. She draws forth the hearts of many living beings and savors even the body of merit with relish. With the vessel of blood she gives strength in the mouth. The vajra smashes the brains; she beats the small drum. The Mukhā devours the great field, with a terrifying cry and a great roar of delight. She binds the foe-effigy into a twisted thread, draws forth the great obstructors, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The ḍākinī of the great blood-drinker, with gestures of song, mudrās, and mantra words, draws in the great obstructors who create hindrances, with the hungry manner of one craving the corpse, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The Mukhā, slayer with the head of a tigress, red-black, with the striding posture of a hunter, joins her two hands in a gesture holding amṛta, and is wreathed in a radiance of utmost delight. Wrathful, frowning, with glaring eyes and bared fangs,

With three eyes, terrible and glaring in hatred, she makes a great host of fangs her retinue. She is the devourer who crushes pride, her body adorned with Mahārakta, great blood. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she is splendidly adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. In the manner of her wisdom body, she is fearless, taking her stance on the ground of union. With the bearing of a leopard's mouth, her body is adorned with garlands of fresh skulls. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and bending, she is seated upon the seat of the great field of corpses.

She never transgresses the command, fulfilling the heart-commitment. She draws out the hearts of many living beings, and the merit of their bodies she drinks with relish. Into the mouth of the one who drinks Bhandha and blood, she gives strength. She draws in enemies, bashing their brains, with the iron hook. She beats the little drum and devours great portions. With a terrifying clamor of the palate, and with the ejection of great delight, she is bound together with the leopard and the coiled lock of hair. Having drawn in the great obstructors, as is proper, she gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The ḍākinī of the great blood-drinker, with gestures of song, mudrās, and mantra words, draws in the great obstructors who cut off the way, with the hungry manner of one craving the corpse, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The Mukhā, slayer with the head of a thief of the charnel ground, with the striding posture of a hunter, blue-black, devours the small portions and gives strength to the chief. Wrathful, frowning, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, with three eyes, terrible and glaring in hatred, she makes a great host of fangs her retinue. She is the devourer who crushes desire, her body adorned with great ash and blood. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she is splendidly adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. In the manner of her wisdom body, she is fearless, taking her stance on the ground of union. With the bearing of a leopard's mouth, she is adorned with many garlands of fresh skulls. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and bending, she is seated upon the seat of the great field of corpses.

She never transgresses the command, fulfilling the heart-commitment. She draws out the hearts of great living beings, and the merit of their bodies she drinks with relish. Cutting off heads with a razor, she beats the drum, hurling the khaṭvāṅga and drinking Bhandha. She is the Mukhā who delights in killing, the ḍākinī who binds with the noose. With a terrifying clamor of the palate, and with the ejection of great delight, she is bound together with the leopard and the coiled lock of hair. With gestures of song, mudrās, and mantra words, she draws in the great obstructors who create hindrances, with the hungry manner of one craving the corpse, and, as is proper, gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not act thus is himself destroyed.

The Mukhā, slayer with the head of a dog, dark blue-black, with the striding posture of a hunter, draws out the heart and lungs and gives strength to the chief. Wrathful, frowning, with glaring eyes and bared fangs, with three eyes, terrible and glaring in hatred, she makes a great host of fangs her retinue. She is the devourer who crushes jealousy, her body adorned with great ash and blood. With three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, she is splendidly adorned with a multitude of fresh skulls. In the manner of her wisdom body, she is fearless, taking her stance on the ground of union. A multitude of many small drums strung together she makes the ornament of her body. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and bending, she is seated upon the seat of the great field of corpses.

She never transgresses the command, fulfilling the heart-commitment. She draws out the hearts of many living beings, and the merit of their bodies she drinks with relish. She gives strength in the mouth through Bhandha and blood. Hurling the khaṭvāṅga and beating the little drum, she is the Mukhā who devours the great field. With a terrifying clamor of the palate, and with the ejection of great delight, she is bound together with the leopard and the coiled lock of hair. Having drawn in the great obstructors, as is proper, she gives strength in the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The ḍākinī of the great blood-drinker,

With songs of gesture, with mudrā and mantra words, the great obstructors who create hindrances are drawn forth, as is proper, in the manner of one greedy for corpses, and are given as strength into the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not do so is utterly destroyed.

She is the Mukhā who slays, vulture-headed, red and black, with the stance of the wild bird of prey. She gives strength into the mouth that draws forth the great field, fierce and furrow-browed, eyes bulging, jaws gaping wide, a great tree. Her three eyes are frightful, her gaze full of hatred. She has made a multitude of wings her ornament. She is the devourer who gathers delusion. Her body is adorned with great ashes and blood. She stands with three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, richly adorned with a host of fresh skulls. The mode of her wisdom body is to receive the offering of the fearless union. Many small tiras she has strung together and made the ornaments of her body. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and contracting, she sits upon the seat of the corpse of the great field. She does not transgress the command, but fulfills the heart-commitment. She draws out the hearts of many living beings, and the merit of their bodies she drinks with relish. Drinking Bhandha, she beats the little drum, and with a small bronze knife she strikes at the small field. She is the Mukhā who devours the great field. With a terrifying clamor of the palate, and with the ejection of great delight, she is bound together with the leopard and the coiled lock of hair. Having drawn in the great obstructors, as is proper, she gives strength into the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The great blood-drinking ḍākinī, with songs of gesture, with mudrā and mantra words, draws forth the great obstructors who create hindrances, as is proper, in the manner of one greedy for corpses, and gives them as strength into the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not do so is utterly destroyed.

She is the Mukhā who slays, long-headed with a rough, shaggy head, yellow and black, with the stance of the wild bird of prey. She gives strength with her hand to the chief of the great field, fierce and furrow-browed, jaws gaping wide. Her three eyes are frightful, her gaze full of hatred. She has made a multitude of wings her ornament. She is the devourer of those who transgress the command. Her body is adorned with Mahārakta, great blood. She stands with three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, richly adorned with a host of fresh skulls. The mode of her wisdom body is to receive the offering of the fearless union. Many small tīras she has strung together and made the ornaments of her body. In the midst of the fire-circle of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and contracting, she sits upon the seat of the corpse of the great field. She does not transgress the command, but fulfills the heart-commitment. She draws out the hearts of many living beings, and the merit of their bodies she drinks with relish. She gives strength into the mouth with Bhandha and blood. With a staff she smashes skulls and beats the little drum. She is the Mukhā who devours the great field. With a terrifying clamor of the palate, and with the ejection of great delight, she is bound together with the leopard and the coiled lock of hair. Having drawn in the great obstructors, as is proper, she gives strength into the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

The ḍākinī of the great blood-drinker, with songs of gesture, with mudrā and mantra words, draws forth the great obstructors who create hindrances, in the manner of one greedy for corpses, as is proper, and gives them as strength into the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever does not do so is utterly destroyed.

She is the Mukhā who slays, raven-headed, dark blue-black, with the stance of the wild bird of prey. She cuts with the vajra, smashing skulls, and with the razor. She gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood. Fierce and furrow-browed, eyes bulging, jaws gaping wide, her gaze is terrifying and full of hatred. She has made a multitude of wings her ornament. She is the devourer who nourishes and consumes the ten fields. Her body is adorned with Mahārakta, great blood. She stands with three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, fully adorned with a host of fresh skulls. The mode of her wisdom body is to receive the offering of the fearless union. Many small tīras she has strung together and made the ornaments of her body.

In the midst of the great charnel-ground fire, with great stretching and contracting postures, she is seated upon a throne of the crushed great field. She does not transgress the command; she fulfils the heart-pledge. She draws out the hearts of many living beings, and she partakes of the body of merit with a smacking of the lips. Hurling the khaṭvāṅga and beating the small drum, with fearsome cries from the palate and with the cries of great delight, she gathers into her train the retinue of the wrathful ones. She draws in the great obstructors, as is proper, and offers them into the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

O dākinī of the great blood-drinker, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, take the great obstructors who create hindrances, with the manner of devouring that craves corpses; draw them forth fully, as is proper, and offer them into the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever has not done so, may that very one be destroyed.

The killer of Mukhā has the head of an owl. With the rising posture of yellow and black, her two hands give strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood. As she draws out the heart and lungs, fierce and furrow-browed, she bulges her eyes and gnashes her fangs, her gaze terrifying and full of hatred. She has made a multitude of wings her ornament. She is the dākinī who devours flesh and blood. Her body is adorned with Mahārakta, great blood. She stands with three heads, six arms, and four legs spread wide, fully adorned with a host of fresh skulls. The mode of her wisdom body is to receive the offering of the fearless union. Many small tīras she has strung together and made the ornaments of her body.

In the midst of the great fire of the great charnel ground, with great stretching and contracting postures, she is seated upon a throne of the crushed great field. She does not transgress the command; she fulfils the heart-pledge. She draws out the hearts of great living beings, and she partakes of the body of merit with a smacking of the lips. Drawing with the iron hook and sounding the small drum, with fearsome cries from the palate and with the cries of great delight, she gathers into her train the retinue of the wrathful ones. She draws in the great obstructors, as is proper, and offers them into the mouth of the great blood-drinker.

O dākinī of the great blood-drinker, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, take the great obstructors who create hindrances, with the manner of devouring that craves corpses; draw them forth fully, as is proper, and offer them into the mouth of the great blood-drinker. Whoever has not done so, may that very one be destroyed. Khāhi khāhi.

You messengers of the vajra command, fierce vajra serving-women, many in terrifying form, accomplish every kind of activity.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up as a red-yellow man-eating creature, one-headed and six-armed in form. She gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood. With the mouth of a great yak's head gaping, and with a roar, she does as commanded. She hurls the field-devouring iron hook and trident, slays with the razor, and draws forth the entrails with a noose. She has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting legs she tramples the great field. As the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up as a red-pale Brahmā-woman in passion, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood. With the mouth of a venomous serpent's head gaping, and with a roar, she does as commanded. She devours the great field with a five-pronged vajra, hurling the khaṭvāṅga, iron hook, and noose. She has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting postures she tramples the great field. She does as the yogins command. With dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up as a yellow-black wrathful woman in passion, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. With bell, staff, and the great trident she devours; she gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood.

With the face of the great snow leopard-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. She draws in with the iron hook and strikes with the razor. Fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a white and red Viṣṇu-woman, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood.

With the face of the bird-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the Tira, the great blood, the khaṭvāṅga, and the dice, fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a yellow-black youth, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, the one who draws forth the entrails of the great field.

With the face of the pig-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red Bhan, the khaṭvāṅga, and the whirling wheel, fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a red-yellow sovereign lady, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, the one who draws out the body of the great field.

With the face of the great brown bear-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red Bhan, the great staff, and the iron hook coiled, fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a red woman, the great plunderer, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, who draws forth the great field's contents, with the noose.

With the face of the great bear-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the bell, the iron hook, the red conch, and the staff, fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a blue-black woman of nectar, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, Bhandha, the great blood.

With the face of the sea-monster-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the khaṭvāṅga, the arrow shot from the bow, and the jewel-mother, fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a blue-grey peaceful woman, one-headed and six-armed in terrifying form. She gives strength to the chief, drawing out the lungs and heart.

With the face of the great-sin-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. In wrath she holds the bell, the five-pronged vajra, the red conch, and the precious vase. Fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a black woman, the Becon.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. The great sin-bearer, she drags out the lungs and heart and holds them in her power. With the face of the great speckled-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. She drinks the great blood from the conch and hurls the khaṭvāṅga. She casts the noose, the knife, and the cord, mistress of power. Fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a yellow-black woman.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. Her power rests on the great blood of the bhandha, the chief. With the face of the great fox-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. She drags along the great field and the stone of the rock-wall. In utmost fury she hurls the khaṭvāṅga. Fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a dark blue-black flesh-eater.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. The great sin-bearer, she drags out the heart and holds the chief in her power. With the face of the great tiger-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red conch, the ringing bell, the khaṭvāṅga, and the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a red blood-drinker.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds the obstacle-subduing iron hook, and her power rests in her mouth. With the face of the great vulture-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red conch, the field-staff, and the khaṭvāṅga hurled, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a red blood-drinker.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. Her power rests on the great blood of the bhandha, the chief. With the face of the great horse-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the five-pronged bell and staff she hurls the khaṭvāṅga. Mistress of power who devours the great field, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as one alone, white and red.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. Her power rests on the great blood of the bhandha, the chief. With the face of the great cat-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the vajra trident, bell, and staff, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, bring about whatever is desired.

She who heeds the command of the assembly of lords, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, rises up in passion as a red-black one who steals the mind.

One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. The lesser sin-bearer, she holds in her power the chief who devours the field. With the face of the great bear-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the khaṭvāṅga, the red conch, the iron hook, and the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, Accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a white-and-red accomplisher. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. The great field-devourer, she holds in her power the chief, the heart and lungs. With the face of a bear-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the lotus, the khaṭvāṅga, the red conch, and the red noose, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Keeper of the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a green-yellow nāga woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds in her power the chief, the great blood of the corpse-demon. With the face of a great-flesh-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. Striking with the pebble and the khaṭvāṅga, and hurling the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a red-black great slayer. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. The great field-devourer, she holds in her power the chief, the heart and liver. With the face of a mud-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the vajra, the sword, and the small striking hammer, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a green-red fire woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She draws out the entrails of the great field and holds in her power the chief with her mouth. With the face of a great-kite-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red conch, the khaṭvāṅga, the iron hook, and the bell, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a green-yellow sow. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds in her power the chief, the great blood of the corpse-demon. With the face of a great-boar-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the five-pointed field-devourer, the khaṭvāṅga, and the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a green-black noseless one. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds in her power the chief, with nectar and the red conch at her mouth. With the face of a great-drum-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. She holds the khaṭvāṅga, the chopper, the knife, and the noose, and has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

Listener to the command of the lordly assembly, with a terrifying, hateful gaze, she rises up in passion as a blue-grey water woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She draws out the heart and lungs of the great field and holds them in her power. With the face of a raven-headed one gaping wide, she carries out the command, together with her cry. With the red conch, the clanging bell, the khaṭvāṅga, and the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

She who heeds the command of the host of the Lords, with terrifying, wrathful eyes, rises up in passion as a red-grey old woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds power over the nectar and the red conch in her mouth. With the face of a great vulture-headed one gaping wide, together with her cry, she acts according to the command, drawing out the entrails with the staff, the bell, and the khaṭvāṅga. With fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

She who heeds the command of the host of the Lords, with terrifying, wrathful eyes, rises up in passion as a dark, black woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She devours the small fields and holds power over the chief. With the face of a cuckoo-headed one gaping wide, together with her cry, she acts according to the command. With the iron hook, the red conch, the khaṭvāṅga, and the knife, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

She who heeds the command of the host of the Lords, with terrifying, wrathful eyes, rises up in passion as a blue woman, a mountain-goat woman. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She casts the noose of the wandering rope over the great field and holds power. With the face of a great goat-headed one gaping wide, together with her cry, she acts according to the command. With the red conch, the khaṭvāṅga, the great bell, and the noose, she has made fresh skulls her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

She who heeds the command of the host of the Lords, with terrifying, wrathful eyes, rises up in passion as a red woman with a vase-like ear. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds power over the great blood of the corpse-vessel. With the face of a great monkey-headed one gaping wide, together with her cry, she acts according to the command. In the manner of hurling the khaṭvāṅga over the great field, she binds all with the iron chain and strikes with the copper knife. With fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

She who heeds the command of the host of the Lords, with terrifying, wrathful eyes, rises up in passion as a dark-green woman holding a belly. One-faced and six-armed, her form is terrifying. She holds power over the heart and lungs of the great field. With the face of a great bear-headed one gaping wide, together with her cry, she acts according to the command. She sounds the great bell, drinks from the red conch, hurls the khaṭvāṅga, and devours the small stones. With fresh skulls she has made her ornament and throne. With stretching and contracting steps she tramples the great field. According to the command of all the yogins, with dance-gestures, song, mudrās, and mantra words, accomplish whatever deed is wished.

You messengers, Vajra Lords, you whose forms can become anything, with your many terrifying forms, carry out all deeds as you have pledged.

This is the ninth chapter, the chapter on the subjugation of the māras by the cloud-like emanation of the wrathful ones of the Tathāgata.

Then the Blessed One, the glorious Vajra Heruka, the great blood-drinkers, spoke from the cloud of awakening mind: Oṃ mahācitta maṇḍala. Krodha ha ha ha. He he he. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Caturyoginī hriṃ hriṃ hriṃ. Triṃ triṃ triṃ. Mrīṃ mriṃ mriṃ. Kriṃ kriṃ kriṃ. Ha ha ha. By this utterance the inconceivable body of Vajra Heruka abided blazing with wrath.

Ratna Heruka enacted the wrath of generosity. The Heruka of attachment, with the body in the manner of empowerment, enacted an utterly fierce wrath. The Heruka of action, in the manner of leaving nothing at all undone, was the great, savage wrathful one.

And these were also the wrathful goddess Vajradhārāṇī; the wrathful goddess named Ratnadaṇḍā; and the wrathful goddess named Padmabhandhadhārīṇī.

Together with the wrathful goddess named Karmadaṇḍā, they entwined the glorious Heruka in the manner of stretching and contracting, and abided in the great equality, in the manner of non-duality.

In the next circle outward were the Great Yoginī Dkarmo (the White One); the Great Yoginī Uger (the Impelling One); the Slayer; the Devourer; the Yoginī; the Fierce One; the Yoginī Who Brings Accomplishment; the Vajra Family-Maker; and the Great Gatherer of Power. In fierce attire, within a circle of blood and skeletons, they abided with their two feet stretched and contracted, in the manner of method and wisdom.

In the next circle outward were the Great Vajra Ḍākinī of the subtle forms; the great lion-headed one, endowed with her stance; the great tiger-headed one, endowed with her stance; the great horse-headed one who intoxicates; the owl-headed one; the vulture-headed one, the great slayer in her stance; the long-beaked one, the great cutter; the crow-headed one, great in the stance of the impelling goddess; the one with the head of the loudly sounding one; the great Phavaṇ-headed one who accomplishes slaying through utter bewilderment; and the pig-headed goddess, the great embodiment of aversion who devours without letting go. Each of them abided, bearing her own implements and holding cruel weapons.

This is the tenth chapter, on the wheel of wisdom of transformation, from the Secret of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One was delighted by the absorption called Great Fierceness, the Gathering of Transformations, Dispelling Bewilderment. By uttering these mantras he caused a great trembling throughout everything.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Mahā Śrī Heruka sarva khatam. Duba ca mahā caṇḍa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ.

Oṃ mahā kāruṇikāya. Mahā Ratna Heruka sarva khatam dhu. Paca mahā caṇḍa trāṃ trāṃ trāṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Mahā Śrī Padma Heruka sarva khatam madhu. Hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Mahā Śrī Karma Heruka sarva khatam dhu. Paca mahā caṇḍa ha ha ha. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Hala hala hala hūṃ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Buddha Locanā Ḍākinī. Hana hana hana. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva kāruṇikāya. Vajra Locanā Mahā Ḍākinī. Dhaka dhaka hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Ratna Locanā Ḍākinī. Paca paca hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Mahā Padma Locanā Ḍākinī. Dhaha dhaha dhaha. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva mahā kāruṇikāya. Karma Locanā Mahā Ḍākinī. Chinda chinda hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Hrūṃ hrūṃ haṃ. Hrṃ hrṃ hrṃ. Ha ha ha. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ.

Oṃ rulu Gaurī. Oṃ rulu Caurī. Oṃ rulu Pramohā. Oṃ rulu Vetālī. Oṃ rulu Caṇḍālī. Oṃ rulu Ghasmarī. Oṃ rulu Śmaśānī. Bindha bindha. Ghuma ghuma ghuma. Hana hana hana. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ.

Oṃ Caurakara siddha he he. Oṃ Gaurakara Vyāghrī he he. Oṃ Cairakakara Śrgāla he he. Oṃ Śvānakara Gṛdhra he he. Oṃ Kāṅkakara Kāka phaṭ phaṭ. Oṃ Gatākara Pañcama he he phaṭ. Hastakara Ulūka he he he. Hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ.

Mahā Caturyoginī ha ha ha. He he he. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Phaṭ phaṭ.

Bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo. Bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo. Bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo. Bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo. Bhyo bhyo bhyo bhyo.

Rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu rulu.

Khāhi khāhi khāhi khāhi khāhi khāhi. Phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Samaya samaya. Yoga yoginī phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ.

By this utterance, everyone was utterly overcome, utterly terrified, utterly intoxicated, and utterly liberated.

Holding the offerings and making the request, they did not remain idle. This is the eleventh chapter, the chapter on mantras, from the Pleasing of the Secret of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, in a fierce manner of body, speech, and mind, uttered "Jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ, hūṃ hūṃ, hoḥ hoḥ." He performed the great application of the rites of subjugation. From the secret vajra treasury, into the fully opened lotus of the secret consort, he transformed the multitude of sentient beings into awakening mind. Descending from the sky, he caused them to be born as his sons, and having done so, he recovered his memory. The body of the buddha was inconceivable, a mass of flame beyond thought, with weapons and many heads and faces, and the one called Kyibuṅ was seen to be trembling and about to be killed. He said:

You wrathful ones of most terrifying form,
cast out from the place of supreme bliss,
your share is exceedingly small.

Now, what is to be done? Be quick about it.

"Together with the Lord, then, so be it," he said, and by these words the Blessed One knew that the marks of the beings had been wholly cleansed.

Then the Blessed One, with great delight, spoke with great intensity: "Be off, and go! Revere the Lord and take the pledge. You have no share in dwelling here. Stay on the ground of the outer maṇḍala." When he had commanded this, they were struck with terror and fell into dismay. They swore the oath of the vajra handmaidens and said:

Supreme being, god and lord, who is it?

We, your subjects, hear your command.

We shall dwell in the outer place.

Mothers, sisters, servants, and retinue,
by your terrifying body, deign to forgive us.

You know what you have done; deign to forgive us.

Deign to forgive us who have long had our share.

We who guard the world,
from today, having taken this pledge,
shall we not protect the retinues?
Shall we not accomplish every task as commanded?
Shall we not leave open the way for the holders of the vehicle?
If we fail to hold the maṇḍala where you dwell,
may we be terrified as now,
and may we die and go to hell.
So they said, and swore the oath.

Then the Great Blood-Drinker remained silent. Thereupon the Great Slayer, the Brahmanī, the Maiden, the Sovereign Lady, the Accomplished One, the Great Stirrer, the Vajra Great-Faced, the Great Woman Who Ruins, the Sow Slayer, the Fierce Maker, the Moist Maker, the Great Sow, the Great Black Woman with Matted Hair, the Great Vajra Holder, the Great Vajra Black Woman, the Great Vajra Crone, the Vajra Heart-Stealer, the Utterly One-Pointed Deep One, the Great Vajra Rākṣasī in Disguise, the Great Dark Blue One, the Great Dark Green One, the Great Becon, the Great Peaceful Vase-Nosed One, the Woman Accomplished in Action, the Obedient One, the one of Chamṇam Form, the Fierce Violent One, and the one who displays the manner of a madwoman, these and the other mothers, sisters, and daughters listened to the command with deep reverence. They listened to the command of the vajra handmaiden, and, having taken the pledge to the vajra handmaiden, they said:

Whatever actions you desire, we shall perform.
So they swore the oath, and, with terrifying forms, weapons, and their foundations of abiding, they took up their work, dwelling in the outer cloth, performing the rites of that place.

Now the accomplishment of their maṇḍala is explained.

The maṇḍala is square on the outside,
with a crescent and blood at the center.
A maṇḍala of Vāstu,
drawn with scented water and a heap of blood.
At the center, from Hrīḥ, a figure of eighteen arms.
Or else with three heads and six arms,
filling a great red skull-cup, a bhandha,
with eight, or twenty-nine, attendants.

Or else, for one possessing five,
bless with the syllable of the fifth.
For one with leftovers and a portion,
recite the mantra of Ucchuṣṭa.
Fill the skull-cup with red and drink,
and, calling by name, or by Bhyo, or by Rulu,
the one who has come before you directly,
scatter blood well from the mouth.
All the rites of the Heruka are thus accomplished.

Act just as in the rites that came before. Toward those playful young women, indulge desire with the passion of empowerment, and pierce with the ritual peg of the tamāla. Whatever rites are wished for are granted as accomplished.
Through the meditative absorption of equality, which is great in passion, in slaying, and in exuberance, the retinues of the Caurakara too are engaged in the four rites. When a yogī who bears the name alone urges them on, the rites are accomplished with single-pointed focus.

Then the Great Samantabhadrī knew that all phenomena abide as mere name, and she gathered together this great secret magical display.

Then the supreme yogīs, the beings, all of them supreme yogīs, declared:

All phenomena are mere name, and this is yoga.
Apart from mere name there is no yoga,
and no being who is a yogī at all.
That very thing is the nature of the three times;
that very thing is Samantabhadrī, the supreme.
In the tantras of the net of magical display,
among those vajra-mind consorts,
there is no definitive secret meaning whatsoever.

Thus she knew all phenomena as the Great Gathering. This is the twelfth chapter, the maṇḍala of the Great Gathering of the Heruka of all the Tathāgatas.

Aho!

Because the cause itself is empty, the result is directly manifest.
Because there is nothing to bless, it is accomplished through blessing.
Even the Buddha's deeds, the Victor said, are sentient beings.
To know that very thing as neither doing nor not doing is praised most highly among all.

Not abandoning attachment, but directly realizing attachment, is the intention;
so, like all the higher maṇḍalas, because there is nothing to be accomplished, it is accomplished through accomplishing; thus the Victor most clearly declared.

Because there is neither male nor female, delighting in the appearance of male and female, practicing with diligence, one accomplishes through victory;
so all who practice have declared.

One who realizes emptiness yet is careless in conduct is no yogī, the Victor said.

One who slanders what does not exist and confuses virtue and sin is a sinner;
this is most clear.

Because virtue and sin exist, one accomplishes through diligence; this arises in all the vehicles.

For one without conscientiousness, who abides without intrinsic nature, who does not honor the supreme, who has lost the source and is not diligent in the Dharma, it is directly and clearly evident that he is an ordinary sentient being.

Therefore, children, whoever among you eagerly listens to this supreme secret magical display,

first recognize one who has trained in diligence and is conscientious.

Without even a moment's distraction toward forms, respectful, this is the gathering of the secret.

Through faith in the supreme vajra master, one makes a great offering to all the buddhas without exception.

Skilled in the path, honor the vajra master.

When he had spoken thus, great eagerness arose in the yogīs and yoginīs, and they honored him with a great offering:

The first maṇḍala was perfect in its abundance.

The second was for the secret offering.

The third was for the stirring up of play.

From clouds of wrath the māras were subdued.

The magical display of a single meaning was declared.

The offering of the assembly brought great delight.

It was never present in the three times,

and was praised as skill in the path.

Listen well, together with those who possess diligence.

Translator's Notes

- This passage is dense and syntactically irregular, likely reflecting a rough or corrupt translation from Sanskrit. The long lists of figures are translated as literally as the grammar allows. Several names, such as "the one who brings under power," "Dispeller of Arrogance," and "Wheel of Speech," are rendered by meaning, since the underlying Sanskrit names are not reconstructible with certainty. The sense of "dhāraṇī of the great yoginī" in the third paragraph is uncertain. The mineral names Śakra, Vaiḍūrya, Padmarāga, and Asmagarbha are rendered by their conventional gem equivalents (sapphire, beryl, ruby, emerald), which is approximate. The sentence ending the passage is incomplete in the source, as the main verb has not yet appeared.

- This passage is extremely obscure, a tantric text with corrupt, cryptic verses on mudrās and syllables. The rendering is deliberately literal. The sequence "Om surata sukhe" is my reconstruction from the corrupt "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□". Readings such as "the thirteenth" and "yi" (the syllable) are uncertain. The opening sentence is a continuation of the preceding description of the palace and maṇḍala, and the first chapter's title closes that section before the second chapter begins.

- This is a densely coded tantric passage (apparently from a Cakrasaṃvara-type or related Yoginī tantra), written in deliberate "twilight language." The wording is uncertain and the passage needs a commentary. The following are the main doubts. The line about "the sounds of the vowels and consonants" renders □□□□□□□□□□, which is the Sanskrit vowels (āli) and consonants (kāli). The names Chagpamo, Attvomaḷi, and Mahāsukha are rendered tentatively. "Tsekdrak" renders □□□□□□□□, probably a fierce seed-syllable form. "Conch-shell kīla" is a literal reading of □□□□□□□□□□□□. Some figures and numbers, such as the ages of sixteen and twenty and the fifteen cubits, are given as in the Tibetan. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, so the final line is left open. The sexual symbolism here is ritual and yogic, and it should be understood within the tradition's own contemplative framework.

- This is an obscure tantric passage, likely from a Mahāyoga or related text, and its sexual-yogic imagery is ritual and symbolic. Several lines are difficult: "the thick, the empowering, and the five" is rendered literally, and the nineteen-year-old "stalk" imagery and the "four-sided square" arrangement are literal as well. The names of the four courtyard figures are partly rendered by meaning (Hearer, Illuminator, Great Speaker), and the "Destroyer of Aversion" is a likely deity name. A few lines, such as "the five sovereign spaces" and "accompanied by the manner of going," may be technical terms whose lineage gloss could differ.

- The passage is textually corrupt in places (for example "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□", "□□□□□□", "□□□□", the "corner" line, and "the three-pronged one"), and the seed-syllable mantras show variant spellings; I rendered these conservatively. "Samantabhadra the yogi" translates Kun tu bzang po rnal 'byor, a name of the Great Secret One in this tantra. "Ali" and "Kali" are the vowel and consonant series. The last line breaks off mid-sentence, as in the source passage.

- The dance-gesture verses are terse and the hand-positions are partly obscure, so some lines, notably the "small drum" (□□□□□□□□, ḍamaru) and "cudgel" (□□□□□□) images, are rendered literally. The mantra syllables are transliterated from the Tibetan as given, including apparent corruptions that I have left unemended. The closing samaya verses are very compressed. In "the cutting of the sūtras is forceful" the reading of □□□□□□□□ is uncertain, and the sense of "the world that is higher still" is likewise doubtful.

- This is from a tantra with probable verse corruptions in the received text. "Rakta" is left untranslated as a ritual substance. "Rāgan" (□□□□□□) is a metal, likely brass or bronze, and its identification is uncertain. "Ten kinds of wanderers" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is rendered literally. The phrase about "knowing equality" and the line about the lowest practitioners and yearly repetition are somewhat compressed and follow the most natural reading. "Sang" (མང་) is a unit of weight.

- This passage belongs to a tantric text on the four families and their consorts, and the first part continues the preceding verses on women. A few lines are obscure and my rendering is tentative: "the Great God of the mold" is not at issue, but "poured from a mold" for the first consort's figure and the phrase "the sixteen" (age or span) follow the plain sense of the Tibetan. The line "cut through to the root with the seed-syllable of habitual tendency" renders a difficult phrase literally. "Brahmā's melody" and "a single dawn of Brahmā" are literal; the latter is probably a very short span of time. The family names (Karma, Vajra, Jewel) are inferred from context, since the Tibetan names only some of them directly. The lines on low-caste women and on beings of all kinds are to be understood in the tantric context of skillful means and taming, as the text itself frames them.

- The passage is corrupt in places, and the verses are especially obscure. Several lines are rendered as the text stands, including "the supreme abides in the lineage," "gathers in with jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ," and "filled their palms with precious substance in the form of a face." The speaker in the opening verses is probably the vajra body, speech, and mind. The mantra is given as transliterated, and its Sanskrit is uncertain.

- The mantra at the opening is rendered as a plausible reconstruction; the Tibetan transliteration is corrupt. Several lines in the empowerment verses (the list of empowerments, "cymbals," "victory banner," "bearers of measure") are obscure, probably corrupted in transmission, and are rendered literally. The phrase "Victor of Victors" and the closing lines of the final paragraph, especially "spider-like weaver, a copper-patterned one," are uncertain and rendered tentatively.

- This passage is from a tantra on the subjugation of Rudra-type figures, and the Tibetan is in places corrupt or opaque. The list of consorts is uncertain: Cakra, Devī, and the names rendered Guardian of the Realm (Dhṛtarāṣṭra), Vaiśravaṇa, and "Virūpākṣa's kin" are best-guess identifications from the Tibetan epithets. The enumeration of the tamed ("bind, cut, cook, gnash their teeth") and the epithets "the great antidote" and "the one with the face of copper" are rendered tentatively; they appear to refer to hell-guardian forms. The mantras are transliterated as given. The phrase "he gathered them together" and the final weapons list (including "small stone" and "threatening finger") follow the Tibetan literally.

- The Sanskrit mantras are given in the reconstructed forms implied by the Tibetan transliteration and are not translated. The line "Ha ha ha sa ni dgyes par mdzad" is rendered in sense; the verse is compressed and some images, such as "destroying merit and body by stamping" and "slaying the ten fields," are rendered literally and are doctrinally elliptical. The line "my peaceful foot" (zhabs nga zhi) follows the received text; the reading is possibly corrupt. In the opening, "bhandha" is retained as the skull-cup, as the Tibetan transliteration has it.

- This is a wrathful Heruka-type liturgy and several lines are corrupt or opaque. The word རྒྱུ་ is rendered "field" in the sense of a field of beings to be liberated, following the "ten fields" of the preceding rendering, but this is uncertain, and the phrase "seat that crushes the great fields" is tentative. Likewise "trident that pierces the mountain of sin" reads རྒྱུ་གཙུག་གི་སྒྲིལ་པ་ as a verb-like image; the sense is approximate. The lines on Mahāsukha, where the Tibetan has "su kha" and "su ba," follow the clearer parallel line. The terms "heart-commitment" (སྙིང་ཁྲུང་) and "skull-bowl" (མུ་ལྗེ་, rendered from context) are approximate. The mantra syllables are transliterated without translation.

- This is a wrathful tantric text of the Heruka type. The verses are partly corrupt or variant, with repeated passages. I rendered རྒྱུ་གཙུག་གི་སྒྲིལ་པ་ as "wrathful gaze" on the sense of glaring or scowling. "Bhandha" for མུ་ལྗེ་ is a transliteration, perhaps a skull-bowl or vessel, and uncertain. Mahāsukha is retained as in the preceding passage. "The ten fields" likely refers to the ten directions or realms of beings to be liberated, but the reading is uncertain. "Mansion" renders བཤོ་བྱིན་པ་ (Skt. vimāna). The mantra syllables are left untranslated. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as in the source.

- This is a wrathful tantric passage with some obscure or corrupt phrases. The mantra syllables are left in transliteration. "Bhaṃbhara," "bhanda," and "kalagila" are retained as unclear technical or transliterated terms. "Ten fields" (zhing bcu) refers to the ten directions or ten realms of those to be liberated, and "slaying" here is understood in the tantric sense of liberating. The phrase about the body of merit and the expulsion is obscure in the Tibetan, and the rendering is tentative. "Krodheśvarī" is the reconstructed Sanskrit of the Tibetan transliteration, and "Mahāsukha" is retained from the Tibetan transliteration.

- The text contains a mantra and syllabic passages in corrupt Sanskrit transcribed in Tibetan; I have given an approximate romanization, not a reliable translation. Several lines are obscure or textually doubtful: "the great skillful means" (thabs chen po) as something she devours; "the little vajra pellet-drum" (rdo rje rde'u chung); "stone staff" in the preceding passage versus "pellet-drum" here; "cittas" (tsitta, apparently a class of beings or a corrupt reading); and "sta na mchog" and "kalagila," rendered tentatively as the supreme embrace and a place or state of play. The "dark maroon cast-off hide" and "Bhandha Rakta" are likewise uncertain. The repeated opening lines recur nearly verbatim at the end, which I have preserved.

- This passage repeats a section already rendered in the preceding text, so some lines echo it. Several lines in the Tibetan are corrupt or obscure: "the dance of passion" and "great means," "bhandha-rakta" (probably a name or epithet of the chief Blood-Drinker), "supreme gesture of the breast," and "playful palate" are tentative. The Sanskrit mantra is rendered as transliterated, with its readings left as in the source, which appears to be corrupt. The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source and is left unfinished here.

- This is a Heruka-tantra invocation of Krodheśvarī with partly corrupt Tibetan; several phrases (the passage on the wings, the "tchamngam" and "Rgya Tsigma" terms, and "Liberate even what was not so done") are obscure, and I rendered them cautiously or transliterated. The mantra is given in a reconstructed, approximate form. The opening line repeats the final line of the preceding passage's closing sense in the Tibetan, and I have kept it as the passage begins.

- The passage is a wrathful ritual praise of a blood-drinking yoginī. Several lines are corrupt or obscure in this text. Among them are "great means devoured," "Mahāmāṃsa," "the glory-fountain of the great skin" (gyang gzhi), "stira" (small spirit-beings, name uncertain), "vajra bhandhara," and "twisted skein of entrails." I rendered these cautiously and literally. The "great blood-drinker" and the "blazing Great Glory" appear to be the principal heruka figure, and I kept them as titles. Mantra syllables are transliterated and left untranslated.

- The passage is a highly condensed ritual text with partly corrupt and repetitive transmission (two verse stanzas recur nearly verbatim), and I have retained the repetitions rather than harmonizing them. Several terms are obscure and rendered provisionally: "lion-cord and twisted thread" (se gol snol ma) is uncertain. The "ten fields" probably means the ten directions. "Cauldron" (zhi la du) is a conjectural reading of a doubtful phrase. "Pramoha" is the reconstructed name for pra mo ha, which may refer to delusion (moha). The proper name in the preceding passage, Tsaūrī, is not repeated here, since this passage names her only as the red-black wrathful yoginī.

- The passage is the repeated visualization of three wrathful yoginīs, each named by a Sanskrit-derived name: Betālī (blue-black), Ghasmarī (green-black), and Caṇḍālī (yellow-black). The Tibetan text is somewhat corrupt and the three stanzas differ slightly, so a few lines are uncertain. The phrase rendered "ten fields" (zhing bcu) refers to the ten directions or fields, and its exact sense is not fully clear. The word rendered "small dice" (rde'u chung) is obscure and may denote a small implement of the rite, not a die. The line "whoever acts thus is himself destroyed" in the first stanza reads literally as written in the Tibetan, which differs from the

"does not act thus" of the continuity passage; this is probably a scribal variant. The passage breaks off mid-description at its close, as the source does.

- This passage is a wrathful tantric visualization text, and its imagery is dense and in places obscure. Several terms are uncertain and were rendered cautiously: "freshly flayed" (the Tibetan reads "fresh skin" and is translated as the object of drinking life-blood); "twined together in a braid with the bound ones" renders a difficult phrase about binding subjects to the deity's braid; "great fields of crushed corpses" and "the ten fields" are literal renderings of obscure terms. The final sentence, concerning the five beginning with amṛta placed at the tongue, pathway, and sense faculties, is obscure and may refer to the five nectars or the five meats. The names Śmaśānā and Pukkasī follow the Tibetan transliterations. I rendered "Caṇḍālī" and the dark blue-black yoginī consistently with the prior passage. Throughout I took the Tibetan verb བཟུངས as "drinks." The refrain's "mouth of the great blood-drinker" refers to Heruka or his consort in the mandala.

- This is a wrathful ritual text with a heavily corrupt or archaic orthography. Several lines are uncertain, notably རྒྱུ་གཤམ་ཆེན་པོ་ (rendered "great field of corpses"), རྒྱུ་གཤམ་ཆེན་པོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་ (rendered "foe-effigy bound into a twisted thread," following the common ritual sense of se'u-gol/se-gol as an effigy), and the line རྒྱུ་གཤམ་ཆེན་པོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་ (rendered "savors the body of merit with relish"). The mantra is corrupt and has been given in plain transliteration without translation. Mukhā is left untranslated as a class of wrathful animal-headed beings. The first passage continues directly from the preceding English, which began mid-sentence. The final line breaks off mid-sentence in the source; it is rendered as it stands.

- This passage is a highly formulaic wrathful ritual text with repeated stanzas, and several terms are obscure. I left Mahārakta, Bhandha, and khaṭvāṅga untranslated as ritual substances or implements. The phrases "leopard's mouth" and "the leopard and the coiled lock of hair" (ལྷ་མོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་, ལྷ་མོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་) are uncertain; they may denote a hairstyle or posture rather than an animal, and the readings are tentative. "The merit of their bodies" (ལྷ་མོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་) is rendered literally and is of unclear sense. "Ground of union" (ལྷ་མོ་ལ་བཟུངས་པའི་ལྷ་མོ་) is also tentative. The passage ends mid-sentence, matching the Tibetan, which continues in the following passage.

- This is a wrathful ritual text in a corrupt or phonetically irregular transmission, and several lines are obscure. The terms "Mukhā," "Bhandha," "tira," "khaṭvāṅga," and the "leopard and coiled lock of hair" (se gol snol ma) are left close to the original; their exact sense is uncertain. The phrase "great field" (zhing chen) probably refers to a ritual or charnel field, or to a victim of the rite, and is rendered literally. In the source the third stanza breaks off in the middle of the ornaments passage, so the translation ends there.

- This is a ritual text of wrathful dākinī invocation, with obscure and probably corrupt passages. Bhandha (bhan dha) and Mahārakta are kept as given. The phrase about "the field" (zhing chen) refers to the field of those to be liberated, and "tiras" (sti ra) is of unclear meaning, kept as in the preceding passage. "Mukhā" is a transliterated name or term of uncertain referent. The line translated "partakes of the body of merit with a smacking of the lips" is obscure in the Tibetan. The phrase "Brahmā-woman" (tshangs ma) is a literal rendering of an unclear epithet. The repeated verses are rendered consistently with each other.

- This is a ritual text with obscure animal names and transliterated terms. Several headings are rendered tentatively: gzig chen as snow leopard, bya bang as bird, pha wang as pig, dred chen as great brown bear, dom chen as great bear, chu srin as sea monster, and sdig chen literally as "great sin." The terms "Tira" (sti ra), "Bhan" (bhan dmar), "Bhandha" (bhan dhas), "Becon" (be con), and "jewel-mother" (rin chen yum) are left as given because they are unclear transliterations or technical terms. The word khyab 'jug is rendered as Viṣṇu in the sense of "pervader," and dbang mo as "sovereign lady." The gloss "great field" renders zhing chen, presumably a ritual domain trampled by the dancing deity. The previous passage's "Bhandha, the great blood" is kept for consistency.

- This is a tantric passage of wrathful female attendants (the sets of animal-headed ones, in the manner of the Heruka maṇḍala retinue), and its refrain repeats with only colors and animal heads changing. Several terms are obscure and rendered tentatively: སྐྱུ་མཚན་པོ་ (rendered "great sin-bearer," a guess; it might instead be a transliterated name), བྱུ་མཚན་པོ་ (bhandha, left transliterated), མཁའ་འབྲུག་ (khaṭvāṅga), and the line about "the stone of the rock-wall," which is corrupt or unclear in the Tibetan. The animal-head identifications (speckled, fox, tiger, vulture, horse, cat, bear) follow the Tibetan words སྐྱུ་, བྱུ་, སྐྱུ་, བྱུ་, སྐྱུ་, བྱུ་, and སྐྱུ་, though སྐྱུ་མཚན་པོ་ may mean "great speckled" or "great hawk." In the second stanza, the color "yellow-black" for སྐྱུ་མཚན་པོ་ is literal, and the earlier "black woman" in the continuity passage is the same figure in the preceding pair. The passage breaks off mid-refrain, as the final line is incomplete.

- This is a ritual hymn of wrathful female attendants of the lordly assembly, with a repeating verse pattern. Several terms are obscure or rendered tentatively: bhan dha (the "corpse-demon" blood), spang ti (rendered as "mud-headed" by analogy with a likely variant), rde'u (pebble), rngeu chung (small hammer), shing za (rendered "field-devourer" in the five-pointed implement), and snga chad (noseless). The Tibetan "མཁའ་འབྲུག་" (great field) is rendered literally; it may refer to a ritual victim or target body and has an unclear technical sense. Some lines are probably corrupt, and the identification of each animal-headed form is therefore approximate.

- Several lines are obscure and my renderings are tentative. "Great field" (zhing chen) is probably a technical term for the body or ground of the rite. The phrases "corpse-vessel" for bhan dha, "wandering rope," "vase-like ear," and "holding a belly" for the epithets of the goddesses are uncertain. The animal-headed identifications (vulture, cuckoo, goat, monkey, bear) rest on rare words and are provisional. Throughout, "the Lords" renders dbang phyug, which may refer to the Īśvarīs, the goddess hosts. The opening verse was rendered above as "the Great God"; here I kept the plural sense of the host. The final names of the wrathful goddesses are Sanskrit reconstructions and may be incomplete, since the passage ends mid-list.

- Several names in the wrathful retinue are partly obscure and may reflect Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit names. The renderings "Karmadaṇḍā," "Dkarmo," "Urger," and "Phavaṅ-headed" are provisional. I rendered the epithets by their Tibetan meaning where it was clear and otherwise kept sound-values; the Tibetan "Dkarmo" is the White One, and the impelling goddess is a translation of the Tibetan name. The mantra syllables follow the Tibetan transliteration, and some spellings, such as "Duba ca," "Paca," and "Cairakakara," are uncertain reconstructions that may be corrupt. The final verbs are rendered as a series of four effects; "liberated" translates the Tibetan "bsgral ba," which in this tantric context carries the sense of being liberated or delivered.

- Several names in the long list of wrathful goddesses are transliterations or obscure Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit names (for example "Kyibuṅ," "Becon," and "Chamṅam Form"), and I have kept them as they appear since their Sanskrit originals are uncertain. In the verse on the maṇḍala, "bhandha" and the references to "five" and "the syllable of the fifth" are obscure and rendered conservatively. The verse beginning "Together with the Lord, then" is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan, and the rendering is tentative.

- The passage opens with the end of chapter eleven and continues into chapter twelve. The phrase "Caurakara" is left untranslated as a proper name or group designation; its exact referent is uncertain. "Bearing the name alone" renders the yogī who holds only the nominal designation. The final lines are cut off mid-sentence in the source, so the last line is rendered as it stands.

Colophon

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.