In the language of India: Sarva Tathāgata Buddhōtra Punar Guhya Vanośi Aśvadda, Mahātantra nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Great Tantra called "The Unsurpassed Secret Intent of All the Tathāgatas, the Play of the Supreme Horse."

Homage to glorious Vajrasattva.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One, Vajra of Great Bliss, the source of all the buddhas of the ten directions and the three times, whose body, speech, mind, qualities, and activities are the vajra secret, surpassing all others, adorned with the full perfection of the major and minor marks, dwelt in a maṇḍala of ornamental array, piled up like Mount Meru, a source of precious qualities, whose very nature shines in manifold forms. He makes clear every profound and vast aspect, brings all phenomena to their utmost completion through the assembly of wisdoms, and is the very self whose activity is vastly and universally displayed.

He is glorious Bliss-Maker, Lotus Lord of Dance, who has attained the absorption of great passion and, through the unobstructed nature of reality, bestows empowerment upon all. This very place, where all the deities gather, had become a celestial palace. In Akaniṣṭha, the abode of the Vajra Mountain, a splendid mansion blazed with the radiance of manifold precious wisdom. Pleasing forms of many kinds, fragrances of many kinds, delicious tastes of many kinds, soft and gentle touches of many kinds, and many kinds of the bliss that arises from the Dharma, all objects of desire, radiated into the ten directions. The palace, densely arrayed, with lofty and spacious pinnacles, stood with four doors and their gatehouses distinctly formed.

At that time there were present the great Sugatas of the play: Universal Illumination, Glory of Light, Lord of Joy, Display of Miracles, All-Seeing, Immovable Vajra, Manifest Radiance, Lord of Stability, Thunder-Voice, Immaculate, Heap of Jewels, Treasury of Space, Jewel Net, Jewel Name, Jewel Crest, Radiant Light, Amitāyus, Lord of Dharma, Unattached Light, Joyful Eye, Accomplisher of All Aims, Powerful Diligence, Great Deed of Miracle, Subduer of Yakṣas, and Lord of Variety.

Moreover there were bodhisattvas, great beings: Blissful Intelligence, Ocean-Voice, Splendid Array, Sharp Wheel, Radiant Knowledge, Vajra Banner, Radiating Light, Fierce Power, Immaculate Being, Magical Emanation, Jewel King, Net-Holder, Excellent Hand, Radiating Golden Light, Jewel Sheaf, Dharma Height, Immaculate One, Dispeller of Darkness, Joyful Melody, Jewel Youth, Vajra Subduer, Dancer, Ocean of Delight, Unobstructed Array, Lotus of Joy, Lord of Rice-Seedlings, Jewel Heap, Garland of Clouds, Lovely Flower, Lamp of Wisdom, Pile of Eloquence, Transformer of the Wheel, Lord of Mindfulness, Lotus Intelligence, Power of Activity, and Essence of Intelligence. All of these dwelt in the manner of being accompanied by their own assemblies of consorts.

Moreover, Radiating Lotus, Lotus Holder, Lotus Resounder, Lotus Mover, Lotus Satisfier, Lotus Scatterer, Lotus Illuminator, and Lotus Empowerer were also arrayed, each by his own activity. Moreover there were the Great Terrifier, Lord of Loving-Kindness, Lord of Tenderness, Lord of Lotus Liberation, Lord of Liberation, and Lord of Generosity, and Lords of Conduct, Lords of Speech, and Lords of Harmony were likewise seated, each with his own consort of awareness. Together with these, and with an assembly of the retinue, there dwelt twelve hundred thousand buddhas and bodhisattvas, who appeared both as distinguished and as undistinguished.

Then the Blessed One entered the meditative absorption called Lotus-Attached Eye, the king of absorptions. From the Śrīvatsa mark upon his heart, and from the other places of his body, he sent forth a hundred thousand maṇḍalas of radiant light. These illuminated all the world-systems of the ten directions, and eighteen great and wondrous signs appeared.

Then the vessel of the world and its contents blazed forth in clear radiance. The Blessed One roused the commitments of the buddhas and bodhisattvas of the ten directions, and they in turn, through the great seal called Arrayed Miraculous Display, caused the gathering to unfold within the courtyards of his wheel. This purified the buddha-fields, and the retinue, together with its own retinue, gathered once more into the place where the light rays radiated. As he sat there, delighting in the vast and wondrous play of such a teaching, and smiling, doubt arose in the entire assembly.

At that time they spoke together in harmony:

Kyema! Ho! Wondrous Dharma of many kinds!
How great are the wonders of the Victor's deeds!
What indeed is the purpose
Of such immeasurable miraculous displays?
Without cause or condition, the buddhas
Do not set forth the commitments of the three secrets.
These signs, too, have appeared;
Pray, urge the Lord of Secrets to speak.
You are the son of all the Victors,
A holder of the ocean of their intent.
Master of the Word, consider this;
Entreat him well, and make your request.

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, with his five hundred companions, rose from his seat before the Blessed One, in order to cut off the doubts of the others and to make his own gateway clear. He arranged vast clouds of offerings from the ten directions and made offerings to all the Victors. He circumambulated one hundred and eight times, bowed with single-pointed devotion, and with a joyful countenance made this request:

E ma! The very body of the Victor,
The maṇḍalas of miraculous display,
Arise from the abode of absorption and wisdom.
The joyous maṇḍala gathers together,
And with a great rain-cloud of awakening mind
Purifies the afflictions and the rest.

Through the wisdom of great compassion
You bring the fruit of the accumulations to perfect ripening.
With radiant body and joyful face,
Pray, teach the secret vehicle.
Your intent is hard to fathom,
Being profound, subtle, and vast.
The assembly is weighed down by the mountain of doubt;
You who possess great compassion, make it clear.
All of this is the vessel of the teaching.
Protector, you who are spontaneously established in equanimity,
This undertaking at this time is of great meaning;
Bring the fruit of aspiration to its completion.

When he had made this request, the Blessed One, the Vajra Holder himself, regarded through the gateway of single-pointed equanimity of mind all the maṇḍalas, both stable and moving, of the great thousand of the three thousand. He looked, and looked upon all. Having thus considered, he said: "Let all these maṇḍalas, which are beyond speech and thought, be expressed in many ways." Then, beholding the very thing itself in its real state, he rested in the meditative absorption of equanimity toward the limit of seeing, the limit of intention, and the limit of activity. He did not set forth, through arrangement, ordered arrangement, exposition, intention, thorough intention, play, great play, activity, or manifold activity,

These objects of the great thousand of the three thousand, gathered together in the aspect of the six worlds, he did not consider to appear as anything other than this maṇḍala of the buddhas. Nor did he look upon the time, the place, the distinctions of place, or the arrangements of the maṇḍalas. He did not look upon them all, yet he did not obstruct his intention either. They do not abide even at the limit, and he rested like space. Then, the moment he entered that meditative absorption, those maṇḍalas of the retinue also came to be realized as being, like space, the nature of the maṇḍala of all phenomena.

Then again the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, urged him on through wonder, and stirred the minds of others toward their benefit, arousing him with a song:

Great king of the meaning of the way, since you are the very continuum of all guides,
since you are the very continuum like space,

from the maṇḍala that is like space reveal the wonder of great compassion.
Alas, protector, in whom all aims abide,
you who engage in the sacred work of peace,
the path of the bodhisattvas' compassion, free of moisture, for those who are dry and parched, may the Dharma rain down.

Though he was petitioned in this way, he remained silent and said nothing at all.

Then once more the consort named Radiant Lotus urged him on with a song that rouses one from the absorption free of concept:

Non-apprehending absorption, beyond thought, free of expression, great bliss, wisdom, the awakening mind:
by the unfailing pledge of non-apprehending compassion,
please reveal the vast display of your play.

After he had been urged on in this way, the protector considered the places of the protectors. He smiled, arranging rays of light, and the retinue, Good Giver, opened the occasion:

Excellent, excellent, holder of the vajra, together with your companion who holds the lotus!
Since you urge me again and again,
to grant and to teach,
with a joyful and gentle gaze,
bring to peace whatever realization you desire.
All the realizations of the future are grasped by the force of compassion.
By the light that pervades all meanings, open the occasion for what is to be grasped.

Thus he spoke.

This is the first chapter, the chapter of manifestation, from the great tantra, the Play of the Supreme Horse, the unsurpassed secret intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then, with joy, the retinue assembled, and made their joyful faces bloom.
Just as the chief had declared,

they held the maṇḍala arising from compassion.
Then the lotus-bearer with radiant sight, her smile blossoming, urged him on,
and with embraces, giving of milk, and the like,
all became joyful and passionate.

Ah, you, king of knowledge, great compassion like the light of the sun, hold the maṇḍala that arises from compassion.
Opening the way without partiality, you comprehend all that becomes an object.
From the space of non-apprehending wonder, arrangements like oceans and masses of clouds:
with the great rain of compassionate emanation, purify the manifold eight activities.

Then the chief, the Vajra Holder, rose from his meditative absorption.
Adorned with his own consort,
a king, overpowering and majestic, he turned the wheel of his hands, and looked into all directions.
In the pure expanse of non-apprehending space,
a vajra emanation body appeared, and together with the great radiant Lotus he sat in the manner of play.
With smiling eyes and faces full of desire,
he spoke the mantra that rouses the retinue.

Oṃ āḥ hūṃ mahā bhasmi śakuru vina hṛdaya aṃ bhava hi ala la ho.

With the non-dual awakening mind, join and gather the maṇḍala.
The complete body of the accumulations of merit and wisdom performs the play of the vajra dance.
The supreme joy, the vajra awakening mind, rests in the smiling, coiling abode of the lotus.
Its nature is pure, brilliant white;
in the red, there is empowerment and non-duality, radiant and pervasive, issuing forth everywhere.

From the emanated maṇḍala there issued forth limitless manifestations. Pacification, cessation, nirvāṇa, the protector of awakening, the abiding, the path: all such names he joined in non-duality, and he arranged them in the abode of his own maṇḍala.

Wondrous emanations played forth in full. With majesty he danced. He smiled and he played; he rose up on every side, and his lovely eyes gazed forth. He moved his long brows and transformed them; with the vajra dagger he stirred and roused them. He cast away, he gathered in, he set down, he sprang up. By dances of every manner of play he emanated the manifold activities of the families, and made them pervade the whole of space.

From within the bliss that arises in this play, the awakening mind and all else become peaceful and clear. When the very rain of play came down visibly, in the ten directions of the six worlds, all that is stable and all that moves, without remainder, the buddha-fields were purified. Then the gathering of awakening minds, in the play of striking, embracing, and restraining, joined, dissolved, and delighted; and the drop of wisdom, supremely joyful on every side, shone as the light of the sun in manifold appearances. Let it abide in true bliss.

This was the great gathering of assembled ones. From all the ten directions they received it, and with a ceaseless stream they made offerings of pure bodhisattvas blessed by means and wisdom. They sounded drums and cymbals in sweet sound; there were the pleasures of play that satisfy the senses, and dance, song, and the six kinds of music in every variety, filling the three thousand worlds with their voice. Thus the Blessed One, the Lotus, bliss and yet greater bliss, was honored together with his radiant consort.

Eḥ ma! From the midst of the assembled gathering, he of great compassion, like the orb of the sun, the Turner of all wheels, brought liberation, and so expanded his own maṇḍala. Through the supplication of Vajradhara, spontaneous perfection was complete in the maṇḍalas.

"Glorious Lotus, great being, purifier of all abodes of wisdom and activity: your feet arise through the power of compassion. You are the supreme wisdom of suchness, purifying the three realms without remainder. Protector, your kindness is excellent."

Thus he was entreated, and was pleased. He rested in the state of the great seal (mahāmudrā).

Then the joyful awakening mind, together with the bodhisattvas emanated from the former tantra and the four paths, and the companions of the path of the former tantra, took thought, and with the wisdom-mind of compassion, abiding in their nature, understood all. From the four directions they urged him on.

"Kyai kyai! Embodiment of the Three Jewels in bliss, you who hold the mind of loving-kindness and make the body radiant; Vajra King, awakening mind, you who think of me and accomplish the great aim of beings.

Kyai kyai! Gathering of jewel-like qualities, great wisdom of compassion and equality, King, Wheel, awakening itself, treasury of emanated manifold maṇḍalas.

Kyai kyai! Perfectly pure body, source from which an ocean of joy arises, discriminating the manifold individual wisdoms, suchness of all phenomena.

Kyai kyai! Great self of the aim of beings, who does not abandon equanimity yet casts away the manifold, supreme samādhi of accomplished action, showing the pure maṇḍalas of the ten directions."

By the joyful contracting, he moved; in the four directions he entered the joyful abode of awakening.

"Alas, beings! Suchness itself, through the magical display of the awakening mind, is blocked in its own limit and path by afflictions, the duality of grasped and grasper, and obscurations. These are fit to be places of compassion. By many means of luminous wisdom, liberate them all at once, and show your own great bliss, the supreme meaning."

Thus spoke the Lotus Vidyādhara, and the buddhas with their sons were delighted.

This is the second chapter, the chapter on the play of emanated compassion, from the Glorious Supreme Horse Play Tantra, the secret and unsurpassed intent of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the chief of the bodhisattvas, Vajradhara, rose from his seat, and began to speak in praise of the Sugata.

Bowing low, he made his request in melodious song:

Kyema ho! Three Jewels, body of the sacred pledge,
Lord of unsurpassed wisdom,
Very mandala of the awakening mind,
Now is the time of the play of emanated compassion.
Boundless are the bodies of the wheel of the families.
Today all auspiciousness is perfectly gathered.
If great compassion were cast aside and abandoned,
Why then would the supreme Great Vehicle be taught as mantra?
Having heard these words of rightful request,
Look upon the mandala of compassion.

The Protector, the very body of the Lotus,
Plays with his radiant consort,
Beholds the directions with stainless wisdom,
And the mandala of nondual awakening mind shines forth.
This path, from which the great secret vehicle arises,
Is the glorious supreme play.
He gathers the buddhas with their sons,
Shakes the assemblies of the abodes of the other emanations,
Moves through these three thousand worlds,
And enters into meditative absorption.
From his body he sends forth rays of light.
Pervaded by them, the mandala of the families shines clear.
The bodies of the heroes, in the radiance of wisdom light,
He sets in the five places with secret mantra.
The Great Seal, the perfectly complete body,
Has three faces and six arms, in a radiance of delight,
Bright red, with the glow of lotus-ruby.
His right and left faces are blue and yellow.
He is adorned with all the ornaments and marks of the family.
In his hands he holds a lotus, a bouquet, a vase,
A five-pointed vajra, a śrīvatsa,
And, with the last two, an arrow and a bow.
He wears garments of many kinds of jewels,
And plays together with his consort, the Seal.

The celestial palace has four gates,
With a many-jeweled gateway and entablature,
Lattices, half-lattices, strings of pearls,

Banners, and bells, and other adornments.
In the central mandala, the greatly exalted Palace, its pillars and beams,
Are adorned with lotuses, vajras, and so forth,
A perfect gathering of desirable qualities.
In all the abodes are jeweled thrones,
Marked with lotus, wheel, sun, and moon.
Outside, the surrounding courtyard,
And in all the vessels, upon the lotus,
Distinguished as method and wisdom,
Sun and moon stand alone.

Then all the pure lotuses
Are seated upon the central throne,
And by the power of the stirring of the song and dance of joy
They bring method and wisdom to completion.
At that time the supreme mind, awakening mind,
Being utterly purified like the expanse of the sky,
The body of awareness and great bliss
Arises in manifold and varied forms.
His speech itself is a gathering of wheels of letters,
Blazing with rays of five-pointed light.
In due sequence, the limbs of the ritual,
The signs of the mind, the sacred pledges are performed,
Together with mantra, in the manner of emanating and gathering.
The king, the Sugata with his consort,
The bodhisattvas and the mind-born goddesses,
And the wrathful ones who perform activity, with their consorts, Having become the body of the Great Seal,
Are beautified by the signs of the garland of the Victors of the families.
Dwelling in their own mandalas,
They sit in the ranks of the vajra secret.

At that time the Protector of great bliss, Called Lord of All Families, Brings forth the great mandala
Of the emanation of lotuses.
From the bodhisattva's Kam, emanated,

The Sugata, body of radiant light,
With the ornaments of face, hands, and so forth,
Exactly in the form of the chief deity,
Is joined with his consort in his own light.
To the auspicious, the possessor of marks, in bliss,
By saying "Rāga Padma Hūṃ,"
The supreme mantra of eight syllables
Brings about the accomplishment of all activities.
If to any lotus one adds
"Śāri" and "Buddha Hūṃ,"
Then pacifying, enriching, empowering, wrathful, and all activities,
And the assemblies of the eight great accomplishments,
Come to be accomplished by mere application,
And long remain.
At the time of emanating, to the secret mantra
One attaches the letter Jaḥ,
And joins the mandala of the families of emanation.
The lord of the family dwells joyfully in his abode.
Rouse him with songs and mantras that stir compassion,
And with the gathering of light rays.
Through the power of the mantra that reveals the three samayas,
Joy and attachment grow firm, and radiance is possessed.
Om: the pure lotus, the realm of bliss,
The supreme one made clear through the blessing of wisdom.
The maṇḍala, the three secrets, the great samaya,
The equality, the lord of the family, the great sage.
Because the blessing is never abandoned,
The body, speech, and mind of all the buddhas,
The body that illumines and is without duality, Abides in its own essential nature.
Rouse the chief figure with the mantra,
And gather the light rays with their ornaments into the heart.
From the letter Ā up to Aḥ,
The sixteen letters send forth rays of light.
Thereby all beings are arrayed as the body of a buddha,
And all the maṇḍalas of the corresponding families become radiant.

The light rays of the mantra, together with its sound,
Establish the sixteen phenomena, the pure realm,
Each in its own place,
And the thirty-two supreme major marks are completed.

In the same way, from Ka up to Kṣa,
The thirty-four become clear in their proper order,
Together with the six letters of the reflected image.
All the rays that radiate are the body of a buddha.
Having made the maṇḍala of wisdom clear,
Together with the light and sound of the mantra,
The many phenomena, the undefiled wisdom,
Again enter the abode of the body,
And the eighty excellent minor marks are completed.
Moreover, it is adorned with all things,
The seven precious possessions, the eight auspicious signs, and the rest.

From Khaṃ arises the great and boundless emanation,
One-faced, four-armed, with a radiance of white and red.
He holds a lotus and other things, and a sword, Accomplished by the ornament of the radiance of the Dharma.
He is Padmālaṅkāra, of the middling type, supreme in his nature,
And he abides in the eastern maṇḍala.

From Gaṃ arises the emanation, the Sovereign of the Dharma, Red-yellow, one-faced, two-armed,
Holding a lotus rosary and a vase.
He abides in his place in the maṇḍala.

One-faced, four-armed, with a greenish-yellow glow,
Holding a moon, a jewel, and a staff.

He abides in the northern maṇḍala.

Those Sugatas, the Victors too,
Together with all the universal monarchs (cakravartins),
Adorned with the major and minor marks and many ornaments,
Are to be made beautiful as noble consorts of the lineage.

Again, the emanation, the Sovereign of Loving-kindness,
One-faced, four-armed, the color of a snow mountain,
Holds a raised vajra, a staff, and a sword,
A trident, a skull-cup, and a lotus branch.
Majestic, with his retinue, embraced by his consort,
With wrathful ornaments, at the eastern gate.

From Khaṃ arises the emanation, the Sovereign of Play,
One-faced, four-armed, golden in color,
Holding a jeweled staff, a lotus,
A skull-drum, and a vajra sprout.

One-faced, two-armed, with a reddish-pale glow,
Holding a garland of suns, and striking a gong, Completing the wheel of the Dharma.

From Tha arises the Magical Display,
One-faced, four-armed, holding a banner,
A lion, an ocean, a jeweled garland,
And a jeweled vase together with its nectar.

The King of Jewels of Action,
One-faced, four-armed, with the glow of ruby red,
Holds a mountain, a lotus, fragrant water,
And a pond where golden fish leap about.

From Dha arises the One with the Net,
One-faced, four-armed, the color of fresh green,
Holding a net, a bell that radiates light,
And a vessel from which a stream of honey drips.

From Ta arises the One of Emanated Fine Hands,
One-faced, four-armed, with a light like crystal,
Holding a lotus banner of white and red glow,
A vessel of perfume, in the manner of a kuśa grass.

From Tha arises the One Who Holds Golden Radiance,
One-faced, four-armed, the color of dark blue,
Holding a beautiful book in bodily form,
A treasury of jewels, and the light of the moon.

From Ḍa arises the Jeweled Bud,
One-faced, four-armed, with the glow of a padmarāga ruby,
Holding a lotus stem, a wish-fulfilling tree,
And a trident in the form of a crescent moon.

From Dha arises the One Who Sees the Dharma,
One-faced, four-armed, in a variety of bodily forms,
Holding armor, a lamp of wisdom,
A śrīvatsa with eight corners, and a jewel pinnacle,
Together with a variety of masses of cloud and hail,
And holding a fang, a bell, and a swan.

From Bha arises the Youth of Jewels,
One-faced, four-armed, green-yellow in color,
Holding a net, a garland of wheels,
A three-pointed ray of light, and a mantra vase.

These great beings
Abide with ornaments, garlands, attire, and rays of light, Embracing their consorts, each in their own place,
Attending upon the principal deity in the manner of an embrace.

From Nyam and Na arises the One of Miraculous Display,
The Vajra That Utterly Subdues, and the others,
According to the signs of their respective families,
Lotus-ruby in glow, red in radiance,
Golden-colored, like Indra,
With lotus, vajra, and rosary as their emblems.
One-faced, four-armed, each embracing a consort,
With lower hands holding fitting emblems,
Various distinctive signs of their own,
Adorned with flowers and fruits
Marked by lotus stems.

In the four directions beginning with the east,
In the guise of bodhisattvas,
They are seated in the places of their own maṇḍalas.

From Ya, Va, and Ra arise the four beginning with Lotus Radiance,
One-faced, two-armed, white, yellow,
Red, and green, holding a lotus, a mirror,
A jeweled garland, and a lute.
They perform the offerings, and stand in the inner intermediate directions.

From Śa, Śa, Sa, and Ha arise the four beginning with Lotus Delight,
One-faced, two-armed, of the form of two families,
Holding incense, flowers, a conch, and perfume.
Standing, with the manner of a trident and of action,
They abide as offerings in the outer intermediate directions.

Now their secret mantras.

Oṃ dhehi rāga padma śiri buta hūṃ hūṃ svāhā.
Oṃ padma mahādhavara buna sita mahādhama hṛdaya hūṃ hūṃ. Brad tañ yaja svāhā.
This belongs to the central maṇḍala.

Oṃ cakra alokana māraksha saṃbhara dana hṛti baya bati ja svāhā.
This belongs to the western maṇḍala.

Oṃ vajra dhara bakṛta yani śaṃ rati baśaṃ ni ja svāhā.
This belongs to the eastern maṇḍala.

Oṃ ratna kuti dumanta bhanda bhanda duna duna bi ja svāhā.
This belongs to the southern maṇḍala.

Oṃ piśaci nadhama ma duru ha ha ha ha sarba gurba ni hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.
This belongs to the northern maṇḍala.

Oṃ mama avalokana ru ru yu ru si debhyo de satva mama hūṃ ja svāhā.
This belongs to the bodhisattvas of the families.

Oṃ vilokanā ma sita na ma kuru kuru bodhisatva bhara buna ja hūṃ ja svāhā.
This belongs to the awakening minds emanated from the families.

Oṃ bindha bindha sarva karma siddhe de pi kuru buta saṃbho ha hūṃ oṃ aṃ ja svāhā.
This belongs to the goddesses.

Oṃ apasmara krodha sni. Yakṣa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ vitaṃ paka phaṭ svāhā.
This belongs to the wrathful ones.

The king of secret mantras, the unbearable one, shakes the three thousand worlds from where he abides, through the emanated body. Make it clear as your own deity.

Then the Protector, the Holder of the Vajra, the sovereign of great bliss and dance, entered into equipoise in the absorption that makes the three maṇḍalas clear. He consecrated the maṇḍala and bestowed empowerment, and the lords of the families made it clear. When all places and all signs were utterly purified, the three aspects became appearance without duality.

Oṃ namaḥ sarva tathāgata kāya vāk citta mahā bodhihya sūtraṃ triśa śudhe sonākhyā hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ.

This is the mantra of the jewel crown.

Oṃ ratna sarva buta kuru ratna mama kuta. A a vīrya sadma mama ku abhiṣiṅca oṃ āḥ hūṃ svāhā.

Oṃ padma amoka samaya śrī ha ha ha chindha mani asmi śabi mama ya hūṃ hūṃ.

This is the making clear of the three mantras.

Oṃ biśa chindha mani abasaṃ bodama mama kuru sila lata sina bibuda papaṃ da hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ.

This is the mantra of emanating.

Oṃ matala ni biśa cakra kumata butana ma sila dutri si hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

This is the mantra that makes the maṇḍala clear.

Oṃ aṃ a a mindu śe mala śandun dhe tathāgate bhyod ti padma kuru āḥ hūṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra of the [offering] arrangement.

Oṃ padma mukhaṃ padma paba sabo ti di rayaṃ guru hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ haṃ haṃ darśa svāhā.

This is the mantra of the essence.

Oṃ namaḥ sūtraṃ bhoga gana gumale saṃsāra hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

This is the mantra of the supreme awareness.

Oṃ bagagabasaṃpo padma dha ahye hyi mahā kāruma da amadhuna ja ja.

This is the mantra of invitation.

Oṃ padmo saṃ gagasura tara ga samaye staṃ.

This is the mantra of the seat.

Oṃ amuka sinam sarva bhyo gagata pūca meda nada hūṃ tri svāhā.

This is the mantra of offering.

Oṃ padma biloku malasunaṃ tutaṃ svāhā basaṃ hi hi.

This is the mantra for gladdening.

Then the supreme Lord of Secrets explained the meaning, blessing the great secret mantras of the body, speech, and mind of the wondrous Vajra Secret.

The supreme wisdom of the Sugatas, and the supreme magical display of the maṇḍalas: this is the stainless awakening mind, the supreme essence of the maṇḍala, the great vajra place of secrecy. In the manner of the play of means and wisdom, from the awakening mind that is intrinsic nature, arises the spontaneously present great perfection, the sacred and supreme appearance of beings, the Dharma of stainless, naturally pure nature, the maṇḍala, the supreme abode, free of duality.

The aggregates, elements, and the rest are the utterly pure body. Wondrous! The truth body is nirvāṇa. Wondrous! All phenomena are the wisdom body. Wondrous! All phenomena are magical emanation.

The maṇḍala of the three secrets, possessing the vast manner of mantra, is most marvelous. By the varied activities of the five means, past and present connected meanings arise. Skillful in means, one completes the ten perfections; through the power of the purity of merit and wisdom, one attains the great meaning of the grounds and what lies beyond the grounds. This is the realm of the blessing of the Tathāgatas.

La la, body, speech, and mind: through the power of that very profundity, I pay homage to the abode of the three secrets. I pay homage to the marvelous Dharma. I pay homage to the emanation body. I pay homage to the awakening mind.

Thus it is spoken.

This is the third chapter, on the magical emanation of the maṇḍala, from the Tantra of the Play of the Supreme Horse, the Unsurpassed Secret of the Intent of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the assembled retinues of the gathering, in great joy and wonder,

Having been fully satisfied through the three tantras in their purity, they made their request in a song of delight.

Ema! How wondrous, how marvelous! The non-dual play, how marvelous! The stainless purity, how marvelous! The gathering in of radiating light, how marvelous! The massed clouds of awakening, how marvelous! The arising of buddhas, how marvelous! The arising of magical emanations, how marvelous! The arising of wrathful ones, how marvelous! The magic of blessing, how marvelous! The one who moistens what is dry, how marvelous! The one who makes the wind of cessation, how marvelous!

We, the assembled retinue gathered here, ask that you bless us as holders of the sacred bond. In due order, from the highest to the lowest, seat us in the ranks of the vajra secret.

Then the Blessed One, the Great Bliss, the vajra body of great passion, in order to fully train the retinues whose body, speech, and mind are non-dual, through the absorption known as the Vajra Adornment, made his own maṇḍala shine forth clearly.

At that moment the great awakening mind, its rays of light pervading everywhere, through the offering of great joy, made clear the signs of the abiding place. What is called the nonperception of discrimination, the place of cessation, and the like, these extremes of one's own conceptual thought, were consecrated with the jewel water of the stainless awakening mind. Having received the empowerment of their own wisdom, they became endowed with the ability to work for the benefit of beings. With minds that protect themselves, in the places where they engage in action, they seek this teaching of the buddhas, the awakening mind of great compassion. By the signs of the awakening mind, one should recognize the five places of gathering.

Oṃ guhya vajra samastvaṃ. A la la ho.

Through the gathering of the arising of the vajra, the great secret sacred bonds abide in the vajra secret action, just as the intent of the family. These are the great sacred bonds of the fortunate. Whoever transgresses them will be destroyed.

By the great meaning of the command of the word, the immeasurable retinues of the departed received the sacred bond and so took their places in the ranks.

Then the Lord of Secrets himself, the great one who had attained empowerment and who performs great deeds, honored the Blessed One with his crown in the manner of a yogin. He made offerings of the outer, inner, and secret kinds, and made his request in equal measure:

Never has the like of this occurred. You are wondrous, great sovereign of the buddhas! You engage in displaying marvelous manifest conduct. Though the sacred wheel of the word lies utterly beyond the reach of speech and thought, relying on appearances that point it out through example, may you indicate it clearly through letters, names, and the like, and make it understood.

The Teacher, the sacred sovereign, understanding the meaning of that request, entered into equipoise in the absorption that is beyond speech and thought, and remained silent.

Then the assembled retinue bowed to the great lion of supreme power, paid homage, and made various wondrous offerings. They made their request: "Lion of supreme intelligence, open for us the occasion to ask." The Lord of Secrets, the lion of supreme power, understanding the meaning of that request, said: "Assembled retinue, listen. Ask me, and be bold."

Again, having made their request, all together they spoke with one voice: "Protector, treasury of all the Victors, supreme son of the buddhas, powerful lord among bodhisattvas, we have heard from you about the places where the Dharma is taught. That supreme and sacred Blessed One of secrets does not teach the paths of secret mantra, and out of his deliberate intent does not act through connection. Whatever the causes and conditions may be, we ask that you teach them to the assembled retinue. It is fitting that you make them clear and distinct."

Having spoken the very meaning of what was asked, he said: "The secret treasury of all the Victors, the very vajra of body, speech, and mind, makes manifold appearances shine forth. Those who hold the perfected secret mantra, that meaning which lies beyond explanation, the Victors do not declare in its intended sense."

Thus the Teacher, the supreme Victor, does not speak in the mode of mere explanation, and so the very heart of the real meaning is made clear at length in his word. Assembled retinue, listen! The heart of supreme awakening lies beyond speech and thought and cannot be expressed, so to put it into words is not fitting. Apart from the conceptuality of the two extremes, the appearance of words gives rise to doubt, and liberation itself comes to be a bondage. Of all the buddhas of the past, of those yet to come, and of those who now appear, the intended meaning was never spoken, is not spoken, and will not be spoken.

Then the bodhisattva, the very heart, whose awakening mind is free of elaboration, spoke within the sphere of conventional truth, using words of signs, so that yogins would not find the ultimate hard to realize. And the Victor taught a cycle of words, and the assembled retinue asked once more: "Supreme lion of power, if it is so, how shall I and the yogins of the future, following after the words, make clear in their meanings the spoken acts of secrecy? By what means will they be indicated? Hero, you are the Victor's son; you have the courage to request the receiving of empowerment. You asked the Blessed One, the supreme and holy sovereign, and you, supreme lion of power, as the retinue asked, did likewise."

He bowed to the Victor, the Vajra-holder, and from the offerings of wonder spoke these words in vajra speech: "Alas, great-hearted Teacher, in whom all the Victors of the ten directions are gathered, if you do not express in words the defining mark of awakening mind, then those of the future who rely on sound will not touch the meaning. Having made the signified indicated, we ask that you teach that very secret, which establishes the fitness of illustrating by example this heart, this meaning of awakening."

Then the Protector, the Vajra-holder, marked with the five wisdoms, formed the sign of the hand-gesture and displayed marvels and wonders. He also proclaimed a wondrous Dharma sound that turns all things into lotuses. Om āḥ hūṃ svāhā. Bodhicitta guhya samaya asa. Anubodhicitta ananta garbha. Mahāsattva prata āḥ hūṃ.

The moment this was spoken, all the buddhas of great renown trembled violently and fell into a swoon; what then need be said of all others?

The Blessed One spoke the true word: "I shall explain; sons of the lineage, listen. Where there is no duality of ultimate and conventional, the meaning of true reality is taught. That is the defining mark of the thing itself, the very measure of the great sky-goers. As long as, in the factors of the intellect, there are signs appearing as two, thought and expression are called the conventional; what lies beyond that is the ultimate. The three bodies, not two, the appearance-things unceasing, abide as the great teaching of the three times, the very meaning of the wish-fulfilling. The manner of all things like an illusion, all things empty of intrinsic nature, the wisdom of their union, that itself is the unsurpassed and supreme."

Having spoken thus, he uttered the sound "Alala." The supreme lion of power asked: "So it is, Blessed One. In what does the mind of the mantra deity abide?"

By those who abide in conduct, how are they to be connected with one another? Do they enter by stages of the mind?"

The Blessed One declared: "Lord of secrets, listen. The meaning taught by the buddhas, the perfectly pure defining mark, the time that has arrived, the thing and its defining mark, which lie beyond counting and the counted, are just so. If one enters the path of true, excellent conduct and practices the meaning of the mantra in its three aspects, then if connection accomplishes itself by force of circumstance, one holds the supreme truth endowed with both view and conduct, and abides well on the yogin's ground. Having accomplished the meaning that connects the two truths, the meaning of true permanence becomes clear. May the yogin attain the ground of conduct, the ground itself, endowed with unborn wisdom of means, the sphere of the sameness of all things, without division of the two truths."

The true and supreme meaning is the illusory body.

Conventional illusion is the speech of skillful means.

The mudrā is the very manner of illusion;

it is not nonexistent, yet it is without signs, because it possesses the two yogas.

Relying on the two yogas of the one who is still training, and growing familiar with the spontaneously accomplished ground, one abides in the two truths, made true.

Whether great or small, it is accomplished through power.

The yogin who merely follows after sound comes to abide in meaningless conduct.

When the true conventional truth is clear,

one abides in the nondual ultimate truth.

Turning back the battlefield of varied phenomena, the vidyādhara, the knowing man, becomes renowned.

Thus he was pleased.

This is the fourth chapter, the chapter teaching suchness, from the tantra "The Playful Display of the Supreme Horse, the Unsurpassed Secret of the Intention of All the Tathāgatas."

Then the supreme vidyādhara, the Lord of Secrets, asked again:

Blessed One, what is the meaning of the intention concerning the essence, the awakening mind?

How is the lamp of wisdom that purifies karma and the afflictions?

The awakening mind intended by the Victors, settled in equipoise like a vajra, makes luminous the nonconceptual wisdom.
Even the manifold is awakening mind;
there is nothing other than great bliss.
The collection of the three, body, speech, and mind, is the cause of all phenomena.
These three are just like a vajra, and the three bodies appear distinctly, as Vairocana.
There is no phenomenon that is a clearly established thing;
from the one come the manifold magical displays.
By taking mastery of the mudrā through means,
one is freed from the whole mass of bonds.
Free of all things,
the aggregates, elements, and sense sources are utterly secluded.
Because the realm of apprehended and apprehender, of conceptual thought, is left behind,
the very essence of the immeasurable arises from the meaning of the supreme three.
It is the nature of the great luminosity.
It is a meaning that is a wonder, a marvel,
the secret heart of all the Victors.
Birth and unborn, the manifold things, bind through the extreme of clinging to a side.
These are freed from phenomena.
It is the ocean of the samādhi of great truth,
a wondrous, astonishing Dharma with the nature of a clear mirror, the secret treasury of the Victors.
In phenomena that are unceasing, the awakening mind itself comes to arise.
It is the body of the Tathāgata, the sameness, a Dharma that has arisen as a marvel.
The appearing of the manifold is freed in its own place;
it is the awakening mind, peaceful by nature, freed from the extremes of the two.
The awakening mind, with abiding and without abiding, is the meaning that has arisen as a marvel and wonder.

In the expanse of vast and distinct clarity, the great awakening mind that realizes all arises from the objectless secret.

The manifold of what is objectified and what is not is the clarity of the wisdom of bliss, the unceasing nature of reality.

In the manner of accomplishing activity,
the unelaborated appears as manifold elaboration.
From the steadiness of the awakening mind, which acts free of expanding, withdrawing, desire, and elaboration, come unsurpassed wonder and miraculous power,
and an ocean of wisdom arises as a marvel.

One's own suchness becomes clear.

At what the Victor has taught as the purpose,
the retinue is filled with wonder.

Offering and giving voice with their own mouths, once their own suchness has become clear,
let them praise that very awakening mind.

Emaho! Emptiness, the awakening mind!

Emaho! Pure, without stain!

Ema! Unobscured, greatly luminous!

Emaho! The Dharma of sameness, without distinction!

Emaho! The mind that individually knows itself!

Emaho! Action and agent, spontaneously accomplished!

We prostrate and praise suchness.

The Blessed One himself is the awakening mind, the awakening mind itself is the supreme heart.

We, the assembly of vidyādhara, aspire to that very awakening mind;
entering and arising are nondual.

May we stir our own awakening mind, touch it and draw near to it,
if we wish to experience it.

Through great compassion, bestow your blessing in your wisdom.
Sugata, bestow your blessing.

When they had made this request in these very words, the Blessed One, the Essence, spoke thus:

The diverse, utterly pure essential nature,
all the gatherings of phenomena that radiate forth, are by nature beyond expression, free of concepts.

This is the self-secret, a meaning hard to realize.

The three realms of existence are, from the very beginning, the pure Dharma.
Through the fault of conceiving a self and being deluded, beings wander for a long time.

Through their own conceptual thought, they engage in the actions of things.
Though the mind in error may impute all this,
the intrinsic nature does not change at all.

To the buddha who is the meaning from the very beginning, beings, deluded, wander in the wheel of illusory pleasure and pain.

False conceptualization is without substance; it is the awakening mind.

Deluded thought does not abide; it is the supreme ornament.

The place of the ultimate itself is the realm of awakening; existent things are the buddha, the manifest complete body.

The grasping thought is clear as the essence of awakening.

All that is stable and moving, all things, are nothing other than the body of great bliss.

This is the fifth chapter, the chapter on suchness, from the great tantra "The Secret Beyond All, the Intention of All the Tathāgatas: The Play of the Glorious Supreme Horse."

The Blessed One, of all the Victors,
the meaning of the condensed essence of the maṇḍala;
then the Lord of Secrets asked about the meaning of the maṇḍala's full unfolding, that the Victor might explain the radiating characteristics and their realization, and he made the request.

The Blessed One, of all the Victors,
the meaning of the condensed essence of the maṇḍala,
the one endowed with the power to expand it widely,
the abode of the three secret vajras, fully unfolded, according to the characteristics, is the ritual.
Please show me its limbs.

Then the Protector, the Lord of Secrets, remained absorbed in the meditative absorption that moves into nondual wisdom, and taught the meaning of the vast emanation.

Arisen from emptiness and wisdom,
a mountain bearing the lineage, marked by its family, entering in the manner of the syllables of the vowels, possessing the illuminations of the seven horses' light and the rest, like a gathering of stars, from the sameness appears a form like a ball of light, in the manner of the five radiant light-rays, together with mudrās, signs, and mantras.
The self-aware, radiating forth, purify the buddha-fields.
Like those balls of light,
the chief is the body of Vajradhara.
Through emptiness and great compassion he illuminates all the tantras without remainder, and like the circle of the clear sky,
he performs the great compassion that protects from faults.

From the seed syllable of the secret, there arose the pervading, luminous appearance of space, and from it the many kinds, each individually,
the maṇḍalas of the four elements were arranged in order.
Generated from the seed that emanates everything,
the forms of diverse precious wisdoms:
in the east, garlands of necklaces, parasols, banners, and victory flags;
mirrors, assemblies of musical sounds, and palaces beyond measure;
wheels, jewels, vajras, and lotuses;
adorned with the beauty of the four gateways;
diverse sounds and melodies, gatherings of sun and moon, cakras, arcades, and garlands;
crowds of goddesses of the sublime sense pleasures;
resting on stacked thrones of blazing jewels, ornamented with sun, moon, lotus, and gems.
Pervading all places just as they are,
the maṇḍala is spontaneously accomplished.

A Ā, I Ī, U Ū, E Ai, O Au, Aṃ Aḥ, Ṛ Ṝ, Ḷ Ḹ.

Ka Kha Ga Gha Ṇa. Ca Cha Ja Jha Ña. Ṭa Ṭha Ḍa Ḍha Ṇa. Ta Tha Da Dha Na. Pa
Pha Ba Bha Ma. Ya Ra La Va. Śa Ṣa Sa Ha Kṣa.

The realm of suchness, a wonder,
is the clear mind of all the Sugatas,
the blessed, marvelous emanation body,
the abode of all the diverse maṇḍalas.

The great mind of all sentient beings is by nature pure, without stain.

The aggregates and phenomena are buddhas;
the five elements are the sky of the Mother, mistress of the expanse.

The constituents and sense sources are the bodhisattvas, the assemblies of the female bodhisattvas, and the wrathful goddesses.

The outer, the inner, and the three realms of existence, appearing as real things, are the maṇḍala, the great nature of the families.

The form aggregate is the great Vairocana.

Feeling is the body of Ratnasambhava.

Perception is the body of Amitābha.

Formations are Amoghasiddhi.

Consciousness is Vajrasattva.

All of these are the bodies of the five Sugatas.

The earth element is Buddhalocanā, the Buddha-Eye.

The water element is the goddess Māmakī.

The fire element is Pāṇḍaravāsīnī, the White-Robed.

The wind element is Samayatārā.

Space is the body of Samantabhadrī.

This is the pure maṇḍala of the elements.

All the domains of the sense faculties without exception are the bodies of the families of the Sugatas.

In the eye is Vairocana.

The ear is the great Ratnasambhava.

In the nose is Amitābha himself.

In the tongue is the body of Amoghasiddhi.

The body itself is Vajrasattva.

Thus the maṇḍala that appears abides as spontaneously present from the very beginning.

The yogin should know this secret meaning.

The six outer objects, known as meanings, take the shape of the mudrās of the five Great Mothers.
The realm of form is Buddhhalocanā.
The multitude of sounds is the goddess Māmakī.
The multitude of smells is the expanse of Pāṇḍaravāsīnī.
The six tastes are the goddess Tārā.
The multitude of touches is the body of the goddess Samantabhadrī.
The three times are joined in union, without meeting or parting.
Through the union of vajra and lotus,
make the maṇḍala of self-awareness clear.

All without exception, body, speech, and mind,
the qualities, the activities, are the ornaments of play.
I myself am the expanse without meeting or parting, the supreme play of skillful means and wisdom.
Even all the distinctions of the grounds are joined through the vajra Dharma.
By bringing qualities and activities to their culmination, one gains the supreme state in this very life.
The vajra, the three secrets, the great sacred commitment, is practiced by one's own power.
By constantly joining in equipoise,
one dwells in the abode of the great maṇḍala.
In the manner of stainless awakening mind, beings together with their assemblies are purified.
Constantly reciting the secret mantra, one makes the gate of the Vajra Protector clear and stable.
Constantly offering the torma,
one is freed from clinging to the constituents.
Constantly making offerings to the deities,
one offers and plays with one's own nectar.
Constantly praising the nondual, all liberation is like an echo.
The ten perfections at one time become realized as the Lotus rite.

With the exhaustion of defilements, the five bodies and all the lotus families are joined in equality.
One who abides in the lotus sacred commitment will have every abode appear as a clear maṇḍala.
Meditate on the lotus in its own place.
The protectors who engage in desire and all phenomena are clear when each abides in its own place.
From the stainless, pure drop come the appearances of the five rays of light.
Radiating out from one's own place, that very thing is the desire-form of the protector's body.
Since the lotus is everywhere without attachment, every abode becomes a clear maṇḍala.

Once the marks of the great Sage and the excellent features are complete, the source of all qualities without exception,
the supreme buddha who is utterly proud, arises.
Abiding in the vajra sacred commitment, meditate on the vajra in its own place.
In the place of mudrā, where radiating light gathers, the wisdom of equality accomplishes every aim.
The wrathful body, who destroys, is free of any object through manifold compassion.
One's own maṇḍala is free of stain,
the directly evident body of secret wisdom.
Abiding in the wheel sacred commitment, meditate on the wheel in its own place.

The jewel of all the Victors,
the host of twenty-five emanations and gatherings, purifies the gatherings of aggregates and constituents.
Activity and wisdom are unsurpassed.
The pure form of awakening abides,
the blessed body of the emanated maṇḍala.
Joining joyous means with wisdom, one abides as holder of the family of the great mudrā.
The yogin, endowed with faith, diligence, and absorption, acts without obstruction for a long time toward accomplishment.

When this was spoken, the assemblies of bodhisattvas in the retinue were delighted.

This is the sixth chapter, the chapter on meditative absorption, from the Glorious Supreme Horse Play Tantra, the unsurpassed secret that is the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi rose from his seat. With offerings of joy and with dance and gesture he pleased all the maṇḍalas. Having bowed to the Blessed One, he made this request:

Ah, chief of all the Victors, father who gives rise to the hosts of buddhas,
if you emanate the maṇḍala and thereby liberate this path of those to be trained, how are beings of the outer world to be taken in hand?

Those whose faculties are not yet ripened will not come to see the white phenomena.
Yet through your great compassion they appear to be seized and set upon the work.
Some beings of the future will see the maṇḍala in this way.
How are they to be disciplined so that the maṇḍala is made firm?

When he had made this request, the Blessed One declared: Child of good family, those beings of the future who wish to enter the path of the secret mantra vehicle should rely upon a vajra master and be led into the maṇḍala of painted images.

The vajra master, supreme in intellect, is endowed with faith, diligence, wisdom, and power.
Having come to know all phenomena that pertain to himself, he takes the bodhisattva vow, the protection.
Having set in place great compassion, joy, loving-kindness, and equanimity, the four of the awakening mind,
he cherishes all sentient beings as guests,
and in turn leads them onto the path of awakening.
Well established in the six perfections and in the four ways of gathering disciples, he seeks the path of the Great Vehicle.
With a mind that has no dismissiveness toward hearers and the rest, he seeks the meaning of the secret vehicle.

He has received empowerment in the maṇḍala and keeps his commitments.
He understands the meaning of the secret tantras, and having become practiced in the ten aspects of suchness, his own wisdom is fully liberated,
and he abides steadfast in the reality of things.
He is not shaken by non-Buddhists and the like,
nor does he waver toward the lesser vehicle and the rest.
With a mind always intent on taking beings in hand,
he strives in the work of the maṇḍala and so forth.
He is the guide who leads beings to the great city of nirvāṇa that does not abide.
The fierce and strenuous eight worldly concerns he regards with equanimity, without taking or rejecting.
Like a guide with eyes for a host of blind people, such a one should be taken as the chief of teachers.

The person who enters should be perfectly endowed, peaceful, gentle in speech,
pleasing to beings,
one-pointed, faithful, and diligent.
Such a one enters into all the qualities of intellect.
Having abandoned the company of the wicked, and with the pure path of the Great Vehicle in the manner of the deities and the teachers and the rest, he dwells apart from them.
He is the vessel for holding the Great Vehicle's secret, good in intellect and endowed with qualities.

The place should be a supreme ground, an utterly secluded spot, a mountain or forest, rich with fruit, flowers, and flowing streams, free of harmful crowds of people, a place where yogins and their companions are glad,
a supreme place where the owner of the land is without obstruction.
Having properly completed the preliminary approach, one performs the activities of drawing the maṇḍala and the rest.
Endowed with the seven excellences, one should protect and bless the lord of the ground and his companions, together with all the offering substances and implements.

With the vajra ground, the fence,
the tent, and the canopy,
the host of wrathful ones, with flames and weapons, protects, and one meditates on the wheel in sequence.
With a mind to liberate all sentient beings,
one purifies through the accumulation of merit.
Prostration, offering, confession of misdeeds, rejoicing in merit, requesting the buddhas not to pass into nirvāṇa, turning the wheel of Dharma, offering the body, generating the awakening mind,
and dedicating the roots of virtue gathered along the path:
one dedicates them fully and extensively,
and makes aspirations for the sake of sentient beings.
By their nature, which has no object of focus,
these are effortless, like space, beyond the three doors of liberation.

The great wisdom of suchness has the nature of space in everything, and even space itself has no defining mark.
The yogin, who is like space, sees all things clearly as equal.
From that state, a host of magical displays emanates the great maṇḍala.
Moving through the realms of the families,
one accomplishes all things through great yoga.

In a place that is stainless and pleasing, whether a village, a town, a forest hermitage,
a mountain cave, or a grove,
one should examine the features that delight the heart.
Where the site is good, with fruit-bearing trees, with tender shoots, riverbanks, and flowers,
a place of splendor and a source of excellent qualities, that place one should examine with deep reverence.

It should have the sign of space as a wheel-net and of the ground as a lotus-net, a foundation of many kinds of auspicious perfection, which is the mark of being free of obstacles.

On ground that is not crumbling or collapsed,
one that is high in the middle has great mudrā.
Land sloping toward the east and north brings the siddhi of the four activities.

Sloping toward the south and west brings worldly siddhi.

Sloping toward the west and north brings other deeds, those of fierce samādhi.

Where the east is high and the center low, one should avoid it.

Dig that ground to a depth of about knee height, and fill it back in again.

If it comes out in surplus, the supreme siddhi will come.

If it is exactly full, that is auspicious.

If it falls short, it is not good.

If bits of charcoal, bones, and the like appear, or if one fills the hole with water,
the master, holding the vajra and bell, should recite the mantra of the deity in equipoise, walk eight fierce paces toward the east,
then turn back and look.

If there is no diminishing, siddhi will come.

To the lords of the ground, seen and unseen, one should offer satisfaction, or buy the land by paying its price.

Having taken it, so that there will be no obstacles, one should drive away the other minor obstructers.

In the center of the obstacle-free ground, the wealthy lord of the family, wearing the Dharma robes and other adornments, should be seated well upon a lotus maṇḍala,
in the guise of a wheel-turning king.

He should purify with offerings and the like and consecrate, and with the mudrā that protects with the vajra, he should seal the maṇḍalas of the ten directions with their vidyās.
The earth goddesses and the protectors should be invited and pleased with offerings.
In particular, the lord of the ground and all the obstructers of the six destinies, without exception, should be summoned, and given offerings and gifts as repayment of debt.
One should scatter fragrant water over everything and purify with mantra and mudrā.
Whoever wishes for siddhi and the like, whether supreme, middling, or lesser,
for the sake of accomplishment should follow the rite of examining the site, and should also perform all the limbs and the empowerment seal.

Then, for the maṇḍala, which is equal on all sides, the ground should be dug to a measure of a cubit or so,
the faults of the earth removed,
and the clay, of good color and smooth,
mixed with fragrant water, consecrated with mantra and pressed firm.
For an accomplishment maṇḍala, a cubit's measure is praised.
For a broad one, six cubits is the measure.
For the gathering of the accumulation, the height of a cubit is praised.
The surrounding circle should be a cubit in measure.
For conferring empowerment, a measure of four finger-widths is praised.
It should be made four-sided and wide,
well formed, standing like a mirror.
With equal measure, ants and the like,
the five precious substances, the five medicines,
the five essences, and the five grains, consecrated with fragrant water and mantra,
one should place in the heart of the maṇḍala.
Focusing on the equality of all directions, purify with the mantra of emptiness.
Water consecrated with fragrant mantra should be sprinkled in a stream in the ten directions, and with various torma offerings give satisfaction, so that the assembly of deities and the guests are contented.

The master, who stands as chief of the family, having completed the ornaments and costume, should make the proper request to the excellent companion in practice, one endowed with intelligence.
In the center, residing in the heart...

Reciting the mantra that purifies the origin and the sky, one should meditate on the maṇḍala as a heaped-up mountain, arisen from the seed syllable of the elements.

Having bound the vajra and set it upon the ground, with the pure vajra of loving-kindness, the vajra maṇḍala together with the awakened mind, adorned from beginning to end with mindfulness of the hand-emblems, there arise the vajra ground and the perimeter wall, the tent and the rest, and wrathful ones blazing with flame. The chief, in the body of the Lord of Dance, together with the lotus, claps his palms three times.

Light streams forth and shakes all places. Then a goddess of golden color, beautiful with ornaments, holding a garland of flowers and a vase, rises from the earth to half her body. If she is agreeable, she remains in the manner of one who heeds the command. One offers her praise, worship, water for the face, and the like, with fragrance. Until the rites are completed, she is to remain firmly seated, unchanging, and one speaks the words that charge her, as well as the maras and others.

Goddess, may you be my witness, by the manner of conduct and the distinguishing qualities of all the buddhas, the protectors, and by the grounds and the perfections. Just as all the Victors have vanquished the hosts of māras, so too have I begun the maṇḍala that triumphs even over māra.

Then, to the master adorned with all his ornaments, holding the vajra and the bell, who is raised up for the purpose, songs urging the sacred pledge are sung from the four directions.

First, the clear Dharma mirror, by which the Victors became protectors of beings. The secret of the Sugatas, the supreme pledge of the three vajra secrets; the way of stainless wisdom, which separates away all obscurations without remainder; the vajra lotus, the space of equality, lord of the sixty great maṇḍalas, treasury of the Great Vehicle's wheel of Dharma. The three secrets, the lotus, the pure expanse, the meaning shown as distinctly clear: like a vajra, it joins all places.

At the time of expounding the wheel of Dharma, profound and vast, with its manifold sounds, the king of peerless qualities, who possesses the treasury of the jewel mountain, regards the joyous fields of compassion. Possessed of the wisdom of equality in selflessness, may he bring all to completion through pure enlightened activity. Lord of the manifold three secrets, vajra, supreme family, wisdom, diligent, with his beautiful pure eyes he looks upon beings.

Then again, in the form of the Great Wrathful One, with five faces, holding various hand-emblems, abiding in a terrifying, blazing form, one meditates on Hūṃ with a roaring shout. Like a vajra lotus, one gathers the deities into oneself. Arisen from Ma and Ta, the two eyes are splendid discs of sun and moon, blazing. Having purified everything, one again perfects one's own maṇḍala.

From the blazing wind-frame of the nostrils, setting all the worlds ablaze, arisen from the vajra gait, one makes firm the varied ground.

Oṃ sumbhani sumbha hūṃ, gr̥ṇṇa gr̥ṇṇa hūṃ, gr̥ṇṇāpaya gr̥ṇṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ, ānaya ho bhagavān vidyārāja hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Releasing all the signs of the hand-emblems, one makes the wrathful maṇḍala radiate.

Hūṃ! Hosts of the gods, the lord of the gods, and the wind gods; yakṣas, gandharvas, and rākṣasas; flesh-eaters, Yama's servants, and hosts of the Mothers; ḍākinīs and all the yakṣas: whoever dwells on this ground, as guardians and lords of the earth, by the mere hearing of this, come quickly! Do not transgress my command. Whoever abides there with great power, with lotus, vajra, and khaṭvāṅga, I will reduce to a heap of ash. I shatter the abodes of the blazing wrathful ones.

By this blazing lotus form, should anyone break the sacred pledge, the places of rebirth in the three realms of desire will be laid bare, and he will become fearful, with no other refuge than this. Circling all around from the earth, one drives in the stake against the obstructers, that they may be worked upon.

Oṃ ghātaya ghātaya sarva duṣṭa phaṭ. Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ vajra kīlaya. Vajradhara ājñāpaya tikāya vāka citta vajra kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Moving the hands and moving the feet, like the wondrous sidelong glance of the wrathful one, and knitting the brows in a wrathful frown...

With a smile on the lotus of the mouth, the mudrās are each transformed into their places. With a haughty, dignified bearing, one offers praise before the face. With the dance gestures of the wrathful Hayagrīva, the Supreme Horse, one enacts the modes of pacifying, enriching, empowering, and wrathful action.

Then, with water mixed with the five products of the cow and with fragrance, one anoints the ground of the maṇḍala all around. In the places of the deities, with scented water, one traces the circular and square outlines. Placing their own mantras and flowers, each in its own place, one arranges the headdresses, music, and the gathered offerings, adorning the surroundings of the places of the divine protectors. In the ground near the maṇḍala deities, one pleases them with offerings and praise.

When the limbs of the rite are complete, and in order to make up for any faults and ask forgiveness, the hero who holds the vajra and the bell should circumambulate in all directions.

Oṃ vajrasattva samaya, manupālaya, vajrasattva tvenopatiṣṭha dṛḍho me bhava, suposyo me bhava, anurakto me bhava, sutoṣyo me bhava, sarvasiddhiṃ me prayaccha, sarvakarma sucame, cittam śreyaḥ kuru hūṃ, ha ha ha hoḥ, bhagavan sarvatathāgata vajra mā me muñca, vajrī bhava mahāsamaya sattva āḥ.

This king of secret mantras, unsurpassed, even by being recited just once, exhausts all sins without remainder and brings about the accomplishment of all actions.

Placing the knees on the ground, holding incense in the right hand and ringing the bell with the left, one makes this petition with these words.

Oṃ, Sugata with the ten powers, endowed with diligence, protector of beings, endowed with fearlessness and all other qualities without limit, great maṇḍala transmitted by the means of the two families, unshaken, of mighty compassionate force, may the great gathering of the maṇḍala of empowerment that brings joy, and the aggregates of moral discipline and the rest, be pleased.

This very maṇḍala of stainless compassion, with the Lord of Dance of the Lotus (Padmanarteśvara) as its chief, is free from all gatherings of the pleased, and is the source from which all good fortune and virtues arise. Because we wish to accomplish the perfect fruits of the desirable objects, to hold all beings without exception in compassion, and also to make offerings to you, we have begun this vast and perfectly pure maṇḍala. Out of your kindness, protector, and in loving regard, you should consecrate it. Accept these flowers, fragrances, garlands, and the rest. As long as the aims of beings are not fulfilled, for that long, held in compassion, remain here and bless these places of mine and all the rest.

Then one calls to the disciple: O son of good family, you who are a vessel for the vehicle, hear this scripture of the Vajra Vehicle. Bring forth the force of faith, reverence, and joy. The Tathāgatas of the past taught this excellent rite. The protectors, the perfectly awakened buddhas, the assemblies of Tathāgatas yet to come, and likewise the present ones, abide for the benefit of beings. By practicing this excellent rite, secret, profound, and unsurpassed, the supreme person attains in his own place the omniscient wisdom of great bliss. In the incomparable practice of secret mantra, they destroy without remainder the utterly unbearable hosts of the māras of the maṇḍala of the Lord of Dance of the Lotus.

Therefore you too, possessing this supreme intelligence of omniscient wisdom, should go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. Go for refuge everywhere to the assemblies of the wheels in each of the family maṇḍalas, the yogīs and ḍākinīs who keep the secret mantra. Go for refuge, and especially to the master, to the heroes and heroines with their retinues, the great bodhisattvas.

Then the disciple of good conduct takes refuge and takes the bodhisattva vow of awakening mind. He pays homage to the Three Jewels.

Take hold of the Three Jewels.

Whatever evil I have done, caused to be done, or rejoiced in, having come before the Protector, I will confess all of it.

With faith I rejoice in the merit of the Victors together with their sons and their retinues, of the solitary buddhas and arhats and all beings, in their meditation, recitation, and the like.

To the bodhisattvas who gather the accumulations and engage in conduct, who realize the awakening of the very nature of mind and turn the wheel of Dharma, I go for refuge completely.

Just as the buddhas arise, so too the fortunate bodhisattva, through the supreme stainless awakening mind, fixes his attention on the vast multitude of beings.

The awakening mind, the suchness that is the basic space, by which the beings of the three times make the maṇḍala of the heart radiant, is never to be abandoned in the three times.

Be reverent toward the vajra master, and at all times hold his good qualities. Do not disparage the secrets of the yogī. Regard your vajra brothers and sisters as you would your own eyes. Be diligent in recalling, throughout the three times, the forms of the secret mantra and the mudrās.

Then, to bring about auspiciousness, the master should generate the wisdom beings by blessing the seed syllables and mantra of oneself and of the signs.

Again, in one's own place, one sits and offers incense, flowers, lamps, perfumed water, and the like.

Next, prepare the toothstick. It should come from an auspicious, supreme, milk-bearing tree, with leaves, flowers, and fruit, moist and straight, free of worms, without cracks or breaks, twelve finger-widths long, anointed with fragrant perfume, its tip wreathed with flowers. Cleanse it with mantra and scented water, and bless it as the weapon of the family, reciting the mantra with its three syllables: Oṃ sarva pāpa dahana vajra śītani svāhā.

Facing east, the disciple is given the toothstick, and in doing so the master speaks the words of truth. The disciple receives it without speaking. With the tip like a knife, he scrapes the tongue and brushes the teeth with the finer side. Then he casts it down upon ground anointed with fragrance, so that the two do not look at one another.

From the direction in which it falls, east and the rest, one examines the signs of accomplishment, pacifying and the others. Whether it points upward or downward, supreme or middling, is observed. The intermediate directions indicate that worldly activities will be accomplished.

Having recited the mantra of purified action, one gives the disciple pure, scented water, purified and blessed, to rinse the mouth three times, to be offered in the manner of a sprinkling touch. Oṃ hrī viśuddha sarva dharma pāpa nicāśa viśodha dharma sarva kalpana apanaya hūṃ.

Fold a clean cloth well, tie a protective cord with three knots, recite the mantra of three syllables over it, and bind it to the disciple's left upper arm. Kuśa grass with its tips undisturbed is gathered into two bundles, which are blessed as father and mother, and given as a pillow and a seat. Oṃ sarva dusti kuru svāhā.

Encourage the disciple with joyful words, and make offerings together with the gathering of tormas. Having dedicated them to the host of deities, speak the words of truth and lie down comfortably, silent, with a virtuous mind, so that the signs of dreams may be examined.

The master too retires within, offers to the deities and praises them through the absorption in which the maṇḍala appears clearly, and lies down with a virtuous mind.

Then, at dawn, the master and disciple rise before the pillow. "Kye kye, rise, you who are well and fortunate. Whatever signs you saw in your dreams, now is the time to speak the truth." The disciple should answer truthfully.

The master explains the omens of the supreme and middling signs and turns back the bad omens. With sbyin sreg offerings, tormas, and the like, and with the five products of the cow, he should anoint. Then meditate on the great emptiness, the wisdom in which all things are freed from signs.

A vase made of precious material, with a long neck, a rounded belly, a lip, raised feet, and a generous capacity, is well anointed with fragrant white pigment.

Seated well upon a lotus maṇḍala, the vases are adorned with the letters of their respective seed-signs. The Victorious Vase and the others are to be honored with offerings and arranged upon their seats. Into them one should place the five precious substances, the five grains, the five essences, the five medicines, and the five auspicious substances. With neck cords, dhāraṇī threads, and the ornaments of the vase mouths, and so on, one makes the commitment deities vivid, and then, undivided from the body of wisdom, one offers, praises, and recites the mantra. The water, together with its mantra, abides inseparable from the deity.

At the proper time, when the maṇḍala has been accomplished, one arranges them in their own respective directions. Having made the commitment maṇḍala vivid, and joining skillful means with wisdom, inseparable from the wisdom deities, one should draw the lines of the maṇḍala upon the ground. The one who draws should be a person of discernment, handsome to behold, sixteen years of age, or else one who has been properly empowered through blessing. This person should prepare the maṇḍala.

Take cloth made from pure materials, of twenty-five colors, or threads made from the five. Bless them and twist them together. Having purified them through emptiness, and abiding as the deity of the family, twist them with offerings, praises, and mantra.

Oṃ vajra samaya mutra matikrama hūṃ. Oṃ āḥ hūṃ.

Reciting the mantra that begins with jaḥ, the disciple draws the thread straight from the heart of the vajra master to the space between the eyebrows. To the west and east of that place, rays of light stream forth, and one gazes upon the great compassion of the bodhisattvas, the maṇḍala of space. From the vajra center, the directions and intermediate directions are shown, and the great maṇḍala is displayed in its completeness. Heroes of supreme power, pray be mindful. By this vajra line, resounding with its sound, may the maṇḍala of space be well accomplished, and may you be urged on for the sake of beings.

Oṃ anunna anugato sarva dharma para para anugata sarva ananta avatāra sarva dharma hūṃ.

When the deities have come to be seated before one, with offerings and praises one regards them in the manner of the powerful ones. Placing the vajra and the cord at the ground, one first strikes the Brahmā line stretched from east to west. Likewise, measuring from the doors, one measures the four corners most carefully. The second line, from south to north, and the lines of the intermediate directions are then to be struck. When the lines of the square have become equal, one divides them into eight and into sixteen. Except for the inner and outer margins, the remaining parts are divided into smaller portions of four each.

When the rite of the lines is complete, one honors and praises with the thread of wisdom, and with the vajra, the cord, and the mantra, one prays that the deities depart to their own abodes.

Oṃ vajra gajaḥ.

With the pride of being the lord of the maṇḍala, one imagines that the two eyes arise from the syllables mā and tā. Looking upon all the places of the maṇḍala, with mantra and mudrā one opens the four doors, and also examines the finer portions with the mind. With the mudrā of raising the vajra, one lifts up the walls of the painted design, and the yogin, steadfast, performs in mind the secret rite of entering and departing.

Oṃ vegākrama hūṃ.

By the perfect purity of the lotus nature, this is the great place where the maṇḍala arises, the host of manifestations of compassion and wisdom. Pervading all, it is the chief of those who show blessing. The body, speech, and mind of the Victors, with their qualities and activities, appear wondrously. For the sake of all beings without exception, may the palace be purified and blessed. Through the perfect purity of all directions and intermediate directions, may the abode of awakened wisdom become radiant. With great compassion, spotless in its force, which conquers all hosts of afflictions and faults, may you accomplish the secret maṇḍala that arises from the blessing of wisdom.

Take the powders of the five precious substances, colored sands, and whatever else is available. Fill vessels of precious material with them and place them in the five directions of the maṇḍala's site. When they have been purified and blessed, honor the threads of the five families, together with the consorts, and the central maṇḍala of the family and so on, and please them with offerings, praises, and mantra.

Oṃ vajra citta mati samaya hūṃ.

With white, blue, yellow, green, and red pigments, in due order, begin from the direction of the lord of power, and draw the five-colored thread. With the right hand hold the lotus and the vajra, and with the left hand perform the work of drawing the line. Make offerings to it and recite the mantra; then recite the truth-saying and cover it.

This is the utterly pure dharmadhātu, which brings the realm of sentient beings to self-liberation. The glorious Lord of the Dance of the Lotus is the abode of all the Tathāgatas. By the blessing of the genuine truth, may the actions of the maṇḍala be auspicious.

Begin from the central navel. At first the master draws it himself; afterward it may be drawn as one wishes, with understanding. Make it even and straight, without high or low. Then show the signs and marks. If the work is broken off, or if one speaks during it, it will not succeed. Deceit gives rise to tormenting deeds, and from breaking off, master and disciple alike will meet with evil and death. If it is drawn with a crooked or sloping line, there will be strife and conflict; if the directions are confused, madness will result.

In the place of the central maṇḍala, within twenty-five squares, together with the families of the lord of the Sugatas, draw the letters and the signs of the mudrās. On the petals of the outer lotus, for the twenty-four assemblies, draw in due order, beginning from the east, the bodhisattvas together with the wrathful ones. In the intercardinal directions, between the outer and inner, place the eight offering goddesses. In the intervening space, place the bodhisattvas of the Fortunate Eon. At the four gates, place the wrathful hosts.

At the center of the central maṇḍala, place the Sugata Amitābha, who radiates light, together with the lotus and the vajra bell, in his own color, with colored pigments. In the square to the east of him place Amitāyus, Dharmeśvara, Rāgavirāga (Free of Attachment), Prabhāsa (Light), and Priyadarśana (Delightful to Behold), with the stacked lotus, the lotus garland, the lotus-seated precious book, and the jewel garland, each in its own color and adorned with its mantra.

At the center of the eastern maṇḍala is the Sugata Akṣobhya, with the mantra of the vajra bell, placed on his seat with his own light. In the square to the east of him are the family of Nirmala (the Stainless), the sound of thunder, Abhisambodhi (Manifest Illuminator), and Bstan-dbang-phyug; they are drawn with the clinging jewel, the heaped jewel-lotus, and the jewel net, in due order each in its own color and adorned with its mantra.

At the center of the southern maṇḍala is the Sugata Ratnasambhava, with the jewel heap and the bell, marked with his own color and mantra. In the square to the east of him are Gaganagañja (Treasury of Space), the one with the net, Ratnaketu, Ratnadhvaja (Jewel Banner), the jewel flute, the jewel garland, the jewel banner, and the jewel vase, each with its own light and adorned with its mantra.

At the center of the western maṇḍala is the Sugata Samantaprabha (All-Pervading Light), and for his sign, draw the wheel and the bell, marked with his own light and mantra. The measure is that of the wheel of the lotus family.

At the center of the northern maṇḍala is the Sugata Amoghasiddhi, holding the vajra and the bell of many kinds, with his own mantra and color clear. In the square to the east of him are Vīrya (Diligence), Mahāvega (Great Speed), the one who subdues yakṣas, Nānāeśvara (Lord of Many Kinds), the lattice garland, the lotus garland, and the vajra serpent with the moon disk, marked with radiating light and mantra.

In the four squares of the intermediate directions, adorn with their own light and mantra the one who holds the radiating lotus, the one who presses down the lotus, the one who upholds the lotus, the mirror, the jewel garland, the lute, and the mudrā of the dance.

Beginning from the east of the outer lotus, the bodhisattvas of the families are placed four by four: Sukhamati (Blissful Intellect), Sāgaraghoṣa (Ocean Sound), Tejaprabha (Radiant Splendor), the wheel, the wheel of the treasury of space, the jewel wheel, the lotus-stem wheel, and the staff.

Each abides marked by its own light and mantra.

Prajñāvabhāsa (Radiance of Wisdom), Vajrajaya (Vajra Victory), Raśmiprabhāsa (Radiant Light), Dragśul (Fierce Force), the jewel heap, the jewel parasol, the lotus stem, and the heap of light, each drawn on a square. Then the host of stainless ones, Māyājāla (Net of Illusion), the king of jewels with the net, and the jewel mountain, each drawn on a square. The golden-light radiance of the one who bestows, the jewel cluster, the one who sees the Dharma, the lotus square, the sacred scripture, and the armor of the lotus stem, each drawn. Vimala (Stainless), the dispeller of darkness, Joyful Melody, and the Youth, the crystal and the jewel garland, the heap of clouds, each drawn on a vajra square.

These are the bodhisattvas of the five families, marked by their own light and mantra.

At the outermost edge, draw the emblems of the mudrās of the four wrathful ones: the lord of speech, the donor; the three-pointed one; the jewel with nine points; the one-pointed staff; and the sword.

In the four corners are the four offering goddesses: incense, flowers, lamps, and perfume.

In the outer intermediate spaces, in each direction, four bodhisattvas are placed: Vajra Vairocana, the dancer, and the ocean of intellect, the Unobstructed Array. Draw them in their own places, each seated on his own seat with his own light, with the vajra emblem and secret mantra.

The lord of the ground of the lotus of joy, the heap of jewels, the garland of clouds: draw the jewel emblem with its mantra, abiding on its own seat in its own light. The pleasing flower, the lamp, the heaped incense, and the transformer of the vessel: draw the lotus emblem with its mantra, abiding on its seat in its own light. Draw the lord of mindfulness, the Lotus Intellect, and the Intellect of the Essence who accomplishes activity, with the square, the emblem, and the mantra, abiding on their seats in their own light.

At the gates, beginning with the east, are the vajra square of the Wrathful and Terrifying King, the raised vajra, the jewel staff, and the lotus garland. One should draw the emblems of the mudrās, abiding on seats of their own syllables.

In the four directions are ornaments and garlands, and the goddesses of sensory pleasures and so forth; draw the ornaments as lotus and vajra, and the jewel wheel on a square. The radiance has five colors, together with twenty-five lights.

On the outside are the horse-descents, the nets, and so forth; the banners; twenty-four bells; the parasol, the vase, the garland of birds; the wish-fulfilling tree, the pond, and the cow; the sun and moon, the mirror, and the five victory banners; the wheel of Dharma and the deer. Beautify the outer boundary with lotuses, and surround it with vajras, flames of fire, and weapons.

At the center is an eye of twenty-five colors. The garland of lotuses is red, and the intermediate spaces are white. The four-sided jewel at the four gates is of golden color. Arrange the five offerings and the vases, and draw the canopy, the garments, and the directional ornaments. Spread out heaps of flowers together with their mantras, each in its own place.

Having assembled many kinds of torma offerings, place them in the outer directions and intermediate directions. By clearly generating the meditative absorption of the deity, the auspicious activity of the maṇḍala will be accomplished.

Then praise the deities, and cause the vajra and lotus pledge beings to enter. Having summoned with the heart mantra, the guests will be satisfied. Urge them with the pledge mantra, and entrust them with their own activities. Thus it was taught.

This is the seventh chapter, on the drawing of the images, from the great tantra, the glorious Hayagrīva's Play, the unsurpassed secret of the thoughts of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the chief of the bodhisattvas, Vajradhara and the others, became pleased, and once more urged the Victor: "By the power of great compassion for the benefit of all, how should those who in the future practice secret mantra be given empowerment as they enter the great maṇḍala, in accordance with the rite? How should consecration likewise be done? How should one protect the limbs that serve one's own and others' benefit? What is the sequence of the offering and the fire ritual?"

The Chief, endowed with great compassion, for the sake of all beings to be trained without exception, made this time manifest and taught the elaborate limbs of the rite. Then the assembly of bodhisattvas received it with reverence and put it into practice.

Then the power of the Blessed One, the consort mudrā, wisdom, stirred in great excitement, her face blooming with exceeding delight, looked upon all the families, and consecrated this meaning, called the giving of the Three Supreme Ones.

Whichever future beings to be trained, wise bodhisattvas, wish to enter the path of ripening in this non-dual secret vehicle, let them please the vajra master through actions that bring him joy. Entreating him again and again, let them seek the maṇḍala for the sake of its secret meaning. In order to free all beings without exception from suffering, with the vast intelligence of the supreme awakening mind, let them dedicate all outer and inner wealth and possessions to awakening.

Desire made utterly pure, the expanse of the lotus; by the suchness of all phenomena, the supreme maṇḍala of the emanation of wisdom: today I seek this delightful and greatly meaningful maṇḍala.

Oṃ utakata samaya stvaṃ.

Pleased be the supreme body of lotus delight, the source from which the manifold maṇḍalas arise. I pay homage to the body of the Sugata, perfect in the major and minor marks.

The great vajra subdues all others and dispels every stain of ignorance. The supreme mind that brings the secret Dharma to its conclusion: I pay homage to the vajra mind.

The essence of secret mantra, the secret Dharma, is emanated from the expanse of the radiant lotus. Bearing the characteristic of awakening, vast as space: I pay homage to the vajra speech.

Raining down a shower of precious qualities, becoming the victory of the Tathāgatas, glorious, supreme, endowed with all auspiciousness: I pay homage to the Great Vehicle.

The all-pervading one who becomes the ground of all, the vajra samaya supreme in action, who utterly crushes all that is hostile: I pay homage to the vajra subduer.

Victorious lord of all accomplishments, in the very place of the great maṇḍala, may you accomplish the samaya and wisdom that arise from the secret empowerment. By entering after the wisdom emanated from the nature of reality, the host of compassion, the blessing born of true reality fulfills every wish.

The array of words emanated by the Sugata, of the family that completes the empowerment: having adorned the disciple with garlands of flowers and the like, he is then set upon a platform. Torma offerings are given toward all directions, all are entreated and instructed, and the disciple is made to enter.

Take a clean cloth of red thread, one not used elsewhere and not damaged, bless it with one's own mantra, and cover the face well with it. With palms joined like a lotus, and a rosary of precious beads, reciting mantra and holding dhāraṇī with one-pointed mind, firmly seeking awakening, let the disciple generate faith in the place of the maṇḍala.

Then the wise master, so that the disciples may enter the path of the Great Vehicle, speaks to them once more: "This supreme and profound path of secret mantra is extremely difficult to hold. You who wish to hold it, generate a mind free of arrogance, and keep to the supreme view and conduct.

Alas! The meaning of the vajra secret, the unsurpassed essence of the Great Vehicle, though it brings about awakening in this very life, will cause doubt to arise in the deluded. By realizing this excellent way of being, the buddhas dwelling in the three times attain a supreme and wondrous blessing and, endowed with the proper manner, act for the sake of sentient beings. May you be free of exaggeration and denigration, and hold to it with faith and diligence, without doubt."

Then the disciple again made this request: "May the supreme protectors, who possess true and great compassion, show me kindness."

I have no one else to entrust these matters to, so I shall request them as you have instructed. Again, with a mind of utmost reverence and faith, I take refuge in the great master of the supreme and great pledge that is not heard by the unworthy. May the assembly of buddhas and their offspring in the maṇḍala, whose supreme minds are free of stain, think of me. Seeking awakening, I have given rise to devotion toward the maṇḍala and its abode. I take refuge in the supreme Lords of the Dance, the great bliss, who have become protectors. It is well that you have caused me myself to enter this palace of nirvāṇa.

Then, with the karma vajra, take the disciple by the secret thumb and bring him inside the curtain. Oṃ padmo sarva tathāgata samaya yoga citta utpādayāmi hūṃ svāhā.

Then, having entered the secret place, through offerings, continual confession, and so forth, once he has become a worthy vessel, he should utter the three pledges, pour water, proclaim the vajra secret pledge, and purify the three places through mudrā and mantra. Oṃ, you who are of all the Victors, bless and make firm. In this maṇḍala of Padma Naṭeśvara, do not speak, even for the sake of your life, to those who have abandoned the pledge of selflessness, who lack faith and let their diligence decline, who are dull-minded with little wisdom, or who dwell in conceptual clinging.

Great Bliss Protector, embodied as the Lotus-Holder, when you have entered the heart, if another speaks of the secret wisdom, you will drink the heart's blood and know it otherwise. I am the body of the Lord of the Dance, and since I hold you with compassion, you must not transgress these words of instruction that I give. If you scorn me and treat me with contempt, the body of the great, wrathful and fierce Krodha will split your skull into a hundred fragments and reduce your body, mind, and strength to dust.

Upon the maṇḍala of the four places of arising, with your own mantra, seed syllable, and rays of light, recite the invoking secret mantra a thousand times, ring the bell and burn fragrant incense, and cause the wisdom being to enter. Through this, signs will be seen. The wisdom of body stirs in the ten directions. The wisdom of speech utters secrets. The wisdom of mind makes clairvoyance clear. The three mantras remain steadfast through the mudrā.

By the blessing of the wisdom of truth, whichever deity of the maṇḍala's family it may be, it is fitting that, in accordance with my aeon, you cause it to descend at this time. The family upon which the jewel garland falls is the disciple's own pledge. Then the mantras and the garland, all of them, should be given back to that same disciple.

By the blessing of the golden probe, remove the cataract of ignorant blindness. May all the buddhas of the ten directions strive to open your eyes. Having cleared away the covering and veil of ignorance, you now have the lotus eyes, excellent and immaculate. Oṃ padma cakṣu jñāna praveśa phaṭ. Having removed the face covering with the vajra, show the maṇḍala clearly.

Look well, you of great intelligence. Just as the former Victors and others entered well into this maṇḍala, the essence of secret mantra, and attained accomplishment, so too the deity upon whom the flower falls is the pledge of your family.

Beginning with the guardian of the eastern gate, display the maṇḍala up to the principal deity. With food, clothing, and the like, please the wise lama. Display the yidam deity's body, mudrā, and so forth, together with the secret names. From this very day onward, to attain the state of the Vajra-Holder, those of keen mind, even in this last age of decline, should hold to this at all times.

Kyemaho! Ocean-like abode of intelligence, you who strive for the sake of protecting beings, I bow at your lotus feet. In this delightful, supreme palace-city, the precious treasury of empowerment has descended upon the body of Vairocana. Out of compassion, loving regard, and thought, in keeping with my lineage, bless me and cleanse the stains of fault.

Since this is the time of granting the empowerment, may you attain the supreme body of the Protector. Facing the eastern door, at the distance of a forearm's length from the back, set up the maṇḍala for conferring empowerment, in the measure of the central space. Draw an eight-petalled lotus with its doors, and color it well with red pigment. Arrange a lion throne together with a lotus, and seat the disciple in the manner of a wheel-turning king. Above the head set a beautiful parasol, with a victory banner on the right. Place conch shells, bronze horns, and sweet-sounding cymbals, the instruments of music and offering, in the directions and intermediate directions. Let the disciple be well covered with ornaments, garlands, and garments. Purify with fragrant water together with mantra, with white mustard seed, and with kuśa-grass water. Oṃ mahā binta hana hana hūṃ phaṭ.

Then generate the disciple as the deity of the family, sing songs of pure auspiciousness, arrange the music and the garlands of adornment, and confer the empowerment with the water of the vase. Thereby, from the places where the accumulations of obscurations, the habitual tendencies, and the afflictions dwell, they are purified. By the power of the pure stream of divine water, may the aggregate of wisdom, the supreme sovereignty, be attained.

Oṃ. The water of the gods is the water of purity. It has come forth from the places of the vajra's three secrets. With the water of awakening mind, the accumulations are purified. By conferring empowerment, may the goal be attained.

Next comes the crown. It is the supreme, perfectly pure precious quality, adorning the body of the five families, a crown of excellent head ornaments. It is the supreme heap of precious things, the source of all. Trāṃ. This ornament, free of any contrived quality, makes the maṇḍala of the family clear.

The great Dharma king of the three realms, with all the major and minor marks, and all conventional appearances, is primordially the five-pointed vajra. Adorned with a garland of light and with mantra, it triumphs over all the host of those who have realization. The Sugata, with single-pointed compassion, never abandons the beings of the three realms.

The bodhisattva, the five-pointed vajra, makes clear the abode of self-aware wisdom. The meaning that phenomena are unborn is like an echo, a sound that is spoken yet without substance. The bell of emptiness is the speech whose nature is such. From it arise the vast and varied hosts of appearances. Hoṃ. All phenomena are liberated from any cause; likewise, the host of results is without conditions. The pure expanse is the lotus of intrinsic nature. This is the speech that reveals the definitive vehicle.

Kyeho! Vajra Heruka, the Great Glorious One! Empowered by the name of the family, the truth body, luminosity, great bliss, the lotus-voiced one, together with the name. Oṃ. In the great mudrā, the secret place, by the samādhi that is like a vajra, subdue adversaries and the rest. Vairocana, the Tathāgata.

Oṃ vajra padmo abhiṣiñcāmi. Oṃ ratna mukuṭa abhiṣiñcā hūṃ. Oṃ atipati trāṃ abhiṣiñcā haṃ. Oṃ nama heruka abhiṣiñcāmi.

With deep reverence for the master and the deities, hold the qualities together with the assembly. Guard your vajra brothers and sisters of the samaya as you would the apple of your eye. Whoever shows disrespect to these will have their life taken by fierce Vajra Wrath. Recite the mantras at the proper times, and bind the mudrās continually. Conceal at all times the secret words and the collection of signs. Partake continually, with an understanding of equality, of the five nectars, flesh, and the rest. At the appropriate times, perform the conduct of the six dances, the six songs, and the postures. Knowing that when the samaya is impaired the five afflictions and the five sense pleasures are to be used with understanding, abide in the vajra and bell mudrā, in the conduct of the three places. Practice the excellent rites of prophecy, subsequent permission, and the releasing of the breath. Such a one becomes the supreme vajra master and attains the state of enjoying the qualities.

The body of the vajra and bell mudrā is blessed by the perfect mantra. With a mind that holds firmly to the future, uphold the secret samaya.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata svara padma samaya stvaṃ. Oṃ dadu śrī padmo gandha a. Oṃ mahā padmo svāhā sarva tathāgata kāya vāk citta hūṃ phaṭ.

Recite the auspicious offerings; this becomes the supreme discipline of the vow-bound observance. The common accomplishments, which fulfil the aims of oneself and others, and all the rites of the ritual works, namely pacifying, enriching, empowering, and subjugating, as well as the rite of confusing and driving away, and the works of killing and the rest, all of these belong to the way of this secret maṇḍala. Accomplish whatever you desire.

Then, through the perfect union of the lotus maṇḍala, luminous by its very nature, one overpowers the phenomena of saṃsāra, proclaims the sacred Dharma in the ten directions, and ascends to the stage of the six perfections, cutting through false imputations and doubts. The Sugatas together with their children give the prophecy, and the supreme lineage they establish is unsurpassed. All the Victors bestow the prophecy, and one is freed from all, together with the grasping of the three realms.

There is no sin in all the three realms other than being devoid of desire. Therefore, never abandon attachment to desire. Oṃ mahā samaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Hold the continuous stream of secret mantra, and take up the deity and the master. This was spoken by all the buddhas through the door of a single utterance. With a mind that benefits all beings, strive in the maṇḍala and the rest. One endowed with faith, diligence, wisdom, and intelligence should apply oneself to whatever fruition one desires. Whoever in this supremely secret city seeks whatever aim, abandons all obscurations and the rest, and engages in the clear wisdom of the supreme abode. This great Secret Vehicle of great bliss brings about awakening in this very life. One attains the state of great bliss, freed from the afflictions, the enemies, and the rest.

Then the pure suchness of the deities and their seats of dwelling should be shown. Make offerings and give gifts, gather the assembly, welcome the guests, and accumulate the auspicious collection for beings. Furthermore, the intelligent disciple should present a choice gift to the guru, please him with the offerings of the maṇḍala and the gathered substances, and make supplication.

One should present to the vajra master the sixteen, or else the twenty-four, perfect in all the limbs of wisdom, and perform the rite of blessing. After bathing and being anointed with fragrant adornments, one is purified by various mantras and mudrās. Having been joined with the deity of one's family, one is indicated by the sign that rouses the samaya, and one enters the union of non-dual wisdom. With the stream of the awakening mind, one makes offering to one's own maṇḍala, and so the assembly of masters also bestows empowerment.

Just as the supreme child of the Victors gratified those who entered, the secret meaning of non-dual wisdom is conferred through the mudrā of descent:

Alala ho. Oṃ āḥ hūṃ. Aho, bliss, the place of one's own nature. Aho, delight, bring satisfaction. It abides by nature in all maṇḍalas. One should place in the disciple's hand the blessed one endowed with supreme wisdom. The wisdom of bliss, which is one's own nature itself, becomes clear as the meaning free of defilement. By the mind free of conceptual thought, one comes to see one's own true reality.

Emaho! These realms of beings are deluded into being other than suchness. For those who have the wisdom of great bliss, nothing at all becomes other. This wisdom is exceedingly subtle, the vajra essence, like space, the Dharma free of dust, liberated, and peaceful. It is one's own nature itself.

That is the secret meaning of the fire offering, which I now explain to all of you. In a great maṇḍala of four directions, or in some other suitable place, one should prepare the hearth for pacifying, enriching, empowering, and wrathful action, indeed for all rites. It may be round, a cubit in size, or crescent-shaped, or triangular, or of various shapes. These may be white, yellow, red, and black, marked with all four colors. They are adorned with the vajra, wheel, and lotus, and bear various vajra weapons. Make them four cubits, or two, or three, with half a cubit at the foot.

Each of the firewoods and kindling sticks has its own defining marks: the color of the grain, the taste, and the tip. In length they measure four, eight, sixteen, or twenty finger-widths, according to the rite. Each is smeared with its own proper butter. In due order, the hearth of the firewood should be built round, square, crescent-shaped, or triangular.

Place the dwelling of all the deities in the abode of fire, in accord with each particular action, and call out the name of Agni. With the right hand wave the gesture of fearlessness, and with the left hold the rosary. Recite: Oṃ ehyehi Agne Yema Mahā Vavahi Svāhā.

Let the Wrathful King speak. Offer the fire deity a seat and lotus, and then the five offerings. When every substance for burning has been offered, praise the deities and make supplication, as in the house of offerings to the deities. With the filling ladle on the right and the pouring ladle on the left, offer the flowing, nourishing essences in all their varieties.

Oṃ mahā anala mahā bhūta vajra lāpsmi kuru hūṃ, sarva duṣṭān hūṃ phaṭ. This is the offering to the fire deity.

Oṃ mahā kuru pañca hūṃ. This is the mantra for offering with the filling ladle.

Oṃ sarva badha hana vajra svāhā. This is for sesame.

Oṃ vajra puṣpe hūṃ. This is for flowers.

Oṃ sarva agnaye hūṃ svāhā. This is for the kindling sticks.

Oṃ vajra pūja megha Lokeśvara hūṃ. This is the offering of the work of the Lord of the World.

Oṃ dhūpe tivabu śa gandhe. These are for the combined offerings.

Oṃ apratihata vajra svāhā. This is for kuśa grass.

Oṃ vajra āyuṣe svāhā. This is for dūrvā grass.

Whatever other substances are assembled, offer them with the three syllables of their own names as mantra. Then make offerings to all the maṇḍalas and make supplication for what you wish. By confessing misdeeds and purifying every habitual tendency, one will attain the accomplishments of the deities. Finally, having made offerings to the fire deity, recite the mantra of each particular action. Oṃ vajra nama sarva tathāgata hṛdaya mākuru hūṃ. Request the deities to depart, and dissolve the pledge deities into the deity.

Next, for the benefit of beings, I shall explain the excellent consecration. In a delightful and beautiful place, prepare well an image and a maṇḍala. Please the deities with offering substances, and bring in the master with his implements. Having clearly accomplished the maṇḍala, perform the rite of purifying the sacred supports.

Just as all the perfect buddhas departed from the Joyful Heaven (Tuṣita) and entered the womb of the goddess Māyā, so too please abide here. Abiding in this place of the Jewels, accept the offerings of flowers and the rest. Hold in mind the purpose of this, and increase the supreme awakening mind. I wish to perform the consecration within.

Out of love for my disciples, and also to make offerings to you, Blessed One, it is fitting that you, in your kindness, perform the rite for me, who am practicing.

Then, having purified all the places, may all who liberate the places of the six classes of beings turn their minds to this present time. Bodhisattvas, arhats, and all the deities who hold the secret mantra, for the sake of worldly offerings, it is fitting that there be an excellent consecration.

Then, having purified all the places and completed the blessing, perform the rite of empowerment in full, just as for one's own maṇḍala. Then offer the burnt offering, the torma, and the rest. Thus he spoke.

This is the eighth chapter, the chapter on the path of special excellence, from the great tantra, the sublime secret of the unsurpassed intent of all the Tathāgatas, the Play of the Supreme Horse (Hayagrīva).

Then, at the time when the Tathāgata, by his power, was subduing everything, the king of the māras was overcome with great sorrow. He said: Alas! Oh! If this buddha destroys and ruins my abodes and the rest, by what means shall I tame him? And yet in this matter there is nothing at all that I can do.

Shall I contend with those who have fallen to the lowest state? Likewise, these three worlds exist for the work of destroying and ruining existence, so I will command them all and turn them back from these evil deeds. So he thought.

Then all those of great power, authority, and splendor in the abodes of the three worlds gathered together, and he proclaimed: Hey, listen to me, all of you! If these world-systems do not come under the rule of a single king, all existence will be destroyed. Therefore let every direction assemble with its retinue, and heed my command! So he announced.

At that time the host of the great fierce lords of the world, each displaying his own miraculous powers, said: What sort of arrogant one are you? Each one of us is a great king who protects limitless retinues, and we hold sway over countless realms. It would be well if you yourself dwelt in peace, for you have become sacred only through the touch of others. So they spoke in agreement. At this the king of the māras grew exceedingly swollen with affliction, and said to the others:

All these worlds, together with their gods, abide under my command.
All beings, without exception, shall heed the king's secret command.

Lord of the three realms, god of gods,
the ground that supports all grounds,
I am the measure of power and miracle.
None of you can rival me.
If you transgress my command, your lives and your dominions will be destroyed, and your dwellings scattered.
So he declared.

Then Brahmā, king of the gods, gathered his own limitless retinue, and standing in their midst in the form of a wrathful being with the body of a great rākṣasa, he emanated wrathful beings and hosts of weapons by his own power. In the same way Viṣṇu, the Great Lord (Maheśvara), Indra, the Lord of Hosts (Gaṇapati), Bhṛṅgi and Riti, and the six-faced youth (Kārttikeya) each gathered his own limitless retinue, and standing in their midst they unfolded inconceivable emanations and displayed their power and miracles. The four great kings who dwell on the terrace of Mount Meru likewise stood up in the midst of their own retinues and displayed their might and miracles.

The guardians of the directions who dwell on the golden mountain took their places, each with his own abode and with fearsome weapons: Indra, the Lord of Power (Īśāna), Yama, Nirṛti, the water god (Varuṇa), the yakṣa (Kubera), the sun, and the earth deities. The sun, the moon, Mars, Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, and the great planets likewise took their places, each with his own retinue, in hosts of fearsome wrathful beings and with weapons. Anantā, Takṣaka, Balahetu, Kulika, Vāsuki, Śaṅkhapāla, Padma, and the water gods took their places with their own attendants and fearsome emanations. In the same way the yakṣas, who abide as the proud hosts of the three realms, the gandharvas, the kumbhāṇḍas, the powerful and mighty chiefs of the six classes of beings, the mātṛkās, the Yamas, the asuras, the Suparṇas, the rākṣasas, the garuḍas, and the hosts of stars and constellations, each in the center of the maṇḍala of his own retinue, manifested and took their places, with fearsome bodily forms, weapons, and roars.

Then the king of the māras also gave rise to affliction. He assembled his own retinues, displayed all at once every power of miracle he possessed, and from a palace blazing with weapons of every kind he revealed himself in a fierce, blazing, terrifying form, with hosts of wrathful goddesses at play.

The assembled retinue, together with weapons blazing with fire and light, spread out in the ten directions and filled all of space, and hail, plague, and every kind of tumult arose. By this, all the gods of the world became intoxicated and bewildered. From every direction the hosts of terror struck and cut them down with the blazing weapons of that retinue, until each of their assemblies was seized with panic, and they offered up their own life-essences and begged for refuge.

Then the māras, who bring all the gods together, were dismissed with threats and made to take a binding pledge. Each took back his own life-essence. The whole assembly was separated from its lords, and the eight Great Gods took their places on their own summits. The four Great Kings took their places in the eastern continent. The yakṣas and the guardians of the directions took their places in the two minor continents of the east. The beings of the six classes were stationed in the south. The gandharvas and the mātṛkās were stationed in the minor continents of the south. The asuras were stationed in the west. The Yamas, the Suparṇas, and the rākṣasas were stationed in the two minor continents of the western continent. The planets and the constellations were stationed in the north. Thus, from the unsurpassed secret intention of all the Tathāgatas, the emanation of the māras was shown.

Then the king of the māras himself, greatly delighted, gave this command to his entire retinue: "One who dwells in the retinue of a single king dwells there by acting in accord with his wishes. So you too must listen to my command as I give it. Cut off this path of liberation, and show no reverence to any other teacher. Otherwise my world will be emptied. These beings, who lack any vast aspiration, are by nature deluded. They are like animals, so there is no point in their gaining any place of well-being."

And he spoke again in verse:

Alas, beings without discernment Abandon their own happiness
And strive after another path to liberation.
Deluded, they ruin their own continuum.
They abandon well-being and wish for harm.
Pity these beings in their bewilderment.
Yet for now, those fortunate through compassion
Have gathered in my retinue.
You who wish to attain some higher state elsewhere,

Place faith and reverence in me.

So he commanded. And they too listened in this way. Though they had lost their own places and sorrow arose in their minds, they had no means of doing anything about it, and so they sat and remained there.

Then the king of the māras went to his own abode. With his retinue he indulged in joyful enjoyments and the qualities of desire, and took pleasure in delightful song, dance, and music. He thought: "Since I am the lord of all the three realms, I have seen no goal higher than this to be achieved. Now, if I were to bring the assemblies of buddhas and the bodhisattvas under my power, by what means should I begin?" And he questioned his own retinue as well.

Then he commanded all the cities of the māras: "Among the retinues of the buddhas, display everywhere every kind of inauspicious omen, evil sign, and wondrous magical contrivance. If you accomplish whatever they wish, they will take an interest in us. After that, when their chief figures have gathered in my retinue, I shall tame them by various means. If any are unable to come, I shall destroy them together with their very abodes." So he declared.

Then he emanated a host of wrathful beings with a multitude of weapons that shook the three thousand worlds. He arranged to crush utterly all beings who delight in the white class of virtue, and to destroy even the bodhisattvas who abide on the grounds. But the power of truth was harmed by nothing. Then, in a towering rage,

"I shall tame these three realms of mine all at once. As for those who practice, these wicked and deceitful ones, can they not be tamed? Therefore, rouse all those who dwell in my lower ranks, and let those who abide on the path of liberation be tamed in the proper manner." So he declared. Then he commanded Brahmā and the others, and they too sent forth their own emanations and weapons in every direction, and they recited their own groups of fierce secret mantras. Through this the world was shaken and convulsed, and everything fell into turmoil.

This is the ninth chapter, on the sudden arising of the host of Māras, from the Glorious Supreme Steed Play Tantra, the unsurpassed secret.

Then the Blessed One, supreme in great bliss, the very self of all the buddhas, in order to tame each of the three thousand worlds one by one, remained in the meditative absorption of magical display. Though he never stirred from suchness, by the power of his great compassion and his aspirations, he displayed various modes of thought in accord with the karma and conceptions of each being.

Those who are devoted to attachment and desire he tamed through great passion. Likewise, to tame aversion, delusion, pride, and jealousy, he tamed them through accordant appearances of many kinds, and also by means of the contrary.

Lotus, Sugata, Vajra-meaning, Jewel, and the varied Jewel-action, together with the great seals and others, he turned the wheel, and he accomplished things just as they are. The meaning of the great skillful means, the pure lotus, became the supreme emanation of wisdom, and so the lord of dance, great bliss, manifested the very view of the vajra.

Yet other vast deeds he performed, taming by various powers. He made a body accordant with pure beings, golden in radiance, endowed with the major and minor marks. He made known the unsurpassed vehicle, the profound secret mantra as it truly is. The Victor, the Sugata, took the body of the seal, and in various wondrous maṇḍalas, to some he appeared as a great supreme bodhisattva; for some he joined them correctly to the five paths; for some he completed the ten perfections; for some he directed them to the meaning of the result.

For some he went to the heaven of Tuṣita, the land of the gods. Entering the womb, being born, and engaging in play in accord with the conduct of the world, and other such deeds, he displayed in other bodies as things to be abandoned. All these were the inconceivable magical display of the one possessed of every pretense, the supreme activity of skillful means that enters in accord with beings. He performed austerities and engaged in difficult practices. At Vajrāsana he became a buddha, subduing Māra and awakening completely. Having urged the single-pointed absorption, he remained. Displaying miracles, he tamed all, and in due order turned the wheel of Dharma. He also showed the manner of passing into nirvāṇa, and the distribution of relics for the long term.

He whirled forth as peaceful hosts and as wrathful ones, and in the self-arisen varied forms of animals, in the whole world of vessels as a body of power, as Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and the guardians of the world, and as Māras and rākṣasas in their forms. He purified the karma and conceptions of beings, and he arranged the aim of his own wisdom.

At that time the abodes of beings and the hosts of weapons, struck down by the power of the hosts of karmic force, were by the power of suchness, through a great assembly, completely freed from the correct path. Then a throng of great arrogance and haughtiness arose, displaying its own power and miracles. Clinging to the path of affliction and karma, they gathered their own kind together.

"The three worlds are destroyed! Alas, alas! We, the chiefs of the three realms, who is it that emanates, alas, who is worthy to destroy us? He who dwells in the bliss of his own austerities holds the supreme path of passing beyond sorrow. What can another's teaching do? It is a limb of the fearful host of bliss. Who would abandon his own happiness and seek the aim of others' suffering? Even with many inconceivable emanated forms, it is hard to improve the beauty of one's own body. Even with many inconceivable emanated sounds, would they listen to our voice and be drawn on?"

By the light that is called mental conceptualization, they cannot become one-pointed in absorption. Those of fierce and supreme power, splendid in their radiance, dwell in bliss, each in his own conduct.

Then the first host of the māras, together with the Sovereign (Śiva), Brahmā, the great Viṣṇu, the Maker of Light, the Singer, and the Arrogant One, were exceedingly enraged. By their own power they displayed themselves and uttered fierce secret mantras, wrathful words, shouts, and cries. At that time, through the blessing and power of the king, he subdued them by means of the skillful method of entering in accord. The supreme unsurpassed secret vehicle, above all in guarding the three doors, and for the sake of arranging bliss in the true meaning, was brought into accord by great compassion. He taught the long path of entry as blissful, and made them happy through the door of joy. Yet through the force of their own afflictions and arrogance, the conduct that accords with entering the meaning was destroyed. Dense darkness of great delusion spread, and the mountain of pride was raised everywhere. The flames of aversion blazed and burned, envy stirred as a wind, and attachment became a river sweeping all away.

Greatly enraged by the power of arrogance, they urged their hosts upon one another. Drawing forth the strength of secret mantras and magical power, by the force of their loud proclamation they threw the three worlds into turmoil. Human plague and famine spread, weapons seized the harvests and their fruits, and terrifying spirits and hosts of evils arose in ceaseless circling. The earth blazed with fire, water-lords raged, poison and the poison of gems stirred like the wind. The paths of happiness, of higher rebirth, and of liberation were cut off. Overwhelmed by evil minds, beings were made to suffer, and so the buddhas were moved to concern.

Then the assemblies with the bodhisattvas all rose together to the teaching. They bowed toward the principal one, circled him many times, and prostrated. Delighting the Protector of bliss, they made offerings and offered this petition:

O you of great compassion, god of gods, by the nectar-water of loving-kindness and the other joys, you destroy them utterly together with their harmful spirits. May the vajra gathering of wisdom, which dissolves, show the maṇḍala of miraculous display. We beseech you to show the blessing of your enlightened activity. For these beings, stirred by waves of affliction, destroy the blissful path to liberation for themselves and others. If the very awakening mind, a path free of moisture, were to be left to vanish from the three realms of existence, then to what could great compassion be ascribed?

Emaho! The fruit, nirvāṇa! Emaho! The bodhisattva's lotus pond! Emaho! The inexpressible kumuda lily! Emaho! The tree with flowers and fruit! Since these maṇḍalas are utterly pure, they are the abode of the supreme lineage, of defining marks and qualities. How, at this time, would you not purify them? To what could great compassion be ascribed? These fortunate ones are vessels for the teaching, holders of the doctrine of the vajra vehicle. Now they are crushed beneath the mountain of conceptual thought. Since they cannot be tamed by skillful means, so that they may be liberated by force, we beseech you to show the manifold maṇḍalas.

Thus they petitioned.

This is the tenth chapter, on great enlightened activity, from the great tantra, the glorious Hayagrīva's Play, the supreme secret, the unsurpassed intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One entered the absorption called Subduing the Great Gods. From the expanse of body, speech, and mind he drew forth this great maṇḍala of the vajra array and emanated it. It was square with four gates, adorned with all the ornaments of the lintels, and with strings of precious jewels and the like, bells and tassels, and clouds of the five sense pleasures as offerings, banners, victory standards, and parasols, resplendent with twenty-five colors. From a wheel of nine compartments, thrones of lions and the rest were arrayed.

Ka kha ga gha ña. Ca cha ja jha ña. Ṭa ṭha ḍa ḍha ña. Ta tha da dha na. Pa pha ba bha ma. Ya ra la va. Śa ṣa sa ha kṣa. Wisdom, unmixed, the great bliss, shines forth.

The supreme family of emanations abides in the sacred pledge of the dhāraṇī, with the radiance of wrathful, guiding splendor. The body is of the two lineages, transmitted through scripture: red and black, with three faces and six arms. The two faces, yellow-white and red, abide in the manner of Brahmā's countenance. The central face is wrathful and smiling, majestic in bearing. In his hands he holds a lotus, a vajra, a wheel, a bell, and a jewel, together with a three-pronged spear. He is adorned with a hanging garland of precious jewels, with pearls, necklaces, and armlets. He wears an upper garment, a lower wrap, and a cloak. He is adorned with a crown, earrings, rings, and a host of ornaments, and beautified with the major marks and minor features. With the offering of the family, his hair is loosened and flowing.

From his own light he draws forth his consort's form, and sends her out through the mantras of the ten directions.

Hūṃ phaṭ padmo ghr̥ ga ja svāhā. Oṃ duṃ druṃ bhinda ja pra moḥaṃ.

When the enlightened activities he performed are complete, they gather back and dissolve into the body of the Lord.

In the east is Vairocana, of the great mudrā, golden in color, with three faces and six arms, holding a three-pronged spear, a staff, a lotus, a sword, and a bhandha.

In the south is Ratnasambhava himself, dark blue, with three faces and six arms, holding a jewel, a lotus, a curved knife, a trident, a vase, and a three-pronged spear.

In the west is Amitābha, red, with three faces and six arms, holding a skull-staff, a three-pronged spear, a lotus, an axe, a wheel, and a sword.

In the north is Amoghasiddhi himself, green, with three faces and six arms, holding a sword, a vajra, a staff, a spear, a three-pronged lotus, and a leg of Yama.

The right face of each is white, and the left is red, green, and yellow, with that of the elder in the color of his own body. Each embraces his own consort about the neck. The Lord, in the form of a deity with one face and two arms, has a body color endowed with the radiance of secrecy, adorned with all hand-implements and attire.

Oṃ jina jigalaṃ. Dveṣa rati. Sva ratna dhṛga. Maṃ moha rati. Oṃ ārolika. Paṃ rāga rati. Ha prajñā dhṛg. Tāṃ vajra rati. Hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

With a host of radiating light rays he makes the maṇḍala of the family appear clearly. He is seated in the manner of a wheel-turning king in royal attire, in a joyful cross-legged posture.

In the directions and intermediate directions of the surrounding space are the eight bodhisattvas and the eight female bodhisattvas, who arise from the syllables of wisdom in the heart and are summoned by their own secret mantras.

Kṣitigarbha, white-yellow, holds a jewel. Ākāśagarbha, dark blue, holds a sword. Avalokiteśvara, reddish, holds a lotus. Vajrapāṇi, greenish, holds a vajra. In their left hands is a lotus with its stem. In the manner of pride they bow toward the directions.

The goddesses of offering are Lāsyā, Mālā, Gītā, and Nṛtyā, white, yellow, red, and green, radiating light in these colors, with a mirror, a jeweled garland, melodious song, and graceful dance.

Oṃ kṣira jaya. Hūṃ lāsyē samayaṣṭvaṃ. Trāṃ mālē samaya ho. Hrīḥ padma bhandha hri. Giti ra ho haṃ. Anṛti ragayāmi hūṃ phaṭ.

Maitreya, white-yellow, holds a nāga tree. Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin, dark blue, holds a wheel. Mañjuśrī, reddish, holds an utpala. Samantabhadra, green-yellow, holds a jewel-ear. In their left hands they hold a lotus with its stalk. In the posture of bodhisattvas they sit upon their seats.

The goddesses of incense, flowers scattered, lamp, and perfume are in order yellow, white, red, and green, beautified with the substances that accord with their names.

Oṃ mera ni. Ja dhūpa praveśa. Thiliṇ svara mapaya. Hūṃ puṣpa āveśa hūṃ svara caya. Baṃ dīpa bugini. Muṃ śira caya. Ho gandhe cita ya hūṃ phaṭ.

At the eastern gate is Yamāntaka, the great slayer of Yama, dark blue-black, with a staff, a three-pronged spear, and a garland. At the southern gate is Mahābala, yellowish in radiance, with a vajra noose and a jeweled garland. At the western gate is Hayagrīva, victor over terrifying beings, with a skull, a snake, a bell, and a rope of lambs. At the northern gate is Vajra Kuṇḍalin, greenish, with a vajra and a three-pronged spear of power.

The wrathful ones, in majestic and fierce attire, are adorned with the garb of the charnel ground stages. They hold hook, noose, iron chain, and bell, with red eyes, terrifying, amid a mass of light.

Vajra Fang and the others are wrathful and fierce. Father and mother, in embrace, stretch and contract their limbs, reciting the speech of Hūṃ Phaṭ Rulu, in the manner of subduing the wheel of karma.

Oṃ Rulu Padmāntakṛd Hūṃ Phaṭ.

Jaḥ Vajra Krodheśvari Hūṃ Prajñāntakṛd Phaṭ.

Hūṃ Ratna Krodheśvari.

Hūṃ Padmāntakṛd Phaṭ.

Baṃ Padma Krodheśvari Hūṃ Viganāntakṛd.

Ho Karma Krodheśvari Hūṃ Phaṭ Svāhā.

Without outer or inner, this is the great maṇḍala, emanated from the great wisdom of compassion. It is sealed with the four mudrās and crowned with the lord of the family. By a retinue of deities emanated from masses of light, the three worlds are illuminated. The eight great gods, Brahmā and the others, are summoned. By the power of the mantra that overwhelms with vajra splendor, they lose all memory. They are liberated by a host of weapons, and the heap of the three poisons is made to be consumed. By the wrathful song of splendor, the activity of the wrathful ones gathers the great gods and their retinues under control. Having placed them in the great maṇḍala, they are shown the flesh and bones of their former state. Through the vajra nectar samādhi, the great gods are given their bodies again. They are given empowerment together with their retinues and seated in the assembly of Vajradhara. They are entrusted with the secret symbols of the samaya, charged to heed the command in all activity, and set as ornaments of the celestial palace. All are bound to words and melodies in harmony. It is declared that those who break the samaya will taste ruin by oath and life.

This is the eleventh chapter, the emanation of the maṇḍala of the vajra array, from the great tantra, the glorious Hayagrīva Sport, the unsurpassed secret of the minds of all the Tathāgatas.

Then, with the body of Padma Attachment, the radiance of speech was increased. Through the mudrā and the abiding of miraculous power, the city of Golden Eye with its fine petals, the gathering places of Laṅkā, the host of rākṣasas, and the nāga kings were to be brought under control. By the wheel of the power of all miracles, the Buddha considered the training of the great gods and others. Entering into meditative absorption, he performed the emanation of Padma Hayagrīva. From the union of suchness and basic space, there arose the bodhisattva, the father of all the Victors, the Vajra-holder, the Sage and Lord himself, accomplished by the transmission of the emanation of the family itself. His body is red, the color of passion. He has three faces, with a green horse head. In his hands are a curved knife, a khaṭvāṅga, and a skull, with five emanated masses of blazing blood-fire. Eight great nāga lords form his skull garland, and he wears the skin of an elephant and a tiger. His fierce cry resounds in the ten directions, and he has the appearance of obstructing spirits and the like. In the guise of a wrathful sage he bewilders the nāga realm of beings. On a lotus seat, stretching and contracting, he is united with the great consort, the glorious one.

Oṃ Padma Guru He He Rulu Hūṃ Phaṭ.

In the blazing wheel, in the directions and intermediate directions, are eight great wrathful ones of wisdom, with fearsome forms accomplished from Hṛīḥ, each with a majestic green horse head. In the east is Padmeśvara, white, with three faces and six hands. He holds a vajra, a lotus, a nāga, a noose, a jeweled staff, a sword, and a spear. He is embraced by the lioness queen, and treads upon various hostile beings with his feet. He is adorned with earrings of sun and moon, and every part of him is adorned with garlands of snakes. In the south is Gzi-chen Drakpo, the Fierce One, black, with a sword, a three-pronged spear, a vajra, a three-pronged arrow, and a bow. He is embraced by the body of the Fierce Lady. A blazing mountain of fire pervades all around, and the binding of a tigress terrifies other places. He is the emanated messenger of the fire-dragon, and a gathering of wrathful maṇḍalas. In the west is the supreme Vajra Net, red-yellow, who draws a vajra staff. He holds a wheel, a snake noose, a mirror, and water, and with his feet he treads on the greatly terrifying goddess.

Blazing with garlands of radiant lightning, the emanated messenger has the face of a wolf.
He holds a hundred thousand swords and a skull-cup of blood.
In the north is Ö-che, of terrifying great form, green, with a three-pronged great arrow.
He holds a jewel, a conch of blood, and a conch-blood staff.
With red eyes he overpowers the goat-corpse spirits.
The Lord of Victors is joined with the body of the wrathful one.

His crown is a nāga head, adorned with raised hoods, and at the same moment he sounds the great cry of "phud."
All of them, with garlands of skulls and a ground of auspicious wealth, make the charnel grounds into places of purity.

The four great wrathful ones of the intermediate directions bear the half-form of the family, marked with the seed-drop.
Three-faced and six-armed, they blaze with radiance.
They hold the vajra and the skull-staff, and their voice is song.
Wolves, garuḍas, and clouds of sky-iron, garlands of light, seed-drops, and hooked goads adorn them.
They are the magical display of the nāga method, Uhara, surrounded by hosts of goddesses of the sense pleasures.
Everywhere they have red eyes and the mark of the vajra, and in their places they sound the terrifying syllable "Hūṃ."
They dwell in the abode of the king of the nāgas, and they subdue the miraculous powers of others.

Oṃ mahā hayagrīva padma dharuṇaṃ vidhahara hūṃ phaṭ. This is the root mantra.

Oṃ namo uḍṭaṃ heruluruka bamukha ākarṣaya rakṣaṇaṃ guru hūṃ phaṭ.
This is the heart mantra.

Oṃ padma raga makurya rakaṃ ruluruluhūṃ phaṭ. This is the near-heart mantra.

In the four directions of the great maṇḍala are the hook, the chain, the noose, and the bell, white, red, yellow, and green, blazing with radiance.
With lions, wolves, tigers, and dragons, and with a retinue of emanations piled head upon head,
they are seated according to their own actions.
In terrifying attire and fierce forms they abide, carrying out their activity and subduing the maṇḍala of the nāgas.
When the eight great nāgas and the others are gathered in, their power and miraculous ability are made to cease.
By the force of remembering their own pledges,
the eyes are made to desire to see face to face.
Oṃ nāga megha nanāgara caya samaya hūṃ.

Having bestowed empowerment in the secret maṇḍala, the splendid light blazes like a mass of fire.
The crown ornaments of the family are opened and made clear, and together with the abodes of wisdom's hosts of light, through familiar entry into the secret maṇḍala,
the Jewels who uphold the way are revealed directly.
With all the assemblies in a single voice,
they take refuge in the Lord of Dance, and make requests for the sense pleasures and take their vows, and enjoy the treasury of heaped merit.

Kyema! O maṇḍala, so wondrous!
Liberate us and our retinues completely.
The maṇḍala of the Victors, beyond compare, abides like the orb of the sun.
This path of great bliss was not realized before,
but now it is found through your compassionate kindness.
Through those who hold the yogic secret,
we shall act just as the command has been entrusted.
Should we ever decline from this vajra secret pledge, may we perish. Thus they made their vow.

This is the twelfth chapter, the emanation of the maṇḍala of the Horse-Necked Empowerment, from the great tantra, the glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the unsurpassed secret, the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One Padma, in his body, delighted by the command, with a smile of attachment to the Consort, acted by entering the indestructible absorption.
The guardian of the direction, the great king of the gandharvas, together with his own wives and retinue, terrified other places,
and by his own power subdued them completely.
His body shone with the radiance of lapis lazuli.
Three-faced, he played with six mudrās:
a treasury vase of jewels, a great mantra staff,
a wheel, a garland, and a Magadha...
His ornaments and attire were a host of jewels.
The Great Mother, sovereign of space, was red-yellow, joined in the manner of the profound.

Rays of light shone forth, and the fierce emanations of beings.
With crowns of the five families and garlands of jewels, the deity was majestic with four mudrās.

In a palace of blazing jewels, four-sided, four-doored, adorned with porticos, rising from the center of the courtyard and retinue, he sat cross-legged on a lotus center.

In the east was the Subduer, with the body of Vajra, brilliant white, holding a vajra and bell. In the south was Ratnamati, the Jewel of Intellect, with the body of Śrīvatsa, adorned with a parasol, golden yellow with abundant radiance. In the west was the king of discernment, red-white, holding a lotus and a book. In the north was the Liberator of All the World, green-grey, drawing a vajra net.

In the southeast was the sovereign of the net, yellow-grey, holding the precious Bhṛṅgara. In the southwest was the supreme Dharma mountain, holding a three-pointed lotus staff. In the northwest was the Victor's wisdom crest, blue-grey, holding a lion vase. In the northeast was the stacked net of illusion, green-yellow, bearing the sign of the vajra and the garuda.

These bestowed the dominion of a wheel-turning king. Adorned with the major and minor marks and with radiant splendor, they increased the enjoyments of great beings, and they sat joined with their matching consorts.

Oṃ vita jñāna tana saṃbhoga ta hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ dharma muni nasa nasa hūṃ.
Oṃ vihara phramo thana hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ jñāna lotra saṃbhogaya hūṃ phaṭ.
Oṃ ratna marudhe sagram ba hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ mahā śuti musa moha ha hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ buddha buddha saryana kumāra hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ nama gagana sita yoga hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ nisa ha he hi hu mu gara bari hūṃ phaṭ.

By reciting the secret mantra of the wheel, the deities emanate into the outer abodes. Having purified the fierce cause and result, the great wisdom of all purified abodes, the supreme family's luminous wisdom brought under control the lords of the east, the gandharvas and the rest, the guardians and protectors of the places. The host of arrogant beings, proud through affliction and karma, grew calm in their own continuum and, together with the bodhisattvas, took their place before the Blessed One and offered up their essence-mantra with a petition.

Oṃ trakṣa ka sarva rama mama hūṃ hūṃ svāhā.

Blessed One, we pray, bless this awareness mantra of ours. May the teaching quickly spread. We who have been made protectors of all through the mantra of the seal that grants well-being will abide in this maṇḍala at all times, and will protect the yogins who hold it, abiding as servants. We pray that the Protector will again rise, bless us, and grant empowerment and liberation.

When they had made this petition, the Blessed One blessed the awareness essence-mantra, and spoke: Oṃ u oṃ mṛta vigana śuta hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Then, like the first buddhas, they became radiant with light and took their places as ornaments of the celestial palace.

This is the thirteenth chapter, "The Magical Display of the Maṇḍala of the Wisdom Being of Mind," from the great tantra "The Sport of Glorious Hayagrīva, the Secret Unsurpassed Intention of All the Tathāgatas."

Then the bringer of bliss, the Lord of Dance, the great being of the lotus assembly, entered into meditative absorption on the illusory Dharma of precious qualities. Together with the host of ḍākinīs, the Yamas, abiding as kings, great kings, and queens, performed the display of the host of great ḍākinīs in order to tame them along with their retinues.

From the nonduality of means and wisdom arose the radiant Lady Sovereign of Dance, with the color of lotus-ruby and of space. She has one face and four hands. They hold a lotus stem, a vessel of nectar, a vajra khaṭvāṅga, and a noose. She is wrapped in ornaments of precious garlands. Your will takes on a wrathful radiance. Stretching and drawing in her limbs, she stands upon the supreme sun disk, and the ground is adorned with garlands of suns.

Oṃ padma mahā krodhīśvari hūṃ phaṭ.

And the glorious goddess herself, and Oṃ, emanated into the directions and intermediate directions. On lotus seats, marked by fields, stretching and drawing in their limbs, with bodies of dark blue in great numbers, they hold curved knives and skull cups of blood. In a blazing manner they appear, resounding with fierce cries.

With the host of outer emanations, they play in the great charnel ground. Vajra, jewel, lotus, and action, and magical displays laugh in the sky. Like manifold illusions, their eyes widen. Their colors accord with the directions and intermediate directions, bright, yet stained with the dust of darkness. They hold the field-staff with three prongs, a golden arrow, a vajra, a makara banner, and a noose. The great field-staff, a nine-pronged vajra, they raise on high. They gather a curved knife and a noose of entrails. They brandish a three-pronged vajra dripping with blood, and a great field-staff that splits the body open and draws out the heart. In the same way, the one of wind holds a skull cup.

Oṃ vajra takṛd mahā lati ti hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajra tatri medara hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ ḍākī madakumpāya hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ ḍākī nīti breśa hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajraḍākī vilasa hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajraḍākī drikūṭamale hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajraḍākī jvala jvala hūṃ phaṭ.

On the outer lotus petals appear lion, horse, jackal, wolf, vulture, heron, crow, and owl: the eight great ones with heads of beasts, fangs, and wings. Emanated from hūṃ, they are red in color. In their hands are curved knives, skull cups of blood, vajra swords, three-pronged spears, wheels, battle-axes, clubs, and arrows. They manifest cudgels, field-staffs, and flayed skins as their ground, with mongoose, basin, jewel, and garuḍa. Their faces take on the hue of their respective directions. All of them abide wrathful and imposing. They manifest flayed skins as their ground and garlands of skulls, adorned with clusters of blood, fat, and ash. A host of ḍākinīs of the seven families, mothers and sisters, emanated. Their fangs and wings blaze and stir the ten directions.

Oṃ serava rana hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ niraṃ teśa pamukha hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ kaṃ namaduna hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ muranaṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sūrya samoka hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajra snigaśabruṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ niśa kurya rana hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ relaṃ subagaśa hūṃ phaṭ.

These sixteen ḍākinīs too have garlands of blazing light and lightning. They emit the sound of rolulu in the light. Their glances are wrathful and fierce, and they have fangs. Each has one face and four arms, in a playful manner. They fully realize the basic space and wisdom, and their hands perform their respective activities. Their faces and bodies are each of their own color.

Oṃ ruku saṃ ta guna ḍeta samoraga hūṃ phaṭ: this is the essence mantra.

Oṃ vajraḍākī jāla śaṃbara kumāra hūṃ phaṭ: this is the near mantra.

Oṃ ḍākī hūṃ saṃbara jālimukha mame hūṃ phaṭ: this is the root mantra.

By the power of emanating the maṇḍala of the ḍākinīs, those beings fell unconscious, without recollection. Then they were gathered back into the ḍākinīs' own retinue and arranged in the great maṇḍala of the pledge. Thereafter, together with the host of ḍākinīs, having abandoned the abodes of those to be tamed, they uphold the Victor's teaching and bring about the union with the Vajra Vehicle.

This is the fourteenth chapter, the emanation of the ḍākinīs, from the glorious Tantra of the Play of the Supreme Horse, the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, chief of the joyful, the Tathāgata, lord of dance, in union with his radiant consort, emanates the maṇḍalas of the ten directions. Entering meditative absorption, he subdues the obstructing spirits of the directions. He emanates the maṇḍala that subdues the three realms, abiding as the nature of all the buddhas. In a splendid palace of blazing jewels, upon a jewel lotus and a lion throne, adorned with stainless sun and moon disks, the great supreme deity at the center has eight legs and sixteen arms. He is red-yellow, like the sun's disk, and possesses the bearing of the obstructors and others. He holds a lotus, a vajra, a wheel, a sword, a skull cup, a jewel, and a battle-axe, and a cloth. With him is the great consort, the sovereign lady, graceful, adorned in garlands of precious ornaments, and bathed in a stainless lotus.

Oṃ bhagavate ruka saṃ pogataya hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ vajrasattva hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ ratnasattva hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ padmasattva hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ karmasattva hūṃ phaṭ.

Upon the summit of the wheel and lotus they are seated, in the manner of embracing their consorts.

In the outer lotus, in the seven families, there is a gathering of two thousand Sugatas, fathers and consorts. The Sugata of the vajra family and of the jewel family, and the lotus family with its varied expanse of sky, have bodies the color of padmarāga, ruby. Beginning with Indra, the seven in succession hold a topknot, a crest-jewel, a vase, a staff, a bell, a book, a banner of Dharma, and a rosary. All of them have three faces and six arms, adorned with precious ornaments and garlands, radiant with light. Their hand implements are a curved knife, a skull cup, a garland of lotuses, and a trident. They also hold four additional hands, and first they hold the mudrā that is their own emblem.

Oṃ vajra duki visika duku ṇḍika mṃ hri saṃ gata sūṃ sra mota phaṭ svāhā.
This is for the Tathāgatas.

Oṃ vajra samoyoga tasaralasū hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the jewels.

Oṃ padma buṃ sini haṃ he he maṃ baṃ hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the lotus families.

Oṃ karma bhyo truṃ hūṃ rakṣa murya sa hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the action family.

Oṃ vajra cakra bruṃ sitiyoḡīśvari hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the wheel family.

Then the gathering of emanated maṇḍalas, sent forth in all directions, serve as messengers of the vajra family. They summon the spirits of the kings of the directions. Making them terrified, they summon enemies, and those who are quarreling in their separate families are pinned down with the secret mantra of the vajra. Recollect your own pledge, and offer the essence of life. With the secret pledge of the vajra, once empowerment and blessing are completed, seat them in the secret place of the maṇḍala. Casting aside the place that holds the secret, establish them within your own body, and place them as the ornaments of the celestial palace.

The essence of these is: Oṃ samudara jinna naga sutra bhava sitri sniśa hūṃ pruṃ phaṭ.

The mantra for restoring again is: Oṃ sumuge ḍaṃ saṃ myag he he rutu pala sitaṃ ja hūṃ phaṭ.

The condensed essence of the deities is: Oṃ sarva sakara bruṃ baḡśa saṃ mebraṃ mu rakṣa hūṃ.

This is the fifteenth chapter, "Subduing the Three Realms," from the tantra "The Glorious Supreme Horse's Play," the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the body of the Lord of Dance, gathered all the buddhas together, emanated a wrathful maṇḍala, and set about subduing the yakṣa Drulbum.

The celestial palace is triangular and dark blue. At the center, upon a wheel and a sun-disk seat, is the great glorious Padma Heruka, resplendent with the adornments of the great charnel ground. He has three faces and six arms, his body the color of padmarāga. He holds a trident, a club, a sword, a lotus, a noose, and a skull drum. He emanates an elephant hide and a fresh skull. He embraces his consort in union, in the manner of method and wisdom joined. From the syllable he emanates the adornments of wrathful ones.

In the east is Vijaya, white-blue, with three faces and six arms, holding a vajra, a conch, a wheel, a jewel, a lotus, and a sword marked with blazing fire-light.

In the south is the Slayer of Yama, blue-black, with three faces and six arms, holding a skull staff, a jewel, a mongoose, a trident, a pile of flames, and a skull drum.

In the west is the wrathful body of Hayagrīva.

With three faces and six arms, his color is reddish-blue. He holds a wheel, a threatening finger, and a trident, along with a sword, a skull cup, and a ḍamaru drum.

In the north is Amṛtakunḍalin, swirling with nectar. He is green-blue, with three faces and six arms, holding a net, a curved knife, and a lotus, together with a club and a three-pronged spear, and he grips a lion.

In the southeast is Nīladaṇḍa, the Blue Staff. He is blue-gray, with three faces and six arms, holding a staff, a wheel, and a lotus, together with a banner, a bhaṇḍa, and a bell.

In the southwest is the protector Acala, the Immovable. He has three faces and is yellowish-gray, with six arms. He holds a jewel, a sword, and a pestle, a lotus, a skull cup of blood, and a three-pronged spear.

In the northwest is Ṭakkirāja, the King of Desire. He is reddish-blue, with three faces and six arms, holding a vajra, a staff, a jewel vase, and a skull cup filled with nectar.

In the northeast is Mahābala, the Great Power, smoke-colored. He has three faces and six arms, with a terrifying radiance. He holds a three-pronged vajra and a great corpse-belly, various vajras, and a great corpse's blood. He wears fearsome attire and a garland of wrathful ones, and he moves with the playful gestures of one who casts out the demonic.

The mantras are these. Oṃ vajrakrodha vijaya hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha yamāntaka hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha hayagrīva hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha amṛtakunḍali hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha nīladaṇḍa hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha ārya acala hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha ṭakkirāja hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ vajrakrodha mahābala hūṃ phaṭ.

The guardians of the directions, the kings, the yakṣas, and the hosts of vase-bearing spirits are all brought under his power. When they are subdued by fierce secret mantra, they are again received and transformed into the womb of wisdom. The secret empowerment of the maṇḍala is conferred, and in the manner of other maṇḍalas the pledges are given. The offering of the life-essence and heart of all is blessed through the great pledge. Once more the mantra that upholds the pledge is bestowed upon all the retinue. Oṃ vajra karaka mūrdha sinabhamukha hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ āḥ hūṃ vajra sukata bhamotraṃ alala hūṃ phaṭ.

The pledge of all the gods arises from the three secrets of the vajra. The body of the vajra yakṣa, fierce in power, gives empowerment over the three realms through time. He is victorious over the ways of saṃsāra, and through awakening mind that very reality becomes clear.

This is the sixteenth chapter, on the play of wrathful enlightened activity, from the Tantra of the Playful Supreme Horse, the glorious, unsurpassed secret of the realized intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Lord of Dance, adorned himself with the ornaments of a laughing, majestic splendor. In order to tame the city of the asuras, he manifested the maṇḍala of the Mother. It is a supreme and excellent abode, emanated from the dharmadhātu, the nature of the Victors, issuing forth jewels. It is a square palace with gateways, beautiful with eight pillars and roof beams. Seated on a lotus throne at the center is the body of the Mother, the play of non-duality. Her color is red, her ornaments are of great copper-colored form. She has one face and four arms, with a beautiful radiance. She holds a wheel, a conch, a lotus of blood, and a blazing jewel with nine points. She wears a garland of jewels and lotuses. Her upper body is finely clothed, and she sits in the excellent maṇḍala. Oṃ padma musara samakata hūṃ phaṭ.

In the east and the other directions are the radiant goddesses: Padmadhātṛvīśvarī, Ratnamālā, and Gītā, the Great Singer. They are white, red, yellow, and green in color. They hold a three-pronged vajra, a lotus, and a net, and vessels filled with the jewels of nara and sila. They do not emanate their own maṇḍalas, and they sit upon various lotus seats. Oṃ cuṇḍeśvari hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ śṇīśa vajra saṃbrumṅa hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ byicu svate hūṃ phaṭ.

On the lotus petals of the intermediate directions are the four great Mothers who generate bliss: Jālinī, Vidyutmālinī, the Winged One, and Kāmā. They are white, yellow, reddish-blue, and bluish-green, and they abide in an excellent hue. They hold a vajra, a jewel, a lotus, and a green utpala flower, and they perform excellent deeds. Oṃ nute noca kru hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ saṃbhogata suhebya hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ mama kribrum hehe hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ tare gagana amala hūṃ phaṭ.

In all directions, space pervades.

Abiding as though filling a sesame seed, all the hosts of the Mothers and the Lords of Death are thrown into turmoil, trembling and wild with terror. They go for refuge to the Compassionate One, and they offer up the very essence of their life force.

Then the maṇḍala is gathered in. Empowerment is conferred in each one's own place, and they receive the vow of the joyful pledge. The wisdom of the Sugatas becomes clear. All agree together, guard the pledge, and sustain the practice of yoga.

Oṃ me ma rakta sabra ti idaṃ sabuta phaṭ. Oṃ trakṣa ra la si baṭa ta phaṭ. This is the essence of the Mothers and the elemental spirits. Oṃ yume sidha rulu rulu hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the yakṣas. Oṃ āḥ hūṃ yoga brigu me, hasa hasa, rulu rulu hūṃ phaṭ. This is the mantra for restoring and blessing once more.

This is the seventeenth chapter, the chapter on the emanation of the maṇḍala of the precious expanse, from the Tantra of the Glorious Hayagrīva's Play, the unsurpassed secret of the realization of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Lord of Dance himself, with the wheel of body, speech, and mind of all the buddhas of the three times, entered into the absorption that subdues and gathers those below the earth, upon the earth, and above it, the subjugators, the planets and the stars, the māras and all their retinues of kin. Resting in that absorption, he emanated a wheel.

From the clear light rays of the accomplishment of skillful means and wisdom, the three thousand worlds were filled. There stood a blazing jeweled palace, its four doors adorned with garlands and pediments. It had three tiers of wheels together with their seats, and was encircled by vajras, lotuses, and jewels, and by the finest lions and elephants.

At the center, upon a lotus made beautiful by the sun, is the hero together with his consort. He has one face and four arms, and holds a vajra, a jewel, a lotus, and a sword. The one who moves everywhere in red and yellow is embraced by a green-yellow lotus and a bell. He is wrapped in the major and minor marks and garlands of ornaments, and wears a crown adorned with the assembly of the buddhas. He is beautified by the four mudrās.

On the spokes of the vajra wheel are twenty-four heroes of the families, with the radiance of white, red, and yellow. They hold the vajra, the bell, and the lotus in meditation. They carry the jeweled wheel with its hub. The first two hands show the sign, and the remaining hands hold curved knives and skull cups. In wrathful form, yet with the bearing of heroes, they are adorned with garlands, the three lords of the families, wrapped in blazing jeweled ornaments.

Om vajra svata krodha hehe rulu hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the vajra families. Padma teṣṭha svāda na ma kuru kuru hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the heroes of the lotus family. Om iku ri cakbandha sidhi phaṭ phaṭ, krodhi śvari hūṃ phaṭ. This is for the Tathāgata family.

At the four doors are the beautiful wrathful goddesses: the great heroine Unsuiting-Intellect, and the four of Wisdom Space. They are white, yellow, and red, and so on in due order. They hold the vajra hook, the noose, the iron chain, and the bell as their emblematic gestures. Om vajra aṅkuśa jaḥ, pāśa hūṃ, sphoṭa paṃ, gheṇḍe hoḥ phaṭ. These perform the acts of summoning, drawing in, and binding, and with the rite of bringing down they bring delight.

The maṇḍala of the body, speech, and mind of all the buddhas of the three times is gathered here. The heroes of the three families are shown as wrathful ones, with a fearsome bearing and a ferocious manner. Vajra Cutter is greatly terrifying. Vajra Destroyer captivates the mind. Vajra Excellent is supreme in intellect. Vajra Teaching is victorious in battle. Lotus Great Cloud has the voice of thunder. Lotus Clear Mind destroys sorrow. Lotus Trunk is intoxicated with his roar. Lotus Radiance shines with the light of nectar. They swiftly turn back the heaped-up cycle of saṃsāra.

Wheel Joy is supreme nectar of honey. Wheel Liberator binds the three peaks. Wheel Play is the power that gives delight. These are emanations, bodies of the retinue assembly, who subdue the beings of the three places.

Then the planets and the stars, with fierce and venomous roars, emitted a great cry, and emanated forth as well.

They will be left without power or miraculous display. They take refuge in the great maṇḍala and pledge to uphold the teaching. Offering each his own life-essence, with body and mind in faith, they receive empowerment in the great maṇḍala, and the consecration is to be set upon the seat.

This is the eighteenth chapter, the chapter on all the solitary buddhas arising as wrathful ones, from the great tantra "The Play of the Glorious Supreme Horse," the unsurpassed secret of the intentions of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the lord of the gods, together with the Great Bliss Lotus and his consort, for the sake of cause and result among the six classes of beings, emanated the maṇḍala of the awakening mind of great bliss. The abode of the great maṇḍala blazes, with the eight terrifying ones, Jewel Garland and the others. It is adorned like the place of the great charnel ground. In the central wheel, with its seat, the Heruka of the five families is enthroned, joined in embrace with the five great consorts. All have three faces and six arms, shining red, black, white, yellow and green. They hold vajra, khaṭvāṅga, sword, trident, a staff and a skull-drum. In the right hands, a conch cup; in the left, a skull filled with blood. The middle hands hold the curved knife and the lotus. The last pair embrace the consort in union. They have nine eyes, red with wrath, reversed in gaze. Their wrathful, tawny hair is bound upward. They are adorned with skulls, blood and ash, and beautified with ornaments of deer-skin cloth.

Oṃ vajra śrī heruka vajra krodheśvari hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ buddha śrī heruka buddha krodheśvari hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ ratna śrī heruka hūṃ phaṭ, ratna krodheśvari hūṃ phaṭ. Padma śrī heruka hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ padma krodheśvari hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ karma śrī heruka hūṃ phaṭ, karma krodheśvari hūṃ phaṭ.

Adorned with the great bliss of awakening mind, they pervade all with their play. The three realms, unmixed, are distinguished in their expanse, and become the nondual great bliss. Empowerment, blessing and the families bestow the consecration. Generated, each head is adorned with its own lord, and they unite in equal embrace with the four goddesses who stir the aspiring and the entering mind.

This is the nineteenth chapter, the chapter on great bliss, from the tantra "The Play of the Glorious Supreme Horse," the unsurpassed secret of the intentions of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One rested in his own intention and remained there. At that very time, the king of the māras, Matrarutra, displayed his own great miraculous powers. With his retinue he ran through the ten directions, obstructing the awareness-holders and all yogins, cutting off all the happiness of the higher realms, and stirring up his own afflictions.

Then the Blessed One entered meditative absorption called Miraculous Display of the Mind. By the boundless light rays of the families, he illuminated all the worlds of the three thousand in an instant.

In this three-thousandfold world of the lord of Victors, he blessed a beautiful and excellent palace. It was adorned with jewel pillars and rows of seats, with beautiful forms and every other ornament. There were thrones of jewels, sun and moon, supported by lotuses and lions. With fine doors and a spacious porch, he emanated a pure celestial mansion, an excellent palace.

Then the Blessed One of great bliss, in the body of the glorious lord of dance, roused the assemblies of buddhas, maṇḍalas and families with clouds of joy. By the power of nondual great bliss, the maṇḍalas of the families became one. With vast, perfect and complete clarity, he emanated a vast maṇḍala.

In the center is the lotus family king, the chief, shining with the radiance of the Lotus Vajra, in a terrifying body with three faces and six arms, whose joyful vajra eyes whirl. In all the directions, beginning with the east,

The supreme sugatas, the vajra-beings, Vairocana, Ratnasambhava and Amoghasiddhi, shine in the radiance of their weapons in the directions, and those of the jewel direction: the vajra, the wheel, the jewel, the sword and the lotus, and the crossed vajra. The chief, of the lotus family, bears six implements; the sound of emptiness rings in the bell in his left hand.

The Buddhas with lovely eyes are Locanā, Māmakī, Pāṇḍaravāsinī and Samayatārā. Beautiful in color and bearing their implements, they are the four chief ones. They are the buddhas' meditative absorption, the power of miraculous display, the union of skillful means and wisdom, and the assembly of the thousand.

On the blazing tips of the wheel, each shows its own distinct mark. Red-radiant, white, and golden in color, and shining with the sapphire hue, they hold the lotus, the vajra, the wheel and the jewel, together with the lotus trident. In the right hand is a wheel, in due order; adorned splendidly, they sit in the vajra posture, majestic.

Furthermore, blazing hosts of wrathful ones fill the outer wheel and the spaces between, and at the gates and elsewhere, in fearsome forms, they abide with an air of haughty power. They are the tenfold hosts, emanations bearing weapons, who perform the work of the emanations of the families: the wrathful ones who terrify the three realms, together with the pure assemblies of ḍākinīs. Splendidly arrayed with charnel-ground ornaments, with the colors of the families and their weapons, rays of light stream forth in dense profusion, and they proclaim the fierce secret mantra.

Thus, having perfected in an instant the maṇḍala of the wrathful and peaceful hosts, one should send it forth to the outer realm, and make it the share of the continuous flow of secret mantra.

HŪṂ ALALA HO. MAHĀPADMA HRDAYA. A Ā OM ĀḤ HŪṂ. MAHĀPADMA KURU. HALA HALA BHIṢANA HŪṂ HŪṂ PHAṬ.

The abode where the buddhas dwell in the thousandfold world, and those greatly agitated, swollen with pride and deluded: having made them happy with the light of the blazing maṇḍala, arrange them in the buddha-field of their own buddha. Having gathered the maṇḍala back into its place, and having beautified one's own wheel, one is perfected through empowerment and blessing, and the crown is adorned with the lord of the family.

OM PADMA KUNDHALI HRDAYA NA BI MUKURU HANA DAHA HŪṂ PHAṬ.

When all utter the secret mantra, the vajra messenger who gathers the three worlds, Vajrakīlaya, paralyzes the haughty chief ones.

Then the Blessed One of great bliss, in order to rouse all the buddhas, struck the vajra bell three times and uttered the great mantra of the great pledge. The assemblies of the Tathāgata families, from the vajra of gathering absorption, abide as one and behold beings.

The haughty chief ones, the unruly, are confused and misled about cause and effect, and will not turn from the teaching of the buddhas. Clinging to the wrong path, and puffed up by the might of their conceit, they destroy the three worlds. If they cannot be tamed by peaceful means, then although the play of wrathful ones is performed, he sees that they are to be tamed and takes counsel.

Alas! Great hosts of the untamed, as occurred in the past, have appeared again in this present time. From the words of the Tathāgata they stray onto the wrong path; arising in wrathful guise, they make all sentient beings exceedingly wrathful and fierce. By the signs of this having occurred, they take rebirth in evil realms such as the Unceasing Hell, and depend on unbearable extremes of suffering. By what means could they be tamed?

Deeply deluded, stupefied hosts, likewise with evil habitual tendencies, sever the lineage of the seven vidyādhara, and the scriptures of the teaching will perish. Beings wander in the darkness of karma; there are evil times, evil families, slanderers, harmful spirits and misleading demons; the three existences are destroyed and the pledges violated. By such means the buddhas' compassion shows its magical display: a mass of those who view themselves as mountains, who have gained power and are deluded by great pride.

In the present age this will come to pass. After the Victor has passed away, in the age of joining and union, beings will be deluded about karma as it truly is. Hold in your care the very self of all the buddhas. Through the great means of the sport of manifest conduct, these beings are brought into the time of the teaching.

The three existences are venomous and fierce, and peaceful means will not benefit them. From the essential nature of wisdom and skillful means, all the Tathāgatas act as wrathful ones. If those who take on the wrathful guise, in their wrath, burn the three worlds, then what need to speak of the compassion of the buddhas, wrathful, burning all three realms without remainder?

Out of the essential nature of what is naturally pure, through the winds of jealousy and delusion, the world wanders in perversion. Separated from the path of things as they truly are, beings have entered the path that ruins the three realms. For the sake of these pitiable worlds, and of the deluded hosts who are hard to tame even by clairvoyance, the host of wrathful ones carries out the joining. Thus it was proclaimed.

This is the twentieth chapter, the chapter on the maṇḍala of manifestation and the subduing, from the Tantra of the Sport of Glorious Hayagrīva, the Supreme Horse, the unsurpassed secret of the intent of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Great Joy, in the form of Padmanarteśvara, the Lord of Dance of the Lotus, together with Mātangi, Rudra, and others, in order to tame the hosts of māras, sported as the single form of the Great Mother.

Clouds of awakening mind radiated into the ten directions. The three maṇḍalas became clear, the maṇḍala of the assembled host was vast, and the great self of the great maṇḍala was vast. Joyful and dancing, he took his seat. He has three faces, radiant like a snow mountain, and holds a lotus, a pestle, and a trident. He wears jewel ornaments and a crown of adornments. Through the samādhi of the manifested maṇḍala, he made emanations in a single vessel at a single time.

Without edge or center, in all the abodes of the world, the celestial palace blazes, fierce and dark blue-black. It has a wheel of six spokes, with courtyards in sequence like the sun's orbs, with half-moons, doorways with encircling borders, and four corners, adorned with blazing jewels and skull-staffs. It rests upon the wheel of immeasurable wisdom, and is draped with many terrifying wrathful ornaments. It is an abode spontaneously accomplished, as vast as the limits of space.

By the power of aspiration, empowerment, and the blessing of compassion, in the six worlds, the four times, and the ten directions, when the whole form realm is gathered under his sway, then, to crush the pride of the eight fierce gods, the Great Gods and guardians of the directions formed the walls. To bring to completion the four bodies and the eight glories, the great kings of the four classes were taken up and made the pillars. For the sake of what surpasses the other vehicles, great elephants and kalaliṅga birds were made the foundation posts. To fulfill the wishes of the people of the four continents, the planets and stars were made the lattice, so that there is no change or reversal. To overwhelm the world with majesty, lions and kalaśas were made the molten base. To purify forever the old stagnant ditch of saṃsāra, a milk of ambrosia drips from the lions' mouths. The courtyards of skulls and bones were adorned with vajra spikes. There are great fields, drums, banners, pennants, and parasols. So that compassion and the bodhisattvas pervade everywhere, it is clearly equipped with blazing sun and moon ornaments. Emanated fire, wind, and thunder divide the four times, with the origin of the wrathful ones and the sound of compassion.

There are jewel thrones, with lotus, sun, and moon seats. The golden three-eyed lions, the six, the four, and the twenty-eight of exalted power, dwell in the courtyards on eight-legged thrones. Through great compassion there are twenty-eight suns; the fearless lions are twenty-eight; having attained the emanation body, there are twenty-eight sovereign ladies. Everywhere they abide in radiance, endowed with the strength to lift the jewel-legged thrones. The Protector, in a secluded place, for others hides what is seen and what is walked: the scriptural teaching on the nature of reality. It is the abode where the enlightened activities are completely fulfilled.

The four families, the blood-drinking Heruka, the unchanging dwelling, the body of truth (dharmakāya): that very reality is the scriptural teaching of all-pervading light. The lotus Leberen, the light of the ten directions, is the manner in which all buddhas arise. That which has become attached is the lotus; the greatness of it, or its qualities, the scripture reveals. Through the pure, stainless expanse of space, the scripture of the unattached Lotus-Holder is shown. Empty and luminous, what else could be more exalted? It is a stacking of sun and moon discs. By the great gathering of the wheel of lions, inseparable from skillful means and wisdom, free of elaboration and spontaneously rounded, is the scripture of the unborn nature of reality. Because the rays of light shine forth in clarity, it is the scripture of wisdom, secret and concealed in the depths. The gathering that has become the pervasion of emanation and withdrawal is the secret mother of the family of wisdom. Through the samādhi of the joy of skillful means and wisdom, the great maṇḍala, the complete and perfect great gathering, is to be perfected, in the very body of the lord, the great wrathful one, by this secret mantra.

Oṃ padma śrī heruka padma krodhīśvari hūṃ, mahācaṇḍa sarva duṣṭān phaṭ.

The lord of the maṇḍala has a majestic bearing, blazing with fire-light, a radiant red glow, the splendor of rays streaming forth. His five heads abide in the four directions in the manner of the four activities. The central head gazes upon the expanse of equality and bliss. His hair rises to the peak of existence, blazing like fire. His brows are wrathful and swift, like lightning. His body is short, his ornaments are those of a fierce gaze, and with three eyes on each face he beholds his own domains. He is clothed in the wings of the vajra and jewel garuḍa. With sixteen playful eyes and hand implements, he stands with eight graceful legs, adorned with ornaments, in order to overpower the three worlds. With his wrathful retinue he tramples in proud posture, together with his consort. At the tips of the diverse streaming rays he displays the varied appearances of the five families of the Sugatas. He purifies his own field and subdues the fierce abodes, and sets all in the great maṇḍala of the families. By the entire maṇḍala of the victors of the ten directions he brings forth the joy of father and mother together. In the center, upon the lotus, sun, and moon discs, the seed syllables of body, speech, and mind appear complete and clear.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata kāya vajra svabhāva ātmako 'ham.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata vāk vajra svabhāva ātmako 'ham.

Oṃ sarva tathāgata citta vajra svabhāva ātmako 'ham.

On the six blazing spokes of the wheel are the six great ḍākinī queens of the kha-mgya, each with one face and two hands, in a terrifying form. What are the signs and forms of the six families?

Buddha-vajra oṃ. Sattva-vajra hūṃ. Ratna-vajra trāṃ. Padma-vajra trīḥ. Karma-vajra ha. Ghuna-vajra phaṭ.

Having radiated outward to pervade the outer maṇḍala, and having purified the realms of beings, animals, and the rest, they hold the vajra, wheel, precious jewel, lotus, sword, khaṭvāṅga with three prongs, and bell, while in the left hand each holds a skull-cup full of nectar. They are fierce ḍākinīs crowned with the heads of the families, draped in their own garlands and in charnel-ground ornaments, seated in the varied forms of the kha-mgya of action.

From the mind maṇḍala of the Great Glorious One, the blind and the backward-bound complete their ornaments. In bodies of diverse colors and signs, with linked hands, they hold skull-cups of copper.

Oṃ śrī khāi, oṃ īśvari khāi, traṃ, śrī khāi a.

The sixteen blind and the wandering ones arise, and should be arranged in the places of the skull-wall courtyard.

Oṃ śrī khāi hūṃ. Śrī khāi hūṃ.

The eight iron she-wolves, with their emanations, and the ten wisdom-emanated dogs sit fiercely. Like a mountain of fire and clouds, they churn and swirl, and all are seated in the places of the outer courtyard.

Oṃ tibta cakra śvāna mumora khaṃ hūṃ phaṭ. Kukura yakṣa hūṃ phaṭ.

From the mind maṇḍala of the Great Glorious One, through the mudrā of jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ, come the one-legged one with nine stacked heads, the one with eight heads and eight arms in play, and the one with six heads, six arms, and six legs.

The one with three heads, three legs, and three arms: in the four gates of the great maṇḍala they play with the mudrās of boundless emanation. From the blessing of their play, there arise, perfectly complete in form, the awakening mind that is method and wisdom, filling all the directions, above and below and in between, radiant with the mudrās of the fire-dragon and the wind-dragon.

Oṃ jina lato ca raṃ yakṣa kuru bañca hūṃ phaṭ.

Furthermore, the gathered maṇḍalas of emanation, the red-handed servants of the rhinoceros, the conch-bird, the kruṅkruṅ crane, and the rest, are encircled by a host of beings filling the world.

Oṃ haha ruru mahā caṇḍeśvari viśanaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

This is the root mantra of all.

Oṃ padma vita sito he he cakrebhyo phaṭ.

This is the heart mantra.

Oṃ hulu hulu hūṃ phaṭ. E a maralī hūṃ ja.

This is the near-heart mantra.

By speaking "Oṃ bhyo e ā ralī ja," the entire wheel of wrathful ones comes forth. Their own maṇḍalas become non-dual, and they abide in the causal maṇḍala of the Great Heruka himself, and they arrange the sacred commitments of their own maṇḍalas.

Then the host of the wheel of emanations blesses all to play. They bring the māras, the boastful spirits, and the bewildering spirits into their own abode.

Oṃ hulu hulu raṃ jala e a ralī jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ. Alala ho.

Oṃ matra rutra hala hala hūṃ phaṭ.

To purify the substance of the three poisons, the fierce host of wrathful ones issues forth in the ten directions. With frowning and smiling they show the mudrās, and they utter the secret mantra of he he ru ru. With the vajra laughter of hala, they cause the māras, rākṣasas, and the rest to fall into a faint.

Oṃ sarva pāpa kara heta pa byīśa matarutra hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva pāpa heta ba byīśa khataṅ rutra hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ sarva pāpa kara heta pa byīśa khataṅ rutra hūṃ phaṭ.

The host of messengers of the Great Glorious One's mind maṇḍala sends down a great hail of glorious vajra thunderbolts. By hūṃ and phaṭ the three realms of existence and saṃsāra are destroyed. The blessing of hūṃ and phaṭ is beyond thought. The vajra blood-drinkers drain the ocean of blood. Vajra weapons, meteoric iron, swirl together in a tumult. They crush the māras of the wrong views of the secret mantra. The great vajra hail blazes and roils, grinding to ashes the hearts and faculties of those who have broken their commitments. Wisdom and compassion: alala.

Om mahā śrī heruka bandha bandha garja garja hala hala hūṃ phaṭ.

Then, having slain and slain the māras together with the rudras with vajra weapons, they play with the enjoyments of the retinue. The flesh and blood, the inner liberation, the nectar, the bones, limbs, and sense faculties, they make into a feast of offerings for the assembly. In harmony, with a single voice and melody, they praise with the vajra song of all their joy.

From the purified nature of compassion, the lotus, in the heart arises the awakening mind, emanated from laṃ. The supreme bodies, majestic in the four directions and the center, are the five wisdoms known to the accomplished buddhas. Glorious in body, excellent and noble in the expanse of the face, he is the Horse-Voiced One, supreme in power, spontaneously accomplished. The path of liberation, compassion, and skillful means are emanated; with the blessing of wisdom, he emanates as a hundred thousand wrathful kings. Perfected through long aspirations that bring beings to ripeness, free of any extreme of focus, in the manner of the lotus consort, he sees all phenomena without remainder, clearly.

In the manner of the lotus of unattached compassion, all sounds and languages are freed from extremes. Through defining characteristics, the profound and far-reaching meanings of the Dharma, the wind of the nostrils severs the three poisons at the root. Through the connection with the face's haṃ, the five lineages are cut. Sharp, fierce fangs sever birth and death at the root. The speech of the broad, firm tongue expounds as an ocean.

Skilled in taming beings with hands that move in play, by stirring his four wings he accomplishes the four enlightened activities. In the manner of his playful feet he subdues all beneath him. His great body, with its massive limbs, is like a mountain. His supreme mind is the wisdom of emptiness, a sun spread wide. He is the abode from which wisdom and the supreme deities arise with blessing. In wondrous play he is the lord of all wrathful ones. I prostrate and offer praise to the hero who holds the supreme body.

Then, through the body of the empowerment of great bliss, he proclaims the wheel of the samaya commitments, and he makes the secret vajra body, speech, and mind arise clearly with blessing.

Oṃ āḥ hūṃ sarva pañca amṛta samayogi siddhi hūṃ. Paho kaka mala suta sa hūṃ. Oṃ vajra samaya krodha samaya oṃ āḥ hūṃ. Mahāyogi cittaraṃ bara rakta mala khāi khāi hūṃ. Oṃ kha khale la rulu rulu hūṃ phaṭ. Idhana samaya alala ho. With these words he sang the vajra song, and he danced the lotus dance. By the offering of great bliss, all are satisfied.

At that time, the hosts of māras and others who are to be subdued are adorned with the wisdom of the awakening mind of great bliss. Through the power of empowerment and the like, he becomes known as the Lord of All Knowledge-Holders. He abides outside the great maṇḍala and holds the secret maṇḍala. His retinues, too, if they receive the essence of the samaya, undertake to become his servants. The essence is spoken: mama traksha rutra mamabhyo. The mantra for commanding them again: oṃ rulu rulu hūṃ bhyo padma hṛd dha ruru hūṃ bhyo hūṃ.

This is the twenty-first chapter, the gathering of the great secret, from the glorious Tantra of the Play of the Supreme Horse, the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Lord of Dance, gathered the maṇḍala of the lineages. Through the power of the play of nonduality with himself, the wrathful kings of great body, the body, speech, and mind of all the buddhas, the secret speech, the samaya, and the great mudrā, the maṇḍala of the cause, the samaya body, make the arrayed maṇḍala beautiful.

The palace is the source of the qualities of the dharmadhātu. It is the maṇḍala of the Victors, crowned with the lineages. He is the sovereign of the lineages who liberates all beings without remainder. He is the great maṇḍala of vajra array and ornament. He possesses the five lineage bodies of the faculties, the objects, and their gatherings. Wisdom and means, nondual, are never separated. By liberating the three times at once he is adorned with the three subduings. He is magnificent in his adornment of freeing the three realms entirely. Unabiding in sorrow, he proclaims an ocean of scriptures. Unveiled and unobscured, his exalted state is seen to be beautiful. He hastens, with the six graceful movements, to liberate beings who never turn back. His dance, unobstructed, is endowed with the force of blessing. His neighing, melodious in tone, delights his consort and kin.

Breath issues from the midst of the red-tawny hair. The special quality of the broad, majestic forehead, and the special quality of the blazing, luminous horse's throat, are supreme in meaning and wondrous in excellence. The nature of the green, flaming horse's head is the unchanging wisdom, clear as it is. With the radiance of loving-kindness he sees the special features of the three realms. The supreme feature is the blazing of the thick, steady mane. In the countless buddha-fields, such as the Densely Arrayed, upon a single atom there are as many wrathful ones as there are atoms, and they gather all three fields entirely under their power. The horse's neigh, in which wisdom and means are joined, is the Brahmā-like horse-song of the glory of accomplishment. With the first tone it proclaims the Victors' buddha-fields. The second tone resounds upon the summit of Meru. The special quality of the pleasing, threefold melody of his speech shows the path of liberation from the harmful conceptions of the sixteen later ages. His eyes move swiftly like lightning, and he destroys the flesh-eating, blood-drinking rākṣasas. The horse's neigh that pierces the mind makes all beings in darkness clearly seen. The source, the realm, the number, the means of seeing, and the meaning of conceptuality...

From the seed syllable hūṃ the maṇḍala of the great glorious wrathful deity arises. Its place is the warm, long-drawn breath of the nose. The maṇḍala of the mudrās brings forth a display of manifold magical emanations. The wide chamber of the nostril's wind is the life-force of wisdom. With the secret churning, it draws suffering out from the heart. Through vast emanation it cuts off the habitual tendencies, and reverses the ocean of saṃsāra against its course. By the wind of the family, the five poisons are liberated into basic space.

The round, white, long-drawn, sharp and mighty fangs, the awakening mind held clenched within the mouth, play in all that is unborn, the nature of reality. It is the fire-pit that becomes anything whatever, the pacifying, enriching, magnetizing and wrathful, and it is called the mouth that unites the five activities.

Saṃsāra ripening completely, the strength of abundant karma and afflictions, birth and non-birth, the neutral and unspecified, the great activity that ripens these, whether fixed or reversed, becoming anything whatever, and, having become the teaching of both the expresser and the expressed, it is the tongue itself, by its adhering and its moving.

The very cause of the syllables is the Sugata's mind. The vajra sprout is the mind of samādhi. Light itself destroys the afflictions utterly. These are the wisdom mudrā of awareness, the mudrā of the seed syllable, and the mudrā of the perfect qualities. The three existences are the stages of view, of continuum, and of action.

Therefore, in the expanse where wisdom plays, the essence and the subtle hand-emblems, having become manifest, are the expanse of space. The dharmakāya is like the moon in water: manifold appearances lack any intrinsic nature. In all the places of the great charnel grounds, the lords of dance play in every way.

In the east, the four hands of the playing deity bear these emblems: the great wrathful one's heart-extractor, a blazing khaṭvāṅga, a vajra, an iron hook, and a snake-noose, with which he plays. Likewise the four hands of the south and the other directions hold a skull-cup filled with blood, a vajra, a lute, a vajra club, and a fresh skull. They play holding a fire-noose, a variegated garuda-spotted one, a staff whose tip blazes with wisdom, a vajra khaṭvāṅga, and a gani. They raise the nine-pronged and five-pronged vajra, the three-pronged and one-pronged, blazing, thrusting and striking. He shows the miraculous display of what is primordially unborn and clear.

The special quality of the five wisdoms is a precious net adorned with a thousand buddhas. By skillful means like the black king of nāgas, the play of the three doors of liberation, body, speech and mind, reveals the manifold maṇḍalas that accomplish the purposes of emanation. The four mothers of the secret entwine the body and reveal the four awakening minds themselves.

A vajra net, a precious lightning flash, a garuda's wing, and broad outstretched wings: the compassion of two thousand buddhas dawns. By the magical display of means, they are stretched out from the right. The two thousand moons of wisdom, which dispel the darkness of ignorance of the three existences, pervade from the left. Great is the blessing of the union of means and wisdom. As emanations stream forth, the three poisons are unceasingly overcome.

The mudrā called the manifold play, with its eight activities, belongs to the one whose own body is great. The hero with the tiger subdues the upper direction with eight feet. The one with the iron-bird net takes the east and south with eight feet. The one who scatters vajras shines in the southern direction. The one in the dark rhinoceros-armor stretches his legs to the southwest. The one of varied splendor is robed in the northeast. The one with the silk banner adorns the northeast with his feet. The one with red fangs extends his seat to the northwest. The one with coiled black snakes subdues the lower direction with his feet. They crush the eight wrathful ones, stamp them with their feet, and piercing them, destroy the great poison and press down the spine. The one who presses the chest, the destroyer, and the terrifier, through being concealed within the retinue's bodies, make wisdom clear. The body itself, concealed within the retinue, is adorned by the expanse.

Through the play of compassion he shows the celestial palace. Through the play of activity he makes hūṃ and is adorned with hūṃ. He overpowers the ten grounds and possesses the ten powers.

Then the great lord of dance, by the blessing of the dance of the sacred pledge...

Abiding in the continuous absorption, he pleased the glorious Great Mother. The seal of the great sacred pledge is the glorious sovereign lady who brings delight. Of all the women of every kind, none should be disparaged, for each is the vajra of speech.

To the chief, utterly tormented, whatever is spoken in earnest, adorned with words of coquettish charm, to him tormented by a longing heart, the assemblies of goddesses, circled round by the gathering of wisdoms, make a circle around him. In the maṇḍala of his own consort, they lay the foundation of non-dual equality. The stream of the clear gathering of awakening mind dissolves, and the maṇḍala of great meaning shines forth.

The inconceivable multitudes of emanations, lords of the expanse, are bodies at play in the wisdom of certainty. Without fail they hold sway over the thousand million worlds. They are the supreme source of the three worlds, the abode and support of all three times. In all the maṇḍalas of the ten directions, that very great sacred pledge abounds. All that reaches the limit of the outer, inner, and secret, being utterly pure lotus, is every miraculous display, suchness itself.

Through the activity of compassionate attachment, the fierce, powerful activity dwells in the yakṣa. Blazing non-dually, he burns up everything: karma, habitual tendencies, obscurations, and all the rest. The gathering of wisdoms causes them to depart from their places, and by spontaneous faith crushes them all. In the five hundred degenerate ages, at the end of time, he who is hard to tame among the beings of the three realms of existence makes the radiance of light that gathers and radiates. Knower of the world and passed beyond sorrow, with a non-dual mind he knows all clearly.

Such is that special intention. In order to tame all beings, he shows a liberation with three heads. The right is white, the left red, the middle dark blue. The hand-implements of the six wisdoms are these: with the right hands he plays, holding a vajra, a small stone, and a trident. In the left are a bell, a lasso, and a fresh skull-cup. A fire-mountain of the eon, a snake-noose, and a garland of fresh skulls he made his ornaments. He is coquettish, heroic, and fit to inspire terror. He laughs, rebukes, and terrifies. His body is both wrathful in compassion and peaceful. He has the dance-methods of body, speech, and mind. The wrathful, terrifying one is the complete victor.

In the unborn basic space of phenomena, by teaching the Dharma free of signs, he is victor over the wisdom of the dharmadhātu. As the enjoyment body, with the major and minor marks, seated upon the throne of supreme power and fearlessness, in all the buddha-fields he never ceases to teach the profound and vast Dharma. Making clear what exists and what does not, he is the wisdom like a mirror. For the sake of the many beings to be tamed, in the grounds of the ordinary multitudes, through the display of objects and signs, he is the gathering of wisdoms that accomplish activity. All signs have the nature of space. That itself is free of the Dharma that is falsely imputed. All-possessing, that very loving mind is by nature pure, without stain. It is the basic space of the great bliss of Heruka, the cause of all phenomena. Because it enters the abode of luminosity, it is called the Great Yoga.

This is the twenty-second chapter, on extracting the meaning of the cause of the maṇḍala, from the Tantra of the Playful Supreme Horse, the Secret and Glorious Intention of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the glorious Body, the great lord of dance, spontaneously present and supreme, possessing the power of majestic compassion, in order to show special qualities, made a sky-outline, the pride of the seal, the pride of dwelling in whatever he becomes, the pride of the supreme place that overwhelms with radiance, the pride of the demeanor of the great charnel ground. His body is the supreme, majestic with eight hues, a body endowed with the meaning of the seal. His faces are joined as five hūṃs. His tongue is the crescent moon, becoming anything. His fangs cut birth and death from the root. His voice resounds like the thundering dragon. His absorption is like the host of stars in the sky.

Like a ocean of activity with its gathering waves, like a mass of clouds of blessing and miraculous display, the play of his deeds is a dance of fierce majesty. He is the gatherer of the māras and the ogresses. His seat overwhelms the three realms with radiance. His field is the one in which a thousand-fold three worlds are liberated at a single moment. His is the supreme ascetic conduct that destroys conceptual thought.

The supreme qualities of body, speech, and mind: he possesses thirty-six majesties. He is majestic through his vast and coarse limbs. He is majestic in the number that accords with circumstance. He is majestic in being seen as the chief of those who offer homage and wings. He is majestic in being the special guru who has entered the practice. He is majestic in filling the great tones of the thousand-fold three worlds. He is majestic in being luminous and spacious beyond the two extremes. He is majestic in bringing compassion and sacred commitment to their end. He is majestic in taming through means that are never bewildered. He is majestic in knowing unobstructed clarity. He is majestic in not knowing exhaustion in what is lacking. He is majestic in turning one thing into whatever is desired. He is majestic in defeating the yakṣas. He is majestic in his skillful means, unstained by fault. He is majestic in playing, free of plague, with those in dire distress. He is majestic in acting as protector of those long in saṃsāra. He is majestic in overwhelming all at once. He is majestic in the perfection of the wisdom of action.

Body, speech, qualities, activity, and mind: with these one should shatter the pride of overpowering. Then from within that corpse, lightning-like tongues emerge three times. One should cut off a tooth or a nail, and that very thing becomes an excellent sword. Draw it forth according to the number of yogins. Taking it, go into the sky and recite the mantra that holds awareness:

Oṃ bhūru nara samata ya hūṃ phaṭ.

With the pride of the lord of dance, go wherever one wishes. Overwhelm the hosts of the arrogant. Sing songs through the practice of ascetic conduct. Through varied ascetic conduct, in a single instant, one purifies the place.

The maṇḍala of body, speech, and mind of the Blessed One Padma Heruka: however it is emanated and whatever it appears as, since its defining mark is not fixed as one, the emanations of body, speech, and mind are inconceivably vast. The blessings of its nature, activity, and qualities are wondrous and unobscured, clear. Its power surpasses all the three realms. From the clear manifestation of one's own maṇḍala, it shows blessing widely to beings: the dharmakāya, the perfect enjoyment, and the manifold emanations that tame beings.

The speech of words, the scriptures, and the speech of awareness are majestic with thirty-six in four. The three poisons are purified by body, speech, and mind. The five poisons are enjoyed as great bliss. By the power of wisdom playing from the expanse, all beings without exception are sealed and purified in the expanse of natural purity. Even the compassion of any Victor offers no refuge apart from this. Having purified the three existences, one seals with the seal of existence and the secret seal. The drop, dharmakāya, the supreme awareness, is praised as the lord of dance.

This is the twenty-third chapter, the chapter showing the fierce majesty, from the Tantra of the Play of the Supreme Horse, the glorious secret, the unsurpassed intent of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the supreme chief of the retinue, Lord of Secrets (Vajrapāṇi) and the others, prostrated again and again. Having made vast offerings, out of love for beings they requested the stages of accomplishment.

Blessed One, lord of all accomplishments, for the sake of all who are to be tamed: how are the common accomplishments attained, and likewise the supreme accomplishments? What is the method of accomplishing them, and what is the ritual procedure of the rites? Having assembled the complete factors, does one become supreme in this very life? Please explain the many methods and the rituals.

Then the Blessed One, dwelling in his own maṇḍala, for the benefit of future beings, through the union of body, speech, and mind, spoke this marvelous miracle.

The great sacred commitment of all the Victors: abiding in the threefold mudrā, one should undertake the accomplishment of the accomplishments of activity in excellent places. When relying on the companion of the mudrā...

With the recitation complete in all its limbs, one should recite the fourteen-syllable secret mantra three hundred thousand times. For the sake of accomplishing the sign of the play, one takes the supreme great sign, sealed, from a charnel ground that has been well examined. With the mere gesture of the Great Wrathful One, with white mustard seed, ash, and the like, reciting the mantra of Sumbhani, one should drive away the pretas and the lords of death.

Then one washes well with purifying water mixed with fragrance, and adorns the body with ornaments such as garlands of flowers. Having blessed it with the mudrā of speech, the hero takes it into his own dwelling. With the six songs and the six melodies, one trains it through the dance of the wrathful king's play.

The maṇḍala of accomplishment, supreme in delight, is praised as one fathom wide in extent. In accordance with the ritual, one purifies the substances and the ground as is proper. When the rite of the seed-syllable's abiding is complete, one protects the site and draws the maṇḍala. The father and mother, together with the companions of the accomplishment, take their places in the four directions of the maṇḍala, and the supreme great one is set at the maṇḍala's mouth. With the wheel of protection well established, one begins from the meditative absorption of emptiness, and having completed the pleasing of the maṇḍala and the other rites, one summons the risen corpse and causes it to enter. One should recite without interruption:

Oṃ vīraṇa trakṣata hala tāi loma tāya mantacandra hūṃ phaṭ.

Reciting without breaking the stream of luminous radiant light in meditative absorption, with one hundred thousand the corpse stirs; with two it appears with light; with three hundred thousand it gives voice, rises, and looks all around. At that time the lord of yogis seizes it by the hair and drags it, and brings it under control with the mantra of the supreme horse. With the mudrā of the vajra garuḍa wing, and with the speech that conveys the meaning, he strikes up the dance as well. Meditative absorption, mantra, and the limbs, never separated, come to their own place. Having circumambulated the outer edge of the maṇḍala, one performs the ritual of pleasing the deities with offerings accompanied by dance and song.

Then, with the great ascetic practice, pressing down the corpse by the covering, and completing the dance and the rest, that corpse turns to gold. With this one makes offerings and gifts, and provides what one needs for oneself.

This is the twenty-fourth chapter, the chapter teaching the accomplishment of the risen corpse, from the Tantra of the Glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Lord of Dance, sporting with his radiant consort, heard the words requested by the retinue. For the benefit of future beings, he proceeded in order to bestow benefit by teaching the excellent common accomplishments. One who has obtained empowerment and abides in the sacred commitments should, in an agreeable and excellent place, accomplish the preparation of the eye-ointment, and, endowed with blessing, work for the benefit of beings. Abiding in one's own meditative absorption, once one's own secret mantra has been recited a hundred thousand times and one sees the subtle signs, one should begin the maṇḍala of accomplishment. With any maṇḍala whatever, endowed with mudrā, secret mantra, and meditative absorption, one should recite the jewel mantra three hundred thousand times:

Oṃ padma maca ga hru ala samara siti yona hūṃ phaṭ.

Having seen the sign of the maṇḍala's place, one goes to a place at the edge of a village. Whether at night unseen by anyone, one stays in a village of fierce spirits and demons. With the gathered members of one's own retinue, one should have them guard against raucous people and violent followers. There, in the form of a bhanda with the marks, one gazes upon the great radiance of the butter lamp. For one night, until it fades, one recites the mantra and performs the practice without losing meditative absorption. When the first dawn light appears, one should hold it, fumigated with smoke. The ascetic practice of song and dance...

By the power of the bearing and bearing-forth of all the gods, one brings the lord of that place under one's sway. Endowed with the mantra of the awareness-holder, one again applies a single portion of eye ointment. Then one instructs the gathered retinue, and the matter is to be kept secret from all beings. By the lotus accomplishment, the añjali offering, one comes to see whatever objects one desires.

Furthermore, the method of accomplishing the pill is this. Substances arising from the five nectars are mixed with the five meats and placed inside a skull cup bearing the marks. In a place adorned with a maṇḍala, in a place endowed with skillful means and wisdom, one meditates on the body of the Lord of Dance, and recites the secret mantra of fourteen syllables three hundred thousand times. When one sees subtle signs, one rolls the nectar into a ball, the size of a fruit of the wild fig, and places it within a precious container. Set at the center of that maṇḍala, it is to be guarded by the protective wheel. The secret mantra of the awareness-holder is to be recited five hundred thousand times. Rays of light and iron hooks will appear.

Oṃ mahā padma saṃbhota hulu hulu hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Then one takes up that pill, holds it in the mouth or in the hand, and goes to whatever place one wishes, and brings about the fulfillment of whatever one desires. Delighting in the supreme abodes of the gods, one can travel round them in a single morning.

Furthermore, there is an excellent practice of taking essences. For whatever person wishes to accomplish it, the king of nectars, arura, is best when it is golden in color. One hides twenty-one of them in a cow's...

Then, taking it with the sulphur gone red and grown abundant, with cow's urine and ash, one cooks it in the butter of a yellow-brown cow. Mixing this with honey, for twenty-one days one increases it and eats it in the measure of a small bowlful of yogurt. Relying on the secret maṇḍala, meditating on the body of the Lord of Dance, and reciting the mantra of the awareness-holder, one continues without seeing clear signs, never letting the limbs of practice decline, and generating diligence.

Oṃ padmo vihara hara tasani hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Before the secret mantra is completed three hundred thousand times, one carefully combines and eats a thousand good fruits of arura. By its power, the host of diseases and sharp pains is destroyed, long life and the perfection of happiness are gained, the faults of aging and the like are cleared away, and one goes to the realm of the awareness-holders.

In the same way, by the hand of Indra, sugar, molasses, nyeshing, zurngul, muzil, and the like, one who knows one's own ritual succeeds through the mantra of the awareness-holder. Relying on the maṇḍala of the Lord of Dance, on the ground where one has practiced the separate trainings, one mixes it with cow's milk, empowers it with cow's butter, and keeps it until signs appear. Thereby one obtains the accomplishment of an awareness-holder.

Oṃ padmo indra dra ahe devina hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ padma ragya agarta darśa hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ padmo samon viśale hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ ghuli sabotam gorana hūṃ phaṭ.

Oṃ padmo meśa ānanda tayakara hūṃ phaṭ.

Through these, actions are accomplished. Practicing constantly on one's own, and relying on the path of secret mantra, one attains accomplishment in this very life.

This is the twenty-fifth chapter, on accomplishing the common attainments, from the glorious Tantra of the Play of Hayagrīva, the unsurpassed secret, the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Lord of Dance himself, in the form of the Play of the Mudrā, taught to the vessel-worthy bodhisattvas the characteristics of the abode of awareness-holders, which gives rise to the supreme accomplishment.

In the red maṇḍala of empowerment, one spreads out eight bhandas endowed with the marks upon the petals of the lotus, and adorns them with the mantra of the departed. One uses an assembly of food, drink, and enjoyments, in full and undiminished perfection. With devotion to the god, the Lord of Dance, one recites the king of secret mantras, and from the count of three hundred thousand recitations...

Adorning the closing syllables with other mantras, one begins the recitation until the signs appear.

Oṃ asuśa oṃ āyuśa sota brum.

The signs are rays of light and something like smoke, and the realm of the mudrā, and the time of its arising. With the six-fold dance, with song and with dance, one enters the great conduct of discipline and partakes of the nectar. The supreme body, speech, and mind are the great mudrā. One generates the secret consort, the supreme essence:

Oṃ ekate vigate matangkate svāhā.

She shines forth as the mudrā that is neither lost nor diminished. By union without duality, one joins the vajra with the lotus. In this wonder of the mudrā of skillful means, the radiant secret place is the three-cornered "e." The sun, the lotus, and wisdom are united, each shown through its own clear symbol:

Oṃ brum padma āyuśe.

Through the radiation of blessings, the buddhas of the ten directions are urged into action, and the supreme awakening mind, the stream of life, is made clear in the practitioner. The lotus of eight petals, together with the sun, holds at its center the great secret vajra. It is nourished with hūṃ and stirred with a. To urge this again and again is to become body, speech, and mind within the expanse.

Into this, the stream of the supreme awakening mind is placed within the marked bhanda. The yogī, with dance and elegance, sings auspicious verses, with auspicious dance and melody. One offers a feast of enjoyments to all, and makes supplication for the sake of accomplishment.

This is the twenty-sixth chapter, the chapter on the accomplishment of longevity, from the great tantra, the Glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the unsurpassed secret that is the intent of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the supreme god of dance blessed everything as nectar, so that all that is outer and inner, vessel and essence, without remainder, might be accomplished as the bodies of the five families. He taught the essence that gathers all that arises from itself by its own nature and all accomplishments. Having examined all phenomena without exception, they abide in the manner of the maṇḍala of the five families. With the things that arise from this, one should practice union as in suchness itself.

First, gather the accumulation of merit and please the vajra master. In places that are perfectly endowed, draw near to the deity in meditation, and then begin the great maṇḍala. By the maṇḍala of the deities of the family, one accomplishes the mudrā of the family. Substances of fragrance, shape, color, and taste, together with the five meats and the nectar, are set out in five marked bhandas, around the maṇḍala and in the four directions. By the maṇḍala of the arrangement of vajras, one purifies each of the things to be abandoned. By the power of mudrā, mantra, and samādhi, one brings forth the maṇḍala of the family. Having made offerings and pleased the deities, one speaks the secret mantra that accomplishes all actions:

Light, smoke, fragrance, and the goddess are the signs. The common recitation and the special recitation are accomplished by three hundred thousand recitations. Then, seeing the signs of accomplishment, one purifies them with only a touch. With the discipline of the dākinī's play, one purifies merit and bestows blessing. With the maṇḍala arrangement and its adornments, the face is transformed into a blazing wrathful form. With the song of the father and mother in longing, and with the gathering and radiating of bodhisattvas, one seats the lord of the dance of Māra in the central place of the maṇḍala.

Again, through the wrathful maṇḍala, one enters the heart of the chief of those who subdue form. Having summoned all the maṇḍalas of wisdom, the pledge and the nectar become nondual. Then arises the body of the lotus king, seated on the throne at the center of the maṇḍala. Having pleased him with offerings, praises, and joy, one fulfills his heart-pledge with dance, dance-steps, and song. Especially through the power of the king of secret mantras, he is endowed with the five wisdoms and radiates light:

Oṃ mahā sarva tathāgata pañca amṛta ruluru ruluru hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

As long as no sign has appeared...

Then one should recite the king of mantras. Next, with the Hayagrīva mudrā, the great accomplishment, the meaning of the secret, the vajra supreme horse, the great mudrā: one confers empowerment with the substance of nectar and satisfies the yogic companions. With songs that stir the heart from every direction, one makes offerings to the deities of the maṇḍala and to the guru. Speaking the words that request accomplishments, one makes a vast enjoyment of bliss. Delighting and taming all the deities, one drives out with mantra the powerful ones who are without pledge. By scattering the nectar, their bodies are destroyed, and one is born from the wisdom of one's own awareness. Then one pleases the activity-performing protectors and the assembly of guests with torma offerings. The great accumulation of merit and wisdom, the whole gathering, one dedicates for the sake of beings.

This is the twenty-seventh chapter, on accomplishing nectar, from the great tantra, the Glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then, in the center of the body of the Supreme Horse's Play, in the center of the maṇḍala, with a delighted manner, he urges on all beings and explains the secret meaning of enlightened activity. The pacifying, enriching, empowering, wrathful, and subjugating activities that arise from meditative concentration, together with suppressing, reversing, paralyzing, killing, and the like: through the power of familiarity born once absorption has become clear, one applies them to the work of benefiting oneself and others.

Pacifying is the syllable of peace. Placing the one to be accomplished upon the moon disc, with the light mantra of Vairocana one unites with the deities of the three times. One generates the bliss of awakening mind and clears away all pangs and conceptual thoughts. By the power of long familiarity as taught, even a blazing fire can be made to subside.

For enriching, one takes the form of fullness. From Ratnasambhava, the one endowed with the elements, one appears in the guise of a universal monarch, yellow, with a blazing mass of radiant light, splendid and majestic, together with one's own assembly of consorts. Gathering all the blessings of the Sugatas, one begins the work through the doors of the qualities of body, speech, and mind, and of enlightened activity. By mantra and the secret rays of light, the seven precious things, gold, and the rest rain down like clouds from the treasury of space. The assemblies enjoy them themselves and give them to other beings. This is because one has gathered them through skillful means and empowerment.

Red Amitābha, the body of boundless radiant light, is seated in the center of the lotus maṇḍala and tames beings through great desire. Through the power of the absorption and mantra of this family, one draws under one's power the assemblies of deities and beings, and they become friendly, together with their retinues. Whoever has a mind of hatred becomes, upon meeting, increasingly attached. Whoever is to be killed, accomplish that action.

This arises from the absorption of the dark blue wrathful one of action. By the gathering emanation of wrathful ones, one binds and draws in the one to be accomplished, placing him in the maṇḍala of fire, provided with exceedingly fierce weapons. Those who turn away from the Three Jewels, who harm all people, who deceive all teachers, and whom the compassion of the buddhas cannot bear: from the many wrathful ones of action, weapons blaze forth in fire and light and slay that sinful one. Birds, dogs, jackals, flesh-eaters, and a great gathering of blood-drinkers rejoice and play in the manner of offering praise. They devour him so that not a sesame seed remains, and his mind's very nature abides in great bliss.

These are accomplished through the absorption, the secret mantra, and the distinct form of each maṇḍala.

Oṃ bhūta cakra sambhava gati locana, che ge mo, śāntiṃ kuru svāhā.

Oṃ ratna sambhava guru māmaki, che ge mo, puṣṭiṃ kuru svāhā.

Oṃ yāmite sarvara raho, che ge mo, vaśaṃ kuru svāhā.

Oṃ karma śānti vakrotni, che ge mo, hāya svāhā.

Abiding in a good place, abiding in one's own maṇḍala, through the power of joining mantra and absorption, one brings the rite to actual accomplishment. Moreover, as for bewildering and paralyzing...

Dividing, summoning, expelling, subduing, and the other rites as well, through the application of one's own view, will be accomplished by means of meditative absorption and mantra.

This is the twenty-eighth chapter, on the stages of the application of meditative absorption, from the great tantra, the Glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Then, the king of applications, the supreme among all activities, is the very sign of relying on substances, and it brings about the fruit one desires and wishes for. The Lord of Dance, the body of the mudrā, through the maṇḍala of the deities of manifold display, accomplishes each one's desired aim.

Vajra, wheel, jewel, lotus, net and the like: all the rites are to be accomplished with the pride of the deity, until the signs appear. Having set the reflected image upon the maṇḍala as its base, one accomplishes the maṇḍala of the deities. Relying on the substances of the sign, one makes offerings to the support and pleases it, and recites the secret mantra of each rite.

Oṃ mama sarva vita hara kuru svāhā.

Sarva samo kuni.

Laṃ va śāntiṃ kuru dani hūṃ.

Puṣṭiṃ ratna ma kuru svāhā.

Vaśaṃ kuru padmo hṛdaya āṃ.

Staṃ bhana mo śa a karma pani hūṃ phaṭ.

When the form begins to gather, or when light radiates and stirs, then, taking it in hand with pride, one should recite the secret mantra fiercely.

Whoever wishes to accomplish pacifying, increasing, subjugating, and so forth should contemplate abiding in the maṇḍala of the rite that corresponds to each of these. Having urged on the sign of the mudrā, one remains in one's own rite.

For rites such as summoning, and for accomplishing through the hook and the like, when one is free of the signs of the support, whatever one wishes to do will reach its conclusion and be accomplished. To the secret mantra of method and accomplishment, one adorns the end with the respective rite, and after the fourteen syllables one should accomplish it by reciting three hundred thousand times.

Oṃ vilogi mama duṣṭa naga gagana rulu rulu hūṃ phaṭ.

First, having recited the root mantra three hundred thousand times, then again reciting an equal number, whatever rites one desires will be accomplished.

This is the twenty-ninth chapter, on conduct through the door of the support, from the great tantra, the Glorious Supreme Horse's Play, the unsurpassed secret of the intention of all the Tathāgatas.

Guarding all places of dwelling, and being a most excellent ritual of benefit, it is undertaken through methods that abide in the blessing of the Victors. One who wishes to protect a city or the like should recite the king of secret mantras over water, sand, and so forth.

Oṃ namo kuru sarva vidara nimosa dena rasa nirasa kra rakta hūṃ phaṭ.

One who is endowed with the application of his own deity should recite it a thousand times and scatter it in the ten directions. Whatever is protected will become auspicious, and the hosts of spirits will not be able to gain a foothold.

Furthermore, on a wheel of nine compartments, one draws upon birch bark. Surrounding its edge with a circle, one should inscribe the king of secret mantras. The secret mantra to be inscribed in the center is to be envisioned as the secret mantra of fourteen syllables. At its end, Oṃ, and finally he he, hu ru kaṃ pa bhaga śa ha ha mama bri hūṃ phaṭ svāhā. After that come the vowels and consonants, together with the protective mantra. Having anointed it with fine saffron, one places it in the center of a vajra net. Reciting it a hundred thousand times together with the person's name, what is bound on becomes the supreme protection.

Furthermore, in a fine vase, one combines nectar and milk, and with one's own secret mantra and white mustard seeds, one meditates on the body of the Lord of Dance, filled with passion. This causes the mantra to become a protection of the skull-cup.

This too is explained from this very secret of all the Tathāgatas, by the bodhisattvas of the ten directions...

All of them were delighted by this, and once more they gave their charge to all the gods. By the power of their faith, they take up this king of tantras, and those who hold it will come to show loving-kindness toward others as well.

This is the thirtieth chapter, the chapter on protection, from the great tantra called the Secret of All the Tathāgatas, the Glorious Supreme Horse, the Play.

Here ends the root text of the great tantra, the Unsurpassed Intention of All the Tathāgatas, the Secret of the Glorious Supreme Horse, the Play.

Translator's Notes

- The Sanskrit title is corrupt in the transmitted text; I have transliterated it as given and rendered the Tibetan title. Many of the name lists (the Sugatas and the bodhisattvas) are rendered by meaning, since they are descriptive epithets rather than established names. A few are uncertain: "Lord of Rice-Seedlings" for sa li dbang phyug, and "Transformer of the Wheel" for kha lo sgyur ba. The passage breaks off mid-list in the source.

- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation preserves that break. The opening names (Lords of Conduct, Speech, Harmony) continue the preceding list; I rendered them in the same style as earlier names. The phrase about the retinue "appearing as distinguished and undistinguished" renders a compressed phrase that could also be read as "discriminating and non-discriminating." The sentence about the assembly gathering "within the courtyards of his wheel" is obscure, and the translation is cautious. Several lines in the final paragraph, including the string of verbs of arrangement and intention, are terse and may reflect textual corruption.

- The mantra is transcribed as it stands in the Tibetan, and is partly corrupt; I have not tried to emend it. Several lines of the verses are obscure in the Tibetan itself, notably the first song (the phrases rendered "free of moisture" and "for those who are dry and parched, may the Dharma rain down") and the name Good Giver, which I take as the name of the retinue member who speaks. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end. I have rendered the vajra-holder and consort passages literally rather than interpretively.

- Verse lines are rendered here as prose because the Tibetan syntax is elliptical and the grammatical subject often shifts without marking. The line "dges pa'i byang chub sems" and the identification of the speakers in the long address are uncertain, and I have followed the most natural reading. The phrase "mda' ba'i tshogs" is ambiguous in the passage "this was the great gathering of assembled ones," but I have kept to the plain sense. "Great bliss, the supreme meaning" follows the Tibetan "bde chen don ston mchog."

- The opening "bsKum pas" is rendered "Bowling low"; the first syllable is slightly obscure in the text as given. The passage is verse with some corrupt or terse lines (for example "gnas pa gnas pa yin" and "Śāri" in the mantra instruction), rendered as literally as sense allows. The mantra syllables are given as they appear.

- This is a dense maṇḍala-generation passage, with letter-mantra sequences and deity descriptions. Several deity names and attributes are rendered tentatively from the Tibetan epithets, for example the Eyed One for Locanā, the Lord of Horses for Hayagrīva-type names, and Padmālaṅkāra, so they may reflect a different Sanskrit original. The line "wooden staff and pot" and the "guardian" in the Ṇaṃ deity's hands are obscure; I rendered them literally. In the second stanza, the Tibetan lines on the three samayas and their relation to the "lord of the family" are compressed, and the reading of "equality" as a separate item follows the syntax most plausibly but is not certain. The "six letters of the reflected image" is a literal rendering of a technical phrase whose referent is not clear.

- This passage is a list of emanated deities, each tied to a seed syllable; several names and attributes are obscure, and the text may be corrupt in places. Most doubtful: "the display of miraculous power" at the southern Taṃ deity; "the One of Meaningful Purpose" (Amoghasiddhi-like, don yod pa); "in the manner of Kārttika" for the Phaṃ deity, where the Tibetan karti ka may be a curved knife (kartikā); the unclear "mango of the kuśa shoot" simile; "a mārā" among the Ghaṃ deity's implements, which is unclear; and the lines on the Sovereign of Loving-kindness, whose attributes are blended with a wrathful retinue. A leading bracketed line at the start of the Haṃ sovereign's verse and the Kaṃ/Khaṃ transitions are somewhat uncertain in sense.

- The passage is a maṇḍala-deity description in verse, and the Tibetan is corrupt in places, with garbled epithets and emblem lists. Several lines (for instance "a hero, an enjoyment, and a lotus eye," "a reliquary stem," and "in the manner of a kuśa grass") are rendered literally because the sense is uncertain. The deity names after the seed syllables are partly inferred from the epithets given. The mantras are Tibetan transcriptions of Sanskrit and are heavily corrupted. I have given a plain, readable transliteration rather than reconstructing the intended Sanskrit, which cannot be recovered with confidence. The syllable "Brad tañ yaja" in the second mantra is likely a scribal intrusion.

- The mantras are transliterated from the Tibetan and left as in the source; their forms are corrupt in places, so the translation does not attempt to □ them. The labels after each mantra are rendered as stated, though a few (such as the one for rbad pa, rendered "arrangement") are uncertain. The final line begins the next passage and breaks off mid-sentence, so it is left unfinished.

- This passage is dense and its syntax is often elliptical, so some lines are rendered with the most plausible reading. "The three tantras" is kept literal. The lines on "nonperception of discrimination" (□□□□□□□□□□) and "the place of cessation" probably refer to formless and cessation attainments treated as limits of conceptual thought, but the construction is compressed. "Gathering of the arising of the vajra" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is rendered literally; its precise technical sense is not certain. The closing lines on what the Victors do not declare "in its intended sense" are obscure, and the negation may be read differently.

- This passage is dense and the verse syntax is at times elliptic, so some lines are rendered cautiously. "Lord of secrets" translates the epithet addressed to Vajrapāṇi. The line "liberation itself comes to be a bondage" follows the Tibetan literally. The mantra syllables are transliterated as given and not translated. The final sentence is a cut-off wish-verse that continues in the following passage.

- The opening verses are syntactically terse and the grammar of the lines on being "made true" and on the one who "follows after sound" is compressed; I have kept the rendering close to the wording. The name of the tantra is rendered descriptively from its title. "Vidyādhara" is given for "knowing man," the lord of secrets being Vajrapāṇi, who is the questioner.

- The verse beginning "Arisen from emptiness and wisdom" is syntactically dense and obscure in the Tibetan; the phrases "mountain bearing the lineage" and "the seven horses' light" are rendered literally, and "family" translates rigs, which may also mean lineage or buddha-family. The title "Play of the Glorious Supreme Horse" (Hayagrīva) is rendered literally. The line "the grasping thought is clear as the essence of awakening" and the closing pairing of the five elements with the Mother's sky follow the Tibetan closely, though the doctrinal intent is somewhat compressed.

- The wording of the line on "the supreme buddha who is utterly proud" is a literal reading of the Tibetan, which likely reflects the wrathful or haughty aspect of the Heruka-type buddha. The line about the "desire-form" of the protector refers to the lotus family's association with desire. The "twenty-five emanations and gatherings" is rendered literally and is not further specified in the text. The name Samayatārā renders the epithet of Tārā as the keeper of the sacred commitment (samaya). The "protector" (mgon po) is translated as protector throughout and refers to the family lords.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence, so the final lines are left open, and the sense of the last two lines is uncertain. The phrase "the ten aspects of suchness" renders the Tibetan literally (de nyid bcu); this probably refers to the ten topics of reality. The line about "the deities and the teachers" in the second stanza on the entrant is syntactically obscure in the Tibetan and is rendered cautiously. The lines on the maṇḍala in the opening request are likewise compressed and rendered close to the Tibetan.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the Tibetan, so the final line is left unfinished. The measures in the maṇḍala section (a cubit, six cubits, four finger-widths) follow the Tibetan terms □□□ and □□□, but the lines on proportions are compressed and somewhat elliptical. The opening line on the Tibetan page has a stray space inside the word suchness, which I have treated as a scribal artifact.

- This is a ritual text, evidently from a Hayagrīva-type tantra, and its syntax is highly elliptical. The opening "origin and sky purified" probably refers to the elements. The line about "the places of rebirth in the three realms of desire" in the lotus passage is obscure; I have kept it literal. In the mantras, the transcription follows the Tibetan-transliterated Sanskrit and may reflect corrupt forms. "Lord of Dance" renders the epithet for the chief figure and may refer to a specific wrathful form. The enumeration of the wrathful retinue is condensed in the Tibetan.

- The passage runs from the closing of the maṇḍala-preparation rite into the disciple's refuge and bodhicitta vows. The line about "gatherings of the pleased" in the verse to the maṇḍala is syntactically terse in the Tibetan and rendered cautiously. "Lord of Dance of the Lotus" renders padma gar gyi dbang phyug, likely Padmanarteśvara, an epithet of Avalokiteśvara or Hayagrīva in this cycle. The mantra syllables are given in plain Sanskrit transliteration, following the Tibetan transcription; some forms (for example "sucame") are corrupt readings of the standard Vajrasattva mantra and are kept as transmitted.
- The passage is a ritual manual with some corrupt lines. "Tshogs spyod" in the bodhisattva refuge verse could also be read as "who engage in the gatherings"; I have taken it as accumulation and conduct. The "sbyin sreg" is the fire offering (Skt. homa). The line "mtshams kyis 'jig rten las rnams 'grub" is rendered according to the usual commentarial sense of the intermediate directions signifying worldly activities. The nature of the "wisdom beings" generated by the master is inferred from the common ritual context.
- Several mantras are given in corrupt transliteration in the Tibetan, so I have given them in approximate Sanskrit reconstruction. The syllables mā and tā for the eyes are as in the text. The meaning of "བཀྲ་ཤིང་རྒྱལ་པོ་འཕགས་པོ་" is taken as being empowered by blessing in the proper manner. The opening phrase "Victorious Vase" refers to the vijaya vase, one of the maṇḍala vases.
- The text is a maṇḍala-drawing manual and several names of the deities and emblems are transliterated or reconstructed, and some are uncertain. Names such as Bstan-dbang-phyug, Sukhamati, Sāgaraghoṣa, and Tejaprabha rest on reconstructed or tentative Sanskrit equivalents. The lists of emblems in the squares are terse and some attributions of emblem to deity are uncertain. Lines of the passage are cryptic (for example "བུ་དྭགས་མཁན་པོ་" and "ཐུགས་རྟེན་མཁན་པོ་"), and the rendering of these warnings follows the most natural reading. The five-colored thread is rendered from the Sanskrit pañcarāga.
- The Tibetan text here is evidently corrupt in many places, and the proper names of the bodhisattvas in the opening lines are partly reconstructed from translated Tibetan names (for example Vajrajaya, Prajñāvabhāsa); these reconstructions are tentative. Several items are hard to identify (the "horse-descents," the "transformer of the vessel," "Dragśul"), and I have kept them close to the Tibetan. The chapter title names the tantra as Hayagrīva's Play (Rta mchog rol pa), and the closing question opens the following chapter.
- This verse section is dense and the Tibetan is probably corrupt in places (for example the opening lines about "making this time manifest," and the lines about the "power of the Blessed One," where I took the consort's role from context). The phrase translated "the giving of the Three Supreme Ones" is ambiguous. The mantra syllables are given as transmitted, and the doubled "བུ་དྭགས་མཁན་པོ་" may be corrupt. The red cloth is, in tantric practice, the blindfold placed over the disciple's eyes; the text says to cover the face, and I followed it.
- The passage is a ritual empowerment text, and some sections are corrupt or obscure. In the line on those to whom the secret must not be spoken, the Tibetan repeats "dull-minded" (blo dman) and may be defective. The word rendered "secret thumb" (gsang ba'i mthe bo) likely denotes the thumb of the disciple's mudrā-hand. The final stanza, where the empowerment descends upon "the body of Vairocana" (snang mdzad), is ambiguous. It may refer to the disciple as embodying the Buddha, or the line may be textually unsound. "Palace of nirvāṇa" follows the Tibetan literally. The Sanskrit mantras are given as transliterated and may carry scribal irregularities.
- The opening line in Tibetan runs on from the preceding passage's closing sense, which is why it begins mid-thought. Several mantras are given in Tibetan transliteration with some corruption, so I have rendered them in a normalized Sanskrit form; the syllables of the final mantras, especially "dadu śrī padmo gandha a," are uncertain. The phrase "mudrā of the vajra and bell" and the "conduct of the three places" refer to the master's physical gestures and the body, speech, and mind conduct. The phrase about "adversaries and the rest" probably refers to hostile forces or the obstacles to practice.

- The verse beginning "There is no sin ... other than being devoid of desire" is an antinomian-sounding tantric statement. I have kept it literal; its sense depends on the commentarial reading of desire as the path. The Tibetan "ཁུ་ཁུ" is a cubit, a unit of measure. The final measurements are obscure and may be corrupt, so I have translated them closely. The "sixteen or twenty-four" gifts are left unspecified in the text, probably referring to consorts or to wisdom-limbs.

- The title of the tantra reads literally "Glorious Supreme Horse, Play," and is rendered as the Play of the Supreme Horse, with Hayagrīva given as the likely Sanskrit equivalent. Several mantras are partly corrupt, so I have given them as transliterated and not attempted emendation. Certain lines in the consecration section are elliptical and are translated as literally as sense allows.

- The passage begins mid-thought, so the opening sentence is a fragment and the speaker's identity (the māra king, continuing from the preceding passage) is assumed. Several of the divine names are conjectural identifications from the Tibetan epithets: bhrīṅ gi ri ti is rendered as Bhṛṅgi and Riti (Śiva's attendants), and the Nāga names (Anantā, Takṣaka, Balahetu, Kulika, Vāsuki, Śaṅkhaṇḍa, Padma) follow the standard Tibetan equivalents. The sentence "you have become sacred only through the touch of others" is difficult, and the sense may be that the māra king is merely sanctified by others' contact; the rendering is tentative. The Tibetan "sa'i lha" is rendered "earth deities" and "gshin rje" in the list of beings as Yamas.

- This passage is textually rough, with some corrupt or elliptic readings. Notably, the phrase about the "life-essence" (snying po) offered by the terrified gods and taken back by the māras is obscure, and I have rendered it as the likeliest sense. "Mnas dor" is rendered "dismissed with threats" as a best reading. The placement of the classes of beings in the four directions follows the text, with the eight Great Gods on "their own summits." The "white class of virtue" is a literal rendering of dkar po'i rigs.

- The sequence from "Lotus, Sugata, Vajra-meaning, Jewel" appears to list the five families and their activities, and is obscure; I have rendered it conservatively. The line about "one possessed of every pretense" translates a difficult phrase and is uncertain. The speech of the arrogant Māra host at the end is rendered as direct speech; the boundaries of the quotation are inferred. Brahmā and Viṣṇu are named as the world's guardians in this passage's list of forms.

- This verse is difficult and, in places, probably corrupt. In the opening lines the verbal subjects are ambiguous, and "Sovereign (Śiva)" is my gloss of dbang phyug, with "Maker of Light," "Singer," and "Arrogant One" translated literally as epithets of the demonic or Hindu deities. The "king" in "the blessing and power of the king" is likely the tantra's presiding buddha or Hayagrīva, but this is uncertain. The phrase "path free of moisture" (rlan bral lam) is a literal rendering of obscure wording. The closing syllables are the Sanskrit alphabet (vowel-less consonant series), left in transliteration as in the original.

- This is a maṇḍala visualization text with many mantras and obscure seed-syllable strings, which I give in transliteration without translation. Several implement names are uncertain: "bhandha/bhanda" and "be con" (rendered "staff") are unclear, and "lamb-rope" for the Hayagrīva implement (lu gu rgyud) is tentative. The "two lineages transmitted through scripture" and "the elder's color" (le brgan) are doubtful readings. Some deity identifications (such as the offering goddesses and Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin) are inferred from the standard pattern of the eight bodhisattvas and goddesses.

- The mantra syllables are rendered in standard Sanskrit transliteration. Their Tibetan spellings are irregular, and I have normalized them, so the exact forms are somewhat uncertain. Several names are only partly clear. The "Golden Eye with fine petals" city and the epithet translated as "Gzi-chen Drakpo" (Fierce One of great radiance) are reconstructions, and I have left the latter transliterated as a name. In the Padmeśvara description, the text lists seven implements for six hands, so the enumeration may be corrupt. The line "tasting ruin by oath and life" renders a compressed idiom of the samaya threat.
- Several mantra syllables here are corrupt in the Tibetan transliteration and are given as they stand. The proper names Gzi-chen and Ö-che (Tib. Ö-je) are rendered from the Tibetan. The item "Magadha" near the end of the gandharva king's attributes is unclear, and I left it incomplete. The term rendered "goat-corpse spirits" is a tentative reading of རྩོམ་པ་. The line "Lord of Victors is joined with the wrathful one" may refer to a consort pairing.
- The first section is a list of eight deities, partly obscure. Names such as the Subduer (བཅོད་པ་པོ་འཇམ་མགས་པོ་འཇམ་མགས་པོ་), Ratnamati, and the "king of discernment" are tentative; some epithets, such as "Victor's wisdom crest" and "stacked net of illusion," may be proper names. The mantras are Tibetan transliterations of corrupt Sanskrit and are rendered phonetically, not translated. The Tibetan uses the plural "they" and shifts addressee ("your will") in the Lord of Dance section. "Magical display" for རྩོམ་པ་པོ་ is a choice. The final lines are unclear and rendered cautiously.
- The mantra syllables are transliterated from the Tibetan and are partly corrupt or opaque. The Tibetan list of eight beast-headed ones is rendered as listed. "Field-staff" renders རྩོམ་པ་པོ་འཇམ་མགས་པོ་, a conventional term for a wrathful implement, perhaps a khaṭvāṅga-like staff. "The one of wind" (བཅོད་པ་པོ་) is uncertain, possibly a wind-deity. The final line's list of implements is partly obscure; "a cloth" is a tentative rendering of རྩོམ་པ་.
- This passage is transliterated mantra material and its syllables are corrupt in places, so I have given the mantras as phonetic Sanskrit transcription without correcting them. The seven families headed by Indra, and the exact distribution of implements, are obscure in the Tibetan; I followed the text's sequence rather than reconstructing it. The yakṣa "Drulbum" is a literal rendering of the Tibetan name, and the Sanskrit original is uncertain. The passage ends mid-description, with the western deity Hayagrīva introduced but not yet detailed.
- The deity names in this passage are reconstructed from the Tibetan epithets: Amṛtakuṇḍalin for the one who swirls with nectar, Nīladaṇḍa for the Blue Staff, Acala for Immovable, Ṭakkirāja for King of Desire, and Mahābala for Great Power. The terms rendered as bhaṇḍa and nara-sila are uncertain transliterated implements. The names Padmadhātṛvīśvarī, Ratnamālā, Jālinī, and Vidyutmālinī are conjectural reconstructions from the Tibetan epithets. The mantra syllables are given as transliterated and are not translated. The Tibetan text appears slightly corrupt in places, particularly in the passage on the pledges and the transformed wisdom womb.
- The opening line, "abiding as though filling a sesame seed," is obscure; the sense seems to be that they are compressed or crowded into a tiny space. The mantra syllables are given as they appear in the Tibetan transliteration and are likely corrupt, so they are rendered conservatively. The names of the four door goddesses are uncertain: "Unsuited-Intellect" and "Wisdom Space" translate the Tibetan literally, and the exact list is not fully clear. The names of the heroes in the verses on Vajra Cutter and the others are rendered literally from the Tibetan.
- Matrarutra (བཅོད་པ་པོ་འཇམ་མགས་པོ་) is rendered as a transliterated proper name; the Sanskrit form is uncertain. The bracketed mantra syllables are kept in transliteration as given. The line "reversed in gaze" renders the Tibetan literally and may refer to eyes turned back in wrathful expression. "Cause and result" in the sixth line translates the Tibetan phrase without further interpretation. The passage ends mid-sentence, continuing in the next section.
- The verse is textually corrupt in places, and the translation follows the apparent sense.

Examples: "the sound or emptiness rings in the bell in his left hand"; "the tenfold hosts" (བུ་བོ་བུ་བོ་བུ་བོ་); "the seven vidyādhara" (འདྲི་རྒྱལ་མཁན་བུ་བོ་བུ་བོ་བུ་བོ་); and the final lines about mountain-like views. The mantras are transliterated as given, with the Tibetan spellings partly normalized, and may themselves be corrupt. Standard names (Locanā, Māmākī, Pāṇḍaravāsini, Samayātārā) were inferred from the Tibetan epithets.

- This passage is a tantric text with corrupt or obscure readings. The tail end of the final section ("mgon gnas dben par gzhan dag gis, mthong rkang sbas pa'i chos nyid lung") is especially unclear, and my rendering there is tentative. The enumeration "drug bzhi rtsal 'phags nyi shu brgyad" and several architectural terms (ka la shas, ka lā liṅga, thod dbyug) are rendered conservatively, as the Sanskrit equivalents are uncertain. The title is rendered as "Hayagrīva" by interpretation of "rta mchog," following the tantra's known identity.
- The Tibetan is a corrupt transmission in places. "Lebrgan" (ལེབར་གན་) is unclear; I rendered it as a proper name "Leberen" for lack of a certain reading. "Kha-mgya" (ཁ་མགྲ་) is left transliterated. The "blind and backward-bound" (མཁན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་) and "the wandering ones" (ལྷན་པོ་) are uncertain readings. Mantras are given in reconstructed Sanskrit from the Tibetan transcriptions, with a few syllables uncertain (notably "Ghuna" and "tibta").
- The mantra syllables are transliterated from the Tibetan and may carry scribal corruptions; I have kept them as given. The animals in the second section (ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ the rhinoceros, ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ the conch-bird, ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ the crane) are literal renderings of obscure names for emanated beings. The final verses are dense and partly obscure, and lines such as the severing of "the five lineages" by the face's haṃ are rendered closely rather than interpreted. The Horse-Voiced One is Hayagrīva.
- This is a ritual-tantric passage with several transliterated mantras, which I have kept in Sanskritized form without translation. The text is evidently corrupt or abbreviated in places, notably in the mantras and in the final line, which breaks off mid-thought, so that last line is rendered provisionally. I read the horse-headed deity (Hayagrīva) as the implied subject throughout, though the text names him only by epithets. The phrase "three subduings" (tshar gsum) and "sixteen later ages" are rendered literally, as their precise referents are unclear.
- This is a dense tantric verse text with many obscure emblem lists. I have rendered the line about the emblems of the southern and other quarters, and the names of certain deities in the eight-feet passage (tiger, iron-bird net, rhinoceros-armor and so on), according to the surface sense; the identification of these figures is uncertain. The "lute" (lu gu rgyud) and "gani" (ga ni) are rendered literally and may stand for specific ritual implements. The passage ends mid-sentence, as in the source.
- Several lines of this tantra are syntactically very obscure, notably the passage beginning "To the chief, utterly tormented," and the "pride" series at the end (rñoms), which I have rendered by "pride" as the likely sense of divine pride. The phrase "the yakṣa" in the activity passage may refer to the sphere of fierce activity personified; I have kept it literal. "Hard to tame among the beings of the three realms of existence" follows the Tibetan srid gsum.
- The line "bringing compassion and sacred commitment to their end" (thugs rje thugs dam) is rendered literally. "Chief of those who offer homage and wings" renders a difficult phrase (bkur gshog gtso bo) and is uncertain. The passage on thirty-six majesties is obscure and may be corrupt in places. "Thirty-six in four" is likewise opaque. The tantra title is rendered as "Play of the Supreme Horse" (Hayagrīva-related) provisionally. The passage ends mid-sentence.
- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, and I have left it open accordingly. The mantras are heavily corrupt in transmission, so I have simply transliterated them. Several lines are obscure: the phrase about the gesture of the Great Wrathful One, the "covering" pressed upon the corpse (go la langgha), and bhanda with the marks are rendered cautiously. In the line "Whether at night unseen by anyone," the Tibetan is elliptical.
- The passage is rich in technical terms and corrupt or obscure readings. Several herbal and ritual ingredient names (nyeshing, zurngul, muzil, "hand of Indra") are of uncertain identity; I have transliterated or kept them literal. The line about hiding twenty-one arura fruits in a cow's "ra bo" is unclear and is left incomplete rather than guessed at. The sulphur line is also doubtful in the received text. "Bhanda" is kept as in the preceding passage. "Fruit of the wild fig" renders the Tibetan for a plant of uncertain identification. The Sanskrit mantras are given in plain reconstruction and may carry transmission errors in the Tibetan.

- The mantras are rendered by transliteration only, as is customary; spellings follow the Tibetan and are not normalized to Sanskrit, since several are obscure (for example "asuśa" and "āyuśa" are probably corrupt forms). In the line on the signs, "the time of its arising" is a literal rendering of a compressed and ambiguous phrase. "Those who subdue form" is a literal rendering of a difficult epithet whose referent is unclear. Chapter 26 ends at the colophon, and the passage then begins a new chapter whose opening verses are only partly clear.

- The mantras are rendered as given in the Tibetan transliteration, which is corrupt in places. Syllables such as che ge mo, ruluru, and similar are retained without emendation. "Hayagrīva mudrā" translates རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་འཁྱུག་པོ་ལྷ་མོ་ together with རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་, and the identification of the "Supreme Horse" with Hayagrīva is the traditional reading. The line about killing, "accomplish that action," follows the tantric convention of liberative killing, and the passage describes the consciousness of the victim as placed in great bliss. In the line about those who "deceive all teachers," the verb རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ is unusual in context, and the reading is tentative.

- The transliterated mantras in the Tibetan are visibly corrupt; I have given tentative Sanskrit reconstructions of the syllables and not attempted to restore the original sense. Some are unintelligible. The phrase rendered "Lord of Dance" (gar gyi dbang phyug) likely refers to the central deity of the tantra in dance form. "Skull-cup" in the final protective rite translates sngags thod literally and the reading is uncertain. The first sentence of this passage completes the thought begun in the preceding continuity text on bewildering and paralyzing.

- The title is rendered as the Tibetan gives it, with "Supreme Horse" for རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ (Hayagrīva, the Glorious Supreme Horse). The last line of the verse, རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་འཁྱུག་པོ་ལྷ་མོ་འཁྱུག་པོ་ལྷ་མོ་, is read as the holders of the tantra becoming loving toward others; the reading is straightforward, but the verse is terse, and the subject of the previous lines (those who hold the tantra through the power of faith) is inferred from context. The word རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ is rendered "Play" (Skt. līlā) in the title.
