The Higher Tantra of the Abhidhāna

མངོན་པར་བརྗོད་པའི་རྒྱུད་བླ་ན་མ།

The Higher Tantra of the Abhidhāna, known in Sanskrit as the Abhidhānottara Tantra and in Tibetan as Ngönpar Jöpé Gyü Lama, is a scripture of the Cakrasaṃvara cycle of Buddhist tantra, opening with homage to glorious Vajraḍāka and set among the wrathful vajra beings, ḍākas and ḍākinīs of all the tathāgatas. Over many chapters it presents the deities of the Heruka and Cakrasaṃvara maṇḍalas, their seed syllables, mantras, colors and hand emblems, along with rites, the sacred places of pilgrimage understood as present within the body, and the practice of meditating on oneself as the deity in union with wisdom and means. Its closing chapters stress that the outer forms of worship are surpassed by inner yoga and by meditation on emptiness and nondual wisdom. It is Toh 369 in the Kangyur, in the Tantra section, where it belongs to the explanatory tantras of the Cakrasaṃvara literature, and it was translated into Tibetan by Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna and Rinchen Zangpo and later revised by others.

In the language of India: a bhi dha na utta ra tantra nā ma. In the language of Tibet: The Higher Tantra of the Abhidhāna.

Homage to the Blessed One, glorious Vajraḍāka.

As far as the ends of the six classes of beings,
all the buddhas come forth;
this is the work of Vajrasattva.
To the dharmadhātu I bow and offer praise.

Glorious Vajraḍāka,
embodiment of the three bodies and the five wisdoms,
dwelling in the wheel of the ḍākinīs,
liberator of beings, to you I bow and offer praise.

For as long as the vajra ḍākinīs
cut the bonds of conceptual thought and fully engage in the work of the world,
for that long I always bow and offer praise.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One was dwelling in the secret essence of the vajra wrathful ones, the ḍākas and the ḍākinīs of all tathāgatas. There the blessed ones, all the tathāgatas, made a request to the Blessed

One, the beginningless Vajrasattva, and the Blessed One said: "I shall explain the essence, higher than the higher, of the Abhidhāna of the net of the vajra wrathful ones, ḍākas and ḍākinīs of all tathāgatas. Vajrapāṇi, lord of the great wrathful ones, I shall explain in detail the magical display with its diverse retinue. Listen well and hold it in mind."

At this he said, "Excellent, Blessed One," joined his palms and bowed, and the Blessed One spoke:

Now the secret is to be explained,
in brief and not at length.
Glorious Heruka, the perfect union,
accomplishes all aims that are desired.
Higher even than the higher
is this later Abhidhāna,
the binding of the net of ḍākinīs.
In the delight of the supreme secret
the self of all forever abides.
The ḍāka, the illusion, the sattva
is Vajrasattva, the supreme bliss.
This is the self-arisen blessed hero,
the binding of the net of ḍākas.

This great beginningless mode,
the abode in the bhaga where existence, sound and form arise,
is the field of conduct for those who practice the pledge.
Stainless in beginning, middle and end,
hard to find in the three worlds,
it is the perfect union of churner and churned.
For whomever, and in whatever way is fitting,
it is naturally pure and luminous,
arising from the secret place.
Ever free of faults and peaceful,
become equal to space,
it brings about emanation and withdrawal.
Naturally pure and self-arisen,
it bestows the bliss of the yoginī.
Endowed with recitation and meditative concentration,
and with the wisdom of the rite of union itself:
these are taught in the tantra.

Lord of Secrets, listen well.

The supreme ones, the breath-releasing and the intermediate,
together with fragrant water,
the wise one should make into pills
and offer them to the maṇḍalas of the retinue.
At the special time of their arising,
the innate is accomplished through the messenger.
Supreme, middling and lowest,
all accomplishments up to the ultimate arise.
The accomplishment of joy
that the mind desires will also be accomplished.
With drops of one's own substance
one should worship the buddhas and bodhisattvas.
Through the union of one's own deity
one should worship oneself and others too.
By seeing, by touching,
by hearing and by remembering,
one is freed from all wrongdoing;
of this there is no doubt.
The yogin himself is supreme merit,
the purifier who destroys wrongdoing.
Through pure recitation and meditative concentration too,
accomplishment comes in this very life.

From the Higher Tantra of the Abhidhāna, higher than the higher, this is the first chapter, teaching the hidden secret of entering the pledge.

Then the Blessed One Vajrasattva entered into equipoise in the samādhi of the great wrathful one called Magical Display in the Dharmadhātu, and taught the secret of all accomplishments to bodhisattva great beings as numerous as the atoms of countless buddhafields, unattached and free of attachment, namely: the great hero called Form Vajra, the great hero called Feeling Vajra, the great hero called Perception Vajra, the great hero called Formations Vajra, the great hero called Consciousness Vajra, the great Vajra Maheśvara, chief of all the tathāgatas of the dharmadhātu, the great hero Delusion Vajra, the great hero Ear Vajra, the great hero Nose Vajra, the great hero Attachment Vajra, the great hero Jealousy Vajra, the great hero called Lord of All Tathāgatas, the great hero Earth Vajra, the great hero Water Vajra, the great hero Fire Vajra, the great hero Wind Vajra, and the great hero Space Vajra. With these and others like them, without exception and leaving none out, reaching to the limits of the dharmadhātu, infinite and radiating, through the arising of the secret essence, an assembly of the diverse wheels of the maṇḍala, he dwelt together with the wheel of the pledge of the three secrets: the great hero Vajra Khaṇḍakapāla, the great hero Vajra Mahākaṅkāla, the great hero Vajra Kaṅkāla, the great hero Vajra Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra, the great hero Vajra Suravairin, the great hero Vajra Amitābha, the great hero Vajraprabha, the great hero Vajradeha, the great hero Vajra Aṅkuraka, the great hero Vajra Jaṭila, the great hero Vajra Mahāvīra, the great hero Vajra Hūṃkāra, the great hero Vajra Subhadra, the great hero Vajrabhadra, the great hero Vajra Mahābhairava, the great hero Vajra Virūpākṣa, the great hero Vajra Mahābala, the great hero Vajraratna, the great hero Vajra Paramāśva, the great hero Vajra Ākāśagarbha, the great hero Vajra Śrī Mahāheruka, the great hero Vajra Padmanarteśvara, the great hero Vajra Vairocana, and the great hero Vajrasattva. All the realms of space were seen to be completely filled by heroes such as these and by all the tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, lord of all families, entered into equipoise in the samādhi called the Nonduality of the Pledge of the Three Vajras, and his own secret pledge, the yoginīs arising from the secret bhaga, and taught the great pledge of union, the nondual secret pledge of the heroes, namely: the great yoginī called Pātanī, the great yoginī called Māraṇī, the great yoginī called Ākarṣaṇī, the great yoginī called Narteśvarī, the great yoginī called Padmajālinī; the great ḍākinī called Vajraḍākinī, the great ḍākinī called Vajralāmā, the great ḍākinī called Vajrakhaṇḍarohā, the great ḍākinī called Vajrarūpiṇī; the great yoginī called Pracaṇḍā, the great yoginī called Caṇḍākṣī, the great yoginī called Prabhāvatī, the great yoginī called Mahānāsā, the great yoginī called Vīramatī, the great yoginī called Kharvarī, the great yoginī called Laṅkeśvarī, the great yoginī called Drumacchāyā, the great yoginī called Airāvatī, the great yoginī called Mahābhairavā, the great yoginī called Vāyuvegā, the great yoginī called Surābhakṣī, the great yoginī called Śyāmādevī, the great yoginī called Subhadrā, the great yoginī called Hayakarṇā, the great yoginī called Khagānanā, the great yoginī called Cakravegā, the great yoginī called Khaṇḍarohā, the great yoginī called Śauṇḍinī, the great yoginī called Cakravarmiṇī, the great yoginī called Suvīrā, the great yoginī called Mahābalā, the great yoginī called Cakravartinī, and the great yoginī called Mahāvīryā. Heroes and yoginīs such as these, in all their variety, were seen to fill everything to the very limits of the realm of space, proclaiming the sounds hūṃ and phaṭ, performing many kinds of dance, embracing and kissing their own pledge partners, perfecting the taste of great compassion.

Having seen this, they entered, and the supreme heroes called to mind the pledge. The wisdom of the nondual pledge of glorious Vajraḍāka and the ḍākinī Vajravārāhī truly arose, and the Perfection of Wisdom arose.

Then the Blessed One taught the families and the secret of all the hosts of mātṛkās, namely: the vajra mātṛkā called Kākāsyā, the vajra mātṛkā called Ulūkāsyā, the vajra mātṛkā called Śvānāsyā, the vajra mātṛkā called Sūkarāsyā, the vajra mātṛkā called Yamadāḍhī, the vajra mātṛkā called Yamadūtī, the vajra mātṛkā called Yamadaṃṣṭrī, and the vajra mātṛkā called Yamamathanī. All the realms of space were filled by every quarter of such hosts of mātṛkās. The lord of the family, glorious Heruka, from whom arises the nondual wisdom whose nature is the pure dharmadhātu, embodiment of the Perfection of Wisdom, is the great pledge, the pledge of the vajra family:

All phenomena are without entity,
entirely free of every characteristic;
it truly arises from the selfless Dharma.
This is the supreme pledge.

Then the Blessed One taught the vajra pledge called the Nondual Vajra Armor, namely: the great lord of yoga Vajrasattva, the great lord of yoga Vairocana Vajra, the great lord of yoga Padmanarteśvara, the great lord of yoga Vajra Heruka, the great lord of yoga Vajra Sūrya, and the great lord of yoga Vajra Paramāśva. These six families are to be set upon the six limbs. That supreme pledge of nondual protection arises from the nonduality of method and wisdom.

I shall explain the hidden secret, supreme in the great yoga: the great vajra goddess Vajravārāhī, the great vajra goddess Yāminī, the great vajra goddess Mohanī, the great vajra goddess Sañcālinī, the great vajra goddess Santrāsanī, and the great vajra goddess Caṇḍikā. These too are the great secret mind of the union that perfectly protects the nondual pledge of the realm of space and of the whole dharmadhātu. Many yoginīs of such various kinds made offering with their own hands of supreme warm blood, joined their palms, and with supreme devotion touched their crowns to the ground.

Then he entered into equipoise in the samādhi called the Great Pledge, Magical Display, the Variegated Vajra. From the pores of his own body he emanated and sent forth beings of every kind, and for the many to be trained he filled the whole dharmadhātu, without exception and leaving none out, with methods of every kind, and the sky in front was seen to be completely filled with this variety. The Blessed One, assuming the guise of the wrathful ones of great compassion of the various families, for the benefit of sentient beings displayed miracles of the various joys of nondual taste, as numerous as atoms, and the lord of the three realms spoke:

Upon water, fire, wind and the Mahendra earth is Sumeru, king of mountains, of many kinds, beautiful with the splendor of many kinds of jewels. Upon it glorious Vajrasattva drew forth the great vajra wrathful one from the dharmadhātu and emanated him; and when he had emanated the great vajra palace, king of great maṇḍalas, the great Samantabhadra arose, came forth together with the vajra retinue, and dwelt there firmly.

It was adorned with excellences of every kind, ornamented with ornaments of vajra jewels, lovely as the colors of the moon and sun, and patterned in a lattice design with nets of bells, yak-tail whisks, victory banners and small tinkling bells. It resounded with the sound of the thread of the vajra pledge entering the wheel of Dharma. It resounded with the cries of every kind of god, nāga, yakṣa, rākṣasa, bhūta, preta and piśāca, of unmādas, apasmāras and shadow-oppressing spirits, of the vicious and the exceedingly savage, of vetālas, corpses and burning corpses, of dogs, jackals and she-jackals. It resounded with the cries of "phem" and "alala" of heroes, ḍākas and ḍākinīs, and with the sound of bells and ḍamaru drums, and it was adorned with severed heads that danced.

He whose conduct is that of the Blessed One Vajrapāṇi, who liberates through virtuous action and benefits all sentient beings with the taste of compassion; who, encircled by a whirling retinue, dances the lotus dance with joined palms, and stands with the right leg extended and the palms of the hands joined; who teaches the profound way of the supreme Dharma of the fragments of buddha skulls and the desire of the great king of wrathful ones; who holds a great body and proclaims a profound sound; who possesses the maṇḍala of his own retinue; from whom the great Highest Abhidhāna arises; who possesses the net of nets of the king of the vow of the ḍākas and ḍākinīs; the Teacher who teaches in accord with the various dharmas, who grants and teaches the bliss suited to the various intentions of sentient beings: "Great being, excellent, excellent! Vajrapāṇi, listen well!"

This concludes the second chapter, the chapter of the request, from the Abhidhāna Tantra, Highest of the High.

Then the Blessed One spoke the vajra secret essence to the whole maṇḍala of the retinue:

Having meditated on a moon at the heart,
The magical display of the subtle vajra,
The secret of all the sugatas,
Is the vow of the net of ḍākinīs.
There, blessed as the secret,
Listen well to the supreme essence:
The highest even of the highest,
The vow of the net of ḍākinīs.

In this way, everything, as far as the secondary charnel grounds, should be known as completely pure.

pu ja au a go rā de mā ka o tri ko ka la ka hi pre gri sau su na si ma ku

The ten grounds, whose nature is complete purity,
And likewise the ten perfections,
And the ten knowledges, of purified nature:
Meditate fully on these tens.
Because the three wheels too are completely pure,
The twenty-four are virtuous in their nature.
Through liberation from times and lunar days,
The minds of the yoginīs rejoice.
The meaning of the thirty-seven purities
Arose from the exalted Heruka.
The Abhidhāna Tantra, highest of the high,
Is the sublime of the supreme great secret.

By circling to the left and to the right,
One should laugh, make offerings and circumambulate.
One who knows that reality
Should teach the five signs.
To anyone who has no empowerment,
Do not teach that reality in any other way.
In the Abhidhāna Tantra, the master

Gives the oral instruction to the empowered disciple.
Otherwise the disciple goes into madness,
Into fainting and stupor.
Into Avīci, the great terror,
That wicked one will fall.
One who gives the volume to one who is no friend,
That wicked one dies at once.
Boils, fevers, poison and disease:
He will be tormented by ḍāka grahas.
By savage obstructors and by Gaṇapati
He will be slain and fall into hell.
With every effort possible,
Master and disciple, in due order,
Having always kept that reality hidden,
Will swiftly gain the siddhi of mantra.
When the master, everything in due order,
According to the stages of the Abhidhāna Tantra,
Applies it to deity yoga,
Nondual wisdom will arise.
At once there is awakening;
The supreme will surely be found.
A human girl such as this should be avoided:
One who does not know my pledges,
Fierce, of wrong views, of wicked nature,
Savage and without compassion,
Possessed of greed and avarice,
Cunning, wicked and jealous,
Attached to other men,
And full of conceptual thought.
Such a mudrā should be avoided;
For her, the siddhi of union is far off.
Take a Pukkasī, lovely and beautiful,
Adorned with a beautiful form and youth,
Single-minded toward union,
Steady in her observance and knowing the pledges,
Brave, free of attachment, without shame,
Without pride and without avarice.

Mantrin, this is your own conduct:
You should take up the vidyā and the observance.
Always wear the five mudrās,
And make skull ornaments for your head as well.
Hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṃ,
Smeared all over with the dust of ashes.
Always eat mahāmāṃsa,
Be intoxicated by drinking everything,
Sit upon a corpse seat,
And wear a great hide as clothing.
Eat food that accords with this,
Be sated with fat and blood.
In villages or in wildernesses,
Whatever land one goes to,
One should never stay there out of attachment,
But always practice in charnel grounds,
Or else stay in the marketplace.
The śrāvakas, the unfortunate of the world,
Are pervaded by unknowing and delusion;
In a temple that the śrāvakas enjoy,
One should not stay.
Just like a poor man,
So the bodhisattva dwells.
He sports with the vajra dance,
Always dwelling in the charnel ground,
Eating excrement and great flesh as food,
Furnished with intoxicating drink.
The chief of heroes, with one-pointed Mind, should meditate intently.
If he has not found the great mudrā,
That which has fully abandoned all distraction
Is the source of wisdom,
Arisen from the perfection of wisdom.
Not apprehending grasped and grasper,
Abide in nonduality itself.
Having made the mind one-pointed,
If one abides in the conduct of meditation,

The siddhi of delight in bliss will come.
The ritual sequence of wisdom and means:
Sport gently with the great mudrā.
Through meditation becoming manifest,
Liberation and all the buddhas too
Will be attained in this very life.
The left-hand conduct is wisdom;
The right, likewise, is means.
The might of one endowed with meditation
Holds sway over the lord of the Thirty (Indra).
Yoginīs and accomplished ones,
Daughters of yakṣas and of nāgas,
And various gandharvīs besides:
With them he enjoys the pleasures of desire.
That reality, the supreme secret:
Always meditate on the vowels and consonants.
Through the yoga of one's own deity,
Examine everything in the same way.
As for the signs the hero shows:
With the yogin's left hand
One should engage in the signs.
This, which has become the abode of heroes,
The three worlds, moving and unmoving,
All beings, have arisen from the left.
Vajrasattva is the thumb itself;
In the index finger Vairocana dwells;
In the middle finger abides Padmanarteśvara;
The ring finger is the hero possessing siddhi;
In the little finger, the Inexhaustible Body;
On the surface of the nails abides Hayagrīva.
Those that arise from the cause of the left
Are said to be all the heroes.
The palm is the supreme gathering of the messengers.
Having ascertained the back well,
The five signs should be shown.
Practitioner, understand this:
Earth is said to be Locanā;

The water element is said to be Māmakī;
Fire is said to be Pāṇḍaravāsinī;
Wind is known as Tārā.
She Who Kisses is emptiness,
And likewise she is the perfection.
All the heroes of the center
The wise one invites to go to the back.
This secret should not be shown;
With great effort it should be hidden.
Thus, by means of signs, the heroes
Eat food together with them.
The union of all by the hero
Is the Saṃvara of the net of ḍākas.
For all who follow one another,
I shall explain the various signs.
The characteristics of the ḍākinīs
And the characteristics of the messengers,
In order to benefit the practitioner,
All of these I shall explain.
Painted cloths and images:
When they are painted, likewise the pledges,
And the distinctions of body color,
By which the practitioner is accomplished;
The perfect maṇḍala,
Beautiful with various mantras;
The delightful pledges of the deities;
The yoginīs, various and supreme;
Of various delightful heroes
The yoginīs fully assembled,
The ḍākinīs too fully assembled,
Their own various families, supreme and sublime.
According to the word of the lineage of masters,
In order to benefit the disciple,
He is highly skilled in the activities of the lord,
Well trained in mantra and in tantra,
And moreover in the ritual sequences,
Skilled in the activities of the Highest Abhidhāna.

The mantrin examines the characteristics of the paśu,
The distinctions of the various families,
The conduct of the yoginīs,
And likewise of the ḍākinīs.
The outer mudrās of the mātṛkās
Arose from the family of Vārāhī.
The conduct of all the heroes
And the conduct of the cakra he has thoroughly learned.
In the characteristics and conduct
Of the outer lord of yoga he is skilled.
Arisen from the family of glorious Heruka,
He is trained in virtuous conduct.
In the distinctions of conduct in the lands
And in the conduct of a master he is skilled.
The practice of the yoginī tantras,
The vast yoga tantras,
The sequence of the divisions of the kriyā tantras:
All the tantras he fully knows.
The scriptures and treatises of accomplishment, and

The sūtras and likewise the jātakas,
The unsurpassed conduct
Arisen from the perfection of wisdom,
He is skilled in all the outer treatises:
The perfect and supreme master.
Endowed with the meditation of union,
And with a mind that is free of doubt,
One should eat every kind of food.
With the hundred syllables, everywhere,
Having firmly meditated on the secret mantra,
Joining it with one's own name,
Interweave them as one and recite.
Always recite the garland mantra as well,
And all aims will be accomplished.
Higher even than the highest,
The vow of the net of ḍākinīs.
With the collected secret mantras, the armor,

The essence and the near essence,
Protect with the collected secret mantras.
In a maṇḍala of utmost beauty,
Having well arranged the maṇḍala of letters,
Generate the heroes and the yoginīs.
This is all the secret mantras,
The sublime and supreme of the mātṛkās,
The secret, the joy, the hidden;
It is the compendium of all secret mantras,
It is the abode of all secret mantras.
The arising of beings, too, is pervaded by the mātṛkās.
This reality is not to be shown,
For that would destroy the siddhi.
This meditation is supreme,
The unsurpassed siddhi of what one desires.
A person, merely by meditating on this,
Attains the state of Vajrasattva.
He is clad in the armor of loving-kindness;
Compassion is the armor of Dharma;
He is equipped with wisdom as his weapon;
The māra of the afflictions is fully cast off.
Protected by Mahāpratyaṅgirā,
Marked by the four vajra faces,
Through the division of body, speech and mind Marked by the vajra of the three joined:
This great protection, supreme of all,
Bestows every siddhi.
The wheel of command is a great protection;
Through the kīla, siddhi comes without obstructors.
The supreme protection of these Bestows awakening on the practitioner.
With the fence of vajra kīlas,
The vajra ground and the net,
The tent above and the canopy,
Having driven out the vicious māras,
One does not kill; there is no killing.
For one who has tamed his own mind,

It is his own mind that is bound.
Who is there to be killed, and by whom?
The mind of equality is the scent;
The square is the anointing;
White sandalwood is the body:
It is abiding in equality itself.
The flowers, yogin, are patience,
And are said to be strewn with effort.
Natural purity is the incense;
The meditation of equality is the incense.

This concludes the third chapter, teaching the ultimate meaning of the essence of reality, from the Great Abhidhāna Tantra, the Highest.

Then the Blessed One Vajraḍāka spoke the secret of reality:

Now I shall properly explain
The Abhidhāna Tantra, highest of the high,
Just as the lineage of masters has explained it.
Having cast off outer conceptual thought,
The pledge of equality, supreme and sublime,
Is without conception and without analysis,
And all fears are fully cast off.
There are no lunar dates and no constellations,
Nor is there any rite of training.
There is no cleanliness and no uncleanness,
Nor are there any acts of purification.
It is free from times and measures,
And the conduct of purification is fully cast off.
Knowing the application of his own mantra and tantra,
He also works for the benefit of all sentient beings.
In mountain ravines and on mountain peaks,
On the banks of great rivers,
On the shores of great oceans,
At a solitary tree and at virtuous places,
In a house of the mātṛkās or a charnel ground,
In various excellent gardens,
In temples or at stūpas,
In houses or at crossroads:

If the practitioner accomplishes union there,
It grants the fruit of every desire.
Having examined the place,
Wherever the mind delights,
If the various sublime Saṃvara
Is practiced there, siddhi will come.
From mind that is free of any joining,
Through a meditation divided in many ways,
Having anointed the ground
With the nectar of the five wisdoms,
One should strew with effort
The flowers of the perfection of patience.
The delightful seat of the various mudrās
Should be made vast through meditative equipoise.
With a one-pointed mind,
Accomplish the perfection of meditative concentration.
Abiding in the four abodes of Brahmā,
Practice the four means of attraction.
Focusing as well on the ten virtues,
Work too for the benefit of all sentient beings.
When one looks outward and inward,
All phenomena are empty.
The supreme and sublime accumulation for awakening
Abides firmly in mind alone.
In the space at the center of one's heart,
Meditate on a sun disk resting there.
Upon it, that which is the supreme reality
Is the five wisdoms, the peaceful.
With bright rays of many kinds Radiating, it pervades everywhere.
Having roused those who were accomplished before,
One also confers the blessing.
By delighting in meditating on the element of space,
One sees the supreme maṇḍala.
Like a pod filled with sesame seeds,
One sees it pervaded by deities and wrathful ones.
Having seen the buddhas and bodhisattvas,

The mind of awakening and the chief of masters,
And the various goddesses,
I shall make offerings and praise them.
Emanating buddhas, hosts of emanations,
The king of wrathful ones, with the yoginīs,
Establishes the sentient beings of the six classes of beings
In the state of buddhahood.
Having seen that supreme one, pervading
The whole expanse of space, and having gathered it in,
All go for refuge to the Three.
Until awakening is finally reached,
All sentient beings without exception
Are placed in that state of buddhahood.
To that the practitioner should pray:
"In that which has arisen from virtuous action,
I always go for refuge."
Pride, which has the form of delusion,
Form, feeling, perception, Formations and consciousness likewise:

oṃ bruṃ aṃ hrīṃ ho hūṃ

These are pervaded by Vairocana,
Vajra Sūrya, Narteśvara
And Vajrarāja,
And likewise by supreme Vajrasattva.
All the tathāgatas
Are glorious Heruka Vajra.
Eye, ear and nose,
Tongue, awareness, and likewise mind:

oṃ hūṃ trāṃ āṃ khaṃ haṃ

Delusion and aversion, Likewise jealousy and attachment,
Avarice and stupidity:
In all of the sense sources
They are the Lord Vajra himself.
Earth and water, and likewise fire,

Wind and space itself:

lāṃ māṃ pāṃ tāṃ khāṃ

Pātanī and Māraṇī,
Ākarṣaṇī and Narteśvarī,
And the goddess Padmajālinī:
Equal to space, like the sky.

Thus the aggregates, the elements
And the sense sources: the yogin
Should know the nature of ordinary things
To be completely pure.
All ordinary phenomena are completely pure,
And I too am completely pure.
Then go for refuge to the Three.
By turning into a body of mantra,
Having become glorious Heruka myself,
I also work for the benefit of all sentient beings.
Having attained the supreme state of Heruka,
May I place and establish in it
All sentient beings without exception.

oṃ svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho'haṃ

This should be recited up to three times.
Into the insubstantial ten directions, the front and the rest,
Send forth the garland of the essence mantra.
Then, having seen that essence,
And likewise the net and the fence,
Bless the vajra ground and the rest.
The canopy and the net of arrows,
And all around, the blazing vajra fire:
Set these out far beyond.

oṃ medinīvajrībhava vajrabandha hūṃ oṃ vajraprākāra hūṃ vaṃ hūṃ oṃ vajrapañcara hūṃ vaṃ hūṃ oṃ vajravitāna hūṃ khaṃ hūṃ oṃ vajraśarajāla trāṃ śaṃ trāṃ oṃ vajrajvalānalārka hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ

The wheel of command of Heruka,
The eight chiefs, blazing:

Having seen them clearly,
Meditate on Vajrasattva
Dwelling in the center of a sun disk,
With three faces and six arms, peaceful,
Like pure crystal and the color of the moon,
Joined in equality with the great mudrā,
Seated well in cross-legged posture with his wisdom consort,
His head with a garland as of skulls,
And Akṣobhya dwelling as his crown ornament,
Complete with all the ornaments,
Marked with all the major marks,
And adorned with all the minor marks.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṃga,
Embraces her well with vajra and bell,
And holds a noose and a hook:
The great hero dwells in the state of bliss.
White, yellow and green:
The other two faces vary in color.
In forward and in reverse order
He sends forth his eight wrathful ones:
Vajra Raudra, nalārkaṃ,
And likewise Vajroṣṇīṣa, Hearth Union, Vajrayakṣa, Vajrakāla, Mahābala,
And the one called Vajrabhairava:
These wrathful ones are set in place.
Blue, yellow, and likewise red,
Green, and of the color of smoke,
White, black, and of saffron color;
Most terrifying, with crowns of skulls,
Three-faced and six-armed,
All ornamented with ornaments
Of human bone, and blazing fiercely,
With the right leg extended,
They dwell within variegated lotuses,
Dwelling in the center of sun disks.
Imagine the eight world protectors

Pressed down beneath their feet.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṃ,
And bear the supreme noose and hook as well,
All with bells and ḍamaru drums,
Well embraced in the bliss of wisdom.
Adorned with reddish-yellow hair,
Terrifying with bared fangs,
Wearing tiger skins as clothing,
Bearing ornaments of terrifying garlands:
With these, adorn yourself.
Meditate on Vajra Hūṃkāra:
Wrathful, blazing and moving,
Fierce and terrifying, transformed,
Well adorned with all the ornaments,
Standing in the posture with the right leg extended,
He bears a hook, a noose and a khaṭvāṃ,
And holds a bell, a vajra and a skull cup.
He wears a necklace of heads upon his body,
And a girdle of a garland of skulls;
All the vicious ones he presses beneath his feet;
He is joined in equality of means and wisdom,
And has Vajrasattva as his crown ornament.
One should meditate on Vajrabhairava.
Meditate on the two wrathful ones:
Above is Uṣṇīṣacakravartin;
Meditate on Vajrabhairava.
Below is Vajrapātāla,
Of white and blue color,
Holding a skull cup and a khaṭvāṃ,
Holding a wheel and a spear,
A noose, a hook, a bell and a vajra,
Standing in the posture with the right leg extended.
Having made the kīla into a wrathful one,
Send it forth into the ten directions.
The command given to it is:
"Swiftly make the obstructors nonexistent!"
Having recollected the secret mantra,

Plant them evenly in the four directions.
Joining the thumb and the threatening forefinger,
Snap the fingers toward the ten directions.

oṃ suṃbhani suṃbha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ
To the east.
oṃ gṛhṇa gṛhṇa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ
To the north.
oṃ gṛhṇāpaya gṛhṇāpaya gṛhṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ
To the west.
oṃ ānaya hoḥ bhagvāna vajra hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ
To the south.

With this king of secret mantras,
Into the brains of all the obstructors
Drive in the vajra kīla and press it down,
In forward and in reverse order.

oṃ gha gha ghātaya ghātaya sarvaduṣṭāṃ vighnān hūṃ phaṭ kīlaya kīlaya sarvapāpaṃ hūṃ phaṭ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ vajrakīlaya vajradhara ājñāpayati kāyavākcitta vajrakīlaya hūṃ phaṭ

Having looked upon the kīla as the vajra wrathful one,
One should examine it thoroughly.
In forward and in reverse order,
Strike it with the vajra of siddhi.

oṃ vajra hūṃ muṅgara vajrakīla ākoṭaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ

The wise one should fiercely recite
The words of the vajra wrathful ones, the words of secret mantra:

oṃ khavajradhṛk vajra hūṃkāra vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajracaṇḍa vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrānalārka vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajroṣṇīṣa vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrakuṇḍali vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrayakṣa vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrakarāla vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajramahābala vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrabhiṣana vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajroṣṇīṣacakravarti vajra hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrapātāla vajra hūṃ phaṭ

By accomplishing these commands,
At once there will be no obstructors.
māṃsa, marrow, fat and saliva,
śukra and rakta mixed together:

The yogin should make them into pills;
If he eats them, siddhi is certain.
Blue, yellow and green:
Having made oneself into Vajra Hūṃkāra,
Yellow, black and green,
Smoky, yellow and pale yellow,
White, yellow and green,
Red, yellow and green:
Thus the four, like the lord,
With Akṣobhya as crown ornament, possessing the pledge.
By meditating, one pleases the vajra holder.
In this way all the wrathful ones as well
Do not transgress the pledge.
Thus the command of the chief
Of the many and various should be taken up.
Wherever the yogin dwells,
He sees all obstructors as nonexistent.
Naked, or else not naked,
With hair unbound and limbs smeared with ashes,
Thus, for as long as he does not tire,
He should perform the recitation of the wheels.
The vajra of the wisdom of emptiness:
Recollect it with faith and rest in equipoise.

oṃ śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāvaātmako'haṃ oṃ animittajñānavajrasvabhāvaātmako'haṃ oṃ apraṇihitajñānavajrasvabhāvaātmako'haṃ

Wisdom that is like a mirage
Should be examined as mind alone.
This is equal to space;
There is no dharma, nor is there any non-dharma.
Just as space has no stain,
It is without substance and without object.

That which abides, clear, in the center of the union at the heart,
Where the mind of subtle view and self-arisen experience enters,
Which approaches the three realms entirely as nondual:
To that clear and supreme dharmadhātu I bow.

That which binds firmly within it all the steeds, the movements of things,
Which has become the vessel where wisdom and all the victors gather,
Which approaches the three realms entirely as nondual:
Its vision, like space, has become stainless glory.

Through the yoga of recollecting the Buddha,
Meditate on the recollection of the Dharma.
Through the yoga of recollecting the Dharma,
The dharmakāya will arise of itself.
In the center is the illuminating consciousness.
For those who know the supreme wisdom,
Through the habit of thorough meditation,
This blazes forth without doubt.
Always abiding in the heart
Is the single drop, without letters.
If a person meditates on it,
Supreme wisdom will arise.
Through the yoga of recollecting the sattva,
Meditate on the recollection of the sattva.
Through the dharma of recollecting the sattva,
The Dharma sattva arises in particular.
I, who benefit beings with compassion,
See through the power of aspiration,
And having seen, as far as below,
In the center of a moon disk,
Vajrasattva, the omniscient one,
White and yellow and likewise red
And blue, with four faces.
Imagine the wind maṇḍala
Arising perfectly from the letter yaṃ,
Blue in color and shaped like a bow;
Meditate on it as marked with banners,
And visualize garlands of smoke pervading it.
Above it is the letter raṃ,
The supreme and sublime fire maṇḍala,
Triangular and red in color,
Pervaded by blazing garlands, blazing,

With boundless light like ten million suns;
Meditate on it as marked with vajras.
Above it is water itself,
Arisen from the supreme letter vaṃ,
Like the color of duśara (snow),
Round, with garlands of light rays.
Above it is the earth maṇḍala,
Arisen from laṃ, and yellow,
Square, and marked with vajras,
With yellow light rays massing everywhere.
Above it the yogin should meditate on Sumeru, the supreme mountain,
Square, with the four jewels,
Beautified by eight peaks,
Arisen well from the letter suṃ,
Supreme and sublime in its rays and splendor.
Above it one should imagine
That which arises from a white bruṃ,
And upon that, together with the wheel,
Imagine a multi-storied palace,
Square, with four doors,
Adorned with four porticoes,
Beautiful with nets and half-nets,
Adorned with garlands of banners.
At all the corner sections,
And at the doors, the door recesses and the junctions,
It is adorned with vajra jewels.
Lay down the lines of the outer maṇḍala.

Within it is a wheel,
Eight-spoked and white in color.
At its center is a great lotus,
Variegated, with eight petals,
Its heart covered with anthers.
In the center of a moon disk
Is Vajrasattva together with his consort.
His four faces are white and yellow,

And likewise red and green:
Peaceful, wild, wrathful,
And with an expression most terrifying.
He is equally endowed with vajra and bell,
Spear, axe, and hand drum,
Curved knife, skull cup, and khaṭvāṅga.
He wears the skin of Brahmā as his garment,
And holds a noose and the head of Brahmā.
Thus he has twelve arms,
And sits in the vajra-hero posture.
His head ornament is a crown of skulls;
All his ornaments are complete,
And he is fully endowed with the major and minor marks.
He has the pledge of the wisdom of the mind;
His crown is Vajradhara.
Just as the means, so is the wisdom consort:
The five mudrās are blessed.
Divided by the distinction of the families,
The supreme sovereign of the vajra realm,
Through the method of union in great bliss,
Dissolves the two bodies into nonduality.
From sameness arise bodies:
The retinue of the ḍākas arises,
Together with the heroes and the yoginīs.
They stand with the right leg drawn in and the left extended,
Their faces white, blue, yellow, and red,
Their hands embracing with wheel and bell.
They hold, in order, the hand emblems
Of Vajrasattva and the rest, as before.
They are adorned with garlands of skulls,
And decked with garlands of freshly severed heads.
They bear the crescent moon,
Have four faces with bared fangs,
Three eyes, and twelve arms.

They trample underfoot Brahmā and the other gods, wear ornaments of human bone, have Vairocana as their head ornament, are adorned with the six mudrās, and wear tiger skins. He is embraced on his lap by Buddhaḍākinī, who embraces his body while holding a skull cup and a wheel, making the threatening gesture toward the wicked, and who entwines him with her two thighs, intoxicated with bliss and delight.

The elements, the aggregates, and the sense sources are blessed. The earth element is laṃ, Pātanī. The water element is maṃ, Māraṇī. The fire element is raṃ, Ākarṣaṇī. The wind element is yaṃ, Narteśvarī. The space element is khaṃ, Padmajālinī. Their colors are yellow, blue, red, smoky, and blue.

The aggregate of form is Vairocana, oṃ, white in color. The aggregate of feeling is Vajraratna, aṃ, the color of refined gold. Perception is hrī, Padmanarteśvara, red. Formations are Vajrarāja, ho, green. Consciousness is Vajrasattva, hūṃ, white. The suchness of all the tathāgatas is glorious Heruka, hi, black in color. The eye is bruṃ, the Vajra of Delusion, white. The ear is hūṃ, the Vajra of Aversion, black. The nose is khaṃ, the Vajra of Jealousy, yellow. Speech is the Vajra of Passion, a, red. Touch is the Vajra of Avarice, haṃ, green. All the sense sources are the Vajra of Lordship, haṃ, white. The body is hūṃ, white. Speech is āḥ, red. The mind is oṃ, blue. In this way one blesses and visualizes body, speech, and mind, all three.

Then, the ḍākinī of the eastern petal is blue in body. On the southern petal is Lāmā, green, that is, pale blue. On the western petal is Khaṇḍarohā, red. On the northern petal is Rūpiṇī, golden and pale yellow, with one face, four arms, and three eyes, her hair loose, clad in the directions, standing with the right leg extended, with a terrifying expression, adorned with the five mudrās, holding a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a hand drum, and a curved knife, her face full of passion, gazing and touching with delighted passion.

In the four intermediate directions, upon vases of the five nectars, one should place four vessels filled with bodhicitta.

In the east, in Pretapurī, are Mahābala and Cakravegā, black. In the north, in Gṛhadevatā, are Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā, yellow. In the west, in Saurāṣṭra, are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī, red. In the south, in Suvarṇadvīpa, are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī, green. In the southeast, in Nagara, are glorious Heruka and Suvīrā, red. In the southwest, in Sindhu, are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā, moon-white and pale yellow. In the northwest, in Maru, are Vairocana and Cakravartinī, smoke-colored. In the northeast, in Kulutā, are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā, white.

The heroes, Mahābala and the rest, have one face and four arms and wear crowns of matted locks. With two hands they embrace while holding a wheel and a bell, and with the other hands they hold a khaṭvāṅga and a hand drum. They are adorned with the five mudrās and stand with the right leg extended.

The goddesses, Cakravegā and the rest, have one face and two arms, and embrace while holding a skull cup and a wheel with the threatening gesture. They have three eyes and fierce forms, their hair loose; naked, they abide evenly in nondual union. Clad in the directions, they are girded with a neck jewel, bracelets, armlets, earrings, the sacred thread, a necklace, a garland of heads, and a girdle of bells.

At the eastern, northern, western, and southern doors are Kākāsyā, Ulūkāsyā, Śvānāsyā, and Sūkarāsyā. In the southeast, southwest, northwest, and northeast are Yamadāhī, Yamadūtī, Yamadaṃṣṭrī, and Yamamathanī. Just as with the four ḍākinīs, so too are the distinctions of Kākāsyā and the rest. The goddesses of the intermediate directions have a twofold form and a captivating manner; they sit on seats of pretas, greatly fierce, acting for the benefit of sentient beings through compassion. All these heroes, moreover, bear a garland of wheels on their foreheads. These are the body wheel, which dwells beneath the earth.

The Blessed One, dwelling in the maṇḍala, gazing with eyes of passion at the heroes and yoginīs of every kind, sang:

"The bliss of manifold savors and essences,
The great bliss of passion,
Today I have found.
a la la ho, great delight!
This is great bliss itself.
The deity, the Sugata, is surpassingly beautiful."
Merely by singing this song,
Through joy one is freed from the states of existence.
The Sugata, the great purity,
Should be contemplated in the maṇḍala.
Some yogis wish the womb-born
To be brought under the sway of song.
The womb-born are the body wheel.
Having beheld the wisdom maṇḍala,
Having made offerings and praises, one should cause it to enter.

Through the practice of emanating and gathering back,
One should meditate on entity and non-entity.
The yogi, without error,
Should perform ten thousand or a hundred thousand recitations.
Then the body of one still subject to birth is accomplished,
And without doubt one will course through the sky.

oṃ śrī ka ya ḍā ka ru ru lu bruṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍā ki nī jā la sambaraṃ svā hā. This is the heart mantra.

To the ḍākas, the ḍākinīs, and the rest,
First abiding upon the lotus,
One should make offerings and also recite the mantras.
Then the five natures will always
Be accomplished, and not otherwise.
Pacifying and subjugating,
Bewildering and suppressing
Are performed by the ḍākinī of body,
And the supreme accomplishment will be attained.
When the pledge beings have arisen,
One should meditate on the six limbs.
With the eye of pure wisdom
One should behold the heroes and yoginīs.

oṃ haḥ at the heart; namaḥ hi at the head; svā hā at the crown of the head; oṃ bauṣaṭ he is the armor; hūṃ hūṃ ho at the eyes; phaṭ haṃ is the weapon of all the limbs.

White and yellow and red,
Blue and green and smoky:
One should meditate with the mind on the six colors.

oṃ baṃ, Buddhaḍākinī, at the navel. haṃ yoṃ, Yāminī, at the heart. hriṃ moṃ, Mohanī, at the mouth. hriṃ hrīṃ, Sañcālinī, at the head. hūṃ hūṃ, Santrāsanī, at the crown of the head. phaṭ namaḥ, Caṇḍikā, the weapon of all the limbs.

All the heroes and yoginīs,
And the ḍākas, being seated,
Through the yoga of one's own deity
One should contemplate them all in this way.
Partaking of the five deathless wisdoms,
One should abide in bliss as one pleases.
Having worshiped those who hold the vajra pledge,
One should perform the approach practice at the four times.

This concludes the fourth chapter, the rite of the body vow, from the Abhidhāna, the Highest of Highest Tantras.

Then, furthermore, this is to be explained.
Having meditated on the maṇḍalas of speech,
In the center of the previous maṇḍala
One should meditate on the speech wheel,
Eight-spoked and red in color,
With its inner petals as before.
One should meditate on the speech ḍāka,
The transformation of Vajrasattva,
With four faces and twelve arms,
Abiding in the posture with the right leg extended.
Embraced by Padmaḍākinī,
He abides forever in great bliss.
He embraces her perfectly with lotus and bell.
He holds the head of Maheśvara (Śiva),
And with two hands he holds outstretched
The flayed skin of Maheśvara.

The rest will be as in the previous sequence.

The retinue of Maheśvara
Should be seen as trampled underfoot.
His faces are red and blue, likewise yellow,
And the left one white, each with three eyes.
He is adorned with crowns of matted locks,
His head made beautiful by a garland of skulls,
Bearing the crescent moon,
And having a crown of variegated lotuses.
His fangs are bared,
His faces terrifying in expression,
And he is endowed with the moods of grace and the rest.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
With a garland of freshly severed human heads.
He is adorned with necklace, bracelets, and earrings,
And with a garland of heads.
The sacred thread and the ash
Are renowned as the six mudrās.
These are the six perfections,

Sealed by the six mudrās.

Seated upon his lap is the Blessed Mother,
Padmaḍākinī, in her own color,
With one face, two arms, and three eyes,
Naked, her hair unbound,
Wearing a girdle adorned with pieces of bone.
Holding in her left hand a skull cup
Filled with the blood of wicked māras, she embraces him.
With the hand that holds a lotus, in every direction
She makes the threatening gesture at all the wicked.
Her splendor blazes like the fire at the end of the eon;
She ever delights in dripping blood,
And embraces him with her two thighs.
She is the embodiment of the compassion of great bliss,
Who bestows all accomplishments.
The Ḍākinī and the others explained before
Should be placed in their places in the directions of the lotus.
Their shapes and colors are as explained before;
However, the Ḍākinī is white,
And Khaṇḍarohā likewise is black;
The other two goddesses have the same colors as before.
In their left hands they hold khaṭvāṅga and skull cup,
And in their right, hand drum and curved knife.
In the four intermediate directions, too,
One should place, within vases, the five deathless nectars,
And vessels of bodhicitta as well.

In the east of the speech wheel, in Kāmarūpa, are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī, white. In the north, in Oḍra, are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā, red. In the west, in Triśakuni, are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā, black. In the south, in Kosala, are Vajra Hūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī, pale blue like the sky. In the southeast, in Kaliṅga, are Subhadra and Śyāmā, pale yellow. In the southwest, in Lampāka, are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā, white. In the northwest, in Kāñcī, are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā, green. In the northeast, in Himālaya, are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā, pale blue like the sky. The speech wheel moves upon the earth.

The heroes, Aṅkurika and the rest, have one face, four arms, and three eyes, with a crown of matted locks and hanging silk streamers. With two hands they embrace while holding a lotus and a bell; in the left hand is a khaṭvāṅga and in the right a hand drum. They are adorned with the five mudrās and the rest, and stand in the posture with the right leg extended. The goddesses, Airāvatī and the rest, have two arms and one face. They embrace with the hand holding a skull cup and make the threatening gesture with the hand holding a lotus. They wear a necklace, bracelets, armlets, earrings, and the sacred thread.

Their necks are adorned with garlands of skulls,
And they wear girdles of ringing bells.
With the divisions of Kākāsyā and the rest,
As with the doorkeepers and others explained before,
The goddesses Yamadāhī and the rest
Should be known to be thus in the four intermediate directions.
All these heroes, moreover,
Have a garland of lotuses on their foreheads.
All the aggregates, sense sources, and elements
Should be contemplated as body, speech, and mind.
Following the rite explained before,
One should set out and meditate on the syllables.
The mind is āḥ, and it is red;
Speech is oṃ, said to be white;
The vajra body is hūṃ,
Like the moon in the sky.
Having joined and meditated on
All the maṇḍalas, every one,
And having seen the wisdom wheel,
One should cause it to enter through empowerment.
All having arisen and then dissolved,
One should meditate on and contemplate them all.
In the sequence of body, speech, and mind,
One should practice emanating and gathering back.

oṃ śrī bā ka a ā ro lig hūṃ phaṭ haṃ ḍā ki nī jā la saṃ ba raṃ svā hā. This is the heart mantra.

oṃ ya ma ma tha nī ye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Having worshiped with the vajra pledge,
One should thoroughly perform the rite of recitation.
Attracting and increasing,
And the various rites, will be accomplished.
One becomes a follower of the Dharma, and attractive,
And the accomplishment of speech will be attained.
The supreme, all the middling,

And all the lowest, abiding at the end:
In that one all abide,
The most sublime of those who tame the manifold.
Attached through the passion of desire,
Intoxicated with the joy of desire,
The great-souled practitioner
Abides in its power.
Abiding in the beautiful variegated lotus,
He practices the great yoga.
bhur bhūḥ, lord of the Dharma of passion,
Abides in great bliss.
At the time of rising, the pledge is this:
Partaking of excrement and vajra water,
And the aggregate of Dharma having been completed,
One accomplishes the state of a vidyā king and the rest.

oṃ haḥ at the heart; namaḥ hi at the head; svā hā hu ā ro lik at the crown of the head; bau ṣa ṭa he is the armor; hūṃ hūṃ ho at the eyes; phaṭ haṃ is the weapon.

Dharmavajra, Vairocana, Padmanarteśvara, Vajrabhairava, Vajra Sūrya, and Paramāśva: red, yellow, white, blue, red, saffron-colored, and green. These are their distinctions.

oṃ baṃ, Padmaḍākinī, at the navel. haṃḥ yoṃ, Padma Yāminī; hrīṃ moṃ, Padma Mohanī; hriṃ hrīṃ, Padma Sañcālinī; hūṃ hūṃ, Padma Santrāsanī; and phaṭ phaṭ haṃ, Padma Caṇḍikā: these are at the heart, the head, the crown of the head, and the eyes, and are the weapons of the Dharma. They are red, blue, white, yellow, green, and smoke-colored.

At the time of recitation they are set in place,
And one should practice in bliss as one pleases.
The heroes and the yoginīs
Abide in their own exalted stations.
Warmth arises through meditative equipoise;
It is to be taken up through one-pointed focus:
The sameness of the vajra of speech.
Through the yoga of one's own deity
One should thoroughly examine all phenomena.

Vajra water and Vairocana,
Honey and white butter, should be mixed together.
Through the yoga of the pledge of the tongue,
This is the very wisdom of the essence.
Having meditated on the lord as the head ornament,
One should eat one's food as one pleases.
Having taken on the form of the deity,
One is born as lord of the gods of desire.
Through food and drinks of milk,
Sickness and old age are cast off.
Urged on by this song of the goddess
Who is lovingly attached to beings,
One accomplishes the unsurpassed benefit of beings
In all the qualities of awakening.
Through the perfection of diligence
One generates compassion and teaches.
Having taught the secret Dharma,
One also attains the supreme accomplishment of speech.
For the benefit of all beings,
By teaching things just as they are, one is liberated.
Urged on by that very yoginī,
With wondrous pledge offerings
Of many and manifold kinds,
Having opened the eyes, one offers this praise:

ā pa ra ta ru su ra ta su khvā bā hā su kha me tva sau khya ma ya sa ma ya ra ma ra ma ho su ra ta sau khya ya tre sa ma ca ri taṃ su ga ta sānta ma ya pra bi kur ba bi kur ba su ra ta di ya padma ja le pra bi ba jaṃm pa sur tod su kha padma ja le pra bi nan tan ra ta su kha sa da na padma ja le pra bi marda marda su ra ta ma bi sa bi śva ja le ho ha hūṃ ha ha ho ja ya ma hā su kha su kha te je ma ya ra ma ra ma ho su ra ki tu su kha ba hūṃ bi ti dhe ja mu kra ja ya te ja ra ha na ta ho ba rā ha sa su kha ho hūṃ ho ho sur to tā rā ga su kha ra ti rī ji na pa ra ma śrīr ti ho pa ra ma he tu ma hā su kha ho su kha ma nu yo na ra pa ra me śva ra ho ho bha ga bān ma hā su khaṃ hūṃ ho ba hūṃ bi ti bi ti bi śva jā la ra ti bi śva ma ho su ra ti su khaṃ ga cid tra par ma ma hā su kha ho su kha ma nu gṛ hjya ho su ra ta ud ta ma san di su khaṃ a ā ro li ka a ma hā su kha gṛ hjya ho

Merely by singing these songs,
Joy and bliss are perfectly gathered,
And great bliss, as the mind desires,
And the accomplishments as well, are attained.
Having blessed the great host of the retinue,
The great maṇḍala is greatly delighted.
This is the vow of the lotus net.

This concludes the fifth chapter, on the vow of speech, from the Abhidhāna, the Highest Tantra.

Then, furthermore, this is to be explained:
The sublime maṇḍala of mind.
In the center of the multi-storied palace
One should set out the supreme wheel,
Blue in color and of great splendor,
Arisen from the secret, with eight spokes.
In its center is a lotus,
A variegated lotus with anthers,
Described as having eight petals,
And made into a pure seat.
In its center one should meditate on a moon.
There, pervading the moon,
Vajrasattva, the great bliss,
The supreme deity, is released and rises up:

oṃ hūṃ a ma hā su kha a la la ho ma hā su ra ta stvaṃ su ra ta su kha bi yo ga sur taṃ ud ta ma bo dhi su khaṃ su kha ma nu siṅ dha ho su ra ta ba ya sau khya ma ya oṃ āḥ hūṃ ho bha ga bāṃ ma hā su khaṃ ud ta ra ud tar sarba ud ta ma sau khyam ya hūṃ a la la ho ma hā su kha stvaṃ par ma su khā ma lai du bi bi ud ta ma jā la su khaṃ a la la ho su ra to sau khya ma ya

The Blessed One, the Great Bliss,
Rises up together with his retinue.
The deity of the mind wheel has four faces

And twelve arms, and is seated with the right leg extended and the left drawn in. He has three eyes and bared fangs, and his faces are blue, white, yellow, and red. He embraces with vajra and bell, holds the head of Viṣṇu in one hand, and with two other hands holds outstretched the fresh skin of Viṣṇu. The rest is the same as for the ḍāka of body. He wears a garland of skulls and a garland of heads, his girdle is bound with a garland of heads, and he has Vajrasattva as his head ornament.

He also bears the ornament of the crescent moon;
A crossed vajra surmounts his crown.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
And is adorned with the six mudrās.

The ḍākinī before him has one face, two arms, and three eyes, her hair loose. Naked, she is adorned with pieces of bone and wears a girdle. Her left hand, holding a skull cup, embraces him, and her right holds a vajra with the threatening gesture.

Her girdle resounds with the sound of bells,
And pleasing sounds of the Dharma
Come forth by the tens of millions.
It is the realm of phenomena, emptiness.
Sameness and discernment,
And the accomplishment of activity, are to be meditated on likewise.
This is the most sublime of unions.
Having well examined it as utterly pure,
Making sameness the single taste of the Dharma,
One should gaze upon the wheel.
On the eastern petal is the Ḍākinī,
And likewise in the south is Lāmā,
In the west Khaṇḍarohā,
And likewise in the north Rūpiṇī,
White and yellow and likewise red,
And green in color, supreme and sublime.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
And likewise hand drum and curved knife.
They have three eyes, their faces contorted,
Naked, with loose hair, terrifying,
And stand in the posture with the right leg extended.
Thoroughly intoxicated with the passion of desire,
With slightly bashful sidelong glances,
Full, swelling breasts, holding joy,
And the fangs of their mouths slightly bared,
They are sealed as well with the five mudrās.
In the four intermediate directions, one should set out

Vases filled with the nectar of wisdom,
And upon them one should place vessels
Completely filled with bodhicitta.
In the eastern direction of the mind wheel,

In Pullīramalaya, are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā, white. In the north, in Jālandhara, are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī, yellow. In the west, in Oḍiyāna, are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī, red. In the south, in Arbuda, are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā, green. In the southeast, in Godāvarī, are Suravairin and Vīramatī, sky-colored. In the southwest, in Rāmeśvara, are Amitābha and Kharvarī, whitish. In the northwest, in Devīkoṭa, are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī, green and pearl-like. In the northeast, in Mālava, are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā, lotus-colored and pale yellow. The mind wheel moves through the sky.

The heroes, Khaṇḍakapāla and the rest, have one face and four arms and wear crowns of matted locks. Wrathful out of compassion and terrifying, they embrace with two hands holding vajra and bell, and with two further hands, left and right, they hold a khaṭvāṅga and a hand drum. They are adorned with the five mudrās and stand with the right leg extended.

The goddesses, Pracaṇḍā and the rest, have one face and two arms, and embrace with the skull cup, making the threatening gesture. They have three eyes and pale yellow forms, their hair loose. The two forms are joined evenly in nonduality. Clad in the directions, they sport playfully. They wear a neck jewel, bracelets, armlets, earrings, the sacred thread, a necklace, a garland of heads, and a girdle of bells.

The goddesses of the doors and corners
Are Kākāsyā, Yamadāhī, and the rest.
Just as with the colors of the ḍākinīs,
So it is with Kākāsyā and the rest.
The goddesses of the intermediate directions are likewise:
They bear a twofold form and are captivating.
Having meditated on the hands and the rest in this way,
One is granted all accomplishments.
Having seen the wisdom wheel,
One makes offerings and praises and confers empowerment.
If one meditates one-pointedly,

One abides in the exalted state of Nairātmyā.
The essence, the wisdom pledge,
For the sake of all the practitioner desires,
Having arranged them in body, speech, and mind,
One emanates the supreme buddhas.
One should always keep the pledges,
And, with the nectar water of the five wisdoms,
Through the practice of the pledge offering,
One should recite according to the rite.

oṃ śrī citta ḍā kiḍhṛ ka a khaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍā ki nī jā la saṃ ba ra huṃ hūṃ phaṭ. This is the heart mantra.

oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ. This is the near-heart mantra.

Having joined recitation with meditation,
Through the sequence of emanating and gathering back,
The mantra practitioner swiftly gains accomplishment
And attains the state of Vajrasattva.
The pledge of sameness is the supreme pledge.
In what is pervaded by the attainment of mind,
One practices the great yoga,
And attains the very power of coursing through the sky.
This one, throughout all the three realms,
Has truly entered the supreme state.
At the time of rising, for the one who holds the pledges,
The practice of the six limbs is taught.

oṃ haḥ at the heart: this is Vajrasattva, white. namaḥ hi at the head: this is Vairocana, yellow. svā hā hu at the crown of the head: this is Padmanarteśvara, moon-white and pale yellow. bau ṣa ṭa he is the armor: this is Heruka, sky-colored. hūṃ hūṃ ho at the eyes: this is Vajra Sūrya, like refined gold. phaṭ haṃ is the weapon of all the limbs: this is Paramāśva, green and pale yellow.

oṃ baṃ at the navel: this is Vajraḍākinī, sky-colored and pale yellow. haṃ yaṃ at the heart: Yāminī, white. hrīṃ moṃ at the mouth: this is Mohanī, red. hreṃ hrīṃ at the head: this is Sañcālinī, yellow. hūṃ hūṃ at the crown of the head: this is Santrāsanī, blue. phaṭ phaṭ is the weapon of all the limbs: this is Caṇḍikā, reddish yellow. One practices and abides in bliss as one pleases, according to the rite.

For the aspirations of countless beings,
This one, whose nature is the vajra of mind,
Is the infinite union of nonduality,

Abiding as the reality of all existence,
Stainless and without pride,
Beyond letters and beyond expression.

This concludes the sixth chapter, on the vow of mind and on service to the guru, from the Abhidhāna, the Highest Tantra.

Then, further, I shall explain
The supreme samaya of the maṇḍala,
Which bestows every secret of desire
And grants the most secret accomplishment.
For the benefit of the practitioner,
I shall explain the meaning of the practice.
In the center of the former maṇḍala
Draw a lotus with eight petals,
Multicolored and with its anthers,
Which bestows the fruit of all desires.
In its center is the syllable hūṃ;
Visualize Vajrasattva,
Fully complete with all the major marks,
Adorned with all the minor marks.
Through the union of great delight,
Supreme, nondual, without duality,
From the cause, the mind of awakening,
Comes the stainless moon of awakening.
Seeing that, the goddess rises
And urges him with this song:
hūṃ Play! Play! Delight, ho!
O vajra of great bliss,
From the very play of great bliss,
Please arise right here!
a la la ho Great delight!
You are the supreme of bliss;
Merely by kissing your mouth
I have found here the single taste.
Oh, Blessed One, delight in great bliss!
oṃ Vajrasattva, you who delight so well,
All tastes and the supreme tastes,

The great delight and the blisses,
And always all the accomplishments too:
Play! Play! with the goddess
And with all the yoginīs.
Blessed great Vajra, Play in the goddess's delighted lotus!
hūṃ a la la ho Great delight!
Blessed One, you who delight in desire,
Grant well the accomplishment of desire;
Play with delight in the supreme lotus!
oṃ a la la ho Great delight!
With the bliss of the assembly, at all times,
Holding the supreme vajra,
In the lotus, the opened supreme mouth of the lotus,
Please play!
Just as the bee takes honey,
The deities play in the lotus itself.
Oh, friend, here in great delight
Join the supreme vajra in bliss;
Make bliss here at all times!
Today, at this very time, right here,
Is the gathering of perfect awakening.
a la la ho Great delight!
Great bliss, play in the supreme of all delights!
a la la ho Great delight!
Urged by these songs,
From sameness the glorious Blessed One,
The vajra of Saṃvara, arose.
Gazing upon the retinue,
The Blessed One is four-faced:

His faces are blue, yellow, red and green. He has three eyes and twelve arms. Standing with the right leg extended, he presses Mahābhairava and Kālarātri beneath his feet. With two hands holding vajra and bell, he embraces Samayavajravārāhī. Two other hands hold the skin of Gaṇapati. The third right hand holds a ḍamaru drum, the fourth an axe, the fifth a curved knife, and the sixth a vajra spear. The third left hand holds a vajra khaṭvāṅga, the fourth a skull cup filled with blood, the fifth a vajra noose, and the sixth the heads of the four māras.

He wears a crown of matted locks with ornaments,
Bears a garland of skulls upon his head,
Holds a half moon upon his head,
His head marked with a crossed vajra.
With terrifying fangs and a contorted face,
He is endowed with the moods, the erotic and the rest.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment
And bears a garland of human heads.
Necklace, bracelets and earrings,
And the jewel on the head adorn him;
With the sacred thread and the ashes,
These are renowned as the six mudrās.
In his lap is the Blessed Lady,
Samayavajravārāhī,
Who should be made with a body color like his,
One-faced and two-armed,
Two-eyed, with her hair hanging loose.

She is naked, adorned with a girdle and hip ornament. She embraces him with her left hand, which holds a skull cup filled with the blood of the māras. With her right, making the threatening gesture together with a vajra, she threatens the ten directions.

She has the splendor of the fire at the end of the eon,
Delights in blood, which drips from her mouth,
And embraces him evenly with both thighs.
She is of the nature of great compassion;
The abode of all phenomena, she is virtue.
Arisen from the vowels and consonants,
She is free of conceptual thought
And has abandoned both dharma and non-dharma.
By placing the goddesses on the lotus petals,
All accomplishments are granted.
The Ḍākinī, Lāmā,
Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī,
Placed in a circle turning from the left,
Grant accomplishment to the yogin.

Black, yellow, and likewise red,
And green, with fierce forms,
All are three-faced and six-armed,
Three-eyed, standing with the right leg extended,
Naked, with their hair hanging loose,
Pressing the four māras beneath their feet,
Intoxicated with passion and attachment,
With crown ornaments of skulls,
Adorned with the five mudrās.
Black, blue and green,
Extremely terrifying, with angry eyes;
Yellow, black and green,
Fully complete in the mood of compassion;
Red, black and green,
Surrounded by the moods, the erotic and the rest;
Green, black and yellow,
Gentle, and terrifying in wrath.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga;
On the left, a ḍamaru and a curved knife;
A head and a vajra spear on the right.
In the four intermediate directions, too,
Upon vases filled
With the water of the five nectars,
Place vessels filled with the mind of awakening.
The goddesses Kākāsyā and the rest
Stand with the right leg extended,
Black, dark blue, red, yellow and pale,
One-faced and four-armed,
Three-eyed, with fierce forms,
Adorned with hair hanging loose,
With crown ornaments of skull garlands,
Adorned with the five mudrās,
Naked, pressing pretas down as their seats,
Intoxicated with the compassion of desire.
In the left they hold a head and a khaṭvāṅga,
In the right a skull cup and a curved knife.
In the four intermediate directions, too,

Are the ḍākinīs Yamadāhī and the rest,
One-faced and four-armed,
Standing with the right leg extended,
Three-eyed, on seats of pretas,
With hair hanging loose, and most terrifying,
With crown ornaments of skull garlands,
Adorned with the five mudrās,
Naked, of various forms,
Intoxicated with joy and bliss.
In the left they hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
In the right a ḍamaru and a curved knife.
If they are placed in a circle turning from the left,
They will grant the accomplishments of the intermediate directions.
Kākāsyā and the rest, placed at the gates,
Should be placed in a circle turning from the right.
The elements, the sense sources and the aggregates
Visualize as body, speech and mind.
Through the application of the sequence explained before,
Place them according to the rite.
Of the maṇḍalas of Mahendra (earth), of water,
Of fire and of wind,
What is placed in their center
Are the four, earth and the rest.

Pātanī and Māraṇī,
Ākarṣaṇī and Nartakī:
These are the element of space itself;
The net of lotuses is emptiness.
Form is Vairocana;
Feeling is Vajra Sūrya;
Perception is the king Narteśvara;
Formations are Vajrarāja;
Consciousness is Vajrasattva;
All the sugatas are Heruka himself.
The eye is the vajra of delusion;
The ear is the vajra of aversion;
The nose is the vajra of envy;

The tongue is the vajra of passion;
The body is the vajra of avarice;
The sense sources are all the vajra of mastery.
hūṃ is the vajra of mind;
What is called āḥ becomes speech;
oṃ is the vajra of body;
he is vajra wisdom.
Through the application of the sequence, body and the rest,
Visualize all things.
The Blessed One is passion for bliss,
And likewise freedom from passion.
Having seen that wheel of wisdom,
Make offerings and praises, and confer empowerment.
The applications of subsequent passion,
By entering in, become the essence of sameness.
When one has visualized things and non-things
And performed the application of emanation and absorption,
With the offerings of the samaya of union
One should recite according to the rite.

oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍākinī jāla sambara svāhā This is the heart mantra. aṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ This is the near-heart mantra. oṃ vajra vairocanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarva buddha ḍākinīye vajra varṇṇanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra of Vārāhī. oṃ ḍākinī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ lāme huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ khaṇḍarohe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ rūpiṇīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ kākāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ulūkāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ śvanāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ sūkarāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadāye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadūtīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadaṃṣṭīṇīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamamathanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Through the application of emanation and absorption
One should meditate the supreme meditation.
This is declared to be
The supreme secret of the yoginīs,
Fully complete in the sixteen digits,
Chief of all mantras and secret mantras.
Having risen from the session of meditation,

Set out the two armors.

oṃ ha Vajrasattva, at the heart. namaḥ hi Vairocana, at the head. svāhā hu Padmanarteśvara, at the crown of the head. gau ṣa ṭa he Heruka, the blood drinker, at the shoulders. hūṃ hūṃ ho Vajra Sūrya, at the eyes. phaṭ haṃ Paramāśva, the weapon of all the limbs. oṃ vaṃ Vajravārāhī, at the navel. haṃ yoṃ Yāminī, at the heart. hrīṃ maṃ Mohanī, at the tongue. hreṃ hrīṃ Sañcālinī, at the head. hūṃ hūṃ Santrāsanī, at the crown of the head. phaṭ haṃ Caṇḍikā, the weapon of all the limbs.

Thus things and non-things are equal;
All are of one taste as phenomena,
Abiding in sameness itself.
These five wisdoms of sameness
The yogin who keeps the samaya maintains.
At the four times, or else at the three times,
One should guard them as much as one is able.
This is the supreme secret;
It should not be taught to anyone at all.

This concludes the seventh chapter, the teaching of the samaya of the vow, from the great Abhidhāna, the Highest Tantra.

Then I shall explain according to the ritual text.
An eight-petaled lotus, beautifully fair,
With petals of various colors, delightful:
In the center of a sun maṇḍala
Visualize the king of lotuses.
At its hub is a crossed vajra,
A vajra with five prongs.
In the center of its hub
It is marked with a sun maṇḍala;
On that are the vowels and consonants,
And in the center, the tangible, empty.
Pervaded by the supreme Vajrasattva,
Oneself is glorious Heruka himself,
With five faces and twelve arms,
Three-eyed, transformed in wrath,
Standing with the right leg extended,

And likewise standing with the left leg extended.
Draw Bhairava and Kālarātri
Pressed beneath his feet.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment
And plays in compassionate wrath.
With crown ornaments of skull garlands,
He bears a crown of matted locks as ornament,
A half moon at the crown of his head,
His head pressed by a crossed vajra.
Endowed with the moods, the erotic and the rest,
He bears a garland of human heads,
Adorned with a garland of fresh skulls;
With necklace, bracelets and earrings,
His head adorned with a garland of skulls,
With the sacred thread and the ashes:
Visualize the six mudrās.
With two hands holding skull cup and bell
He embraces Vārāhī.
With the two other hands
He wears the fresh skin of Mahābhairava.

The third right hand brandishes a vajra and holds a triple banner, the fourth holds a five-pointed spear, the fifth an axe, and the sixth a vajra ḍamaru drum. The third left hand holds a vajra khaṭvāṅga, the fourth a vajra noose, the fifth a curved knife, and the sixth the head of Rudra. The Vārāhī abiding in his lap has the color of the Blessed One, two arms, one face and three eyes, with hair hanging loose. She is naked, with a girdle adorned with pieces of bone. With her left hand, holding a skull cup filled with the mind of awakening, she embraces him; with the threatening forefinger of her right hand she threatens all the wicked in every direction, and she holds a curved knife.

She has the splendor of the fire at the end of the eon,
Delights in blood, and drips with blood;
With both thighs she entwines him well.
She is the sacred one of supreme bliss.
Transformed into a fierce form,
Playing with the passion of compassion,
With Vajrasattva as his crown ornament,

Visualize glorious Heruka.
His faces are the color of the sky, yellow,
Red, green, and pale yellow;
Wrathful, laughing, and erotic,
Fierce, and endowed with peace.
The elements, the sense sources, the aggregates,
And the tangible are likewise meditated.
The Ḍākinī and likewise Lāmā,
Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī
Are four-armed and one-faced,
Three-eyed, with fierce forms,
Seated in the half cross-legged posture,
Supreme ones clothed in the directions.

With crown ornaments of skull garlands,
Adorned with hair hanging loose,
The goddesses bear the five mudrās
And bestow the liberation that is desired.
In the east, the south, the west,
And the north, set them out.
White and yellow, and likewise
Red and green, intoxicated with passion,
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga
And bear a bell, a ḍamaru and a curved knife.
In the four intermediate directions, four vases
Fully filled with the five wisdoms;
Skull cups fully filled with milk
Should be set upon the vases.
Having arranged them in a circle turning from the left,
And having summoned the wisdom beings,
One should make offerings and praises and cause them to enter.
Having set them in mind, speech and body,
One should meditate on the supreme state.
Visualize hūṃ āḥ oṃ.
If one recites the secret mantra correctly,
All accomplishments are bestowed.

oṃ śri pajra he he ru ru kaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍākinī jāla sambara svāhā oṃ hriḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra. oṃ vajra vairocanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarva buddha ḍākinīye vajra varṇṇanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra of the goddess. oṃ ḍākinī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ lāme huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ khaṇḍarohe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ rūpiṇīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Having sent forth the emanations of the wrathful ones
And brought the three kinds of beings to completion,
Endowed with meditation and recitation,
One should oneself emanate and absorb.
Throughout the three realms without exception
Enjoy body, speech and mind as one pleases.
Having risen from meditation, the one who keeps the samaya Should put on the two armors.

oṃ haḥ Vajrasattva, at the heart. namaḥ hi Vairocana, at the head. svāhā hu Padmanarteśvara, at the crown of the head. pau ṣaṭ he glorious Heruka, the blood drinker, at the two shoulders. hūṃ hūṃ ho Vajra Sūrya, at the eyes. phaṭ haṃ Paramāśva, the armor of all the limbs. oṃ vaṃ Vajravārāhī, at the navel. haṃ oṃ Yāminī, at the heart. hrī moṃ Mohanī, at the mouth. hreṃ hrīṃ Sañcālinī, at the head. hūṃ hūṃ Santrāsanī, at the crown of the head. phaṭ phaṭ oṃ Caṇḍikā, the weapon of all the limbs.

This is the very essence of the samaya,
The intrinsic nature of all things.
The yogin, lord of the Dharma in the form of mantra,
By applying himself as the Dharma,
Should conduct himself as is blissful.

This concludes the eighth chapter, on the sequence of the sites, from the Abhidhāna, the Highest Tantra.

Then, further, I shall explain
The rite of the solitary hero.
The mantra practitioner visualizes at the navel,
In the center of wind and fire,
Upon that a multicolored lotus,
Upon that a sun maṇḍala,

And upon that a skull cup filled with the nectar of the five wisdoms. In its center the vowels and consonants are doubled, arranged in forward order and in reverse order. From the union of Vajrasattva blessed by hūṃ, arisen from joy and delight, one meditates on glorious Heruka, the embodiment of compassion, whirling with passion.

He has four faces and twelve arms, and stands with the right leg extended. His fangs are bared, he has three eyes, his face is contorted, and he wears a garland of skulls. His body is sealed with the six mudrās of the hero. He presses down the heads and breasts of Mahābhairava and Kālarātri. He wears a tiger skin and is suffused with the flavor of compassion. The two hands that embrace Vajravārāhī hold a nine-pronged vajra and a vajra bell. Two other hands hold the stretched-out skin of Gaṇapati. The third right hand holds a vajra spear, the fourth a hook, the fifth a vajra curved knife, and the sixth a vajra ḍamaru. The third left hand holds a skull cup filled with marrow, held for the offering of yoga, and a vajra khaṭvāṅga, topped with a five-pronged vajra, with a most terrifying vajra bell hanging from it and various banners hanging down, marked in the middle with a crossed vajra, with a single-pointed vajra at its lower end. The fourth holds a vajra noose, the fifth the head of Brahmā, and the sixth an axe. His faces are blue, yellow, red and green, utterly terrifying, and he abides in erotic grace, laughter and majesty.

In front of him, arisen from the vowels and consonants, the Blessed Lady Vajravārāhī sits embracing him. Her body is red; she has four arms, four faces and three eyes, and her hair hangs loose. She is naked, with a girdle of pieces of bone. In her left hand is a skull cup fully filled with the mind of awakening and with the blood of the wicked māras; with her right, making the threatening gesture, she holds a vajra curved knife; her two other hands hold a ḍamaru and a khaṭvāṅga. She has the splendor of the fire at the end of the eon; her mouth drips with blood, and she delights in blood. Her two thighs are evenly crossed. She is the embodiment of the compassion of great bliss. Her faces are red, green, yellow and blue, and she acts wicked and terrifying. Her hands and body color should be drawn in accordance with the faces and body color of the Blessed One. Upon this, the supreme yogin sets out the deities in the sequence of the inner sites and the rest.

bu: Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā, at the head. jā: Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī, at the crown of the head. au: Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī, at the right ear. a: Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā, at the back of the crown; these are the sites. go: Suravairin and Vīramatī, at the left ear. rā: between the eyebrows, Amitābha and Kharvarī. de: at the two eyes, Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī. mā: at the shoulders, Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā; these are the secondary sites.

This is the maṇḍala of mind, those who move in the sky. kā: in the two armpits, Aṅkurika and Airāvatī. o: at the two breasts, Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā; these are the fields. tri: in the center of the navel, Mahābala and Vāyuvegā. ko: at the tip of the nose, Vajra Hūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī; these are the secondary fields. kā: at the mouth, Subhadra and the goddess Śyāmā. la: at the throat, Vajraprabha and Subhadrā; these are the chandohas. kā: at the heart, Vajrabhairava and Hayakarṇā.

hi: at the anus, Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā; these are the secondary chandohas. This is the wheel of speech, those who move on the earth. pre: at the genitals, Mahābala and Cakravegā. gṛ: at the rectum, Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā; these are the meeting places. sau: at the two thighs, Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī. su: at the two shanks, Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī; these are the secondary meeting places. nā: at the toes, glorious Heruka and Suvīrā. si: at the two soles, Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā; these are the charnel grounds. ma: at the two big toes, Vairocana and Cakravartinī. ku: at the two knees, Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā; these are the secondary charnel grounds. This is the wheel of body, those who dwell beneath the earth.

The Ḍākinī holds a vajra; Lāmā, a bell; Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī, the fist that holds an elephant skin. Kākāsyā holds a vajra spear; Ulūkāsyā, a hook; Śvānāsyā, a curved knife; Śūkarāsyā, a ḍamaru. Yamadāhī bears a skull khaṭvāṅga; Yamadūtī, a noose; Yamadaṃṣṭrī, the head of Brahmā; Yamamathanī, an axe. The vessel of the mind of awakening is the essence of the four faces.

The earth element is Pātanī; the water element is Māraṇī; the fire element is Ākarṣaṇī; the wind element is Narteśvarī; the space element is Padmajālinī. The aggregate of form is Vairocana; the aggregate of feeling is Vajra Sūrya; the aggregate of perception is Padmanarteśvara; the aggregate of formations is Vajrarāja; the aggregate of consciousness is Vajrasattva; and the suchness of all the tathāgatas is glorious Vajra Heruka. The two eyes are the vajra of delusion; the two ears are the vajra of aversion; the nose is the vajra of avarice; the mouth is the vajra of attachment; the tangible is the vajra of envy; all the sense sources are the vajra of mastery. Mind is Akṣobhya, speech is Amitāyus, and body is Vairocana.

oṃ ha at the heart, Vajrasattva. namaḥ hi at the head, Vairocana. svāhā hu at the crown of the head, Padmanarteśvara. bau ṣaṭ he at the two shoulders, Heruka. hūṃ hūṃ ho at the two eyes, Vajra Sūrya. phaṭ haṃ on all the limbs, the armor of Paramāśva. oṃ vaṃ at the navel, Vajravārāhī. haṃ yoṃ at the heart, Yāminī. hriṃ moṃ at the mouth, Mohanī. hreṃ hrīṃ at the head, Sañcālinī. hūṃ hūṃ at the crown of the head, Santrāsanī. phaṭ phaṭ Caṇḍikā, the armor of all the limbs.

Knotting the index fingers, join the middle fingers firmly;
Join the thumbs firmly as a vajra.
Having set it in the center of the forehead,
Turning and turning, one should circle it all around.
Pressing down with the feet and looking upward,
Proclaiming upward the sound pheṃ,
Summon the heroes and yoginīs
Who dwell in the world systems of the ten directions.

jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ Through the application of the vajra hook and the rest, summon them, cause them to enter, bind them and bring them under control. Seeing those heroes and yoginīs completely fill the expanse of the sky, offer the empowerment with a skull cup fully filled with the five nectars, together with the proper posture and method.

Just as, at the very moment of his birth,
All the tathāgatas bathed him,
So, with the pure water of the gods,
I shall likewise perform the bathing.

oṃ sarva tathāgata ābhiṣekata samaya śriye hūṃ hūṃ

Upon a maṇḍala of wind and fire is a skull cup. There, the syllable a is generated, and it is fully filled with the nectar of the five wisdoms. Upon the moon of sixteen digits it is blessed by the syllables hūṃ, āḥ and oṃ, and one meditates that from the emanation of the three syllables the three wheels arise. oṃ samaya śuddhāḥ sarva dharmāḥ smaya śuddho'haṃ One imagines the essence of all phenomena abiding in sameness.

Through the application of the five wisdoms
One drinks the water of vajra nectar.

oṃ vajra amṛta udaka hūṃ ṭha ṭha traṃ a khaṃ hūṃ oṃ

Through the application of the recitation of wisdom,
Send forth the supreme wheel.
Having taken a rosary of great conch,
Then one should recite with it.

Having performed one's own breath control,
By meditating, it blazes at once.

oṃ vajra śrī he he ru ru kaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ṭākinī jāla sambaraṃ svāhā oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra. oṃ vajra vairotanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarva buddha ḍākinīye vajra varṇṇanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra of the goddess.

If one has not become weary,
One should recite thus and meditate.
If one has become weary, meditate on the purifications.

Now, what are the thirty-seven factors of awakening? The close placement of mindfulness on the body is the Ḍākinī. The close placement of mindfulness on feelings is Lāmā. The close placement of mindfulness on phenomena is Khaṇḍarohā. The close placement of mindfulness on mind is Rūpiṇī. The basis of miraculous power that is intention is Pracaṇḍā. The basis of miraculous power that is diligence is Caṇḍākṣī. The basis of miraculous power that is investigation is Prabhāvatī. The basis of miraculous power that is mind is Mahānāsā. This is the purification of the lotus of wisdom. The faculty of faith is Vīramatī. The faculty of diligence is Kharvarī. The faculty of mindfulness is Laṅkeśvarī. The faculty of meditative absorption is Drumacchāyā. This is the purification of the wheel of mind. The faculty of wisdom is Airāvatī. The power of faith is Mahābhairavā. The power of diligence is Vāyuvegā. The power of mindfulness is Surābhakṣī. The power of meditative absorption is the goddess Śyāmā. The power of wisdom is Subhadrā. The awakening factor of meditative absorption is Hayakarṇā. The awakening factor of diligence is Kākāsyā. This is the purification of the wheel of speech. The awakening factor of joy is Cakravegā. The awakening factor of pliancy is Khaṇḍarohā. The awakening factor of discernment of phenomena is Śauṇḍinī. The awakening factor of mindfulness is Cakravarmiṇī. The awakening factor of equanimity is Suvīrā.

Right view is Mahābalā. Right thought is Cakravartinī. Right speech is Mahāvīryā. This is the purification of the wheel of body. Right action is Kākāsyā. Right livelihood is Ulūkāsyā. Right effort is Śvānāsyā. Right mindfulness is Śūkarāsyā. These are the doors of the four liberations. Right meditative absorption is the Blessed One, glorious Heruka: the very nature of the vajra of the wisdom of the utterly pure dharmadhātu is none other than myself. Generating the virtuous phenomena that have not arisen is Yamadāhī. Fully guarding the virtuous phenomena that have arisen is Yamadūtī. Fully abandoning the nonvirtuous phenomena that have arisen is Yamadaṃṣṭrī. Not generating the nonvirtuous phenomena that have not arisen is Yamamathanī. This is the purification of the wheel of samaya.

If one meditates in this way, leaving nothing out,
The practitioner will certainly attain accomplishment.
For the sake of beings, the yogin himself
Is sameness, the sacred samaya.
For each of the five wheels
Meditate on the distinct divisions of the rite.
The distinct divisions of the womb-born
Have the supremacy of the five wheels.
Meditating chiefly on the yoginīs and the rest:
These are the divisions of the distinct divisions.
Just as Vajra Heruka,
So too, in the center of the goddess,
Is the union with Buddhaḍākinī,
And likewise the retinue of yoginīs.
Oneself as the hero of vajra body
Visualize in the center of the bhaga.
As in the sequence of meditation,
So join them in the three wheels.
I myself meditate on the five bhagas:
In the center, union with the Ḍākinī,
Union with Padmaḍākinī,
And, distinguishing Vajraḍākinī,
The three wheels in the center of the bhaga,
Meditate on Heruka as the supreme.
When meditating on the wheel of samaya:
The maṇḍala of the samaya ḍākinīs,
The maṇḍala of the wisdom ḍākinīs,
The maṇḍala of the wisdom ḍākinīs;
In the center of the multicolored lotus and the rest
Are the applications of the wheel of wisdom.
That, here, in the centers of the bhaga,
Meditate on in the five wheels.

The solitary hero Heruka,
And likewise Vārāhī as well:
Body color, faces, hands and emblems,
Visualize them on a multicolored lotus.
In the center of that very lotus Meditate on Heruka as the supreme.
Together with the skull cup, equally,
Joining the divisions of the five,
Meditate on the sequence of the yoginīs;
Visualize them in the center of the bhaga.
The lord of the wheel has not been seen.
With the mudrā of embrace,
Imagine the wheel of heroes there.
Visualize each one's own yoginī
Hidden in the heart.
The yoga of the feast gathering
Is beautiful with four arms:
Two are the embracing arms,
The others hold various emblems.
Two hands embrace,
And in the center of her bhaga
The hero's meditation is not seen.
The application hidden in the relative:
The supreme meditation too is not seen.
The meditation of the egg-born
That applies the sequence
Is the thought of the five gathered together:
This is the meditation of the supreme egg-born.
Through the divisions of the divisions of the wheel,
Thus the yogin meditates.
According to the particular intention,
So one meditates on what is desired.
Through the divisions of the divisions of the lord,
Meditate on the divisions of the family.
Through the divisions of the divisions of the goddess,
Meditate on the lord as well.
Through the divisions of the divisions of the names,

Apply them to the word "ḍākinī."
Or else, by whichever division of the three bodies,
Whatever is to be made the lord:
Through the divisions of the lord and the rest,
These are the divisions of the divisions of the wheel.
Through all the divisions of the family,
Distinguish the heroes and the yoginīs.
Through the application of the songs of the womb-born
Examine the meditations thoroughly.
The egg-born has no song:
It has abandoned sound and the fading of sound.
This is the self-arisen Blessed One,
The sacred, supreme bliss of yoga.
Some desire yoga;
Some do not desire yoga:
Having abandoned song, sound and the rest,
They abide in the state of no thing,
Subtle, inexhaustible, without any thing,
Free of grasped and grasper.
The enjoyment of the supreme state
Is together with song, sound and the rest.
Having abandoned song, sound and the rest,
They abide in the state of no thing,
Subtle, inexhaustible, without any thing,
Free of grasped and grasper.
The enjoyment of the supreme state
Is together with song, sound and the rest.
All the qualities of desire, too,
I shall consume with benefit and loving care.
Through striving for the welfare of beings,
Patience and diligence are supreme and sacred.
The yogin does not disparage song,
And the ḍākinī delights in what benefits.

ho Lord who has found bliss in the three existences!
a la la la ho
Victor possessed of bliss, assembly of garlands,

The vajra plays in the lotus!
a la la la ho
Sugata, released from the laughter of separation,
Lord, essence of all delight,
Delighting utterly with passion,
Essence of the assembly in the three existences!
a la la ho
You who are fully liberated through delight,
Liberate me completely from desire!

When the yogin of the lotus,
Arisen from the vowels,
Has sung this king of songs,
The bliss of vajra yoga
Rises from the net of lotuses.
Urged by this, the protectors,
For the bliss of great bliss, from the celestial palace,
All the buddhas, arise and are born,
And all the victors without exception come to birth.
Together with song, there is no thing.
For the one who has abandoned the egg-born portion,
Its form is not seen:
There is no bliss and no suffering,
It is nondual and without any thing.
Examine the domain of examination.
Liberated from dharma and from what is not dharma,
One is not stained by evil or fault.
For the one liberated as nondual in all things,
The egg-born is together with a thing.
Since one is woken from sleep by song,
The deluded should not disparage the wise.
For the sake of those who have not understood, and of what is to be understood,
For the welfare of beings there are buddhas.

The field-born and the innate goddesses,
Likewise the place-born yoginīs,
The family-born goddesses, the born goddesses,

Likewise the invisible sky-goers,
The last birth is supreme indeed;
The middle is various and excellent.
The thirty move upon the earth;
Those who move beneath the earth dwell below.
Yakṣiṇīs and nāginīs,
Kiṃnarīs and gandharvīs,
All the goddesses accomplished before,
And others too whose intent is on the Sugata,
Who delight in the Three Jewels:
All of them are the wheel of the outer maṇḍala.
Making use of various songs,
One should always sing songs.
With the bliss of various flavors,
Worship the goddesses and the lord of the ḍākinīs.
Abiding in the maṇḍala of wind,
Meditate on the wheel of body.
The wise one, firmly established in water,
Meditates on the maṇḍala of speech.
Abiding in the maṇḍala of fire,
The maṇḍala of mind is great bliss.
Abiding in the maṇḍala of Mahendra, the earth,
Is the supreme and excellent maṇḍala of samaya.
That very maṇḍala of wisdom:
Contemplate it and meditate on it.
In the center of the maṇḍala of the bhaga,
Meditate on a multicolored lotus.
In the center of the maṇḍala of the sun,
Meditate on the solitary hero.
A wheel, a lotus, a garland of vajras:
These three wheels encircle it all around,
Just as the supreme wheel of samaya
Is encircled by a garland of crossed vajras.
Likewise, with the five kinds of hungry ghosts,
Encircle the outer maṇḍala.
Outside are the fierce charnel grounds,
Of various colors, supreme and excellent,

With various trees, delightful,
Dogs and jackals, terrifying,
Crows, owls and herons,
Vultures and sipikas.
Likewise the cremation grounds,
With skeletons mounted on stakes,
And charred remains hanging all about;
Likewise the half-burned and the unburned,
Heads, skulls and severed parts,
Torsos, hands and heads,
Jackals giving voice to their howls,
And snakes of every kind dwelling there in delight.
Lions, boars and tigers,
Goats and sheep likewise,
Elephants, dogs, donkeys and oxen,
And camels: various, the supreme of bliss.
Food of various kinds,
The finest drinks of liquor,
Supreme gatherings of heroes,
And yoginīs, various and supreme,
Holding skull cups and khaṭvāṅgas,
Curved knives and the finest hand drums,
Various drums of the gods,
Foods of supreme flavor of every kind,
Various kisses, ālikā,
And the supreme and excellent kuśale.
In such a charnel ground
One should give torma
To yakṣas, vetālas and rākṣasas,
And meditate on the forms of Heruka.
With hand drum, vajra and bell,
And cymbals, perform the dances.
Clad in the directions, joining the mudrā,
Uttering hūṃ phaṭ and loud cries,
In the posture with the right leg extended,
Having bound the blazing mudrā,
And having filled the mouth with the samaya,

Here one should call to mind the secret mantra:
oṃ āḥ ārali ho jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ vajraḍākinī samaya stvaṃ dṛśya ho
This should be recited three, four or five times,
Again and again.
In forward order and in reverse,
Give to them also in the skull cup.
Having opened the vajra palms upward,
Here one should apply the secret mantra:
oṃ kha kha khāhi khāhi sarba yakṣa rākṣasa bhāta preta piśāca unmāda apasmāra ḍākaḍākinyādayaḥ imaṃ baliṃ gṛhṇaṃtu samaya rakṣantu mama sarba siddhimme prayacchantu yathaibaṃ yatheṣṭaṃ bhuñjatha pibatha jighatha mātikramatha mama sarba kāratayasaṅ sukha biśuddhaye sahāyikaṃ bhabantu huṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā
By the sequence of this rite,
It should be given at the four junctures of the sessions.
Dwelling alone and at ease,
The purpose of the mahāmāṃsa, the great flesh, is taught.
The yogin, resting in meditative equipoise,
Should here eat all of it.

From the Highest of the Highest of the Tantra of Discourse, this is the ninth chapter, the teaching that distinguishes the stages of the nondual wheel.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
The rite of the pure abode.
The secret of the secret rite
Is the supreme heart of the ḍākinīs.
The union that is the abode of all secret mantras
Is what grants every accomplishment.

Then the vajra retinue of the Great Lord over all the tathāgatas, the great ḍākas together with their messengers, the hosts of ḍākinīs, and also the other great Blessed Ones, the Samantabhadra vajra holders, bowed to their own lord and petitioned him:

"How wonderful! You, being of bliss!
How wonderful! O lord of bliss,
The supreme secret of the ḍākinīs,
Your own maṇḍala: please explain it.

O Buddha yoga, great yoga,
Vajra yoga become supreme,
Speak your own secret maṇḍala,
From which the bliss of the three worlds arises.
O Vajraratna, great Lotus,
Various union and various dance,
Speak your own pure maṇḍala."

Arising from Vajravairocana,
The palace is four-cornered and most beautiful,
Fully endowed with four doors,
And complete with every ornament.
This maṇḍala arisen from bliss
Has in its center two wheels,
The supreme wheels of mind and speech,
Eight-spoked, blue and red,
Encircled by vajras and lotuses.
Draw it encircled outside by a wheel.
Outside the maṇḍala, the supreme maṇḍala,
Various yoginīs
Sport with song and dance.
Outside, a garland of hungry ghosts,
Of various colors, supreme and excellent,
Dance with dances of the hands,
Their faces contorted and their tongues waggling.
Its center has become empty;
Upon a moon is the supreme syllable hūṃ.
It is pervaded by a vajra:
Meditate on Vajrasattva,
With three faces and six arms,
The three bodies, possessed of the mood of compassion,
Fully joined with the great mudrā,
Seated in the vajra cross-legged posture
Upon a seat of a multicolored lotus
In the center of a moon disk.
His faces are white, blue and saffron.
He holds the vajra of body, speech and mind,

The skull cup and the khaṭvāṅga,
Embraces with vajra and bell,
Holds the hand drum and the head of Brahmā,
And wears Akṣobhya as his crown.
The places of the ḍākinīs should be laid out,
And the heroes likewise should be laid out.
The elements, aggregates and sense sources
Should be meditated on as body, speech and mind.
The goddess too has a form like his;
She is the Great Seal, bliss.
At the heart, the seed maṃ
In the center of a moon disk,
Together with two ho syllables:
First calling to mind the accomplishment,
Seal it with this mudrā.
Immediately, in the secret lotus
At the heart of the goddess,
Having engaged in passion,
The great Protector, through passion,
With the great bliss of Vajrasattva,
Sports together with her,
And the two organs are joined.
The minds of the heroes and yoginīs
Having become joyful,
When with joyful intent
They urge him with the sound of hand drums,
He rises from the joy of sameness.
With the vowels and consonants joined in sameness,
Great bliss was delighted.

Then all the tathāgatas, equal in number to the atoms of everything reaching to the limits of space and of the dharmadhātu, together with their retinues, pervaded by the secret heroes together with the ḍākinīs, and led by a great host of bodhisattvas, and all the hosts of ḍākas and ḍākinīs without exception or remainder, and the vast hosts of messengers and female messengers who are the nature of the outer consorts, were amazed, gazed with their eyes, and embraced one another equally.

With the magical display of dance,
Rising up in great joy,
Joining their palms at the crown of the head,
Delighted by the blessing,
They should urge the great Protector
With these songs of delight:

"How wonderful! The wondrous, marvelous Dharma!
How wonderful! The wondrous, marvelous way!
How wonderful! The wondrous, marvelous secret!
How wonderful! Arisen from bliss!
How wonderful! The meaning of Samantabhadra!
How wonderful! Bliss truly gathered!
How wonderful! Great bliss, pure!
How wonderful! Bliss, the supreme of bliss!
How wonderful! The union of secret mantra!
How wonderful! The conduct of the mind!
How wonderful! Endowed with the seal of sameness!
Oh wonder! Accomplishment truly arises!
Oh wonder! Through the perfections!
Oh wonder! Passion following the consort!
Oh wonder! Great action of every kind!
Oh wonder! The threefold union, pure!
Oh wonder! The vajra joined in sameness!
Oh wonder! The lotus opening!
Oh wonder! The two organs joined as one!
Oh wonder! The marvelous sameness!
Oh wonder! The great pure dance!
Oh wonder! The stainless song, how excellent!
Oh wonder! The music well played!
Oh wonder! Dispelling darkness with phaṭ!
Oh wonder! Flowers and beautiful garments!
Oh wonder! Incense, the lovely ghati!
Oh wonder! Lamps dispelling delusion!
Oh wonder! Supreme perfume, cool!
Oh wonder! The yoga of union!
Oh wonder! Illusion like space!
Oh wonder! Buddha from the beginning, vajra from the beginning!

Oh wonder! Jewel from the beginning, bestowing bliss!
Oh wonder! Lotus from the beginning, drawn from the beginning!
Oh wonder! Various illusion, magically displayed!
Oh wonder! Wondrous, marvelous Buddha!
Oh wonder! Wondrous, this itself is marvelous!
Oh wonder! Wondrous are sentient beings!
Oh wonder! Wondrous, they are the goddess!"

Released by this, the protectors:
From the seed of supreme union
Arises one the color of saffron,
Marked with a vajra,
With six faces and twelve arms,
Adorned by Vārāhī.
The great hero Mañjuvajra
Abides in the half cross-legged posture,
Three-eyed and laughing aloud,
Fierce, terrifying and menacing,
Possessed of the dance moods, compassion among them.
Bhairava and Kālarātri
He keeps pressed beneath his feet.
Or else, standing with the right leg extended,
He is born as the great source of yoga.
In the center of a moon disk
He is seated on a multicolored lotus.
He has the color of fresh saffron stamens
And is adorned by that mudrā.
His faces are blue, green and yellow,
Red and white, and peaceful.
He has a crown ornament of a garland of skulls
And is beautified by buddha forms.
He holds vajra and bell together,
Squeezes the breasts of the goddess,
Wears the brahmanical thread,
And remains with the skin of fierce Bhairava
Bound about his waist.
He holds the skull cup and the khaṭvāṅga,

Carries a sword and an utpala petal,
A hook, a noose, a hand drum,
A head, and likewise a bow.

With body color and hand emblems like his,
The great Vajravārāhī
Abides in the state of great passion,
Entwining him well with her two thighs.
Great joy, enchanting,
Her body adorned with a garland of heads,
She is marked with the six mudrās.
In this way the mantrin should meditate:
Mañjuvajra, great bliss.
By joining the places and the rest to their lords,
All the lords, wisdom and the rest,
It is the union of the net of the ḍākinīs;
It is the vow, the supreme of vows.
First is the wheel of mind.

On the eastern spoke, in Pullīramalaya, are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā: white, blue and green. In the north, in Jālandhara, are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī: yellow, blue and green. In the west, in Oḍiyāna, are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī: red, blue and green. In the south, in Arbuda, are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā: green, yellow and red. In the southeast, the direction of fire, in Godāvarī, are Suravairin and Vīramatī: red, yellow and green. In the southwest, the direction of Nairṛti, in Rāmeśvara, are Amitābha and Kharvarī: white, yellow and green. In the northwest, the direction of wind, in Devīkoṭa, are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī: the color of the sky, yellow and green. In the northeast, the direction of Īśāna, in Mālava, are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā: green, yellow and blue. This is the wheel of mind: the heroes Khaṇḍakapāla and the rest, holding vajra and bell, embrace Pracaṇḍā and the rest.

Second, in the wheel of speech: on the eastern spoke, in Kāmarūpa, are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī: white, blue and green. In the north, in Oḍra, are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā: green, yellow and blue. In the west, in Triśakuni, are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā: blue, yellow and green. In the south, in Kosala, are Vajra Hūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī: red, yellow and green. In the southeast, the direction of fire, in Kaliṅga, are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī: green, yellow and red. In the southwest, in Lampāka, are Vajraprabha and Subhadrā: yellow, blue and green. In the northwest, the direction of wind, in Kāñcī, are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā: smoke-colored, yellow and blue. In the northeast, the direction of Īśāna, in Himālaya, are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā: the color of the sky, yellow and green. This is the wheel of speech: Aṅkurika and the rest, holding lotus and lotus bell, embrace Airāvatī and the rest. Thus these are the two wheels, of those who move in the sky and of those who move on the earth.

The third, the body, arising from the vajra, is four-cornered with four gates. At the eastern gate, in Pretapurī, are Mahābala and Cakravegā: blue, yellow and green. At the northern gate, in Gṛhadevatā, are Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā: yellow, blue and green. At the western gate, in Saurāṣṭra, are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī: red, yellow and green. At the southern gate, in Suvarṇadvīpa, are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī: white, blue and green. In the southeast, the direction of fire, in Nagara, are Heruka and Suvīrā: the color of the sky, yellow, blue and green. In the southwest, in Sindhu, are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā: yellow, blue and green. In the northwest, the direction of wind, in Maru, are Vairocana and Cakravartinī: white, blue and green. In the northeast, in Kulatā, are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā: white, blue and green. In the wheel of body, Mahābala and the rest are embraced by Cakravegā and the rest, with wheel and wheel bell.

All these heroes stand with the right leg extended. They are three-eyed, three-faced and six-armed, holding a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga, a hand drum and a curved knife. Just as with the arms and hand emblems of the heroes, so it is with the ḍākinīs as well:

They have crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
And are adorned by the lord of their own family.
All of them bear the five mudrās
And wear tiger skins as garments.
The goddesses, with their hair unbound,
Entwine well with their two thighs.
All of them are clad in the directions,
Their bodies transformed into terrifying forms.
In its center is Mañjuvajra,
The supreme one who bears the half moon,
Treading upon a crossed vajra.

Vārāhī, with her hair unbound,
Is naked and wears a girdle.
Having summoned the wheel of wisdom,
Following the sequence of the earlier rite,
Draw it in and meditate on it dissolving.
Bless it through the four acts.
All the heroes and yoginīs
Should be laid out in the sequence of the places and the rest.
The elements, aggregates and sense sources
Are the excellence of body, speech and mind.
The essence, become the supreme wisdom:
Empowerment too should be conferred.
Then the armor should be put in place.
The wise one's recitation of wisdom:
Restraining the breath, one recites well,
And through meditating on what is meditated keeps it secret.
oṃ āḥ maṃ hūṃ
Through the practice of sending forth and drawing in,
Recite also the mantra of the nondual garland.
Then the samaya being
Should be recited according to the rite:

Taking up a rosary of great conch,
Recite the secret mantra according to the rite.

Having practiced at the four times,
Do recitation and meditation one-pointedly.
Having swiftly accomplished the yoga,
Through the sequence of accomplishing the secret mantra,
Having made oneself endowed with the mudrā,
The mantrin should always make offerings.
The mantrin, having entered the maṇḍala,
Meditates on the maṇḍala of body, speech and mind.
Through union with one's own deity
The supreme maṇḍala is accomplished.
Through union with the deities of the maṇḍala
All accomplishments are fully granted.

From the Highest of the Highest of the Tantra of Discourse, the sequence of the rite of the maṇḍala of the three wheels: this is the tenth chapter.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
The supreme and excellent division of the families.
Through the sequence of joining the places and the rest,
They are distinguished by the order of the directions.
The great union, supreme of all:
The lord of yogins is fully accomplished.
Emerging from the vajra body,
It is the maṇḍala, the excellent maṇḍala.

Then the Blessed Ones, all the tathāgatas, and also all the heroes and yoginīs, gathered and came before the Buddha, the Blessed One, the lord of great bliss, the great Vajradhara.

Wide-eyed, dancing with joy,
In a sequence gathered up with speed,
With the right foot and the left
Stepping forth before him,
With eyes thus changed to wrath,
Raising their brows and rolling them,
They who go to the unborn mudrā
Bowed with the mudrā of the eyes,

and they urged the great Vajrasattva in many ways and made their request, and they spoke of the maṇḍala in which all the great yoginīs delight:

"The reality of the Blessed One
And the supreme maṇḍala are beautiful.
The vajra of great delight
Is all the buddhas, great bliss.
The great bliss of play
Today I have found.
a la la ho
The great bliss of all the tathāgatas
Is supremely delighted."
By singing these songs,
Existence is wholly and decisively turned back.
The great and pure tathāgata
Is contemplated in the maṇḍala.

Then the Blessed One, Great Bliss, Vajrasattva, reflected and opened his eyes wide, and with a dance that revolves around the four quarters he raised his brows.

Gazing ahead and with his steps
Whirling about in proud disdain:
Body, speech and mind are the vajra itself;
Reality abides in this.
The maṇḍala and the name of the maṇḍala
Abide in the mind of vajra wisdom.
Joining oneself without conceptual thought
Is the supreme vajra maṇḍala.
The full disk of the moon
Is the vajra of great delight.

Like the white of a painter,
Such is this supreme mind of awakening.
Like a fire stirred by the wind,
Blue and blazing in various hues,
Itself beautiful with a half moon,
It abides in the vajra maṇḍala.
The enchanting maṇḍala of eight parts,
Together with a blazing sun:
That maṇḍala, the vajra jewel,
Brings about the accomplishment of supreme bliss.
A lotus of eight petals, open,

Its center pervaded by anthers:
From the lotus, the lotus itself,
The maṇḍala of joy arises.
When the supreme maṇḍala is seen,
Just like a blazing fire,
In the karma vajra maṇḍala
All actions are accomplished.
In this way those infinite ones
Should be fully visualized in the maṇḍala.
Whatever emanates, wherever and in whatever,
Has arisen from Vajrasattva.
The nature of all is Samantabhadra,
Pervading the whole realm of space.
Upon the supreme ground of the sphere of space,
Meditate on a palace of many stories.
In the very center of the palace of many stories,
Visualize five maṇḍalas.
On beautiful multicolored lotuses,
Arrange the deities each in their place.
In the center of the central maṇḍala
Meditate on Heruka,
With the body color and positions explained before,
Abiding in bliss with Vārāhī.

In the east, in Pullīramalaya, are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā. In the north, in Jālandhara, are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī. In the west, in Oḍiyāna, are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī. In the south, in Arbuda, are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā.

In the center of the eastern maṇḍala of that central maṇḍala, in Godāvarī, are Suravairin and Vīramatī. In the east, in Rāmeśvara, are Amitābha and Kharvarī. In the north, in Devīkoṭa, are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī. In the west, in Mālava, are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā. In the south, in Kāmarūpa, are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī.

In the center of the northern maṇḍala, in Oḍra, are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā. In the east, in Triśakuni, are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā. In the north, in Kosala, are Vajra Hūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī. In the west, in Kaliṅga, are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī. In the south, in Lampāka, are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā.

In the center of the western maṇḍala, in Kāñcī, are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā. In the east, in Himālaya, are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā. In the north, in Pretapurī, are Mahābala and Cakravegā. In the west, in Gṛhadevatā, are Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā. In the south, in Saurāṣṭra, are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī.

In the center of the southern maṇḍala, in Suvarṇadvīpa, are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī. In the east, in Nagara, are Śrī Heruka and Suvīrā. In the north, in Sindhu, are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā. In the west, in Maru, are Vairocana and Cakravartinī. In the south, in Kulatā, are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā.

The heroes Khaṇḍakapāla and the rest, and Pracaṇḍā and the rest, all of them, are of various forms, three-faced, six-armed and three-eyed, standing with the right leg extended, and sealed with the five mudrās. The goddesses are naked, with their hair unbound. Holding a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a hand drum, a curved knife, a vajra and a bell, the heroes embrace them and are entwined by the two thighs of the goddesses, intoxicated with the taste of the joy of great delight.

At the four corners of the heroes' central maṇḍala,
Upon vases,
Skull vessels filled to the brim
With the mind of awakening should be placed.
At the corners of the other maṇḍalas
Place both the vases and the skulls.

In the intermediate quarters are the four goddesses, Ḍākinī and the rest, of half form, sovereign ladies. They are three-faced and three-eyed, standing in the posture with the right leg extended, clad in the directions, with their hair unbound, and they firmly bear the five mudrās.

Encircled all around by a garland of vajras,
Outside the five maṇḍalas,
Draw various blazing maṇḍalas.

All the heroes and yoginīs are seated on seats of hungry ghosts upon multicolored lotuses. At the eastern of the four gates is Kākāsyā, with wrathful eyes, glassy eyes and a wrathful face. She holds a curved knife, a head, a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a bell and a hand drum. She is three-eyed and three-faced, with her hair unbound, naked, multicolored, standing with the right leg extended, seated on a hungry ghost and a multicolored lotus. She abides in the center of a blazing maṇḍala and is adorned with the five mudrās. Ulūkāsyā, Śvānāsyā and Śūkarāsyā are just like Kākāsyā in color, arms, posture and seat. With the faces of a donkey, a camel, a goat and a cat, they devour with great ferocity.

Those from Yamadāhī to Yamamathanī are sovereign ladies of the dance. They are three-faced, six-armed and three-eyed, standing with the right leg extended, clad in the directions, with their hair unbound, trampling a multicolored lotus and a hungry ghost, blessed by the five mudrās. They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga, carry a head and a curved knife, and hold a hand drum, a vajra and a spear. Their fangs are bared, and they are terrifying. All of them wear garlands of human skulls as ornaments.

They have crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
And have Vajrasattva as their crown ornament.
Their diadems are made of garlands of vajras,
And they have ornaments made of vajras.
A crossed vajra and a half moon
Press upon their heads and adorn them.
Just as with the color of the Blessed One,
So are the face color and arms of Vajravārāhī,
And her mudrās and posture as well.
She is naked, with her hair unbound,
Adorned with a girdle of bone pieces.
But the upper face of Vajravārāhī
Is white,
With fangs bared.

As for the sequence of the sites,
From the sequence of the Abhidhāna in a Hundred Thousand Lines,
The chapter on the maṇḍala of the yoginīs
Was taught by Vajrasattva.
Elsewhere, with the Vajraḍāka
And with the first chapter
Of the Abhidhāna Tantra there is certainly no contradiction.

This is the rite of the maṇḍala of pride,
The great union whose nature is the five of the fivefold,

The rite of the vow (saṃvara), concealed and secret,
Of all the ḍākinīs without exception,
Thus, as in the section of the teaching elsewhere.

Vases of many kinds,
Various vases in accordance with the rite,
Made of gold and of silver,
Beautified with various cloths,
And adorned with garlands of flowers,
Filled with the five nectars,
Endowed with the five kinds of medicine,
Together with the five jewels,
And beautified with the five grains:
Having set sixteen vases
In the directions and intermediate directions of the maṇḍala,
One should worship the ḍākinīs in various ways,
With song and dance and great bliss,
Clothed only in the directions, with hair unbound,
With the sounds of various music;
And with garlands of various pretas
One should encircle the outside of the maṇḍala.

Outside that, in the middle
Of the enclosing rim, are the ḍākinīs,
Encircled on the outside by a girdle,
And the terrifying charnel grounds,
Beautified with many various things.

Having seen before one
The supreme maṇḍala of wisdom and commitment,
One should likewise worship the commitment of the Abhidhāna,
And confer empowerment in its proper order.

The wise one, having arranged them on the body,
Gathered them into one and dissolved them,
Should don both armors:
The heroes and the yoginīs,
Abiding in the aggregates, elements and sense sources.

Having meditated on all the wheels,
One should set them in the aggregates, elements and sense sources,
And in body, speech and mind;
One should set the wisdom being in the heart.
With various pleasing things
One should worship with offerings to the commitment deity.
One should emanate countless Activities of wisdom recitation.
Having taken a rosary of human bone,
And resting in equipoise, one should recite.
There, to the wheel of wisdom,
The wise one should offer worship, praise and recitation.
For the benefit of sentient beings
The yogin should make aspirations.
The teachings of the Great Vehicle
Are quickly accomplished by the yogin.

By this sequence, just as it is,
For the benefit of others, the one who keeps the commitments
Should worship, meditate and recite.
Pacification and enrichment increase,
And one obtains the pleasing accomplishments.
The supreme and sublime one among the classes of the egg-born
Grants all desires through union.
If one performs the rites just as they are,
There is no doubt that they will be accomplished.
The sublime and supreme accomplishment of union
Is found from the words of the guru.
Moreover, the sites of the yoginīs,
Supreme in the sequence of the lineage,
Or else the earlier accomplishments,
Are shown in dreams.
Moreover,
Attainment of the state of the guru
Is fully bestowed by the yoginīs.

This secret of the supreme commitment,
This hidden thing, should not be taught.
The mind of the yoginīs
And the mind of the buddhas are supreme;
The secret heart of the ḍākinīs
Is the supreme of yogic union.

This is the eleventh chapter, on the sequence of the sites of accomplishment, from the Highest of the Highest of the Abhidhāna Tantra.

Next I shall explain the practice
That accomplishes every desired aim,
Higher even than the highest:
The Saṃvara of the net of the ḍākinīs.
Vārāhī, the great sovereign lady,
Is well accomplished by the yoginīs.
This is the yoga of all,
The condensed heart of yoga.

One should draw an eight-petaled lotus,
Of various colors, supreme and sublime.
On its center, together with the anthers,
Is a seat that is completely pure in every way.
In its middle is a lunar disc,
Likewise pure and stainless.
On it are the vowels and consonants,
And in their middle it is adorned with vaṃ.
In its middle the goddess arises:
Vajravārāhī, the yoginī,
Four-faced and with twelve arms,
Three-eyed, with contorted faces,
Seated in the half cross-legged posture,
Beautifully adorned with dance,
Clothed in the directions, with hair unbound.
With the face of the half-female Lord (Ardhanārīśvara),
She bears a form that is white and red,
Adorned with a crown of skulls.
She holds a vajra and a bell in her hands,
Encircled by a coil of lotuses,

And on her forehead a mudrā blazes.
With two hands she wears a human skin;
She holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And holds a noose and a supreme hook,
A damaru, a curved knife, and the head of Brahmā.
Her faces are four:
With blue, yellow and green faces
The goddess is adorned.
Her faces bare their fangs,
Adorned with a half moon,
Marked by a crown ornament of crossed vajras.
She fully bestows all accomplishments.
Sealed with the six mudrās,
The goddess is adorned with a girdle of bone pieces,
A belt of bells that resounds,
Beautifully adorned with anklets,
Beautified with armlets,
On her forehead a garland of vajras,
Wearing mudrās marked with vajras,
Her body beautiful and captivating.

On the eastern petal is the Ḍākinī,
Lion-faced and terrifying.
To the left is the one with the face of a pig,
The goddess Lāmā, greatly terrifying.
In the west is the elephant-faced goddess,
Khaṇḍarohā, the sovereign lady.
In the south, in the guise of a goddess,
Is Rūpiṇī, with the face of a horse.
Three-eyed, of various forms,
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And carry a head and a curved knife in their hands.
Naked, with hair unbound,
They are beautified with dance as well.
On the backs of pretas, in the half cross-legged posture,
With contorted faces, they are very terrifying.
Bhairava and Kālarātri

Are pressed down beneath the feet of the goddesses.
In the four intermediate directions, beginning with that of Fire,
One should set vessels of bodhicitta and the rest
Upon vases.

In the color of conch, jasmine and the moon,
One should draw a six-spoked wheel.
In its middle the wise one should draw
The four of the mātṛkā family:
Māmakī and Locanā,
The goddess Tārā and Pāṇḍaravāsinī.
Blue, white and red
Is the goddess, sovereign of the vajra family.
With faces white, blue and red,
The goddess is of the family of permanence.
Green, white and red,
The goddess is of the karma family.
Red, yellow and green,
The goddess is of the lotus family.
Three-eyed, with hair unbound,
They wear the supreme garment of the directions,
Complete with every ornament,
Adorned with the six mudrās.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And their own emblem is the fourth:
Vajra, wheel, crossed vajra,
And red lotus, supreme and sublime.
All of them likewise hold a bell,
Encircled by a coil of skulls.
Treading down the four māras with their feet,
Their faces laughing with dance and song,
They sit in the middle of a moon on a multicolored lotus,
Fully bestowing the accomplishments of the families.
In their hands they carry a head and a damaru,
Adorned with a vajra curved knife,
With crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
And adorned with garlands of heads.

On all the corners
One should set the sequence of the sites and the rest.
In the east, on the six-spoked wheel,
One should set the goddesses in their corresponding order.

On the first corner, in Pullīramalaya, is Pracaṇḍā. Second, in Jālandhara, is Caṇḍākṣī. Third, in Oḍḍiyāna, is Prabhāvatī. Fourth, in Arbuda, is Mahānāsā. Fifth, in Godāvarī, is Vīramatī. Sixth, in Rāmeśvara, is Kharvarī.

Second, on the six-spoked wheel of the north: first, in Devīkoṭa, is Laṅkeśvarī. Second, in Mālava, is Drumacchāyā. Third, in Kāmarūpa, is Airāvatī. Fourth, in Oḍra, is Mahābhairavā. Fifth, in Triśakuni, is Vāyuvegā. Sixth, in Kosala, is Surābhakṣī.

On the eastern spoke of the six spokes of the third wheel, the western one, in Kaliṅga, is Śyāmādevī. Second, in Lampāka, is Subhadrā. Third, in Kāñcī, is Hayakarṇā. Fourth, in Himālaya, is Khagānanā. Fifth, in Pretapurī, is Cakravegā. Sixth, in Gṛhadevatā, is Khaṇḍarohā.

On the eastern spoke of the six spokes of the fourth wheel, the southern one, in Saurāṣṭra, is Śauṇḍinī. Second, in Suvarṇadvīpa, is Cakravarmiṇī. Third, in Nagara, is Suvīrā. Fourth, in Sindhu, is Mahābalā. Fifth, in Maru, is Cakravartinī. Sixth, in Kulatā, is Mahāvīryā.

The first are white and green,
With skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Wheel, damaru and curved knife.
The second, of the north, are blue and yellow,
With vajra, skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Damaru and curved knife.
The third, of the west, are red and yellow,
With skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Lotus, damaru and curved knife.
The goddesses of the fourth, of the south,
Yellow and red, hold a crossed vajra,
A damaru, a curved knife, a skull cup,
And a khaṭvāṅga as well.
All of these goddesses, too,
Are half-female sovereign ladies.
Three-eyed and four-armed,
Naked, with hair unbound,

In the half cross-legged posture, with dance,
They stand with their feet on the backs of pretas,
With crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
Adorned with the five mudrās,
With anklets and girdles,
And crown ornaments marked with vajras.

Behind that wheel,
In the east, one should encircle it with a garland of vajras;
In the north, a garland of wheels;
In the west, a garland of crossed vajras;
In the south, a garland of lotuses.

In the middle it is adorned with a garland of vajras.
On all the corners
One should draw crossed vajras evenly.
Behind that, the wise one should encircle it
With a garland of various pretas.

At the gates of the outer maṇḍala
And on its four corners,
One should draw and set the forms
Of the assembled ḍākinīs, while resting in equipoise.
The crow-faced one, Kākāsyā, is set in the east,
Blue and red and captivating.
The owl-faced one, Ulūkāsyā, is set at the northern gate,
Green and red and beautiful.
The dog-faced one, Śvānāsyā, at the western gate,
Is yellow and smoke-colored and very fierce.
The pig-faced one, Sūkarāsyā, set in the south,
Has a form of green and blue.
Three-eyed, with contorted faces, very fierce,
They wear the sublime garment of the directions.
With eyes askew and hideous forms,
They stand with the right leg extended.
They sit in the middle of a sun on a multicolored lotus,
Adorned with the five mudrās,
With crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
Of various forms and captivating,

Naked, with hair unbound, terrifying.

Yamadāhī, buffalo-faced,
Abides in the direction of Fire.
Yamadūtī, donkey-faced,
Abides in the direction of Nairṛti.
Yamadaṃṣṭrī, camel-faced, the fierce one,
Abides in the direction of Wind.
Yamamathanī is horse-faced.
These are intoxicated with passion,
With crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
Of various forms, captivating ladies,
Naked, with hair unbound,
In the half cross-legged posture, dancing,
Their faces baring their fangs,
Three-eyed, with swaying bodies.
They sit in the middle of a sun on a multicolored lotus,
Intoxicated with hideous passion,
All of them seated upon pretas.
In the maṇḍalas of the wheel and the rest
They hold skull cups and khaṭvāṅgas,
And carry curved knives and heads;
In their right hands their damarus
Sound forth a most terrifying noise.
Their manner is to encircle the outside.

Furthermore, with many kinds
Of song and dance as offerings,
And with the various sublime commitment substances,
With flowers, incense and lamps,
With scents, garlands and ointments,
With all kinds of divine garments,
And with goddesses with cymbals, supreme and sublime,
One should worship the outer yoginīs.
In its center, before one, without limit,
Everywhere filled with a retinue
That fills the whole element of space,
One should also worship the supreme and sublime Vārāhī

And the fierce yoginīs.
These supreme things are secret and hidden;
They are not to be told to anyone at all.

Outside, with a garland of pretas,
The nature of the supreme maṇḍala,
Its magical display, should be set out;
One should set it out in sequence, just as it is.

The nails and teeth are Pracaṇḍā. The hair of the head and body is Caṇḍākṣī. The skin and its impurities are Prabhāvatī. The flesh is Mahānāsā. The sinews are Vīramatī. The bones are Kharvarī. The kidneys are Laṅkeśvarī. The heart is Drumacchāyā. The eyes are Airāvatī. The bile is Mahābhairavā. The lungs are Vāyuvegā. The intestines are Surābhakṣī. The colon is Śyāmādevī. The stomach is the goddess Subhadrā. The bladder is Hayakarṇā. The hairline is Khagānanā. The phlegm is Cakravegā. The pus is Khaṇḍarohā. The blood is Śauṇḍinī. The menstrual fluid is Cakravarmiṇī. The fat is Suvīrā. The tears are Mahābalā. The saliva is Cakravartinī. The mucus is Mahāvīryā.

The earth element is Pātanī, the water element is Māraṇī, the fire element is Ākarṣaṇī, and the wind element is Narteśvarī. The space element is Padmajālinī.

The aggregate of form is Vairocana, the aggregate of feeling is Vajrasūrya, the aggregate of perception is Narteśvara, the aggregate of formations is Vajrarāga, and the aggregate of consciousness is Vajrasattva. The self of all the tathāgatas is Vajra Śrī Heruka.

The eye is Delusion Vajra, the ear is Aversion Vajra, the nose is Avarice Vajra, speech is Desire Vajra, the body is Envy Vajra, and all the sense sources are Lordship Vajra. The mind is Akṣobhya Vajra, speech is Amitābha Vajra, and the body is Vairocana Vajra.

Setting these out
Is seeing the wheel of wisdom.
If one abides in this practice,
One thereby meditates on everything.
Empowerment, worship, commitment
And meditation are made equal, as the essence.
To the wisdom being at its heart
One offers the essence of the nectar of wisdom.
The commitments of body, speech and mind,
Mind and what is not mind, should be well examined.
Through the practice of recitation and meditation,
Having abandoned all conceptual thought,
By the recitation of the supreme commitment
The supreme king of secret mantras is accomplished as well.

oṃ vairocanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarvabuddhaḍākinīye vajravarṇanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

One should join them properly with praises and with the names.
Having joined the secret mantras of Pracaṇḍā and the rest,
Endowed with hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ,
One should perform the supreme recitation.
Having fully completed the recitation,
One should also drink the supreme drink of peace.
This is the supreme commitment of sameness,
In which all phenomena are completely the same.

Therefore, having meditated on it, one is completely pure:
The supreme state of the thirty-seven,
Selflessness, the Dharma and the path,
Fully abide in the supreme maṇḍala.
The yoginī of the perfection of wisdom,
Having rested from the work of yoga
And abiding in the signless state,
Relies evenly on the signless.

Phenomena do not exist and are without signs;
Neither non-dharma nor that which has dharmas exists.
Dependently arisen phenomena, too, are equal to space,
Without entity and without signs.
If one abides here on that very ground,
One sees with the eye of wisdom.
The wheels of the sites and the rest, too,
One certainly sees as equal to motes in a sunbeam.
Even a portion of the tip of a hair split a hundred thousand times
One fully realizes and sees.

Heruka, dwelling in the center of the bhaga
Together with the yoginī,
Is the cakravartin, fully united;
One sets Kākāsyā and the rest outside.
Glorious Heruka, the lord,
Is surrounded by the four ḍākinīs.
Acting as lords to one another,
The union of Vajrasattva and the rest
Is accomplished in common with the yoginīs.
The three unions are the supreme commitment.
The great lord of the three realms
Has not been seen to engage in conduct.
If it is not accomplished, one becomes a cakravartin,
A king who is lord of the three realms.
If it is accomplished, then, as a great yogin,
One attains lordship over the three existences.
Likewise, through the practice of the rite,
One should eat one who has died by violence.
Those who commit the deeds of immediate retribution
The wise one should summon and consecrate;
Otherwise the accomplishment becomes fearsome.
The fruit of livelihood is as one wishes.
The practice of slaughtering livestock
Should be done after asking the yoginīs;
It is the practice of preparing the divine food offering.
With mother and sister together,

Likewise the supreme and the middling;
Otherwise, together with a daughter,
The two organs joined in union
Is the accomplishment of supreme sameness.
Through the practice of one's own deity
One should enjoy the five sense pleasures.
Having meditated on oneself as Vārāhī,
And having placed the threatening finger at the navel,
The ḍākinīs and the rest abide in the wheel.
Having made the goddess deeply pleased,
And having entered the nine gates,
Having pierced the lotus of the heart,
Merely by striking the yoginī
One should drink the supreme wound-born.
If one eats what that striking produces,
One becomes a buddha, and not otherwise.

This is the twelfth chapter, teaching the sequence of signs for accomplishing the sites of the yoginīs, from the Highest of the Highest of the Abhidhāna Tantra.

Next, I shall explain further
The rite of the yogin heroes
And the arising of the sites of the yoginīs;
I shall explain the assembly.
All the heroes and yoginīs
Are not apart from the guru's command.
All the ḍākinīs
Will certainly bestow excellence.
Nine squares are in the center,
And outside one should draw sixteen.
In the very middle of the central square
One should draw a most beautiful lotus,
A multicolored lotus of eight petals,
With its center and its anthers.
In its middle, having visualized a moon,
One should arrange ā and the rest;
Having made the vowels and consonants even,

One should place hūṃ within.
All-pervading through Vajrasattva,
One should meditate on Heruka,
With five faces and ten arms,
Fully adorned by Vārāhī,
White and blue and likewise red,
Green, and yellow on top,
Three-eyed, with terrifying faces,
Standing in the posture with the right leg extended.
Bhairava and Kālarātri,
Greatly intoxicated, he presses beneath his feet.
With a crown ornament of a garland of skulls,
Beautified by bearing the half moon,
With a diadem of crossed vajras,
His matted locks are bound on his head as a crown.
Sealed with the six mudrās,
His body adorned with vajra ornaments,
Equally endowed with vajra and bell,
He is the supreme bliss of great bliss.
He holds a trident and a damaru,
Likewise a vajra and a curved knife,
A skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, the head of Brahmā,
An axe and a noose
In his right and left hands.
He wears a human skin as his garment.
His two legs evenly entwined,
He is joined in union with Vārāhī.
She has his color, arms and posture;
Her hair unbound, naked,
She wears a tiger skin as a garment,
Has a girdle of ornaments of bone pieces,
And a garland of fierce skulls,
Intoxicated with the passion of compassion.

On the eastern petal is the Ḍākinī,
In the north Lāmā, the ḍākinī,
In the west is Khaṇḍarohā,

In the south Rūpiṇī, the ḍākinī:
Black, dark blue, red and pale yellow,
Wearing the garment of the directions, standing with the right leg extended,
With crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
Hair unbound, and nondual.
On all the corners
One should also place vessels of bodhicitta.
They hold a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a bell,
A damaru, a curved knife and a head,
Three-faced, three-eyed, with contorted faces,
Intoxicated with the passion of fierce passion.
The Blessed One, having gazed upon them with bliss,
Is attached to great bliss.
Wearing a necklace of heads,
Heruka is to be meditated upon.
Thus in the very middle of the central square
One should meditate on these supreme ones too.

In the eastern square of it, in Pullīramalaya, are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā, yellow. In the north, in Jālandhara, are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī, blue. In the west, in Oḍḍiyāna, are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī, white. In the south, in Arbuda, are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭrin and Mahānāsā, green. In the direction of Fire, in Godāvarī, are Suravairin and Vīramatī, red. In Nairṛti, in Rāmeśvara, are Amitābha and Kharvarī, lotus-colored. In the direction of Wind, in Devīkoṭa, are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī, smoky blue. In Īśāna, in Mālava, are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā, green and like pearl. Holding a vajra and a bell in their hands, they embrace.

Then, in the east of the second square, in Kāmarūpa, are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī, red. In the north, in Oḍra, are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā, green. In the west, in Triśakuni, are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā, blue. In the south, in Kosala, are Vajrahūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī, white. In the direction of Fire, in Kaliṅga, are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī, sky-colored and pale yellow. In Nairṛti, in Lampāka, are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā, red. In the direction of Wind, in Kāñcī, are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā, yellow. In Īśāna, in Himālaya, are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā, blue. Holding a lotus and a bell, they embrace.

In the east of the third square, in Pretapurī, are Mahābala and Cakravegā, sky-colored and pale yellow.

In the north, in Gṛhadevatā, are Vajraprabha and Khaṇḍarohā, yellow. In the west, in Saurāṣṭra, are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī, red. In the south, in Suvarṇadvīpa, are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī, blue. In the direction of Fire, in Nagara, are Śrī Heruka and Suvīrā, smoke-colored. In Nairṛti, in Sindhu, are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā, green. In the direction of Wind, in Maru, are Vairocana and Cakravartinī, blue. In Īśāna, in Kulatā, are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā, white. Holding a wheel and a bell, they embrace.

Moreover, they hold a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a damaru, a curved knife and a head; they are six-armed and three-faced, the faces being taught in accordance with the oral instructions; three-eyed, they stand with the right leg extended.

They are adorned with the five mudrās,
Wear a tiger skin as a garment,
And are adorned with garlands of heads,
With diadems of garlands of skulls.
Vajra garland, lotus and wheel
Adorn their foreheads in corresponding order.
The goddesses, hair unbound and naked,
Entwine them closely with their two thighs.
As is the means, so is the wisdom,
Well pervaded by the mudrā of the emblems.

Four-cornered, with four gates,
Adorned with four porticoes,
Adorned with nets and half nets,
Adorned with silk banners and garlands:
Having laid it out in the form of a wheel,
One should examine carefully how it may be beautiful.
Thus, for the outer wheel,
One should set out the gatekeepers as well.
In the intermediate directions and the corners
The wise one should draw the goddesses.
Having heard many rites,
I have gathered them into one with effort.

At the eastern gate is Kākāsyā,
With three faces and six arms;
Her right and left faces

Are the faces of a crow and a heron;
She is squat, with a hideous face.
At the northern gate, with owlet,
Owl and cat she is beautiful;
In her right and left faces
She moves her tongues, terrifying in form.
In the west is the one called Bhavagī,
With the faces of a dog and a lion;
In her left and right faces
She moves her tongues, most beautiful.
In the south, the earth-holding goddess
Is pig-faced, with the form of a buffalo;
Her right and left faces
Are deep, fierce and terrifying.
The first is called Kākāsyā,
The second likewise the owl,
The third is the dog-faced one,
And the fourth is the pig itself.
Faces of blue, smoky and white;
Green, yellow and red;
Faces of yellow, red and blue;
White, blue and green in color.

First, from Fire up to Īśāna,
Are Yamadāhī, Yamadūtī, Yamadaṃṣṭrī and Yamamathanī:
Red and yellow and green,
Blue and yellow and green,
Smoky, yellow and green,
White and yellow and green.
They have three faces and six arms,
Are three-eyed and stand with the right leg extended,
Wear the garment of the directions, with hanging bellies,
Their hair unbound,
Sealed with the five mudrās.
And all the wheels
Rest upon pretas,

Seated on multicolored lotuses
And disks of sun and moon.
In their hands they carry skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Noose, hook and damaru,
Head and curved knife,
Adorned with garlands of skulls,
Intoxicated with joy and delight.
Their passionate faces
Turn terrifying, glaring eyes.

Then Yamadāhī and the rest are at the gates,
And Kākāsyā and the rest in the intermediate directions,
Placed in union with their own means.
Having meditated on the stage of union,
All the heroes of the wheel, too,
Are just like Vajraḍāka;
All of them, following the former,
And all the ḍākinīs and the rest likewise.
Just as the guru commands,
Just as one wishes, so too are the sites.
According to the distinctions of mind,
One should meditate on the maṇḍala of the yoginīs.

By arranging various vases,
It is fully adorned with skull cups;
Skull cups filled with milk
Should be placed upon the vases.
Surrounding it on the outside
Dwell various ḍākinīs;
Accompanied by song and dance,
They emanate various kinds of music.
With flowers, incense and lamps,
Scents and sublime garments,
Various commitment substances, the food of the flavors,
Various edibles and liquor, one should worship.
The various supreme and sublime maṇḍalas
Are surrounded on the outside by pretas.
One should meditate on entity and non-entity

In accordance with the command of the guru's oral instructions.
The vajra, lotus ring and wheel
Abide fully between the four corners;
The intermediate directions are marked with half vajras.
In the front center of the vajra pillars
The squares should be furnished with vajras.
In the supreme rite of the variegated,
One should set out the sites and the rest in order,
And likewise the elements and aggregates;
One should set out the six sense sources too.
One should meditate on the wisdom vajra.
Through union with body, speech and mind,
When one sees the wheel of wisdom,
One should worship with argha and water for the feet.
With the various supreme and sublime commitments,
Through the distinctions of their variety,
One should worship with māṃsarakta (flesh and blood).
Through joining the two armors,
The supreme and sublime mudrā of wisdom,
If one meditates on the single taste without remainder,
One meditates on the wheel of wisdom.
Through the distinction of touch,
The wise one joins in the three unions.
Through meditation, the meaning of complete purity:
The wise one, the thirty-seven;
Through the practice of wisdom recitation,
One should eat with the supreme of the three commitments.
Through the practice of emanation and gathering,
One should meditate on the meditation of recitation.
At the four times, the holder of commitments,
Wise in the union of the sites, should keep guard.
Everything that is seen on the earth
Is all the form of glorious Heruka.
Purifying the existence of the six destinies,
One accomplishes immeasurable benefit for sentient beings.
All having entered, through the practice of entering,
One should make all enter here.

This is the certain practice;
One will attain certain accomplishment.
With rosaries of human bone
One should recite the supreme commitment.
In accordance with the sequence of the rite of the gathering,
The yogin should recite the supreme mantra.

oṃ śrīvajra he he ru ru kaṃ ḍākinījālasambara hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ hrīḥ h ha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ These are the heart and near-heart mantras.

oṃ vajravairocanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarvabuddhaḍākinī vajravarṇanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ These are the heart and near-heart mantras of Vārāhī.

By merely reciting with the rite of yoga,
The vajra is summoned, and from its place
It is stirred up and violently shaken.
Light blazes from the body, there is laughter,
Its eyes blaze,
There are gentle words and blazing;
By the yogin's mere recitation
The entry of the vajra is seen.
The mantrin, having recited in meditative equipoise,
Having taken up the conduct of the commitment,
Having held firm the vital breath and its exertion (prāṇāyāma),
And having uttered the illuminating hūṃ,
Should emanate into the sphere of phenomena.
To benefit all sentient beings
And to tame those hard to tame,
One emanates the qualities of the buddhas before oneself.
Having seen that state of the wrathful one,
One should gather it back into the three realms.
Having made it enter body, speech, and mind,
One should practice the conduct upon the earth.
When the yogin not in meditative equipoise,
Moistened with compassion,
Looks upon all sentient beings,
The three worlds of existence are Heruka.
Whatever the mantrin eats,
Having meditated on it as the supreme commitment,
All is the victorious Lord of Dharma;
He abides fully in sameness.
When the one who keeps the commitment rises,
Recollecting the worship of the guru,
He should bathe with the water of the mind of awakening.
Abiding with the lovely mudrā,
Having blessed it into the state

Of the wrathful ones, the buddhas, the heroes,
The yoginīs, and the ḍākinīs,
This is taught as the delightful offering.
For the maṇḍala that pervades the expanse of space
Aspirations are to be made.
When, by the yoga that follows immediately,
One sees the moving and the unmoving,
The Blessed One is pure by intrinsic nature,
And intrinsic nature too is made insubstantial.
Sentient beings are pure by intrinsic nature,
And existence is made supreme.
Having blessed the unsurpassed Vajravārāhī
As the mudrā,
Through the union with one's own deity
One should examine everything in this way.

This is the thirteenth chapter, from the supreme Higher Abhidhāna Tantra, teaching the arrangement of the grid and the gathering of the sacred places.

Then I shall explain the secret.
Since the sacred places and the gatherings are supreme,
The intrinsic nature of all accomplishments,
Blended in sameness, becomes the essence.
In equipoise with a nondual understanding,
Within the three wheels endowed with their colors,
In the center of a square maṇḍala,
Is the supreme wheel of the twenty-four.
In its center is a great lotus,
A variegated lotus, beautifully lovely,
Eight-petaled, together with its hub,
Adorned all about with anthers.
The square has four gates,
Ornamented with four archways,
Adorned with garlands and half-garlands,
Fully endowed with all the characteristics.
In the center of a sun disc
Is Vajrasattva, the great bliss.
From the vowels and consonants, having melted,

One should meditate on the five wisdoms.
Through their complete increase
One meditates on Vajra Heruka.
With the great blazing fire of the end of time
He utterly slays all who are hard to tame.
Bhairava and Kālarātri
He tramples beneath his feet.
The fangs of his mouths are bared,
His three eyes are fearsome and utterly terrifying.
From his body, which is blue,
He emanates a body, blue and blazing.
He wears a crown of a garland of skulls,
Blessed by the five buddhas;
He wears a crown of crossed vajras,
Beautified by a half moon.
Six-faced, the hero is hideous,
With a body graceful and laughing,
Fierce and terrifying.
Sealed with the six mudrās,
His body adorned with various ornaments,
He is united with Vārāhī,
Embracing her nondually with the thighs.
He stands with the right leg extended,
He abides with the left leg extended.
He makes ha ha and makes hūṃ hūṃ,
He makes hi hi and is terrifying,
He makes hūṃ hūṃ and has phaṭ phaṭ,
He utters the great sound of aṭṭāṭṭā.
Blue, yellow, and likewise red,
Green, and likewise white;
The upper face is greatly fierce.
Enjoying the vicious as his food,
Holding vajra and bell together,
He presses the breasts of the goddesses.
He wears a garment of a fierce beast's skin,
And drinks the fresh, dripping blood.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,

A spear, a curved knife, a hook,
A noose, and a head.
Vicious and fierce, with a ḍamaru,
And with the mudrā of a blazing spear,
His forehead is beautifully adorned.
With such hands and body color he abides.
His hair loose, he is naked:
One should meditate on a mudrā such as this.
Adorned with a girdle of skull pieces,
Vārāhī too should be meditated on like this.
The yogin, having abandoned doubt,
Through uniting method and wisdom,
Through the bliss of compassionate passion,
Arises for the sake of sentient beings.
Moistened with great compassion,
Through the enjoyment of the union of space,
Through the bliss that is the essence of great compassion,
Having purified the existence of the six classes of beings,
He accomplishes the supreme benefit of sentient beings.
Arisen from the wisdom of emptiness,
In the ground free of conceptual thought,
Without intrinsic nature and supremely subtle,
Free of drop and sound,
Having seen the commitment of sameness,
Which is supreme, outer and inner,
The essence, the wisdom, and the commitment,
In the center of a moon disc,
Having seen there the hand emblem and the color,
The moon, the vajra, and the seed syllable,
Here one should meditate on that essence,
And examine it in the yogas of approach.
In the sequence of the Ḍākinī and the rest,
One should set them on the lotus petals.
In the east one should set the Ḍākinī,
Likewise in the north Lāmā,
In the west is Khaṇḍarohā,
Likewise in the south Rūpiṇī.

Blue, green, red,
And yellow; likewise the four
Have distorted faces and three fierce eyes,
Loose hair, and are clad in the directions.
All their ornaments are complete,
They are sealed with the five mudrās;
A skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga
Rest against the left shoulder;
A ḍamaru, a curved knife, and a head
Are the supreme commitment of the ḍākinīs.
Filled with the water of the mind of awakening,
A skull cup is to be placed on top of the vase.
As for setting out the wheel:
The yoginīs accomplished before,
In the sequence of blessing and so on,
Are in the order of east and north.

In Pullīramalaya are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā, pale yellow like the sky. In Jālandhara are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī, yellow in color. In Oḍiyāna are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī, green in color. In Arbuda are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭrin and Mahānāsā, pale yellow like the sky. In Godāvarī are Suravairin and Vīramatī, yellow in color. In Rāmeśvara are Amitābha and Kharvarī, green in color. In Devīkoṭa are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī, pale yellow like the sky. In Mālava are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā, yellow in color. In Kāmarūpa are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī, green in color. In Oḍra are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā, pale yellow like the sky. In Triśakuni are Mahābhairava and Vāyuvegā, yellow in color. In Kosala are Vajrahūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī, green in color. In Kaliṅga are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī, pale yellow like the sky. In Lampāka are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā, yellow in color. In Kāñcī are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā, green in color. In Himālaya are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā, pale yellow like the sky. In Pretapurī are Mahābala and Cakravegā, yellow in color. In Gṛhadevatā are Ratnavajra and Khaṇḍarohā, green in color. In Saurāṣṭra are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī, pale yellow like the sky. In Suvarṇadvīpa are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī, yellow in color. In Nagara are Heruka and Suvīrā, green in color. In Sindhu are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā, pale yellow like the sky. In Maru are Vairocana and Cakravartinī, yellow in color. In Kulatā are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā, green in color.

Or else, for body, speech, and mind,
One may distinguish the colors as one wishes.
Following the leftward order,
The gates are to be arranged.

In the east is Kākāsyā, in the north Ulūkāsyā, in the west Śvānāsyā, and in the south Sūkarāsyā; they are blue, green, red, and yellow in color. In the direction of Fire, in the southeast, is Yamadāhī, red in color. In the direction of Nairṛti, in the southwest, is Yamadūtī, blue in color. In the direction of Wind, in the northwest, is Yamadaṃṣṭrī, the color of smoke or of a rain cloud. In the direction of Īśāna, in the northeast, is Yamamathanī, white or pale yellow in color.

The heroes Khaṇḍakapāla and the rest, and Pracaṇḍā and the rest, are alike: they are one-faced and four-armed, abiding with the right leg extended, wearing a garland of skulls and clad in a tiger skin. They bear the five mudrās and are embraced by the legs of the goddesses. Naked, they are adorned with a garland of heads; they are three-eyed, their foreheads adorned with a garland of skulls. They embrace with vajra and bell, endowed with the sameness of nondual union, pressing the breasts of the goddesses. They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga and bear a ḍamaru; or else, by the division into the three families, they hold the root emblem.

All are clad in the directions,
And the goddesses, with loose hair, are fierce.
The goddesses Kākāsyā and the rest,
With loose hair and clad in the directions,
Abide in the stance with the right leg extended.
Three-eyed, with distorted faces,
Wearing crowns of garlands of skulls,
Their braids adorned with garlands of heads,
All of them also bear the five mudrās.
Utterly intoxicated with desirous passion,
Together with their own method,
Unwavering, they are joined in the same way.
Bellies hanging and arms hanging,
Their bodies terrifying and faces distorted,
Utterly terrifying, upon a sun and a lotus,
They abide firmly for the accomplishment.
Just as anyone may wish,

Their faces impassioned:
With such a conception
The yogin should meditate.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And bear a ḍamaru, a curved knife, and a head.
All the maṇḍalas, every one of them,
Should be meditated on as seated upon pretas.
In the maṇḍala of the hosts of ḍākinīs,
After the close approach comes the yoga;
Through the union of the hero's limbs
One enters the absorption of the higher accomplishment.

The nails and teeth are Khaṇḍakapāla. The hair of the head and of the body is Mahākaṅkāla. The skin and its grime are Kaṅkāla. The flesh is Vikaṭadaṃṣṭrin. The sinews are Suravairin. The bones are Amitābha. The kidneys are Vajraprabha. The heart is Vajradeha. The eyes are Vajra Aṅkurika. The bile is Vajrajaṭila. The lungs are Mahāvīra. The intestines are Vajrahūṃkāra. The colon is Subhadra. The navel is Vajrabhadra. The bladder is Mahābhairava. The hairline is Virūpākṣa. The phlegm is Mahābala. The pus is Ratnavajra. The blood is Hayagrīva. The menstrual fluid is Ākāśagarbha. The fat is Śrī Heruka. The tears are Padmanarteśvara. The saliva is Vairocana. The mucus is Vajrasattva.

Pullīramalaya: on the head is Pracaṇḍā. Jālandhara: on the crown is Caṇḍākṣī. Oḍiyāna: in the right ear is Prabhāvatī. Arbuda: at the back of the head is Mahānāsā. These are the sacred places (pīṭha). Godāvarī: in the left ear is Vīramatī. Rāmeśvara: between the eyebrows is Kharvarī. Devīkoṭa: in the eyes is Laṅkeśvarī. Mālava: on the two shoulders is Drumacchāyā. These are the secondary sacred places. Kāmarūpa: in the armpits is Airāvatī. Oḍra: on the two breasts is Mahābhairavā. These are the fields (kṣetra). Triśakuni: at the navel is Vāyuvegā. Kosala: at the tip of the nose is Surābhakṣī. These are the secondary fields. Kaliṅga: in the mouth is Śyāmādevī. Lampāka: at the throat is Subhadrā. These are the meeting places (chandoha). Kāñcī: at the heart is Hayakarṇā. Himālaya: at the genital region is Khagānanā. These are the secondary meeting places. Pretapurī: at the sexual organ is Cakravegā. Gṛhadevatā: at the anus is Khaṇḍarohā. These are meeting places. Saurāṣṭra: on the two thighs is Śauṇḍinī. Suvarṇadvīpa: on the two calves is Cakravarmiṇī. These are secondary meeting places. Nagara: on the toes is Suvīrā. Sindhu: on the soles of the feet is Mahābalā. These are the charnel grounds. Maru: on the big toes is Cakravartinī. Kulatā: on the two knees is Mahāvīryā. These are the secondary charnel grounds.

The earth element is Pātanī. The water element is Māraṇī. The fire element is Ākarṣaṇī. The wind element is Narteśvarī. The space element is Padmajālinī. The aggregate of form is Vairocana. The aggregate of feeling is Vajrasūrya. The aggregate of perception is Padmanarteśvara. The aggregate of formations is Vajrarāja. The aggregate of consciousness is Vajrasattva, and the embodiment of all the tathāgatas is Śrī Heruka. The two eyes are Mohavajra. The two ears are Dveṣavajra. The two nostrils are Mātsaryavajra. The mouth is Rāgavajra. The tangible is Īrṣyāvajra. All the sense sources are Aiśvaryavajra. The mind is Akṣobhyavajra. Speech is Amitavajra. The body is Vajravairocana.

These are the yoga of accomplishment.
Through the application of the hook of one's own heart,
Having summoned the wheel of wisdom,
Having emanated and arranged them,
One also confers empowerment in the due sequence.
Once they have entered, one should bind them,
And unite with delight and with passion.
Having become one with one's own nature,
One sets the two armors upon it.

oṃ ha at the heart: Vajrasattva. namaḥ hi at the head: Vairocana. svāhā hu at the crown: Padmanarteśvara. vauṣaṭ he at the two shoulders: Heruka. hūṃ hūṃ hoḥmig at the two eyes: Vajrasūrya. phaṭ haṃ, the armor of the whole body: Paramāśva. oṃ vaṃ at the navel: Vajravārāhī. haṃ yaṃ at the heart: Yāminī. hrīṃ maṃ at the mouth: Mohanī. hreṃ hreṃ at the head: Sañcālinī. hūṃ hūṃ at the crown: Santrāsanī. phaṭ phaṭ, Caṇḍikā: the weapon of all the limbs.

Knotting the index fingers, one firmly joins the middle fingers,
And joins the thumbs firmly as a vajra.
Having placed this at the center of the forehead,
One should apply it, turning it round and round.
With the feet half pressed down, looking upward,
Proclaiming the sound pheṃ upward,
One summons the heroes and yoginīs
Who dwell in the world systems of the ten directions.

jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ
Having summoned them through this application, one makes them enter,
Binds them, and brings them under control.
Having seen the heroes and yoginīs
Completely filling the center of the sky,
And having taken up a vase filled
With the nectar of the water of wisdom,
Empowerment is to be conferred upon him with their hands.
With offerings of song and dance
The empowerments are to be offered.
The mantra for this is oṃ sarvatathāgata abhiṣekata samaya śriye hūṃ hūṃ.

By singing this song they are urged on, or else the great ḍākinīs become pleased and delighted:

Great bliss of the music of empowerment,
Great bliss of the net of ḍākinīs,
Great bliss of offering great delight,
Great bliss of the net of ḍākinīs,
Illuminating great bliss,
Great bliss of the net of ḍākinīs,
a la la hoḥ
Great bliss that has become supreme,
Great bliss of the net of ḍākinīs,
a la la hoḥ

Having delighted in the wisdom of great bliss,
The commitment abides in the one who holds the commitment.
Having meditated on wisdom as of one taste,
One meditates likewise on the wheel of one taste.
Crowned with Vajrasattva,
Fully endowed with the five wisdoms,
Whatever heroes there are, the root mantra and the rest,
Should be conceived as the brahmin's thread and so forth.
Whatever is the mantra of Vajravārāhī
Adorns one as a necklace, from neck to neck.
With the heart mantra of the goddess
One is adorned with a garland of fifty,
And with the seven-syllable secret mantra

The jewel earrings are beautifully lovely.
The ḍākinī of all the buddhas
Is the supreme wearing of the skin garment.
With the secret mantras of the six yoginīs
The girdle is made into an ornament.
With the six armors
The body of the mudrā is beautifully adorned.
The mantra of the yoginīs of all the wheels
Is the skull cup for drinking.
Whatever mantra belongs to Vairocanī
Makes the skull an ornament on the crown.
With the twenty-four heroes
One should conceive the elements of the body.
Having thus contemplated oneself,
One guards well with the boundary or with mantra.
Having examined the conduct of celibacy,
One worships with the eight-line mantra.
Having abandoned every fear,
One contemplates oneself thus as the yogin.
One meditates on the wisdom of emanation and withdrawal,
And performs the recitation of the wisdom of union.
The great yoga, the great accomplishment:
From the drop of the vajra wrathful one
One should emanate into the three realms.
The tip of the vajra nose blazes.
To emanate, from the drop in space
A subtle vajra is seen,
And from between the pores of the body hair,
Into the moving and the unmoving,
One emanates clouds of wrathful buddhas.
The yoga of complete purification
Is the sequence of the thirty-seven.

The application of mindfulness to the body is the Ḍākinī. The application of mindfulness to feelings is Lāmā. The application of mindfulness to phenomena is Khaṇḍarohā. The application of mindfulness to the mind is Rūpiṇī. The basis of miraculous power of aspiration is Pracaṇḍā. The basis of miraculous power of diligence is Caṇḍākṣī. The basis of miraculous power of analysis is Prabhāvatī. The basis of miraculous power of mind is Mahānāsā. The faculty of faith is Vīramatī. The faculty of diligence is Kharvarī. The faculty of mindfulness is Laṅkeśvarī. The faculty of meditative absorption is Drumacchāyā. The faculty of wisdom is Airāvatī. The power of faith is Mahābhairavā. The power of diligence is Vāyuvegā. The power of mindfulness is Surābhakṣī. The power of meditative absorption is Śyāmādevī. The power of wisdom is Subhadrā. The limb of awakening that is meditative absorption is Hayakarṇā. The limb of awakening that is diligence is Khagānanā. The limb of awakening that is joy is Cakravegā. The limb of awakening that is pliancy is Khaṇḍarohā. The limb of awakening that is discrimination of phenomena is Śauṇḍinī. The limb of awakening that is mindfulness is Cakravarmiṇī. The limb of awakening that is equanimity is Suvīrā. Right view is Mahābalā. Right thought is Cakravartinī. Right speech is Mahāvīryā. Right action is Kākāsyā. Right livelihood is Ulūkāsyā. Right effort is Śvānāsyā. Right mindfulness is Sūkarāsyā. Right meditative absorption is the Blessed One, Śrī Heruka. Generating the virtuous phenomena that have not arisen is Yamadāhī. Fully protecting the virtuous phenomena that have arisen is Yamadūtī. Fully abandoning the nonvirtuous phenomena that have arisen is Yamadaṃṣṭrī. Not generating the nonvirtuous phenomena that have not arisen is Yamamathanī. This is the meditation that purifies the wheel of commitment.

Then the wheels of commitment,
Placed in equipoise, should recite:

ha ha hūṃ hūṃ hi hi phaṭ hūṃ hūṃ a a oṃ śrīvajra he he ru ru kaṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍākinījāla sambaraṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ hrīḥ h ha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ These are the heart and near-heart mantras.

oṃ vajravairocanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ sarvabuddhaḍākinīye vajravarṇaṇ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā These are the heart and near-heart mantras of the goddess.

In the due order of these,
Having taken up a rosary of conch shell,
With the thumb and ring finger of the left hand
One should recite the secret mantras.
At the four times, just as one wishes,
The yogin should perform the recitation.
Meditation is to be done one-pointedly,
Joining commitment with commitment.
Having concluded eating and recitation,
One gives the torma according to the rite.
At the maṇḍala, at one's ease,
Seated naked with hair loose,
The one who keeps the observance gives the torma.
Standing with the right leg extended,
In equipoise one binds the mudrā:

Making the index fingers a spear, one firmly joins the middle fingers,
And joins the thumbs firmly as a vajra.
Having placed it in the region of the center of the forehead,
Twisting and twisting it, turning it round, one says this:
oṃ āralli hoḥ jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ vajraḍākinī samaya stvaṃ dṛśya hoḥ
This should be recited
Three, four, or up to five times.
Having become naked with hair loose,
The yogin rises from a high seat,
And standing facing the south,
Gives the torma at midnight.
Following whatever the rite may be,
Having praised with the three realities,
And opening the vajra palms upward,
One proclaims these secret mantras:
oṃ kha kha khāhi khāhi sarva yakṣa rākṣasa bhruta preta piśāca unmāda apasmāra ḍākaḍākinyadayaḥ imaṃ baliṃ ghṛhṇaṃtu samaya rakṣantu mama sarva siddhimme prayacchantu yathaivaṃ bhuñjatha vipatha jighratha mātikramatha mama sarvakāratāya sadsukhaṃ viśuddhaye sahāyikā bhavantu huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

All the heroes and yoginīs,
Dancing with the sign of great bliss,
Abide in the body, speech, and mind of the Blessed One.
Having made the vowels and consonants equal,
There, through the application of the repha,
The repha blazing above
Causes dripping below.
That which has the nature of the dripping fluid
Becomes the form of deathless drops.
Churning and accomplishing are rightly joined.
Through the karmic wind
Fully stirring the fire of wisdom,
Smoke arises at the maṇḍala of the navel,
And rays of light are made to blaze.

That wheel of commitment, having burned all the tathāgatas, goes to the wheel of enjoyment of all the tathāgatas. By that method it circles three times, passes out through the door that opens the vital point at the hair curl between the eyebrows, and having emerged, takes the nectar of the five wisdoms from the tathāgatas who dwell in the world systems of the ten directions. It enters the golden door at the crown of the head called Jālandhara, goes into the opening at the junction of the teeth, rests in the wheel of enjoyment, brings joy to all the burned tathāgatas, and comes to abide in the maṇḍala of the navel. Thereby one does not see even so much as a fraction of the tip of a hair split a hundred thousand times going out or coming in, and one abides in joy, just as one pleases, at ease.

Through the yoga of one's own special deity
One should examine everything in this way.
It is thinking within non-thinking;
Mind too cannot be pointed out.
Through meditation that is beyond thought,
Existent and nonexistent are abandoned.
That mind which the mind thinks,
Whatever is found, should be grasped.
The khaṭvāṅga is the body of the deity;
The sound of the ḍamaru is wisdom.
By day the Blessed One is the hero;
By night he is taught to be the yoginī.
The emanation of the pure Dharma
Is shown in the form of Vārāhī.
śrī is nondual wisdom;
he is the abandonment of the collection of causes;
ru is freedom from arrangement;
ka is not abiding anywhere.

The yogin's mind, having come to rest,
Is what is taught as nirvāṇa.
At the time of the yogin's transference,
Heruka and the other glorious yogins,
Holding various flowers in their hands,
Bearing various victory banners and pennants,
Sounding the music of various instruments,
Make offerings with various songs.
This conceptual thought that is called "death"
Is carried off to the realm of the sky-goers.

From the Highest of the High, the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the fourteenth chapter, on the state of nondual union.

Next, something further is to be explained:
The divisions of meditation on the mothers (mātṛkās).
The union of the abodes of all the secret mantras,
The abode of all the tathāgatas,
All-knowing and all-accomplishing,
Pervading everything with great bliss,
The protector, the lord of all the buddhas,
Dwells in the hearts of all sentient beings.
aṃ āṃ iṃ īṃ uṃ ūṃ eṃ aiṃ oṃ auṃ aṃ āḥ hūṃ
This belongs to the Blessed One himself,
Heruka, the supreme lord.
In the sky, at the center of the hub
Of a stainless moon, one should meditate on him.
ṛṃ ṝṃ ḷṃ ḹṃ
The Ḍākinī dwells upon the lotus petals.
kaṃ khaṃ gaṃ ghaṃ ṅaṃ caṃ chaṃ jaṃ jhaṃ ñaṃ ṭaṃ ṭhaṃ ḍaṃ ḍhaṃ ṇaṃ taṃ thaṃ daṃ dhaṃ naṃ paṃ phaṃ baṃ bhaṃ maṃ
These are of Khaṇḍakapāla and the others,
And of Caṇḍākṣī and all the others:
They are the wheels of body, speech, and mind,
And they bestow every accomplishment.
yaṃ raṃ laṃ vaṃ śaṃ ṣaṃ saṃ haṃ
These are of Kākāsyā and the others,
And of Yamadāhī and all the others.
The syllable kṣaḥ, whose very nature
Is the form of the vital essence (śukra) of great bliss,
All-knowing and all-seeing,
Is the abode of all the buddhas,
All-pervading and ever empty,
Inexpressible, in the subtle center.
This is the unceasing, permanent mind;
Its own form is like space.
This is what binds oneself,
And this is what is skilled in liberating.
This dwells at the center of the navel,

And as the form of vital essence it abides as great bliss.
Through the union of body, speech, and mind,
It is to be placed at the center of the three wheels.
This is the supreme secret;
It is not to be taught to anyone.
The arms and hand emblems explained before,
And the armor as well, are likewise;
Having arranged them as explained before,
The aggregates, elements, and sense sources
Are the very purity of the hero's limbs,
And so too are the factors of awakening.
In forward and in reverse order,
One should arrange the wheels explained before.
All are white in color,
And the three wheels are sixteen.
The heroes too are to be arranged each in turn,
And the yoginīs each in turn as well;
Through union with their own method,
They abide in nonduality.
With the heroes' own wisdom consorts
They abide in nonduality.
The Ḍākinī and the others, and Śvānāsyā and the others,
Abide nondual with their own method.
That is the vajra essence.
This sacred teaching of the yoginīs,
Supremely secret and concealed,
Was requested by Vajragarbha
And spoken by the Blessed One.

From the Highest of the High, the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the fifteenth chapter, on generation through meditation on Śrī Heruka, the Ḍākinī, the heroes, and the yoginīs.

Next, something further is to be explained:
The meditation for beginners,
Supreme among the practices of yoga,
The instantaneous generation,
As taught by Vajragarbha.

He has two arms and one face,
Three eyes and a wrathful countenance;
With his outstretched right leg he presses down
On the heads of Bhairava and Kālarātri.
He is adorned with the six ornaments, a crossed vajra,
And a half moon;
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
And is adorned with a garland of heads.
He holds a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
And brandishes the supreme vajra as well.
Vārāhī too embraces him,
Abiding with his color and with arms like his.
With her two thighs she clasps him evenly;
With skull cup, vajra, and threatening gesture
She menaces the directions, her hair hanging loose,
Wearing a girdle adorned with bone ornaments.
The retinue and the others of the maṇḍala
Have two arms and one face,
And are equally joined with the five mudrās;
Three-eyed and of fierce form,
All are seated on seats of pretas.
This is the meditation of the supreme meditation.
In the center the vajra Blood Drinker
Is blue in color, the great bliss.
Meditated upon at the center of the lotus,
The Ḍākinī is yellow in color.
The distinction between the heroes of the mind wheel
And the ḍākinīs is this:
The heroes are black in color,
And the ḍākinīs are white.
The heroes of the speech wheel
Are red in color and blaze intensely;
The ḍākinīs likewise are black:
One meditates on them in the two colors.
The heroes of the body wheel
Are beautifully adorned in moonlike pale yellow,
And the ḍākinīs with them are red;

They also take whatever form they wish.
Kākāsyā and the others are all green;
Yamadāhī and the others are all smoke-colored.
In this way the distinctions of color
Are to be known through supreme meditation.
The ḍākinīs hold skull cups and khaṭvāṅgas,
And are poised in dance with ḍamaru drums.
All of them have hair hanging loose,
Are clothed only in the directions, with laughing faces.
The heroes of the mind wheel
Embrace their consorts well, holding vajra and bell;
The yoginīs hold a skull cup and vajra,
Together with the threatening gesture.
The heroes of the speech wheel
Are adorned with lotus and bell;
The yoginīs hold a skull cup and lotus,
Together with the threatening gesture.
The heroes of the body wheel
Have a wheel and bell that blaze brightly;
The yoginīs have a wheel and the threatening gesture,
And a skull cup filled with marrow.

The goddesses Kākāsyā and the others
Hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
Together with a curved knife and the threatening gesture.
The goddesses Yamadāhī and the others
Have a ḍamaru drum, a head, and the threatening gesture,
And wear crowns made of garlands of skulls;
In the half-crossed posture they dance.
The hero stands with his right leg outstretched,
Entwined by the thighs of the ḍākinī,
Equally joined in nonduality,
The great bliss of compassion's passion.
Through being equally joined with the wheel of wisdom,
The bliss of bliss becomes one;
It arises perfectly from the taste of the Dharma.
Together with the seed syllable of one's own name,

One joins it evenly with the garland mantra.
Having joined the consonants evenly,
One joins it properly with two hūṃ syllables and phaṭ.
Thus the secret mantras of the heroes are properly joined.
For the yoginīs it is explained likewise:
In the center the seed syllable of their own name,
Evenly joined with the consonants,
And huṃ hūṃ phaṭ likewise:
The mantra practitioner should join them in this way.
In the center is the vajra Blood Drinker;
The wise one should recite this secret mantra:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra.
oṃ vajra vārāhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra vairocanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra of the goddess.
At the four times, according to the rite,
The yogin should perform the recitation.
In front of him, from the pores of his body hair,
He emanates the Dharma and enjoyments.
In order to benefit sentient beings,
He should display the wheel of Dharma.
Having liberated the six classes of beings,
He places them in the unsurpassed state.
The mantra practitioner applies this as he wishes.
And in the center of the five families,
The one who pervades the center of the three families,
The lord of the three realms,
In whom all the buddhas are perfectly gathered,
Is the division of body, speech, and mind.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixteenth chapter, teaching the meditation practice for beginners.

As fully explained by Vajragarbha,
This brings about every accomplishment:
Through the rite of the four-armed one,
Those of middling faculties should meditate.
Through the practice of instantaneous generation,

They should cultivate the meditations.
He has four arms and four faces,
Three eyes, fierce and terrifying;
He stands in the posture with his right leg outstretched,
Trampling Bhairava and Kālarātri.
His body bears a necklace of human heads;
He has a supreme crown of skulls,
Beautified by a half moon,
And marked with a crossed vajra.
With the six mudrās, in fierce form,
In colors white and terrifying,
Blue, green, and red,
One should visualize his faces above.
He holds a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
A vajra and bell, and a ḍamaru drum,
And is equally joined with Vajravārāhī,
Pressing the breasts of the goddess.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment.
She wears the supreme garment of the directions,
Her hair hanging loose, with a girdle of bone ornaments,
Marked by his arms, his faces, and his color.
The Ḍākinī is blue and yellow;
Lāmā is green and yellow;
Khaṇḍarohā is red and green;
Rūpiṇī is yellow and red.
They hold a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
And, supreme, hold a curved knife and a head;
They sound the many sounds of the ḍamaru drum.
Naked, their hair hanging loose,
They wear diadems made of skulls.
Three-eyed, with fierce faces,
Their own colors and their arms likewise,
They dance in the half-crossed posture,
Trampling the four māras beneath their feet,
Gazing with desire and imagining.
The heroes of the mind wheel
One should visualize as blue and yellow.

Likewise the vajra ḍākinīs
One should visualize as white and blue.
Holding skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
They embrace well with vajra and bell.
The various sounds of the ḍamaru drum,
The vajra sound, are made complete.
Skull cup and threatening gesture,
Curved knife and human skull they hold:
The hands of the goddesses are likewise,
And with their two thighs they entwine well.
He stands in the posture with his right leg outstretched,
Contorted like the Great Terrifier,
Wearing a diadem of a vajra garland:
The heroes have the vajra as their mark.
The heroes of the speech wheel
Are red and black and terrifying,
Pervaded by the lotus heroes,
Holding their own hand emblems;
The lotus ḍākinīs likewise
Have bodies green and white.
The heroes of the body wheel, too,
Have bodies yellow and green;
The heroes are wholly pervaded by wheels,
And they also bestow the rule of a universal monarch.
The wheel ḍākinīs likewise
Are white and red and captivating,
Perfectly endowed with their own emblems,
Turning the wheel of Dharma.
The four ḍākinīs, Kākāsyā and the others,
Are of various colors and captivating.
They hold a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
A curved knife, a head, and a ḍamaru drum.
The goddesses Yamadāhī and the others
Are likewise smoke-colored and red.
Yama's staff and curved knife,
Skull cup and khaṭvāṅga they hold.
The ḍākinīs, the mothers of the retinue and the rest,

Are seated upon seats of pretas.
Entwined equally with their two thighs,
The ḍākinīs are in great delight.
Their hair hanging loose, wearing the garment of the directions,
They wear crowns made of garlands of skulls.
All of them hold the five mudrās,
The retinue of heroes and ḍākinīs.
Three-eyed, fierce, and contorted,
The heroes revel in the food of desire,
And gaze with the names of passion.
Following the sequence of the rite explained before,
The secret mantra with the seed syllable of one's own name:
The heroes' secret mantra is explained here,
And the ḍākinīs' likewise.
This very root secret mantra,
And the supreme secret mantra likewise:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra vārāhi baṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ vajra vairocanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
When, having meditated on them all, one sees them,
The lord and the retinue and the rest,
Having seen that wheel of wisdom,
One should properly confer empowerment and cause it to enter.
Having made them one through meditation,
One should satisfy them with supreme nectar.
Through the practice of wisdom recitation,
Having emanated the supreme host of wrathful ones,
When one sees the heroes and ḍākinīs,
Through the sequence of body, speech, and mind,
The one who holds the samaya should perform the recitation.
The retinue and the rest, the heroes and the ḍākinīs:
This is the secret mantra of them all,
And it is explained as the ultimate recitation.

From the Highest of the High, the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the seventeenth chapter, teaching the meditation for those of middling faculties.

Next, something further is to be explained,
The secret of Vajragarbha:
Whatever stages of reality there are,
In order to benefit the practitioner,
The meditation for those of sharp faculties is explained.
The practices of the generation stage
Are to be cultivated through that meditation.
The wisdom of omniscience
And the wisdom that knows all aspects of the path:
Joining the vowels and consonants evenly,
One should make oneself into Heruka.
The protector has three faces and six arms,
Three eyes, and a contorted face.
He stands in the posture with his right leg outstretched,
Pressing with his feet upon the heads
Of Bhairava and Kālarātri.
He wears a human skin as his garment,
Is adorned with a half moon,
Has a crossed vajra set upon his head,
And wears a crown made of a garland of skulls;
His body is sealed with the six mudrās.
He is equally joined with Vajravārāhī,
Who, in nondual union,
Entwines him well with her two thighs,
Naked, her hair hanging loose,
Wearing a girdle of bone ornaments
And a garland of skulls,
Intoxicated with the bliss of compassion.
Equally joined with vajra and bell,
He delights in bliss with the passion of desire.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
Bears a sword and a ḍamaru drum,
And in another hand the head of Brahmā,
And is adorned with the six mudrās.
She is marked by his body color, his faces, and his arms,
Except that she holds a curved knife.
Sky-colored, pale yellow, red, and white:
The three doors of liberation and the three bodies.

All the retinue and the rest, the ḍākinīs,
The heroes, the yoginīs, and the ḍākinīs,
All have three faces and six arms
And three eyes, and stand in the posture with the right leg outstretched, Firmly established upon seats of pretas,
Abiding in nondual union.
The Ḍākinī is white, blue, and red;
Lāmā is green, blue, and white;
Khaṇḍarohā is red, white, and blue;
Rūpiṇī is yellow, blue, and red.

These are three-eyed, naked, with their hair hanging loose, standing with the right leg outstretched upon pretas, and they hold a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga, a sword, a wheel, a curved knife, a head, and a ḍamaru drum.

As for the heroes and yoginīs of the mind wheel: in the east are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā, blue, white, and red. In the north are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī, red, white, and blue. In the west are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī, white, red, and green. In the south are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā, green, white, and red. In the southeast are Suravairin and Vīramatī, red, blue, and white. In the southwest are Amitābha and Kharvarī, yellow, blue, and white. In the northwest are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī, blue, white, and red. In the northeast are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā, green, white, and red.

In the east of the speech wheel are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī, red, blue, and white. In the north are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā, blue, white, and red. In the west are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā, green, white, and red. In the south are Vajrahūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī, yellow, blue, and red. In the southeast are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī, green, yellow, and red. In the southwest are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā, blue, white, and red. In the northwest are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā, red, blue, and yellow. In the northeast are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā, white, blue, and green.

In the east of the body wheel are Mahābala and Cakravegā, white, blue, and yellow. In the north are Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā, yellow, blue, and green. In the west are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī, red, blue, and white. In the south are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī, blue, red, and green. In the southeast are the Blood Drinker and Suvīrā, green, yellow, and red. In the southwest are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā, white, blue, and green. In the northwest are Vairocana and Cakravartinī, green, red, and yellow. In the northeast are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā, sky-colored light blue, yellow, and green.

At the eastern gate is Kākāsyā, blue, yellow, and red. In the north is Ulūkāsyā, green, red, and white. In the west is Śvānāsyā, yellow, blue, and green. In the south is Śūkarāsyā, red, blue, and green. In the southeast is Yamadāhī, white, blue, and green. In the southwest is Yamadūtī, blue, white, and red. In the northwest is Yamadaṃṣṭrī, smoke-colored, red, and white. In the northeast is Yamamathanī, red, blue, and white.

Khaṇḍakapāla and the others, and Pracaṇḍā and the others, are equally joined with vajra and bell, and hold a sword, a ḍamaru drum, a head, a skull cup, and a khaṭvāṅga.
Lotus and lotus bell,
Wheel and wheel bell:
The two, of body and of speech,
Are just as with the mind wheel.
The goddesses have the ḍamaru drum and sword,
And the curved knife likewise.
Kākāsyā and the others hold a sword, a ḍamaru drum, a curved knife, a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a head, and a bell. Yamadāhī and the others hold a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, a sword, a hook, a ḍamaru drum, a bell, and a head.

All of them, moreover, are three-eyed, adorned with the five mudrās, and wear human skins. The heroes stand with the right leg outstretched; they wear garlands of skulls and the diadems of their own families, stand upon pretas, and are entwined well by the two thighs of the yoginīs, who are naked, their hair hanging loose, and wear girdles of bone ornaments. The goddesses Kākāsyā and the others and Yamadāhī and the others are naked, their hair hanging loose; they stand upon pretas with the right leg outstretched, are three-eyed, adorned with the five mudrās, and wear garlands of skulls. Their bellies protrude, their sexual organs are long, and their faces bare their fangs; they are intoxicated with the taste of compassion's passion, and dreadful with their terrifying movements.
Having meditated on all of this in this way, without omission,
When one sees the wheel of wisdom,
One should make offerings with wisdom water and the rest, with arghya,
And with the supreme samaya substances.
As soon as one sees it, one confers empowerment as well.
Having made offerings and caused it to dissolve,

According to the rite of wisdom recitation,
Having set them in place, one should fully perform the scattering and the drinking.
Through the practice of the life breath and its control,
One obtains the accomplishments one desires.
Having recited for the samaya wheel,
Together with the five deathless wisdoms,
One recites the secret mantra with wrathful words;
It bestows the accomplishment of bliss.
One should perform the entire maṇḍala, without omission,
And, resting in equipoise, perform the recitation.
According to the rite of wisdom and method,
The recitation of yoga bestows the great aim.
The yoginīs, the ḍākinīs, and the heroes
Bestow even the supreme accomplishment directly.

Having recited these and meditated
In their proper order,
And having meditated on the nectar of wisdom,
One abides in union with one's own deity.

From the Highest of the High, the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the eighteenth chapter, the further teaching on the meditation for those of sharp faculties.

Vajragarbha said:
Next the most sublime of the supreme is explained:
The vows of equal union,
Equal union with all the buddhas,
The supreme vow of the ḍākinī.
Having seen the instantaneous entry,
One meditates on Vajrasattva and emanates.
Arising from the vowels and consonants,
One makes oneself into Heruka.
His faces are yellow, blue, and green,
And the one above is white and peaceful.
His crown ornament is a diadem of skulls;
Three-eyed, compassionate and fierce,
He is adorned by Vārāhī.
Upon the heads of Bhairava and Kālarātri
He stands with his right leg outstretched.
Fierce, he tames those who are hard to tame,
And subdues all obstructors.
He wears a half moon and matted locks,
And bears the imprint of a crossed vajra.
His body is marked with the six mudrās;
These mudrās are the supreme vow.

He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
And is adorned with a garland of heads.
Vajravārāhī is red,
Naked, her hair hanging loose.
With his body, his face, and his emblems,
She entwines him well with her two thighs.
She wears a crown of a garland of skulls;
Lip is pressed tightly to lip;
She wears a girdle of little bells,
Intoxicated with the joy of the family.
Equally joined with vajra and bell,
He holds the breasts of Vārāhī.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And holds the supreme noose and hook as well.
Having stretched out the skin of Brahmā,
He holds it with his hands above his head.
The melodious sound of the ḍamaru drum
Fills everything with the sound of the Dharma.
On the left and on the right
One should visualize the four ḍākinīs:
On the right side the Ḍākinī and Lāmā,
In the north Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī.
Blue and saffron, white and yellow,
Three-eyed, contorted and fierce,
White, blue, green, red, and saffron,
They blaze with intense brilliance.

When they are meditated upon on the right side,
They bestow every accomplishment.
On the left side, red, blue, and green,
And likewise white for the upper face;
Green, red, and yellow,
And blue above: that too is bliss.
She stands with her right leg outstretched,
Wearing the supreme garment of the directions,
Her hair hanging loose, terrifying,
Adorned with a garland of heads,

Trampling the four māras beneath her feet,
Adorned with the five mudrās.
She holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And holds a vajra spear in her hand;
She wears a human skin as her garment;
A bell and a ḍamaru drum likewise,
And she holds a head and a curved knife in her hands.
Her girdle of little bells resounds,
Her anklets jingle, ru lu ru lu.
Upon a variegated lotus,
At the center of a sun disk,
They are seated together on a single seat.
In the heart are the samaya being and the wisdom being,
With that color, those arms and hand emblems:
Vajrasattva Heruka,
With a diadem of Akṣobhya.
Having meditated on all of them in this way,
Together with the major and minor marks,
And having made them one with wisdom,
One recites the vow of the ḍākinīs:
oṃ āḥ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ ḍākinī jāla saṃvaraṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hrīḥ h ha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ āḥ vajra vārāhi hye vaṃ ḍākinī jāla sambaraṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ vajra vairocanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
These are the heart mantras and near-heart mantras of the glorious Blood Drinker and of Vārāhī.
oṃ vajra ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra lāme huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra khaṇḍarohe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra rūpiṇi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
With these, in their proper order,
One should perform recitation and meditation.
In the sequence that follows the four times,
With samaya and vow inseparable,
One should also eat the five lamps.
One should always meditate within a charnel ground.
Through practice for seven nights,

The accomplishment of invisibility is certainly attained,
And one goes everywhere and can also make oneself seen.
Taking various forms, in great bliss,
One should eat the foods,
And likewise drink the drinks for thirst.
Whoever is clad only in the directions
Remains intoxicated, and as if intoxicated.
In a place where there is not even a shadow,
The great yogin practices.
Together with mahārudhira, great blood,
And equally joined with excrement and water,
Many various kinds of māṃsa, flesh:
One eats this food with single-pointed mind.
Endowed with union with the inner self,
One should always proceed with devotion.
The self of union, even when not in meditative equipoise,
Is seen with the eye of wisdom.

From the Highest of the High, the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the nineteenth chapter, the rite of the vow of union with the four ḍākinīs.

Next, something further is to be explained.
In accordance with the excellent rite,
He has eight faces and sixteen arms;
Or else twelve faces
And twenty-four arms;
Or else the faces of various animals,
And one should give him a hundred arms.
Or else the family of the tathāgatas,
Bodhisattvas and heroes,
Ḍākinīs and dhāraṇī goddesses,
And the perfections likewise,
With faces distinct from one another,
Various distinctions of color,
And arms from a thousand up to a hundred thousand,
Holding various hand emblems,
Having faces of various kinds,
And performing dances of various kinds,

He stands swaying, with his right leg outstretched.

He is seen pressing face down beneath his feet Mahābhairava, Kālarātri, and the others, Brahmā, Indra, Upendra, Rudra, Viṣṇu, the Youth Who Scatters All, Kārtika, Mahākāla, Nandikeśvara, Yama, Varuṇa, Kubera, the Moon, the Sun, the various māras, and all the obstructors. He is dreadful, his countenance transformed, fierce, with bared fangs, laughing, repulsive, utterly terrifying, heroic, graceful, fierce, with quivering brows, haughty, peaceful, moving, with darting eyes, mouth gaping wide, playful, tongue lolling, and he bestows the supreme through the various aesthetic moods.

With a garland of skulls and a half moon,
And a crossed vajra pressed upon his head,
He has a diadem of the five buddhas,
And Vajrasattva adorns the crown of his head.
Three-eyed, he wears a tiger skin;
His body is adorned with a garland of fresh heads;
The six mudrās are complete upon his body,
And he is decked with ornaments of garlands.
Vārāhī entwines his body,
Clad only in the directions, her hair hanging loose,
Two-armed and one-faced,
Wearing a girdle of bone ornaments,
And adorned with a garland of skulls.
She embraces him with vajra, threatening gesture, and skull cup;
With her two thighs she embraces him evenly,
Pervaded by joy and intoxicated.
He is equally joined with vajra and bell,
Pressing the breasts of the goddess,
And holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
And an outstretched elephant hide,
A hook, a noose, and an axe,
A trident, and a head,
A ḍamaru drum and a curved knife,
An arrow and a bow likewise,
A skull staff and a short spear,
The threatening gesture and a pestle,
A wheel, a sword, a jewel,

A lotus, a crossed vajra,
A staff with a vajra handle,
A club, a spear, and a paṭṭiśa,
Yama's staff and a dagger,
A conch, a horn, and a paṭaha drum,
A lute, a flute, a great clay drum,
And a clay drum: he holds weapons as his hand emblems.
Seen with their sharp points,
Various emblems appear in various ways,
For as many arms as there are, up to a hundred thousand.
So too with the various mudrās,
And so too with the various rites.
The retinue, the Ḍākinī and the others,
And all of the heroes,
And the yoginīs of various kinds,
Of infinite colors, of various colors,
Hold various hand emblems.
Wearing the garment of the directions, their hair hanging loose,
Possessing the bliss of the various moods,
Dreadful, fierce, laughing "ha ha,"
They revel in various dances,
And in songs, music, and moods likewise.
Various samaya foods,
Various lovely flowers,
Perfumes and incense, and garments likewise,
Lovely garlands of lamps:
These are perfect offerings,
Of various colors, supreme and sublime.
Having meditated in this way, the mantra practitioner,
Having completed it with supreme yoga,
Then recites the garland mantra as well,
Having blended in the twenty-two syllables.
The goddess Vajravārāhī
Should likewise be meditated upon in this way:
Beautiful with various faces,
Holding various hand emblems,
Clad only in the directions, her hair hanging loose,

She is the perfection of awakening,
And likewise all those who hold the grounds.

Having performed the rite in this way,
One should recite the secret mantra with a rosary:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ kara kara kuru kuru bandha bandha trāsaya trāsaya kṣobhaya kṣobhaya hrauṃ hrauṃ hraḥ hraḥ pheṃ pheṃ phaṭ phaṭ daha daha paca paca bhakṣa bhakṣa vasarudhira antramālāvalaṃvini gṛhṇa gṛhṇa saptapātālagatabhujaṃg sarvamapā tarjjaya tarjajya ākaḍhya ākaḍhya hrīṃ hrīṃ jṇauṃ jṇauṃ kṣmāṃ kṣmāṃ hāṃ hāṃ hīṃ hīṃ hūṃ hūṃ kili kili sili sili hili hili dhili dhili hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ ḍākinījālasambaraṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
This is the supreme heart mantra,
Virtuous, accomplishing all actions.
If the hero, with the seed syllable and his own name,
And the yoginī, with devotion, constantly recite it,
Everything without exception is accomplished,
And one travels to the abodes of beings.
At that very moment, immediately,
The supreme vow is accomplished.
This secret mantra of Vajravārāhī
Bestows every bliss that one desires:
oṃ vajravārāhi protaṅge protaṅge hana hana praṇāna kiṅkiṇi khiṅkhiṇi dhuna dhuna vajrahaste śoṣaya śoṣaya vajrakapāla khaṭvādgadhāriṇi mahāpiśate mānasāśani mānuṣa antraprāvṛtte sānnidhya naraśiromālāgranthitadhāriṇi sumbhani sumbhe hana hana prāṇān sarvapāpasatvānāṃ sarvapaśūnāṃ mahāmāṃsacchedanī krodhamūrte daṃṣṭākarālini mahāmudre śrīherukadevasya agramahiṣi sahasraśire sahasrabāhave śatasahasra ānane jvalitatejase jvalamukhe piṃgalalocane vajraśarīre vajra āsane mili mili timili timili he he ha ha hūṃ hūṃ kha kha dhu dhu ru ru dhuru dhuru muru muru advaite mahāyogini paṭhitasiddhe dreṃ dhaṃ dreṃ dhaṃ graṃ graṃ he he ha ha bhīme hasa hasa vīre hā hā ho ho hūṃ hūṃ trailokyavināśāni śatasahasrakoṭitathāgataparivārite hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ siṃharupe khaḥ gjarūpe gaḥ trailokyodare samudramekhale grasa grasa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ vīrādvaite huṃ hūṃ hāḥ hā mahāpaśūmohani mahāyogīśvari tvaṃ ḍākinī sarvalokānāṃ bandhanī sadyaḥ pratyayakīraṇi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ bhūtatrāsani mahāvīre paramasiddhe yogīśvari phaṭ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

This is the root mantra of Vajravārāhī.
This is the supreme Vajravārāhī,
Accomplished as the supreme heart.
Whoever recites it and meditates,
By that one all actions are accomplished;
Without doubt they are accomplished in accordance with the sūtra.
The worship is of oneself, in one's own place,
And never anything external.
Of that same accomplished Blood Drinker,
The secret mantra endowed with eight roots:
oṃ namo bhagavate vīreśāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ mahākalpa agni sannibhāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ jaṭamukuṭodakaṭāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ daṃṣṭākarālograbhīṣanamukhāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ sahasrabhujabhāsurāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ paraśupaśodyataśūlakhaṭvāṃgadhāriṇe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vyāghrajina aṃbaradharāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ mahādhūmrāndhakāravapuṣāya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
This is the secret mantra of the Blood Drinker;
One should meditate upon oneself and make worship.
oṃ namo bhagavati vajravārāhi vaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ārya aparājite trailogyamāte mahāvidyeśvari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ sarvabhūtabhayāvahe mahāvajre huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajrāsane ajite aparājite vaśyaṃkari netrabhrāmaṇi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ śoṣaṇi roṣaṇi krodhani karālini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ trāsani māraṇi suprabhedani parājaye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vijaye jaṃbhani staṃbhani mohani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajravārāhi mahāyogini kāmeśvari khage huṃ hūṃ phaṭ namaḥ is to be applied to all of them.
With this secret mantra one should perform all actions.
Having meditated upon oneself
As Vajravārāhī of the vowels and consonants,
Endowed with the mantras of the eight roots,
One should also worship oneself.
Having blessed the four faces,
One worships with oṃ sumbhani sumbhas.
Or else, with all four faces as vajra,
And at her navel the glorious Heruka,
Having meditated upon oneself,
One should likewise meditate on the retinue as well.

Eating beef and the like, one accomplishes the practice.
Those malicious toward the teaching of the Sugata and toward beings,
Such creatures are declared to be the ones:
Those who steal the property of the Three Jewels,
Those who commit the deeds of immediate retribution,
Whoever reviles the master,
And those who revile the Great Vehicle.
Having slain those beasts,
One should eat them together with the yoginīs.
The summoning of those beasts, too,
Is to be done by the practitioner through prior generation.
The seven beasts, and likewise the beasts,
Are the donkey, the human, and the tortoise,
The dog, the camel, the jackal, and the horse.
These lamps of the beasts
Are known as the limbs of the divisions of accomplishment.
The beasts are distinguished by caste and color.
Among the four-footed, the elephant;
Among birds, the goose is substituted;
Among the animals, one whose lips move.
They are offered as food into the mouths of the deities.
This is taught as the examination of the beasts.
The practice for accomplishment is explained:
Crow, hawk, and jackal,
The twice-born, and one of great mantra,
Crane, goose, and the kaṅbuka bird:
With these excellent ones, perform the fire offering and the torma.
One who desires accomplishments should meditate.
With the milk of a black bitch,
Together with black beans and rice,
One should perform the fire offering in the mouth of a corpse.
One should perform a hundred and eight fire offerings.
Then that corpse rises up
And will say, "What shall I do?"
Going beneath the earth, or the sword,
Subjugation, or bestowing benefit,
Or pills, eye ointment, or gold,

Or swift-footedness, or the taking of the essence:
Having granted any one of these,
It departs, and not otherwise.
Messengers above and below are accomplished.
In this tantra there is no doubt.
From the Highest of the Highest, the Abhidhānottara Tantra: the twentieth chapter, on the rite of the vow of yoga.

Then, further, I shall explain
The sequence of protection and averting.
The supreme protection, hidden in other tantras
And hard to find,
I shall fully explain in this tantra,
The Abhidhāna Tantra, highest of the highest.
One should have no doubt about it.
In order to protect sentient beings,
One should draw an eight-petaled lotus.
At the center of the lotus, with its anthers,
And behind that a crossed vajra,
One should correctly apply the secret mantra of Sumbha.
Outside it one should make a girdle,
And draw sixteen petals.
There the divisions are to be arranged,
And with that the outside is encircled.
What the wise one draws at the center
Is a vajra with twelve prongs.
What is to be placed at its center
Is hūṃ, fearsome and terrifying.
At the center of the hūṃ is the letter vaṃ;
At the center of the vaṃ, three letters,
To be drawn interspersed with the name of the one to be accomplished.
The four ḍākinīs
Are to be placed circling from its left:
ḍāṃ laṃ khaṃ rūṃ are placed there,
Together with ṛ ॠ ḷ ॡ.
Placing the ḍākinīs, one should draw them
Thoroughly interspersed with the name.

Following the order of the wheel of mind,
The wise one should place on the petals
khaṃ praṃ on the eastern petal;
In the north it is kaṃ caṃ;
In the west, only kaṃ paṃ;
In the south it is vaṃ maṃ.
In the directions from Agni's to Īśāna's:
suṃ vaṃ iṃ khaṃ vaṃ laṃ hraṃ.
By these, in their proper order,
Interspersed with the letter hūṃ,
The seed syllables should be drawn.
kaṃ khaṃ gaṃ ghaṃ ṅaṃ caṃ chaṃ jaṃ: these are drawn on the girdle of the lotus.
The vajra with twelve divisions
Encircles it, adorned with drops.
Outside the sixteen petals
Draw a wheel with sixteen spokes.
Here, beginning with the deity of the east,
They are to be placed circling from the left:
The ḍākinīs and the heroes.
āṃ ā vaṃ maṃ vaṃ maṃ paṃ suṃ suṃ śāṃ vaṃ suṃ muṃ haṃ viṃ khaṃ maṃ caṃ raṃ khaṃ haṃ saṃ aṃ ciṃ haṃ suṃ paṃ maṃ vaiṃ caṃ vaṃ maṃ
These, interspersed with hri,
And interspersed with oṃ, should be drawn.
The name of the one to be accomplished is placed inside;
One draws according to whatever the rite may be.
jhaṃ ñaṃ ṭaṃ ṭhaṃ ḍaṃ ḍhaṃ ṇaṃ taṃ thaṃ daṃ dhaṃ naṃ paṃ phaṃ baṃ bhaṃ maṃ: the girdle is drawn on the outside.
Outside the wheel, within a square,
Draw the doors, joined together,
As follows:
From Kākāsyā and the rest in their order,
Place the seed syllables of Yamamathanī and the rest:
kaṃ aṃ svāṃ sūṃ yaṃ yaṃ yaṃ yaṃ yaṃ raṃ laṃ vaṃ śaṃ ṣaṃ saṃ haṃ,
Joining them, and interspersing with hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ,
And also interspersing them with the name.

Above the doors
One should draw four-pronged half vajras.
At the corners
One should draw sun and moon and half vajras.
Above that, one looks toward the faces
Of the eight wrathful ones, expressed in eight lines.
In the middle of the outer girdle
One should draw these averting mantras:
namaḥ smantakāyavāgacittavajraherukānāṃ oṃ hūṃ vajraherukacakravarti sarvalokikalokodtarāṇi yantramantratantracūrṇaṇprayogādīni yena kenacid kritāni sarvāṇi ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍhya tarjjaya tarjjaya gṛhṇa gṛhṇa bhakṣaya bhakṣaya trāsaya trāsaya hana hana daha daha paca paca kṣmāṃ kṣmāṃ jnauṃ jṇauṃ matha matha vidhvansaya vidhvanya śatasahasradhacūrṇaṇya oṃ phaṭ vajraherukoṣṇīṣacakravarttitasyevamukhaṃ cakṣur bandha bandha hūṃ hūṃ amukasya śāntiṃ kuru hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ svāhā
Having encircled it completely with this,
Place it in the middle of the belly of kṣa.
Outside the letter kṣa,
Having encircled it completely with thā,
Encircle it completely with the marks of the vowels.
Having meditated on oneself as Heruka,
One should also recite the seven-syllable mantra:
oṃ hrīḥ h ha amukasya śāntiṃ kuru śāntiṃ kuru hūṃ hūṃ pāpaṃ phaṭ
From a woman of low caste, or a brahmin woman,
Or especially from a king's daughter,
Having taken the self-arisen flower,
Mixed with the elephant flower,
And combined in equal measure with the awakening mind,
Blended together with rocana,
And likewise the water of lotus and vajra,
Mixed with the great eye ointment,
One should draw the wheel of the supreme deity,
Encircled by a garland of vajras,
On human skin, or on birch bark,
Or else a preta's cloth will also do.
Having taken butter and milk
Endowed with the five nectars,

One recites the secret mantra of eight lines.
Likewise the one who keeps the observance makes worship.
A vase of gold or of silver,
Filled with the nectar water of the five wisdoms:
Having placed the wheel in its middle,
Wind the wheel with white thread.
Recite the garland secret mantra over it.
Then one should bestow the empowerment.
It makes the sick free of disease,
And it also makes the healthy sick.
Having placed it in the middle
Of intoxicating liquor, the wise one
Makes the healthy sick,
Following whatever the rite may be.
For any action whatsoever,
Encircle it with the garland mantra.
If the wheel for accomplishing yoga
Is concealed inside a head,
The ḍākinīs will, without doubt,
Bestow their blessing upon it.
Everything one desires will be accomplished,
And accomplishment will come without obstacles.
From the Highest of the Highest, the Abhidhānottara Tantra: the twenty-first chapter, on protection and averting.
Then her meditation is explained,
Which benefits all sentient beings.
In an instant, oneself
Is the averting goddess, in sequence:
Four-faced, with sixteen arms,
Pressing beneath her lotus Obstructors of many vicious kinds,
She sits with her right leg extended,
Abiding in the center of a moon maṇḍala.
White, blue, red, and yellow,
Adorned with a face on top,
Complete with every ornament,
Adorned with white garments,

Crowned with the five buddhas,
Supreme in truly restoring the dying to life,
Three-eyed, with gentle speech,
But vicious and fierce toward others.
With the threatening forefinger she brandishes the vajra,
Supreme in holding the bell and the noose;
She holds vajra, sword, and spear,
Axe, skull cup, and hook,
Bow and khaṭvāṅga,
And draws the arrow taut.
Hammer, wheel, and the gesture of fearlessness:
She bestows every accomplishment.
Or else she has eight faces,
On her right and left sides.
Those on the right are blue, red, and yellow,
Fierce, laughing "ha ha."
Those on the left are green, red,
And the color of smoke.
The one on top is beautiful and peaceful,
Her body the color of the moon.

At her heart is the wheel,
In the very center of a moon maṇḍala.
With faith, deeply settled in meditative equipoise,
One should recite the vidyā-mantra that restores the dying to life:
oṃ amṛta sumukhe jīvaṃ praveśaya praveśaya sarvavaṃjrapadmasamayoge mahābodhicidtavisbāpitamūrte huṃ hūṃ a ā aṃ aḥ he svāhā
By reciting this some ten thousand times,
One restores all the dying to life.
Untimely death is pacified,
And one is certainly raised from death.
Otherwise, when the yoginīs are pleased,
They perform wonders,
Dancing each on her own.
With hi hi there is joy,
With ho ho there is delight,
With he he they speak words,

With huṃ hūṃ there is completion.
huṃ hūṃ is meditative concentration.
With phaṭ phaṭ there is killing,
With hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ, the ritual dagger.
With jaḥ jaḥ they are well drawn in.
sa sa makes things true;
It is the sound that means "certainly excellent."
hūṃ vaṃ is killing.
hūṃ bruṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ is grinding to ashes.
With ha ha there is making clear.
bhuṃ bhuṃ produces splendor.
With hriṃ hriṃ they are well drawn in.
tryaṃ tryaṃ is worship.
With saṃ saṃ the fruit of all accomplishments is bestowed.
hi hi is bewildering.
laṃ laṃ is auspiciousness.
di di is holding.
With jiṃ jiṃ they are well drawn in.
hūṃ hūṃ is saṃsāra.
hri hri is killing.
jaṃ jaṃ brings about stupefaction.
With ho ho one is to be made enamored.
haṃ haṃ is protecting.
ho ho is delight.
ṭaṃ ṭaṃ is the vicious.
gūṃ gūṃ is flowers.
gaṃ gaṃ is scent.
raṃ raṃ is the secret.
By these, in their proper order,
One abides by this sequence
Of the rites of pacifying and the rest.
From the Highest of the Highest, the Abhidhānottara Tantra: the twenty-second chapter, teaching the meditation that performs all the actions of raising from death.
Then another secret is to be explained:
The reality of mantra, the sequence of the rite,
Spoken by Vajragarbha

And declared the supreme of all secrets.
The supreme bliss of the yoginīs,
The sequence of the lineage of the yoginīs,
Is secret, secret, and supremely secret.
Through the practice of the generation stage
It is the supreme cultivation of meditative concentration.
Having made oneself into Heruka,
One is completely pervaded by the ḍākinīs.
His body is red and greatly terrifying,
Emerging from the five wisdoms.
His faces are red, blue, green,
And yellow, and the peaceful upper face is white.
He has three eyes and twelve arms,
And sits with his right leg extended.
Great Bhairava and Kālarātri,
Having come for refuge, are pressed beneath his feet.
With the six mudrās and a half moon,
He bears a crossed vajra on his locks.
He wears an elephant hide as his garment.
He holds vajra and bell together,
Sword and spear, supreme in terror,
Holds skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Supreme in bearing noose and hook,
The ḍamaru and the head of Brahmā,
And is adorned with a garland of heads.
He has a crown ornament of a garland of skulls,
Adorned with the five buddhas.
Before him is Vajravārāhī,
Bearing his color and his hand emblems,
Supreme in bearing noose and hook,
The ḍamaru and the head of Brahmā,
And adorned with a garland of heads.
She twines closely about him with her two thighs,
Joined equally in nondual union,
Adorned with the five mudrās.
Arisen from the wisdom of kṣaḥ,
With its body, faces, and hand emblems,

Abiding in the center of a moon maṇḍala,
One should meditate on the wisdom being.
Emerging from the twelve parts,
The commitment being, the great bliss,
The emergence of omniscience:
Here one recites the mantra tantra.
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ a ā i ī u ū e ai o au aṃ aḥ ḍākinījālasambaraṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ a ā aṃ aḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra.
oṃ vajravārāhi a ā i ī u ū e ai o au aṃ aḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ vajravairocanīye a ā aṃ aḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
These are the heart mantra and the near-heart mantra of the goddess.

phaṭ oṃ śaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ṣaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ saṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ haṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

These are the heart secret mantras of the retinue of heroes and yoginīs, which have become the supreme of secrets; they are the very hidden mantras of the three wheels.

The heroes of the wheel of mind are red,
And the ḍākinīs are blue,
Holding vajra and bell together,
Their faces transformed like Mahābhairava's,
Pervaded by aversion, in great bliss.
The heroes of the wheel of speech are white,
And the ḍākinīs are red,
Holding lotus and bell together,
Pervaded by attachment, in great bliss.
The heroes of the wheel of body are yellow,
And the ḍākinīs white, and the color of fire,
Pervaded by delusion, in great bliss.
The goddesses, the Ḍākinī and the rest,
Are of various colors, great vessels.
The goddesses Kākāsyā and the rest
Are red, yellow, white, and green.
The goddesses Yamadāhī and the rest
Are blue, yellow, and green,
And likewise white in color.
All of them, the retinue and the rest,
Are three-eyed and sit with the right leg extended.
The heroes wear tiger skins,
And all the goddesses are naked,
Beautiful with their hair hanging loose,
Twining closely with their two thighs.
They wear girdles of bone ornaments,
All bear garlands of skulls,
And are adorned with the five mudrās.
Holding skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
The heroes and the goddesses
Hold the skull cup, the vajra, and the lotus,
And likewise also the wheel.
The goddesses, the Ḍākinī and the rest, Kākāsyā and the rest,

And Yamadāhī and the rest,
Hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
Mirror, scent, taste, and touch,
A supreme and pleasing garment,
And hold the ḍamaru and the bell.
The Ḍākinī holds skull cup
And also khaṭvāṅga,
And carries bell, ḍamaru, and curved knife.
The goddesses Kākāsyā and the rest
Are to be fully conceived with these hand emblems.
All of them sit on preta seats,
Supreme in wearing the directions as their garment.
The wheel of mind is fierce,
The wheel of speech has agitated faces,
The wheel of body is peaceful,
And the Ḍākinī's faces are transformed.
Having meditated just as one wishes,
One should conceive the principal deity at the center:
A buddha or a bodhisattva,
Or any of the many various wrathful ones,
Or some tathāgata,
Or the special families of the mātṛkās,
Marīcī, or the Inciting Goddess,
And likewise Prajñāpāramitā.
Whatever one meditates upon,
The yoking of the mental faculty,
And what is made proud by that,
Is like a jewel of various forms.
Or else Vajrasattva
Abides among beings in various forms,
All-knowing and all-accomplishing,
All-pervading with great bliss.
From the Highest of the Highest, the Abhidhānottara Tantra: the twenty-third chapter, teaching the meditation on the reality of the secret commitment of the yoginīs.

Then, further, I shall explain
The sequence of rites of the ḍākinī families.
They are explained as many and various families;
In brief they are three and five,
And they are also well known as six.
This is the highest practice of yoga:
The ḍākinīs, their retinues, and all the rest,
And the three realms without remainder,
Truly arise from the families.
All the bodies arise each on its own;
Otherwise, all are of the family of the mātṛkās,
Joyful, delighted, and pleasing,
Born and arising from the mind.
The Blessed One, Great Delight, lord of the family of bliss, explained and taught this seed syllable of the secret heart of reality: hūṃ bruṃ āṃ hrīṃ khāṃ vāṃ.
Then, at the explanation of the great mantra,
The sons of all the buddhas
Trembled violently and fainted,
And then recalled the vajra wisdom.
Akṣobhya and the family of the Eternal,
Likewise Vajrasūrya,
Amitābha and Amoghasiddhi,
And Vajrasattva, the great bliss:
In this way the bodies of the buddhas, too,
Are renowned as Vajraḍāka.
First is Vajraḍāka,
Second is Buddhaḍāka,
Third is Ratnaḍāka,
Fourth is Padmaḍāka,
Fifth is Viśvaḍāka,
And sixth is Vajrasattva.
The five are to be known as Heruka;
The vajra hero is that very one as well.
They partake of the food of space,
And they partake of the food of recitation as well.
Their emanated enjoyment is space;
They partake of the food of the lotus;

Their various enjoyments are emanations.
Supreme and sublime of the various family,
Equal to space, stainless, utterly pure,
Cool like the very nature of snow,
Pure in color, of supreme color,
Of a color like the rays of the moon,
Three-eyed, of various good fortunes,
They sit upon seats of various lotuses,
Abiding in the center of moon and sun,
Seated in the vajra cross-legged posture.
All have crowns of matted locks,
And likewise garlands of skulls.
All are sealed with the six mudrās,
And sit well upon their own seats:
Elephant, lion, and horse,
Peacock, and garuḍa,
And upon these, seats of pretas.
If one meditates on them, they bestow accomplishment.
With the vajra hand touching the earth,
Holding vajra and bell at the hip,
The lips of the mouth are twisted.
The wheel and bell, with a swaggering air;
Likewise the jewel and bell;
The sequence of the lotus and bell;
And the bell with the crossed vajra itself.
One should meditate on all of them as haughty,
The supreme and sublime vajra of the family.
One should draw six maṇḍalas,
Each fully endowed with four doors,
Encircled by a vajra wheel,
Likewise encircled by jewel and lotus,
Encircled by a crossed vajra,
And at the center encircled by a vajra.
What is drawn as the outer maṇḍala
Is a supremely pleasing multi-storied mansion.
The six families are to be arranged,
And there the sacred sites and the rest are arranged in sequence.

What is placed at the center of the maṇḍala
Is Vajrasattva, the great bliss.
At its eastern door, in Pullīramalaya, are Khaṇḍakapāla and Pracaṇḍā. In the north, in Jālandhara, are Mahākaṅkāla and Caṇḍākṣī. In the west, in Oḍḍiyāna, are Kaṅkāla and Prabhāvatī. In the south, in Arbuda, are Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra and Mahānāsā. The center is the first ground, the Very Joyful. The heroes' bodies are black in color, and the ḍākinīs are the color of ash and of clouds. The heroes hold vajra and vajra bell, and the ḍākinīs hold skull cup and make the threatening gesture with the vajra.
At the center of Vairocana's maṇḍala is the Blessed One Buddhaḍāka, the great bliss. At the eastern door, in Godāvarī, are Suravairin and Vīramatī. In the north, in Rāmeśvara, are Amitābha and Kharvarī. In the west, in Devīkoṭa, are Vajraprabha and Laṅkeśvarī. In the south, in Mālava, are Vajradeha and Drumacchāyā. The heroes' bodies are white, and the ḍākinīs are yellow. The Stainless ground is the center, the Buddhaḍākinī.
At the center of the ground of the Luminous is Ratnaḍāka. At the eastern door, in Kāmarūpa, are Aṅkurika and Airāvatī. In the north, in Oḍra, are Vajrajaṭila and Mahābhairavā. In the west, in Triśakuni, are Mahāvīra and Vāyuvegā. In the south, in Kosala, are Vajrahūṃkāra and Surābhakṣī. The heroes are yellow, and the ḍākinīs are green.
At the center of the ground of the Radiant is Padmaḍāka. At its eastern door, in Kaliṅga, are Subhadra and Śyāmādevī. In the north, in Lampāka, are Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā. In the west, in Kāñcī, are Mahābhairava and Hayakarṇā. In the south, in Himālaya, are Virūpākṣa and Khagānanā. The heroes are red, and the ḍākinīs are white.
At the center of the ground of the Difficult to Master is Vajraḍāka. At its eastern door, in Pretapurī, are Mahābala and Cakravegā. In the north, in Gṛhadeva, are Vajraratna and Khaṇḍarohā. In the west, in Saurāṣṭra, are Hayagrīva and Śauṇḍinī. In the south, in Suvarṇadvīpa, are Ākāśagarbha and Cakravarmiṇī. The heroes are black, and the ḍākinīs are yellow.
At the center of the ground of the Manifest is Viśvaḍāka. At its eastern door, in Nagara, are Heruka and Suvīrā. In the north, in Sindhu, are Padmanarteśvara and Mahābalā. In the west, in Maru, are Vairocana and Cakravartinī. In the south, in Kulutā, are Vajrasattva and Mahāvīryā. The heroes are multicolored, and the ḍākinīs are the color of smoke.

Outside that maṇḍala,
it is encircled by a garland of hungry ghosts.
Outside that, vajras all around;
in the corners, draw the ḍākinīs as well:
Ḍākinī and Lāmā,
Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī.
Draw four skull cups in the intermediate directions.
In the intermediate directions of the central maṇḍala, Ḍākinī is the ground Gone Far,
Lāmā the ground Unmoving, Khaṇḍarohā Good Intelligence,
and Rūpiṇī the Cloud of Dharma.
They are blue, yellow, and green,
and the fourth is red in color.
The ḍākinīs Kākāsyā and the rest
are multicolored and captivating.
The ḍākinīs Yamadāhī and the rest
have the faces of Ardhanārīśvara, the Lord who is half woman.
All the heroes stand with the right leg extended,
adorned with the five mudrās,
wearing tiger skins as garments,
adorned with garlands of heads.
Clad in the directions, with hair unbound,
are the lovely families of ḍākinīs.
All are seated upon hungry ghosts.
Meditate on the supreme maṇḍala.
The wheel that rests upon a lotus
is the supreme maṇḍala of Saṃvara.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and a damaru in the right hand.
In this way the forms of the ḍākinīs
are adorned with hand emblems.
The ḍākinīs Kākāsyā and the rest
have the hook, the noose, and so on as emblems:
in the left, the khaṭvāṅga; in the right,
in their order, the noose and the chain,
and likewise the bell.
The ḍākinīs Yamadāhī and the rest

hold the mirror and the vīṇā,
scent and taste, in the right hand,
and in the left a skull cup and khaṭvāṅga.
Bestowing every accomplishment,
crowned with the diadem of their own family,
they abide upon skull cups.
Having meditated on each wheel in turn,
pervade it completely with its retinue.
Behold the wisdom being in the heart.
Through the application of all the yogas,
having seen that wheel of wisdom,
and having dissolved it through meditation,
with the wisdom of body, speech, and mind
confer empowerment, then emanate them in sequence.
oṃ āḥ baṃ hūṃ
With these, in their proper order,
perform the control of the life breath in stages.
Having emanated them evenly, bestow the empowerment.
Through the application of the proper sequence,
perform recitation and meditation without doubt.
In accordance with the secret mantra,
the one who holds the samaya should recite:
oṃ śrī mahāsukha vajrastva ḍākinī jāla sambara a hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī buddha ḍāka a la la la a ḍākinī jālasambara hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

Abiding in meditation,
recite for the whole retinue and all the rest.
Together with the six cakravartins,
recite for the ḍākas and the ḍākinīs.
Through the union of the great samaya,
the samaya become the supreme samaya;
through the union of the nondual embrace,
if one recites the secret mantra, accomplishment will come.
Certainly within six months, and not otherwise,
one gains the accomplishment of the six cakravartins.
Or else, Vajrasattva,
Vairocana, Vajrasūrya, Padmanarteśvara the king,
the lord Paramāśva, and Heruka:
the wise, having meditated on them with certainty
through the application of the sacred sites and so on,
obtain the sequence of gradual application,
the sequence of the sites of the lineage,
and the commands of the yoginīs
through the lineage of the guru.
Otherwise the mantra practitioner wanders in saṃsāra
and never sees the command.

This concludes the twenty-fourth chapter, on the command of the cakravartins of the six families, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
the path of yoga, so hard to find,
the essence of the yoginīs' practice,
in accordance with the yoga of the sacred sites:
the instantaneous mode, arising from syllables.
Instantaneously, the signs are the hand emblems;
instantaneously there is Vajrasattva,

the unsurpassed great bliss.
Entering into that, and in that very manner,
instantaneously there is Heruka, glorious and supreme,
like a stainless autumn sky,
resembling the flax flower,
eight-armed and four-faced,
terrifying, and striking utter terror.
He stands with the right leg extended,
three-eyed, the lord of the yoginīs.
His left face is white, his right face red,
and his upper face is yellow and beautiful.
The hero wears a garland of skulls,
blessed by the five buddhas.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment
and is adorned with a garland of heads.
Bhairava and Kālarātri
he stands upon, pressing them down onto a lotus with his feet.
Holding vajra and bell together, he embraces his consort,
and is entwined by the thighs of Vārāhī.
Joined in equal, nondual union,
she has unbound hair and is clad in the directions,
equal and alike in the color of her body,
wearing a girdle of ornaments made of bone pieces,
with his faces and his hand emblems,
and she grants the accomplishments of yoga.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
the Victor's hide above,
a hammer and a spear, and elsewhere
he is adorned with the head of Brahmā,
and holds the peaceful half moon.
His head is adorned with a crossed vajra,
his body with the six mudrās,
adorned with the marks of the vajra,
with a diadem of vajra garlands,
girdled with loincloths,
and with armlets marked with vajras.
In this way the chief of mantra practitioners

knows the secret mantra, the essence of the rite.
Vārāhī, abiding in bliss,
has set aside the Victor's hide;
from among the Victor's emblems and the rest,
Vārāhī is adorned with the damaru and the curved knife.
The Blessed One is at the center of the hub,
on a lovely eight-petaled lotus,
a multicolored lotus, beautiful in hue,
all pure, supreme, and sublime.
On the eastern petal and the other directions,
place the four, the Ḍākinī and the rest.
Place the Ḍākinī in the east,
and likewise Lāmā in the north;
in the west is Khaṇḍarohā,
and in the south is Rūpiṇī.
They are blue, yellow, and likewise red,
and green is the fourth.
Four-faced and eight-armed,
three-eyed, fierce, and majestic,
they sit in the half cross-legged posture,
lovely, with hair unbound,
clad in the directions, with garlands of heads,
adorned with the five mudrās.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
bell, damaru, and curved knife,
and likewise bow and arrow,
and in their hands the supreme vajra spear.
They dance with proud gestures of the hands,
intoxicated with compassion and passion.
Blue, yellow, and green,
with the upper face white;
yellow, blue, and green,
with the upper face fierce and red;
red, blue, and green,
with the upper face white and peaceful;
green, red, and blue,
with the upper face a supreme yellow.

With their feet they press down the four māras,
and with their faces they look toward the Blessed One.
In the corners are vases
filled with the nectar of wisdom,
and upon them skull cups
brimming with the milk of awakening.
Outside is the wheel of the three samayas,
with tiered chambers, beautifully adorned.
In the east is Gaurī,
and likewise Caurī in the north;
in the west is Pramohā,
and in the south is Vetālī.
In the southeast is Ghasmarī,
in the southwest Caṇḍālī,
in the northwest Ḍombī,
and in the northeast Herukī.
Thus the eight yoginīs:
Gaurī is yellow, blue, and green;
Caurī is red, blue, and green;
Pramohā is blue, yellow, and green;
Vetālī is white, blue, and green;
Ghasmarī is multicolored,
red, blue, and green;
Caṇḍālī is green, blue, and yellow;
Ḍombī is smoke-colored, blue, and green;
Herukī is blue, green, and red.
Thus all of them, too,
are three-eyed, with hair unbound,
clad in the directions, and dancing,
seated well upon seats of hungry ghosts,
adorned with the five mudrās.
They carry khaṭvāṅga, skull cup, and bell,
damaru, noose, and hook.
All are adorned with garlands of skulls
and crowned with Akṣobhya.
Thus they bestow all the accomplishments
of the pīṭhas and upapīṭhas.

Thus, in the wheel of mind,
the goddesses Gaurī and the rest
are proclaimed to be yoginīs.
Through approach they bestow their grace,
and the unobstructed result is accomplished.
Having accomplished the goddess Khecarī,
one attains the state of moving in the sky.
Outside that is the wheel of speech.
In the east is she of the vīṇā gesture,
in the north she of the flute gesture,
in the west she of the great drum gesture,
and in the south she of the drum gesture.
They are blue, yellow, red, and green.
In the southeast and the other corners are Vajrahāsā, Vajralāsyā, Vajragītā,
and Vajranṛtyā; they are red,
blue, yellow, and green.
They are one-faced and four-armed,
naked, with hair unbound,
wearing garlands of skulls,
three-eyed and lovely.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
with gestures of the hands,
with the gesture of vajra and bell,
and, holding the wrists level,
with the gesture of turning the lotus.
They are the kṣetras and the upakṣetras,
the chandos and the chandohas,
and they are crowned with Amitābha.
In the east of the wheel of body
is Puṣpā, in the north Dhūpā,
in the west Dīpā, and in the south Gandhā;
they are yellow, smoke-colored, red, and white.
Ādarśā, Rasā, Sparśā, and Dharmā
are in the southeast and the other corners,
moon-colored, red, green, and white.
They are three-eyed,

naked, with hair unbound,
dancing all about with their feet,
bearing offerings in their hands,
holding skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
and carrying a damaru in the hand,
wearing garlands of skulls.
These goddesses are the melāpakas,
the upamelāpakas, the charnel grounds,
and the lesser charnel grounds,
and they are crowned with Vairocana.
At the gates are Vajrāṅkuśī, Vajrapāśī, Vajrasphoṭā,
and likewise Vajraghaṇṭā,
blue, green, red, and yellow,
in the east, the north, the west,
and likewise in the southern direction.

In the southeast and the other intermediate directions
are Yamadāhī and the others,
red, blue, smoke-colored, and yellow.
Skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
their own emblems, and damaru,
curved knife, and a head they hold.
Three-eyed, with hair unbound,
naked, they abide in a dancing posture.
All are adorned with the five mudrās,
wear garlands of skulls,
bear the crest of their own family,
and abide in their proper order.
In their hearts is the wisdom being.
The three wheels of body, speech, and mind:
one should meditate on the lord of the chief,
white, red, and blue,
the heroes together with the yoginīs.
When one has meditated in this way,
then, from the meditation as taught,
with the hooks of wisdom

summon the wheel of wisdom,
make offerings and confer empowerment in due order,
gather them into one and dissolve them.
Having meditated on the sequence just as it is,
perform the wisdom recitation as well.
Through emanating and gathering, through breath control,
done in the sequence of sending out and drawing in,
the master should recite:
oṃ āḥ hūṃ hūṃ
By a sequence such as this,
having done it countless times,
for as long as one does not grow weary,
rest the samaya wheel above in equipoise and recite.
Taking up a rosary of great conch,
perform the recitation of supreme Saṃvara:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kṣmāṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ ḍākinī jāla sambaraṃ svāhā oṃ vajra vārāhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ lāme huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ khaṇḍarohe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ rūpiṇi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ huṃ gauri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ cauri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vettāli huṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ pukkasi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ caṇḍāli huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ghasmari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ herukasananibhe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra vīne huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra vaṃśe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra mṛdaṃhe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra murje huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra hāsyai huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra lāsyai huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra vīte huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra nṛtye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra puṣpe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra dhūve huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra dīpe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra gandhe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ rūva vajri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ rasa vajri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ sparśa vajri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ dharma dhūtu vajri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra aṃkuśa jaḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra pāśa hūṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra spoṭa vaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra āveśa hoḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadāḍhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadūti huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamadaṃṣṭi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ yamamathani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
The one who holds the samaya, with pure words,
should always recite with a devoted mind.
Endowed with the union of the inner self,
having the nature of wisdom and means,
one's own means and the body of the vidyā,
the self that is equal and nondual,

by emanating hosts of wrathful emanations,
and making the three worlds, together with all in them,
into Heruka,
and gathering all of the three worlds without remainder into that,
one abides in body, speech, and mind.
This is the rite of yoga,
the recitation of the meditation on the wheels.
Through the yoga of one's own deity,
when one sees the moving and the unmoving,
at the time when the holder of samaya rises,
all the tathāgatas,
the heroes and the yoginīs,
the ḍākas and the ḍākinīs,
should all be supplicated.
Arising from the enjoyment of the wrathful one's delight in bliss,
having been attended by Pramohā,
one enters into the union of bliss:
ra ma he nad ṭa na su ra ā ma hā su hu ba ra jo i ni ka ma la su hu a la la hoḥ su ra a utta ma ma hūṃ ma hā sijja u ma jo i ni ja la ma ho ā ī a ā ra ho a ru he byi nu su ba ya nā ha su ra a su hu de hi bar ṭā i ni jā la su hu bi sa pha na ta ro ṇa ṇa pa de hi ma hā su hū majja mu hū mo kṣu pa la kkha u tu tu sa hū ṇa i su hū bajji u mo khu su hū i na i du khe la tha i mo khu su hū ba sa i paṃ ka u majja ta nu na ba rā a pa da traṃ bhu ja ta nu muñja ma hā su hū i la da ra pā ya u ma hū a ra bī a gi a paṃ u ra su Having urged the protector with this,
the accomplishment of the maṇḍala is certain.
By singing the song of the king of spring
in a sweet and gentle voice,
the stainless nets of ḍākinīs
look on and perform every action.
Through the union of the lovely vajra and lotus every accomplishment is achieved.
If one urges them with this delight,
they bestow great bliss.
At the times of union,

the vajra holder should join completely.
At the beginning, in the middle, and at the end,
recite the secret mantra of a hundred syllables.
Having made the wheels stable,
the heroes and the ḍākinīs,
this is the secret mantra of them all,
of the wrathful ones, the buddhas, and the tathāgatas.
Having made them all stable in the heart,
through meditation all become stable.
If one desires accomplishment for oneself,
all accomplishments abide in it:
oṃ vajra heruka samaya manupālaya vajra heruka tvenopatiṣṭha drīḍho me bhava sutoṣyo me bhava anurakto me bhava supoṣyo me bhava sarva siddhiṃ me prayaccha sarva karma suca me cittaṃ śriyaḥ kuru hūṃ ha ha ha hoḥ bhagavāna vajra heruka māme muñca heruka bhava mahā samaya satva aḥ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
Through this the Blessed One pervades all.
The supreme hundred syllables
are supreme Heruka himself.
Whatever is its reversal,
arranged upon sixteen petals,
and all the maṇḍalas that have been taught,
I should meditate upon and make stable.
Through the yoga of one's own deity,
one should abide in bliss just as one wishes.
If one meditates on a yoga such as this,
the three realms too will be seen.
Oneself has the defining mark of the hero,
and thus existence too is empty.
Through meditation one truly abides as oneself.
Here no austerities are taught;
there is no rosary, and no mantra either;
no dhāraṇīs, no rites of fire offering,
and no basis in a sequence of ritual;
no performing of yoga mudrās,
and no sequence of the stance with the right leg extended.
Holding the actual great vajra,

performing every self-arisen accomplishment,
one does not even bring about cessation.
One should worship oneself by oneself.
The full maṇḍala of the moon,
meditate upon it at the center of the navel.

The syllable that has become the supreme site,
meditated upon as the form of the deity,
one should imagine at its center.
Uniting body, speech, and mind,
it has passed beyond the body,
and even the entity of mind cannot be found by searching.
There is no passion and no freedom from passion;
yet it is endowed with dispassion.
At the center of the lotus of the heart,
what is well found through examination
is where the mind comes to rest.
All the yoginīs are women;
they are declared to be the supreme mudrā.
Upon the moon, adorned with the fifty letters,
the contemplation of the wisdom mind
is supreme; there is nothing else to practice.
Through the path of the guru's instructions
and the mind's supreme effort,
this state of peace,
which the many in the world do not realize,
once union and separation from union have been made,
is pervaded by the single state.
Thus the fruit of awakening is hard to find:
first it arises from the syllables of the vowels, and in no other way.
The intellect of those with wrong views, following the treatises of evil non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), is fruitless, like a eunuch, like a blind man's insight into forms.

This concludes the twenty-fifth chapter, on the sequence of the sites of body, speech, and mind, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high.

Then I shall explain the practice.
Buddhakapāla, supreme and sublime:

this practice is supreme among all practices,
bestowing every accomplishment.
The secret should be well concealed
and not shown to anyone at all.
That reality, held as the supreme meditation,
abides in the heart of the yoginī.
The secret should be firmly concealed,
and one should meditate on the guru's words.
In a lovely charnel ground site,
the practitioner, with certainty and firmness,
through the practice of the generation stage,
the sequence of the grounds and the sites,
at the center of the vajra hub
should meditate on the syllable hūṃ.
Through that, oneself becomes in particular Buddhakapāla, the supreme,
without location, peaceful and pure,
free of all conceptual thought,
self-arisen from the vowels and consonants,
nondual and supremely peaceful,
two-armed and one-faced,
adorned with the six mudrās,
the color of jambu gold, pervading evenly,
massed all about with garlands of light rays,
with a diadem of skull garlands,
three-eyed, with a laughing face.
He is the meditation of all beings,
the nondual Dharma, unsurpassed.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
with a human skin stretched above.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
his right hand in the mudrā of fearlessness.
Crowned with the five buddhas,
he is adorned with a garland of heads.
In his left hand is a skull cup
brimming with marrow,
mixed, for the benefit of all beings,

with the five ambrosias of wisdom.
The khaṭvāṅga is the yoga of the deity;
the skull cup is the heroes and yoginīs;
the fearlessness of the right hand is purity:
freed from all fears, fearless.
All that is vicious and terrifying, without exception,
he presses down here with his feet,
and he removes every fear caused by the vicious.
He holds the peaceful half moon,
his head is marked with a crossed vajra,
his forehead is beautified by a vajra garland,
and he wears lovely anklets and ornaments.
Rising from the center of the hub
of a multicolored eight-petaled lotus,
he presses down with his feet Bhairava and Kālarātri,
passion and aversion.
That wisdom being, possessed of form,
one should meditate upon as arising from the syllable hūṃ.
In the heart of the wheel of mind
one should meditate upon Heruka.
The wheel of speech one should meditate upon at the mouth,
and the wheel of body as before.
Blue, red, and white,
six-armed and three-faced,
he holds vajra and bell together,
three-eyed, with transfigured faces.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and carries a trident and a skull.
Fully united with the body of his own vidyā,
he abides in the state of great bliss.
At the centers of the four maṇḍalas,
arising from the three syllables and the rest,
with diadems of skull garlands,
endowed with their own supreme emblems,
applying the sequence of the sites and the rest,
supreme and sublime among the three vows,
the Ḍākinī and Lāmā,

Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī,
should be placed at the sites of the lotus's directions.
The four skull cups are supreme.
The Ḍākinī is yellow in color,
Lāmā the color of the palāśa flower,
Khaṇḍarohā is blue,
and Rūpiṇī is red and blazing.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
the right hand in the supreme gesture of fearlessness.
At the gates are four goddesses,
the ḍākinīs Kākāsyā and the rest,
blue, yellow, and likewise red,
and green, wrathful in form.

In the intermediate directions are Yamadāhī and the others,
fierce and utterly terrifying.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
and likewise the supreme gesture of fearlessness,
the damaru and the curved knife.
They are seated upon the four māras,
three-eyed, with hair unbound,
wearing the supreme garment of the directions,
with diadems of skull garlands,
adorned with the five mudrās.
Mirror, taste, scent,
and touch are the four offerings.
Through the sequence of the ten grounds
and the union of body, speech, and mind,
all phenomena, outer and inner,
are the purity of the factors of awakening.
The twenty-four beginning with ka,
pressed at the top with the bindu,
each consonant joined with two hūṃ,
and with phaṭ joined at the end:
these are the secret mantras of all the heroes,
which grant every desired result.
The consonant with the name of the ḍākinī,

and at the end hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ:
in this way the ḍākinī Pracaṇḍā and the others,
the very reality of mantra, grant bliss.
The vajra of body, speech, and mind is hūṃ āḥ oṃ.
This is utterly secret.
For the ḍākinīs on the lotus petals,
the consonants together with the neuter letters,
with hūṃ as the second,
and at the end the wise join phaṭ.
The secret mantras of Kākāsyā and the others are ya ra la va
together with the consonants,
and at the end one joins hūṃ and phaṭ.
For Yamadāhī and the others,
śa ṣa sa ha
with the consonants, two hūṃ,
and likewise phaṭ should be joined.
At the center, likewise, one recollects
the secret mantra of Buddhakapāla:
oṃ aṃ āṃ iṃ īṃ uṃ uṃ e ai aṃ eḥ ṣa svāhā
On the elements, aggregates, and sense bases
one should apply the armor.
The wheel of wisdom and the samaya wheel
should be worshiped with equal taste.
The secret mantras of the four offering goddesses
are made from each one's own name, its consonant, and hūṃ,
and in this way joined to the maṇḍalas.
Arising from Buddhakapāla,
wearing vajra ornaments,
all should be joined in their proper order.
Fully joining them in sending out and drawing in,
one should recite the four secret ones.
Through the practice of emanating and gathering,
the sequences of the three wheels:
here, through the practice of the rite,
having joined them at the four times,

one should perform the recitation of the samaya wheel.
The supreme samaya becomes accomplishment.
Of all the secret mantras of the samaya holder,
Buddhakapāla is supreme.
Through the practice outside meditative equipoise,
one should examine everything thoroughly in this way.
The samaya should always be guarded,
and the five ambrosias of wisdom are supreme.
Or else one should recite one's own name;
one should recite the very reality of mantra:
oṃ śrī buddha kapāli bruṃ āḥ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambaraṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
This is the lovely and supreme practice,
the supreme wisdom of the yoginīs.
Wherever the samaya has been broken,
this practice should be given.
When it has been pacified, one should also confer
the unsurpassed empowerment of the yoginīs.
At the four times, in sequence,
one should bathe with outer and inner water.
Or else one should take the samaya vows
and supplicate the guru:
"I am ignorant and deluded;
I have contravened and broken the samaya.
Guru, protector, grant me refuge!
Lord, holder of the vajra,
you whose nature is great compassion,
I go for refuge to the lord of beings."
Having done this without hesitation,
one will certainly become accomplished.

This concludes the twenty-sixth chapter, on restoring the samaya and the generation of Buddhakapāla, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
the secret reality, so hard to find:
the generation of all the secret mantras,
the abodes of beings and the beings themselves.

All the yoginīs and heroes
are the supreme abode of the buddhas,
inexhaustible, nondual, and utterly pure,
stainless at the beginning, middle, and end.
Arising from the wisdom of a
is Vajrasattva, the great bliss,
three-faced, six-armed, and peaceful,
three-eyed, with the mood of compassion,
perfectly endowed with the great mudrā,
pure in nature and without stain.
His head is adorned with matted locks and a half moon,
his head is marked with a crossed vajra,
he has a diadem of skull garlands,
and is adorned with the five buddhas.
He sits in the cross-legged posture of the sattva,
adorned with the six mudrās.
He holds vajra and bell together,
carries in his hands a sword and a hook,
and holds a beautiful jeweled noose.
He bestows every accomplishment.
His faces are white, blue, and red,
the supreme abode of the three gates of liberation.
The wisdom being is in his heart,
and one should also meditate on the supreme of the three wheels.
From hūṃ comes the wheel of mind,
and its hand emblems are blue;
from āḥ comes the wheel of speech,
and its hand emblems are red;
from oṃ comes the wheel of body,
and its hand emblems are white.
Heroes and yoginīs are joined in equal union,
body, speech, and mind without stain.
From raṃ comes the great mudrā;
one should imagine her at the center of the navel.
From i comes the bhaga, the lotus,
the stainless moon of awakening.
One should imagine u in the heart,

place e upon the head,
place ai at the crown,
and place o in the eyes.
Having made aṃ into armor,
a is the weapon in front.

From ḷ comes the goddess Locanā;
from ṛ comes Samayatārā;
from ḹ comes the goddess Pāṇḍaravāsinī;
from ṝ truly arises the Jewel goddess.
Jewel Lamp and Wisdom Lamp,
white, and the color of the palāśa flower,
red, and the color of the gold of the Jambū River,
they are three-faced and six-armed,
three-eyed, intoxicated with delight,
all of them clad in the directions,
joined in union with their own skillful means.
Wheel and crossed vajra,
red lotus and jewel,
vajra and bell held together,
they bestow every desire.
They hold sword, arrow, and hook,
and hold the bow drawn back;
all the marks are complete in them.
Crowned with skulls,
in the center of a multicolored lotus,
they sit in the posture of the sattva.
These are to be placed at the gates;
in the center is the moon seat of the lord;
at the corners are the four kinds of offering goddesses,
clad in the directions, their hair let loose,
three-faced and six-armed,
three-eyed, wearing garlands of skulls.
With mirror and lute,
bell, conch, and elixir,
they make offering with their hands of a drink of liquor.
In other respects they are just like their lord,

complete with all ornaments,
seated gracefully in the half-crossed posture,
with their hands cupped together,
holding offerings in their hands.
Through a rite such as this comes omniscience.
The stainless reality of the vowels,
the supreme secret so hard to find,
has been taught by Vajrasattva.
The rites of the reality of mantra
are perfectly joined to body, speech, and mind.

oṃ śrī mahā sukha vajra satva āḥ
ā hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambaraṃ svāhā
oṃ siddha locani ḷ āḥ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ samaya tāte tuttare ture ṛ āḥ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ ratna jālini ṝ āḥ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ rūpa vajri bhruṃ
oṃ śabha vajri hūṃ
oṃ rasa vajri hrīḥ

The omniscient one, the supreme lord,
one should meditate upon as dwelling in the center of the bhaga.
The vowels, the vajra, the great secret,
abide in the heart of all sentient beings.
That by which all things are secret,
its secret has now been explained.
The yogin, at the four times,
should engage in recitation and meditation.
Having abandoned all doubt,
the great being, firm in diligence,
having seen the wheel of wisdom,
the one bound by samaya makes offering and confers empowerment.
Having dissolved them into one,
through the practice of emanation and absorption,
the three realms without exception
all become like Vajradhara.
Past, present,
and future, the three times:

thus in the beings of the three times
abides the state of Vajrasattva.
The pure self of innate joy
is the supreme, without beginning.

This is the twenty-seventh chapter, on the generation of Vajrasattva, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the higher of the higher.

Next, the supreme rite is explained,
the practice of Mañjuvajra.
Arisen from the wisdom of maṃ,
Mañjuvajra, great bliss,
has six faces and six arms and is peaceful,
his body a stainless white,
three-eyed, seated in the vajra posture,
adorned with the six blazing mudrās,
crowned with Akṣobhya,
adorned with a garland of skulls,
bearing a peaceful half moon,
his matted locks bound up in a topknot.
White, blue, and saffron,
yellow and green likewise;
the upper face is peaceful,
bestowing the fruit of the deity's accomplishment.
Holding vajra and bell together,
holding sword and book,
and utpala lotus and hook,
he should be visualized with a body of wisdom.
The essence of body, speech, and mind
should be visualized in the center of the wheel.
Through the placement at the sites explained before,
just as for Vajrasattva,
one should call to mind this secret mantra.
The secret of Mañjuvajra
is the three secrets, endowed with wisdom and samaya,
the union of heroes and yoginīs.

oṃ śrī mahā sukha mañju vajra a maṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara svāhā

Having empowered oneself,
the one of great discipline should recite the secret mantra.
Having emanated the wheel of the three secrets,
one should gather in the three realms.
This is supremely secret;
it should not be shown to anyone at all.

This is the twenty-eighth chapter, on the practice of Mañjuvajra, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the higher of the higher.

Next, something further is to be explained:
the practice of the nine-syllable one.
Arisen from the wisdom of kṣa,
the devourer of all the wicked,
the devourer who devours the ḍākas,
who devours concepts and brings them to an end,
arisen from emptiness equal to space,
devourer of the enjoyments of space,
with six faces and twelve arms,
three-eyed, his faces contorted,
he stands with his right leg extended,
devouring the wicked māras.
Bhairava and Bhairavī
he holds pressed face down beneath his feet.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
adorned with a garland of heads,
with a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
made beautiful by a half moon,
his matted locks held down by a crossed vajra,
his body adorned with the six mudrās,
the fangs of his mouths bared,
terrifying, utterly and greatly terrifying.
Blue, smoky, green,
red, and the fifth is yellow.

The sixth is the head of a donkey;
the upper face is utterly terrifying,
the color of ash and of clouds,
utterly destroying all the wicked.
Holding vajra and bell together,

he enjoys the enjoyment of delight.
In his lap is Vajravārāhī,
of his color, her upper face the head of a sow,
joined with him in nondual union,
her hair let loose and clad in the directions,
her two thighs entwined about him,
intoxicated with the passion of compassion.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and wears the skin of Brahmā;
a vajra spear and a ḍamaru drum,
a curved knife, a noose, and a head,
and brandishes a sword in his hand,
fierce, destroying all the wicked.
In his heart is the wisdom ḍāka,
pervaded throughout by Kākāsyā and the others.
In the center of the eight-petaled wheel,
going around from left to right,
in the charnel grounds and the secondary charnel grounds,
one should place the supreme ḍākinīs.

yaṃ raṃ laṃ vaṃ śaṃ ṣaṃ saṃ haṃ

One places the ḍākinīs of the wheel of wisdom.
Having meditated for seven days,
in a sequence of four sessions each,
by meditating at a riverbank or in a charnel ground
one will surely gain accomplishment.
Stealing away and killing,
whatever action one wishes, wherever it may be,
is accomplished by the wheel of the ḍākinīs;
in this action there is no doubt or hesitation.
Blue, the color of the palāśa flower,
red, and the fourth yellow:
these are the four, Yamadāhī and the others,
with beautiful faces of various colors.
Red, blue, and smoky,
and the white face supremely beautiful,
all of their faces three-eyed,

their hair let loose, clad in the directions.
Kākāsyā, with her left and right faces,
and Ulūkāsyā's faces likewise;
the third has the face of a dog,
the fourth the face of a sow.
Their left and right faces
have the forms of fierce goddesses, according to the rite.
The faces of Yamadāhī and the others,
both left and right, are likewise:
the thukri, the camel, the horse,
the lion, the goat, the elephant, the buffalo,
and also the face of a bear;
all should be made alike.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
carry noose and hook in their hands,
bell, ḍamaru, and curved knife,
wear a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
are adorned with the five mudrās,
and dance upon seats of pretas.
Short in stature, with long sexual organs,
their faces with fangs bared,
they are intoxicated with the taste of compassion.
The secret of body, speech, and mind
should be meditated upon and thoroughly cultivated.

hūṃ ā oṃ

This is explained as the secret:
in the center of the vajra, the lotus, the wheel,
the wisdom ḍāka in the heart,
and the wheel of the syllables of the ḍākas.
Having seen that wheel of wisdom,
one should worship it and visualize it dissolving.
Having settled in equipoise, the syllables,
the secret mantra, should be recited with the breath and its control.
Having made one's own offering of scattering and drinking,
one should emanate the wisdom of the three secrets.

oṃ śrī kṣa ḍākinī jāla sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

At the beginning the consonant, the name, and hūṃ;
at the end it is joined with phaṭ.
As taught by the Ḍāka Moon,
it bestows every desired fruit.
These supreme ones are secret;
they should not be given to anyone at all.
Within seven days one gains mastery:
if one meditates one-pointedly,
the accomplishment of the ḍākinīs of the secret of the three wheels will swiftly be attained.

This is the twenty-ninth chapter, on the practice of the Kṣa Ḍāka, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the higher of the higher.

Next, what is to be explained as supreme is the practice of the Āli Ḍāka.
Arisen from the wisdom of the vowels,
the Āli Ḍāka, supreme and sublime,
has eight faces and sixteen arms,
three-eyed, fearsome, utterly fearsome,
the fangs of his mouths bared.
He stands with his right leg extended,
a half moon binding his matted locks,
adorned with a garland of skulls,
his crown held down by a crossed vajra,
a vajra garland upon his forehead.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
his body adorned with the six mudrās.
Conceptuality, which is Bhairava himself,
and craving and jealousy, which are Kālarātri herself,
he presses down beneath his feet.
Taming all who are hard to tame,
wearing a garland of the heads of obstructors,
of various colors and gracefully beautiful,
white in color, slender-waisted,
blazing with divine splendor.
Blue, yellow, and smoky:
so too are the faces on the right.
Green, red, and pale yellow:

the faces on the left are also beautiful in their variety.
The upper face, ash-gray, the color of clouds, and peaceful,
gazes with passion and ardent desire.
The taste of compassion is perfectly complete in him,
his body swaying and seductive.
The body of the Āli Ḍākinī
is two-armed and naked,
her head adorned with a garland of skulls,
intoxicated, with her hair let loose,
with three black and terrifying eyes,
of his color, and full-bodied.
Her two thighs entwine him well;
she abides in nondual union.
He holds vajra and bell
and squeezes the breasts of the goddess.
Just as with the mudrā of the ḍāka,
so the ḍākinī too should be joined.
Two of his arms are extended,
and he wears the skin of Viṣṇu.
He holds skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
bears sword and skull cup,
trident and ḍamaru,
axe and hook likewise,
noose and the head of Brahmā,
curved knife and wheel.
In his heart is a twelve-spoked
king of wheels, beautifully adorned.
In the center of its hub
one should visualize the wisdom ḍāka,
with his color, faces, posture,
arms, and mudrās the same.

In the east is the vajra ḍākinī called Supreme Samaya, who arises from the family of the syllable ī. In the north abides the ḍākinī called Supreme Variety, arisen from the syllable ī. In the west is the ḍākinī called Supreme Space, who should be joined with the syllable e. In the south the ḍākinī called Supreme Place abides perfectly, arisen from the syllable ai. In the intermediate directions, beginning with the direction of fire, the four ḍākinīs should be placed. First, the ḍākinī called Supreme Greatness should be joined with the syllable ū. In the quarter of Nairṛti, the ḍākinī called Supreme Fierce One should be joined with the syllable ū. In the direction of the wind, the ḍākinī called Supreme Hero should be joined with the syllable o. In the quarter of Īśāna, the ḍākinī called Supreme Wrath should be joined with the syllable au.

Likewise here, in the four intermediate directions, they are placed in the quarters beginning with Īśāna: from the syllable raṃ the ḍākinī called Supreme Accomplishment; from the syllable ḷ the ḍākinī called Supreme Charnel Ground; from the syllable ṝ the ḍākinī called Supreme Yoga; and from the syllable Ḭ the ḍākinī called Supreme Ferocity.

The ḍākinīs, all of them together,
are the twelve links made pure.
They have three faces and six arms,
all three-eyed and contorted,
their bodies white; and for all of them
the two faces, blue and green, in nondual bliss,
the faces on the left and on the right,
the wise should visualize.
Clad in the directions and dancing,
their hair let loose, utterly terrifying,
they hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
ḍamaru and the supreme curved knife,
spear and head; all of them
are of various colors and bear hand emblems.
Seated upon the heads of corpses,
they are complete in the taste of compassion.
They bear the five mudrās,
all adorned with garlands of skulls,
and wear garlands of heads,
all of them crying a la la.
oṃ is the vajra of mind,
āḥ becomes speech,
a is the vajra of body,
in the center of the vajra, the lotus, the wheel.
This is supremely secret,
the supreme practice of the yoginīs,

spoken by Vajrasattva
at the request of Vajragarbha.
The ḍākinīs of the wheel of the maṇḍala,
with their retinues and all the rest, should be placed.
Having seen that wheel of wisdom,
one should meditate as well on the single taste of phenomena.
Through the practice of wisdom recitation,
one should make the scattering-and-drinking offering with one's own mantra.
Joined with the inner self,
one emanates together with the host of the supreme wheel,
and when that supreme one is seen, gathers it back again.
The twelve supreme and sublime links
are the twelve grounds themselves;
the vajra ground is the thirteenth.
The Very Joyful and the Stainless,
the Luminous and the Radiant,
the Hard to Master and the Manifest,
the Gone Far and the Immovable,
Excellent Intelligence and the Cloud of Dharma,
the Formless and the One Possessed of Wisdom:
thus, upon the twelve grounds,
the goddesses of the wheel should be placed.

In the center is the ground of Vajrasattva, called Great Delight, Supreme Bliss.

For the mantras of all the retinue and the rest,
make the name, the consonant, and hūṃ,
and join phaṭ at their end.
With the lord of mantras, the secret mantra,
one places one's own seed in one's own heart
and joins it with body, speech, and mind.
Having seen this wheel of wisdom,
one should gather it into one and worship it.
I, both outwardly and inwardly,
settled in equipoise, recite in silence.
Having made one's own scattering-and-drinking offering,
the intelligent one should recite with control of the breath.

oṃ śrī āli ḍāka a a aṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambar hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

All of existence, entirely and without remainder,
has the nature of no entity whatsoever:
the essence of mantra, shape, and dharma,
the very essence of union.
Since the realm of beings abides in its portions,
through the yoga of one's own deity
one should unite oneself and make offering.
Even with a mind not set in equipoise,
one should meditate and thoroughly cultivate it.
Mantra, shape, and the nature of reality:
the single taste of phenomena is emptiness.
Phenomena are selflessness itself;
upon phenomena without intrinsic nature
one should reflect again and again.

This is the thirtieth chapter, the practice of the Āli Ḍāka, the secret of the great secret, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the higher of the higher.

Next, the practice is to be explained
of the supreme Lord of Various Dances,
supreme over all, the great yoga,
who well bestows the great accomplishment.
Through the practice of the generation stage
one should meditate and thoroughly cultivate it.
In the center of a sun disk,
from siṃ oṃ dvaṃ a vajra arises.
That, transformed completely, is oneself,
become the supreme Ḍāka of the Consonants,
the Lord of Variety, of various colors,
supreme and sublime among all the families,
with six faces and twelve arms,
three-eyed, with a quaking sound,
holding a peaceful half moon,
adorned with a garland of skulls,
bearing a crossed vajra upon his head,
his matted locks bound at the crown,
his body marked with the six mudrās,
adorned with divine ornaments.
The ill-fated non-Buddhists (tīrthikas)

he presses beneath his lotus feet;
the succession of the five views
he presses beneath his extended right leg.
His feet dance in the half-crossed posture,
and he is adorned with six legs.
He wears the skin of Viṣṇu,
adorned with a garland of heads,
and is embraced by the vajra goddess,
naked, with apron and girdle,
her hair let loose, three-eyed,
pressing lip upon lip,
vajra and bell entwined together,
pressing the place of the limb of awakening,
her two thighs entwined about him,
blissful with the taste of compassionate passion.
The limbs of the skin of Brahmā
he holds stretched out with two hands.
He bears skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
holds the head of Maheśvara (Śiva),
trident and sword,
and carries ḍamaru, noose, and hook.
White, blue, and green,
yellow, smoky, and saffron.
On the left and right sides,
at Pīlava and Upapīlava,
the two ḍākinīs should be joined.
The vajra ḍākinī
called Supreme Dharma
arises perfectly from the syllable ṇi;
she should be placed on the left side.
Arisen with certainty from the syllable si,
the vajra ḍākinī
called Supreme Ocean
is of various colors, with various faces,
three-eyed, her countenance contorted,
standing in the half-crossed posture,
her feet dancing.

She has five faces and ten arms,
three-eyed, fierce, and terrifying;
Bhairava and Kālarātri
she holds pressed beneath her feet.
Her throats are six and four;
she is adorned with the five mudrās,
clad in the directions, her hair let loose,
with a girdle made of a garland of skulls,
with anklets tinkling with little bells,
adorned with a garland of skulls.
In the center of the moon disk
is the supreme and sublime embrace.
Brandishing the vajra, with the threatening forefinger,
they are adorned in nonduality.
Adorned with the nondual skull cup,
they carry noose and hook in their hands,
skull cup and the supreme curved knife,
wearing the crown ornament of body, speech, and mind,
and bestowing every accomplishment.
With the wisdom ḍākinī in the center,
one should meditate as well on the method of the three wheels.
The wisdom ḍāka of oṃ
is in the center of the wheel of mind;
the ḍākas of body, speech, and mind,
these one should visualize in one's own heart.
Through the sequence of practice explained before,
the succession of the sites and the rest,
one should imagine and visualize them there
and emanate the three in their sequence.
Thereby comes nondual accomplishment;
one should meditate together with the ḍākinī.
Having meditated on the tastes of the wheel of wisdom, one should recite the secret mantra.

oṃ śrī praṇa bod ḍāka ā ā oṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara oṃ svāhā
oṃ hriṃ dharma uttame mahā vajra ḍākinīye dvaṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ sīṃ sāgar uttame mahā vajra ḍākiniya sīṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

When one recites the wisdom of the three secrets,
one should recite the heroes and ḍākinīs:
the consonant, one's own name, and hūṃ twice,
and at the end it should be joined with phaṭ.
Having meditated on the wheel of the three secrets,
having gathered the three and meditated on them,
through the practice of the samaya of the three secrets
one should meditate in the center of the bhaga.
The stainless moon of awakening,
the wheel of mind, the three nādas:
the lords are three,
three ḍākinīs and three ḍākas,
who gather in and who generate.
Vajravārāhī in the bhaga
one should visualize as the three secrets.
Through the practice of meditating on reality,
therefore, having abandoned pride,
through practice at the four times,
one should meditate and recite in this way.
One should always guard the samaya.
What arises from the various milks,
the great brahmin, honey, and butter,
together with mahā māṅsa,
consecrated with the three realities,
one should partake of as food.
Without bustle and without craving,
with no retinue to look after,
enjoying through what is not enjoyment,
one eats the deathless food
and relies also on the five qualities of desire.
Eating the food that is no enjoyment,
one drinks the meditation of yogic meditation,
and otherwise drinks nothing at all.
Joined with the inner self,
having blessed oneself:
the Blessed Ḍāka is Pīlava,
the yoginī is Upapīlava;
method is called Pīlava,

wisdom is Upapīlava;
the outskirts of a city are Pīlava,
the outskirts of a village Upapīlava;
the union of moon and sun
is Pīlava and Upapīlava;
the instantaneous union is Pīlava,
and joy is Upapīlava.
Endowed with many powers,
one is accomplished in this very life.
All the paśu are to be eaten,
and the food offerings for the deities are likewise to be prepared.
When heroes and ḍākinīs have gathered,
having assembled at a fitting time,
with song and dance and food,
one should worship with the supreme gathering.
Having abandoned all conceptual thought,
one practices the conduct of samaya.

This is the thirty-first chapter, teaching the signs of the practice of the Ḍāka of the Consonants, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the higher of the higher.

Next, something further is to be explained:
the sequence of practice for accomplishment,
the union of ḍākinī and ḍāka.
It is the binding (saṃvara) of the supreme samaya,
the binding of all phenomena,
the great bliss of the ḍākinīs,
abiding in the center of the vajra of the sphere of space,
the supreme and sublime samaya maṇḍala.
In its center is a great wheel
adorned with five maṇḍalas,
and in the center a beautiful sun seat,
endowed equally with vowels and consonants,
possessing the thirty-two major marks,
adorned with the eighty excellent minor marks.
Having performed the blessing,
one generates him from one's own seed:
arisen perfectly from the syllable hi,

utterly terrifying like the fire at the end of time,
the fangs of his mouths bared,
three-eyed, his faces with lolling tongues,
he presses all the wicked beneath his feet,
with wrathful and laughing faces,
raging even at the end of the eon,
with a crown ornament of matted locks.
He stands with his right leg extended,
adorned with a garland of heads;
with the skin of Mahābhairava
a girdle is bound about his waist.
With a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
he bears a crossed vajra and a half moon,
and on his forehead a vajra garland.
Seeing the wrathful one, one should contemplate him.
He crushes even all the gods,
holds the observance of the skeleton-bearer,
is the supreme reviver of the dead,
and surely subdues all the wicked.
His body is adorned with the six mudrās,
decked with various ornaments;
he is six-armed and five-faced,
possessing the supreme essence of the various tastes.
Blue and yellow, and likewise red,
green, and the white one peaceful.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he embraces the body of Vārāhī.
He holds the skin of the Great God (Śiva),
stretched out in the manner of a canopy;
he holds skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
and in the sixth hand a ḍamaru.
With his left foot he presses down Kālarātri,
and with his right, Bhairava;
pressing them down beneath his feet,
he makes them stupefied and utterly intoxicated.
Vajravārāhī, of his color,
her hair let loose and naked,

with a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
and a girdle of ornaments made of pieces,
her two thighs entwined well about him,
embraces him at the neck, intoxicated.
She bears his emblems and mudrās,
and holds the curved knife and the supreme ḍamaru,
and in the sixth hand the head of Brahmā.
Vajraḍāka, in this form,
the wise one should place in the center of the grid.
In the east is Buddha Ḍāka,
in the north is Karma Ḍāka,
in the west is Padma Ḍāka,
in the south is Ratna Ḍāka:
white and blue and red,
green and yellow.

Holding wheel and bell together,
he stands with his right leg extended.
Green, yellow, red, blue,
and white, the upper face gazing upward;
with bell and crossed vajra he embraces great bliss,
standing in the posture with the right leg extended.
Red, blue, yellow, and green,
and white likewise:
with lotus and bell he is in union,
squeezing the breasts of the goddess.
Yellow, blue, and likewise red,
green, and the color white:
with jewel and bell he is in union,
standing with his right leg extended.
These are the five ḍākas,
and they are also the five saṃvaras.
In the four quarters of Fire, Nairṛti, Wind, and Īśāna are Buddha Ḍākinī, Karma Ḍākinī, Padma Ḍākinī, and Ratna Ḍākinī,
three-faced and six-armed,

three-eyed, their hair let loose,
adorned with garlands of skulls,
complete with all ornaments,
adorned with the five mudrās,
clad in the directions, supreme in dance,
adorned with garlands of heads.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
are adorned with vajra, arrow, and the rest,
noose and hook beautiful in their hands.
Granting every desire,
perfectly complete in the taste of compassion,
intoxicated with the longing of compassion,
with slightly bashful sidelong glances,
they are blissful, bestowing delight.
Thus by many and various ones
the maṇḍalas are pervaded throughout:
Bahurūpā and Lovely Form,
Vajra Lip and Light Maker,
Horse Face and Fierce Face,
Vajra Fierce Lady and the Renowned One, Vajradūtī and Vajranakhī,
and Vajrakumārī likewise,
and Kāmbojī likewise, Vajravetālī,
and Vajramātṛkā likewise,
the Fragrant One and Terrifying Face,
and Moon Crest likewise, Bhṛkuṭī and Viśvarūpā,
and Vajrakartarī likewise, Vajraśṛṅkhalā,
the goddess Māyā and Fame Maker,
Nalarki and Piṅgalā, Vajrajvālā, the One with Joined Palms,
and Vajrabhairavī herself:
these are the ḍākinīs who accomplish the maṇḍala.
All of those ḍākinīs
are three-eyed, their faces contorted,

pot-bellied, their hair let loose,
adorned with garlands of skulls,
perfectly complete with all ornaments,
adorned with the five mudrās,
clad in the directions, supreme in dance,
adorned with garlands of heads,
all seated on seats of corpses,
of various forms, captivating the mind.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
carry noose and hook in their hands,
brandish the supreme vajra,
with bell and the supreme ḍamaru;
their three faces heroic and alluring,
perfectly complete in the sentiment of compassion,
they gaze with sidelong eyes
and sway with the exertions of delight.
Granting every accomplishment,
they are loving toward all practitioners.
In six months the practitioner accomplishes the wheel of the ḍākinīs.
Without doubt, the supreme accomplishment
the ḍākinīs cause to be attained.
At this very time, immediately,
there is no doubt one will move in the sky.
The inner palace itself
has nine squares and so on, together with gates.
At the gates four goddesses are set,
and the ḍākinīs grant accomplishment.
One should draw the goddesses of the outer maṇḍala:
there, on the four sides of the band,
twenty goddesses should be placed,
the ḍākinīs and the others, in the directions and intermediate directions.
Four-cornered and four-gated,
thus the outer maṇḍala is laid out.
At the gates are four goddesses
who grant every desired fruit.
It is adorned with four portals;

all the portions of the corners,
the gates, and the junctions of the gate recesses
are adorned with vajras and jewels.
One should draw the lines of the outer maṇḍala;
within it nine squares,
and the gates too, are to be made.
Thus the ḍākas and ḍākinīs,
the binding of the net, are emptiness;
the thirty-seven factors of awakening
are the purity of phenomena.
In the center are the thirteen grounds;
outside, the sites and the secondary sites,
the charnel grounds and the secondary charnel grounds.
Purified through practice in this way,
one should meditate on the supreme Saṃvara.
That is the wisdom of mind:
the wisdom ḍākas and ḍākinīs.

To the aggregates, elements, and sense sources
one should apply both of the rites.
This is the vow of supreme wisdom:
set out the wheel of the three secrets.
Arrange it half and half.
The three ḍākas are in the center of the wheel,
the great arising of samaya yoga.
Having summoned the wisdom wheel
and offered water for the feet, one should make it enter.
Having empowered with the water of wisdom,
one should meditate on the lords.
The supreme samaya of all the tastes
of selfless phenomena is stainless.
From all the pores of the body
emanating the samaya of the three secrets,
one should consecrate all sentient beings without exception
as samaya ḍākas.
Then, gathering them in with effort,
one should make them enter the three secrets.

The ḍākas who were accomplished before
should be set in the places of blessing.
This is the great Vajra Vehicle,
abiding in the place of the ḍākas' conduct.
Recitation of the supreme Saṃvara
grants the unsurpassed state.
At the four times, as one wishes,
one should meditate always, without weariness.
In forward order and in reverse,
one should emanate the supreme wheel.
From the pores of the body, in front,
emanating Cakrasaṃvara, one should make offerings.
Having empowered the three vajras,
one should meditate on the wrathful one of cessation.
Together with the wisdom wrathful one,
one should recite like the thunder of the clouds.
Through the practice of going and coming,
the great vajra discipline of silence,
within seven days, with certainty,
might and power will be accomplished:
making things shake and sway,
agitating, distracting, and causing possession,
making the healthy sick,
and making the sick healthy.
Having meditated in this way,
there is no doubt in these rites.
One endowed with the yoga of the inner self,
who delights in meditation and recitation
and delights in samaya food,
is unobstructed, and his life is firm.
Reciting thus according to one's own rite,
one properly enters the state of a buddha.
There the wise should meditate on,
worship, and recite the samaya wheel.
I shall explain these secret mantras:
oṃ śrī vajra ḍāka adhi hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī buddha ḍāka abhruṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

oṃ śrī karma ḍāka akhaṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ śrī padma ḍāka hri hūṃ ḍākinī jāla sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ śrī ratna ḍāka aṃ hūṃ ḍākinī la sambara huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
Those four ḍākas,
and the Ḍākinī, Lāmā, Khaṇḍarohā, and Rūpiṇī,
their necks evenly entwined,
are well embraced with both legs.
Their colors, arms and faces,
and their hand emblems too, one should visualize.
Having made the goddesses manifest,
these are their respective heart mantras:
oṃ śrī vajra vārāhi vaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī ḍākini ḍāṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī lāme lāṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī khaṇḍarohe khaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī rūpiṇi rūṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

These are of the nature of the five. The mantras of the ḍākinīs of the intermediate directions are:
oṃ śrī buddha ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī karma ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī padma ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī ratna ḍākini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

The mantras of the ḍākinīs at the gates grant every fruit that is desired.
The four are of various colors,
pervading all according to their families.
oṃ hūṃ rūbe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ hūṃ surūpe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra dunti huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ prabhākari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
On the eastern band
the four goddesses are to be placed,
white in the color of their bodies;
their secret mantras are taught:
oṃ vajra vaḍavamukhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

oṃ ghomukhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra ghoṇe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ yaśaspini huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
On the southern band
the four deities should be placed.
The color of their bodies is yellow;
their mantras are taught:
oṃ vajra dūti huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra nakhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra kaumāri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra kaṃboji huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

On the western band, these are the mantras of the four goddesses who are red in the color of their bodies:
oṃ vajra betāli huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra sīka huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra garḍari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra bimabadāne huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

On the northern band are four goddesses, green in the color of their bodies; their secret mantras are taught:
oṃ candraśekhare huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ bhṛkuṭi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ biśvarūpe huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra katayani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

In the four intermediate directions, beginning with Īśāna in the northeast, are four goddesses with the colors of a twofold form. Their mantras are taught:
oṃ vajra śṛṃkhale huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajra māle huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ vajra yaśaskari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
oṃ vajrā nalārke huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

At the gates are four goddesses of various colors, endowed with fierce forms. Their mantras are taught. In the east:
oṃ vajra piṅgale jaḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
In the south:
oṃ vajra jvalani hūṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
In the west:

oṃ vajra kuṇḍali baṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
In the north:
oṃ vajra bhairava ho huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

In all of them, at the end of the consonants,
one joins śrī, following the supreme order.
If the mantrin recites them in this way,
he attains the accomplishment of the Saṃvara
of the net of ḍākinīs,
and within six months gains mastery of bliss.
If they are made one and gathered together,
the great yogin, endowed with splendor,
will accomplish the supreme net.
If all these secret mantras
are recited ten thousand or a hundred thousand times,
the king of secret mantras is accomplished.
By reciting the heart mantras,
the heroes and ḍākinīs are accomplished,
and one becomes whatever one wishes.
Entering into the bodies of others,
and attaining invisibility,
the great yogin roams about
and takes on various forms.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-second chapter, called "The King of Maṇḍalas from Which the Samaya Vow Arises."

Next, I shall explain something further:
the sequence of the rite of Buddha Ḍāka.
One should follow the sequence of the scripture and so forth
of Buddha Ḍāka, explained before.
A yogin who does not know the scripture
is a Buddhist tīrthika;
one should never abandon the scripture.
Not abandoning the Three Jewels,
"To the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha
I always go for refuge."
If one focuses on the perfection of wisdom,
the accomplishment of yoga is achieved.

Through the practice of instantaneous entry,
one should imagine one's own body:
blue and fierce, with a contorted face,
ferocious and terrifying, striking terror,
the fangs of the mouth bared,
matted locks bound at the crown with a half-moon,
the locks held down by a crossed vajra,
adorned with a garland of skulls,
complete with every ornament,
with a body arisen from baṃ hūṃ vajra,
fully endowed with the six seals,
wearing a tiger skin as a garment,
seated well in the half-crossed posture,
three-eyed, with a fierce body,
four-necked and four-faced,
fully endowed with twelve arms,
the perfect, supreme wisdom of emptiness,
with a garland of skulls of all the vicious,
wearing a necklace arisen from the end of time,
pressing all the vicious beneath his feet.
Bhairava, who is the afflictions, with his head,
craving, delusion, and jealousy,
and Kālarātri lying face down,
the vicious and terrifying obstructors,
all are pressed beneath his feet.
Sky-colored, pale,
white, and red,
and green, the face that looks upward.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he embraces Vārāhī in bliss.
Through union that is nondual throughout,
all phenomena are of one taste:
this is called the ascetic virtues.
The glorious great bliss
is Vajra Heruka himself.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga staff,
a Dharma wheel and a ringing staff,

an alms bowl, a spear, and a noose,
a hook, a head, and a hand drum.
With his right and left hands
he stretches out a human skin and wears it.
In the east are Mātaṅgī and Ḍombikā, Rajakī and Pukkasī, Khaṭakī and Śabarī,
Jivārī and Samarī.
These eight goddesses
are to be placed in due order.
Yellow, blue, and likewise red,
and the color of smoke,
red, green, and a smoky color;
the eighth is white.
To be placed at the gates are Herukī, Vajracaṇḍī,
the Vajra Supreme Sister,
and the fierce Vajrabhairavī,
who devour all who are hard to tame.
They are the color of ash clouds, green,
red, and blue, exceedingly terrifying.
The eight in the middle hold a Dharma ringing staff,
a skull cup, a hand drum, and a curved knife,
and hold a garment upon the shoulder.
At the gates are four goddesses
with a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga, the gesture of fearlessness,
a Dharma ringing staff, and a hand drum;
they are one-faced and four-armed.
Upon a seat of a hungry ghost
they sit in the dancing half-crossed posture.
Living on alms, the three robes,
not taking food afterward, always sitting,
accepting any place, a single seat,
the open air, the foot of a tree,
the wilderness, the charnel ground,
rags from the rubbish heap, and felt:
by these, in their due order,

one meditates on the pure ascetic virtues.
The supreme samaya of the sameness of wisdom
one should meditate on as one taste.
oṃ śrī mahāsukha vajra he he ru ru kaṃ āḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ maṃ matāṃgī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ḍaṃ vajra ḍaṃbinī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ raṃ rājakī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ buṃ pukkasī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ khaṃ khaṭakī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ śaṃ śabarī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ jiṃ jibarī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ saṃ samarī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ heṃ herukī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ baṃ vajra caṇḍī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ hūṃ vajra rūkṣasī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ bhai vajra bhairapī huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
All of them are naked, with loosened hair,
three-eyed and peaceful,
with fangs bared and tongues lolling,
their bodies adorned with the five seals,
wearing head ornaments of garlands of skulls,
with the moods of laughter, peace, compassion,
grace, and menace,
ferocity and wrath.
Reciting and meditating, one emanates and gathers in,
and abides in bliss in body, speech, and mind.
When beings of various inclinations
are thoroughly trained, by the means of taming,
in the domain of bliss,
the fruit of unsurpassed wisdom is attained.
Through this all sentient beings are happy;
through the enjoyment of deathless bliss
the fruit of wisdom is found.
This is the attainment by all sentient beings
of the supreme state.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-third chapter, on generating the ascetic virtues.

Next, I shall explain something further:
the sequence of the rite for bringing down rain.
On the hub, together with its filaments,
of a supreme eight-petaled lotus,
in its center is the Great Vajra,
fangs bared and terrifying,
eight-armed and four-faced,
three-eyed, terrifying even the terrifying.
He brandishes the vajra weapon,
and has the threatening forefinger with a noose;
he holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga staff,
carries a hook and a spear,
wears and holds the skin of a hero,
and a hand drum is said to be the eighth.
With his outstretched right leg
he presses down the terrifying, intoxicated water god.
His locks are bound with a half-moon,
he is adorned with a crossed vajra,
his body is adorned with the six seals,
he is adorned with a garland of skulls,
he wears a tiger skin as a garment,
with a supreme diadem of a garland of skulls.
Biting his lip, his face contorted,
he gazes wrathfully and looks on with terror.
On the eight petals one should draw the eight nāgas:
Ananta and Vāsuki,
Takṣaka, Padma, Mahāpadma, Śaṅkhapāla and Karkoṭaka,
and Nanda; these are the eight.
White, blue, red, and green,
yellow, and smoke-colored,
multicolored, and yellow.
With palms joined together,
facing toward the Blessed One,
in fear they beg for his kindness

and remain gazing in terror.
The Blessed One, blue in body,
is terrifying and strikes great terror.
The right face is a smoky red,
the left a smoky green;
the upper face is the face of a garuḍa,
contorted and terrifying.

He has the splendor of a red sun,
a light equal to twelve suns.
Vārāhī embraces him at the neck
and entwines him well with both legs.
Or else he is twelve-armed,
the supreme great bliss, twelvefold:
the curved knife, the head of Brahmā,
fully endowed with vajra and bell.
He presses the lips of the goddess.
She is naked, with her hair loosened,
three-eyed, and wearing a girdle,
her body the supreme gold of the Jambu river;
they abide in nondual union.
The nāgas with their own wives,
and Varuṇa too with his wife, Varuṇa white in body,
beg for his kindness.
At the heart are the wisdom wheels;
one should generate their colors, arms, and faces too.
At its heart one should place hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ,
and likewise for body, speech, and mind.
In the very hearts of the nāgas themselves
one should place hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ.
The rite of the king of secret mantras should be recited according to the words of the wrathful one.
On a riverbank or by the ocean,
at a well or a nāga lake,
or at ponds and pools,
the intelligent one should do the recitation of the wrathful one.

Or else, in a dwelling of the nāgas,
one should engage in meditation and recitation.
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ hūṃ nāṃ nāga barṣāpaya hūṃ ḍākinī jāl sambara hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
Having meditated on these, one should recite about ten thousand times,
a thousand at each of the four times.
Within seven days, with certainty,
rain will fall everywhere on all the lands.
At the time of the samaya fire offering and worship,
accompanied by song and dance,
one should eat and drink milk.
The yogin should recite the mantras of the eight nāgas.
By the rite of bathing in milk,
one should make the fire offering, burning and pouring milk.
One should use firewood from milk-sap trees,
and kindling sticks from milk-sap trees,
and with milk one should make the fire offering.
One should fill a vase completely with milk.
In the intermediate directions, beginning with that of Agni, the god of fire, and in the cardinal directions,
one should give tormas with milk.
oṃ aṃ ananāya hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ baṃ busukai hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ taṃ takṣaka hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ paṃ padma hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ maṃ mahāpadma hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ śaṃ śaṃkhapāla hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ kaṃ karkoṭa hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ aṃ anabatapta hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā
oṃ hūṃ baṃ baruṇāya nāgādhipataye nāga barṣapataye hūṃ nāṃ hūṃ svāhā Reciting these together with the wrathful one,
one should do about ten thousand recitations of them all.
One should eat milk and old rice as food,
with senses subdued, in complete silence.
Directly, dispensing with a drawn image,
if one recites about ten thousand times, they will appear.

The accomplishment is direct,
and by merely speaking one brings down rain.
Do not doubt this!
Into a silver vessel
one should pour white mustard seed and water.

Over it one should recite twenty-one times. One should bathe an image of the Buddha with urine mixed with milk. From kneaded earth of the riverbank one should make the figure of a nāga, with its head pointing west, and empower its nine heads with the water. Then one should place it in the river. Immediately the god sends down rain, and rain falls on Jambudvīpa.

The lands become filled with grain,
and the forests flourish.
All sentient beings abide in the touch of bliss.
Taking on in turn the form of the wrathful one,
having meditated on oneself in accordance with the tantra,
by meditating on Heru Vajra
in one's own heart alone,
rain will also fall.

If one climbs to the top of a mountain and recites over a trident, hail is cut off. If one recites over a hand drum, a spreading fire is stopped. If one recites over a noose, one summons. If one recites over a skull cup, one draws forth blood. If one recites over an axe, one kills. If one recites over a khaṭvāṅga, one pacifies. If one recites over a curved knife, one kills those who roam the three worlds. If one recites over a head, one raises the dead. If one brandishes a vajra while reciting, one gains the accomplishment of the underworld. If one recites over a bell, one summons those who are unwilling. If one recites over an elephant hide and spreads it out, one flies through the sky, travels a hundred thousand leagues, and comes back again. If one recites over the six seals, one becomes invisible before others.

One roams everywhere on the earth and dwells however one pleases.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-fourth chapter, on the rite of bringing down rain.

Next, I shall explain something further:
summarizing the supreme secret,

meditating on oneself in an instant,
one should take the form of glorious Heruka:
blue, fierce, and contorted,
fierce, three-eyed, with six supreme faces,
his matted locks bearing a half-moon,
a crossed vajra on his supreme head,
wearing a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
adorned with a vajra garland,
with a necklace of heads on his body,
adorned with the six seals,
wearing a tiger skin as a garment,
his body adorned by Vārāhī,
standing on a single leg.
The right face is yellow and smoke-colored,
the left is red and green,
and the upper face is a horse face,
white and cloud-colored, fierce and terrifying.
He is endowed with vajra and bell together,
and presses the lips of the goddess.
He wears the skin of a Victor as a garment,
and upholds the family of the ḍākinīs.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
is adorned with the vajra emblem,
holds a noose and a hook in his hands,
holds a hand drum and a head,
and likewise a curved knife and a noose:
twelve arms are thus taught.
The entire maṇḍala too
one should visualize as standing on one leg.
An elephant face and a sparrow face,
and likewise a lion face;
the first is a dog face,
the second an owl face,
the third a pig face,
and the fourth has a crow face.
Embodying the dharma of the shape of the abodes,
he takes on great and various forms,

infinite, renowned as all-victorious,
omniscient and all-encompassing,
bearing whatever body he wishes.
Thus one should meditate and visualize.
Like a jewel of many forms,
the great being sports in play.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-fifth chapter, on accomplishing the manifold.

Next, I shall explain something further:
the practice of the supreme Vārāhī.
Through the practice of the generation stage,
one should meditate on oneself and visualize:
her body has the splendor of twelve suns,
a body like vermilion, unmoving,
like the bandhūka flower.
She is three-faced and six-armed,
complete with every ornament,
and sits in the posture of a sattva.
She wears a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
and holds vajra and bell together.
With her lovely hair she embraces him,
pressing the lips of the Method's face.
She holds an arrow and a bow,
drawing the bow to the end of her ear.
She holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and summons with the supreme hook.
She sits in the center of a red lotus
and bestows all that is desired.
Or else, twelve-armed
and six-faced, the body of the goddess arises.
Her upper face is the face of a wild boar,
fierce, splendid, with a terrifying brilliance.
On the eastern petal is Vajraguhyottamā;
in the left direction, Vajrasamayottamā;
in the western direction, Vajratejottamā;
in the southern direction, Vajraratnottamā;

in the direction of Agni, Vajrajñānottamā;
in the direction of Nairṛti, Vajravidyottamā;
in the direction of Vāyu, Vajrasiddhottamā;
in the direction of Īśāna, Vajrabhasmottamā.
At the gates are Vajrajvalottamā, Vajratejottamā, Vajrakrodhottamā,
and Vajradaṃṣṭrottamā.
All of these goddesses
are red in color and three-faced,
six-armed and three-eyed,
and sit in the posture of a sattva.
Their hair is loosened,
they are adorned with every ornament,
and, holding vajra and bell together,
they embrace the method of their own bodies.
They hold a noose and a hook,
a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga.
In the four corners one should place
those who draw bows and arrows to the full.
At the gates they stand with the right leg outstretched,
naked, with contorted faces,
all of them standing upon seats of hungry ghosts,
brandishing vajras, with threatening forefingers,
and endowed with nooses.
Moreover, mutually,
the retinue and the rest pay homage in due order.
At their hearts are wisdom goddesses,
to be visualized together with body, speech, and mind.
Through the yoga of the wisdom maṇḍala,
the taste of phenomena dissolves in sameness.
Having emanated by the recitation of wisdom,
one should gather them in by the sequence of the rite.
Through the recitation of the supreme samaya,
the reality of the moon will be accomplished.
oṃ śrī vajra vārāhi ā vaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra guhyottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

oṃ śrī vajra samayottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra teja uttame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra ratnottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra jñāna uttame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra badyī uttame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra siddhottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra bhasmottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra jvalottame jaḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra amṛtottame huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra krodhottame baṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī vajra daṃṣṭrottame hoḥ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
In the order of these,
one should meditate and recite.
Having gathered in and emanated,
all phenomena and all that bears them
are purified through the yoga of one's own deity.
One should carefully examine all sentient beings.
The abode of yoga is the Dharma;
one should lead them into the three secrets.
The abode of the three secrets is the Dharma,
and the Dharma too is likewise thus.
The selfless phenomenon is the Dharma;
phenomena do not come from phenomena.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-sixth chapter, called "The Supreme Samaya of the Three Secrets."

Next, I shall explain something further:
the sequence of the rite of the six yoginīs.
Having drawn a lotus of five petals,
its hub covered with filaments,
in its center is Vārāhī,
red, with a light blazing in many colors,
three-faced and beautiful with six arms,
three-eyed, with loosened hair,
wearing a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
the supreme one who wears the directions as her garment,
in the half-crossed posture,

her body adorned with the six seals,
wearing a garland of heads.
All the vicious māras,
and Kālarātri lying face down,
she keeps pressed beneath her feet.
Her faces are red, blue, and green;
she is adorned with the five buddhas.
She holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
carries a noose and a hook in her hands,
and holds a head and a curved knife.
She bestows every accomplishment.
At her heart is the wisdom samaya,
arisen from union in body, speech, and mind.
In the east is the goddess Yāminī;
going around to the left, one should arrange Mohanī and Saṃcālanī, Saṃtrāsanī and Caṇḍikā.
They are three-eyed, with loosened hair,
one-faced and four-armed,
blue, white, and yellow,
green, and smoke-colored.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a bell, a hand drum, and a curved knife,
wear head ornaments of garlands of skulls,
are adorned with the five seals,
wear the directions as their garment, supreme in dance,
are adorned with garlands of heads,
and bear Akṣobhya as a diadem.
Theirs is the bliss of the mood of compassion,
joined together in nondual union.
The supreme ones, Vajrasattva and the rest, are these:
Vārāhī with Vajrasattva,
Yāminī with Vairocana,
Mohanī with Padmanarteśvara,
Saṃcālanī with Heruka, Saṃtrāsanī with Vajrasūrya,
and Caṇḍikā with Paramāśva.

Vajrasattva is white in body,
Vairocana is yellow,
Padmanarteśvara is red,
glorious Heruka is blue, Vajrasūrya is red,
and Paramāśva is green.
Or else one should meditate on them individually.
Vajrasattva is three-faced,
six-armed and three-eyed,
adorned with the emblems of the six seals.
He holds a vajra, a bell, a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga,
a sword, a hand drum, and a head,
wears a human skin, and is dancing.
All the heroes, Vairocana and the rest,
are one-faced and four-armed,
supreme ones marked by a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga,
a hand drum, and a bell.
Or else all of them should be visualized
as twelve-armed and six-faced.
Their secret mantras are these:
oṃ śrī oṃ baṃ baṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī haṃ yoṃ yaṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī hrīṃ moṃ maṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī hreṃ hriṃ saṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī hūṃ hūṃ saṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śrī phaṭ phaṭ caṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
These are the secret mantras of the six yoginīs.

oṃ haḥ baṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ namaḥ hi bhruṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ svāhā hu hri huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ bauṣeṭa he hi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ ho traṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ phaṭ haṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
These are the mantras of the six heroes.
Merely by meditating on these recitations,
the six wheels are supremely accomplished,

and one attains the state of a universal monarch,
becoming king of the six universal monarchs,
invincible, victorious, fully perfected;
one finds great strength and supreme prowess.
If one always worships the six hand emblems
and praises them according to the rite,
that is swiftly accomplished,
and one also attains the supreme state of king of yogins.
Having accomplished invisibility and the like,
one roams throughout the three realms,
and the sentient beings of the six destinies are liberated.
Through meditation one becomes equal to Vajradhara.
Or else, on a six-cornered wheel
is the great bliss, Vairocana, Mañjuvajra, the king,
lord of the universal monarchs,
like saffron in color,
with a light that blazes with radiance,
fully endowed with the great seal,
the very nature of the dharmadhātu.
With his right and left hands
holding vajra and bell, he embraces his consort.
A sword, a book, a khaṭvāṅga,
a skull cup, a hook, a noose,
an utpala lotus, and a hand drum.
His faces are saffron-colored, blue,
red, and green, and the upper face is white:
the great purity of the dharmadhātu,
which thoroughly liberates the realm of sentient beings.
Arranged going to the left from the east,
including Paramāśva with Caṇḍikā,
by placing them there
one accomplishes Mañjuvajra himself.
White, red, and yellow,
blue, red, white, blue, and green:
in the six limbs are the heroes
together with the ḍākinīs:

Vajrasattva with Vārāhī, Vairocana with Yāminī,
Padmanarteśvara with Mohanī,
Heruka with Saṃcālanī, Vajrasūrya with Saṃtrāsanī,
green and smoke-colored;
one should visualize their body colors thus.
The heroes are one-faced and four-armed;
the goddesses are two-armed
and hold a skull cup and a curved knife.
The heroes hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
their own emblems, in nondual union,
fully endowed with a bell as well,
supreme ones holding a hand drum.
They are three-eyed and stand with the right leg outstretched,
wearing skirts of tiger skin,
wearing head ornaments of garlands of skulls,
and wearing necklaces of heads;
all of them stand upon hungry ghosts.
In the center, the lord presses down Bhairava and Kālarātri,
and the goddess entwines him with both legs,
her hair loosened, wearing the directions as her garment.
At the heart is the wisdom samaya,
to be joined with body, speech, and mind.
One should properly apply the twofold armor.
Having meditated on the wheel of the sites,
one should arrange the heroes and ḍākinīs.
The three secrets abide at the heart.
The ḍākinīs, the Crow-Faced and the rest,
are to be arranged at the outer gates;
in the corners, Yamadāḍhī and the rest.
One should visualize them all as naked,
with the colors and emblems explained before,
seated properly upon seats of hungry ghosts,
standing with the right leg outstretched,
fierce, with loosened hair,
all wearing garlands of skulls.

Outside and inside oneself,
the six perfections are purity;
one should meditate, and meditate intensively.
Through the practice of emanating and gathering in,
one should recite the secret wheel.
When reciting the heroes and yoginīs,
one should meditate, and meditate intensively.
Having emanated the hosts of the wheel of emanations,
one brings the three kinds of beings to fulfillment.
By meditating on the inner self,
having meditated on the secret of the three wheels, one should recite.
With the three realities together with the mantras,
the heroes and the ḍākinīs,
with huṃ hūṃ phaṭ at the end,
one should do the recitation of the three wheels.
In accordance with the rite of yoga,
the one who holds the samaya should recite it.
oṃ śrī mañju vajra āḥ hūṃ maṃ huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ haḥ vajra satva huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ baṃ vajra vārāhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ namaḥ hi vajra vairocan huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ haṃ yoṃ yamani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ svāhā hu padma narteśvari huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hrīṃ moṃ mohani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ bauṣaṭ he heruka huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hrī hrīṃ saṃcalani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ ho vajra sūrya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ saṃtrāsani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ phaṭ haṃ parmāśva huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ phaṭ phaṭ caṇḍika huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ kākāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ ulūkāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ śvānāsye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ sūkarasye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ yamadāḍhi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ yamadūti huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
oṃ yamadaṃṣṭriṇi huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

oṃ yamamathani huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
Having set the two armors
on the left and right hands,
one performs all the rites
in whatever way one wishes.
If one performs the rites without doubt,
accomplishment is certain, and not otherwise.
Or else the Protector, master of the ten,
abides in the ten perfections:
generosity, moral discipline, patience, diligence,
meditative concentration, and wisdom as the sixth,
skillful means, power, aspiration,
and primordial wisdom: these are the purity of the gatekeepers.
The Very Joyous and the Stainless,
the Luminous and the Radiant,
the Difficult to Conquer and the Manifest,
the Far-Reaching and the Immovable,
Excellent Intelligence and the Cloud of Dharma:
by these one should meditate on purity.
The four, Yamadāḍhī and the rest,
one should visualize as the noble truths:
suffering and its origin,
cessation and the path.
The Blessed One, glorious Mañjuvajra,
is the purity of the dharmadhātu,
the very nature of primordial wisdom.
Thus one should meditate on purity.
The path of nondual union
is secret and supremely secret;
through the power of yoga it is the supreme secret.
The practitioner should train well in what is taught,
in the divisions of the lords as they are,
and in the sequence of the guru.
Thus the rite, in nondual
union, is the supreme samaya,
the means and the cause of all accomplishments,
the great secret of the yoginī's mind,

which bestows the fruit of all rites.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-seventh chapter, on the meditation that generates the practice of the nondual armor.

Then, further, I shall explain
the code signs, which are supremely secret.
Without fully knowing the code signs,
the accomplishments of union are not attained;
when this is known with certainty,
accomplishment will be attained, without doubt.
dva is explained as a man.
di is a woman.
pu is pressing down.
su is eating itself.
ma is explained as a mother.
ya is a wife.
bha is a sister.
bhi is explained as a female friend.
lu is a daughter.
sri is explained as blood.
so is the drink of peace.
pe is broth,
and pi likewise is meat.
Another syllable is eating.
bhu is mixed.
pi is a charnel ground.
du is a corpse.
ṭī is a yoginī.
gā is Lāmā.
tri is Rūpiṇī.
ku is the Ḍākinī.
ha is Khaṇḍarohā.
jā is the two thighs.
Another syllable is speaking honestly.
sva is welcome.
mi is a fish.
byo is what is not to be eaten.

phyo is what is not to be drunk.
ga is one who may and one who may not be approached.
kā is desire.
sa is one who goes to no other.
ra is a woman without a husband.
du is a woman of bad conduct.
su is a fortunate woman.
na is an unfortunate woman.
sa is one who has samaya.
a is one without samaya.
ī is has come.
na is has not come.
so is passion.
These are the code signs of the letters.
At the time of empowerment the yogin
should give what is to be eaten and what is not to be eaten.
Empowerment is supreme;
knowing the supreme samaya,
at the samaya time of those who have samaya,
at the gathering of the samaya circle,
one should give it to the faithful;
one should not give it to the faithless.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-eighth chapter, on the code signs.

Then, further, I shall explain
the characteristics of the yoginīs;
by merely knowing them
the practitioner gains accomplishment.
A woman white like a lotus root,
with long eyes like lotus petals,
who always delights in white clothes,
who has the scent of fresh sandalwood,
and who delights in the assembly of the sugatas,
should be known as born of that family.
A woman like refined gold,
who delights in red and yellow clothes,

who has the scent of jasmine and campaka,
is a follower of the Excellent One.
One who is wholly dark blue like an utpala,
who delights in blue scents and clothes,
who has the scent of the blue utpala,
follows the excellent hero.
A woman whose color is like a white lotus,
who always smells of the lotus root,
likewise has the mind of a heroine.
A woman red and pale yellow,
of beautiful form, with red clothes,
with the scent of mālakī and utpala,
is born of the vajra family.
A woman yellow and green,
who delights in white clothes
and has the scent of flowers on her head,
is a follower of the tathāgata family.
A woman whose color is red,
who wears clothes of that color,
and always has the scent of camphor,
is a follower of Vairocana's family.
These families of yoginīs,
seven in all, I have explained.
They always delight in left-handed conduct;
by their own colors they have six families.
The vidyā letters of the families
also become six colors.
They bind their own mudrās
and speak words born of their own vidyā.
The woman who comes from the left,
who is always on the yogin's left,
who signals with her left hand,
who glances from the left,
and who talks of goddesses and of dance,
is declared to have samaya.
The woman who listens to what is done,
who speaks much of her family,

who does not abandon the family's duties,
who does not cast aside what she herself has taught,
and who recites the vidyā of her own family,
is declared to have samaya.
She who joins her palms in homage,
who always bows with the left side of her body,
and who speaks of goddesses and of all things,
will certainly go to bliss.
With her left big toe on the ground
she draws lines with her foot,
she moves her head about,
she looks sidelong and shows her hand,
especially to the practitioner;
she calls to mind her own vidyā,
and shows her palm at her cheeks, her jaw,
or her nose;
she looks sidelong and praises once,
repeats it, and looks at the family.
A yoginī who truly goes,
if she certainly has samaya,
is then a yoginī hard to find;
and likewise from the ḍākinīs
the five nectars truly arise.
Yāminī and Saṃtrāsanī,
the Desirous One, Vārāhī, the One of Terrible Form,
and the All-Roaming One come to welcome.
The yoginīs are of seven kinds;
their own marks are explained in brief:
Rūpiṇī and Cumbikā, Lāmā, the Transformed One, the One with a Child,
the Unturning One, the goddess Ehikā;
the Ḍākinī is explained before them.
She who looks with acceptance,
who dances with raised eyebrows,
who first gathers in her form
and afterward becomes frightening,
is declared to be Rūpiṇī;

the nondual hero should approach her.
Whether lovely or unlovely,
when she embraces and kisses a child
she should be known as Cumbikā;
she is also the supreme ḍākinī.
She does not look at food but looks sidelong,
with a scowl and a wrinkled face,
twisting her eyebrows, with a threatening finger;
moreover, she does not breathe out.
She who is frightening
is shown to be Lāmā.
Pig, bear, cat,
the jackal kind and tigers:
she who is frightening among all these is declared to be the Transformed One.
She who laughs with great delight,
who goes and does not return again,
and laughs with passionate attachment,
is declared to be Khaṇḍarohā.
She whose mind is always weary,
and who, with foot or hand,
with the hem of her garment or with a stick,
touches one so that one does not survive,
should be known as the Unturning One;
she is declared not to be practiced with.
The family mudrās of the ḍākinīs:
the hero approaches and looks at the signs.
Skull cup, axe, fang,
and sword are all terrifying;
vajra and conch
are declared to be the family mudrās.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the thirty-ninth chapter, on the signs of the yoginīs.

Then, further, I shall explain
the characteristics of the ḍākinīs,
by correctly knowing which

one abides in the samaya of the ḍākinīs.

The woman who is red and yellow,
who gives off the scent of the lotus,
whose gaze is peaceful by nature,
and who knowingly follows one's gaze;
the woman whose nails are red,
whose eyes are always full of longing,
and who draws a lotus in her house,
is born of the family of Padmanarteśvara.
She who has a trident between her eyebrows,
whose body is blue and pale,
who always meditates on the vajra family,
in whose house a vajra is drawn,
and who always makes offerings:
that glorious ḍākinī
is born of the family of Heruka.
She on whose forehead a trident
and short spears appear,
whose eyes are red, whose complexion is reddish yellow,
whose feet and hands are likewise red,
whose mind always delights
in goats and in chickens,
in whose house is the emblem of the vajra,
and who always makes offerings to it,
is born of the family of Śrī Heruka;
she is a ḍākinī, there is no doubt.
She on whose forehead
or on whose hand a wheel appears,
who, like the blue clouds,
always wears it on her forehead,
who is of great fortune, gathering all,
and supremely truthful,
who draws a wheel in her house
and always makes offerings to it, is a ḍākinī born of the family of Vajravārāhī,
proud in her strength.

She who is like the color of collyrium,
whose teeth are white and prominent,
who is always fierce,
who has strength of mind,
who always delights in bathing,
who does not talk much,
who draws a vajra in her house
and always makes offerings with virtue,
is born of the family of Vajravārāhī;
she is endowed with ten thousand.
She who is yellow, appearing like the color of gold,
whose eyes are unmoving, whose facial down is yellow,
on whose forehead
or on whose hand a vajra appears,
who always abides in royal power,
who is proud and speaks the truth,
from whom the scent of mālikā comes forth,
in whose house a vajra
is always drawn and greatly worshiped,
is born of the family of Khaṇḍarohā,
the supreme sovereign of yoginīs.
She who delights in horse meat,
who is thin and of the black color of collyrium,
who has something like a spear point on her forehead,
who delights in fierce deeds,
who always goes to charnel grounds,
who is fearless and without pity,
who has a tilaka on her forehead
and draws and worships a skull cup in her house,
is born of the ḍākinī family
of glorious Heruka.
The woman who is like the color of a cloud,
whose teeth are set unevenly,
who always delights in fierce deeds,
who bares her left fang,
and who in her house draws an axe
and always worships it,

is without doubt a ḍākinī
born of the family of the Guide.
These hosts of ḍākinīs
are born of the family of Śrī Heruka.
For the benefit of the practitioner
their characteristics have been correctly explained.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the fortieth chapter, on the characteristics of the ḍākinīs.

Then, further, I shall explain.
The practitioner should know
the particular characteristics and the various aspects of the Lāmās.
She whose round face
appears perfectly circular,
who always has a moustache on her lip,
whose body hair and eyebrows are long,
whose clothes are fine and clean, who is peaceful,
unagitated, and speaks the truth,
and who always delights in the holy Dharma,
should be known as the hero's sister.
One should give the lotus mudrā,
or else make the tortoise mudrā.
Hide, vase, and ewer
should be known as the reply to the mudrā.
On the tenth days of the month
she draws a lotus in her house.
These are the characteristics
of the Lāmā woman.
Her belly protrudes, her eyes are long,
her eyes are red and tawny;
she is wealthy, fortunate, and glorious;
she is yellow and looks like a campaka;
she is neither very tall nor short;
she delights in multicolored clothes;
she has three lines on her forehead;
looking upward from the corners of her eyes,

she laughs and is joyful;
she stands treading upon the road;
she always delights in tales
of those who die in battle.
When one sees such a proud woman,
one should show the spear mudrā,
and by bending the left leg
one should show oneself as well.
Turning the left ones fully back
is declared to be the reply to the mudrā.
The fourteenth and the eighth days of the month
are declared to be her time.
She draws a trident in her house
and always worships it.
These are the characteristics
of the Lāmā of Lokeśvara.
She in whose cheeks
hollows are seen,
who is likewise always red and yellow,
whose eyes appear green and yellow,
whose hair is likewise curled,
on whose head and forehead a silk band is seen tied,
on whom a single line is clearly present,
whose neck is likewise long,
who always delights in red clothes,
who laughs and sings songs,
who is sometimes angry,
whose mind wavers,
and who delights in quarrels:
when one sees such a proud woman,
one should show the spear mudrā;
as a second, with effort,
one should show the bell mudrā.
Turning back toward the left side
is declared to be the reply to the mudrā.
She who is short, with thick thighs,
who always delights in yellow clothes,

and who wears a cloth over her shoulders:
when one sees such a woman,
one should show the vajra mudrā,
and as a second, with effort,
one should show the conch mudrā.
Turning fully back from the left
is declared to be the reply to the mudrā.
The fourteenth is her time;
she draws a vajra in her house.
These are the characteristics
of the Lāmā of Śrī Heruka.
She who has body hair all over her body,
whose eyes are black and yellow,
who is stout and fearsome in her changes of mood,
whose face is broad and mouth large,
whose lower lip protrudes, whose complexion is black,
whose eyes are round and nose flattened,
who is always skilled in song,
and who is cloud-colored and captivating:
when one sees such a proud woman,
one should show the mudrā of song,
and as a second, with effort,
one should show the spear mudrā.
Turning fully back from the left
is declared to be the reply to the mudrā.
The eleventh day of the month is her time;
she draws a fang in her house.
These are the characteristics
of the Lāmā of Vajravārāhī.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-first chapter, on the characteristics of the Lāmās.

Then, further, I shall explain
the code signs of the ḍākinīs,
by which brothers and sisters
come to recognize one another correctly.

She who shows her left hand
is indicating honest speech.
She who shows her ring finger
gives the reply to honest speech.
She who strikes her belly
is indicating "I am hungry."
She who shows her forehead
means "I have come from the sky."
She who puts a finger in her mouth
is saying "I have eaten."
She who moves her tongue
is saying "I will eat."
She who touches her knee
is indicating "I am tired."
She who touches the tip of her finger
is saying "I am rested."
She who gnashes her teeth
is saying "I eat flesh." Showing the right hand indicates "Do it like this."
She who shows a frown is saying "Bound."
She who shows the garuḍa
is indicating "Freed."
To her who shows a fist
one should show patati.
To her who shows her hair,
having watched her change of manner,
one should show the khaṭvāṅga.
To her who moves her limbs
one should show the fang.
She who shows her hand with her hand
is saying "Eat the torma."
She who shows her right hand is saying "Do it like this!"
She who touches her ear
is indicating "One should stay."
She who touches nail with nail

means "Carried off by death."
She who draws on the ground is saying "Today one enters the maṇḍala."
She who touches her breast means "Protect my child."
She who draws on the ground with her left thumb
is declared to mean "Protect the kinsfolk!"
She who narrows her eyes is saying "Do it so."
She who touches the joints
is saying "Sleep well."
Whatever messenger woman she may be,
all of them should correctly practice these.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-second chapter, on the code signs.

Then I shall explain the limb mudrās
by their characteristics.
To the woman who touches the crown of her head
one should show the head.
To her who shows her forehead
one should show the cheek.
To her who shows her teeth
one should show the tongue.
To her who shows her lips
one should show the shoulder.
To her who shows her waist and back
one should show the ground.
To her who shows her breasts
one should show the jaw.
To her who shows her belly
one should show the navel.
To her who shows her secret place
one should show the liṅga.
To her who shows her thigh
one should show what is below.
To her who shows her knee

one should show the calf.
To her who shows her foot
one should show the sole.
To her who shows the joints of her fingers
one should show the nails.
To her who shows the ground
one should show the sky.
To her who shows the sky
one should show the sun.
To her who shows a river
one should show the ocean.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-third chapter, on the characteristics of the limb mudrās.

Then, further, I shall explain well
the supreme mudrās of the limbs as they are,
by knowing which, brother
or sister is known without doubt.
By showing one finger
one says "Welcome."
By showing two fingers
one gives the reply to the welcome.
This is well explained
as the limb mudrā of all yoginīs.
Bending the two index fingers is the eye gesture;
to whomever the mantrin shows it,
she at once, for as long as she lives,
comes under his power, without doubt.
To her who shows her middle finger
one should show the index finger.
To her who shows her ring finger
one should show the tongue.
To her who shows patisa
one should show the front.
To her who shows the crown of her head
one should show the edge of the boundary.
To her who shows the ground

one should show the sky.
To her who shows a frown
one should show the space between the brows.
To her who shows her teeth
one should show the lips.
To her who shows her throat
one should show the mouth.
To her who shows her forehead
one should show the navel.
These, in order, are the limb mudrās
of all the yoginīs.
Those keepers of the secret who always show them
will come to the correct view.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-fourth chapter, on the limb mudrās of the ḍākinīs.

Then, further, I shall explain
the characteristics of the ḍākinīs,
by which, from afar, heroes
and heroines are recognized as sisters.
She who has samaya and is devoted is the ground of yogic enjoyment.
Having made the ground the basis,
she honors the vow of the yogin.
She looks in reverse order,
her face changes,
and the eyebrows of her face always move;
she is to be quickly recognized in various ways.
Likewise the change of manner born of the ḍākinīs
should be known as wandering;
three lines, fully rounded:
these should be known as the signs
of those who truly go as ḍākinīs.
If she turns away,
the meaning explained before is given up.
Her substance, which perishes,
is clear like a vajra.

Her voice, like the cuckoo's call,
is always clear and pleasant.
In the house of the signs
there are mirrors like vajras,
there are mirrors like swords,
and hand emblems like spears always appear;
these are called the clear mirror.
The forms made as signs
that have these characteristics should be known as
the supreme among the ḍākinīs.

What is called potaṃgi is honest speech. What is called pratipataṃgi is the reply to honest speech. What is called gamu means "go." What is called luṃkaṃ means "come." What is called dehi means "food." What is called grihana means "brahmin." What is called piraṇaṃ is the heart. What is called marṇa is an ill-omened sound. In what is called gāndha, kar is ka. śiro is a lie. kara is the belly. bara is sound. śraramaṇo is the ear. amritasvā is churned. samagama is a man. talika is a ḍākinī. naraka is the maṇḍala. amoka is the charnel ground. kalika is the door. śvasa is the brahmin caste. paridhi is the kṣatriya caste. birati is the vaiśya caste. krur is the śūdra caste.

anatasthā is one with a mole. paśulika is a house. ṭāka is a sister. melapaka is water. griharaṇa is releasing the vajra water. Touching the tongue to the teeth indicates hunger. triśna is asking. kuta means "I have come from such and such a place." kirana is a flower. tumula is laughter. tanta is averting the fall of rain. tṛpata is a request. dhuryo is knowing. nriha is a cloud. dhupa is incense. sanu is a mountain. sarita is a river. aguli is a limb. badana is the face. jātika is the tongue. antana is the teeth. pakṣi is a banner. chando is a garland. cala is the wind. paśu is a wild animal. yanti is the maṇḍala. sanama is a crossroads. phalkuśaṃ is people. mahākṣaraba is great livestock. ga is a tree. na is a man. go is a bull. ma is a buffalo. bha is food. ha is a synonym. adhya is a king. Touching the mouth means "I have eaten." Touching the tongue means "I am satisfied." nasti is the essence. hri is shame. Fire means "destroy it with the hurled substances." Touching the thigh is empty. Above is one. Below is none. These are the mudrās and the replies to the mudrās, the secret code of the speech of the heroes.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-fifth chapter, on the rite of the code signs of the ḍākinīs.

Then, in the yoga tantra,
I shall explain the samaya that is hard to find.
A man or a woman who goes from the left grants the accomplishments one desires.
Though dwelling in a house or in a field,
even very far away, they will be known.
There is no union other than Heruka.
The ācārya, the yoginī herself,
is, for the practitioner in this tantra,
truly the excellent one;
she should not be despised or abandoned,
but should be honored according to one's ability.
These eight messenger women increase devotion and faith;
they are always the cause of the accomplishments
and also set the samayas in motion.
Uniting with all the other goddesses,
being bewildered by desire,
nondual and unobstructed,
practicing the samaya as it is to be practiced,
the sovereign of women, wholly united,
the conduct of Brahmā, likewise the ground,
and the continuous conduct without anger:
these eight are the conduct of samaya.
The practitioner who abides in practice
should always know them.
They are common to all the tantras;
without cause they should not be broken.
They are to be taken up by faith alone,
not with the eye and the hand.
This secret should not be revealed;
it should be hidden with great effort.
When the wise one moves his little finger,
the messenger women truly abide.
Pure, impure, and mixed:

the practitioner abides in three ways.
The one who pleases is wholly pure,
and the one who illuminates is a person endowed with qualities.
In land after land the ascetic
should examine the signs of the messengers' forms.
The messenger is like the edge of a sword;
she purifies and increases merit.
Likewise, by being well joined with the messenger
the practitioner gains accomplishment;
even without recitation, offering, and meditation
it will be accomplished very quickly.
With mantra and mudrā the practitioner fully enters into worship itself.
There is no worship other than this:
thus the treatise is certain.
Delighting in the path of the messenger,
the practitioner who strives for accomplishment,
fully endowed with vidyā-mantra and mudrā,
should always partake of food.
The practitioner, being excellent,
should partake of all
the families placed in equipoise,
and should consider nothing not to be eaten.
Here there is no distinction among them.
The practice of the messenger woman:
when one engages in the rite of accomplishment,
there is the messenger alone.
The accomplishment on the side of awakening,
close to the practices
and obtained through the succession of the gurus' lineage,
by empowerment, well endowed with mantra,
is correctly explained to be among the messengers.
With the mudrā, good union and proper manner,
unattached giving and moral discipline,
born from the cause of wisdom, perfectly complete,
the very self of mind rises at dawn.
Having done all the tasks of the body,

one should always practice keeping
the weapon fully on the body, abiding on the body.
With a body that has been purified
one should always recite the mantra.
One should clearly show the places of yoga,
and should not step over the weapons.
One should not be angry with those who have samaya,
and should not transgress against those who strive in earnest.
One should be happy together with them.
For one's own benefit and for the benefit of others
one should engage in the conduct of samaya.
Here one should enjoy together.
At night one should always be clothed in sky,
and should always become black and red.
One should wear what comes from the limbs of living beings.
One who desires bliss will attain bliss.
For the sake of worship, obstruction is wholly abandoned, and one is pure.
Blessed by Śrī Heruka,
one is fully endowed with the five mudrās,
fully endowed with them at all times.
One should not consider family or not family.
One should give up binding the crown hair and the like.
The messenger is the first purity;
the second is held to be union;
eating food from a single dish
is declared to be the third purity.
By thoroughly training in these purities,
if one attains the stage of purification by the pure,
from what would accomplishment not arise?
What is taught in the Compendium of Reality,
likewise what is taught in the Cakrasaṃvara,
what is correctly explained in the Secret Tantra,
and likewise what is taught in the Glorious Supreme Primal
and in the Vajrabhairava,
is accomplished through recitation, vows, and the like;
here, by meditation alone,

the mantrin accomplishes it in an instant.
Those who delight in the path of yoga
should also correctly practice this purity.
The merit that comes from purity,
the vast qualities of practice,
cannot be told by a single mouth,
unless one had a thousand faces.
Glorious Herukī, of great wisdom,
who accomplishes all the pure characteristics,
who drinks the water of the merit of bliss,
is the purifier, the destroyer of evil.
Even by touching and by speaking
one is freed from all evil.
The supreme person who practices
without faults of body and speech
is freed from all evil,
and will attain the grounds
of the sugatas, whose very nature is purity.
Birth after birth he is a tathāgata;
he becomes a righteous king of noble family.
Having thus always made worship,
one should give the torma with faith.
Then, through pure worship,
the hero born from nirvāṇa,
and likewise worship of oneself,
all the buddhas assembled together with their heirs,
all the heroes and the yoginīs,
the stable and the moving,

keeping the time of the worship of the brothers,
abiding at the time of the moon,
together with the brothers and the children,
from whom all happiness and suffering arise:
mantra, likewise mudrā,
and wisdom should not be shown there.
Partaking of the purifying food
always becomes the practice of samaya.

The secret mantra should not be given to anyone;
the instructions should not be allowed to decline.
To those who abide in samaya, as is fitting,
the instructions too should be given.
Apart from the messengers, one does not go to others, deluded by desire.
Always free of attachment to the messenger,
one should enjoy her without transgressing.
Those who do not abide in a lowly birth
are not to be served and honored.
Mother, sister, daughter,
and wife abide as messenger women.
In the circle, or likewise in accomplishment,
hardship will certainly be exhausted.
The highest and the lowest cease together;
thus the substances are ascertained.
The yogin always acts from the left:
he puts the left foot forward first,
he turns the left hand around,
he worships fully with the left half,
he presses down with the left of the body,
with the left he satisfies and eats.
The vow is equal, the vow complete;
the practitioner strives in samaya.
He practices with the family of samaya
and partakes of food together with them.
For those who practice everything within the five families,
the families are proclaimed to be of four kinds.
For those who practice everything within one family,
one worships fully in the practice of yoga.
With beef and horse meat,
dog meat and various kinds,
having made a triangular maṇḍala,
even the buddhas will surely enter.
Likewise the food of the heroes:
the mantrin, fully endowed with mudrā,
should examine all the treatises

on the enjoyments of the emanation of Śrī Heruka.
He should always hold and guard them,
so that in all actions
they are accomplished just as they are, without obstructors;
here others will not come to be.
This is the excellent supreme messenger;
she is diligent and joined together with him.
Unattached, joyful enjoyment is complete:
this is the very division of the yogic substances.
Delighting in the guru's instructions,
its meaning is equal to the supreme.
A brother, or else a father,
is seen in an instant as the lord.
With thick tongue and reddish yellow eyes,
rough, with reddish yellow hair,
in common for all accomplishments,
always delighting in recitation and vows,
fully endowed with mindfulness,
together with the messengers and the rest and their abodes,
the twenty-four supreme ḍākinīs
fully grant the fruit of enjoyment and liberation.
One should always recite the root mantra
that accomplishes all desired aims.
The three worlds, moving and unmoving,
which fully grant the fruit of yoga,
arise from this secret mantra,
fully endowed with mantra and mudrā.
A secret mantra devoid of mudrā
does not bless embodied beings.
As long as there are the deeds of beings,
they should be realized through perfect union.
Whoever hates the yogin
who accomplishes all desired aims
will be born in a hundred births as a dog
and will be born blemished with moles.
For example, someone who wants butter,
though he churns water with effort,

will get no butter or cream;
his body is only wearied.
Holding and worshiping,
relying on another yoga
that has become a cause of a means of livelihood,
is likewise pointless elsewhere.
The hero, great and supreme in yoga,
in whatever region he dwells,
even if it is a low-caste barbarian land,
that land has been fully examined.
As a cause for caring for beings,
he himself still always abides there.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-sixth chapter, on the enumeration of the messengers.

Then, further, I shall explain
the supreme essence of the ḍākinīs,
the distinctive mantra of the heroes,
by merely recalling which
the three worlds are shaken,
and by merely remembering which
true accomplishment is granted step by step.
oṃ sarba buddha ḍākinīye bajra varṇṇanīye huṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
This secret mantra is the great secret mantra,
supreme in performing all actions.
By reciting the great mantra one accomplishes;
all desires are accomplished.
It is that of the Ḍākinī and the yoginī,
of Khaṇḍarohā and of Lāmā as well.
oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
This secret mantra is the great secret mantra,
supreme in performing all actions.
By merely reciting it one accomplishes;
it is chief among all secret mantras.
The fragment of skull and the rest
are the supreme essence of all heroes.
Those secret mantras, supreme and holy,

accomplish all desired aims.
Higher even than the highest,
it is the supreme vow of the heroes.
This is the secret mantra of all;
this is renowned as the mantra.
Beneath the earth and in the heavens,
and likewise in the realm between,
by whatever actions, just as they are,
the three worlds are accomplished.
Having accomplished everything by it,
through the unsurpassed supreme secret mantra
the three worlds are accomplished.
Through those unsurpassed ones
the practitioner accomplishes everything.
The ḍākinīs and all the heroes
are given in brief, not at length.
Having drawn a beautiful drawing,
adorned with various flowers and fruits,
one should meditate on the maṇḍala upon it:
the Ḍākinī and Lāmā,
the yoginī and Khaṇḍarohā,
the heroes and the heroines,
laughing ha ha he he,
the twenty-four families of heroes,
the vow of the net of ḍākinīs.
The heroes explained before are supreme among the valiant;
the supreme of heroes is all of them.
The twenty-four heroes
pervade countless beings.
The heroes and the ḍākinīs,
the yoginī and Lāmā,
and Khaṇḍarohā likewise,
one should view in the place of the wheel.
They accomplish all actions;
one should always worship those who dwell in the wheel.
Well settled in equipoise, one accomplishes one's desires.
Reciting according to the rite explained before,

by contemplating the vow of the net of ḍākinīs,
all the accomplishments
of the great wheel are accomplished as well.
It is taught by ten million buddhas:
for each single ḍākinī
the number of her retinue is ten million.
The yoginī and Lāmā
and Khaṇḍarohā in particular are virtuous, bringing about all accomplishments.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-seventh chapter, on the essence of the nonduality of yoginī and hero, the practice of the sequence of actions of the ḍākinīs and heroes.

Then, further, I shall explain
the characteristics of images and paintings.
From great conch alone
the wise should fashion the form,
complete with all its characteristics,
with excellent limbs and minor limbs.
With a mind of devotion going before,
the yogin should take it up and accomplish it.
One should worship it with excrement and urine,
together with rakta and śukra.
The incense of nara, the great glorious substance,
is the practice of the hero's action;
the supreme state is accomplished.
Then, having worshiped oneself,
one will obtain all one's desires
and will win a king's woman.
Following whatever the rite may be,
one should perform the offering of the hands.
Having drawn the painting on a great hide,
if the practitioner rests in meditative equipoise,
it will be accomplished in seven days;
without doubt, one should practice.
Worship the yoginī and Lāmā,
and likewise one is born in the abode of the ḍākinīs.

Having found bliss through that,
one will always perform the rites.
By always worshiping Lāmā,
her accomplishment is swiftly attained.
To accomplish a ḍākinī,
draw the image on an elephant's hide.
To accomplish a yoginī,
draw the painting on a cow's hide.
To accomplish the sky-goers (khecarīs),
draw the painting on a horse's hide.
To accomplish the earth-goers,
draw the painting on a buffalo's hide.
To accomplish those who move beneath the earth,
draw the painting on a pig's hide.
To accomplish a yakṣiṇī,
draw the image on a wooden board.
To accomplish a daughter of the gods,
draw the image on a board of campaka.
To accomplish nāginīs,
draw the painting on a board of nāga tree.
One who wishes to accomplish a human should draw the image on charnel ground cloth.
For the accomplishment of seeing beyond,
draw the image on a donkey's hide.
One who wishes to gain riches
should draw the image on a rat's hide.
One who wishes to summon liquor
should draw the image on a monkey's hide.
One who wishes to summon blood
should draw the image on a skull cup.
One who wishes to summon seed should draw the image on a dove's skin.
One who wishes to summon a god
should draw the image on a board of deodar.
One who wishes to summon a city
should draw the image on a jackal's hide.
For the rite of pacifying, draw it on the cloth

of a brahmin woman at the time of her menses;
by this, pacification comes about.
For increasing, draw it on the cloth
of a kṣatriya woman at the time of her menses.
For subjugating, draw it on the cloth
of a vaiśya woman at the time of her menses.
For the fierce rite, draw it on the cloth
of a śūdra woman at the time of her menses.
For those to be made to faint,
draw the painting on the cloth of a banner.
For paralyzing, a slab of stone;
for driving apart, a camel's hide;
for summoning, a lion's.
For all rites, a bird's skin,
or else iron alone.
Otherwise, the various rites
are certainly accomplished by mindfulness alone.
In order to do away with obstructors,
draw it on the skins of hares.
For raising up obstructors,
draw it on the skins of the dead.
On gold, silver, and the like,
on copper, crystal, and deodar,
and from vajra, the rites are to be done;
the supreme accomplishment is the special result.
Sandalwood and deodar,
red sandalwood and campaka:
aśoka brings accomplishment;
śrīvṛkṣa becomes a giver of wealth.
Aguru and walnut wood,
the various kinds of milky trees,
birch wood and the rest
become the accomplishment of the accomplished.
What is made from frog bone,
the various kinds of nāga tree,
tortoise bone, and elephant tusk especially bring down rain as well.

Brahmin bone is for pacifying;
elephant bone is for increasing;
for subjugating, horse bone;
for killing, buffalo bone;
for driving apart, camel bone;
for enmity, horse and buffalo;
for paralyzing, dog bone;
for summoning, lion bone.
For going beneath the earth,
use the bones of a pig.
What is made from white earth will always bring about pacification.
For increasing, yellow earth;
for subjugating, it is red earth;
and for killing, black earth.
This is the rite in brief.
Excrement, urine, fat, and blood,
and likewise the great eye salve,
together with ground human bone,
are mixed into the colors.
The self-arisen flower and the seed,
of a low-caste woman and a brahmin woman,
a caṇḍāla woman and a servant woman,
a washerwoman and a dancing woman,
a mother, or else a sister,
or the various kinds of daughter:
having taken these in their presence,
the special śukra and rakta,
having mixed these various things,
one should draw the image according to the rite.
On the earth of an anthill,
with the hair and bone of the dead,
one should draw the excellent one with a brush.
The measuring line is a dead person's thread;
this is the supreme measuring line for images.
Having propitiated with garlands of the departed and so forth,
one should also make lamps of fat.

The incense is the great hero,
and the food offering is made with marrow.
The scent is excrement and vajra water.
The vase is made of skulls,
the vessel for the guest water is a skull,
and the guest water is powdered bone.
With effort the person makes offering,
practicing according to his ability.
Through the application of various mudrās,
endowed with skillful means and wisdom,
whether image or painting,
or otherwise, the wise should perform the rite.
In accordance with whatever the rite may be,
one wears the corresponding clothing,
or naked, with hair let loose,
and having changed one's form and color;
the principal and the yogin,
and the master as well, likewise,
abiding in the proper way of the mudrā,
with excrement, urine, and the excellent hero,
should rest in meditative equipoise and recite.
Songs and dances of many different kinds,
in various forms,
and the finest food and drink should be enjoyed.
These should be done until completion;
this is the sequence of the rite.

At the times of consecration,
it is enhanced with a twofold feast gathering.
Bracelets and wristlets,
armlets and the various kinds of cloth,
finger rings and crest ornaments,
anklets and skull cups,
parasols and yak-tail fans likewise:
various persons give and present them.
The various supreme and excellent heroes,
the various kinds of intoxicating drink,

the supreme rites of samaya,
the various flavors and essences,
the various supreme flowers,
the bodies of supreme goddesses,
the sounds of various music,
the master joined with a mudrā,
and the special assemblies of disciples:
with these and with offerings of food one should worship.
With supreme fragrances of incense,
the various incenses of the victors,
and especially garlands of lamps,
parasols and canopies likewise,
mirrors and yak-tail fans,
nets and half nets,
it is adorned with tassels.
The vases, provided with cloth,
are completely filled with the nectar of wisdom,
with the five jewels and medicines
and the various kinds of fragrance.
The vessel for the guest water especially should be filled with the five sprouts of cūta,
āmra, jambu, kadamba,
bilva and bījapūra.
Bala, moṭa, kṛtañjaḥ,
together with kedri and karikar,
ekavīra and sahade:
among all the herbs that are known,
these five should be known,
and the wise should place them in the vase.
Gold and nutmeg,
camphor and zhosha likewise.
With golden crest ornaments
and adorned with the six mudrās,
all the practitioners, naked,
sing auspicious songs,
and with a completely pure mind,
an attitude of faith going before,

at all times and on all occasions
they should make various vast offerings.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-eighth chapter, on the rite of consecrating painted cloths and the like.

Then, further, I shall explain
the maṇḍala, the excellent maṇḍala,
called the Exalted Heruka;
it is the condensed essence of the maṇḍala.
The practitioner, perfectly in meditative equipoise,
should always guard the samaya.
One whose samaya is broken
will not obtain empowerment and accomplishment in the maṇḍala.
Honey and vermilion, with camphor,
red and sandalwood combined:
those who have entered the feast gathering
all abide in taking the essence.
All hold the sign of the vajra.
By joining the tips of the stout one, the end and the nape,
one should always practice through the stages of yoga.
If one tastes it as a peaceful drink,
one will always obtain accomplishment.
This becomes the five nectars;
it is the entry to all accomplishments.
The four offerings, and likewise the hero,
of the two empowerments in union,
hold the very suchness of union.
For the approach to be done first,
recite a hundred thousand times according to the rite.
Recite the secret mantra of the wheel a hundred thousand times,
and that of one's own deity also a hundred thousand times;
the others should be recited ten thousand times.
The wheel should be drawn as instructed,
and by radiant, supreme persons
the maṇḍala should be drawn and laid out.
Whatever place was explained before,
there the maṇḍala should be drawn.

The ground should be thoroughly prepared:
having pounded it and pounded it well,
it should be level, with splinters removed.
With dung that has not fallen on the ground
one should smear the ground of the maṇḍala.
With charnel ground ash
together with the five nectars
the ground of the maṇḍala is smeared,
and there one rightly begins the maṇḍala.
Engaging in all conduct in the charnel ground,
with the powder of charcoal from burned corpses
and with the substances of the eight charnel grounds,
the master, well settled in equipoise,
should draw the excellent maṇḍala.
The master is endowed with all the characteristics,
has abandoned all bad signs,
knows correctly and knows the tantra,
and knows the secret mantra of Glorious Heruka;
he is without anger, pure and learned,
knows the union, and has gone beyond in wisdom.
His crown is adorned with skulls,
his limbs are smeared with ash,
his body is adorned with curved ornaments,
and bone garlands rest upon his bones.
A single piece adorns his crown,
he is adorned with a garland of bones,
and the khaṭvāṅga rests in his hand.
Having made oneself into Śrī Heruka,
then beneath that one should recollect Glorious Heruka
and set him in the heart of this wheel.
Having thus armored oneself,
one should set fences in the directions,
and below one should also set weapons.
Having laid out oneself as the wheel,
above one makes a net of arrows,
and around oneself a net of weapons.

One thus armored
cannot be overcome even by the thirty-three gods.
Having thus protected oneself well
and adorned oneself with mantra and mudrā,
one should draw the terrifying maṇḍala
that bestows all accomplishments.
Then, with a thread from the dead
moistened with great blood,
one should strike the lines of the terrifying maṇḍala
of the supreme city of Glorious Heruka.
It is square, eight cubits across,
with four doors and four corners all around.
The mantra practitioner applies it twofold
and recites the Cakrasaṃvara of the net of ḍākinīs.
What is placed in its center
is a variegated lotus with eight petals,
with petals and a blazing center,
perfectly endowed with anthers.
In the center one should set the hero
in the form of the great Bhairava, radiant and intensely blazing,
laughing loudly, "Ha ha!",
adorned with ornaments of a garland of skulls,
excellent, with three eyes and four faces,
wearing an elephant hide,
with fine brows and a spreading vajra frown,
holding a khaṭvāṅga in his hand,
and adorned with a garland of fifty heads.
The goddess who stands before him,
called Vajravārāhī,
is exceedingly terrifying, facing the great Bhairava;
she should be given a fierce form with three eyes.
Her skull cup is filled with entrails,
blood drips from her mouth,
and toward gods and asuras, together with humans,
in all directions she makes the threatening gesture.
The twenty-four ḍākinīs

arisen from the family of Vārāhī
should be worshiped in the directions and intermediate directions and in the hub of the wheel.
Likewise here the heroes too,
abiding properly in the wheel, are worshiped.
If the practitioner desires accomplishment,
he should worship the nondual hero.
Then, as for making the vases:
they should be without a black base and other flaws,
of pearl, gold and jewels,
coral, silver and copper.
A vessel well filled with all kinds of food
should be placed on top.
The neck should be wound with thread,
and the mouth adorned with leaves.
Well wrapped with a pair of cloths,
eight should be set out at the doors.
The ninth vase, wrapped
with a pair of cloths, is placed in the center.
Of gold, or silver, or jewels, or

of pearls, it should be made beautiful.
All around the maṇḍala, with jewels
and with gold, it is beautifully arrayed.
Having worshiped the delightful supreme city,
there is no doubt it will be accomplished.
One's own face and whole body
should be well cleansed with scented water.
If one desires the supreme accomplishment,
one should offer a hundred lamps.
All the ḍākinīs of the sky
should be set above by the mind;
whatever ḍākinīs there are on the earth
should be set throughout the maṇḍala;
and whatever there are, set them below the earth.
All the mātṛkās should be set in the directions and the intermediate directions.

If one desires the supreme accomplishment,
one should offer scent, flowers, incense
and also a hundred lamps,
and in the maṇḍala of Glorious Heruka
worship the heroes and yoginīs.
With banners red and likewise yellow,
white, black and tawny,
and likewise various cloths,
many garlands of flowers,
canopies, and very beautiful arrows
hung with silk,
and likewise with foods, snacks and drinks,
one should worship in perfect meditative equipoise.
Then, for the sake of accomplishment, the practitioner should first please the master.
One who desires accomplishment, perfectly in equipoise,
should worship the guru as best he can.
Adorned with the sound of bells, with flowers and incense,
he rings a bell of very sweet sound;
the practitioner beats a drum
and should call out, "Ha ha!"
Having thus worshiped the maṇḍala according to the rite,
with everything desirable,
one covers the face of one's beloved son
well with silk,
fills his joined palms with flowers,
and has him scatter lotuses and circumambulate.
Having circled to the left, he prostrates,
and also utters the sounds of hūṃ and phaṭ.
Standing in the posture with the right leg extended,
one should place the son of accomplishment.
Having scattered the flowers from his palms,
with the thought of where they will fall,
and having also made the circumambulations,
in perfect meditative equipoise,
the practitioner makes him enter.
Then, carrying the offering into the city,

keeping to the right side,
he casts the handful of flowers onto the maṇḍala.
Wherever in the maṇḍala the flower falls,
that is to be shown as his family.
Then the master, well
and perfectly in equipoise, worships the mudrā.
Then, for the disciple, secondly,
with great vermilion recited over three times,
a tilaka is made for him.
Then one uncovers the disciple's face
and should show him the maṇḍala.
Whatever the place of his deity may be,
there one should show it to him correctly.
Together with the master,
having bowed down deeply,
in a sequence that begins from the left,
he should then circumambulate.
To the maṇḍala and to the guru
he should prostrate according to the rite.
Then he should offer the gurus the fee
that the Tathāgata has taught:
offering a hundred thousand in gold,
various kinds of jewels,
a hundred pairs of cloth,
an elephant, a horse, or a kingdom,
earrings and bracelets,
necklaces and excellent rings,
crest ornaments made of gold,
a good wife and a daughter,
male and female servants and sisters:
having prostrated, he should offer them.
"From this day on, as a servant
I offer myself to you":
thus the intelligent one, with complete faith,
should offer himself as well.
What must thus be made certain the practitioner makes thoroughly certain.

Then the ḍākinīs
and yoginīs become pleased with him.
The Ḍākinī and Lāmā,
Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī:
the practitioner is together with the ḍākinīs,
and all the beings who move with them;
there is no doubt that the practitioner
will do whatever is to be done for them.
When this yoga is accomplished,
he is unhindered in the three worlds:
invisibility, the cavern, abiding in and moving through the sky,
fleetness of foot, and likewise taking the essence;
by merely wishing, the practitioner
will always and continually produce them.
He makes many forms
and will travel through the sky.
Especially among the ḍākas
he overpowers all beings as well;
by the application of a single glance
in an instant he produces union itself.
The mantra practitioner who, without seeing the maṇḍala,
desires to be a yogin
is like one who strikes at the sky with his fist
or drinks the water of a mirage.
This yoga is supreme and most excellent,
the highest of all applications.
Whoever constantly desires it will go on outshining gods and humans.
Whether in the Compendium of Reality,
or the Secret, or the Vajrabhairava,
this king of maṇḍalas
has not appeared before and will not appear.
Whatever has been explained or not explained,
all of it abides in Glorious Heruka.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the forty-ninth chapter, on the rite of the maṇḍala.

Then, further, I shall explain
what is endowed with the junctures of union.
What is without water is the juncture:
unstained, with attachment abandoned.
The juncture belongs to all beings;
it is all sentient beings.
The juncture is purified existence;
it is Heruka himself, guardian of the vowels.
The yogin should meditate and recite.
He appears, arising all at once,
holding the color of a conch and of jasmine,
complete with all the ornaments,
marked with all the marks,
with three faces and six arms,
three eyes, and the mood of compassion,
his hair loose, a skull on his forehead,
and on the crown of his head the moon:
endowed with the glory of Heruka.
The junctures are the most excellent of accomplishments;
this is to be done in four sessions.

The four joys are joy and the rest:
at the navel, at the heart lotus in the middle of the breasts,
at the root of the tongue and on the top of the head,
are joy, supreme joy itself,
excellent joy and the coemergent.
The first has sixty-four petals;
the second, with eight, is supreme;
the third has sixteen petals;
the fourth has thirty-two petals.
Abiding at the root of Vārāhī's navel
is the coemergent joy, the supreme Heruka.
At the juncture of the time of union
one should meditate on the four noble truths.
Suffering is the wheel of emanation;
the origin is the wheel of Dharma;
cessation is the wheel of enjoyment;
and the path is great bliss.

Having thus blessed oneself at the junctures,
one makes the yoga certain:
white and blue and green,
with three eyes, in the mood of compassion and emptiness,
through the three gates of liberation and the three bodies
one applies them in sequence for complete purity.
Holding vajra and bell together,
holding a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
holding a head and a curved knife in his hands,
he sits in the cross-legged posture of the sattva,
on a moon and a preta in the center of a lotus,
his hair loose, clothed in the directions,
intoxicated with the mood of delight.
If one always meditates on the junctures at their times,
the supreme vow is accomplished.
Excrement and vajra water,
Ratnasambhava and Amitābha,
and Amoghasiddhi likewise:
always mixing these together,
the yogin always bows to the junctures.
These secret mantras are always as well;
Heruka is the supreme Gāyatrī:
oṃ śrī herukāya vidmahe vidyārājaya vidmahe ta vīrā prajodaya āḥ hūṃ
If one always meditates on the junctures,
one should recite the supreme Gāyatrī.
The name Gāyatrī means the Veda;
performing all rites is virtuous.
One will not die an untimely death,
and pacifying, increasing and subjugating are accomplished as well.
The mantra practitioner always speaks of matters
past, future and present.
This accomplishment is thoroughly achieved;
immediately, along with the great accomplishment,
the three worlds are accomplished.
When the lord of practitioners, having meditated
and knowing the rite of Heruka, abides in the vowed observance for three days,

he goes to the abode of the gods.
Having obtained the wisdom of the gods,
he also takes on the supreme divine body.
He gains mastery over all speech,
and having become omniscient,
he has completely abandoned aging and death.
Attended by buddhas and gods,
he sports as a buddha within existence.
For as long as three days and nights,
he should practice the coemergent with a mudrā.
Having seen her, he should rightly accomplish the sister.
Having worshiped for three days,
Vajraheruka, the glorious deity,
and all the rest will come.
Having planted his knees on the ground,
and having bowed to him,
the practitioner should always worship.
Pleased with what the practitioner desires,
at once the hero knows all.
He holds every chief,
roams throughout the three realms,
and the practitioner becomes supreme.
This is the greatly glorious hero,
who has completely abandoned all duality.
By merely being conscious of him,
the earth encircled by its girdle,
and gods, asuras and humans too,
at once come under the power
of that very practitioner.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the fiftieth chapter, on the junctures of the Gāyatrī.

Then, further, I shall explain
the meditation on the seven syllables.
From the syllable hūṃ there rightly arises
Vajraḍāka, of great bliss,
with six arms, three faces and three eyes,

marked with all the marks
and endowed with the eighty excellent minor marks:
the chief arisen from the vowels and consonants,
united in equal union with Vārāhī,
empty and pervaded by compassion,
united with vajra and bell together.
He wears a human hide as his garment,
holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and in his right hand a trident;
he bestows all desired fruits.
He has a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
wears variegated vajra matted locks,
and bears a half moon on the crown of his head.
His body is adorned with the six mudrās.
Bhairava together with his consort
he presses down with his foot in the posture with the right leg extended.
He sits on a sun upon a variegated lotus,
seated in the center of six wheels,
united with six yoginīs;
he swiftly bestows accomplishment.
The first is the goddess Herukī,
the second is Vajrabhairavī,
the third is the Fierce Wrathful One,
the fourth is Vajrasūryā,
the fifth is Vajraraudrī,
the sixth is Vajraḍākinī.
They should be set out starting from the left.
These goddesses are exceedingly fierce,
with three eyes and loosened hair;
they wear the supreme garment of the directions.
All are seated on a preta and a sun.
Blue and yellow and green,
red and smoke-colored, and likewise white,
they hold a small drum and a bell.
All wear human hides
and have head ornaments of garlands of skulls.
They sit in the manner of the right leg extended and the left drawn in.

They arise rightly from six syllables.
The goddesses' gaze is the sign.
Just as the protector's color is,
so too is Vārāhī's;
the mudrās and hand emblems are likewise.
Blue and yellow and green,
they wear tiger hides as garments,
embracing evenly the goddess's thighs,
intent on supreme joy.
oṃ hrīḥ h ha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
From those syllables one should meditate on the ḍākinī with six limbs.
The seventh, set in the center,
is Heruka arisen from the syllable hūṃ.
In the center, the factor of awakening that is mindfulness is the Blessed One, Glorious Heruka. The factor of awakening that is discrimination of phenomena is Vajraherukī. The factor of awakening that is diligence is Vajrabhairavī. The factor of awakening that is joy is the Fierce Wrathful One. The factor of awakening that is pliancy is Vajrasūryā. The factor of awakening that is meditative absorption is Vajraraudrī. The factor of awakening that is equanimity is Vajraḍākinī.
One should meditate on these seven factors of awakening,
applying and meditating on them in their sequence.
Reciting the immeasurable secret mantras,
the supreme abode of all the wrathful ones,
even a practitioner of little merit
gains accomplishment within half a month;
always meditating one day on each,
in seven days, without doubt.
On the full moon of the last month of spring,
with mother, sister, daughter or niece,
by the rite of wisdom and skillful means,
having recited and meditated day and night,
at dawn one becomes equal to the Glorious Heruka.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the high, this is the fifty-first chapter, on generation through meditation on the near-heart mantra.

Further, I shall explain the heart mantra,
which benefits all sentient beings.
Arisen from the wisdom of hūṃ,
great bliss arisen from bliss,
blue and white and fierce,
with eight faces, exceedingly terrifying,
with three eyes and sixteen arms,
he is adorned with a garland of heads.
He has a head ornament of a garland of skulls,
wears matted locks with a half moon,
his head is marked with a variegated vajra,
and his body is adorned with the six mudrās.
The terrifying great Bhairava
he presses down with his right foot extended;
the exceedingly terrifying Kālarātri as well
he presses down with his left foot extended.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he squeezes the breasts of Vārāhī.
Having flayed the skin of Brahmā, he wears it as an ornament.
A trident and an axe,
a khaṭvāṅga, a small drum, a supreme curved knife,
and the eighth holds a hook:
so are the right hands.
A skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a head, the supreme one holding a noose,
a hammer, and the excellent threatening gesture:
the wisdom of Śrī is perfectly complete.
In his lap is the form of Vārāhī,
fierce, red and white,
her two thighs wrapped well around him,
her hair loose, with three eyes,
adorned with a garland of skulls,
abiding in his faces and hands.
She has a girdle of bone ornaments,
her face with fangs bared,
clothed in the directions, gazing with passion,
the circle of her hips broad.
Blue, white and likewise red,

yellow, green and smoke-colored,
the colors of smoke, ash and cloud:
she abides in faces and forms such as these.
The goddess holds an arrow and a bow,
and has cast aside the skin of Brahmā.
Upon a variegated lotus
she sits at the center of a moon and a sun.
Seated at the center of an eight-spoked wheel,
one should meditate on the outer maṇḍala.
In the center of the hub of the lotus
the Blessed One is certainly to be set.
oṃ is on the eastern petal,
and there one sets the Illuminating Ḍākinī.
va is on the northern petal,
and there one sets the Horse-Faced Ḍākinī.
jra is Vajraraudrī;
the ḍākinī should be set in the west.
he ru is set on the southern petal:
the ḍākinī of golden color.
Yellow and blue-green, white and red,
with three faces, contorted and fierce,
clothed in the directions, with loosened hair,
they are seated upon corpses,
and with the right leg extended they conquer the four māras.
Fierce, with garlands of skulls,
on the petals of the thick lotus,
they gaze with eyes of passion, and they desire;
through the mood of compassion they are bliss.
They hold arrow and bow,
supreme ones holding noose and hook;
they carry skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
and sound the small drum.
Yellow, green and blue;
blue-green, red and white;
white, green and blue;
red, blue and green:
thus, with their colors distinguished,

one should meditate on the supreme samaya deities.
In the four intermediate directions, vases filled with bodhicitta are placed.
In the eastern direction is he;
her name is called Helika.
In the northern direction is ru;
the ḍākinī is Rucakī.
In the western direction is ru;
she is called Rucakamalī.
In the southern direction is ka;
she is known as Kaṅkālī.
In the direction of Agni is Hūṃkārī,
in the direction of Nairṛti is Phaṭkārī,
in the direction of Vāyu is Ḍamari,
and in Īśāna's is Kilikila.
These eight are great goddesses;
they bestow all accomplishments.
As with the faces and forms before,
so it is here as well.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
bell, small drum and curved knife,
with three eyes and loosened hair,
clothed in the directions, seated with the right leg extended,
ornamented with garlands of skulls,
adorned with the five mudrās,
fully endowed with all ornaments,
fierce, violent and exceedingly terrifying.
One should meditate on all of them seated upon corpses,
with three eyes, intoxicated with passion.
In the corner of Īśāna is she called Blue Utpala;
in the direction of Vāyu is she called Supreme Net;
in the direction of Nairṛti is she called Lambodarī;
in the direction of Agni is she called Śabarī.
Yellow, blue-green and blue,
and red-yellow is the fourth.
They hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
curved knife and the supreme small drum,

and the fourth is a vajra spear.
Clothed in the directions, they sport with passion,
excellent women with hanging bellies,
their vulvas long and wide,
their three eyes rolling and fierce,
their hair loose, exceedingly terrifying,
with head ornaments of garlands of skulls,
decked with all the ornaments.
At the eastern door, from baṃ, one sets the ḍākinī called the Fierce One; at the southern door, from raṃ, the ḍākinī called the Playful Fierce One; at the western door, from sa, the ḍākinī called the Supreme Blazing One. At the northern door, from hā, is the ḍākinī called the Supreme Victorious Garland.
Blue, white and yellow indeed,
holding a hook and a small drum,
carrying skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
curved knife, head, and threatening gesture;
white, blue and green,
holding a noose and a small drum,
holding skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
holding threatening gesture, curved knife and head;
red, blue and green,
with an iron chain, small drum and curved knife,
holding skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
a head and the supreme threatening gesture;
green and white mingled,
with supreme faces yellow and red,
bell, small drum and curved knife,
khaṭvāṅga and skull cup,
and hands with a head and the threatening gesture:
with loosened hair, greatly fierce,
faces with three rolling eyes,
mouths gaping and tongues moving,
they sit in the postures with the right leg extended and with the left leg extended.
With head ornaments of garlands of skulls,
holding the supreme garment of the directions,
they are seated at the center of a sun on a corpse and a lotus,

adorned with garlands of heads.
All bear the five mudrās,
adorned with necklaces of heads,
and wear the crest of Akṣobhya,
their eyes rolling and moving.
Arisen from twenty-two syllables,
the supreme one should be meditated on in the heart.
This, of all the secret mantras,
is the supreme one of twenty-two syllables:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru kaṃ hūṃ ḍākinī jāla saṃvar hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
Each syllable is set out,
and likewise the heart mantra of the ḍākinīs.
hūṃ śrī are the god and the goddess:
the union of body, speech and mind.

In the center is the purified Blessed One,
who should be meditated on and thoroughly contemplated.
The eight liberations are the various doors.
Seeing in terms of form is empty;
seeing outer forms while having no inner form is also empty;
seeing as one who beholds the beautiful and the unbeautiful is also empty.
Seeing in terms of the sphere of infinite space is also empty;
seeing in terms of the sphere of infinite consciousness is also empty;
seeing in terms of the sphere of nothingness is also empty;
the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception too is empty.
Seeing perception and feeling as ceased is also empty.

The sixteen arms too are emptiness: the emptiness of the inner, the emptiness of the outer, the emptiness of the outer and inner, the emptiness of emptiness, the great emptiness, the emptiness of the ultimate, the emptiness of the conditioned, the emptiness of the unconditioned, the emptiness of what is beyond extremes, the emptiness of what has neither beginning nor end, the emptiness of what is not discarded, the emptiness of intrinsic nature, the emptiness of all phenomena, the emptiness of own characteristics, the emptiness of non-apprehension, the emptiness of the nonexistence of entities, and the emptiness of essential nature.

Just as the Blessed One is,
so too is Vārāhī.

The Blessed One whose form is nondual,
glorious Heruka, is consciousness;
Vārāhī is like space.

The purity of the four goddesses:
the Illuminating Ḍākinī herself
is the analytical knowledge of meanings;
she who is the Horse-Faced One is the analytical knowledge of phenomena;
the ḍākinī Vajraraudrī
is the analytical knowledge of definitions;
the Golden-Hued Ḍākinī
is the analytical knowledge of eloquence.
These goddesses are in the center of the petals.

As for the four reliances,
Helika is reliance on the meaning;
Rucakī is reliance on the letters;
Rucakamile relies on wisdom;
Kaṅkālī is reliance on consciousness.

On the wheels of the east, the north, the west,
and the south,
the four summaries of the Dharma are set out.
hūṃ is: all formations are impermanent.
phaṭ is: all formations are suffering.
Ḍamari is: all phenomena are without self.
kilikīla is: all phenomena are peace.

The wheels of Agni, Nairṛti, Vāyu,
and Īśāna, all of them,
are purified by the goddesses.
The four fearlessnesses: fearlessness in realizing all phenomena of entities is the Blue Utpala Goddess. Fearlessness in teaching all phenomena is Supreme Mindfulness. Fearlessness in entering the path of renunciation is Lambodarī. Fearlessness in knowing the exhaustion of the defilements is Śabarī.
The maṇḍala goddesses in the intermediate directions purify the four corners by this.
The goddesses at the four doors:

She Who Makes Fierce is the faculty of faith;
the Playfully Fierce One is the faculty of diligence;
the Supreme Blazing One is the faculty of mindfulness;
the Supreme Victorious One is the faculty of meditative absorption.
The eighty excellent minor marks
are the Blessed One, the glorious Herukavajra.
The thirty-two major marks
are the noble Prajñā, the Blessed Lady, Vajravārāhī herself.

This is the fifty-second chapter, on generation through meditating on the heart of twenty-two syllables, from the highest of the high, the Abhidhānottara Tantra.

Then, further, what is to be explained
is the purity of the maṇḍalas.
The eye of all the elements
is known as the lines of Vairocana.
The sequence pervaded by the bhaga
the wise know as the lines of the maṇḍala.
The times are known to be of various kinds,
and the various offerings follow the rite.
Pullīrama is the lotus.
Jālandhara is the wheel of mind;
Oḍḍiyāna is the wheel of speech;
Arbuda is the wheel of body.
Godāvarī is the four corners:
Rāmeśvara is the direction of Agni;
Devīkoṭa is Nairṛti;
Mālava is the corner of Vāyu;
Īśāna is Kāmarūpa.
Such is the purity of the four corners;
of this there is no doubt.
Oḍra is the eastern door;
Triśakuni is the southern door;
Kosala is the western door;
Kaliṅga is the northern door.
The eastern archway is Lampāka;

Kāñcī is the southern archway;
Himālaya is the western;
Pretapurī is the northern.
Gṛhadevatā is the divine frieze;
Saurāṣṭra is the jewel ground;
Suvarṇadvīpa is the half-nets;
Nagara is the yak-tail whisks,
the bells, the victory banners and the flags.
Sindhu is the circular vajra line;
Maru is the door alcoves;
Kulutā is the unsurpassed lines
of the vajra, of the jewel,
and of the maṇḍala.
It is four-cornered with four doors,
adorned with four archways,
adorned with nets and half-nets,
and adorned with silks and garlands.
All the corner sections,
and the junctions of the doors and door alcoves,
are adorned with vajras and jewels.
The very body of the wheel of body
is Amoghasiddhi, who moves through it.
The wheel of speech is Amitābha;
the wheel of mind is Akṣobhya;
the center of the lotus holds Ratnasambhava.
The one who has the form of the outer maṇḍala:
meditate on him as Vairocana.
Feeling is the wheel of body;
perception is the wheel of speech;
the wheel of mind is formations;
consciousness is the lotus, without doubt.
The fifth line, which is supreme,
has a nature purified by that.
All the grounds and all the lines
should be meditated on as completely purified by the heroes.
The twenty-four lines
are purified by the heroes.

The wheel is purified by the ḍākinīs.
At the hub is the seed of Vārāhī, kṣaḥ:
it is the glorious supreme Heruka.

The petals are purified by the ḍākinīs.
The maṇḍala, the supreme maṇḍala,
is the purity of the thirty-seven.
To summarize the heart of the maṇḍala:
the first maṇḍala is the letters;
the second maṇḍala is the hand emblems;
the third is said to be the mudrās of the hands;
the fourth is what has become form;
the fifth is the offering of flowers;
the sixth is the maṇḍala of the assembly itself.
The center is the ground Utterly Joyful,
together with the hub of the lotus.
The wheel of mind is the Stainless;
the wheel of speech is the Luminous;
the wheel of body is the Radiant;
the four corners are the Difficult to Master;
the four doors are the Far Gone;
the corner sections are the Immovable;
the vajra lines are Good Intelligence;
the archways are the Cloud of Dharma.
Having drawn such a maṇḍala,
one should always meditate on it and make offerings;
one will obtain vast accomplishments.
The reality of the supreme maṇḍala
of Cakrasaṃvara, the wheel of restraint,
is glorious Heruka, the supreme wisdom.
The maṇḍala of the bhaga lotus
is the supreme body of Vārāhī.
That is the gathering of the maṇḍala,
the maṇḍala of supreme great bliss.
The maṇḍala of hero and yoginī
is the maṇḍala of nondual union.
The reality of the self is meditative absorption;

the reality of the deity is likewise;
the reality of mantra is the mudrā.
Such a maṇḍala, the highest of the sublime,
transcends meditation on all the limbs,
is free of thought and conceptualization,
and transcends the bindu of the mother letters:
that is the supreme maṇḍala.
All phenomena cannot be examined;
it engages in both Dharma and non-Dharma.
Such a maṇḍala, as it is taught,
is like pure space.
Passion and dispassion are equal in passion,
arisen like a ruby and water together.
The passion of one's own mind is the supreme red;
these are the supreme maṇḍala.
Mentation is all the elements,
form and formless, without stain.
What urges and awakens is mentation;
mind is the maṇḍala of the enlightened mind.
The maṇḍala is said to be the body;
the maṇḍala is said to be the bhaga;
the maṇḍala is the mind of awakening,
pervading the moving and the unmoving,
below the earth, upon the earth, and above the earth.

This is the fifty-third chapter, teaching the meditation of the maṇḍala, from the highest of the high, the Abhidhānottara Tantra.

Then the Secret is to be explained,
which grants benefit to all sentient beings:
arisen from the vowels and consonants,
the supreme city of the dharmadhātu,
adorned with nets and half-nets,
and adorned with silks and garlands.
In its center is a great vajra
that transforms into a four-faced one.
In the middle of its hub
is a crossed wheel together with its hub,

the eightfold wheel of mind.
In the center of a sun disc,
in the middle of the wheel's hub,
is a multicolored eight-petaled lotus,
mixed with crossed vajras,
the twentyfold dwelling place of the deities,
taught to be in the middle of the hub.
In the center of the sun disc,
from hūṃ one makes Heruka,
four-faced and eight-armed,
three-eyed, his body white.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he squeezes the breasts of Vārāhī.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
his body adorned with the six mudrās.
With his outstretched right leg
he presses on the brains of all the wicked.
Bhairava and Kālarātri,
fainting and utterly intoxicated:
he presses their brains with his feet.
He tramples the naked ones who cry out,
with the skin of the Victor above.
With his hands he holds a hook,
and likewise a ḍamaru drum,
and holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga;
elsewhere too he holds a head.
His head is marked with a crossed vajra,
and he bears a half moon on his head.
He has a crown ornament of a garland of skulls,
his crest adorned with Akṣobhya,
and he wears the necklace of Brahmā.
Emanating his own seven wrathful ones,
just as the color of the Blessed One,
so too is the supreme Vārāhī.
Her body is black with a red sheen,
beautiful with the luster of splendor.
A curved knife, a skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga,

a bell, a ḍamaru drum, a spear,
a hook and a noose likewise:
the goddess has eight arms.
Her faces are white, blue and green;
the upper face is a beautiful red.
The faces to right and left
are yellow and green in form.
Otherwise, just as the lord is,
so too is Vārāhī.
She is naked with her hair loose,
wearing a girdle of unbroken pieces.
On the four lotus petals are the ḍākinīs;
in the corners are vases and skull cups.
The wheel of mind is as explained before.
The heroes and ḍākinīs likewise
are on the two wheels of speech and body,
in the east, the north, the west and the south.
At the doors are the door guardians:
the Crow-Faced One and all the rest.
In the corners are Yamadāḍhī and the others.
The particulars, as one wishes,
were explained by Vajragarbha;
some hold them to be yoginīs.
Following the sequence of the guru's tradition,
the various families explained before
should be meditated on as one wishes.
Further, the faces and the colors
follow the colors of the ḍākinīs,
and the hand emblems and mudrās are as explained before.
Set out the positions and so forth in that order.
Following the rite explained before,
set out the secret mantras in their proper order.
The meaning of the purity of the thirty-seven:
the supreme meditation should be meditated on.
What arises within the vowels and consonants
should be meditated on and thoroughly contemplated.
Into the pure city of the dharmadhātu

the realm of sentient beings fully enters.
This yoga is secret;
it should not be taught to anyone.

This is the fifty-fourth chapter, on the meditation of the city of the dharmadhātu, from the highest of the high, the Abhidhānottara Tantra.

Then, further, what is to be explained
is the meditation of the bhaga lotus.
In response to Vajragarbha's request,
the Blessed One declared:
Truly secret, definitively secret,
the vowels and consonants abide in the triangle.
Meditate on a lotus of three petals.
Vajravārāhī and Heruka
are to be meditated on at the hub.
Vajraḍāka and Lāmā,
and the third is Khaṇḍarohā.

The Blessed One is red and blue;
Vārāhī too is red and blue.
The Ḍākinī is blue and yellow,
Lāmā is green and yellow,
and Khaṇḍarohā is red and yellow.
They are one-faced with four arms.
The Blessed Lord is four-faced,
four-legged and four-armed.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
and is well marked by bell and vajra.
He has a crown ornament of a garland of skulls,
and is marked with a crossed vajra.
Peaceful, he bears a half moon;
Akṣobhya binds his crest.
He always wears the secret garment,
and is adorned with a garland of skulls.
These are the face and marks of Vārāhī:
she embraces him closely with her two thighs;
naked, with her hair loose,
three-eyed, she clings to him in loving passion.

Bhairava and Kālarātri, the two,
he tramples under his feet,
and he stands in the posture with the right leg outstretched.
His body bears the six mudrās,
his fangs are bared,
and he is intoxicated with the passion of compassion.
The right face is white, the left green,
the upper pale blue; the body is white.
Rūpiṇī should be imagined as the bhaga;
the vowels and consonants are the supreme of the bhaga.
Further, in the middle of the triangle,
meditate on the wheel of the lotus.
In the center of the wheel of mind,
imagine a multicolored lotus.
In the center are Heruka and Vārāhī;
on the petals set the Ḍākinī and the others.
In the corners are white skull cups;
the wheel of mind moves in the sky.
In the eastern corner is the wheel of body;
on the wheel in the corner of Vāyu
are the Crow-Faced One and the rest, eight in all.
The wheel of speech is in the corner of Nairṛti.
Of the four wheels in the triangle,
the east is the ḍākinī of body,
the direction of Vāyu is the ḍākinī of Yama, Nairṛti is the ḍākinī of speech,
and in the center is Vajraheruka.
Blue and white, smoke-colored,
and blue and red: these are the four.
Each holds its own hand emblems alike.
Otherwise, according to the color of each one's own lord,
the wheels of heroes are likewise of that color.
The ḍākinīs of the wheel of mind
should be visualized as red in color;
the color of the heroes is black,
joined in nondual embrace.
The heroes of the wheel of body

should be visualized with white bodies;
the ḍākinīs are yellow in color,
fully joined with the two heroes.
The Crow-Faced One, Yamadāḍhī and the rest:
of the two forms, half is female.
Together with their own means,
they are intoxicated with delight and passion.
The heroes of the wheel of speech are red,
and the ḍākinīs are green.
The signs in the sequence explained before
are again according to the division of the families.
All are seated on seats of pretas,
adorned with garlands of heads.
All bear the five mudrās,
and one sets out the lord of the six mudrās.
All wear the diadem of their own family.
Meditate on them in their sequence, just as they are.
By the application of the time of the ḍākinīs,
having meditated in accordance with how it is,
one should set out the secret mantras of the armor.
The sequences of body, speech and mind,
by the application of the rite explained before:
meditate on the sequence of the hero's limbs.
The calm abiding that is secret and hidden
is the wheel of bliss of the ḍākinīs.
Always resting in equipoise,
always meditate on the supreme union.
This should not be taught to anyone;
its reality should not be spoken to anyone.
If one always meditates on the union of the two organs,
accomplishment will come.
One should always guard the pledges
and also partake of foods and refreshments.
Going and going, at all times,
purify thoroughly at rising and setting.
Whoever listens to this wisdom,
that mantra practitioner will swiftly be accomplished.

This is the fifty-fifth chapter, on the meditation of secret union, from the highest of the high, the Abhidhānottara Tantra.

Then, further, what is to be explained
is the supreme secret wisdom.
The meditation of the vast secret mantras
of the five families I shall explain.
To those whose understanding is wrong understanding
you should not explain it at all.
As it is taught through the succession of the gurus,
by which one quickly comes to understand:
through thousands of koṭis of births,
urged on by the wisdom of illusion,
true faith is generated,
and one abides in the way of yogic conduct.
The mute, the dull, the wicked,
those whose understanding is a child's understanding,
sentient beings not fully ripened,
and those corrupted by outsider treatises:
none of them understand it.
Covered by the darkness of ignorance,
they always delight in conceit,
vicious-minded with pride and the like.
None of them understand
the secret domain of the buddhas.
Glorious Heruka truly enters;
by the great-souled master
accomplishment is swiftly produced,
and immediate conviction is brought about.
One who knows the various vows
should teach the activities of the rite.
The three realms of existence without exception:
he knows the teaching of the Omniscient One.
By seeing, by touching,
by hearing and by remembering,
one is freed from all evils;
thus it is, without doubt.
Arranging the deities in reverse,

reversing the divisions of the mantras,
reversing all the maṇḍalas as well,
and not meditating on them separately;
having extracted the reversed letters,
that reversed secret meditation
accomplishes all the heart mantras.
It gathers all the ritual manuals,
and is common to all the tantras.
For minds that are fully ripened,
here the pledges of the mantras,
of union and the rest, are thus taught.
It is spoken as the Sugata's consolation.
The pure body is without fault;
even a mantra practitioner of little merit
will find me through my delight.
There, there is no protection and nothing to eat,
no maṇḍala and no lord of the maṇḍala,
no recitation, no ascetic discipline and no fire offering;
in short, it has the character of a gathered mind.
The wisdom of the consciousness that is grasped comes from diligence in what the guru has taught.
For outsider treatises
that path is very far away.
Yogins, by skillful means,
are diligent in attending upon the guru.

The defining characteristic of the Teacher is taught,
and the reality of the hero is taught.
Moment by moment is the self of yoga;
moment by moment it is endowed with the mudrā.
Everything, entirely, is momentary;
in an instant the secret mantra is spoken.
Having set the knees upon the ground,
one makes supplication oneself.
What the Blessed Goddess asked about
is the vast, nondual state.
This abides in all beings,

playing in the moving and the unmoving.
Vajragarbha said:
Listen well to what I shall explain as is fitting,
and grasp it with an examining mind.
That in which the self of all always abides
is just what was explained before:
the body is said to be the maṇḍala,
and it comes to have nine doors.
There the great wheel of the navel
is said to be called the Omniscient.
The vajra holder who has entered there,
partless and free of parts,
plays within embodied beings,
beyond the body and without stain.
Sometimes he dwells in forms;
sometimes in the nose and in speech;
sometimes as sounds in the ear;
sometimes as excrement and vajra water;
sometimes as the mind together with feeling;
sometimes as thirst and sometimes as hunger;
sometimes wrathful and sometimes peaceful;
sometimes he gazes in bliss;
sometimes he is desire for women;
sometimes he kills and destroys;
sometimes he beats the music;
sometimes he dwells as flower and fruit;
sometimes he plays and enjoys;
sometimes he dwells as the life force;
sometimes he is earth, water and fire;
sometimes the five great elements;
sometimes, by the distinctions of caste,
brahmins and caṇḍālas;
sometimes mother and sister;
sometimes wife and daughter;
sometimes Brahmā and Īśāna, Viṣṇu and the sun itself;
sometimes the moon together with the stars;

sometimes he becomes day and night;
sometimes all the beings of the three realms,
the maker and the inexhaustible victor;
sometimes he is subdued by the power of peace,
the vajra holder of unmanifest emptiness;
sometimes he goes to great awakening;
sometimes he conquers Māra the enemy;
sometimes he has the very nature of a child;
sometimes he is old and decrepit;
sometimes seized by a great illness;
sometimes moving and unmoving;
sometimes blue and vermilion;
sometimes white and yellow;
sometimes the Buddha Vairocana;
sometimes Tārā and Pāṇḍaravāsinī;
sometimes Locanā and Māmakī;
sometimes Durgā, the Peaceful One;
sometimes birds and garuḍas,
the sky and the ḍākinīs;
sometimes nāgas and great serpents;
sometimes prostitutes and monkeys;
sometimes seeing dreams;
sometimes after falling asleep;
sometimes he becomes wind and bile;
sometimes blood and skin;
sometimes sorrow and smoke;
sometimes the burning fires;
sometimes birth in the heavens.
Such is this magical display.
In this in which the self of all abides,
the deity who is free of parts,
this is the variety of his illusion.
The vajra holder, who is not permanent,
is without form within the bhaga.
Within the navel is a great lotus.
Between the sixteen lines laid down,
by joining equally with the letters,

the act of union is done.
At its center, always, is the great secret,
which emits and gathers.
That very one, the vajra holder himself,
alone, self-arisen, the great deity,
is proclaimed by the name
"the reality of all buddhas."
In the delight of the supreme secret,
the self of all always abides.
This is what the Omniscient One explained,
or the path of the unchanging explained.
A hundredth part of the tip of a hair:
contemplate it as having the supreme form.
It is not empty, and cannot be apprehended;
it has no letters, and no emptiness either;
it has no stain and no seed;
it is without form and without signs.
The very entity of consciousness
should be grasped as the wisdom of consciousness.
The lamp that illuminates all should be seen as the first sign.
A mere flash of illuminating lightning
should be imagined as the second sign.
Having the character of white light,
it is seen in the ten directions;
it is said to expel the afflictions.
The yogin should examine it thoroughly.
The enjoyments of the gods of desire
are taught as the fourth, consciousness.
The goddesses of form, touch and so on
are the five wisdoms of the directions.
The sixth is the wisdom of the formless;
the seventh is the dharmadhātu;
in the eighth, just as one wishes,
is the fruit of buddhahood.
Hidden gazing, the hand,
embracing, the pairs and the rest:

the Tathāgata spoke these as consolation.
The ninth is the highest of the high;
everything is taught here.
Other ways are like straw.
That itself is the life of living beings;
that itself is the unchanging sublime;
that itself is what pervades all,
abiding in all bodies.
That itself is the wisdom of the buddhas,
said to be glorious Heruka.
Male, neuter and so on,
it also holds the subtle essence.
Of that wisdom which always arises,
those who abide on the grounds,
the treatises without exception,
and those who hold the Vedic tenets,
in this world and in others,
without it none will be accomplished.
For the tenets of the Vedas
this is proclaimed to be the essence.
Sitting and rising,
entering and completion,
blessing and empowerment,
meditative absorption and offering: these are summarized.
Then, the rite by another name:
skillful means and wisdom, nondual;
all is born in that very reality,
which emits and gathers.
a ā i ī u ū ṛ ṝ ḷ ḹ e ai o au aṃ aḥ ka kha ga gha ṅa ca cha ja jha ña ṭa ṭha ḍa ḍha
ṇa ta tha da dha na pa pha ba bha ma ya ra la va śa ṣa sa ha kṣaḥ
This is that Blessed deity,
the supreme itself, abiding preeminently.
Having known the generation of all the deities
and their accomplishment likewise,
the supreme ultimate is also likewise:
these are the eighty-four vehicles.
If one abides in the conduct of mantra,

by that one is surely victorious in this.
All proceed through wisdom and skillful means.
First one should speak the secret mantra.
Whatever is virtuous or nonvirtuous
is the ornament of the hosts of deities;
it is all the places of the girdle.
One who always holds to this realizes all phenomena.
If the vowels and consonants are visualized in front,
the great yoga is at rest.
It is the inconceivable mind itself,
and the mind too should not be examined.

Do not think even of the mind itself;
by that one will attain retention.
That which is secret among all the tantras
I explain to you as well.
This should be carefully hidden:
the restraint of nondual nonduality.
Of all the yoginīs and the rest,
and of all the limbs of the hero,
the yogin attains the fruit;
it arises from within existence.
The method of the highest tantra
should not be explained to one who gives no service.
If it is explained, there is suffering,
and through suffering the mind goes round in circles.
The yogin whose mind goes round in circles
does not see nirvāṇa.
Just as a woman rejoices in childish chatter, and also repeats the talk of the babblers she keeps company with,
so, the path not being explained, there comes to be bondage: the bad path of yoga is said to be like that.
The limbs of the body of glorious Heruka,
all bodies, have the nature of the stable and the moving.
The site is the ground Utterly Joyful;
likewise the secondary site is the Stainless;

the field should be known as the Luminous;
the secondary field is the Radiant;
the meeting place is the Manifest;
the secondary meeting place is the Difficult to Master;
the gathering is the Far Gone;
the secondary gathering is the Immovable;
the charnel ground is Good Intelligence itself;
the secondary charnel ground is the Cloud of Dharma.
The conduct of the scripture of Śrī Heruka
has this inner nature.
The ten perfections and the grounds
are the yoginīs' language of signs.
In the heavens, upon the earth and below the earth,
the limbs of the hero are the self of the stable and the moving.
What has been taught since beginningless time
abides with the nature of outer and inner.
The glorious Blood-Drinker, the great king,
the chief lord of all desires,
everywhere possessing hands and feet,
everywhere with eyes, heads and faces,
everywhere possessing hearing in the world,
abides pervading all.
Then, accomplishment is to be accomplished
with a mind endowed with meditative concentration.
For the benefit of the practitioner,
the reality of the Secret has been spoken.
Then, further, what is to be explained
is a pith instruction very hard to find,
which in the hero's language of signs
I have hidden in the tantra.
The garments are the five mudrās and so on;
the limbs of wisdom are the dagger and net.
What is spoken of as the vowels and consonants,
causes and the rest, emptiness, are the preliminary.
From entering, sound and the rest,
up to the condensed, it is endowed with union.
The nectar that satisfies is nirvāṇa;

empowerment is conferred by the offering of the hand.
One is truly protected by the great armor;
it is the offering made with all the mantras.
Thus the fourteen realities
have been explained in summary.
Whatever supreme person practices them all,
the self purified of all evils,
attains the ground of the Tathāgata,
and in birth and old age is born in the family of the Sugatas,
becoming a king who possesses the Dharma.
If one thus performs the rite properly,
it fully grants all accomplishments.
If on the day of the full moon, upon the earth,
a yogin meditates in this way,
that becomes his merit.
Gods, nāgas, humans and all the rest:
by whatever merit of his has come about,
self and others are endowed with true wisdom.
By merely contemplating in meditative concentration,
or by reading, reciting and writing it,
one attains the enjoyments of the heavens,
or else attains the state of a universal monarch.
When the yoginīs pass away,
the glorious Blood-Drinker and the other ḍākas,
holding various flowers in their hands,
with various victory banners and flags,
with various sounds of music,
make offerings with offerings of various songs.
This concept called "death"
carries one to the abode of the sky-goers.
A yogin of such great glory
is hard to find upon the earth.

This is the fifty-sixth chapter, on generating and accomplishing the secret letters, from the highest of the high, the Abhidhānottara Tantra.

Then, further, what is to be explained
is the extraction of the mantras in the order of the rite.

In an utterly solitary place,
the wise one, having leveled the ground,
should smear it with excrement and urine.
Having smeared it with mahārakta as well,
and having made oneself into Heruka,
having taken a low-caste butcher woman,
one should set out flowers and the rest.
Offer the incense of the great hero;
light lamps of fat and the like.
Beat the ḍamaru drum and the bell;
make offerings with song and dance,
with the various kinds of divine music.
Clothed in the directions, with hair loose,
the body endowed with the six mudrās,
having made the vowels and consonants equal,
one should dissolve them into their classes.
Having known them in fours,
one should expand them with the supreme of sages.
The hero dwelling there should be extracted,
who accomplishes all one's aims and wishes.
Whatever is the fifth of the fourth,
and the fifth of the fifth,
and the fourth of the fifth,
and whatever is the third of the first,
and likewise the twenty-ninth;
whatever is the first of the fourth,
and the fourth of the semivowels,
and the second of that same group,
and take truly the thirtieth;
and the twenty-sixth itself,
and likewise half of half of a hundred,
then the thirty-third,
and the first of the first,
and the third of the semivowels,
and the first of the fifth,
and the third of the first itself;
the thirty-second itself;

the fifth of the fourth,
and the fourth of the fifth,
and the first of the semivowels,
and the third of the second,
and whatever is the first of the third,
and the fifth of the fifth,
and the first of the first,
and likewise the eleventh itself,
and likewise, the wise one, the sixteenth;
whatever is the first of the third,
and likewise the twenty-sixth;
whatever is the third of the fourth,
and the second of the ūṣmans itself;
whatever is the first of the first,
and likewise the twenty-seventh,
and the twenty-eighth as well;
the third of the first,
and the fourth of the fifth,
and likewise take the thirty-first;
and the fifteenth itself,
and likewise the twenty-fifth;
whatever is the second of the first,
and likewise the twenty-sixth,
and the thirty-second letter;
the last of the ūṣmaṇas;
the thirty-second itself,
and the fourth of the fifth,
and the fourth of the second,
and the fourth of the fifth,
and the third of the ūṣmans,
and further the twenty-seventh;
the first of the antasthas,
and likewise the twenty-first;
the second of the antasthas,
and likewise again the thirtieth;
the first of the fifth,
and the first of the ūṣmans itself,

and likewise the letter to be made itself;
whatever is the first of the fourth,
and whatever is the first of the ūṣmans,
and likewise the twenty-eighth;
whatever is the second of the first,
and the first of the third,
and whatever is the third of the first,
and whatever is the fourth of the fourth,
and the second of the antasthas,
and also the fifth of the third;
then take the letter to be made.

The fourth of the first,
the second of the antasthas,
then the eighth itself,
whatever is the fifth of the fourth,
and the fifth of the fifth as well;
take also the twenty-third.
Likewise the twenty-seventh,
the fourth of the fourth,
once again the twenty-seventh,
likewise the twenty-sixth;
take the twenty-fifth as well.
The thirty-third itself,
the fourth of the fourth,
the fifth of the fifth;
take the second of the antasthas.
The fifth of the fourth,
the fourth of the fourth,
the first of the first itself,
likewise the twenty-seventh,
the fourth of the antasthas,
likewise the twenty-first,
the second of the ūṣmans itself,
likewise the twenty-sixth,
the first of the very first,
the second of the antasthas itself,

the first of the second,
the second of the sixth itself,
the first of the very first,
the second of the antasthas,
the first of the second,
the second of the seventh,
the third of the sixth,
the fifth of the fourth;
it should be joined with the fourth.
The fourth of the antasthas,
and on the fifth of the fifth
set it in the place of the fourth.
On the first of the fifth
join it above, together with Agni.
The third of the ūṣmans,
the first of the antasthas,
and on the first of the fourth,
with the Radiant One made its seat.
The third of the seventh,
and the first of the sixth as well;
the letters ka and sa,
having taken the first ones,
the fourth of the fifth,
and the first of the antasthas:
likewise combine them and take them.
The fourth of the sixth,
the first of the seventh;
take the fourth of the ūṣmans.
The fourth of the seventh
is set apart by Vajrasattva.
The fourth of the ūṣmans itself,
with the sun as well made its seat.
To the fourth of the seventh
one should join it below Agni,
and it is endowed with the bidding to depart.
The second of the fifth,
likewise the twenty-second itself,

likewise the second of the sixth,
the eleventh and the twenty-second;
having taken the first of the third,
the third of the fourth,
the fourth of the ūṣmans itself,
the third of the fifth,
one should take the fourth of the seventh.
Having taken the twenty-first,
the first of the second,
and the first of the fifth as well,
the sixth letter of the second,
and on the fourth of the fifth,
likewise the letter kṣa.
Having taken the twenty-fourth,
the combining is taught once again.
The third of the fifth,
the third of the ūṣmans,
the second of the antasthas itself;
on the fourth of the fifth
one should again set the sun.
Having set down the twentieth letter,
one should give it the sixteenth as its seat,
and below, radiant with Agni.
The fifth of the fifth,
the third of the antasthas,
the third of the fifth,
the third of the sixth,
the fourth of the antasthas,
set apart by the twenty-fifth.
The fifth of the fourth,
and the third of the second as well,
distinguished by the Son of the Sun.
The fourth of the ūṣmans,
and on the third of the first,
with radiance made its seat.
The fourth of the seventh:
with the fifteenth give it two seats.

The third of the ūṣmans itself,
on the first of the fifth,
one should give the sixteenth as its seat;
with that the twenty-first is taken.
The first of the fourth,
the third of the antasthas,
the third of the second,
the first of the fourth,
the fourth of the fifth,
the third of the third,
the third of the first,
the third of the ūṣmans itself,
and likewise the twenty-first,
pressed down evenly by the sun.
The third of the fifth,
the first of the fourth,
and on the third of the third
one should make it bright with radiance.
Know the first of the antasthas;
there too one should set the sixteenth.
The third of the second,
likewise the twenty-sixth,
the second of the first,
the first of the very first as well,
the third of the fourth as well,
the first of the very first as well,
the first of the second as well,
and likewise the fourteenth.
The fourteenth, the fourth of the ūṣmans,
with the twenty-seventh made its seat;
the seed of the eight beginning with ya,
radiant with the sun.
The third of the third as well,
one should give the fifteenth as its seat.
The third of the second as well,
the fifth of the third as well,
the seed that is the letter of ka and sa:

one should give the twenty-fifth as its seat.
Once again one should combine them:
the body is well extracted,
and one should give Mahendra as its seat.
The fourth of the ūṣmans,
the fourth of the seventh,
the seed of the eight of the ya group,
likewise the thirty-third itself,
and likewise the thirty-third:
this gathers all that has the nature of the fifth.
Then too one should extract
the second in the same way:
the first of the second,
the third of the antasthas,
the third of the ūṣmans,
likewise the twenty-eighth,
the fourth of the seventh,
the third of the sixth,
the fourth of the fifth as well,
the third of the sixth as well;
each doubled, this is the fourth line:

kara kar kuru kuru bandha bandha trāsaya trāsaya kṣobhaya kṣobhaya hrau hrau hraḥ hraḥ pheṃ pheṃ phaṭ phaṭ daha daha paca paca bhakṣa bhakṣa vasa rudhira antra mālā valaṃ vine gṛhṇa gṛhṇa sapta pātāla gata bhūjig sarvaṃ vā tarjaya tarjaya ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍhya hrīṃ hrīṃ jṇau jṇo kṣmāṃ kṣmāṃ hī hī hūṃ hūṃ kili kili sili sili hili hili dhili dhili hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ

This is the secret mantra, the king of knowledge mantras (vidyās), which accomplishes every activity.
Anything more supreme than this does not exist in the three worlds.
If one knows the mantra of the glorious Blood-Drinker,
all others are like grass without pith.
It is taught as the root mantra.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the highest, this is the fifty-seventh chapter, the rite setting out in detail the extraction of the letters of the root mantra.

Furthermore, the twenty-two letters,
the seven letters of the heart, the near-heart,
the seeds of the eight of the ya group,
and likewise the twelve vowel signs,
with the intervening letters left out:
the six limbs are Heruka,
joined equally with the six heroes.
Meditate on them in six squares,
and one becomes master of Heruka.
They abide fully in single letters:
oṃ namaḥ svāhā vauṣaṭa,
together with hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ;
the practitioner should know them as the heart.
The first is at the heart itself,
the second should be known at the crown of the head,
the third is joined to the topknot,
the fourth becomes the armor,
the fifth becomes the eyes,
and the sixth is held to be called the weapon.
Then the thirteenth vowel itself
is joined with the second letter.
The eleventh vowel is fully joined;
it is to be adorned with the sixth letter.
The fourth of the vowels itself
is joined also with the seventh letter.
The eleventh vowel itself
the wise one joins to the eighth letter.
Joined with the second vowel,
it is to be adorned with the ninth letter.
The second vowel letter itself
is joined with the twelfth letter.
Possessing the second vowel,
take the twenty-first letter.
The wise one joins the fourteenth letter
with the twentieth letter.
The third of the vowels itself
is joined to the fifteenth letter.

Fully endowed with the fifteenth vowel,
the sixteenth letter is to be beautified.
Endowed with the third vowel,
it is held to be the seventeenth letter.
The second of the vowels itself
is joined to the eighteenth letter.
The second vowel itself
is joined to the twenty-first letter.
It is joined also with the fifth of the alphabet;
it is joined to the twenty-third letter.
The thirteenth vowel itself
is joined to the twenty-fourth letter.
Having taken the first class,
it is joined to the twenty-fifth letter.
Endowed with the second vowel,
it becomes the twenty-sixth letter.
The twenty-eighth letter
is joined with the fifteenth letter.
It is fully endowed with the first of the third,
its lower part together with Agni.
Likewise, joined to the second vowel,
is the twenty-ninth letter.
To the thirty-first letter
the second vowel is joined.
The thirty-second letter also
is to be endowed with the second vowel.
The thirty-third letter
is to be fully endowed with the sun.
The fourth of the alphabet itself,
endowed with the thirty-fourth letter,
accomplishes every desired aim.
The fifth of the alphabet itself
is fully endowed with the thirty-seventh;
it is what accomplishes the ḍākinīs.
The thirty-eighth itself,
joined with the second vowel:
that which accomplishes all the gods

is this very one, without doubt.
The forty-second itself
should be formed with Agni and below.
The forty-third itself
is joined with the fifth vowel itself.
The forty-fifth letter
is joined to the second vowel letter.
The fifth vowel itself as well,
endowed with the forty-sixth,
makes offering to all the heroes.
The forty-seventh itself,
joined with the second vowel,
is held to be Vajrasattva, the supreme.
Likewise the fifty-first,
by the fifth vowel itself,
is held to be supreme beauty.
The fifty-second itself,
joined with the second vowel:
that which accomplishes all the gods
is this very one, without doubt.
Likewise the fifty-third as well
is joined with the thirteenth vowel.
This is supreme among the letters;
it surely slays enemies.
It is to be made from the four classes.
The fifty-sixth letter
is joined with the sixth vowel.
The fourth of the antasthas
should be joined to the second vowel,
and likewise joined with the fifteenth;
it accomplishes all accomplishments.
It becomes the fifty-ninth letter.
The sixty-first letter itself
is joined with the second vowel;
this is declared to be supreme.
Likewise the sixty-second,
joined to the second vowel,

is held to be supreme for the ḍākinīs.
The sixty-third letter itself,
endowed with the eleventh vowel,
is supreme among all beautiful letters.
The sixty-fourth itself,
set apart by Vajrasattva,
fully endowed with the second vowel,
grants accomplishment, the great liberation.
The sixty-fifth letter,
fully endowed with abiding upon Agni,
joined with the third vowel,
grants all accomplishments, said the Sugata.
The sixty-sixth letter,
joined with the third vowel,
grants accomplishment in every activity:
thus the Tathāgata has said.
The sixty-seventh letter,
fully endowed with the second letter:
all the purposes of the yoginīs
this very one fulfills, without doubt.
From the sixty-eighth itself,
join there the letter ba,
and its lower part is to be examined.
The seventy-first letter
is fully joined to the second letter;
the beautiful one among all letters
is this very one, without doubt.
The thirty-fourth itself,
joined to the second vowel,
is accomplished from the very beginning:
so it was spoken from the mouth of the Tathāgata.
The seventy-fifth letter itself,
endowed with the sixth of the mātṛkā:
this is the supreme yoga,
most excellent of all virtues.
The seventy-sixth itself,
endowed with the second vowel

and endowed with Agni below:
apart from this, nothing else is beautiful.
The seventy-seventh letter:
there it should be joined with da;
it is held to be the beauty of the ḍākinīs.
The seventy-eighth itself
is joined with the second vowel;
it is held to be the supreme of causes.
The eighty-first letter
is distinguished by the end of the fourth.
This is what accomplishes from the very beginning,
that which leads into all accomplishments.

The eighty-second letter
is likewise joined to the second vowel.
On the fifth of the alphabet,
likewise the eighty-eighth letter.
The fifth of the mātṛkā,
and likewise the eighty-ninth;
having taken the fifth of the mātṛkā,
likewise the ninetieth letter.
Having taken the fifth of the mātṛkā,
it is joined to the ninety-first letter.
The second of the mātṛkā,
and the ninety-sixth letter;
the ninety-ninth letter,
endowed with the second vowel,
terrifies all the wicked
and is the abode of bliss of all the mātṛkās.
The thirteenth vowel letter
is endowed with the second letter.
The thirteenth of the mātṛkā itself
is joined with the fifth letter;
it throws all the wicked into turmoil
and is the abode of bliss of the ḍākinīs.
With the fourteenth vowel
it is joined with the eighth letter,

and fully joined with the fifteenth.
The fourteenth vowel itself
is joined with the ninth letter,
and above it the bindu fully abides.
These letters are to be accomplished;
they are the distinctive mark of the ḍākinīs.
The eleventh vowel itself
is joined with the twelfth letter,
and above it is adorned with the bindu.
The eleventh vowel letter
is joined with the thirteenth letter,
and it too is adorned with the bindu.
It terrifies all the bhūtas
and is the delight of the practitioner.
To the fifth vowel letter
join the thirty-second letter.
The third of the vowels itself
is joined with the thirty-third letter.
With the second of the mātṛkā itself
it is joined to the thirty-fourth letter.
With the second of the vowels
it is joined with the thirty-sixth letter.
The second of the first
is joined with the thirty-seventh letter.
The third vowel letter
is joined with the fortieth letter.
The eleventh of the mātṛkā itself
is joined with the forty-first letter.
The second vowel letter
is joined to the forty-second letter.
With the third of the vowels
it is joined with the forty-fourth letter.
With the second of the mātṛkā itself as well
it is joined to the forty-eighth letter.
The second vowel letter
is joined with the forty-ninth letter.
The second vowel letter

is joined to the fifty-second letter.
With the fifth of the alphabet itself
it is joined with the fifty-fifth letter.
The fifty-fourth letter
is also adorned with the bindu.
The fifty-fifth letter
is also adorned with the bindu;
it is joined to the second vowel letter.
The fifty-eighth letter
should be pressed on its head with the bindu.
The second vowel letter
is joined to the sixtieth letter.
The second of the alphabet itself as well
is joined with the sixty-seventh letter.
It accomplishes every accomplishment against the wicked
and also bestows glory on the practitioner.
The fourth vowel letter
is joined with the seventieth letter,
and it too is adorned with the bindu.
With the fourth of the alphabet
it is joined with the seventy-third letter.
Taking well the fifteenth,
with the fourteenth vowel
it is joined to the seventy-fourth letter.
With the fourteenth of the alphabet
it is joined with the seventy-third letter,
and likewise joined with the fifteenth.
The second vowel letter
is joined with the seventy-fourth letter.
The second letter of the alphabet as well
is joined with the seventy-seventh letter,
and it too is adorned with the bindu.
The second of the alphabet as well
is joined with the seventy-eighth letter,
and adorned with two bindus.
The second of the alphabet as well
is joined with the seventy-ninth letter.

With the fourth of the mātṛkā itself
it is joined with the eightieth letter;
it should be pressed on its head with the bindu.
The fourth vowel as well
is joined with the seventy-ninth letter,
produced by the sound of the bindu,
and it too is adorned with the bindu.
The third vowel letter
is joined with the sixteenth letter.
The number of letters, below and above,
is declared to be ninety-seven.
This the wise
should know as the secret root mantra.
It is the abode of accomplishments,
and when the heart of the ḍākinīs is subdued,
the glorious Blood-Drinker, king of the deity families,
by its recitation makes accomplishment fruitful.
Place oṃ at the beginning
and join hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ at the end:
this is the secret root mantra,
which accomplishes every accomplishment.
Then all the heroes of one's own nature joined in union
are held to be the net of ḍākinīs,
the wheel of Cakrasaṃvara.

hā svā raṃ va saṃ la jā nī ki ḍā ṭaph hūṃ hūṃ kaṃ ru ru he he jra va śrī oṃ

The heart of the king of knowledge mantras
has never arisen before and will not arise again.

ṭaph hūṃ hūṃ ha ha hrīḥ oṃ

The letters vaṃ and yoṃ,
the letters maṃ and hri,
and hūṃ and phaṭ: so it is declared.

oṃ vaṃ vajra vārāhi haṃ yoṃ yamini hrīṃ moṃ mohani hreṃ hreṃ saṃ calni hūṃ hūṃ saṃtrāsani phaṭ phaṭ caṇḍika

The yoginīs are proclaimed as six;
meditate on them in the six squares.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the highest, this is the fifty-eighth chapter, on meditating on the heart mantra of the armor.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
the unsurpassed heart mantra of the goddess:

oṃ vajra vairocanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

As for the application of the goddess's heart mantra,
the thirteenfold one is virtuous in nature.
In the center of a lotus is Vārāhī,
and on the petals the goddesses are placed.
In the quarters of the four gates meditate on the heart mantras of the goddesses:
the Horse-Faced One (Hayāsyā), arisen from oṃ, Vajragarbha, the Sound of the Wicked,
the Fierce One and the Moving One,
the Stealer of Men and Vimalā,
the goddess endowed with the one who makes hūṃ,
the One of the Burnt Offering and the one who makes phaṭ,
and the Self-Arisen One: these are twelve.
The one who makes ha is the chief on the right.
She who is called Vajravārāhī
bestows every accomplishment.
Blue, yellow and red,
green, with the upper face white,
three-eyed, with grimacing faces,
her fangs fiercely bared,
she sits with the right leg extended, wearing a garland of skulls,
her belly bulging, her hair hanging loose,
clothed in the directions,
and she abides in union with her own consort, her means.
Bhairava, Cāmuṇḍī and the Terrifying Intoxicated One
she keeps pressed down beneath her feet.
A skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a spear, a curved knife and a ḍamaru drum,
a vajra and bell, a noose,

a hook, the head of Brahmā,
an axe, and the threatening gesture;
a human skin is stretched above her.
With girdle and armlets
she is adorned with the five mudrās,
and wears a crown of the five buddhas,
compassionate, with a wrathful frown, terrifying.
On the petals place all the goddesses.
The mātṛkās are eight:
yellow, red and green,
the south one blue in color,
in Agni's quarter red, and smoky,
blue and white,
placed around as far as Īśāna.
They are three-eyed, with hair hanging loose,
fully endowed with the five mudrās,
seated well in the half cross-legged posture,
with crowns of skulls,
clothed in the directions, with grimacing faces,
and all of them seated on seats of pretas.
Intoxicated with compassion and passion,
they perform the supreme vajra dance,
holding skull cups filled with blood (rakta),
and they sound bells and ḍamaru drums;
they bring delight to the gods.
At the gates are the gatekeepers,
seated upon Indra,
seated with the right leg extended,
three-eyed, with hair standing on end,
with crowns made of garlands of skulls,
decked with ornaments of garlands;
a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a vajra and a head they hold in their hands.
All are wrathful, with hanging bellies,
all adorned with garlands of heads,
blue and green and white
and yellow, four-armed and of two colors,

naked, with a wide lotus,
crowned with the crowns of their own families,
and all with their own consorts as their second.
Meditate on the thirteen.
This is the meditation on the supreme heart mantra;
it bestows all that one desires.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the highest, this is the fifty-ninth chapter, teaching the meditation on the heart mantras of the armor and the goddesses.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
an arrangement extremely hard to find:
by merely knowing it,
accomplishment is swiftly achieved.
A piece of ground, level and pleasing,
should be anointed with sandalwood.
On the ground, fragrant and sweet-smelling,
scatter loose flowers as a carpet,
and make it delightful with the scent of incense.
Having done all one's own preliminary tasks
and having performed the binding of the directions,
then make the lacing of a clay drum,
and on a round of forty-nine squares
set out the letters of the alphabet.
From what abides there, the hero
extracts what accomplishes every desired aim:
the practitioner takes vowels and letters
in their order and also out of order.
From that count multiplied by the munis,
take the thirty-second square;
it is to be distinguished by the fifth.
Take well the half of fifty;
it is divided by the twenty-fourth.
Take the thirty-sixth square;
it is distinguished by the third.
Then take the thirty-second;
it is to be distinguished by the fifth.

Then take the twenty-fifth
and join it with the twenty-fourth.
Take well the thirty-third,
endowed with the fifteenth square,
and fully together with the fifth.
Then take the twenty-second,
and the eleventh likewise;
this is held to be supreme beauty.
The nineteenth of the squares
is fully endowed with the son of Agni
and divided in the third square.
The seed of the eight of the ya group,
fully endowed with the thirty-sixth square,
becomes the letter.
Again, those very letters
accomplish every desired aim.
Then, having taken the Self-Arisen,
join it to the fifth of the squares,
and on its crown join the bindu.
Then take the twenty-second,
and the eleventh likewise.
The words "accomplishing all aims"
are declared to be the second phrase.
The nineteenth square itself
is divided by the twenty-seventh and fully endowed with the third.
Take well the thirty-third
and join it to the second square;
fully endowed with the twentieth,
it is held to be the supreme of beauty.
Likewise the twenty-first itself,
and likewise the twenty-sixth:
in the words recited twice,
extract them in deep equipoise.
Then take them in reverse order:
the first of the squares itself,
fully endowed with the end of the fourth,

and likewise joined with the fifteenth.
Then take the twenty-second,
and the eleventh likewise.
The words of Dharma, wealth, desire and liberation are declared to be the third phrase.
The seed of the second square,
the thirty-sixth square itself,
likewise the twenty-sixth,
and take well the thirty-third,
endowed with the thirteenth square;
the tenth of the squares itself
the practitioner takes in reverse order.
The nineteenth of the squares,
on the twenty-third square,
is fully endowed with the second,
and above it is to be adorned with the bindu.
Then take the seed of water,
and the eighth likewise,
distinguished by the son of Agni.
Join the letters hūṃ phaṭ at the end.
This is called the King of the Three Realms,
adorned with four mantra phrases.

oṃ is what makes the body shine forth;
hūṃ and phaṭ are joined at the end.
This mantra of the universal monarch among knowledge kings
has never arisen before and will not arise again.
In the Compendium of Reality, the Glorious Supreme,
the Cakrasaṃvara and the Vajrabhairava,
it is endowed with the four wrathful ones,
together with the eight forms,
for the purpose of protecting the maṇḍala,
and especially against all the wicked.
By merely obtaining this,
without any need for examination, they will die.
With the great meats, each and every one,
it is declared, even without a vajra.

What is spoken here is the common yoga;
it brings forth the fruit of every accomplishment.

oṃ sumbha ni sumbha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ grihṇa grihṇa huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ grihṇāpaya grihṇāpaya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ānaya ho bhagavāṃ vajra huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

This is declared to be terrifying
and unbearable to all the wicked.
On the supreme ground of the element of space,
in the very center of the lotus's hub,
meditate on Vajrahūṃkāra,
who surely subdues all the wicked.
He is fully endowed with sixteen arms;
he has eight faces, grimacing,
the fangs of his faces fiercely bared,
and he is adorned with a garland of skulls.
He wears a crown of the five buddhas,
and is decked with every ornament,
with the six mudrās marked with the vajra,
his body fierce, his mood compassionate.
Standing in the posture with the right leg extended,
he presses down the skull of Īśāna
and presses the breasts of the supreme Umā.
He gazes with wrathful eyes,
wearing on his body a necklace of heads,
a garland of heads bound upon his head,
and he forms the mudrā of vajra and bell.
Likewise there is Trailokyavijaya:
binding the hook and the threatening gesture,
it rests fully above the forehead;
the mudrā at the heart and the forehead
is what subdues the obstructors.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
bears a sword and a hook,
a spear, a head and a ḍamaru drum,
and above, a human skin:
so too the sixteen arms.

He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
a body of bliss, nondual with his own consort.
Blue, white and yellow
and likewise red, the left faces are beautiful;
white, blue and yellow,
and the upper face red,
three-eyed, with red eyes.
He is fully endowed with the four wrathful ones,
and virtuously performs every activity:
the Vajra of Desire, the Blue Vajra,
the Moving Vajra itself,
and the Vajra of Acala,
blue and green and red,
and smoky mixed with saffron,
their faces with fangs fiercely bared,
adorned with garlands of skulls.
With their feet in the right-extended posture
they press down the four māras.
Their bodies are adorned with human bones,
and the various families of wrathful ones radiate from them.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a vajra and the extended threatening gesture,
and embrace their own consorts, nondual.
They gaze with the wrathful look,
fully endowed with the bell as emblem,
and form the mudrā of holding;
with the mudrā of Trailokyavijaya
all the wrathful ones are bound.
They wear tiger skins as garments,
three-eyed, unbearable, terrifying,
with hammer, club and arrow,
and likewise sword and bell,
or else vajra and bell;
all follow the families of the wrathful ones.
Their embracing arms are likewise;
they have three faces and six arms,
all three-eyed: the supreme accomplishment.

By joining body, speech and mind,
the maṇḍala is the most sacred supreme accomplishment.
The thirty-seven, fully purified:
one should meditate on the maṇḍala of letters.

oṃ sumbha ni sumbha huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ grihṇa grihṇa huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ grihṇapaya grihṇāpaya huṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ānaya ho bhagavāṃ vajra huṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Having seen the heroes and yoginīs,
meditate on generating them all.
Joined in the great maṇḍala,
the very essence of the five unions,
it is the maṇḍala of the yogin;
it is the meditation on the supreme heart mantra.
Likewise the meat of dog and pig,
and likewise of the one with the copper crest:
in the work of fierce rites
make them food, fire offering and torma.
Then all is accomplished without remainder,
and every kingdom is fully won.
Conch, mother-of-pearl and pearl:
if all three arise from a cause,
then who would revile the skull
of one whose body is the wisdom of the Dharma?
The hero wears a garland of skulls
and is adorned with the half moon;
this is declared to be the heroic power of heroes,
the form of Herukavajra.

From the Abhidhānottara Tantra, highest of the highest, this is the sixtieth chapter, on the generation of Vajrahūṃkāra, the maṇḍala of the four wrathful ones drawn in detail, blessed as the four-faced protection.

Then, furthermore, I shall explain
the meditation on the eight classes.
Abiding in the center of the lotus of the sphere of space,
meditate on Herukavajra:
he has five faces and ten arms,

three eyes, deep red,
and sits with the right leg extended.
His faces grimace, terrifying,
the faces with fangs fiercely bared,
and he is adorned with a garland of skulls.
The fierce one bears the half moon,
his head marked with a crossed vajra,
bound with a crown of matted locks,
and adorned with the signs of the six mudrās.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment,
in the mood of bliss, nondual with his consort,
on his body a necklace of fresh skulls,
pervasively intoxicated with the mood of compassion.
White and blue, of the color of clouds,
his body is graceful and swaying.
His right and left faces
are yellow and red and green,
and of the color of smoke.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he fully embraces his own consort.
Having flayed the skin of Brahmā, he wears it,
holding it firmly across his back.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga,
a spear, a ḍamaru drum and a curved knife,
and holds skull cups as well.
The Blessed One, surely arising from vaṃ hūṃ,
keeps Bhairava, together with his own wife,
pressed down beneath his feet.
On the eastern petal the goddesses are placed,
and likewise as far as the southern quarter;
those in Agni's quarter and the rest are also to be placed,
and likewise as far as Īśāna and the rest.
The ḍākinī of a,
likewise the ḍākinī of ka,
the ḍākinī of ca,
and the ḍākinī of ṭa:
white and red and yellow,

and the one of blue color in the south.

red and smoke-colored, green,
and yellow are properly placed as far as Īśāna.
The ḍākinī of ta,
likewise the ḍākinī of pa,
then the ḍākinī of ya,
and the ḍākinī of śa, the eighth:
all of them have three eyes,
one face and four arms.
With the right leg extended,
they press the eight world protectors beneath their feet.
Their faces are contorted, fangs bared;
they wear the supreme garment of the directions,
and are adorned with the five mudrās.
Their hair hangs loose; compassionate, yet like the wrathful ones, fierce, they throw the land into turmoil
and accomplish every desired aim.
They fulfill the wishes of all beings;
they bring everything to completion, just as desired.
They hold a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga
and are adorned with bell and ḍamaru.
The ḍākinīs of the classes are bliss:
the yoginī should meditate on them.
Or else Vārāhī should be set in place,
and the mistress too should be placed.
As their lord, Vajrasattva
should also be meditated upon by the wise.
Those joined as body, speech and mind
throw into turmoil what is beneath the earth and upon it.
oṃ āḥ a ka ca ṭa ta ya śa huṃ hūṃ phaṭ
The lord of all that is stationary and moving,
whatever there may be, without exception, is accomplished by this.
The holy and supreme ḍākinīs of the classes
should be meditated upon in the middle of the bhaga.
a śa kā śaṃ carma ca ṭaṃ ta pa ka ta pa sa ta tha pa ba na jaṃ yaṃ ma bha haṃ ca śar bha ca ta tha

Together with honey and butter,
one should always eat these eight at the proper time.
Without aging, sickness or death,
accomplishment comes in this very life.
Together with drinks of liquor,
merely by eating them, one gains power.
Even if they are not found, one should use sālu rice.
Dwelling within the seventh birth,
if one always takes cattle as food,
in an instant one becomes a sky-goer.
About this there is no doubt to weigh.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-first chapter, on the practice of the classes.

Then, further, this is to be explained:
the donkey (gardabha), by the supreme yoga.
The maṇḍala of heroes and yoginīs
and of the mātṛkās was explained before.
The ḍākinīs and the other sky-goers
should be made in the form of the donkey.
The form of Vārāhī as well,
her face is to be made a donkey's.
The positions, emblems and faces explained before
are further to be understood.
Following the sequence of signs explained before,
the ḍākinīs hold spears.
All those of the mind wheel
are terrifying, with garuḍa faces;
those of the speech wheel have peacock faces,
those of the body wheel lion faces.
Likewise there are faces of dog, pig,
owl and crow;
in the corners, Yamadāḍhī and all the rest
have the faces of buffalo and deer.
All those of the entire maṇḍala
have three eyes, and their eyes are deep red.
This is the holy and supreme yoga;

it brings all suffering to an end.
To the one whose mind is set on yoga,
the supreme yoga will grant accomplishments.
It grants the instructions of the Vajrayāna
and the accomplishment of speech.
By teaching the Dharma not heard before,
beings are freed from existence.
By the unsurpassed itself being taught,
accomplishments such as invisibility arise.
Whoever it may be, the three worlds,
all of them, are seen at once.
The secret mantras of the heroes and yoginīs explained before are likewise;
likewise those of the ḍākinīs and mātṛkās.
If one recites the lords of mantra explained before,
they grant accomplishment in full,
and one always attains every bliss.
If one recites the near-heart of the yoga,
with the donkey accomplishment one travels through the sky.
Even one without observances attains the observances;
even the impure becomes pure;
even the poor becomes a lord of wealth;
even the sick becomes free of sickness;
even the blind will see;
and one will attain the five superknowledges.
Donkey flesh and horse flesh,
dog, cow, elephant, human,
camel and jackal likewise:
these eight are equal and supreme.
The yogin should eat these eight.
Excrement, water, honey and butter:
having meditated in meditative concentration, and having eaten them,
one will attain the accomplishment of lightness,
the accomplishment of transforming one's form,
and one returns to one's own form as well.
Wherever the yogin dwells,
what is to be eaten is declared to be eaten;

likewise with what is to be approached and not approached:
drinking and drinking, accomplishment comes.
Mother, daughter, sister,
one's own kinswomen, and niece:
by the wise, as they wish,
the mudrā and the great mudrā are accomplished.
If one meditates on the donkey ḍākinī,
the accomplishment of summoning comes swiftly.
This supreme thing too is secret;
it is not to be told to anyone.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-second chapter, on accomplishing the cause of accomplishment, the donkey activity performed as desired.

Then, further, this is to be explained:
the meditation on the five ḍākas,
the rite of generating them from the families.
Seats, emblems and seed syllables:
this is the supreme seed.
ṅa ña ṇa na ma:
this is the supreme, accomplished seed.
ṇa is Vajraḍāka,
ṇa is Buddhaḍāka,
ṇa is Ratnaḍāka,
na is Padmaḍāka,
ma is Viśvaḍāka.
The five ḍākas are supreme.
Aversion, delusion, pride,
desire and jealousy likewise:
by these five families
the result of freedom from desire is bestowed.
Vajra, wheel, jewel,
lotus, and sword the fifth;
blue, and white,
yellow, red and green.
The vajra mudrā is supreme awakening;
the jewel mudrā likewise;

the lotus mudrā is the fourth,
and the sword mudrā the fifth.
Elephant, lion, horse,
peacock and garuḍa likewise;
Viṣṇu, Brahmā, the Sun,
Maheśvara, and Indra too.
Together with self-awareness and its limbs, they abide properly in nondual bliss.
In the east, the south, the west,
and in the north likewise, here
they should be placed with their retinue of heroes.
The five are truly the five buddhas;
the five are the five selves.
In the center is a sun maṇḍala,
in the east a moon maṇḍala,
in the south and the west likewise,
and in the north a sun maṇḍala.
Or else, in the center a moon,
and in the east a sun seat.
They have become heroes, namely:

Vajrakapāla, Vajra Equal to Space, Vajragarbha and Vajra Solid. These four are the maṇḍala of Vajraḍāka, and an elephant throne should be made as their seat.

Vajracandra, Vajraketu, Vajrarāja and Vajraśabda: these are the maṇḍala of Buddhaḍāka, and their seat is a lion throne. The Vajra of Desire, Vajrarākṣasa, Vajraṭahara and Vajrahāsa: these are the maṇḍala of Ratnaḍāka, and their seat is a horse throne. Vajra Fire-Glory, Vajra Destroyer, Vajra Burner and Vajravimala: these are the maṇḍala of the lotus, and their seat is a peacock throne. Vajrapatākā, Vajragīta, Vajravīra and Vajrabhairava: these are the maṇḍala of the action ḍāka, and their seat is a garuḍa throne.

These heroes, too, belong to their own families. They wear garlands of skulls and have three eyes. Embracing their own wisdom consorts, they sit in vajra posture on seats of pretas. Their fangs are bared and their faces contorted; they wear tiger skins as garments. Each has one face and four arms, holding a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga, with the sound of the ḍamaru, hūṃ. They are adorned with necklaces of garlanded heads, bear the five mudrās, wear the crown ornament of their own family, and bear matted locks and the moon.

For Vajraḍāka, the east is white, the north green, the west red and the south yellow. For the action ḍāka, the east is yellow, the north blue, the west white and the south red. For the lotus ḍāka, the east is white, the north green, the west blue and the south yellow. For Ratnaḍāka, the east is green, the north yellow, the west white and the south blue. For Buddhaḍāka, the east is blue, the north green, the west red and the south yellow.

In due order, these are to be encircled all around with the implements:
vajra, wheel, sword,
lotus, and garlands of jewels.
In the four corners one should meditate on the four mātṛkās:
the mātṛkā who bewilders,
the mātṛkā who is aversion itself,
the mātṛkā of desire,
and likewise the mātṛkā of jealousy.
They are to be placed in Agni's quarter and the rest.
White, blue, red and green,
with loose hair and contorted faces,
three-eyed and naked,
they bear the five mudrās.
Four-armed and one-faced,
they sit upon seats of pretas.
They abide in the maṇḍalas
of Mahendra, of fire, of water and of Vāyu, seated upon the seats of their families.
Wheel, vajra, lotus,
sword, skull cup, khaṭvāṅga,
and the curved knife too they hold in their hands.
One should meditate on the goddesses arisen from the neuter syllables,
wearing garlands of skulls,
seated in half cross-legged posture.

Vajrayakṣa, Vajrarakṣa, Vajra Swaggerer, Vajra Horse-Face, Vajra Bear-Face, Vajrasaṃvara, Vajrasamaya and Vajra Paramāśva: these kings of the wrathful ones are at the gates and in the intermediate quarters.
Blue, green, red and yellow,

red, blue, smoke-colored and white.
Hook, noose, chain,
bell, skull cup, khaṭvāṅga,
and the ḍamaru likewise;
hammer, club, spear,
axe, skull cup, khaṭvāṅga,
and a head they carry in their hands.
One-faced and four-armed,
their red-yellow hair standing on end,
they bear the five mudrās
and wear tiger skins as garments.
They wear garlands of skulls
and are adorned with necklaces of heads.
Upon a sun and a lotus
they stand with the right leg extended,
seated on thrones of the eight protectors of the directions.
Fangs bared, faces contorted,
three-eyed, crowned with the diadem of their own family,
they join nondually with their own consorts.
Endowed with the flavor of compassion,
they should be meditated upon as encircled
on the outside by vajra pretas.
First the consonant, the name and hūṃ,
and at the end one should join phaṭ.
One should make the protection with the rite explained before.
On the aggregates, elements and sense sources,
and on body, speech and mind, one should meditate.
The ḍākas have six faces and twelve arms;
with their own emblem, the bell,
they are joined in equality, without duality.
Spear, hook, skull cup,
khaṭvāṅga, head,
ḍamaru and curved knife,
and human skin they hold.
Blue, yellow, red, green,
smoke-colored and white;
white, blue, yellow, red,

green, and the color of ash;
yellow, blue, white,
red, green, and the color of the lotus;
red, white, blue,
yellow, green, and the color of the sky;
green, white, red,
blue, yellow, and the color white:
these are the distinctions in the colors
of the faces of the five ḍākas.
Or else one should meditate on them with one face and two arms.
The garland secret mantras together with the names,
the wise place from the four corners and the intermediate quarters.
At the end one should join huṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

oṃ mahāsukha vajraḍāka hūṃ ḍākinījāla saṃpara āḥ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ mahāsukha buddhaḍāka bhruṃ ḍākinījāla saṃpar āḥ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ mahāsukhar ratnaḍāka hraṃ kinījāla saṃbara ā hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ mahāsukha padmaḍāka hrīḥ ḍākinījāla saṃbara āḥ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā oṃ mahāsukha viśvaḍāka khaṃ ḍākinījāla saṃbara āḥ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

These are the heart secret mantras of the five ḍākas, and this is what has become the heart of wisdom.

oṃ vajraḍāka ṅaṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ buddhaḍāka ñaṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ ratnaḍāka ṇaṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ padmaḍāka ṇaṃ hūṃ phaṭ oṃ viśvaḍāka maṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Having meditated on the wisdom being and the pledge being as one in taste, the wise one bestows empowerment well through the pledge,
and meditates on various offerings.
Recalling the state of all the maṇḍalas,
one also bestows empowerment.
The supreme of various excellences:
likewise embracing and kissing (cumbana),
the union of bhaga and liṅga,
the supreme heroism of the ripening of wisdom.
The six mudrās of wisdom and means
one should observe and examine with certainty.
The first joy is wisdom;

supreme joy is joining in union;
in the joy of bliss is the great accomplishment;
the coemergent joy is unsurpassed.
Union and complete union,
great union and the union of wisdom:
these are the stages of the rite.
If one knows the practice of the system of the drop,
one should observe through the subtle practice.
The cause of the wisdom of the Omniscient,
the state of the dharmadhātu, is attained.
Having accomplished the rite with certainty,
the yogin swiftly gains accomplishment.
Of this alone there is certainty.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-third chapter, on secret wisdom.

Then, further, this is to be explained:
the supreme heart essence of the mind.
Abiding in the center of the vajra of the sphere of space,
one should meditate on the moon of wisdom.
Arisen from the letter ā
is Vajrasattva, the great bliss,
in color like snow and kunda flowers,
equal to pure crystal.
Three-faced and six-armed, peaceful,
three-eyed, poised in compassion,
he sits in the center of a moon upon a variegated lotus.
Arisen from the wisdom of emptiness,
he binds his matted locks with a half moon,
has a crown ornament of skulls,
and is perfectly complete with every ornament.
He sits in vajra cross-legged posture,
abiding in union with his own body.
Manifest in compassion and passion,
his faces are white, blue and red,
having the nature of the three gates of liberation.
He is joined equally with vajra and bell,

pressing the lips of the goddess.
He holds a vajra, a spear, a skull cup,
a khaṭvāṅga and a skull cup.
With the letter aḥ, seated in the center of a sun,
one should meditate on Vajrasattva.
From i comes Vajracandra;
from ī comes Vajramāyā;
from e comes Dharmavajrī;
from ai comes Viśvamāyā.
These four goddesses
bear the colors of his faces.
With loose hair and large eyes,
intoxicated with compassion and passion,
together with their own consort, the means,
in the center of a moon maṇḍala,
they should be meditated upon above various pretas.
The lord and his wisdom consort, in cross-legged posture,
wearing crown ornaments of garlands of skulls,
adorned with the five mudrās,
joined equally with vajra and bell,
carry spear and curved knife in their hands,
hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga,
and grant every accomplishment in full.
Just as in the yoga of the hero,
they bear his colors and hand emblems.
The secret union of the four goddesses
is the supreme practice of the heart essence.
In the delight of the supreme secret,
the self of all always abides.
That very thing, the supreme of all secrets,
the supreme heart essence of the ḍākinī,
is the pledge of secret wisdom;
it is the nature of the dharmadhātu.
u is to be meditated upon at the heart,
ū likewise at the head,
o at the crown of the head,
and au is to be placed at the eyes.

oṃ is to be placed as armor,
and aḥ is to be placed as the weapon.
Through joining body, speech and mind,
one abides in meditating on oneself.
Through joining the wisdom being and the pledge being,
one also makes unsurpassed offerings and bestows empowerment.
Through joining in the pledge of sameness,
phenomena likewise are the same.
All things are of one taste:
the supreme nondual is accomplished.
According to the pledge, at the junctures of the sessions,
one should meditate at the four times.
The practice of the four unions
one should contemplate in the four sessions.
With compassion one should go out to all,
and meditate without partiality.
All are Vajrasattva;
wisdom follows without partiality.
Joined with the vajra lord of yoga,
oneself is the lord of the vajra.
It is the bone beyond counting;
it is declared to be the recitation of wisdom.
Recitation is the meditation of wisdom,
the emanating of the six emanations.
Therefore the recitation of the pledge
should be performed according to the rite.
oṃ āḥ a ā i ī u ū e ai o au oṃ aḥ hūṃ svāhā
Having taken a rosary of great conch,
one should always recite the king of secret mantras.
It is a purifier, a great merit,
virtuous, and a destroyer of faults.
It destroys all suffering
and is the fruit of all virtue;
it is the teacher of all secret mantras.
In a place of utter solitude,
arisen from the bliss of delight
of the heart essence of the ḍākinī,

the four goddesses are joy,
and the lord of yoga is supreme bliss.
The bliss of the family is the Blessed One,
the self-arisen Vajrasattva.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-fourth chapter, on the secret union of the four goddesses.

Then the supreme practice is explained,
which devours all the vicious
and destroys the savage, outer and inner.
From what is like empty space,
manifestly arisen from the letter kṣa,
is Cakrasaṃvara, the Net of Ḍākinīs,
two-armed and one-faced,
three-eyed, with a terrifying face.
Standing with the right leg extended,
he presses down the savage enemy, Māra.
Joined equally with the great mudrā,
he embraces her fully with skull cup and bell.
In the middle of the skull cup
it is marked with a lovely supreme vajra;
filled completely with the nectar of wisdom,
it is placed in the right hand.
His form is of every kind,
and his body is adorned with the six mudrās.
His face is fierce, with fangs bared,
and his crown is ornamented with skulls.
His head is marked with a crossed vajra;
he bears matted locks and a half moon,
and wears the crown ornament of Vajrasattva.
This is the meditation on Vajrabhairava.
With a mind that has abandoned doubt and is completely pure,
one makes no distinction among the stains of conceptual thought.
One's body is adorned with the ornaments of love and compassion;
one is well trained in the yoga of uninhibited bliss.
In a great charnel ground of animals, utterly terrifying,
vetālas and rākṣasas cry out with every kind of sound;

it is made terrible by the sound of pheṃ.
Moreover, the practitioner should practice in a place suited to yoga.
Or else he has four faces,
and here one should meditate on him with eight arms.
White, blue, red and yellow,
his faces are contorted and terrifying.
He holds spear, vajra, khaṭvāṅga,
ḍamaru, head and curved knife;
with various arms, and a moving tongue,
he proclaims the sounds ha hā hi hī huṃ hūṃ and the one called phaṭ.
The single hero, terrifying,
tames all who are hard to tame.
Through the practice of body, speech and mind,
the wise one sends out clouds of wrathful ones.
In order to accomplish the joy of meditative concentration,
one should practice in the body of the wrathful one.
One should eat the pledge substances and recite;
having made the pledge union, one should recite.
Abiding in equipoise and having recited,
one should meditate on all phenomena without exception.
oṃ akṣa hūṃ phaṭ
It exhausts the misdeeds of the three existences
and exhausts even the five acts of immediate retribution.
It exhausts all suffering
and purifies existences too.
The holy supreme practice
is surely accomplished merely by reading it.
Vicious and harmful beings,
those attached to savage deeds,
and those with wrong views:
these should certainly be devoured.
One sends forth the ornaments of the buddhas' emanations
and liberates the three realms.
The mantra practitioner should recite that supreme mantra
together with the name.
oṃ phaṭ so-and-so bhakṣaya phaṭ kṣāḥ hūṃ phaṭ

With the mind of a wrathful one oneself,
eating meat, and naked,

with loose hair, trampling a corpse,
holding a noose and a hook in the hands,
according to the rite of the secret mantra,
one should recite ten million times and meditate.
According to the rite of yoga,
the three realms will be slain.
With the ḍākinī and her retinue,
one should also visualize them being eaten.
Oneself, as the wrathful one bearing a vajra needle,
should be made to enter the heart.
Tearing apart the heart, the entrails, the marrow and the bones,
the flesh and the blood,
those who commit the five acts of immediate retribution
and the vicious should be eaten.
The ḍāka, seated at the navel,
is joined together with the ḍākinī.
Through the thorough union of the intelligent vajra,
within seven days he will come.
Merely by performing the meditative concentration,
the vicious one will be eaten by me.
At midday and at midnight
one should engage in these actions.
Being naked, with hair let loose,
facing toward Yama's quarter,
by the practice of the rooster seat,
one should recite the secret mantra of fire.
phaṭ hūṃ raṃ raṃ raṃ this one, the perpetrator of immediate retribution, so named, raṃ raṃ raṃ hūṃ phaṭ Merely by performing the recitation properly,
within fourteen days,
even Vajradhara in person
will die, without doubt.
If the evildoer turns back,
pacifying rites should be performed for him.

Having recited the secret mantra extensively,
by this too he will be pacified.
oṃ svāhā a ā baṃ a mu kaṃ pā pa bī ra ho bha bi ṣḍya ti ta sya si ba śāntiṃ bha bantu baṃ aṃ aḥ oṃ svāhā Drinking milk and wearing white clothes,
with a peaceful mind one abides in emptiness,
and anoints the body with white scent.
One should eat the flesh of crow, dog, cat
and mongoose.
All becomes thoroughly established;
about this there is no doubt to weigh.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-fifth chapter, on the union and subjugation of the lord, the great wrathful Vajrabhairava.

Then, further, this is to be explained:
the one of seven births within existence,
the pledge of the various paśus.
Having a divine form, captivating,
having a divine form, majestic and glorious,
he is king among the paśus,
fortunate, lovely, going in bliss.
The shoots of his hair are likewise long;
his eyes are long and his eyes are also red;
his form is like lotus petals.
Fragrant pollen issues from his body;
divine scent issues from his body,
and the breath of his mouth smells of camphor;
because of this, bees always circle him.
His urine and feces smell of musk.
His words are gentle,
and his hands and feet are soft.
He has the fragrance of the utpala,
and is free of white hair and wrinkles.
His body is glossy and supple.
Heart, skull and navel:
therefore he becomes gorocanā.
Casting seven shadows, he walks with the gait of a goose.

He has a compassionate disposition,
always has faith in the Three Jewels,
and possesses generosity and moral discipline.
If the yogin recognizes such a one:
he is not killed and is not burned by fire;
no vicious creature of any kind whatsoever is able to eat him.
He is not seen at night;
he is the supreme lord of invisibility.
Having recognized such a one, the mantra practitioner takes him himself and practices giving.
Excrement, water and bodhicitta
the wise one takes and makes into pills.
Wrapped in the three metals,
they should be accomplished by the intelligent one.
Having fully joined the two organs,
one recites the near-heart mantra a hundred thousand times.
Having placed this in his hand:
from this giving, it is given to me.
This one, immediately,
finds the activity of Akṣobhya.
Having taken him to a solitary place,
one should settle in equipoise and practice.

Further actions are to be explained in full,
the holy supreme means of accomplishing siddhis.
Having cut the hair from the crown of his head,
and also the hair of an animal,
mixing them and making them into a thread,
by tying it around the neck of anyone,
that person turns into a form like his,
and also takes on various forms.
Having taken his skin,
one draws glorious Heruka upon it.
The accomplishment of the wrathful one in person brings about glorious Heruka.
Having taken the skin of the hands and feet,

mixing it with the hair of a bhūta,
and having made it into powdered pills,
one consecrates them with mantras and performs the rite.
The wise one, on the day of victory,
wraps them in the three metals
and takes it with the left hand.
With a fist concealing the thumb,
if that fist is placed on the head,
at once the thief is paralyzed.
With one's own hands one takes both his arms;
taking one's own hair as a noose and holding it,
holding the hook in the right hand,
one wraps it with five threads.
Whatever direction is filled with wealth,
seeing that direction, one should take it.
Having set it in the house and sitting upon it,
having recited the mantra, one travels in the sky.
oṃ jaḥ a ppaṃ ba hūṃ ba hūṃ ba rā na du khe ca ri ja ri hrīḥ svāhā Wealth and grain and likewise clothing,
whatever the mind desires,
all of it is swiftly summoned,
and the house is seen to be completely full.
Having eaten the meat,
one turns into a divine body.
The yogin becomes a vajra body,
and by this death is brought under control.
Having taken the sinews according to the rite,
and mixed them with hair, one twists them;
having twisted them into thread
according to the rite, one makes them into nooses.
Standing with the right leg extended, abiding in wrath,
with the recitation of someone's name,
if the noose is cast, immediately
the goddess is summoned and stands before one.
With the powder of his bones
the wise one draws a maṇḍala,
and here the accomplishment of the maṇḍala,

whatever one desires, abides in it.
Further, one makes ornaments
and beautifies them with vajra marks.
For worship one holds them with the sinews.
One who keeps the observance of being anointed with sandalwood ground there will travel in the sky.
The practitioner, having made eye ointment
from the great sesame oil,
will not be seen, even his shadow.
If the yogin anoints himself with the fat,
the night too becomes like day.
If the yogin eats the marrow,
he is satisfied, and not otherwise;
for as long as he lives he does not hunger,
and his intellect and memory increase.
The yogin remembers his former births
and becomes Vajrasattva.
Having made the entrails into powder,
the wise one dries them in the shade as well.
When they are placed on someone's head,
immediately that person is drawn under one's power.
If the mantra practitioner eats the lungs,
he at once becomes free of sickness.
If the foot is taken and struck on the ground,
it brings down a stream of rain.
The intelligent one takes the secret part and dries it,
mixes it with red sandalwood,
and makes it into powder;
if it is given to any woman,

that woman, tormented by desire,
comes under one's power and does one's bidding.
A knee bone made into a peg,
about twelve finger-widths in length,
hidden away with someone's name,
brings that person's family line to an end.

If the yogin eats the tongue,
he gains the accomplishment of speech.
If the yogin eats the heart,
the mind becomes invincible.
Taking the four kings of the teeth,
above and below,
with the wing of a bee
and powder of tsupma petals:
if the practice is done with this powder,
the moving and the unmoving are bewildered.
With the veins made into powder,
all women are made to wither.
Self-arisen flower, gorocanā,
lac and saffron:
if the mantra practitioner applies them as a tilaka mark,
even a universal monarch comes under his power.
With powder of the yogin's eyeballs,
the enemy army is split apart.
Merely by eating the breasts,
milk is immediately drawn forth.
Merely by eating the yogin's sexual organ,
a woman's seed is drawn forth at once.
With powder of the yogin's teeth and nails,
scattered on the head of whomever one will,
the eight accomplishments are accomplished;
even father and son
are made to hate each other.
By the practice with the lips made into powder,
the mouth is suppressed.
By the practice with the nose made into powder,
the breath is suppressed.
By the practice with the ears, one becomes deaf.
If one binds on the skin of the head
and recites before the mouth,
one becomes chief of all the gods.
By the practice with the skull,
blood is drawn forth.

By turning the skull mouth downward,
only harm is done.
Indravāru and gorocanā:
having mixed the two together,
whoever has a tilaka mark made of it will see the abode of Indra.
By anointing with gorocanā
together with nyangtré,
one gains invincible strength
and overcomes adversaries.
Putrañjali and gorocanā
made into powder together:
on whatever woman the powder is scattered,
she becomes intoxicated with desire
and remains for as long as she lives.
By anointing with gorocanā
and putra together,
all the bhūtas, male and female,
saying, "What shall we do?",
will come to sit before him
and will grant whatever he desires.
Gorocanā and jīvantī
made into powder together,
combined with a dead man's eye and eye ointment:
one will live
for as long as the eon endures.
Makara's hand and gorocanā
made into powder together,
made into pills
together with nāgamado,
and mixed with vajra splendor:
if this is made into an eye medicine,
even the elephant of the Wealth Guardian
will appear in person,
and if one rides upon it,
with a great retinue of elephants,
one becomes invincible to others.

One destroys the enemy army,
gains power over the lands of others,
and is granted whatever one desires.
Through the practice of brahmadaṇḍī
together with gorocanā,
there will be no challenger in the Vedas.
The gorocanā of peacock bile
together with hare's blood:
if pills are always prepared from it
and bound with a peacock tail feather,
one flies like a bee,
gains the accomplishment of summoning the gods,
and the vidyādharas will come.
For a mere trifle in return,
they will grant whatever one desires.
One carries off the celestial palaces of the gods,
and the daughters of the gods too are summoned.
If one wishes, they remain under one's power;
if one does not wish it, one works for the benefit of beings.
If the tail feather is turned downward,
treasures too will be seen.
By taking them, the perfection of generosity
becomes completely fulfilled.
At the doors of the treasures beneath the earth,
if one circles them with the tail feather,
one should enter by opening the doors.
One sports together with the daughters of the asuras,
and takes the essence and the elixir of the gods.
Having seized it and eaten it,
one turns into the form of a god of desire.
By taking the substances of accomplishment,
one goes about working for the benefit of beings.
Then, as for the rite
of the five limbs:
having taken hair, skin, flesh,
bone and marrow,
one should make pills from them together with excrement, water, semen

and vermilion, and practice.
Wrapped in the three metals,
if they are hidden inside the mouth,
one will travel through the sky.
Together with gorocanā,
one becomes a great king in the three realms.

From the Supreme of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, this is the sixty-sixth chapter, on accomplishing the great paśu of seven births.

Then, further, this is to be explained:
meditating on the mind of one's own dharma,
joining it to the letters of one's own dharma,
one should meditate correctly on the selfless dharma.
The letters of one's own dharma are supreme joy;
the dharmakāya body is self-arisen.
Certainly arisen from the letter he,
Heruka is to be meditated upon.
Certainly arisen from the letter hi,
Vajraḍāka is to be meditated upon.
Arisen from the wisdom of hūṃ,
Vajrahūṃkāra is to be meditated upon.
Arisen from the letter hūṃ,
Akṣobhya is to be meditated upon.
Generated from the wisdom of baṃ,
Vajrasattva is to be meditated upon.
Arisen from oṃ bhūṃ oṃ bhūṃ,
Buddhaḍāka is to be meditated upon.
Arisen from aṃ trāṃ raṃ sva,
Ratnaḍāka is to be meditated upon.
Certainly arising from hriṃ hriṃ a,
the lotus ḍāka is to be meditated upon.
Arisen from khaṃ ho ha haṃ,
Viśvaḍāka is to be meditated upon.
From ḍā comes the ḍākinī herself;
from yaṃ likewise the yoginī;
from bhrūṃ the goddess who moves on the earth;

from baṃ the one who moves in the sky;
from maṃ the mātṛkā herself,
the consort of the hero, the renowned one.
he is the lord of mind;
from ru speech arises;
ka is the vajra of body:
Heruka arises from the three syllables.
From maṃ comes Mañjuvajra;
from saṃ comes Samantabhadra;
from laṃ comes Lokanātha;
from kṣiṃ comes Kṣitigarbha;
from baṃ comes Vajrapāṇi;
from meṃ comes Maitreya himself;
from khaṃ comes the one renowned as Ākāśagarbha;
from gaṃ comes Gaganagañja.

From saṃ comes Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin, the Remover of All Obscurations;
from gaṃ comes Gandhahastin;
from jñāṃ comes Jñānaketu as well;
from aṃ comes Akṣayamati;
from praṃ comes Pratibhānakūṭa;
from saṃ comes Sarvāpāyañjaha, who leads beings out of all the lower realms;
from saṃ comes the Destroyer of All Lower Realms;
from jaṃ comes Jālinīprabha;
from caṃ comes Candraprabha;
arising from raṃ is Ratnaprabha;
from sūṃ comes Sūryaprabha;
from baṃ comes Vajraprabha as well;
from maṃ comes Mahāsthāmaprāpta;
suṃ is Sudhana;
from baṃ comes Bhadrapāla himself;
from saṃ comes Sāgaramati.

Samantabhadra, Mañjughoṣa, Lokanātha, Kṣitigarbha,
Vajrapāṇi and Maitreya, Ākāśagarbha, Gaganagañja,

Sarvanivaraṇaviṣkambhin,
and Gandhahastin himself;
Akṣayamati and Jñānaketu, Pratibhānakūṭa the supreme,
and the Destroyer of All Sorrow himself; Sarvāpāyañjaha himself, and Jālinīprabha, Candraprabha, Ratnaprabha, Sūryaprabha, and Vajraprabha the supreme;
Sudhana and the Jewel-Attainer, Sāgaramati and Bhadrapāla:
these are the ones accomplished of old.
Their garland secret mantras should be arranged.
They are taught as the pledge,
and they grant the accomplishment of siddhi.

Vajradūtī herself,
the Inciter, and Ratnolkā, Vajrasūryā likewise,
Vetālī, Vajrakumārī,
Kampoji likewise,
Buddhabodhī likewise,
Jñānolkā and Vajrabhairavī,
Jñānolkā and Jayakarī,
Tārā and Pāṇḍaravāsinī,
Locanā and the supreme Māmakī,
Dhvajā, Pratisarā,
Mayūrī and Śabarī,
Śṛṅkhalā and Pratyaṅgirā,
the goddess Uṣṇīṣā and Vajrabhairavī:
these are the goddesses accomplished of old,
who grant every fruit one desires.
Together with the manifesting syllable and the name,
one should add hūṃ phaṭ at the end;
at the very end join svāhā as well.
Then they fully grant the accomplishment of the mantra.

Yamāri and Paramāśva the Victor
are those who subdue the obstructors;

these four, with Prajñāntaka,
accomplish every aim one desires.
Ṭakkirāja, Nīladaṇḍa, Mahābala,
and eighth, the renowned Acala:
the great wrathful ones, accomplished of old,
surely subdue all who are vicious.
Gaurī and the other pledge goddesses
are the eight goddesses of the Blood-Drinker.
The ḍākinīs explained before abide nondual with the eight wrathful ones.
The mantras endowed with the eight root syllables
should be properly joined with the names.
oṃ is the manifesting syllable in every case,
and at the end join hūṃ phaṭ svāhār.
The manifesting syllable, the name and hūṃ,
and at the end join phaṭ and svāhā.

The goddesses of form and sound,
and the goddesses of smell and taste,
are to be arranged on the four petals.
Sky-clad, with hair let loose,
she who is renowned as Sparśavajrā, the Vajra of Touch, through her touch, abides truly nondual.
In the center the king, the Blood-Drinker,
abides in bliss through the goddess's touch.
The essence is renowned as the dharmadhātu;
it arises from the perfection of wisdom.
The wisdom being abides nondually;
she is Vajradharmadhātvīśvarī.
The nondual wisdom of equality
is that dharmadhātu, which cannot be apprehended.
That is the supreme secret reality,
which the Vajra Holder truly bestows.

The supreme of greatness is the Samāja;
Vajrasattva is the supreme of bliss;
the one that follows the Yoga Tantra;
the Yoginī of Going and Not Going;

the Ocean of Knowledge is supreme;
Vajraḍāka, a little;
it is the Māyāsaṃvara Tantra;
the Tantra of the Arising of Yoginīs;
it is the Secret Ocean Tantra;
the Abhidhāna Tantra is unsurpassed;
the supreme Samāja is the explanation.
According to the particular dispositions of beings,
as a cause for taking sentient beings into its care,
this sublime supreme Samāja
bestows the fruit of a buddha's awakening.
The families are taught to be of five kinds.
Of the many bodhisattvas,
whichever one one wishes
should be made the presiding lord.
In accordance with the names,
following the stages of the Abhidhāna Tantra,
the vajra practitioner
should perform the rites of the Abhidhāna Tantra.
Abandoning every doubt in the mind,
this meditation of nonduality,
sublime and supreme in the Great Vehicle,
leads one to possess great siddhi.

Next the supreme hand emblems shall be explained,
the sequence of the rite of form and color.
Emerging from the letter he,
one should meditate on oneself as Heruka.
His body is white and very fierce,
terrifying with bared fangs;
he has three eyes and five faces,
six arms and four legs.
He wears a crown of a garland of skulls;
his matted locks are bound with a half moon on his head;
he wears a crown ornament of a crossed vajra;
his body is adorned with the six seals.
He wears a tiger skin as his garment

and is adorned with a necklace of heads.
White, yellow and likewise red,
green, and the upper face blue;
laughing, heroic and amorous,
furious, peaceful and wrathful.
Holding vajra and bell together,
he abides nondual through the vajra touch.
He also holds the supreme hide of the Victor
and bestows the fruit of every bliss.
He holds a skull cup and a khaṭvāṅga staff,
with a vajra spear in a supreme hand.
Standing with the right leg extended,
he presses the four māras beneath his feet.

Sparśavajrā is green,
with a form of white radiance.
Her faces are green, yellow and red,
and her left face is white;
her upper face is blue and terrifying.
Her hair is let loose; she is intoxicated;
she bears the seal of the lion's release;
her two thighs are closely entwined.
She wears a crown of a garland of skulls;
her three eyes are deep red.
She is joined with vajra and skull cup,
adorned with a bell and a ḍamaru drum,
and holds a spear and a khaṭvāṅga in her hands.
Of great passion, with the radiance of fire,
sky-clad, in the mood of peace,
she tames all who are hard to tame
and tames sentient beings of every kind;
the mood of compassion is wholly complete in her.
At the center of moon and sun,
she sits in the heart of a multicolored lotus.
Bhairava and Kālarātri
one should visualize as pressed beneath their feet.

All the retinue have three faces
and wear crowns of garlands of skulls.
They are fierce and yet peaceful,
their forms distinguished by the three families,
and they hold the emblems of the three families.
Those whose forms are distinguished as goddesses
are joined in the nondual pledge.
All of them sit on seats of pretas,
pressing down with the right leg extended;
their two thighs are closely entwined.
One should meditate on wisdom and means.
In the intermediate directions are vases
and skull cups brimming with the moon.
At the corners are the gatekeepers,
each according to its share of color.

They stand with the right leg extended,
pressing the world protectors beneath their feet.
They wear crowns of garlands of skulls,
intoxicated with compassion and wrath.
The colors, white and the rest, are assigned
in the order of the right-hand faces,
and the order of the seals is likewise.
In forward order, and in the order reversed,
the retinue and the rest, the supreme ones, are to be placed.
In the center of the vajra lotus,
in the midst of the three family wheels,
is the supreme one who holds his own blessing.
The buddhas keep it hidden from the tīrthikas.
This is utterly secret;
it rests in the words of the guru;
it is the kindness of the yoginīs.
Arranging the sequence of the sacred places and the rest,
one should set out the thirty-seven purities.
It is a being whose self is wisdom and means;
it draws in even the supreme of the tenth ground;
it abides in the ten perfections;
it is the purified meaning of the three unions.

This is the stainless supreme meditation.

This concludes the sixty-seventh chapter of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high: the chapter on the meditation of the blessing in which oneself is generated from the letters of the Dharma.

Next I shall explain in the highest way
the sequence of meditation on oneself in the rite.
Māmakī and Locanā,
the goddess Tārā, Pāṇḍaravāsinī, Marīcī and Jambhala,
the goddess the Inciter, and Dharaṇī,
arise from their own seed syllables.
They are adorned with twelve arms
and have three eyes; they stand with the right leg extended;
they sit in the posture of the sattva;
they abide in the vajra posture.
They have the faces of the four Vedas,
are sky-clad, and sit on corpse seats.
With hair let loose, they are terrifying;
they wear crowns of garlands of skulls;
they gaze with wrath, yet in the mood of compassion.
The goddess Prajñāpāramitā
arises from the supreme wisdom of reality.
She is the very self of each perfect union:
this, without doubt, is the wisdom of reality.
The wrathful ones of various forms
arise from the hero himself.
The supreme wrathful ones and the arising ḍākinīs as well,
unstained, in their moods,
are to be joined to him as their lord.
This is the meditation on oneself.
Through the practice outside of meditative equipoise as well,
one should meditate and contemplate.

The subtle wrathful Vajra Holder,
in the center of the lotus at the heart,
Vajraḍāka, the loving one,
makes his dwelling right here.

All the perfect buddhas, the mind of awakening,
and the three kinds of beings abide in this.
By worshiping this very one,
all who are worthy of worship are worshiped.
Whoever constantly looks upon this,
the Victor regards as one worshiped.
Through the vajra of inner union,
the yogi is held to be a vajra holder.
Therefore, through vajra worship,
what the mind longs for is sought within the body.
What the tantras teach,
that by the practice of the five offerings
one swiftly attains buddhahood,
is held to be something other, external.
The placing upon the four insubstantials,
the meditation in the form of the deity,
is the great worship of sameness,
which fully accomplishes all the buddhas.

A tantra that comes about well merely as a teaching that shows mantras and reality
is not the ultimate.
When the ultimate truly arises,
there is no teacher and no teaching.
The sacred places and the rest, divided into twenty-four,
abide right here in this.
Therefore wandering among them
is wearisome, and not for one who has reality.
If reality is lacking,
what will wandering in error accomplish?
And if reality is present,
what error is there in it?
The supreme sacred places and secondary sacred places
are made stainless by being taught.
Or else, for incapable and careless people,
the places of men should be proclaimed.
What I have explained in this way

is by force of the dispositions of sentient beings.
Since there is no bliss other than meditative concentration,
one should therefore devote oneself to supreme meditative concentration.
The yogi who wanders outside exhausts his bodily elements.
Therefore, abandoning the external,
one should abide in the play of yoga.

The glorious one of vajra yoga,
with eyes of pure wisdom,
his heart long pained with compassion,
looks upon those who practice vajra yoga.
Being pleased with them, he grants the supreme siddhi, whatever they desire.
Therefore one should strive with great effort
to accomplish the noble lady Wisdom.
Endowed with various conduct,
having practiced conduct and austerities,
here abandon conduct and austerities,
and take delight in the austerity of reality.
Living on whatever food there is,
the one who keeps the austerity in that way,
being devoted to meditative concentration as supreme food,
should live by the conduct of a madman.
Naked or not naked,
whichever it may be, so it is.
Focusing on one's own chosen deity,
one should contemplate that alone.
Having become as one who is mute,
if the yogi practices thus for about six months, then certainly this great yoginī will become clear.
When one sees the supreme Jñānolkā,
the yoginīs gather together well,
just as flocks of geese gather
at a delightful lotus pond.
Like a magician in the world,

one works for the good of all beings.
One will become manifest as glorious Vajradhara:
of this there is no doubt.
"So that through this conduct it will surely come about just as has been explained, purify your minds!"
This I implore of sentient beings.
Whoever possesses marvelous compassion,
whatever he speaks comes true.

Through the practice of the fierce vajra,
one should place the ḍākinī at the heart.
At the heart, apply the vajra hook;
join it within by the vajra of mind.
Further, the vajra that is to be placed
should be examined within the dharmadhātu.
Having joined oneself to the sky,
meditate on holding a form of splendor.
Placing one's own mind of Dharma,
one's own warmth, one's nature, stainless,
through the practice of one's own meditation,
meditate on one's own letters of Dharma.
In meditating on the form of another,
according to whatever one has realized,
one should not meditate on some other lord
produced by the mind's delusion.
According to whatever one's inclination,
one should look upon the form of another.

This concludes the sixty-eighth chapter of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high: the chapter on the worship that tames oneself.

Then all the blessed tathāgatas spoke this secret, the secret wisdom.

"Phenomena, by their nature selfless,
are stainless like the sky.
With the vajra of the wisdom of emptiness,
one should meditate on emptiness always."

Having given their cries of "Excellent!",
from the union in which the tantra was born, they said:
"Excellent, excellent, great wisdom,
the Abhidhāna, supreme of the supreme!
Excellent, fierce mode of the vajra,
the highest kindness of a buddha's awakening!
Excellent, the union of nonduality!
For the accomplishment of the supreme and the supreme,
'Excellent!' is surely to be applied.
The meditation free of desire,
excellent, protector of all beings!
This teaching of the Great Vehicle,
the supreme nondual wisdom,
the first of those who have received the instructions,
excellent, all vajra gurus!
The yoginī taught to them,
excellent! To the maṇḍala of the assembly
she has granted the unsurpassed siddhi."
Having finished, they fell silent.

When the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, had spoken thus, the wrathful vajras of all the tathāgatas praised what the Blessed One had taught, the unsurpassed Abhidhāna Tantra, the Saṃvara of the Net of Ḍākinīs.

This concludes the sixty-ninth chapter of the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high, called the Secret of Secrets, the Great King of Tantras of Cakrasaṃvara: the chapter teaching meditation on reality itself, free of doubt.

This completes the Great King of Tantras of Cakrasaṃvara, the Secret of Secrets, from the Abhidhānottara Tantra, the highest of the high.

It was translated, edited and finalized by the Indian preceptor, the great paṇḍita Dīpaṃkaraśrījñāna, and the great Tibetan translator, the monk Rinchen Zangpo. Later it was also edited by the great paṇḍita Jñānaśrī and the translator Khyungpo Chökyi Tsöndrü. Later still, the paṇḍita Ānanda and Lochung supplied what was missing, removed what was superfluous, proofread it, corrected it well, and finalized it. There is nothing more profound than this.

Here is contained volume Kha of the Tantra Collection.

Translator's Notes

• In "the abode in the bhaga where existence, sound and form arise," the Tibetan □□□ is read as □□□□ ("existence"); the line remains obscure. The verse beginning "the supreme ones, the breath-releasing and the intermediate" uses coded language for ritual substances, and its exact referents are uncertain. Names of the heroes are given in their standard Cakrasaṃvara forms, which the Tibetan renders: □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ Khaṇḍakapāla, □□□□□□□ Kaṅkāla, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ Vikaṭadaṃṣṭra, □□□□□□ Suravairin, □□□□□□ Aṅkuraka, □□□□□□□ Jaṭila, and so on.
• The names of the yoginīs, ḍākinīs and mātṛkās are given in their standard Sanskrit forms from the Cakrasaṃvara cycle, which the Tibetan renders; the first four goddesses (□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□□, and the like) are reconstructed from their meanings as Pātanī, Māraṇī, Ākarṣaṇī and Narteśvarī, which is likely but not certain. The mātṛkā written □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("Yama burner") is taken as Yamadāḍhī (also spelled Yamadāhī). □□□□□□□ ("Mahendra") here names the earth maṇḍala in the stack of elemental maṇḍalas.
• The syllables after the statement on the charnel grounds are, in the Cakrasaṃvara tradition, the initial syllables of the twenty-four sacred places (pīṭhas), which the following verses call "the twenty-four." The spirit class grib gnon is rendered literally as "shadow-oppressing spirits," as its Sanskrit equivalent is not certain. In the verse on liberation, the text reads tshos ("dye, color"), which makes little sense; it has been read as tshes ("lunar day"). In the line "arose from the exalted Heruka," mngon mthe is unclear as written and has been read as mngon mtho, "exalted"; this is uncertain.
• "She Who Kisses" renders 'o byed ma literally; in this list of the elements she corresponds to space, but her Sanskrit name cannot be identified with confidence. In the line "When they are painted," the text reads 'dri ("ask"), which makes little sense here; it has been read as 'bri ("paint, draw"). Paśu, "the beast," is the tantric term for the unawakened being bound by fetters, here the prospective disciple whose characteristics the mantrin examines. "The five mudrās" are the bone ornaments of the charnel-ground yogin.
• In the line "I shall make offerings and praise them," the text reads rjed ("forget"), which makes no sense here; it has been read as brjod ("praise"). In the list of the six senses, "awareness" (rig pa) stands in the place of the body or the sense of touch. "The four abodes of Brahmā" are the four immeasurables (brahmavihāras): loving-kindness, compassion, joy and equanimity.
• "Hearth Union" renders thab sbyor literally; this member of the eight wrathful ones cannot be identified with confidence. In the list of the eight wrathful ones, rdo rje nag po stobs po che has been taken as two figures, Vajrakāla and Mahābala, which gives the eight names that match the eight colors listed next.
• Māṃsa, śukra and rakta are flesh, semen and blood, among the substances of the tantric pill. The four-line verses in long meter are dense; "the steeds" (rta) is taken to refer to the winds, the mounts of mind, and this reading is tentative. The mantra list names Kuṇḍali as the fifth wrathful one, which suggests that the figure rendered literally as "Hearth Union" (thab sbyor) in the previous passage is Vajrakuṇḍali.
• The six sense-vajra deities (the Vajras of Delusion, Aversion, Jealousy, Passion, Avarice, and Lordship) are rendered by meaning rather than with reconstructed Sanskrit names. The colors of the five elements are given as the Tibetan lists them (yellow, blue, red, smoky, blue). "Twofold form" for the goddesses of the intermediate directions renders gzugs gnyis pa literally; its precise sense is unclear. Khaṇḍarohā appears both on the western petal and in the north as the text stands.
• The lines on the womb-born and song are obscure; the rendering "some yogis wish the womb-born to be brought under the sway of song" is tentative. "The five deathless wisdoms" likely refers to the five nectars. The term rendered "sacred thread" is the older Tibetan equivalent of yajñopavīta.

• "Vajra water" (rdo rje chu) here denotes urine, paired with excrement as pledge substances. The color list after the six deities names seven colors for six figures, as the text stands. The verse beginning "The supreme, all the middling" is obscure and its rendering tentative. Śyāmā (sngo bsangs ma) and Khagānanā (bya gdong ma) are identified from the parallel Cakrasaṃvara maṇḍala and the mantras that follow.

• In the pledge-substance list, "vajra water" and "Vairocana" are coded terms, generally understood as urine and excrement. The Sanskrit names of the mind-wheel heroes, goddesses and sacred places are identified from the parallel Cakrasaṃvara maṇḍala.

• The goddess whose exalted state is attained through one-pointed meditation is named bdag med ma, Nairātmyā, "the Selfless One."

• "By merely kissing your mouth" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□, whose verb □□□□ is uncommon; the sense of kissing is inferred from context. In "the opened supreme mouth of the lotus," □□□□□ is taken as "opened" rather than the number ten million (koṭi), which is also possible. In the description of Vārāhī, □□□□□□ ("imagined") is read as □□□□□□□ ("holding"), which fits the context. The colors of Kākāsyā and the others are listed as the Tibetan gives them; how they are distributed among the four goddesses is not stated.

• Pātanī, Māraṇī and Ākarṣaṇī are standard Sanskrit forms of the first three goddesses; □□□□ ("dancer") is rendered Nartakī, a form inferred from its meaning. In the opening of the eighth chapter, □□□□□□ "the tangible" is given literally; it may refer to the class of stop consonants (sparśa) in the syllable arrangement, which the text does not make explicit. In the sixth left hand, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as "the head of Rudra"; it could also mean simply "a fierce one's head." The text has the embracing hands hold "skull cup and bell" where vajra and bell would be usual; this is translated as written.

• Santrāsanī is written □□□□□□□□□□□□, an evident slip for □□□□□□□□□□□. At the throat the male deity is given as □□□□□□□□□□□, Vajraprabha, the same name as the deity at the eyes; this is translated as written. The terms "sites," "secondary sites," "fields," "secondary fields" and "chandohas" render the classes of sacred places (pīṭha, upapīṭha, kṣetra, upakṣetra, chandoha).

• Two slips are read as evident: □□ for □□□ "at the mouth," and □□□□□□□□□□□□ for □□□□□□□□□□, Sañcālinī. The faculty of faith is assigned to □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, here identified with Vīramatī, the goddess of the corresponding place, though the Tibetan wording differs from her usual name. The awakening factor of diligence is assigned to □□□□□□□□□, Kākāsyā, as written, although in this sequence Khagānanā would be expected. The "great conch" rosary (□□□□□□□□) is in tantric usage commonly understood as one made of human bone. In the sequence of places, Khaṇḍarohā appears beside Vajraratna, sharing her name with the goddess of the inner circle, as the text has it.

• The goddess of right speech is written □□□□□□□□□□□□□, here identified with Mahāvīryā, the goddess of the knees in the preceding list, whose name there is written □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□. In "liberated from dharma and from what is not dharma," the Tibetan reads □□□□□□□□□□□□□, literally "from dharma and from dharma"; the second is taken in the sense of its opposite, as in the parallel phrase "abandoning dharma and non-dharma" earlier in the text, but this is uncertain. The verses on the womb-born and egg-born modes of meditation are terse, and several lines (for example "the laughter of separation" and "the egg-born is together with a thing") are rendered literally. The repetition of the lines on abandoning song is in the Tibetan and is kept.

• "The thirty" (sum cu pa) is taken literally; it may refer to the gods of the Thirty-Three, here set beside the classes moving on and beneath the earth. "Sipika" (si pi ka), apparently a charnel-ground creature, is left in its Tibetan spelling because it cannot be identified with confidence. "Severed parts" renders the obscure rje ngar, and "charred remains" the obscure rag rog; both are uncertain. "Clad in the directions" means naked (digambara). The five kinds of hungry ghosts encircling the outer maṇḍala are kept as written. The title in the colophon reads nges par brjod pa ("discourse") where the opening has mngon par brjod pa (Abhidhāna); it is translated as it stands.

• "The Great Lord over all the tathāgatas" renders dbang phyug chen po here as an epithet of the presiding buddha, not the god Śiva. The verbs gsungs in the petition are read as honorific imperatives ("speak"). The word gha ti in the offering verse is unidentified and left as written. Ser ba in the description of the faces is the color yellow, not hail. Bsgral ba at the start of the final section is taken in its general sense "released, delivered", since the context is not a wrathful rite; the sense of the line is uncertain.

• The three colors given for each pair are presumably those of the hero's three faces; the text simply lists them. Ser ba here is the color yellow, not hail. The hero paired with Suvīrā in Nagara is written khrag 'thung ma, with a feminine ending; it is taken as Heruka (khrag 'thung, "blood drinker"), whose place this normally is, but the ending is unexplained.

• "Great conch" (dung chen, Skt. mahāśaṅkha) in tantric usage commonly denotes human bone; here it describes the material of the rosary. "The four acts" by which the wisdom wheel is blessed are not specified in the text; they are probably the four stages of summoning, drawing in, binding and delighting. The words gsungs pa after the assembly's request are read as introducing their own verses of praise.

• Several pairs here differ from the previous chapter's list and are translated as they stand: in Lampāka the pair is Vajrabhadra and Subhadrā (shin tu bzang mo), and Mālava's hero is rdo rje'i sku, taken as the same Vajradeha. Gshin rje sreg ma is rendered Yamadāhī ("Yama-burner"), the head of the four Yama goddesses. "Of half form" (gzugs phyed pa) for the four goddesses of the intermediate quarters is literal; its exact sense is uncertain. The sentence on the donkey, camel, goat and cat faces is translated as an independent statement; the text does not say plainly which goddesses bear these faces.

• "The maṇḍala of pride" renders snyems pa, whose exact sense here (pride, exultation) is uncertain. "The egg-born" (sgong skyes) may refer to birds, or to the "twice-born"; the intended referent of this line is unclear. "Rosary of human bone" renders dung chen, literally "great conch," a standard tantric term for human bone.

• "The family of permanence" renders rtag pa'i rigs literally; in the sequence of four families given to Māmakī, Locanā, Tārā and Pāṇḍaravāsinī it presumably corresponds to the tathāgata family, the place where Locanā is usually assigned. "Half-female Lord" and "half-female sovereign ladies" render phyed ni bud med dbang phyug, evidently alluding to the androgynous Ardhanārīśvara form.

• In the list of body sites the Tibetan gives Vīramatī (as "steadfast mind" at Godāvarī and "mind of a hero" at Nagara) where the earlier list placed Vīramatī at Godāvarī and Suvīrā at Nagara; the text is followed as it stands. "Menstrual fluid" renders rdul (rajas). The element goddesses and the aggregate deities are given their standard Sanskrit names (Pātanī, Māraṇī, Ākarṣaṇī, Narteśvarī, Padmajālinī; Vajrasūrya, Narteśvara, Vajrarāga), which the Tibetan renders by meaning.

• "The thirty-seven" are presumably the thirty-seven factors conducive to awakening. "The wound-born" (rma skyes) is a covert term, evidently for blood. The verses on eating one who died by violence, slaughter, and union with mother, sister and daughter belong to the deliberately transgressive coded language of the yoginī tantras, which the commentarial tradition reads esoterically; they are translated as they stand.

• "Bhavagī" transcribes the Tibetan bha ba gi, a name for the western gate goddess that cannot be identified with confidence. "The earth-holding goddess" (sa 'dzin lha mo) is translated literally, as her name is not securely identifiable. "Śrī Heruka" renders dpal khrag 'thung, "glorious blood-drinker."

• "Moving and unmoving" renders rgyu dang mi rgyu (Skt. carācara, the animate and inanimate world), not "cause." The verb bsngam in "held firm the vital breath" is uncertain; it is read in the sense of restraining the breath in prāṇāyāma. "bsgom sa nas" is read as bsgoms nas, "having meditated," and "phyag rgyal" as phyag rgya la, "with the mudrā," as evident copyists' slips.

• The color term nam mkha' ser skya, recurring for every third pair of the twenty-four, is rendered "pale yellow like the sky"; its exact shade is uncertain. "Clad in the directions" means naked. The text as it stands gives both legs of Heruka as extended; this is translated as written. Pullīramalaya is written Pullīramaya in this text.

• "Clad in the directions" means naked. The goddess at Godāvarī is here written brtan pa'i blo can ma, "steady-minded," rather than the earlier dpa' ba'i blo gros ma; she is kept as Vīramatī for consistency. In "unwavering, they are joined in the same way," mi g.yo ba might also be read as the deity Acala; the plain sense is taken. The body part skra mtshams, "hairline," is translated literally.

• "With the boundary or with mantra" renders tsham ngam sngags, read as mtshams sam sngags; the first word is uncertain. The figure for right speech is here called dpa' bo chen mo; she is kept as Mahāvīryā, the goddess of Kulatā, for consistency.

• "Making the index fingers a spear" follows the text as written (mdung); the parallel mudrā earlier reads mdud, "knotting." "The three realities" renders de nyid gsum. "One's own special deity" renders rang lhag lha, which is uncertain.

• "Khaṇḍakapāla" here renders thod pa'i dum ("skull fragment"), taken as the hero Khaṇḍakapāla of the Cakrasaṃvara maṇḍala, who is paired with Caṇḍākṣī's circle; the Tibetan says literally "his skull-fragment and the others." The goddess gshin rje sreg ("Yama-burner") is given as Yamadāhī; she is the same corner goddess elsewhere called Yamadāḍhī. "Marrow" renders rkang, which could also mean "feet" or "bones"; marrow fits a filled skull cup best. The line "the three wheels are sixteen" is translated literally.

• "The Great Terrifier" renders 'jigs pa chen po, probably an epithet of Mahābhairava, to whose contorted, wrathful appearance the hero's is compared. The line "gazing with the names of passion" is translated literally; its sense is obscure. Where the sixteenth chapter says "display the wheel of Dharma," the Tibetan has bstang, read as bstan ("display, teach").

• The hero and heroine names are those of the twenty-four pairs of the Cakrasaṃvara maṇḍala. The Tibetan rta rnam in the speech wheel's northwest is read as rta rna, Hayakarṇā. In the body wheel's southeast, "the Blood Drinker" (khrag 'thung) is the hero usually called Heruka or Śrī Heruka. The three colors given for each figure are presumably the colors of its three faces.

• "The scattering and the drinking" renders 'thor 'thung literally; the exact ritual acts meant are not certain. "Lip is pressed tightly to lip" takes the obscure pi di dam as describing a close kiss. "The life breath and its control" renders srog dang rtsol ba, the Tibetan equivalent of prāṇāyāma.

• "The Youth Who Scatters All" translates kun 'gyed gzhon nu, a deity in the list of trampled gods whom I cannot identify with confidence. "Excrement and water" renders dri chen chu; "water" may stand for urine, as in the lists of the five nectars. "The five lamps" is a standard tantric code for the five meats or substances. The last line, sa 'dzin thams cad, is taken as "all those who hold the grounds"; it could also mean "all the mountains."

• "Beasts" renders □□□□□ (Skt. paśu), the tantric term for those deemed fit for ritual liberation, here defined as enemies of the teaching. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is a syllable short; □□□ is read as □□□ ("declared"). In □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□ is read as □□ ("goose"). "In accordance with the sūtra" renders □□□□□, whose sense here is uncertain. The "one of great mantra" (□□□□□□□□□□□□) and the kaṅbuka bird (□□□□□□□□) could not be identified with confidence. "The taking of the essence" is the elixir practice (rasāyana). "The supreme vow" may also allude to Saṃvara.

• □□□□□□□□□ is taken as Sumbha (Sumbharāja), the wrathful deity whose mantra appears in the preceding chapter. The "self-arisen flower" and "elephant flower" are coded names for ritual substances, conventionally menstrual blood and an elephant's ichor; the "awakening mind" here is the seminal substance. "Rocana" is the yellow pigment gorocanā. "Inside a head" may mean a skull.

• "The wisdom being" and "the commitment being" render □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ (jñānasattva and samayasattva). In the list of syllables, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered "saṃsāra"; in this list of ritual functions it may instead mean "circling" or "surrounding."

• □□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the Inciting Goddess") could not be identified with confidence and is translated by meaning. The line "made proud by that" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) probably refers to the divine pride of identifying with the deity meditated upon.

• The grounds named are the first six bodhisattva grounds: Very Joyful (Pramuditā), Stainless (Vimalā), Luminous (Prabhākarī), Radiant (Arciṣmatī), Difficult to Master (Sudurjayā), and Manifest (Abhimukhī). "The family of the Eternal" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) and Vajrasūrya (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are given as written; which tathāgatas they stand for here is not certain. "The food of recitation" renders □□□□□□□□□□ as written; it may be a slip for □□□□□□□□□, "the food of the moon." Place names are given in their standard Sanskrit forms (the Tibetan has □□□□□□ for Oḍra). Goddess names not yet met in this text are identified from the standard Cakrasaṃvara pairs: Vīramatī, Laṅkeśvarī, Hayakarṇā, Suvīrā, Mahābalā, Mahāvīryā.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as a rendering of Ardhanārīśvara, the half-female form of Śiva. □□□□□□ in □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□, giving the standard term for breath control (prāṇāyāma). □□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□, "six months". □□□□□□□□ in the list of emblems is unclear and is rendered loosely as "in their order". The four grounds named (Gone Far, Unmoving, Good Intelligence, Cloud of Dharma) are the seventh through tenth bodhisattva grounds.

• "The Victor's hide" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; it probably reflects a misreading of Sanskrit gajājina, "elephant hide", the hide Heruka holds aloft. In the list of colors the second yoginī is called □□□□□□□□□□□□, "Urger", where the list of positions has Caurī; she is taken to be Caurī. □□□□□□□□□□□□ / □□□□□□□□□□□□ is identified with Ghasmarī, the fifth of the standard eight, but this is not certain. □□□□□ in the gestures of the speech-wheel goddesses could not be identified and is rendered only as "gestures of the hands". The text writes □□□□ and □□□□□□, given here as "chandos and chandohas"; the usual pair is chandoha and upachandoha. The four goddesses of the speech wheel are named by the instrument they play (vīṇā, flute, great drum, drum) and are translated descriptively.

• □□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□, "austerity". "Great conch" (□□□□□□□□) for the rosary is in tantric usage commonly understood as human bone. "Sending out and drawing in" renders □□□□□□□□□□, literally "scattering and drinking", here taken as the outward and inward movement of the breath. "Whatever is its reversal" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) probably refers to the hundred-syllable mantra in reverse order, set out on sixteen petals. The mantra run beginning "ra ma he" is a song in Apabhraṃśa, the "song of the king of spring" mentioned after it. The vidyā is the female consort.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ at the start of the twenty-sixth chapter, and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ just after, are taken as the deity Buddhakapāla, who is the subject of this chapter. □□□□□ is read as palāśa, the tree with flame-colored flowers. "The fifty letters" renders □□□□□□□□□□, literally "half a hundred". The last line of the long verse before the colophon is compressed in the Tibetan and is rendered loosely.

• "The neuter letters" (□□□□□) are the vowels ṛ, ṝ, ḷ, ḹ, which the grammatical tradition calls neuter. "Sending out and drawing in" renders □□□□□□□□□, as in the earlier chapter. "The practice outside meditative equipoise" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, the post-meditative state. The chapter title phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken to mean restoring, literally "rising from", the broken samaya, which matches the content of the chapter. The second uṃ in the Buddhakapāla mantra is written exactly as the Tibetan has it.
• The line on the fourth goddess reads literally "from ṝ the Jewel truly arises"; her mantra calls her Ratnajālinī, and "Jewel Lamp and Wisdom Lamp" in the next line may be names or epithets of goddesses rather than descriptions. They are translated literally since the names cannot be identified with confidence. In both chapter colophons the Tibetan reads rgyu ("cause") where rgyud ("tantra") is evidently meant; translated as the title of the tantra. "Clad in the directions" means naked. The six mudrās are the six bone ornaments.
• "Thukri" (thug ri), the first of the animal faces, could not be identified and is given as written. The phrase rendered "the Ḍāka Moon" may be the name of the teacher of the mantra or an epithet; it is translated literally. The names of the eight ḍākinīs in the final section ("Supreme Samaya," "Supreme Variety," and so on) are translated by meaning, since their Sanskrit forms cannot be established with confidence. The colophon of chapter twenty-nine reads nges par brjod pa for mngon par brjod pa, and the colophon's rgyu is evidently rgyud; both are taken as the title of this tantra.
• "Holding a peaceful half moon" reads zla ba phyed pa for the written zla ba byed pa, evidently a copyist's slip, as in the parallel lines elsewhere in this text. The "twelve links" (yan lag bcu gnyis) are here equated with the twelve grounds, a tantric scheme that extends the usual ten bodhisattva grounds with "the Formless" and "the One Possessed of Wisdom," and adds the vajra ground as a thirteenth. Pi la and nye bi la are taken as Pīlava and Upapīlava, the classes of sacred sites in the ḍākinī-tantra geography.
• "The great brahmin" is a coded term of the tantric feast for a sacramental substance, commonly understood as human flesh, listed here beside "great meat"; it is translated literally. Pīlava and Upapīlava are classes of sacred sites in the ḍākinī-tantra geography; the passage reinterprets them as pairs of inner principles.
• The four figures in the intermediate directions are named in the Tibetan simply "Buddha Ḍāka," "Karma Ḍāka" and so on (mkha' 'gro, which does not mark gender); the description that follows is of female figures, so they are given as ḍākinīs. In the list of goddesses, names that could not be identified with confidence are translated by meaning (Lovely Form, Vajra Lip, Light Maker, Horse Face, Fierce Face, Vajra Fierce Lady, the Renowned One, the Fragrant One, Terrifying Face, Moon Crest, Fame Maker, the One with Joined Palms); Kāmbojī renders kam po ci and Nalarki is given as written. "The ḍākinīs cause it to be attained" reads thob par for the written thod par ("skull"), evidently a copyist's slip.
• On the southern band the Tibetan reads "four deities" with the masculine form lha po, where the other bands have lha mo, "goddesses"; the mantras are feminine, so lha po may be a slip for lha mo. Here ser ba is the color "yellow." In the northern-band line, the text has bzhad pa, "laugh," which is evidently a slip for bshad pa, "taught"; I have translated "taught." The "wrathful one of cessation" (or "of blocking") renders 'gog pa'i khro bo, and the reference is uncertain. The line about joining śrī "at the end of the consonants" (gsal byed mtha') is obscure, and the rendering is tentative.
• Sbyangs pa'i yon tan here means the ascetic virtues (dhūtaguṇa), which the text then lists. Some readings are uncertain or look like slips. In the list of face colors, skye ba, "birth," is taken as skya ba, "pale." The goddess rdo rje sring mchog ma is rendered literally as "the Vajra Supreme Sister," because the matching mantra name (rūkṣasī) does not settle her Sanskrit name. 'Theb is read as thob, "attained." 'Du is read as 'di, "this." Brjed pa in the chapter title is read as brjod pa. In the rain rite, chu lta is taken as chu lha, "water god." La pa is read as ral pa, "locks." The color term lnga dgu is obscure and is tentatively rendered "multicolored." Stobs kyi rgyu is identified as Karkoṭaka.

• In the bathing of the Buddha image, dri chu is rendered "urine," following its usual sense in tantric rites; "scented water" is also possible here. The phrase rgyal ba'i pags pa, "the skin of a Victor," is unclear; it may be a slip, but no evident correction suggests itself. The line bri gzugs spangs pa'i mngon sum du is tentatively rendered "directly, dispensing with a drawn image." The opening phrase 'dzam bu'i chu bo, "the Jambu river," refers to the gold of that river (jāmbūnada).

• The twelve goddesses of Vārāhī's maṇḍala are named in Sanskrit from their own mantras. The second gate goddess is called rdo rje gzi brjid mchog ma, the same name as the western one, although her mantra is amṛtottame; the text's reading is kept. The line zla ba'i de nyid 'grub par 'gyur, "the reality of the moon will be accomplished," is obscure; it may mean "within a month that very goal is accomplished." Several apparent slips were read as follows: mdangs and mdang as dang, "and"; thong as thod, "skull cup"; and gdod as gdong, "face." The consort called khrag 'thung (literally "blood-drinker") is male here and is rendered Heruka, since the color list names him "glorious Heruka."

• The phrase 'jam pa'i rdo rje 'chag rgyal po is unclear; 'chag may be a slip for 'chang, "holder." It is rendered simply "Mañjuvajra, the king." The phrase rta mchog tsa ba'i ka appears to be a corrupt writing of Caṇḍikā, Paramāśva's consort in the preceding list, and is translated that way. The "ten perfections" list adds skillful means, power, aspiration, and wisdom to the usual six, and the ten grounds follow in their standard order.

• In two lines of the code list the syllable is missing (the text reads □□□□□□□□□, a syllable short), so the code syllable for "eating" and for "speaking honestly" cannot be given; they are rendered "another syllable." "Code signs" renders □□□; the line closing the list reads □□□□□□□□□□□, taken as a slip for □□□. The chapter number □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as "thirty-eighth." In the chapter on the yoginīs several lines are obscure: □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("speaks much of her family") and □□□□□□ (rendered "jaw") are uncertain, and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is a short, unclear line. The names of the yoginīs rendered as "the Desirous One" (□□□□□□□□), "the One of Terrible Form" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), "the All-Roaming One" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), "the Transformed One" (□□□□□□□□□□), "the One with a Child" (□□□□□□□□□□□) and "the Unturning One" (□□□□□□□) are translated literally because their Sanskrit forms could not be confirmed.

• Several readings are uncertain. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as □□□□□□ ("knowingly follows one's gaze"). □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□, "endowed with ten thousand," whose sense is unclear (perhaps a following of ten thousand). □□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□ ("fierce"), □□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□ ("tawny"), □□□□□□□□□□□ as □□ ("reply"), and □□□ as □□□ ("code signs"). □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "the Guide," may stand for Vināyaka, an epithet of the Buddha; the family meant is not certain. The "mudrā of song" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) may be a slip for another emblem.

• Several words are read as evident slips: □□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□ ("honest"), □□ for □□ ("my child"), □□□□□□□□□□ as the cheek, □□□□ as □□□□, □□□□□ as □□□□□ ("navel"), and the twice-occurring □□□□□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□□□□□ ("she who shows the ground"), which fits the sequence ground, sky, sun. □□□□□□ is uncertain (rendered "jaw"). The line on gāndha and kar is obscure and is given literally; several lines of the forty-fifth chapter (on reverse looking, "wandering," and the perishing substance) are also obscure and are rendered as closely as the wording allows.

• Several of the code glosses are obscure: □□□□□□□ ("earth-born") is taken as a tree; □□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered "asking"; and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("fire means destroy it with the hurled substances") is uncertain. □□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□□□□□, "eight messenger

women." In the list of eight forms of samaya conduct the items are given as literally as the wording allows. Titles in the list of tantras: □□□□□□□□□□□□ is the Compendium of Reality (Tattvasaṃgraha), □□□□□□□□□□□□□ the Glorious Supreme Primal (Śrīparamādya), and □□□□□□□□□□□□ "the Secret Tantra," probably the Guhyasamāja. Per the established name list, □□□□□□□□ is kept as Herukī, though in this verse it may refer to Heruka.

• The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally says "even the buddhas surely perish"; it is read as □□□□, "will surely enter," which suits the context of the triangular maṇḍala and the samaya meats, but the reading is uncertain. "The vow of the net of ḍākinīs" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) may allude to the Ḍākinījālasaṃvara. Several lines on the enjoyment of the messenger and the substances are terse and are rendered as literally as English allows.

• "Great conch" (dung chen) is probably a coded term for human bone. Nara, "the great glorious substance," and "the great hero" (dpa' bo chen po, dpa' bo bzang) seem to be coded names for transgressive ritual substances such as human flesh; I kept them literal. "The supreme state" translates bla ma'i go 'phang. Elsewhere in this passage bla ma is read as the yoginī class Lāmā, as in the preceding piece. In "yellow earth" (ser ba'i sa), ser ba stands for ser po, "yellow," which the sequence of colors for the four rites requires; it does not mean hail here. "The self-arisen flower" is menstrual blood. "Seeing beyond" (pha rol blta ba) is uncertain: it may mean clairvoyant sight or seeing the enemy.

• The plant names in the vase lists, from cūta to sahade, are romanized as the Tibetan spells them; several, such as moṭa, kṛtañjaḥ, kedri and karikar, could not be identified with confidence. Zhosha is a medicinal fruit named in Tibetan. "Exalted Heruka" translates mngon mtho; it may stand for Abhyudaya, but this is uncertain. The line about joining "the stout one, the end and the nape" (sbom po mtha' ltag) is obscure and probably refers to a yogic or sexual practice. "Curved ornaments" (gug skyed) is a tentative rendering. Here khrag 'thung is the masculine blood drinker of the maṇḍala, so it is given as Heruka, not as Herukī as in an earlier context. "The five nectars" translates "the immortal half of ten."

• "The Secret" (gsang ba) probably refers to the Guhyasamāja Tantra. "Guardian of the vowels" (dbyangs skyong) is a tentative rendering. "The cavern" (phug) in the list of accomplishments is uncertain; it may refer to the power to enter caverns or the underworld. "The junctures" (mtshams) appear to be the junctures of the day, the sandhyās, observed in four sessions.

• Dbyangs skyong is the Tibetan rendering of Gāyatrī, as the mantra in Gāyatrī form (vidmahe ... prajodaya) shows. It would be better to read "Gāyatrī" also where the preceding piece rendered it "guardian of the vowels." The "junctures" are the sandhyā observances. In the list of substances, Ratnasambhava, Amitābha and Amoghasiddhi stand as code names for ritual substances. Drag gtum ma is translated literally as "the Fierce Wrathful One," since its Sanskrit form cannot be identified with certainty. Vajraraudrī for rdo rje drag mo is a probable reconstruction.

• Several names of the retinue goddesses are translated literally, because their Sanskrit forms cannot be fixed with confidence: the Illuminating Ḍākinī (gsal byed), the Horse-Faced Ḍākinī (rta gdong), Blue Utpala, Supreme Net, and the four door goddesses (the Fierce One, the Playful Fierce One, the Supreme Blazing One and the Supreme Victorious Garland). "Has cast aside the skin of Brahmā" renders tshangs pa'i pags pa rnam par spangs and is uncertain.

• The text announces "sixteen arms" as emptinesses, but the list that follows names seventeen; it is translated as it stands. The four reliances, four fearlessnesses and four summaries of the Dharma are given here in this tantra's own wording, which departs from the standard lists (for example, Kaṅkālī is "reliance on consciousness"). Several goddess names are rendered by meaning because a Sanskrit form could not be identified with confidence: the Horse-Faced One, the Golden-Hued Ḍākinī, the Blue Utpala Goddess, Supreme Mindfulness, She Who Makes Fierce, the Playfully Fierce One, the Supreme Blazing One, and the Supreme Victorious One. Rucakamile is given as the Tibetan transcribes it.

• The correspondences of the maṇḍala parts to the bodhisattva grounds list only nine grounds (the sixth, Abhimukhī, is not named), and are given as the text has them. In the final lines, the three petal deities with Lāmā and Khaṇḍarohā are evidently the goddess Ḍākinī; the Tibetan here reads "Vajraḍāka," kept for consistency with earlier usage. "The skin of the Victor" renders the text as written; one would expect an elephant hide here. "Yamadāḍhī" renders a Tibetan form meaning literally "Burner of Yama."

• In the opening color list, □□□□□ is the color yellow, not hail. "Yamadāḍhī" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ per the house glossary. The line "There, there is no protection and nothing to eat" renders the Tibetan as it stands; the sense of "nothing to eat" is uncertain and may refer to ritual food offerings.

• "A mere flash of illuminating lightning" reads □□□□ ("lightning") for the written □□□□ ("reading"), which makes no sense here in a list of signs following "lamp." In the color lists, □□□□□ is "yellow," not hail. "Durgā, the Peaceful One" may instead be two figures, Durgā and Śivā.

• This chapter encodes a mantra by naming letters by their position in the classes of the Sanskrit alphabet; the positions are translated exactly as given. "The semivowels" renders the Tibetan calque □□□□□□□□□, while □□□□□□□ (antastha, the same grammatical class) and □□□□ / □□□□□□ (ūṣman, the sibilants) are left in their Sanskrit forms as the text spells them. "The letter to be made" (□□□□□□□□) is uncertain; it may name a particular letter or syllable.

• The whole passage is a coded extraction (uddhāra) of the root mantra, naming letters by their position in the groups of the Sanskrit syllabary (the five consonant classes, the antasthas or semivowels, the ūṣmans or sibilants) and by running numbers; the code-words "Agni" (the letter ra), "the sun", "the Radiant One" or "radiance", "Mahendra", "the sixteenth" and "the fifteenth" (vowel signs, anusvāra, visarga and similar) are given literally as they stand. "The bidding to depart" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□, most likely a code for the visarga. "The Son of the Sun" (□□□□□□□□□) is a code name whose referent (Yama or Śani) is not certain here, so it is translated literally. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□ here is the ordinal "thirty-third" letter, not the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

• As in the preceding chapter, this is a coded extraction of mantra syllables; the letters are named by vowel number, by running number and by class, and the code words (Agni for the letter ra, the sun, the fifteenth vowel and the like) are kept literal. □□□□□□ is rendered "the alphabet" and □□□□ here, in the same coded sense of the letter-matrix, as "the mātṛkā" rather than as the class of mother goddesses. "The six limbs" are the six limb mantras placed on the heart, crown, topknot, armor, eyes and weapon.

• Like the preceding chapters, this is a coded extraction of mantra syllables by vowel, letter number and class; □□□□□□ is rendered "the alphabet" and □□□□ "the mātṛkā", both in the sense of the letter-matrix, except where the text speaks of the bliss of "all the mātṛkās", which may also refer to the mother goddesses. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ repeats "sixty" and is rendered as "the sixtieth letter".

• Several of the twelve goddesses around Vārāhī are named by Tibetan descriptive names that cannot be matched with confidence to Sanskrit forms (the Sound of the Wicked, the Fierce One, the Moving One, the Stealer of Men, the One of the Burnt Offering, the Self-Arisen One, and the Terrifying Intoxicated One trampled with Bhairava and Cāmuṇḍī); these are translated by meaning, and the division of the list into twelve is not certain. "Seated upon Indra" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□. "The lacing of a clay drum" (□□□□□□□□□□□□) appears to describe the pattern of the grid and is uncertain. "The munis" is a number code for seven (seven times seven giving the forty-nine squares); "the half of fifty" is twenty-five, and "the son of Agni" and "the seed of water" are code names for letters.

• The texts named at the start (□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are taken as the Tattvasaṃgraha (Compendium of Reality), the Śrīparama, the Cakrasaṃvara and the Vajrabhairava tantras. The couplet □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is obscure, and its rendering is tentative. "The one with the copper crest" is most likely the rooster. The names of the four wrathful ones (the Vajra of Desire, the Blue Vajra, the Moving Vajra and the Vajra of Acala) are translated by meaning, since their Sanskrit forms cannot be fixed with confidence.

• The run of syllables after "the middle of the bhaga" appears to be a coded listing of the eight substances to be eaten; it is given as the Tibetan spells it. "Dwelling within the seventh birth" likely alludes to the "seven-times-born" (saptajanman) ingredient of tantric rites; the line is rendered literally. "Vajra Equal to Space" and "Vajra Solid" are literal renderings of □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, whose Sanskrit forms I cannot fix with confidence. "Donkey" renders the transliterated Sanskrit □□□□□□ (gardabha), confirmed by the chapter title's □□□□□□. "What is to be approached and not approached" reflects the tantric pairing of permitted and forbidden (gamyāgamya), here applied antinomian fashion.

• Several of the heroes and wrathful kings are rendered literally because their Sanskrit forms cannot be fixed with confidence: Vajra Fire-Glory (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), Vajra Destroyer (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), Vajra Burner (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), Vajra Swaggerer (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), Vajra Horse-Face (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) and Vajra Bear-Face (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□). Vajraṭahara keeps the Tibetan transliteration as given. "The goddesses arisen from the neuter syllables" takes □□□□□ as the neuter vowels of the Sanskrit alphabet. "Consonant" takes □□□□□□□□ in its grammatical sense, in line with the consonant seed syllables of the five ḍākas.

• The colophon of chapter sixty-four reads □□□□□□□ and □□□□□□, evident slips for □□□□□□□ and □□□□□; it is translated as "the sixty-fourth chapter" of the Abhidhānottara. □□□□□□□□ in the mantra is the Tibetan placeholder "so-and-so," where the name of the target is inserted, and is translated accordingly. "Great conch" (□□□□□□□) in tantric usage commonly denotes human bone, so the rosary is likely of bone. "It is the bone beyond counting" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; its sense is unclear. The names of the goddesses Vajramāyā, Dharmavajrī and Viśvamāyā are reconstructed from the Tibetan.

• This chapter describes the "seven-times-born" (saptajanman) paśu whose body supplies the ritual substances that follow. "The great sesame oil" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) likely denotes human fat in tantric code. "The two organs" renders □□□□□□□□□□□, here the sense or sexual organs, not the god Indra. In the first mantra, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as the slot where the target, a perpetrator of immediate retribution, is named.

• Several ingredients are Sanskrit or Tibetan plant and substance names whose exact identity is uncertain; they are given as the text writes them: tsupma (□□□□□), nyangtré (□□□□□□□□), indravāru, putrañjali, putra, jīvantī, nāgamado, brahmadaṇḍī, "makara's hand" (□□□□□□□□□□□) and "vajra splendor" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□). "Self-arisen flower" is a standard code for menstrual blood. "The Wealth Guardian" renders □□□□□□□□□ literally, a name I cannot identify with confidence. "Four kings of the teeth" likely means the canine teeth.

• The two lists of bodhisattvas do not match exactly. The first list's second "from saṃ" figure is "Destroyer of All Lower Realms," while the summary list has "Destroyer of All Sorrow" (probably Sarvaśokatamonirghātamati); both are translated as written. In the summary, "Jewel-Attainer" stands where the first list has Mahāsthāmaprāpta and may be a variant for him. "Manifesting syllable" renders gsal byed, which here seems to mean the opening syllable oṃ. The "hide of the Victor" (rgyal ba'i pags pa) may stand for the usual elephant hide. The list of tantra titles in the section beginning "The supreme of greatness is the Samāja" is terse; its titles are given in literal translation where they cannot be securely identified. Several goddess names (Kampoji, Buddhabodhī, Jayakarī, Vajrabhairavī, Dhvajā) are tentative reconstructions or are given as spelled.

• The line rendered "The buddhas keep it hidden from the tīrthikas" could also be read as "keep it hidden from Buddhists and tīrthikas." Ritual pilgrimage to the outer sacred places (pīṭha) is contrasted with the places as they exist within the body. The identification of the goddess "Dharaṇī" (literally "Earth Holder") is tentative, and "Jambhala" is given as spelled in the goddess list. "Some other lord" renders dbang po gzhan, read here as a deity other than one's own and not as the god Indra.

• The opening four lines are taken as the close of what all the tathāgatas spoke at the end of the previous piece, so they are given in quotation marks. Lochung, "the Junior Translator," is left as a title because the person it names is not identified here.

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
