The Great King of Tantras Called the Arising of Glorious Saṃvara

Śrīmahāsaṃvarodayatantrarājanāma · Toh 373 · Derge Kangyur

དཔལ་བདེ་མཆོག་འབྱུང་བ་ཞེས་བ་བྱའི་རྒྱུད་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་པོ་ཆེ་པ།

The Great King of Tantras Called the Arising of Glorious Saṃvara, known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Mahāsaṃvarodaya Tantrarāja and in Tibetan as Pal Demchok Jungwa, is one of the principal explanatory tantras of the Cakrasaṃvara cycle, a yoginī tantra centered on the deity Heruka. Framed as a dialogue in which Vajrapāṇi questions the Blessed One, its thirty-three chapters address the yogas of the generation and completion stages, the maṇḍala and its deities, mantras, mudrās, empowerment, the torma offering and other rites, and close with verses on the inconceivable, coemergent great bliss in which wisdom and compassion are indivisible. Its colophon presents it as drawn from a vast Heruka Abhidhāna Tantra of three hundred thousand lines, and records its translation by the Indian preceptor Parahitānanta and the Tibetan translator Mönlam Drak, with a later revision by Zhönnu Pal against a manuscript of the paṇḍita Vanaratna. It is Toh 373 in the Kangyur, where it belongs to the Tantra section among the unexcelled yoga tantras.

In the language of India: śrī mahā sambarodaya tantra rājā nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Great King of Tantras Called the Arising of Glorious Saṃvara.

Homage to glorious Heruka.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One, the body, speech, and mind of all the tathāgatas, was dwelling in the bhagas of the vajra consorts, surrounded by noble Nanda and others who were free of attachment. In the midst of eighty koṭis of lords of yoga, such as noble Avalokiteśvara, he looked at Vajrapāṇi and smiled. Vajrapāṇi rose from his seat, draped his upper robe over one shoulder, placed his right knee on the ground, joined his palms, and made this request to the Blessed One:

"O Saṃvara, supreme in every aspect,
what are the characteristics of the yoga of generation,
and how, too, is that of completion?
Blessed God, I wish to hear it from you.
How are wind, fire, water, and earth,

and likewise space?
How, O God, are the five aspects?
Lord, what likewise are the six sense objects?
What is the blessing of the three bodies that abide outside and within?
How is the body of the deity?
Lord, speak likewise of the goddesses.
What, O God, are the moon and the sun?
How are the five paths?
What is the nature of the body?
And likewise, what is the form of the channels?
What is the measure of the number of the channels?
And likewise, what are the constituents of the body?
Lord, please explain to me
the signs of the hidden commitment.
How many signs are there of the sacred places and so on,
of the nature of outer and inner?
How are the grounds and the rest attained?
How do the signs come to be seen?
What are your twelve rites?
How is the recitation of mantra done?
What rosaries are suitable?
How many recitations should there be?
What is the yoga of the deity's form?
How many drawings of the maṇḍala are there?
What, O God, are the accomplishments of mantra?
What is the worship of the maiden?
Which are the days for acting and for not acting?
Lord, what is the intoxicating torma?
How, O God, are the five nectars and the rest?
How are the five hooks and the rest?
Please explain the drawing of the maṇḍala.
How is the laying of the lines done?
How is the ground thoroughly purified?
How is the protection wheel made?
What are the tasks of the master?
How is the disciple taken in?

How many empowerments are there?
And how, too, is the fourth?
What is the determination of time?
And likewise, what is the ransoming from death?
How many names are there for the four times?
How are the four continents?
What are timely and untimely accomplishments?
How is the conduct to be practiced?
How many yoginī tantras are there?
How are the yoga tantras?
What is the number of the sūtra collections?
And likewise, how many perfections are there?
Consecration, fire offering, and sacrificial offering,
how do the accomplishments of mantra come about?
How, O God, is the extraction of essences?
How is the intoxicating drink taken?
How, O God, does secret mantra arise?
How is the extraction of mantras done?
What, O God, is forceful subjugation?
Lord, what is taking into one's care?
Blessed One, what are the realities?
What are emptiness and compassion?
What is the intrinsic nature of emptiness?
How is suchness the intrinsic nature?
Lord, tell of the characteristics of meditation that fully knows all phenomena."

This is the first chapter, the Request, from the Tantra of the Arising of Glorious Saṃvara.

The Blessed One declared: "Vajrapāṇi, excellent, excellent that you have asked about this arising of the secret.

Then, for that reason, I shall rightly explain
the meditation of the stage of generation.
Through the nature of diverse karma
there come to be the four places of birth:
the egg-born, the womb-born,
the heat-and-moisture-born, and the miraculously born.

Geese, cranes, peacocks, parrots, swans, and the like are egg-born.
Elephants, buffaloes, cattle, horses, donkeys, humans, and the like are born from the womb.
Worms, insects, butterflies,
fish, and the like are born from heat and moisture.
The gods and the hell-beings,
likewise those in the intermediate state of existence,
and those of the first eon and the like,
these are miraculously born beings.
In eastern Videha, Godānīya, and likewise northern Kuru,
the humans of these three continents live wholly by great enjoyments.
Dull and confused, they make no distinctions;
they are without conceptual thought and without analysis.

Those who are well born in Jambudvīpa, renowned as the land of karma,
there, for beings, deeds done well and done ill,
superior, middling, and inferior,
come to appear as the ripening of their former births.
Through pride, avarice, malicious thoughts,
deceit, overweening conceit, attachment, hatred, delusion, and the like,
they are tormented by fevers, diseases, and the rest.
The foremost and best of the people of Jambudvīpa are those born in the central land;
depending on their former virtue,
their faculties become sharp, middling, or dull.
To be born as a human being is the first excellent fruit;
to find renunciation and leave one's own home is the second;
having gone forth, to accomplish virtue is the third;
to attain a one-pointed mind is declared the fourth.
The illusion-like samādhi human beings do not know, because they have heaped up the habitual tendencies of afflictions from beginningless time.

Therefore, through karma done before, birth and death come about.
As long as it has not found the coming together of the parents, it remains seven days in the intermediate state of existence.
The being in the intermediate state,
like a traveler on a journey,
is thus, by the noose of karma,
born among the six destinies.
When the being full of craving has seen the union of father and mother and the rest, consciousness, as one rides a horse,
mounts the steed of wind,
and in an instant, a single moment,
comes with the utmost speed;
and by the force of its great delight
it enters by the path of the mouth.
The seventy-two thousand channels are stirred, and in that instant, through the melting of the vowels and consonants (āli and kāli), supreme joy is attained.
In the midst of the semen and blood
it abides in the form of a drop.
Its first form is the jelly-like;
the oblong is the second;
it grows into the soft lump, the third;
and likewise the fourth is the rounded mass.
Merely by being stirred by the winds it takes on something like the form of flesh.
When the seed has reached five months,
the five limbs fully emerge.
In the seventh month the hair of the head and body,
the nails, and the sexual signs appear.
In the eighth month the sense faculties and the limbs of the body come forth.
In the ninth month it is fully complete.

In the tenth month it is endowed with mind.
The jelly-like by nature is Akṣobhya;
the oblong is Ratnasambhava;
the protector Amitābha is the soft lump;
the rounded mass is Amoghasiddhi;
the hardened is Vairocana:
thus it is taught in five aspects.
Urine and blood are Akṣobhya;
the nature of the seed is Amitābha;
the lump is Ratnasambhava;
in what is mixed into a single taste Vairocana dwells.
In the middle of the place of birth are two channels, abiding likewise on the right and the left.
From the left, it is said, comes semen;
from the right, likewise, comes blood.
These, when gathered into one,
are the nature of the sphere of reality (dharmadhātu).
When the seed of karma has gained its power and has been fully turned about by the wind, the face definitely turns toward the door of the source of phenomena.
If it rests on the right side,
it abides squatting, facing outward;
if it rests on the left side,
it turns to face the belly of the wisdom woman.
The wise mark the moment in time in the sequence of the falling of the seed.
Whatever seed the wind moves on the right becomes in every case a male;
whatever seed the wind moves from the left definitely becomes a female;
whatever seed moves in the middle of both always becomes neuter.
The water element should be known as the father's;
the fire element is the mother's.
Skin, flesh, and blood
are said to be born from the mother;

sinews, marrow, and semen
are said to be born from the father.
The body made up of these six,
which Vajrasattva has declared:
form, feeling, perception,
formations, and likewise consciousness,
these aggregates definitely arise
as the nature of the five buddhas.
So that, knowing the stage of the production of existence,
one may attain perfect buddhahood,
this reality of fully knowing the aggregates has been explained by those who teach it.

This is the second chapter, the division of the stages that definitively teaches the stage of generation.

Then I shall rightly and fully explain the meditation of the stage of completion, by merely knowing which
one swiftly attains accomplishment.
Relying on the maṇḍala of the body,
there are the Dharma body and the enjoyment body;
because perfect awakening is accomplished in stages,
it is called the maṇḍala of the body.
One of dull faculties should meditate on and contemplate
the maṇḍala of the stage of generation.
One of sharp faculties contemplates, in the manner of an instant,
the maṇḍala that is mind alone.
Meditation on the stage of completion through the yoga of the instantaneous mode is this:
the three realms are by nature the celestial palace,
and living beings are those of the maṇḍala;
in its center, in the instantaneous mode,
the yogin is the lord of the maṇḍala.
Through the mantra oṃ āḥ hūṃ
there are the maṇḍalas of body, speech, and mind;
in the heavens, on the earth, and beneath the earth,
in an instant all becomes a single body.

In the instantaneous mode there is yoga;
in the instantaneous mode one recites the secret mantra.
Union in equality with all the faculties is the supreme bliss of the net of ḍākinīs.
The four elements and the five aggregates,
and likewise the nature of the six sense objects,
are the wisdom of the blood-drinking goddesses;
one should not imagine any difference in them.
The maṇḍala is sealed with suchness;
likewise it is emptiness, equal to space.
The manifold is suchness and selflessness;
the means is the power of compassion;
their union, free of conceptual thought,
is the supreme heart of the maṇḍala.
Even though one contemplates the union of nonconceptuality,
the nonconceptual is then beyond thought.
That too is supreme in every aspect:
the lord of bliss, without aspects.
That reality, the nature of thing and nonthing,
is ever made to arise through existence.
Without the concepts of manifold elaboration, great bliss ever arises.
Through the nature of nonarising, birth rightly arises from it.
Because it is not inert, it is self-aware.
Since it is not seen by unknowing,
it is formless and abides nowhere at all,
and because it is unchanging, it is stable.
Because conventional birth arises,
it is not annihilation, and so it is not a nonthing.
In the very nature of innate joy
all phenomena are innate.
Self-blessing and self-arisen,
it is indestructible and without decay.
Through tasting the flavor of nonarising, meditation too is that very reality.
Through discerning emptiness individually, concentration also becomes wisdom.

The meditation that fully knows all phenomena, that very meditation is nonmeditation.

Perfect awakening, great bliss,
and likewise the supreme Great Seal (mahāmudrā):
so that one may enter that reality, the Dharma,
these are fully taught by way of their divisions.
Through the instructions of the holy guru
they become clear, and not otherwise.
The Saṃvara of all the buddhas is fully established in the syllables e vaṃ.
The activities of body, speech, and mind are the Saṃvara supreme in every aspect.
Saṃvara is awakening, supreme bliss;
it cannot be seen and cannot be expressed.
The secret of all the buddhas is the supreme bliss of union.
This stage of self-blessing becomes clear through the kindness of the guru.

This is the third chapter, the division of the stages that definitively teaches the stage of completion.

Then, for that reason, I shall rightly explain
the characteristics of the four elements.
Whatever things there are, without exception,
are of the nature of the elements.
Things rest upon the earth;
fire cooks them all;
water dissolves them;
wind moves them together;
space abides as empty of objects,
and there all things arise from it.
Wherever one of them abides,
all four are present there.
Grass, trees, plants, creepers, and the like have consciousness only as if they were inert.
Those who are sentient beings of the six destinies abide as if endowed with consciousness in each and every joint.

Thus all the things of existence should be understood by the intelligent.
When sentient beings die,
the winds of all the limbs and lesser limbs
are all set in motion;
in that instant fire gives up its heat;
water dries up altogether,
and then feeling ceases;
only the solidity of the earth element of the body and the rest remains.
Birth and death
everywhere come about through the elements.
Gods, asuras, and humans
are not born without the elements.
The gods, the guardians of the world, and the rest,
all abide together with them.
All the Vedas and philosophical systems ever affirm them and meditate on them, because they go everywhere and abide in all persons on the face of the earth.
The four elements, the supreme lords,
are rightly explained in all the treatises.
Wind should rightly be seen as the life breath;
fire has the characteristic of sustaining life;
water is the very essence of nectar;
earth abides merely as the field.
The deity who ever abides there is the lord of supreme consciousness; into the forms of the five deities that consciousness is wholly transformed.
Form, feeling, perception,
likewise formations, and consciousness;
the mirror-like, equality,
individual discernment,
likewise the accomplishment of activity,

and the utterly pure dharmadhātu:
these wisdoms are fully present.
Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, Amitābha, Amoghasiddhi, and likewise Akṣobhya himself:
the five, of one taste, are perfect awakening.
Form, sound, likewise smell, taste, touch, and likewise phenomena are to be known as the six objects;
these are explained as completely pure.
The elements are to be known as eighteen;
they are the very nature of the aggregates.
One should meditate on the supreme syllable
so as to attain the fruit of buddhahood.
One should meditate on the eye and the rest:
the consciousness of the eye faculty is the magical display of the vajra of mind;
the meaning of the three natures, completely purified, becomes the state of luminosity.
Sound, the ear, and its consciousness are of the nature of nonobjectification.
The nose, smell, and its consciousness too should likewise be known as completely pure.
Taste, the tongue, and its consciousness are completely pure as the ultimate itself.
The body, touch, and its consciousness too arise with an illusion-like nature.
The mind, phenomena, and mental consciousness are completely pure as the very essence.
Because the six consciousnesses enter the foundation of all (ālaya), they are the Tathāgata.
When the state of luminosity is attained, glorious Heruka truly abides.
Through the joining of object and subject
the nonconceptual state is reached.
Through abiding in the supreme of all aspects,
the objects should be known as completely pure.

The Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha
are likewise imagined as three in one.
The three refuges and the three realities,
the three bodies, the three liberations,
the three faces, the three syllables, the three deities:
these are the very nature of the three realms.
The three maṇḍalas and the three yogas are taught as the three paths;
the three commitments and the three virtues, likewise body, speech, and mind;
wisdom and means,
and their union is the third.
Through the nature of the source of phenomena,
the way the three secrets are seen;
through union that does not objectify the three spheres,
the very nature of the three mantras;
of the nature of outer and inner,
the very essence of the three channels.
The outer is the Dharma of the worldly;
the inner is the nature of the deities and the rest.
Because outer and inner are pure,
the yogin attains buddhahood.
In the nature of the dharmadhātu
the deity should be directly perceived.
The nature supreme in every aspect should be fully imagined as the goddess.
In the nature of the primordial deity Vajrasattva dwells.
The signs of the sacred places, the fields, and the rest,
the assembly of heroes and yoginīs,
and likewise, in nondual union,
the deities stream forth;
from the streaming forth of countless deities one should imagine the measured maṇḍala.
The yoga of the deity is inconceivable,
and the play of the buddhas too is inconceivable.
In the form of the net of ḍākinīs glorious Heruka is truly united.

Their indivisible essential nature
I have explained for meditation.
All of them attain nonduality,
free of grasped and grasper.
The coarse is said to be sound;
the subtle becomes the nature of mind.
That reality free of thought is renowned as the supreme state.

This is the fourth chapter, the division of the stages of the purification, as deities, of the four elements, the five aspects, and the six objects.

Then I shall rightly explain the full division of moon and sun.
Joined on the right and on the left,
they move in their proper order.
On the left, beginning from the palate,
and entering the maṇḍala of the navel,
the channel of the moon faces downward,
and āli flows down as the moon.
On the right, beginning from the navel,
and entering the place of the palate,
the channel of the sun faces upward,
and kāli ever flows as the sun.
The characteristic of the movement of the two channels from the two doors of the nose is this:
the left channel is the path of entering,
and the right is the path of going out.
From the rising of the sun until its setting is day;
from its setting
until its rising is night.
Day and night are a full day;
a watch is called a period.
Four periods are known as the day,
and likewise the night has four periods.

In a single day there are sixteen divisions of transition;
for half a period at a time the wind ever moves through the nostrils.
Beginning from the first day of the waxing fortnight,
for three days, in each half period,
the wind of the moon moves;
then for three days the wind of the sun;
in this sequence it goes on until the fifteenth of the waxing fortnight.
Beginning from the first day of the waning fortnight,
for three days, in the morning,
what is known as the wind of the sun moves,
and likewise until the fifteenth.
Since a quarter of each period is called an hour (ghaṭikā), in a single day and night the hours should be known to number thirty-two.
By the measure of sixty-four daṇḍas in a single day and night, half an hour is a daṇḍa,
which is said to be an eighth of a period.
The going out and coming in of the wind at the nostrils is renowned as a single breath.
Those skilled in the yoga of the winds should know six breaths as one life breath (prāṇa).
Fifty full life breaths,
together with three breaths and a quarter, make the daṇḍa of the first day at the time when the sun moves to the north.
At the time when the sun moves to the south,
the night too becomes the same.
The increase and decrease of each daṇḍa should be known through the divisions of time.
Eleven breaths together with a quarter are the increase and decrease of each transition.
A third of a breath, a quarter of that,
and a sixth of that change with each day.

If, departing from its movement in half periods,
it shifts in reverse,
disputes and the like will surely come about;
therefore the wise should examine these well.
When for one, two, three, and four,
five, and six days the wind moves constantly in reverse,
then there will be a great dispute.
If it moves in reverse constantly for half a month,
a great illness will arise.
If it moves in reverse for a month,
dear kin will perish.
If it moves in reverse for a month and a half,
one will die in six months.
This should be known for the ordinary times.
Further, I shall explain the special features.
When the sun has gone into the seven equals,
at the day and month of one's birth,
that is the time called "the expansion,"
the time for the determination of death.
The house of the zodiac in which a person is born,
and the other, the seventh from it:
because the sun has passed there through seven equal houses, it is explained as "the seven equals."
The winds that ever move from the path of the sun in every case
the wise should mark as time, without interruption, again and again.
At whatever moment of time the wind enters into a different course, when that moment of time is complete,
one will die; of this there is no doubt.
Beginning with half a day, then a full day, and likewise up to one day and night, and from that, two days, three days, and likewise up to four days, whatever wind, relying on the channel, moves by the path of the sun, not the left, from that one should know these: fourteen, twelve, ten, eight, six, and four.

From five to twenty-five, these days proceed by increasing five at a time;
then, by increasing one at a time, up to ten tripled with three added.
From that, at the time of the expansion, there are three, two, and one years;
six, three, two, and one months;
and for the rest, one lives for fifteen, ten, five, three, two, and one days.
Having drawn a wheel of three tiers with thirty-seven squares, one should draw in order the winds of life span and of life breath and the signs of the days.
For the days in between,
from the fifth day to the twenty-fifth,
whatever sixteen numbers have not been explained,
I shall state them in full.
If the wind moves in the sequence of the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth days, even one endowed with good qualities dies
in three years less twenty-four days.
If it moves in the sequence of the days eleven, twelve, thirteen, and fourteen,
even one endowed with good qualities dies
in two years less twenty-four days.
Likewise, if the wind moves in the sequence of the sixteenth day,
the seventeenth, the eighteenth,
and the nineteenth, then even one with good qualities,
in one year less twice twelve days,
being without refuge,
will without doubt go
to the city of Yama.
If the wind moves in the sequence of the twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth days, even one endowed with good qualities dies
in six months less six days.
Having drawn a wheel of two tiers with thirty-two squares,
there one should draw in order the life span,

the divisions, the wind, and the signs of the numbers.
When one has known in every aspect
all these signs of death,
if the intelligent one, by ransoming death,
wishes for the stable state,
then by thoroughly purifying the channels
the wind is purified to the same extent;
the yogin should press it down again and again, in the order of each.
Having drawn it into the left nostril,
one should bind the channel and press it down;
likewise, drawing the wind
into the right, one should press it down slowly.
The number of breaths
that move in a single day for sentient beings is twenty-one thousand with six hundred more.
Through the Mahendra wind of earth comes kingship;
through water all aims are rightly achieved;
when the wind of fire moves,
there come hunger, thirst, weariness, suffering, and illness,
and all activities fail:
so the supreme Vajradhara declared.
The wind of air brings disputes, sorrow, and confusion,
loss of wealth, and affliction.
The Mahendra wind brings gain, acquisition, and the gathering of wealth, grain, and the like.
When the wind of water moves,
it brings about every desired accomplishment;
therefore its application is supreme and foremost,
as Vajrasattva declared.
The wind is the very nature of the Blessed Heruka, and becomes threefold:
the left is of the nature of wisdom,
and the right is the very self of compassion.

The union of the two, indivisible,
also moves through both places.
Therefore the one who knows that reality should know there virtue, nonvirtue, and the rest.
For destroying poison and the like, and for the rest,
for producing auspicious glory,
the nature of wisdom is highly praised.
Ever glorious is the power of compassion:
for battle array, play and sport, and feasts,
for cutting and for piercing,
for the rites of burning and of boiling,
the nature of compassion is highly praised.
Further, the vajra holder whose nature is both should be known to bring doubt;
since virtue and nonvirtue are not certain,
the knower of the winds should mark it here.
If the lord moves in āli
and someone abiding in kāli asks a question, or if, when it moves in kāli, he abides in āli,
the aim he desires will fail.
If someone abiding on the side
from which the lord is moving asks,
all his aims will be fully accomplished.
From abiding in both comes doubt.
Through the nature of the wind
the three bodies of the lord should also be known:
entering is the Dharma body, abiding is the enjoyment body,
and going out is called the emanation body;
these are held to be the three bodies.
Whether it is the questioner's or one's own,
with the Dharma body all is virtuous;
with the enjoyment body there will be doubt;
the emanation body shows conflict.
The breath control of the yogin abides as the very essence of the five buddhas.
In whichever place, left or right,
it moves in its proper order.

The light that moves from the right is the maṇḍala of fire;
its color is like a forest flower;
that is the deity Amitābha.
The light that moves from the left is ever the maṇḍala of wind;
it appears green in color;
the deity is the supreme Amoghasiddhi.
The light that moves from both appears like the light of gold;
this is the wind of the Mahendra maṇḍala;
Ratnasambhava ever moves there.
That which moves slowly from below,
white like the kunda flower and the moon,
moves as the maṇḍala of water;
it is the great light, the Vajra Lord.
The wind that accompanies the whole body and makes all minds enter is the lord Vairocana, renowned as the going out.
The yoginī, in meditative equipoise, should count the entering wind up to a number such as a hundred thousand, always reciting it free of sound.
When the practitioner has completed the hundred thousand recitations free of sound, even one whose life has declined will live five years here; of this there is no doubt.
Always rising in the morning,
one should count the wind up to a thousand.
Therefore, in the yoga of the wind
one should always remain in meditative equipoise.
Or else, through the yoga of the vase,
one should always conquer the Lord of Death.
The one who knows himself should fill everything with wind down to the soles of the feet;
having made the vase retention stable,

it is explained that one destroys him by three degrees.
The lowest is about thirty-six;
double that is likewise the middling;
triple should be known as the great;
with that vase retention one should conquer.
Having first learned the vase retention, sitting oneself in cross-legged posture,
one rubs the hands three times and then snaps the fingers six times.
As long as it takes to reach thirty-six,
so long one should hold the vase retention.
Destroying him with the great, the triple,
is with a hundred and eight.
One who desires the stable state should conquer through that very thing with diligence.
Because one conquers through the practice of the vase,
one goes far from the Lord of Death.
When one has learned the vase retention and abides steadfast in cessation,
even in a thousand eons
the Lord of Death will not come near him.
Whoever contemplates in meditative equipoise the wind that has reached the center of the heart lotus in the form of a white hūṃ will not perceive sense objects and the rest.
Going upward, the wind is saṃsāra;
traveling downward, it is nirvāṇa;
in the lotus of the heart
it abides as nonabiding nirvāṇa.
The winds that move above and below are joined together by the mind;
if one trains through that union,
one attains the stable state.
Whoever does not know the yoga of the wind,
or, knowing it, does not practice it, becomes a worm tormented
by the many masses of the suffering of saṃsāra.

The wind that goes and comes should be examined by the intelligent.
All is blessed by the wind;
the wind goes everywhere.

This is the fifth chapter, the division of the stages of the instructions on the moon and the sun.

Then I shall fully explain the definitive ascertainment of the five excellent, supreme paths.
The practitioner who is perfect in the aims of self and others should examine virtue and nonvirtue.
From the movement of the maṇḍalas of fire and of wind,
and likewise of Mahendra and of water,
the characteristics of pacifying, increasing, subjugating, and summoning, and likewise of killing and expelling,
should be examined by the wise.
One who does not know their application will labor to no purpose.
Through fire comes death;
through wind wealth declines;
through Mahendra comes kingship;
water bestows wealth and grain.
The element that moves from the right is the very maṇḍala of the fire god (Agni);
red in color and clear,
it is the arising of the Lotus Lord.
The element that moves from the left is the very maṇḍala of wind;
green in color and clear,
it is the arising of the Karma Lord.
The element that moves from both,
clear like the color of gold,
is the very maṇḍala of Mahendra;
it is the movement of the Jewel Lord.
The element that is slow and without movement is the very maṇḍala of water;

appearing like pure crystal,
it is the movement of the Vajra Lord.
It fully gathers all the elements and rightly holds support and supported.
Vairocana is the great wind that moves out from the body of the dying.
Without knowing the reality of the wind, neither rites nor nonrites are accomplished;
because the wind travels everywhere,
the logicians do not know it.
With the reality of the wind going first,
one should accomplish the reality of mantra.
That which has become the life of sentient beings,
called the wind, performs all actions.
This is the mount of consciousness that brings attainment of the state of buddhahood.
It is the secret of all the tantras,
the means that is the cause of awakening.

This is the sixth chapter, the division of the stages that definitively teaches the five paths.

Next, I shall fully explain,
in due order, the wheel of channels.
The channels that run throughout the body number seventy-two thousand.
The channels and the secondary channels
all rest upon their sites;
the channels numbering one hundred and twenty are declared to be the principal ones.
The sites and lands of the channels are twenty-four in number, and the three channels at their center pervade them all and are their support.

At the head is Pullīra, abiding as the channel through which teeth and nails flow.
At the crown of the head is Jālandhara, abiding as the channel through which head hair and body hair flow.

Oḍiyāna is the channel of the right ear, through which skin and impurities flow.
At the back of the head is Arbuda,
the channel through which flesh flows.
the channel through which the sinews flow.
Between the eyebrows is Rāmeśvarī, through which bone always flows.
At the eyes abides Devīkoṭi,
the channel through which the liver flows.
Mālava is the two shoulders,
where abides the channel flowing to the heart.
At the armpits is Kāmarūpa, through which the eyes always flow.
The two breasts are Oḍi,
the channel through which bile always flows.
Triśaku is the navel,
where the channel abides through which the lungs flow.
The tip of the nose is Kosala, abiding as the channel through which the coils of the intestines flow.
The mouth is Kaliṅga, abiding as the channel through which the colon always flows.
The throat is Lampāka,
the channel through which the stomach always flows.
Kāñci is the site of the heart,
the channel through which feces flow.
Between the thighs is Himālaya, the channel through which flows the juncture of the supreme lady.
Pretapurī is the sexual organ,
the channel through which phlegm flows.
Gṛhadevatā is the anus,
through which pus always flows.
The two thighs are Saurāṣṭra, through which blood always flows.
At the two calves abides Suvarṇadvīpa, the channel through which rajas flows.
The toes are Nagara;

know it as the channel through which fat always flows.
The soles of the feet are Sindhu,
the embodied one through which tears flow.
Marudeśa is the big toes, abiding as the channel through which saliva always flows.
Kulatā is the knees,
abiding as the channel through which mucus always flows.

Among the channels abiding at their center,
in Lalanā urine flows.
The channel on the right through which blood flows is known as Rasanā.
The one in the central part fully enters,
reaching into the middle of the lotus at the heart.
Like the blossom of a plantain's spike,
it hangs with its mouth turned downward;
it blazes like a lamp of sesame oil,
and the awakening mind flows through it evenly.
Know this to be Avadhūtī,
the bestower of the innate.

The channels Lalanā and the others
are the chief of all the channels;
therefore the others here rely on them,
just as other rivers enter the Gaṅgā and the Sindhu.
Having become one, it is the khakhamukha;
that itself is the source of birth, and nothing else.
Know that, with the nature of the enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya), it abides in the body.
Women too have three principal channels,
the channels Lalanā and the others.
Lalanā is by nature wisdom,
and Rasanā abides as skillful means.
Avadhūtī, in the center,
is utterly free of grasped and grasper.
Lalanā is the enjoyment body, Rasanā is the emanation body,
and Avadhūtī is the dharmakāya;

thus they are explained as the three bodies.

All these channels
make the body wholesome.
From their assembly the body-mass arises,
and that mass is of the nature of the deity.
Transcending form, it becomes the mass;
transcending the mass, it is the deity itself.
Therefore, through inconceivable union,
the self that is suchness goes everywhere.
By whatever rite the practitioner abides in the state beyond the mass,
through that he becomes of its very nature,
and so attains buddhahood itself.

This is the seventh chapter, the division of the stages of the means of the wheel of channels.

Next, I shall correctly explain, in due order, the commitments
by merely knowing which accomplishment comes swiftly.

In one's own home or a secret place, secluded and delightful to the mind,
in mountain thickets and ravines,
on the shore of the great ocean,
in a house of the mātṛkās or a charnel ground,
or in the midst of a confluence of rivers,
one who desires the unsurpassed fruit should properly draw the maṇḍala.
The patron, with great faith, should invite the field-born, place-born, and mantra-born yoginīs and the yogins,
the master, and all the deities.

The master may be a householder or a novice,
or likewise a monk;
some masters are worldly;
he may be a monk abiding in the teaching,

or someone endowed with good qualities,
or likewise one who has attained the higher knowledges.
Among these, the patron should make chief whomever he has faith in.
With the master going first,
the virtuous maṇḍala is drawn;
the master who is empowered and endowed with good qualities,
who is not reviled by worldly people,
and who has entirely abandoned the ten nonvirtues,
should be made the chief of the feast gathering.

The intelligent patron should never make one who is without compassion, angry and cruel, arrogant, greedy, given to praising himself,
and not settled in meditative equipoise.
One who indulges in the enjoyments of household life,
a ploughman or a merchant,
or one who in delusion sells the sacred Dharma,
is not to be chief of the feast gathering.

Rather, one who possesses all good qualities, who holds the banner of omniscience,
who is disciplined and truly endowed with diligence,
free of craving and free of pride,
always attentive to the service of sentient beings,
adorned with the appropriate ornaments, delighting in ornaments of skulls,
and holding vajra and bell together:
that wise one should also seat
the left-hand partner firmly on his left side.
A master endowed with such qualities is highly praised for all rites.

In due order, when the master and the deities who were invited have arrived, they are cleansed by washing their feet with whatever scented water can be obtained.
Then, at the place where the ground has been thoroughly examined,
with the master going first,

they should enter according to the distinction of elder and younger and take their places on the seats.

Those without good fortune and the proud, likewise those who revile the guru,
those who have not seen the commitment, even one's own son,
and likewise such men and women:
the practitioner who desires accomplishment
should not admit them into that commitment.
If those who are like cattle enter, accomplishment will come only after long delay.
Through disparaging the commitment, body and mind suffer, and likewise one falls from one's station, is kept far from glory,
and is tormented by sufferings of many kinds.
Knowing this, one should exclude them,
and gather those whose sphere is worship.
In the order of elder and younger, with flowers, incense, lamps, and

and especially with the scent of sandalwood, the intelligent one should always make worship.
The torma, adorned with parasols and banners, should be carefully prepared by the master.
The deities are worshiped for the sake of propitiation, and whatever rite of pacifying or enriching the patron desires in his mind, having drawn it for the sake of accomplishment,
one should consecrate that rite, whichever is wished for.
Liquor of honey, liquor of sugar, and grain liquor, whatever can be obtained, should be offered.

One who is pure, disciplined, and of heroic mind,
who has entirely abandoned craving and delusion,
and who regards all things as equal,
should be appointed as the action vajra.
Food to eat and food to chew, and likewise drink,
tooth-sticks, and likewise the offering fee, should be presented by the patron right in front of the maṇḍala.

Afterward the wise action vajra distributes the substances.
First, the commitment substance together with the hook should be enjoyed.
Then the master
consecrates everything in full.

"To all the sovereign ladies of the heroines who dwell in the sites and the secondary sites, in the fields, the meeting places, and the charnel grounds,
I bow down with respect.

The goddesses are the authority, the commitment is the authority, and the speech they have taught has become the supreme authority;
by the power of that truth, may it become the cause for the goddesses here to take me into their care."

Furthermore, before the maṇḍala, joining the palms firmly at the heart,
the patron too should make aspiration prayers
as a dedication:

"You who have destroyed attachment to existence and to peace alike, and overcome conceptual thought, you possess the vision of all things as having a nature equal to space.
Protector, with the water of your heart, moistened by the weight of the water of compassion, act upon me; goddesses, I pray you, show me your deepest love.

Your mind is utterly pure through partaking of the yogic nectar of a single taste, your body is utterly pure through traveling to the lands of the sites and the rest;
protector of the supreme wheel, the maṇḍala at the center of the glorious site, to you, the supreme guru, I always bow my head with respect.

The body of all the heroes is ever beautiful, adorned by the embrace of the precious bodies of the goddesses;
protector abiding in the wheel, of stainless innate joy, heart of yoga, Saṃvara, to you too I always bow.

Buddha, omniscient one, abode of utter purity, the goddesses are made beautiful by the abode of the innate;
guide, the source of innate joy,
to you, the stainless supreme innate one, I bow."

With these three verses one should rightly offer praise, and bow down as well, as one pleases.
With the mind elated, as one pleases,
in the great delight of joyful clamor,
one should adorn the ground with garlands of flowers,
and worship the body with various flowers.
With the joy of the feast of liquor,
one should fill the place with vajra songs.
In supreme joy one should dance,
dancing the postures that are the signs of the sites,
and dancing with mudrās and mantras.
There one should sound pleasing music of many kinds,
with paṭaha drums and the like,
small hand drums, auspicious drums,
long drums, and so forth.

The heroes together with Heruka, and the supreme yoginīs on the left:
after that, the chief of the feast gathering should think of the virtue of the patron.
The assembled yogins and yoginīs
then in an instant give voice to auspicious words:
he will possess perfect happiness,
freedom from illness, and a virtuous mind;
he will truly attain pleasure, liberation, and the rest,
and his accomplishment will be perfect.

The elaborate maṇḍala
should be dissolved as the rite explains.
Having gathered up the remaining torma,
one gives it to the bhūtas who seek it.
With pleasant fragrances one satisfies

the hosts of yoginīs of the sites and the field-sites.
All the heroes who were invited are requested to depart into great bliss.

This is the eighth chapter, the division of the stages of the rite of the signs of the commitments.

Next, I shall explain just briefly
the signs of the left hand,
by merely knowing which
the practitioner swiftly gains accomplishment.

To one who shows a single finger, show two in reply, meaning "welcome."
When someone closes the fingers of the left hand, know it as the sign asking "are you well?"
To one who shows the ring finger,
one should show the little finger.
To one who shows the middle finger,
one should show the thumb.
To one who shows the forefinger,
one should clearly show the throat.
To one who shows the batisa,
one should show the trident.
To one who shows the breasts,
one should show the hairline.
To one who shows the teeth,
one should show the wheel.
To one who shows a wrathful frown,
one should show the crown knot.
To one who shows the forehead,
one should show a playful gesture.

A woman who approaches from the left,
a yoginī always from the left,
who speaks out in a loud voice,
who gazes with a glance to the left,
and speaks with delight to women:
know her to be one who holds the commitment.

When the women are entreated,
she clearly declares the seed syllable of her family,
does not abandon the activity of her family,
and recites the vidyā of her own family.
When someone inquires about the vidyā, she puts her left hand on her own head and tousles her hair,
and the practitioner especially will then recall her own vidyā.
She points a finger at her cheek,
or at her throat, or at her nostrils,
and constantly, with a sidelong glance,
looks toward her own family.
The yoginī who goes about, truly arisen,
is hard to find and surely holds the commitment.
In her own house she draws a skull cup,
an axe, a sword, a banner,
a wheel, a yak-tail whisk, a conch,
and a trident, and delights in them;
she always delights in meat and liquor,
and she is one who destroys fear and shame.
She arises truly from the family of the ḍākinīs, and is explained as the one called the Innate Lady.
She is born in land after land,
and practitioners always rely on her.

The sites and the secondary sites, likewise the fields and the secondary fields,
the chandohas and the secondary chandohas,
the meeting places and the secondary meeting places,
the charnel grounds and the secondary charnel grounds:
these truly abide in Jambudvīpa.
The site is known as Pullīra, and likewise Jālandhara is a site;
Oḍiyāna is likewise a site,
and likewise Arbuda too is a site.
The secondary sites are Godāvarī, likewise the one by the name of Rāmeśvarī,

the one called Devīkoṭi, and Mālava too is a secondary site.
A field is the one named Kāmarūpa,
and the one called Oḍi is also a field.
A secondary field is Triśaku, and Kosala too is a secondary field.
Kaliṅga and Lampāka
are likewise chandohas; Kāñci and Himālaya
are, in particular, the secondary chandohas.
The meeting places are Pretavāsī and likewise Gṛhadevatā; Saurāṣṭra and Suvarṇadvīpa are the two secondary meeting places.
Pāṭaliputra is a charnel ground,
and Sindhu is likewise a charnel ground; Maru and Kulatā, these two,
are explained as the secondary charnel grounds.

Thus they are known as the outer sites;
the inner sites are said to be the body itself.
Here, in the form of the channels of one's own body,
they are well known by the names of the sites.
That form is the aspect of the deity,
and so it abides as the inner self.
Therefore this body, the abode of that mass,
is equal to all the buddhas.

The site is the ground Very Joyful (Pramuditā), and likewise the secondary site is Stainless (Vimalā).
The field is the ground Luminous (Prabhākarī), and the secondary field is Radiant (Arciṣmatī).
Know the chandoha as Manifest (Abhimukhī),
and the secondary chandoha as Hard to Conquer (Sudurjayā).
The meeting place is Gone Far (Dūraṃgamā), and the secondary meeting place is known as Immovable (Acalā).
The charnel ground likewise is Good Intelligence (Sādhumatī), and the secondary charnel ground is Cloud of Dharma (Dharmameghā).

Thus the purity of the grounds, of the sites and the rest,
has been explained in due order.
By relying on the sites, the secondary sites, and the rest, people become free of stains.

The intelligent one, free of conceptual thought, should wander and examine the signs carefully.
Having recognized the women of various forms and of terrifying forms, fierce, and laughing in an unbearable way, through the yoga of one's own chosen deity
one should proclaim the sound hūṃ.
Having entirely abandoned all doubt,
the practitioner should act like a lion.
By seeing, by touching, and even by hearing, accomplishment will very swiftly come.

This is the ninth chapter, the division of the stages that definitively teaches the grounds through the signs and through the signs of the sites and so forth.

Next, I shall properly explain
the applications of pacifying and the rest, by merely drawing which the practitioner will attain accomplishment.
With saffron mixed with sandalwood
one should draw on a day of the waxing fortnight.
Having drawn a wheel with six spokes,
one inserts the seven-syllable mantra, surrounds it on the outside with a vajra garland,
and in the center interweaves the name.
On clean silk or cotton cloth,
or else in two bowls joined mouth to mouth,
having drawn the rite in secret,
one should wind it with white thread.
With white color, facing east,
one should worship it with white flowers.

One should visualize the person who is the object of the rite seated in front on a moon maṇḍala, and should empower him with a white vase filled with the nectar water of the moon.

If, free of doubt, in the three sessions,
one recites the seven-syllable mantra,
there will immediately be pacification,
well-being, happiness, and long life.
For epidemics, poison, and harm,
one should meditate on it in the left hand.
Having drawn the wheel with sandalwood,
one should worship it with flowers and incense.
With the person who is the object of the rite facing east, the wise one should apply
torma, water, and likewise fire.
In its center, with dūrvā grass,
or a peacock feather, or water from kuśa grass,
one should in particular sprinkle it.
This secret mantra is the supreme chief;
it performs the rites of pacifying and the rest in due order.

With saffron mixed with fine fragrances one should draw the wheel of enriching, interweaving it with the syllables svāhā.
Having drawn it on two bowls,
one winds it with yellow thread
and places it in butter and honey.
Facing north, in the three sessions,
one meditates on the color yellow, and the wise one imagines the person who is the object of the rite seated on a yellow moon maṇḍala.
One empowers him with yellow nectar and worships with yellow flowers.
With a mind free of conceptual thought,
and with the intention of enriching, one should recite:
So-and-so bauṣṭikaṃ kuru svāhā.
One should interweave it with the mantra bauṣaṭ.
Wealth and grain increase,
and glory and good fortune enter together.
Through this application of the rite
there will be enrichment, and not otherwise.

Mixing red sandalwood and red lac with blood from the ring finger, on cloth, or on a leaf of birch bark,
or on a bowl taken with its rim unchipped,
one should draw the two wheels alike,
interwoven with the syllable hoḥ.
Having bound them with red thread,
one should worship with red flowers.
Placing it in the midst of butter and honey, facing the western direction,
one meditates on the color red,
and imagines the person who is the object of the rite,
seated on a red maṇḍala, as filled with passion.
One should always recite, without interruption,
the mantra that arises from the seven syllables.
Becoming intoxicated, he falls at one's feet;
one should imagine that this is accomplished.

If he does not come under one's control, one should torment the yantra, removed from the butter and honey, over leaves of khadira. Then anyone at all, even one of bad fortune, will become one of good fortune, and not otherwise. On cloth from a charnel ground, or on cloth soaked with menstrual blood, one should draw, with lac juice, the yantra interwoven with the syllables jaḥ hrī; or else one draws the wheel of accomplishment on a bowl or on a woman's skull, winds it with red thread, worships it with red flowers, and pierces the heart of the person who is the object of the rite with a hook and binds his throat with a noose. If, though one imagines it thus, the person who is the object of the rite never comes, one should kindle a fire of khadira wood and punish the yantra by roasting it, and with this, So-and-so ākarṣaya hrīḥ jaḥ, one should summon the person who is the object of the rite in that very instant. Summoning by the feet is unsurpassed.

Next, I shall explain further the unsurpassed rite of pressing down.
By joining eight lines with eight lines evenly,
there are forty-nine squares.
The wise one should leave empty
the thirteen squares between them.
In each of the corners there are nine squares, abiding properly in the four corners.

Leaving empty the squares
in the center of all four corners, on cloth from a charnel ground one should draw, properly applied, the mantra of the four-faced one.
With water mixed with turmeric and realgar,
one writes on the two wheels the name of the person who is the object of the rite, interwoven with the syllable laṃ.
On two bowls joined mouth to mouth,
one draws Mount Meru with eight corners.
On top of Mount Meru, in the center of the maṇḍala of Mahendra, marked with laṃ, one visualizes it pressed down from above
by a crossed vajra.
One winds it with yellow thread.
One should properly visualize one's own body in the form of Heruka with two arms.
The yogin, facing south,
meditates on the color red.
One visualizes the person who is the object of the rite in the center of Mount Meru, pressed down by Mount Meru, and above it one visualizes
the crossed vajra pressing it down completely.
If one does this in one's own place,
it presses down the mouth of the enemy,
it presses down all his armies as well,
and it presses down even the enemy's heart.

oṃ sumbha nisumbha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ laṃ Devadatta staṃbhaya.
oṃ grīhṇa grīhṇa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ laṃ Devadatta staṃbhaya.
oṃ grīhṇāpaya grīhṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ laṃ Devadatta staṃbhaya.
oṃ ānaya ho vidyārāja hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ laṃ Devadatta staṃbhaya.

In the order explained before,
one should surely draw the wheel with this very mantra and worship it with yellow flowers.

This is the supreme rite for pressing down speech.

Always on cloth from a charnel ground
one should clearly draw the two wheels, binding the mouth by interweaving the syllable vaṃ with the name of the person who is the object of the rite.
In the center of the maṇḍala of Mahendra,
in an amulet box joined mouth to mouth, one should imagine the person who is the object of the rite
as having fully entered into the heart of a sheep.
One should recite the mantra without interruption;
he will surely become mute.

Next, further, I shall explain the supreme rite that surely kills.
Salt, mustard seed, pungent oil,
leaves of neem, and likewise poison,
charcoal from a charnel ground, datura,
or else blood from one's own index finger:
these substances should be made into ink.
Facing the southern direction, with this application,
using a pen made from a crow's feather, one takes the name of the person who is the object of the rite and properly draws the two wheels, interwoven with the syllable hūṃ.
With a wrathful and fierce roar,
with the left leg extended,
abiding in the center of a sun maṇḍala, his face transformed, like the fire at the end of an eon, blue, his throat filled with the unbearable sound of hūṃ: thus one should visualize oneself.
The wise one imagines the person who is the object of the rite
in a place strewn with gravel and potsherds, or in the midst of the charcoal of a charnel ground,
or in some such locality;
one imagines him emaciated and filthy,
dressed in tattered clothes,
and one should imagine him pierced by mantras

in all his limbs, in his head, in his heart, and in his shoulders.
The deity that abides in the body of the person who is the object of the rite one draws fully into one's own body.
Regarding him as like an empty house,
one emanates a host of wrathful ones holding various weapons in their hands, and imagines them killing him with their weapons.
Having chopped him into six pieces,
they eat and drink his fat, marrow, grease, and flesh,
and likewise drink his blood as well.
With swords, clubs, pestles, axes, wheels, and hammers,
they beat and hack the person who is the object of the rite,
and split him into a hundred pieces.
Crows, owls, vultures,
jackals, rākṣasas, and ḍākinīs,
with furious minds,
eat and drink him.
Reciting with the mantra interwoven with the syllables hūṃ phaṭ, one should kill the hosts of enemies who do harm to the Three Jewels.
How wonderful! For the act of killing, though there is killing, is no killing:
it is mere conceptual thought of saṃsāra, realized by the mind as suchness.

Next, one draws the two wheels interwoven with the syllable phaṭ, properly taking the name of the person who is the object of the rite;
one should write it joined with the mantra.
One properly draws the person who is the object of the rite, looking on, with a horse and a buffalo mounted together.
Placing it inside two skull cups joined mouth to mouth,
one should wind it with blue thread.
With a wrathful mind, at midday,

or especially at night,
at a most fierce crossroads,
or in the midst of a terrifying charnel ground,
one should secretly dig and insert it.
One worships according to the rite explained before.
Through the horse and the buffalo fighting,
it immediately brings about division.
Both are wrathful and terrible in their wrath,
great in their nature of waging battle;
through quarreling with each other they become hostile, and not otherwise.

By this very rite, interwoven with the syllables hūṃ phaṭ, one draws here:
having drawn the mantra together with the person who is the object of the rite on cloth from a charnel ground, placing it inside skull cups joined mouth to mouth and winding it with black thread, having meditated oneself as Heruka,
one should dig in a cremation ground and hide it.
In front, the wind arisen from yaṃ, bow-shaped, and in its center abides
the blue one, riding a camel, moving toward the southern direction;
since he is led by the host of wrathful ones,
he goes about the earth like a madman.
One recites without interruption the mantra joined with the syllables hūṃ phaṭ.
Whoever's rite is performed in this way will at once be expelled.

The practitioner, facing south, in wrath, should properly mix his own blood, ash from a charnel ground, poison, salt, sesame oil, mustard,
the juice of the leaves of the intoxicating datura,
and mustard seed in equal measure.
Likewise on cloth from a charnel ground
one should draw the two wheels in due order, completing the rite.

Killing abides in the body of Yama;
division, on the horse and the buffalo;
expulsion abides on the camel;
pacifying, on the moon maṇḍala;
subjugation, in the heart of women;
enriching, on the back of an elephant;
muting abides in the body of a sheep;
pressing down, in the center of Mount Meru; and summoning abides on the lion, the śarabha.
In this way the rites should be examined.
A rite devoid of these rites, though one practices it, will not succeed through that;
a rite without the guru's instructions becomes fruitless, like empty space.

This is the tenth chapter, the division of the stages called the Source of the Expanse of Rites.

Next, I shall explain
the secret characteristics of mantra recitation.
In mountain thickets and ravines,
on the shore of the great ocean,
at a crossroads, at an assembly hall,
in a charnel ground, or in a place that delights the mind, having first drawn the maṇḍala,
then, as the deity oneself,
by the rite explained before, properly,
one should first perform the approach and the rest.
On a mountain or in a mountain place
one should recite the heart mantra:
oṃ śrī vajra he he ru ru ka hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.
Having recited it one hundred thousand times,
one should perform a fire offering of a tenth.
Worldly and transworldly accomplishments are swiftly accomplished, and not otherwise.
In a thicket crowded with trees,
having always drawn the maṇḍala,

one should constantly recite and practice the near-heart mantra without interruption:
oṃ hrīḥ h ha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.
Having recited it three hundred thousand times, one should perform a fire offering of a tenth of the recitation.
One should accomplish the bringing down of rain, treasures,
and the accomplishment of speech.
In a ravine with stainless water,
having drawn the virtuous maṇḍala,
reciting the mantra without interruption,
one recites the secret mantra of the four-faced one:
oṃ sumbha nisumbha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ grīhṇa grīhṇa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ grīhṇāpaya grīhṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ ānaya ho vidyārāja hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.
The yogin should recite it four hundred thousand times and perform a fire offering of a tenth.
Pacifying, enriching, and the extraction of essences, and likewise the accomplishment of the welfare of sentient beings, follow.
Having gone to the shore of the great ocean and properly drawn the maṇḍala, in particular one recites the mantra of the goddess three hundred thousand times, and having completed the rite as it has been taught,
one performs a fire offering of a tenth:
oṃ vajravairocanīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.
All worldly accomplishments follow,
and likewise the accomplishment of moving in the sky.

In a charnel ground, following the sequence of the rite explained before, one draws the maṇḍala.
The seven-syllable secret mantra
one recites three hundred thousand times and so accomplishes it.
Having performed a fire offering of a tenth,
one should accomplish the rites with certainty.
The rites of separating and of expelling,
and in particular the rite of killing,
just as Vajrasattva has taught,
are accomplished by recitation alone.

Having drawn the maṇḍala at a crossroads,
one should perform the rite of suppression.
The secret mantra of the goddess Ḍākinī is accomplished by reciting it ten thousand times: oṃ ḍākinīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ
If one performs a fire offering of a tenth, bhūtas and vetālas are brought to accomplishment.
In a temple or an assembly hall
one should draw the supreme maṇḍala.
The mantra of Lāmā, without fail,
one recites one hundred thousand times,
and then performs the goddess's fire offering of a tenth:
oṃ lāme hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
The eye ointment, swift-footedness, and likewise subjugation
are accomplished here; of this there is no doubt.
In a solitary and delightful place
one should always draw the maṇḍala, and with the mantra of Khaṇḍarohā and the rest perform the rite as before:
oṃ khaṇḍarohe hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā Having recited it two hundred thousand times,
one performs a fire offering of a tenth.
Reciting the mantra without interruption,
one accomplishes the yakṣas and yakṣiṇīs.
The secret mantra of Rūpiṇī
one recites, without fail, four hundred thousand times, and performs the goddess's fire offering of a tenth.
That it will be accomplished there is no doubt:
oṃ rūpiṇīye hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ svāhā
With flowers, incense and scents, food offerings for the deities and torma likewise,
and especially with food and drink,
one should worship the supreme maṇḍala, and with special songs and dances
one should proclaim the mudrās and mantras.
Having found a pleasing samaya consort,

one places her in her direction and performs the practice;
according to the particular rite,
one should examine her family and so forth.
Abiding in the form of the deity,
one recites and worships according to the rite.
At whatever time it may be, keeping silent,
one first performs the approach there.
Equipped together with intoxicant and torma,
one should accomplish the power of the mantra.
A hundred, a thousand, up to a hundred thousand:
there one should mark the count.
By reciting the mantra countless times unsurpassed virtue arises.
If one practices these with definite application,
one will attain accomplishment.
This is the eleventh chapter, teaching the rules of mantra recitation.

O Lord of Yakṣas, listen well to the characteristics of the recitation rosary, through whose true rite accomplishment here is beyond doubt.
Gold, silver and copper,
likewise crystal, conch and so forth,
are used for pacifying and enriching.
For pacifying, a rosary of a hundred beads;
a rosary of one hundred and eight beads is highly praised for the rite of enriching.
The wise recite with it for the sake of kingship or glory,
or for the perfection of happiness and delight.
For the applications of subjugating and summoning, beads of saffron and other fragrant substances,
of coral, and of red sandalwood seeds:
always a rosary of fifty beads.
Rudrākṣa and lungtang fruit, likewise human bone, and the bones of camel, donkey and buffalo, are to be used for fierce conduct, for silencing, for suppression, for destroying enemies by separating them,

for killing and for expelling.
According to the particular rite,
so too is the recitation rosary to be made.
Mixing the hair of donkey and camel with the feathers of a crow, for the rites of suppression and expulsion one strings the rosary with a thread of that.
With the hair of horse and buffalo
one makes the thread for causing enmity.
Thread of hair from the charnel ground is to be mixed with the hair of a dog;
since that thread is praised for fierce rites, it should be used for them.
For virtuous rites one strings the rosary with thread spun by a maiden.
For pacifying, it is placed on the index finger;
for enriching, always with the middle finger;
with the ring finger, it is said, for subjugating;
with the little finger, for fierce rites.
The thumb, having the nature of the deity,
is to be employed in all the rites.
The beads are the arhats, and the head bead has the nature of the dharma realm.
With the particular recitation rosary
one meditates in equipoise and recites.
In the Perfect Age one recites once;
in the Age of Three, twice;
in the Age of Two, three times is taught;
in the Age of Strife, one recites four times as much.
With these four counts of the mantra
one recites the secret mantra without interruption.
This, comprising the recitation rosary and so forth,
is verbal recitation.
Visualizing oneself in the form of the deity,
whose nature is emanation and absorption,
through the sign that is the reality of the mantra

one properly contemplates going and coming.
Liberated from the three extremes is the ultimate meaning of suchness.
These are the characteristics of the rite of mantra recitation, as they have been taught.
This is the twelfth chapter, the definitive teaching on the counting rosary for mantra recitation.

Next, I shall explain further
the arising of the maṇḍala of the deity, which delights in the supreme secret
and is the abode of all qualities of accomplishment.
A site pervaded by all the qualities of sense pleasure
the wise should properly examine.
Endowed with union as the two-armed Heruka, one should take pride in the five aggregates and so on.
By reciting the mantra of the Four-Faced One one binds the directions and makes the fence:
oṃ sumbhani sumbha hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ in the east;
oṃ grīhṇa grīhṇa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ in the north;
oṃ grīhṇāpaya grīhṇāpaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ in the west;
oṃ ānaya ho bidyārāja hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ in the south.
By snapping the fingers toward the directions
one should expel the vicious māras.
From the syllable hūṃ on the lotus at the heart
one should emanate garlands of light rays.
By their light one beholds before one the guru, the buddhas and the rest, and with prostrations, flowers, incense and so on one worships them, and afterward confesses one's misdeeds.
One goes for refuge to the Three Jewels and generates the mind of awakening.
The mind that benefits others is loving-kindness;
that which destroys the suffering of others is compassion;
to be gladdened by the happiness of others is joy;
and one contemplates equanimity, evenness toward all sentient beings.
With the words oṃ svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvvadharmmā svabhāvaśuddho'haṃ, abiding in mind alone,

one should meditate on the accumulation for awakening:
oṃ śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāva ātmako'haṃ
As the forms of the support and the supported one imagines bhai ram ba and the rest.
From yaṃ arises the maṇḍala of wind, shaped like a bow and blue in color;
upon it, from raṃ,
the form of the maṇḍala of fire,
red in color and triangular,
marked with a three-pronged vajra.

Upon it, arisen from baṃ,
the maṇḍala of water, round and white.
Upon that, arisen from laṃ,
the maṇḍala of earth, square, yellow in color, and at its four corners likewise marked with three-pronged vajras.
Upon that, arisen from suṃ,
is Mount Meru, square,
beautiful, made of the four precious substances,
and adorned with eight peaks.
Upon that, arisen from hūṃ,
one visualizes a crossed vajra.
Upon that one visualizes a lotus with its center and its anthers.
In its center one should meditate on the pure union of the vowels and consonants.
In its center is the syllable hūṃ,
and from it, the nature of Vajrasattva, one visualizes glorious Heruka seated in the center of a sun maṇḍala.
The hero has three faces and six arms and sits upon the seat with the right leg extended.
His principal face is deep black,
the right is like jasmine,
and the left is red and very terrifying.

He is adorned with a crest of matted locks.
Treading on Bhairava and Kālarātri,
he abides in great bliss.
Vajravairocanī embraces him,
and he delights intensely in the passion of compassion.
With his two hands holding vajra and bell joined together, he embraces her properly.
With the two supreme hands of the second pair
he holds an elephant hide as his garment.
With the third right hand he sounds a hand drum, proclaiming the essential nature of all phenomena.
With the third of his left hands
he holds a khaṭvāṅga staff and carries a skull cup.
He makes a headband of a garland of skulls,
and is adorned with a half moon.
His head is marked with a crossed vajra,
and the lord of his family forms his crest.
His face has a very terrifying expression and also the sentiment of erotic charm.
He wears a garment of tiger skin and is adorned with human heads, half of twenty.
The deity bears the five mudrās and possesses the nine sentiments of dance.
The Blessed Lady who embraces him has one face, two arms and three eyes.
She is naked, the color of the bandhūka flower, and wears a girdle adorned with bone pieces.
Her hair is loose and she bares her fangs;
she delights in blood, and it drips from her.
Her left hand, embracing him, holds a skull cup filled with the blood of vicious māras and the like.
Her right hand, in the threatening gesture, holds a vajra.
She is great of body, like the fire at the end of an age.
With her two thighs she embraces him evenly,
and she always delights in great bliss.
Ḍākinī, likewise Lāmā, Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī,

sources of the bliss of all accomplishments, are to be placed on the petals of the lotus in the directions.
They are black, green, red,
and pale yellow in color, with three eyes,
one face and two arms,
their hands holding khaṭvāṅga and skull cup;
in the right is a vajra curved knife.
They are naked, standing with the right leg extended,
their hair loose, their faces baring fangs,
and they are adorned with the five mudrās.
On the four petals of the intermediate directions are vessels of the mind of awakening and the rest, filled with the five nectars,
and one worships with the joy and bliss of song and dance.
At the four gates the hosts of deities abide;
one should always meditate on these deities.
At the eastern gate one should visualize
Kākāsyā, two-armed and blue.
At the northern gate is Ulūkāsyā, green, with her hair loose.
Likewise Śvānāsyā, who is red, abides at the western gate.
Śūkarāsyā is yellow
and stands at the southern gate on a preta seat.
In the corners of fire, of Nairṛti, of wind and of Īśāna
are Yamadāḍhī, Yamadūtī, Yamadaṃṣṭrī and Yamamathanī.
Likewise the goddesses who stay in the corners are of captivating form and two-armed,
standing on pretas, great fierce ones,
adorned with the five mudrās.
In the left hand they hold skull cup and khaṭvāṅga, and in the right a vajra curved knife.
All these yoginīs
bestow every accomplishment.
Then, having come to know the two armors,

one visualizes the wisdom wheel,
and by the union of mantra and mudrā
one merges it evenly with the samaya wheel.
Now the two armors will be explained.
oṃ ha at the heart.
namaḥ hi on the head.
svāhā hu at the crown.
bauṣaṭ he on the two shoulders.
hūṃ hūṃ hoḥmig on the two eyes.
phaṭ haṃ on all the limbs: this is the weapon.
The first is Vajrasattva;
the second, Vairocana, is present;
the third is Padmanarteśvara;
glorious Heruka is known as the fourth;
the fifth is Vajrasūrya;
and the sixth likewise is Paramāśva.
One is protected by these six armors.
oṃ baṃ is Vajravairocanī.
oṃ haṃ yaṃ is Yāminī.
oṃ maṃ is Mohinī.
oṃ hriṃ is Saṃcālinī.
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ is Saṃtrāsinī.
phaṭ phaṭ is Caṇḍikā, on the whole body: this is the weapon.
They are placed at the navel and the heart, and likewise at the mouth, the head and the crown, and likewise the weapon.
oṃ yogaśuddhāḥ sarbadharmā yogaśuddho'haṃ Placing the right and left hands at the heart, one performs the dance of the blossoming lotus.
The deities of the heart mudrā and the rest, encircling: this is the Ḍākinījāla Saṃvara.
This yoga is the chief and the supreme;
one should meditate on the yoga of the deity.
The wheels of Dharma, of enjoyment and of emanation, and the wheel of great bliss, are to be applied.
The twenty-four channels purify the whole body,
and by the twenty-four places

the body is gathered and held.
This body has the nature of the hero;
it is equal to all the buddhas.
Through the yoga of the nondual aspect the inconceivable state is shown.
With a mind attuned to this yoga
one should meditate on the supreme state.
This is the thirteenth chapter, on the generation stage of glorious Heruka.

Next I shall properly explain
the worship of Vajrayoginī.
If one is unable to travel to the sacred places and so on,
one should worship the outer yoginīs.
Having worshiped the yoginīs in one's own home,
one should first perform the approach and the rest.
Without the prior approach,
it is pointless and mere weariness.
On the tenth day of the waning fortnight,
or likewise of the waxing fortnight, endowed with bathing, cleanliness and the like,
one invites them with a mind of faith,
and in one's own home, having properly seated them facing east, one worships the goddesses.
With saffron, eye ointment,
and likewise vermilion one anoints their heads;
their feet, hands and faces likewise
one anoints with unguents and worships them.
One hangs garlands of flowers on their heads and perfumes them with fragrant incense.
One, three, four or five,
and especially seven or nine,
up to as many as twenty-four:
the patron, with steadfast faith,
with food, intoxicating drink,
fish, meat and the like,
having consecrated them as mudrās, worships them,
and the hero should show the signs.

The assembly of Vajravairocanī,
as having the nature of the deity, one always worships.
With the rite of the torma first,
one offers five lamps and food,
and fully endowed with songs and praises
one worships the vajrayoginīs.
Here, if with diligence one worships the vajra goddesses abundantly with intoxicants and meat, and, devoted to the glorious Vajra Vehicle, worships them with faith through a feast, their hearts are pleased and they will bestow the supreme,
for the supreme rests in their hands.
Having worshiped the yoginīs,
one should examine the signs of pacifying and enriching:
in the instant of worshiping the maidens,
one examines the karmic results of virtue and nonvirtue.
If one of them rubs her two hands together,
her mind has not been pleased,
and so illnesses will increase and suffering will be met with.
If at the moment of the worship
she lets out the sound of laughter, freedom from illness will not be attained,
and death is beyond doubt.
If right upon the worship she weeps and rubs her two eyes,
it is said one will die in an instant.
When the practitioner has always performed the worship,
if pair by pair, each to each,
they turn their faces toward one another, the maidens are always showing that there will be quarrels everywhere.
If a yoginī looks behind her,
or bites her nails with her teeth,
she has not been satisfied with the meat dishes,
and the rite will have to be done again.
If they are not pleased by the feast of all the food and drink, sudden illness, from weapons and the like,

will arise at once.
If they sing and make music like this and laugh again and again, the wise should discern that these maidens are showing dangers from kings and thieves.
If, having drunk the intoxicant, they dance
again and again in many ways, great illness will come upon those concerned.
This should be examined at the time of the worship.
If they throw away all the food of the feast and gaze about in the directions, it is the fault of having let one's conduct lapse:
the deities are angered with oneself.
If they fall into conversation with one another,
or if they laugh at one another,
know that the maidens are showing that the rite of the principal has lapsed.
If one vomits immediately after eating,
it shows that the disease of madness will arise.
If the beautiful one, as she leaves, looks back behind her,
the rite will have to be done again,
and it shows illness arising after a long time.
If she rubs the ground with her foot,
it signifies a change of dwelling.
If she falls down at the time of the worship,
it shows that people will do battle with one another.
When it is free of these changes,
the worship should be taken as accomplished.
Therefore, having worshiped with diligence,
the practitioner should always examine.
Worship the vajrayoginīs:
they grant every desired result.
This is the fourteenth chapter, the definitive teaching on the rite of worshiping Vajrayoginī.

Then, for that purpose, I shall properly explain
the supreme characteristics of the vessel.
A vessel of clay, or likewise of tortoise shell,
made of bell metal, copper or iron,
or made of gold or silver,
of conch, or likewise of mother of pearl,
the supreme fruit of the pomegranate,
and likewise others newly made,
those made of horn, wooden vessels and the like,
and also, in particular, stone vessels.
Of one piece, of two pieces, likewise of three, four or five,
of six pieces, of seven pieces,
and of eight pieces: so they are renowned.
From a brahmin, a kṣatriya, a vaiśya,
a śūdra, a woman, or one born of outcaste lineage.
White, red, pale green, yellow, and likewise pale yellow,
ash colored, of bad color,
and of various colors: so they are renowned.
Superior, inferior and lowest,
and likewise various shapes are distinguished:
with two hollows like the back of an elephant,
and likewise like a vajra or a crow's foot;
with teeth green or yellow,
or bulging, or likewise eaten by worms.
Having looked at all of these,
one should examine it thoroughly.
In places where the ground is level,
or on plains or in hollows of sand,
the mantra practitioner, having practiced there,
should examine how it falls.
Facing south, there will be fear for brahmins.
Falling toward Nairṛti, there is fear for cattle,
for those without caste and those of low caste.
Facing the wind, the mantra is in danger.
If it faces north, one will become rich.

Toward Īśāna, there is accomplishment of the mantra,
and the continuity of the vows is not broken.
Facing fire, there is robbery,
and likewise facing downward, a woman thief.

If it rests facing upward, it destroys women;
if it falls on its side, it is fierce.
One should fully know the characteristics of the vessel.
One of a single piece gives power over places;
one of two pieces gives power over the maṇḍala;
one of three pieces brings accomplishment to the practitioner;
by one of four pieces there is accomplishment of mantra;
by the fifth, pacifying and enriching;
one of six pieces, know, brings the gaining of alms;
by one of seven pieces one subjugates.
Because the practice of accomplishment would be fruitless, likewise one of eight pieces is to be rejected.
One with a single hole is of a brahmin;
one with two holes is of a kṣatriya;
one with three holes, know, is of a vaiśya;
those with four holes are of śūdras.
One with many holes or with no hole
the wise should reject.
A woman's skull also is not to be taken,
and in particular one whose color has faded,
one without teeth or with damaged teeth,
should not be kept by one who desires virtue.
With green teeth there is much suffering;
with crow's-foot markings there will be quarrels;
by one with two hollows one will fall into ruin.
Likewise one shaped inside like the back of an elephant, with four hollows in the central place,
should be regarded as a wish-granting cow.
One with two hollows on the front side is said to be called a wish-fulfilling jewel.
One whose color is like conch, jasmine or the moon,
and which is glossy, is regarded as auspicious:

it grants the accomplishments of all mantras,
and the practitioner obtains accomplishment.
One that is large and yellow in color, or like a lotus and marked with a lotus,
is declared to be praised for enriching,
and through it perfect wealth is accomplished.
Whatever vessel is red in color and moreover marked with red dots is always, by its characteristics, a vessel granting the accomplishments of subjugating and summoning.
One shaped like the mouth of a cow,
very hard and bearing pearl-like marks, is especially highly praised for killing, expelling and separating.
One who obtains a vessel that is highly praised is granted every desired result.
Having traveled to the sacred places and fields,
the practitioner should accomplish the goddess.
If one keeps a vessel complete with these characteristics, accomplishment will be achieved.
This is the fifteenth chapter, the definitive teaching on the characteristics of the vessel.

Then, for that purpose, I shall properly explain
the accomplishment of the five nectars, by whose true rite
the fruit of all accomplishments arises.
By a concealed rite, one properly takes it from one born from the womb of a brahmin;
therefore it bears the name of Vairocana,
and accomplishment is properly held to come from it.
Having found a woman of the jewel family, green in color, with an excellent body
and with black pupils in her eyes, one cleanses with her urine and performs the practice.
One of the lotus family, with a perfect body, beautiful limbs and young,

one properly worships with food and drink,
and the wise one, having presented an offering gift,
at that very moment enters into union,
and they take each other's śukra.
Therefore she who bears the name of the dancer caste is likewise known as the Tathāgata.
By the rite explained before accomplishment is carried to completion:
the first flower of the woman renowned as a dyer is highly praised.
If one finds a caṇḍāla woman who keeps the samaya,
one should always rely on her.
Meat, fat and likewise blood
the wise should take.
The practitioner who desires accomplishment
takes whatever of the five hooks he finds;
or, since here killing is taught as the chief means,
if he properly finds them, he takes them.
Cow meat and horse meat,
elephant meat likewise,
human meat and dog meat
the wise should take.
These, as Vajrasattva has taught,
are renowned as the five lamps.
Having found them, at the time of the tenth day
one properly gathers these substances.
Having mixed them with fragrant substances,
one combines them in great secrecy.
The practitioner, in secret, properly forms them into pills.
At that very moment, with a complete array of special food and drink, having consecrated them in the midst of the gathering,
one then properly begins the rites.
Mantra recitation and likewise meditative concentration bring forth the fruit of every wish;
they grant rejuvenation through the body's essence and the accomplishment of supreme liberation.

One who constantly relies on the pills is granted the fruit of every wish.
If they are applied to all the rites,
the state of the sky-goers will be attained.
This is the sixteenth chapter, the definitive teaching on the accomplishment of the five nectars.

Next I shall properly explain
the supreme rite of drawing the maṇḍala.
Thus, when someone makes a request,
or when one wishes for merit oneself,
first, abiding in the circle whose nature is one's own deity, one performs the prior approach.
Having gained mastery through the prior approach,
one should then give torma there.
One who is steadfast and knows the profound Dharma, who has gone to the far shore of consecration and torma, who knows the reality of the fire offering and the maṇḍala,
who is learned in all the fields of knowledge,
who has faith and devotion toward the way of secret mantra,
who is of fine form and lovely to behold,
and who has respect and love for the guru:
to such a one the Saṃvarodaya is to be explained.
In a temple, at the site of a stūpa,
in a dwelling, an assembly hall, or a clean place, or in a charnel ground that has existed from the beginning:
there one should begin the maṇḍala.
On ground where the rite has been performed before,
one does not dig and so forth;
touching it with the hand,
one purifies the ground by reciting the syllable hūṃ as mantra.
One should purify an area of ground twice the size of the maṇḍala's portion.
When one's own mind is completely pure,
by that very fact the ground becomes pure.
The master, the nature of all the buddhas,

whose identity is the body of the deity,
should supplicate the hero who holds vajra and bell,
together with the ḍākinīs.
The intelligent one, whirling the vajra and diligently ringing the bell, expels the gods, the asuras, the guhyakas,
and the hosts of extremely vicious obstructors:
"I, through the power of glorious compassion,
by fully applying the wheel of protection,
whatever you may be, kaṭapūtanas and the rest,
hosts of obstructors, go elsewhere!
If, when I have commanded, anyone should transgress, by the body of the Vajra Lord arisen from the three bodies he will be split apart;
here he will be destroyed, and nothing else."
Having taken possession of the ground,
one should bind the boundary with a fence.
With the threatening mudrā of the right hand, one praises the earth goddess Pṛthivī, arisen from the syllable baṃ, yellow in color and holding a golden vase,
and earnestly urges her:
"I, named so-and-so, am drawing the maṇḍala; goddess, it is by your leave."
One worships her with flowers, incense and the rest,
and the wise one, having presented the offering water, supplicates the tathāgatas, the Blessed One, the vajra holder worshiped by the wrathful ones:
"Perfect buddhas, please consider me!
Out of love for the disciples,
and in order to worship you as well,
O Protector, I wish to draw the maṇḍala of the arising of the innate.
Therefore, Blessed One, I pray you, grant your kindness to me who am devoted.
Whatever other secret mantra deities there are,
and the deities who protect the world, and the bhūtas who rely on perfect awakening and rejoice in the teaching,

all of you who possess the vajra eye:
since I am drawing the maṇḍala,
the maṇḍala of the Saṃvarodaya,
I pray you, generate loving care for me and likewise for the disciples."
The thread, endowed with the five wisdoms and divided into twenty-five strands, is to be twisted together, strand with strand,
as the essential nature of all phenomena.
The practitioner, uttering the syllable hūṃ, should anoint it with the five nectars.
In length it is twice the circle,
in thickness a twentieth part of the gate.
Having said jaḥ three times, at the center
one holds it with the left fist,
and the intelligent one strikes the line in the sky,
and likewise strikes it on the ground.
With a thread that is clear and beautiful,
of proper measure and clean,
the one with wisdom should strike the lines of the glorious maṇḍala of the arising of the innate.
Beginning from half a cubit up to as much as a hundred cubits:
first are the lines of Brahmā,
and second one strikes the diagonal lines.
In the positions of the west and the south
the master properly stands, without fail;
in the positions of the eastern and northern directions
the disciple stands, in equipoise.
First, in a fourfold measure,
one strikes the lines of one square.
Then, in an eightfold measure,
one strikes well the lines of one square.
Again, in an eightfold measure,
one strikes the lines of one square.
Then again, in a twofold measure,

one strikes well the lines of one square.
Then, in a fourfold measure,
one strikes the lines of one square.
Again, in a twofold measure,
one strikes well the lines of one square.
Then the wise one, in a fourfold measure, strikes the lines of one square.
Then, in a twofold measure,
one strikes the lines of two squares.
Then one draws the half in two tiers.
This is the laying of the maṇḍala's lines.
The marks of the line cord are sixty-four:
these are the characteristics of the maṇḍala's lines.
Up to the very outer edge of the circle
one strikes the lines as the rite has taught.
With powder of the five precious substances, or else with rice and the like,
white, yellow and likewise red,
green and likewise black,
the master goes to the direction of Īśāna,
and there, in equipoise,
with the well-concealed left fist lays out the five strips of color.
Between each of them one draws a gap the width of a single barley grain.
If the strips are thick, there will be illness;
if thin, wealth will decline;
if crooked, there will be quarrels here;
if broken, death will occur.
In the eastern direction is a great white;
the south is endowed with yellow;
the western portion is red;
the north is endowed with emerald;
and the portion of ground in the center blazes with the light of sapphire.

At every portion of the corners and at the junctures of the door projections, in equipoise, one should properly draw them,
adorned with vajras and with jewels.
Within the vajra fence
it is adorned with the eight charnel grounds:
Caṇḍogra, and likewise Gahvara, Vajrajvala, and Karaṅkin;
in Īśāna, Aṭṭahāsa;
in Agni, Lakṣmīvana;
in Nairṛti, Ghorāndhakāra;
in the direction of Vāyu, Kilikilārava.
In the east the śirīṣa and the aśvattha tree,
the kaṅkela, and especially the cūta tree,
the paṭā, and likewise the karañja,
the latāparka, and the pārthiva.
Indra, and likewise Dhanada (Kubera), the lord of nāgas (Varuṇa), and the lord Yama,
then Īśāna and Agni,
the lord of rākṣasas, and the lord of wind (Vāyu).
Vāsuki and Takṣaka, Karkoṭa and Padma,
Mahāpadma, Huluhulu, Kulika, and Śaṅkhapāla.
Thundering and Great Thundering, Fierce, Moving, and likewise Steady, Filling, and likewise Pouring:
these fierce ones are the lords of the clouds.
And besides, many of various kinds:
crows, owls, and vultures,
jackals and she-jackals,
foxes and she-foxes,
lion-faced and tiger-faced ones,
females with fierce and terrifying faces, snakes with the heads of cattle,
two-faced ones and others roaming in the directions;
skeletons, and bodies impaled on stakes,
hanging bodies, half-burned bodies, and heads,

skulls, shinbones, headless trunks,
heads with bared teeth, and bones;
the various accomplished vidyādharas,
the yogins who practice the conduct of the pledges,
the hosts of yoginīs,
yakṣas, vetālas, rākṣasas and the rest,
the lords of the great cry of kili kili, and the hosts of masters who have fully attained accomplishment and miraculous power:
these are to be visualized in the midst of the charnel grounds.

This is the seventeenth chapter, the section teaching the characteristics of laying out the lines of the maṇḍala.

Next, the characteristics of the master
I shall properly explain.
He has a peaceful and disciplined bearing and grants fearlessness to all sentient beings.
He knows the application of mantra and tantra, is learned in the treatises, and is endowed with compassion.
He regards all sentient beings as his children and speaks pleasantly in every situation.
He always delights in generosity and the rest and strives intently in meditative concentration and yoga.
He harms no one and speaks the truth;
he has compassion and a mind intent on benefit;
he has an impartial mind and is endowed with the mudrā.
He has become the protector of sentient beings and knows the particular dispositions of sentient beings;
he is the friend of those who have no protector.
His body has all its faculties complete;
he is well formed and beautiful to behold.
He knows the reality of the meaning of empowerment;
his words are clear, and he is a great ocean of good qualities;
he is always and continually steadfast.
Such a one should be recognized as a master.

Disciples of good family who delight in the Dharma the master should properly gather.

Those without compassion, wrathful and malicious, arrogant, greedy, attached, and distracted, violent, deluded, and indolent,
without tenderness for the lives of others,
and covetous of the wealth of others,
the guru should always reject.
Those who are steady, disciplined, and intelligent,
patient, upright, and without deceit or guile,
who have entirely given up the ten nonvirtues,
who look upon sentient beings with loving-kindness,
who, as if it were blazing fire or poison,
do not touch the wealth of others,
who always and continually honor the guru,
who are eager to behold the holy Dharma, who always delight in generosity and the rest,
and who long for the world beyond:
these are commended as disciples,
and the virtuous maṇḍala should be shown to them.
Joining their palms together,
they should petition with a respectful mind:
"Great hero in union with the supreme yoginī,
you, my teacher,
have shown the way of great awakening.
Great protector, I beseech you:
grant me that very pledge;
grant me also the mind of awakening.
The empowerment of the heroes and heroines,
and likewise of Vārāhī and Heruka, fill the secret place and the rest completely,
and please explain the arrangement upon the body.
The Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha,
the three refuges, grant to me as well.
Into the supreme city of great liberation,
O protector, please make me enter."
"Come, my child: of the Great Vehicle
you are a vessel of the great way.
The ritual of the conduct of secret mantra

I shall properly explain to you.
Through the power of the vajra secret mantra
one truly attains incomparable wisdom.
Therefore, to attain omniscience,
my child, form this resolve:
honor the guru, and likewise be loving;
be devoted to the buddhas and tender toward beings;
give up the root transgressions entirely,
and give up the gross transgressions as well.
You should attend to sentient beings;
do not long for the Lesser Vehicle.
Carry across those who have not crossed;
liberate those who are not liberated;
bring relief to the sentient beings tormented by the suffering of saṃsāra."
The disciples who properly possess these trainings should undergo the preparatory rite.
In accordance with the ritual, they should be bathed and purified with fumigation, and a tooth stick given to them.
In particular, with a red thread tied on the upper arm, they are always protected.
Kuśa grass over which the mantra of the syllable dhī has been recited should then be given to them, and their dreams, virtuous and nonvirtuous, examined.
The vows of body, speech, and mind are also to be given.
Having had them take loose flowers together with the offering gift, and then tying on a blindfold there,
one should lead them into the maṇḍala.
The negative deeds amassed in former births are purified by seeing the maṇḍala.
One should ask, "O, who are you?"
and they reply, "I am the fortunate one."
The pledge water, the oath,
and the casting of the flower onto the maṇḍala:
wherever the flower falls,
to that family they will belong.

The water, the crown, the vajra,
the bell, and the name empowerments;
the empowerment embodying the five tathāgatas;
the observance, and the prediction;
the permission and the encouragement;
and the irreversible empowerment too should be given;
the parasol, the seat, the consort, and the rest,
complete with vajra, bell, and the rest:
the master empowerment, entirely complete,
is the one that arises from the vase.

The second is the supreme secret;
the third is the wisdom of insight;
the fourth, likewise, is just so.
One who properly possesses these empowerments should be known as a holder of the pledges.
"Having entered supremely into the maṇḍala of the supreme secret and beheld it, today you are completely freed from all negative deeds, and abide as an excellent one.
The permission and the supreme encouragement spoken in unison by all the buddhas, the accomplishments, the pledges, and the vows:
these you must always guard."
The disciple, through the power of faith, having bowed at the feet of the guru, should say, "Just as the Lord has commanded, so shall I do."
Then, as the Tathāgata has taught, various ornaments, garments, and the like,
and in particular one's own body,
are to be offered to the guru as the offering gift.
Having obtained the principal empowerment, with the great mind of one who has done what was to be done,
one should, moreover, say this with great joy,
and so bring the conclusion to completion:
"Today my life bears fruit;

my living is fruitful.
Today I am born into the family of the buddhas;
I have become a child of the buddhas."
One should complete it with a fire offering,
and invite the Saṅgha to a feast.
Then one should hold a feast gathering, and give also to the sick and to those without protector.
Afterward, in accordance with the instructions,
by striving in the conduct of the pledges,
with one's continuum made a vessel, through the stages of meditating on the wheel and the rest, endowed with the perfect, true instructions, accomplishment will come, and not otherwise.

This is the eighteenth chapter, the section on the stages of empowerment.

Next, the characteristics of certain death
I shall explain supremely.
The omens, in one's own body or outside it,
should be examined by the wise.
If one feels as if pierced in the soles of the feet,
and when one comes to feel as if pierced at the navel,
then, beyond three days
and before five, one will depart.
If at the times of defecation and urination
a sneeze occurs at the same moment, then within one year, at that very time of day, one will die and perish.
If, while the two organs are joined in union, in the middle and at the end a sneeze occurs at the same moment, then one will certainly die within a month.
If at the heart and the middle of the throat
a stabbing pain arises at the same moment,
then, if one does not rely on the Dharma,
one will die within a month and a half.
If the image of the pupil of the left eye
is not seen in a mirror,

then, if one does not avert it,
one will certainly die within seven days.
The roots of the ears, the middle of the brows, and the tip of the crown of the head: if these four are pierced with pain at the same moment, then one will die immediately.
If one suddenly feels it,
and is disturbed by emaciation, anger, and fear, whoever does not rely on the Dharma will die within one year.
If on the first day of the waxing fortnight one sees one's semen to be black,
then one will die within six months;
red shows that one will be struck by illness.
Constant dripping from the eyes,
seeing forms distorted, whoever does not see his own shadow
in a mirror or in water, seeing a rainbow at night,
seeing a circle of stars by day, seeing flashes of lightning in the south
when there are no clouds, seeing a path of shadow by day,
and likewise seeing meteors fall, seeing geese, crows, and peacocks mingled together as one,
two moons and two suns,
and likewise one's own head blazing, seeing a city of the gandharvas
on the tops of trees and the peaks of mountains, seeing terrifying pretas and piśācas
and other beings as well, trembling violently all of a sudden,
and fainting again and again:
if one sees even a single one of these,
one will die within one month.
The moon without its hare mark,

the sun devoid of light,
the sun at night, the moon by day,
and likewise one's own eyes blazing,
stars the size of Mount Meru, appearing like oceans and rivers,
and semen, feces, and urine discharged at the same moment:
then, if one does not rely on the Dharma,
one will die within half a month.
There, too, by day, one's shadow should be looked at as having a person's form;
if its head is not seen,
one will die within one year.
If the left hand is not seen,
one's son and wife will certainly perish.
If the right hand is not seen,
father, son, and the rest will die with great hardship.
If the urine comes in five streams, swirling round from the left and foul smelling,
or if sour urine and the like comes forth,
one will die within six months.
Whoever, at the end of a dream, climbs a heap of sand or of ashes,
or a temple or a stūpa,
will die as described before.
If, riding a donkey or a monkey, one climbs an anthill or a rubbish heap
and goes toward the south, whoever sees this at the end of a dream;
a woman clad in black,
dark in color, making love with the man:
she is called Kālarātri,
and he will go into the belly of Yama.
If one sees in a dream that one is eaten by vultures, jackals, dogs, and crows, by bears, pretas, and piśācas,
one will certainly die within one year.

If one sees in a dream that one is covered with red clothing, adorned with a red garland,
and anointed with sesame oil,
one will not live six months.
One endowed with the instructions as they are
will ransom death,
and by that very means will conquer death.
It is through the Dharma that one conquers death,
by accomplishing the stages of perfect awakening;
therefore think of the Dharma as supreme.

Furthermore, the special features of the meditation shall be properly and beautifully explained.
When the breath is cut off for an instant and various omens are truly seen, by the practice of scattering and filling one should purify the maṇḍala of the body.
When the time of death has truly come,
one should perform the supreme yoga of transference.
The channels that reach the nine openings should be filled by inhalation (pūraka);
the breath should be pressed down by exhalation (recaka);
it should be bound by retention (kumbhaka);
and the doors of the openings should be purified.
Through utter pacification it becomes peaceful.
The practice of drawing out consciousness,
and, further, for traveling to the beyond,
the wise one should apply it with the vowels and consonants joined together.
Placing the syllable hūṃ at the heart,
the one and a half syllables should be placed below and above.
In the portion beneath it is the seed syllable of wind, facing downward.
Making the seed syllable of wind twofold,
the one possessed of yoga should join them together.
In a sequence of twenty-one,

one recites the mantra of one and a half syllables.
The mount of consciousness is wind;
if one visualizes the door of the wind through which it is to travel,
it grants the accomplishment of liberation.

The distinction between the highest and the lowest
I shall explain: listen, Lord of Secrets.
Through the navel one goes to a happy destiny in the desire realm;
from the drop, to a body possessing form;
from above, into the formless realm:
these are what lead to happy destinies.
From the nose one becomes one of the yakṣas;
from the ears, a kinnara;
if, O Goddess, from the eyes,
one becomes a king among humans.
From the door of the mouth, the pretas;
from the urinary passage, likewise, the animals;
from the anal passage one goes to hell;
from liberation one goes elsewhere.
When the time has come, one should perform transference;
out of time, one would be killing the gods.
Merely through having killed the gods,
a person will be cooked in hell.
Therefore the wise should properly know the signs of death.

This is the nineteenth chapter, the section on the stages of observing the omens of death and the yoga of transference.

Next, therefore, the measure of the four ages
I shall properly explain,
by merely understanding which one quickly comes to know the eons.
Twenty thousand and eight thousand,
one million and seven hundred thousand:
these are declared to be renowned as the eon of the Perfect Age (Kṛta Yuga).
At the juncture of the Perfect Age and the Tretā Age

there are, likewise, eight thousand.
One million, two hundred thousand,
ninety thousand and six thousand:
this is renowned as the Tretā eon;
so the wise should understand it.
At the juncture between the Tretā and the Dvāpara six thousand should be understood.
Sixty thousand and four thousand and eight hundred thousand make the Dvāpara;
gathered from all the treatises,
this is properly renowned as the Dvāpara eon.
At the juncture of the Dvāpara and the Age of Strife
there are, likewise, four thousand.
Thirty thousand and two thousand and four hundred thousand should be known as the Age of Strife (Kali Yuga).
At the juncture of the Age of Strife and the Perfect Age
there are four thousand.
These are renowned as the ages;
there is no doubt of accomplishment here.
"The nature of the four continents, O Protector, please explain."
Eastern Videha, Kuru, and likewise western Godānīya:
these three continents
abide as lands of the fruition.
Those well born in Jambudvīpa should be known to be in the land of accomplishment.
For birth in the three continents there abides merit from which fruition arises;
the people of Jambudvīpa accomplish liberation and accomplishment itself.
These should be understood as the continents taught by the buddhas of the past.

This is the twentieth chapter, the section on the stages of the definitive teaching on the four ages.

Next, the supreme practice that has reached the far shore I shall properly explain, by which the practitioner, through the very cause of accomplishment, reaches the culmination of accomplishment.
In the common yoga tantras
the secret is not explained:
the supreme accomplishment among accomplishments,
the supreme observance among observances.
Having attended upon and served a holy guru,
and having heard much of the unsurpassed tantras, having heard reality just as it is from the mouth of the guru, one should always meditate.
Wealth, wife, and likewise life should be given up as a gift.
If one is freed from these three knots,
one will always practice the conduct.
With great enthusiasm one recites the vidyā,
and likewise delights in speaking the truth.
One abides firmly in what one has vowed,
as one began it earlier with faith.
Desire, anger, and fear,
craving, delusion, and pride should be given up.
Examining disciples, and likewise teaching,
and compiling texts, one should always give up.
Pure and impure, purification, drinkable and undrinkable, one should not discriminate.
Anger at blame and praise
and manifest pride one should entirely give up.
Always without attachment and without elation,
one abides in equanimity toward all.
There is no fire offering and no worship,
no rosary and no mantra recitation;
the days of the week, the planets, the stars, and the dates of the month as well, one should not consider.
In a form whose nature is self and other,
one should abide without doubt.
One should not act without desire;
toward all, one acts with a little desire.

Making a tiger skin one's garment,
adorned with the five mudrās,
the yogin whose nature is wisdom and means should meditate on glorious Heruka.
Through the conduct of Samantabhadra
the mind should abide in bliss.
One should stay a single night in a village and stay five in a town.
Through practice that accords with the mind,
one should dwell upon the ground.
Or else one practices, with bliss and joy,
the conduct called "the wind."
One always roams without companions, alone, with one-pointed mind;
relying on the observance of a madman,
one wanders like a leaf blown by the wind.
In a charnel ground, at a lone liṅga,
at a solitary tree, or in a forest,
on a mountain peak, or on the bank of a river,
or on the shore of the great ocean,
in a pleasure garden or a mountain cave,
in a mansion or an empty house,
at a crossroads, before a gate,
and likewise at the gate of a king's palace,
in the dwelling of caṇḍālas, or a cattle shed,
or a workshop, one dwells in concealment.
Garlands of flowers discarded in the marketplace,
any old flowers whatsoever, garlands of flowers from charnel grounds and lone liṅgas:
with these one makes offering to the body.
A garland of flowers at one's own throat,
and in particular a sacred thread and a girdle are also to be tied on;
on the two feet one wears anklets.
Speech is known to be of the nature of mantra recitation;
the movement of the hands is mudrā.
Through the practice of nonconceptuality

the yogin abides as he pleases.
Giving up all apprehensions,
the practitioner should act like a lion.
Or else, relying on the unwavering observance,
one practices the conduct of yoga.
Dwelling in a pleasure garden or an empty house, in the house of a lowly or wicked person in a village,
for as long as it takes to gain power,
one should abide in the practice of silence.
However one sleeps, walks, or sits,
whether awake or again awakening, eating merely whatever is obtained,
without hunger, one abides well.
If one lives by begging alms,
one abides eating from the vessel of the hands.
Through the intrinsic nature of nonconceptuality
there is no doubt one will accomplish it here.
Among these three,
relying on whichever observance one wishes,
and having gained a little power,
one practices the conduct as one wishes.
Having given away one's body as a gift,
afterward one properly undertakes the conduct.
The yogin who roams by means of this conduct will certainly become stainless.
One should not be mistaken about this:
the miraculous power of the buddhas is inconceivable.

This is the twenty-first chapter, the section on the stages of the definitive teaching on conduct.

Next, I shall explain something further:
the definitive account of the yoga tantras and the extent of the yoginī tantras.
I shall explain it: listen, Lord of Secrets.
The extent of the yoga tantras is definitely six koṭis;
likewise the yoginī tantras are renowned to number sixteen koṭis.

The sūtra collections other than the Great Vehicle are taught to be eight hundred million.
Likewise, the way of the perfection of wisdom is a million and five hundred million.
All of these were spoken by the Lord of Sages, whose nature is the three bodies;
they were taught by the Sugata.
All the topics of the Vinaya and the rest were taught for the śrāvakas themselves.
The great explanations of the various sūtra collections are the teaching for bodhisattvas.
The tantras of yoga and of yoginīs are the secret, the domain of the buddhas.
So that, through the yoga whose nature is wisdom and means,
by meditating on great bliss,
one may swiftly attain buddhahood
in the Dharma, enjoyment, and emanation bodies, they were spoken, for sentient beings of meager merit,
by the one whose nature is the deity.

Next, I shall explain something further:
the rite of consecration that reaches the far shore.
One should carefully examine as master
one who possesses the characteristics explained before.
For images and the like,
whether cast or fashioned,
one purifies the ground for the sake of the consecration, adorns it with canopies, victory banners, and flags,
and takes full possession of the site.
Images, or volumes,
or complete painted images
should be placed in front.
The maṇḍala wheel abides in the sky;
one worships it properly with the five offerings.
samaya stvaṃ samaya ho:
this should be recited three times.

"Just as all the perfect buddhas, having properly dwelt in Tuṣita, entered the womb of the goddess Māyā,
so likewise please dwell here.
For the sake of the one named so-and-so,
in order that the mind of awakening may fully increase,
accept these flowers and the rest,
and, O Protector, please dwell here always."
Having, with these words, caused the tathāgatas to abide in it especially,
and the wise one having offered praise,
having encircled it with white mustard seed,
one should purify it three times.
One anoints it with fragrant butter and also bathes it with a cleansing paste.
Then again, with the individual vases,
one bathes the images.
Afterward, the Blessed One, the maṇḍala wheel abiding in the sky,
should be made to enter the cast image and the rest.
In accordance with local custom and so forth,
one performs the activities of the ten rites.
Having performed the opening of the eyes,
one blesses them as vajra eyes.
Likewise, flowers, incense, lamps,
unguents, and food are offered.
Having thus performed all the rites, one completes it with the rite of the fire offering.
Since fire is the mouth of all the gods,
the wise one should perform the consecration.
At the time the consecration is properly complete,
one should recite praises and verses of auspiciousness,
and make offering, with whatever can be obtained,
with the sounds of mṛdaṅga drums, cymbals, and the like.
With a feast and with the offering of gifts
one should satisfy the people and make them prosper.
Through this prosperity the people become fortunate,

and come to have auspiciousness and peace.
Whoever reviles the practice of peace will be harmed by various sufferings.
How could a deity that does not abide be made to abide through consecration?
It is done for the sake of merit,
at the request of disciples with faith;
through the intrinsic nature of nonconceptuality
the consecrated deity is present.
When the world protector gods and the rest
come to abide permanently, with worship and the object of worship joined as one,
then the deity too is truly present.

This is the twenty-second chapter, the section on the stages of consecrating the deities.

Next, the characteristics of the fire rites and the like
I shall properly explain.
After the ground has been purified,
the hearths should be made,
starting from eight finger-widths up to as much as a thousand cubits.
With one of eight finger-widths one kills enemies;
with ten, likewise, increase;
with twelve finger-widths, power and summoning;
with fourteen, likewise, pacification.
A hearth pit of sixteen finger-widths makes one's lineage flourish.
By one of eighteen finger-widths land, cattle, and lineage increase.
A hearth pit of twenty finger-widths pacifies epidemic disease.
This is the definitive account of the hearths.
The measures of the substances to be burned
the wise one should know to be made in conformity with the rite.
Two parts of the three parts of the width measure should be dug out as its depth:

this is the common characteristic of the digging of all the hearths.
By an eighth part of the hearth pit
the rim itself should be raised.
Half the measure of the rim's height is to be made the ledge right there.
Just as is the measure of the outer ledge,
so too is the inside of the rim.
At its outer edge, also,
the height should be made according to the measure.
In particular, the inside of the hearth pit should be marked with a vajra.
White, yellow, and red,
and likewise black and green:
following the respective rites,
these are the characteristics of the hearths' colors.
However, the hearth for performing all the rites is the same in its features as the hearth of pacification:
the rim is in the shape of a lotus,
and the ledge is encircled by a garland of vajras;
the rim outside it
is square, with the height of the rim.
For pacification it is round in shape, facing east, and its color is white.
For increase it is square, facing north, and made yellow.
For expulsion and for fierce rites, it is a half-moon, made facing west.
For the rites of division and killing,
it is a triangle, made facing south.
For the three, power, summoning, and division,
its color is red and it is triangular.
For the rites of suppression and stupefaction
it is made facing Nairṛti.
For expulsion it is the color of smoke,
and likewise made facing the direction of Vāyu.

The rite of suppressing those tormented by fever and the like is always done facing the direction of Agni.
The deity, the seat, and the colors change according to the form of the rite.
By the application of the syllable hūṃ
one meditates on the deity in two-armed form.
In an instant one recites the secret mantra;
in an instant one has the nature of the deity.
For increase one acts with a joyful mind;
for pacification one acts with a peaceful mind;
for power, with a mind of passion.

With a wrathful mind, the secret;
and with a mind of fierce transformation
there come expulsion and the fierce rites.
One sets out the guest water, the water for the feet, and the rest;
then the fire should be invited.
At one's own heart, from a lotus and the syllable hūṃ, one meditates on Vajrasattva.
From three syllables arises a form shaped like a bow;
in its center, from the seed syllable raṃ,
is one red in color, with a beautiful face, holding a staff and a water pitcher in the left hands, and with the right a rosary and the gesture granting fearlessness, with pendulous belly and a crown of matted locks, adorned with all the ornaments:
so the learned mantra practitioner should visualize him.
With the syllables oṃ jaḥ hūṃ
one should look toward the sides of the hearth pit.
Having given purifying sprinkling, scattered offerings and drink, guest water, and the rest, one places him in the center of the hearth.
Having visualized the pledge being,
one should cause the wisdom being to enter.
One makes offering with flowers, incense, and lamps,
and likewise perfume and food.
Placing the two hands inside the knees,

one holds the filling ladle and the pouring ladle.
With agnaye svāhā,
if one offers seven or three ladlefuls,
then the fire, being satisfied,
shows great fearlessness.
With flowers, tooth sticks, garments, and the like,
and also with praises, one should please him;
then, having given scattered offerings and drink,
one visualizes the fire as properly abiding.
oṃ bodhibrīkṣāya svāhā: this is for the aśvattha.
oṃ vajralatāya svāhā: for the plakṣa.
oṃ vajrayajñāya svāhā: for the udumbara.
oṃ vajrakuberāya svāhā: for the trees with milky sap.
oṃ sarvapāpaṃ dahanavajrāya svāhā: for sesame seeds.
oṃ vajrapuṣṭaye svāhā: for unbroken rice.
oṃ sarvasampade svāhā: for curd and food.
oṃ vajraāyuṣe svāhā: for dūrvā grass.
oṃ apratihatavajrāya svāhā: for kuśa grass.

Then, on the lotus seat at the heart, one should meditate on the wheel of the complete maṇḍala, arising from the complete transformation of the seed syllable and emblem of one's own deity. Then one should cause the wisdom wheel to enter the pledge wheel.

In the center of the heart of the fire one visualizes it in an instant.
One worships with purifying sprinkling, scattered offerings, drink, and the rest, and worships with guest water, water for the feet, and praises.
By reciting the seed syllable of one's own deity one performs the fire offering without doubt.
Having offered to the deities individually, afterward one performs the fire offering as one wishes:
three times and seven times, and more,
up to as many as a hundred thousand, likewise.
In conformity with the rite,
the wise one performs the fire offering.
Likewise all the substances of the request are offered thus into the mouth of the fire.

Firewood, kuśa grass, and the like go to the maṇḍala of light; food, scattered offerings and drink, and the like, to the hands; flowers to the head; incense to the light; unguent to the heart; purifying sprinkling to the body; water for the feet to the feet.

Lamps, guest water, and food are offered in front in their proper order.
By the rite as explained before one requests the supreme maṇḍala to depart.
The worldly fire offering is then properly complete.
If it is the transcendent fire offering:
by day is the worldly fire offering,
and likewise by night the transcendent.
The yogins and yoginīs gather,
with special foods and drinks,
with great exuberance of tumultuous sound,
and the joy and bliss of song and dance;
through the yoga of one's own deity
one performs there the fire offering of caru.
If one requests the deed one desires,
it will be accomplished here; there is no doubt.
"oṃ You accomplish every aim of sentient beings;
grant the corresponding accomplishments.
Having gone to the realm of the buddhas, please abide there as you please."
To whichever god or bhūta, Brahmā or any other,
one should first give the fire offering:
oṃ namaḥ smantabuddhānāṃ amukasya śāntiṃ kuru svāhā.
If one requests the deed one desires,
it will be accomplished; there is no doubt of this.
Then the mantra practitioner, in equipoise,
the learned one, examines the color, the sound,
the smell, and the shape of the blaze,
and in this way should discern the omens of the fire, good and bad.
If the fire blazes in a single point,
it brings about every excellence.

If two points blaze evenly, perfectly unmoving, know that it is middling.
If four points blaze together,
it brings increase, and accomplishment remains firm.
A color like the kunda jasmine or the moon,
glossy, with the luster of beryl,
a stainless fire without smoke,
brings health and makes the family line flourish.
The light of the moon-crystal gem,
like the color of snow,
the color of the puṣparāga gem:
this destroys all misdeeds.
Like the bandhūka flower,
the color of the japā flower,
like the color of refined gold:
this bestows mastery and kingship.
A scent of campaka, lotus, and utpala,
of uśīra and mālatī,
like the scent of śītagandha,
with the scent of camphor and aloeswood,
is auspicious, and makes one supreme lord of the place.
Sweet-sounding like the lute, the zither, and the clay drum,
like the conch and the copper horn:
seeing a fire with a sweet and very deep sound brings about happiness.
Like the śrīvatsa, the parasol, and the conch, whatever has the shape of a trident or a vase,
a victory banner, a yak-tail whisk, a fine vajra,
a svastika, a horse, or an elephant, silent and coiling to the right,
blazing with a single tongue of flame, grants great benefit.
These are virtuous and excellent,
bestowing long life and health.
Wavering and blazing toward the front,
three-pointed, with masses of smoke,
swirling and full of sparks,
scattering about: this increases illness.
A fire that trembles again and again,

again and again rages harshly,
again and again turns to the left,
again and again touches the ground with its flames,
with black spots, the color of charcoal:
the family line will swiftly be exhausted,
and for whoever stays at the side of a king,
it foretells the destruction of his troops and his master.
Colorless, black like the color of smoke,
green, of various colors, harsh in color,
the color of palāśa or of sesame oil:
this ruins all aims.
Foul like the smell of a corpse or the smell of fish,
having the smell of water-born creatures:
if the fire is seen like this,
it foretells that the chief will fall.
Making crackling sounds,
whatever has a roaring sound,
whatever is of the nature of a hissing sound,
or the sound of the vajra-thunderbolt, ruins one's aims.
Whatever resembles a spear, a sword, an arrow, a snake,
a camel, or the head of a cow:
if such frightening forms are seen,
say three times before it,
"Please forbear!"
and then, in the patron's house, perform the ritual sequence for peace, happiness, and well-being.
Then, further, the excellent fruits arising from all the components of the fire offering are explained.
The hearth component, made of earth on prepared ground,
makes the patron prosper.
Butter brings about all wealth.
The kindling sticks increase splendor.
Firewood makes one exceedingly heroic.
Kuśa grass protects everything.
White mustard seed brings pacification.
Rice is said to bring increase.
Know that sesame destroys misdeeds.

Millet draws in wealth and grain.
Māṣa beans bring great strength.
Barley grants the swiftness of the wind.
Dūrvā grass increases life.
Wheat destroys illness.
Milk and honey increase wisdom.
The lakpen bestows every happiness.
The fire is the accomplishment of desired aims,
and the deity one deeply longs for grants liberation.
For the rest, one should know to perform the pacifying and other rites in accordance with the action.
The filling ladle is wisdom, the pouring ladle is method;
joining the two, meditate on nonduality.
The stream of butter that issues from that is held to be the nectar of great primordial wisdom.
With it one truly worships the fire,
whose nature is all that moves and does not move.
To whoever performs the fire offering in this way good fortune and accomplishment are fully granted.

This is the twenty-third chapter, the section on the sequence of the definitive teaching of the fire offering.

Next, the vast array of rites:
the mantras for the state of various accomplishments,
from which the fruits of various rites arise,
are thoroughly and correctly explained.

oṃ namaḥ śmaśānapāsine mahākāla anucārya tadyathā oṃ cala pracala lāla lālaya deva liṅga svāhā

Having done the approach recitation ten thousand times, at midnight one should take hold of the effigy and recite for as long as it takes until the person comes. This is the summoning of the person in the flesh.

oṃ camuṇḍe dhumakeśi dhūmabiṅyujjihve hana hana paca paca devadattaṃ ānaya svāhā

With the tip of a fingernail, draw Mount Meru on the sole of the left foot. In its inner corners write four letters hrīḥ, and in the center write the words of the mantra. If one presses down on it while reciting, this is the supreme means of bringing under control.

oṃ vajrakrodha mahābala hana daha paca vidhvaṃsaya yo saumāraya hūṃ phaṭ

From anthill soil mixed with five kinds of earth, make a Vāsuki one span high. Sprinkle it with water using a sprig of karavīra, fumigate it with guggulu without interruption, and give a torma of the three white substances; then within seven days it will bring down a stream of water. If it does not, on the seventh day cut it into pieces, put them into a vase, and send it off into a river; then rain will fall. This is the armor for bringing down rain.

oṃ gaga ari gaga svāhā

Wash one's face with this mantra and recite it seven times over a stone. If the stone is put into the doorway opening of anyone at all, it will bind that person's mouth.

oṃ mūkā stiṣṭhanti mūkā gacchanti mukāḥ kādhyanti lāṃgabaṃ mūkānāṃ mūtrapurīṣeṇa devadattasya mukhaṃ bandhāmi svāhā

Take bull dung that has not fallen to the ground and put it into the opening of anyone at all; then the mouth with which he speaks will be bound. It is accomplished by reciting.

oṃ namo nikhā bhairavāya ciri ciri kirātarūpeṇa muṣikātuṇḍaṃ bandhāmi markkaṭo śriṃgāla sarppau ṛkṣo vārāhādīnāṃ siri siri khili khili svāhā

Recite this mantra fully twenty-one times over one hand or over stones, and put the stones at the four corners of a house, a field, or a garden; then there will be no harm.

Alternatively, mix these substances, poison, salt, mustard seed, white mustard seed, radish seed, datura seed, and mahākāla seed, with the blood of a buffalo, a pig, and a jackal. Having combined them properly, on the fourteenth day make offerings of flowers and incense and a torma. After that, hold it properly in the right hand, make the threatening gesture with the left, recite with a wrathful voice, and bury it in the four directions; then a boundary will have been sealed and a fence made.

oṃ hrīṃ prīṃ hūṃ phaṭ biṭṭa biṭṭa svāhā

Consecrate cow dung with this mantra and put it in a place of water; then the curds will be spoiled. By sprinkling milk, they will be released.

oṃ revantasvāmine trailokyādhipataye kuru kuru gaccha gaccha bhakṣaya bhakṣaya netrarogā siri siri nāśaya nāśaya hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ hrīṃ hrīṃ svāhā

This is the mantra for treating eye disease.

oṃ aruṇe hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

Recite this fully over water; if one washes the eyes with it, eye disease will be destroyed.

Cut the root of the medicinal plant balā into seven pieces; if they are tied onto the arm, fever will be destroyed. If the root of apāmārga is tied on, quartan fever will be destroyed. Take saptaparṇa wood and hide it at the doorpost or on the road; then beer will spoil. If it is taken out, it will be released.

oṃ nam ścaṇḍāṃ kuśa kulu kulu svāhā

Pigeon droppings, a wet shoe, tongzil, guggulu, cinnamon, nakha shell, costus, and the fruit of the golden tree: likewise mix these with molasses and make them into incense. If all the vessels of merchandise are fumigated with it, the merchants will make good profit.

oṃ namo bhagavati suṣkamukhi cāmuṇḍe ciri miri pātāke amukaṃ baśamānaya svāhā

Costus, sweet flag, Indra's barley, white mustard seed, tagara flowers, cardamom, and likewise nāga flowers,
and sarja resin, made in equal parts:
fumigate the goods with these,
and trade will come swiftly.
Make two letters ya facing each other,
and place the name in the middle.
Take a tree leaf carried by the wind,
and write on that leaf.
With a pen of crow's feather,
and ink, poison, mustard seed,
and charnel-ground charcoal in equal measure,
prepare it well, write, and make offerings.
On a day of an inauspicious conjunction and of Mars,
if one tosses it into a whirlwind or sends it off on the current of a river, the enemy will surely be driven out.

Going at night to a place marked by a single sign, the great-souled one should recite the mantra hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ. This is the application of expulsion.

From cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, make an image sixteen finger-widths tall. Write the name clearly on cloth from a charnel ground and put it inside. With wrath, block its mouth with dough, and wind it about with thread made of a corpse's hair. Then, if one strikes its mouth with a pestle over which one has recited wrathfully seven times, the person will be suppressed.

Draw an image on the left hand with realgar and heat it over the tip of a butter lamp: this is the rite for bringing under control.

In the direction of Vāyu, the northwest, smear a maṇḍala. On a leaf of birch bark write the name of Devadatta interspersed with the mantra, put it in the middle of a ball of dough, and give it to a crow; then he will be driven out.

Make a vessel from the clay that a potter has wiped from his hands, and recite one thousand and eight times over it. If one places it in water without breathing out, the town will become stable.

Then, if one wishes to kill an enemy, make an image out of wax or dough. Wrap that image with cloth from a monk's robe, beginning from the top and going down to the feet, and hide it well. Place a hand upon it and recite the mantra interspersed with the name a thousand times less one. Place it in a corner of a temple and drive a peg of khadira wood into its heart. If, three times a day, one pours hot water onto the peg and recites fully with wrath, he will be destroyed.

Mix the five kinds of white mustard seed with blood, mix sesame oil, pepper, and bhallātaka, and mix in iron filings. Having combined them, call out the enemy's name and perform a thousand fire offerings; then he will be killed in an instant.

Mix tawny mustard seed with blood, and mix sesame oil, salt, and bhallātaka. Calling out the enemy's name, perform the fire offering eight thousand times in the fire of a charnel ground; then the target will be killed by obstructing spirits. He will vomit blood and will die of fever or of colic.

Make an image of the enemy from charnel-ground ash and press it down with the left foot. With hair unbound and in wrath, face the south. If, calling out the name of whoever it is, one performs the fire offering eight thousand times, the enemy will swiftly die.

If red sesame and priyaṅgu flowers are mixed with butter and one performs the fire offering eight thousand times, one will become supremely fortunate. If white sesame and white rice are mixed with butter and one performs the fire offering eight thousand times, wealth and grain will increase. In every case, this is not for one who lacks a guru.

Two kinds of karavīra flower, and likewise two kinds of sandalwood, costus, cinnamon, yellow turmeric,
flower-tree, and black turmeric,
and likewise three kinds of utpala,
and likewise lotus filaments, priyaṅgu and hundred-flower,
and likewise white mustard seed,
nirguṇḍī and bhūta's voice,
bezoar, nāgakeśara, the three pungents,
and likewise water-seed,
realgar and the three fruits,
neem leaves, uśīra,
the fruit and seed of karañja,
asafoetida and bhallātaka:
taking these twenty-five
in equal portions,
at a conjunction of Puṣya with a Sunday,
grind them with the five products of the cow,
make pills of whatever size one wishes,
and dry them in the sun.
On the eighth day of the waning fortnight in particular,
keeping a supreme fast,
before one's own chosen deity
one should recite eight thousand times.
Having first performed the rite in this way,
complete it with consecration and the fire offering.
If one carries it, uses it as eye ointment and as unguent,
and first applies it to the head,
at that very moment one is freed from all faults; of this there is no doubt.

If it is smeared on the heads of children, they will be completely freed from the grahas that seize children. If one who is seized by a vicious graha is fumigated with it, he will be completely freed. For all fevers, if it is applied as an ointment to the head, the fever will be gone. When disputing in the midst of many people, or when going to the king's gate, if one smears it on the forehead, one will be victorious. If it is smeared on the tips of the hair, women come under one's control, so one captivates young women and becomes fortunate. If it is smeared on the navel and the womb of women who bear no children, a child will swiftly come. For all forms of leprosy, if it is drunk together with cow's urine, one will become well. For women who do not conceive, if it is drunk in springtime together with the five products of the cow, they will conceive and have a son. For stabbing pain caused by the blood, if it is drunk together with rice water, the piercing pain will be fully pacified. For aching eyes, if it is smeared on the head, eye disease will be destroyed.

For one seized by the poison of fangs, if it is smeared on with saliva, the poison will be gone. If one always carries it, one will be completely freed from lions, tigers, bears, and the other lords of the forest, from scorpions, centipedes, and the like, and from all grahas. It is the supreme protection in every situation, and one will become dear to all people and fortunate.

This is the twenty-fourth chapter, the section on the sequence of the definitive teaching of the application of medicines for the vast array of rites.

Then, further, the supreme rite
of elixir extraction is correctly explained,
by merely knowing which
the body takes on the marks of flourishing.
Camphor, sihlaka, musk,
the medicine, and yellow sandalwood:
singly or together,
they ransom one from old age and death.
That which arises from a vidyā consort is supreme;
that from one of one's own caste is held to be middling;
that from an ordinary woman is inferior.
Avoid the old and the childlike.
Take one whose body is dark in color,
young, with glossy hair,
with black irises, and fragrant.
Her flower is highly praised.

Seek the time of the waning fortnight,
and it grants all the accomplishments one desires.
What flows in the waxing fortnight is not praised,
for it brings on old age and the like.
Avoiding the first and the last,
it is clear, like pure crystal.
The navel of the musk deer is highly praised:
take fine musk.
That from one which has been killed is foremost;
the supreme medicine should be taken.
Take the yellow sandalwood grown at the milk feast and so forth.
Butter is of three kinds: born of the head,
born of the sheath, and born of the flesh.
Head-born butter is supreme,
that from the sheath is middling,
and that from the flesh is the lowest.
This is the supreme rite of elixir extraction.
Camphor makes the body flourish;
turuṣka protects everything;
the musk deer's navel destroys disease;
and the medicine brings pacification.
Always, with the four in equal measure,
take them regularly in the morning.
When the wind of the moon is flowing,
drink what flows from the moon;
when the wind of the sun is flowing,
drink the sun with the sun.
Combine these substances equally,
and always pour them into the nose.
If this is applied for six months, one's lasting life will increase.
If it is poured into the left nostril, karma becomes completely purified,
and, like the moon in the waxing fortnight,
one lives free of all disease.
That which is free of black and yellow,

rid of stain and odor,
which has become like clear water,
is free of the four faults.
Very beautiful, stainless, and wholesome,
its light a little like crystal,
having become like pure crystal itself,
it is supreme for binding the body.
Fish, meat, and likewise liquor,
women and lovers, should be avoided.
Steady, disciplined, and concealed,
one should fully guard one's own body.
With a faithful disciple and a companion,
enter a solitary cave,
and there, with liquor and torma together,
make offerings to the deities.
Uniting oneself with one's special deity, recite the mantra without interruption.
Perform deeds of giving and merit,
and satisfy the disciples.
Having found an irreproachable place,
make it free of obstructors and dwell there.
Having obtained a comfortable seat,
the intelligent one should not speak.
For as long as seven days purify one's own body thoroughly.
After that, for ten years or so,
one should practice the rite.
At the time of accomplishment, for two years as well,
the wise one should always guard it well.
When twelve years are fully complete, wrinkles and white hair are eliminated,
one is freed from all kinds of disease,
and lives as long as the moon and stars remain.
To gods, asuras, and humans,
and to women, one becomes attractive.
These five substances
should be eaten and drunk constantly and continually.

When these rites are fully complete,
the desired accomplishments set in.
With a body like the wish-fulfilling cow,
one will attain the accomplishment of a sky-goer.
Brick, dye-changer, dakgu, nirguṇḍa and balgulja,
datura leaves and resin,
with musk and sandalwood,
with vālikā and cora:
if one massages one's body with these,
one will be completely freed from all diseases,
free of poison, and radiant.
The three fruits and sandalwood
in powder, with musk,
drunk together with cool water for a year:
one will be free of disease and of old age.
The three fruits and sandalwood powder together with musk, taken and eaten for about six months, bring long life and beauty.
Musk together with the three fruits should be placed in a stone vessel.
Whoever measures it out and always drinks it will truly be free of old age and disease.
Whatever person eats for six months
the three medicines, sandalwood, ka, and sa, for him the accomplishment he desires will arise; of this there is no doubt.

This is the twenty-fifth chapter, the section on the sequence of the rite of elixir extraction.

Then, further, I shall correctly explain intoxicants and brewing.
The secret rite in all the tantras should not be told to others as it is.
For the sake of producing nectar
I shall explain it: listen, Lord of Yakṣas!

The vajra of primordial wisdom, known as Mandara, the expanse of space the ocean of milk:
merely by churning the nectar
of the beautiful ocean of milk,
there arose from it the goddess of liquor,
the maiden Rūpiṇī of desire,
like the color of the rising sun,
with a radiance like lac juice,
her body adorned with every jewel, her light like the color of a lotus,
her body arisen from the letter maṃ,
with eighteen beautiful arms,
the goddess holding various essences,
who brings the three worlds under her power.
With her right hands she holds a sword, an arrow, a hook,
a skull cup, a vajra, a victory banner,
and likewise a pearl garland and a bell,
and with the ninth she grants the supreme gift.

With her left hands she holds a shield and a bow,
a noose and a khaṭvāṅga staff,
a water pot, a ewer, and a spear,
a mallet, a lute, and a rosary.
Young and perfect in the bloom of youth,
the beautiful goddess has three eyes.
Drawn out from the middle by Mandara, having become all the rivers,
into what is called the ocean of milk
she flows down like butter and honey.
That goddess, the drink of peace,
abides in the form of Vajravairocanī.
In the middle of the body of Vairocanī, Heruka melts.
United with all the heroes,
she is the supreme bliss of the net of ḍākinīs,
in which everything becomes of one taste:
Rūpiṇī, embodiment of fierce nectar.

For seizing, for action, and for enjoyment, therefore it is the essential nectar.
Likewise the hearth is known as the source of phenomena, and the ferment is proclaimed to be nectar.
Whatever is the liquor is Vajrayoginī;
whatever is its potency is Heruka;
its color is the Lord Padmeśvara;
whatever is its fragrance is Ratnasambhava;
whatever is its taste is Amoghasiddhi;
and whatever has the nature of the force of wind.
Without liquor, what wisdom is there?
And what would consciousness become?
Consciousness and wisdom being perfected,
by liquor all beings become befuddled.
In the sacred sites, the fields, the chandohas,
the gatherings, and the charnel grounds,
it is the link between the worshipped and the worshipper.
Nectar is the supreme offering;
as taught in this tantra and in other tantras,
it is the joy of auspiciousness and bliss.
For the ancestral gods and for humans,
at the taking of a bride and in sacrifices,
the wise use it in sacrifices too;
for kṣatriyas, when entering battle;
for vaiśyas, for the sake of auspiciousness;
and śūdras accomplish their siddhis with it.
At the times of the self-arisen offering,
in the sphere of conduct long explained,
at the times of consecration and fire offering,
or in the sphere of wandering through the sacred sites,
when the yoginīs have been invited and the secret mantra is accomplished at the place of worship:
having understood it thus in its variety,
one should not examine its faults.
I shall explain how it is brought under control:
listen, Lord of Secrets!
The guru, the heroes, and the yoginīs should be worshipped, and then one should partake.

With the mantra called oṃ aḥ hūṃ
one should always bless it.
With the mantra called ha hoḥ hrīḥ
one should purify it and understand it:
the letter ha takes away its color,
hoḥ destroys its smell,
and the letter hrīḥ destroys its potency.
Then one should partake of the nectar.
If one bound by samaya drinks it without the three deities and the rest, it turns into poison, without a doubt,
and the accomplishment of mantra will not arise.
Whoever becomes drunk on liquor,
many obstructors arise for him.
The mantra practitioner, transformed by liquor, grows greedy for pleasure and lusts for sex,
laughs and likewise sings songs,
delights in fighting, and is deluded.
Because he reviles and degrades, as well,
he will be boiled in the Raurava hell.
The yoginīs become angry,
and illness, grief, and fear come upon him.
Tormented by the terrifiers,
the sinner will be led to hell.
To one who bears a grudge against the guru, who reviles the guru, or who bears a grudge against beings, it should not be given.
That very nectar is that very poison,
and the practice for accomplishment is fruitless.
That the mantra practitioner should avoid these things was taught by the buddhas of the past.
Having the caru food,
and fully possessing the rite, one should partake.
The gathering of yogins and yoginīs, held as the rite teaches, does not deceive.
Since all things are equal,
one should not examine who is fortunate and who is not.

Therefore it is called the gathering;
one obtains accomplishment and authorization.
Wisdom, intelligence, and strength,
bliss and good fortune: it grants excellent fruits.
All the qualities of the eight masteries and the unsurpassed fruit will be attained.
Born of substances, likewise born of roots,
gauḍī and paiṣṭī are kinds of liquor;
born of trees, likewise born of sugarcane,
are all those that grow upon the earth.
Mādhvī is said to be of five kinds, paiṣṭī is said to be of eight kinds,
and gauḍī is of seven kinds;
these divisions should be known.
Arising as sharp, bitter, and hot,
sweet and smooth,
produced in various lands,
they are well known by the names of liquors.
Varuṇa, Nanda, and Vāsuki should be visualized there as the seat.
With flowers and saffron incense,
and having given torma, one should begin.
If it is done with the complete rite,
the supreme intoxicant will be produced.
When one is intent on the accomplished liquor,
it should be made day after day.
This preparation is supremely fine:
the accomplished intoxicant gladdens the mind.
Two zho of the śrīgo medicine,
ten parts of emblic myrobalan, likewise one bre of water,
sixty-three phobari,
and one srang of molasses:
when these are combined into one,
this is called the accomplished liquor.
It should be brewed in the sunlight.
This is the emblic intoxicant.

Take dhātakī flowers,
mango flowers, millet,
malaya and sārivā,
rock lichen, śrīku, and bark:
these should be measured out in equal parts or in quarter parts, with thirty-two srang of water, and the molasses comes to eight srang.
In three days this liquor should be known to be produced.
This is the liquor of dhātakī flowers.
Take patraka and phobari, madder and nāgakeśara,
pomegranate fruit and likewise pepper,
with pippali and with milk,
and one srang of molasses,
and add water seven times as much.
The intoxicant becomes fragrant and cooling in nature.
This is the patraka liquor.
Cinnamon, cardamom, nelada, lekthong, tamāla, rupati,
combined with sugar:
the wise one mixes them together and brews them seven times in the sunlight.
The accomplished liquor is unsurpassed.
This is the sugar liquor.
Water drawn from the roots of śrīgu,
together with honey:
the wise one, in order to purify the substances,
should add it in eight parts.
Add extra honey and brew it.
To that, too, the three fruits, saffron, musk and camphor,
gandhapatra, and aloeswood should be added in their proportions:
dividing everything into eighths,

add them for the sake of the proportions.
For four days and nights in particular it should be placed in the midst of grain.
When the liquor has matured,
if one tastes it, it will smell of musk.

With the bark of śobhāñjana and four times as much honey, it will be accomplished.
In the second division, with camphor,
musk, and nutmeg,
and with the deer's potency,
the liquor becomes free of impurity.
With dhātakī flowers,
half a measure of bāli, and honey,
and again, by this same characteristic,
with a quarter part extra, it will be accomplished.
Half a srang of gandhapatra should be combined in a hundredth part.
Preparing it in just this way,
one should combine it month by month.
The divisions of the various liquors are said to accord with the lands.
Thus the divisions of liquor should be known from this tantra and from other tantras.
There is no offering other than the intoxicant;
butter lamps and fire offerings are not offerings.
Without a guru there is no Dharma, and without the Dharma there is no liberation.
Samaya other than the intoxicant will not arise anywhere at all.
It is found through the power of one's own merit,
or in some cases through pleasing the guru.

This is the twenty-sixth chapter, the section on the sequence of the definitive teaching of intoxicants.

Then, further, the supreme rite
of extracting mantras is fully explained.
On a pleasing piece of ground smear scented water.

In a solitary place, well concealed,
make it delightful with flowers and incense.
The mantra practitioner partakes of the caru food,
and likewise partakes of nectar as drink.
Uniting himself with his own special deity,
he should first give torma.
United with all the ḍākinīs,
the master, in perfect equipoise, draws an even, pure, triangular maṇḍala surrounded on the outside by three lines:
the great pleasure grove of the source of phenomena, beautified with various flowers.
There divide the vowels and consonants and write the eight groups in order.
Desire, Fierce, and likewise Suchness, the Sage, the Arrow, Fire, and Form:
in forty-nine squares
they should be set out according to the instructions.
Beginning from the letter ā up to the letter ha, the mantra is arranged going clockwise:
Lord of Secrets, understand this!
Take the fifth of the first square.
There the tenth square
should be properly placed above it.
With the third of the ninth square
adorn it above as a bindu.
Take the first of the seventh square,
and adorn it below with the seed of fire.
Adorned with the fourth of the first,
it is the supreme one of the goddesses of desire.
Take the letter that is the second of the seventh.
Take the eleventh of the first square.
Take the fifth of the ninth square,
and adorn it below with the letter u.
Take the fourth of the seventh square.

The eleventh of the first square should adorn its head.
Take the fifth of the ninth square,
and adorn it below with the fifth of the first.
Take the fifth of the fifth square.
Take the fourth of the seventh square,
adorn it with the eleventh square,
and adorn it below with the fifth.
With the third of the ninth square
adorn it above as a bindu.
It should be recited twice.
Take the second of the fifth square, properly joined with the fourth
of the eleventh square.
If this heart mantra is always recited,
it is the source of all accomplishments and qualities.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
adorn it below with the fifth
of the ninth square,
and adorn it with the fourth of the first.
With the seventh of the seventh,
place two bindus at its side.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
and it should be recited twice.
Again take that same letter, adorn it below with the fifth of the vowels,
and with the third of the ninth square adorn it as a bindu.
It should be recited twice.
Take the second letter
of the fifth square.
Take the fourth
of the eleventh square.
First place the homage.
If it is always recited continually,

it brings good fortune and accomplishment.
Properly take the second letter
of the seventh square.
The letter that is the first of the eleventh is adorned below with the son of fire.
Take the letter that is the second of the seventh,
adorned with the eleventh vowel.
Properly take the fifth letter
of the ninth square,
adorned with the twelfth vowel.
The letter that is the first of the seventh truly takes the supreme state.
Properly take the fourth letter
of the fifth square,
adorned with the fourth vowel.
Take the fourth letter
of the ninth square,
adorned with the eleventh vowel.
Take the letter that is the fourth of the seventh,
and beautify it with the fifth vowel.
With the third of the ninth, likewise beautify its head.
That should be said twice.
The supreme letter is liberation:
take the second letter of the fifth,
and join to it the fourth
of the eleventh square.
Take the third letter
of the seventh square,
adorn it below with the seventh letter
of the ninth square,
and adorn it with the second vowel.
Gather the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
adorned with the second vowel.
At the beginning, too, place the consonant.
It delights the hearts of the ḍākinīs;

if one always meditates on it and recites it,
it grants the supreme of all accomplishments.
At the beginning place the letter oṃ.
Properly take the third of the seventh,
properly adorned with the fifth vowel.
Take the second letter
of the ninth square,
and on it the third
is made an ornament on its head.
Properly take the fourth letter
of the fifth square,
adorned with the third vowel.

Take the third letter
of the seventh square,
properly adorned with the fifth vowel.
Take the second letter
of the ninth square,
and adorn it with the third.
Take the third letter
of the seventh square,
and join the fifth vowel beneath it.
With the third letter of the ninth
it is adorned as a bindu.
Recite it twice in succession.
Properly take the second letter
of the fifth square;
joined with the fourth letter of the eleventh square,
it is the supreme lord.
Take the letter of the first square,
and give the seventh vowel beneath it.
Properly take the same letter
of the seventh square;
it is made beautiful by joining the fourth letter of the fifth square.
Recite the mantra twice.
Take the fourth letter

of the seventh square,
and join the fifth vowel beneath it,
adorned with the half moon and the bindu.
Recite its word twice.
Take the second letter
of the fifth square;
joined with the fourth of the eleventh square,
it bestows Saṃvara, the supreme bliss.
Properly place the consonant at the beginning.
Take the letter of the first square,
and join it with the seventh vowel.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
and join it with the fourth
of the fifth square,
fully adorned with the second vowel.
Take the first of the fifth square;
take the first of the sixth square.
Recite the word twice.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
and join the fifth vowel beneath it,
adorned with the half moon and the bindu.
Recite it all twice.
Take the second letter
of the fifth square;
joined with the fourth of the eleventh square,
it is the supreme lord.
First properly join the consonant;
it accomplishes the supreme syllable.
Take the first vowel
of the thirteenth square;
it is joined to the second vowel.
Having taken the fourth letter
of the fifth square,
by placing it, it becomes the supreme state.
Take the fourth letter of the ninth square:

the supreme lord.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square;
with the thirteenth vowel
its head is adorned.
The wise one places the seventh of the seventh beside it as two dots.
Take the second letter
of the seventh square,
and adorn its crown with the third vowel.
Take the eighth letter
of the ninth square;
beneath it give the fourth,
and join the second vowel.
This is declared the supreme syllable.
Take the fifth letter
of the ninth square,
and beautify it with the second vowel.
By placing the first of the seventh square, it grants all accomplishments.
Take the fourth letter
of the seventh square,
and join the fifth vowel,
adorned with the half moon and the bindu.
Recited twice, it is the supreme lord.
Take the second letter of the fifth,
and join it with the fourth
of the eleventh square:
this is truly the supreme state.
By way of the guru's oral instruction
one should come to know the extraction of mantras.
For a mantra merely read from a book, devoid of proper teaching,
even in a hundred koṭis of eons
the state of accomplishment will not arise.
At the times of the tenth day,
with various flowers and the like,

together with food and drink,
one should worship Vajrayoginī.
The mantra itself is the form of the yoginī;
the yoginī herself is the form of the mantra.
If one would attain the supreme state,
one should not separate them.
If one desires the supreme accomplishment, better to give up one's life entirely,
better even to go to one's death,
but always guard the commitments.
Since all beings of the three worlds, moving and unmoving, arise from the left,
the yoginī always practices the left.
She steps out first with the left foot, makes offerings with the left hand,
and with the left she is satisfied and eats.
One who practices all in the five families should regard them as a single family, completely freed from all conceptual thought and having abandoned all duality.
The guru is the Buddha, the guru is the Dharma, and likewise the guru is the Saṅgha;
he is the equal union with all buddhas,
the binding of the net of ḍākinīs.
Therefore one who desires
the state of a buddha should please the guru.

This is the twenty-seventh chapter, the stage-by-stage classification of the rite of extracting mantras.

Then, after that, I shall fully explain the particular rites of the fire offering.
For the sake of kingship, the practitioner should recite the mantra ten thousand times.
By the rite explained before,
one should undertake the rite of fire offering, interspersing the mantra with the name of the one to be subdued.
Performing the fire offering free of conceptual thought with the great flesh mixed into milk, one becomes a king in every respect.

With the flesh of cattle, humans and jackals mixed together with liquor and milk, offering supreme burnt oblations,
always performing a hundred thousand fire offerings,
one will obtain the supreme city and become a glorious great king.
Kindle a fire of thorns,
and with poison, blood, sesame oil and pungent spices, likewise with hair and chaff,
and with human bones, perform the fire offering.
With hair unbound, overcome by wrath,
facing the south, naked,
or else the mantrin wears black clothes.
For a fierce rite, at midday or at midnight, in a caṇḍāla's fire, recite with a fierce roar
the mantra joined with the name of the one to be subdued, and perform the fire offering with one-pointed mind:
even the mighty together with their army will be destroyed,
so what need is there to speak of others?
Next one should know the expulsion of an enemy who is arrogant with power.
Facing the direction of Vāyu (the northwest), kindle a fire of flesh-eaters,
and with crow's wings, fat and nimba mixed with resin and sesame oil,
if one applies the rite for seven nights,
without doubt the enemy will be expelled.
As for the rite known as dividing:
kindle a fire with maddening wood,
and the knower of secret mantra mixes nimba leaves together with snake skin and the nests of crows and owls, and performs the fire offering one hundred and eight times.
The whole world will then be divided,

and even dear ones are abandoned by their kin.
Next I shall explain summoning.
Meditating on light like vermilion, one visualizes the one to be summoned naked, in the direction of Vāyu, facing upward and trembling,
while one sits on the seat in the posture of play.
Reciting the secret mantra syllable jaḥ,
by applying the noose and the hook, pierce the lotus of the heart of the one to be summoned.
If one pierces the lotus of the place of birth,
the three realms will surely come under one's control.
On a single piece of skull,
or on an unbroken one, lovely and beautiful,
draw the image of the one to be summoned.
Then, uttering the name of the one to be summoned, with the wood of the datura and with oleander (karavīra), properly mixed in blood, perform the fire offering.
On birch bark draw the image of the one to be summoned with one's own blood mixed with bezoar.
Covering the image of the one to be summoned with cloth, recite the secret mantra and perform the fire offering.
With one's body joined to the roar of the mantra,
taking up the flowers one by one,
perform the fire offering for seven days:
whoever one desires in one's mind is summoned.
Next I shall explain yet another.
Making an effigy
from the wood of red sandalwood, write the name with one's own blood and bezoar, and likewise insert it into the heart of the one to be summoned.
Smear the body with the three pungents,
and pierce it with a copper needle,
at the heart, the navel and the secret place:
pierce the three places of the one to be summoned.
Whoever one desires in one's mind will be summoned by midnight.

With golden-colored ochre, draw clearly the sign of the place of birth; cover it with the left hand and recite the mantra one hundred and eight times. If one recites the mantra uttering someone's name, that person will come in that very instant.

Take a leaf carried off by a whirlwind, and with a crow's quill and tears write on it the name of the one to be expelled. If one gives it over to a whirlwind rising upward, that person will be expelled at once.

Make a ritual dagger six fingers long from a monkey's bone and recite the mantra over it seven times. At whosever door it is hidden, that person's family line will be cut off. If it is hidden in the stalls of cattle, elephants, horses, donkeys, camels or buffaloes, they will be destroyed.

Take the garment of a preta that has not fallen to the ground, and put it together with the great oil in a lead vessel. On the special day, the fourteenth of the waning fortnight, recite the heart mantra and prepare an eye ointment. By smearing it on the eyes, one will see all the ḍākinīs.

oṃ bhūta liṅge svāhā. This is the mantra for applying to the flame.

Take elephant dung, place it inside a tortoise shell, and burn it as incense in the house. This will surely pacify even demons, lice and the like.

oṃ udakimaśaṃkājātā udakasaṃbhavāḥ teṣāṃ tutaṃśca pakṣaṃśca indro bandhati mahābalaḥ maśakā indrapāśabaddhā indrabaśagtā gacchante sūyyodaya svāhā

Take pieces of stone from a crossroads, recite this twenty times over them,
and place them in the four directions.
When the mosquitoes are driven back,
those who have minds become happy.
Through happiness they attain the Dharma, and through the Dharma they become unsurpassed.

This is the twenty-eighth chapter, the stage-by-stage classification of the rite of fire offering.

Then I shall properly and fully explain meditation on the meaning of reality as it is.
Meditation has the nature of non-entity;
non-entity is free of elaboration.

It is the activity whose nature is self-awareness;
meditation, too, has nothing to be meditated upon.
This, which is free of one and many,
arises in that very instant.
This wisdom is self-aware,
beyond the domain of speech;
it is the very substance of omniscient wisdom, arisen in a marvelous form.
All existence is equal in being without entity, vast, and of depth hard to fathom.
That which is free from causes is a mere reflection of the coemergent.
By its nature it is luminous, beyond the domain of deliberation,
blameless and at peace,
and certainly it cannot be urged on.
It is inexpressible and cannot be counted.
The aspect of emptiness abides as the nature of all things, free of all qualities such as sound.
This is the source of the bliss of the buddhas.
The abode of awakening is beyond compare;
that which abides in beings
I have not taught to some.

The reality of equality in each and every thing has been taught by the Victor.
Beyond the aspect of duality, clearly aware and of good fortune, pervading the center of the manifold sky, the power of the taste perfectly complete, all things have entered within the mind, forms of manifold aspect radiating, and the three worlds appear to the mind as though dissolving into space.
By Saṃvara, the supreme bliss, one in every aspect,
the nature is said to be coemergent.
By the characteristic of possessing the supreme of all aspects, know the maṇḍala of reality.
All the channels are the ḍākinīs;

the sense sources and the limbs are the maṇḍala.
By attaining the single taste of all,
the nature of glorious Heruka expands.
It has no appearance and no obstruction,
no location and no remainder;
because it is the nature of all things,
it always abides in all things.
It should be known as the natural state itself,
and meditation on it, too, is the natural state itself.
Because joy is brought about by its essential nature,
this is the self-arisen dawning.
Therefore, by contemplating the inconceivable,
one should know the manifold as one.
The self in which the distinctions of entity and non-entity are abandoned, through the steady clarity of the nature of joy,
pervading to the boundless limits of space:
one should realize this great self.
Stainless maṇḍalas of manifold aspect appear, radiating outward.
Coemergent joy is the name of the fourth;
it is the abode of all bliss.
For one who knows true reality,
here there is no method and no wisdom.
Practitioner, know the maṇḍala of the three levels to be conceptual thought itself.
The Dharma body, the enjoyment body, the emanation body,
and the one called great bliss: this is the sequence.
Through the nature of great bliss,
the four cakras are equal.
The practitioner should always engage with all things without attachment.
In the midst of the mire of saṃsāra, unsullied, is nirvāṇa.
One who has well attained beautiful qualities,
who has wisdom and has diligence, who then is devoted to the person of the guru, regarding him as equal to the Buddha,

who has thoroughly understood the Victor's Dharma, is steady and has excellent faith:
because such a one has become a vessel here, one should bestow one's grace upon him.
Then, since form and the rest are indivisible and he knows the three realms as one,
that practitioner, without interruption,
should joyfully make great offerings.
As long as he possesses the accumulations for awakening,
so long will he become stainless.
The practitioner, through method and wisdom,
will attain the unsurpassed result.

This is the twenty-ninth chapter, the stage-by-stage classification of the teaching on reality.

Next, what is to be properly explained is the defining character of the bodily proportions of the painted images of the deities.
Lord of Secrets, listen!
Of the images with the Brahmā line and the rest,
five parts are the seat.
For the body, which has three sections,
the face is made of an equal portion;
the face is twelve parts.
The neck is four fingers.
The wise one applies that same measure to the middle of the hairline and to the two ears.
The forehead, the mouth and the nose in measure are three parts: the circle of the face.
The middle of the eyebrows and the top of the mouth,
and the width of the eyes, too, are two fingers.
Their length should be known to be a measure of four fingers.
The measure of the middle of the base of the neck is also the part for the two shoulders.
In every case, the heart and the place of the navel are one measure apart.

By the measure between the breasts is the measure between breast and shoulder.
By the measure of the two forearms is the same measure for the two upper arms.
At the junction of thigh and shank
it is properly four fingers.
The kneecap measures four fingers,
and the instep of the foot is the same.
By the measure of twelve parts one should draw the bodily form of the deity.
The remainder is four fingers;
the seat is an eighth of the principal figure.
By a ninth part of the seat
two fingers each are made.
At the heart of the moon disc make the hand emblems, the garments and the rest.
The deity of the profound vajra holder has the characteristic of twelve parts.

The lesser parts and the other parts should be drawn well, so that they are lovely.
There, too, the two arms, equal to the measure of the face, should be drawn a little smaller.
Having taken away two fingers,
one should draw the peaceful deities.
There, too, make the face
a span in measure, and draw the hands always beautiful.
In all the limbs and lesser limbs
two fingers each should be taken away.
The wrathful males, the sovereign wrathful females,
the male and female servants, the attendant women,
and all the fierce and frightening forms should be drawn at ten parts.
One's own form, which delights the mind,
should be drawn at nine parts.
The deities of the maṇḍala wheel should be arranged one after another in proper order.

The vajra king in the center should be drawn with a single set of characteristics.
If the three, the elbows, the neck and the shanks,
are too long, it is a great fault:
the mantrin himself will surely
fall from his position and be driven out.
If the three, the nose, the ears and the fingers,
are too short, it is a great fault:
accomplishments will surely be destroyed,
and likewise fortune will decline.
If the three, the shanks, the face and the cheeks,
are too thick, it is a great fault:
the practitioner himself will surely be far from glory, and māras and obstructors will arise.
If the three, the jaw, the chest and the flanks,
are sunken, it is a great fault:
one's aims will decline,
and obstructors will arise here without doubt.
If the three, the breasts, the ears and the forehead,
are crooked, it is a great fault:
the practitioner himself will quickly be tormented by the quarrels of enemies.
If the three, the thighs, the waist and the two armpits, are deficient, it is a great fault:
there will be danger from bandits and thieves,
and death, without doubt.
If the ears, the lips, the forehead and the nose are deficient and the eyes are crooked,
the mantrin himself will surely meet with various obstructors and die.
If the figure gazes upward, as if with agitated breath,
or leans from its seat as though it were moving,
one will always be shifted from one's own place,
and one's aims will be destroyed.
The faults of the body, in the neck, the armpits and so on,
are known to be countless.
If here the eyes are crooked,

or the mudrās and hand emblems are mistaken,
one will be sorely tormented by grief and suffering.
Various faults like these should be examined.
If the three, the backrest, the parasol and the seat,
have the fault of being small and cramped,
friends will speak unpleasant words, fortune will decline, and death will follow.
These faults are great faults;
the wise should examine them well.
One who is disciplined, who knows all the crafts,
who has seen the rite and rests in meditative equipoise, should draw with all the characteristics complete and with beautiful forms.
For the peaceful, a body of peaceful manner;
for the fierce, fierce and terrifying;
for the heroic, heroic and with a proud body;
for the graceful, a smiling face.
Having marked out the characteristics in this way,
the mantrins should draw the painted images.
The mantrin who is a beginner should make images and the like;
if one practices with a painted image,
one will swiftly attain vast accomplishment.

This is the thirtieth chapter, the stage-by-stage classification of the definitive teaching on the characteristics of images such as paintings.

Next I shall properly and fully explain the auspicious characteristics of the yoginīs.
Ḍākinī is Padminī;
Lāmā is Hastinī;
Khaṇḍarohā is Śaṅkhinī;
Rūpiṇī is Citriṇī.
The wise should examine these four types in their own nature.
I shall explain the characteristics of Padminī.
Her face is round like a disc;
her nose is like a sesame flower;

her nails are like copper, her feet arched like a tortoise's back,
and the soles of her feet rest evenly.
Her breasts are like the fruit of the palmyra palm;
likewise her body hair is curled,
and her supreme place of birth has three folds.
Her chest, too, is very beautiful.
Her gait is like that of an elephant in rut;
she has the fragrance of the lotus and the voice of a goose,
and her touch is like a lotus.
One should enjoy her as one desires in the lotus posture.
Seizing her by the hair and the breasts,
one should press her lips with one's teeth, and insert a finger into the bhaga; in this way
one should make love to the lotus.
Next I shall likewise properly explain the characteristics of Hastinī.
She smells of liquor and has thick shanks,
a crooked nose and curled body hair;
she is intoxicated with desire and full of craving, stout of body and untamed.
One should sport with her in the uraṭa posture.
Hastinī is round in shape.
One should strike her head with one's fingers, embrace her fiercely and knead her breasts, touch her mouth and bite her,
and the skilled one should draw his nails across her.
Hastinī laughs with a roar and delights in song and music.
One who properly possesses these characteristics
should be known as Hastinī.
Śaṅkhinī, too, I shall explain.
Her hair is long and her nose is long;
she is neither too thin nor too stout;
her breasts are like orange fruits,
and she delights in feasts of curd and milk.
By seizing her hair with the left hand

one should give rise to joy, and press her lips with one's teeth.
With great joy, fiercely,
one should scratch her loins and her heart with the nails.
She has the smell of a donkey,
is rough like a cow's tongue,
and Śaṅkhinī has the voice of a crow.
One who properly possesses these characteristics
is always called Śaṅkhinī.
Next Citriṇī, too, I shall explain.
Her body is short and her chest beautiful;
her breasts are like bilva fruits; she is very wrathful and without shame,
always delighting in quarrels;
her shanks are slender, and she lies on her back;
her lips droop, and her voice is a dove's;
she has the smell of flesh,
and Citriṇī's shoulders are full.
I shall explain the play of joy with her.
First one presses the bhaga with the hand, kisses her and kneads her breasts, strikes her head with one's fingers, delights her by drawing the body together,
and embraces her fiercely.
One should let her suck one's lips.
One who properly possesses these characteristics,
explained in metrical verses,
is Citriṇī, who is Rūpiṇī.
Next I shall properly explain, further,
the characteristics of the divisions of the shifting.
The outer shifting is coarse;
the inner nature is said to be subtle.
At the crown is the cakra of great bliss,
a lotus with four petals,
the subtle seat of the awakening mind.
Since it is the form on which all things rest,
it is the very nature of the essence of awakening.

Outside what has become the seed is a lotus with thirty-two petals.
At its center the letter hā, facing downward, lets bliss trickle down.
The moon, whose nature is the awakening mind,
has the nature of fifteen digits;
it always flows down as great bliss.
The yoginī is of sixteen digits.
On its two sides
are lalanā and rasanā,
in their own nature the vowels and consonants;
by the nature of cause and result,

she who has the form of the four joys,
whose nature is coemergent joy,
the supreme sovereign lady of nonduality, conventionally like the kunda flower, ultimately has the form of bliss.
The support of the awakening mind of the buddhas is Vajradhara.
At the throat is the cakra of enjoyment,
red, with sixteen petals;
at its center is the letter oṃ.
Above it, by way of the opening of the uvula, nectar flows down without interruption.
At the heart is the cakra of Dharma,
a multicolored lotus with eight petals;
at its center is the letter hūṃ,
which abides facing downward.
Above it is a subtle lotus, resembling the abode of Brahmā.
The consciousness at its center always dawns, pervading all;
it is the support of self-arisen wisdom,
the supreme lord of consciousness.
At the navel is a lotus, blue in color,

with sixty-four petals;
at its center is the letter oṃ,
blazing like a jewel.
Below it a subtle lotus should be placed at the site of the knot;
it is said to be the support and the root of the seventy-two thousand channels.
Lalanā has the nature of wisdom;
method abides as rasanā.
The goddess who has entered between them,
the letter oṃ, is she of manifold form,
the goddess whose nature is the four bodies, who bestows all accomplishments and bestows great bliss on all:
to her I always truly bow.
To whatever thing
people apply their minds,
by that the goddess becomes its very nature,
she of manifold form, like a wish-fulfilling jewel.
Stirred by the fire of wisdom, when the things that are objects are analyzed, they are free of any continuum.
As Caṇḍikā blazes and radiates, stainlessness itself is truly known and clear.
The conceptions of the aggregates are burned, and objectless self-awareness trickles down, and the nectar of the equality of all things pervades space and possesses the true state.
Next I shall properly explain further the shifting of the form of the bindu.
From the first day of the waxing fortnight
up to the full moon:
on the first day of the waxing fortnight,
in the toes, the letter ā;
on the second day, in the shanks, the letter ā;
on the third day, in the thighs, the letter i;
on the fourth, in the place of birth, the letter ī;
on the fifth, in the navel, the letter u;
on the sixth, in the heart, the letter ū;

on the seventh, in the breasts, the letter ṝ;
on the eighth, in the throat, the letter ṝ;
on the ninth, in the palms, the letter ḷ;
on the tenth, in the cheeks, the letter ḹ;
on the eleventh, in the eyes, the letter e;
on the twelfth, at the tip of the nose, the letter ai;
on the thirteenth, in the forehead, the letter o;
on the fourteenth, at the fontanelle, the letter au;
on the full moon, at the crown, right and left,
is the very nature of the letters aṃ and aḥ.
From the first day of the waning fortnight
up to the new moon,
it shifts in that same way.
On the left is āli, the moon,
whose nature is subtle;
on the right is kāli, the sun,
whose nature is coarse.
By the divisions of the awakening mind
there are likewise sixteen shiftings.
By the divisions of the half-watches of activity sixteen shiftings are taught.
The seizing of the moon and the seizing of the sun,
the cessation of the bindu and the cessation of space:
properly together with these,
the sixteen shiftings should be known.
Non-conceptual great bliss is the form of the wisdom one longs for.
This is like the threshold and the steps of the door to the house of joy and bliss.

This is the thirty-first chapter, the stage-by-stage classification of the teaching on the four yoginīs, the sequence of the four cakras, and the shifting of the awakening mind.

Next I shall fully and clearly explain,
just as it is, the reality of the torma.
For the maṇḍala, the fire offering, mantra recitation, consecration, pacifying and enriching,

subjugating, expelling and killing,
the accomplishment of bhūtas and yakṣiṇīs,
and the times of practice at the sacred sites,
it is supreme in all rites.
Without liquor and torma
the rites will not be swiftly accomplished.
Therefore the torma is highly praised;
the buddhas of the past have taught it.
First, endowed with the yoga
of the form of the deity, two-armed Saṃvara, one should properly protect with the two protections and proclaim the sound of hūṃ.
With the twenty-four sacred sites
one should adorn the limbs of the body.
Through the yoga of the instantaneous form,
in an instant one recites the secret mantra.

First, set out the food, the drink, the feast and so on properly in front of oneself, and purify them. In front, from the letter yaṃ, there is a wind maṇḍala; above it, a fire maṇḍala arisen from the letter raṃ; on that, a lotus vessel, a skull cup arisen from a white letter a, resting on a hearth of three skulls. Upon the food and so on in its center, bless as complete the forms of the five nectars and the five lamps, arisen from the syllables oṃ aṃ traṃ khaṃ hūṃ and lāṃ māṃ pāṃ tāṃ bāṃ. Stirred by the wind, the fire blazes up, and by its boiling the seed syllables and the rest melt; view them as an essence like the rising sun. Above it, imagine a white khaṭvāṅga, the color of mercury, arisen from hūṃ, of the nature of nectar and pointing downward, melting completely; view it as having become of one taste with the essence. From the transformed vowels and consonants, the letters oṃ āḥ hūṃ come to abide stacked one upon another. From them the deities of the maṇḍala wheel are emanated and act for the benefit of beings; then, preceded by union, they melt and are absorbed into their respective seed syllables. By reciting the three syllables as many times as one wishes, one should bless the offering.

Knotting the index fingers, firmly join the middle fingers;
Join the thumbs together firmly as a vajra.
Placing that at the center of the forehead,
One should circle it, revolving it all around.

Pressing down with the feet and looking upward,
Proclaiming upward the sound pheṃ,
One summons the heroes and yoginīs
Who dwell in the world systems of the ten directions.

Then again one should circle the right and left hands, reciting three times samaya stvaṃ, samaya ha, samaya hoḥ, and circling and circling to the right and to the left. Preceded by complete release, in which there is no distinction between what is offered to and the one who offers, one should make offering to the deities with the supreme bliss of the net of ḍākinīs. In the east: indra saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the south: yama saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the west: varuṇa saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the north: kubera saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the quarter of Īśāna: mahābhūta saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the quarter of Agni: agni saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the quarter of Nairṛti: rākṣasa saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. In the quarter of Vāyu: vāyu devatā saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. Above: candra sūrya brahmādyā devatā saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. Below the earth: vaimacitrī pṛthivā devatā saparivārānākarṣaya jaḥ. jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ santṛpta sarvva devatā sādhakasya śīntaṃ kuru puṣṭiṃ kuru sarva karṭhantu siddhirbhavatu yathā sukhaṃ sukhe oṃ kara kara kuru kuru bandha bandha trāsaya trāsaya kṣobhaya kṣobhaya hrauṃ hrauṃ hraḥ hraḥ pheṃ pheṃ phaṭ phaṭ daha daha paca paca bhakṣa bhakṣa vasa rudhirāntra mālā valaṃ vine grīhṇa grīhṇa sapta pātāla gata bhujaṃga sarvambā tarjaya tarjaya ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍhya hrīṃ hrīṃ jñau jñau kṣmāṃ kṣmāṃ hāṃ hāṃ hīṃ hīṃ hūṃ hūṃ kili kili sili sili hili hili dhili dhili hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ

Having recited this once, one circles in due order the Blessed One together with his Wisdom consort, and the Ḍākinī and the others, up to and including Yamamathanī. Then one should make the offering, reciting this once, twice, three, four or five times: oṃ ā ralli hoḥ jaḥ hūṃ vaṃ hoḥ vajra ḍākinī samaya stvaṃ drīśya hoḥ

Then, presenting water for rinsing, tooth cleaner and so forth into their hands, one worships them properly, preceded by the circling of the hands in the lotus gesture, and praises them:

Through the sameness of existence and peace you have destroyed attachment and vanquished the conception of things as real;
You possess the vision that sees all things as having a nature equal to space.

Protector, with the water of your heart, moistened by the weight of the waters of compassion, Act on my behalf; goddesses, I pray, be exceedingly loving toward me.

With this one should receive the accomplishments.

Then, circling as before for the guardians of the directions of the eight charnel grounds and the others: oṃ kha kha khāhi khāhi sarva yakṣa rakṣasa bhūta preta piśāconmādāpasmāra ḍāka ḍākinyādaya imaṃ baliṃ gṛhṇaṃtu samaya rakṣantu mama sarvva siddhimme prayacchantu yathaivaṃ yatheṣṭaṃ bhuñjatha pibatha jighratha mātikramatha mama sarvva kāryāṃ satsukhaṃ viśuddhaye sahāyikā bhavantu hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

Having praised them properly with the mantra of eight lines, one should receive the accomplishment one desires, and one should display the signs with the sign gestures of the hands. Reciting oṃ yoga śuddhāḥ sarvva dharmmā yoga śuddho'haṃ, one should please them with the mudrā of the circling lotus.

Preceded by an embrace that does not break apart the mudrā of withdrawal, one should snap the fingers with the thumb and ring finger:

oṃ You have accomplished all the aims of beings
And granted accomplishments in accord with them.
Though you now depart to the buddha realm,
Please abide in bliss, just as you please.

Reciting oṃ vajra muḥ, one should request them to depart. All the deities of the maṇḍala should be absorbed into oneself.

After that, by gathering up the leftover torma, one should show the accomplishing of the sacred commitment:

Filling the mouth with intoxicating liquor,
One should bind the blazing mudrā.
With the fierce sound of hūṃ,
One should give it into the vessel for the leftovers.
Having pleased them by giving flowers, incense and so forth,
One should recite the mantra:
oṃ sarvva kha kha khāhi khāhi ucchiṣṭa baliṃ ucchiṣṭa bhakṣakebhyaḥ svāhā Endowed with the moods of compassion and the rest,
One should likewise sing the auspicious song.
The aim in every aspect is completely pure,

The great bliss that is without aspects;
The practitioner, whose nature is wisdom and skillful means,
Will accomplish every one of the rites.
If one has the means, each single day,
Or likewise each month or each year,
The form of the mind of perfect awakening
Should be fully dedicated into suchness.

Through generosity and all the rest, he completely fulfills the supreme wishes of beings' minds;
Glorious Heruka, the Ḍākinī and the rest have crushed to dust all the cities of conceptual delusion;
The guru who has fully turned the wheel, the source of the wisdom of the Victors, bestows the ultimate:
That is the ever swift auspiciousness of the noble ones, who are ruled by great compassion.

This is the thirty-second chapter, setting forth the torma offering.

Now I shall explain the vow of accomplishments Arising from primordial wisdom.
The methods in their various modes
Are the supreme cause of accomplishments.
The body, together with its outer and inner,
Is stainless like the sky.
Thus, oneself being equal to space,
One sees oneself as ever liberated.
Bodiless, with neither beginning nor end,
Free of qualities such as sound,
Completely liberated from duality,
In every way it abides as anything at all.
Relying on things that are no things,
One should make them things without support.
Having made the mind into no mind,
One should not think of anything at all.

Abiding on one's seat, and having made firm
The lineage of the gurus,
One should then meditate on the mind

Of one taste, equal to space.
Liberated from the forms of meditative concentration,
Having fully abandoned the workings of speculation,
The mental factors become stable as mind;
Beings too are likewise in their intrinsic nature.
Equal to space, it abides truly as space,
Like a pure crystal jewel,
A form with neither beginning nor end,
Free of elaboration, not the domain of the senses,
Changeless and without appearance,
Empty of all, without afflictions,
The lamp of beings, destroying the bonds
Of existence, free of verbal expression,
Not even the domain of the mind,
Liberated from duality, without afflictions:
To that very reality, unmoving,
Which bestows ultimate liberation, I bow.
When one touches that reality just as it is,
It cannot be conceived by any thought.
When one thinks of what cannot be conceived,
Then it becomes inconceivable.
Just as sentient beings are without thought,
So, just as without thought, are the Victors too.
Because the buddhas, free of thought,
Have fully taught this thought,
In that inconceivable mind
It passes beyond the reckoning of all thoughts.
Without the concepts of manifold conceptualization,
It is great bliss without attachment,
The supreme of all aspects,
Beyond all the senses, without aspects.
Its nature is thing and non-thing,
Yet it fully abandons thing and non-thing.
Because it is not inert, it is self-aware;
Unknowing, it does not see at all.
Formless, it abides nowhere at all;
It is changeless and stable.

Among phenomena that have no entity,
What is there to take up or reject?
All phenomena to be taken up or rejected
Are just like a dream.
Through fully knowing joy,
The supreme perfection of wisdom,
Abiding in the fruit of joy:
This is awakening without entity.
The two, of one taste and indivisible,
Are the very great bliss of joy.
The distinction of wisdom and compassion
Is like that of a lamp and its rays.
The indivisible nature of these two
Is the mind of a thing of one taste.
Through the union of wisdom and skillful means,
One accomplishes perfect awakening;
In that very thing all the unsurpassed Buddhas fully abide.
Whoever abides in the correct awareness of indivisibility Is Vajrasattva.
As long as, for the cause of perfect awakening,
One restrains it through bliss,
For so long will the practitioner experience it, Until Saṃvara is perfected.

Toward beautiful illusions and magical displays, that knowing is just as it is;
One should thoroughly train in the sameness of all delight and weariness.
There is nothing that frightens, nor is there any arising of bliss;
Through that very reality the practitioner follows suchness as the self.

How wonderful! Through the desire of great bliss
The three worlds are filled.
How wonderful! The bliss of peace descends;
Manifold full awakening expands.
How wonderful! The great bliss of bliss!
How wonderful! However it may be, so let it be enjoyed!
How wonderful! The great self of the coemergent,
The essential nature of all phenomena!

Seeing beings as like the moon in water,
One rightly engages what is heard as like an echo;
The mind too should be viewed as like a mirage in the desert.
Thus food and drink are like space;
Scents should be smelled as like a flower in the sky;
The mind should pervade like the sun and moon.
That true abiding too is like Mount Meru;
It should be regarded just like a maiden's dream.
Conventions should be traversed as like illusions and magic shows.
Just as these are, so is the arising of coemergent bliss:
Existence devoid of intrinsic nature, a form beyond conception,
Ever dawning. I bow to and praise the supreme path of the Sugatas.

Abandoning all other offerings entirely,
One should properly undertake offering to the guru.
By pleasing him, one will attain
The supreme primordial wisdom of omniscience.
If one fully worships the master,
Unsurpassed in his deeds, as Vajrasattva,
What merit has one not made?
What austerity is there that one has not displayed?
To one who has abandoned fear and wrongdoing,
Who is endowed with bliss,
And who guards the conduct of the sacred commitments,
The stages should be fully taught.
By reading, keeping, or writing out
The Glorious Heruka Abhidhāna Tantra,
One will attain accomplishment, miraculous powers, good fortune,
And the state of a bodhisattva.
The Ḍākinījālasaṃvara, in union with all the heroes:
When one meditates and reflects
On the Glorious Saṃvarodaya Tantra,
One has great wealth and great bliss,
And the suffering of poverty is destroyed.
For sentient beings of many inclinations
He teaches manifold conduct,
And to train them in various ways
He has rightly taught the methods as well.

When the profound Dharma is taught,
Even if someone does not come to feel faith in it,
He should not disparage it;
For the nature of reality, indivisible emptiness and compassion,
Is wholly inconceivable;
The play of the buddhas is inconceivable.
Glorious Heruka, on whom the hosts of ḍākinīs rely,
Is in perfect union.
Those sentient beings who enter through faith Delight in all of these,
And abide in the state of glorious Heruka,
In union with all the ḍākinīs.

This is the thirty-third chapter.

Extracted from the Ritual Section on the Arising of the Coemergent, from the great Glorious Heruka Abhidhāna Tantra of three hundred thousand lines, and accomplished by reading the secret of all the yoginīs, the great king of tantras, the Glorious Saṃvarodaya, is complete.

Though my wisdom is meager and my training slight,
Through the firm faith born in me for the text of the tantra,
Whatever I have translated merely for my own aim,
May the noble and the learned be patient with it.

It was translated, edited and finalized by the Indian preceptor Parahitānanta and the Tibetan translator, the monk Gyü Mönlam Drak. Later the translator Zhönnu Pal also edited it, checking it against the Indian manuscript of the all-accomplished great paṇḍita Śrī Vanaratna.

Herein is volume Ga of the Collection of Tantras.

Translator's Notes

• Here □□□□□□ in the opening line of the request is the deity and tantra Saṃvara, not "vow," given the title of the work. The bhagas of the vajra consorts (rdo rje btsun mo, vajrayoṣit) is the standard tantric setting. □□□□□□□□□□ is the standard rendering for the northern continent Kuru (Uttarakuru).
• The five embryonic stages (Tibetan nur nur po, mer mer po, ltar ltar po, gor gor po, mkhrang gyur) are rendered descriptively; they correspond to the Sanskrit stages usually given as kalala, arbuda, peśī, ghana, and the hardened form, though the sequence of equivalents varies between sources. The "wisdom woman" (shes rab) whose belly the female embryo faces is the mother.

• Āli and kāli here are the lunar and solar currents associated with the vowels and consonants. The "measured maṇḍala" translates dkyil 'khor tshad can, a maṇḍala with fixed dimensions, contrasted with the countless emanated deities.
• The calculation of the time of death in this passage uses symbolic number words, rendered here as numerals: earth (fourteen, as the worlds), sun (twelve), directions (ten), auspicious signs (eight), the fierce one (eleven, the Rudras), eye or pair (two), moon (one), lunar day (fifteen), arrows (five), qualities (three). The value of yan lag ("limb") as thirteen is inferred from the sequence of days and is uncertain. The term rendered "the expansion" (rgyas pa) names the critical period around the birth day and month.
• The "lord" (mgon po) whose movement in āli or kāli is examined is the breath itself, identified with the deity. The "Lotus Lord," "Karma Lord," "Jewel Lord," and "Vajra Lord" are the heads of the corresponding buddha families (Amitābha, Amoghasiddhi, Ratnasambhava, and the Vajra family head).
• The twenty-four sites are given as the Tibetan spells them; □□□□□□□□□□□ is read as Pretapurī, the usual name of this site in the list, the initial □□□ being an evident slip for □□□. The substance assigned to Himālaya, □□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the juncture or boundary of the supreme lady"), is obscure and is translated literally. □□□□ at Suvarṇadvīpa is rendered rajas, which can mean the female generative fluid as well as dust. In the line □□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□ is unclear and is rendered loosely as "appropriate ornaments." □□□□□□ ("the left one") is taken as the female partner (Skt. vāmā) seated at the master's left. In the foot-washing, □□□□□□ is rendered "scented water" because it is the water for washing the guests' feet (pādya), not one of the nectars; it could also be read as "urine." □□□□□ ("cattle") renders paśu, a term for the uninitiated.
• The five classes of sacred places named in the homage verse, rendered "sites, secondary sites, fields, meeting places, and charnel grounds," correspond to the pīṭha, upapīṭha, kṣetra, melāpaka and śmaśāna of the Saṃvara literature. □□□□□□□□□□ is rendered "grain liquor"; □□□□□ is a kind of baked grain cake, so the term probably means liquor brewed from such cakes. In the prayer, □□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken in the sense of conceptual thought that the deity overcomes.
• □□□□□□□ and □□□□□□□ both ordinarily mean the ring finger; since the text treats them as different signs, □□□□□□□ is rendered "forefinger" here, which is uncertain. □□□□□□, the name of a gesture or bodily sign, is unidentified and is left as "batisa." The phrase □□ is obscure and is rendered tentatively as "the yoginī who goes about, truly arisen." In the list of the twenty-four places, the Tibetan here spells some names differently from the earlier list of channels: □□□□□□□□□□ (Pretavāsī) stands where the earlier list had Pretapurī, and □□□□□□□□□□□ (Pāṭaliputra) takes the charnel-ground slot that Nagara held in the earlier list. Both are given as this text spells them. The order of the fifth and sixth grounds (Manifest before Hard to Conquer) follows this text.
• □□□□□□□□ ("so-and-so") and □□□□□□□□ ("Devadatta") are placeholders for the name of the person who is the object of the rite, so they are translated rather than romanized. □□□□□□□ is taken as red lac. In □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "with its rim unchipped" is a tentative reading. "Summoning by the feet" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is translated literally.
• In the list of ingredients for the expulsion rite, □□□□□□□□□□ is read as "sesame oil" followed by □□, taken as short for □□□□□□ ("mustard"), which then appears again in the next line. The reading is tentative. □□□□□□ (śarabha) is a mythical lion-like beast, which the text calls a lion.
• "Samaya consort" renders dam tshig, which here, given the following instruction to examine her family, appears to refer to the female partner of the practice. The material lung tang (lungtang fruit or seed) used for rosary beads could not be identified with confidence and is left in phonetic form. "The beads are the arhats, and the head bead (mdo 'dzin) has the nature of the dharma realm" is a tentative reading of a terse line. In the directional mantras, byang bu'o is read as byang du'o, "in the north," the evident reading. The four ages are the Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali yugas.

• "Human heads, half of twenty" renders the Tibetan literally (ten heads). The names of the gate goddesses (Crow-Faced, Owl-Faced, Dog-Faced, Pig-Faced) and of the armor goddesses (rendered Yāminī, Mohinī, Saṃcālinī, Saṃtrāsinī, Caṇḍikā) are given in their standard Sanskrit forms from the Cakrasaṃvara system. The four wheels named near the end are the cakras of the body (navel, heart, throat and crown) in the completion of the deity yoga.

• "She weeps" reads ngu byed for du byed ("makes smoke"), which makes no sense here beside rubbing the eyes. "Vermilion" renders li khri, red lead. "Having consecrated them as mudrās" takes phyag rgya to refer to the women worshiped as consorts. In the second chapter the vessel is the skull bowl; the "pieces" are the number of plates of the skull, and "teeth" likely refers to the sutures. The line "if she falls down" (babs par gyur na) is somewhat uncertain and may refer to something else descending at the time of worship.

• The vessel discussed in the first chapter is the skull bowl; the "pieces" and "holes" refer to the skull's plates and foramina. In the second chapter the five nectars are referred, in veiled language, to women of different castes and families and to their bodily substances, and correlated with the buddha families; "the first flower" is first menstrual blood, and śukra is left untranslated as the technical term for the generative fluids. "The five hooks" and "the five lamps" are the tantric names for the five meats.

• "The Saṃvarodaya" renders sdom pa 'byung ba, read as the name of this tantra (elsewhere bde mchog 'byung ba). "Kaṭapūtanas" renders lus srul, taken as a class of foul-bodied spirits. The sequence of squares in the line laying is translated as it stands; its exact geometry depends on the commentarial tradition.

• The names of the seven cloud lords (Thundering, Great Thundering, Fierce, Moving, Steady, Filling, Pouring) are translated from their Tibetan meanings, as their Sanskrit forms could not be identified with confidence. The animal □□□□□ is uncertain and has been rendered "foxes." Of the tree names, □□□□□□□□ and □□□□□□□ are given as the Tibetan transcribes them; their exact identification is uncertain. The line "always and continually honor the guru" reads □□□□□□□□□□□, which has an extra syllable for the meter; the extra □ is taken as a copyist's slip rather than as a negation. The line about the master being "always and continually steadfast" (□□□□□□□□□□□) may alternatively mean "relying on a fixed abode" or echo "elder" (sthavira). Here □□□□□ in the list of empowerment articles is taken in its tantric sense of consort (vidyā).

• "The wisdom of insight" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□, the third empowerment (prajñājñāna). The instrumental □□□□□□□ in "shall be properly and beautifully explained" might instead name the speaker by an epithet ("the Beautiful One shall explain"); the referent is unclear. "Path of shadow" (□□□□□□□□□□□) is translated literally.

• "Lord of Secrets" is the epithet of Vajrapāṇi. The age totals given in the verses are 1,728,000 for the Perfect Age, 1,296,000 for the Tretā, 864,000 for the Dvāpara, and 432,000 for the Age of Strife. "Lone liṅga" renders □□□□□□□□ (Skt. ekaliṅga), a solitary shrine, a standard site for tantric practice.

• The number given for the perfection of wisdom texts (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is rendered literally as "a million and five hundred million"; it might also be read as five each of millions and hundreds of millions. □□□□□□□□ is taken as the Sanskrit mṛdaṅga, a drum, transcribed in Tibetan letters. The line listing division a second time among the red triangular rites follows the Tibetan as it stands. The hearth measurements (rim, ledge, height) are technical and are rendered as closely as the Tibetan allows.

• "A form shaped like a bow arising from three syllables" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is translated literally; the three syllables are not named in the passage. Caru is the boiled oblation of grain and milk.

• The line on the hearth reads □□□□□□□□□□, rendered "earth on prepared ground" taking □□□□□ as □□□□□ "ground"; the meaning of this line is uncertain. □□□□□, an item of the fire offering said to bestow happiness, could not be identified and is given in phonetics as "lakpen". The stray syllable in "□□□□□□□□□□□□□" is read as "□□□□□□□□□□□", "the excellent fruits are explained". "Mahākāla seed" is a plant substance named after the deity, not the deity himself.
• Several materia medica could not be identified with confidence and are rendered literally: □□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("a wet shoe"), □□□□□□□□ (given in phonetics as "tongzil"), □□□□□□□□ ("golden tree"), □□□□□□□□□□ ("flower-tree"), □□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("bhūta's voice"), and □□□□□□□□□□□ ("water-seed"). □□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "obstructing spirits". □□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken in its astrological sense: the lunar mansion Puṣya falling on a Sunday. □□□ and □□□□□□□ are taken as an inauspicious astrological conjunction and the day of Mars.
• "Camphor" renders □□□□ ("moon"), its usual name in such lists, and "the medicine" renders the bare □□□; the passage that follows describes a woman's flower, in the waning and waxing fortnights, and the substances here are probably coded names, which are rendered as written. The identity of □□□□□□□□ ("centipedes"), of the items in the massage-oil list (□□□□□ "brick", □□□□□□□□□ "dye-changer", □□□□□□, □□□□□□□□), of "the milk feast" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), and of "ka and sa" is uncertain. "Resin" reads □□□□□□□□ as niryāsa. In "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□", □□□ is read as □□□ "ocean".
• Many of the plants in the recipes (□□□□□□ / □□□□□□, □□□□□□□□ "phobari", □□□□□□, □□□□□□□ "nelada", □□□□□□□□□ "lekthong", □□□□□□□ "rupati") could not be identified with confidence and are given in phonetics or as written. □□□ in "the sugar liquor" is taken as Skt. khaṇḍa/sugar. In "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□", □□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□ "intoxicant". The line "and whatever has the nature of the force of wind" names no corresponding buddha in the Tibetan.
• "Desire, Fierce, Suchness, the Sage, the Arrow, Fire, and Form" appear to be numerical code words naming the sizes of the rows of the grid, which together make the forty-nine squares; they are translated as written. The identifications of □□□□□ ("bāli") and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the deer's potency") are uncertain. "The seed of fire" and "the son of fire" refer to a letter (presumably ra) and are rendered literally.
• The passage encodes mantra syllables by their positions in a grid of squares (the letter chart used for mantra extraction); the coded instructions are translated literally. "The same letter of the seventh square" renders an unusual phrase, literally "the equal letter," which may mean the letter at the corresponding position. "Bestows Saṃvara, the supreme bliss" plays on the name of the deity, which literally means "supreme bliss." The last lines of the guru verse allude to the title of the Sarvabuddhasamāyoga Ḍākinījālasaṃvara tantra ("union with all buddhas, the binding of the net of ḍākinīs").
• "The great flesh" is human flesh, and "the great oil" is likewise most likely human fat. "A fire of flesh-eaters" renders a phrase that may mean a fire built in the manner of piśācas or from their kind of fuel. "Demons, lice and the like" renders a compound whose second part means "louse"; the following mantra concerns mosquitoes, so small pests are probably meant. The "garment of a preta" is probably a corpse's shroud. The closing line, "I have not taught to some," may mean that this teaching is not given to just anyone.
• The iconometric verses are terse and several measures are hard to construe with certainty; they are translated literally. "The Brahmā line" is the central vertical guideline (brahmasūtra) used in laying out a figure. "The three levels" are the realms below, upon and above the earth.
• The Tibetan for "elbows" is an uncommon word and the identification is uncertain. In "far from glory" the Tibetan writes a word meaning "flame" or "point," evidently for the similar-sounding word for glory, which the context requires. "Loins" renders an obscure word for a part of the body. The four women's types (Padminī, Hastinī, Śaṅkhinī, Citriṇī) are the classes of the Indian erotic treatises, here identified with the four goddesses Ḍākinī, Lāmā, Khaṇḍarohā and Rūpiṇī; the uraṭa posture is left in its Sanskrit form.

• Caṇḍikā here is the inner fire (caṇḍālī) of completion-stage yoga. "The seizing of the moon and the seizing of the sun" are the lunar and solar eclipses, used as names of yogic moments. The seventh and eighth vowels are both spelled ḭ in the Tibetan and are given as written.
• "Water for rinsing" renders □□□□□□, taken as the ācamana water offered after the meal. "The mantra of eight lines" (□□□□□□□□□□□) most likely refers to the well-known eight-verse praise of Heruka recited at this point in Cakrasaṃvara torma rites; the text does not quote it here.
• "A mirage in the desert" reads □□□□□ (sorrow) as the evident copyist's slip for □□□□□ (desert), as in the stock phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□. The Indian preceptor's name □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is given as Parahitānanta, the most likely Sanskrit equivalent of the Tibetan; the identification is not wholly certain. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is terse; it is taken as an exhortation to enjoy whatever arises just as it is.

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead.
