The Ritual Manual of Noble Acala, King of the Wrathful Ones, Taught for the Taming of the Valiant through the Immeasurable Power of All the Tathāgatas, known in Sanskrit as the Āryācalamahākrodharājasya Sarvatathāgatasya Balāparimitavīravinayasvākhyāto Nāma Kalpa and in Tibetan as De bzhin gshegs pa thams cad kyi khro bo'i rgyal po 'phags pa mi g.yo ba de'i stobs dpag tu med pa rtul phod pa 'dul bar gsungs pa, is Toh 495 in the Kangyur, where it belongs to the Tantra section. It is a ritual manual (kalpa) devoted to Acala, the fierce, unmoving wrathful deity who protects practitioners and removes obstacles. Set as a discourse of the Blessed One in a jeweled celestial realm, it teaches Acala's mantras together with the rites built around them, including painted images, recitation, fire offerings, and practices for subjugation, protection, wealth, and the attainment of powers such as the state of a vidyādhara. Its colophons record a translation made under the patronage of the Tangut court and later revisions checked against Indian manuscripts.

In the language of India: ārya acala mahā krodha rājasya sarva tathāgata tasya bala aparimita bīra vinaya svābyāto nāma kalpa

In the language of Tibet: The Ritual Manual Called "The Teaching on the Taming of the Valiant, the Immeasurable Power of Noble Acala, King of the Wrathful Ones of All the Tathāgatas."

Homage to the venerable noble Avalokiteśvara.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One was dwelling upon the wind. The place was arrayed with various jewels and was arranged and encircled by many countless koṭis of jeweled celestial palaces. Bodhisattva lion thrones were set out there, born from the merit of inconceivable, countless tathāgatas and adorned with jewels. It was encircled by walls of various jewels that illuminated countless world systems, and it was utterly enchanting. Above it was a jeweled canopy adorned with various jewels, illuminating and opening up the realm of space. There was an inconceivable king of lotuses, arisen from the substance of the seven precious things, which brought delight to the various wishes of all sentient beings, made great and supreme light rays shine forth, and cleared away all darkness. It was encircled by many koṭis of inconceivable lion thrones born from the primordial wisdom of all the bodhisattvas, encircled by countless bodhisattvas, and encircled by many gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas and others. There the Blessed One dwelt and taught the Dharma.

He was encircled by great bodhisattvas, namely the noble Avalokiteśvara, Mañjuśrī, Samantabhadra, Maitreya, Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin, Śāntamati, Various Array, Bearer of Sky Flowers, Ākāśagarbha, Utterly Pure, Vajrapāṇi and others. He was encircled by many koṭis of śrāvakas, namely Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Aśvajit, Kāśyapa and others. He was encircled by Śakra, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Kubera and others, of great renown and great fame.

The Blessed One, with a mind endowed with great compassion, was teaching the Dharma. That is to say, for those bodhisattvas who were hearing the Dharma discourses on entering the way of secret mantra and so on, for those śrāvakas, for those assemblies complete in every respect, and for the various wishes of the inconceivable realm of sentient beings, he engaged in conduct suited to their various needs and performed miraculous displays of magical power. He honored and fully pleased inconceivable buddhas. He also beheld many miraculous displays of the buddhas' magical power. He also brought forth many emanations of the buddha. He also produced great arrays. In short, whatever he saw would serve the welfare of sentient beings, he did all of it.

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the Arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni, looking upon the great assemblies, addressed the bodhisattva mahāsattva Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, I have brought forth the maṇḍalas of the wheel of speech in its many varieties, arranging many words and letters, which delight various sentient beings, are distinguished by various mudrās and mantras, express the distinctions of the various classes of beings, fully pacify various sufferings, possess many powers and are enchanting. They are marked by the characteristics of single syllables, of eight thousand, of countless numbers and of three koṭis, of suffixes, of long and short, of vowels and of consonants. They are divided and determined as the examples of the bodhisattvas, such as the ten dharma realms of the tathāgatas, and as the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas, the five mundane superknowledges, the divisions such as the abodes of the gods, the human realm, the pretas, and down to the realm of animals. These I have taught with the superior intention of benefiting sentient beings, for the sake of the beings of seventy-seven countless koṭis. They will also spread in this world system, Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground.

"Lord of Secrets, among all those seventy-seven countless koṭis, I have taught the doors of the rites of various methods to the great bodhisattvas, the noble Avalokiteśvara, Vajrapāṇi, Mañjuśrī and the other bodhisattvas. And to those Lords of Secrets I have also taught extensively the mudrās, the mantras and the ritual procedures of the male servants, the female servants, the male messengers, the female messengers and the others.

"I have also taught the means of accomplishment that possess various activities:

Fully endowed with various sādhanas,
the rites of painted scrolls are explained;
or else the rites of the activities are distinguished,
where the secret activities of great power,
the fire offerings, I have taught;
likewise the rest, the other lands and places;
then all the hearths, and likewise pacifying, increasing, subjugating and the fierce rites;
then the particular times,
and the maṇḍalas likewise are taught.
The mudrās too, all of them,
the seed syllables and the emblems,
the secret mantras themselves,
the emblems of the families, and likewise the bodies,
and the shapes of all of them as well:
activities such as these,
all of them I have taught.

The ritual manual called Acala
I shall now explain once again.
Whatever the mantrin of pure being,
endowed with intelligence, is to accomplish,
from the inconceivable variety

a sādhana of secret mantra
I have condensed in this ritual manual, and I shall rightly explain its rite.
Serving the perfectly complete buddhas,
through accomplishment one attains that state;
as a supreme child of the tathāgatas
one will be born into what is called the Dharma.
All the buddha fields without exception will through it be completely purified.
Always, continuously, free of conceptual thought, abiding upon the path of the sky,
relying on a body that has form,
he comprehends the distinctions among beings.
For beings hard to pacify and tame,
for great obstructors and those who lead astray,
then, in order to tame them,
the perfect Buddha always emanates
the one proclaimed by the name Acala, the wrathful one, the noble, the mighty,
the glorious tamer of those hard to tame,
the child of the children of the buddhas.
Here the supreme victors and likewise the children of the victors always bow down to him; Brahmā and the others and all embodied beings worship him.
He repays the kindness of the buddhas,
and likewise of the children of the buddhas;
all of his aspirations are fulfilled,
his inconceivable primordial wisdom complete.
Because he has attained the ground called Unmoving, Acala, the Unmoving, is also his name;
because he is not moved by any of the māras,
his permanent primordial wisdom is stainless and excellent.
The king of ritual manuals, of great magical power,
I shall explain: child, listen here.
Blessed by all the buddhas,
wholly devoted to the dharma realm,

he always grants swiftly the accomplishments of long life and supreme freedom from illness;
he always dispels the obstructors and likewise utterly destroys the māras.
For the happiness of sentient beings
this ritual manual is fully explained."

Then those bodhisattva mahāsattvas and those assemblies complete in every respect made this request with a single voice: "For the sake of all sentient beings, and out of love for us, Blessed One, please explain it. Sugata, please explain it."

When this request was made, the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the Arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni, knowing the request that had been made, illuminated the world system Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground with great light rays. A light ray called Arisen from the Śrīvatsa emerged, surrounded by many countless hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of light rays. Beginning from this world system Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground, it pervaded the world systems as numerous as the atoms of inexpressible, utterly inexpressible buddha fields, as far as the very limit of the realm of space, and circled them, turning to the right. Likewise it covered the north, the west, the south, the east, and the world systems of the ten directions. All the bodhisattvas dwelling in those world systems spoke this verse:

Where the protector of the Śākyas, the perfect Buddha, dwells in great splendor, let all the children of the Victor born from the dharma realm go.
There, listen to the stainless true Dharma,
the virtuous way of the conduct of secret mantra,
by attaining which the protector of the world found unconditioned awakening.

Then that light ray, having heard this verse, turned back and entered into the śrīvatsa of the Blessed One himself. Then those great bodhisattvas, through the power of the wrathful one, came from their own world systems to where the Blessed One Śākyamuni was.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni, knowing that the minds of the assemblies complete in every respect were one-pointed, once again entered into equipoise in the samādhi called Universal Arising of Flames that Burn the Vajra-Arrogant. As soon as the Blessed One had entered into equipoise, this great trichiliocosm world system moved in six ways. It moved, it moved strongly, it moved strongly all around. It shook, it shook strongly, it shook strongly all around. It rocked, it rocked strongly, it rocked strongly all around. It quaked, it quaked strongly, it quaked strongly all around. It roared, it roared strongly, it roared strongly all around. It resounded, it resounded strongly, it resounded strongly all around. An immeasurable, brilliant light appeared in the world. Inconceivable miracles were also seen.

This entering into equipoise was for the benefit and happiness of all sentient beings, through this heart of the king of great wrathful ones, the king of secret mantra: it fulfills the intentions of all the tathāgatas; it utterly destroys all the māras; it fulfills the wishes of all sentient beings; it liberates the realms of sentient beings in countless dharma realms; from it has arisen the fire of the nonconceptual primordial wisdom of the samādhi whose nature is the emptiness of all the tathāgatas; it reveals the essence of awakening of all the bodhisattvas; it accomplishes the maṇḍala of the wheel through various speech; it is the father of the bodhisattvas; it is the light for all sentient beings fallen into the darkness of the afflictions; it is the guide for all who have fallen into the lower realms and the bad destinies; it is the happiness of those tormented by suffering; in short, whatever suffering sentient beings have, it brings that suffering to complete peace.

As soon as the Blessed One had spoken this heart of the wrathful one, it made all the abodes of the māras in this world system Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground, and those classes of māras, and all sentient beings dazed. It produced a light that brought every happiness to suffering sentient beings, and having fulfilled the wishes of all sentient beings, the ground of all the lords of existence without exception was shaken. Moreover, inconceivable wonders arose in the world.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni spoke thus to the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, this is the king of wrathful ones, the suchness of the supreme essence of the tathāgatas.

From this emptiness others have arisen;
it is the very nature of the dharma realm.
The victors are seen to arise from this;
here all the victors abide.
The realms of existence are emanated from this.
All the buddhas of the past,
and likewise the others who have not yet come,
all of them truly arose from this.
Stainless like the sky,
completely free of all elaboration, utterly beyond the domain of speech,
it is always free of elaboration, abiding like the sky.
Taking conventional expression first,
the secret mantras are then recited.
Conventional expression too is conceptual;
in reality there is nothing to express.
Relying on conventional expression,
the Protector taught reality itself.
Sentient beings do not exist; like an illusion
they are to be contemplated with the mind.
Just as an illusion is in some respect also without intrinsic nature, so conventional expressions are to be understood as having emptiness as their nature.
Thus this protector, the secret mantra,
is beautiful in equality, without intrinsic nature;
it bestows the things that are desired and brings them all to fulfillment."

Then all the assemblies, complete in every respect, of the bodhisattva mahāsattva Samantabhadra and the others, and Brahmā, Indra and the others, were utterly amazed and marveled, and gave up their pride. All of them looked toward the Blessed One Śākyamuni and spoke these words with a single voice: "Blessed One, you have turned this wheel of Dharma that we have never heard before. Blessed One, it is wonderful! Sugata, it is wonderful! Blessed One, we have come to possess supreme happiness. Blessed One, this is inconceivable. Blessed One, this is not the domain of any of the śrāvakas or the pratyekabuddhas. Blessed One, it cannot be overcome by the evil māras or by any who take the form of obstructors. Blessed One, this is the wish-fulfilling jewel of the ultimate for all sentient beings. Blessed One, this fulfills the aims one desires. Blessed One, this is the protector of the teaching of the tathāgatas and of sentient beings. Blessed One, this cannot be transgressed by any rākṣasas, kumbhāṇḍas and the like."

When they had made this request, the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the Arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni, gave his approval, saying "Excellent!" to those great bodhisattvas and to that assembly of gods and others: "The treatise is excellent, excellent! Again, the treatise is truly excellent! Just as the words of this treatise are spoken beautifully, so it is, exactly as it is. Yet I taught this text of the heart of the great king of wrathful ones, which protects the teaching of the treatise, looking upon suffering sentient beings veiled by the darkness of delusion.

This, which those who cannot hear it are unable to receive, was taught by the perfect Buddha who attained the state.
For the sake of their doubts I have truly lit the lamp of primordial wisdom.
Childish beings, wholly filled with suffering, dwell here upon the face of the earth;
because they do not know this way,
they are bound by the tight bonds of the household."

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, gazing at the Blessed One with unblinking eyes, said this: "Blessed One, it is wonderful! Sugata, it is wonderful! Blessed One, this has great power. Blessed One, I cannot bear the splendor and power of the heart of that king of wrathful ones. Blessed One, this heart of the king of wrathful ones tames those who are hard to tame."

The Blessed One Śākyamuni declared: "Lord of Secrets, it is just as you have said. Moreover, Lord of Secrets, through the power of this king of secret mantra I have conquered all the afflictions and all the māras there are. Lord of Secrets, the maṇḍalas of the wheel of speech by which I delight sentient beings in the world systems with their various distinct desires, which I have taught to the distinct wishes of the various world systems, I taught through the blessing of this. Lord of Secrets, that the great bodhisattvas, having gained all mastery, have found the valiant power of primordial wisdom, this too comes from the blessing of the heart.

Striving single-mindedly for the aims of beings,
they dwell upon the face of the earth;
wishing to benefit sentient beings,
they also send forth emanations.
Always making offerings and giving delight,
they truly dwell in the fields of the victors.
For as long as the directions endure,
all the buddhas, who are always and continuously worshipped, dwell equally in this
that is called awakening.
Phenomena that lack intrinsic nature
are what arise and cease.
Relying on conventional expression,
they are taught to be like an illusion.
Just as an illusion is emptiness,
so is the defining characteristic of phenomena.

Nevertheless, Lord of Secrets, for as many eons as countless hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of countless eons, I took on the bodies of various sentient beings and underwent suffering. I gave away my head, hands, feet, eyes, the best of my limbs, my wives, sons, daughters, elephants, oxen, chariots and so forth, and other external things as well. Having brought the six perfections to completion, in the manner of the various inconceivable world systems, I taught sounds, words, and letters to beings of various dispositions and various desires, and with the guise of signs of various modes of conduct and with distinctive forms, I worked for the benefit of sentient beings. And the defeat of the four māras at the seat of awakening: all of that was done through the power of this king of secret mantras. This is what makes the buddhas flourish, what brings victory even over the māras, what makes all the teachings fruitful, and what, furthermore, brings victory over all the various obstructors without exception.

There is no second other than this,
the unchanging mantra of the buddhas.
Therefore, having placed it in the heart,
one dwells at ease in whatever way one wishes.
There are no hostile obstructors,
nor any others who seek an opening.
There is never any fear of enemies,

nor any fear of thieves and the like;
one is wholly freed from every fear.
By meditating on it as abiding in the heart,
so that I might at long last be delivered from the fearsome ocean of saṃsāra, how shall I attain the supreme state praised by the perfect buddhas?
While I had attained nothing at all,
by practicing in this way
that unchanging state is to be attained here,
and the fullness of buddhahood itself is attained.
One should rely on the means of accomplishment of secret mantra taught by the perfect buddhas.
Then a body with the light of a wish-fulfilling jewel will be attained right here.
For the accomplishment of those who abide in this way,
when the mantra practitioner rests in meditative equipoise,
by that even what was not found is attained.
By this even the unsplittable is split;
even over the unconquered, all without exception is conquered.
Recitation of the greatly powerful secret mantra bestows the state of perfect buddhahood.
Wherever the mantra knowledge of mindfulness, understanding, and thought has gone,
just like a blazing fire,
the mantra practitioner will be clearly seen.
When one relies on the king of secret mantras,
there is nothing at all that comes of it without fruit.
Recollecting the greatly powerful secret mantra brings about the desired actions.
This lord of all mantras without exception will swiftly bring accomplishment.
When one desires the fruit of secret mantra,
one should have no doubt about this.

Then those bodhisattvas and that entire assembly, not abandoning their sense of wonder, spoke together in one voice, with a single sound:

How wonderful! Inconceivable Buddha, you comprehend the aims of sentient beings;
and you, whose nature is free of conceptual thought, proclaim the inconceivable state.
The person who holds it has the lower realms cut off.
For whoever has it in hand, accomplishment rests in the palm of his hand.
Without fear and without any sense of mine,
all doubts entirely abandoned,
dwelling on the ground of exhaustion,
he acts for beings without deliberation.
The king of secret mantras, the protector, protects all of us.
Those who wish to accomplish their desired aims meditate in their minds on what has been taught.

Then, as soon as this whole assembly had spoken these words, they fell silent. Then all were amazed, their eyes wide open, and they had no power of speech left to address the Delight of the Śākya Clan.

Then the bodhisattvas dwelling in the sky, having heard this wonder, filled their cupped hands with various flowers in the sky above the Blessed One Śākyamuni, and praised the Blessed One in verse:

Ever pure and stainless, always and continuously free of conceptual thought,
ever abiding without conceptual thought,
great hero, I bow to you and praise you.
All your phenomena are unmoving;
since all is the domain of what is well composed,
you know them always to be unmoving.
To you, free of elaboration, I bow and offer praise.
Wishing to benefit sentient beings,
you taught the conduct that you practiced,
and from it the pure truly arise.
Pure hero, I bow to you and praise you.

Just as space is pure,
free of every particle,
so too your body, Protector,
has abandoned all conceptualization.
Utterly pure like a crystal orb,
like space, free of elaboration,
all things being completely pure,
ocean of wisdom, I bow to you and praise you.
Like a rainbow in the sky,
Lord, you are always seen;
so, by pure sentient beings,
you, Lord, are always seen.
All the lower realms are completely liberated:
great hero, you yourself were born,
the essence of the expanse truly arose,
a single wisdom of great splendor.
Throughout the whole earth, without fail,
you behold the suffering of sentient beings;
having brought this suffering to an end,
they become equal to the unsurpassed state.
This mantra, chief of the secret mantras,
in order to increase understanding of the Dharma, gives birth to all the children of the victors.
Through what you, Lord, have spoken,
all things from the very first become perfect.
Victor, you yourself were born without cause;
fully freed from karma and from birth,
you are born as the supreme Victor, the Lord.
Flame of wisdom without intrinsic nature,
having abandoned all that is conditioned,
the single nature of the realm of phenomena, unsurpassed Victor, I bow and pay homage.

Thus they spoke.

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, asked the Blessed One in verse about the meaning of the words of the mantra:

Blessed One, how is secret mantra to be accomplished?
What is the means of accomplishment?
What is called the root of the means of accomplishment?
And how, too, is it taught?
How, so that the mind may be pure,
Lord, what should one meditate on?
How is it that it is without fruit?
How should the mantra practitioner rely on it?

When he had asked this, the Blessed One declared to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi:

Having made the awakening mind firm,
I shall speak of the accomplishment of mantra.
This is the rite to be performed for the accomplishment of mantra;
otherwise everything is without fruit.
Just as, if its root has not grown,
a tree has neither flower nor fruit,
so know the fruit of secret mantra:
the awakening mind is its root.
Having generated the awakening mind,
one attains the unsurpassed state.
All phenomena that abide in this come about through arising and abiding;
in brief, all things
are without intrinsic nature and beyond thought.
The awakening mind is certainly attained;
otherwise it remains something merely apart.
Son, it is like a lion:
one meditates on the conditioned as emptiness.
All existence is illusion,
whatever abides as the fruit of thought.
What the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) assert,
the self, the life principle, and the person,
what they speak of as primal matter and the spirit (puruṣa),
and that which abides as all-pervading:
having thus imagined the round of saṃsāra,
these are nothing but things of saṃsāra.
Deluded by conceit,

the childish, for whom suffering is real,
are bound by the noose of what is false.
Seeing those who suffer,
it is to all of them that this is spoken.
These are the words that were declared:
There is no life principle, nor are there sentient beings;
there is no agent, nor any primal matter;
there is no pervader, nor are there things;
there is no nature of substance and the like.
The noose whose nature is wrong cognition,
the bondage of existence, is abandoned;
one is wholly parted from all things.
By meditating on the manifold just as it is,
one is wholly freed from all things and attains the state of emptiness.
By way of the distinction of outer and inner,
meditate thus on everything.
Foam, water bubbles, and illusions rise up from emptiness alone.
Having meditated thus on everything,
one discerns the aspects of the state of wisdom.
Freed from the ways of evil,
one is liberated into the deathless state.
Beyond the aggregates, the elements, and the sense sources,
and beyond apprehended and apprehender as well,
the noose of omniscient wisdom should be thoroughly examined with regard to death.
Where there are no aggregates or elements,
and the sense sources do not arise,
that is complete liberation from all things:
so the supreme Victor has always taught.
Where there is no foundation consciousness, no self, and not even a person,
this awakening of the buddhas here upon the earth,
there everything is taught to be an illusion.
I, who have gained mastery of omniscience, comprehend the aims of sentient beings.

So that the rites may be undertaken,
I explain it to you, son, without omission.
That there is a foundation,
and that there is consciousness as well,
and that its self-nature, my son, exists: this too was taught.
Seeing the sufferings of the childish,
who are possessed by the demon of things,
so that I might lead them in, son,
the extensive rite was taught.
There is no sentient being and no life principle,
no person and no agent,
no consciousness and no foundation;
that in which there is no self and no Lord (Īśvara),
no spirit and no pervader,
no things and not even illusion,
wholly freed from all things:
this is taught as the stainless true Dharma.
That itself is the supreme chief.
Rely on the state of perfect buddhahood;
constantly and continually rely on that state;
constantly and continually one should meditate.
Meditate on the awakening mind;
so as to be wholly free of apprehended and apprehender, purify all things thoroughly.
The aggregates, the elements, and the sense sources,
all are emptiness, like an illusion:
this is the awakening mind in summary.
The intelligent bodhisattva should meditate thus in the mind.
All excellences draw near.
If, with conscientiousness, one constantly relies on the very mind of the buddhas, the sprout of the awakening mind appears.
If one has done the approach, the fruit is small;
for those who are born through the conduct of secret mantra, a body like a wish-fulfilling jewel will be attained through the awakening mind.

A body unstained like space will be attained completely.
The merit of meditating on the awakening mind is said to be inconceivable;
all the buddhas of great miraculous power have said its fruit, too, is inconceivable.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, rose from his seat, circumambulated the Blessed One three times, boldly took up his vajra in the proper manner, and addressed the Blessed One with these words:

I, your son, arisen from the ocean of wisdom, am delighted and glad,
yet I have great doubts about these things.
How am I to understand them?
Maitreya and the others,
all those of the ten grounds without exception,
are in doubt about this.
Great Sage, please explain.
Out of loving concern for those who have not worked for the benefit of beings, who have abandoned merit and wisdom,
I make this request of the Blessed One.
Today, you who strive to benefit beings,
please tell me all of it without omission.
What is its might and power?
What is its overpowering of adversaries?
How have you, Lord, here truly spoken of the one called Acala?
There is no state other than this.
Please speak of all these things.
The maṇḍala through which
that state is accomplished, please explain it too.
You have spoken of the inconceivable state
by which this earth is attained.
Please speak also of the measure of secret mantra;
and how, too, is the maṇḍala?

Protector, I am in doubt about this.
For the benefit of beings here,
please likewise speak of the accomplishments of mantra,
and of the divisions of its rites,
and explain the fierce rites as well.
Protector, how, through pacifying, enriching, and subjugating, does the fruit of mantra recitation come about very swiftly?
Protector, the characteristics of recitation,
how are they here upon the earth?
The rite of the fire hearth,
and the satisfying offerings, the purifying smoke and the torma offerings, together with the king of wrathful ones:
Protector, please speak of all of these.
From the midday of a single day to the instant of the eighth month, please truly explain the accomplishments.
The healing treatments for the work of poison,
the various rites performed with substances,
and what arises from true invocation:
please explain them all without exception.
There is no other protector through whom accomplishment is attained;
apart from you, Lord, there is no other.

The heroic bodhisattvas,
the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas of great miraculous power,
and those renowned in the world,
Brahmā and the others said to have great miraculous power:
for them too, as protector and refuge,
apart from you, Lord, there is no other.

Then the bodhisattvas, Maitreya and the others, and Vajrapāṇi and the others, once again petitioned the Blessed One:

King of Dharma, the gateway of mantra,
Blessed One, please explain it.
For the sake of bodhisattvas who practice the bodhisattva conduct, the means of accomplishment for the conduct of secret mantra that the Blessed One himself has seen:

those who have attained the joy and bliss of the Dharma dwell upon the face of the earth.
Striving earnestly to please the secret mantra, attaining bliss in this very life, beings dwelling upon the earth will without doubt come forth.
All will attain the state of sovereignty,
all fears entirely abandoned.
The king of secret mantras, of great miraculous power,
will appear in this world.
All the hostile rākṣasas,
the bhūtas, grahas, and piśācas,
and the harm that is said to come to beings
from the terrifying and the violent:
by recollecting the greatly powerful secret mantra,
none of these will occur.
Malevolent beings upon the earth,
and the various others that are spoken of:
in order to tame them,
this ritual manual has been taught.
Gods, nāgas, and yakṣas, kumbhāṇḍas and kaṭapūtanas,
all the spirits that cause madness and the lunar mansions,
and the malevolent planets and others that are spoken of:
for those evil beings
this wrathful one has been taught.
All the hosts of grahas such as Brahmā, likewise kings and śrāvakas,
and the bodhisattvas of the ten grounds,
cannot describe it;
it reduces all of them to ashes.
The recitation of secret mantra has great miraculous power;
contemplate it truly as abiding in the heart.
What is called secret mantra is hard to see,
and it destroys all to ashes without exception.

The maṇḍalas of Brahmā and the others,
the great-souled bodhisattvas,
and the lords of Indra's ten abodes cannot withstand it.
The play of the king of wrathful ones:
hostile beings, whatever they may be,
should be regarded as like tufts of cotton blown away.
By the mere mention of his name they scatter in the ten directions.
Therefore, in every way,
the recitation of secret mantra here should be constantly and continually kept in mind.
One who desires the accomplishment of secret mantra, fearless in every circumstance,
should make the mantra his abode here upon the earth.
Recollect the protector of secret mantra, hold it, and constantly recite it.
Dwelling in the midst of fire,
through his body with bared fangs foes scatter, and there is never any fear.
One rejoices as on a stairway to the higher realms.
When one is thronged by fear and terror,
the great king dispels that fear.
When one has fallen among bandits and thieves,
the body poised like a lion,
the king of wrathful ones of great miraculous power,
should always be held in mind.
Fevers, stabbing pains in the teeth and eyes, those that arise in the waist, the ribs, and the flanks of the body,
the illnesses of embodied beings upon the earth,
of every various kind that arises:
by merely recollecting the secret mantra
all of these are brought to an end.
The wrathful king's inconceivable might and power and valor:
upon the earth, apart from the omniscient one,
who could ever withstand them?

Just as the might and power of a universal monarch cannot be expressed,
so too the wrathful king in his poised stance cannot be described.
Just as the unshakable qualities of a universal monarch cannot be counted, so too the strength of the king of wrathful ones
cannot be expressed.
All the kings of wrathful ones
of what are called the vajra and lotus families,
the wrathful ones' envoys and messengers,
and the servants and messengers of great miraculous power:
they speak of this wrathful one
as the universal monarch.
The might and power so described of the wise king of wrathful ones:
this sole glory of all the buddhas is called their hero.
Because whatever he says has become words of truth,
he is undeceiving itself.
Therefore, because he is unmoving,
he is called Acala, the Immovable.
Having attained the Immovable ground,
he abides with a mind one-pointed in meditative concentration;
by the grounds of the śrāvakas and so forth,
and by all the māras, he is unmoved.
Then the Protector bestowed the name.
Perfect buddhas, supreme among humans, heroic bodhisattvas:
this accomplishes all aims.
The buddhas of the past,
likewise those yet to come,
and the protectors who abide at present:
to benefit beings, this rite
was taught by all of them.
It is said to be called the Buddha Eye.
It guards the teaching

for all the realms of sentient beings.
It is the emanation of all the buddhas;
by the bodhisattvas of great power innumerable secret mantras are said to remain to benefit beings.
Wise Vajrapāṇi,
all these have been truly explained.
For people not obscured by evil
it brings forth light for beings.
Bound by the unbreakable noose,
they reach the unsurpassed state.
Through the wise king of wrathful ones,
even what the mantra practitioner has not accomplished is accomplished.
Through the blessing of the king of wrathful ones
all desires without exception will be fulfilled.

Then that entire assembly was amazed, and, joyful, their eyes wide open, they spoke in one voice and one speech with melodious words:

How wonderful! All the buddhas are inconceivable in skillful means and wisdom.
With a mind that has become compassion,
please explain the incomparable pledge.
Whatever beings are thronged with fear,
all upon the earth become fearless;
and whoever has great devotion by nature,
for him the lower realms will be emptied.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, said to the Blessed One, "Blessed One, please explain how, merely by entering this maṇḍala of the king of wrathful ones, all sentient beings will attain the state of royal sovereignty, cannot be harmed by any obstructors or vināyakas, swiftly gain accomplishments, and become fully endowed with every kind of sovereignty."

When he had made this request, the Blessed One declared to the great bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, "Vajrapāṇi, excellent, excellent! Vajrapāṇi, once again, most excellent!"

"Son of noble family, listen to this matter about which you have petitioned me. Through hearing this maṇḍala of the king of wrathful ones, everyone upon the earth is amazed, their eyes wide open; powerless, they cannot bear it, and then they fall to the ground."

Then, at that time, the Blessed One entered into the samādhi called Flame Arisen to Burn All Māras, and he spoke this mantra, the king of secret mantras, which fulfills the wishes of all sentient beings, which gives birth to all the bodhisattvas of the three times without exception, which illuminates the aims of all sentient beings, which is born from the inconceivable merit of all the tathāgatas, which is extremely difficult for any sentient being to see, which crushes the obstructors to seeing, which purifies all the lower realms, which completely pacifies all illness, which fulfills all wishes, which performs the restoration for all malevolent grahas, and which brings complete pacification from all the enemies that are māras:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvvāśa paripūrakebhyaḥ sarvvathā caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa sphoṭaya hūṃ traṭ hāṃ māṃ

As soon as the Blessed One had spoken the king of secret mantras, that entire assembly fell headlong, face down, like the trunks of plantain trees and like a great forest. This great trichiliocosm, this world system, shook in six ways: it swayed, it moved, it moved violently, it shook, it shook violently, it trembled, it trembled violently. When the east rose, the west sank; when the south rose, the north sank. Moreover, they beheld wonders and marvels and were greatly amazed, and in the world systems they also beheld various buddha fields. In this world system, Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground, the various obstructors, the various kinds of rākṣasas and māras, and all others with malicious minds were destroyed to ashes.

Some lay face down.
As at the eon of destruction,
smoke and smoky haze hung everywhere.
The sun and moon, of great miraculous power,
even their light turned to darkness.
The black darkness and gloom were utterly terrifying;
in the regions where lightning flashed it was dreadful;
in every direction there were cries of wailing;
the whole earth was in turmoil.
The planets and all the hosts of lunar mansions,
and whatever other chief gods there were,
all of them, terrified and panic-stricken,

fell senseless, face down.
Asuras, kinnaras, and nāgas, yakṣas, rākṣasas, and kaṭapūtanas,
unable to bear it in their bodies,
swooned as though struck by poison.
All of these blazed as one,
as though arisen from the fire at the end of the eon;
all of these blazed and spread.
Throughout the buddha fields,
the great-souled bodhisattvas,
the lords dwelling on the ten grounds,
they too grew drowsy and swooned,
and fell face down upon the ground.
The wrathful women, the envoys and servants,
the male and female messengers with their slaves,
unable to withstand the stance of this body,
lost their senses and fell face down.
The śrāvakas and the rhinoceros-like solitary ones,
and the other great wonder-workers of the world,
like sawdust beaten down by iron,
they too fell where they stood.
Brahmā, Śakra, and the other gods,
the asuras and yakṣas of great miraculous power,
all of them turned to ashes.
When they were thronged with suffering,
a little while later, once again,
they turned to one another and spoke in fear:
"What will become of this only son?
This earth is utterly terrifying!
Apart from the state of the Sugata we see no peace at all."
The forms of the māras and obstructors, of every various kind, stood there;
their bodies as though transformed,
they stood upon the earth like trees.
The realms of Brahmā and the others,
all of these were seen ablaze.

Even bodies that had become like Avīci hell were everywhere wrapped in smoke and haze.
The buddha fields without exception,
all of these it burns.
Imbued with compassion and truly endowed with it, Vajrapāṇi made this request:
"Since the welfare of beings has not been considered,
Blessed One, please withdraw this display.
The childish, who are bound to suffering, cannot bear this.
Protector of all the sentient beings in the world,
you bring forth compassion.
Born from the mountain of sole love,
you who free beings from suffering,
you alone are the protector of beings,
and you alone have become their friend.
The ferryman who carries them across the ocean of saṃsāra is you alone.
You alone, who heal all illnesses,
are the physician.
You too are the one who shows the sacred path;
you are a father in the ocean of saṃsāra;
upon the earth there is you alone.
Protector, because you have generated compassion,
the whole earth truly flourishes.
Like a wish-fulfilling tree for those who seek their aims are the true heroes, those with the awakening mind;
the lords dwelling on the ten grounds
flourish through you alone, Protector.
Your compassion is like a lotus born from the mud;
those whose minds have turned evil,
Protector of beings, please burn them.
They become as though without core,
like the trunk of a plantain tree.
Like moths, these people, who have received the call of fierce summoning, though they are burned, feel no stabbing pain.

So too here the childish,
all the obstructors and vināyakas,
and the lords of the strength of ten innumerables,
through the utterance of the king of secret mantras,
all of them are destroyed to ashes.
Therefore, in every way,
Blessed One, I petition you.
I, your son, am delighted and glad;
it is fitting that you hear this from me."

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni possessed a mind endowed with compassion, and these words of petition that Vajrapāṇi had addressed to the supreme lord of sages for the benefit of sentient beings were most far-reaching.

Then, at that time, the Blessed One entered into the samādhi called Source of the Life of All Sentient Beings and Birth of Wisdom.

Having entered into it, he spoke this queen of knowledge mantras, which benefits all sentient beings, which wholly transforms all that is conditioned, which strikes terror into all terrors, which dispels all enemies, fire, and water, which brings all sentient beings to excellent glory and good fortune, which gives birth to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, which burns up all fears, which crushes all harm, and which is the intention of all the buddhas and bodhisattvas:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvvāśa paripūrakebhyaḥ sarvvathā oṃ sarvva saṃskāra pariṣkāra viśuddha dharmmate mahānaya parivāre svāhā

Then, merely through his speaking this, throughout all the world systems of the great trichiliocosm all happiness was bestowed, and all were endowed with victory on every side.

Those who had gained the state of sovereignty,
by bringing their minds back into their own bodies,
truly came forth with excellent dispositions;
all their evils were completely pacified.
They came to behold the Blessed One.
Endowed with minds that had come to awareness,
all were possessed of their own lives;
having become valiant in miraculous power,

they attained a most wondrous state.
They stand before the supreme Victor.
Their own and others' disciplines become firm;
through the might of this knowledge mantra,
by their own miraculous power they are victorious in battle;
upon the earth they come to overpower adversaries;
all attain the state of sovereignty.
Those who had become chiefs of all the māras,
and all those who had come upon the earth,
were wholly freed from every fear.
What is spoken of as the lower realms, abiding in the depths of extreme suffering:
all the lower realms were torn apart,
and they became vessels of happiness.
That which is called the fire of hell,
so hard to look upon and so dreadful,
at that moment became exceedingly cool,
like a portion of the autumn moon.
The places described as hells,
dense with bitterly cold black darkness,
as though by a fierce great blazing fire,
all of them became warm.
The suffering of those called pretas, utterly unbearable and dreadful:
through the might of this knowledge mantra
all of these were freed from it.
And that entire assembly,
whose minds had been tormented by suffering,
were truly granted every happiness,
and they spoke joyful words to one another.
The great obstructors, the vināyakas,
and the other creatures besides,
and the bhūtas upon the earth, settled in their own minds, having become gentle,
gazed upon one another.
The heroic bodhisattvas,
and Brahmā and the others of great miraculous power,

their own minds beautiful and at ease,
all of them attained happiness.
The messengers, envoys, servants, and attendants,
the bhūtas, grahas, and piśācas,
all attained the state of sovereignty and dwelt upon the face of the earth.
The steadfast bodhisattvas and the entire assembly of great miraculous power spoke these words for the benefit of beings:
"How wonderful! Omniscient one, without equal, whose wisdom of skillful means is beyond thought,
upon the earth, apart from you,
who else is there to arise?
In a vessel of boundless happiness you hold all of these.
All have gained the state of sovereignty
and dwell upon the face of the earth.
The suffering of existence is no longer as before,
so utterly unbearable and dreadful.
All become children of the buddhas."
Rejoicing in benefiting all sentient beings, with minds that had become one-pointed,
they spoke with melodious words:
"The one who has become the friend of all is none other than the Buddha.
Even those whose minds have become a cause for reproach
he brings to happiness, each one.
What he truly taught upon taking birth is this:
for as long as one has not passed into nirvāṇa,
for that long one enters saṃsāra;
this is the supreme way of the buddha vehicle."
All the bodhisattvas
and the assembly of Brahmā and the others
all rose from their seats, and where the Lord was seated,
the bodhisattvas surrounded him.

The gods of great miraculous power, Brahmā and the others, having arrived all together,
petition for the unsurpassed state.
Wishing to benefit all sentient beings,
they circumambulated the perfect Buddha, bowed low to the Protector of the World,
and spoke these words:
"How wonderful! Great lord of buddhas, who delights in healing all sentient beings, Protector of the World, the means by which you protect are incomparable and inconceivable.
Through what you have established here,
the ocean of suffering is purified.
Physician of beings, when you are seen, happiness truly arises."

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni, with a profound mind endowed with compassion, spoke these words in this melodious voice:

"Bodhisattvas of great miraculous power,
you who possess miraculous power, do not be afraid.
The perfect buddhas, supreme among humans,
have taught these inconceivable things.
For one who relies on such a Dharma, the suffering by which one would again be bound in this way within saṃsāra will not arise, since one has performed the approach.
The perfect buddhas, supreme among humans,
truly taught the Great Vehicle.
Having truly gathered up the path,
all are completely freed from suffering.
That is the supreme suchness, peace;
it is called the vehicle of the buddhas.
Having taken up this sacred vehicle,
one will certainly, without doubt, become a buddha.
All the buddhas of the past,
likewise those yet to come,
and the protectors abiding at present:

from this very way of benefiting beings
all of them truly took it up, and they attain the peace that ends suffering.
Therefore, in every way,
rely on such a true Dharma as this.
If one performs the approach to this Lord, sufferings are dispelled."
Then the other bodhisattvas,
and Brahmā and the others of great miraculous power,
engaged in benefiting sentient beings,
spoke these melodious words in his presence:
"Protector, what you have spoken!
My mind has no other support;
there is nothing more supreme than you, who have become our refuge.
All have gained the state of sovereignty;
they have come to take pride in their own miraculous powers, are parted from every fear,
and have abandoned all suffering.
Toward the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, those of great miraculous power are endowed with devotion;
truly abiding in the Great Vehicle, they are fit for the deeds of awakening and the rest."

Thus they spoke.

Then that assembly, which included all the bodhisattvas, Vajrapāṇi and the others, touched their heads to the two feet of the Blessed One and made this request: "Blessed One, King of the Dharma, out of loving kindness for us, please explain that by which all sentient beings, through seeing the nature of reality of the maṇḍala of the King of the Wrathful Ones, will attain the state of Īśvara: that which causes all sentient beings to attain the state of Īśvara, which heals and cleanses all diseases, which is endowed with every glory, which destroys untimely death and all obstructing spirits, and which destroys all enemies, afflictions, bandits and thieves, savage men, harm from kings, lions, tigers and the like, fevers, tumors, eruptions that break out at night, and all harm from venomous snakes."

When this request had been made, the Blessed One,
the Protector of the Śākyas, of great miraculous power,
the great lord who arose from the vajra,
spoke these melodious words:
"So that I may explain the supreme maṇḍala upon the surface of the earth, listen, my son!
The secret of all the buddhas, the protectors,
and of the bodhisattvas
I shall truly explain to you;
listen here with a mind intent on benefit.
The maṇḍala of the King of the Wrathful Ones,
all of this, which has not been taught before,
you, my son, must not give
to one whose mind is clouded by wickedness.
First I shall explain the master;
listen, my son, in meditative equipoise.
He becomes well established in every respect.
Of his many qualities, I shall tell a few.
He is perfect in moral discipline and endowed with compassion, patient, diligent, and well settled,
pure and perfect in ritual;
he never disparages his guru;
he looks to the benefit of others as to his own;
he delights in giving and strives with resolve;
he is truthful in word and full of integrity;
he delights in generosity, is pleasant and gentle,
and his whole body is perfect in good qualities.
He constantly makes offerings to the buddhas, the śrāvakas, and the children of the Victor;
he is devoted to his guru and without pride;
he is solely helpful and virtuous toward beings;
he is endowed with profound intelligence;
he knows what is timely and what is untimely;
he understands the faculties and the divisions of meaning;
he always delights in benefiting sentient beings;
he is greatly diligent in pleasing the secret mantras;
such a one is highly praised in this maṇḍala.
The gods of great miraculous power,

the buddhas, the śrāvakas, and the teachings,
and the bodhisattvas, the protectors:
knowing their divisions, he always fully teaches the profound meaning.
In him there is no avarice at all;
even in wrath he speaks with love.
He knows the way of the four means of attraction,
is adorned with the six perfections,
has donned the armor of the bodhisattva,
and abides in the illusion-like state.
Just as it is taught for the śrāvakas, who cultivate the Four Noble Truths,
so the mantra practitioner, as taught here,
cultivates them with the mind of awakening.
The bodhisattva endowed with intelligence cultivates this in his mind and attains the wisdom of intention.
Arising from the Great Vehicle,
the four means of attraction and the six perfections are held to bestow inconceivable fruits;
the one endowed with wisdom cultivates them.
Whether he is green, white, or yellow,
or in short even black,
tall or short, he has a fine complexion,
his hands reach down to his knees,
his face is always long,
his head is even and broad,
his eyebrows are unbroken, his nose is high,
and his ankles are slightly red.
Fully adorned with every good quality,
he purifies the ocean of evil.
He should honor all the teachings,
and he also teaches reality itself.
He knows the divisions of the maṇḍalas and the assemblies of mantras and mudrās;
he obtains authorization and empowerment,

and becomes one of true wisdom.
He is devoted to his guru and to the deity,
and is endowed with the compendium of mantras and mudrās;
he knows the secret mantras of the King of Secret Mantras;
he pleases sentient beings and speaks with love;
he knows the reality of mantra recitation and the fire offering;
he knows the reality of pacifying and enriching rites;
he knows the fierce rites and subjugation;
he applies mantras and mudrās thoroughly;
he truly attends upon his guru
and regards him as the Teacher himself.
He makes offerings to all the bhūtas,
and he also knows the reality of worldly beings.
Perfect, free of indolence toward sentient beings,
he will display enthusiasm and teach.
He whose wisdom mantra of Īśvara brings everything under control constantly recites the mantras of the wrathful ones and strives with resolve to please the deity.
Endowed with moral discipline and perfect, truly arisen from enlightened body and speech,
fully adorned with the observances,
he always protects all.
Thus I have taught in brief
the characteristics of his qualities.
One who fully knows these is highly praised as a master.
Otherwise, my son, the rite of mantra recitation is fruitless.
The secret mantra is not accomplished by oneself,
and even when taught to others there is no accomplishment.
The maṇḍala does not bear fruit,
there are no means of accomplishing the mantra,
nothing at all is protected,
and there is no deity for the fire offering.
These are the marks of one who lacks meditation,
and they are to be utterly shunned.

Therefore the characteristics of the master are praised in every respect.
Therefore this secret wisdom should be understood as taught to be the source of all the buddhas;
otherwise it will be fruitless.
The master and the disciple,
ever heedful,
should guard it constantly and without interruption,
just as they guard their own lives."

"Even in a hundred koṭis of eons
the appearance of a buddha is extremely rare, and his teaching by the lord upon the earth is likewise extremely rare.
Therefore the master,
fully adorned in every way with all good qualities,
should constantly recite
the fifteen-syllable secret mantra.
When he has recited it a hundred thousand times,
he should also begin the fire offering.
The one who knows the mantra and has done this should then draw the supreme maṇḍala.
There will be no malevolent beings and no obstructing spirits, nor any hosts of bhūtas and the like;
those who obstruct by force of their might will have no hold on the state and its fruit.
All will attain the state of Īśvara,
all will be fully adorned with happiness,
and will be free of every fear;
of this there is no doubt.
Otherwise everything is fruitless:
the obstructing spirits look for an opening and carry off the body of the mantra practitioner, and the rite yields no fruit.
When he has acted in this way, the mantra practitioner himself should draw the supreme maṇḍala.

The state of a second buddha,
and everything else, will then be accomplished.
First I shall rightly explain the site;
listen with a mind in meditative equipoise.
As for where this marvelous maṇḍala, supreme in beauty, is to be drawn:
rivers and lakes are rightly taught,
and mountains adorned with flowers and fruits;
pleasure groves are taught as well,
adorned with peacocks of lovely plumage;
parks and delightful mansions,
cattle pens and crossroads,
and also any place outdoors,
temples and mountain hollows, multistoried buildings and houses,
or a place with a single landmark;
rivers and parks,
and especially the spaces within them;
and other places of many kinds,
wherever the mind may wish.
From among these and other places one should take whichever site is suitable, invite the deity,
and worship again and again.
With the mind alone one requests him to depart,
and one should firmly bind the directions.
One remains having put on the armor oneself,
the body well adorned with the uṣṇīṣa,
and, holding a vajra in the hand,
one imagines in the mind that the deity has come.
Having thus established oneself,
one should set up the protection of the people.
Having blessed oneself there,
one should sit apart on another spot of ground.
Having dug down about knee-deep,
one should clear away the insects and worms.
When it is free of its many faults,

one should pound it firm again with effort.
Having smeared it with the five products of the cow,
one should joyfully make offerings of flowers and incense.
In every direction of the site
one should cast tormas generously.
Loose flowers should be strewn across the ground, scents and incense offered in the ritual sequence,
and the fire offering performed according to the rite.
One who wishes for virtuous yoga, striving earnestly in this way,
should do this at the site for one day.
When it has been well purified,
one should invite the deity,
and in particular should properly present tormas, scents, and flowers.
The wise and intelligent one should then seek signs,
and the fruits of virtue and nonvirtue will appear.
If one sees a good dream,
then, with a mind made joyful,
in order to accomplish the aims of oneself and others,
one should draw the king of maṇḍalas.
If the dream is bad, the wise one should give it up;
frightening and harsh dreams are inauspicious,
and there will be no accomplishment for oneself or others;
fruitlessness is the only fruit that comes of it.
The wise one who desires
the accomplishment of the maṇḍala should draw its center.
It measures eight cubits, and likewise a measure of sixteen is also given.
The supreme Victor has always taught the five principal ones.
There, having divided it into two parts,
the one-cubit measure is the outer part;
the other part, as it is rightly explained,
should be determined as the central part.
Within that cubit measure,
the Buddha is shown in the center.

The second is the children of the Victor, which are taught here in brief.
The part lying outside the second should be determined there in the same way.
In brief, according to the cubit measure,
all the parts should be determined.
It has four gates with porticoes and is adorned with ornaments of vases,
the whole ground as if ablaze;
at the gates and corners are vajras,
and at the corners, above all,
all the vases are invariably placed.
It is adorned with porticoes bound with vajras and bound with nooses.
When all this has been done,
in the center is an eight-petaled lotus;
at its lovely heart
a vase is properly placed.
On the vessel atop the vase
a white lotus is set,
and on it is seated the protector of beings,
the lord who fulfills the aim of the teaching.
The alms-bowl mudrā of the protector, the savior, the Protector of the Śākyas, should always be drawn.
From it everything is then pervaded,
and the perfect maṇḍala comes into being.
Thus sixteen finger-widths is the maṇḍala of that protector;
by this everything has been fully explained.
On the remaining band, going clockwise,
in the northern direction
the protector Lokeśvara is seated.
Upon a lotus is a vajra,
white in color and of great splendor.
He wears the armor of loving-kindness.
Arisen from the very nature of loving-kindness,
in the direction of Īśāna, the northeast, the hand emblem is the mudrā of the water flask:

of wondrous heroism, inconceivable, Samantabhadra should always be drawn.
Seated in the quarter marked by Agni, the southeast,
is the lord holding a wish-fulfilling jewel, completely filled with an ocean of wisdom,
who meditates on the profound meaning.
In the direction of Indra, the east, sits one holding the utpala of wisdom.
In the abode of Yama, the south, is one who is present as the executioner of the enemy of all.
The protector seated in that place arises in the family of the Vajra Peak.
In the direction of Nairṛti, the southwest,
in the midst of the wind and the rest,
clad in the armor of the sword of wisdom,
sits the King of the Wrathful Ones, of great power,
the protector of countless wrathful ones,
surrounded on all sides by his retinue.
The ocean of the maṇḍala's qualities becomes clear in every direction.
In the direction of the wind, the northwest, sits one arisen from the lord of all the victors,
who symbolizes all wisdom
and whose maṇḍala of light is complete.
In the direction of Varuṇa, lord of the waters, one well joined in the vajra mudrā sits upon a red lotus,
seated in beauty like the end of time.
In the western direction
is the lord who abides on the ten grounds;
he too is placed just as arranged, marked with the sign of his own mudrā.
There, in the lower part
and in the part of the upper direction, great beings free of faults:
on all of these a hero is seated.

In the center one alone will be seated.
Relying on solitary awakening, Śāriputra, the great being;
and then the one whose wisdom knows space..."

becomes supreme in the domain of miraculous power; Maudgalyāyana too,
and Kāśyapa, the great being;
then, upon the earth, of the supreme Victor, Aśvajit and Gavāṃpati,
the fierce and mighty one with the clenched fist, Bharadvāja,
Ānanda, and the one called Nanda,
and Rāhula too, in their proper order:
these are placed here, arranged as they should be,
adorned with alms bowls and lotuses.
All the sons of Vajrapāṇi, Subāhu and likewise all the rest,
are placed near Vajrapāṇi, arranged as they should be.
Those who are spoken of as sons of the true Dharma, Mañjuśrī and the others, should all be placed near Mañjughoṣa.
Those who are spoken of as wrathful ones,
arising from the family of Vajrapāṇi, are placed in sequence
in the southern direction.
One is equipped with a vajra axe,
and likewise one with a vajra hammer;
they are spoken of as exceedingly fierce,
clouded with the light of garlands of flame.
Among those spoken of as wrathful ones, Hayagrīva stands in plain view,
sporting with Bhṛkuṭī;
she who is renowned as Tārā is hard to find.
Each bearing the sign of its own mudrā,

these too should be diligently drawn there.
Tārā and Bhṛkuṭī should be drawn,
and likewise the Vidyā, the Blessed Lady; Māmakī and Śṛṅkhalā are taught,
Space and the Buddha Eye, Mayūrī and Marīcī, Jāṅgulī and Parṇaśabarī;
each bearing the sign of its own mudrā,
these of great fortune should also be drawn.
In the northern direction
they are seated, of very great miraculous power.
The mudrās, when they take bodily form as women,
have their bodies adorned with ornaments.
Male and female messengers likewise,
and male and female servants, very harsh,
each bearing the sign of its own mudrā,
should be drawn in the western direction.
In what is called the earth maṇḍala,
the gods born from the nature of the Victor,
the world protectors and the rest, should be drawn.
Those who abide by their pledges upon the earth,
the king of the gods, the great asuras, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Maheśvara (Śiva), with the signs of their own mudrās,
should be drawn in the eastern direction.
Those who are spoken of as sages, Viśvāmitra, Protector of Beings,
and Shunner of Evil, the equal of Yamī,
and others too who are very hard to see,
endowed with the truth of the Vedas,
should be drawn in the north.
The sun, the moon, Varuṇa,
and Agni too, very hard to behold, and the lord of the yakṣas, should always be drawn in the southern quarter.
Those who are spoken of as mātṛkās, exceedingly fierce upon the earth,

with hands bearing their own offerings,
should also be drawn in the west.
Those who are spoken of as the sisters,
of many forms, great sorceresses,
exceedingly devoted to the benefit of beings,
are seated in that same direction.
At the eastern gate sits the Black One,
of great miraculous power, protecting and guarding; Delight Maker guards the northern gate,
and likewise Shunner of Evil is in the south.
The one rightly taught for the western gate has arisen from the family of the great obstructors;
bearing the sign of his own mudrā,
he sits guarding, of great miraculous power.
My only son, these, in brief,
have been taught very extensively.
This treasure of all the buddhas, entire,
has not been seen by others upon the earth.
Ever heedful,
as though it were your own life,
guard thus its beautiful nature;
all the buddhas guard it.
You should not place your trust in childish ordinary people.
Such a fool ruins himself and brings ruin on others as well.
This true Dharma that I have taught liberates from all suffering;
its ruin
comes about through the veil of ignorance.
This supreme teaching spoken by the perfect Buddha you, my son, must not give even in part to those without faith,
the wicked, the frightening and harsh,
in whom violence has spread:
so the perfect Buddha has told you.
The perfect Buddha, supreme among two-legged beings,

has declared it utterly secret.
The maṇḍala of the King of the Wrathful Ones,
all of this, must not be explained.
Being ever heedful,
one should guard the teaching of the Victor.
If one shows and gives this
to one who has not seen the maṇḍala, one deceives all the buddhas, the protectors,
and the bodhisattvas;
one becomes a mass of every suffering and surely goes the way of the wicked.
For such a wicked one, the accomplishment of the secret mantra will surely not arise.
He who fulfills the aim of the teaching,
the lord, glorious Vajradhara, crushes with his vajra the head of one who shows it to those who have not seen the maṇḍala.
For him the secret mantra will not succeed,
and he will be destroyed by the obstructing spirits too;
his practice of the mantra will bear no fruit.
Therefore, my son, listen here to these words spoken by the Buddha:
do not give it even so far as the ear can hear;
this pledge the perfect Buddha has spoken.
Whoever utterly transgresses the pledge spoken by the Buddha has deceived the perfect buddhas, the lords who dwell in the three worlds."

Then that whole assembly was filled with wonder and gazed with wide eyes, and with minds utterly amazed they spoke these words:

"How wonderful! The Buddha is inconceivable;
this has come about through the power of compassion.
For those who do not know what is a cause and what is not,
this true Dharma has been fully taught.
It cuts off their lower realms and destroys all suffering.

The Buddha has declared inconceivable
the one in whose hand it rests.
Obstructing spirits and misleaders,
and the wicked, who are utterly terrifying:
when the mantra practitioner sees the maṇḍala,
all of them will be pacified.
Where all this is present,
the true Dharma has no abode."

"All these misdeeds are purified, and then one is freed from fear.
All attain the state of Īśvara.
Without doubt one will come to hold all sentient beings under one's power.
Sentient beings dwelling beneath the earth,
and all the malevolent beings there are,
up to those dwelling upon the earth:
having all been brought under control,
they remain as servants who obey.
The gods of the depths of the earth and the others,
the gods and the great mahoragas, wherever this is present, even in some small way,
these great beings protect it there,
and carry out every command.
Whatever gods, yakṣas, and lords of men there are stand before this king upon the earth, saying, 'What shall we do?'
When one is harassed by obstructing spirits, tormented and afflicted by disease,
terrified by a malevolent king,
when everything is being plundered,
when one is struck by malevolent mātṛkās,
by lions, tigers, and likewise by water,
when ḍākinīs on this earth,
rākṣasas and mahoragas bring terror,
when the realm is oppressed by famine,
when one is terrified by every disease,

by fevers, lung disease, and difficult breathing,
by abscesses and eruptions that break out at night,
by stabbing pains in the head and eyes,
and stabbing pains striking the belly,
when struck by every kind of disease,
tormented by every affliction,
when one has long been impoverished,
in fights, brawls, and disputes,
and when one is in litigation with kings, bandits, envoys, and the like:
'Hold to this great protection!'
the supreme Victor has always said.
The lords of the gods, the yakṣas and the rest,
the bhūtas, yakṣas, and kinnaras,
all who dwell upon the earth and abide by their pledges, none of them will transgress what has been taught as the nine pledges.
All the inconceivable things spoken by the perfect Buddha, supreme among two-legged beings, the inconceivable rites he taught,
bring forth fruits that are inconceivable as well."

Then the Blessed One at that time gave his approval to those assemblies, saying, "Excellent, excellent! These words, which no māra can transgress and which fulfill the wishes of all sentient beings, are truly wonderful."

Then the Blessed One, Śākyamuni,
his mind well pleased,
spoke these melodious words:
"Great ones arisen from the vajra!
Excellent, hero of great wisdom!
And again, Vajradhara, you have done well!
The various inconceivable rites
I shall explain to you, child of the Victor.
Taught by the supreme Victor, the lord,
is heroic, inconceivable wisdom;
all those practices by which certain accomplishment is won should be carried out.

Entering the maṇḍala,
the rite of offering and the torma,
and scents, flowers, and other virtuous things:
I shall explain them; my son, listen here.
By these the truly inconceivable unsurpassed state is attained.
Within, the Buddha abides as one's nature;
in the four directions, all around,
the bodhisattvas, possessing bodies of many kinds,
are arrayed in front.
As far as the reaches of space extend,
so far extends the domain of the mind.
Behold them truly, as if they were directly present.
Placing them before you, offer water and request all the buddhas to listen, together with the bodhisattvas and śrāvakas.
Moreover, having done what is to be done,
and the sequence of worldly rites, one should know the correct procedure within the extensive rite of offering.
Having gazed again and again for as long as the maṇḍala of the body remains, in order that they grant the inconceivable supreme,
one should thoroughly bind the directions.
Those whose minds are filled with compassion,
who grant inconceivable fruits,
are all present by virtue of the mind;
and having once again, by the Protector of the World,
contemplated them in this way with the mind,
one should offer scents and flowers.
In particular, the torma
should be offered according to the rite.
Having given it, one should regard the buddhas above, whose minds are compassion itself, who behold the suffering of saṃsāra,
as the lord who is present there.

Then, taking flowers and incense in the hand,
and placing them at the heart,
one should make this supplication to them:
'May all the perfect buddhas who abide,
of one taste with compassion,
working for the benefit of beings, grant that I truly obtain the fruit I desire.'
In this way, in all the directions,
one should make supplication to the abodes of the Victors.
Then, after contemplating them correctly,
the children of the Victor as well,
with the rite of water offering and the rest,
and with scents, flowers, and so on, once again,
the protectors, as though directly present,
should be worshiped by one in meditative equipoise.
All of them in their own bodily forms, likewise bearing their own weapons,
with their own attire and weapons,
should be imagined as fearless.
All of these are said to hold offerings in their hands and to wear diadems upon their heads.
They should be imagined as fulfilling every wish,
as beings of great fortune.
Thus the protector of the maṇḍala should be imagined as the very lord of the offering,
the lord who brings healing to the teaching;
he should be contemplated in every respect.
Then the learned one should offer to him lamps, water for offering and very lovely water for rinsing the mouth, scents, flowers, lamps, incense, the torma, and likewise food,
and rice and milk porridge as well."

"Sixteen vases, their necks bound with cloth, should be set in place.

Parasols, victory banners, and flags,
horses and elephants, the finest of mounts,
the most pleasing sound of bells,
and above all precious music:
countless koṭis
of the very finest should be offered.
Above all, with pleasing sounds, melodies and songs, gentle and captivating,
and above all the music of bells,
one should worship the virtuous maṇḍala.
Having worshiped thus according to the rite,
joining the ten fingers in añjali,
in order to increase the aspiration one bows down to the supreme Victor and the rest.
Then the disciple who has come,
the intelligent one, is called into the maṇḍala,
and one then gives him refuge in the three.
Endowed with devotion to the Three Jewels,
he should take up, without omitting anything,
the carefully examined mind of awakening.
He is always devoted to his guru,
endowed with profound intelligence,
of great enthusiasm and perfect understanding,
delighting in recitation and applying himself to it, praiseworthy and perfect in moral discipline, delighting in giving and very diligent,
fully possessed of the six faculties,
skilled in the arts and in ritual,
of great enthusiasm and courage,
mindful of kindness done and repaying it,
deeply respectful toward father and mother, utterly certain about the Three Jewels;
he makes offerings to the buddhas, the śrāvakas, the teachings,
and to worldly beings;
he is endowed with faith and compassion,
free of illness, with no faculty impaired,
truly devoted to the benefit of sentient beings;

he silences all talk of evil,
is wholly free of wrong views,
and relies truly on right view.
Whether he is yellow, green, or white,
or even black, his complexion is fine;
his body is very straight,
his head very broad,
his nose well formed, his eyebrows unbroken,
his eyes and lashes fine,
and everything is evenly well developed;
likewise his head is like a parasol,
his waist is broad and well formed,
his feet are very firmly planted,
and he is endowed with these and other good qualities.
Then, when the guru has examined them,
five or eight should be accepted,
or countless, as many as he truly wishes,
and then he should give to them refuge in the three, the confession of misdeeds, and the offering of oneself,
for the sake of the awakening of a buddha.
The mind of awakening, without omission,
is to be taken up by the person of intelligence.
All of these should be done properly.
Then the true Dharma should be taught once more:
'In countless koṭis of eons leisure and endowment are extremely hard to find;
like the udumbara flower,
they appear only now and then, by chance.
Even harder to find than that is the protector of the world, the savior.
So too upon the earth
is the way of the lord's secret mantra.
In this ocean of saṃsāra, my son,
so full of suffering and terror, apart from the secret mantra on earth
no savior at all is to be seen.

Therefore, wishing to abandon the faults of saṃsāra in every form, having seen the harsh terrors of old age, sickness, fear, and death,
when one relies on this supreme path,
all suffering is cut off.
Bondage under endless punishments and the other masses of suffering:
when one relies on this supreme path,
they arise nowhere; they become exceedingly rare.
The suffering over relatives and dear friends, companions, kin, and in-laws,
the suffering over wealth and possessions,
the torment of the suffering of illness,
the suffering of fear for food:
for anyone dwelling in saṃsāra upon the earth,
when he comes to rely on this way,
these will not arise.
Ten, eight, and then five:
refuge in the three and the precepts for a set time should be given as trainings and taken up.
The teaching of the Buddha is very rare.
Having truly taken up the vows,
one should guard one's restraint
as embodied beings guard their lives.
Perfect leisure is rare.
Arising from the conduct of secret mantra,
first one should rely on a single experience.
With a body like a wish-fulfilling jewel,
one attains the peaceful state of a buddha.
This path is supreme and glorious,
and grants inconceivable fruit.
Having relied on Acala,
one comes to the unsurpassed state.
This is the supreme reality,
which wholly abandons all suffering.
One endowed with deep devotion will attain the Great Vehicle.

Therefore you should be devoted to the Great Vehicle without deceit.
Through it, among beings,
you will become a tathāgata,
with a mind that benefits all sentient beings, fulfilling every wish.
You will teach the three vehicles;
from abiding in that way it comes about.
Endowed with profound intelligence,
you will teach the profound meaning;
when you teach the way of the Victor,
freedom from doubt will come of it.
Then you will teach the true Dharma, primordially at peace and without abode.
All the sentient beings who hear it will be born as children of the Victor.
Here there is no self, and no life principle,
no Īśvara, and no agent,
no creator of the world, and no sentient being,
no male, and no neuter,
no person, and no abode,
no one there who experiences feeling,
no primal matter, and nothing all-pervading,
nothing subtle, and nothing manifest,
no cause, and nothing else besides:
one's own essence has no intrinsic nature,
what is one's own has no intrinsic nature,
and upon the earth there is nothing permanent.
All is like what springs from the acts of a magical illusion, devoid of an agent and the rest.
View all these as empty and examine them in the state of wisdom.
Self, life principle, and all the rest are imagined only by the childish.
Here there is no self and no sentient being,
only what arises from the absence of desire.

Like an illusion, a mirage,
a city of gandharvas, or a dream,
all things are emptiness;
they truly abide like a plantain tree, ungraspable and inexpressible, abiding like foam and bubbles.
Illusory birth is no birth;
it is emptiness, like space;
like space, it is unstained,
and abides in complete purity.
This is the reality of supreme peace,
always taught by the one supreme in every aspect.
Whoever attains supreme wisdom here will become a tathāgata.'
Then the mantra practitioner, to free
the supplicating disciple from misdeeds, should make protection with the sword mudrā,
and after that should don the armor;
the one who knows the rite should protect him.
Wishing to benefit the disciple, the mantra practitioner should recite everywhere
the fifteen syllables,
the mantra that brings satisfaction."

With the correct mantra one should sprinkle for purification.
Having bound the disciple's face with a cloth,
one should have him bow his head to the ground.
With his mind turned toward the Three Jewels,
and with a mind endowed with compassion, imagining all the protectors to be directly present, one should lead him in.
All will attain the state of lordship;
all grasping is utterly abandoned;
and buddhahood, just as one wishes,
will come about without any doubt.
Having offered the fee to the guru,
one should request empowerment.

With one's very life, become devoted,
one should bow down to the guru.
As the fee to be offered to the guru, humbly submitting one's own body,
one should offer oneself as the gift;
otherwise there will be no fruit.
Jewels, elephants, horses and cattle,
and whatever else he may have in mind:
the disciple, with a devoted mind,
should offer all of these.
Likewise one should offer garments.
For one who pleases the guru and offers the fee to the guru,
an inconceivable fruit is declared.
Therefore, in every way,
one should honor this Victor, supreme among beings.
Here he is declared to be a perfect buddha;
he is declared the lord of the abode of the ten grounds,
and all the guardians of the world;
likewise Śakra and the rest, and the hosts of māras, Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra,
the nāginīs and the son of Vinatā,
and all the hosts of planets and lunar mansions;
the aggregates too, and the great miraculous powers,
and what is called the exhaustion of the defilements:
all of these are declared to be him.
The glorious tamer of those hard to tame,
Vajrapāṇi here upon the earth,
who works for the sake of the glorious teaching,
holding the instructions of the sublime path,
the very body of the perfect Buddha,
is truly declared the one embodiment of all qualities.
Hold to the master's good qualities,
never at any time to his faults.
By holding to his qualities one gains accomplishment;
through faults accomplishment is destroyed.
To step upon his shadow

is said to be the same as destroying a stūpa.
He bestows inconceivable fruit;
he should be regarded as a buddha.
He who teaches all the supreme secrets of the stable and the moving:
you should not meet with those who revile the master,
not even in a dream.
Whoever reviles the master
is seized by obstructors and by those who lead astray.
Such sinful beings
should be shunned far away upon the earth.
In whatever hells are firmly established, terrible ones such as Avīci,
whoever reviles the master
will there be thoroughly cooked.
Therefore, in every way,
one who desires the fruit of buddhahood should honor with devotion this wondrous one, who bestows inconceivable fruit.
I shall explain in detail
the rite of empowerment: listen, my son.
Wherever empowerment is conferred,
the world will look upon him as a buddha.
There an eight-petaled lotus is prescribed, one cubit in size.
The vajra that abides within it is adorned with rays of light.
Eight vases, complete in every way,
are filled to the brim with pure water;
their necks are tied with fine lengths of cloth,
their mouths adorned with fine leaves.
Having incanted them with the king of the wrathful ones,
one fills them with all medicines and jewels.
With parasols, victory banners and flags,
the captivating sound of music and the like,
hosts of sweet and abundant praises,
and joyful celebration on every side,

the mantra practitioner then confers empowerment,
acting as though the protector were directly present.
Immediately upon conferring empowerment,
he gives it for the realization of glorious awakening.
From then on, my son, you are a son of the buddhas upon the earth, honored by the stable and the moving,
and you will be embraced by the bodhisattvas.
Because he has become unseen,
he is called a bodhisattva:
māras, obstructors and serpents,
and others who lead astray,
for that reason will not see the bodhisattva, the son of the Victor.
Even what has not been accomplished is swiftly accomplished,
and he vanquishes all the māras.
One who is empowered in this maṇḍala is certainly a buddha.
Here the terrible suffering of suffering will never arise again.
All attain the state of lordship;
all fears are utterly abandoned;
and likewise they are adorned with every good quality.
Then, to benefit the disciple,
one should begin the fire offering.
One should also make the fire pit,
and furnish it with a rim.
In its center is a wondrous vajra,
for the purpose of pacification.
All around that fire pit
one should anoint it with perfume.
The fire hearth is to be one cubit in size:
so the Tathāgata has truly taught.
With wood from which fire readily springs one should kindle the fire in this hearth.
Then one should offer water for welcome and water for rinsing the mouth.
Sprinkling for purification upon the ground is prescribed.

One should spread out the tips of kuśa grass,
and encircle it again with the root ends.
In this way one should do all of these things.
Beautified with an anointing of butter and honey, the one who is truly skilled should make the fire offering with kindling sticks.
With a mind endowed with compassion,
naming each disciple one by one,
one should burn the glorious burnt offerings, exactly twenty of them.
Having done all of this,
with a mind endowed with compassion,
and bowing low to all the supreme Victors,
one should then make this aspiration:
"Blessed One, by whatever merit I have gathered,
countless and immeasurable,
may all beings without exception attain the unsurpassed state.
May all the countless koṭis of sentient beings,
and whoever else has fallen into the lower destinies,
through the power of my merit,
all be endowed with happiness.
Whatever sufferings the hungry ghosts endure,
and whoever has fallen into the lower destinies,
through the power of my merit,
may they all be freed from them.
However many sentient beings there are,
with all their various sufferings,
may all of these be pacified,
and may no one ever suffer.
Whatever misdeeds beings have committed,
arising from body, speech and mind,
may no sentient being be touched by them;
may all be endowed with happiness."
Then, bowing to all the supreme Victors, taking up perfume, flowers and the like,
and looking above and below,

then, in order to withdraw them,
one should then speak once more:
"All you protectors, directly present,
out of love for me, come again;
Blessed Ones, together with your sons, great beings, until my aim is accomplished, please come again."
Then the torma, the flowers, and the colored powder together with the perfume
the mantra practitioner who desires the supreme accomplishment should not touch with his hand.

Then, having blessed them oneself,
sitting on the ground and taking off one's garments, one should gather them up with care and consign them to a river.
Having striven diligently in this way,
when the second day dawns,
the wise one should then teach the mudrās that bring about every accomplishment.
By merely binding one of them,
the deity draws near to one.
Taming all sentient beings
who dwell in great suffering upon the earth, the terrifying one is not seen by the whole world of the stable and the moving.
Blessed by all the buddhas,
truly endowed with every excellence, accomplishment through the mudrā will always come about without any doubt.
The mudrā of the sword is taught;
then, after that,
I shall explain the armor: listen.
For the head, there is also the hammer;
for the crown, there are the stones;
the command-sign mudrā, and the one at the heart,
and the binding of the directions should be performed.

Likewise the mudrās of the lamp and of perfume,
the mudrā of the torma, and of incense too,
the mudrās of flowers and of food,
and that of invitation itself;
and those for the tathāgatas and the Victor's sons,
for the śrāvakas, and for the messengers and the rest,
for all who are worldly,
and likewise for the hosts of sages,
for those declared to be the sisters,
and for the seven mātṛkās:
all of these without exception,
listen to them in detail, here upon the earth.
Attentive, not wavering for even an instant,
come, my son, and listen, for your benefit.
By merely uttering them,
obstructors and those who lead astray are vanquished.
The index finger and the middle finger
the intelligent one should extend straight;
the ring finger and the little finger
he should press down firmly with the thumb.
This should be done with the right hand.
Holding it as a true sword,
having put the sword into its sheath,
one should draw it out again completely.
Terrifying, as though blazing,
it should be whirled in all directions.
This is the glorious sword-holder,
the sword of wisdom, son of the Victor.
Whatever has arisen from ignorance
he cuts with the sword whose nature is wisdom.
Therefore, in every way,
to vanquish all the kings of obstructors, continually, each day at the three times,
one should bind this mudrā.
One should bind the left fist tightly,
with the index finger set inside the thumb;
the threatening forefinger, bent and set inside,

is what is called the noose.
The glorious one who holds this mudrā
is known as the noose mudrā.
If even the lords of the abode of the ten grounds are all summoned by it,
why would vicious beings, like the denizens of hell,
from wherever they are, not turn toward it?
The middle fingers are joined together,
their tips touching one another;
the index fingers and the ring fingers are placed entirely within the hands;
the thumbs press upon them, facing them;
and the little fingers are set at the front.
This the perfect Buddha, supreme among those with two feet,
has declared to be the mudrā of the armor.
One should place the sword of wisdom at the heart and upon the five limbs as well;
then one dons the armor with the mudrā.
The mudrā is a restraint for sentient beings.
One should strive diligently in this way.
To free the disciple from misdeeds,
and to accomplish every excellence,
one should then confer empowerment.
At the time of recitation and on other occasions,
one should make protection according to the rite.
Against the various kinds of obstructors,
and when other enemies arise as well,
to accomplish the aims of both oneself and others,
one should always apply this.
Taking hold of each hand with the other,
one should make both hands firm,
and raise the two index fingers upward:
this is called the mudrā of the head.
As for what the two hands do:
each should be bound into a fist.
With the hand of the guhyaka, taking hold from the left thumb,

one raises the right thumb upward.
Smashing like a vajra,
it blazes like a great fire;
the hand abides like a vajra.
Whomever the mantra practitioner is angered at,
gods, nāginīs and their retinues, yakṣas, mahoragas and rākṣasas,
kumbhāṇḍas and pūtanas,
asuras, hungry ghosts and kiṃnaras,
and any others who create obstacles;
elephants, horses and chariots,
whoever is as arrogant as the ocean,
whatever king is vicious,
and those who harm this teaching:
in order to tame and to destroy those vicious beings,
and likewise for swift accomplishment,
one should apply the great mudrā,
placing it together with the mantra.
Through the deities arisen from oneself, abiding firmly in the maṇḍala,
one should join cause and result.
The right hand is bound into a fist,
with the middle finger raised upright:
this the lord of the perfect buddhas has declared to be the crown.
The left hand is bound into a fist,
and the index and middle fingers are raised;
this is always bound with the left.
It is known as the command-sign mudrā.
The fists of the two hands are bound and pressed against each other;
set firmly together as one,
this is declared to be like a stone.
The right hand is bound tightly into a fist,
and the skilled one sets it at the heart.
The perfect Buddha, holiest of those with two feet,

has called this the mudrā of the heart.
The middle finger and the index finger,
and the thumb, are each extended;
setting both hands in this way,
one should radiate out to the ten directions.
Having bound the ten directions with this,
the skilled one should recite the mantra.
The two hands are joined with palms together,
and the middle fingers joined within.
The perfect Buddha, holiest of those with two feet,
has called this the mudrā of perfume.
Interlacing the hands outward,
one raises the thumbs and middle fingers upward,
and sets the little fingers raised as well.
The Victors and the Victors' sons have called this the mudrā of the lamp.
Again releasing the hands outward, reversing them, the middle and the index fingers and the thumbs are as before,
with the joints held very firm.
Accompanied by the mantra,
this is called the mudrā of the torma.
The mudrā of the sheath of the hands is beautiful, just like a sheath.
In brief, it is the mudrā of incense,
as the Victor, supreme among persons, has taught.
Joining and bending the middle and ring fingers,
one presses them down from above with the thumb.
When this is done with the left hand as well,
it is called the mudrā of flowers.
Joining the hands with palms facing downward, the middle fingers and the ring fingers and the index fingers are bent, while the little fingers remain outside,
and the thumbs face toward them there:
this is called the mudrā of food.
The knower of mantra, seated cross-legged, paryaṃkāśīn, joins the hands in the shape of an alms bowl,

bends the thumbs,
and, intelligent, joins them at their base.

the knower of secret mantra should invite the protector Śākyasiṃha,
the hero who wears the saffron Dharma robes,
the lord who works for the sake of the teaching.
In the boundless, endless realms of the world,
if one who has wisdom, deeply settled in meditative equipoise, contemplates him constantly,
he will attain the fruit he patiently pursues.
Joining the two hands with palms together,
the skilled one bends the index fingers and sets the thumbs at their tips:
this always summons the Victor's sons.
Shaping the hands like a lotus,
with only the middle and ring fingers,
one summons all of these:
the śrāvakas who dwell upon the earth.
As for whatever hosts of female messengers are taught,
the messengers too have great miraculous power;
the mudrā taught for them
summons them on earth with a hook.
One binds the right fist tightly, making it thoroughly firm;
the one who has wisdom extends the index finger and bends it at the third joint.
Holding the left hand
at the wrist with the right hand, one should summon, being steadfast,
the female messengers and the rest upon the earth.
From the center, with the hands turned outward,
the middle fingers are raised upright;
the index fingers are made straight and joined closely with them;
bending them toward the inner side,

one sets the thumbs opposite each other.
This is the mudrā for the worldly ones,
well known as the summoning.
With these very mudrās,
holding the left hand fully apart,
the right hand summons all the sages
and those who abide in ascetic observance.
Holding the left hand straight,
the skilled one should bend the middle finger,
and bend the index finger as well.
The glorious one who holds this mudrā
is renowned as the one for the sisters.
One should invite the sisters,
who grant accomplishment and are sublime.
Extending the right hand straight,
three fingers are stretched out straight;
there, the tip of the bent index finger should be touched with the thumb.
By this mudrā one certainly summons the seven mātṛkās.
The perfect Buddha, holiest of those with two feet,
has truly taught this mudrā.
Being always conscientious,
one should guard the maṇḍala on the ground.
This mudrā is rare to hold,
so the supreme Victor has declared.
If one relies on this mudrā,
one attains an inconceivable fruit.
Therefore, in every way,
when the mantra practitioner who desires inconceivable fruit and wishes for accomplishment always holds it,
obstructors and those who lead astray,
nāgas and all the vicious rākṣasas, yakṣas, kumbhāṇḍas and kinnaras,
hungry ghosts, pūtanas and great mahoragas,
since he is protected by this mudrā,

will find no opening to seek a weak point.
Moreover, vicious beings,
and whatever diseases are terrible:
none of these will occur,
for he is thoroughly protected by this mudrā.
He is wholly free from every fear,
and all are endowed with true lordship.
None of these things will occur;
one should entertain no doubt about this.
Whatever beings there are on their paths who commit extremely violent deeds, whom the Sugata, with his peaceful heart,
is unable to tame:
in order to tame them thoroughly,
this wrathful one, who is hard to find,
has been beautifully taught by the Sugata.
He bestows inconceivable fruit.
Various inconceivable deeds are declared to be inconceivable;
therefore this too is inconceivable.
This teaching of the pledge and of wisdom will come to ruin
if one deceives the buddhas, and then none of the fruits of secret mantra will arise.
In order to complete the accumulations for awakening,
one should always guard the pledge.
By guarding the pledge,
the fruit of accomplishment will arise.
Being always unwavering,
embodied beings should form the mudrās.
Even the childless will obtain a son;
even what is unaccomplished will all be accomplished.
When no child has been conceived, the embodied one that is wished for is conceived in the womb.
Then the mudrā, correctly applied,
accomplishes every aim.
This is the teaching of the mudrā that is called entry into the maṇḍala.

Otherwise, for all embodied beings,
when the rite is impaired, there is no fruit.
Whatever lords and other kings there may be attain equality with the supreme among humans.
This is the path of its rite;
upon the earth there is no other.
All attain the state of lordship;
all fears are utterly abandoned.
By holding the mudrā,
all sentient beings will gain power.
The characteristics of the stance upon the earth
I shall explain in detail: come and listen.
By merely binding it,
one attains an inconceivable state.
Whatever vicious ones there are upon the earth,
gods, nāgas and yakṣas, mahoragas, rākṣasas and kinnaras, bhūtas, grahas and piśācas,
and any other obstructors who lead astray:
in order to vanquish them,
the disciple who holds the stance,
in the three places, at their sites,
applying it while settled in equipoise, will without doubt cause that one
to be destroyed or to die.
At the place where the pledge is given,
with flowers at the crown of the head and palms joined,
having worshipped all the Victors,
one should prostrate again and again.
Then, settled in equipoise,
one binds upon the earth with the binding of the mudrā.
Raising one foot,
one should cast down a fierce gaze.
One should take this posture with wrath,
casting the gaze down beneath the foot.
The right hand should be raised,

and the left placed at the heart;
one should stand with the legs spread apart.
From the body the syllable hūṃ blazes with light.
The obstructors of the stable and the moving, or any others, are held fast below to be struck down.
By pressing down and striking with the foot,
one makes the gods and asuras tremble;
the three worlds tremble as well,
and one burns them unbearably.
When all have been burnt,
one circles close beside them.
Oneself in the likeness of the wrathful one,
taking up the mudrā of the noose,
one should bind with the noose mudrā.
Binding with that noose mudrā
those who dwell in all ten directions, one torments them severely.
Proclaiming "Ha ha!", one displays great magical feats,
and some are destroyed and turned to ash.
"O Sugata, great-souled one!"
all of them say in pleasing words,
"O greatly fortunate one, give us your command;
we will do as you command.
Not following our own wishes,
we shall not break your command."

Then the great Sugata spoke to them of the pledge:
"You ought to keep in mind
the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha as well.
All of you who have received the command must also guard the teachings.
The command of the great-souled
mantra practitioner must not be broken.
Do no harm to anyone;
never create obstacles.
The command of one whose mind is set on the Buddha and the Dharma will not be broken.

The command of the mantra practitioner is never to be broken;
if he pursues the aim of his petition,
the pledge will grant its fruit in this way.
If you break the command,
when the great-souled mantra practitioner,
the mantra practitioner, utters hūṃ,
you will always be crushed to ash.
This is the glorious Vajradhara,
the great wrathful one of great strength;
with his vajra he splits the head like the bud of the arjaka." Then all of them, stupefied and terrified, spoke these words:
"Just as the mantra practitioner has decreed,
we shall not break the command.
We shall honor you as is fitting,
and we shall protect you thoroughly.
We shall always remain
devoted to the mantra practitioner.
We shall guard the sacred Dharma,
the abode taught by the Sugata, and we shall guard the teaching for as long as it endures." Commanded in this way by the Sugata, they were bound firmly to the pledge.
"Great-souled bearer of the vajra, satisfy the Sugata.
If obstructors should cause harm to the teaching, or if any of them
should harm sentient beings, eldest son and only son of the Sugata,
you, Vajra, the great-souled, at my command you should always split their heads with the vajra."

Then the glorious Vajradhara, with a delighted heart,
rose from his seat,
and toward the command spoken by the Sugata,
with palms joined and kneeling,
said: "I place your command upon my crown.
Protector, to me, the son of your Dharma,
your son, give your command.
The command for the three times
I shall uphold just as it is."
Then the great vajra king,
before the maṇḍala of the Omniscient One,
with a voice like the deep sound of a drum,
spoke in melodious words:
"All you of great miraculous power,
and you obstructors and rākṣasas, listen.
The command of the great-souled
mantra practitioner must not be broken.
If you break the command,
if you harm sentient beings,
or if, in the maṇḍala upon the earth,
you harm the teaching,
with my blazing vajra,
together with your sons and your armies, whatever gods or asuras you may be,
the mounts of the gods or their abodes,
since the Sugata's command remains in force,
I shall crush you all to ash."
Then, there, to the great-souled one born of the vajra, they spoke these words:
"Hero, whatever you command, we place ourselves under your command."
Then, extending the left leg and binding the hands together,
one strikes at the place where the obstructors are.
If one strikes with the right hand of that same posture with the mudrā of the wheel,

they are crushed into a dust of ash.
If one creates obstacles,
even a bodhisattva of the ten grounds,
even one such as Brahmā,
or even a god, will be destroyed.
The left hand is set in its place,
and the right is placed on the head;
then one strikes the obstructors who are bhūtas.
Again withdrawing the left hand, one arises like the flames of the fire at the end of the eon and should strike with the vajra palm.
The very earth becomes like powder;
what need to mention vicious beings?
Pressing the lower lip with wrathful teeth,
the eyes knit in a wrathful frown, with the vajra palm well joined
one vanquishes all three realms of existence.
Extending the left side of the body,
one strikes with the vajra mudrā.
If the three realms of existence are crushed to ash,
what need to speak of vicious beings?
Standing with the feet even,
one sets the left index finger at the forehead;
the right hand is raised upward,
the tip of its index finger blazing fiercely;
one strikes at the place where the obstructors are,
the mouth adorned with the syllable hūṃ.
Striking with the root mudrā,
the body appears like the fire at the end of the eon.
Even if one had a body of vajra,
one would be destroyed.
Setting the feet unevenly, askew,
the hand raises a staff upward;
whirling it all around with the right hand,
one strikes the form of the obstructor.
Struck by the mudrā of the staff,
as if blazing forth from the body,

it is crushed to ash without any doubt;
it will certainly die.
Pressing down with the foot of the extended left leg,
one raises the right hand to the head;
raising the left foot,
and uttering hūṃ from a fearsome mouth,
one splits even Meru, the king of mountains,
and the ocean too dries up.
The one who holds this glorious mudrā abides well in the observance.
Whatever classes and the like are spoken of,
obstructors and the exceedingly fierce:
in order to vanquish them,
one should apply this mudrā.
Like cotton carried off by the wind,
all of them are crushed to ash.
With the sound of the syllable hūṃ,
one should raise the hammer to the head;
the left hand is set at the heart,
and again the right remains above.
If the skilled one, forming a wheel,
strikes with the hands joined evenly,
all the obstructors are destroyed:
this should be stated in brief.
Those whom no other mudrā or sign is able to repel
will without doubt be vanquished here by this mudrā that has been taught.
Setting the feet upon the ground,
one forms the vajra mudrā well,
like the blazing fire of the vajra.
Though, when examined, there is no self in it,
one presses the lower lip wrathfully with the upper teeth and strikes the vicious beings.
Struck by the vajra mudrā,
they burn unbearably.
Gathering those exceedingly fierce ones,

one opens for them the way of the command.
Whatever the mantra practitioner wishes in his mind,
they then give it to him.
Otherwise there would be grave transgression,
and the mantra practitioner's body would be destroyed.
Like the fire at the end of the eon, adorned with the proclamation "Hā hā!",
the intelligent one, by the mudrā of the noose, summons them from every side.
Even if it were Vajradhara himself,
when, holding the mudrā of the sword,
the mantra practitioner proclaims hūṃ,
he would without doubt
be dried up and destroyed,

so the supreme Victor has always declared.
Standing with the feet set evenly,
one places the hands in the armpits,
and then covers the hands again,
and likewise presses the lips with the teeth.
Again, in the posture with the left leg extended, raising the right hand
and setting the left at the heart, one arises like the fire at the end of the eon.
Striking at the place of the obstructors,
one crushes them to ash at once.
Bending the legs,
holding the right hand and the left upon the thighs, one should give praise.
Pressing the lower lip wrathfully with the upper teeth,
one should cast the gaze downward.
Gathering all the obstructors together,
the intelligent one places the hands in the armpits,
and all of them are tormented.
Whatever nāgas and rākṣasas, obstructors of great terror,
and people who do harm there may be,

by the application of this mudrā
all of them will be destroyed.
Sending the hands behind the back,
one should turn about with the right.
Or else, standing unevenly, askew,
one should strike with the vajra hammer.
Approaching the place of the obstructors,
one should cast down the wrathful gaze.
If Vajradhara upon the earth strikes at the form of an obstructor, that one will be destroyed;
it will die without any doubt.
With the foot of the extended left leg,
the mantra practitioner facing east,
with the noose mudrā and the excellent armor, blazing like the light of fire,
the lord of the abode of the ten grounds summons all the obstructors.
Having summoned them from every side,
the sword mudrā cuts them down.
When all have been summoned,
they cry out most piteously:
"Today we remember
that we are sons and daughters to our mothers.
Look upon this suffering of ours!
This is surely death."
"If you wish to stay alive,
do not create any obstacles.
The command of the great-souled
mantra practitioner must not be broken."
One holds the obstructors alive in one's hand.
Again, moving to the right,
one should swiftly press down with the foot.
Imagining oneself to have become Mount Meru, this great-souled one presses down the three realms entirely, without remainder.

Whatever obstructors and other vināyakas there are,
once the mantra practitioner proclaims the sound hūṃ,
will never again seek an opening there.
This posture, as truly taught,
is the secret of all secret mantras.
If you desire the fruit of mantra,
do not teach this to anyone.
One's own self as the body of the deity, endowed with the mudrā and the maṇḍala;
one's own sign, the seed syllable,
and one's nature, fashioned outwardly:
these one should strike continually, without interruption.
Otherwise there is no fruit.
In brief, my son, here
I have spoken the secret.
The rite of the mudrās and signs:
do not explain this everywhere.
Whatever other sinful beings there are,
who terribly revile the guru,
who do not acknowledge father and mother,
who revile the Three Jewels,
who are fearsome in form and without faith,
who commit the five deeds of immediate retribution,
who are without courage and lazy,
without enthusiasm and given to sloth, sunk in this mire of the stain of avarice, whoever always remains so:
to them the secret
taught by the buddhas should not be explained.
For any other vicious beings,
those who always do sinful deeds,
one should not recite the king of the wrathful ones,
nor show them the maṇḍala.
Those who do not know secret mantra and have no mudrā,
and whoever disparages the guru,
none of them should exercise
any of the powers the Victor has taught.

Whatever secret there may be,
this heart essence that bears the name of the wrathful one,
wishing to benefit sentient beings,
I have taught it without remainder.
Relying on this secret,
whatever buddhas there have been in the past, whatever protectors will come in the future
for the benefit of beings,
and whatever protectors are present now,
in the manner of benefiting beings:
all of these protectors are beyond conception,
of unequaled wisdom and heroism,
inconceivable even when examined.
The undefiled sacred Dharma that they teach in their realms is victorious over māra everywhere;
primordially at peace, without any abiding,
they will turn the wheel of the Dharma.
From the hidden secret, the wisdom of sameness, whatever I had not taught before,
the secret maṇḍala upon the earth,
I have now spoken without remainder.
The countless protectors of the past,
and the others who will come in the future,
and those who are present now, abiding here for the benefit of beings:
whatever is the secret wisdom of them all,
which grants inconceivable fruit,
the secret wisdom that overcomes adversaries,
I have spoken all of it without remainder.
Whatever is taught in all the tantras, wondrously drawn forth by the supreme secret,
has been taught without remainder.
It grants inconceivable fruit;
all attain the state of lordship;
every happiness is truly bestowed;
and all embodied beings will come to be utterly free from every fear.

This swiftly brings accomplishment
and grants inconceivable fruit.
The secret that overcomes adversaries, protecting all sentient beings, has been taught.
Therefore, in every way,
the secret of secrets truly arises.
Being always conscientious,
the Victor taught it for the sake of protection.
By the great-souled mantra practitioner
the supremely delightful has been truly explained.
Through the heroic secret wisdom,
even what the mantra practitioner has not accomplished is accomplished.
The secret wisdom that overcomes adversaries
should not be explained to anyone.
The perfect Buddha, supreme among those with two feet,
the Protector, declared it inconceivable.
There are no hostile kings, and no vicious ones;
no obstructors and no vināyakas;
no rākṣasas, yakṣas or their lords;
no vicious planets and no mātṛkās;
no untimely death and no fear;
no turmoil caused by disease;
no ḍākinīs and no piśācas;
no lions, tigers and the like;
no great danger from water;
no fevers or other terrors;
none of the oppressors and the rest;
likewise no danger from lightning;
no bandits, robbers or the like;
likewise there is no plague,
and there is no danger of famine there;
likewise there is no fear of māra;
no fear from other kingdoms;
no fear of contagious disease there;
no carbuncles erupting in the night;
no illnesses of any kind;

and nothing else that brings fear.
Upon this earth, wherever it may be,
for whoever holds this in his hand,
in whose heart it abides,
being free from every fear,
he will attain the state of a true man among humans.
I have sought it with great hardship,

and likewise, with no regard for my own life,
by greatly pleasing countless protectors,
this supreme state comes to be attained.
This true wisdom, so very hard to find,
I have attained.
For the sake of beings, beyond all thought,
I remained for countless ages.
Now I, as a buddha,
am truly seated at the seat of awakening.
By displaying this mudrā
I was truly victorious over Māra.
These three realms of existence are thick with fears;
beings are filled with suffering.
Through my efforts in the three worlds
I have delivered them without exception.
I, the great self of all the buddhas without exception,
by teaching for the sake of beings, accomplished all of these things through the power of this mudrā.
Having attained the ground of incomparable wisdom, having attained upon the earth the ground of omniscience,
I am therefore a treasury of omniscience,
and having journeyed to the sublime state, I abide there.
Knowing the beings of the various worlds,
and seeing them tormented by suffering through the terrors of the hells and the rest, with a heart endowed with compassion
I taught the inconceivable sublime Dharma that brings forth its fruit by way of secret mantra.

Throughout the three worlds, just as I have taught,
true wisdom spreads forth.
The extensive rites of secret mantra
I have taught here.
Therefore, in every respect,
this sublime Dharma that I have taught,
one should explain the rite in full,
remaining always conscientious.
What is proclaimed through the secret mudrās should not be told to one who does not know the pledge.
All the buddhas would be deceived,
and the fruit of secret mantra would not arise.
Such people will fall into the lower realms;
no other result will come of it.
If any beings
should have broken their pledge, having diligently pleased the guru,
they should take up the pledge again upon the earth.
Then they should bind the mudrā,
the secret that is taught upon the earth.
Knowing the rite performed in this way,
joining mantra and mudrā thoroughly,
one attains an inconceivable body;
otherwise it will be without fruit.
Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni,
his heart endowed with compassion,
spoke with melodious words
to the great being Vajra Born:
"I shall explain what accomplishes every aim of secret mantra;
come here and listen.
Many inconceivable fruits have been taught again by the Sugatas.
Inconceivable are the various rites, inconceivable the fruits, overpowering all;
these holders of secret mantra possess them,
and therefore this too is inconceivable.
What the perfect buddhas have taught,

victorious through great miraculous power,
is a protection too for the world,
all of which is tormented by desire.
That I shall explain, my son;
listen with a mind intent on benefit.
Its fruit comes in this very life;
otherwise there will be no fruit."

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni at that time entered the meditative absorption called Play That Fulfills the Aspirations of All Beings. Having entered it, he spoke this king of secret mantras, the heart of all the supremely awakened tathāgatas, which fulfills the aspirations of all beings, liberates from all the lower realms, grants long life and freedom from illness and the like, and fully pacifies all illnesses:

namaḥ sarbbaśāparipūrkebhyaḥ sarbbatathāgatebhyaḥ sarbbathā acalakāṇa naṭṭanaṭṭa moṭṭa moṭṭa maṭṭa maṭṭa taṭṭa taṭṭa tiṣṭha tiṣṭha ābeśa ābeśa āḥmattamālaka dhaṇa dhaṇa tṛṇi tṛṇi khāda khāda bighnāṃ mārya māraya duṣṭaṃ rakṣa rakṣa sataṃ kuru kuru kiri kiri mahābijaya bajra phaṭ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ tṛbalitaraṃga nartaka haṃ haṃ haṃ acalaceṭa phaṭ phaṭ yaḥ āḥ hūṃ asamaṃ trikatrāṭa mahāpalaśātaya samānaya trāṃ māṃ hāṃ śudhyatu lokaḥ tuṣyatu bajrī namo stva pratihatabalebhyaḥ jvāla jvāla trāṭa asahanamaḥ svāhā

As soon as the Blessed One had spoken this supremely secret great heart mantra, this great trichiliocosm world system shook in six ways. It moved, moved strongly, and moved strongly all over. It trembled, trembled strongly, and trembled strongly all over. It shook, shook strongly, and shook strongly all over. It swayed, swayed strongly, and swayed strongly all over. It was stirred, stirred strongly, and stirred strongly all over. It roared, roared strongly, and roared strongly all over. When the east rose the west sank, and when the south rose the north sank, and a great light appeared in the world. Other wonders and marvels, too, were seen in the world.

All the obstructors and vināyakas,
whatever terrifying rākṣasas, piśācas and malevolent beings,
whatever māras and fearsome ones,
yakṣas, nāgas and kinnaras,

kumbhāṇḍas and pūtanas,
whatever hosts of asuras,
whatever planetary spirits and mātṛkās,
like cotton carried off by the wind,
all of them were crushed to dust.
The sound of a deep melody resounded in every direction.
Meteors of great terror fell,
and terrifying lightning raged.
As though the whole earth were ablaze,
there were masses of fire all over the earth.
Every direction became greatly terrifying;
the whole circle of the earth was in turmoil;
in a darkness of great terror
the circle of the earth was seen.
Buddhas, śrāvakas and gods,
bodhisattvas of great miraculous power,
and those whose minds had strayed from the path,
all of them were filled with wonder.
Sitting before the Omniscient One,
they addressed him with these melodious words:
"Omniscient One, please withdraw this display!
The sufferings of beings are stirred up everywhere.
Here, where the earth has become the seat of awakening,
we cannot bear this way of things."

To all of them the Omniscient One, rising as his meditative absorption dissolved into emptiness, the Protector, spoke to the bodhisattvas with melodious words:
"Bodhisattvas, do not be afraid!
Whatever gods are tormented by fear,
and other malevolent beings as well,
the worldly ones, the moving and the unmoving:
the perfect Buddha, supreme among two-legged beings,
has declared this to be inconceivable.
Then all beings

will truly attain every happiness;
all will attain the state of sovereign mastery;
all suffering will be left behind;
all their aspirations fulfilled,
it comes about at once upon the earth.
This heart mantra of the king of wrathful ones
the supreme Victor has always taught.
Because this great power is unseen,
the king of wrathful ones himself abides in it.
It should not be applied where there is no fit vessel.
The secret mantra, the secret, overpowers adversaries.
He himself is the Tathāgata, abiding here in wrathful form.
Fully endowed with various activities,
this secret mantra is accomplished by recitation.
Even one who has committed the five deeds of immediate retribution will swiftly succeed through it.
There are no lunar dates and no constellations;
even fasting is made unnecessary;
there are no bathing rites at all;
there is no sequence of rites with scents and the like;
there is no painted scroll, and no special place;
there is no sequence of rites for the proper time.
Even one laden with every sin accomplishes it wherever he truly abides."

Again the Blessed One,
his heart endowed with compassion,
spoke with melodious words
to the great being Vajra Born:
"The king of secret mantras, of great miraculous power,
the near-heart mantra of the wrathful king,
which swiftly bestows accomplishments,
I shall explain; my son, come and listen.
It is the very rite for whatever the mind desires, endowed with inconceivable activities.
When this great secret mantra has been accomplished,

it grants inconceivable fruits.
The supreme secret of the perfect buddhas, unknown to the stable and the moving,
fulfills every aspiration:
so the supreme Victor has always taught."

namaḥ sarbbaśāparipūrkebhyaḥ sarbbatathāgatebhyaḥ sarbbathātraṭa amoghacaṇḍamahāroṣaṇasphoṭaya hūṃ trāsaya hūṃ traka hāṃ maṃ

This here is the near-heart mantra of Vajrapāṇi's great wrathful one.
Capable of every activity,
this king of mantras of great miraculous power, fulfilling desires beyond conception, performs even activities for which no prior practice has been done.
Whatever rites are taught at length in the other kings of tantras, through the rite of this one they too, countless as they are, should be accomplished.
The wrathful one's servants who obey his commands,
the male and female messengers of great miraculous power, by the sequence of this rite
they too are accomplished as is fitting.
Whatever worldly gods there are,
whatever nāgas, Viṣṇu and the rest,
the planetary spirits, the lunar mansions and all the rest,
kumbhāṇḍas and pūtanas,
yakṣas, asuras and kinnaras,
yakṣiṇīs and piśācas,
whatever rākṣasas and humans,
sages and likewise ḍākinīs,
mātṛkās and rākṣasīs too,
whatever are described as worldly,
they too, by this very rite,
should be accomplished without any doubt.

As a general one, for the boundaries,
the Lord of the World taught this spell.
All the mudrās without exception and the mantras have been taught in full.
This mantra that accomplishes every aim brings success swiftly
and grants inconceivable fruits;
it has been truly taught as utterly secret.
Join it together with the mudrā.
Scents, flowers and incense,
and tormas too, all without exception,
no one at all can destroy.
Binding the directions, and then the food,
and whatever else the mind desires:
all of it is accomplished
by applying the mudrā together with its mantra.

Then the Blessed One spoke to Vajrapāṇi:
"This king of wrathful ones, as my legacy,
I hereby entrust to you.
Pacifying and enriching,
and likewise fierce rites and subjugation,
and likewise the various transformations,
all depend on you, as is supremely desired.
Born from manifold merit,
blazing with the excellent major and minor marks,
with every mark complete,
preceded by extending the mudrā,

I confer on you the empowerment of a perfect buddha,
O vajra holder born from the Sugata.
All that the Sugata has taught with the sound of a deep melody, the sequence of rites of the king of wrathful ones,
taught in its exact order:
you alone abide
to guard the renown of the stable and the moving.
The sublime Dharma, the emanation body, will pass into peace upon the earth.
In the presence of all the buddhas,
you alone remain upon the earth.
For those who have passed, those yet to come,
and those who abide for the benefit of beings,
you alone are the charioteer;
you attain the unsurpassed state."

Vajrasattva, endowed with insight, by placing the mudrā once again stirred all the great mighty ones,
and the earth shook in six ways.
All of them became manifest, and through the inconceivable sublime Dharma of the buddhas
he attains the inconceivable state.
The very self of Vajrasattva upon the earth obtains the light rays of the sky treasury.
The great noble one, a great marvel, comes forth truly in the world;
it is here, at this heart of the earth.

Then the Blessed One, the Victor, spoke with melodious speech to the bodhisattva of the ten grounds the secrets of the stable and the moving:
"I shall bring you satisfaction,
great being Vajradhara.
Remaining always conscientious,
the great being should do just that."

Then the Blessed One, at peace, was supremely absorbed in the expanse of phenomena;
having realized the one nature of reality,
the Omniscient One fell silent.
Then the whole assembly spoke words of wonder:
"Great are the buddhas, beyond conception!
This is what the Protector of the World has taught.
From this day forth, all of us will reach perfection in the one permanent state.
The great-souled vajra holder will be entrusted by the Sugata."
The assembly, with great joy,
spoke with melodious words:
"Great fortune has become supreme!
Please give us your command: what are we to do?"

Then glorious Vajradhara,
with sparks of fire flying forth,
by the force of his compassion spoke to the assembly:
"Listen to the very rite of the painted scroll of the wrathful king, of great miraculous power.
Whoever, by way of mantra, practices the conduct of a bodhisattva will then obtain the aims taught in the sādhanas of mantra.
Rare is one who holds the mantra;
embodied beings cannot withstand him.
All the malevolent vināyakas,
the rākṣasas of terrifying form,
cannot even see him from afar,
like proud heroes who have been vanquished.
All illnesses are completely cured;
all fears are entirely abandoned.
The state of sovereign mastery over all he obtains in the palm of his hand.

There are no lunar mansions and no planetary spirits and the like,
no mātṛkās and no gods either;
free from all fears
this circle of the earth becomes.
All beings obtain mastery,
and upon the earth the king who knows mantra,
honored with his retinue, speaks melodiously.
The painted scroll, when seen, is vividly clear.

"Take cloth, inspected to be free of hairs,
sold by a hero,
and wash it with white scented water until it is pure as the jasmine flower and the moon.
Have it worked again
until it is beautiful with ochre dye.
Make it beautifully perfumed with incense,
and keep cleanliness in every respect.
Then, having done so,
the ground should be thoroughly smeared,
and on it delightful fragrant scents should be smeared most beautifully.
Parasols, victory banners and pennants,
drums and bells of supremely sweet sound;
on a day of good stars and sun,
the root mantra is fervently recited.

A pleasing vase,
completely filled with scented water,
the mantrin should set out according to the rite,
and food and torma according to the rite.
When all this has been done in this way,
at that occasion, performed on a grand scale,
with those well trained in the work of music,
invite the greatly fortunate one there.
Then the poṣadha vows should be given,
and the mind of awakening will become distinguished.
That greatly fortunate one should be honored, adorned with clothing and ornaments.

When he has been duly honored,
then, in a very secluded place,
the wise one should lay down the lines.
The cloth should be covered over from its edge,
and set out lengthwise together with its border.
In its center the wise one should draw the wrathful one, very hard to behold, big-bellied and exceedingly wrathful,
lord of serpents, with four arms,
his face contorted, gazing sidelong,
blood dripping from his tongue,
fangs bared, utterly terrifying,
his radiance like massing banks of cloud,
his eyes like the rising sun,
the third like smoke.
He dances, crying out "hī,"
by nature a mass of serpent light.
A garland of fresh skulls,
seeming to hang in four strands, adorns the head of the greatly terrifying one.
On his left side a lock of hair hangs down.
With fiery light and showers of sparks,
a vajra is in his right hand;
in his second he holds a sword whose light rays blaze surpassingly.
His left hand holds a noose;
his second makes the threatening gesture.
His body is adorned with ornaments of snakes;
a son of Vāsuki serves as his belt.
A garland of fresh skulls
is arrayed upon him as an offering.
The hero wears garments of ochre.
Upon a rock of precious stone
he is seated with his right leg extended.
Below him an obstructor should be drawn,
blazing as it burns,
charred black,

its veins and entrails spilling out,
as though dripping with blood.
Below, the wise practitioner,
his knees planted on the ground,
busy with a vessel of incense, intent on holding the vessel of offering water.
This painted scroll as the most supreme
the perfect Buddha has proclaimed.
Through this painted scroll, at once,
even what the mantrin has not accomplished is accomplished.
The marvelous king of wrathful ones,
who torments all, should be drawn correctly.
One of great wisdom should treat the painter to a feast and give him his fee as well.
The brushes should bear the mark of being new,
and the potter's vessels should be new;
these are the particular signs to be distinguished;
or else everything comes about.
When one has seen that all has been done in this way,
it should be covered with a scented cloth.
Upon the earth it is utterly secret;
it should be shown to no one.
Whoever sees this wrathful one without understanding, his memory becomes confused;
that person, beset by disease,
will perish at once.
The mantrin who desires accomplishment,
always remaining conscientious,
the mantrin should always guard this painted scroll, constantly and without interruption.
The masters of mantra have explained:
the perfect buddhas, the heroes,
these bring about
qualities beyond conception.
Upon the earth, through the root mantra of the maṇḍala,
which has become the abode of qualities,
all of these should be accomplished.

All secret mantras are inconceivable;
inconceivable results arise from them.
This wrathful one, the great body of secret mantra, is called the Blessed Sage.
By the wise one of the king of wrathful ones
this secret mantra is accomplished through recitation.
This wrathful king is inconceivable;
the mantra too is held to be inconceivable;
all attain an inconceivable state.
Since it is taught to be accomplished through recitation,
the mantrin is not able to do it on his own.
For the intelligent mantrin, even if he has committed the five deeds of immediate retribution, it fulfills completely
that person's aspirations.
Therefore, in every way,
this mantra yields inconceivable results;
if one is always thoroughly trained in it,
the mantrin's inconceivable result arises.

The second painted scroll
I shall explain; listen with a mind intent on benefit.
Its vast and inconceivable qualities
the perfect Buddha has truly proclaimed.
Taking a cloth of ochre,
soak it completely with scented water.
There are no lunar dates and no constellations,
no poṣadha, fasting or the like.
Having sought out a good painter,
the skilled one should draw the painting:
the Buddha, the protector, the perfect Buddha, beyond the stages of meditative absorption,
his body that of a universal monarch,
with a radiance of many-colored light rays;
the bodhi tree, the wish-fulfilling tree,
adorned with parasols and victory banners;
at the sides, the king of birds,

his cupped hands filled with flowers.
On the right, the seated hero,
the great Sage, the Lord of the World, adorned with various ornaments,
his upper robe draped over one shoulder,
his palms joined, bowing,
should be shown gazing constantly at the one seated there.
Seated near him on the left,
with a proud bearing and laughing, holding at the crown of his head with his right hand this vajra, fiercely blazing,
is the great hero wearing a diadem,
adorned with every ornament.
The marks of each part of the painted scroll fulfill every aspiration.
Below, the wrathful Acala, adorned with sword and noose,
upon a seat of red rock,
seated amid masses of light rays,
encircled all around by blazing light,
lip pressed against lip, gazing sidelong,
burning up all obstructors,
appears like the fire at the end of time.
The practitioner gazes straight at him,
holding a censer in his hand,
both knees properly planted,
his mind turned toward the Victor's son.
Below that, the chief of the wrathful ones, firmly subduing the three realms,
having become the path of granting permission,
gazes at the Tathāgata.
Made of the seven precious substances,
with a full stalk and its anthers, the nāga maiden who holds it appears like the Tathāgata.
The white lotus is the protector,
the Lord of the World, master of compassion;

the red lotus is truly explained as the vajra holder born from the Sugata.
Such is the king of painted scrolls,
of great miraculous power, in which all these are made.
By seeing this painted scroll
all sins are abandoned;
the noose of thought, thick with fears,
and the lower realms are cut off;
all attain the state of sovereign mastery;
a Victor, the supreme being, will come forth.
Those seized by any of the planetary spirits,
those afflicted by any of the diseases,
those caught here by any of the fears,
are freed by seeing the rite.
One becomes loving toward all beings;
one brings all beings under one's power;
all attain the state of sovereign mastery.
One should always gaze upon the painted scroll.

Remaining always conscientious,
pure, adorned with moral discipline,
having duly honored the painted scroll,
one attains buddhahood in that very life.

Then the great Vajradhara,
his mind dwelling in one-pointed yoga, taught the desired procedure that bestows happiness on beings.
Pacifying and enriching,
subjugating and fierce rites:
having gathered these activities into a summary,
the mantrin who wishes to accomplish the painted scroll in a maṇḍala upon the earth should always listen to that one of great miraculous power.
The great being, the single hero,
the chief who acts for the sake of the teaching,
as he taught it to all embodied beings,
his procedure is truly explained.

The protector, who acts at once,
always tames those who are hard to tame.
Kings who are spoken of as wicked,
and those who do harm to the teaching:
in order to destroy them,
this wrathful one is fully applied.
Whatever others are spoken of here
who do harm to the teaching,
yakṣas, rākṣasas and kumbhāṇḍas,
gods and the rest, together with kinnaras:
in order to crush them,
the king of wrathful ones is fully applied.
All illnesses are completely cured;
enemy realms are utterly destroyed.
When an army is raised here,
if the king of wrathful ones is fully applied against malevolent beings and māras, it overpowers them with inconceivable strength.
For expulsion and for killing,
for destroying the three worlds,
or for driving someone permanently mad,
this should always be applied.
When the protector's supreme painted scroll comes into someone's hands,
it becomes, at the heart of the earth,
the sustenance of embodied beings, together with its fruit.
At that time, dwelling in the maṇḍala,
one carries out the activities of the mudrās.
The mantrin who holds it with respect,
pure and adorned with good character, thoroughly pleases the guru,
offering the fee for the sequence of the rite.
Having taken up any secret mantra whatever,
he fully receives the gift of the mudrās, obtains permission from the guru,
and strives in practice upon the earth.
A charnel ground, a mountain peak,

a crossroads, or a solitary landmark:
whatever place delights the mind,
in that very place one should begin.
One should eat only food from alms,
or else eat roots, fruits and the like.
In a secluded place free from noise,
there one should recite a hundred thousand times.
When the hundred thousand is complete,
one should burn kindling sticks of apāmārga and the like,
together with the three sweet substances.
When a hundred thousand of these are complete,
then, at the full moon,
one sits down before the time arrives.
Understanding this sādhana,
one should perform the rite of protection properly.
A sword or other weapon is prescribed,
or else any one at all is prescribed.
Having entered fully into this place,
the person who is the practitioner sits.
When the sound arises at midnight,
one should invite him to be seated before the painted scroll.
Reciting the secret mantra, one sets up the session;
this is the inner, pure abode.
Then the signs of it will arise there in many forms.
There are many sounds of sweet-voiced drums,
or else flowers fall as rain.
Sons of the gods come to the place,
and with sounds of various drums,
adorned by kinnaras,
they sing sweet songs.
Brahmā, Śakra and the other gods
of great miraculous power come there;
they rain down flowers,
and bowing, they beg him to give his command.
The vidyādharas let fall a rain of flowers that fills the earth;

with sounds of various drums, supremely blissful and captivating, filling all the earth there,
they also sing sweet songs.
The great bodhisattvas,
the lords of the ten grounds,
and the wise bodhisattva,
the compassionate one, declares:
"Great hero, my son, well done!
You have crossed the ocean of existence.
My son, you have attained the unsurpassed state,
the abode of the courageous.
You will become equal to the bodhisattvas;
you alone will bring benefit to beings.
My son, you are all the buddhas;
every fault has been entirely abandoned."
Then in the eastern quarter, countless and beyond measure, divine vehicles bearing flowers stand once more before him.
Nets of jeweled bracelets cover every direction entirely,
hung with tassels of pearls,
adorned with parasols, victory banners and pennants.
Parasols made of various jewels shine forth like the sun.
Above, a canopy of jewels is spread out level with the mountainsides.
Vidyādharas in many koṭis,
all adorned with shimmering ornaments, surround him on every side
and at once stand before him.
The mantrin who desires accomplishment
should swiftly recite to glorious Vajrapāṇi until the one of great miraculous power arrives.
When the great being has arrived there,
these signs will appear:

the earth shakes in six ways;
the ground is strewn with a carpet of flowers;
various fragrances of the great one make the earth exceedingly sweet-smelling;
in the four directions the sounds of drums and of music and the like ring out;
a great sound proclaiming "ha ha"
is heard in the ten directions.
To the great being who has arrived there,
with a mind that has become faithful,
one should announce and offer water for welcome and for refreshment, scents and flowers, in their proper order.
Then one should swiftly say these words;
one should say: "Welcome!
Seized by the enemy that is sin,
great hero, I am suffering;
protector, have compassion on me."
Then this great being,
Vajrapāṇi of great miraculous power,
spoke with melodious words
to the intelligent mantrin:
"Great hero, my son, well done!
You have seen what is hard to find.
My son, by accomplishing this king of wrathful ones of great miraculous power,
you have crossed the ocean of saṃsāra,
thick with the turmoil of terrible suffering.
There is no more fear of rebirth,
no dreadful fear of death.
You will see the perfect buddhas,
the great beings who are kind to living beings;
the protectors who dwell in the ten directions will always teach you the sublime Dharma." Knowing it to be so, he takes him by the hand himself,
and placing him on the great being's vehicle,
the source of all inconceivable qualities,

where he then abides,
for as long as the knower of mantra wishes
he shows him the buddha fields.
Sustained by the hero's merit,
he travels that far without hesitation.
Then at that time the great one,
having placed him there on the beautiful divine vehicle, then the one who has become a vajra holder

Acala, possessed of great miraculous power, is pleased.
Then he mounts the divine vehicle, surrounded by hosts of vidyādharas.
With great songs and the sound of drums,
the songs of the vidyādharas ring out.
By many inconceivable koṭis of vidyādhara garuḍas
he is surrounded at that time, and set free.
In the buddha fields he is the garuḍa who is universal monarch of all the vidyādharas.
He gains inconceivable qualities and lives for countless eons.
With the light of the sun and moon,
the glorious one who tames those hard to tame, when the one of excellent understanding has practiced all this,
in countless buddha fields
this object of worship shines forth.
He hears the inconceivable sublime Dharma,
and because the wise one has heard it,
the inconceivable qualities of a buddha arise.
This accomplishment of the wise one through the king of wrathful ones has been correctly explained.
Furthermore, for others, as is fitting,
he gives incomparable protection: listen!
Through this second painting,
as you, perfect buddhas, know,

from inconceivable, countless ones,
it was taught by the one called Śākya.
Pacifying, enriching,
subjugating, and likewise fierce rites are to be performed properly with the second painting, each as is fitting.
Whatever means of accomplishment
the Victor taught with this second painting, if one practices it on earth,
accomplish it by the rite with this very painting.
The rite of the means of accomplishment is inconceivable;
it was taught by the Inconceivable One.
Its inconceivable result was taught by the perfect Buddha, supreme among humans.
There is no reckoning of lunar days and no constellations;
in this there is no keeping of fasts.
Whether one has eaten leftovers or not,
one should practice again and again with diligence.
If one recites it a hundred thousand times, even a mantrin who has committed the five deeds of immediate retribution will himself, in all rites and in every way, become a supreme son of the Victors.
Healing and the like are done with dūrvā grass,
or else by reciting the mantra and casting it.
Those struck by fever and other diseases,
to heal the harm done by the vicious ones,
those seized by every kind of illness,
and those sorely tormented by all the planetary spirits:
place them before the painting and enchant them with the mantra of the wrathful one.
Fill a vase completely with water and bathe the person struck by disease.
When supreme ease is granted,
they will recover and return to health.
For those on earth seized by grahas
the fire offerings have been correctly taught:
one should make a fire offering of dūrvā grass smeared with the three sweet substances

in order to pacify the grahas.
The rākṣasas, as described,
the ḍākinīs of great miraculous power,
the piśācas and the kumbhāṇḍas,
the mātṛkās said to have great miraculous power,
and any others who, acting viciously,
harm the beings on earth:
in order to destroy them,
one should apply the king of wrathful ones.
For illnesses and for grahas, with kindling sticks of medicinal trees
such as myrobalan and emblic, one should perform this fire offering.
For one dwelling upon the earth who wishes to gain a kingdom, this rite is supreme:
the lotus rite, the sequence of the fire offering.
A hundred thousand water lotuses smeared with the three sweet substances should be offered in the fire before the painting by one who so desires.
One who wishes to become king should perform the rite correctly and properly.
If one wishes to become a minister,
its rite is explained as follows:
three hundred thousand night lotuses should be offered in the fire by one who wants that result.
He will become a king's minister, accomplishing whatever he desires.
If one smears apāmārga grains with the three sweet substances and makes a hundred thousand fire offerings, one gains lordship over a district, or a city.
Seven hundred thousand fragrant substances should be offered in the fire before the painting.
Then the mantrin will obtain whatever he has in mind.
If a woman without a son seeks a son,

when she makes a fire offering of dūrvā grass, sesame, rice and the like,
she will obtain a son.
One who wishes to bring her husband under her power should burn a hundred thousand fragments of it;
the lord will come under her power.
One should burn lotus stamens and priyaṅgu together with kalikā.
One obtains unshakable wealth,
and great affection arises.
Through a fire offering of barley grains
the inexhaustible fulfillment of wishes is taught.
By making a fire offering of rice inexhaustible wealth also arises.
If one burns lotus seeds, bilva fruits and the fruits of the night lotus,
one obtains inexhaustible riches.
By offering all kinds of fruits in the fire
one will obtain rule over the earth.
Through a fire offering of salt and nimba,
the enemy dies at once.
Having properly spread out the painting
of the solitary hero, so difficult to behold,
one should carry out the rite before it.
The fierce rite, the harmful remedy, is for great yakṣas and great kings,
those on earth whose minds are haughty,
with overweening pride and great arrogance, vicious and doing vicious deeds,
harming the Three Jewels,
holding to annihilation and permanence, rejecting the sublime secret mantra, not honoring the secret mantra, reviling those who rely on it with devotion,
and disrupting the mantra recitation.
Since they oppress others,
one who has seen the rite of the action
should apply it to them.
Those given to evil, without Dharma,

who burn up all creatures:
if the rite is applied to them,
their life will be cut off at once.
Take the slough of a snake
and grind it to powder together with poison.
Then take a leaf of the nimba tree and write the enemy's name on it.
Staying in a solitary place,
one should always write with the poison.
Take five skull cups,
smear them and fill them with mustard oil.
With nimba wood the wise one should kindle a fire according to the rite.
Making a hearth stand with three of them,
place one on top.
The fourth, filled with white mustard seed, should be placed on top of that.
Take the slough of the snake and put that person inside it.
Cut it into pieces
and put one into each skull cup.
Having enchanted it one hundred and eight times,
with the painting facing north,
the mantrin should face south.
Squatting in wrath,
with loosened hair, himself wrathful,
the mantrin should make ferocity foremost, until the rite is completed.
If this is done at midday,
the life will be cut off at once.
Take the leaves of the death-omen plant,
or its bark, together with the root, together with one's own blood and with mustard oil,
with salt and with lac;
make all these into one.
In a solitary place,

with the painting turned to face north,
the mantrin faces toward the south.

Having made a fire pit,
one should make the kindling sticks especially of pungent wood.
With pungent wood alone,
with that very wood, one should light it.
In the fire pit of great power
one who has seen the rite of the action should burn seven oblations.
It has the form of the wrathful one:
kindle the fire of wisdom there.
Having bound the sword mudrā,
the skilled one should do the recitation of the mantra.
In wrath one should offer eight thousand oblations into that hearth.
At the first, his son will die;
at the second, together with his mounts;
at the third, his whole realm;
at the fourth, his own life.
This rite that has been taught takes effect within a single day.
Or else the realm is destroyed,
or the lord of the land dies.
Black wind, rain, and likewise Māra,
and burning by fire will come;
great rains, unbearable winds,
dust storms and downpours will arise.
Enemy armies attack in wrath;
he is struck by the fangs of tigers and lions.
Great harm arising
from every direction will come.
Through performing the vicious rite
it will happen on that very day.
Since the mantrin is not appeased,
how could it ever be pacified?

The hosts of gods such as Brahmā,
the world protectors of great miraculous power,
all the worldly gods,
and others described as mātṛkās,
the great bodhisattvas,
the lords dwelling on the ten grounds,
the buddhas of great miraculous power,
and the mantrins dwelling on earth
are unable to protect him:
because the king has become wrathful,
they are unable to protect him.
Grind salt with one's own blood,
and especially pungent spices.
Facing south oneself,
with the painting facing north,
in the fire pit that has been made kindle a fire of thorny wood.
Utterly wrathful and fierce,
then speaking the enemy's name
and squatting, burn the offering properly.
Having enchanted the oblations three times seven or twice seven,
or three thousand times,
make the fire offering with the vicious rite.
At the first, it is the son;
at the second, the wife is named;
at the third, he himself departs;
at the fourth, his mounts and army;
at the fifth, his own land;
at the sixth, his lineage and kin;
at the seventh, without any doubt,
he is reduced to ashes upon the ground.
Within half a watch, or a daṇḍa, or half a day, through the wrathful one,
if even Takṣaka would die,
what need to mention ordinary people?
If one wishes things to become well again,
here in one's own realm and palace,

through a thousand oblations of milk
it at once returns to its normal state.
If the holder of secret mantra on earth wishes to make someone forever without a land,
or to make an enemy mad,
or else wishes to cause division,
human bone powder, salt, mustard seed, and yakṣa cluster should be offered as oblations before the painting:
three times seven oblations, or more.
When the rite of oblations is completed,
he will without doubt go mad.
When one wishes to pacify this,
dūrvā leaves smeared with milk should be offered as a thousand oblations.
If the mantrin so wishes,
he then returns to his normal state.
Poison and blood,
together with bone powder
and with nimba seeds,
should be ground with mustard oil and kneaded.
With the painting facing north,
into a fire of intoxicating wood, full of wrath, one should make a fire offering of twenty-one oblations.
Having recited the mantra one hundred and eight times,
squatting on the seat,
when the rite of oblations is completed,
smoke and fire billow everywhere,
and the life of the enemy,
together with his children, livestock and kin, will be cut off.
Take human bone powder,
then take the five parts of the nimba, grind them with one's own blood or with mustard oil,
and with the painting facing north,
make a fire offering of seven oblations.

The enemy's life, together with his children, livestock and relatives, withers at once.
Kings who are vicious to beings,
and others, such as gods,
and the mātṛkās, who on earth
do harm to the mantrin:
in order to destroy them,
one should undertake this application.
Mustard seed ground with poison in the same way,
and likewise the fruits of the nimba:
if one makes a fire offering as is fitting,
their life will be cut off at once.
With one-pointed mind,
listen to this, assembly!
I shall explain the secret application
by which the result comes about immediately.
A nimba leaf smeared with poison:
write the name on it in blood.
Kindle the fire with the three pungent spices.
The mantrin always faces south;
spread out the painting facing north.
Squatting on the seat,
one should burn the offering with a wrathful mind:
for seven oblations, twenty recitations of the mantra.
The enemy, together with his lineage,
livestock and kin, dies at that time.
For half a daṇḍa, or a mere moment, wherever one may be staying,
if one undertakes this application against the harmful enemy of the mantrin,
the enemy dies at once.
This word is not otherwise.
Grind the three pungent spices with one's own blood and make an effigy of the enemy.
The wise one should write the name on a nimba leaf and place it inside.
Taking genuine nimba wood from the earth, the skilled one, knowing the rite correctly,

should coat it and smear it with poison.
Having smeared it with poison according to the rite,
one should kindle it at that instant.
The mantrin faces south,
and the painting always faces north.
Squatting, with a wrathful mind
like a blazing and spreading fire, if one speaks the enemy's name,
and performs for him
a fire offering of three oblations,
the enemy will die immediately.
With his sons and his own lineage, with his wife, his children and his kin,
even though protected by the Tathāgata,
at once he is turned to ashes.
With the first, he himself is destroyed;
with the second, his wife.

with the third, his sons, his kin and the rest:
there is no doubt that here they will die.
The great-souled one should take
the five parts of the nimba, grind the five parts of the nimba together with his own blood and with poison,
make an effigy of him,
and write the enemy's name.
Cutting it up, he should burn eight oblations.
Together with his children, livestock and kin,
that person dies immediately.
Even if the enemy's protectors, Śaṅkara (Śiva), and then Viṣṇu and Brahmā, protect him well,
and the mātṛkās guard him,
and other renowned lords of the gods

such as Śakra (Indra) as well,
since the mantrin is not appeased,
they are unable to protect him then.
When the mantrin, with a loving heart,
is at some time appeased,
he should then burn oblations of milk
mixed with dūrvā grass.
Because supreme ease is bestowed,
the person then returns to his normal state.
Take a wet cloth,
thoroughly soaked in lac juice,
together with conch powder,
and with poison and mustard seed.
Staying in a solitary place,
kindle a fire of nimba wood.
The knower of secrets, wrathful,
the knower of mantra who has become fierce,
staying there at midday,
burns seven oblations.
The mantrin stays in secret, free of fear,
and then performs the fire offering with recitation.
By applying the first oblation,
the enemy is afflicted with poison and blisters;
at the second, with quartan fever;
at the third, with a great fever;
at the fourth, his body withers;
at the fifth, he loses his memory;
at the sixth, only a little of him remains;
at the seventh, his life departs.
For the mantrin's rite to be accomplished this secret has been explained.
I shall explain it in brief:
you of great miraculous power, always listen!
Since the mantrin is not appeased,
the man cannot otherwise survive.
As long as the mantrin is not appeased,
by what could it be pacified?

When the king of mantras is pleased and moistened with love, at that time it becomes pacified.
Poison, nimba and garlic,
together with conch powder,
should be burned close beside the painting, exactly twenty oblations.
The enemy, together with his kin, retinue and livestock, will be cut off at the root.
Apart from the holder of secret mantra,
who else could then do this?
The three pungent spices and salt,
poison together with sour gruel, mustard oil and hair,
the slough of a snake,
nimba leaves together with their fruit,
human bone powder,
mustard seed and conch powder,
onion and garlic:
having ground these into powder,
the mantrin, with concentrated mind,
should offer them as oblations into a fire of thorns.
Quickly speaking the enemy's name,
if one burns a single oblation,
that enemy is destroyed at once.
If one burns three, seven and then one oblations as a fire offering against the enemy, his paternal clan, together with his realm,
his relatives and his livestock will be destroyed.
If the wise one
wishes to make the enemy mad,
he should make an effigy from the parts of the nimba,
the five together with the fruit,
and offer seven oblations of dhattūra:
the enemy will at once go mad.
If one constantly burns
the three pungent spices and salt,

he will be seized by a great disease and will wither like dry wood.
If one continually burns jambīra together with sour gruel, a severe cold fever
will at once destroy him.
For pacifying, a fire offering of milk is prescribed in every case.
Take the feathers of a crow,
smear them with castor oil,
and in a fire of dhattūra burn exactly twenty oblations.
Like a crow, the enemy
at once wanders in all directions.
Salt together with poison,
human bone together with mustard seed,
all together with white mustard seed:
if these are offered as oblations against the enemy in a fierce fire of nimba wood,
he is at once reduced to ashes.
Ox bile together with salt and with lac juice:
if these are burned, the enemy declines and dies at once.
With the juice of the sgeushé plant,
and likewise salt and the three pungent spices,
make an effigy with these.
Take a firebrand from a charnel ground,
kindle the fire with it,
and place the name inside the effigy.
Whatever there is of it,
burn it right down to the tips of the feet.
Together with his land and his realm,
together with his children, livestock and kin,
he himself together with his wife is here at once reduced to ashes.
The skilled one, with charcoal ash,

draws the image of the enemy,
presses it down firmly with his foot,
and in utter wrath begins the recitation.
The enemy is struck with severe stabbing pains,
and great blisters break out.
At once he becomes
a madman roaming all over the earth.
Apart from the holder of secret mantra,
who else on earth could do this?
Through a fire offering of kindling sticks from milky trees and the three white substances, that person returns to his normal state;
by the mantrin's good grace it passes.
Taking up what has been discarded,
the wise one should make the house empty.
Write the enemy's name on a nimba leaf,
smear all of it with poison,
and then dry it thoroughly again.
Having written the enemy's name on a nimba leaf with one's own blood, place it inside
and bind it tightly with sinew.
Kindle the fire with the three pungent spices
and make a fire offering of three oblations.
If the mantrin can destroy the three worlds,
what need to mention a vicious ruler of the land?
If one wishes to pacify it,
with one's mind moistened by compassion, take kindling sticks of milky trees smeared with milk, and sesame and rice:
if one burns one hundred and seven oblations,
it is pacified at once.
Take vulture flesh and likewise owl,
the flesh of a cat,
and the hair of a mongoose:
if these are burned in a fire of chaff,
with just three oblations

division will quickly come about.
Vulture bones, snake bones,
and bones from a human jaw:
chop these in yellow pigment
and hide them near the house:
even if he is protected by Śaṅkara,
the enemy is destroyed at once.
Poison and one's own blood,
salt, and likewise the three pungent spices:
make an effigy with these
and place the enemy's name inside it.
Kindle a fire of nimba wood
and properly worship the fire of the wrathful one.
Whatever there is of it,

one should burn three oblations.
By performing one oblation,
it is he himself, his son and his wife;
with two, his whole circle of kin;
with the third, his realm, with his mounts and army.
Even if he is protected by Svayambhū (the Self-Existent), he will be reduced to ashes.
By one's own power
one should make a cloth thoroughly wet.
Speaking the name of the one to be subdued,
then make an effigy likewise beneath it.
Pressing its head down hard with the foot,
and wrathfully pressing the lower lip with the upper teeth, when one recites for an eighth part of the day,
he is struck by great disease.
He falls into fever and fainting, disease of the spleen, and sores bursting out in his groin.
Afflicted with every kind of illness,
he is seized by water sickness;
together with his lineage, livestock and kin,
the enemy is at once brought to this state.
Apart from the holder of secret mantra,

who else is there who could do this?
Take the enemy's hair
and the earth from his footprint,
make an effigy of him,
and with poison and mustard seed
make a fire offering in a fire of thorns:
the enemy will be destroyed at once.
Bone powder against the enemy,
together with poison and sour gruel:
make the enemy's form,
and if one burns it in a fire of nimba wood,
that person is at once struck by a disease that cannot be cured.
Apart from the holder of secret mantra,
who else is there who could cure it?
Nimba, poison, the three pungent spices,
and the fruits of the dhattūra:
make all these into one
and fashion an effigy well.
If one cuts up its body and burns it,
his life will be cut off at once.
Blood, salt and poison,
made into one,
and likewise in a fire of arka wood,
one burns three oblations.
Within one daṇḍa or half a watch,
he dies upon the earth at once.
Having ground it with mustard oil,
with the painting set facing north,
salt and nimba leaves,
likewise with pungent oil:
just seven oblations
should be burned by the mantrin wherever he stays.
When seven oblations have been burned,
he dies upon the earth at once.
One's own blood and the three pungent spices,
together with mustard oil:

if these are burned in a fire of thorns,
he is at once reduced to ashes.
The milk of arka and snuhī,
and likewise pig dung:
when these are burned in a charnel ground fire,
he is at once destroyed on the spot.
Porcupine quills, and likewise pig bristles:
if three oblations are burned,
he will be destroyed immediately, on the spot.
Nimba leaves, black pepper,
poison and mustard oil:
if seven oblations are offered,
his life will be cut off immediately.
Crow bones, human bones,
and mongoose bones
should be ground finely into powder.
Together with mustard oil,
if they are burned in a fire of nimba wood,
the enemy, together with his village and town,
will be destroyed immediately.
Owl bones, tiger hair,
and bone from a skull, well combined,
should be buried and hidden at the enemy's door:
he will at once be driven out.
Tiger bones, mongoose hair,
and likewise dog hair:
if they are burned in a fire of thorns,
division will at once come about.
Sati flowers, black pepper,
nimba leaves, and likewise poison:
make them all into one
and burn one hundred and eight oblations.
Whoever is named,
when the wise one burns these in the fire,
even all those on earth without exception will be divided in the world.
Dhattūra seeds,

likewise nimba fruits,
poison and salt:
having burned one hundred and eight oblations,
together with his children, livestock and relatives,
he is without doubt reduced to ashes.
The bones of a snake, a black mongoose and a crow,
and the heads of lizards,
taken in equal parts
and ground with one's own blood,
are made into a single wick.
Having enchanted it one hundred and eight times,
one should light it at the enemy's door.
Together with his children, livestock and kin,
that enemy dies at that time.
Human fat,
and ash taken in a skull cup,
together with lac juice:
combine them and make a single ball.
Place a hawk's bone inside it.
When it is placed at the enemy's door,
he himself, together with his village,
that enemy, is destroyed at that time.
Taking the five parts of the dhattūra, with poison and the three pungent spices,
and burning three oblations,
the enemy will die at once.
Take the flesh of a mongoose,
and the skilled one should dry it thoroughly.
With poison and salt,
when three oblations are burned,
all kinds of diseases arise,
and his life will be cut off immediately.
If this rite is properly applied,
it will be accomplished at once.
Charcoal and salt,
and the three pungent spices, mixed in equal parts,

together with mustard oil:
then make an effigy.
Kindle a fire of thorns,
with the painting facing north
and the mantrin facing south;
in wrath the fire blazes up.
With exactly three oblations
one should burn the enemy's effigy.
With the first, his son will die;
with the second, his wife, livestock and kin;
with the third, he himself, his realm,
his livestock and his kin are at once reduced to ashes.
Without the mantrin's grace,
how could it ever be pacified again?
Then offer more than one hundred and eight oblations of milk.
At that time, right there, he and his own retinue, livestock and circle of kin will likewise be restored to peace.
Take dhattūra fruit
and bury it all around the site of the house.
On a leaf of the tree called nimba one should write the enemy's name, with poison and blood:
with that one should always write the enemy.
Fill a vessel full
with the three pungent spices, salt and blood.
Having placed the name inside it,
cover it completely with hair.
On a fire of nimba wood, with mustard oil,
one should boil it just a little.
It destroys his realm in every direction.
Even one who has become his own god,
the lord of the three realms,
is without doubt reduced to ashes:
what need to mention vicious beings?

Even a king of great miraculous power,
though he is protected by Svayambhū,
all of them will be destroyed.
Relying on this application,
with a mind become compassion,
one works for the benefit of the teaching:
here on earth there is no doubt of this.
This truly inconceivable rite
the king of wrathful ones has displayed.
Being always heedful,
abiding in the taste of compassion,
in order to protect the teachings,

one should apply this sublime rite.
Take the fruit of the nimba and then fill it with the three pungent spices.
In particular, on a nimba leaf
write the enemy's name,
and take the five parts of the tree.
Then kindle a fire according to the rite.
Filling a skull cup with mustard oil,
and with poison as well,
the mantrin should put the name in,
wherever he may be staying, and boil it.
That enemy dies at once,
and likewise his realm together with its livestock.
All kinds of calamity,
poison, wind and diseases of the womb, famine, exile from the land,
and storms of wind and rain gather everywhere.
With hosts of rākṣasas and bhūtas
the whole earth will be filled.
Apart from the holder of secret mantra
there is no protection at all.
Generating a mind of compassion,
and looking upon the tormented beings,
one should then offer

twenty-one ladlefuls of milk.
Through the mantrin's good grace,
at that time it will be pacified.
If the wise mantrin is not pleased,
how else could it be pacified?
For the sake of accomplishing mantra,
if one applies this true application,
for the sake of protecting the teaching,
in order to destroy the vicious,
kings or wicked ones
who do harm to the teaching:
in order to subdue them,
if one properly applies this true rite that brings about complete accomplishment, they will be destroyed at once.
Human bone, poison powder,
dog bones,
likewise mustard seed, vulture bone,
mustard oil, and likewise a snake's slough,
the five parts of the nimba,
lac and salt:
gather all these together,
and in a fierce fire of thorns, oneself like the fire of the wrathful one,
one should burn three oblations.
There Māra afflicts him,
and many diseases close in on all sides.
Together with his children, livestock and kin,
even a king will be destroyed.
When a king with a vicious mind does harm to the mantrin, by undertaking this application
the mantrin is at once set right.
The three pungent spices, salt, poison,
burnt mustard seed,
pungent spice and pungent oil,
lac juice and a snake's slough:

make these into one,
and then make an effigy.
Fill it entirely with pungent spice,
with a fire of pungent wood.
Having written the name on it,
if it is burned in a fierce fire,
that enemy dies immediately.
When the mantrin is without regard for him,
then signs of poison,
or else terrible blisters,
and great disease engulf him on every side;
fever and fainting fits will arise.
He is burned by fire, great rains fall.
Then, even if he wields a vajra,
through great disease and constant fever,
together with his children, livestock and kin,
he will die without any doubt,
because the mantrin is grim at heart.
When the mantrin is pleased again and his mind turns to compassion, the man is at once freed
from all diseases on earth.
This wondrous summary
of the vicious rites has been correctly taught.
This essence on earth, the swift rites of the mantrin, has been correctly explained.
The domain of concentration is inconceivable;
the domain of miraculous power is inconceivable;
overpowering others is inconceivable as well.
The perfect Buddha, sublime among humans, declared all of it inconceivable.
Who could fathom these qualities?
They are marvelous qualities.
As far as the mind ranges,
so far are the rites encompassed.
The bodhisattvas of great miraculous power and the perfect buddhas have taught them everywhere.

Pacifying, enriching,
and likewise the rites of magnetizing:
all those that are taught in other tantras are performed here.
Whatever secret mantras there are,
and the maṇḍalas taught on earth:
all of these are to be accomplished through this king of ritual manuals of great miraculous power.
For pacifying, make a fire offering by burning dūrvā leaves with milk;
a fire offering of the three white substances or sweets,
or fruits, with a concentrated mind;
moreover, all kinds of fruit,
or else the wood of milky trees,
and likewise grains of barley.

or things made of various precious substances.
The particular rites of each kind of action:
whatever has been proclaimed for pacifying,
the fire pit and likewise its nature,
whatever site has been made known, whatever direction has been rightly taught for the pacifying rites that are taught, whatever measure is known for the kindling sticks that are taught,
and whatever else has been proclaimed:
all of that is to be done here.
So for this pacifying itself,
all of that is to be applied here.
What is explained as magnetizing,
and the divisions of its rites as well;
then the fire pit and its nature, as fitting,
the quarter of the directions or else the site,
the various rites gathered together:
whatever magnetizing rites of the great-souled ones
have been taught elsewhere,
the mantrin who desires accomplishment

should apply all of them here.
Out of kindness toward sentient beings,
the perfect buddhas have also rightly taught enriching.
The various rites and foods,
the various actions well applied,
the particular directions that are taught,
and then also the fire pit,
and whatever else, however little, has been taught,
what has been taught, such as the seat of awakening, gaining things for oneself and living well:
apply all of these in enriching.
All that has been rightly explained here is the magical display of the king of wrathful ones.
What even the lords who dwell on the ten grounds,
and anyone at all, cannot do,
all of this is to be accomplished
at once and swiftly, by mere recollection.
The great-souled Wrathful One is inconceivable;
so the perfect buddhas have proclaimed.
His fruit is inconceivable:
for whoever gets this into his hands,
the lower realms become empty.
Where all fears have gathered,
it terrifies even the great obstructors.
Whatever illnesses there may be, all of them,
all of these fears,
and all the sins massed together:
by the mere recollection of this,
all of them cease to be.
Amid all the gathered fears,
when the assembly, all present, looked on,
their minds there on the earth were supremely at ease.
All the bodhisattvas, too, opened their eyes wide in wonder,
and the wise Vajradhara spoke in pleasing words:
"Excellent, hero, great being,

truly born from the vajra family!
Grateful one, of all the buddhas
you are the one son of great miraculous power.
What is taught here
in this ritual manual of the great-souled Acala:
whoever gets it into his hands,
accomplishment rests in his hand.
Possessed of inconceivable qualities,
an inconceivable means of accomplishment,
endowed with many wonders:
the one who holds this secret mantra,
we too will obey his command.
Gods, together with asuras, and nāgas will come to that mantrin to follow behind him.
All sentient beings will come to be pleased and delighted with that fortunate one.
All who have become obstructors will carry out the mantrin's orders."

Then the Blessed One entered into the meditative absorption called the Arising of Flames That Set Ablaze the Vajra That Destroys All Obstructors. As soon as the Blessed One had entered it, this very buddhafield shook, shook strongly, and shook strongly all over; it moved, moved strongly, and moved strongly all over; it swayed, swayed strongly, and swayed strongly all over; it roared, roared strongly, and roared strongly all over; it resounded, resounded strongly, and resounded strongly all over. Then, throughout this very buddhafield, all the obstructors and the vināyakas, and whoever here has a malicious mind, the rākṣasas who steal the lives of others and seek an opening, and those vināyakas of terrifying form, were burned by the splendor of the Lord of the Vajra Dance and were left with no place to stay.

Whoever with reverence
has gone for refuge to the Buddha and the Dharma, that person will have no suffering whatsoever in his body.

Then the Blessed One said to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi:

"The forms of obstructors that did not exist before,
and the rite for dealing with them:
Vajrapāṇi, come here and listen.
With minds obscured by ignorance,
people come not to know the tantra,
and so they are overpowered by obstructors.
If here one has faith in the mantra,
the obstructors come to be dispelled,
and one becomes supremely free.
Actions, their causes and their fruits,
good deeds and bad deeds alike:
the king of the perverse overpowers one,
and holds all of these in contempt.
Through many wrong conceptions
one is quickly born in hell.
All the fruits of ill-omened deeds come,
and then there is no restoration ceremony."

Then the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, touched his head to the feet of the Blessed One and said this: "Blessed One, please explain! Sugata, please explain! The obstructors take forms that never existed before. Because childish beings in the future will have little wisdom and will not know the cause of the unprecedented arising of obstructors, in order that these may be dispelled, may the Lord please explain."

Then the Blessed One said to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi:

"Being bound by the nooses of obstructors depends upon past karma.
Through habitual practice of avarice,
by harming the things others desire,
and through the faults of conceptual thought in the mind, obstructors arise for the mantrin.
In order to destroy them,
one should direct the mind toward awakening.
All obstructors are utterly destroyed.
The hoard of beginningless saṃsāra, whatever sins there are, however slight,
the wheel of beginningless existence:
through the power of the mind of awakening

all of them are exhausted.
The mind of awakening is the great mind;
it completely abandons the faults of mind.
The faults of beginningless sin
it burns, like fire at the edge of a forest.
Because the mantrin is skilled in the mind,
all his karma will be burned away.
If one holds the mind of awakening in this way,
one will gain the accomplishment one desires.
Whoever has generated the mind of awakening, untainted, stainless and steadfast,
without any doubt at all,
accomplishment rests in his hand.
One who has not generated the mind of awakening,
who has abandoned faith and diligence,
a person who merely issues commands:
for him there is no accomplishment through this."

"Vajrapāṇi, if a mantrin accomplishes the mantra with this commitment, beginning with generating the mind set on awakening, obstructors will not create obstacles. And why is that? Vajrapāṇi, because such a person is worthy of homage from gods and worldly beings."

He spoke once more and reflected: "Obstructors, vināyakas, yakṣas, rākṣasas, gandharvas, pretas and piśācas, seeing the mantra holder upon the earth even from very far away, become eager and pay him homage.

He is completely freed from all faults,
he has thoroughly gathered all merit,
he is fully endowed with the accumulations for awakening, and he is equal to all the supreme buddhas."

Then Vajrapāṇi again said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, when the obstructors bring to bear on a practitioner the forms they had before, how does that turn out?"

The Blessed One said: "Lord of Secrets, when a mantrin is overpowered by obstructors, he comes down with fevers and feverish illnesses, becomes hungry and thirsty, takes pleasure in sloth, loses his certainty, and falls into doubt. When there is illness and harm, when his own deity turns its face away, and the deities fade from his visualization, then, Lord of Secrets, it should be understood that the mantrin has been overpowered by obstructors.

"Lord of Secrets, at that time the master should draw the maṇḍala of the king of wrathful ones, the protector Acala, who repels all obstructors; and having destroyed all the obstructors, he should confer empowerment.

"Lord of Secrets, this is the maṇḍala. Its outline is square, with a border running all the way around.

It is made with vajra bindings,
the vajras linked and joined to one another.
Eight cubits, or four, or five,
or ten, or sixteen,
or one cubit, or two:
make it beautiful as your means allow.
It has a single door,
and a vajra canopy should be set over it.
Surround it all with a vajra fence,
and draw the excellent maṇḍala.
In its center the hero
is rightly seated upon a lotus.
To its east is the mother of the buddhas, Gaganalocanā.
To its left one should draw
the one with the stainless vajra of space;
on the right side, the one of great force who bears a radiant vajra garland.
On the left side, the great hero with vajra in hand, the vajra bearer;
on the right side, the great hero,
the great wrathful one called Proud Bearing.
Below, on that side, is the protector,
Acala, of great strength,
the great wrathful one with a sword in his hand,
who cuts through the three realms.
Toward the door one should draw Delightful to See, and likewise Facing Toward.
When all of these have been made in this way, set out the wrathful forms

in black and in red,
and then consecrate the vases.
Adorn their mouths with an ox and the like,
fill them up to the mouth with seeds,
bind their necks properly with cloth,
and decorate them with hanging garlands of flowers.
Endowed with the five precious things, the five grains,
and the great medicines,
they are filled to the brim with scented water.
Arrange all the deities in their places.
With virtuous scents, flowers and so forth,
make offerings with whatever is to be had.
Then perform the empowerment thoroughly by means of the great-souled Acala.
There, as for the second maṇḍala,
then, facing the maṇḍala,
it is square on every side,
two cubits or four cubits.
Draw a lotus in the center,
with radiating vajras in between;
around its edge, with a garland of vajras,
surround it with vajra bindings.
Having placed the disciple in its center,
confer the empowerment here with diligence.
Then form the sword mudrā
of the great-souled Acala,
and give it from heart to heart,
bearing a garland blazing on every side.
Completely freed from all obstructors,
he attains the accomplishment of a vajra holder.
Completely freed from all sins,
having utterly cast off all obstructors,
adorned with the qualities of all dharmas, he attains the accomplishments he desires, just as he wishes."

Then Vajrapāṇi said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please explain! Please explain the secret ritual manual of the king of wrathful ones, who has been commissioned by all the tathāgatas and has great might and power, through which accomplishment will arise for practitioners in times to come, which will bring benefit and happiness for the sake of many sentient beings, and through which all obstructors will be cast off and mantras too will be accomplished. Blessed One, please explain it! Sugata, please explain it!"

The Blessed One said this to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, excellent, excellent! Vajrapāṇi, excellent once again! For the benefit and happiness of all sentient beings, and for the sake of sentient beings in the future, you ask about the great king of wrathful ones, who is unobstructed everywhere, heroic, authorized by all the tathāgatas, able to perform every action, and who brings about accomplishment. Listen well and keep it in mind, and I shall explain it."

"Vajrapāṇi, the master, abiding in the state of a tathāgata, should draw the great maṇḍala of the great wrathful one.

It is square, with four doors, adorned with four porticoes.
In it is the Blessed One, the great hero, fully endowed with all dharmas.
On his right and left sides
one should draw the two vajra holders, Stainless Space and Great Force.
Below is the great wrathful one,
Acala, of great strength,
sword in hand, gazing sidelong,
like the Lord of Death, Antaka, made manifest, seated within a maṇḍala of fire;
he should be joined together with wind.
The wise one, having made offerings as before with scents, flowers and the rest, the mantrin should confer the empowerment with every wondrous and auspicious thing.
With that mudrā, the disciple himself,
having offered a fee to the guru,
the master endowed with wisdom,
should then rightly begin the rite of fire offering.
On the peak of a mountain,
in a cowshed, on a riverbank, on the road at a crossroads, or else in a place where fire is kept,

in a charnel ground or in one's dwelling place, eating food gained by alms
or else only cooked leaves,
in a solitary place, keeping silent,
one recites the mantra three hundred thousand times:
this is explained as the preliminary approach.
Having recognized the signs according to the rite,
the wise one accomplishes the siddhi.
The sword is to be made according to the rite:
without crack or flaw, four finger-breadths,
with two finger-breadths for the little finger,
made of wood whose nature suits the practice.
On its middle draw designs of various kinds.
Having washed it with the five products of the cow,
make offerings to it with scents, flowers and the rest.
The mantrin, having drawn the maṇḍala, should accomplish it just as before.
The mantrin, seated on a lotus seat,
holding the sword by its hilt, engaged in meditation on the wrathful one,
should recite the secret mantra without distraction.
At midnight, or else
at the very time the sun rises, the sword blazes up brilliantly and illuminates everything.
Thereafter, with a body of knowledge,
he comes to range through the sky.
He remains for an entire intermediate eon,
and dies at the time of his own choosing.
He is worshipped by all the vidyādhara kings and by all the vidyādharas.
He has the various mounts of the gods,
and is attended by the hosts of gods.

"Then, if one wishes to accomplish the noose, having recited three hundred thousand times as before, one should likewise make a noose of gold, silver or copper. If one recognizes the signs, draws the maṇḍala, and accomplishes it, one likewise becomes a vidyādhara, and lives for an eon as king of all the vidyādharas. In the same way, if one accomplishes the sword, the banner, the jewel, gorocanā, the parasol and the hook, they are likewise accomplished.

"Then, if one wishes to bring a king under one's control, one should make an effigy of kuśa grass, press it down with the left foot, and recite until the king himself comes with his retinue and falls under one's control.

"Then, if one wishes to accomplish a god, one should make an effigy of pine wood and recite until the god comes. When he has come, he speaks and grants the mantrin whatever he wishes.

"Likewise, one who wishes to accomplish the nāgas should make an image of a nāga from nāgakesara wood, recite three hundred thousand times as before, and keep reciting until all the nāgas have come under one's control.

"Likewise, one who wishes to accomplish the yakṣas should make an image of a yakṣa from gold, recite three hundred thousand times as before, and keep reciting until all the yakṣas come and carry out one's commands.

"Then, one who wishes to accomplish the gandharvas should make an effigy of a gandharva from bamboo, recite three hundred thousand times as before, and keep reciting until a gandharva comes and speaks.

"Likewise, one who wishes to accomplish the garuḍas should make a garuḍa from clay; if one recites three hundred thousand times as before, all the garuḍas will do as they are commanded.

"In the same way, one who wishes to accomplish the rākṣasas should draw the form of a rākṣasa with charcoal from a charnel ground, press it down with the left foot, and keep reciting until all the rākṣasas speak.

"If it is applied in the same way to men and women too, it is likewise accomplished.

"Thus, Vajrapāṇi, in whatever way this king of wrathful ones is applied, in just that way he performs every action. This great king of wrathful ones has great might, unobstructed everywhere; he has been authorized by all the buddhas; he is fully endowed with every action; and he brings success through merely being read. To this king of wrathful ones one should apply the rites of all the ritual manuals. Having set aside those who have not generated the mind set on awakening, those without faith, and those who doubt, one who has obtained permission should apply the rites of all the ritual manuals. In whatever way the rites of summoning, magnetizing, killing and drying up are applied, in just that way this unfailing and unobstructed one should be applied."

Then the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi said this to the Blessed One:

"The means of accomplishing the maṇḍala,
and the former forms of the obstructors:
may the Blessed One please explain them."

"Listen to the rite for the practitioner, and to the various obstructors.
His mind is constantly distracted,
and the secret mantras turn their faces away.
He takes no joy in recitation or meditative concentration.
The place, the rites of the deity,
the fire offering and the empowerment rite:
the deities turn their faces away from them.
Obstructors do violent harm to the mantrin.
He comes to be without his chosen deity,
and thinks of other lands.
Many conceptual thoughts arise,
he has no faith and great sloth;
likewise his limbs are pierced with pain,
and under the sway of time he stretches and yawns.
He becomes full of anger,
doubts arise,
and once again he has no accomplishment.
Faults such as these are taught as the forms of the obstructors.
Quarrels, snakes and nāgas,
and pestilence arise,
and he is afflicted by fevers and burning illness from obstructors.
Likewise the practitioner

in an auspicious maṇḍala of the planetary spirits, one should fully confer the empowerment.
The mantrin, purified in this way,
fearless of all the obstructors,
should once again meditate on his own chosen deity,
together with a fire offering.

With a concentrated mind, he should burn sesame seeds and ghee a thousand times.
He should satisfy the deity with the secret mantra and perform it according to the rite of fire offering.
In order to accomplish what he desires,
he should once again undertake to please the deity.
Then once more the Blessed One spoke again: "Vajradhara,
listen with a mind intent on benefit to the forms of the obstructors that did not exist before.
In the means of accomplishing the maṇḍala, too,
one should apply the actions of the rite.
When the wise mantrin
performs wondrous actions,
the obstructors and vināyakas,
who are full of faults
and make obstacles for sentient beings,
he terrifies with unbearable terror.
Against the decline of the rites of the site and so forth, likewise against tormenting the deity,
and against trampling upon the mantras,
the great-souled one blazes with splendor.
Wherever, through the rite of the torma, things are made to accord with the rite,
and wherever offerings have been made,
whatever contempt there was is pacified.
Wind and rain, and likewise charcoal,
the sound of the syllable hūṃ resounding,
noises coming forth first from one place,
the sound of flashing lightning,
burning with fire and greatly terrifying, elephants giving out unbearable cries,
vetālas, utterly fierce,
like donkeys, camels and monkeys,
loudly roar the sound ha ha.
A light swirling with blazing fire,
and the forms of wind maṇḍalas spread out in places and blaze forth.

The sound of a lion's roar, a mighty sound, magical displays of various forms,
all these also produce terror.
Apply Acala, of great strength,
the king of wrathful ones;
by his power he also destroys.
Through the mantra they are bewildered,
and the fierce ones are paralyzed.
His form and shape are those of the syllable ha, fitting the manner of fire.
The one of great diligence, entirely red,
with a sword in his hand that destroys faults,
points a threatening finger at all the malicious,
and holds a noose in his left hand.
He is seated in the midst of a blazing garland, abiding like the fire at the end of an eon,
with the sound hūṃ and the sound phaṭ,
baring his fangs and gazing sidelong.
All the malicious in the ten directions,
by the syllable hūṃ and the ten wrathful ones,
are destroyed in every direction.
They loudly roar ha ha.
Burned by the vajra fire,
they harm one another
and are destroyed in every direction.
Abiding in the yoga of oneself as the deity,
one attains the state of the great hero.
Apply the king of wrathful ones
to all obstructors and vināyakas:
the syllable ha in the manner of fire destroys them as though before one's eyes.
Endowed with the sound of the syllable hūṃ,
he destroys all the vināyakas.
The syllable hūṃ is in the manner of wind,
with a light like dense, massed clouds.
With the roar of the syllable hūṃ from the clouds

he scatters all the malicious ones.
The syllable ha is in the manner of fire,
a blazing vajra hand.
Endowed with the sound of the syllable hūṃ,
one should gather in all the gazes.
Having made oneself into the syllable ha, entirely red and wrathful,
with a terrifying voice, greatly terrifying,
noose in hand and wrathful,
the mantra holder, with the noose mudrā,
should summon all the obstructors.
Having summoned all the obstructors,
he should bind them and terrify them thoroughly.
Or else, toward all the obstructors, extremely fierce and wrathful,
he should make images of them,
summon them with the noose mudrā,
beat them and probe them,
cut them and burn them:
all the obstructors will be destroyed.
Even if they were standing before Brahmā, they would scatter at once and die without any doubt.
Or else, once more I shall explain
the taming of all obstructors.
Having drawn the obstructor on the ground,
press its head with the foot and torment it.
Afflicted, it trembles violently
and without any doubt it dies.
Or else, once more I shall explain
the subjugation of all obstructors.
Having made its effigy
in the very form of the seizer,
if the mantrin torments it with fire,
it is quickly burned and seized.
Even obstructors equal to Śakra will depart swiftly, that very instant.

In just the same way, I shall explain a common rite for the other obstructors as well.
The mantrin, filled with wrath,
should properly make images of them,
smear them with mustard seed and poison,
and anoint them with salt as well.
When they are burned in the fire,
they are consumed swiftly, that very instant.
Or else, once more I shall explain
striking all obstructors with the dagger.
Having made its effigy,
one should strike it with a vajra dagger.
Struck, it is completely quelled
and without any doubt it dies.
Or else I shall also explain the paralyzing of all obstructors.
Having made its effigy,
visualize Mount Meru upon its body,
and press it down firmly with a vajra that has eight points.
Then it is completely quelled,
and there is no doubt that it will die.
Even the obstructors of the god Brahmā swiftly remain motionless and fixed.
Then, by all and for all,
the common rite should be performed.
Having made its effigy,
rightly begin the rite of fire offering.
Having chopped and cut it with a weapon,
offer it into the fire, beginning from the feet.
Once it is cut, at that very moment
it will be destroyed, without any doubt.
Thus, when the wise one performs the rite upon all of them in every way, all the obstructors
who have malicious minds are destroyed.
Beating, cutting, striking with the dagger,

piercing and likewise probing,
burning, and any other kind of subjugation:
the mantrin adorned
with the mind of awakening should do all of these.
Those with utterly malicious minds cut off the lives of others and harm sentient beings.
One who is the very ground of benefit,
having generated great compassion,
recollecting the Buddha and the Dharma, speaks just as all the buddhas do:
he is the one who performs the fierce rites."
Then glorious Vajradhara,
opening his eyes wide in wonder,
spoke with the pleasing words of the Sage, the lord of the Dharma:
"How wonderful! The buddhas are inconceivable, and the Dharma of the buddhas is inconceivable too!
As long as the very name of those who do harm to sentient beings is suppressed,
for that long the mind,
with its notions of help and harm belonging to the lower realms, toward the suffering of Avīci

are wholly bent and go."

Then Vajrapāṇi again said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please explain the great king of wrathful ones, authorized by all the tathāgatas, set out in mantras, mudrās and the stages of the mantra, swiftly marked by the marks of the mudrās, who, when applied together with all the gods, nāgas, yakṣas and rākṣasas, performs every action, unfailing and unobstructed."

Then the Blessed One said this to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi: "Excellent, excellent! Vajrapāṇi, excellent once again! Now listen well and keep it firmly in mind, and I shall explain it to you."

"Excellent, Blessed One," Vajrapāṇi said to the Blessed One.

Once more the Blessed One said, "Listen to this:

Stand with the feet placed evenly,
and join the palms in homage.
Having set the thumbs in place,
show devotion to all the buddhas.
With the vajra arrangement,
stretch the joined palms upward,
then bring them forward once again.
Joining the palms once more,
place them behind the back.
With the arrangement of the palms,
bring them forward once again.
Wrathfully proclaiming the sound hūṃ,
one should threaten the family of māras.
With the arrangement of the feet,
and with both hands as well,
with the threatening forefingers of both,
the obstructors and vināyakas,
the very source of all sins,
are scattered by the threatening finger.
Then again, spreading the feet apart,
set them on the vajra ground,
and apply this everywhere,
down to the seventh level beneath the earth.
With the hands joined together,
one foot stands upon the ground;
likewise, down to the smallest, mothers and young alike,
it destroys all obstructors.
Apply it fully to what has not been accomplished:
the sword of the Three Jewels arises.
With that arrangement,
circle it all around the head.
Proclaiming the sound of the syllable hūṃ,
one forms the sword mudrā.
The second, from the tip of the sheath:
those who do harm to the teaching,
mantrins who speak ill of the guru,
those who harm other sentient beings,
whoever reviles the deity,

gods, guhyakas and emanations, asuras and terrible rākṣasas:
all of these are to be destroyed.
But if, for that harm, two or three times,
they respectfully ask forgiveness,
and the host of secret mantras is pleased with them,
one gains the accomplishment one desires, just as one wishes.
Again, with the vajra feet,
stand with the feet placed evenly.
Bind the hands into fists, one with the other,
and with the forefingers joined,
turn them back and place them above the forehead.
Arrange and set the feet,
press the lower lip with the upper teeth in wrath,
and proclaim hūṃ like thunder:
the syllable hūṃ will, without doubt,
crush all the obstructors.
The great blazing vajra gaze completely destroys all the malicious.
This mudrā, proclaimed as Tilaka,
accomplishes every aim.
Whatever the mantrin accomplishes, whatever he applies it to,
there it becomes effective,
without any doubt.
With the arrangement of the vajra feet,
lift one foot upward,
and bow respectfully to all the buddhas.
Hold the fingers in fists, one with the other,
form them in the shape of a mouth,
and join them right before the mouth.
The means of accomplishing the maṇḍala,
and likewise the rites:
great clouds arising from all directions gather together,
great thunder rumbles loudly,
lightning flashes there too,

the great body proclaims ha ha,
streams of rain pour down,
and it all arises like the end of time.
This is to be placed in the mouth.
The great body of the fierce one holds the mouth mudrā as well.
By merely seizing them,
they are destroyed without remainder.
Then the blazing wrathful one,
of great splendor and with a great mouth,
summons them and devours them,
destroying all the kings of obstructors.
In whatever way the body of the wrathful Acala is applied, in just that way the obstructors and rākṣasas of terrifying form are destroyed.
The mantrin, endowed with the mouth mudrā, should apply it everywhere.
This is unfailing and unobstructed,
and is highly honored by all the buddhas.
Again, set the vajra feet,
and join the palms in homage at the crown of the head.
As before, having placed the feet evenly,
lift a foot and shake it.
The hands, crossed one over the other,
the right and the left,
holding the noose and the sword,
having cast down the vajra, stand firm.
Place the left upon the ground,
and the right together with the weapon.
Having summoned the target with the noose and set it down,
if one cuts the effigy with the sword, even Brahmā or Śakra
is cut down swiftly, at once.
This is the glorious one holding the noose:
by the application of the sword mudrā,
through the mantrin's merely applying it,

all the malicious are to be subdued.
Strike the palms together and join them,
and turn them round like a wheel.
The mantrin, having turned them and drawn them in,
should set the feet as before.
Join the palms in homage,
bind each hand into a fist with the other,
join the tips of both forefingers,
and form a single-pointed vajra.
This is declared to be for striking and piercing all the malicious.
Apply it for protection and the like,
which destroys all obstructors.
Holding both hands evenly,
join them and bind them into fists.
Join the middle fingers with their tips touching,
and form the forefingers into a vajra.
The vajra joined to the middle fingers is the mudrā of the great mudrā;
it destroys all the malicious."

Then the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is wonderful! Sugata, it is wonderful! The fierce mudrās of the king of wrathful ones, all of them unfailing, unobstructed and overpowering, grant accomplishment in just the way the practitioner applies them. For the benefit and happiness of all sentient beings, I too wish to explain this means of accomplishment from the ritual manual of the great king of wrathful ones, who destroys all obstructors."

The Blessed One said, "Vajrapāṇi, if you think the time has come for it, speak."

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, having received the Blessed One's permission, bowed to all the tathāgatas with a display that delighted and gladdened every intention, and entered into the absorption of the samādhi called Supreme Light of All Accomplishments. The very moment the Blessed One entered absorption, all the world systems were at once lit up with a great light, and all the buddha fields were filled with the bodies of Vajradhara; these circled through the ten directions and then entered back into the Blessed One's own body.

"Listen to the great miracles that make up the means of accomplishment of the great king of wrathful ones. Eating leaves and the like, one should recite three hundred thousand times. Then, remaining for three days, one should make a great offering before the painted scroll, and in front of it kindle a fire with kindling sticks of nimba wood, and with the heart mantra make a fire offering of eight thousand white mustard seeds smeared with ghee; this is after first having done the approach.

"The means of accomplishment of the great king of wrathful ones is this. Having drawn the maṇḍala, one should bind the sword mudrā, sit cross-legged, and recite until one becomes a vidyādhara. Honored by all the vidyādharas, one remains for an eon, with no time of death unless one wishes it; one travels through all the buddha fields, makes offerings to all the tathāgatas, and works for the benefit of all sentient beings.

"If one again recites three hundred thousand times, one can perform every rite one wishes. One makes words come true. One fells trees. One makes birds fall from the sky. One dries up ponds. One turns the wind elsewhere.

"On the night of a lunar eclipse, one should make a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground and strew loose fragrant flowers. Then, before the painted scroll or a volume of the Perfection of Wisdom, one should put one measure of ghee from a cow whose calf is of the same color into a copper vessel, kindle a fire of khadira wood, and recite while heating it; the three accomplishments will then arise.

"Then, if one takes up residence on a mountain peak and, without eating food, recites a hundred thousand times, one will see treasure.

"If one wishes to stop a cattle plague, by burning a thousand oblations of milk it will be stopped. If one smears dūrvā grass with the three sweet substances and makes a hundred thousand fire offerings, even a great cattle plague will be stopped. If one smears lotuses with curd, honey and ghee and makes a hundred thousand fire offerings, one will see three supreme requests granted.

"When going to sea, if one enters the water of a river and recites three hundred thousand times, one will reach one's destination. If one burns flowers of a certain color, one will obtain clothing of that same color. By burning grain, one's grain too will become inexhaustible. By a fire offering of barley one becomes a great householder. With priyaṅgu one brings others under one's control. With fragrant wood one comes to have many attendants and servants.

If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva fruit smeared with the three sweet substances, one becomes a king.

"The proper rite for the painted scroll is this. One should paint the noble Acala with one face, wearing the hero's garment of saffron cloth, looking with a sidelong glance, holding a sword and a noose in his hands, his face furrowed with wrathful frowns, terrifying the three worlds, and clad in saffron. Then one should go to the ocean, spread out the painting, wear clean clothes on one's body, and, free of fear, keeping silence and living on alms, recite five hundred thousand times. On the final day, if one makes ten thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of caṇaka, one will see Acala, will also attend upon the tathāgatas, and, gaining samādhi, will attain the samādhi of the bodhisattvas.

"Alternatively, one should paint the noble protector Acala on a cloth from a charnel ground and paint his eyes open with one's own blood. The practitioner, facing east, should spread out the painting opposite him, facing him; bathing three times a day and wearing wet clothes, he should recite three hundred thousand times in silence. On the night of the eighth day of the waning fortnight, he should give a torma of meat to all the bhūtas and then recite ten thousand times upon a large corpse. The body of the corpse will then move; he should not be afraid. Then he will see in its mouth the center of an open lotus. When he takes it and holds it, he becomes a vidyādhara and travels in the world of Brahmā in a divine form.

"Alternatively, if one recites before the painted scroll in three sessions a day for six months, makes offerings as one's means allow, and fumigates it with agaru incense, one will become the lord of a country.

"If one consecrates a banner with a thousand recitations and holds it out in front of the army, the enemy's army will be defeated in battle.

"One who wishes to paralyze an army should imagine a great body, yellow in color, with four faces and four arms, of ugly hue, baring its fangs, terrifying, and wrapped in a garland of flames, as if seizing the enemy's force; or else, if one paints it and displays it, the enemy's army will be paralyzed.

"One who wishes to stir up a quarrel should make a fire offering of crow and owl feathers; a quarrel will then arise.

"One who wishes to make an enemy intoxicated should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of oblations. Through the fire offering, Acala's servants bind him by the neck and carry him off to the south; by visualizing the enemy's body as intoxicated, vomiting blood, and terrified, he will perish together with his family line.

"If one empowers a human bone with a hundred and eight recitations and grinds it, whoever's name one utters will at once be struck by fever.

"If one smears nimba fruit with melted butter and makes a fire offering, the enemy will perish within three days.

"If one makes an effigy of the enemy out of salt and clay, pierces it with thorns of the intoxicating datura, and makes a fire offering of it chopped and cut into pieces, he will perish at once.

"If one utters the enemy's name and burns a hundred and eight of what is called salamari, the enemy will become poor.

"If one wishes to bring someone under control, one should make an effigy out of salt, cut it up and make a fire offering of it; then even a great man will come under one's control within seven days.

"If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of opened jasmine blossoms, a yakṣiṇī will come under one's control. By making a fire offering of the leaves of the magic-making plant, one causes madness. By a fire offering of salt one can summon even a daughter of the gods.

"By a fire offering of guggulu one will attain kingship.

"The rite for another painted scroll is this. In the center one should paint the Blessed One Śākyamuni; to his right, Mañjuśrī adorned with every ornament; and to his left, Vajradhara, his face gently smiling, holding a vajra in his hand. By reciting five hundred thousand times in its presence, one becomes able to perform every rite, and disease will break out in the enemy's army.

"If one binds the eye mudrā and, in wrath, recites the mantra that ends with syllables such as hūṃ, the enemy will be seized by a great graha or will surely perish.

"If one recites a hundred thousand times over ash from a charnel ground, whoever one gives it to will become one's servant.

"If one recites seven times over gorocanā and makes a forehead mark with it, all people will be delighted, and one will become invisible. All obstructors, vināyakas and the like will be made to blaze. If one applies it to oneself, one frees people from Brahmā and rākṣasas even from a hundred yojanas away.

"If one wishes to subdue the affliction of someone who has been seized by a black snake for six months, one should, in wrath, draw the sword emblem and surround it with figures of the family of the great mahoragas. Then one should consecrate the sword with a thousand recitations and set it in the center so that it seems to blaze. If it is shown to the patient, it will certainly take effect.

"If one recites the heart mantra of the noble one-eyed Acala a hundred and eight times in each of three sessions, one will be constantly connected with him.

"If one offers a fist-pressed ball of dough in a solitary place, he will grant the great supreme accomplishment.

"If one binds the heart mudrā and, in wrath, recites the syllable hūṃ, one splits the clouds.

"If one makes a fire offering of thorns smeared with mustard oil, one makes the wind and rain stand still like a pestle. It provides great protection for the practitioner.

"If one performs the practice pressing down with the left foot, people will obey one's commands.

"If one makes effigies of gods and humans and cuts them, they will be cut. If one makes effigies of all gods and humans and strikes them with an iron kīla, they will be pinned by the kīla. Then, if one wishes to bind them, one should consecrate a yellow thread and wind it around the figure; they will then be bound. If one wishes to crush them, one should make effigies of gods and the like and press them down beneath a board; they will then be crushed. Then, if one wishes to beat them, one should make effigies of humans and the like and strike them with a switch; they will come bowing and ask for one's commands. If one wishes to suppress them, one should make effigies of all gods and humans and press them down beneath a board or the like; they will then be suppressed.

"Thus, in whatever way this greatly miraculous king of wrathful ones is applied, in just that way he also performs thousands of other wondrous deeds."

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, spoke the mantra of the great king of wrathful ones:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvva viśva mukhabhyaḥ sarvvathā oṃ caṇḍa mahā roṣaṇa hūṃ trāṭ mahā caṇḍa acala kāṇa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ apratihata tathāgatājñāṃ smara hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

Then Vajrapāṇi spoke again, giving the heart of the rite of the great unobstructed wrathful one, the Sole Hero:

namaḥ straiyadhvikānāṃ tathāgatānāṃ hāṃ

The very moment the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, had spoken, in that instant all the world systems were lit up with a great light. Then all the māras and great māras of terrifying form, and the gods, nāgas, yakṣas and the rest, throughout all the world systems, were scorched by the splendor of the great wrathful one. Each of them went to his own tathāgata and pleaded, "Blessed One, please protect us! Sugata, please protect us from this burning!"

Then those tathāgatas spoke these words to the great obstructors of their own fields: "Sons of good family, keep in mind the great wrathful one called Acala, who acts on the command of all the tathāgatas and utterly destroys all the malicious. Otherwise your heads will be split into a hundred pieces by the vajra of Vajrapāṇi. Give rise to the thought that whatever exists is like an illusion. Give rise to a mind that seeks the benefit and happiness of all sentient beings. Keep in mind that sentient beings are free of all evil. Sons of good family, keep in mind the great king of wrathful ones, who is free of all suffering."

Then all those malicious ones went for refuge to that very great king of wrathful ones and said, "Blessed One, we will not cause harm in any region. Wherever this great king of wrathful ones abides, we will protect it. We will provide whatever is needed. We will also destroy every harm." Having made this pledge, they came to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down there.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, also taught the practitioners the rite for practicing the great king of wrathful ones: "This great king of wrathful ones should be recited in a solitary place by a person who keeps unbroken silence and lives on twigs, roots and fruit, or on water and air. This unfailing and unobstructed king of wrathful ones should be applied against malicious rākṣasas and the like, whose minds are turned away from the Three Jewels and who are greatly proud and arrogant. With a mind intent on their benefit, one should bring them to give rise to the mind set on supreme awakening and, through faith, to become devoted to the Three Jewels. Not even by the rites of other ritual manuals should it be applied against lowly, suffering beings. The great king of wrathful ones should be applied on behalf of those who have devotion and faith in the Three Jewels. Even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution will without doubt obtain the accomplishments he desires, in accordance with the rite." So spoke the Blessed One, Vajradhara.

Then glorious Vajradhara,
his heart endowed with compassion,
having fully surveyed all of this,
the whole realm of sentient beings without exception,
he who works for the benefit of beings,
made his request in pleasing words:

"Blessed One, of all dharmas you alone are the sovereign lord;
you alone are the Omniscient One,
whose all-knowing is vast as the sky.
For beings who have no protector
you are protector, ally and friend in all things.
For all sentient beings you alone are the supremely kind and gentle father.
Healing the diseases of the afflictions,
you alone are the king of physicians.
Of all sentient beings
you are the chief, supremely devoted to them.
For me, here, you alone are the chief; I have no other.

"Wishing to benefit sentient beings,
I put this request to you:
with your heart endowed with compassion, Protector, tell me this:
how will sentient beings become happy?
How is it, and through what,
that here they have come to rest on suffering?
Lord, tell me these things.

"Kings, savage men, bandits and thieves, and likewise fire and water,
disease, famine and the māras,
and likewise the terror of untimely death,
excessive rain and the failure of rain,
and constant harm from epidemics:

Protector, how may one here remain unchanged, though they be a hundred?

"Beautifully adorned with glory,
with the very power to bring under control,
and with love for all sentient beings:
how will all of these arise?
How does one come to have a poor, bad complexion?
How does the body become feeble,
smoke-colored and haggard?
And then, how will distractions not arise for mantra practitioners, all harms entirely cast off?
How may all this be lovingly well cared for,
and wealth upon wealth increase?

"When lying down and when sitting,
when walking or when staying,
how may the mantra practitioner always be at ease?
How will the deity perform fierce rites for him and remain connected with him?
How will accomplishment in rites come about swiftly?

"Rākṣasas, mahoragas, kumbhāṇḍas, pretas, beasts of prey and likewise snakes,
whatever constantly inflicts harm:
how may one not be harmed by them?
Pacifying and enriching,
and likewise the rites of control and of fierce sorcery:
how, accomplished swiftly,
will they become effective?
All this, O one of great fortune,
it is fitting that you now explain."

The Sage, lord of the Dharma, having heard these words,
spoke in pleasing speech

to that great Vajrapāṇi:

"Excellent, only son, great hero!
Vajrapāṇi, mighty in strength,
great in miraculous power, excellent once more!
In my teaching you are the one;
you alone are my son,
who always makes it increase.
The protection of my teaching, too, rests in your hands.
You alone are the Victor's son,
the chief, the lord, the charioteer.
On you alone it depends;
all awakening rests in the palm of your hand.

"What you have asked,
only son, is wondrous.
The marvel of the supreme secret
I shall explain without omission.
That which dwells in my heart is blessed for the sake of others.
The secret of all dharmas, too, never taught anywhere before this,
I shall explain to you, hero,
without omission: come, listen.

"The secret that abides,
by which accomplishments are swiftly won, abides here on the face of the earth together with those of supreme form:
temples of many colors,
and likewise bearers of many forms,
of great miraculous power and great might,
who likewise uphold the Victor's sons,
truly endowed with the Victor's qualities, supremely devoted to the Three Jewels.
Honoring these, and honoring them again,
those who do harm are burned.
It binds them by the truth of the Victors;

it brings all sentient beings under control.

"Those given to sexual union, whoever does evil with fire,
those of celibate conduct and likewise others, whatever people there are on the earth:
all of these are harmed here.
The cities of the gods likewise:
with bodies malicious and ugly in hue,
the malevolent ones do harm.
Having bowed to the stable and the moving,
they have cast this world aside.
Apart from the teaching here on earth,
they have no teaching at all.

"That through which happiness is experienced you, too, ought to hear.
The mantra practitioner, having first done all this,
the perfect Buddha, light of the sun,
the omniscient lord endowed with understanding,
beyond all elaborations,
the utterly pure Dharma,
the great abode, peaceful from the very beginning,
wholly free of every fault,
bringing about every excellence:
this is the chief of the Three Jewels, fulfilling every intention.

"The forms of the planetary spirits, their signs, their attire and their very shapes are not known to the stable and the moving;
so I shall explain them: son, listen.
This abode of wisdom of mine, wondrous, of beautiful aspect,
in all the circle of the earth,
only son, I have never taught."

"The supreme forms of the planetary spirits, supremely wondrous, beyond conception,

have become supremely beautiful;
relying on beautiful forms
that are wrathful, with ugly faces, they themselves abide beautiful and beneficent.
When their form, beyond conception,
has become supremely beautiful,
then this is beyond conception,
not the domain of the meditation of sages.
Peaceful acts are done for sentient beings,
and the wrathful is wrathful indeed;
for sentient beings this one, as peace,
at that time acts in every way.

"If the wise make offerings to the Buddha,
the Dharma and likewise the Saṅgha,
their forms are represented,
and at that time one should make the offering.
Pacifying should be known as pacifying,
and enriching too, in its proper order;
this one called the fierce rite,
and the defining forms of bringing under control:
all of these, put in brief,
have been taught at length.
Through offering in deep equipoise
this is not pacifying and the rest;
one directly honors the Three Jewels,
who bring about every excellence.

"With the mind restrained and with the five senses restrained, when a day has passed with the great white fragrance,
one anoints the body with it and is adorned by bathing.
Having gone to a pleasing place,
very secluded and free of cattle,
one should always smear it with cow dung and the like,
and anoint it with fragrance.
The colors yellow and red,
white, or likewise green,

and black are rightly taught.
Having taken up the colors,
the wise, according to their understanding,
should make a pleasing maṇḍala.
The Buddha should be made yellow,
the Dharma should be made white,
the Saṅgha should be made green:
this secret is rightly proclaimed.
By the many colors of the planetary spirits
the maṇḍalas are marked out.
Beneath it the wise
should always place the body of the mantra practitioner.
One draws the side of the one who holds the mudrā,
each with his own mudrā, color and emblem.
The measure of the maṇḍala is well known to be sixteen finger-widths;
or else, in whatever way pleases the mind,
in that way one should properly undertake it.
In accordance with the colors indicated,
one offers scents, flowers and the like.
In equipoise, for each in turn,
one recites their secret mantras.
With a one-pointed mind,
having meditated on oneself as the Sugata,
with each planetary spirit present before one,
one should utter the secret mantras.
Then by this secret mantra
every intention is completely fulfilled:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvva sāparipūrakebhyaḥ sarvva tathāga bhakti svāhā sarvvatrayaṃ āḥ āditya suviśuddhyaḥ
This is the mantra of the Sun, the Moon, the Suppressor and Mars.
vibudha phaka
This is that of Mercury.
oṃ bhogaspadayaḥ
This is that of Jupiter.
oṃ asurodha mahoḥ

This is that of Venus.
oṃ kṛṣṇa varṇṇa phaka
This is that of Saturn.
oṃ vikṛta vaktra ruci svāhā
This is that of Rāhu.

"Moreover, each secret mantra should be recited a hundred and seven times seven.
The planetary spirits of many forms should all be honored in this way.
Good fortune will arise,
and vast wealth will be bestowed.
Kings, savage men, bandits and the like,
rākṣasas, mahoragas and kumbhāṇḍas:
none of them will appear,
and there will never be fear of them.
One is freed from all diseases,
all suffering is cast off,
and one attains the state of lord of all:
this will come about without doubt.
Whoever has become afflicted, abiding in the very nature of affliction,
through offering according to the rite,
that affliction will no longer arise for him.
He abides always in happiness,
loving, kind and gentle to sentient beings,
his mind clear and joyful, delighting in benefiting all beings.

"The benefit that comes from accomplishment:
a peaceful mind in equipoise, outwardly keeping to discipline,
being lord and chief of all,
a king of great magical power,
and one who tames malicious beings:
this will come about without doubt;
so the Victor, speaker of truth, has declared.
Excessive rain and the failure of rain,

the onset of famine and the outbreak of strife:
when the maṇḍala has been honored,
these will not occur for him.

"When one undertakes this rite for pacifying and for enriching, scents, as taught in accordance with the rite,
should first be offered here.
Even for one who is laden with evil
it will be quickly accomplished.
He is freed from all diseases,
all faults are cast off,
he is freed from all evil,
all strife is cast off,
and everything will always be happy:
this will come about without doubt.
If one makes offerings by this rite of offering,
having done what is meritorious,
all the hosts of gods are pleased and will bestow vast accomplishments.
All malicious vināyakas and rākṣasas of terrifying form do no harm
to the mantra practitioner diligent in recitation.
He is always free of the various diseases and will always live
in perfect wealth;
through offering according to the rite
even the king comes under his control.
All the malicious ones of great might,
the terrifying planetary spirits and the rest,
and the ḍākinīs too, of great power,
will bow down to him on every side:
this will come about without doubt.
Thus, having made offerings
in every way and in every respect, one knows happiness in all things,

one casts off the ocean of suffering,
one is beautified by every kind of excellence,
likewise always endowed with royal power,
one's speech is pleasing everywhere,
one is adorned with lordship over all,
and one becomes supremely fortunate:
of this there is no doubt at all."

When he had spoken thus, the great yogin, the Sage, lord of all dharmas, fell completely silent.
Then the assembly said:
"Great hero, excellent being,
omniscient one, free of the sickness of fever, you have taught the definitive meaning of the reality of mantra completely, without remainder.
Protector, beings were utterly without it;
this way it has been declared in your presence,
this essence, drawn from the vast ocean of secret mantra and condensed:
by obtaining it, this fearlessness becomes manifest.
All of them, without doubt,
having dealt with all who dwell beneath the earth,
are freed from all suffering and truly endowed with all happiness.
Then everything will come about,
and all diseases will be cast off.
The malicious ones of terrifying form,
and whatever rākṣasas have fangs,
on seeing the secret mudrā,

will all of them perish."

This concludes the chapter on the vast offering to the planetary spirits.

The one called the protector Acala watches over sentient beings.
He reveals the maṇḍala of Mañjuśrī.
Then all the beautiful accomplishments,

the vajra, the sword and the like as well,
within the later maṇḍala
the mantra practitioner accomplishes according to the rite.
Having seen the rite of the actions,
he properly examines the ground for its purity.
Wishing to benefit the disciples,
he draws the whole maṇḍala with care.
It measures five cubits on every side,
each side adorned with a courtyard.
Where the gateways have been set up,
one should visualize the western gate.
The rite of the gate, free of fear,
should be performed at the northern side.
Whoever performs it otherwise will surely perish before long.

As before, according to the rite,
the lines should be struck as a square,
with gate recesses and with courtyards,
and well adorned with bands as well.
Then, in the central part, the mantra practitioner draws the sword mudrā, of beautiful form,
in the middle of a fire maṇḍala,
set firmly upon a jewel stone,
wreathed in a blazing garland of splendor,
like the light of the rising sun.
With its own seed syllable, seed by seed,
he draws the perfect Buddha who is to be meditated upon.
This is the mantra of blessing:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvva viśva mukhebhyaḥ he he he ājñā pari mārgaṇa āgaccha bhagavan sīghraṃ svāhā

To its north one should draw a vase marked with a vajra, peaceful, wreathed in a blazing garland,
the very nature of the Lord of the World.
In the southern direction, for the protector,
a vajra should be carefully drawn.

In the middle of a fire maṇḍala,
the wise one, keeping to the northeast, the direction of Īśāna, should draw the beautiful image and mudrā of Vajrapāṇi, set upon a jewel stone and blazing,
which is said to be the wish-fulfilling jewel:
the mudrā of the king of wrath, in heroic play.
Having drawn a lotus above it,
all the buddhas abide there.
Keeping to the southeast, the direction of Agni,
one should draw a vajra with great care,
with a terrifying garland of flames, resting upon a lotus.
Below, the wise one should draw the servant of the king of wrathful ones, standing upon a vajra stone,
encircled by blazing vajras.
Within the middle of the wind maṇḍala,
one should draw there the noose mudrā, wreathed with constant flames.

Then in the second section
one should draw the female messengers all around.
The female messenger called the Steadfast One is properly placed in the north;
seated upon a water maṇḍala,
one should draw the Sky Slayer there.
In the southern direction the Terrifying Lady is seated in the middle of a sun maṇḍala, terrifying all obstructors on every side,
blazing like the fire of destruction.
She should be drawn upon a wheel stone.
For the sake of their retinues,
one should draw with great care.
For the Sky Slayer, on the band,
a pestle and a hammer
should be drawn with great care.
Then again, in the west,

one should draw the terrifying Blessed Lady.
The mudrā known as the ūrṇā should be drawn in the eastern part.
The goddess is seated upon a white lotus,
adorned with garlands of jewels.
Thus, with certainty on every side, when the mantra practitioner joins the assembly of virtuous mudrās each with its own seed syllable,
the supreme maṇḍala is wondrous.
The mantra practitioner should please all these by offering scents, flowers and the like, according to the rite.

Then Vajrapāṇi spoke the mantra of blessing:

Joining the palms of the hands with the middle fingers inside:
holding this glorious mudrā is declared to be the Lotus Treasury.
In the very presence of all the protectors,
it blesses the maṇḍala.

The mantra is this:

namaḥ sarvva tathāgatebhyaḥ sarvva sukhebhyaḥ hūṃ hūṃ vaḥ vaḥ maṃ maṃ svāhā

With this mantra, together with the mudrā, one should perform the invitation, the request to depart and the rest according to the rite. This is the great king of maṇḍalas of Mañjuśrī, the supremely secret protector Acala, taught by all the buddhas in order to protect the teaching, for the true Dharma to endure, and in order to protect sentient beings. Whoever, having entered here, has trained well in the knowledge of the mudrās of the directions has supremely entered the maṇḍala, the secret essence of all the tantras.

This maṇḍala of Mañjuśrī should not be explained to just anyone. Why is that? Because this maṇḍala has been taught as supreme.

Whatever mantra practitioner acts otherwise,
by corrupting the rite of the maṇḍala,
will surely, together with his disciples, perish without doubt.

Then, having entered this maṇḍala of Mañjuśrī, one should bind the boundaries, and not otherwise. The master, having drawn the maṇḍala and entered it, should engage the disciple in whichever rites are appropriate.

Then Vajrapāṇi again spoke these words to Mañjuśrī, the youthful one: "Mañjuśrī, listen. The rite of the painted cloth that suppresses the immeasurable power of opponents is this. One should take cloth bought for more than its price, free of hair and the like. On it one should paint the king of wrathful ones, the Sole Hero, with his right hand raised, his right foot lifted up, his left foot also raised upward, his left hand making the threatening gesture with the forefinger, his face hideous, blazing within and above; and the Tathāgata above, reviving him with both hands. The king of flowers is to the north. To the right is the Blessed One Vairocana. Below, one should paint the practitioner raising his hands with a vessel of incense and gazing at the king of wrathful ones. Mañjuśrī, I have explained this rite of the painted cloth of the protector Acala out of a wish to benefit sentient beings.

"Mañjuśrī, listen to the rite of the means of accomplishment of the protector Acala, by which one obtains great accomplishment through an easy method. Here, first of all, a bodhisattva who practices the conduct of a bodhisattva by way of mantra should, alone and living on alms, in delightful places such as snow mountains, first perform the approach of a hundred thousand recitations before this painting. Then, taking up residence on a mountain summit, he should recite three hundred thousand times. Then, on the full moon, having made offerings as his means allow, he should recite until dawn. In the morning, at daybreak or after the sun has risen, the signs will appear: the sun will change and turn, and it will also become dark."

In the four directions a great sound will be heard, proclaiming "ha ha." The flower garlands of the king of wrathful ones will sway, the earth will quake, thunder will rumble and roar, and the vidyādharas will rain down flowers. Into the practitioner's presence the great king of wrathful ones himself will come, surrounded by all the gods, the nāgas, and the rest. At that time the sufferings of the hells will be completely pacified. Then one should offer water for welcome, prostrate, and remain there. Then the king of wrathful ones will speak, saying, "Son, I shall grant you one boon." One should then take whatever one wishes: the state of a vidyādhara, kingship, or invisibility.

If one becomes a vidyādhara, one will have the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, holding a sword in hand, mounted on a divine vehicle, surrounded by many vidyādharas, honored with great reverence by all the vidyādharas, surrounded by many buddha fields, and the buddhas, the blessed ones, will make offerings to one; and one will live for an eon.

Alternatively, if one wishes to accomplish an eye ointment, one should combine antimony, blue utpala, and costus, put them into a copper vessel, and at the time of a lunar eclipse recite the mantra until smoke arises. If that is applied to the eyes, one will become invisible within the desire realm.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the sword, one should take a sword without crack or flaw, and on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the waning fortnight make vast offerings before the painting. Holding the protecting sword in the right hand, one should recite the mantra until it emits rays of light. When it blazes or radiates light, one alone will become a vidyādhara. Through its blazing one will become a king of vidyādharas. Unimpeded, one overpowers the strength of adversaries, and whoever sees one, in whosever presence one is seen, will gain faith.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the Vajradhara attainment, one should take a vajra of wrought iron sixteen finger-widths long, three-pronged at both ends, and smear it with red sandalwood. Beginning on the first day of the month of miracles, one should make vast offerings before the painting and recite the mantra each day. On the full moon of the month of Caitra, one should make vast offerings, light a full hundred butter lamps, and sit close beside a bundle of kuśa grass. Holding the vajra with both hands, one should recite until it blazes; by holding it, one together with one's retinue will attain the state of a universal monarch of the vidyādharas. In the same way, one should also accomplish the rites of other ritual manuals for weapons such as the wheel and the spear, and for garments, sandals, the sacred thread, and the like. As before, the three kinds of accomplishment will arise.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish wealth, one should smear kindling sticks of khadira wood with curd and butter and make eight thousand burnt offerings; wealth will then be bestowed. If one goes to the bank of a river that flows into the ocean and sends eighty thousand lotuses anointed with sandalwood into the river, one will obtain wealth equal to the heap of lotuses.

If one wishes to bring the gods under one's control, one should anoint kindling sticks of aloeswood with curd, honey, and butter and make burnt offerings; they will then come under one's control. If one burns rice anointed with those three, the mantra will become inexhaustible.

If one wishes to bring the yakṣas under one's control, one should make burnt offerings of pills of guggulu mixed with the three sweet substances; they will then come under one's control. With kindling sticks of aśoka wood, the yakṣiṇīs will come under one's control. If one makes burnt offerings of white mustard seed for a king, the king will come under one's control.

If one goes to the bank of a river that flows into the ocean and makes a fire offering of one hundred thousand lotuses, Śrī, the goddess of fortune, will come and bestow wealth, or will grant the kingship of a single region. Then, if one offers three hundred thousand, one will become lord over all the lands. If one offers five hundred thousand, one will become lord of Jambudvīpa.

If one places the painting at the mouth of an asura cave and recites three hundred thousand times, all mantras will arise. If one enters without hesitation, the elixir of rejuvenation and the like will be obtained. Then, if one remains right there, the terror of Viṣṇu's discus will come about.

Beginning on the first day of the waxing fortnight, one should touch the toe of the Blessed One with eight thousand jasmine flowers. If one keeps pressing them on until light rays issue from the big toe of the foot, the practitioner's body will instantly become invisible, and his hair will become coiled matted locks. Together with his retinue he will attain the state of a king of vidyādharas and will remain for an eon.

One should draw an eight-petaled lotus on the ground and, seated upon it, recite one hundred thousand times; then, remaining right in that place, dwelling upon a lotus and possessing a retinue of a thousand, one will remain for an eon.

Then, if one wishes to extract a treasure, one should take a vase wound with black thread, smear it with sandalwood, fill it with water, consecrate it with eight thousand recitations, and set it down at the place where the treasure lies. When the ground there cracks open, one should sprinkle water on the ground, dig down about a cubit, and take the treasure.

Then, to accomplish the lion, one should make a lion out of earth from an anthill, smear it with gorocanā, and place it in a maṇḍala. Having made great offerings, one should recite until it moves. It will become a lion, and by mounting its back one's hair will curl into coils the color of bell metal; one will gain foreknowledge and will live for ten thousand years.

Mañjuśrī, if this rite taught in the ritual manual of noble Acala is practiced, it will bring swift results."

When the Blessed One had spoken thus, that entire assembly, complete in every respect, praised what the Blessed One had taught, rejoiced in it, rose from their seats, and departed.

This concludes the ritual manual called The Noble Great King of Wrathful Ones Acala, Taught to Tame the Valiant through the Immeasurable Power of All Tathāgatas.

At the command of the king of Minyak, the translator Lan Gelong Darma Lodrö translated and edited this from the presence of the Indian preceptor Ulaśamarakṣita. It was requested by the monk Yönten Dorjé.

Later, as urged by the command of the Dharma king Tashi Rabten Palzangpo, the translator, the monk Chökyong Zangpo, carefully checked it against an Indian manuscript and established the text. And again, during the lifetime of the great lord of men Tashi Rabten Sokpo Pak, the monk Ānandamaṅgalaṃ, at the temple of Palkhor Dechen, checked it against an Indian manuscript from the monastery of Vikramaśīla, properly corrected whatever could not be left uncorrected, and made it pure.

Here is volume Da of the Collected Tantras.

Translator's Notes

• "Various Array," "Bearer of Sky Flowers" and "Utterly Pure" are bodhisattva names I could not identify with confidence; they are translated by meaning. "Adorned with the Essence of the Flower Ground" appears to correspond to the world system Kusumatalagarbhālaṃkṛta, but I have kept a translation of the Tibetan. "Dwelling upon the wind" renders the Tibetan literally.
• The name of the samādhi, rendered "Universal Arising of Flames that Burn the Vajra-Arrogant," is uncertain in its exact sense. The verse is attributed in the Tibetan to the bodhisattvas of the other world systems, though its content seems addressed to them; I have followed the Tibetan as it stands.
• "Dazed" renders a Tibetan expression for being stupefied or overpowered. The verse beginning "This, which those who cannot hear it" is terse and its first two lines are construed with some uncertainty.
• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as an epithet of the Buddha, "the Delight of the Śākya Clan." The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("dwelling on the ground of exhaustion") and the following "acts for beings without deliberation" (□□□□□□□□□□) are obscure; the rendering is literal. □□□□□□□□□ ("well composed") may refer to the Sanskrit language (saṃskṛta) rather than to good composition generally.
• The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("otherwise it remains something merely apart") is obscure and rendered literally. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is unclear (□□□□□□□ possibly for □□□□□, "nature"). □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered literally; it may mean that approach practice alone yields a small fruit. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is uncertain. In Vajrapāṇi's verses, several lines ending in □□□□□ are taken as requests, following the surrounding □□□□□□□□□□□□ and □□□□□□□□□□□□.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the lords of Indra's ten abodes") is unclear and rendered literally; it may refer to the guardians of the ten directions. □□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the Buddha Eye") is also the name of the goddess Buddhalocanā, but here it is presented as a name for the rite. "The Immovable ground" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is the eighth bodhisattva ground, Acalā, which the text plays on in explaining the name Acala.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, applied to malevolent grahas, is rendered with the glossary sense "restoration"; it may simply mean that the mantra restores and purifies them. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("like sawdust beaten down by iron") is obscure. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("What will become of this only son?") is rendered literally; its reference is unclear. In Vajrapāṇi's plea, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ and the moth simile (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are uncertain. In the closing prose, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is not a known expression and is taken as □□□□□□□□ ("far-reaching"); the syntax of that sentence is also uncertain.

• Several lines are obscure and rendered literally: □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("by bringing their minds back into their own bodies," apparently recovering from the swoon of the previous scene), □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, the attendant term □□□□, and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("what he truly taught upon taking birth").

• In the opening request, □□□□□□□□□ is here taken in its literal sense of healing and cleansing diseases, not as the poṣadha ceremony, since its object is "all diseases." The ailment □□□□□□□□□□□□□ is uncertain; it is rendered "eruptions that break out at night." In the description of the master's body, □□□□□□ ("to train") makes no sense and is read as □□□□□□□, "reaching": the hands reach the knees. In the line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□ is taken as indolence (□□□□□□□), which is uncertain.

• The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken in its usual ritual sense of dismissing the deity after worship, which fits the following steps of binding the directions and invoking the deity again; it could also be read as an invitation to come. In the northeast verses, □□□□□□ ("loving-kindness") may instead refer to Maitreya, whose emblem is the water flask, though the verse names Samantabhadra. The compass directions are given as the Tibetan names them, and their order is that of the text. The last line breaks off mid-sentence and continues in the next piece.

• Several names in the lists could not be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning: "the fierce and mighty one with the clenched fist" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), the sages "Protector of Beings" (□□□□□□□□□□□) and "Shunner of Evil" (□□□□□□□, also the guardian of the southern gate), "Space" (□□□□□□) among the goddesses, "the Black One" (□□□□□) at the eastern gate, and "Delight Maker" (□□□□□□□□) at the northern gate. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as naming Ānanda and Nanda; it could instead mean "Ānanda, who is called Joyful." The meaning of the closing line, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, is unclear, and its sense may be completed in the following piece.

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("as if directly taught") is read as the evident □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "as if directly present," which the text itself uses a few lines later. □□□□□□□□□□ is taken as the imperative "hold!" (□□□□). Several lines in the offering rite are elliptical: the line naming "the Protector of the World" and the line about the "lord of the offering" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are rendered as literally as the sense allows, and their exact reference is uncertain. The opening address, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, could also be narrative ("the great vajra ones arose").

• In the list of what is denied, □□□□□□ is taken as the Sāṃkhya primal matter (pradhāna), and □□□□ and □□□□□ as the subtle and manifest states of that system. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("arising only from the absence of desire") is unclear as written.

The precepts "ten, eight, and then five" are probably the novice, eight-limbed fasting, and lay precepts. The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as bondage under punishment.

• "Humbly submitting one's own body" renders the obscure phrase "pressing the ears of one's own body" (rang gi lus ni snyan mnan), which seems to denote a gesture of submission; the sense is uncertain. "The son of Vinatā" takes the Tibetan "son of the tamed one" (dul ba'i sras po) as a rendering of Vinatā (literally "bowed, humble"), mother of Garuḍa; this identification is tentative. "Lordship" (dbang phyug gi go 'phang) is taken here as a state of sovereignty, not the god Īśvara.

• The opening lines seem to describe disposing of the disciple's garments or the ritual materials in a river; the object is unstated in the Tibetan. "With the hand of the guhyaka" renders gsang ba pa'i lag pa, perhaps meaning Vajrapāṇi's hand gesture; the sense is uncertain. "Attentive, not wavering for even an instant" renders the obscure tsham ngam skad cig mi g.yo bar; the first word is unclear. The Sanskrit word paryaṃkāśīn, kept in Tibetan letters, means "seated cross-legged".

• "The stance" renders the obscure term tsham ngam, which recurs in this section; its context here, followed by a description of a wrathful standing posture, suggests a stance or posture, but the meaning is uncertain. "The seven mātṛkās" follows the evident reading bdun nyid for the written bdun nyin. "The three worlds" renders sa gsum, literally "the three grounds" (below, upon and above the earth).

• The speaker and addressee of the lines from "Great-souled bearer of the vajra" through "split their heads with the vajra" are not marked in the Tibetan; they are taken as the Sugata's charge to Vajradhara, reading khyod kyi as the instrumental khyod kyis. "Arjaka" is the plant whose bud is proverbially said to split, the image for a head split by mantra power. "Whatever classes and the like" (ris sogs) is obscure.

• "One should give praise" renders bstod par bya, which is unexpected in a description of a posture; the sense may be different. "Their lords" takes dbang po as the lords of the rākṣasas and yakṣas rather than the god Indra. "Carbuncles erupting in the night" renders lhog pa mtshan bar rdol ba; mtshan could also refer to the private parts.

• □□□□□□□□□ ("Vajra-born"), the addressee of Śākyamuni's verses, could not be identified with confidence as a known Sanskrit name (perhaps Vajrodbhava or Vajrasaṃbhava), so it is rendered literally. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ in the last verse is taken as the earth that has become the seat (lit. "essence") of awakening, echoing □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ earlier in the passage. The line "true wisdom spreads forth" renders the rare verb □□□□□□□ somewhat tentatively.

• The second line, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, is read as the Buddha's absorption dissolving as he rises; it could also be taken as the absorption becoming "thousandfold," but the context of withdrawing the display favors the reading given. The addressee □□□□□□□□□□ is kept as "Vajra Born," as in the preceding passage.

• The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is obscure; □□□□□ is taken tentatively as a form of □□□□, "boundaries," so that the preceding mantra is a general one for sealing the boundaries. In the painting rite, "sold by a hero" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) renders the Tibetan literally; it may refer to cloth bought from a particular kind of seller or obtained without bargaining, and the sense is uncertain. □□□□□□□ is rendered "the sisters," taken as a class of goddesses (bhaginī).

• □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as "lord of serpents," reading □□□□□□□ as a rendering of Sanskrit bhujaga. The lines on the brushes and potter's vessels (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ... □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are obscure and translated literally. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is understood to mean that the mantra's success does not rest on the mantrin's own power; the sense is uncertain. The "Lord of the World" on the right of the second painting, a bowing ornamented figure linked with the white lotus and compassion, is presumably Avalokiteśvara, though the text does not name him.

• The lines □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ are taken to mean that the painted scroll becomes the sustenance of beings at the heart of the earth; the sense is uncertain. In the bodhisattvas' address, the agent ("the wise bodhisattva, the compassionate one") is grammatically loose and has been rendered as closely as the Tibetan allows.
• "Whether one has eaten leftovers or not" renders lhag ma, most likely the ritual state of impurity after eating (Skt. ucchiṣṭa): the rite is said not to depend on purity, dates or fasting. In the husband-subjugation verse, "fragments of it" (gzegs ma) is ambiguous: "it" may refer to the substances just named or to something belonging to the husband. Ka li ka is taken as Skt. kalikā (buds, or a plant of that name). The plant 'chi ltas ("death-omen") could not be identified with confidence and is translated literally. "Put that person inside it" follows the Tibetan mi de, evidently the enemy represented by the written name.
• "Yakṣa cluster" renders gnod sbyin 'khrigs, an ingredient that could not be identified with confidence; it is translated literally. "The lords dwelling on the ten grounds" renders dbang phyug as a common noun (lords, masters of the bodhisattva grounds), not as the god Īśvara. In "within half a watch," thun is a unit of time, not the ritual substances. "Intoxicating wood" (myos byed shing) may be datura or a similar plant.
• The plant sge'u gsher could not be identified and is given in phonetic form. "Taking up what has been discarded, the wise one should make the house empty" is a literal rendering of an obscure couplet. "A fire of chaff" takes spun pa as a variant of sbun pa, chaff or husks. "Yellow pigment" renders ser rtsi, whose exact substance is uncertain. "Quartan fever" renders nyin bzhi pa, a fever recurring every fourth day.
• In "ground finely into powder," the text's zhi bar ("pacified") is read as zhib par ("finely"), which the context requires. "Water sickness" renders chu sri ba, probably dropsy or urinary retention. Sati flowers (sa ti) could not be identified with confidence. The couplet "Even one who has become his own god, the lord of the three realms" is ambiguous in the Tibetan; it may alternatively mean that the lord of the three realms himself reduces the target to ashes.
• "King of ritual manuals" renders rtog pa'i rgyal po (Skt. kalparāja), the work's designation of itself. "Diseases of the womb" renders skye gnas nad, which could also refer to diseases of the genitals. "Even if he wields a vajra" is a literal reading of rdo rje thogs nas kyang; the sense may be that even a vajra wielder cannot protect him.
• The Tibetan for the deity whose splendor burns the obstructors, rdo rje gar gyi dbang phyug, is translated literally as "the Lord of the Vajra Dance"; its Sanskrit form cannot be identified with confidence. In "the hoard of beginningless saṃsāra," the word zom literally means a large jar or vessel and is taken here as a store of accumulated karma. In "actions, their causes and their fruits," the text reads rgyud ("continuum" or "tantra"); the evident sense is rgyu, "cause," and that reading is translated. The line rendered "whatever illnesses there may be" contains the word 'dod ("desire"), which does not fit the context well; the rendering follows the evident sense.
• The mother of the buddhas, "the eye of space" in Tibetan, is rendered Gaganalocanā, the name this figure bears in the Mahāvairocana tradition. Several other maṇḍala deities could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally: "the one with the stainless vajra of space," "Proud Bearing," and the two door figures "Delightful to See" and "Facing Toward" (the last possibly Abhimukha). In "adorn their mouths with an ox and the like," the Tibetan ba glang ("ox") is unexpected in a vase rite; the meaning is uncertain.
• "With two finger-breadths for the little finger" renders a line about the sword's dimensions whose exact reference is unclear; it may describe the width of the hilt. Stainless Space and Great Force are the two vajra holders named in the preceding maṇḍala; their Sanskrit names are not identified.
• In "beat them and probe them," and later "piercing and likewise probing," the verb rtog

("examine") is unexpected in a list of violent rites; the sense intended is uncertain. In "in the very form of the seizer," the Tibetan 'dzin pa ("seizer, grasping one") may refer to a seizing spirit (graha) or to some material; the meaning is uncertain.

• "Down to the smallest, mothers and young alike" renders ma bu phra mo, whose sense in this mudrā passage is uncertain. "Emanations" renders sprul; it may stand for sbrul, "serpents." The mudrā named thig le is given as Tilaka.

• The Tibetan says that "the Blessed One" entered absorption, although the preceding sentence describes Vajrapāṇi entering it; the text may be calling Vajrapāṇi "Blessed One", as tantras sometimes do, but this is unclear. "Makes words come true" renders the obscure tshig rnal mar 'bebs; it might instead mean making someone speak the truth. The written se'u (pomegranate) makes no sense here; I have read be'u (calf), giving the standard ritual "ghee from a cow whose calf is of the same color". "Three supreme requests granted" renders the unclear mchog gsol ba gsum mthong ba, literally "will see three supreme requests". "Salamari" (sa la ma ri) and the "magic-making plant" ('phrul byed) are substances I could not identify with confidence. The grain called so ba, and the caṇaka (chickpea) kindling sticks, are given as the text has them.

• "Frees people from Brahmā and rākṣasas" renders tshangs pa dang srin po; the pair may stand for the spirit class brahmarākṣasa, those possessed by such spirits being the ones freed. The opening of the snakebite rite is terse; "seized by a black snake for six months" follows the Tibetan literally. In "come bowing" the written dgu is read as "bend, bow"; the sense is not certain.

• The requester at the opening is called Vajradhara, but the Sage's reply is addressed to Vajrapāṇi, so here the name evidently refers to Vajrapāṇi as the one who holds the vajra. Several lines are terse and their sense uncertain: "remain unchanged, though they be a hundred" (brgya la mi 'gyur ba), "blessed for the sake of others" (gzhan gyis byin gyis brlabs, reading gyis as gyi), "whoever does evil with fire", and the unfinished construction beginning "The mantra practitioner, having first done all this", which seems to list the objects of practice. "The stable and the moving" means the inanimate and animate world.

• The planetary spirit called gnon po, listed with the Sun, Moon and Mars, could not be identified with confidence and is rendered "the Suppressor"; it may stand for Ketu. Several lines are obscure: "when a day has passed with the great white fragrance" (dri ma dkar chen zhag tu lon), "through offering in deep equipoise this is not pacifying and the rest", the lines on the colors of the planetary spirits and the placing of the practitioner's figure, and the assembly's words "Protector, beings were utterly without it". In "that affliction will no longer arise for him" the Tibetan has phan pa ("benefit"), which contradicts the context; the evident sense has been translated.

• The female messengers brtan pa ("the Steadfast One") and mkha' gsod ma ("the Sky Slayer"), the Terrifying Lady (rnam 'jigs ma) and the "king of flowers" could not be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning. "Whichever rites are appropriate" renders the unclear tsham ngam gyi las. "Reviving him" renders dbugs 'byin par mdzad pa, which could also mean "consoling" or "encouraging". In the third chapter-colophon, rab 'byams has been taken as "vast".

• "The terror of Viṣṇu's discus will come about" renders an ambiguous phrase; it may mean either that the practitioner gains power to terrify with Viṣṇu's discus or that he is threatened by it. "Lord over all the lands" renders □□□□□□□□□, whose exact sense is uncertain. □□□□□□□□ is taken as the arrival of Śrī (Lakṣmī); it could also mean simply "fortune gathers." The sense of □□□□□□□□ ("hair ... the color of bell metal") is uncertain. In the closing title, □□□□□□ means "taming," not the Vinaya, and □□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the valiant," Skt. vīra) matches the Sanskrit title. Minyak refers to the Tangut kingdom. The Indian preceptor's name is given as spelled.

• Palkhor Dechen is the great monastery at Gyantse; Tashi Rabten was a ruler of Gyantse. The final line is a volume marker of the Collected Tantras (Gyübum) section, volume Da.

Colophon

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
