The Secret Tantra of the Ritual Manual of Krodhavijaya, known in Sanskrit as the Krodhavijayakalpaguhyatantra and in Tibetan as Khro bo rnam par rgyal ba'i rtog pa gsang ba'i rgyud, is a tantric scripture centered on Yamāntaka, the wrathful form of the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, here called Krodhavijaya, the Victorious Wrathful One. It opens with the terrifying appearance of this wrathful deity, before whom the other wrathful ones drop their weapons and the worldly gods bow down in fear and offer praise, and it goes on to teach his mantras, mudrās and ritual procedures. Much of the text consists of ritual instructions in verse: rites of protection, healing and pacification, rites for bringing rain or stopping hail, rites of subjugation and destruction directed at enemies, and the construction of the secret wheel diagram called the Hela wheel together with the twelve postures of the wrathful practitioner. Its chapters are presented as sections of a secret ritual manual belonging to the root rite of Mañjuśrī. It is Toh 604 in the Kangyur, where it belongs to the Tantra section, among the action-oriented ritual tantras associated with Mañjuśrī and Yamāntaka.

In Sanskrit: krodhabijayakalpaguhyatantra. In Tibetan: The Secret Tantra of the Ritual Manual of Krodhavijaya.

Homage to the Blessed One Mañjughoṣa.

Then the wrathful one of Mañjughoṣa,
this wrathful one named Yamāntaka, turbulent with weapons and blazing tongues of flame, fierce and endowed with fierce power and might:
when they saw him, all the other wrathful ones let their weapons fall.
Likewise the worldly gods bowed down with their bodies, and moreover, joining their palms,
in terror they offered many praises.
All the many gods, however many there were,
as though tormented by the splendor of Mañjuśrī's wrathful one, declared:

"Blessed One, we have the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha as our refuge, and we have seen your utterly unbearable, terrifying form, pervading the directions with blazing splendor, throwing the three realms into turmoil."
When the gods and the asuras, terrified, had gone for refuge,
then the wrathful one of Mañjughoṣa became peaceful once again.
When the great wrathful one called Yamāntaka was at peace, all the gods who had gone for refuge then asked him:
"We who seek your supreme diligence,
how are we to please you?
In what way will you be gracious?
We have great doubt."
The wrathful one heard the words of the gods,
and Yamāntaka declared:
"All you gods, listen!
I arise before the three times;
I arose before all the buddhas.
I arise after the three times as well;
I arise in the present of the three times.
At the time of the last five hundred years,
I cause my teaching to arise.
When all the teachings have declined,
I cause my teaching to arise.
When evil deeds of immediate retribution are done,
then my teaching arises.
When people eat foul and heavy food,
then my teaching arises.
When they wear poor clothes and tattered rags,
then my teaching arises.
I am the body that arises in the three times;
when all the teachings have declined,
then my teaching arises.

In whatever way things become peaceful,
I am the body of all peace;
in whatever way they become wrathful, all wrath is my body.
All of you of great splendor, since you have gone for refuge to the Three,
keep my unbearable
wrathful one abiding in your minds.
Because the Three Jewels abide,
and because their command is upheld, and out of loving compassion for all sentient beings, my mind has become peaceful.
You who have gone for refuge,
endowed with the mind of awakening:
the supreme accomplisher of every aim,
these seventeen syllables, my heart essence, arisen from my mind, all you gods must hold!"
When Yamāntaka himself had proclaimed the heart essence, the earth then quaked,
the ocean too was violently churned,
and the yakṣas, the rākṣasas, the piśācas and the rest were destroyed.
All the gods bowed down,
the hair on all their limbs standing on end, and took up that wrathful heart essence of the wrathful one Yamāntaka.
Then, to protect the sacred Dharma, Yamāntaka taught them at length this ritual manual
of Krodhavijaya.
Then the ritual manual of Krodhavijaya was spoken by the wrathful one himself.
The gods endowed with compassion and the mind of awakening heard it and rejoiced, and to protect the Three Jewels

each explained a ritual of his own.
As for this root tantra proclaimed by the wrathful one himself, called Krodhavijaya:
the transmundane and the worldly ones who had bowed to him before heard it just as it came from the wrathful one's mouth; and this tantra spoken by the wrathful one himself the bodhisattvas,
with compassion grown vast in the same way, blessed in many ways.

This was the first chapter, called "The Emergence of the Tantra from Krodhavijaya, the Root Ritual Manual of Mañjuśrī."

Then I shall now concisely explain the supreme and marvelous ritual
of Krodhavijaya,
taught by Mañjuśrī's wrathful one.
Here, its maṇḍala,
which bestows all accomplishments and throws the three worlds into turmoil, is called Many Pretas.
In what place is this maṇḍala accomplished in every respect?
The mantra practitioner, first of all,
should examine its site:
a solitary tree, or a charnel ground, an empty house, a crossroads,
a stūpa, a place where two borders meet, an empty thicket, an old road,
a pleasure garden, a mountain peak,
a riverbank, a forest,
or else the shore of a lake;
a shrine of the Great God (Śiva) is suitable as well, or a cattle pen not trampled down.
Above all, in a clean place, wherever the mind is also glad,

there one should make the maṇḍala.
Then the vidyādhara should diligently purify the ground properly:
free of salt, uncracked,
level and free of thorns, high toward the east and north,
its color rich and especially good.
Smear it with cow dung
mixed with the five products of the cow.
Having smeared it as is fitting,
the master, having bathed, having kept a fast and settled in meditative equipoise, should bless it with the wrathful one's protection.
At night, draw the supreme secret maṇḍala called the Great Host of Pretas.
With a beautiful line of three twisted strands made of linen or cotton cloth, the wise one should lay out the lines of the maṇḍala, with four corners and four doors:
first from the east and the north to the south and the west.
That line, from the intermediate directions, should then be drawn straight.
At the southeast corner and at the northwest corner, measure it well with the line, and lay out the lines as a square.

Beautiful with a single tier, it should be adorned with four doors.
The southern door is left open, and the rest should be closed.
In the center, draw a lotus proportioned to the maṇḍala.
The lotus and the doors of the four directions should, without doubt, be made equal.
The ornament should be made half the door;

its sides are equal in measure to the petals.
The secondary ornament as well should be made like the ornament.
Having laid out the lines of the maṇḍala all around, according to the rite, afterwards the vidyādhara, in the proper way, draws with ash from the charnel ground.
Always within the corners,
the northeast and the rest,
the wise one draws the cudgel mudrā.
At the doors of the directions, place pretas, and a fifth preta besides should be visualized upon the lotus.
Likewise, inside the outer doors and in all of those directions, draw headless human corpses, pretas, starkly, with ash from the charnel ground.
That is why it is the Great Host of Pretas.
Its size runs in steps from one cubit up to eight cubits;
never draw it larger than that.
For one's own constant worship, one of a single cubit should be drawn.
For pacifying and for increase,
and for rites concerning kings, two cubits are taught.
For driving away all beings,
and likewise for destroying, three cubits.
Four cubits is declared the best for the acts of subjugation and summoning.
Five cubits is best for striving to eliminate disease, pestilence among people, and enemies.
Six cubits surely turns back all obstructors and grahas.
Seven cubits performs the acts of subjugating and summoning the gods.
Eight cubits should be known as supreme for all accomplishments and for fire offerings.

Having drawn it in whatever way is fitting,
one who is pure should then touch it.
For the water, a water vessel should be filled to the brim with water.
Likewise, for the flowers, another fine vessel should be filled well with lovely, fragrant flowers and garlands of flowers, and made beautiful.
For the scent,
take white and red sandalwood, and likewise guggulu incense mixed with aloeswood.
For lamps, butter lamps,
and the wise one uses a soft wick;
for fierce rites,
it is taught that human fat is used.
As torma, offer fish, meat and so on,
and especially mixed porridge and the like.
Having gathered the requisites there in this way, the holder of the vidyā-mantra bows to all the buddhas and focuses on the mind of awakening.
If one is unable to carry out the work of drawing, then upon the lotus drawn earlier in the center of the Great Host of Pretas, the wise one should imagine the preta with the mind.
Having made this visualization with the supreme mantra of the preta, the four cudgels of the corners as well should be visualized with their own mantras.
If one is able to draw them,
the mantra itself should be placed upon them.
If one is unable to draw the four pretas of the doors as well, it is taught that they are likewise to be blessed with the mantra that seizes pretas.

In order to bless them within
with their own mantra,
imagine legs, arms, heads and shoulders, and likewise further shoulders, and likewise garlands of hands, skulls, skeletons, fresh human skins, and garlands of corpses.
Within it, cause them to be blessed with their own mantra.
Having visualized in this way according to the rite, at the end, invite the wrathful Yamāntaka by reciting his mantra, and request him to be seated with his own heart mantra.
The wrathful one, turbulent and terrifying, his body like blazing flames, noble in splendor, is to be visualized, his complexion radiant as if crushing all pride.
He has six faces, his hair is tawny, his brows are tawny and his eyes are yellow;
he has three eyes, and his eyes are round;
his form has twelve arms.
He sits likewise upon a preta, beautified by six legs.
A trident, a sword, a staff, an axe, a hand outstretched in giving,
and the weapon of the hook:
these he holds likewise in his right hands.
Likewise the six on the left:
a skull cup, a short spear, a great arrow, the forefinger raised in threat, a noose held,
and a club in hand; so he is to be visualized.
He is adorned with fresh and dried human heads and with garlands of pretas, and wears a garment of tiger skin.
His body is huge and his belly is huge;
his faces have many shapes, his hair is like a turbulent ocean.

One face laughs, one face is peaceful,
one face glares terrifyingly with wide eyes, one face has its mouth gaping open and moves its tongue about, and one face bares its fangs.
Thus, having invited him well with the heart mantra, one should offer him the welcoming water.
Then, having offered the welcoming water according to the rite with water mixed with scent, place a red flower
on the crown of the preta as well.
Then the one of great intelligence should offer red sandalwood to the wrathful one.
After the scent come the flowers;
offer a torma of sandalwood.
Flowers and garlands of flowers should be offered with the flower mantra.
Having offered the flowers in due order, according to the rite, with the flower mantra, then, with his own heart mantra as well, on the crown of the wrathful one and at the heart of the chief wrathful one the heart mantra should be set in place.
At his fontanelle place the fontanelle mantra, and on his topknot the crest mantra;
on his body the armor,
and on the array of weapons the weapon mantra.
These, as here taught,
should be set in place with flowers.
Having worshiped in whatever way is fitting, offer incense with its own mantra.
Then blazing lamps
should be set out in the eight directions as well.
Having offered the bhūta torma to the wrathful one, outside the Great Host of Pretas the wise one should give the outer tormas.

Facing toward the chief wrathful one, then once again offer incense.
Outside it, a vessel with water filled with flowers is set down.
Having summoned the disciples, who have bathed and fasted according to the rite, one should kindle splendor in them with all the mantras, and with the heart mantra of the wrathful one give flowers into their two hands and cover their faces with a cloth.
Having had them recollect the Three Jewels, the master should lead them in.
With his own heart mantra, have them cast the flower itself onto the maṇḍala.
Then the mantra practitioner shows them the mudrā called the Cudgel.
The secret pledge of the Three Jewels should be given to them.
Then, for the sake of accomplishment, the mantra practitioner, having empowered them with water and flowers, gives them the secret mantra of the chief wrathful one.
Then, having empowered them according to the rite with the heart mantra of the wrathful one, with flowers, incense and garlands the heart mantra should be given to them.

When they in turn have thus received the supreme heart mantra of the wrathful one, they should then bow to the guru and honor him with gifts as best they can.
If the mantra practitioner honors the guru, accomplishment will be gained; not otherwise.
Having given the disciples the heart mantra, and having worshiped with garlands, sandalwood and so on, after that, take up the vessel placed outside earlier, filled with scented water and the like,

and, having offered the welcoming water, request the unbearable wrathful one of Mañjughoṣa, fierce in his might, to depart.
Once he has departed, that offering water should be offered to the maṇḍala as well.
In the maṇḍala on the vast ground,
the holder of vidyā-mantras who desires unequaled accomplishment should always perform the worship well in this way.
Then he will obtain accomplishment.

This concludes the second chapter, the presentation of the maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas, from the Detailed Root Ritual of Mañjuśrī, the Great Tantra of Krodhavijaya.

Next, further secret mantras follow.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ preta mukha khadakla svāhā
That is the mantra of the central preta.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ ākrodha bijāya agīr jvālite jihve preteśvari hūṃ phaṭ
This is the mantra of the four cudgels of the corners.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ oṃ preta thod lakpaya hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the preta of the eastern door.
oṃ preta bighnantaka hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the preta of the southern door.
oṃ preta jvala hūṃ phaṭ
That is the preta of the western door.
oṃ kṣipra pretodgata hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the preta of the northern door.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ pretamāle bikṛte pretamāle bikṛte pretamāle bikṛte guhya pecika mukhi sarba rakṣo pajuṣṭo hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the garland of pretas.
This is the collection of mantras of the preta maṇḍala.

Now come the mantras for inviting the wrathful Yamāntaka, and the rest.
oṃ namo buddha dharma saṃghebhyaḥ krodha barbīra sarba mayena āgaccha āgaccha oṃ āḥ hūṃ idaṃ preta āsanaṇa pretodgatan rakṣa rakṣa svāhā

That is the mantra for inviting the king of wrathful ones, Yamāntaka.
oṃ jvāla jvālati bigraha hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the armor.
oṃ ākrodhikā yamāntaka hanamtha bhañja hūṃ phaṭ
This is the seventeen-syllable mantra of the king of wrathful ones to whom this ritual belongs.
oṃ āḥ hūṃ
That is his heart mantra.
oṃ kāla hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mantra of the fontanelle.
oṃ yamāntaka ekabīra hūṃ
That is the mantra of the crest.
oṃ baibasvatāntaka hūṃ
That is the mantra of the weapon.
These are the five limbs of the king of wrathful ones, Yamāntaka.
oṃ ekabīra yamāntaka bisara svāhā
That is the mantra for offering the welcoming water. oṃ bhimāntake tajo balinni svāhā
That is the mantra of the food offering for the deity.
oṃ bākacita śonitraratra saṃgandha bigrahi svāhā
That is the mantra of scent.
oṃ dibya srekmālya dhāriṇe svāhā
That is the mantra of flowers.
oṃ citi dhuba priyāya svāhā
That is the mantra of incense. oṃ dīpya jyotiṣṭhati svāhā
That is the mantra of the lamp.
oṃ sarba amīṣebhya bahariṇe svāhā
That is the mantra of all the outer tormas.
oṃ dibyana bhyojini hara hara draṃ draṃ khāhi svāhā
That is the mantra for offering all the tormas.
oṃ khukhuni pretoktate pretamāle lalini mlā mlā kledha kledha pri pri tiśi phreṃ driṃ driṃ driṃ draḥ khukhuni griha baliṃ svāhā
That is the torma mantra of the maṇḍala of the Many Pretas.

This concludes the third chapter, the presentation of the mantras of the maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas, from the Detailed Root Ritual of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya.

Next, further, I shall explain the mudrā of Mañjughoṣa's wrathful one, Ekavīra, the Sole Hero, the great being of boundless splendor.
First, having displayed the pledge of the Three Jewels, one should bind the right hand well and firmly, according to the rite.
The vidyādharas, always,
with all the fingers of the hand hide the thumb well and bind it tightly and well.
This is the cudgel mudrā, as the rite calls it.
With the heart mantra, or separately, the mantra practitioner binds the mudrā with its mantra; otherwise it is never to be bound.
oṃ namo buddha dharma saṃghebhyaḥ oṃ sarba tathāgate krodha bijāya agnir jvālita jihvā preta śira hūṃ phaṭ
That is the mudrā and mantra of the cudgel.
This mudrā, though only a single one,
makes the heart mantra of the wrathful one blaze;
chief of all weapons without exception, it pacifies all the māras.
How it is drawn in the maṇḍala, that rite I shall now explain.
The cudgel has the form of a staff;
this is what is known as the cudgel.
In particular, at its tip the wise one draws the head of a preta.
Always draw it in the Many Pretas, and never otherwise than that.
According to the rite of the vidyādhara, this seal is drawn with ash from the charnel ground.
Or else, whenever one wishes to practice it, this very seal is drawn on its own in the maṇḍala belonging to the practitioner who desires accomplishment.

Next, I shall explain here the maṇḍala for accomplishing the mudrā.
As before, here too
draw the square Great Host of Pretas.
In its center, place a cudgel, and likewise in the eight directions.
Since it has nine seals,
it is also called the Mudrā Maṇḍala.
Likewise, open the southern door and then perform the worship.
All the mantras of the mudrā without exception should be interspersed with the wrathful king's own mantra.
By this, worship is made here, and in stages the secret worship comes to be performed. oṃ namo buddha dharma saṃghebhyaḥ oṃ ā sarba tathāgata krodha bijaya agni jvālitā preta śira hūṃ phaṭ hūṃ
This is the mantra of the cudgel mudrā, with Krodhavijaya placed at its head. With it, all rites are to be accomplished.

Next, I shall explain the practice of the cudgel, supreme among all accomplishments, belonging to the chief wrathful one himself, together with the secret worship.
Make a lotus of eight petals, beautiful with its pericarp and stamens, and at the petal tips, in the eight directions, draw the cudgels, with the wrathful one set between them.
Having placed the ninth in the center,
the others, beginning from the east, going around clockwise in due order,
should be set in place with flowers.
The seed syllable of all the cudgels, hūṃ, should be placed on the crowns of the pretas.
At the beginning, furnish it with oṃ;
oṃ and namaḥ serve as worship.
This aḥ is declared to be the seed and the pledge of Krodhavijaya.

oṃ āḥ hūṃ
oṃ namo buddha dharma saṃghebhyaḥ
It is praised by all the buddhas.
All of the cudgels, every one, possess the urging of their own pledge;
all possess their own pledge, arising from the family of the tathāgatas, and are fully endowed with words of urging.
When they are examined with the wrathful gaze and urged, each with its own sign, they at once perform the action.
This āḥ is Krodhavijaya looking with the wrathful gaze.
Endowed with its own pledge and joined with hūṃ, it acts as the urging.
Pacifying, increase, subjugation and summoning, sowing division and expelling:
these, by the application of the secret worship,
I shall explain in brief.
At its beginning is the syllable oṃ;
what follows it makes the mantra grow.
The pledge of the tathāgatas itself is proclaimed to be the third.
The fourth, in order to bestow accomplishment, is here the word that urges the mantra.
To say oṃ sarba tatāgata is the very essence of the mantra.
The hūṃ at the end
is said to make the wrathful one's mantra grow.
Beyond that, in particular,
one acts with one's own words of urging.
One who wishes to bring something under control should name the thing itself:
having said, "Bring the lord of the gods under control!"
add svāhā at the end.
For pacifying, the urging itself should be furnished with pauṣaṭ at the end.

One who desires the unequaled glory born from the family of the tathāgatas should always add namaḥ svāhā at the end of the words of urging.
For increase, urge as before and add pauṣaṭ.
For increase, also add the wrathful one's hūṃ at the beginning and the end of the urging.
For killing, the blazing phaṭ is the special addition here.
For destroying families,
phaṭ joined with the wrathful hūṃ in the middle.
Likewise, for expelling, place hūṃ at the head and the end of the urging,
and place the truly blazing phaṭ as well.
This is known as the rite of the secret worship.
In that sequence of worship, thus,
the nine cudgels are completed.
By the application of the secret worship, with incense, flowers and likewise scent, and likewise tormas and lamps, success comes even without recitation.
For subjugation, sowing division, expelling, killing and the rest, in the ways that have been taught and by such applications as these,
there is no need for lunar dates, for constellations, or even for fasting.
One who knows the rite of the secret worship, having made the mudrā maṇḍala well, whether bathed or not bathed, may act freely, as he wishes.
Those who worship the heart mudrā of Yamāntaka
with a torma of any kind at all, or even with leaves, flowers and fruit, if they possess the mind of awakening and are deeply devoted, within six months will find whatever they want and need, and will perform whatever rites they wish.

This concludes the fourth chapter, the presentation of the secret worship of the cudgel mudrā maṇḍala, from the Detailed Root Ritual of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya.

Next, accomplish all that has been taught concerning the cudgel mudrā.
Its second maṇḍala is a different one,
called Preta in the Center.
The practitioner, at night in a charnel ground, with ash from charnel grounds, draws a square with four doors, furnished with the lower halves of human corpses.
Adorn it with a canopy, yak-tail whisks, mirrors, bells and garlands of flowers, with divine substances, and many pretas starkly drawn,
and decorate it with eight skull cups.
Afterwards, draw the cudgel mudrā as well upon a headless corpse.
In this maṇḍala that accomplishes everything,
called Preta in the Center, perform the worship as taught with the mudrā of the chief wrathful one.
Having given all the outer tormas, being pure and having donned the armor, and having first performed the approach of a hundred thousand recitations, one should begin this.
Having filled an auspicious skull cup with the blood of great beasts, and likewise flesh that comes from a human,
offer these to the mudrā.
Blazing lamps
made from the fat of great beasts should be offered outside it, in the eight directions, to that which is guarded by mantra.

Having done this in such a way, the one who knows the rite should then practice.
Glorious, wearing red clothing,
anointed with red sandalwood,
not doing anything else whatsoever, he should do it only on the eighth day of the waning moon.
Together with three companions who are brave, strong-minded and powerful, the intelligent practitioner, of great fortitude, with senses well restrained, enters into the practice in the maṇḍala of the preta.
Then at night, binding the mudrā, he sits firmly and recites well.
Various obstructors
appear in a single night, and he must conquer them.
Having thus conquered
the great hosts of rākṣasas, he will accomplish the mudrā.
Then even rites that had not succeeded he performs without hindrance.
Urged by Mañjughoṣa's wrathful one, there is no doubt of it here.
Urging with hana bisphoṭa bañja bañja and saying hūṃ at the end of the urging, standing in the posture with the left leg extended, in wrath he topples in an instant inaccessible mountain peaks, walls, upper stories, gatehouses, parapets and towering houses.
If, urging with dhara bisphoṭa bañja, one says hūṃ at the end of the urging,
mountains and many other things, likewise the gates of the asuras, likewise the earth and other things, whatever one wishes, are split apart.
If, urging with paca bidhvanasaṃ śo,
one says hūṃ at the end,

by this mudrā the waters are dried up without hindrance;
great lakes and rivers, and even oceans, are dried up.
Say stambhaya twice,
at the end hūṃ and likewise mu,
and then at its end hūṃ;
if one adds sena stambha, paca bidhvanasya śoṣaya śoṣaya da hūṃ phaṭ like figures standing in a painting, they will surely and swiftly be held down.

Place hūṃ at the end, and then driṃ;
say kṣebhaya twice,
and at its end the syllable ma.
When the wise apply this,
if one is wrathful, what great wonder is it that armies are thrown into turmoil?
Place hūṃ and ga at the end,
and then place tiṣṭha tiṣṭha.
If the mantra practitioner applies this,
this rite subdues elephants.
If, urging with hana bidhvaṃsa marya,
one says hūṃ at the end,
and likewise says phaṭ at the end, armies will utterly perish.
If, urging with kha kha khāhi khāhi,
one says hūṃ at the end,
the armies will, without hindrance, fall to fighting one another.
With hūṃ at the end and likewise phaṭ, if one applies with certainty driṃ driṃ ja ja driṃ driṃ, the wrathful mantra practitioner, it is said, makes a rain of blood fall.
Saying hūṃ at the end: ha ha hā hā baitāli hūṃ phaṭ; so one should do it oneself.

When the courageous mantra practitioner urges with this, they are swiftly stupefied.
Saying hūṃ at the end, ha ha ha, and likewise antaya and phaṭ:
when furnished with these urgings, it makes the lords of beings blind.
Say hūṃ at the end, and then hūṃ, and likewise place driṃ driṃ ja ja;
when driṅ and phaṭ are at the end, beings are at once struck down.
When the mudrā of this great wrathful one has been accomplished in this way, then all rites whatsoever are performed by merely urging with the mind.
It fully fulfills the pledges of all the bodhisattvas.
Whatever practice one desires, that one performs without hindrance.
If it is not accomplished there, then before this one should do the approach,
a hundred thousand recitations according to the rite, and then the intelligent one enters the practice.
At that time, in the manner of the earlier urging of the pledge of the tathāgatas, one should then again apply it likewise to the mantras, without hindrance.
Fully furnished with homage, place oṃ at its beginning, and place yet another oṃ;
āḥ is the second.
Place hūṃ at the end of its words,
and then all the words, in this way, krodha bijaya agni jvali jihva ta śrī:
the other words should be recited.
Then at its end hūṃ,
and likewise at the end of the words oṃ;
at the very end place ā, and at the end of that,

with hūṃ and siṭi, visualize the two hands;
with praputa, visualize the two hands.
Then, by the command of the tathāgatas, having compelled that mudrā, one recites it oneself.
Having thus done a hundred thousand recitations, and urging that great wrathful one in all things as is fitting, one should accomplish every rite.
They act at the command of that chief wrathful one, and not otherwise.
One who has first done the approach should surely apply that rite of urging to the rites that have been taught, if they do not succeed.
If one compels the mantra otherwise, one will surely die oneself.
In particular, if with this mudrā one compels the heart mantra of the hero, the chief wrathful one, all beings without exception are thrown into turmoil.
Wherever this mantra is recited, there the bodies of all,
the worldly and the transcendent, will undoubtedly be destroyed.
When one compels with this mudrā, within a circle of seven yojanas whatever mantras of others there are,
and enemies, are stripped of their arrogance.
It terrifies the bhūtas, and likewise summons the gods;
it greatly delights the wrathful one,
and increases the power of Yamāntaka.
The classes of pretas and vetālas are likewise said to be terrified.
Curses, harms and terrors too it destroys, when strongly urged.

It destroys all obstructors, it puts an end to all death,
it puts an end to all poverty:
the cudgel mudrā is proclaimed to be fierce.
If one binds this and shows it to enemies, and likewise to other people, and applies Yamāntaka,
it steals their very life on the instant.
In brief, this rite of the heart mudrā,
which has its own pledge, spoken from the mouth of the wrathful one,
is taught as utterly secret.
The mantra practitioner should apply the heart mudrā, the cudgel, of the chief wrathful one, Yamāntaka the Sole Hero, together with the heart mantras.

This concludes the fifth chapter, the detailed presentation of the rite of the cudgel mudrā, from the Detailed Root Ritual of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya.

Next, for the root mantra of seventeen syllables, there is also another mudrā, called the Vetāla.
It is the secret that delights the heart of the fiercely zealous Yamāntaka.
Wherever mantra practitioners bind it, there it confers blessing.
This mudrā called the Vetāla, spoken by the wrathful one, I shall explain, the one on which all the charnel grounds always depend.
Then interlace the fingers of both hands with one another, and raise the middle fingers, pressed together side by side.
With the two index fingers, the two ring fingers, and with the two thumbs, the two ring fingers are held well, and bent inward.

The two little fingers are also bent inward.
Likewise, the two thumbs are crossed over one another and extended.
This Vetāla was always properly taught by the wrathful one for those who have wisdom.
The secret mantra of the chief wrathful one,
the well-spoken seventeen syllables, should be combined with this.
Endowed with the Vetāla mudrā,
for all that one desires, one should apply it according to the rite in the maṇḍala called Ha Ha.
The Ha Ha maṇḍala,
which makes the wrathful one blaze, I shall explain;
it should be applied according to the words.
As was explained for the Great Host of Pretas, this too should be made an even square.
In particular, in all the directions the wise one should kindle fire.
It should be drawn according to the rite, eight cubits, neither more nor less.
At each and every door, place a bloody preta pierced through with a stake.
In the center, clearly place the lower half of a human corpse, without its head.
As in the maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas, finally lay out the garland of pretas.
The chief mantra of the wrathful one, without the fontanelle, the crest and the rest, the seventeen syllables, the intelligent one places upon the headless corpse.
Six-faced, with six legs as well, and likewise with twelve arms,
a fierce form, ablaze,
he should be placed as before.
Having set out the arrangement of the Many Pretas
as before,

one should worship it with that mantra, with flowers, incense, garlands and so on.
Here the torma is declared to be the great flesh, so one should not use any other.

the rite of the torma with blood, and likewise incense, all of it impure.
Then the glorious vidyādhara, having bound the Vetāla mudrā, should offer torma, flowers and the rest, in every way with the wrathful one's mantra.
Around the circumference of the maṇḍala, in the eight directions, set out lamps.
Kindle a fire with half-burnt brands from charnel grounds, or else with impaling stakes,
and, with a ladle of khadira wood, having burned great fat seven times in the fire in the south, then one should practice the wrathful one.
For this there is no approach, no recitation and no restraint.
The fortitude of the vidyādhara himself is to be known as its cause.
At the southern door, with great care, place a corpse that bears no wound, place the vetāla seal at its heart, and circumambulate it.
Then, with the great wrathful one's mantra, wash it thoroughly and adorn it well, and having worshiped it fittingly with scents and red and blue flowers, the wise one should first protect himself with the Vetāla mudrā.
Likewise, the five limbs of Yamāntaka should be applied to the body.
The hero of great power himself takes a sword in his hand, presses on its heart

with his heroic left foot, and recites the seventeen-syllable mantra of the chief wrathful one.
oṃ ākrodhika yamantaka hanamtha bhañja hūṃ phaṭ
This is the root mantra of seventeen syllables.
When it is urged by that fierce mantra, the preta begins to stir.
The Ha Ha maṇḍala is thrown into turmoil, and likewise it gives forth the sound "ha ha." Then, when it has risen, one should offer it welcoming water together with flesh and blood cut by oneself with a sharp and blazing weapon.
Knowing the warmth of heart of that vidyādhara,
it accepts the welcoming water and makes the Ha Ha maṇḍala terrifying.
Then that great being,
seeing the terrifying form, should display the Vetāla mudrā of the hero Yamāntaka.
Then Yamāntaka,
dwelling in the body of the preta, seeing the seal of the vetāla itself, and knowing the warmth of heart of that vidyādhara, bestows the supreme of desires; there is no doubt.
When the king of wrathful ones departs again, the corpse will fall to the ground.
Its body itself
turns to gold; there is no doubt.
Then one gives it freely to one's companions and to beings.
This is the explanation of the practice of the great being, the hero.
It is to be done by one whose mind is truly courageous,

never by any other, lowly one.
If a practitioner of weak mind practices that king of wrathful ones, it will then rise up and swiftly kill him together with his companions.
If he does not know the Vetāla mudrā, however fierce he may become,
that king of wrathful ones will kill the practitioner.
Wherever the supreme vidyādhara, adorned with the pledge of the tathāgatas and urging the wrathful one, binds the Vetāla mudrā, there, without doubt, the wrathful one will bless him well,
will swiftly grant him the supreme as well,
and will depart; there is no doubt.
oṃ namo bundha dharma saṃghebhyaḥ ākrodhika yamāntaka hanamtha bhañja hūṃ bethābi rakṣa rakṣa mān tathāgato ājhāpayati svāhā
This is the mantra of the wrathful one's Vetāla mudrā, adorned with the command of the pledge of the tathāgatas.
In the Ha Ha maṇḍala, when the Vetāla mudrā is joined with its own mantra, the wrathful one swiftly and surely confers his blessing.
In the application meant for heroes, even if one does the prior approach and the rest, the wrathful one is surely and swiftly accomplished for the practitioner, as he wishes.
Alternatively, a person whose mind is not courageous, being wise, should himself hold this Vetāla mudrā with its pledge in the Ha Ha maṇḍala and recite.
Having been empowered with this very mudrā, as best one can, anywhere at all,
before a painting of the supreme wrathful one, or a maṇḍala made according to the rite, or likewise any other image, one should restrain mind and senses and first recite a hundred thousand times.

Having thus first done the approach as one wishes, only then, afterwards, having kept a fast,
he enters the practice of the Vetāla mudrā.
The Ha Ha maṇḍala
is drawn in a charnel ground, according to the rite.
Or else one whose mind is not courageous draws it in a house with ash from the charnel ground.
An empty house will do;
if that house is not empty, once the Ha Ha has been seen, it is destroyed as soon as seven days have passed.
Then, having performed the secret worship as fitting,
as in the Many Pretas,
sit at the southern door, facing toward the north, bind the Vetāla mudrā taught from its own pledge, and recite.
On the eighth day of the waning moon, the intelligent one who knows the rite sits displaying the sign and recites until the sun rises.
Then, by the intention of the wrathful one,
the vetāla goddess will be accomplished.
With the mantras of the wrathful deity and the supreme words of urging, all the rites that have been taught are then performed.
To the mudrā called the Cudgel as well, apply those same ones swiftly.
If they are applied, this too will undoubtedly perform them.
Two practices of the Vetāla mudrā have been taught here to mantra practitioners.

Now, for those of weak mind,
a third practice follows.
At that time, draw the Many Pretas explained earlier, according to the rite, anywhere at all, as is fitting,
and apply it with those mantras.
Then this maṇḍala of the Many Pretas, lovely to behold,
whether in a house or anywhere else:
having drawn the maṇḍala there, on the crown of the preta in its center the vetālī is placed here.
Binding the heart mudrā of the vetāla, which gives splendor to the wrathful one's syllables, which is peaceful and delights all, apply it to her.
Then, with the Vetāla mudrā,
the thirteen secret syllables.
Knowing also the other, peaceful one, recite as one wishes.
oṃ ā hūṃ baitāli rakṣa rakṣa māṃ svāhā Having recited this heart mantra of the Vetāla mudrā anywhere at all, as one wishes, in counts multiplied by ten,
according to the rite,
one will perform even marvelous deeds merely by thinking of them in the mind.
Being secret, this sublime vidyā-mantra performs all rites.

Then, now, the rites of this one, whatever the King of Wrathful Ones himself has taught in detailed ritual,
I shall explain in brief:
stupefying, striking the vital points, and bewildering, likewise the rite of causing descent, subjugating and compelling, killing and driving away, setting at odds so that they fight and kill one another, and likewise also magical illusion, the applications of pacifying and increasing, likewise gladdening,

and the rite of summoning as well:
these I shall explain in condensed form.
In order to accomplish rites with the vetāla mudrā, having first performed the preliminary service according to the rite, in order to accomplish the respective aims, one should undertake this rite.
Having bound a hundred eyes of peacock tail feathers into a bundle, the wise should tie it, with thread spun by a maiden, to a fine handle of khadira wood without pennants, one cubit in length.
At the base of that handle, too,
one should fashion a fine stūpa well.
On birch bark, with gorocana, draw the vetāla surrounded by the Wrathful One, and the wise one should place it beneath the stūpa.
Then, on the night
when the moon is seized by Rāhu, draw the maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas on the shore of a lake, and recite.
Then, for the sake of accomplishment, the mantra practitioner, fixing the mind upon that tail and holding it in the left hand, recites while gazing at the moon.
For some great heroic beings whose minds are not disturbed by māras, warmth, smoke, and blazing will arise from that tail.
If one sees it become warm, one resembles a bodhisattva, and with it one is able to help or to harm all sentient beings.

If one sees smoke arising from that excellent tail, one swiftly becomes invisible as well, taking whatever form one wishes, swift as thought, without aging and without death, surrounded on all sides by yakṣas, with the splendor of a great being.
If it blazes,
one becomes a glorious vidyādhara, swiftly travels through the sky,
and, endowed with every bliss, becomes the foremost of vidyādharas.
If, when the moon is released by Rāhu, one has not succeeded at that time, by circling the tail once one gains the accomplishment of overpowering armies, and overpowers any single one whatever as well.
Elephants made arrogant by rut, tigers, lions, and foxes, horses, chariots, and birds,
boats, ships, and mounts:
if one circles it, it overpowers them all.
And release from what has been overpowered comes through this tail, without doubt.
Then, further, stupefying by means of the vetāla is secretly explained.
Then, having taken great fat, place it inside a skull cup.
Make a wick of the soft cotton of red aśvamāra.
Having lit it with the fire of an outcaste,
when the sun or moon is seized by Rāhu, collect the soot from the skull, and recite until the moon or the sun is released.
Or else, from arka cotton,

then afterward, with an iron probe, one should anoint both eyes.
With both eyes anointed in this way, whoever one looks at will become stupefied, without doubt.
Then, if the face is washed and one looks, they will be freed from it again.
Then, further, bewildering:
the supreme means of bewildering is explained.
The root of a single arka, the root of ganaka,
aśvamāra and costus,
the root of mohanī,
the root of mahānala,
combined with śarapuṅkhā,
together with old preta flowers, and combined with the front teeth of men or of women,
together with the skin of the private parts, are well prepared by a maiden who has not known desire on the eighth day of the waning fortnight.
Afterward they should be smeared with a woman's blood and a donkey's semen, and combined with charnel-ground ash.
Then, on the eighth day of the waning fortnight, having first drawn many pretas, the vidyādhara recites at night.
Having recited well one thousand and eight times, the substance is then accomplished.
If this bewildering powder is applied to any sentient being, it will then bring about bewilderment.
Have no doubt about this.
In fights and disputes, and in a king's great battlefront, in order to protect one's own side, if one who knows the application raises banners impelled by this,

the enemies will all be bewildered.
If touched by this powder,
people are bewildered at once.
If they come over to one's side, they will be freed;
certainly not otherwise.
Then, further, the supreme rite of causing descent shall be explained, by which all bhūtas will descend at once.

If snake slough is ground together with tiger skin, with poison and the root of turmeric, mohana and mālatī,
having ground them in goat's urine, one should then make them into pills the size of a chickpea,
seven, or eight, or nine.
Further, having ground
hare's blood and saffron, one should make pills as before,
seven, or eight, or nine.
Then the mantra practitioner places the first pills in a skull vessel, and on the night of the eighth day of the waning fortnight should recite one hundred and eight times.
Those with saffron should be placed in a clean vessel of ariṣṭa wood.
Likewise, having recited one thousand and eight times, the top should be closed up well.
If the pills prepared well before are put onto ordinary incense, descent swiftly takes place, without delay, not otherwise.
When one has reflected and quickly sends it away, this is then done with the saffron pills.

Then, further, I shall explain this accomplishment, the supreme subjugation by which things arise from the vidyādhara's mind, made certain through the rite.
The plant known here as rakta, raktamūlikā, taken at its root,
and śarapuṅkhā,
front teeth that come from a human,
and the leaves of a tree tossed by a whirlwind, those that float, together with what remains, are ground at night by a young maiden.
That supreme powder should be moistened seven times with one's own semen.
Then, having placed what one has prepared in the heart of a lotus,
the pure and intelligent one,
on the eighth day of the waning fortnight,
holding it in the hand, should enchant it with the mantra a thousand times.
It is the king of powders, which subjugates;
then accomplishment will be obtained.
Give it in food or drink,
or else cast the powder,
or else release it in the direction of the wind, or else cast it once upon clothing, or else, if it is applied in any way at all,
in an ointment or in tooth powder, then by this, at once,
even enemies intoxicated with arrogance are brought under control, even from afar, and serve well, like slaves.
Whoever is touched by this powder will follow one even unto death.
If, being far away,
they cannot be touched by the powder, make an image of them and cast this powder upon it.

Within seven days, merely on hearing the name of the vidyādhara, they themselves, together with their wealth, will without doubt come under control.
Then I shall explain
the rites of enmity, by application alone.
Fine peacock eyes,
likewise snake slough,
the hair of horses and buffalo,
seeds of kanaka, flowers of aśvamāra,
and likewise elephant pepper:
having made all of these equal in measure, grind them in the blood of a mouse and a cat.
One should make the pills equal oneself.
Having made them, one who knows the rite recites one thousand and eight times at night.
One should fumigate them with incense of the hair of a mouse and a cat.
Then the one who knows the application, having taken a single pill from among them, casts the pill or else the powder upon the crown of the head of one of those who are to be divided, in order to divide them.
This supreme means of dividing was taught by the Wrathful One himself.
Then I shall explain the supreme means of killing, by which the one to be slain, if this is applied well according to the method of application, is accomplished without doubt.
This application is to be applied to rulers of men who in various ways harm the Three Jewels, and not to other wretched beings.
This succeeds for one endowed with the mind of awakening, not otherwise.
Since this samaya of the Tathāgatas bestows all accomplishments, guard it well according to the rite.

If it is done otherwise, it will not succeed.
If one wishes for all the accomplishments of the Tathāgatas, then, desiring the benefit of living beings, one should accomplish without delay even the accomplishments of the underworld and of flight.
For one of wrathful and fierce conduct, who wishes to kill for the sake of desire, how could the accomplishments of the Tathāgatas arise even in a dream?
For the mantra practitioner as taught, loving, patient, and likewise kind,
compassionate by nature,
who cultivates the very mind of awakening, all the accomplishments of the Tathāgatas will succeed without doubt.
In order to tame the vicious,
this application was taught in full.
It is taught to be performed against those who greatly harm the Three Jewels, not otherwise.
For the one of malicious mind against whom the rite is directed, take earth from his footprint, then moisten it
with the urine of a clean buffalo, and having made an image of him with it, smear it with charnel-ground ash.
Charcoal and sharp thorns, and likewise bones and chaff, should be placed at its heart.
Likewise, further, having completely filled the belly, the ears, the nose, the eyes, and the mouth, place it at the edge of a precipice and press it down with the left foot.
Then reverse the peaceful mantra of the vetāla, recite it backward,
and, having spoken the name of the target,

recite the practice one thousand and eight times;
in this very sequence of reversal, insert the name between two phaṭ syllables.
By performing this rite, certainly the target will swell up and will certainly come under the power of the Lord of Death.
If the intelligent one has thus removed the arrogance of the target, the one struck by every illness should then be freed again.
If it is done otherwise, at once he will certainly go before the Lord of Death.
In order to protect the Three Jewels, against all who do harm,
even if illness and the like are applied, this that brings death has been taught.

It is not to be done against one who knows the samaya;
if one does it, one dies oneself.
Now I shall explain the rite of driving away as well, just as it was taught by the Wrathful One himself of the supremely heroic Mañjughoṣa.
Make a peg of khadira wood, about eight finger-widths long,
smear it with pungent mustard oil, and sprinkle it with charnel-ground ash.
Then wrap it in the skin of a crow that has died of itself.
At night the practitioner binds that peg with red thread,
and then, with the vetāla mudrā joined with the words "Drive away!", speaking the name of the target, the wise one recites one thousand and eight times.
Then the one who wishes to drive away should drive that peg in at the door of the target.

This is declared the supreme means of driving away:
even a target with the might of Śakra (Indra) will be driven away.
Then, further, I shall explain fighting and quarreling with one another.
Having recognized those who harm the Three Jewels, in order that, as one wishes, their own side falls into turmoil, the mantra practitioner should act just as was taught.
Barahe and ricira,
patra and keśinī,
and likewise, last, sukari,
found where perfect awakening abides:
from among these medicines of great power take any single one and combine it with leaves blown down by the wind.
Likewise balakata,
black cumin, and realgar:
grind these into a powder,
knead it with human fat,
and recite the vetāla mantra one thousand and eight times.
When dawn has come,
it is called "the vicious one that causes turmoil."
Those who carry it
fall into turmoil with those of their own side, and fight one with another.
In order to harm a country, a city, or an army,
for killing one another,
this vicious one should be applied.
Fighting and killing one another:
this is what has been taught, as appropriate.
Then, further, I shall explain properly the rite of magical illusion.
By means of the ash of charnel grounds the materials of illusion are accomplished.

Into a fine human skull pour ash and the blood of a hare, and set out the drawn maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas, as was taught.
Within it, having made a great offering to the vetāla, there, at the southern door, kindle a fire in the hearth.
Then fumigate that ash with ghee and perform the fire offering.
Then over that ash, too, recite one thousand and eight times.
By those very one thousand and eight,
at dawn, certainly,
the wise one will perform magical displays with that ash.
If white flowers are smeared once each with that ash and scattered into the sky, certainly perfect buddhas will appear.
If, as before, yellow flowers are smeared with that ash
and likewise scattered into the sky, thousands of those free of attachment and all the buddhas together with their abodes are displayed, not otherwise.
With white flowers, likewise, the worldly gods are displayed as before, whatever anyone wishes,
by thinking of it in the mind.
With blue flowers, likewise, yakṣas and rākṣasas, as before, pretas, ḍākas, and kumbhāṇḍas, or else whatever one wishes.
Having recited over water seven times and scattered it upward, certainly one should withdraw the illusion again, or else by clenching the fist.

Bind seven crow feathers to a handle of human bone, smear that ash upon it,
and, imagining the illusion just as one wishes, whirl it in the midst of the gathering: crossing lakes and oceans, likewise houses of bell metal, battles, turmoil, and death, and the supreme great spectacles are vividly displayed.
By clenching the fist they are likewise withdrawn.
Showing the underworld as well,
many beings gathering,
going upward, and likewise turmoil, one's own army and the ocean, too, in turmoil:
with that tail and the ash, whatever else one wishes besides, these one will certainly bring about.
By clenching the fist they are likewise withdrawn.
Thus magical illusion, in brief:
one should do just as was explained.
For the sake of pacifying, recite properly the very essence of that vetāla.
Whether for oneself or for another, speaking words of pacifying for the target, having recited one thousand and eight times, sprinkle fine white flowers, fragrant and pleasing,
with water of white sandalwood, enter the water of a river flowing to the ocean, recite over each one,
and cast away one hundred and eight.
Then whether oneself or another, it will be pacified beyond compare.
A king's realm or regions, villages or cities,

by performing that rite of pacifying,
will be pacified without doubt.
Then I shall also properly explain the rites of increasing.
Having made various offerings to a stūpa, sit before it
and recite the great vetāla mudrā, worshiped by the perfect buddhas.
If the stūpa contains relics,
it happens at once.
If one recites speaking the name of the target, man or woman will prosper.
If, before a stūpa of the holy Dharma, one recites ten thousand times according to the rite, then, until there is increase,
recite step by step for the sake of increase.
The wise should make the offerings of the Tathāgatas to all stūpas.
For one containing relics, according to the rite,
I shall explain in particular.
First, near the stūpa,
the wise should make a maṇḍala.
Then, there, one should spread exceedingly pleasing flowers.
The wise should offer to it eight brightly blazing lamps.
Having offered various food offerings together with exceedingly pleasing water, and having offered guggulu incense, one endowed with the mind of awakening bows with reverence
to all the Tathāgatas,
and, facing the stūpa,
should recite for pacifying and increasing.
One should also read the holy Dharma, and from time to time make stūpas.
If one does this for half of each day and night,

there will be pacifying and increase.
The rite of increasing has been explained.

Further, I shall explain how, toward the practitioner, the whole world will certainly become delighted:
just as a mother cherishes her child, so it is here, not otherwise.
The wise one should mix gorocana without fail with his own blood.
Having mixed it many times over, the wise one places it in a skull.
Then, when the moon is seized by Rāhu, gazing with the eyes at the moon, recite well until it is released.
In the morning, having made a single dot on one's own forehead, one then goes to the king's court.
This application, which brings beings under one's power,
has been explained in brief:
the moving and unmoving worlds are delighted on seeing one.
This is the teaching on delighting all the people of the world.
Then I shall explain in brief the rite of summoning as well, which the sole protector Mañjughoṣa spoke through the mouth of the Wrathful One.
From the hair of a dead woman or girl,
on the eighth day of the waning fortnight,
diligently spin a noose well,
and then place it inside a skull.
Then, until the moon comes to be seized by Rāhu, recite each day.
When the moon has been seized by Rāhu, on a clean riverbank, there draw the maṇḍala

of the Great Host of Pretas and make offerings.
As taught by the Lord of Wrathful Ones, make a vast torma
to the vetāla accompanied by the Wrathful One, and then to the outer bhūtas.
Then press down upon it with the hand, and, until the noose that lies within the human skull moves, gaze at the moon and recite.
Then, if it springs upward, the practice is said to be accomplished.
At that time, taking the noose, in an instant the gods of the world are drawn by it through one's mere thought, and then the vidyādhara does well whatever he wishes, whether by thought in the mind or by word.
Even Śakra and the other gods certainly act according to his command.
In an instant, from the sky, endowed with great miraculous power, drawn by that noose,
they present the supreme objects of desire.
Daughters of yakṣas, gandharva women, or else daughters of the gods, are drawn by that noose into one's presence in an instant, and then the supreme vidyādhara does the deeds that please him.
If those who are lesser in practice come to be tormented by desire, then, with that very noose, summon beings of divine nature and resort to them without fear.
Even when tormented by desire, not women of the human kind:
afflicted by joy and sorrow, brought low by sickness and by masters,

with urine, dust, and impurities, human women are always to be shunned.
If one comes to be tormented by desire, one should resort to divine women.
But if that great being is at that time without attachment, surrounded by virtuous lords of the gods and by fierce yakṣas, he dwells in his own fine celestial mansion and goes wherever he wishes.
The gods present to him fine immeasurable palaces, many elixirs,
and the fruits of the wish-fulfilling tree as well.
Equal to the lords of the gods, he obtains these without doubt.
He is certainly freed from hunger, thirst, and illness, and is honored by all vidyādharas.
If the noose stirs or moves, accomplishment such as this will be obtained.
If it stirs or moves, or otherwise, but accomplishment has not come about, then even with the unaccomplished noose one should perform worldly rites.
Whether a man or a woman, having thought in the mind of what one desires, stretch out that noose at night and recite there toward their direction.
The name of the target, together with the words, should be joined at the end with the words.
To the place where the noose lies,
like a bird out of the sky, they will come into one's presence in an instant, without any doubt.
A ruler of men together with his household, or else an ordinary person, cattle, horses, and chariots,

any fruit or flower whatever,
and likewise desired goods as well, whether seen or merely heard of:
when urged with the words of their name,
at that time it will summon them.
Those who dwell in other lands, even those a hundred yojanas away,
if urged by the samaya,
are certainly summoned by that noose.
In this rite of the turbulent wrathful vetāla, or of Krodhavijaya,
the rites accomplished by the noose, and whatever is accomplished, unaccomplished or accomplished,
and both gods and asuras, are taught in the rite through summoning.
This rite of the vetālī has been explained properly and in sequence.

This concludes the sixth chapter, the detailed exposition of the rite of the vetālī, from the Detailed Root Rite of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya.

This is the supreme rite of the vetāla, which grants great and supreme accomplishment to vidyādharas,
explained properly and in brief.
Then I shall correctly and extensively explain the rite of the Wrathful One, detailed, wondrous, and supreme,
which came forth from the lotus mouth of the Wrathful One.
The mantra of seventeen syllables that the Wrathful One himself spoke:
the very moment it is merely heard, the gods are all bewildered.
Urged on by Mañjughoṣa, the fixed number of recitations of that blazing Wrathful One I shall explain here in this detailed rite.
First, by reciting six hundred thousand times, the preliminary approach will have been done.

Then, for the purpose of the rite, one should afterward recite another six hundred thousand.
Likewise, if one recites one hundred thousand on a mountain peak, one will succeed, not otherwise.
Afterward the wise may engage in practice as they wish.
Then the sequence of the preliminary approach and so forth
of Krodhavijaya,
for the benefit of the practitioner,
I shall explain here in this rite.
The Wrathful One, solely heroic, destroys all the māras,
bestows all accomplishments,
and destroys all harms.
First, each day one should perform the bathing rite of the King of Wrathful Ones.
Then, impelled by the Wrathful One,
one should perform protection on one's own body.
In the mind, sit on a lotus seat arisen from the seed bhaṃ.
Upon it, one should meditate on oneself as the body transformed from the seed hūṃ, and having meditated,
at one's own crown the syllable oṃ,
and at the two eyes the syllable āḥ:
one should protect oneself thus. Then, further, reciting the mantra of seventeen syllables and recollecting the Tathāgatas, one should place at the heart the heart mantra previously set upon one's own body.
Then, with the fontanelle of the Wrathful One,
one should touch one's own fontanelle.
The crown of the Lord of Wrathful Ones should afterward be placed at one's crown as well.
Then, with the hands, one should also put armor on the body according to the rite.

Then, upon one's two hands,
the intelligent one should set out the weapons.
Having bound, according to the rite, the seal possessing one's own samaya, the wise one should place at one's heart the vetālī of the Lord of Wrathful Ones.
Likewise, having bound with the right hand the club mudrā as well, the abode of exceedingly fierce weapons, one should enter upon the worship of the Wrathful One.
By performing the worship of the Wrathful One as explained, he bestows all that one desires.
It is proclaimed that one should make mental offerings to the maṇḍala of the Great Host of Pretas, and also always to images, and to drawings, as many as have been taught.
With fragrant divine flowers,
fine bilva leaves,
and scented water, make offerings on the ground, or else upon images.
I shall explain the characteristics of images, which accomplish the aims of every need.
Having done the preliminary approach according to the rite, then have an image made.
It may be of gold or else of silver;
likewise it may be made of bell metal or copper, brass, sapphire,
lapis, crystal, or precious gems.
One who desires kingship should make it in gold;
one who desires wealth should make it in silver;
to destroy illnesses, make it of bell metal;
copper bestows desires abundantly.
To destroy enemies, it is brass.
For the increase of one's own wealth, make it from sapphire:
it bestows the supreme and all desires.
Lapis of various kinds

is proclaimed to bestow riches.
If made from stainless crystal, it bestows the supreme pacifying and increasing.
One made of precious gems bestows the sword and the accomplishment of the gods of the underworld.
In order to accomplish everything,
I shall now explain the measures.
If one makes one of gold about eight finger-widths and worships it, one obtains kingship and splendor too.
One who always desires wealth should make one of silver ten finger-widths in measure.
Likewise bell metal, which dispels illness, should be made sixteen finger-widths in measure.
At twenty finger-widths in measure, make it of copper and worship it.
Brass, too, as with copper, is twenty-two finger-widths in measure.
One made of sapphire should also be made sixteen finger-widths in measure.
Of lapis, eight finger-widths is auspicious;
of crystal, twelve finger-widths;
of precious gems, it should be eight finger-widths.
Thus one who desires accomplishment should worship well the images, as described, which show all that one desires.
With limbs unimpaired, clear and fine, it should always be made by a skilled artisan, endowed with the characteristics given before, richly adorned with fine weapons:
riding on a preta, with six faces, three eyes gazing in a terrifying manner, radiant, with twelve fine arms,
and clearly endowed with six legs, with garlands of human heads and pretas, holding the se ral kha as his means, he is seated in the posture with the left leg extended, delighting in wearing a tiger skin as his garment.

Such an image,
complete in the manner given before, this Wrathful One as described, the mantra practitioner should have an artisan make.
Or else, from the heartwood of a tree, one should make images of the Lord of Wrathful Ones according to the characteristics described, and always worship them.
Then I shall properly explain images made of wood.
Pure and bestowing all desires, it too should be fashioned in the same way.
If one desires to be supreme among all vidyādharas, the mantra practitioner should have made an image of sandalwood, twenty finger-widths in measure.
From the wood of red sandalwood, sixteen finger-widths in measure, have a fine image made,
which bestows all that one desires.
One made from the root of rāja-arka bestows the aims one desires;
fourteen finger-widths in measure is auspicious, and all bliss and abundance arise from it.
From the heartwood of aśoka, made well by a skilled artisan,
a fresh one five finger-widths in measure is taught;
this is explained for subjugating.
Likewise, if one is made from tāla wood six finger-widths in size, it summons the lords of the gods and asuras, and likewise the nāgas.
From nāgakesara wood,
likewise make one seven finger-widths in measure; it is taught for destroying illnesses and for bewildering enemies.
One made from a human skull is always auspicious at twelve finger-widths.

Without delay it bestows the supreme,
and it abundantly bestows the accomplishments one desires.
Those made from a human skull, even without performing the preliminary approach and so forth, merely by worshiping them, accomplish the aims one needs.
This is the extensive explanation of the characteristics of fine images.

Just as the Wrathful One has taught,
I shall explain the characteristics of the painting.
On a fine burial cloth taken from a corpse and washed, measuring one cubit,
the wise one should paint well with a brush made of that very corpse's hair.
Without any colored pigments at all,
one should paint with the blood of a hare.
Or else his image
may be painted with red ochre, as before.
Wrathful and blazing, terrifying to behold, he stands with the left leg outstretched and the other bent.
He has six faces, his hair bristling upward, his eyebrows yellow and his eyes yellow too;
he has three round eyes, and a body endowed with twelve arms.
Likewise he is set upon a hungry ghost, and is made splendid with six legs.
One right hand grants the supreme boon, and the others hold a trident, a sword, an axe, a club, and a hook.
A wrathful left hand makes the threatening gesture, and the hands hold a spear and a javelin;
a left hand holds a staff, and the hands hold a skull cup and a noose.
Thus should Yamāntaka be painted, wearing a tiger skin as his garment,

his face overpowering others with terror;
the wise one should paint the image with his fangs bared.
Then, on both sides,
the figures of the mudrās are to be painted.
On the right, a male in wrathful form, his mouth gaping, terrifying to behold, his hair bristling upward, deep yellow:
the club mudrā, holding a weapon, standing with the right leg outstretched and the other bent, threatening, his face creased in a wrathful frown, his face and eyes in a wrathful manner.
On the left, paint a female vetāla, with blazing mouth and great splendor, three-eyed, her face creased in a wrathful frown, her most terrifying mouth gaping wide, her hair bristling upward, her belly huge, fierce, clothed in tattered rags, likewise holding a trident in her hand, of great splendor, fiercely threatening, her body ablaze with flames,
her face and eyes in a wrathful manner.
Receiving the command of the Sugata's son, this painting of the secret mudrās should be placed in a secluded spot.
One who knows the rite should recite the club mudrā before this image.
Or else, if one recites the vetāla mudrā, one gains the accomplishment of the mudrā.
Having set it in a secluded place free of bustle, one should worship it every day.
Or else, always spreading out this painting in the maṇḍala of the mudrās, one who desires accomplishment, in meditative equipoise, should make offerings and recite.
I have properly explained the painting for accomplishing the mudrās.

Next I shall explain
another painting of Yamāntaka.
After the preliminary approach has been done,
on a fine burial cloth from a corpse, washed, made one cubit in measure, with good pigments containing no glue, the Wrathful One, the solitary hero, dark like a black cloud, should be painted as before.
After the preliminary approach has been done,
and the painting made as is fitting, having placed it somewhere utterly secluded, then, following the rite of worship, having worshiped it constantly, every day, and having placed it somewhere utterly secluded, after that one should begin the recitation.
Next, further, the rite of recitation is explained just as it has been taught.
Having spread out the painting and made offerings, and having worshiped all the tathāgatas, seated on a cushion of kuśa grass, in meditative equipoise and keeping silent, gazing at the painting alone, with the head bent like a peacock's, with a rosary of rudrākṣa beads,
for as long as the mind does not grow weary,
one should recite with a one-pointed mind;
when weary, one should leave off the recitation.
Having recited thus three hundred thousand times, after the approach has been completed, one should then take up residence on a mountaintop and, living on air, perform recitation.
One who delights in and desires the supreme accomplishment should then practice its observance.
If one does not wish for the threefold rite, then by the recitation taught earlier the middling and lesser accomplishments, if one practices well even without the observance, will be obtained;

but through that observance even the supreme is accomplished.
Further, here
there arises the observance called the Hero.
Not straying from the road and keeping silent, eating alms food, with the senses restrained, carrying a fine, hard staff of khadira wood, a fathom long, taking on the guise of Yamāntaka, one travels by paths that are hard to tread.
The practitioner who properly practices the observance of the wrathful hero in the form of a hero for six months then attains even the supreme accomplishment.
Having practiced the glorious observance, and then having entered upon the practice of accomplishment, without doubt the sublime itself is thus swiftly accomplished.
This is the taking up of the formidable observance.
In the practice, those of the lineage of Māra, in the forms of goddesses of desire, and likewise others, in bodily guise, with forms of many different kinds, torment the one whose senses are restrained.
One should not speak with them, nor become attached to them even slightly.
Endowed with the mind of awakening, intent on the Wrathful One and reciting, if, as one goes along in this way,
one sees terrible forms, or other things that are utterly astonishing, with one's thought fixed on the Sugata, one should not be frightened by them.
If they oppress one and act with hostility, those who break the command of the Sugata the Wrathful One himself will utterly destroy.

Meditating with one's thought on the Sugata, this observance is to be undertaken by a courageous hero;
it is to be done by a hero, and not otherwise.
One who desires the supreme accomplishments should earnestly undertake this observance of the deity that has been taught, in just the manner it has been taught.

This concludes the seventh chapter, the Wrathful One's observances, from Krodhavijaya, the Detailed Root Rite of Mañjuśrī.

Here is contained the Collection of Tantras.

If one constantly worships the images that have been described with flowers as has been explained, then these virtuous observances, and likewise the preliminary approach, are held to be fulfilled for certain by mere recollection alone;
through worship those very aims are swiftly accomplished.
For the image that bestows kingship, having anointed it, as is fitting,
with sandalwood, saffron, and aloeswood, and having worshiped it with lovely blue lotuses and white lotuses, with campaka and mallikā, and with fragrant nāgakesara, the wise one should offer guggulu incense together with ghee.
If this is done, even a householder, thinking of him and reciting eight times, should offer before him food offerings, as much as he can afford.
It is fine even without the preliminary approach and the rest.
Applying oneself in this way, within six months one is free of thieves and enemies, and without doubt obtains kingship.
Even without the practice of accomplishment,

by worshiping every single day one gains a domain.
Without doubt, through this rite one will gain a hundred thousand.
For the image that bestows wealth, one should oneself anoint it well
with sandalwood, saffron, and aloeswood,
and worship it lavishly with garlands of flowers.
Having worshiped it every day with garlands of white flowers, one should also offer guggulu incense with ghee, or incense of kunduru.
Reciting over atimuktaka flowers one by one, according to the rite, at the end one should offer a hundred thousand.
Then great riches
will come about at the end of this;
in practicing this there is no doubt.
For the image that dispels illness, having anointed it with red sandalwood, and having offered incense of śata wood, one should offer, with pure flowers, food offerings.
At the end, reciting the Wrathful One's mantra joined with the words for dispelling illness, whether for oneself or for others, for anyone at all who is chronically ill, it overcomes the illness within a single meal's time.
It is fine even without the preliminary approach and the rest.
For the image that grants all one desires, if one worships it in the same way, then pacifying, enriching, subjugating, summoning, dividing, expelling, and killing are to be accomplished by recitation, at the end specially inserting the words of exhortation.
Moreover, whatever aims one desires that accord with one's wishes, those too are properly accomplished in this way.

Having worshiped the image lavishly, wherever it is and of whatever kind,
one should recite devotedly for six months.
If one worships the image every day, lavishly, in every respect, in this way, and the intelligent one always performs its recitation completely, then even if one does not attain accomplishment itself, one will attain the lesser accomplishments.
Or else, whether the Wrathful One or a mudrā, if one is then able to practice it, it is accomplished through its painting as has been taught, and through that observance of the deity.
Next, further, whatever accomplishments come through the supreme observance I shall explain according to the rite, both in summary and in detail.
Then, if one accomplishes the trident of the Lord of Wrathful Ones, exceedingly bright:
a trident made of urmo iron, thirty finger-widths long,
sharp, fine, and excellently made, having first prepared it according to the rite, one should sit on the summit of a mountain, paint that fine painting, and draw properly with ashes
the maṇḍala called Many Pretas.
Then, with vast offerings, and with fish and meats of various kinds, one should make torma offerings to all the directions.
On the evening of the twenty-third day of the month, having placed the trident on flowers in the maṇḍala, one should worship it with flowers, anoint it all over with red sandalwood, and adorn it entirely with flowers.
Holding it in the hand, according to the rite, one sits facing the painting.

With the mantras of the Supreme Wrathful One the wise one recites over the trident.
To purify its faults,
having recited one hundred and eight times, and having kindled a fire there
with the mantras of the Supreme Wrathful One, having made, according to the rite,
a thousand fire offerings of incense for the trident, one should hold it raised up in the hand, and remain heroic and steadfast.
Until it comes to blaze like fire, the intelligent one should keep reciting.
When the trident itself blazes, one then rises upward, blazing.
Through the power of the mantra, from one's three eyes light shines forth like the sun.
All the other vidyādharas as well worship him and rejoice in him.
He is fully endowed with every power, and takes whatever form he desires, at will.
If smoke arises from the trident, then one's body becomes invisible.
If instead it becomes hot,
then in armies, in the abodes of the asuras, on great battlefields and the like, one creates fear and terror.
Thus this first supreme accomplishment has been fully explained.
Now the excellent sword as well is fully explained here, as a practice of accomplishment.
A sword made of urmo iron, thirty-two finger-widths long,
well made and serviceable, with a hilt of elephant ivory:
sitting on the summit of a mountain,
one should perform the offerings and the rest as before.
Having made the fire offering of incense,

one holds the sword in the hand and recites.
Held in the mantra practitioner's fist, it gives off an intensely brilliant blaze.
On seeing that blaze,
he becomes a supreme vidyādhara.

If smoke arises from it, then he becomes invisible.
If it becomes hot, then likewise he becomes greatly strong and swift of foot, and lives a full hundred years.
About this there is no need for deliberation.
If, not having relied on this,
one has not come to attain accomplishment, then one who has the sword and supreme diligence, going into battle, everywhere swift, unwearied, and untroubled, undefeated, can overcome even a thousand.
The practice of the sword has been explained;
now the practice of the club is explained.
A club of kovidāra wood, or else one of khadira wood, fine, like the club of Yama,
should be made forty-two finger-widths long.
Then the intelligent one, in a charnel ground, should perform an extensive torma rite.
Having made fire offerings of incense to the excellent club, as before, wearing red clothes, and adorned with ashes and with red flowers, sitting there at the cremation ground, until the sound "ha ha" comes from the club and the club moves in one's hand, for that long one should recite according to the rite.
Then, as the foremost lord of the wrathful, fully endowed with every power, mounted on his steed, the buffalo,

he will travel through the sky.
His hair becomes thick, coiled locks, glossy and like deep blue,
the color of the clouds at the end of time;
his excellent body is of great strength as well.
If, in his wrath, he so wishes, with the club he slays even the gods.
The practice of the club has been explained.
Likewise, summarizing it well,
I shall explain in the same way the practice of the excellent axe.
An excellent axe made, as before,
of urmo iron,
its haft sixteen finger-widths long,
and the axe head six finger-widths:
if one practices it according to the earlier rite,
one obtains those same accomplishments.
Next, further, I shall explain the practice of the supreme hook.
A hook made of urmo iron should be four finger-widths;
its handle, straight,
should be eighteen finger-widths.
On the twenty-ninth day of the month, at night, having made offerings and tormas,
sitting on the summit of a mountain,
one should practice the hook, clad in protective armor.
Having made fire offerings of incense
with ghee from a tawny cow, until it blazes like a lamp, for that long one holds it in the hand and recites.
Then, carrying it, without doubt,
when dawn breaks,
light shines out everywhere like fire,
and he rises upward, blazing.
The worldly gods
come under his power like servants, and heed his commands completely, like the supreme command of the Tathāgata.

If smoke comes forth from that supreme hook of his,
then, through the smoke that has arisen, even the mighty one's shadow becomes invisible.
The mantra practitioner lives thirty million years, is worshiped by yakṣas and vidyādharas, is fully endowed with every happiness, is prosperous as he desires, and of great strength.
If, through the might and power of the Wrathful One's mantra, it becomes hot,
then the next morning, having performed auspicious rites, and taking up that excellent hook, if one recites, one will without doubt summon the gods, such as Śakra.
Yakṣas and vidyādharas, and likewise mahoragas and kinnaras, daughters of the asuras,
and likewise daughters of the gandharvas,
the classes of pretas and vetālas,
and likewise others, the intoxicated and arrogant:
having summoned them, one makes them carry out one's tasks as one wishes.
Gold-making elixir and rejuvenating essences, substances of accomplishment,
and whatever else the mind desires:
all of these, the hosts of gods, yakṣas, and the rest,
however many they are, offer to him.
All of them, without exception, out of fear, certainly heed his command.
Adorned with every wonder, surrounded by their own mounts, they show him dwelling places and many pleasure groves fully endowed with every wonder, houses and the quarters of queens, and the entire world.

With miraculous powers, fine qualities, and riches they delight the practitioner.
For as long as the man holds the hook, by his command, without fail,
the yakṣiṇīs, each of them, attend him with the pleasures he desires.
If, through faults in the rite, it has not even become hot,
then, holding that same hook, and sitting in solitude the next morning, inserting the name of whichever girl one wishes, and reciting for as long as one likes, even one dwelling eight hundred leagues away will then swiftly come.
Whether a girl or else a boy, wherever they may be, it is swiftly accomplished.
Flowers and fruits are likewise accomplished, and chariots and trees.
Even if it is not accomplished, they are always certainly summoned by it.
Thus the practice of this sublime hook
has been fully explained.
Whatever accomplishment there is of the skull cup, that too I shall explain here.
The trident, the sword, the club, and likewise the axe and the hook, whose practices have been explained, are to be held in the right hand.
The others, the skull cup and the rest, if held and practiced with the left hand, then, just as has been explained, one will certainly attain accomplishment.
A skull cup well made of wood, twenty finger-widths in size, evenly and very well made,
and entirely free of all defects:

sitting on the summit of a mountain,
one performs the sequence of offerings and tormas, and, having made fire offerings of incense, and with the mantra generated protection and power, one holds the skull cup in the left hand, and, placing the right hand on it, one covers its mouth.
Until a blaze,
smoke, or heat arises in it,
for that long one should recite, keeping it covered.
If it blazes, one will travel through the sky, and is declared lord of the three worlds.
If smoke arises,
then likewise one certainly becomes invisible.
If instead it becomes hot,
then whatever one thinks of at that time will come forth from that skull cup.
About this there is no need for deliberation.
But if it is not accomplished,
then, without setting it on the ground, one takes up that skull cup and places it on a wooden stand.
Having placed it there, covered with cloth, thinking of whatever one desires, food, things to eat, and delicacies, whatever they may be,
holding the cloth covering with the hand, if one recites one thousand and eight times, then, once it is accomplished, every day food of any kind whatsoever, together with delicacies, will certainly fill that skull cup.
One should give this nectar food to any sentient beings at all.
After doing this properly,
one should keep clean and eat in the proper way.
For this practice of the skull cup that has been explained, it is to be held in the left hand.

A sharp, well-made short spear should be practiced without delay.

An excellent one made of urmo iron, auspicious, thirty-two finger-widths long:
then, following the earlier rite,
on the clean bank of a river,
one should practice at night, as before.
Its accomplishment is taught to have three results.
Thus, just as has been explained, the wise one also practices the great arrow:
an excellent one made of urmo iron,
very sharp, as before.
Having made the fire offering of incense,
one should smear it with red sandalwood.
The practitioner, according to the rite,
sitting on the summit of a mountain,
practices at night, as before.
If it is accomplished, the results are as before.
Covering the index finger of the left hand with the right hand,
and having performed the rite as before,
when the moon is seized by Rāhu,
sitting well on a single seat, if the intelligent one recites, then from that finger,
without doubt, there will come a blaze.
Or smoke may arise of itself, or else it may become hot.
If then it certainly blazes, one will attain the rank of a vidyādhara.
From the arising of smoke, likewise, one is said to become invisible.
If at that time it becomes intensely hot,
one fully attains swiftness of foot.
If the finger of the left hand has not been accomplished, then, though the accomplishment has failed, it will certainly perform various rites.

If, in wrath, one threatens with it, that person, just as one wishes, will fall down on the instant.
And one slain by the mantra practitioner, who has thereby died,
he then, with the right hand, raises up again for as long as he wishes.
Even a great and raging army he can then threaten with it.
Elephants and horses,
trees and forests,
he destroys before long.
The summits of all the mountains, however fine and lofty they may be,
with that finger of his he topples before long.
The supreme accomplishment of the finger that grants all accomplishments has been explained.
Next, further, the practice of the noose
I shall also explain here.
From the hair of a dead person one should make a noose, thick and pleasing.
If one practices it according to the earlier rite,
one obtains those same accomplishments of it.
From very fine wood
one should make a staff sixteen finger-widths long, well carved and well painted,
fine and pleasing.
Its ends as well
should be bound with the finest gold, and its tip should be adorned with a jewel, a ruby.
Then, properly, on the summit of a mountain, in accordance with the rite explained before, one should perform the fire offering, sitting facing it.

The practitioner practices at night.
Taking up that blazing staff, one rises into the sky without doubt, becomes, as before, the chief of the accomplished ones, taking forms at will.
Through the smoke, the heat, and the rest, one obtains through it the results as before.
The practice of the supreme weapons has thus been explained in summary.
Next, the other accomplishments that come from the rites are to be explained, just as the Supreme Wrathful One himself explained them in summary.
Having first drawn the maṇḍala called Many Pretas,
and having obtained an unwounded corpse,
the wise one washes it and adorns it well.
Having worshiped with flowers and incense, one gives a torma together with meat.
The rite is to be done in charnel grounds;
it is never to be done anywhere else.
On a bed strewn with flowers, one lays it with its head toward the western door.
Taking a fine skull cup filled to the brim with excellent food, one should also pour human fat into that excellent food.
At that time, the wise one, if with a ladle he pours into the man's mouth a full one hundred oblations empowered with the Wrathful One's mantra, then its tongue will come forth.
Then it is to be cut with a blade.
From the tongue cut at its root, through the power of the Wrathful One, swiftly, that very thing turns into the form of thirty-two fine swords.

Then, taking up the swords,
one gives one to each of one's companions.
When the practitioner takes one up, he is accomplished on the instant.
He becomes a king honored in every way by all those vidyādharas, and together with those companions he will live for seven eons.
Or else, the wise one, in a charnel ground, having then drawn the maṇḍala
called Many Pretas,
should make the offerings as they have been taught.
Having obtained the unwounded corpse of a man or woman who has died, washed it well, and adorned it with ornaments, one places it at the door of that maṇḍala, and, sitting on its heart,
one should recite one thousand and eight times.
The mantra of the Supreme Wrathful One, of seventeen syllables, one thousand and eight times:
having recited it, one attains accomplishment.
The corpse then rises up.
One should offer it water for the guest well.
If one then at once touches its head with the left hand, realgar, like the color of fire, will then swiftly come forth from the mouth of that being.
The practitioner takes it, and, having smeared all his limbs with it, becomes the color of refined gold.
He gives it likewise to his companions, and at once all of them become the color of refined gold.
They take whatever forms they wish,
and they become the foremost of all the vidyādharas.

When all the substances have been accomplished, then, once they are accomplished, one should offer one portion to the Three Jewels.
Then the wise one takes his own share, and, having given to all his companions, flies from here into the sky.
When a single substance has been accomplished, yet another rite is to be practiced:
if a single substance has been accomplished, first having made prostrations, one should fully offer oneself to the Three Jewels according to the rite.
After that, taking the substance, and having given that substance to the companions in due order, one will fly.
Afterward one practices these rites.
If one does not do it in this way, then even if it is accomplished, that substance will be stolen.
Therefore, for the supreme accomplishments, always act just as has been explained.
Next, further, the practice of eye ointment (añjana) and of edibles, just as it is, in order to accomplish every need:
this sublime practice I shall explain.
Having kept a fast for three days,
one should draw the maṇḍala in a charnel ground.
Then, following the earlier rite,
one should perform the torma rite there.

Then one should protect oneself with the ashes of a cremated corpse.
Having smeared oneself with them, that joyful one, with excellent companions, having smeared himself with them, should place the essence of the eye ointment on the head of one executed on a stake.

Having covered it with a dead person's cloth, one holds it in the hand and recites;
until the three kinds of accomplishment appear, for that long the intelligent one recites.
Heat or else smoke arises, or else it blazes like fire.
If one anoints one's eyes with it, then through the blaze one will travel through the sky.
Through the smoke, the body, it is said, without doubt becomes invisible.
If it becomes hot, then the beings one looks at will be killed, and one will revive them again, fully,
before long and without doubt.
Even if one has not accomplished this,
if one anoints one's eyes well with it, the beings one looks at come under one's power;
they kneel down and bow their heads.
Following the rite of the eye ointment, the wise one should practice with bezoar.
Its accomplishments are taught likewise;
if it is not accomplished, beings come under one's power.
Red lead, orpiment,
and realgar likewise
the wise should practice following the procedure for the eye ointment.
The dead person's cloth is likewise practiced according to the rite, and the other practices in the same way.
The mantra spoken by the Wrathful One himself
I shall fully explain in summary.
One should draw the maṇḍala in a charnel ground,
and make offerings and tormas.
Having put on that dead person's cloth, the one who knows the rite recites at night.
Then, if together with that cloth one comes to blaze brightly at night, blazing and surrounded by blazing light,

one soars well into the sky.
One gives forth the sound of loud laughter that terrifies the world.
Always endowed with whatever form one desires, one moves about like the Wrathful One.
Likewise, if smoke arises, without doubt one becomes supreme in invisibility, it is fully taught.
If that practitioner's cloth likewise becomes hot,
one becomes swift of foot and of great strength, travels everywhere across the earth, and lives a hundred years without illness.
Even if one has not been accomplished, all beings without exception come under one's power;
whomever one sees, likewise, those one sees become like servants.
If a man wishes to accomplish these yakṣiṇīs,
then, at the foot of a delightful banyan tree,
having drawn the maṇḍala,
with hair unbound and without any clothing, having filled a fine alms bowl completely with excellent, well-cooked food, one practices at night during the waning fortnight.
Then, taking out seven handfuls, and having charged them seven times with the mantra, one says, "Fair Goddess, accept this!"
and throws them behind one's back.
Then, taking another seven handfuls, charged with the mantra, one should eat them.
The one called the Fair Goddess, accomplished, sovereign of all the yakṣas, surrounded on all sides by a great retinue, then appears, her light blazing.
Then, having rinsed one's mouth, one should offer her water for the guest together with incense and fine flowers, and also offer flowers of welcome.

Then, if one offers her a fine and delightful seat furnished with flowers, she says to him, "Now I am accomplished for you;
I will do as you command, and in just that way, never otherwise, I will obey your command.
Give me your command!"
She becomes a mother, or else a sister, a beloved, or else a wife.
If one addresses her as mother, then without fail she gives him realgar and the like, many substances of accomplishment,
without doubt.
As a sister, she gives flowers and fruits, supreme nectar and gold-making elixir to that practitioner always,
without doubt.
When one says, "Become my beloved!",
at night she shows him excellent pavilions, and other pleasing things as well, and shows herself delighted.
Swiftly she brings lovely women, leading them from a hundred leagues away.
Moreover, to that practitioner she, being gentle, gives what he desires and delights.
If he addresses her as wife, taking whatever form he desires, utterly beautiful, with every power and every enjoyment she delights that accomplished one.
Being gentle, she gives what he desires and delights;
smiling, respectful, granting every wish,
she provides every power and every enjoyment, which the practitioner enjoys for as long as he wishes.
If one wishes to accomplish the womb-born piśācīs,
then that rite of theirs for the practitioner

I shall explain here.
At the foot of a śleṣmātaka tree one should draw the maṇḍala in a clean place.
Having made a great offering,
one should perform the torma rite as before.
There, the mantra practitioner, having kindled a fire with wood from a charnel ground, naked, with his hair disheveled, then, into that blazing fire, if with the mantra he burns one thousand and eight fire offerings of fragments, then, at that time, without doubt, the piśācī with a blazing face will come. At that time, having made one's mind courageous, and unafraid, one offers her water for the guest before her.
After that, to him
she shows herself in a beautiful form.
Her name is Kaṅraṅgi:
one should make fire offerings with the mantra of her own name.
Whatever wealth one thinks of,
she comes and, before long, without doubt she offers it fully.
The one called Kaṅraṅgi is supreme among all piśācīs.
For a practitioner who is courageous and of very great splendor, all grahas are fully accomplished.
If it is not so, then swiftly she kills even the practitioner.
If the glorious vidyādhara wishes to accomplish
the daughters of the nāgas,
this is taught as their rite.

Having gone to the shore of a lake of white lotuses, following the former rite,

one should draw there
the maṇḍala called Many Pretas.
Then there the wise one, performing the torma rite as before, first kindles the fire well with kindling sticks of udumbara wood, and the wise one burns powdered nāgakesara one thousand and eight times.
When the fire offering is performed, swiftly
the daughters of the nāgas come, afraid and terrified.
If one burns it at night, whatever the practitioner wishes
they give fully, without doubt.

Next, the mantrin goes as he pleases to the mouth of an asura cave; all the asura women
are accomplished by all these rites.
Having drawn the maṇḍala as before, perform the torma rite extensively.
Having kindled a fire in the hearth with priyaṅgu wood,
recite the mantra according to the rite.
White mustard seed steeped in saffron:
recite over it one thousand and eight times,
and then one must burn it.
Then, while the fire offering is performed, the young asura women appear.
Whatever the practitioner wishes
they give fully, without doubt.
Into the abodes of the asuras they lead him by a pleasant path.
Endowed with every sovereign power, there he attains accomplishment.

If here the mantrin wishes to sell the great flesh,

first, staying in a charnel ground, he should take the great flesh with a courageous mind.
Having taken it and made protection, he holds a knife in his left hand and grasps flawless great flesh in his right.
Entering the charnel ground at night, with a courageous mind, reciting in his mind
the Wrathful One Yamāntaka,
he cries out the call of a seller of flesh.
Hearing the words of that great being, rākṣasas without commitment and some lesser beings become terrified.
Others, who have superior minds,
the guardians of the fierce charnel ground, of various forms and great power, show their bodies.
The adept should not be afraid;
then, with a fierce mind,
he should say, "Welcome!"
Then, to accomplish the guardians, the practitioner should say:
"In exchange for the flesh, give me añjana and whatever substances I desire."
The practitioner says nothing else.
Knowing that his mind is courageous, they give to him, and not to others.

Furthermore, the rites of this one for suppressing armies, as taught by the Supreme Wrathful One,
I shall explain here.
Make a very fine banner made from a corpse's cloth;
then it should be made deep blue, and made sixteen finger-widths in size.
To a slender bamboo staff made one cubit in length fasten it, then raise it, and practice at night in the charnel ground.

Having drawn a vast maṇḍala, squatting there,
holding the banner in hand, recite all through the night.
Then, when dawn breaks, with that held in hand,
at that time the clashing enemy army will without doubt come to a standstill.
And other armed men too, whom the practitioner sees,
all of them, the moment they are seen,
are suppressed and become as immovable as a mountain.
Enemy armies with maddened royal elephants, with chariots, horses, and elephants, and many battling foot soldiers, by merely being seen
will certainly appear as if suppressed.

Furthermore, the auspicious and wholesome charnel-ground application taught by the Supreme Wrathful One I shall now definitely explain.
Having watched at night the blazing fire where a corpse is being burned, with hair unbound and without clothing, he should perform recitation while circling it.
Then there the mantrin takes with his left hand a single handful of ashes, and the wise one goes home, or else goes to an empty temple;
he must never look back.
Then there, over those ashes,
he should recite until dawn.

When dawn has come,
guarding those ashes,
he should place them in a new vessel, and must never set them on the ground.
If, in order to suppress enemy armies, one scatters those ashes,
then in a land with chariots and elephants, all weapons in battle,
and many people,
by merely scattering those ashes once everywhere, their bodies will become immobile, without doubt.
This is the wholesome rite that suppresses weapons and also suppresses armies.
Likewise the applications for putting to sleep and for intoxicating:
one may go to the windward side, or else perform it through the approach practice; either will do.
When a formidable enemy is clashing in arms, having done this, their advance becomes motionless.
Thus the suppression of armies through charnel-ground applications has been explained.

I shall explain other kinds of applications for bringing beings under control.
Draw a maṇḍala in a charnel ground and make offerings as before.
Having made an extensive torma, having made a lamp burn with oil of human fat,
then on a fine skull cup the wise should collect lampblack.
Having collected the lampblack of the smoke, one should keep practicing until dawn.
Then, when morning dawns, if one anoints the eyes with the lampblack of the smoke, whoever one sees comes under one's power.
Thus the application for bringing beings under control has been proclaimed.

Now I shall explain the accomplishment of the wholesome red ochre application.
Having placed a length of cloth dyed with fine red ochre in the mouth of a corpse, then, when it is half burned,
one should take it at night, without companions.
Having taken it, in an empty temple the wise should perform recitation.
Obstructors of various kinds arise.
Until dawn breaks,
remain there and recite over it.
Then, when dawn has come,
wrap it in red cotton cloth, worship it, guard it, and put it away.
Then, with that ochre cloth, one should write the name of anyone at all, whatever one wishes.
Urging them by the practitioner's name,
without doubt
the one to be accomplished swiftly comes.
What was taught on accomplishment with red ochre has thus been explained in brief.

Now, as it is in the vidyā, the accomplishment of the ring together with its application, as taught according to the rite,
I shall explain fully in brief.
When a human corpse is being carried off, go there, and in its mouth place a ring of gold.
The wise one remains there, reciting the mantra of the Wrathful One alone.
When the corpse has been burned by the fire, the ring that lay in the corpse's mouth should be taken with the left hand.
One should recite until dawn.

Then the wise should place that fine ring
on a finger of the left hand.
Whoever and whatever his left hand touches
all become his servants, and follow behind him as well.
One should never have doubts about this.

Furthermore, the most wondrous application for accomplishing white mustard seed, just as the Wrathful One himself taught it,
I shall explain.
From sita wood make a fine casket eight finger-widths in size.
Fill it with white mustard seed;
pour the supreme accomplishment into it, and until the moon is seized by Rāhu, perform recitation every single day.
Having drawn the maṇḍala according to the rite, make extensive tormas as well.
Until all the mustard seeds in the casket make a sound or split open, for that long recite over the mustard seeds.
Then, taking the mustard seeds that have become accomplished, and applying them according to the rite to anything whatsoever, there is nothing they cannot do.
With them one splits the earth and dries up rivers;
many kinds of high mountains
one crushes into powder.
Likewise mountain peaks,
if they are applied, one topples completely.
Rains of blood and charcoal one brings down, without doubt.
Thunderbolts and hail

one makes fall suddenly.
When the vidyādhara applies them to earthquakes and to the gathering of clouds, suddenly too there is no obstruction.
Shaking lakes and oceans, bending trees right over,
and shaking even beneath the earth;
likewise threatening the nāgas, great lakes and ponds,
and subduing the nāgas;
and other rites one may wish to perform,
of various kinds,
whether taught or not taught:
the wise, examining their nature with intelligence, merely by scattering accomplished mustard seeds, will accomplish them without obstruction.
The practice of the mustard seeds that grant all accomplishments is complete.

One who practices the hero's discipline should accomplish these and various others, various ones as before,
and the intermediate ones and so on.
In this rite of the Supreme Wrathful One, for all the rites that have been explained, if they are done
without the discipline, there is no result.
As for the rites of the two mudrās that have been explained here, if one is unable to keep the discipline, then by making offerings to this Supreme Wrathful One
as before,
and by reciting as already explained, one obtains the rites as they were taught and the accomplishments as they were taught.
One who always keeps the Sugata in mind, even if he cannot always keep the discipline, by applying himself to recitation day by day, obtains the aims he desires.

Thus accomplishment through the discipline, and the various practices in this rite, whatever the Supreme Wrathful One taught, have been explained without omission.

This concludes the eighth chapter, the detailed root rite of the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, set out in sequence, from the Krodhavijaya, the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī.

Then, in the later rite, how it may be done even without the discipline:
for that reason I shall state that rite as the Wrathful One himself taught it.
The mantra of seventeen syllables is what is called "the Wrathful One."
For it, first, as shown, draw a painting, and before it make offerings in the proper way.
Or else the wise one may have a statue made; after that,
the wise should recite eight hundred thousand times.
At the end of that,
make a great offering to the Three Jewels.
After that, to the Supreme Wrathful One make offerings just as was taught.
Then it is accomplished, and at that time, bhūta grahas and poisons,
and whatever one desires in mind:
he is able to do the rites he intends.
It should never be applied to trivial accomplishments.
Poison and the rest, whatever is spoken of,
these rites are done by words.
Even with words spoken while distracted elsewhere, it is just as he himself wishes.
Likewise, toward hostile beings,

he is able to subdue them or to benefit them.
For one seized by a black one,
he can also perform the rites:
by sprinkling water upon him, or with a whip or with the foot, just as the Wrathful One taught,
he will recover without doubt.
Thus in all cases one should urge it on by mind or else by word.
Even without being wrathful, minor rites are accomplished;
by mere recollection alone
the doer's rite is accomplished.

Then one should properly perform this other rite, of bringing down into a vessel.
A youth endowed with auspicious marks, free of faults and defects, with complete limbs, is thoroughly washed and adorned with ornaments, and is also given the five products of the cow to drink.
After that he keeps a fast,
and at dawn he is washed, anointed with fragrant scents, and adorned with clothes and ornaments.
Having honored him in this way, facing toward the east, seat him, according to the rite, on a seat of kuśa grass; then into both his hands
give sandalwood, torma, and flowers.
Offer incense of black aloeswood.
Then one swiftly recites the mantra, and by this rite of practice one performs the rite of bringing down into a vessel.

When it has descended into the vessel, one should ask through him about good and bad.
Then whatever has happened, what will happen, and what is happening, he tells truly.

"Great being, do this!" he says, and turns one back, saying, "Not this."
Vidyā-mantras that are deficient or excessive, and mantras too, he here makes complete.
Then to that Supreme Wrathful One present a water offering with flowers.
Then, by the teaching of the Sugata, the commitments should also be shown.
When the vessel has heard them, then, being released, he falls to the ground.
The vidyā, the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, having been accomplished, then departs.
Then take up the vessel;
afterward wash him thoroughly, give him food and let him eat, honor him, and send him back.
Having performed the bringing down into a vessel with the rites as they were taught, then perform the rites taught in the rite of the later rite.

Then, if the mantrin wishes to bring a king under control, at that time, in front of the painting, draw his form with charnel-ground ash, sit upon its heart,
and with one-pointed mind recite ten thousand times:
"May so-and-so come under my power."
Adding his name, as before, at the end of the wrathful mantra as taught,
say svāhā at the close.
This is the application always taught for bringing under control through the Wrathful One.
Then the king, come under control, forsaking his dear ones, with his own person and his wealth will surely serve well, like a servant.

Likewise, if one does ten thousand recitations, brahmins too come under control;
vaiśyas and śūdras, all without exception, surely do so through six thousand.
For women and for girls
one should recite ten thousand times.

Then, if one wishes to separate two people who are friends with each other, draw an effigy of one of them in the same way, place one foot on its heart, and squat.
Adding his name at the end,
recite the Wrathful One Yamāntaka:
"May so-and-so swiftly be separated from this one, phaṭ!"
For this separation, thus performed,
one should recite ten thousand times.

Then, knowing that a being is very vicious and is to be tamed properly, toward one who harms the Three Jewels one should act with the Wrathful One, and not otherwise.
Uttering the enemy's name, draw his effigy with charnel-ground ash.
Then recite one hundred and eight times over a peg of khadira wood, drive it into the effigy's heart, and after that recite ten thousand times.
Then, putting the name at the end of the mantra of the Wrathful One Yamāntaka:
"Kill so-and-so!",
ending it with hūṃ and phaṭ, if one recites in this way a full ten thousand times, by that rite he will die;
there is no need to examine this.

One should always keep the Sugata in mind, and never act with a malicious mind, except to stir suffering in his heart and so purify him.
By the rite of pacifying,
one should then make it peaceful and wholesome.
The sorcery, just as it has been taught, should never be practiced as such.
Out of love for beings,
it is taught to be done with the Sugata in mind.
If one who desires accomplishment wishes to obtain the unobstructed accomplishments just as the Tathāgata taught them, one should not have such a wrathful mind.
One who lacks the intention of the Sugata will then lose the accomplishments.
In short, for one without the awakening mind, the supreme accomplishments taught by Mañjuśrī, the Lord of Wrathful Ones, with discipline and recitation,
according to the rite in the kalpa, are lost.
Whoever has the intention of the Sugata, even without good discipline, and likewise even without images and the like, obtains the supreme accomplishments, and, free of afflictions, as he wishes, finds all that he desires.
Whoever has the intention of the Sugata,
with a mind unconfused and steady, confronts the afflictions of existence, so hard to cross; having paid homage
to all the tathāgatas,
one with the intention of the Sugata obtains the supreme accomplishment.
Knowing this, at that time one should teach the supreme path of the Sugata, which destroys affliction and suffering.

One should never serve worldly gods.
Thus the rites for taming vicious beings, as they were taught,
are for the protection of the Three Jewels;
they should never be applied anywhere else.

Furthermore, the rites of expulsion, for one who wishes to perform them likewise anywhere at all,
I shall likewise explain.
Likewise, with charnel-ground ash the wise one draws the enemy's effigy.
Then, standing on it with both feet, before Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One, saying, "Expel so-and-so!",
adding his name at the end,
and likewise hūṃ and phaṭ,
and saying hūṃ again, if one recites ten thousand times, he will be expelled without doubt.
Or else, with that same ash draw the enemy's effigy, and trample on its heart with the left foot, without hesitation;
facing toward the sun,
if one recites Yamāntaka,
in an instant that enemy is struck down by a burning fever.
Then, by the rite of pacifying, one should oneself pacify it.
If one does not do so, within seven days he will die without doubt.
Rites such as these
one who keeps the Sugata in mind never performs.
For all beings
one should perform pacifying and enriching.
One whose very nature is the awakening mind will before long attain accomplishment.

Then, for the happiness of all beings, the rites of pacifying and likewise the rites of enriching, as they were taught, I shall explain.
At stūpas or in a maṇḍala make offerings to the tathāgatas, and to the Three Jewels prostrate again and again.
Whatever virtue one has gathered by day and also by night, relying on the Three Jewels, do it with the intention of the Sugata:
"By this, may all beings, who suffer so greatly, become happy!" Whatever accomplishment one obtains by it, even small and subtle ones, the wise should always use for the benefit of beings.
The wise should build stūpas, and likewise read the sublime Dharma.
Other small virtues too, however minor they may be,
one who wishes to obtain the supreme accomplishment in this very life should always dedicate to beings.
Thus this awakening mind becomes the field for the sake of the Dharma, and the characteristics of attending upon bodhisattvas are also fully taught.
Thus, having made one's understanding steady, one should increase virtue;
and having increased virtue, dedicate it wholly to beings.

The mantrin who keeps the Sugata in mind, in this way, always benefiting beings,
increases pacifying and enriching.
First, to the Three Jewels make various offerings; after that, the Supreme Wrathful One, Yamāntaka, should be worshiped with the finest white flowers.

Having made offerings, here one should recite according to the rite.
Seated comfortably on a comfortable seat, very serene, with the Sugata in mind, uttering his name, "May he be pacified," add it at the end with the words of the Wrathful One, and add gauṣaṭ at the very end.
For anyone at all,
recite in this way a thousand times.
For lands and regions
and for kings, double it.
For horses and elephants and for cattle, recite a thousand times.
For goats and sheep and for buffalo, it is taught to recite always a thousand times.
Or else, having performed recitation for all embodied beings, one who possesses the awakening mind will certainly become supreme in pacifying.

Likewise for enriching, especially, the finest flowers anointed with white sandalwood, recited over according to the rite of recitation, should be offered before Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One into a vessel filled with milk.
With a thousand, one is greatly enriched.
If one wishes to perform these enrichings that greatly delight the heart, the name of whoever it may be should be added at the end according to the rite.
The wise one, adding at its end the words "May he be enriched," enriches by pouring pleasing flowers into milk.

Then, further, for one who desires glory:
there too, as before,
worship with pleasing flowers
anointed with white sandalwood.
Also offer, with the mantra, incense of fine black aloeswood.
Having done so every day, recite according to the rite.
Adding at the end
the words "Grant me glory!", and then with namaḥ svāhār, recite ten thousand times by the rite as before.
Then, going to the bank of a river that flows to the ocean, standing in the water up to the navel, take puṇḍarīka flowers
anointed with white sandalwood,
and, reciting and reciting, offer them into the water.
If one endowed with intelligence makes this offering, at its end he obtains great glory.
Or else red lotuses
anointed with red sandalwood:
if one offers them there,
then at the end of that,
by these rites one will certainly obtain an inexhaustible treasure.
Atimukta flowers,
reciting and reciting over them as before:
if one offers a hundred thousand, the mantrin who abides as the rite has taught will certainly, at its end, obtain a hundred thousand in wealth.
There is no need to examine this.
Then, if as before

one offers three hundred thousand, without doubt a yakṣiṇī will come under his power.
By this rite the practitioner will also obtain jewels.
Then, if the mantrin, as before, takes many flowers of various kinds anointed with sandalwood, and offers a hundred thousand into the water,
he obtains what he desires upon the earth.
Or else white lotuses anointed with the three sweet substances:
if one burns them well in a blazing fire, by that one sees the hero directly, and from him one obtains
the supreme of desires and wealth as well.
One endowed with intelligence takes the finest food, mixed with butter and honey, and for seven days, with a ladle, from him one obtains
the supreme of desires and wealth as well;
having burned it in a blazing fire, one fully obtains seven districts.
There is no need to examine this.
Or else, with all kinds of grain,
the fire offering accomplishes every aim.
By performing a hundred thousand fire offerings, those very things become inexhaustible.
A hundred thousand bilva fruits anointed with butter, burned in a fire blazing fiercely, win from the lord of the land grants together with wealth.
Unbroken tips of dūrvā grass, with namaḥ svāhā at the end, if soaked in milk and burned, make a person's life long.

Likewise, if one always burns butter and honey in a blazing fire, without doubt one swiftly obtains intelligence as well.
In a fire of lac-tree wood, likewise, if one performs a fire offering of butter every day, long life, intelligence, fame, prosperity, strength, splendor, mindfulness, joy, a fine complexion, glory, and the accomplishments of heroism will be obtained, without doubt.
Likewise, by burning all kinds of food, splendor, prosperity, strength, fame, and the perfection of every desire
will be obtained, without doubt.
As from the later rite, these, which for the most part came forth from the lotus mouth of Mañjughoṣa the Wrathful One, have been explained in brief.

This concludes the ninth chapter, the later rite set out in sequence, the detailed later rite of the Wrathful One of noble Mañjuśrī, from the last of all the detailed rites of the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, Krodhavijaya, the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī. The later kalpa is complete.

Then, the rite of all rites called "the Later of the Later," extensive and with its applications,
I shall now explain.
With the mantra of seventeen syllables, the excellent hero's discipline, and likewise the preliminary approach and so on,
the rites have here been explained.
Now, of the supreme mantra of a single syllable that was taught,
I shall explain the rite of its actions, even without the hero's discipline.
The Wrathful One of Mañjughoṣa, whose name is Yamāntaka:

his supreme heart essence is the single syllable called hūṃ.
Placing oṃ first, according to the rite, sitting before the painting, if one recites this a million times, after that one enters upon accomplishment.
Then his supreme painting, another means of accomplishing every aim,
by which one fully obtains accomplishment,
I shall fully explain in the proper way.
New cloth about one cubit long,
well washed and anointed with scents:
with fine paints that contain no glue, one should paint the Wrathful One Yamāntaka.
His mouth gapes wide; his form is terrifying;
his eyebrows are yellow, and his hair is yellow too;
his color is like a black rain cloud;
he is adorned with skulls.
He has three eyes, and his hair stands on end; he has one face, and his complexion is bright.
In his two hands he holds a club, and with his left hand he makes the threatening gesture.
He has two very fine feet,
and he should be shown riding a buffalo.
He delights in a lower garment of tiger skin,
and utters a fierce and terrifying voice.
All his limbs are complete, his body ablaze with rays of light.

Then the wise one should worship him with the supreme limbs of offering.
The mantrin steadfast in his discipline should after that enter a rock cave, and sitting before the painting, giving up the eating of food, should recite until that king of mountains shakes.

Or else he should recite until the Wrathful One Yamāntaka laughs or moves;
or else, if he recites
until it blazes brightly, he then obtains accomplishment.
Thus, through recitation of the deity, the accomplishments are just so wondrous.
Then the glorious vidyādhara accomplishes all that he wishes to accomplish; whatever he thinks of,
all of it before long comes to abundance.
When he is wrathful, the earth splits, and the waters too dry up.
He is able to topple all the mountains, and he dries up the oceans too.
Rites such as these,
all great wonders,
and benefits of many kinds he performs for all beings.
All the rites taught earlier he should accomplish as in the earlier rite.
Having accomplished them, he should give the supreme fruits to all beings.
Whatever power of accomplishment he has,
if he keeps the Sugata in mind, all of it he gives, with an attitude free of stinginess, to people in need.
The compassionate one always gives his own body to those in need.
Having thus accomplished stainlessly the perfection of generosity, he should dedicate it fully in his mind:
"By this virtue, may all beings become virtuous, endowed with the Sugata, complete in every happiness, and vessels of every virtue." Whoever, having thus accomplished the mantra, has the stainless awakening mind and always enjoys happiness, whatever accomplishments the kalpa teaches, which came from the mouth of the Tathāgata, all of them abide close to him.

That practitioner, through miraculous power, becomes endowed with every quality.
Thus the rite spoken
from the mouth of Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One, taught extensively in the Krodhavijaya, is the compendium of all rites.

This is the tenth chapter, the Later of the Later set out in sequence, the detailed rite of noble Mañjuśrī Yamāntaka, from the compendium of detailed rites of the Wrathful One Victorious over All, the detailed rite of Mañjuśrī.

The single syllable of the Wrathful One of Mañjughoṣa has been explained.
Then, further, its rite
I shall explain in detail and at length.
The face of the one who utterly crushes Yama is explained as the syllable called hūṃ.
Then Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One, called hūṃ, should be known as the supreme vidyā.
His maṇḍala is a different one, to be known as granting every desire.
It is to be made in a charnel ground, in whatever lies within a charnel ground.

Of eight cubits, with four gates, or else it may be of four cubits.
A charnel ground is an excellent site;
it should be drawn with charnel-ground ash.
In its center draw a preta, adorned with garlands.
At the gates place the lower halves of preta corpses;
at the edges place heads.
At the four corners four tridents (śūla) and skull cups should also be drawn.

If one is able to draw, the wise one should draw them with ash.
But if one is not able to draw those figures, then on a fine patch of ground smeared with red sandalwood, in the charnel ground, first of all, the mantrin should set down the syllables.
Then the one who utterly crushes Yama should be invited there and worshiped.
He has six terrifying, blazing faces, and likewise he has six legs, three eyes, the color of a dark rain cloud, and is adorned with eighteen arms.
The Wrathful One who utterly crushes Yama delights in wearing a leopard skin as his garment and holds many fine weapons.
He is to be worshiped upon a preta.
Having worshiped Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One, Yamāntaka,
according to the rite,
offer as a torma
milk-rice porridge mixed with butter and honey.
Offer incense of aloeswood, and make the lamps with butter.
Then this single-syllable seed of the one who utterly crushes Yama should be recited one thousand and eight times while seated before the Wrathful One.
After that the wise one takes the disciple into the charnel ground.
Reciting hūṃ, the face of the Wrathful One who slays Yama, he holds him, and having brought him in, at his heart he should place the syllable called hūṃ.
Then the trident mudrā should be bound, covered with a cloth.
Having shown it well to the disciples, have them too perform worship.

Then, having empowered them with the Wrathful One who utterly crushes Yama, give the single syllable of Mañjuśrī the Wrathful One, Yamāntaka.
Then, having made offerings once more, request the Wrathful One to depart.
Binding the trident mudrā, always request him to depart in this way.
Inviting the Wrathful One, too, should be done with the trident mudrā.
Having paid homage to the Three Jewels, display the trident.
The wise one, with both hands, interlaces the fingers with one another;
the two excellent middle fingers are raised upright from the center;
the two ring fingers are put inside, placed within the two index fingers.
Having raised those two in this way, arrange the rest well.
This mudrā of Yamāntaka is known as the trident mudrā.
All of its rites
are to be done without hesitation.
Then further, in due order,
all the mantras without exception of this one who utterly crushes Yama
I shall state for this maṇḍala.

oṃ hūṃ triḥ: for the central preta.
oṃ hūṃ laṃ lā ha: for the garland of pretas.
oṃ hūṃ jri traḥ: for the lower halves of preta corpses, at all four gates.
oṃ hūṃ hāḥ: for what is below, that is, at the outer edge.
oṃ hūṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ kh: for all four tridents.
oṃ hūṃ hri haḥ: for the skull cups.

Opening the southern gate, one should close off the rest.
It is always in a charnel ground;
yet for the one who utterly crushes Yama,
if a place is well adorned with the mantras, it becomes a charnel ground.
On a patch of ground about one cubit in size,
smeared with red sandalwood,
in whatever manner is suitable,
having drawn the maṇḍala,
the one who knows the rite, beginning from the center, should make offerings with the mantras in due order.

oṃ hūṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ āgacchaya yaṃ phraṃ thana svāhā: this is for the invitation.
oṃ hūṃ hri kālaṃ thāna hā: this is the mantra of the water offering.
oṃ hūṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ khuṃ kha: this is the mantra of scent.
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ karala rana ha haḥ: this is the mantra of flowers.
oṃ hūṃ tri hūṃ paśi khahā: this is the mantra of incense. oṃ jraṃ jri hāḥ: this is the mantra of the lamp.
oṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ khaṅ ka kha: this is the mantra of the torma. oṃ hūṃ svāhā: this is the heart mantra of the Wrathful One.
oṃ hūṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ gajja hūṃ punarāgamanāya svāhā: this is the mantra for requesting him to depart again.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the eleventh chapter: the section on the arrangement of the maṇḍala of the single-syllable king, the one who utterly crushes Yama.

Then the practitioner should draw his supreme image.
The rites as stated are to be done, and the work of recitation performed thoroughly.
On a small cloth about one cubit in size,
a fine one, washed along its border, with white pigment free of glue, draw the one who utterly crushes Yama:
six faces, with hair bristling upward, and each with three eyes, most terrifying; eighteen wrathful arms

and six clearly drawn legs; wearing a leopard skin as his garment, seated in proper fashion upon a preta.
Trident, sword, wheel, supreme axe, and the hand of giving,
iron dart, club, vajra, and great arrow are held in the right hands; in the left, staff, noose, plough and bow, skull cup, hook, short spear, raised trident, and likewise the threatening gesture.
Having drawn the form just as described, like a bee and a cloud in hue, keep it well concealed.
Placing it in a pleasing spot, one should also perform the recitation.
Here the rite of recitation is explained.
The vidyādhara should always bathe with the blazing mantra.

With the mantra of the source of nectar, having first rinsed the mouth in the proper way, the one who knows the mantras should then carefully protect his own body.
After that, according to the rite, the wise one enters the house of the Wrathful One.
Having entered, he sits down upon a fine seat made of kuśa grass, and then, by the rite stated before, he should worship the Wrathful One.
With both hands anointed with scent,
he takes up the mantra jewel, and to purify the faults of wrongdoing recites the Wrathful Nectar mantra seven times.
Then the mantrin, seated facing the Wrathful One, should recite, with a mind clear and one-pointed,

for as long as the mind does not grow weary.
Then at the end of the recitation the wise one binds the trident mudrā and requests the Wrathful One who utterly crushes Yama to depart.
Whoever, in this way, properly, day by day, recites this single-syllable mantra ten million times,
in every respect according to the rite, attains the supreme siddhi.
Then further, the mantras of the rites as they have been taught, spoken by the Wrathful One himself, are explained for the benefit of practitioners.

oṃ hūṃ dīpta te jā svāhā: this is the mantra of bathing.
oṃ hūṃ amṛta prabha baṃ ba: this is the mantra of rinsing the mouth.
oṃ hūṃ sarba ho rakṣa man tathāgatā jñāpayati svāhā: this is the mantra of protection.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ hūṃ mañjughoṣa jñāyā sarba duṣṭaṃ bandha bandha svāhā: this binds the malicious ones.
namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ hūṃ dhṛk prā kāṃ raṃ phaṭ: this is the mantra of the fence.
oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ yama pramathana rakṣa rakṣa namaḥ sarba bhuta bhayebhyaḥ tthāgato jñāpayati svāhā: this protects all the limbs.
oṃ hūṃ kāla mathana phaṭ: this is the mantra for entering the house of the Wrathful One.
oṃ hūṃ rakṣa rakṣa māṃ svāhā: this is the mantra of the seat.
oṃ hūṃ sitya de hūṃ jraṃ jraṃ: this is the mantra for taking up the mantra jewel.
oṃ hūṃ krodha amṛta jagad prabha svāhā: this is the mantra to be applied to the mantra jewel.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the twelfth chapter: the section on the rites of the image, the worship, and the recitation of the single syllable of the one who utterly crushes Yama.

Before that, the approach is definitively stated to be ten million recitations.
If afterward one practices the observance of the Wrathful One, one will attain the supreme siddhi.
A skull cup made of wood,
made to the measure of twenty-six finger-widths, and a sharp trident the wise one holds in the right and left hands.
Having put on a garment of leopard skin, he smears his body with ash, and adorning himself
with garlands of bones, he practices the observance.
He also lets out great peals of laughter that shatter the world.
In a charnel ground, or at a solitary tree, or on a mountain, or else in a grove, for six months the wise one eats cow dung and practices the observance.
The intelligent one never enters a village;
he remains in meditative equipoise and speaks no words, pure, chaste and disciplined, his mind ever on the Sugata, and wholly endowed with the mind of awakening.
Whoever practices the observance of the Wrathful One and is always diligent in recitation will attain the supreme siddhi.
With this one who utterly crushes Yama, the siddhi will never turn out otherwise.
If one is not able to do the approach by this observance, then, eating cow dung,
one should recite thirty million times in the proper way.
At the end of the recitation, too, the wise one should make vast offerings.
Then a thousand jasmine flowers should be offered so that they strike the image.

When, for the good of the vidyādhara, they have been offered so as to strike it, if it blazes up intensely,
then without doubt, by means of that image, he will fly up into the sky.
He then becomes supreme among all vidyādharas and goes at their head.
If, however, when they are offered so as to strike it,
it trembles strongly,
then, as explained in the detailed rite, he gains the middling siddhi.
But if it does not move at all and the image remains as it naturally is,
he will obtain the lowest siddhi.
Thus the three kinds of result are explained.
Through subjecting the body to hardship the three kinds of siddhi are obtained.
Strive hard at the observance of fasting, or else subsist on river water;
attached to nothing, drink the urine of cattle.
If one is wholly endowed with the mind of awakening, then one attains the supreme siddhi.
For one who accomplishes all the supreme vidyās, so that one may accomplish by means of the supreme, the middling and the lowest siddhis, these are taught as the practices that grant them.
If one desires neither the supreme siddhis nor the middling, but always desires wealth, then one should recite constantly.
Other rites of this as well
I shall then explain in brief.
On a very lovely piece of ground, smeared with good cow dung, there, with red sandalwood, the wise one should make the maṇḍala, a fine one about a cubit in size, perfectly even and pleasing:

the maṇḍala of the one who utterly crushes Yama that was taught for a charnel-ground site.
Then, having made that supreme maṇḍala there with the mantras, after that the knower of mantra, with the actions as they were stated, with whatever he has and as best he can,
should worship the Wrathful One.
Each day, according to the rite, he should recite a thousand times.
By always doing it in this way he will attain the result he desires.
Without doubt he will also succeed in making the whole world rejoice.
He will have no enemies;
without doubt he will be free of illness;
his wealth will increase;
even the king will come under his power.
If someone constantly, by this rite, recites Yamāntaka,
then his senses
and the moving and unmoving worlds will without doubt come under the power of that one endowed with the mind of awakening.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the thirteenth chapter: the section on the observance of the single syllable of the one who utterly crushes Yama.

Then further I shall explain the rites of accomplishment through observance.
All the supreme siddhis are to be accomplished in every way through this very observance
of this one who utterly crushes Yama.
For the most part the supreme siddhis are not accomplished without observance;

therefore, having practiced the observance of the crusher of Yama, one should properly accomplish the supreme siddhis.
The wise one does so, and not by other means.

The weapons as they were taught,
according to the rite of the root kalpa (ritual manual), and the applications of mantra and vidyā as before:
these one should always accomplish well.
Here in this kalpa
the maṇḍala located in a charnel ground, which grants all siddhis,
has been taught separately, in particular.
The sword, the underworld, the vetāla, illusion, eye ointment, gorocana, white mustard seed, orpiment and red ochre, and whatever other rites one wishes, invisibility, fleetness of foot, the gold-making elixir and the extraction of essences, the accomplishment of yakṣiṇīs, the accomplishment of nāga maidens and the like,
and, by the excellent rite of summoning, the accomplishment of excellent women for practice:
by the rite of the root kalpa, abiding in the proper way, one should accomplish these.
From among these, this single syllable of this Wrathful One is explained as special.
Then all that has been stated and taught,
and even what is not mentioned, should be accomplished.
This heart of Mañjuśrī's Wrathful One, called hūṃ, is the extensive form;
this is the root rite,
and its condensation has been fully proclaimed.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the fourteenth chapter: the section on the condensed detailed root rite of the Wrathful One Yamāntaka.

The kalpa has been explained in brief and in extensive form, along with the observance and the certainties.
Then the mantra of the radiant Wrathful One called Six-Faced hūṃ, which is accomplished by mere recitation,
the secret, I shall explain in brief.
Practicing observances and hard austerities:
these have no place at all in this;
even by reciting it just once one will perform all the rites.

oṃ namaḥ sarba tathāgatebhyaḥ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ yama bramtha rakṣa rakṣa māṃ sarba bhūta bhayebhyaḥ tthāgatājñāpayati svāhā

These forty-three syllables of the Wrathful One are accomplished merely by reading them.
They grant all siddhis and are extolled by all the buddhas.
If one recites it constantly, it is said to grant all siddhis.
For one who constantly, always,
recites it in a charnel ground by this rite, gods, asuras, gandharvas, yakṣas, rākṣasas and the race of nāgas within a circuit of seven yojanas will flee before his splendor.
Whoever recites this mantra, the Six-Faced hūṃ
of the Wrathful One who slays Yama, finds nothing in the least difficult in the world, moving or unmoving.
The mantra called Six-Faced hūṃ,
joined with the trident mudrā, is proclaimed in this tantra of Krodhavijaya to be accomplished.
In a charnel ground, according to the rite, as its preliminary approach,
one should first of all do one hundred thousand recitations.

Then one should practice the regular rite.
By the rite of regular practice, having then recited another hundred thousand,
after that, as was stated, one engages in accomplishing the rites of the rite of the root kalpa.
Then one succeeds in all rites.
The rite of the one called Six-Faced hūṃ is here explained in brief.
The Wrathful One arisen from Mañjuśrī is the very face called hūṃ;
he is known by the name Yamāntaka.
In this there is no difficulty whatsoever.
The single excellent rite spoken in brief from the mouth of the Wrathful One, that very rite I explain.
Through this one called Six-Faced hūṃ, hūṃ is proclaimed as sixfold.
Likewise, further, in the kalpa, the end of hūṃ is to be used to impel it.
hūṃ traṃ, joined with the trident mudrā, splits even all the mountains.
If hūṃ tri is applied,
even cloth will swiftly split.
hūṃ chig is said to cut through all vidyā-mantras and weapons.
Joined with the trident mudrā,
by always applying hūṃ kha, one devours the hostile and utterly destroys the armies of enemies.
If hūṃ ga is applied,
it is proclaimed to subdue elephants.
hūṃ tha, when all weapons are multiplied, strikes terror into gods and asuras.
hūṃ ha is fully proclaimed to destroy armies and to stupefy.
If hūṃ gra is applied,

it makes them fight one another with weapons.
If hūṃ a is applied,
it sets them free again.
hūṃ ga, when here joined with the trident mudrā, is supreme for swiftly harming elephants, lions,
horses, men and birds,
boats and chariot vehicles,
and even rivers.
If hūṃ ba is applied,
it always frees what has been suppressed.
If hūṃ dhaṃ is applied, gods, asuras and others too are mastered.
For all the minor siddhis, if it is impelled, it yields their fruit.
hūṃ baṃ brings everything under control.
With ra placed at the end, it causes division;
joined with ta, it causes hatred;
joined with ma, it kills;
joined with ya, it likewise kills;
joined with la, it produces illusion;
for pacifying and increasing, it is used alone.
These and other such are to be applied by the root rite.
Then one should accomplish them by the rites as they were stated.
In this way the siddhi of this Yamāntaka will certainly be attained.
This is the single syllable of the kalpa of Krodhavijaya; it is the explanation of the other secrets of Mañjuśrī, the Lord of Wrathful Ones.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the fifteenth chapter: the section on the detailed rite arising from the King of Wrathful Ones, Yamāntaka, called Six-Faced hūṃ.

Then I shall explain the detailed, extensive rite of Yamāntaka the solitary one, supreme and foremost of all rites, called the Accomplishment of Aims.
For this the glorious vidyādhara, in order to accomplish all the rites, in meditative equipoise and endowed with the mind of awakening, should first draw the maṇḍala.
On the shore of a lake or of the ocean, or in a ravine, or in a charnel ground, having examined the ground in whichever place, he adorns it with scattered flowers.
With the blazing mantra of Ekavīra he stirs it up with blazing flames, and having purified it with earth, emblic myrobalan and the like, he should begin the bathing.
The vidyādhara, bathed and clean,
then, with that mantra, should set all the syllables on his own body.
With wrathful eyes turned red,
then, in order to pacify the obstructors, reciting the secret mantra, he should gaze upon the clean spot of ground, cleared of all sweepings and rubbish.
Then, reciting the mantra of the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, Ekavīra, he should draw with charnel-ground ash a fine square maṇḍala with four gates, its main gate facing west.
In its center he should draw a lotus,
and in the four corners club emblems with blazing tips.
This is the one called Many Clubs.
The one with tridents is Many Tridents.
The one encircled by short spears is likewise called Many Short Spears.
Likewise there is Many Skull Cups.
The one with human corpses is Many Corpses.

The one with ugly, headless human corpses, with blazing pretas and with rākṣasas, terrifying on all ten sides, is then called Many Charnel Grounds.
Thus the maṇḍala of Yamāntaka the hero is explained as being of six kinds.
Of these, Many Clubs is said to increase all wealth.
Many Tridents is proclaimed to crush the rākṣasas.
Likewise Many Short Spears cuts down all obstructors.
Those called Many Skull Cups utterly destroy all magical devices.
The one called Many Corpses accomplishes all vetālas.
The renowned Many Charnel Grounds grants all siddhis.
Then, in the center of the lotus,
one should imagine the supreme Wrathful One of Mañjuśrī,
the one called Yamāntaka,
seated according to the rite:
the color of freshly broken sapphire, with six faces, his eyes gazing terrifyingly, wrathful, his mouths gaping wide, terrifying to behold, overpowering all terrors, with three eyes, his hair bristling upward, biting his lip with his teeth, his gaze most terrifying.
One should call to mind his eighteen arms and his six intensely blazing legs.
With a garland of headless corpses made into an ornament worn across the body, he holds the weapons short spear, hammer, noose, sword and hook,
trident, vajra, staff
and the club among the weapons:
these he holds in his right hands.

With the left he makes the threatening gesture, and a bell, a fine skull cup, a khaṭvāṅga staff,
a fresh human head, a skeleton,
a terrifying corpse and a blazing staff:
these he holds in his hands always.
The Wrathful One Yamāntaka
sits upon the corpse of the dead, fearsome, weapons raised, his gaze most terrifying;
he dwells always in the charnel ground.
He crushes all serpents and rākṣasas.
All the gods pay him homage, and all the wrathful ones bow down to him.
His body blazes intensely, fierce and utterly devouring;
he delights in wearing a tiger skin as his garment.
One should call to mind the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, whom the worldly gods and the wrathful ones, having cast aside their weapons and their power, follow and pay homage to.
Having thus become fearless, and having called him to mind with his own mantra, one should invite him, anoint him with sandalwood, and worship him with many flowers.
The vidyādhara should always offer red sandalwood.
Having worshiped him in due order with incense and torma, one brings in the disciple with the mantras of the Wrathful One and the mantras of Buddhalocanā, and has him cast a flower.
Then the glorious vidyādhara,
having recited the mantra of Amṛtakuṇḍalin, makes offerings to the disciple of garlands, white sandalwood and the like, and then recites Buddhalocanā as well.
He gives the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, the terrifying one who overpowers adversaries.

"Deity, I have received you":
this the disciple says three times.
Then the knower of mantra, according to the rite, having bowed to the gurus and been empowered according to the rite, recites the Wrathful One Yamāntaka.

From the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī, the Later Supplement to the Later Tantra of Krodhavijaya, the sixteenth chapter: the section on the King of Wrathful Ones, Yamāntaka.

Then further, having received this mantra of Yamāntaka, one should take the cloth of a corpse and draw his form on it.
Then with fine pigments free of glue one should do as before.
One should make it a fine one a cubit in size, or else four cubits in size.
If the mantrin himself is not able to draw it, then one should have it drawn by an artisan who has fasted and taken the precepts.
Seated upon the corpse of the dead, adorned with eighteen arms,
he is shown with six faces and six legs, terrifying, overpowering, his gaze most terrifying.
Some faces are laughing, some have the tongue curled back, some bare their fangs, some have the mouth gaping, some are wrathful, some are terrifying and overpower adversaries:
faces like those of such a wrathful one,
with yellow brows and yellow eyes.
One should draw him holding in his hands the weapons as they were stated.
In a secluded place without bustle the mantrin should have it drawn in this way.

Having had it drawn thus, the mantra expert sits gazing at the image.
The one who knows the rite recites a hundred thousand times, and then, by means of that very image that was drawn, he should engage in the accomplishment.
The mantra of that Yamāntaka, the fierce one, I now explain.
oṃ is its chief;
the one called a is the second;
the one called kro is the third;
the one called dhe is the fourth;
the one called ka is the fifth;
the one called ya is the sixth, the secret one;
the one called mān is the seventh;
ta is to be known as the eighth;
ka is the ninth, and hūṃ the tenth;
likewise phaṭ is added as the extra one:
the unequaled mantra of eleven.
This is the supreme Wrathful One of Mañjuśrī,
the one called Yamāntaka,
in the Later Supplement rite.
Having thus received that mantra, extolled by all the buddhas, and having received the rite, if one recites it, one will attain the state of a vidyādhara.

oṃ a kro dhe ka ya mānta ka hūṃ phaṭ: this is Yamāntaka, god of gods.
oṃ amṛta kuṇḍali sarba bighanānta kritta na hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ: this is that of Amṛtakuṇḍalin.

oṃ buddhalocani svāhā: this is that of Buddhalocanā.

Then further the places for recitation are explained as they are.
In a charnel ground, or else on a mountain, in a thicket, or on the shore of a lotus lake, if, in wrath, one recites Yamāntaka, one will attain siddhi.
Seated on a seat of kuśa grass,

facing the image,
with both hands anointed with scent,
holding a rosary of rudrākṣa, the mantrin should always recite.
Likewise he should offer incense and arghya water.
Neither too fast nor too slow, nor with the syllables jumbled together, should he ever speak it;
he should always speak it very clearly.
Having set his mind according to the rite, placing his mind upon the meaning, with a mind of non-arising he recites the syllables in their proper order.
At the end of reciting one hundred thousand times, the accomplishment to be done: listen as I explain it.
On the shore of a lake one should draw the maṇḍala called Many Charnel Grounds, and spread out the image within it.
The courageous one, having entered it at night, with a good companion, his mind not bewildered, likewise burns guggulu as incense, and while reciting offers a thousand jasmine flowers, making them strike the image at the heart.
Then the Wrathful One Yamāntaka enters the image, and the eyes of the Wrathful One, that image, will certainly tremble or else stir.
Then, that deity having been accomplished, one performs whatever rites one wishes.
But if it is not accomplished,
one should recite another hundred thousand times, and then at the end of that do the accomplishment.
If even by that it is not accomplished, at the third time even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution will without doubt succeed.
The rites that one who has succeeded can perform here I shall explain.

Even rites that are hard to accomplish, whatever one desires in one's mind,
the holder of vidyā-mantras
will swiftly bring to completion.
He topples the peaks of mountains and the ravines;
he splits the earth asunder;
he can dry up the waters;
he suppresses armies, rendering them immobile;
he brings down a rain of blood.
A thousand, or even a hundred thousand,
he can kill in an instant.
Harm and stupefaction
he brings down in an instant.
Chariots, or else boats, and rutting elephants he can halt.
He throws enemy armies into turmoil.
He can swiftly stupefy a whole region.
Enraged, he makes even the earth quake.
He can burn islands and forests.
He dries up even the waters of the Ganges, and he can fill again what has dried up.
He can hold back the clouds, and he brings down the rains.
He can bring down rain even out of season.
He summons even the lords of the nāgas.
Then even what is held fast by the dark one,
by a mere glance or a mere cloud, he summons, without any doubt.
Hail and a rain of charcoal he can bring down in an instant.
A tree adorned with the finest fruits, flowers and branches,
by a glance or by a thrown stone he causes to fall suddenly.
By its mere application he throws even the underworld into turmoil.

Likewise upon gods and humans he brings great harm.
There is nothing at all, past, present or yet to come,
that does not certainly come under the power of this King of Wrathful Ones.
Even if that deity has not been accomplished, by a mere glance or even by a word it becomes supreme for pacifying poisons, fevers, grahas and the like.
Subjugating, causing division, killing and expelling,
illusion, applying eye ointment,
and the rites that use incense and scented unguents:
all these rites
are accomplished by doing a hundred recitations.
The mantrin goes to where a great treasure lies and performs the accomplishment; unafraid of the obstructors, by reciting a thousand times over that wealth he takes it as if from his own house;
the lesser ones he obtains with a hundred.
Even without recitation or fire offering, by the mere name of Yamāntaka the gods will be terrified before long, without doubt.
Making someone savage,
working sorcery and malign spells, and the siddhis of stupefying and suppressing, by a glance, and the rites of many kinds by way of other rites as well, he can accomplish before long.
In lands and in regions
he brings harm and disease.
Torpor and harm,
stupefying and making invisible,
turmoil and terror,

dejection and agitation once more, summoning wealth and suppressing,
and summoning people as well, lasting injury and fear, strife, battle and hail,
itching sores and the stupor of sleep, and whatever else one desires:
the mantrin, by calling Yamāntaka to mind, will bring about all of these.
Then this Later rite,
as it is, I explain.

Going to the cave entrance of the asuras, the wise one spreads out the painting, eats no food, and sits on a single seat.
When he has recited to the count of ten thousand, then women of supreme beauty, excellent ones, come out at the entrance, and before that practitioner they joyfully say, "Please come inside." Then, together with trusted companions, the practitioner, firm
in his pledges,
should enter that abode.
Likewise, as one wishes,
the names of yakṣiṇīs,
of piśācīs or of gandharvīs,
or else of whatever goddess one desires, should be written and placed before the painting;
and each day, before the painting, adding her name at the end,
if one recites a hundred thousand times without weariness, they, struck with fear of that practitioner, will all come,
and for as long as the practitioner wishes they will carry out tasks here.
The accomplishment of all the gods, of yakṣas and the rest, has been explained.

Now I shall also explain the Later-than-Later rite of this.
On the summit of a supreme mountain draw the maṇḍala of Many Pretas.
Having drawn the preta maṇḍala, offer a torma of meat to all.
With a companion brave of mind, endowed with good qualities and grateful, set down a painting drawn on a corpse's shroud, and then, from all of one's own limbs draw blood with bones and place it in a human skull cup.
With whatever blood the body yields, using brushes of a corpse's hair, one should then make its body and its eyes stand out vividly.
At that time obstructors will be many.
Then the Hero has declared:
the heroes should also perform the rite, and after that the heroes offer a fee to the artisan.
Proceeding properly
until it is fully complete, at the last, if Ekavīra in the painting blazes brightly at night, or else laughs or moves, then accomplishment is said to be attained.
By taking up that painting
he will without doubt fly up into the sky.
Glorious, he goes unobstructed;
at night he blazes like the sun.
Through this practice of the heroes he goes at the head of all vidyādharas.
To that accomplished one even the gods will without doubt bow down.

Of all the vidyādharas
he becomes the king honored by all.
Or else the king who knows the rite takes the peaceful painting as before and places it upon a cremated corpse.
Then, sitting at that cremation, alone and holding a sword,
at night he recites Yamāntaka, until it blazes,
or until smoke or heat arises.
If it blazes, glorious,
he becomes a vidyādhara.
If smoke arises, invisible,
he becomes supreme among those who go through the sky.
If at that time it becomes hot,
he will surely become a king of the earth.
The supreme sword to be made is an auspicious thirty-two finger-widths, complete in all its parts, and is to be finished on a whetstone.
Thus the Later rite too has been well explained in brief.
With the fingers of the right hand concealing the thumb, raised upward: this mudrā
is proclaimed as "the Club."
With the mantra of hā alone one should bind it for all rites:
for inviting and for offering,
for requesting departure and requesting to remain,
at the times of performing rites, and whenever else a need arises.
Having properly bound this mudrā,
one recites the deity Yamāntaka.
If the mantrin goes before a king,
bows his head and kneels,
the king, together with his person and his wealth, is without doubt quickly won over.

From the Later of the Later of all, of the great tantra of Krodhavijaya, the detailed root rite of Mañjuśrī: the seventeenth chapter of the tantra that clarifies the secret, the clear exposition of the Blessed One Mañjuśrī Yamāntaka, the detailed Later-than-Later rite of Krodhavijaya.

oṃ ā krodhe ka ya mānta ka hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ svā hā This too is another mantra of the Blessed One. oṃ āḥ hūṃ This too is likewise.

By reciting that very king of eleven syllables one becomes accomplished.
This Root, the Later, and likewise the Later-than-Later
of Krodhavijaya,
the rites extensive and complete, having been well heard by those gods, all of them, worldly and beyond the world, joined their palms
and said this to Krodhavijaya, to Yamāntaka:
"Blessed One, you have explained this rite most wondrously
for the benefit of practitioners.
Through recitation, homa, offerings and the rest, through the observance of the great Wrathful One, likewise through fierce austerity and fasting as it has been taught, the wrathful Kīlikīla
and the others too, when the time has come, grant accomplishment to one who recites mantra.
What then is there that sets the Blessed One's rite apart?
Therefore, tell us of the supreme accomplishment that comes of itself, independently, without recitation, fire offering, fasting, observance or austerity." When all those supreme gods had bowed and spoken thus,

the Wrathful One, laughing fiercely, spoke in exceedingly fierce words.
With a smiling face of fierce laughter, to the hosts of gods, terrified and bewildered, he said, "Fear not, fear not,"
and having revived them with helpful words, he said:
"What you have asked,
how even without the practice one is accomplished by knowing the method: listen, all you gods!
From the single accomplishment of the Sugata come many different kinds of delight.
Then, by way of meditative absorption, the signs and that accomplishment:
first, relying on awakening as the root, meditate also on wisdom of that kind;
and with a mind free of conceptual thought one attains those accomplishments of the Sugata.
Make that become my form:
the seed, endowed with many weapons, transformed into that Wrathful One's six faces, sending forth the sound of jingling bells, endowed with wrathful faces;
make it possess his splendor and might,
endowed with the essence of utter joy.
Whatever anyone meditates on in his mind, my heart being moved toward it, in whatever way or wherever it may be,
in front or else behind,
he becomes accomplished, able to perform every rite.
I have fifty arms,
and threaten, brandishing the club, trident, sword, axe, hook, skull cup, spear and skull-topped staff.
Of these, six arms in threes:
in the right, club, arrow and sword;
in the left he holds wheel, vajra and one-pronged vajra. He is six-eyed, his brow furrowed,

with a gaze of wrathful frowning;
his upper body is wrapped in terrifying snakes,
he is adorned with skulls,
his color like a blue rain cloud, with one face and uneven eyes, roaring with a voice like thunder, delighting in wearing a garment of tiger skin;
his weapons, all of them, are blazing;
his eyes and topknot are reddish yellow;
his two legs are set in a striding stance;
upon the earth he glares as if to devour, his face with fangs bared, riding as his mount a buffalo.
If the practitioner imagines him, or draws him in a painting, and swiftly worships him, then I, delighted,
will swiftly turn to him and appear, and whatever aims he desires
I bring about without doubt.
This subjugating form is proclaimed to be victory over Māra.
First one should oneself confer the pledge, and having properly made the supreme protection, on a cloth thirty finger-widths in measure the mantrin, with an artisan of good qualities, in order to keep the mind steadfast, in a secluded place, out of sight, with fine and pure pigments should first draw the painting.
Once it is finished, keep it in seclusion;
never show it to anyone at all.
Make it become my form, the seed endowed with excellent weapons;
my face becomes wrathful, with the sound of jingling bells;

the wrathful face is to be imagined;
make it possess my splendor and might,
endowed with the essence of utter joy.
If a person who does not hold the pledges sees that painting,
he will swiftly go mad.
Therefore, in every way, always keep a strong protection.
If it is set up in a village or a town, or placed in some other way, or if worship is not first performed, fear will swiftly arise.
The form that abides in the painting, being constantly familiarized in this way, is transformed and comes to dwell in one's mind.
When, through familiarization, it is seen as always abiding before one,
then even without the painting,
in just that same manner, having constantly applied oneself, through constancy in that very application, constantly applying the Wrathful One, one performs all rites by that.
This is the teaching of the secret.
Or else, if one meditates well in the mind on oneself as being like him until one is accomplished, then, abiding as his very being,
whatever one thinks of in the mind, if one familiarizes oneself with that thing, it will bear its fruit.
For by meditating on the Wrathful One, if one meditates on the Wrathful One fully, even without recitation and the rest one will attain the supreme accomplishment.
If one is to confer

the pledges on practitioners, then, having thoroughly cleansed the ground, first sprinkle it with scented water.
This maṇḍala, called All-Round, should be drawn separately, entirely circular.
Draw it well in black pigment, with its door facing west, about two cubits across.
In its center draw the supreme one:
his body majestic and graceful, the color of rain clouds and of bees, soft and supple, glorious,
with the sound of golden bells, fanned with yak-tail whisks;
and the excellent great buffalo, like a mountain of collyrium.
Having drawn that excellent maṇḍala and made the protection according to the rite, the worship that the knower of mantra performs is explained here according to the rite:
inviting and offering a seat, worshiping with guest water and torma, presenting lamps and incense, and at the end, requesting departure."

In setting out the forms, at the beginning, the deities to be set out are generated from syllables;
this is properly explained by way of the seeds.
Of these, first of all, the seed is the form of the Wrathful One;
that itself is widely renowned.
The single one, supreme with many weapons, who is to be relied upon there, ever making his weapons blaze:
in this form of his, the single one,
are the faces roused by the seeds.
With the six seeds of the bell imagine them resounding like those sounds.

These, it is said, are the Wrathful One's faces.
This is the primordial form.
What his power is like is also properly explained here.
By merely calling him to mind, the armies of Māra, vicious grahas and the rest, their might and strength broken by harm, become terrified and dismayed.
Joined with the two words "Seize!",
his mouth gaping and blazing,
the heart mantra is to be set down purely,
he who has the might to strike with weapons.
Thus the form of the Wrathful Victor: knowing the reality of the mantra that is called the seed, the mantrin will attain accomplishment.
Merely by hurling the weapon one should protect him on every side.
In the manner in which the seeds are arranged, one should apply them to one's own body.
Placing form upon form, hold those very weapons in the hand;
place the seeds in the mouth as well, and set the two feet in the striding stance.
Then, utterly wrathful, one should set out one's own seed.
First, undistracted,
having made protection for oneself in this way, invite him into the maṇḍala, and then make offerings before him.
At the end of the heart mantra, always joining the two words "Come here," one is said to perform the invitation.
With flowers, always say,
"Please be seated on this seat."

Having invited him in this way, with flowers as before,
with the two words "Be seated," request him to be seated according to the rite.
This is the teaching on seating
the King of Wrathful Ones.
Having seated him in this way with flowers empowered by mantra, and having said at the end of the words,
"Accept this guest water," one should offer him the guest water mixed with scented water and flowers.
Having said, "Please accept these flowers that I offer," offer as before the flowers sprinkled with fine scented water.
At the end of the words the mantrin always says, "Please accept this torma that I offer," and should offer tormas of many kinds.
"Please accept this lamp that I offer,"
he says at the end,
and should offer lamps
well filled with ghee.
"Please accept this incense that I offer,"
he says at the end,
and should offer incense and infusions of five kinds, empowered with mantra.
Having made offerings there, in the maṇḍala or in the painting, when the arrangement of one's own limbs is shown to one who holds the pledges, merely by seeing it
he becomes a vidyādhara who holds the pledges.
Then he will swiftly perform the rites that are taught in the ritual.
Having thus performed well the worship of the King of Wrathful Ones, the practitioner, undistracted, reciting the mantra, requests him to depart.

To make him depart,
he speaks the two words "Depart again";
and filling his cupped hands with flowers, he bows and requests him to depart.
Either use the maṇḍala, or recite the secret mantra.
Then another mudrā,
the single Blazing One, is explained, by which the deity
called Yamāntaka is accomplished.
With the fingers of the right hand concealing the thumb, raised
upward: this mudrā
is renowned as "the Club."
With the deity's own mantra
one should bind it for all rites:
for inviting and for offering,
for requesting departure and requesting to remain,
at the times of performing rites,
and whenever else an assault arises.
Having properly bound this mudrā,
one recites the deity Yamāntaka.
If the mantrin goes before a king,
bows his head and kneels,
the king without doubt comes under his power, with his person and his wealth.

From the Later of the Later of all the root rites of Mañjuśrī, the great tantra of Krodhavijaya: the eighteenth chapter of the secret, the Later-than-Later rite of the king, Krodhavijaya, the Blessed One Yamāntaka. It is complete.

ma mai mā mi mu mū mu
mu mi mā mai ma: the syllables in pairs,
the first and the last as one pair.
By the distinctions of pairing and interlacing, the way to join them is explained here.

Place what is called the seed in the center,
and the wrathful ones each separately.
In this phrase of the paired and the unpaired, the last is not a pair.
In this phrase of pair with pair,
he he ha ha hi hi hi hi ha ha he he, joined twice;
with the words of the Great Wrathful One at the beginning, set down oṃ oṃ svā hā and "homage."
One who desires increase, joyfully, should always recite one session at each watch.
This rite of constant worship, through accomplishing the painting according to the rite,
has been explained in brief.
Even without performing recitation, homa, observance and austerity, knowing this reality of the mantra, one should offer worship alone.
The mantrin who knows that worship of him is itself what always pleases
the King of Wrathful Ones will attain accomplishment.
The mantrin always thinking of him, always becoming one in nature with the mantra, always devoted to him in mind, always diligent in worship, always perceiving himself as the Wrathful One:
so that all rites may be accomplished, this concise rite has been explained.

From the root rite of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya: belonging to the secret rite, the first.

ma mai mā mi mu mū mu
mū mī ma mai: the syllables of ma.
By the distinctions of pairing and separating,
the first and the last as one pair:
how this wheel is to be applied,
as appropriate, is explained here.

Place what is called the seed in the maṇḍala,
and the wrathful ones each separately.
For subjugating, for sowing enmity, for killing, likewise for expelling and for pacifying, or else for increasing,
by pairing and interlacing it is swiftly accomplished.
The maṇḍala called the Wrathful One is placed in the center, each separately;
place the two words "Seize!" at the end, and "Bring so-and-so under control!"
Place the seed that has no weapon, and insert the word svā hā in between.
Having made an effigy of the one to be subdued, trample it with the foot;
the mantrin, standing upright,
should keep at it until his feet grow weary.
A king who has not come under control will swiftly come under his control.
Moving on from that first one, place them swiftly in their proper sequence.
At the place of the second seed, standing there and turning the face as well, place the two words of a single pair at the end, and at the end say, "May so-and-so's friend become hostile."
There is nothing more to proclaim.
The effigies of both who are to be subdued are made to perform a frightening act; together, with equal boldness, press the second down with the foot as well.
The mantra adept, remaining on it for about half a watch, then, just as the practitioner wishes, those two become enemies of one another.
By meditating on the Wrathful One in sequence, it comes about from doing it only once.
Moving on from that second seed with fierce strength,

the great Wrathful One with red-veined eyes stands at the third place, and by pressing down with the left foot presses down all the fierce and forceful ones.
Turning the face, the thighs and the back, the sound of ringing bells swiftly arises.
Afterward too, remain on this in sequence.
Separately, by the command of the Wrathful One's wheel, make the stance of the feet likewise, and turning the face slowly, whatever is the first seed, which is for subjugating, becomes one for increase.
Its edge as well, all together, blazes like fire.
If one wishes to accomplish the rites of all,
one should apply it very well.
Its rousing by the pair is said to be allowed either separately or together.
The power of the Wrathful One's wheel abides swiftly in the eighth.
In the manner of the previous sequence, rouse it with the seeds of enmity.
Rousing with the paired seed as well, to accomplish division at the eighth,
in order swiftly to reverse friendship, apply them in sequence according to the rite.
In the manner of the previous sequence, one who wishes to kill swiftly takes the Wrathful One's wheel position, the ninth, that of hostile sorcery.
By this rite, enemies are driven mad and then destroyed.
Even one whom the gods have hidden will be led before the executioner.
In the manner of the previous sequence,
at the position of the Wrathful One's wheel, abide in sequence at the tenth.

The fierce one fiercely presses down, and by its seed they are driven apart.
Reciting in sequence, as before, the blazing seed of before, one accomplishes the rite explained earlier.
Taking whichever is the eleventh in the sequence of the wheel, one should then rouse it with that seed of pacifying.
Rousing it as before,
one performs the rite as before.
What has been taught for pacifying should be applied for increasing.
In the sequence of the wheel's positions, at the supreme,
abiding at the twelfth,
one rouses its seed.
By imagining my might, strength and harm, by applying the paired seeds, the power of the seeds blazing, through the arrangement of the wheel one should accomplish the rites taught before.
Thus the wheel of the Wrathful One, extensive, together with its rites, together with the secret rousings:
all its applications have been explained.
Whatever is roused by the paired seed is well known as the second;
here that is the second seed, and it is said to bring swift accomplishment.
To all the final seeds always join the two words of offering.
In this phrase of pair with pair,
at the upper end and at the lower end.

If one knows in its proper sequence this teaching on the arrangement of the wheel, even without performing fire offering or recitation one attains the accomplishment of the King of Wrathful Ones.

As for the secret wheel of the Wrathful One, whoever applies it without knowing this will not attain this accomplishment;
he will swiftly fall into madness.
With the six syllables
ma mai ma mī mu mū, subjugating, sowing enmity, killing, expelling, pacifying and, last, increasing are to be accomplished by the wise.
By recitation on those very syllables one should rouse them in the same way.
These, as they have been taught,
if not accomplished thus, are accomplished in no other way.
mu mū mi ma mai mī,
and likewise ma at the end, for increase:
at the places of the wheel's spokes join these and those in pairs.
Likewise, inside the wheel, place the seed of the Wrathful One's supreme body, and at the end of the phrase set the ringing of the Wrathful One's bell.
Inside the wheel's rim speak the two words "Seize!"
The wise one, in the wheel's hub, abides in the seeds that have been arranged.
If one knows the wheel of the Wrathful One as proclaimed, the accomplishments
as they have been explained will be attained.
How accomplishment is properly attained, its application, I shall now explain.
First, having bound the mudrā, transforming body into body, into his body, seeing the rites as they should be,
one should perform the applications well.
Face, mouth, eyes and feet even,
the mind utterly clear and peaceful,

the heart likewise full of joy:
the mantra taught for bringing under control is accomplished in perfect evenness.
Set one foot short,
twist the face and the nape of the neck and press down, squeeze shut one side of the mouth and one eye, and making the stance of great pressing down, look with the eyes at the Club:
strive to subdue the one who is to be subdued.
One who wishes to divide people should set about dividing them.
Raising the second foot, set the stance back again;
frowning and binding the mudrā, gazing wrathfully, the mind wrathful too, exceedingly bold and firm, bending deeply to press down with strength, the mantrin, abiding in the mantra mode as before, should destroy whomever he wishes.
For that, one foot
is set stretched out fiercely, standing in a crouching posture, the face too should be frowning and askew, and with the forefinger raised and brandished and the mudrās of the Club, one threatens.
If one wishes to expel enemies, they will swiftly be expelled.
Then set the feet evenly, and hold the right hand high;
the bold one lowers the left.
If one wishes for pacification, there will be pacification.
Standing bent half low, making the stance with the right foot, if one concentrates, abiding in the mantra mode, one who wishes for increase will attain it.
Again, it should be known likewise;
there is nothing else to be done by reversing it.

Six stances in sequence have been taught for the great accomplished one.
The name of the first is Facing Aside;
the one after it, Facing Back; likewise the third stance is proclaimed as Great Wrathful One;
the fourth is with the forefinger raised;
the fifth is called Strength;
the sixth is called Great Strength.
These are proclaimed as the six stances.
By making the stances with openness, the enemy's retinues are mocked.
By becoming familiar with the supreme wheel one will attain great renown.
This tantra, taught and fully taught by the Great Wrathful One, is rare.
This Krodhavijaya
is rarer even than that.
This excellent secret rite bestows every accomplishment entirely; even rarer than that secret rite is this wheel.
There is no need at all for homa and recitation,
no need to do the approach beforehand, no need for the observance of the King of Wrathful Ones or for fierce austerity, no need even for the application of meditative concentration:
for one who has the wheel alone, of the accomplishments that have been taught, accomplishment is attained at once.
Therefore, keeping this secret, the practitioner who accomplishes everything should accomplish very well whatever supreme aim he himself desires.

From the root rite of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya: belonging to the secret rite, the second.

The accomplishments of the King of Wrathful Ones are various, unobstructed and diverse.
If the mantrin wishes, and performs first the supreme rite, he attains accomplishment.
Of this most secret mantra, for now its characteristics, and other matters, will be explained here.
The rites of it that have been taught, and those that will be accomplished later, all that has been taught of Ekavīra alone,
all of that I shall explain.

Through that mantra all rites are performed; whatever accomplishments are taught in the tantra are accomplished through the power of Ekavīra as well.
Oṃ is its beginning;
it is the pledge (samaya) of the Sugata.
The first and the second as well, in the manner of being crowned by the fierce stacked letter, of the kind pressed down by the anusvāra circle:
arranging the letters of the mantra in a string, the heart of the King of Wrathful Ones, which makes all mantras shine forth, those three should then be joined.
Then the body of the King of Wrathful Ones is shown beneath it.
The mantrin, marked by all the mantras, should always know them.
With the unobstructed mantras, all those of the great being,
all the rites such as protection should be done in the sequence explained.
Having made protection with this great being of all, in a very secluded place, as before, the image, for the supreme aim, as elsewhere, should be worshipped according to the rite,

just as the rite was taught earlier.
Each day worship it with garlands of flowers over which recitation has been made seven times.
Having worshipped, offer red karavīra flowers in full bloom,
one hundred and eight in number, casting them so that they strike, for the sake of a son.
If this rite is performed at the three times of day for one month,
the Wrathful One becomes directly present and grants accomplishment in a dream.
If this rite is first performed in this way, whatever purposes one desires are then accomplished without doubt.
Its supreme rite has been explained.
When one has thus done the approach practice for one month, the rites for human ends that are to be done, their procedures, in brief,
I shall now explain well.
Then poison of three kinds, the moving and the compounded, grahas and bhūta grahas, together with mahoragas and rākṣasas, it destroys.
With the mantra of the mudrā one has formed, applying it once, one protects oneself.
Even by merely calling it to mind, one is honored by others as well.
Quartan fever and the rest, too, are quickly removed by hearing it.
For the grahas of mothers and of children, ash, or else earth, will do:
having thought of oneself as pure, and applying it as one wishes, whatever needed aims one desires, by meditating, one brings them about;
by calling it to mind, they are freed.
With a stone over which recitation has been made three times, sea monsters, kumbhīras and other fanged creatures scatter in all directions, and it becomes the best means of clearing the waters.

If one recites it in the mind while traveling,
there is no fear of thieves on the road;
there will be no fear of lions, tigers and enemies, nor of disease.
Even when going before a king,
if one binds the crown of one's head with the mantra, the angry king will very quickly stretch out his hands and join his palms.
In quarrels and in gambling, in danger from weapons and from fire, if one remembers it in the mind and recites it, one will be freed from every misfortune.
To pacify all harm,
for one who has fallen into misery and distress, if this mantra is quickly remembered and recited, the clouds can be pressed down, and quickly turned back again, as one wishes.
Falling thunderbolts and hail, too, are pacified by the mudrā of the staff.
With that very mudrā bound,
one should bring down the clouds with the mind.
Having threatened them thus with the mudrā, one should knit the brows.
By these very means thunderbolts and hail are to be cut off.
One skilled in the application can cut off the rain as well, as one wishes.
If one puts on a blue garment, makes protection all around,
enters the water up to the throat, and recites well for three days, Śakra (Indra) gathers the clouds and sends down rain as one wishes.
Then rain from the great clouds will cover the face of the earth.

If one faces the sun and recites constantly every day, the illnesses of oneself and likewise of others will then disappear.
One may also bring a king under control:
from good white mustard seed make a fine effigy,
sit upon its form,
and if, naming the person, one recites well for seven days,
by this rite he quickly comes under control like a servant.
By fasting for one day, śūdras come under control.
Likewise, fasting for two days and reciting, vaiśyas, as one wishes;
by doing it for three days, kṣatriyas;
by four days, brahmins.
If one performs it according to the rite of recitation, they come under control as one wishes.
From all kinds of grain and husks, a boy or a girl, whichever it may be,
if one likewise makes an effigy, a śūdra in a single night will be made utterly terrified.
For a vaiśya, in two days, sitting squatting upon it,
one likewise separates him from his friends.
In three and four days and nights, kṣatriyas and brahmins.

It is to be done by the rite exactly as it was taught, and not otherwise.
An effigy of anyone whatsoever should be drawn well, as before, with good charcoal from a charnel ground.

Then, having recited the mantra a thousand times over a peg of khadira wood, one should afterward drive it into the body.
Naming that enemy
and becoming wrathful toward him, one then sits upon his heart, drives in the peg and recites.
Holding it with the hand, if one does this at the three times of day for three days, wherever the enemy has been struck, struck there by fierce stabbing pains, unable to move, he falls to the ground, and once seven days have passed he dies.
Going to the abode of the mātṛkās, one should bind the mudrā of the club with the hand, threaten with the forefinger of the left hand, and, after the sun has set, wrathfully name the enemy and recite.
Then the enemy is seized by female grahas, and through various kinds of conduct they bring about his death.
Then the practitioner, by the rite of pacification, should pacify him from that.
Sitting before the mātṛkās, one skilled in the rite of pacification, with senses restrained and a contented mind, recites for three days and nights;
then for him that rite
will be pacified, without doubt.
Facing toward the sun,
smearing the enemy's head with the hand, naming the enemy and pressing down, if one recites until the sun has set,
his brain will become painful, and gravely so, ending in death.
Then, joining the palms, one should recite by day and pacify it.

Standing on the ground on one leg, by day stretching the arms upward, displeased and wrathful, one recites, naming the enemy as one wishes; then, right at sunset, the enemy becomes unhappy and crazed, abandons his kinsmen and friends, and then goes off to another place.
If one wishes here to pacify him, or else to bring increase,
one should keep clean, put on white clothes, at ease, steady and unmoving, make fine offerings,
bow to the Tathāgata,
drink milk and recite
until it is pacified.
Thus these various rites, together with their applications, have been explained at length.
Following the procedure of the ritual manual, accomplish well even what has not been taught.

From the root rite of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya: belonging to the secret rite, the third.

Then, further, this excellent, extensive maṇḍala of Hela, than which there is nothing more excellent,
I shall explain as is fitting.
What was spoken first as he is the seed of urging in all.
It is taking and holding,
urging swiftly to the rite.
Therefore, for first urging and for seizing according to the aim, the Hela wheel of the King of Wrathful Ones is shown in due order.
he he ha ha hi hi hi
hi ha ha he he, joined in pairs, are joined first with the words "Great Wrathful One";

the word "seize!" is the second.
The six pairs are set at the end of the wheel.
In the spaces of the rims and spokes one each arising from the mantra is placed.
All aims will be accomplished.
The mantras taught as twelve,
however they are arranged in their places, however they are uttered, and wherever they dwell, should be applied to their respective rites.
Then this arrangement of them,
the gathering of the mantras, is explained properly.
Within it there are three rims, with an excellent central rim, the six rims of the periphery, and the six most excellent corners of the spokes.
In a very secluded place, free of bustle, having drawn it well according to the rite, one applies them in their places, and applies them in their sequence.
In its interstices, or clearly, these mantras should be gathered.
In the center, the heart of the Tathāgata, the supreme utterance of the name, is placed, and in its places the mantras that bring accomplishment are set.
Dwelling in the two rims, the heart of the Wrathful One should be placed.
It is pressed down by the feet of the Wrathful One, and the sound of a ringing bell is proclaimed.
Trodden by the feet of the Wrathful One, the spokes are endowed with the power of the wrathful ones;
the center is endowed with the pure heart, blazing and made certain,
as far as the three rims:
all aims, every one, are accomplished.
he he ha ha hi hi hi hi ha ha he he, joined in pairs.

From the middle of the words "Great Wrathful One," the held seeds are placed outside;
first the words of urging are set.
Urged on by many wrathful ones, for the accomplishment of all aims everywhere, they dwell there.
Outside the wheel made in this way Amṛtakuṇḍalin is placed.
At the end of the arranged words of urging the other wrathful ones should be arranged.
Then, further, in due order,
in order to set out the great wrathful ones, these twelve that urge
I shall explain properly.
First, the King of Wrathful Ones has said: he is called Great Garland of Flames.
Vajra King of Fire is set,
and Most Fierce Force is set.
Most Fierce, of Great Strength, the Vast Wrathful One, is the fifth.
The sixth is the Invincible (Aparājita).
The one called Terrifier makes the seventh wrathful one.
At the corner the eighth wrathful one is renowned;
likewise Deliverer from Want is the ninth; Utter Crusher is the tenth.
Likewise Kīlikīla is set,
and with Great Kīlikīla they are taught as twelve.
These twelve that are counted, wrathful ones that make things shine forth, are pressed down on all sides by the King of Wrathful Ones.
All are taught in due order.
They are placed dwelling outside the wheel, blazing, endowed with fierce power.
Placed once all have been shown,
the Great Wrathful One who makes things shine forth, of great might and endowed with strength, is in every case Amṛtakuṇḍalin.

The former seeds, the endless ones, should be given the six vowel hooks, marked above with the anusvāra circle:
this is the seed of Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
The first dwells alone in the maṇḍala;
together with its dots it accomplishes all aims.
At the end of the mantra of the Blazing One it is proclaimed by the one with the garland of flames.
Whatever is the second seed likewise dwells together with its dots.
It is called Vajra King of Fire, the wrathful one who accomplishes all aims.

The first seed that was taught, too, is joined with its dots as before:
greatly renowned as Most Fierce Force, the King of Wrathful Ones appears as the Wrathful One.
From the sequence of the illuminating wrathful ones, with fierce dots, likewise, the Great Wrathful One:
he is said to be the one of Great Strength.
Second, the wheel ending with dots:
the one taught as the Vast Wrathful One is renowned as the heart as well, with the dots of the chief, the Invincible.
Its three, together with dots,
are likewise proclaimed.
Called Terrifier, exceedingly great, this wrath is the wrathful one that illuminates.
In the sequence of the Vast One,
the fourth is fully proclaimed:
with its dots, utterly fierce,
the wrathful one is likewise set at the corner.
That is its fifth seed:
the one called Great Garland of Flames, likewise together with its dots,

is called the wrathful Deliverer from Want.
The five are the Vast One itself, proclaimed together with their dots.
The one proclaimed as Utter Crusher is the wrathful one of the wrathful ones who illuminates.
From the former seeds, the endless ones, the former is likewise set with its dots:
the one called Kīlikīla fully bestows every accomplishment.
Likewise its very seed is explained here, likewise with its dots:
that Great Kīlikīla
is the wrathful one of the wrathful ones who illuminates.
Those kings of the wrathful ones are proclaimed by these seeds.
Through the application of the King of Wrathful Ones, it is proclaimed, they make things shine forth greatly.
Dwelling by the wheel of the King of Wrathful Ones, he is said to be Yamāntaka.
First that wheel is shown,
with the Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin; and other than that King of Wrathful Ones is the lord of the wrathful ones who illuminates.
Thus, wherever those three wrathful ones are applied,
there the mantras,
being urgers, likewise urge.
One who knows the rite should earnestly accomplish whatever he desires.
One endowed with meditation on the Wrathful One, having fully meditated on the Hela wheel, even though he has not undertaken what is hard and cannot otherwise be accomplished, the observances, fire offerings and the rest, if he knows how to set out the mantras, he accomplishes.
One who knows the way of the Hela wheel, even without having undergone hardships, quickly succeeds, without doubt.

One who practices observances, fire offerings and meditative concentration, austerities as they have been taught, striving intently, a person of faith,
who has done the approach practice twelve times, performs the rites taught in the ritual manual, showing great marvels.
By knowing the way of the Hela wheel, before long there is bliss.
If one is endowed with meditation on the Wrathful One and dwells in the place of the Hela wheel, one will, all at once, even the three realms swiftly and unobstructedly set shaking.
Therefore, with the utmost diligence, having made meditation on the Wrathful One habitual, one should become habituated through its applications to the mantra arising from the Hela wheel.
What was proclaimed first as the ritual manual of Krodhavijaya, its ritual manual explained as secret:
this rite is the supreme of secrets.
This proclamation of the wheel of the Wrathful One is a rite far more secret than that.
The explanation of the secret wheel of the Wrathful One illuminates greatly; and beyond that, too, this proclamation of the Hela wheel is the supreme of the utterly secret.
Among all these ritual manuals it is explained as the utterly secret.
As for the utterly secret ritual manual, in all of these in every way, a wheel like the Hela wheel has not arisen and will not arise hereafter.
Whoever, having heard the meaning of this, cultivates the accomplishment of the Wrathful One, even without making effort, finds nothing in the world hard to accomplish.

Dwelling in the place of the Hela wheel for as long as one wishes, fully endowed with meditation on the Wrathful One, abiding in the form of the Wrathful One, single-pointedly, the supreme of words bestows the supreme accomplishment.
One sees Mañjuśrī unobstructedly, in accordance with the meaning of the knowledge.

From the root rite of Mañjuśrī, Krodhavijaya: belonging to the secret rite, the fourth.

At the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "urge on!" are set.
At the end of the two words "urge on!"
comes the Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
The Great Wrathful One, the garland, and at the end of this Amṛtakuṇḍalin, first of all shaking,
by one who knows the mantra, in the interstices or beautifully, dwelling in the Hela wheel,
and sitting in the first place,
one binds the mudrā of the club once.
Then reciting the mantra of the Wrathful One,
the mantrin, standing upright,
shifting his two feet,
with his mind wholly intent on this meditation on the Wrathful One, continues until this earth trembles greatly,
or until the mountains shake.
Then, by accomplishing the wheel, one goes to the second place, dwelling at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One," and empowers it with "dry up!" Having set those words first,
at its end comes Amṛtakuṇḍalin;
likewise at the end of Amṛtakuṇḍalin, the mantra of the Vajra King of Fire, greatly shaking and beautiful, abides in the interstices or clearly.

Having bound the mudrā of the club,
meditating on the Wrathful One, one recites the mantra.
By this method of thorough application, lakes, great ponds and great rivers are swiftly dried up through wrath, and even flowing waters are made to run upward.
One should set out the letters of the mantra of the Wrathful One of great might, possessed of suppression, pressing down all the spokes in sequence.
Moving on from those two,
one then sits in the third place,
and, possessed of might, suppresses them in sequence.
At the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "drive out!" urge.
Having set it out as before,
at its end comes Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
At the end of the Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin
Most Fierce Force is set.
The Wrathful One of clear terrifying abides in the interstices or in the approach.
Even if rutting elephants in their fury should come straight toward one, they are terrified at once, and wholly abandon even their rutting fury; turning back, wheeling round this way and that, they go off as if unhappy.
That king of elephants, though in rut, finds no ease and is brought low.
Such is the procedure of the rite of practice meditating on the Wrathful One.

Dwelling also in the fourth place of what is called the Hela wheel,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "press down!" urge.

Then, by the rite explained before,
Amṛtakuṇḍalin should be set.
At the end of that Amṛtakuṇḍalin the Great Wrathful One of Great Strength is set.
By the beautiful posture of complete binding, one presses them into immobility.
An army, or else elephants, or boats, or else chariots, horses, camels, sheep and the like:
doing as in the way of meditating on the Wrathful One,
and dwelling in that application, one will have pressed them down completely.
Then, dwelling in the fifth of the wheel called Hela,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
one sets the two words "stir up! stir up!"
The Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin, too, is set in the place of the final words.
The one called the Vast Wrathful One should be made to blaze intensely.
The Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin, too:
by the supreme posture called Utterly Agitated, swiftly one should throw the enemy armies into complete confusion against one another.
Then, dwelling in the sixth row of the Hela wheel,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "be deluded!" urge.
The Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin, too, is set at the very end of the words.
The Wrathful One, the Invincible, urges as in the former rite.
Having urged intensely, according to the rite, with the deluding posture, beings are swiftly deluded,
as though they were figures in a painting.

Then, here in the Hela wheel, dwelling in the seventh row,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
one sets the two words "roar! roar!"
By the Wrathful One who seizes, Amṛtakuṇḍalin is urged.
Roaring with a terrifying sound, by the swift posture of the Wrathful One, even out of season the sky is covered with clouds, and then rain falls as one wishes.
Then, dwelling in the eighth row of the spokes of the Hela wheel, here, as before,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One," having set the two seeds he he, below them comes Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
Likewise the Wrathful One of the corner is set at the end of Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
With the Wrathful One's posture of the open mouth, called Supreme, swiftly, in a stance with one leg raised, frost, hail, wind and the like,
in season or else out of season, the practitioner meditating on the Wrathful One, by the mantra of the Wrathful One, properly, brings down upon the face of the earth.
Having left the eighth place on the Hela wheel as ground for the practice, the clear words of the Wrathful One's seed dwell in the excellent ninth:
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "raise up!" urge.
At the end of the Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin
Deliverer from Want is set.
Having assumed the clear posture made beautiful by meditation on the Wrathful One, one recites the Wrathful One Yamāntaka, made clear by the Wrathful One's own words.

With the excellent hūṃ, having meditated on the Wrathful One as real, one bends the tops and branches of trees, or else uproots great trees, makes flowers and fruits fall, or else makes them shake as one wishes;
even great trees
become immobile, as one wishes.
Dwelling in the tenth spoke
of the wheel called Hela,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
the two words "crush!" urge.
The Great Wrathful One, Utter Crusher, should be set as before
at the end of the Wrathful One Amṛtakuṇḍalin.
One assumes the terrifying posture.
The summits of great mountains, and gates and iron chains:
if one meditates as before on the King of Wrathful Ones, it brings about the most supreme accomplishment.
Dwelling in the eleventh spoke of the wheel of Hela,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
one urges with the words "crumble!"
By the Wrathful One Kīlikīla Amṛtakuṇḍalin is to be urged, standing at the very end of the words, just as explained according to the rite.
The one called Kīlikīla
likewise abides in the supreme posture.
One binds the mudrā of the club.
Meditation on Yamāntaka makes even a firmly rooted jewel crumble from its summit downward, or else fells the sturdy trees that grow on mountainsides.

Then, dwelling in the twelfth spoke of the Hela wheel,
at the end of the words "Great Wrathful One"
one urges with the words "enter!" Having urged, at its end
Amṛtakuṇḍalin should be set.
The Great Wrathful One Kīlikīla should be set at its end.
One likewise assumes the posture called Great Kīlikīla.
Having bound the mudrā of the club,
if one thoroughly habituates the mind to the Great Wrathful One Yamāntaka, walls, dry wood, stones and the like, if they fall, are lifted out and stay in the sky;
and having risen into the sky, they are made to fall as one wishes.
This marvel arises of itself;
this has happened in the three times before.
Other practices, too, as before, are said to be done by meditating on the Wrathful One.
The setting out of the Hela wheel is explained to be utterly secret.
If one knows it together with its secrets and with its applications, one will attain accomplishment.
Then, further, as is fitting, the applications of the twelve postures I shall now explain thoroughly, in brief and in extensive ways.
Shaking All Around is the first;
likewise Shaking Intensely is explained; Terrifying is the third;
the fourth is Binding All Around;
the fifth is called Utterly Agitated; likewise Deluding is the sixth;
the Swift posture abides there;
Open-Mouthed is explained as the eighth;

the ninth is called Beautiful; Terrifier is the tenth;
with the one called Kīlikīla and Great Kīlikīla,
the postures of the Wrathful One are twelve.
These are explained in sequence.
First, by the step of threatening, one should be endowed with the mudrā of the club.
Afterward, the mantrins should know their own form just as it is.
One's own form, too, abiding in itself, threatening, assuming a posture and so on:
the terrifying mouth is deep,
the Wrathful One's gaze, the face transformed, the feet set apart:
these are explained as the characteristics of the posture.
Swiftly set one leg raised,
make the face and neck crooked, knit the terrifying wrathful frown, threaten with a single finger of the left hand, assume the posture and brandish the club;
face, thigh and left leg:
this is called Shaking All Around, the Wrathful One's posture, together with pride.
The step of Shaking All Around has been taught; the one called Shaking Intensely is slightly lowered in the middle.

Shaking Intensely should be examined.
Likewise, stretching out the arms,
spreading the left leg,
and fiercely clapping the two hands:
this, likewise, is explained as Terrifying.
The gaze is fixed upon the club, the right leg clearly raised:
that is explained as Binding All Around.
One threatens with the forefinger of the left hand;

with the arm raised, as with the left,
the eyes are fixed on the single finger, and the right leg is raised:
this is called Agitating All Around.
Spreading the left leg,
raising it and turning toward the left side, brandishing the club with outstretched arm, with a single threat one deludes.
The one called the Swift posture is that same one, slapping the arms and threatening.
From that same one, opening the mouth, is proclaimed as Open-Mouthed.
With a swaying motion one turns four times, assuming a stance of great might,
pressing the corners of the lips with the teeth, raising the hand and threatening, with pride, and uttering a sound as well, proclaiming the terrifying hūṃ:
the posture well explained here is the Beautiful Wrathful One's pressing down.
One should turn about forcefully, plant the right foot and press down, fiercely clap both hands,
and having done so, terrify:
explained likewise as being with pride, this posture of the great being is called Terrifier,
constantly meditating on the Wrathful One.
One sits with the feet placed evenly, the right raised a little;
the glorious one lowers the left, threatens with a single finger of the left, lifts the arm and brandishes the club;
with the feet, the face is turned:
constantly meditating on the Wrathful One,
this is called Kīlikīla.
Great Kīlikīla

is that same one, looking backward, the Wrathful One closing one eye, and swiftly assuming the stance of worship.
This is the application of the postures, and how, in brief, they are set out from the sequence of the spokes of the Hela wheel:
this is the good explanation.
By the power of the mantra of the Hela wheel and by the power and delight of the right posture, rites that are utterly marvelous, the rites just as they were taught, are to be done.
If one knows those accomplishments, the secret tantra, and this Hela wheel,
one becomes one with the Wrathful One in reality, and so will act in the language of the Wrathful One.
This ritual manual, together with its secrets, is explained as the supreme secret essence.
Than this ritual manual of the King of Wrathful Ones there is nothing else more supreme.
Having heard, from Krodhavijaya, this latest of the later ritual manuals, which is called the Utterly Secret, and meditating on the secret meaning, all those gods rejoiced, bowed to the Supreme Wrathful One, and became supremely joyful.

Belonging to the secret rite, the fifth: the chapter of rejoicing in the Blessed One Mañjuśrī Yamāntaka, the twenty-second.

The secret tantra, the King of Ritual Manuals of the Wrathful One Trailokyavijaya, is complete.

Translator's Notes

• The maṇḍala is named first □□□□□□□□□□□□ ("Many Pretas") and then □□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the Great Host of Pretas"); both are translated literally, as no Sanskrit form can be confirmed. In the list of sites, the line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is obscure; "a cattle pen not trampled down" is a tentative reading.
• "Cudgel" renders □□□□□□, the club-like implement drawn in the corners and also the name of a mudrā. The adverb □□□□□□ describing how the corpses are drawn is obscure; "starkly" is a tentative rendering. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as rites concerning kings (mi'i rgyal po), which is uncertain. □□□□□□□□ is an unclear term, tentatively rendered "outer tormas" from its placement outside the maṇḍala. □□□□□□ is taken as the fontanelle, one of the body places where parts of the mantra are installed alongside heart, crown, crest, armor and weapon.

• "Cudgel" renders □□□□□□, a club or staff, used both for the implement drawn in the maṇḍala and for the mudrā. □□□□□□□□ is rendered "outer tormas," following the previous passage, where these tormas are given outside the maṇḍala; the term is uncertain. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ could also mean "always draw many pretas"; it is taken here as naming the Many Pretas maṇḍala, as in the torma mantra's label just before. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered Ekavīra, matching ekabīra in the mantras.

• The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is unclear; it is taken as the cudgels drawn with the wrathful one set between them. □□□□□□□□□, "great beasts," may be cattle, or may echo Sanskrit mahāpaśu, a term that in some tantric contexts denotes a human victim; it is rendered literally. The adverb □□□, applied to the many pretas drawn in the maṇḍala, is obscure and is tentatively rendered "starkly," as earlier. □□□□□□□□ is rendered "outer tormas," as in the preceding passages.

• Many of the short urging formulas here are given piecemeal within the verse; each Sanskrit element is transcribed as written. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ after the ha ha hā hā baitāli hūṃ phaṭ formula is taken as "so one should do it oneself"; the phrase is terse. □□□□□□□□, "the lords of beings," stands in a line one syllable short and may be defective. "The great flesh" (□□□□□, Skt. mahāmāṃsa) conventionally denotes human flesh. The "Ha Ha" maṇḍala (□□□□□□□□□□□□, literally "become 'ha ha'") may allude to laughter (cf. Aṭṭahāsa), but the name is kept as written. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ could also mean simply "the arrangement of many pretas."

• □□□□□ (in "incense, all of it impure") is taken in its sense of ritual impurity; this may also bear on the term □□□□□□□□ rendered "outer tormas" in earlier passages. □□□□□□□, "great fat," conventionally means human fat. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ reads □□□ ("draw"), which does not fit; since the next line announces "a third practice," the evident reading is □□□□ ("two"), and that is translated. The mantra's hanamtha and bundha are transcribed as written.

• The line listing "subjugating and compelling" reads literally "subjugating and doing/making"; the second term is taken as making others act, but its exact technical sense is uncertain. "Without pennants" renders 'phan med pa literally; the sense of this qualifier of the handle is unclear. In "warmth, smoke, and blazing" the text reads dud 'thul, taken as an evident slip for dud pa, "smoke," in light of the following verses. The line rendered "with the splendor of a great being" (sems can chen po de yi gzis) is obscure. Ganaka (ga na ka) and śarapuṅkhā (sha ra bu ka) are tentative identifications of ingredient names given in transliteration; mahānala and mohanī are likewise reconstructed from the transliterated forms. "Great fat" is the usual tantric code for human fat.

• "The top should be closed up well" renders rtse mo rab tu sbyar bar bya, whose exact sense is uncertain. The "leaves of a tree tossed by a whirlwind, those that float, together with what remains" is an uncertain rendering of an obscure ingredient line. In "whoever is touched by this powder," the text reads rig pa, taken as an evident slip for reg pa, "touched." The line "take earth from his footprint" is a syllable short in the Tibetan, and "earth" is supplied from context. Kanaka is probably datura; mālatī is jasmine; ariṣṭa is the soapnut tree. The text frames these destructive rites as permissible only against those who harm the Three Jewels and only for one with the mind of awakening, which it states explicitly.

• The plant names barahe, ricira, patra, keśinī, sukari, and balakata are given in transliteration because they cannot be identified with confidence; the line describing them as found "where perfect awakening abides" is literal and obscure. "Houses of bell metal" renders khang pa li ba, whose sense is uncertain. "The very essence of that vetāla" is taken to mean its heart mantra.

• "Brought low by sickness and by masters" renders nad dang gtso bos sma phab pa; the sense of gtso bo here is uncertain. "Without attachment" renders brtse ldan ma yin, literally "not affectionate." The closing summary lines on the noose rites are elliptical in the Tibetan and are rendered closely.
• "For the purpose of the rite" renders bu don cho ga, literally "the rite for the sake of a son"; the sense is uncertain. "Fontanelle" takes mtshog ma in that sense. The implement called se ral kha could not be identified with confidence and is left in Tibetan form. "A fresh one" reads sar pa as gsar pa.
• "Pigments containing no glue" reads □□□□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□□□ (without glue), the evident sense; as written □□□□□ would mean "giving." The "threefold rite" (□□□□□□□□□□□□) is not further specified in this piece; it probably refers to the three stages just described (approach recitation, mountaintop recitation, and the observance). The final line is a volume marker of the Kangyur edition rather than part of the tantra.
• "Urmo iron" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is left as a name since the exact kind of iron or steel meant is uncertain. "Incense of śata wood" reads □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□ (incense); as written □□□□□□ ("lord") makes no sense here, and the identity of śata wood is itself uncertain. "Reciting eight times" (□□□□□□□□□□□) translates the text as written; a reading "a hundred" is possible but not attested here.
• "Eight hundred leagues" reads □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□□□□, the evident sense; as written □□□□□ ("adorned") does not fit. "Surrounded by their own mounts" takes □□□□□□ as a spelling of □□□□□□ (mount, vehicle); the line is obscure. In "undefeated" □□□□ has its ordinary sense of defeat in battle, not the monastic downfall.
• "Intensely hot" reads □□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□□□, the evident sense. "Human fat" renders □□□□□□□ (literally "great fat," Skt. mahāvasā), the standard tantric term for human fat. "The great arrow" renders □□□□□□□□□, probably the iron nārāca arrow.
• "During the waning fortnight" reads the obscure □□□□□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□, the evident sense in this ritual context; this is uncertain. "The Fair Goddess" translates □□□□□□□□□□□, a yakṣiṇī whose Sanskrit name could not be identified with confidence; in the quoted address the text has □□□□□□, taken as the same name. "Fragments" renders □□□□□□□, whose precise substance here is unclear. Kaṅraṅgi is given as the Tibetan transliterates the name (□□□□□□□□); its Sanskrit form is uncertain. "One executed on a stake" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, a person killed by impalement.
• "The great flesh" (mahāmāṃsa) is the tantric term for human flesh. In "they give to him, and not to others," the Tibetan reads byad kyis, taken as a slip for byed kyi. In the red ochre rite, dge bdag ni is read as dge ba ni ("wholesome"), and 'dri bar bya ("ask") is read as 'bri bar bya ("write"), since the rite has the target's name written with the ochre cloth. The sense of the closing phrase kha ru is unclear and has been left out of the rendering.
• "Sita wood" renders si ta'i shing, a wood not identified with confidence. "Earthquakes and the gathering of clouds" reads the bdag of sa g.yo bdag sprin as a slip for dang. "One seized by a black one" most likely means a victim of a black snake, in keeping with the reference to poison just before. "Bringing down into a vessel" is the rite of making a deity descend into a medium, here a youth, for divination.
• "So-and-so" renders the Tibetan placeholder for the target's name, to be replaced by the actual name in the mantra. The short line zhi bdag gi cho ga yi is read as zhi ba'i cho ga yi ("by the rite of pacifying"). "Very vicious" reads rab 'dug pa as rab gdug pa. "Except to stir suffering in his heart and so purify him" is a tentative rendering of a terse line.
• "Lac-tree wood" renders rgya skyegs shing, the tree that yields lac, probably the palāśa. In the passage on the finest food, the Tibetan repeats the line "from him one obtains the supreme of desires and wealth as well," which has been kept as written.

• "Paints that contain no glue" reads sbyin med as spyin med. In "When he is wrathful, the earth splits," the line is a syllable short and "the earth" is supplied from the parallel passage earlier in the text. The line on the tiger-skin garment (man bas par dgyes) is obscure; it is rendered by its evident sense.
• "Then on a fine patch of ground" reads the evident □□□□□□□□□□□ for the written □□□□□□□□□□. The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□ describing the cloth is obscure; "washed along its border" is a tentative rendering. The single syllable of Yamāntaka referred to throughout is hūṃ, as the preceding piece states.
• "Mantra jewel" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; in context it most likely denotes the recitation rosary or its bead. The line □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is terse and its rendering "these are taught as the practices that grant them" is tentative. In the closing verses of chapter thirteen, □□□□□□□□□□□□ could also be read as "his lords" rather than "his senses."
• In the series of syllables added after hūṃ, □□□ is transcribed as a syllable to fit the pattern, though it could also be read as the ordinary word "word," giving "the word hūṃ." The substances listed as ba bla and btsag are taken as orpiment and red ochre. In "even cloth will swiftly split," the word □□ (cloth) is kept as written although the parallel lines suggest a hard material.
• In the list of the effects of the six maṇḍalas, the text reads □□□□□□□□□□□ ("Many Images") where the list of names has □□□□□□□□ ("Many Corpses"); the transposed syllables are taken as a slip and rendered "Many Corpses." The ornament □□□□□□□ is rendered as an ornament worn across the body; its exact form is uncertain. The title of the rite, □□□□□□□□, is rendered "the Accomplishment of Aims."
• "Placing his mind upon the meaning" reads the written □□□□□□ as the evident □□□□□□ or a similar phrase; the written form makes no clear sense. "The lesser ones he obtains with a hundred" reads □□□ as □□□□ ("a hundred"). The couplet beginning "even what is held fast by the dark one" is obscure, and its rendering is tentative.
• "Grateful" renders □□□□□ as written; since an artisan (□□□□□□) is paid later in the rite, it may be a slip for □□□□□, "an artisan." "Finished on a whetstone" renders the obscure □□□□□□□□□□; the sense of this line is uncertain. The mudrā name □□□□□□ is rendered "the Club" (a cudgel or staff, probably daṇḍa).
• Kīlikīla is given as the name stands; it is a wrathful deity named elsewhere in the Mañjuśrī ritual literature. Several lines of the iconography are terse: "striding stance" renders the unclear □□□□□, and "comes to dwell in one's mind" reads □□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□ ("one's own"). "Six arms in threes" interprets □□□□□□□□□□□□□ as six arms, three on each side, which is what the following lines describe.
• "Come here" reads □□□□□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□□□□, the usual invitation formula. The closing verses on paired and interlaced syllables describe the arrangement of the ma-syllables in a wheel diagram; their technical sense is terse and partly uncertain, and is rendered as literally as English allows. "Striding stance" renders the obscure □□□□□, as in the preceding piece.
• This piece describes the twelve positions of a wheel diagram for the six rites and the syllables placed in them; its technical sense is very terse and the rendering stays close to the letter. □□□□□□□□ "a single pair" may be a slip for □□□□□□□ "Seize!", which appears in the parallel line above. "My might, strength" reads □□□□□□□□ as □□□□□□□.
• The six stances (□□□□□) are rendered as "stances"; the term is rare, and its sense is inferred from the descriptions of foot positions. The names of the stances are translated literally. "Mocked" renders □□□□□□□□□□, whose sense here is uncertain.
• The lines on assembling the mantra (the "fierce stacked letter" and the "anusvāra circle" crowning the first and second letters) describe the construction of a heart mantra in coded

terms whose exact letters are not specified here; they are rendered literally. The phrase "for the sake of a son" renders bu don as written; its connection to the flower offering is unclear. In the list of poisons, the Tibetan names only "moving and compounded" for the three kinds; the third (presumably stationary poison) is not stated and has not been supplied.

• The names of the twelve urging wrathful ones are translated by meaning, since apart from Aparājita (the Invincible) their Sanskrit forms cannot be identified with confidence; the eighth is named only as being "at the corner." The "six vowel hooks" (gug skyed) and the "dots" (tsheg, probably the visarga) refer to letter marks used in building the seed syllables; the exact signs intended are uncertain. Hela is kept as the Sanskrit name of the maṇḍala and wheel.

• The line rendered "those kings of the wrathful ones" reads khra bo'i rgyal po ("kings of the variegated") in the Tibetan; this makes no sense in context and is read as a slip for khro bo'i ("of the wrathful ones"). The construction of the seed syllables with their "dots" (tsheg, probably the visarga) and the placement of the twelve wrathful ones on the wheel are described in compressed technical verse; the renderings follow the Tibetan closely where the exact arrangement is unclear. The phrase "in the interstices or clearly" (tsham ngam gsal ba) is likewise obscure.

• The term tsham ngam, rendered "posture," is obscure; in this passage it plainly names the twelve bodily poses or stances of the wrathful practitioner, and the same term was rendered "interstices" in the immediately preceding passages, where its sense was less clear. "Words" in the opening line reads chog for tshig, an evident slip. The quoted imperatives ("press down!", "stir up!", "roar!" and so on) are the Tibetan translations of the mantra words to be inserted and are therefore translated.

• The final title reads khro bo khams gsum rnam par rgyal ba, "the Wrathful One Victorious over the Three Realms" (Trailokyavijaya), rather than the Krodhavijaya named in the text's opening title; it is rendered as written. The line rendered "with a swaying motion one turns four times" (sran dang bcas la bzhi ni bskor) is obscure. "Power and delight" renders mthu dga' literally.

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
