The Great Ritual Manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā, known in Sanskrit as the Ūrdhvajaṭā Mahākalpa and more fully as the Root Manual of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā (Āryatārā Mūlakalpa), and in Tibetan as Ralpa Gyendzé kyi Tokpa Chenpo, presents itself as drawn from the Vast Chapters on the Miraculous Display of the Great Bodhisattva. It is Toh 724 in the Kangyur, where it belongs to the Tantra section among the ritual tantras devoted to Tārā and Avalokiteśvara. Opening with the Buddha in the sky above Tārā's ship, surrounded by an assembly of bodhisattvas, it unfolds as a vast compendium of ritual practice: dhāraṇīs and mantras spoken by many buddhas, instructions for paintings, maṇḍalas, fire offerings and mudrās, and rites for protection, healing, prosperity, subjugation and the attainment of siddhis, all centered on the practice of noble Tārā. Its closing colophon records that it was translated into Tibetan by the monk Rinchen Drup from a manuscript that had belonged to Atiśa, brought from Radreng.

In the language of India: ūrdhajaṭā mahākalpa mahābodhisatva vikurvvaṇa paṭala visarād bhagavatā āryatārā mūlakalpa nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Great Ritual Manual of the Upswept Locks, from the Vast Chapters on the Miraculous Display of the Great Bodhisattva, called the Root Manual of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā.

Homage to noble Avalokiteśvara.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One (the Buddha) was dwelling in the midst of the sky above Tārā's ship, together with a maṇḍala, an assembly of bodhisattvas, unfolded through inconceivable wonders and marvels.

Then the Blessed One addressed the gods of the class of the Pure Abodes (Śuddhāvāsa): "Gods, listen! For the benefit of all sentient beings I shall explain the wondrous and inconceivable conduct of miraculous display of the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara: his meditative absorptions, his distinctive magical powers, the maṇḍala of liberation, and the miraculous manifestation of the bodhisattva that sustains all sentient beings; and the vidyā-mantras and the foundation of secret mantra that bring long life, freedom from illness, sovereignty, and the complete fulfillment of the chariot of the mind. Listen to it well and keep it well in mind. I shall explain."

Then they said to the Blessed One, "Excellent!"

Then those gods of the class of the Pure Abodes bowed with palms joined and said this: "Blessed One, please speak of that which enables bodhisattva great beings to attain each of the distinctive kinds of conduct and meditative absorption; which enables them to occupy the vajra seat, to tame Māra, and to turn the wheel of Dharma; which brings about the deliverance of all śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas; which causes birth among gods and humans; which completely pacifies all suffering; which cures the illness of all who are struck by poverty and disease; which cannot be overpowered by the practice of any vidyā-mantra or secret mantra, worldly or transcendent; and which completely fulfills every wish. Since the tathāgatas never speak without purpose, Blessed One, please, with a mind of loving-kindness, embracing us and all sentient beings with compassion, speak of it."

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni surveyed the great maṇḍala of the assembly, complete in every respect, with his buddha eye, and entered into the meditative absorption called Radiating Light Rays into the Pure Domain, the Destroyer. As soon as he had entered it, from the Blessed One's ūrṇā hair there came a light ray called Rousing the Flowerlike Bodhisattvas, surrounded by hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of light rays. It circled the Blessed One three times, passed beyond the infinite great trichiliocosm world-systems, and, having passed westward beyond world-systems equal in number to the sands of a hundred thousand Ganges rivers, it entered the world-system called Sukhāvatī.

There, where the Tathāgata Amitāyus dwells, the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara too, by the power of his former aspirations, was dwelling together with those who abide in the conduct of bodhisattva great beings. Seeing the radiance of the light, with a slightly smiling face he addressed the hosts of bodhisattvas: "O children of the Victor, know that this is a light ray that has come here to rouse us."

Then those great beings opened their closed eyes and stayed turned toward the radiance of this light. Then that rousing light ray, having filled the great world-system of Sukhāvatī with its illumination, circled the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitāyus, three times, and sank into the wisdom crown of the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara.

Then that great being rose from his seat, circled the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitābha, three times, bowed deeply with his head, placed his right knee on the ground, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please consider this. We would go to where the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni is, to see that Sahā world of the Blessed One and to see the Blessed One Śākyamuni, to pay homage to him and attend upon him; and, through his distinctive teaching of the practice of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras, the rites of the means of accomplishment, the procedures of the maṇḍala rite, the rite of the secret painted scroll, recitation, and all the vidyā empowerments, we wish to completely fulfill the wishes of all sentient beings."

When he had said this, the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitābha, said this to that bodhisattva great being: "Great being, if you know that the time for it has now come, go. And in my words, ask after the Blessed One Śākyamuni: whether he has little harm, little discomfort, whether he rises with ease, and whether he dwells in comfort."

Then again the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitābha, addressed the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara:

"Great being, the tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly complete buddhas, as many as the sands of a hundred thousand Ganges rivers, have also spoken of your family, the practice of secret mantra, the procedures of the maṇḍala, the secret empowerment, the mudrās, the rite of the painted scroll, the fire offering, and the rules of recitation, which completely fulfill every wish and delight all sentient beings; of the vast chapters of the Jewel Illumination, which teach how to enter one's own vidyā-mantras and secret mantras through the wisdoms of past, future, and present, which have been brought to completion and are endowed with the inner times; and of the chapters of the vast pledges, which gather in everything worldly and transcendent without exception. And regarding what has been spoken by all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, by the noble śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and by those who dwell on the bodhisattva grounds and possess the speech of ultimate conduct, there is nothing but rejoicing in this.

"Great being, if you know that the time for it has now come, go. In the presence of Śākyamuni, turned toward him, listen to this Dharma discourse, and you too will speak it. Its root vidyā-mantra will be this:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavatyai āryatārāyai bodhisatvāyai tadyathā tāre ṛjuka dharma nityate tāre tuttāre śānta dharma niryāte tāre anabhilāpya dharma niryate tuttāre ture ture hini trasani trasani ohani mohani jambhani stambhani prabhe candraprabhe hili hili cili cili bhegasāmini kuṇḍi kuṇḍi mahākuṇḍa dhara dhara dhanapani tāre huru huru kuru kuru ahaṃ yāya cintayāmi cintadhami kuru svādhāya svāhā

"Great being, this is that root vidyā of your Noble Tārā, which all the tathāgatas have spoken and will speak, and which you too will now speak. Śākyamuni has come to the Sahā world-system, at its limit laid open by spreading fragrance, and it is authorized by Śākyamuni.

"Its supreme heart mantra is also this: namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tāre tuttāre ture svāhā

"Its near-heart mantra is also this: namo ratnatrayāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvānāṃ oṃ kurukulle svāhā"

Then the bodhisattva great being, noble Avalokiteśvara, having received the Blessed One's permission, entered into the meditative absorption called the Ornament of All Arrays, Which Fully Brings Attainment of the Seat of Awakening in Accord with the Conduct of Bodhisattvas. As soon as he had entered it, the world-systems in every direction, all of them, to the very limits of the four directions, above, below, and across, became completely filled with perfect buddhas, blessed ones.

"Excellent, excellent, child of the Victor! That you have entered such a distinctive meditative absorption as this is beyond the power of all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Even those who have fully entered the conduct of bodhisattvas and dwell firmly on the ten grounds are unable to enter it."

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitābha, together with those buddha blessed ones, with loving-kindness, spoke the vidyā-mantra that is the supreme heart of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā: the supreme secret that accomplishes all aims, called the Single Syllable, she who is supremely secret and performs all activities for all sentient beings, a vidyā-mantra in accord with the accomplishment of other vidyā-mantras as well through the distinctive practice of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras.

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitāyus, remained silent for a moment. Having surveyed with his buddha eye the world, complete in every respect and everywhere, he spoke the vidyā-mantra, the intention of the buddha blessed ones, with a mind whose very nature is loving-kindness:

namaḥ sarvabuddhanāṃ oṃ gīḥ

This is the supreme heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, which performs all activities.

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara arose from that meditative absorption. In the time it takes a strong man to stretch out his bent arm or bend his outstretched arm, or merely to snap his fingers, in the mere instant of opening and closing the eyes, he entered into the distinctive meditative absorption called Miraculous Manifestation Itself, the absorption called Swift Mind, the Power of Absorption and Magical Power, and came to the Sahā world-system. Having arrived, he took his place in the middle of the sky above, within the great maṇḍala of the assembly, each seated upon great precious jewels. Having filled the maṇḍala of the entire assembly with the illumination of great light, he entered into the meditative absorption called Illuminating the Ornament of the Lord of Jewel Light.

As soon as the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara had entered that meditative absorption, he manifested multistoried mansions laid out with many jewels, and many jewel parasols spreading over hundreds of thousands of leagues, beautifully adorned with divine garments and silken ornaments, with divine flowers, banners, victory banners, and garlands, and hung with nets of jewel bells from which sweet sounds rang out; places where the bodhisattvas each abide; and rains of divine fragrances, garlands, ointments, and powders falling down. Thus was seen that wondrous act of offering to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the miracle, the bodhisattva's magical display.

Then those gods of the class of the Pure Abodes, filled with joy, felt their hair stand on end.

Seeing all the abodes of the gods shaken, they were frightened and their hearts trembled. "Has our prosperity utterly declined?" they wondered, and they began to call out to one another hurriedly in loud voices, and they also said this: "Blessed One, protect us! Śākyamuni, protect us!"

Then the Blessed One addressed the whole divine assembly: "Do not be afraid! Do not be afraid! This is the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, who, from the buddhafield of the Tathāgata Amitāyus, the Fully Blossomed, wishes to see me, to pay me homage, and to attend upon me. He has come in order to teach definitively the conduct of great purpose, the words of vidyā-mantra, and wondrous words of Dharma."

Then he circled the Blessed One Śākyamuni three times, gazed at the Blessed One without blinking, bowed at his feet, and praised the Blessed One with these finely spoken words:

Homage to you, the knowing person;
homage to you, the supreme person;
accomplisher of every aim of conduct,
homage to you, the chief of persons.
Averter of all that is meaningless, homage to you, lion among persons;
destroyer of all the lower realms,
great hero, homage to you.
Your fragrance of merit is infinite;
homage to you, white lotus among persons;
you purify the mud of the three existences;
homage to you, lotus among persons.
You liberate from all suffering;
homage to you, liberator of all.
You thoroughly tame every torment;
homage to you, the peaceful one.
Accomplisher of the aims of mantra practice, homage to you who are all.
Auspicious with every auspiciousness, homage to you, the auspicious one.
Fully realizing all phenomena, homage to you, pledge of the buddhas.
Teacher who rightly follows
the suchness of all phenomena, the aspect that is free of elaboration, homage to you, Tathāgata.

All things, the knowing and the knowable,
you have done well and rightly heard;
firmly established, you lead in and establish in the path of the three vehicles and in nirvāṇa; homage to you, the omniscient one.

Having thus praised the Blessed One to his face with these finely spoken words of praise, he also said this: "Blessed One, beyond world-systems equal in number to the sands of a hundred thousand Ganges rivers from here, toward the west, in the buddhafield called Fully Blossomed, lies the world-system called Sukhāvatī. There dwells the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, perfect in knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed, guide who tames beings, teacher of gods and humans, Amitāyus. He teaches the Dharma: virtuous in the beginning, virtuous in the middle, virtuous at the end, excellent in meaning, excellent in wording, unadulterated, completely pure, perfectly clean; he rightly teaches the pure conduct of Brahmā. Thus he dwells, lives, and remains, and he teaches the Dharma. To all sentient beings he teaches the practices that are the meaning of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras, the bodhisattva collection of teachings, and the path that follows the conduct of the three paths; he is their protector, their abode, their refuge, their ally, and their happiness, their utmost finality and utterly complete culmination.

"With the permission given by that very Blessed One, I have come here into the presence and nearness of the Blessed One. The Blessed One, the Tathāgata Amitābha, inquires after the Blessed One: whether he has little harm, little discomfort, whether he rises with ease, whether he is free from illness, and whether he dwells in comfort. And he also says this: 'It is wonderful that in such a degenerate time as this, the very person of the Blessed One Śākyamuni teaches the Dharma, and brings the people who are to understand it to find liberation through the three paths and birth among gods and humans. It is wonderful that, through the diligence of that Blessed One Śākyamuni, hosts of beings who lacked good fortune are made to enter fully the path that utterly destroys the three existences, and are firmly established in it for good, and that he places beings in nirvāṇa, which accords with happiness.'

"Yet, Blessed One, the mind of the buddha blessed ones is known only to the buddha blessed ones. Even if I wished to know the wondrous, marvelous, inconceivable miraculous displays of the buddha blessed ones as the displays of buddhas, or wished to know the accomplishment and the intention by which they enter into the conduct of their minds, how could I describe it even in hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of eons, let alone teach it all definitively? Whatever the tathāgatas accomplish, in summary and individually, without exception, is to be seen by the tathāgatas as the unconditioned nature of reality, its very essence. To wish to speak of the abandoning of what is to be abandoned by seeing, and of conduct that brooks no delay, or to wish to teach these qualities: that is known only to the tathāgata blessed ones, not to me."

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, emanating a miraculous display of magical power, sat on a great precious lotus, gazing at the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Śākyamuni, conversed with the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara in talk befitting the tathāgatas that followed upon talk of many kinds, with final questions put first. At the end of their teaching of Dharma to one another, to those assembled for the sake of accomplishing the conduct of the bodhisattvas of the family, in a voice like the voice of Brahmā, like the kalaviṅka bird, and resounding like the great drums made by the kutara and vitara, he addressed the bodhisattva great being, noble Avalokiteśvara:

"Great being, you are welcome. The conduct of great beings; the accomplishment of the blessings of all the buddhas; that which makes all bodhisattvas rightly attain their aims; all the words of vidyā-mantra and secret mantra, together with the secret empowerment; the mudrās; the maṇḍalas; the empowerment of the ritual procedures; that which completely fulfills long life, freedom from illness, sovereignty, and every wish; the tantras of the rites of all the means of accomplishment; knowing and the knowable, sunk into the end of time; kingship; and what is condensed from the fields of the past, the future, and the present: from this comes that which completely fulfills every wish of all sentient beings, which brings forth one's own qualities, which leads one to the culmination of the practice of secret mantra, which delights other beings, which brings invisibility and travel through the sky, which brings swiftness of foot, which sharpens the mind, which causes confusion, which brings entry beneath the earth, which accomplishes fierce rites, which attains every aim, together with their results, which summons all yakṣas, yakṣiṇīs, kiṃkaras, piśācas, and bhūtas, and which makes children, the aged, and the young remain just as they are. In brief, it performs every activity, fulfills every chariot of the mind, and fully accomplishes the activities of increase and pacification, in whatever way they are to be applied and in whatever way they are to be accomplished. These vast chapters of the Jewel, the extensive Great Ritual Manual endowed with the bodhisattva collection of teachings, I authorize. Spoken by all the buddhas, the meaning of the practice of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras for pure beings, the treasury of Dharma: teach it to gods and humans and to all sentient beings, for the benefit of many people and for the happiness of many people."

Then again the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, through the blessing of the Buddha, entered into the meditative absorption called Light Radiance of Arrayed Ornaments That Rouses All. As soon as he had entered it, the illumination of light spread through many pure beings and through world-systems and buddhafields as numerous as the sands of the Ganges River. It brought peace to the beings, completely pacifying all the sufferings of every being who is intensely tormented by suffering, from the existence of Akaniṣṭha down to the great hell Avīci. Having thoroughly roused all the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas, and buddha blessed ones, that light ray sank back into the crown of the head of the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara.

Moreover, in whatever buddhafields are situated in the east and the other directions, that light ray rousing the buddha blessed ones, brought about by stirring the wind maṇḍala, roused the Tathāgata called Glory Fully Illuminating the Fragrance of the Moon's Own Light, the Tathāgata Bhaiṣajyaguru Vaiḍūryaprabharāja, the Tathāgata called All-Illuminating Glory, the Tathāgata called King of Perfect Nobility, the Tathāgata Śālendrarāja, the Tathāgata Lokeśvararāja, the Tathāgata called King Who Ascertains Immeasurable Life and Wisdom, the Tathāgata called King of Infinite Illumination, and the Tathāgata called King of the Light Rays of Beryl Radiance. These and other buddha blessed ones, surrounded by bodhisattvas, in infinite and boundless world-systems, smiled at the vast chapters on the meaning of the words that definitively teach the practice of vidyā-mantras and secret mantras, as spoken by the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni, who dwells in the grove of Tārā's ship in the Sahā world-system, and by the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara.

Likewise in the southern, western, and northern directions, in the intermediate directions, above, below, and across, in the buddhafields complete in every respect, the light shone. In every one of the buddhafields all the abodes of Māra were humbled. Then the buddhas, surrounded by hosts of bodhisattvas and preceded by saṅghas of śrāvakas, each took their places: they wished to behold the miraculous display of the buddhas that dwells in the domain of the tathāgatas, the great being, the bodhisattva himself, and they wished also to make clear the vast chapters on the distinctive meditative absorption that accomplishes conduct in accord with the supreme vidyā, the unobstructed teaching of the tathāgatas.

They were these: Fine Hand, Excellent Jewel, Excellent Discipline, Excellent Eyes, Excellent Joy, Excellent Robe, Excellent Dawning of Siddhi, Noble in All, Noble Dharma, Noble Jewel, Ratnaśrī, Glory of Meru, Inconceivable Glory, Light-Making Glory, Brilliant Glory, Glory of Illumination, Glory of All Aims, All Jewels in Hand, Jewel on the Crown, Jewel in Hand, Meru Banner in Hand, Vairocanagarbha, Ratnagarbha, Jñānagarbha, Essence of Inconceivable Meaning, Essence of Noble Dharma, Crest of Offering, Excellent Crest, Infinite Crest, Crest of Light Rays, Stainless Crest, Complete Crest, Sky Crest, Ratnaketu, Voice of Thunder, King of the Roar of the Great Drum, King of the Wisdom of Infinite Clarity, King Who Dispels All Darkness and Gloom, King Who Conquers All Distraction, King of Wisdom Excelling in All Conduct, King Lord of the World, King Lord of the Eminent, King Who Dispels, King Acala, Sun King, King Perfectly Noble in All Clarity, King Perfectly Noble in Nature, King Perfectly Noble in the Absence of Things, King of the Superior Direction, Illumination without Own Entity, Illumination of Merit, Illumination of All-Seeing, Amitābha, Measurable Illumination, Illumination of Fine Eyes, Illumination of Excellent Arising, Infinite Illumination, Unassailable Illumination, Unchanging, Akaniṣṭha, Stainless, Fire, Illumination, Intelligence, Realization, Bliss, Rim of Bliss, Crest of the Rim, God of Desire, God of Gods, Expansive Navel, Peace of the World, Near Portent of Death, Great Drum, Accomplished, Famed as White, the God Hard to Bear and Hard to Tame, Hard to Illuminate, Gone Far, Taking Long, Abiding Long, High and Lofty Darkness, Sky Light, Universal Light, Not Light, Supreme Bull, Endowed with Universal Light, Definitely Equal, Great God, Maṇḍala of Utter Certainty, End of Stains, Excellent Sign of Equality, White, Imikimi, Youngest, Living with Hardship, Living at Ease, Well Born, Smoke Crest, Crest of Offering, White Crest, Excellent Crest, Crest of Wealth, Unobstructable Wealth, Great Father, Half Necklace, Famed in the World, Universally Famed, Greatly Famed, Supremely Famed, Born, Illumination, What Shall I Do, Equalizer, World Maker, Light Maker, Day Maker, Maker of Arising, Maker of All Aims, Accomplisher, Radiance Maker, Maker of Universal Clarity, Voice of the Great Drum, Melodious Sound, Sweet Voice, Infinite Voice, Voice of the Crest, Muni of the Elements, Kanakamuni, Krakucchanda, Kāśyapa, Śikhin, Viśvabhū, Vipaśyin, and Śākyamuni. These and many other buddha blessed ones, having filled the great maṇḍala of the assembly with light, each took their seat upon a lotus throne.

In the same way, the hosts of bodhisattvas were also seated. They were these: Ratnapāṇi, Vajrapāṇi, Bhadrapāṇi, Sky Hand, Infinite Hand, Earth Hand, Hand of Illumination, Utterly Stainless, Excellent Peak, Many Peaks, Gem Peak, Jewel Peak, Eṇa Peak, Jewel Elephant, Universal Elephant, Gandhahastin, Excellent Gait, Going Free of Stain, Going through the World, Going Beautifully, Infinite Going, Infinite Fame, Well Famed, Famed for Freedom from Stain, Famed for Going, Vimalakīrti, Protector of Fame, Protector of the Protectorless, Lokanātha, Universal Protector, Son of Constant Friend, Son of Infinite Friend, Son of Universal Friend, Son of Maitrā, Son of Fine Eyes, Son of Homage Friend, Son of Tvaṣṭṛ, Son of Rice Friend, Son of Jewel Friend, Son of the Friend of the Three Refuges, Son of the Friend of the Three Vehicles, Outstretched Might, Very Delightful, Possessing Delight, Dharmeśvara, Lord of the Absence of Things, Universal Lord, Lokeśvara, Avalokiteśvara, Lord of Fine Vision, Lord of Clear Vision, Leader of the World, Excellent Offering, Lord of Thunder, Lord of the Great Drum, Lord of Arrays, Viṣatesvara, Excellent Rain, Excellent Offering, Famous, Sūryaprabha, Abiding in Full Birth, Lord of the Moon, Healing Moon, Moon Itself, Infinite Glory, Universal Glory, World Glory, Sky Glory, Gatherer of the Sky, Gaganagañja, Lord of the Earth, Maheśvara, Kṣitigarbha, Unobscured, Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin, Samantabhadra, Bhadrapāla, Sudhana, Well Gathering All, Sky That Scatters All Harvests, Ākāśagarbha, Realizer of All Aims, Source of All, Not To Be Turned Back, Irreversible, Enduring the Lower Realms, Unchanging, Auspicious Exposition, and Guardian of All Vital Points. These and other bodhisattva great beings took their seats together upon Tārā's ship, within the domain of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Śākyamuni.

There were also bodhisattva great beings who had taken the form of women. They accomplish the infinite aims of conduct in the world. They uphold the foundations of the vidyā-mantras, whose inconceivable activity is to establish infinite sentient beings firmly upon the path that carries their intentions through. Some take forms in the guise of medicines, of various flocks of birds, of yakṣas, of rākṣasas, of jewels, of mantras and of kings of precious gems, of sentient beings and of countless things that are not sentient beings; entering into all of these, they conform to the conduct of sentient beings. They conform to whatever way sentient beings are to be trained according to their dispositions, and they conform to the particular excellence of each of these. Just as the vidyā kings have taught, they bring forth the Dharma; they do not transgress the order of the samaya that pervades everything, the Tathāgata, the Lotus and the Vajra, the worldly and the world-transcending; they abide firmly in the path of speech; and they keep the lineage of the Three Jewels from being cut off. They are Abhyudgatoṣṇīṣa, Exalted White Parasol (Sitātapatra), Infinite Leaves, Hundred Leaves, Jayoṣṇīṣa, Exalted Uṣṇīṣa, Lotus Light, Golden Light, White Light, Array of the Uṣṇīṣa, Golden Mass, White Mass, Tejorāśi, Jewel Mass, All-Encompassing Mass, Mass of Renown, Mass of Origination, Mass of Truth, Mass of Insubstantiality, and Mass of Unerring Suchness. These, and others besides.

There are also the uṣṇīṣa kings who have entered the infinite sphere of phenomena, who fulfill the wishes of sentient beings according to their intentions and understand the thoughts in the minds of all people; uṣṇīṣa kings who reach to the limits of space, whose recounting could not be completed even in hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of eons, of inconceivable power and of great nature, overpowering all adversaries. Wishing to show them, I shall teach in brief what would be explained in full at length. The assembly of the vidyā kings to be described is this: Ūrṇā, Brow, Eye, Eyelash, Ear, Throat, Fearlessness, Compassion, Loving-Kindness, Contentment of Love, Wisdom, Light Ray, Hero, Stainless Light Ray, and Dharma Robe. These, and also the infinite and boundless vidyā kings emanated from the uṣṇīṣa of the Tathāgata, namely: the Tathāgata's Alms Bowl, the Wheel of Dharma, the Tathāgata's Couch, the Tathāgata's Vehicle, the Tathāgata All-Illuminating, the Tathāgata's Speech, the Tathāgata's Lip, the Tathāgata's Going, the Tathāgata's Stain, the Tathāgata's Banner, the Tathāgata's Crest, and the Tathāgata's Mark. These, and also those that are mantras spoken by the Tathāgata: vidyā kings and vidyā queens, attendants, male servants and female servants, male messengers and female messengers, yakṣas and yakṣiṇīs, sentient beings and those that are not sentient beings, each sending forth clouds of Dharma arrayed with their own particularly excellent ornaments, surrounded by immeasurable hundreds of thousands of koṭis of beings that correspond to the distinctions of their samādhis, with all the hosts of vidyās entering ever higher and higher. These vidyā kings too came to dwell in that domain of the Tathāgata, abiding there as a noble family.

The vidyā kings were these: the Twelve-Armed Tathāgata, the Six-Armed, the Four-Armed, Hālāhala, Amoghapāśa, Hayagrīva, Infinite Throat, Nīlakaṇṭha, Excellent Throat, Fine Neck, White Throat, Blue Neck, World Throat, Avalokiteśvara, Bowed To by a Thousand Light Rays, Renowned Mind, Padmapāṇi, Chariot of the Mind, Utterer of Words, Broad Smile, Excellent Sound, Edge of the Hair, Constellation, King of Constellations, Son of the Moon, Excellent Fortune, Trailokyavijaya, Infinite Victory, Victorious over the Gods, Fulfiller of Desires, Excellent Tamer, and the one called Tamer. There were these, and also, surrounded by vidyās numbering many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas, which have become samādhis accomplishing infinite counterparts of the clouds of Dharma, together with vidyā queens such as Lotus Uṣṇīṣa, there were many vidyādhara queens and many emanations of the samādhi of the body of Lokeśvara, namely: Tārā, Tārā of the Mind, Dancer, Bhṛkuṭī, Anuttāṭī, Lauṭī, Bestower of the Grounds, Free of Stain, White Lady, White-Skirted, Great White-Skirted, White-Robed, World-Robed, Stainless-Robed, Robed in the Limbs of Awakening, Lotus-Robed, Robed in the Ten Powers, Famous, Lady of Riches, Lady of Riches and Long Life, Urṇūkā, Ṣalūkā, Stainless Ender, Ender Free of Stain, Universal Ender, Ender of Suffering, Ender of Bhūtas, Glorious Lady, Great Glorious Lady, Final Glory, Glory of Praise, World Glory, Renowned Glory, Mother of the World, Universal Mother, Mother of the Buddhas, Sister, Fortunate Chariot Lady, Excellent Chariot Lady, Lady with a Chariot, Tamer of Nāgas, Tamer, Lady of the Bhūtas, Immeasurable, Power of Riches, Summoner, Wondrous Light Ray, Excellent Taste, Lady of Liquor, Utter Crusher, Lady Worthy of Worship, Lady of the Shore, Lady of All Shores, Starlight, Moon Lady, Lunar Lady, Peacock Lady, Lady of the Forest, Giver of Wealth, Lady of Liquor, Lady of the World, Radiant Lady, Great Thousandfold, Lady of Greatness, Well Flourishing, Well Delighted, Giver of Riches, Glorious Lady, Pure Lady, Ender of Disease, Healer of All Diseases, Goddess of Health, Bringer of Fame, Subjugator, Swift One, Giver of Bliss, Auspicious Lady, Delightful Bringer of Auspiciousness, Excellent Moon Lady, and Lunar Lady.

These, and also the other vidyā queens such as Parṇaśabarī, Remover of Poison and Mind-Born, together with the mind-born ones who have truly arisen, blessed as the magical display of all the conduct of the infinite accomplishment of the sphere of phenomena whose nature is space: male messengers and female messengers, male servants and female servants, male attendants and female attendants, yakṣas and yakṣiṇīs, rākṣasas and rākṣasīs, piśācas and piśācīs, who follow the samaya of the Lotus family and practice secret mantra. Established by that which firmly sets in place pure sentient beings possessed of the great maṇḍala of the retinue, they took their places, and their minds became intent upon performing acts of worship to the Blessed One Śākyamuni himself.

The bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, who was there close beside the Blessed One Śākyamuni, summoned his own host of vidyās. Those of you who gathered here were the wrathful kings together with their queens, surrounded by hosts of vidyās, and their great female messengers, by the mere recollection of whom all the hosts of vidyās assemble, namely: Supreme Vidyā, Excellent Vidyā, Well Accomplished, Excellent Arm, Excellent Host, Ender of Gods, Excellent Tooth, Pūrṇabhadra, Vajra Host, Vajra Edge, Vajra Hand, Vajra Shoulder, Vajra Victory Banner, Vajra Pennant, Vajra Domain, Vajra Head-Bearer, Vajra Fang, Pure Vajra, Vajra Hair, Vajra Worship, Many Vajras, Vajra Armor, Vajra Throat, Vajra Speech, Vajra Navel, Vajra Limit, Vajra Tent, Vajra Fence, Vajra Weapon, Vajra Bow, Vajra Arrow, Vajra Iron Arrow, Vajra Mark, Vajra Delight, Vajra Underworld, Vajra Terrifying Eye, Vajra End of Wealth, Vajra Wrathful One, Pleasing Roar of the Waters, Pleasing Roar of the Bhūtas, Pleasing Roar of the Great Wrathful One, Pleasing Roar of Maheśvara, Pleasing Roar of the Dānavas, Pleasing Roar of All Vidyās, Fierce One, Exceedingly Fierce, Hurler, Close Hurler, Constant Hurler, Hurler at the Limit of Taming, Hurler of Perfect Array, Hurler in Search, Strength, Mighty One, Well-Born Straightener, Bhṛṅgiriṭi, Wrathful One, Great Wrathful One, Unaging, Sleepless, Voice of Torment, End of the Nāgas, Staff Water, Blue Staff, Body Giver, Red Body, Vajra Staff, Cloud, Great Cloud, Black One, Black Heap, Various Diseases, Hurler of All, Bowing One, Great Bowing One, Wretched One, Greatly Wretched One, Ender of Time, Black Yakṣa, Fierce One, Fierce Form, Raised Trident, Great Arrow, Club Destroyer, Hero Who Gathers the Eaters, Sun at the End of Time, Life-Stealer, Sound Destroyer, Holding No Anger, Coiled One, Uncoiled One, Infinite Coil, Blood Coil, Arm, Great Arm, Great Virulent Disease, Fire Glory, Victor over All Leprosy, Fleeing One, One Who Puts to Flight, Likewise Putting to Flight, Eater, and Insatiable Seeker.

These, and also great wrathful vidyā kings, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of vidyā kings who thoroughly carry out the acts of taming every sentient being without exception, of expelling, destroying, repelling, killing and crushing, of acting as a father and providing food, and the acts of pacifying, of enriching and of fierce rites: with their minds fixed on the Blessed One Śākyamuni and on the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, they bowed to their own vidyā king, the guardian of the Vajra family, and having received his permission they took their places within their own family, and so placed, they sat down each on their own seat.

Then the female messengers, the vidyā queens offered by the Blessed One Vajrapāṇi, surrounded by hundreds of thousands of niyutas, focusing on the sphere of phenomena itself, whose nature is space, free of elaboration, also gathered in that place, namely: Undergarment Lady, Excellent Undergarment Lady, Chain Lady, Vajra Light, Vajra Tongue, Vajra Brow, Vajra Eye, Vajra Navel, Vajra Frown, Vajra Ear, Vajra Drawing, Vajra Needle, Vajra Fist, Vajra Hook, Vajra Sword, Vajra Hammer, Vajra Fetter, Lady with the Sāla Tree, Sālabirṭī, Supreme Maker, Lady of Desire, Vajra Lady of Desire, Vajra of Desire, Seeing Lady, Lady of Sight, Great Sight, Robe of the Peak, Cave Taker, Lady of the Cave, Cave Dweller, Door Dweller, Desire Vajra Lady, Swift as Thought, Invincible Swift One, Rapid Swift One, Lady of Fair Eyes, Tavern Dweller, Bee Lady, Bee-Born Lady, Lady of the Accomplished Sacrifice, Wind Lady, Full-Robed Lady, Lady of Fair Terror, Hiṇḍanī, Threatening Finger, Female Messenger, Excellent Female Messenger, Māmakī, Left-Hand Lady, Lady of Form, Jayā, Vijayā, Aparājitā, Lady of Virtue and Goodness, Smiling Lady, Smiling Vajra Lady, Lady of the World, Famous, Lady of the Vajra, Untamed Lady, Subjugator of the Three Worlds, Staff Lady, Great Staff Lady, Lady of Sweet Speech, Lady of Excellent Fortune, Lady of Meaning, Lady of Great Meaning, Burner from Above, White Lady, Well-Emanated Lady, Utterly Stainless Lady, Bell Lady, Sword Lady, Lady of the Raised Trident, Morsel Lady, Bringer of Victory, Robed Lady, Lady Who Bows, Lady with a Name, Secret Lady, Staff Drawer, Pestle Lady, and Subjugator of All Female Messengers. These, and also other great female messengers, surrounded by hosts of many female messengers, gathered in that very great maṇḍala of the retinue.

There were also many mind-born dhāraṇī goddesses, who fully cultivate the counterparts of samādhi and who subdue harmful beings and cut them off with punishment, namely: the Dhāraṇī of Vajra Fire That Utterly Bewilders, the Dhāraṇī of the Tiered Mansion on the Summit of Meru, the Dhāraṇī of the Tiered Mansion on the Jewel Summit, Earth Holder, Well Tiered, the Dhāraṇī of Punishment, the Dhāraṇī of Subduing, the Dhāraṇī of Summoning, Armlet Lady, Lady with Armlets, Armlet of the Banner Peak, Armlet of the Jewel Peak, Armlet of the World Peak, Armlet of the Gadan Peak, Threefold Coil, World Coil, Thousandfold Coil, Coil of the Son of the Sun, Coil of All Bhūtas, Lady with a

These, and others besides, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of dhāraṇī goddesses, gathered in that very great maṇḍala of the retinue.

Blessed by the infinite buddhas and blessed by the samādhi of the bodhisattvas, there were the pratyekabuddhas, who in other buddha-fields, when those fields are bereft of buddhas, act for the benefit of sentient beings: those blessed ones who are like the rhinoceros, and those who live in groups. Without speaking at all, they teach the way of the Dharma correctly simply by their abiding. Following saṃsāra, they are constantly weary of it. Their mental continua are thoroughly imbued with the habitual tendencies of a mind that has given up great compassion and remains unmixed. Although they once generated the mind set on awakening, with minds so imbued they do not turn their thoughts to the first ground, the second ground, the third ground, or any ground up to the eighth ground of a bodhisattva. Weary of saṃsāra, afraid and filled with fear, they too gathered in that great maṇḍala of the retinue. They were Taker of Fragrance, Universal Sense Base, Universal Light, Candana, Time, Rim, Near Rim, Omen of Death, Near Omen of Death, Excellent Side, Great Drum, Near Great Drum, World Renown, World Light, Bringer of Victory, Dustless, Near Dust, Portion, Near Portion, Sign, Excellent Sign, Maker of Day, Radiant Doer of Good, Maker of Light, Maker of the World, Widely Heard, Well Heard, Beautiful, End of Good Holding, Tamed Beauty, Infinite End, End of Existence, White Crest, Crest of Signs, Crest, Near Crest, Victor, Lotus Supreme, Lotus Source, Self-Arisen, Born, Pleasing, Mind-Born, Mahendra, Renowned as Tiered, Vase, Eye of All, Maker of Bliss, Benefactor, Peaceful, Peaceful Mind, Dharma, Near Dharma, Illuminator, Flower, Well Blue, Glorious, Who Keeps Far from Kin, Hard to Bear, Gold, Stainless Crest, Moon, Near Moon, Excellent Host, Well Purified, Śakra, Desire, Upendra, and Wealth God. These, and others besides, inconceivable and immeasurable hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of pratyekabuddhas, who have entered and abide definitively in the middle vehicle, in the sphere of phenomena that is wishless, whose nature is space, free of elaboration and uncompounded, free of attachment and of anger, sat together with the Blessed One Śākyamuni where he was seated.

There was also the Saṅgha of śrāvakas, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of śrāvakas, namely: Mahākāśyapa, Nadīkāśyapa, Gayākāśyapa, Uruvilvākāśyapa, Piṇḍola Bharadvāja, Bharadvāja, Maudgalyāyana, Mahāmaudgalyāyana, Śāriputra, Mahāśāriputra, Various Beauty, Subhūti, Mahāsubhūti, Gavāṃpati, Kātyāyana, Mahākātyāyana, Upāli, Bhadrika, Kapphiṇa, Nanda, Sundarananda, Upananda, Koṭikarṇa, Arising of the World, Infinite Arising, Pleasing, Near Pleasing, Joyful, Near Joyful, Aniruddha, Full at the Root, Near Full, Victor, Ailing Tooth, Ruru, Son of the Fierce One, Son of Ruru, Kuru, Playing with Five, Near Playing with Five, Time, Equal Time, Holder of the Gods, Rāhula, Green, Near Green, Object of Thought, Thinker of Joy, Udāyin, Near Udāyin, Glorious, Son of Kadru, Son of the Mallas, Near Possessions, Fragment, Victorious, Near Victorious, Great Victorious, Universal Victorious, Caller, Giver of Fame, Yaśas, Wealthy, Ocean of Wealth, Near Wealthy, Pippalaka son of Pilinda, Fruit, Near Fruit, Infinite Fruit, With Fruit, Kumāra, Kumārakāśyapa, Great Giver, Delighter of the Sixteen Groups, Near Delighter, Crooked Swayer, Noose of the Victor, Great Consoler, Vātsīputra, Kurukulle, Śroṇa Koṭikarṇa, Ender of Blood Beyond, Son of the Gaṅgā, Mountain-Eared, Near Mane, Rain Dweller, Light, Beautiful Light, Śrīgupta, Lokagupta, Uttaragupta, Delighting in Light, Pacifier, Child, Near Child, Twenty Koṭis, Anāthapiṇḍada, Near Entry, Turning Back, Maddener, Universal Light, Excellent Lake, Good, Fully Awake, Svāgata, Near Come, Near Going, Going in the World, Ender of Suffering, Excellent Eon, Great Bhadrika, Acting for the Aim, Great Father, Possessed of Going, Rāṣṭrapāla, Victor, Clear, Near Clear, Great Medicine, Great Splendor, Border of the Gods, Accomplisher, Having a Following, Excellent Brahmā, Excellent Beauty, Excellent World, Equal, and Perfectly Measured.

These, and others besides, who taste the flavor of liberation in the infinite sphere of phenomena; who are absorbed in the three vehicles; who have fully attained the path of the lesser vehicle; who have fled from saṃsāra; who have meditated on the concentrations of the three paths of liberation; who are absorbed in the conduct of the four abodes of Brahmā; well composed, well and fully ordained, firmly established in the excellent way, absorbed in the sphere of nirvāṇa, in equality free of elaboration, the intelligent ones: in that great maṇḍala of the retinue endowed with all of them, together with the Blessed One Śākyamuni, who abides without interruption up to the tenth ground as the abode of the Three Jewels, they too took their seats there.

Many great female śrāvakas also came, who have entered through being fully absorbed in the sphere of nirvāṇa; pure in their focus on the vehicle of the uncompounded path, free of desire, having fully attained universal illumination, holding and purifying the qualities of a field worthy of offerings, overpowering every maṇḍala of Māra; supreme ladies of the world, worshipped by the gods, fields of merit, supreme ladies among all sentient beings, the two-footed, the four-footed, the many-footed and the footless, namely: Yaśodharā, Yaśodattā, Mahāprajāpatī, Prajāpatī Sujātā, Nandā, Sthūlanandā, Sundarīnandā, Thinking Lady, Sundarī, Infinite Lady, Manorathā, Victorious Lady, Vīrā, Near Vīrā, Goddess, Excellent Goddess, Excellent Glory, Glory Lady, Lady of Excellent Conduct, Lady of Great Joy, Lady of Sweet Speech, Rohiṇī, Dhṛtarāṣṭrī, Guardian Lady, Noble Lady, Perfect Lady, Embodied Lady, Lotus Lady, Delighted Lady, Matted-Hair Lady, Near Matted-Hair Lady, All Matted-Hair Lady, Lady of Origination, Lady of Light, Swift as Thought, Lady with Hair, Taker of Viṣṇu, Lady with Viṣṇu, Good-Minded Lady, Many-Minded Lady, Lady Glorious, Lady at the End of Suffering, Giver of Karma, Lady of the Fruits of Karma, Vijayā, Victorious Lady, Mistress of Wealth, Giver of Wealth, Dharmadinnā, Sudattā, Great Eater, Āmrā, Entering Fame, Lady of Mind, Broadly Smiling Lady, Ender of the Three Existences, Ender of the Three Circles, Suffering Lady, Lady of Renunciation, Three Leaves, Lotus Leaf, Lady with a Lotus, Lotus Light Lady, Lady Who Walks Averting Hardship, Lady Possessed of Walking That Averts Hardship, Three Petals, Seven Petals, and Utpalavarṇā. These, and also other great elder nuns and great female śrāvakas, drew near in order to bow at the feet of the Blessed One.

Those very maṇḍalas of the retinue, wishing to see the power of the magical display of the great bodhisattva, assembled and took their seats, in order to hear the Dharma, and they wished to strive to accomplish the aims of the conduct of mantra. Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked upon the Blessed One's maṇḍala of the retinue. Knowing their higher intention, and knowing that the nature of insubstantiality, whose essence is space, utterly transcends the three realms of sentient beings, he spoke to the great being:

"Great being, reflect carefully on the conduct that serves the aims of sentient beings. Meditate on the bodhisattva samādhi called Overpowering All the Powers of Māra with the Power of All the Ten Powers of the Tathāgata, which, in accordance with one's intention, brings faith in the result of the desired action, and brings about the attainment of the Dharma words called Perfectly Attaining the Aim of Mantra Conduct, the words of peace, the words of liberation, the accomplishment of the ritual, and the sameness of conceptual thought."

Then, the instant the Blessed One had spoken, the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara entered absorption. The instant Avalokiteśvara entered absorption, this great trichiliocosm, this world system, shook violently, and was lit up by a great light. He displayed the power of his own miraculous abilities that he brought forth, and he also spoke the words of his own mantra. As for the mantras of the ritual, among its many mantras, the common one, which arises without departing from the proper sequence, is this:

namaḥsamantabuddhānāṃ abhāba svabhāba samuṅgatānāṃ namaḥ pratyekabuddhā āryaśrābakānāṃ namo bodhisatvānāṃ daśabhumipratiṣṭhite śaraṇaṃ bodhisatvānāṃ mahāsatvanāṃ mahāsatvānāṃ tadyathā oṃ khakha khāhi duṣṭasatvādamaka asi musala paraśu pāśa hasti caturmukha ṣaṭcaraṇa gacchagaccha mahābighnāna bighnānataka bikṛtānan sarbabhūta bheyaṃkara aṭṭāṭṭa hāsanādine byāghracarmanibāsana kurukuru sarbakarmaṇāṃ cchindacchinda bhindabhinda saramudraṃ ākarṣaākarṣa bhūtāna nirmathana sarbaduṣṭāṃ prabeśaya maṇḍalmadhye baibasvatajībitānatā karakurukuru mamakyāryāṃ dahadaha pacapaca mābilambasamayamanusmara hūṃhūṃphaṭ sphoṭayasphoṭaya sarbaāśāparipūraka hehe bhagabāna kañcirāyasi mama sarbaarthasāṅṅayasvāhā

This is the great wrathful one of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā, called Tārā's Subjugator. It summons and obtains whatever one desires. Since it summons and vanquishes even Indra and the king of Yama, what need is there to speak of ordinary sentient beings?

The instant the great king of wrathful ones had spoken it, all sentient beings became distressed, terrified and afraid, dejected and heartbroken. Since, apart from the buddhas, the blessed ones, and the great bodhisattvas, they had no other refuge, no other protector, and no other ally, they drew near to the Blessed One.

Then whatever beings are counted as sentient beings, those that move on the ground and those that move in the sky, the stationary and the moving, the womb-born, the egg-born, the born from heat and moisture, and the miraculously born, dwelling in the infinite and boundless world systems, above, below and on the level, in the directions and beyond the directions, even those hidden at that instant, at that moment, were all summoned here in an instant by the great king of wrathful ones.

This king of wrathful ones, once accomplished, should not be recited in the presence of those who are not free of desire. Why is that? Because they would die or wither away. Having consecrated its words, one should recite it before an image of the Buddha, or before a stūpa containing relics, or before a volume of the sublime Dharma, or before Avalokiteśvara. It should not be read for the sake of other rites, nor in just any place whatever. Why? Because that would bring great ill omens, great sorrow, and one's own destruction.

The buddhas, the blessed ones, and the bodhisattva great beings alone, endowed with supreme compassion, accomplishing and following the conduct of omniscient wisdom, bring all sentient beings under their sway, firmly establish the way of the Dharma, and lead the entire realm of sentient beings to attain nirvāṇa. With a mind in harmony with the might of great compassion, they have spoken of teaching where there is no teaching, of properly setting beings on the three paths, of keeping the lineage of the Three Jewels unbroken, of illuminating mantra conduct, of overpowering the strength of Māra, of destroying great obstructors, of repelling wicked kings, of increasing one's own power and turning back the power of others, of paralysis, of felling, of restoring what has declined, of drying up, of delight, of illuminating one's own mantra conduct, of long life and freedom from illness, of increasing one's own sovereignty, of swiftly accomplishing rites, of great loving-kindness, great compassion, great joy and great equanimity, and of perfect restraint, together with the reasons for these; and they spoke with a mind free in every respect of speculation and conjecture about causes.

Then there were nāgas and great nāgas, yakṣas and great yakṣas, rākṣasas and great rākṣasas, piśācas and great piśācas, pūtanas and great pūtanas, kaṭapūtanas and great kaṭapūtanas, mātṛkās and great mātṛkās, kumbhāṇḍas and great kumbhāṇḍas, beasts of prey and great beasts of prey, vetālas and great vetālas, kampojas and great kampojas, sisters and great sisters, ḍākinīs and great ḍākinīs, suckers and great suckers, oppressors and great oppressors, child-spirits and great child-spirits, brampas and great brampas, diseases and great diseases, apasmāras and great apasmāras, grahas and great grahas, sky mātṛkās and great sky mātṛkās, embodied ones and great embodied ones, misshapen ones and great misshapen ones, wailers and great wailers, shadow-oppressors and great shadow-oppressors, vomit-bringers and great vomit-bringers, kiṃkaras and great kiṃkaras, yakṣiṇīs and great

The piśācīs, each surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of piśācīs, also bowed to the Blessed One Śākyamuni and assembled, namely the Ornamented, the Broom Piśācī, the Fierce Piśācī, the Piśācī of Talala, the Blazing Piśācī, the Ash-Eater, the Flesh-Eater, the Hard to Hold, the Deluder, the Bewilderer, the Proclaimer, the Generator, She Who Dwells at the World's End, She of the Ash's End, She of the Drink-Cutter, the Many, the Hard to Tame, Elā, the Marked One, She of the Smoke's End, the Smoky One, and Fine Smoke: these great piśācīs, each surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of piśācīs, also entered that great maṇḍala of the assembled retinue.

The mātṛkās and great mātṛkās, who range through the world, harm sentient beings, and gather up tormas and garlands, namely Brahmāṇī, Maheśvarī, Vaiṣṇavī, Kaumārī, Cāmuṇḍā, Vārāhī, Aindrī, Yāmī, Āgneyī, the Daughter of the Sun, She of the Intermediate World, Vāruṇī, Īśānī, Vāyavī, the Stealer of Others' Lives, She of the Ornamented Face, She of the Auspicious Mark, the Great She of the Auspicious Mark, Pūtanā, Kaṭapūtanā, and the Drier: these great mātṛkās, each surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of mātṛkās, took their seats in that great maṇḍala of the assembled retinue, uttering the words, "Homage to the Buddha!"

Likewise many hundreds of thousands of humans and nonhumans, and all beings, sentient and not sentient, in the whole expanse from the great hell Avīci up to the Peak of Existence, appeared clearly in the midst of the sky. Not a single living creature in the multitude of sentient beings was harmed. Through the blessing of the Buddha and the ornament of the bodhisattva's miraculous power, all sentient beings saw clearly the Buddha, the Blessed One, and Avalokiteśvara seated upon the crown of their heads.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked upon the entire retinue with his buddha eye and said to that great being, "If you know that the time has now come for the bodhisattva Piṭaka, the vast chapter on the samādhi that ascertains for sentient beings the meaning of the conduct of secret mantra, then speak it."

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, with the permission of the Blessed One Śākyamuni, entered the samādhi called the Beautiful and Firm Vajra Stream Arrayed with the Ornaments of the Nature of Space. The instant the great being entered absorption, that entire great maṇḍala of the retinue came to rest, vast, with the nature of vajra, extending for many hundreds of thousands of leagues. There the yakṣas, rākṣasas, gandharvas, wind gods and piśācas, in short the entire realm of sentient beings, through the blessing of the bodhisattva, were firmly established in that celestial palace as in a vajra jewel. Those who had taken their seats did not harm one another at all.

Then that great being, knowing that the great retinue had assembled, called upon the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator.

"O great wrathful one! Protect all the sentient beings of this great maṇḍala of the retinue, assembled here where all the buddhas and bodhisattvas have gathered! Bring them under your power! Tame the wicked! Awaken the peaceful! Make the faithless faithful! For as long as there is one who holds the vidyā-mantras, and who holds the maṇḍala rite of the conduct of secret mantra, the vidyā-mantras of this very vast bodhisattva Piṭaka that accomplishes the conduct of vidyā-mantra and secret mantra, for that long go outside these and protect them!"

When he had said this, the great king of wrathful ones accepted the command. He took on a form of great transformation, and, for the sake of protecting all sentient beings and for the sake of making them steadfast, the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of wrathful ones, took up his station in the great maṇḍala of the retinue with its great array, on all four sides, and likewise above, below and across, uttering a fierce roar.

Then those sentient beings, possessed of a peaceful mind, did not transgress the command to enter properly, and they also heard a sound such as this: "Whoever transgresses this pledge, his head will split into a hundred pieces like the blossom of the arjaka. That too is the blessing of the bodhisattva."

Then that bodhisattva again spoke words of Dharma for the sake of his own vidyā-mantra and the conduct of secret mantra:

"Through one quality the secret mantra of a bodhisattva great being is accomplished. What is that one? It is this: not seeing any phenomenon at all, in a manner free of conceptual elaboration.

"If one is firmly established in two qualities, the secret mantra of a bodhisattva great being will be accomplished. What are the two? Never giving up the awakening mind, and equality toward all sentient beings.

"Through three qualities the aim of the conduct of one's own secret mantra becomes definitely stable and complete. What are the three? Never abandoning sentient beings, guarding the bodhisattva's vow of moral discipline, and never abandoning one's own secret mantra.

"If one is endowed with four qualities, the vidyā-mantra of a bodhisattva who has just generated the mind for the first time will be accomplished. What are the four? Never abandoning the completion of one's own secret mantra, never cutting off the secret mantras of others, abiding with a mind of loving-kindness toward all sentient beings, and a mind that cultivates great compassion. A bodhisattva endowed with these four qualities will accomplish secret mantra.

"Through five qualities one properly enters the bodhisattva Piṭaka and the practice of the conduct of secret mantra becomes complete. What are the five? Resorting to places of many kinds, resorting to remote hermitages, being without hatred toward other sentient beings, not looking to worldly mantras, and abiding in moral discipline, learning and good conduct. Through these five qualities the accomplishment of the aim of mantra conduct becomes complete.

"Six qualities make complete the accomplishment of the conduct of secret mantra. What are the six? Faith in the Three Jewels that is never cut off; not casting aside the meaning of the words of the profound sūtras of the Great Vehicle; and, with a tireless mind, thoroughly seeking the meaning of the conduct of secret mantra and never abandoning the side of virtue. These six qualities bring about full and proper engagement in the conduct of vidyā-mantra and the accomplishment of secret mantra.

"Seven qualities cause one to follow the rite of accomplishing vidyā-mantras and the conduct of secret mantra. What are the seven? Meditating on the profound way of the perfection of wisdom, reciting it, listening to it, chanting it, and inquiring into it, and, out of devotion to the bodhisattva conduct, teaching it at the three times of day; taking up, unhindered, strict restraint, mantra recitation, fire offerings, silence and austerities, as well as intelligence, mindfulness, wisdom and steadfastness; the manner of properly entering the bodhisattva assembly and the way of the profound Dharma of the Great Vehicle, and skill in one's own secret mantra and in the tasks of summoning with mantra, protection and accomplishment; the act of fully cultivating great compassion, great loving-kindness, great equanimity and great joy; the act of properly entering the suchness, free of elaboration, of the realm of sentient beings and the sphere of phenomena, and of seeking the nondual wisdom of omniscience; and the act of never abandoning any sentient being and taking no delight in the Lesser Vehicle. These seven qualities make complete the accomplishment of vidyā-mantra and secret mantra.

"Eight qualities bring about proper entry into accomplishment by way of the aim of the conduct of vidyā-mantra and secret mantra. What are the eight? Wishing to marvel, with faith, at results seen and unseen; the act of being without doubt concerning the miracles and magical displays that are the fruit of a bodhisattva's faith; the act of holding secret mantra without error, and the act of reverence for the guru; the act of holding as undeceiving the mantras, causes and conduct that the buddhas and bodhisattvas have taught as one's own, and of giving away all one possesses; skill in teaching, through what is seen in dreams, which fields are places of accomplishment and which are not; the act of freeing oneself of all stinginess, sleep and torpor, always taking up diligence and offering oneself to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas; in short, the act of putting on the armor of insatiability for the roots of virtue and thoroughly dispelling all obstructors; and overpowering the continuum of awakening, wishing for oneself great wealth and renown for great power, keeping company with persons renowned for great power, never being parted from spiritual friends, and keeping company with great bodhisattvas. These eight qualities bring about proper entry into the accomplishment of the aim of the conduct of secret mantra."

"Friends, in short, one who is never parted from the awakening mind, who has special and supreme devotion to the Three Jewels, and who, with a mind that does not grow weary even toward those whose moral discipline is broken, always strives earnestly, will accomplish the mind-mantras of the Extensive Chapters, limitless and marvelous, born of the mind and concordant in cause with the conduct of bodhisattvas. They are not to be understood otherwise. With a mind that has become free of conceptual thought, they should also be practiced as a cause for the awakening of experience."

Then again the buddhas, bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas, and noble śrāvakas who empower the complete assembly gathered from everywhere spoke these words: "O Son of the Victors, for the sake of all sentient beings, teach the Dharma that accords with entering the Dharma way of accomplishing the aims of the various conducts of secret mantra! Excellent, excellent! How wonderful! The great bodhisattvas have well proclaimed the virtuous conduct of secret mantra, which follows the teaching of the various Dharmas. Whatever great kings hold this Chapter of the Assembly, keep it in mind, set it first upon an elephant even in battle, and worship it with flowers, incense, scents, and unguents of various kinds, we shall regard as equal to ourselves. We shall bring their adversaries and enemies under control. We shall destroy and turn back the armies of their foes. And for the son of good family or daughter of good family, the great king or great queen, the monk or nun, the layman or laywoman who writes it in a book and keeps it in their home, we shall bring about great protection and great wealth, long life, freedom from illness, and wealth that ever increases."

When they had said this, that whole assembly fell silent.

This concludes the first chapter, the Chapter of the Assembly, from the Root Ritual Manual of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā, from the Extensive Chapters on the Magical Display of the Great Bodhisattva, the Great Ritual Manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā (the One with Upswept Locks), from the Definitive Teaching of the Vidyā-Mantras and Secret Mantra Conduct of the Great Vehicle.

Then again the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara, gazing upon the maṇḍala of the whole assembly gathered from everywhere, entered into the samādhi called Following the Pledges of All Sentient Beings and Seeing Everywhere. As soon as the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara had entered into it, from the region of the navel circle he sent forth a ray of light surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of light rays. It illuminated all the realms of sentient beings, and then, having fully illuminated the great maṇḍala of the assembly already gathered there, it remained.

Then again the bodhisattva mahāsattva Vajrapāṇi said to the pure being Avalokiteśvara, "Speak, speak of the practice that accomplishes the conduct of the Extensive Chapters of the maṇḍala of rites that follows the pledge of the great being, which is common to all sentient beings: the gathering into which beings properly enter and so come properly to attain the accomplishments of worldly and transworldly vidyā-mantras and secret mantras!"

When the Lord of Secrets, the lord of yakṣas, had spoken thus, the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara spoke the tantra of the supremely secret maṇḍala. He displayed the miracle called Fully Urging All Vidyā-Mantras: raising his right hand, he pointed with the tip of his finger at the maṇḍala of the assembly, and from that fingertip he sent forth many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of vidyā kings. Having sent them forth, he illuminated that maṇḍala of the whole assembly with a great light, and remained.

Then the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara, by the mantra of his own tantra, bestowed the heart mantra of the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, which performs all rites, the single hero: for inviting and dismissing, for pacifying, for increasing, for fierce rites, for invisibility, for travel through the sky, for entering beneath the earth, for swiftness of foot, for summoning, for causing enmity, for bringing under control, and for scents, garlands, and lamps, all of these. In short, just as it is applied, so it accomplishes. That which accomplishes in each and every way is the great king of wrathful ones called the Three Syllables, which accomplishes all aims through great diligence. What is it?

This is the heart mantra of that great wrathful one which performs all rites. The bodhisattva mahāsattva taught it definitively for all maṇḍalas and all conduct of secret mantra, and it destroys all obstructors.

Then the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara raised his right hand, placed it on the crown of the wrathful one's head, and spoke these words: "Buddhas, blessed ones, take heed! Whatever bodhisattvas dwell in the world systems of the ten directions, endowed with limitless and boundless great miraculous power, make them abide firmly in the pledge!" Having said this, he whirled that king of wrathful ones around and sent it forth.

As soon as the great king of wrathful ones had been sent forth, it went to all the world systems, and in a single instant it subdued and summoned those beings of great miraculous power who had malicious minds. It brought them properly into the great maṇḍala of the assembly of pure beings, set each of them in their proper place, and then remained upon the crowns of the heads of the malicious beings, swirling with a garland of blazing flames.

Then the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara once more gazed upon the maṇḍala of the assembly: "All you sentient beings, listen! Whoever transgresses this pledge of mine will be destroyed by the king of wrathful ones. Why is that? Because the pledge of the buddhas, the blessed ones, is not to be transgressed."

I shall explain the vidyā-mantras and the great secret words that are the meaning of secret mantra, just as the bodhisattvas endowed with great miraculous power have definitively taught them in samādhi. Listen to this well and keep it well in mind, and I shall explain.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama āryābalokite śvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagabatyai āryatarāyai bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā ṛjuka dharma niryāte tāre tuttāre śānta dharma niryāte tāre anabhilāpya dharma

Friends, this is the root vidyā-mantra of my Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā. She performs all rites, she cuts off the phenomena of the three realms of existence, and she turns back all the lower destinies. Here, too, the mudrā is to be applied to that renowned root vidyā-mantra by one who knows it.

Here is the supreme heart mantra. It performs all rites; it brings attainment of the bliss of nirvāṇa; it accomplishes all pacification; it is present just as if one were seeing the Buddha directly. She herself, my friend, the bodhisattva who for the sake of all sentient beings is present in the form of the supremely secret vidyā-mantra, fulfills all wishes. By the mere remembering of it, whatever one remembers, it brings all rites to completion and clears away great terrors. What need is there to speak of reciting it? What is it?

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryābalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tāre tuttāre svāhā

Here the mudrā, renowned as the Utpala, makes all wealth increase.

Here what serves as the near-heart mantra is the supremely glorious great purifier:

namo ratnatrayāya namaḥ sarba buddha bodhisatvānāṃ oṃ kurukulle svāhā

Here the mudrā becomes renowned as Holding the Lotus Garland; it brings all sentient beings under control.

Here what serves as the supreme heart mantra is:

namaḥ sarba buddhāmāṃ oṃ gī

This is the supreme of heart mantras. In short, it expands great qualities for every activity. To describe its qualities to their end would not be possible even in many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of eons. Here the mudrā, renowned as Great Diligence, fulfills all wishes.

Here what serves as the vidyā-mantra of invitation is:

namaḥ sarba buddhānāṃ oṃ he he bhagabati biśvarūpiṇi sarbabala bhāṣiti prabodhani āyāni bhagabati krīḍ utpaladhini mama śuddhāya tiṣṭha tiṣṭha samayamanusmara apratihata śāsana hūṃ māhilamba kuru kuru phaṭ svāhā

This is the vidyā-mantra for inviting the Blessed Lady, and it is also the one for all the buddhas, all the bodhisattvas, all the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas, the gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, piśācas, rākṣasas, and all bhūtas. Having consecrated sandalwood water with it seven times, one should sprinkle it in the four directions, and likewise above, below, and on every side. This is the secret mantra of the buddhas, of all the bodhisattvas, of the Blessed Lady Tārā, and of all worldly and transworldly beings; all the hosts of bhūtas and all sentient beings will come.

This is the incense vidyā-mantra. Combine sandalwood, saffron, and camphor, and offer incense. Then the tathāgatas and all the bodhisattvas who have come are delighted by the fragrant incense and are drawn in. Here the mudrā, renowned as the Lotus Garland, summons all sentient beings and is peaceful; for the vidyā-mantra of invitation, too, it is this same excellent Lotus Garland mudrā.

To the buddhas, all the bodhisattvas, and all the sentient beings who have come, one should also offer guest water. Mix camphor, sandalwood, and saffron with water, and blend it with jasmine flowers, fresh mallikā, summer flowers, punnāga, bakula, and fragrant herbs, any of these flowers, or flowers of the season, or sweet-smelling flowers; then offer the guest water with this mantra:

namaḥ sarba buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā he he mahākāruṇikā biśvarūpadhāraṇi arghaṃ pratīccha samayamanusmara tiṣṭha tiṣṭha debatādhiṣṭhāna madhye prabeśaya prabeśaya sarbabuddhā anukaṃbaka gṛhṇa gṛhṇa hūṃ ambaribicāriṇi svāhā

Here the mudrā is renowned as the Full One; all sentient beings follow it, and it is steadfast.

Here what serves as the scent vidyā-mantra is:

namaḥ sarba budhānāṃ namaḥ smanta gandha apabhāṣite śriye tathāgatāya tadyathā gandhe gandhe hlāde gandha manorame praticchadaṃ gandhaṃ samanānucāriṇi svāhā

Here what serves as the mudrā is called the Leaf, which fulfills all wishes.

Here what serves as the flower mantra is:

namaḥ sarba buddha bodhisatvānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ namaḥ saṃkusumita rajñāsya tathāgatāsya tadyathā kusume kusume kusumādhyo kusumāsūrbāsi kusumābati svāhā

With this same incense mantra one should fumigate with the incense described before.

Having paid homage to all the buddhas, whose bodies are marvelous, beyond conceiving,
I shall explain the torma vidyā-mantra spoken by the perfectly complete buddhas:

namaḥ sarba buddha bodhisatvānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā he he bhagabati mahāsatve sarbabuddhā abalokite mābilaṃba idam paliṃ gṛhṇa paya grahṇa pa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ sarba rara phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

With this one should offer the food for the gods; it becomes a torma for all the bhūtas. Here too the mudrā is the Staff, which turns back all malicious beings.

namaḥ sarba buddha bodhisatvānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ sarba tamo ñandhakār bityaṃ sitānā namaḥ smanta jyoti gandha aba bta sa priyāya tathāgatāya tadyathā he he bhagabāna jyote rasmi śata sahasra pratimaṇḍita śarīra bikurba bikurba mahābodhisatvā manta jvolodyota mūrtti khurha khurha abalokīya abalokīya maṇḍala sarba satvānāṃ svāhā

This is the lamp vidyā-mantra; with it one should offer lamps. The mudrā, called the Opened, illuminates all sentient beings.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratiheta śāsanānāṃ tadyathā jvala jvala jvālaya jvālaya hūṃ bibodhaka hara kṛṣṇa piṃga svāhā

This becomes the vidyā-mantra that performs the activity of fire. Here too the mudrā is known in the world as the Joining of the Mouths;

it makes all sentient beings bright with light.
It was taught long ago by the wise bodhisattva and by the supreme Sage.

Then again the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara said to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, "Lord of Secrets, these mantra words carry great secrecy and are supremely secret.

"My son, for your benefit, the utmost of the fierce, renowned as the family of the Unbearable:

whatever mantras there are, all of them,
the wise should accomplish.
The vajra and lotus families as well,
renowned as the bracelet on the crown,
in order surely to destroy them,
I properly proclaim this vidyā:"

namaḥ sarba buddha bodhisatvānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ oṃ kara kara kuru kuru mama kāryāṃ jaṃbha jaṃbha sarba sarba daha daha sarba bajra bināśaka mārdha ḍāka jībantāṃ takarā mahā bitri tarā piṇe paca paca sarba duṣḍaṃ mahā gaṇapati jībantāṃ takara bandha bandha sarba grahāṃ ṣaḍ mukha ṭha ḍa bhuja ṣa ḍa caraṇa rudra mānaya brahma tyaṃ debanānaya māBilamba māBilamba bhuṣa hrī maṇḍala madhye prabeśaya samayamanusmara hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

"Lord of Secrets, this supremely secret one of great diligence, called the Six-Faced One, a limb of Tārā, is the great king of wrathful ones who vanquishes all. If merely by reciting it even the lords who dwell on the ten bodhisattva grounds are destroyed, what need is there to speak of savage obstructors? Merely by reciting it, great protection is accomplished. Here the mudrā is called the Great Family; it destroys obstructors.

"The heart mantra of this king of wrathful ones is:

oṃ hrīḥ ṣṭṛḥ bikṛtānana hūṃ sarba śatruṃ stambhaya phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

"Through this mantra all enemies will be seized by a disease of great stabbing pains, or else by a one-day fever. Through constant recitation, for as long as it lasts, they will not turn to loving-kindness, nor will they attain a mind of compassion; until the recitation is completed there will be neither release nor binding. This is to be done against those who harm the Three Jewels, not against others who have peaceful minds. One should also apply the Great Spear mudrā.

"Here what serves as the near-heart mantra is:

oṃ hrīḥ kālarūpaṃ hūṃ khaṃ svāhā

"One should apply the Great Spear described before as well. It will do whatever one wishes to all malicious beings.

"The supreme heart mantra, blessed by all the buddhas, called the Single Syllable, is hūṃ. It performs all rites; one should also apply the Great Spear mudrā. It turns back all calamities and brings all bhūtas under control. In short, this king of wrathful ones should be applied to all rites, and when accomplishment comes through recitation in the center of the maṇḍala, something extraordinary will occur.

"Here what serves as the mantra of dismissal is:

namaḥ sarba buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā jaya jaya sujaya mahākāruṇika biśvarūpini gaccha gaccha svabhābanāṃ sarba buddhaṃ svabisarjāya saparibāraṃ svabhabānāṃ cā prabeśaya samayamanusmara sarbārtha sva me sidhyaṃtu bidhya sadāḥ mnorathaṃ ca me paripūraya svāhā

"This is the mantra of dismissal, and it should be applied in all rites. Its mudrā is renowned as the Excellent Seat, and with it one should also offer a seat. By reciting it mentally seven times, one dismisses them all. It should also be applied to the worldly and transworldly maṇḍalas, and, for the mantras themselves, to the accomplishments of mantra, the pledges, the recitation, the times, and the definitive vows."

Then again the great being once more gazed all around at the divine sons of the Pure Abodes and spoke to the great maṇḍala of the assembly the Extensive Chapters of the mantras of his own host of vidyās.

namaḥ sarba buddhānāṃ apratihata gatīnāṃ oṃ niṭi svāhā

This is the vidyā called Keśinī, who follows Noble Tārā, and it performs all rites. It is the heart of the mudrā of the great pledge, and it is applied in all rites concerning poison.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ oṃ niṭi

This is the vidyā called Keśinī the Close Attendant, and it performs all rites. Its mudrā, called the Opened, should be applied in all rites concerning the planets.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ oṃ ni

This vidyā, called She of the Stalk, performs all the virtuous rites of conduct. Its mudrā, the Excellent Seat, is applied to summoning yakṣiṇīs.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintyaddhātarūpiṇāṃ oṃ ṣṭai svāhā

Join properly the Hollow mudrā of her who vanquishes all ḍākinīs.
Explained by the bodhisattva,

this vidyā-mantra is called Kapālinī.
She is the very lotus of all buddhas, highly praised, possessing a goddess's form.

namaḥ smanta buddhanāṃ apratihata gati cāraṇaṃ tadyathā oṃ barade sāhā

The Utpala mudrā itself is applied to the Eye, glorious by nature.
The goddess who holds many forms swiftly brings about wealth.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintyaddhūtarūpiṇāṃ oṃ suri svāhā

Joined with the Spear mudrā,
she destroys all fevers.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintaddhātarūpiṇāṃ oṃ ture svāhā

She is called Tārā Endowed with Intention, highly praised, performing all rites.
Joined with the Staff mudrā, apply it to her who destroys obstructors.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintyaddhūtarūpiṇāṃ tadyathā oṃ bilokini svāhā

The vidyā called the Radiant One brings the whole world under control and bestows every happiness;
it should be applied with the Lotus mudrā.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintyaddhūtarūpiṇāṃ tadyathā oṃ biśva biśva saṃbhabe biśarūpiṇāṃ kaha kaha ābiśa ābiśa samayamanusmara ruru tiṣṭha svāhā

The vidyā Great Diligence was taught by the Guide of the World.
Her heart mantra and mudrā are equality itself;
she makes all beings descend into possession, and is virtuous.
She is proclaimed as the Manifold One.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ oṃ cintyadbhutarūpiṇāṃ tadyathā oṃ śvete prābasu hvāhā

Arrange it with the form of the Lotus Seat;
it performs all rites.

namaḥ samanta buddhānāṃ apratihata gati prātiriṇāṃ tadyathā oṃ śrīḥ

This vidyā is the Great Glorious Lady, taught by the Protector of the World.
Joined with the Joining of the Mouths mudrā, she bestows a great kingdom.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ sarba satvābhaya pradāyikā tadyathā oṃ ajite kumāra rūpiṇī oṃ hi agaccha mama karyaṃ kuru svāhā

She who is renowned as Ajitā, youthful, born of nectar, joined with the Full mudrā, turns back all enemies.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ acintyadbhutarūpiṇāṃ tadyathā oṃ jaye svāhā bijaye svāhā ajite svāhā

Renowned as the Four Sisters, they follow the bodhisattva.
They roam all the lands entirely and take care of sentient beings.
Their brother is renowned as Tumburu,
and they attend upon him.
Riding together on a boat as their mount,
they dwell upon the ocean.
Arrange them with the Fist mudrā;
it fulfills all wishes.

namaḥ samanta buddhānāṃ lokāgrādhibatināṃ tadyathā oṃ kumāri mahākumāri krīḍa krīḍa mahārākṣasi bodhisatvānujñāta mayurāsane pāśa parśūpāṇi raktāṃgī raktagandddhānulepana priye priye kha kha khāhi khāhi hūṃ nritya rakta puṣpārcita mūrtti samanusmara bhrama bhrama bhramaya bhramaya hulu hulu mābilamba sarba karmāṇi me kuru kuru picitra rūpa dhāriṇi tiṣṭha tiṣṭha hūṃ hūṃ sarba buddhānujñāte svāhā

When the bodhisattva who cares for beings had spoken it, all the lands without exception
quaked in six ways.
For the benefit of all beings and to turn back malicious beings,

my vidyā is ever renowned,
renowned everywhere as ever protecting.
That very protection on which beings rely is well marked with the signs of the world.

Then the bodhisattva,
his heart moist with compassion, spoke:
"The great-souled bodhisattva, for the benefit of the childish, has taught what beings are to practice,
possessed of conduct toward all who wander.
Joined with the Staff and Life-Pole mudrā, when the great-souled one applies it,
if it summons even Brahmā and the rest,
what need to speak of results for humans?
Having gathered the whole of this ritual system into the mind of the Maiden, this vidyā-mantra, renowned among the rākṣasas, has been properly taught."

Thus the bodhisattva spoke,
wishing to care for sentient beings.
This heart mantra called the Three Syllables,
this vidyā-mantra, has been properly explained:
for the benefit of all sentient beings,
supreme for summoning enjoyments.
The Staff and Life-Pole mudrā is arranged for all rites.

oṃ hūṃ jaḥ

This vidyā-mantra, in brief, brings results for humans.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ samantotyotita mūrttināṃ abikṛta graha hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

This near-heart mantra, too, is joined with the Axe mudrā.
Likewise it summons the bhūtas,
and likewise the planets together with the mātṛkās.

When all are sealed with the mudrā and arranged, it will bear fruit.
It terrifies the bhūtas,
and frees those whom malicious beings have entered.

This is the great messenger of the Blessed Lady Noble Tārā, who performs all rites, the attendant called Ekajaṭī, who performs all rites. By mere recitation alone she performs all rites. She terrifies all bhūtas, summons them, and brings them under control, and she fulfills everything that the vidyādhara wishes.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā oṃ prahmā suprahmā prahmā barcase śāntiṃ kuru svāhā

This mantra is Mahābrahmā,
explained by the bodhisattva.
The bhūtas fully attain peace,
and in an instant they become cool.
Joined with the Lotus mudrā, one swiftly attains well-being.
For the acts of fierce rites,
the Veda of the Guardian of Existence is wanted.
This has been spoken in brief;
this rite is the abridged one.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā oṃ garuḍa bahana cakra pāni catur bhuja hūṃ hūṃ samayamanusmara bodhisatva ājñāpayati svāhā

The bodhisattva declared it.
It swiftly accomplishes the aim of pacification,
and it destroys the bhūtas.
It has a body in the form of Viṣṇu.
Joined with the Wheel mudrā,
it properly accomplishes the aim of stability.
This, in the tantra of Viṣṇu, is a rite taught at length;
it brings accomplishment to all beings,
and the bodhisattva explained it.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā mahā maheśvara bhutādhipati bṛṣabha dhvaje pralaṃba jaṭa mukuṭa dhāriṇī sita bhasma dhusarata mūrti sa aṃ phaṭ phaṭ bodhisatva ājñāpayati svāhā

Wishing to benefit sentient beings,
I proclaim this mantra.
Joined with the Spear mudrā,
it destroys all the bhūtas.
This rite that has been taught here was taught long ago in the Śiva tantra for beings who dwell upon the earth.
Its vast and various qualities are declared by the Śiva tantra as well.

namaḥ smanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānaṃ tadyathā oṃ śakuni patata pakṣiṇa śaka khakha khāhi khāhi samayamanusmara hūṃ tiṣṭha bodhisatva ājñāpayati svāhā

This mantra is of great diligence, renowned as Garuḍa,
supreme among those who tame the hard to tame.
It destroys the poisons of hooded serpents.
Joined with the Great mudrā,
it destroys them together with unbearable calamities.
The poisons of things stationary and moving it heals beyond doubt.
Out of love for the beings to be tamed,
this is the bodhisattva's true word:
he acts in the form of a garuḍa,
king of birds, possessed of great light.
All the extensive rites that are taught in the garuḍa tantras, tantras that benefit all beings,
I too have proclaimed.
If in the tantra that names the garuḍa
the king of wrathful ones has not been taught,
then, to destroy the poison of hooded serpents,
he moves about in the form of a bird.
Whatever worldly mantras there are,
the rites stated by way of example,

for the sake of beings to be tamed,
he employs in such and such ways.
And whatever tathāgata mantras there are,
and those of the vajra and lotus families, their rites here in these Extensive Chapters are as they were spoken before.
Just as nurses of many kinds take pains to protect a child,
so for those whose minds are utterly childish
I am the cause of the vidyā-mantra forms.
What the One with the Ten Powers taught long ago,
I too now teach.
The meaning of the mantra tantras without remainder the one of great light has proclaimed through realization.
What the supreme Victor taught the son of the One with the Ten Powers has taught: Avalokiteśvara, of marvelous and inconceivable form, has spoken it.

Then again the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara gazed all around at that entire world system and at that great maṇḍala of the assembly, and entered into the samādhi called Properly Urging All Pledges. Through his abiding in that samādhi, the mind of the conduct of accomplishment of all beings without exception came to abide firmly in all sentient beings.

As soon as the bodhisattva mahāsattva had entered into it, there appeared for the great assembly gathered from everywhere a maṇḍala, the Array of Ornaments of the Jewel Essence in the Hand, set in a place of brilliant variety, an inconceivable and marvelous magical display. If even all the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas, the bodhisattvas engaged in conduct, and those possessing the ten grounds who abide as lords of the ten grounds were unable to draw that maṇḍala or have it drawn, what need is there to speak of sentient beings who are ordinary people?

The great bodhisattva gazed upon those who abide in the place of accomplishing the pledges of that excellent noble maṇḍala. Then all the buddhas, the blessed ones, all the pratyekabuddhas, all the noble śrāvakas, all the bodhisattvas abiding on the ten grounds who have been consecrated as regents and have obtained the pledge, those engaged in conduct, and all sentient beings with defilements and without defilements, through the blessing of Avalokiteśvara, through a cause concordant with the inconceivable conduct of buddhas and bodhisattvas and through the distinction of samādhi, came to know properly for themselves that they had entered the maṇḍala arisen from his heart. If no ordinary person can even conceive of it in the mind, what need is there to speak of drawing it or having it drawn?

Then again the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara said to those sentient beings who had properly entered into the pledge of the great maṇḍala, "Friends, listen! If this is a pledge that not even the tathāgatas and bodhisattvas may transgress, what need is there to speak of sentient beings and other noble ones?"

Then again the great being said to Vajrapāṇi, the Lord of Secrets, "O Son of the Victors, the mind-born pledge that transcends humans has been definitively taught. For humans, I shall explain how, when the tathāgatas have passed into parinirvāṇa, sentient beings will properly enter and accomplish all the accomplishments of worldly and transworldly vidyā and mantra."

Then again Vajrapāṇi, the Lord of Secrets, said to the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara, "O Son of the Victors, if you know that the time has now come, speak, speak!

"When Śākyasiṃha, Protector of the World, has passed into parinirvāṇa,
in this supreme buddha field of humans
the beings upon the earth, through your maṇḍala, by merely seeing it in the world,
will fully give rise to the accomplishments of mantra.
If one is ignorant and the rite is impaired, or if one has not become a master of the pledge, then even for great-souled Brahmā
the accomplishment of vidyā-mantra will not occur.
If one does not strive earnestly at mantra and does not see the teaching of the pledge, then even though one strives in many ways,
the accomplishment of vidyā will not occur."

When the application of the pledge is impaired, if even Śakra (Indra), though he strives hard,
does not gain the accomplishment of vidyā,

what need is there to speak of humans on earth?
One who knows that very treatise of the pledge and accomplishes the actions of the conduct will accomplish both mundane and noble mantras merely by reciting them.
Having fully entered the maṇḍala of the bodhisattva,
one performs all the rites.
Within the bodhisattva's teaching, one's accomplishment of vidyā is constant.

Then again the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi, made a request to that great being: "O being, O great being!" And the noble Avalokiteśvara spoke the maṇḍala rite for the sake of sentient beings.

First of all, in the fortnight of miracles, or in the month of Caitra, or in the bright half of the month of Vaiśākha, on a highly praised day, having looked for a favorable planet, on the first day of the bright fortnight joined with an auspicious lunar mansion, or on the full moon, or at another time, avoiding the months of the rainy season, one should consecrate the ground in the morning.

Near a great city, or wherever the maṇḍala master himself dwells, where a river enters the ocean, or beside a river, or close to the shore of the ocean, in the northeastern quarter of the great city, neither too far nor too near, the maṇḍala master should go, and for seven days or a fortnight, keeping a strict fast or observing the fasting vow, he should dwell there apart. In whatever places he dwells, in a clean spot free of stones, potsherds, ashes, charcoal, husks, skulls, bones, and places where bones lie, a spot that has been very thoroughly cleansed, with water free of living creatures mixed with the five products of the cow, and with water of sandalwood, camphor, and saffron, empowered eight thousand times with the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, and joined with the great mudrā of the Blessed Lady, one should sprinkle that spot in the four directions, and sprinkle it all around, above, below, level across, and in the intermediate directions.

Then at that spot one should make it square on all sides, sixteen cubits, or twelve cubits, or eight cubits. Of these, the large one is sixteen cubits, the medium twelve cubits, and the small eight cubits.

These three kinds of maṇḍala were taught by the All-Seeing One.

The large is for one who desires kingship;
the medium makes wealth increase;
the small, the pledge of mantra, performs all rites and is pacifying.

There one should draw whichever maṇḍala one wishes in one's mind. At that spot one should dig down about two cubits, and if one sees there stones, charcoal, ashes, bones, hair and the like, or various kinds of living creatures, one should dig at another spot. There it will be free of harm and free of injury. On mountain peaks, too, and on the banks of great rivers that flow into the ocean, wherever it may be, having examined it very carefully with great effort and having made it very clean and free of living creatures, one should draw it.

At that spot, again, one should fill the pit with clean earth from a riverbank, or with earth from an anthill, or with earth from any place free of living creatures, mixed with water free of living creatures into which the five products of the cow have been blended. Having filled it, one should pound it well and make it level all around, and then make whichever of the three kinds of maṇḍala one wishes.

Four pegs of khadira wood should be empowered seven times with the king of wrathful ones himself and driven in at the four directions. A thread of five colors should be empowered seven times with the king of wrathful ones and wound all around in the form of a square maṇḍala. In the same way, in the central area inside, it should also be made with four corners. The maṇḍala master, staying within the center, should recite the root vidyā or the root heart mantra eight thousand times. Having bound the crown knot with the great mudrā and the root mantra, and having protected his companions with the root mantra of the wrathful one and protected himself, he should go outside while continuing the recitation, circumambulate the maṇḍala clockwise, and sitting facing east on a mat of kuśa grass, bearing in mind all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, he should wind the thread around that maṇḍala in a square form. Outside it, keeping a one-day fast, he should consecrate it.

Then, having performed here the preliminary practices of the maṇḍala master, the preceptor, skilled in his own vidyā, in mantra and in tantra, for the sake of all sentient beings, with special devotion to the Great Vehicle, keeping a one-day fast, accompanied by good companions, and having seen the procedures of the various treatises, should thoroughly purify fine, brilliant powders of five colors, and should place in the center of the maṇḍala the powder empowered with the mantra and heart of the root vidyā.

Outside as well, it should be proclaimed in a place adorned with banners, raised flags, and four gateways, with plantain trees swaying with clusters of fruit and hanging all around with clusters of fruit, and resounding with the sound of great drums, clay drums, and conches. On the four sides, one should listen to the Dharma with the sound of praises in harmony throughout. In the four directions one should recite volumes of the sūtras of the Great Vehicle, namely: the Perfection of Wisdom should be recited in the south; the noble Samādhi of the Moon Lamp in the west; the noble Gaṇḍavyūha in the north; and the noble Sublime Golden Light in the east. If there is no one to recite the volumes in this way, one should request a person, a Dharma teacher who knows how to recite the four sūtras, so that the Dharma may be heard.

Then the maṇḍala master should rise, recite the root vidyā over fragrant white flowers mixed with sandalwood, camphor, and saffron, and spread them as a carpet over the whole maṇḍala.

Having strewn them, he should go outside. Then two or three painters, who for seven days have partaken of the food they wish, who have given rise to the awakening mind, and who abide in keeping the fasting observance of the poṣadha, those companions or disciples who have given their promise, should be admitted.

One whose crown knot has been bound with the root vidyā itself should then take, each separately, fine powders of gold, of silver, of the brilliant substance of various precious gems, and of shining, beautiful copper; and great kings who are possessed of great wealth and who are righteous should be admitted here. From merely seeing the maṇḍala, one is certainly inclined toward awakening; what need is there to speak of one who accomplishes mantra?

The supreme being of the Śākyas has passed into nirvāṇa.
For sentient beings of little merit,
how could there be such wealth as this?
This rite shall therefore be taught.
The bodhisattva endowed with great light, having seen people in poverty, taught in condensed form
a maṇḍala that is small and brief.

Powders of śāli rice and of coarse grain, very fine and brilliant, of five colors, should be tinted to the hues of white, yellow, red, black, and green. The maṇḍala master should take the powder set down earlier, bind the great mudrā of the Blessed Lady, and seal the powder with the root vidyā.

Another master, one who accomplishes pacification, having seen the ritual for the rites, should make a fire pit outside the maṇḍala, in the southeast. It should measure two cubits, with a depth of about one cubit, with a rim all around in the form of lotus petals. Having kindled the fire with kindling sticks of palāśa wood, he should invite the fire god, Agni, with fuel sticks of bilva wood about a span long, still moist and smeared with curd, honey, and ghee, using the root heart mantra, or the mudrā and the root vidyā-mantra. Having invited him, he should again make one hundred and eight fire offerings with the vidyā of the Single Syllable stated earlier, or with the heart of the root vidyā.

Then the maṇḍala master, having purified his crown knot and gathered the requisites, should set himself and a very skilled painter, or a disciple, to the work. Then the maṇḍala master, bearing in mind the buddhas and bodhisattvas, should burn incense with the incense vidyā stated earlier. Joining his palms, he should pay homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas and to the bodhisattva, the great being, noble Avalokiteśvara, then take up the powder and lay out the forms, and the skilled painter should complete them.

By these rites, first of all, one should draw the Buddha, the Blessed One Śākyamuni, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, seated on a jeweled lion throne, teaching the Dharma in the abode of the Pure Abodes. When the maṇḍala master has drawn this, the assistant practitioner should perform the rite of self-protection and the vidyā, and then give a torma to all the bhūtas, scattering it in the four directions outside the maṇḍala, and above and below.

Then, having bathed, he should go near the fire pit, put on clean clothes, perform the rites of cleanliness and protection, and with the root vidyā make eight thousand fire offerings of oblations of ghee mixed with saffron. Then, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, he should recite right there and remain right there. White mustard seed should be empowered one hundred and eight times with the mantra of the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, and having been empowered, it should be placed in a bowl closed with another bowl turned over it. If one sees the many transformed forms of obstructors coming, or fierce roars, wind, rain, or any other ill omens of whatever kind, one should wrathfully make fire offerings of mustard-seed oblations seven times. Then the obstructors will be terrified. As for human obstructors, if one makes fire offerings of barley five times, that person will become paralyzed, or will become powerless, or will die, or in that very instant will be seized by nonhuman beings.

Then the assistant practitioner should sit right there on the mat of kuśa grass and remain, reciting the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator.

Then the maṇḍala master should place, on the right side of the image of the Blessed One Śākyamuni, two pratyekabuddhas seated cross-legged on lotus seats. Below them should be two great śrāvakas listening to the Dharma. To their right should be the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, adorned with all ornaments, white like the color of an autumn cloud, seated on a lotus seat, holding a lotus in his left hand, his right hand granting the supreme boon. To his right in turn should be the Blessed Lady Pāṇḍaravāsinī, holding a lotus in her hand, with her right hand paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, seated on a lotus seat, wearing a crown of matted locks, wearing a lower garment of white silk, wearing an upper shawl of silk, and marked with three dots of black ash. In the same way the Steadfast One and Bhṛkuṭī should also be drawn, each seated on her own seat in her own posture. To their right one should also draw the Blessed Lady Prajñāpāramitā, the Tathāgata Locanā, and the Uṣṇīṣa Queen.

Likewise, sixteen bodhisattvas are to be drawn, namely: Samantabhadra, Kṣitigarbha, Gaganagañja, Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin, Sarvāpāyajaha, Maitreya holding a yak-tail fly whisk in his hand and gazing at the Buddha, the Blessed One, Vimalamati, Vimalaketu, Sudhana, Candraprabha, Vimalakīrti, Healer of All Illnesses, King Lord of All Dharmas, World Goer, Mahāmati, and the one called Upholder. These sixteen great bodhisattvas should be drawn with utterly peaceful bodies, adorned with all ornaments. The chief vidyā kings, the vidyā queens, the forms of the lotus family, and the mudrās should be drawn as explained in scripture and in their proper places.

At the outer edge, too, the places should be set out in square form. Well-made lotus flowers, and whichever vidyā deities come to mind, should also be placed in those positions. Likewise, on the right side of the Blessed One Śākyamuni there should also be the two pratyekabuddhas called Gagana and Completely. Likewise, the gates of entry should be made facing east in every maṇḍala. On the left side of the Blessed One Śākyamuni one should also draw two other pratyekabuddhas, called Candana and Siddha. Below them one should draw two great śrāvakas, Mahākāśyapa and Kātyāyana.

At their side should be the noble Vajrapāṇi, appearing dark blue like an utpala lotus, in an utterly peaceful form adorned with all ornaments, holding a yak-tail fly whisk in his right hand, his left hand placed on the head of the wrathful one. Vajramuṣṭi, Vajrāṅkuśa, Vajraśṛṅkhalā, Subāhu, and Vajrasena should be shown with their proper attire and their proper emblems, destroying the obstructors. All the vidyā kings and queens together with their retinues, and their forms, mudrās and so forth, should be drawn as they come to mind. To their left, two vajra mudrās should be drawn in square form. Having drawn them, one should say: "Whatever hosts of vidyās have not been called to mind in their places, may they dwell in this place!"

Above them one should draw the six perfections and the Blessed Lady Māmakī, adorned with all ornaments, with utterly peaceful bodies. Above them in turn one should draw the eight uṣṇīṣa kings, ablaze with garlands of flame all around, binding their mudrās, each in the form of a great universal monarch: golden in color, with calm faculties, adorned with all ornaments, casting a slight glance toward the image of the Tathāgata. They are Uṣṇīṣacakravartin, Abhyudgatoṣṇīṣa, Sitātapatroṣṇīṣa, Jayoṣṇīṣa, Padmoṣṇīṣa, Vijayoṣṇīṣa, Tejorāśi, and Unnatoṣṇīṣa. These eight uṣṇīṣas should be drawn.

At the gate on the side of entry, two bodhisattvas should be made. On the right side one should draw the one called Going Beyond the World, with an utterly peaceful body, wearing a crown of matted locks, holding a rosary with his right hand in the gesture of granting the supreme boon, holding a water flask with his left hand, facing the gate, his face slightly frowning. On the left side of the gate of entry one should draw the great bodhisattva Victor over the Unvanquished, with an utterly peaceful body, wearing a crown of matted locks, holding a staff and a water flask in his left hand, holding a counting rosary with his right hand while granting the supreme boon, his face slightly frowning, facing the gate of entry.

Beneath the lion throne should be a wheel of Dharma ablaze with garlands of flame all around. Beneath it, dwelling in that jeweled palace, one should draw the Blessed Lady, the great vidyā queen, with a body neither too thin nor too stout, utterly peaceful in form, beautiful, her face slightly smiling, holding a blue utpala lotus in her left hand and a bilva fruit in her right hand, adorned with all the ornaments of a young girl, wearing a jeweled crown, with a garland of pearls worn as a sacred thread, wearing an upper garment of silk, her lower body clad in a silk garment, ablaze with garlands of flame all around, seated on a lotus seat, gazing at the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, facing the gate of entry into the maṇḍala, lovely to behold in every way, and bearing a form made like that of the rākṣasī Ekajaṭā.

On her right side, beneath the lotus, one should draw the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, of a greatly transformed form, ablaze with garlands of flame all around, as if receiving commands, and gazing at the one who is a great bodhisattva. On the left side, beneath the lotus, five bodhisattvas in the form of gods of the class of the Pure Abodes should be drawn, namely: Utterly Stainless, Utterly Tamed, Pure, Dispeller of Darkness, and All-Illuminating. All of them dwell in the abode of the Pure Abodes, on a ground like a floor of stone made of many blazing jewels, carpeted with brilliant, many-colored flowers ablaze all around, and they should be drawn with beautiful forms.

The surrounding outer enclosure should be square, with four gateways, bright with brilliant colors of five kinds; and with very straight and not low lines one should make the inner maṇḍala. In the east, above the Blessed One Śākyamuni, in the center of the drawing, one should make the Lord of Flower Kings seated on a lotus seat, a Tathāgata form drawn very small, ablaze with garlands of flame all around, granting the supreme boon with his hand, and residing at the uṣṇīṣa of the body. To his right one should draw the mudrā of Uṣṇīṣacakravartin. To his left one should draw the mudrā of Tejorāśi. Above the Tathāgata Locanā one should draw Prajñāpāramitā. Above the Blessed noble Avalokiteśvara, to the right of Prajñāpāramitā, one should make the Blessed One Amitābha in the form of a Tathāgata, granting the supreme boon with his hand, seated on a lotus seat, ablaze with garlands of flame all around. To his right in turn are the mudrās of the begging bowl and the Dharma robe. Likewise, in sequence, at the place of entry the lotus mudrā should be made. To the left of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Saṃkusumitarāja, one should draw the mudrā of the uṣṇīṣa Tejorāśi, ablaze all around.

To his left in turn one should draw the Tathāgata Ratnaketu, seated on a mountain of jewels, teaching the Dharma, emitting the blazing light of blue beryl, emerald, and rubies of many kinds, radiant on every side. To his left in turn one should draw the mudrā of Jayoṣṇīṣa, ablaze all around. To his left in turn one should draw the mudrā of the wheel of Dharma, ablaze all around. To his left in turn one should draw the mudrās of the water flask, the counting rosary, and the auspicious seat. At the place of the gate, on both sides, one should draw three-pronged vajras, ablaze all around. Below the Blessed One Avalokiteśvara one should draw the great mudrā the Staff-Bearer and the mudrā of the utpala lotus, ablaze all around, without their touching one another.

The outer maṇḍala, surrounding the drawn form of the maṇḍala, should also blaze with the five colors, brilliant and lovely to behold, beautified by four corners, with four gateways in the four directions.

Outside the inner maṇḍala, at a distance of about two cubits, in the east, one should draw Mahābrahmā: four-faced, clad in a white garment, with a white upper garment and a white sacred thread, golden in color, wearing a crown of matted locks, holding a staff and a water flask in his left hand, with a vajra in his hand. To his right in turn one should make a son of the gods of the Ābhāsvara heaven, his body clad in silk, with an upper garment of silk, his face utterly peaceful, wearing a crown of matted locks, with a white sacred thread, seated cross-legged, his right hand granting the supreme boon. To his right in turn one should make a son of the gods of the Akaniṣṭha heaven, adorned with all ornaments, his body utterly peaceful, his mind dwelling in meditative concentration, clad in silk, with an upper garment of silk, seated cross-legged, granting the supreme boon with his right hand, with a white sacred thread. In sequence after him one should draw the sons of the gods of Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarati, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Yāma, Śakra, and the rest, in their proper order, with their proper attire and shapes. Below Śakra, the class of the Four Great Kings, the sons of the gods Sadāmatta, Mālādhara, Karoṭapāṇi, the Two-Lute ones, and the earth-dwelling gods, should be drawn in their proper order and with their proper attire.

Likewise, in the south, one should draw the sons of the gods Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, Parīttaśubha, Puṇyaprasava, and the rest, with their proper attire and shapes. Likewise in the western quarter, and likewise in the northern quarter too. In the western quarter, below them, they should be drawn in two rows. Beyond the two maṇḍalas there will be a third maṇḍala, and in its four directions one should draw the Four Great Kings in their order.

In the north, on the right side of the entrance, is Dhanada, dwelling near his treasure, adorned with all ornaments, his crown slightly bent, in the form of a yakṣa. To his right one should draw the yakṣa generals Maṇibhadra and Pūrṇabhadra. Likewise, in sequence, one should draw the great yakṣiṇī Hārītī, with the boy Priyaṅkara seated on her lap, gazing intently at the maṇḍala. One should also draw Pāñcika, reddish yellow and terrifying, and near them one should draw the mudrās of the yakṣas.

Likewise, in sequence, in the western quarter one should draw the god who holds a noose in his hand, and the eight great kings: the nāgas Nanda, Upananda, Takṣaka, the son of Vāsuki, and the rest. Likewise, in the second row, in their order, one should draw the yakṣas, rākṣasas, gandharvas, kinnaras, mahoragas, sages, siddhas, pretas, piśācas, garuḍas, humans, nonhumans, and the rest; and the medicines, the varieties of precious jewels, the mountains, the rivers, and the continents, in their order, all those renowned as chief and all the supreme chiefs.

In the south one should draw Yama together with his retinue of seven mātṛkās. In the east is Agni, ablaze with garlands of flame all around, holding a staff, a water flask, and a counting rosary in his hands, wearing a crown of matted locks, clad in a white garment, with an upper garment of silk and a white sacred thread, golden in color, marked with three dots of ash. Their various ornaments, weapons, attire, shapes, and colors should be drawn in the second row.

In the great maṇḍala entered from all sides is the Lord of Umā, riding a bull, holding a trident in his right hand; and the goddess Umā, adorned with all ornaments; and the son of the Kṛttikās, riding a peacock, holding a short spear in his hand, in the form of a youth, six-faced, his body appearing red, clad in a yellow garment with a yellow upper garment, holding a bell in his left hand and holding a red banner. In their order one should clearly draw Bhṛṅgiriṭi in a very emaciated form, the great Gaṇapati, Nandikeśvara, Mahākāla, and the seven mātṛkās, with their proper ornaments, attire, and shapes. There are the eight Vasus, the seven sages, and Viṣṇu, four-armed, holding in his hands a discus, a club, a spear, and a sword, with the garuḍa as his mount, adorned with all ornaments. One should also draw the eight planets, the twenty-seven lunar mansions, and the eight secondary planets that move through the sphere of the earth; and in their order the fifteen days of the bright and of the dark fortnights, the twelve houses of the zodiac, the six seasons, the twelve months, the junctures of the year, the Four Sisters riding in a boat, and their brother, the fifth, dwelling in the water. In brief, they should be set out as mudrās. The gods should be placed in two rows, in their order.

In brief, the third maṇḍala too should be clearly drawn on the basis of the three maṇḍalas, and in all three maṇḍalas the places should be set out in squares. These are the Blessed One's. To summarize, the Buddha, the Blessed One, the chief of all beings, must certainly be clearly drawn.

The noble Avalokiteśvara of the lotus family must be drawn on the right. The noble Vajrapāṇi of the vajra family must be drawn on the left. The noble Samantabhadra, chief of the bodhisattvas, must also be drawn. Mañjuśrī in youthful form must be drawn. The rest must be drawn as mudrās, as they have been set out. These make up the inner maṇḍala.

In the middle maṇḍala, in the eastern quarter, Brahmā, lord of the Sahā world, must be clearly drawn. Likewise, in the southern quarter, the Ābhāsvara gods. Akaniṣṭha and the formless ones are in the form of a maṇḍala of gods. The gods of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, who are not manifest, are not drawn. In the northern quarter, the sons of the gods, Śakra king of the gods, Suyāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarati, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Parīttābha, and the rest, each one a king of the gods, must be clearly drawn. The rest are to be clearly drawn as mudrās, as they have been set out.

Likewise, in the third maṇḍala, in the northern quarter, Īśāna, lord of the bhūtas, together with Umā, must be clearly drawn. Near the second gate is the youthful son of the Kṛttikās on a peacock seat, holding a short spear in his hand, his body appearing red, wearing an upper garment of yellow cloth, holding a bell and a red banner in his right hand, in the form of a youth, gazing intently at the maṇḍala. In the eastern quarter, the garuḍa in the form of a bird and the sage Mārkaṇḍa must be clearly drawn; the rest, too, as mudrās as they have been set out. In the southeast, the four maidens, together with their youthful brother, abiding in a boat as their vehicle and journeying across the great ocean, and the king of the fire gods, must also be clearly drawn. Likewise, in the southern quarter, one must clearly draw the utterly terrifying lord of the rākṣasas of the city of Laṅkā, dwelling there in a picumarda tree, and the bodhisattva in the form of a yakṣa called Jambhala Jalendra. The rest too are to be set out as mudrās. Likewise, in the southwestern quarter, the nāga chiefs Nanda and Upananda must be drawn, and also the sun, chief of the planets. In the western quarter, the supreme sage called the Muni Kapila and the bull among the naked tīrthikas, in naked form, are to be set out in order as mudrās. In the northwestern quarter, Dhanada, king of the yakṣas, Pañcaśikha, king of the gandharvas, and Druma, king of the kinnaras, these must be drawn. The rest too are to be clearly drawn as mudrās, in order, according to the shapes in which they abide.

"One should clearly draw four maṇḍalas" means this: the fourth, outer maṇḍala is decorated with five lines, beautified with a garland of mudrās, square, in the form of four gateways, adorned with the Four Great Kings, each abiding in its proper order, as follows. At the gate of entry, as its mudrā, one should draw a blue utpala lotus. To the right and left, a lotus, a vajra, an axe, a conch, a trident, a club, a discus, a svastika, a vase, a fish, a conch, a bracelet, a water flask, a victory banner, a flag, a noose, a bell, a knife, a hammer, a bow, and an iron arrow: with these mudrās of the finest weapons of many kinds one should fill the surrounding enclosure on its four corners as a garland.

Then, in the four outer directions, four great mudrās should be placed. In the north, having made a maṇḍala in square form, a vajra with three prongs at both ends, ablaze all around. In the east, one should place a maṇḍala in triangular form, ablaze all around. In the south, having made a maṇḍala in the form of a bow, one should place a begging bowl, ablaze all around. In the west, having made a maṇḍala in the form of the sun, a blue utpala with its own stalk and leaves, ablaze all around. In the intermediate directions there will be four mudrās. In the northwest, having made a maṇḍala in round form, a noose, ablaze all around. In the southwest, having made a maṇḍala in long form, a staff, ablaze all around. In the southeast, having made a maṇḍala in triangular form, an axe, ablaze all around. In the northeast, one should place a sword, ablaze all around.

Having clearly drawn everything, above, below, and level across, three mudrās are to be drawn with the powder itself near the gate of the outer maṇḍala, namely: a garment, a fan, and sandals, ablaze all around. These one should clearly draw." Thus it was said.

By the wise bodhisattva
Who desires the benefit of beings,
These rites of the maṇḍala
Have been taught here in brief.

Then the master of the maṇḍala should first of all accept disciples. They are brahmins, kṣatriyas, vaiśyas and śūdras whose faculties are not deficient and all of whose limbs are beautiful; who have generated the mind set on awakening and are followers of the Great Vehicle; great beings whose disposition is not to want any other vehicle; who are faithful and of virtuous character; who strongly desire great kingship, who disdain small wealth, and who strongly desire great wealth. They are monks, nuns, laymen and laywomen who are excellent, disciplined and endowed with moral discipline, who abide in their vows, who observe the restoration ceremony and abide in their vows, and who bear no hatred toward the great bodhisattvas. They are of great standing and of good family, by nature practicing the Dharma, keeping a fast day and night, wearing clean clothes, with fragrant hair, having bathed three times, and keeping silent. On that day they are perfumed with fragrant camphor, saffron and Malaya sandalwood, and have always performed the ritual rinsing. Seated on mats of kuśa grass, having had the rite of protection performed, chaste, truthful, and with their minds set on the Victor, they should be placed in that very outer maṇḍala, neither too near nor too far.

They should be pure and should have performed the purifications, in number from one up to eight, and no more. They should also all be devoted to one another. Great kings of the kṣatriya caste who have been anointed on the crown of the head, and their sons and young daughters who do not know the ways of the village, may be accepted, because the Blessed One, the great bodhisattva Mañjuśrī, who has the form of a youth, awakens childlike people and delights the young. Therefore, first of all, such ones who do not know the ways of the village should be made to enter. This is for the increase of the great king, for the increase of life and health, of power and great wealth, and above all because, through moral discipline, the accomplishment of the vidyā becomes firmly established.

Having first placed them in this way, the master, accompanied by a good companion, should burn camphor incense and go outside without turning his back. Having gone out, he should bathe, as is convenient, in water that is thoroughly clean and free of living creatures, over which the root vidyā has been recited eight hundred times and which has been sealed with the great mudrā. Having performed the ritual rinsing, clean and wearing clean clothes, he should go to the fire hearth, sit on a mat of kuśa grass facing the northeast, and perform a fire offering of eight thousand oblations of ghee mixed with camphor, saffron and sandalwood. By the rite stated before, he invites the deities and requests them to depart. Then he should enter the maṇḍala again.

Having entered, he should offer eight full vases, furnished with clean cloth, adorned with leafy branches and fruits of the sahakāra mango tree, with gold, silver, jewels and grain placed inside. These should be offered one each: the first to the Blessed One Śākyamuni; the second to all the buddhas; the third to the whole Saṅgha of noble śrāvakas; the fourth to all the bodhisattvas; the fifth to the great bodhisattva, noble Avalokiteśvara; and the sixth to all the gods. The seventh and the eighth should be placed in the gatehouse of the second maṇḍala, and one of them should be placed after dedicating it as shared in common with all sentient beings.

Then, by the very rite stated before, he should burn incense, bind the utpala mudrā, and again invite the deities: all the buddhas, all the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas, the great bodhisattvas, and all the bhūtas; and Avalokiteśvara too should be invited by the very rite stated before. Likewise flowers, incense, scents, lamps and food offerings should be presented, by the procedure already shown, with all the food offerings, to all of them, in proper sequence. Since lamps are mentioned, lamps of ghee should be offered. Since food offerings are mentioned for all, noble and not noble: boiled śāli rice with curd and honey, oil cakes fried in ghee and prepared with a special milk porridge, aśoka coils, sugar candy and the like should all be offered to the tathāgatas. Filled pastries, sandalwood infusion, honey and milk, and dishes cooked with milk porridge are for all the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas, the great bodhisattvas and the noble gods, and fragrant flowers too should be offered to them. Laḍḍu sweets, special garbhatkvā cakes and the provisions mentioned before should be offered to all the gods, the hosts of bhūtas and all sentient beings.

Likewise jasmine, tagara flowers, punnāga and the rest, as specifically taught before, should be offered to the buddhas, the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas, the great bodhisattvas, and all the gods, noble and not noble. In particular, jasmine flowers are for the Tathāgata family, lotuses for the Lotus family, and likewise blue lotuses for the family of Vajrapāṇi; for the others, it is done with ordinary mantras. Camphor incense is for the Tathāgata family; sandalwood for the Lotus family; and likewise guggulu should be known to belong to the Lord of Secrets, the Vajra Holder himself. To all other mantra deities ordinary incense should be offered.

To all the noble ones
Lamps of ghee should be offered.
To the mantra deities who are not noble
Let fragrant sesame oil be offered.
In keeping with the sequence of the rite,
Incense is given by reason of what has been seen.
The scents stated in just that way
Are always for all the mantra deities.
Whatever is stated for the Tathāgata,

And whatever is stated for Vajrapāṇi
In their own respective tantras,
The practitioner, for the sake of mantra practice,
Should regard here as the rite.
It is to be followed throughout.

Thus it was said.

Then the master of the maṇḍala, following the rite as seen before, performs the subsequent acts of inviting the deities, worshipping them, offering incense and the rest, and presenting the food offerings. After that, together with a supreme companion in practice who is skilled and quick, he should loudly sound the tones of drums, paṭaha drums and conches, and, adorned with incense, flowers, lamps and garlands, circumambulate the outer maṇḍala in the four directions, the intermediate directions, above, below and all around, and then cast an abundant torma for all the bhūtas, all of it without meat.

Then, having bathed, he should again perform eight thousand fire offerings of śāli rice mixed with curd, honey and ghee, and of thick porridge, with the root vidyā or the heart mantra.

Having performed the fire offering, the master of the maṇḍala, who has carried out the rites of protection for the great beings who are to enter the maṇḍala arranged before, shows the maṇḍala to those he has accepted as disciples: those who have generated the mind set on awakening, who have kept the restoration ceremony, who have offered their own bodies to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas for the sake of accomplishment, who have become a shared resource for the enjoyment of all sentient beings, who will take their place at the unsurpassed seat of awakening, and who through their virtues wish to attain buddhahood, the wisdom of omniscience. By the very showing of the maṇḍala they are freed from all evil; even people who commit the deeds of immediate retribution are freed in that instant.

Then the master of the maṇḍala should cover the faces of those who wish to enter the maṇḍala with a cloth of silk freshly woven by a weaver, free of hairs, consecrated seven times with the root vidyā, and perfumed with fragrant sandalwood and saffron; and the practitioner should first lead them in before the Blessed Lady. A prince who has been anointed on the crown of the head, or a son of the kṣatriya caste, or others of great zeal who desire great kingship, should also be led in. While they stand in the second maṇḍala with their faces covered, they should be given fragrant flowers mixed with sandalwood and saffron and made to cast the flowers with thoroughly cleansed hands. Wherever a person's flower falls, the vidyā mantra of that deity should be given to him. It is universally known that in other lives that deity and this person were bound together. That very deity is his spiritual friend, and accomplishes for him his taking his place at the seat of awakening and his perfecting of great awakening, the wisdom of omniscience. That very deity is the one he is to accomplish, and accomplishes for him great wealth, great kingship, persons renowned for great power, and this companionship. In this very life, by applying himself intensely to whatever practice he takes up, all his rites will succeed. In this way, one after another, such persons may be led in, up to eight, and no others. Thus it is said. Others who wish to practice may also enter as they wish, for the sake of exhausting their evil deeds, but for them it amounts only to the pledge. Thus it is said.

If the master of the maṇḍala is to confer consecration, first of all, outside the maṇḍala, neither too far nor too near, in the northeastern quarter, he should bless a piece of ground with the root mantra and purify it with mantras. Then, regarding it just like the consecration of a king, he should consecrate such persons as these, up to five: those with wholehearted, clear faith in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha; of great zeal; never apart from the awakening mind; who have entered the Great Vehicle; who serve the Three Jewels; whose faculties are complete and who are not of despised standing; who wish to accomplish vidyās and mantras in this very life; of good intention; whose minds delight in the conduct of mantra; who by nature seek auspicious signs; and who, as a cause of awakening, have no doubt about the meaning of the vidyā and keep their minds fixed upon it. The rest should be set aside. Thus it is said. This is by the distinction of being wise and unconfused in conduct; others are not to be admitted.

Then, just as at the consecration of any king, all the requisites should be gathered, and the master and the preceptor should be pleased. Then a canopy is stretched out, banners and flags and a white parasol are held over the head, white yak-tail whisks are waved, and with great honor the joyful sounds of conches, great drums and clay drums are loudly sounded, with cries of victory. While he is praised with verses of auspiciousness and extolled with the verses of well-being spoken by the Victor, the circumambulation is made. Having performed that auspicious rite and bowed to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, he should speak these words: "Master, in order to follow rightly in the accomplishment of the mantra conduct of all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, to enter rightly into the maṇḍala of liberation, the great secret beyond all that is worldly, and because I wish to realize buddhahood through the whole kingdom of the Dharma, in short, so that buddhahood may come about, I shall apply myself with zeal." Thus it is said.

Then, while he sits on a mat of kuśa grass facing the east, seeing and understanding the maṇḍala, the master should first confer on him the consecration of the vidyā and recite the great mudrā and the root vidyā. Then whatever vidyās and mantras there are should be written with gorocana on a leaf of birch bark. Having written them, one should wash one's hands and a pair of bowls joined mouth to mouth with sandalwood and saffron, then place the birch bark inside the joined bowls and set it within the maṇḍala at the feet of the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara. Then, sitting there, one should first recite the root vidyā mantra one hundred and eight times. Then the one seated there on the mat of kuśa grass should be consecrated.

In the outer maṇḍala, the master should take up the full vase that was earlier placed near the gate, the one shared in common with all, and, reciting the root vidyā, consecrate the disciple on the crown of the head. He should consecrate the disciple on the crown of the head with the water, as the disciple wishes. Thus it is said. Then the pair of joined bowls should be given to him as his own. He should be made to read the writing by the light of a lamp. If what he has thereby received is a vidyā or mantra of the Blessed One, it performs its rites through the reading alone. Otherwise it becomes effective when it is accomplished step by step and with effort. Others become accomplished through mantra recitation alone. After that the mantra will be fully grasped. At first it is accomplished through practice alone. This is said for one who is free of doubt. That very mantra written earlier will certainly be accomplished through the master's three accomplishments, without effort.

In this same way the consecration of the vidyā should be given first. As for the consecration in the second maṇḍala: if in the second maṇḍala one consecrates the disciple on the crown of the head with the full vase that was presented to all the maṇḍalas and all the deities, by exactly the rite given before, he is freed from all evil and receives the permission of all the buddhas. He will also have a special longing to accomplish the pledges, maṇḍalas, mantras and mudrās of all that is worldly and beyond the world. All the bodhisattvas confer on him the consecration of a master.

In the third maṇḍala, with that same rite, one should consecrate him on the crown of the head with the full vase offered to all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. One should say: "All the buddhas and bodhisattvas, endowed with great miraculous power, grant you permission to teach the vidyā mantras of all that is worldly and beyond the world, to draw maṇḍalas, to explain them, to teach the tantras, the mudrās of the tantras and their conduct with certainty, and to teach their own rites with certainty." In this very life, or in other lives that follow, he will certainly attain buddhahood.

Likewise, for the consecration of victory and complete victory, with the rite taught before, one consecrates him in exactly the same way with the full vase offered earlier to the Blessed One and the full vase offered to the bodhisattvas. Likewise one should say: "The buddhas, the blessed ones, the great bodhisattvas and the śrāvakas grant you permission: be unassailable by all bhūtas, invincible by all embodied beings, and completely victorious. Accomplish all the mantras just as you wish!"

Then the master of the maṇḍala should give consecration to each of the five beings, according to each one's wish. Then, having led them into the maṇḍala one after another, he should present them to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, circumambulate the maṇḍala three times, and request the deities to depart. Then, on another day, they should gradually be trained in the conduct of vidyā and secret mantra and set to its practice.

At that same moment one should go and take up the full vase of water offered earlier as a support, the one offered earlier to the great bodhisattva, and have those who have entered the maṇḍala face the east and drink three handfuls of the water. One should say this: "O great bodhisattvas, whoever transgresses the secret pledge will generate much demerit."

In whatever maṇḍala it may be, those of low caste who have come into the maṇḍala there should also be helped: the master of the maṇḍala, having roused the mind of great compassion, has them, at the hands of an assistant, with a clean white cloth bound over the head by another, or standing wholly covered with cloth, bind the mudrā of the pledge, and the low-caste persons should then cast the flowers. Then, through those assistants as well, all the beings who have entered should bathe. For them too, only the pledge comes about. And their practice will also be accomplished.

Then one goes to the place where the fire rite was performed before, with kuśa grass whose tips are unbroken. There, too, three kinds of fire hearth are taught: for pacifying, for increasing, and for fierce rites. For pacifying, it is lotus-shaped. Or, by gratifying, it serves also for subjugating. For fierce rites it is triangular. In every procedure of the fire rite kuśa grass is spread out. Having bowed to all the buddhas, one should set the fire rite at the eastern tip. Having bowed to the bodhisattvas, the great beings, who later perform the fire rite, at the southern tip. Having bowed to all the bodhisattvas, one should give it at the northern tip. Likewise the tasks are performed by assistants of steady character: the fire rite with the kuśa grass. First, it is done with the root vidyā. First one should offer twenty-one oblations of parched rice mixed with curd, honey and ghee. For pacifying, it is with pure ghee. For increasing, it is a fire offering of three apāmārga sticks. For fierce rites, it is with kaṭake. This procedure of the fire rite is also common to all practices everywhere, and to the ancillary practices of all the maṇḍalas.

Then the master of the maṇḍala, having shown the principal god of the Pure Abodes and performed the fire rite, should say these words to those who have entered all the maṇḍalas. Then, with recitation of the root vidyā, the guest water is offered.

"May the buddhas, the blessed ones, the bodhisattvas, and also the eminent gods of great miraculous power, and the śrāvakas of the Blessed One, please listen! Whoever in this maṇḍala of the pledge has acted with reverence, even if going beyond the rite, and whoever else has in some way let himself fall short, may they, through this root of virtue, attain the consecration of all the maṇḍalas, and never be parted from the domain of all the tathāgatas and the domain of all the bodhisattvas! May they swiftly attain happiness!" These words should be spoken.

To all the beings who have entered the maṇḍala one should say: "In short, you must never be parted from the awakening mind. Be devoted to giving, abide in loving-kindness and the rest, worship all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and, in short, study the scriptures, the vidyās and the secret mantras spoken by the buddhas and bodhisattvas. You must never be parted from the awakening mind."

Then the master of the maṇḍala, having offered guest water with fragrant flowers to all of them, the bodhisattvas and the rest, or else having offered the guest water mentally, recites the root vidyā with gaccha gaccha, or simply recites svāhā, looks out in the four directions, binds the root mudrā of the Blessed Lady, and, gazing steadily upward, should request the deities to depart. Thus it is said.

This completes the second chapter, the extensive chapter on the rite of the maṇḍala, from the Root Rite of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then that great being, again surveying the maṇḍala of the assembly complete in every respect, spoke to all the sons of the gods: "Listen! What is the Tārā that is the supreme accomplishment, the supremely secret, the rite of all sādhanas, that performs all the rites of vidyā and performs the excellent rites of vidyā, that is greatness itself and brings about great aims, that averts all calamities and accomplishes all aims, the supremely auspicious, auspicious in every way, spoken by all the buddhas, that has truly become my own supremely secret essence, to be applied in all minor rites, and that brings accomplishment in all the great rites of the great queen of vidyās? It is this: namo ratnatrayāya nama āryābalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā tāre tuttāre ture svāhā.

"Friends, this is Noble Tārā, who performs all great rites and who is accomplished by recitation in all minor rites. This vidyā, supremely secret, utterly secret, supremely accomplished, which destroys all rites applied by others, also serves as the rite and sādhana of the second maṇḍala. Through Noble Tārā it is to be applied to all great rites in summary and to all minor rites, and also to the rites and sādhanas of all the maṇḍalas.

"Whether by day or by night, it should be drawn in a clean place. The master of the maṇḍala, himself free of faults and alone, should first make a maṇḍala that is square and even, with four gates, measuring four cubits. In the center is the mudrā of a lotus. To its right are a blue utpala, the mudrā of a staff, and the mudrā of a water pot. To the left are the mudrā of a three-pronged vajra, the mudrā of Pāṇḍaravāsinī, and the mudrās of Hayagrīva and Mahāśrī. At the eastern gate is a lotus; in the north an utpala; in the south a vajra; in the west, apart from the order of entry; and above, the mudrā of a noose in coiled form. After that, having performed the fire rite outside and done the worship and the rest by the rite stated before, one should enter the maṇḍala.

"For this, one who desires kingship does it at a haḍpya tree. One who desires wealth does it at the shrine of the god of his own house. One who desires horses does it in a horse stable. One who desires elephants does it in an elephant stable. One who desires a son does it at the foot of a bodeci tree. For one seized by a brahmarākṣasa, it is done at a place protected by Brahmā. For one seized by a nāga, near a nāga tree. For one seized by a ḍākinī, at a crossroads. For one seized by a yakṣa, at the foot of a banyan tree. For one seized by a pūtana, near a well. Other places too may be used as one wishes; wherever it is done, there is no fault.

"Friends, in short, this vidyā serves for the maṇḍala and for all rites; it is to be applied to all rites. It should be applied together with this great secret. This maṇḍala bears the fruit of the wish to benefit beings. The vidyā of the Tārā maṇḍala increases all wealth; for the benefit of practitioners it increases all prosperity. In short, it is renowned as having become the master of all embodied beings who will come in the future.

"Then this great maṇḍala, once obtained, destroys misfortune and brings peace, and carries off disease and enemies. Whoever sees and hears of such a maṇḍala, which brings about the splendor and strength of all beings, and then gives rise to clear faith in the rite, I prophesy, without doubt, to the awakening of all the buddhas. They will become buddhas of the future, and those guides of the world will also rejoice.

"The maṇḍala on the ground, it is said,
Performs all the rites of pacifying.
Through it the destitute gain benefit.
Beings without protector and in suffering
Should make use of the maṇḍala.
With powder of sapphire and the like
One should draw the maṇḍala in full.
If there is no sapphire or the like,
One should draw it with powder of śāli rice.
If there is no rice powder or the like,
One should draw it with powdered brick and the like.
If there is no powdered brick or the like,
One should draw it with sand.
Thus the wondrous maṇḍala of Tārā,
Which gathers all good qualities,
Is the true word of the Protector of the World,
Spoken by the bodhisattva." Thus it was said.

This completes the third chapter, the extensive chapter on the rite of the sādhana and the rite of the maṇḍala, from the Root Rite of the Blessed Lady, Noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, a Great Vehicle sūtra belonging to the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then the great being, again surveying that great maṇḍala and contemplating the noble true nature that is without entity, taught the rite of the painted cloth, the supreme rite of accomplishment of the Blessed Lady, the great sovereign of vidyās, which all the tathāgatas have taught and in which they rejoice.

First of all, on an auspicious day, one should take cotton bought at the hero's price and have it prepared into cotton by the hands of a brahmin girl. Then that cotton should be blessed: taking the thread bought at the hero's price, with the root vidyā, one should say these words: "May all the buddhas, bodhisattvas, śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas bless it! May the Blessed Ones and the great bodhisattvas grant that all goes well, that my life bears fruit, and bless the accomplishment of the mantra!"

At that time one may hear the sounds of paṭaha drums, great drums, conches, vīṇās, flutes, staff drums and muraja drums; or kṣatriya men, kṣatriya women, women, boys, girls or other people may suddenly utter words such as "Victory!", "Accomplished!", "Bestowing accomplishment!", "Given!", "Take it!", "Glory!", "With fruit!", "The wheel of action!", "Many!", or other such words of good omen; or the sound of bells may arise, or sounds of joy. The vidyādhara should know these to be the blessing of the buddhas, the blessed ones, and the bodhisattvas. For it is said that otherwise accomplishment has no fruit.

If at that time those people give out harsh sounds, uttering such things as "Take it!", "Eat it!", "Seize it!", "Ruined!", "Destroy it!", "Alas!", "Not for long!"; or if men, buffaloes, jackals, donkeys, cats, or lowly animals, two-footed or four-footed, give out their cries, then the practitioner should know that there will be no supreme accomplishment for him, and in this very life he should discipline himself thoroughly. Having done everything again as before, he should begin anew. In this way, through seven attempts, even one who has committed the five deeds of immediate retribution will succeed through applying the rite the seventh time. Thus it is said.

Then the practitioner, having performed protection for that girl, should have her sit on a mat of kuśa grass, placed facing the east or facing the north. He himself should eat a feast of caru, and should also have the girl eat a feast of caru. On the mat of kuśa grass examined before, by that same rite, he should have her spin the cotton. The thread, soft and well twisted, should be properly taken up by the girl blessed before, and the girl should make it in counts from one, five, eight and so on up to about sixteen, duly reckoned by weight in kārṣas.

Of these, the best is to make sixteen;
Likewise the middling is eight;
For accomplishing the minor rites,
Five and one are the least.
For all the mantras, the knower of mantras Should do as he is able.
From that time onward, whatever Evil deeds were done before
Are destroyed in that very instant
By the mind fixed upon the thread.
Having taken up this thread,
One should put it in a clean vessel.
Having set it in its proper place,
One should fumigate it with camphor incense.
With scents that do not come from the bodies of living creatures,
Or with saffron, sandalwood and the like,
Or with campaka, mālikā and the like,
It should be perfumed with fragrant flowers.
Having placed it in a clean place
And performed the rite of protection,
The knower of mantras, who understands all rites,
Should recite in deep meditative composure.

Then one should go to a weaver
And give him whatever wage he wants.
He should not lack any limb, nor be emaciated;
He should always delight in the white Dharma;
He should not be tormented by illness, nor be old;
He should be free of phlegm and of troubled breathing;
He should be neither a eunuch nor of both sexes,
And he should not be of low standing;
Having given up evil transgressions,
He should be fully endowed with good marks,
Highly praised and pleasant to look upon,
Virtuous in all his conduct through understanding,
And versed in the ways of the world.

For one who desires accomplishment,
To weave the supreme cloth
Is one praised, endowed with the strength of virtue,
Or an intelligent craftsman, highly skilled.
By the supreme weaver of cloth,
Who excels in great skill,
The best cloth is made.
A middling one produces the middling;
The lowest serves for the minor rites,
Being inferior in every respect.
Whatever the craftsman asks,
Give him the price accordingly.
At the very first word
The craftsman speaks, the knower of mantras
Should quickly give the price.
This is called the hero's purchase.
Haggling over it, and over its price,
Reverses the effect.
The cloth of one who swiftly gains accomplishment
Is unsurpassed and supreme,
Most worthy of veneration in the rites,
The very happiness of gods and humans,
And the glory of all bhūtas:
So taught the perfectly awakened Buddha.

Then the vidyādhara, having given the restoration vows to the weaver, chooses a very pure lunar mansion, or the fortnight of miracles, or a bright day, having carefully observed a bright planet; or it may be in another bright fortnight. In springtime, when the sahakāra mango has put forth its shoots and blossoms, and the flowers and branches of the trees are flourishing, at that best of seasons, in the morning at sunrise, together with the favorable conditions taught before, the weaver should eat a meal of caru, put on white clothes, and bind a crest upon his head. He should be well washed, well anointed with white sandalwood or saffron, whichever is available, with his body anointed, his mouth perfumed with the scent of camphor, glad of mind, and freed from hunger and thirst.

Then all the parts of the loom, the shuttle and the rest, should be washed with earth and cow dung, and even new ones should again be washed with the five products of the cow. Then they should be washed with water free of living creatures, and sprinkled with white sandalwood and saffron. In a clean place, free of noise, free of local people, a secluded spot with a canopy, in secret, one makes offerings of flowers, incense and the rest.

Then, afterward, the practitioner should empower white mustard seed one hundred and eight times with that same mantra of thorough purification, and scatter it in the four directions, above and below, and in the intermediate directions. Then, having struck the weaver with white mustard seed, one binds the fivefold crest with the great mudrā; when the binding of the topknot has been done, great protection will have been made. If the cloth is to be of the best kind, the weaver should weave it to this measure: four cubits in width and eight cubits in length. If it is to be middling, it is two cubits in width and five cubits in length. The least is of the measure of one span of the Sugata in width, and in length one cubit of the Buddha. Of these, one span of the Buddha, the Blessed One, is one cubit of a man of the Middle Country who is of proper proportions. This is proclaimed to be the span of the Sugata, and by this measure all measures are explained.

This is for the accomplishment of the ritual dagger,
As the Supreme Person has taught.
After the Sage has passed from sight,
The middling is for one who desires kingship.
For persons who seek great wealth,
And over gods, asuras and hooded nāgas,
The least is taught to bring success.
With the middling, the accomplishment is middling.
The middling cloth at all times
Accomplishes the rites for all sentient beings.
For accomplishing minor rites,
The least cloth at all times
Accomplishes all the rites.
With all substances, at all times,
It accomplishes all the rites.
People who seek the glory of the accomplishments
Set forth definitively by the three kinds of cloth painting,
Even Śakra and the other lords of bliss,

Will not succeed if the rite is impaired.
But if the rite is properly complete,
Then even for ordinary human beings,
Through effort, all the rites
Will be accomplished very swiftly.
The Victors and the Victors' supreme heirs
Have rightly taught this practice.
For sentient beings, wretched and without protector,
Tormented by suffering, it is the glory of all;
This, which lies on the path to awakening,
Has been taught by those who see reality.
That this Dharma is the cause of awakening
Is taught by way of the path of mantra.
Through the maṇḍala that has been rightly taught,
All the worldly maṇḍalas
And the transcendent ones too will be accomplished,
And the mantras accomplished without effort.
Whoever wishes it as a cause of awakening
Will always gain accomplishment.
For others, who never benefit beings,
It is said there is no accomplishment.
For all who engage for the sake of awakening,
All the cloth paintings are said to succeed.
This pledge of the Lord Avalokiteśvara
In particular, so that the aims to be achieved are swiftly accomplished,
Has been taught here by the Blessed One
So that everything may be attained.

Then, in due order, the artisan Should weave the cloth with effort.
In five days and nights, or in eight,
In sixteen, in two or in four,
Swiftly, working day and night,
When the weaving of the cloth is complete,
The artisan who has supremely succeeded
Is virtuous by day and by night.
Perfect in the conduct of cleanliness,

The artisan, always blessed,
Should go to a distant place
And there void excrement and urine.
Taking off the clothes he came in,
He should put on other, fresh clothes;
Wearing white garments and wearing a garland,
He should rinse himself again and again.
Anointing his body with white sandalwood,
He should make the tools and the rest clean.
Always gentle and well purified,
He should once again weave with effort.
By such practices as these,
Taught by the other Victors,
Or with effort, through careful examination and proper method,
The cloth should be woven in its entirety.
When the weaving of the cloth is complete,
Well produced by the procedure given before,
It should be made of proper measure and even.
On an auspicious day,
The threads should be set evenly, line by line.
In the beauty of the bright fortnight,
On a bamboo staff four cubits long
The cloth is taken up, and then one goes.
Having made the artisan content
By bestowing wealth lavishly,
The mantra practitioner of good vows and good conduct
Goes wherever he wishes,
Worships it with fragrant flowers,
And sets it down in a clean place.
With this very mantra
One performs the rite of protection.
With the mantra by which the cotton was earlier
Purified again, thoroughly, in many ways,
With that same mantra one should protect Oneself and the cloth itself.
The bodhisattva, the great hero,
Has taught it through mantra recitation;

It was taught by many buddhas,
And by me too it is taught again.
That very form of mantra
Practiced through all the secret mantras,
Of great diligence and great splendor,
Accomplishing all the aims of mantra,
Becomes the cause of protection of every kind
And acts in various ways.
The sentient beings who dwell in Jambudvīpa
Are wholly deluded in the conduct of their minds, Without faith and perverse,
Greedy for wrong conduct,
And they do not accomplish mantras.
For that very reason it is taught again:
They wander in the dark prison of saṃsāra.
But whoever is always pure in mind,
Faithful, delighting in festivity and auspiciousness,
Always applying himself to all the mantras,
Great-souled and desiring accomplishment,
Always holding and keeping them,
Of great enthusiasm and great splendor,
For him, whatever mantras the Victor has taught
Are perfectly accomplished without effort.
In people who have no faith
White qualities do not arise,
Just as seed sown in salty ground
Yields no sprout and no fruit.
Faith is always the root of the Dharma,
So the One Who Sees All Things has said.
For those whose nature accords with the meaning of the Dharma, Accomplishment through mantra is always declared.

Then the practitioner, with the artisan,
Who is a painter, or else himself,
Being skilled in painting,
Takes pigments that are unmixed and clear in color,
And colored paints,

And just as was done for the weaver,
By that same rite as before,
Complete with the proper characteristics,
It should be done in full for the painter, as above.

Just as before for the weaver,
By that same rite he Should paint the picture on the cloth,
Or else one paints the picture oneself.
With camphor, saffron and sandalwood
The pigments in their clay dishes should be charged.
Burning incense, and with the mantra itself
Reciting one hundred and eight times,
Flowers of nāgakesara, punnāga,
Bakula and campaka,
Vāriṣika, dhānasku,
Mālatī and the rest
Should be scattered upon that cloth.
Facing toward the east,
Seated on a mat of kuśa grass, with a mind of faith
Toward all the buddhas and bodhisattvas,
Being resolute, he takes this fine brush
In hand, and with an undisturbed Mind paints the picture on the cloth.

First of all, the Tathāgata Śākyamuni should be painted, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, marked with the thirty-two marks of a great person, his body beautified by the eighty excellent minor marks, seated on a precious lotus, blazing with light on all sides, his body beautified by a fathom-wide aura on all sides, in the act of teaching the Dharma, his body utterly serene, endowed with the supreme of all aspects. The lotus in the center has a stem of beryl. Below, the nāga kings Nanda and Upananda should be painted, firmly holding the stem of that lotus, the great seat, gazing at the Tathāgata and paying homage with their right hands, white, adorned with all ornaments, the halves of their bodies in human form. All around that lotus pond, it should be painted in a beautiful manner, filled with lotus petals and flowers, some slightly open and some in full bloom, with water birds, fish and the like, laid out in full.

From the lotus stem at the base of the Blessed One, and from those very leaves, many lotus flowers spread out, rising in gradual tiers. On the left side there are eight lotus flowers, and upon them, seated on the lotuses, the bodies of eight great bodhisattvas should be painted.

First of all, the noble Avalokiteśvara, colored like saffron slightly pale, like the filaments of a lotus, and golden, his head adorned with a diadem bearing Amitābha, holding a blue utpala lotus in his hand, and with his right hand paying homage to the Tathāgata. His body is beautiful, he gazes at the Tathāgata with a peaceful air, his face slightly smiling, and enveloped in blazing light on all sides he stands at the center of the circle. On another lotus, the noble Candraprabha, the youthful one, should be painted in the same way. On the third, Sudhana. On the fourth, Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin. On the fifth, Gaganagañja. On the sixth, Kṣitigarbha. On the seventh, Mañjuśrī. On the eighth, Fair Eyes. All of these should be painted in the guise of youths, adorned with youthful ornaments.

On the right side of the Blessed One are eight great bodhisattvas, all adorned with every ornament except Maitreya. Close beside the Blessed One is the noble Maitreya in the guise of a celibate brahmin, his matted hair bound up as a crown on his head, wearing robes of golden and red saffron, with an upper garment of red silk, bearing the mark of the three tufts, beautiful in form, with a staff and a water flask placed in his left hand, the skin of a black antelope (kṛṣṇasāra) worn over his left shoulder, holding a rosary in his right hand and paying homage to the Tathāgata, his gaze fixed upon him, his mind engaged in focus on meditative concentration.

On the second lotus the noble Samantabhadra, dark blue like priyaṅgu, his body adorned with all ornaments, holding a precious wish-fulfilling jewel in his left hand and, with his right hand holding a bilva fruit, granting the supreme gift, beautiful in form, should likewise be painted.

On the third, the noble Avalokiteśvara, white like an autumn cloud, adorned with golden ornaments, wearing a crown of matted locks, with a white sacred thread, bearing the Omniscient One on his head: the noble Amitābha, possessed of the ten powers, seated within his matted locks. He is beautiful in form, holds a lotus in his left hand, grants the supreme gift with his right hand, his mind engaged in focus on meditative concentration, his body radiant on all sides.

On the fourth, the noble Vajrapāṇi, holding a vajra in his left hand and, holding in his right hand the plant called "near-cessation" together with its fruit, granting the supreme gift, golden in color, adorned with all ornaments, beautiful in form and of peaceful gaze, his body wound about with a half-necklace, with a sacred thread made of a pearl necklace, radiant with a blazing jeweled crown, wearing a lower garment of fine silk and an upper garment of white silk. The lower and upper garments of the noble Avalokiteśvara and of Samantabhadra are the same. The form of the body is as taught before.

On the fifth of the Tathāgata's lotuses is the noble Mahāmati; on the sixth, Śāntamati; on the seventh, Vairocanagarbha; on the eighth, the one called Apāyajaha. These bodhisattvas hold fruits and books in their hands, beautiful in every way, with upper garments of silk, adorned with all ornaments, their bodies in movement, wearing red saffron robes, seated with legs crossed upon slabs of jewel, of peaceful appearance, enveloped in garlands blazing on all sides. They should be painted while the cloth is being strewn all over with a carpet of fragrant flowers, namely mālatī, vārṣikā, dhanuṣkārikā, punnāga, nāgakesara and other flowers.

On the left side of the Blessed One Śākyamuni, above where the noble Mañjuśrī is, there is a circle of celestial palaces of very tall form, adorned with many jewels. A king of rocky mountains, beautiful, covered with slabs of jewel, should be painted in the form of a mountain.

Eight buddhas, blessed ones, dwelling there should be painted, as follows. The Tathāgata Ratnaśikhin should be painted: radiating the light of precious beryl, with a fathom-wide aura on all sides, blazing brilliantly on all sides with special great jewels such as ruby, sapphire, emerald and the like, beryl, diamond and the rest, colored somewhat like the rising sun, his Tathāgata body wearing a yellow Dharma robe as an upper garment, seated with legs crossed, in the act of teaching the Dharma, wearing a yellow lower garment, his body clad in the armor of the marks of a great person, his body beautified by the eighty excellent minor marks, with a gaze of perfect peace, endowed with the supreme of all aspects.

On the second, the Tathāgata Saṃkusumitarājendra should be painted, golden in color. He should be painted strewn with flowers of the finest nāgakesara, bakula and the like. He gazes at the noble Mañjuśrī, full of light on all sides, the radiance of jewels streaming out to the farthest limit.

On the third, the Tathāgata Śālendrarāja should be painted, appearing the color of lotus filaments, in the act of teaching the Dharma. On the fourth, the Tathāgata Fair Eyes should be painted. On the fifth, Duṣprasaha. On the sixth, the Victor Vairocana. On the seventh, Bhaiṣajyaguru, King of Beryl Light. On the eighth, the Tathāgata, the Victor, Lord Who Utterly Pacifies All Suffering, should be painted. All are golden in color, in the form of tathāgata bodies, granting fearlessness.

Above the tathāgatas, at both corners of the painting, two sons of the gods of the Pure Abodes, dwelling in openings among the clouds, should be painted letting fall a rain of flowers. Dwelling in the sky, they should be painted paying homage to all the buddhas, bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas and noble śrāvakas.

To the north of the pratyekabuddhas, above the bodhisattvas, leaving free the space at their heads, the eight great noble śrāvakas should be painted, namely the elder Śāriputra, Mahāmaudgalyāyana, Mahākāśyapa, Subhūti, Rāhula, Nanda, Bhadrika and Kapphiṇa. The pratyekabuddhas are these: Fragrant One, Candana, Upāriṣṭa, White One, Sika, Indra, Nemi and Sunemi. All are supremely and exceedingly beautiful, peaceful in demeanor, peaceful in nature, utterly disciplined in aspect. The great śrāvakas, their palms joined, are gazing intently at the Buddha, the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

On the upper side too, gods of the Pure Abodes and two other sons of the attendant gods should be painted, holding a silk canopy, very long on every side and exceedingly beautiful, above all the buddhas, bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas and noble śrāvakas; they are sons of the gods wearing divine garlands and garments.

Above the Blessed One Śākyamuni, over his head, there should be painted a silk canopy well arranged upon a network of jeweled strings, pearl necklaces and jeweled threads strung with ruby, sapphire and the like, beautiful with pearl necklaces hanging down all around it.

Below the lotus seat of the Buddha, the Blessed One, near the great bodhisattva, at the side of the nāga king Upananda, there is a mountain of jewels rising up out of the lotus pond: a mountain with jeweled shoots, caves and ravines, jeweled trees wound about with coral creepers, and inhabited and frequented by great sages. Upon it the wrathful king Tārā's Subjugator, of greatly fierce form, holding a noose in his left hand and a club in his right, with a wrathful, frowning face, gazing at the great bodhisattva and receiving his command, with a protruding belly and hair standing on end, black like collyrium and like a storm cloud, with tawny beard, long hair and long nails, red eyes, his neck adorned with snakes, wearing a tiger-skin lower garment, the destroyer of all obstructors, exceedingly terrible, the great king of wrathful ones, blazing on all sides: the wrathful kings Tārā's Subjugator should be painted in exactly this way. Below him are the various matted-haired ascetics.

Below that mountain, seated upon a rock, with body bowed and knees on the ground, holding a censer in the hand, with dress, shape, manner and conduct rendered just as they are, gazing at the noble Mañjuśrī, one should be painted correctly.

Below the Blessed One Śākyamuni, on the right side, the lordly nāga king Nanda should be painted, and beside him another king of lordly jeweled mountains rising up out of the lotus pond, just as described; the wrathful king Tārā's Subjugator should be painted likewise, with a carpet of divine flowers strewn about. That mountain is painted below Avalokiteśvara.

That mountain should be painted very high, in the form of slabs of ruby, with shoots of the same, and with peaks made of beryl. Resting upon it is the goddess who is the compassion of Avalokiteśvara, the noble Tārā, her body adorned with all ornaments, with an upper garment of red silk and a lower garment of multicolored silk, adorned with all the ornaments of a woman, holding a blue utpala lotus in her left hand, golden in color, not too stout and not too old, her mind abiding in meditative concentration, sitting as she receives the command, with her right hand wishing to grant the supreme gift, her body slightly bowed, seated with legs crossed, gazing slightly toward the noble Avalokiteśvara, surrounded by garlands blazing on all sides.

There too, on that very peak of precious beryl, it is surrounded by punnāga trees, every branch adorned all over with flowers, which, having opened, overspread the Blessed Lady Tārā. With those same bending branches, and with clusters of vividly bright coral shoots, of brightly varied form, in blazing colors, the face of the goddess Tārā should be painted, appearing clearly on all sides.

The goddess who destroys all obstructors,
Supreme in destroying fear,
Granting the supreme gift, virtuous,
Should be painted for the practitioner's protection.
The goddess who bears a woman's form,

Child of the compassion of the one with the ten powers,
Is the glory of all beings;
She who grants the supreme gift should be painted.
The goddess who performs great deeds,
The bodhisattva of great light,
Is desired by the practitioner always
For the destruction of all obstructors.
For the protection of lords of men
And for the sake of glory she is renowned.
The lordly wrathful king
Who wishes to dwell on the mountain's peak,
For the sake of destroying all obstructors,
Was taught by the supreme heirs of the Victor.
Greatly fierce, of great diligence,
Greatly violent, of great rays of light,
He should be conceived as being expressly
For subduing beings who hate the teaching.
For the practitioner's protection,
And for destroying all the obstructors,
He, of terrible and wrathful nature,
Summons the deities of the mantras.
Exceedingly fierce, of fierce form,
Without pity, he decisively restrains.
Those who commit violent evil deeds,
Who have not been brought under control, he brings under control.
Those who move in the sky and move on the earth,
And those who move everywhere beneath the earth,
All the malignant ones who oppose
The teaching of the Sage, he destroys.

The cloth should be painted square all round
And at its four corners.
Along the lower edges of the cloth
A broad river is to be made.
A nāga marked by a serpent hood,
One alone, is to be made throughout,
With white and handsome limbs,

Half his body formed in human shape,
Always joining his palms
And placing them upon his head.
That nāga of seven hoods, of great diligence,
Possessing great power,
Is called by the name Ananta.
He gazes intently at the Tathāgata.
Beautiful with precious jewels,
Exceedingly beautiful and of beautiful form,
Adorned with precious ornaments,
With blazing garlands, he should be painted all over.
Renowned as a great lord of nāgas,
Devoted to the teaching of the Sage,
Striving to benefit all the world,
For the destruction of all obstructors,
He should be painted resting in the river.

This rite of the cloth painting
Has been taught by the Victor in brief;
At length, the tathāgatas
Have explained it fully before.
Whatever wise one paints it,
His merit is endless.
Whatever most terrible evil deeds
Were done over ten million eons
Are destroyed in that very instant
By seeing the painting on the earth.
Those who commit the five deeds of immediate retribution,
Those of corrupt moral discipline and those who are reviled,
Those deeply engaged in every evil,
Beings who wander throughout saṃsāra,
Of low birth:
Those should not be allowed to hold the cloth painting.
Yet the Lord of Sages has said that by seeing
The cloth painting they gain a fruit.
Therefore, through merely seeing it,
In that instant evil is destroyed.

What need to mention the people who attain accomplishment:
Those who enter it with purity,
Those who enter into reciting it after,
And those diligent in listening to the mantra?
Whatever merit there is in offering
To all the buddhas for ten million eons,
The mantra practitioner who paints
The cloth painting on earth will obtain that merit.
Whatever fruit is gained
By one who, in the world, again and again, many times,
Offers feasts to buddhas
As many as are counted the sands of the Ganges,
And to the Victors' heirs, the rhinoceros-like solitary victors,
And to the śrāvakas,
That fruit belongs to the mantra practitioner who paints the cloth painting,
Who sees it and reads the rite,
Who rejoices in it,
And who thoroughly examines all the rites.
Through that accomplishment of his mantra,
As many worldly mantras as there are,
And all the mantras spoken
By the Victor, the supreme being,
By his disciples, the rhinoceros-like ones, and the gods,
And by the great-souled bodhisattvas,
Are accomplished in the presence of this cloth painting.

From the Great Vehicle sūtra collection of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, the first painting of the extensive root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā of the Upswept Locks, is complete.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni, looking upon the entire assembly, said to the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, "Great being, there is moreover an intermediate rite of the cloth painting for you. I shall explain it. Listen well and keep it well in mind. I shall explain.

"First of all, using the colors taught before, the very rite stated before, the artisan examined before, and the intermediate measure given before, with cloth that is exceedingly clean, soft, thoroughly purified, with its selvage, with unmixed colors, free of any mixture of hair and so forth, one should have the later cloth painting painted exactly as the first, except for the measure and the figures.

"First of all, the abode of the Pure Abodes, beautiful in every way, as if made of precious crystal, adorned with necklaces of white pearls. In its center one should have the Blessed One Śākyamuni painted, seated upon a precious lion throne, in the act of teaching the Dharma, endowed with the supreme of all aspects.

"On his right side, the noble Avalokiteśvara, appearing the color of lotus filaments, or of saffron, or of the sun, holding a lotus at his left shoulder, palms joined, gazing intently at the Blessed One Śākyamuni, his face slightly smiling, the great bodhisattva, with a crown bearing an auspicious emblem at its center, with a white sacred thread, his right knee on the ground and his head bowed.

"On the left side of the Blessed One Śākyamuni, Vajrapāṇi, dark blue like priyaṅgu, should be painted just as taught before, except that he is waving a yak-tail fan over the Blessed One."

"At his side the noble Maitreya, Samantabhadra, Vajrapāṇi, Mahāmati, Śāntamati, Gaganagañja and Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin should be painted in order; one should have them painted adorned with all ornaments, just as in the first.

"Above them one should have eight buddhas, blessed ones, painted, seated, the right hand granting fearlessness, their bodies wearing upper robes of yellow Dharma cloth, the left hand holding the edge of the Dharma robe, wearing lower garments of saffron cloth appearing slightly red, radiant on all sides, endowed with the supreme of all aspects. One should have these buddhas, blessed ones, painted, namely the Tathāgata Saṃkusumitarāja, Ratnaśikhin, Viśvabhū, Krakucchanda, Kanakamuni, Kāśyapa and Fair Eyes.

"On the right side of the Blessed One one should have the noble Avalokiteśvara painted, together with the great circle of his close retinue. One should have the eight great śrāvakas and the eight pratyekabuddhas painted just as taught before, except that the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana and Śāriputra should be painted in the form of attendants, waving yak-tail fans over the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

"In the same way the sons of the gods of the Pure Abodes should be painted. Śakra, lord of the gods, Suyāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarati, Pure, Stainless, Sudarśana, Ābhāsvara, Brahmā lord of the Sahā world, and Akaniṣṭha: such sons of the gods who move in the form realm, and the sons of the gods who move in the desire realm, should be painted in order.

"One should lay out the circle of the retinue that attends on Avalokiteśvara, richly adorned, and have each painted bearing his own form and attire.

"Below the lion throne of the Blessed One one should have painted a mountain made entirely of jewels, rising from the great ocean, as far as the edge of the cloth. In one corner at the edge of the cloth one should have the practitioner painted, in the form of his actual attire and shape, with knee and head bowed, holding a censer in the hand.

"On that jeweled mountain, below the noble Avalokiteśvara, the wrathful king Tārā's Subjugator should be painted just as definitively taught before.

"Below the lion throne, on the left side of the Blessed One, near the feet of the noble Avalokiteśvara, the goddess Tārā should be painted, seated on a jeweled mountain; one should have her painted just as definitively taught before.

"All around that cloth loose flowers should be scattered: one should strew a carpet all round about with flowers of campaka, blue utpala, lotus, saugandhika, mālatī, varṣika, dhānuskārṣikā, punnāga, nāgakesara and the like.

"At the top of the cloth, in the two corners at the edge of the cloth, two sons of the gods should be painted scattering masses of flowers, of brightly varied form, hovering within rain clouds in the sky, white in color.

"This is declared the intermediate cloth painting.
It always brings about virtue and well-being,
And grants middling accomplishments
To the people on the face of the earth.
Whatever slight evil one did before
While wandering through saṃsāra,
By seeing the painting here
It is destroyed in that very instant.
Sentient beings, deluded and unknowing,
Wander in the five destinies.
Whoever sees the intermediate painting
Of the bodhisattva, even one

Who comes to commit evil,
Who commits the five deeds of immediate retribution,
And even one of corrupt discipline, will succeed.
Even the mantras that were taught in various kinds
Bring accomplishment exceedingly swiftly;
It is gained by doing the recitation.
The sick are freed from sickness,
The poor find wealth,
Women obtain sons.
When one looks at the intermediate painting,
At that time, by merely seeing it,
One gains a great increase of merit.
That person will surely come to share
In the happiness of gods and humans,
And in another birth of his
He will surely attain buddhahood.
Through painting it and reading it,
Worshiping the deity and having it painted,
And likewise through seeing and touching it,
One is freed from all evil.
Thus, from seeking after, supplicating,
And rejoicing in the painting of the one of great light,
One swiftly gains a birth together with its fruit.
Even through supreme eons as numerous as particles of dust,
The merit that a person gains
Cannot be expressed in words:
Seeing the painting comes with its fruit."

So it is said. From the extensive root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā of the Upswept Locks, from the Great Vehicle Vaipulya sūtra collection of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, the third chapter is complete.

Then again the Blessed One Śākyamuni once more said to that great being, "Great being, there is also another, third rite of your cloth painting, called the small one, through which accomplishment is achieved without effort. With the very rite taught before, one should have the artisan paint a cloth painting just one span of the Sugata in measure across, and likewise square on all sides, as before, with the pigments taught before.

"First of all, one should have the great bodhisattva painted, seated with legs crossed on a lion seat, as a young boy, teaching the Dharma as before, radiating rays of light on all sides, beautiful in form."

On the left side one should paint the noble Samantabhadra, standing on a jeweled slab of stone, holding a yak-tail fan in his hand and holding a wish-fulfilling jewel in his left, his color a deep blue-green like the priyaṅgu flower. On the right side, too, one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara, standing on a jeweled slab of stone, holding a yak-tail fan in his hand and bearing a lotus in his left hand, his body radiant with light on all sides; the noble Avalokiteśvara should be painted as before. Beneath the lion throne one should paint a golden mountain, reaching all the way to the edge of the cloth. At the corner of the edge of the painting, below the lion seat of the noble Avalokiteśvara, on the right side, one should paint the king of wrathful ones, Tārā's Subjugator, as before. Below him one should paint the practitioner holding a censer in his hand, as before. All of this is just as it was before.

Then above the noble Avalokiteśvara one should paint the Tathāgata Amitābha, seated in a cave of a jewel mountain, sixteen finger-widths in size, and one should paint a high overhang of the mountain resembling a many-storied house. All around the painting, in a ring of mountains, one should draw it encircled by the forms of mountains. At the upper corners of the painting, as if hovering and joined to the mountain's overhang, one should paint two sons of the gods of the Pure Abodes, called Pure and Thoroughly Pure, scattering various flowers. One should paint the cloth strewn with various flowers, as if spread with a carpet.

The defining marks of the three kinds of painting
Have all been taught here.
This one is called the small one;
This painting is auspicious for minor rites.
Evil deeds most terrible,
Done over thousands of koṭis of eons,
Are freed by seeing the painting;
By merely seeing the painting
One is freed in a single instant.
Though a wise one, for thousands of koṭis of eons,
Has served and honored the buddhas,
That is not equal even to a sixteenth part
Of seeing this last painting.

Whatever merit there is in making offerings
To all the buddhas, the protectors,
By seeing the small painting
The learned one gains that very merit.
For rites of charm and beauty,
And as a cause of wealth, it is also used.
All the vidyās and secret mantras there are,
Those spoken by Brahmā, Indra, and the sages,
And whatever the garuḍas have spoken,
And Varuṇa, the Sun, Kubera,
Dhanada and the rest, and the rākṣasas,
And all the lords of the asuras,
The great mahoragas and the Moon,
The Wind, Yama, and the rest,
And the mantras spoken by the Lion, the Seizer, and others,
All these mantras are drawn in here,
And are accomplished in the presence of the painting.
Rites of pacifying and likewise
Rites of increase are to be performed;
But likewise here the terrible ones,
Censured by the supreme Victor, are to be abandoned.

Thus concludes the fourth root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, the extensive chapters on the rite of the cloth painting, from the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, a sūtra of the Great Vehicle of vast scope.

Then once again the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, rose from his seat, circumambulated the Blessed One Śākyamuni three times, bowed at the Blessed One's feet, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is excellent, excellent, that the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, has spoken this Dharma discourse. For the sake of examining all the observances of vidyā, for benefit, for happiness, and out of compassion for the world, it teaches the skillful means of the bodhisattvas; together with the remaining teachings that lead to the city of nirvāṇa, it is constantly and supremely directed with certainty toward awakening. This great secret vidyā of mine accomplishes, for the bodhisattvas, the aims of all the conduct of vidyā and mantra, and it will make all people flourish.

"In a future time, when the guru of the world has passed into nirvāṇa, when the sun lineage of the Tathāgata has set, abandoned by all buddhas, bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas, and noble śrāvakas, all of them forsaking it so that it has become dark, when the vessel of the world has fallen to ruin, bereft of the noble path, of vidyās, of mantras, of medicines, and of all precious jewels, there will arise a realm of beings without the light of being cared for by good people. Those who are lazy, whose mindfulness has lapsed, who are faithless, unruly, in the grip of nonvirtuous friends, given to deceit, guile, lies, and crooked conduct, will be terrified on hearing this Dharma discourse. Delighting in laziness and sloth, they will be without faith. They will seek sensual pleasures and will not seek secret mantras. Delighting in wrong views, they will engage in much that is not merit, and there will arise those who reject the true Dharma.

"For the sake of those who are bent upon Avīci, who go to the fiercest of the fierce, tormented by suffering; in order to bring under control those not under control, and to grant fearlessness to those who have been brought under control; for the knowledge of the practice of gathering beings through skill in means; and for the rite of the cloth painting: if the Blessed One deems that the time has come to speak of it now, may the Blessed One please speak."

When he had made this request, the Blessed One said: "The extensive rite of the observance of the supremely secret vidyā, supremely secret, fulfilling every wished-for aim, of great purpose and perfect abundance, the supreme essence of all seventy vidyās, will be accomplished at that time without conceptual thought. Moreover, it has been spoken by seventy-six koṭis of buddhas, who, through skill in means for the sake of training beings, protect those who wander in saṃsāra and cause them to be supremely directed with certainty toward awakening. Its vidyā is this: namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tārendra tāre tuttāre ture svāhā. This is called Noble Tārā the Fully Flourishing.

"Blessed One, this great vidyā of mine is equal to the great supreme essence. It supremely accomplishes every task. It has arisen for all sentient beings like a buddha. All the buddhas rejoice in it. It protects from the eight great fears. It performs every rite. It is a teacher of the path to awakening. It is the vidyā of the lotus family. It is properly applied for those of superior, middling, and lesser capacity. It grants the ripened fruit of most excellent deeds, and it will be accomplished even in the time when the teaching has declined. For the sake of guarding the way of the true Dharma, they will enter into equipoise and attain accomplishment. Through only a small practice, they will accomplish their aims of a great kingdom and of lordship over great wealth. Very swiftly, at that time and on that occasion, they will attain accomplishment.

"This rite of the cloth painting has been condensed because at that time, on that occasion, there will be great fear, and beings of the five degenerations, of little merit, will appear. Known to be of little power, short-lived, and weak in diligence, they will be unable to exert themselves in such tasks as accomplishing the rite of the cloth painting in its fully extensive form. It is for their sake that it is taught in this most condensed way.

"First of all, one should buy the material at a hero's price, about one srang in weight or about half a srang, and have a weaver weave a cloth, with its fringe, about one cubit long and about half a cubit wide. Or else, again, one should take a new piece of cloth free of hairs, very white, as long from top to bottom as one wishes, two, four, six, five, ten, or eight cubits, and have the artist paint it as one wishes. The pigments should be unmixed, scented with sandalwood, camphor, and saffron. As for the cloth, combine sandalwood, saffron, and camphor, mix them with clear water free of living creatures, put the cloth into a new vessel to soak, and leave it well pressed down for three days.

"Having made a protection in a clean place and having made oneself clean as well, on the full moon of the bright fortnight, in front of the vessel holding the cloth, facing east, one should sit on a mat of kuśa grass and recite these mantra words eight thousand times: tadyathā oṃ he he bhagabāna bahurūpadhara dibyacakṣuṣa avalokaya avalokaya māṃ samayamanusmara kumārarūpadharaṇa mahābodhisatva kiñcarayasi hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

"Having recited this mantra, one should lie down to sleep right there. In a dream it will be shown whether there will be success or not. Then, on rising, if one has seen a dream with signs of success, one should paint the cloth painting without delay. If one has not seen a dream with signs of success, one should take the cloth out of that vessel and dry it in the sun. Once it is dry, one should again conceal it well in another new vessel, make a protection, and set it aside. Then again, taking any one mantra one wishes from among those supreme essences, of the six-syllable ones, one should again recite its syllables a hundred thousand times. Then the cloth painting will be accomplished very swiftly.

"First of all, taking that cloth, in the fortnight of miracles, or else on a day of the bright fortnight, under a virtuous lunar mansion in proper conjunction, on the day of a planet's turn falling on a virtuous date of the bright fortnight, at the hour of midnight on a night of most beautiful auspicious signs and perfect good fortune, the artist, keeping the poṣadha fast, should paint that cloth painting.

"In a clean place, burning camphor incense, first of all one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara adorned with all bodily ornaments, his head crowned with a topknot, adorned with the marks of a great being, golden in color, wearing a lower garment of fluttering blue silk and an upper robe entirely of blue silk, seated on a lion throne in the half-crossed posture, teaching the Dharma, his right foot placed on a jeweled footstool, seated on the lion throne, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, lovely to behold, his face slightly smiling, gazing at the practitioner.

"On the right side is the noble Samantabhadra, deep blue-green like the priyaṅgu flower, waving a white yak-tail fan, holding a wish-fulfilling jewel in his left hand, beautiful in his whole body, adorned with all ornaments, wearing a lower garment with fluttering blue silk, bearing a pearl necklace as an offering, holding a white lotus in his left hand, and with his right hand holding a white yak-tail fan with a golden handle and waving it, peaceful in aspect, gazing at Avalokiteśvara. Likewise the noble Samantabhadra is seated on a seat of a white lotus. Both of them should be drawn in this way.

"Of three lotuses rising from a single lotus stalk, on the anthers of the middle, root lotus are the lion throne and the jeweled footstool of the great bodhisattva. On another lotus is the noble Samantabhadra. On the third lotus is the noble Mahāsthāmaprāpta."

"That lotus stalk is beautiful, in the form of precious emerald, bearing many lotus flowers in full bloom, half in bloom, and flowers not yet opened. One should paint the two nāga kings Nanda and Upananda, who come from the great lake Anavatapta, holding the lotus stalk that grows from the great lake. Those two nāga kings are white in color, adorned with seven serpent hoods, beautiful with every ornament, half of the body a human body marked with serpent hoods, the other half a serpent's body, gazing intently at the noble Avalokiteśvara, half submerged in the water, and beautified with precious jewels and garments.

"Below, around the great lake, at the corner of the edge of the cloth painting, on the right side, one should draw the practitioner gazing intently at the circle of the feet of the noble Avalokiteśvara, holding a censer in his hand, bowing with body and knees, with dress and color just as they are.

"Above the noble Avalokiteśvara, at the two edges of the cloth, one should draw two very beautiful sons of the gods, garland bearers, holding garlands of flowers, hovering in the sky, scattering great masses of flowers. All around the painting one should draw nāgakesara and other flowers strewn about. The three figures, as one wishes, should be established or drawn. One should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara teaching the Dharma, and the noble Samantabhadra and the noble Vajrapāṇi holding yak-tail fans in their hands. The practitioner should without fail have the three figures painted as he wishes, in the aspect he wishes and with their shapes just as they are; or one should paint them in whatever way the practitioner wishes. In the center the bodhisattva, the great being, and on the two sides Vajrapāṇi and Samantabhadra should without fail be painted, as one wishes.

"On a piece of cloth obtained in whatever way, a span or about a cubit in size, the artist should paint it, whether it be oneself or another, an artist who does not keep the poṣadha or one who has faith, one who is clean or unclean, one who has moral discipline or one whose discipline is broken: any of these is acceptable. But the practitioner himself must without fail have done the preliminary practice, and must without fail have generated, with faith, the mind set on awakening. In that way the mantra will be accomplished, but otherwise, through one who does evil, never.

Thus by one who has come to faith
The deities of mantra are to be accomplished;
Through that faith the king of secret mantras
Is accomplished here, and not otherwise.
For faith is the supreme vehicle
By which the Guide leads beings on.
In people who lack faith
Bright qualities do not arise,
Just as a green sprout does not Come from a seed burned by fire.
For people endowed with faith
The deeds of the buddhas will be accomplished.
All the deities, and especially
All secret mantras, every one,
Are not accomplished without faith.
The deities of the world
And likewise those beyond the world
Are accomplished by one who is said to have faith
And who is free of turbidity.
Because their minds have reached that awakening,
They will surely accomplish awakening.
Accomplishment by other means has not been taught;
That would run contrary to this teaching.
The small, the large,
And the middling cloth paintings have been proclaimed.
That which accomplishes all rites
I shall now thoroughly explain."

Thus concludes the fifth extensive chapter, on the rite of the cloth painting, from the rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, in the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, a sūtra of the Great Vehicle of vast scope.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni addressed the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara: "Great being, the teaching you have given for the sake of those beings, this explanation of the extensive rite of the cloth painting, will be accomplished with only a few means. For their sake I shall explain, in proper accord, the distinctions drawn by classifying the means of accomplishment and its expanded qualities. Listen well and keep it well in mind; I shall explain it for the sake of all sentient beings."

Then once again the bodhisattva said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is excellent that you have spoken well to us, showing the abundance and making clear the power to accomplish the qualities of the conduct of mantra. Blessed One, if you deem that the time for it has now come, please speak, out of compassion for us."

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked upon the maṇḍala of the entire assembly and smiled. Then from the mouth of the Blessed One Śākyamuni came forth rays of light, blue, yellow, white, crimson, crystal-colored, and others. As soon as those rays had come forth, they illuminated the maṇḍala of the entire assembly and outshone every place in the great trichiliocosm, the world system of a billion worlds. They outshone the light of the lunar mansions, the light of the hosts of mountain gods, and even the light of the moon and sun, mighty and of great miraculous power as they are, so that these became dim and lightless and no longer shone forth. Outshining them, and having extinguished all the light of jewels, mantras, medicines, and precious things, the rays sank back once more into the mouth of the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

Then once again the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi, who had gathered and was seated in that very maṇḍala of the assembly, rose from his seat, swiftly bowed at the Blessed One's two feet, and said this to the Blessed One: "The buddhas, the blessed ones, do not smile without cause and without condition. Blessed One, what is the cause, what is the condition, of your smile?"

When he had asked this, the Blessed One said to the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, so it is, so it is. Just as you have said, the Tathāgata does not smile without cause and without condition. There is a cause; there is a condition.

"There are those who are rightly devoted to the means of accomplishment through following the practice of vidyā in the root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, the lord of sūtras, who rely on the cloud of Dharma and rightly follow and pursue it; who hold it, who read it, who have faith in it; who have it written in a volume and honor it with sandalwood, powders, unguents, incense, garlands, parasols, victory banners, and flags of many kinds, or with special kinds of cymbals, or with various music and the clapping of hands; or who even continually attain a mind endowed with rejoicing; or in whom the hair stands on end; or in whom joy arises on hearing of the power and potency of the vidyā; or who rejoice in it; or who carry out its practices one by one. I prophesy all of them to unsurpassed, perfect, complete awakening: all of them will become buddhas, blessed ones. It is for this very reason that the Victor smiled, and not for any other.

"First of all, one who has seen the samaya, has done the preliminary practices, and has received consecration should take, from this king of rites, the root vidyā, or the heart mantra, or the near-heart mantra, or any other mantra, whether of a single syllable or whatever one wishes, go to a great wilderness, and recite it for seven years, eating fruits, foods from the water, roots, and leaves. Then the preliminary practice will have been done.

"Then one should climb to the summit of a mountain, place the principal cloth painting facing west, and oneself face east. Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, one should offer a hundred thousand white lotuses, dyed with white sandalwood and saffron, below the cloth painting, to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, to the pratyekabuddhas, and to the noble śrāvakas. One should also burn camphor incense, as much as one can afford. One should make offerings to the sons of the gods with whatever flowers one can find.

"Then on the bright full moon of the fortnight of miracles, or on any full moon, at the hour of midnight, one should make a hearth shaped like a lotus in front of the cloth painting and kindle a fire of white sandalwood wood. Combining saffron and camphor, with as much oblation as one can afford, one should perform a fire offering eight thousand times. Then one should make a protection.

"Then rays of light will come forth from the Blessed One Śākyamuni, and all around the cloth painting there will arise a single blaze. Then the practitioner should offer a guest-water offering with white lotus flowers dyed with sandalwood and saffron. Then the practitioner should swiftly circumambulate the cloth painting three times, bow to the buddhas, to all the bodhisattvas, to the pratyekabuddhas, and to the noble śrāvakas, and then fearlessly take hold of the cloth painting at the edge of the cloth on the side where the practitioner was painted before.

"Then, merely by taking hold of it, he will fly up. In the mere snap of a finger he will pass beyond the world of Brahmā and come to dwell in the world system of Sukhāvatī, where the Blessed One, the Tathāgata King Mighty through Perfectly Arisen Flowers, dwells, lives, abides, and teaches the Dharma. There he will enjoy himself for a thousand great eons, without old age and without death. The very place where the painted image remains will be blessed by all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. He will know their blessings. He will pass through thousands of buddha fields. He will display thousands of bodies. He will bring forth many powers of miraculous display. The noble Avalokiteśvara will become his spiritual friend. He will be certainly directed toward awakening."

From the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, the piṭaka of the Great Vehicle of vast scope, from the extensive chapters on the painted image in the root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, the sixth, on the rite of the means of supreme accomplishment and the fruits of the rites, is complete.

Then once again the great being addressed the hosts of gods present in the maṇḍala of the entire assembly: "Friends, listen! This is the rite of action for accomplishing the maṇḍala of the practice of the vidyā of the noble Tārā, together with its great rites; for the sake of protecting the practitioner, it is the supreme heart, the ultimate secret, spoken by all the tathāgatas, the great queen of vidyās, by reciting which all mantras are recited.

"O, O hosts of gods! This is the queen of vidyās that cannot be transgressed. If even a bodhisattva who is lord of the ten grounds is summoned by this vidyā, brought under its power, and made to long for it, what need is there to mention other bodhisattvas, and those of the world and beyond the world? It destroys all mantras and all obstructors. It is of great diligence and great might, uniquely heroic. Among all vidyās it alone is declared supreme over all mantras, and it alone, the queen of vidyās, is declared supreme among the great terrors. What is it? It performs all great rites, accomplishes all aims, does all tasks, cuts off all mantras, utterly destroys all malicious rites and all evils, brings each and every mantra to completion, and makes things virtuous. It penetrates ever higher above all the vidyās and mantras of the world and beyond the world; it is unobstructed; it is the true heart of all the tathāgatas; it fulfills every wish. What is it?

"Friends, this is the supreme, ultimate secret that performs all great rites, the great queen of vidyās that no being can transgress, that no bhūta can withstand, that all buddhas declare auspicious, accomplished by all vidyās and mantras, sovereign of all the world, lord of all lords of vidyā, the very nature of loving-kindness toward all who are hostile, compassionate toward people, and destroyer of all obstructors. In short, in whatever way it is applied, in that way it acts. Even without having been accomplished, it performs rites.

"Whatever one touches after reciting the vidyā comes under one's power. If one consecrates a garment and wears it, one will have good fortune. If one consecrates a tooth stick and chews it, tooth disease will be cured. If one consecrates white karavīra seven times and eats it, food will come even without one's seeking it.

"For eye disease, consecrate powdered rock salt seven times and fill the eyes with it, and the eye disease will be cured.

"For ear disease, take the chidhrika that comes forth from the back of an elephant and appears when the thunder roars, wrap it in kabuka leaves, and cook it over a small fire. Once it is cooked, cook it further, combine it with lukewarm water and rock salt, consecrate it seven times, and cleanse the ears with it; in that very instant the disease will be pacified.

"If, when a woman is giving birth, the womb is blocked and she is overwhelmed by stabbing pain, grind the root of aṭarūṣaka in water free of living creatures and smear it around the navel, and she will give birth easily.

"For a man harmed by a thorn, or with a weapon lodged inside his body, consecrate old ghee one hundred and eight times and give it to him to drink, or smear it on that place, and in that very instant he will be free of the thorn.

"For indigestion, distension, and feverish illness, consecrate black salt, rock salt, or any other salt and have it eaten; one will be freed from that illness and be at ease that very day.

"For fever from a chronic illness or an acute fever, grind the root of the mātuluṅga citron and give it to drink with water free of living creatures; one will be freed from it without harm, by reciting seven times, or twice.

"If a barren woman wishes to bring forth what has not been born, boil the root of aśvagandhā together with ghee, mix it with cow's milk, recite over it twenty-five times, and have her drink it at the time of her menses. After she has bathed, if she avoids other men and the householder also entirely gives up sexual misconduct out of desire, a son of her own man, her own husband, will be born.

"For a woman for whom more than three or five years have passed since giving birth, or who has not conceived for many years; or who has been sealed by another's mantras or medicines, or harmed by another; or whose womb has been made unable to hold; or in whom illness has arisen; or who has abandoned other remedies; or whose womb has been made unable to hold by some slight illness of any other kind; or into whom poisons, whether stationary, moving, artificial, or natural, have entered; or upon whom practices of roots, mantras, medicines, love, and enmity have been worked: combine old ghee and the eyes of peacock feathers and grind them, mix with sugar, consecrate it twenty-seven times, and have her eat a portion the size of a myrobalan. For seven days and nights she should drink boiled milk with sugar, and one should recite the mantra again and again.

"For pain in the head, consecrate a crow's wing seven times and fan the person with it, and he will be at ease.

"For diseases such as those from excessive intercourse with women, grind the root of alambuṣā with milk, add the root of nīlikā, recite over it one hundred and eight times, make it into a gruel with milk, and drink it.

"Likewise, for quartan fever, daily fever, fever every second day, fever every third day, continuous fever, chronic fever, violent fever, and the like, mix milk porridge with ghee, consecrate it one hundred and eight times, and give it to drink, and the person will be at ease.

"Likewise, for one seized by a ḍākinī graha, consecrate one's own face one hundred and eight times and look at the person, and he will be at ease. Likewise, for the grahas of mātṛkās, of children, of pūtanas, of vetālas, of kumbhāṇḍas, and the like, and for all people seized by violent malicious beings, consecrate one's own hand one hundred and eight times and touch the head of the one seized, and he will be at ease.

"By reciting it once, one protects oneself. By reciting it twice, one protects one's friends. By reciting it three times, one protects the house. By reciting it four times, one protects the village. By reciting it five times, one protects the area that is the village's range. Likewise, by reciting it up to a thousand times, one will have protected an army.

These, or other minor rites as well, can be performed even without having accomplished the practice.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the practice, one should not perform the minor rites. Going into single-minded solitude, one should resort to a secluded place: where a river that flows to the ocean comes down, the shore of the ocean, the bank of the Ganges, or the bank of some other great river. Having swept a clean spot, one should bathe three times and change one's clothes three times, keep silence, and eat alms food. Eating leaves, barley meal, milk and fruit, one should recite one million one hundred thousand times.

When the signs of accomplishment are seen, one should then begin the practice. In that very place one should set up the principal painted scroll and make a great offering to it. Then, in lamp vessels made of gold or silver, or of copper or clay, filled with turuṣka oil, or filled with fragrant oil, or filled with cow's ghee, one should offer to the scroll one hundred thousand lamps with wicks made from strips of new cloth.

As soon as the garlands of lamps have been offered all around it, rays of light will issue from the scroll, and as soon as they issue, the scroll will become a garland blazing on every side. In the sky above the sound of great drums will resound, and the word "Excellent!" will also be heard. Then, with the swiftness of a vidyādhara, the practitioner, who was drawn earlier at the edge of the corner of the scroll, should offer a welcoming water offering to the one present in the scroll, circumambulate, pay homage to all the buddhas, and take hold of it. Then, merely by taking hold of it, he will fly up together with all those lamp bearers. He will travel even to a hundred and one celestial palaces. Those vidyādharīs, each holding divine cymbals, singing sweet songs and dancing, will be seen filling the space all around, and they will consecrate the practitioner as a great king of vidyādharas. Together with those lamp bearers he will sport, free from aging and free from death. He will live for a great eon, like the rising sun, beautiful with divine ornaments and adorned with brilliant garments. He will bring them under his power and they will do his bidding. He will enjoy himself with them, and all the divine vidyādharas too will attend upon him as his servants. He will become a great king of vidyādharas, will live long, and will be invincible to all the siddhas. In a single instant he will go to the world of Brahmā. If even Śakra (Indra) cannot rival him, what need is there to mention other vidyādharas? And in the end he will attain buddhahood. The noble Avalokiteśvara, too, will become his spiritual friend.

There is yet another means of accomplishing the rite. Having practiced severe austerities, one then goes into single-minded solitude and dwells apart, entering a great hermitage without bustle and free from bustle. In a place where there is a great lotus lake with water, one climbs to the summit of a mountain that stands beside another mountain. Having offered scents, flowers and so forth to the vidyā mantras, eating as one wishes milk or barley meal, lotus roots and fruit, and eating what comes from milk, one should recite the vidyā one million times.

At the end of the recitation, by that very rite taught before, one should set up the principal painted scroll, anoint lotus flowers with white sandalwood and saffron, kindle a fire of khadira wood, and perform the fire offering with thirty-six thousand of the lotuses anointed before. Then, at the end of the fire offering, rays of light will issue from the painted scroll of the Blessed One Śākyamuni. They will illuminate the practitioner completely and then sink into the crown of his head. As soon as they touch him, the practitioner will possess the five superknowledges. He will attain a bodhisattva ground. He will roam about in a divine form as he wishes, and will live for thirty-six eons. He will pass through thirty-six buddhafields, and he will also clearly behold their powers. He will please thirty-six buddhas, and they too will rejoice at his offerings and veneration. And in the end he will be wholly devoted to awakening. He will be cared for by a great bodhisattva as his spiritual friend, all the way until he reaches nirvāṇa in awakening.

This completes the seventh extensive chapter, the rite of the means for accomplishing the supreme rite, from the Root Ritual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā of the Upswept Locks, a Great Vehicle sūtra of great extent belonging to the Avataṃsaka of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni taught the supreme rite of accomplishment. Having taken up the root vidyā mantra of this king of ritual manuals, one should go onto the Ganges river and stay on a boat. In the middle of the Ganges, drinking milk and water, one should perform the recitation thirty thousand times, over as many days and nights as one wishes. Then, at the end of the recitation, one will see all the nāgas.

Then, beginning the practice, one should make a lotus-shaped hearth in the very middle of the boat. Then one should make a great offering to the painted scroll with flowers such as nāgakesara. Placing the principal scroll facing west, and oneself facing east, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, one should consecrate each nāgakesara flower seven times, kindle a fire with khadira wood, and perform the fire offering with nāgakesara flowers mixed with white sandalwood and saffron, up to ten thousand times. When other nāgas are seen, one should not, out of craving, accept the substances of accomplishment they hold out. For at the end of the fire offering one will fly up together with a nāga mount. One will become a king of the vidyādharas. All the lords of the nāgas and their kings will follow one and remain like servants. One will live for thirty intermediate eons. One will act with full freedom, and one's movement will be unobstructed. One will directly see the noble Avalokiteśvara, who will touch the crown of one's head. Merely by that touch one will possess the five superknowledges. One will certainly go on to buddhahood.

Further, there is what serves as the means of accomplishment for the rite of supreme accomplishment. As before, one goes onto the Ganges river. Having made a boat from a single piece of bilva wood, made very sturdy and well built, one climbs aboard it, and with an oar made of bilva wood the practitioner, very skilled and clear-headed, should row that boat along. Never leaving the great river Ganges, one should row everywhere straight ahead or swiftly with the current.

Then, having taken up the root vidyā, or the heart mantra, or the near-heart mantra, or the single-syllable mantra, or the mantra of the wrathful one, or of the messenger, or of the far-following attendant, or any other mantra at all, one should place the principal painted scroll facing west, and oneself face east at first, and afterward as one wishes. Eating milk, barley meal and fruit, or water, or eating lotus roots and fruit, keeping silence, bathing at the three times of day and changing one's clothes three times, always engaging in utterly pure deeds and possessed of an utterly pure mind, one should first of all, before the scroll, as was explained, according to the rite seen before, recite the vidyā one million times. Then, if it is the root vidyā, at the end of reciting it sixty thousand times the boat will go to the great ocean.

Then one should gather up the implements of the practice and leave them in that same place as before. Then, when the boat goes out to the great ocean, one should not be afraid and should not turn it back. Nor can it be turned back, except by the power of the practitioner. Then in a mere moment it will enter even a great ocean that lies a thousand yojanas away, so what need is there to speak of a short way? Having entered it, one should begin the work of accomplishment on the water.

Then, in a hearth of the shape described before, or in an earthen vessel made by a potter, one should kindle a fire of khadira wood. With burnt offerings of nāgakesara stamens and flowers, white sandalwood and camphor mixed together, whether in very small or very large quantity, one should, as before, perform the fire offering six million times with the root vidyā.

While one is performing the fire offering, the rākṣasas who live in the city of Laṅkā, taking on various forms, will cry out "Hā hā!" And the nāga kings who live in the nāga city of Bhogavatī, bearing forms of many kinds, some very peaceful and some very wrathful, will rise up, and the nāgas and rākṣasas will say, "Rise up, rise up! Be our lord!" Likewise asuras, yakṣas, gods, mahoragas, siddhas and all the nonhumans will greatly entice one, but one should not rise. Then the vidyādhara, reciting the mantra, should threaten them with the threatening forefinger of the left hand. Then they will scatter, flee in every direction, and be terrified.

Then, at the end of the fire offering, the boat will carry the practitioner off and in an instant go to the realm of Akaniṣṭha. He will travel to other world systems as well, and come back. He will come to know the minds of bodhisattvas. He will possess the five superknowledges, great miraculous power and great might. He will always see the noble Avalokiteśvara. All nāgas, all rākṣasas, all yakṣas, all gods, all asuras and all sentient beings will come under his power. Once they are set to doing his bidding, all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, the pratyekabuddhas and the noble śrāvakas, and those who have accomplished this mantra, will be loving-kindness itself toward him and will favor him. He will be invincible to all beings.

Further, there is a supreme means of accomplishment of the rite. One should have a large boat made of bilva wood, either a craft from a single trunk or one assembled from parts, and make on it a great dwelling. On that boat, stationed at an island in the middle of the Ganges, one hundred and twenty men holding lamps in their hands should board the boat. Wearing white clothes and with protection performed, they should be placed before the principal painted scroll, set up according to the rite given before. Then, having made a great offering to the scroll, one should perform a fire offering of thirty-six thousand oblations of powdered nāgakesara mixed with saffron, white sandalwood and camphor, together with khadira. Then, at the end of the fire offering, the boat will go to the world of Brahmā and come back in a mere instant, and he will roam about as he wishes. He will see the noble Avalokiteśvara. From merely seeing him he will attain the five superknowledges, and he will live long and remain for a great eon. He will become a great vidyādhara king, a universal monarch. Those lamp bearers too will be accomplished as his vidyādharas. Together with those companions he will roam about as he wishes and go wherever he pleases. The buddhas, the blessed ones, will be delighted by his offerings and veneration. And in the end he will certainly attain buddhahood.

Further, there is the excellent means of accomplishment of the rite:

On a riverbank or on the ocean's shore,
likewise on the Snowy Mountains,
on Vindhya, the king of mountains,
there one should accomplish the supreme rite.
On Sahya and on Malaya,
on Mount Gandhamādana,
on Vulture Peak, the king of mountains,
the supreme rite should be accomplished.
On the cliffs of the great ocean,
and where there are trees, flowers and the like:
the mantras spoken by the Victor should be accomplished in these places.
In a clean place, wholly secluded,
at the village outskirts, for the four acts,
keeping silent and avoiding contact,
one should always pass water.
For the body, at the abode of the gods, and in defecating,
those who keep the vows should observe cleanliness.
For touching, soft earths are wanted.
Earths free of living creatures,
three portions taken in the proper way,
are always for the anus alone.

Likewise, at the end of both, the hands.
The mantrin, always taking up the earths that were described before,
the reciter, always the feet:
the right one and the other,
having placed them each against the other,
should carefully wash the feet,
just as was described at length before.
The cleanliness of one who recites mantra is a cleanliness free of foul smell;

so the Sage himself has always taught.
These are taught in brief;
"They are seen in all the tantras," so said the Lord, the Sage himself.
Then the reciter should sip water, disciplined, delighting in the work of accomplishment,
by the rite described before;
this is the inner purity of mind.
Cleanliness is declared to be of five kinds.
For the mantrin, in all the mantras, cleanliness of body, and likewise of speech and of mind are proclaimed.
The fourth is the cleanliness of truth,
and water is declared the fifth.
The way of truth: anger subdued,
knowing the tantras, having studied the treatises, skilled in the subtle reality and its meaning,
knowing mantras, renowned in the rites, and skilled inwardly through reasoning:
for such a one accomplishment is not hard to find.
Words of falsehood, which forsake
the way of truth, should not be spoken.
Forsaking all truth,
vicious, utterly vicious,
hateful and quarrelsome,
harsh and striking at the vitals, fallen away from the way of truth,
tormenting other beings,
slander, an afflicted mind,
the forsaking of all good dharmas,
likewise a nature bent on harm,
always immoral, practicing what is not Dharma:
these the reciter of mantra should give up.
Likewise the ways of the village,
from which anger and covetousness arise,
and the terrors of the world beyond,

the wise ones, the rhinoceros-like pratyekabuddhas,
and the buddhas of the past have condemned,
as well as the ever-recurring afflictions.
Likewise one who always speaks lies,
pursuing worldly accomplishments for the ends he desires,
who utters lies upon the earth,
falls into a great and unbearable hell.
Likewise, because of his former misdeeds and his delight in them, in the world of Yama he dwells there again and again, forever.
One who makes his living by constant lying will fall into unbearable lower realms:
Kālasūtra, Pratāpana, Saṃjīva, the forest of sword leaves,
and likewise the śālmali forest;
there he dwells for many eons.
A person who speaks falsely,
who speaks wrongly of the secret mantra,
who out of delusion misrepresents it,
and who deceives the bhūtas:
how could he have accomplishment?
Therefore one who out of delusion,
not having seen the accomplishments of mantra, says, "There are no accomplishments for mantrins," speaking words like these,
one who has utterly forsaken the Buddha's teaching here upon the earth:
even in many tens of millions of eons
how could he become accomplished?
Therefore he will be cooked in the unbearable, greatly terrifying Avīci, in Saṃjīva and Kālasūtra,
and cooked in Pratāpana.
A place free of creatures
such as scorpions and snakes should be sought, well supplied with fruit and flowers,
with clear water, highly praised:

there the knower of mantra should do the approach of the mantra.
Other places are not proclaimed for this.
At a temple, or in a charnel ground,
at a single firm landmark,
at a single sign, and likewise at the outskirts,
the knower of mantra should do the approach of the mantra.
Having protected himself and his companions,
and endowed with the secret mantra practiced before,
the mantrin should always recite the mantra.
In a great and excellent forest with great trees,
where flowers, fruits and the like grow,
on mountain peaks and in caves,
with clean watering places,
on the delightful banks of great rivers,
the knower of mantra should do the approach of the mantra.
Knowing the mantra, he gains certain realization.
In the east too, the great river,
the auspicious bank of the Lohita,
and likewise the land of Kāmarūpa,
and the excellent town that brings prosperity,
the lowlands where this excellent one flows, dwelling places and excellent rivers:
in those places the reciter, always pure and intelligent, should stay.
Do the preliminary approach there!
At Gaṅgādvāra, all the rites;
likewise always where the Ganges
meets the Venomous River,
all the applications,
and the recitation with the mantra of the pure.
Great charnel grounds and others too:
there the reciter should always recite.
Where there are clear waters and streams
free of living creatures, for that very reason, intently,
in meditative equipoise, one should recite the mantra.
If there, by the world's way of thinking,

some slight lack of merit is seen,
still, since the mantra has indicated it,
one should stay there for a little while and then go elsewhere.
At the time when the moon is eclipsed, even if it is not the proper time, for a short while one should stay there, and not otherwise.
Otherwise the knower of mantra, as best he can,
should then quickly depart.
In places on the earth
where stūpas of the Sugata stand, one should always dwell.
All the worldly tīrthikas, fallen into bad views,
and the places of other tīrthikas
the knower of mantra always avoids;
the one who knows mantra does not stay there.
Where the best of beings, of vast intelligence,
the supreme Victor, has dwelt,
and the rhinoceros-like pratyekabuddhas,
the bodhisattvas of great fortune,
the sons of the supreme Victor, and the śrāvakas:
in all the lands upon the earth where all of these have dwelt, the knower of mantra should diligently do the preliminary approach.
In meditative equipoise, the secret mantra should be recited in that place.
In these places that have been taught,
all the rites that have been taught,
and the means of accomplishment of the rites, are to be done.
If these places cannot be found,
then in any place whatsoever
one who is pure should do the preliminary approach.
With faith and devotion, the work of the supreme rite of the sādhana is begun.

First of all, one should set up the principal painted image facing west, and oneself face east. Taking earth from an anthill or earth from the bank of the Ganges, one should mix it with pushel tsé, white sandalwood, saffron and camphor, and make the figure of a peacock. Having placed it before the painted image, one should make a wheel-shaped diagram from pure kuśa grass with uncut tips, gathered from a clean place, and holding it before the painted image with the right hand, and the peacock with the left hand, at midnight on the full-moon day of the bright fortnight, one should make a great offering to the painted image and, with the fragrance of burning camphor incense, recite until dawn breaks. Then, at the time of sunrise, it will become a king of peacocks, and the wheel too will blaze.

Then, wearing divine garlands and clothes and fully adorned, in whatever form one wishes, like the rising sun, one should pay homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, circumambulate the painted scroll, and take up the scroll. If one then sits on that peacock seat, in a mere moment one will pass beyond the world of Brahmā. One will become a vidyādhara king, a universal monarch, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of vidyādharas. One will live for sixty eons. One will go wherever one wishes and enjoy oneself fully. One will travel without obstruction. One will be endowed with the riches of the gods. One will directly see the noble Avalokiteśvara, and he himself will become one's spiritual friend. And in the end one will attain buddhahood.

Likewise, there are a staff, a water pot with a spout, an implement carried for worship, realgar, bezoar, a sword, an iron arrow, a single-pointed spear, a battle-axe, and weapons of various special kinds; special things made of earth: two-footed creatures, four-footed creatures, birds, and special mounts such as lions, tigers and leopards, made from anthill earth mixed with sweet-smelling fragrances. Or seats, mounts, bedding, a white parasol, a diadem, every kind of ornament, every kind of jewel, and every kind of the requisites of one who has gone forth: a rosary, sandals, an alms bowl, Dharma robes, a needle, a knife and the like, made of fine iron; or anything else at all, the implements of beings, vessels and the like, made of fine iron, or made of anthill earth or river earth. All of these one should wash with the five products of the cow, sprinkle and purify, and consecrate them one hundred and eight times, as before, with the mantra of application, or the single-syllable mantra, or any other mantra, using, apart from what is taught in this king of ritual manuals, whatever vidyā of the rite of accomplishment one wishes and delights in. One who protects himself and fully guards his companions, who is well able to keep secrets and knows the mantras and tantras, should set up the painted image facing west in the place described before, and position himself as before.

Having made a great offering to the painted image, burning chiefly camphor incense, and having made the special weapons, implements and creatures described before as replicas, as described before, on the night of the full moon of the waxing fortnight one should take up any one of those articles and recite for the whole night. Then at the time of sunrise, at that juncture, great garlands of light rays will be seen all over the painted image.

If the practitioner has taken up a special mount, then, riding it, he will go wherever he wishes. If he has taken up or held a special ornament or a special weapon, he will become a great king of vidyādharas. He will go wherever he wishes, with a divine body like the risen sun, endowed with garlands of great light rays, a body radiant like lightning, the lord of all vidyādharas, long-lived and remaining for a great eon, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of vidyādharas, and enjoying himself in a celestial palace of divine jewels.

The mount made of earth, fashioned before, by which he gained accomplishment will become greatly powerful. It will be his mount and his companion; it will avert the mantra accomplishments of others and bring about every accomplishment of his own mantra; it will be loving-kindness itself, wishing him well and ever devoted to him. Whatever his weapons, ornaments, jewels of various kinds, seats, bedding, creatures and the like may be, they will always remain bound to him as his protection, his guard, and his great shelter. He will become one of great might, great diligence and great body.

He will directly see the noble Avalokiteśvara, who will grant him the words "Excellent!" and anoint the crown of his head, and will act as his spiritual friend until he attains the seat of awakening. He will certainly gain the ten powers in full and become worthy of offerings. He will not be overwhelmed by beings and will be invincible to all the bhūtas. He will not break the lineage of the true limit, and he will attain the grounds. He will become certain of the ten powers and of bodhisattvahood, and will attain samādhi.

In brief, dwelling in an excellent place, before the excellent painted scroll, delighting in excellent offerings, one should perform all the supreme rites, and the other supreme rites as well.

For the sake of becoming a vidyādhara who travels through the sky, following the bodhisattvas, gaining the five superknowledges and attaining the grounds, traveling to every world system in this very body, and bringing to perfection

the continuum of the ten powers; for the sake of directly seeing the noble Maitreya; for the sake of making the teaching of the Dharma meaningful; for the sake of not cutting the lineage of the buddhas; for the sake of surpassing all and attaining the wisdom of omniscience; for the sake of entering into the abundance of the Dharma cloud; for the sake of being free from the torment of the afflictions and fully pacified by a stream of nectar rain; for the sake of engaging in caring for the world and doing so earnestly; for the sake of guarding the Tathāgata's way of Dharma; for the sake of making the Tathāgata's words meaningful; for the sake of cultivating the rite of the means of accomplishment of mantra practice; and for the sake of the arising of buddhas, all bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas and great noble śrāvakas, one should accomplish this king of ritual manuals.

Endowed with the vast power of mantra, sitting close before the principal painted scroll, one should accomplish this king of scrolls with the mantra rites of all the mundane and supramundane, with the various paths found in all the tantras, in short, even with the rites taught in other ritual manuals. They will quickly become accomplishments, and what I have taught will without doubt be accomplished.

This completes the eighth chapter, on the accomplishment of the supreme painted scroll, from the Root Ritual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, a Great Vehicle sūtra of great extent belonging to the Avataṃsaka of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni again looked upon the great circle of the assembly and spoke to the great bodhisattva: "Great being, there is the intermediate rite of your painted scroll, the intermediate means of accomplishment of the rite. I shall explain it in brief, so pay close attention, and I shall explain it."

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, said to the Blessed One, "Blessed One, Teacher, compassionate toward the world, delighting in benefiting all sentient beings, out of compassion for us, and with regard for the people of the future, please speak whatever you consider to be timely."

When he had said this, the Blessed One spoke to the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara: "Great being, listen. First of all, what are the moral discipline, the observances, the practice of cleanliness, the restraint, the recitation, the fire offering, the meditative concentration, the rite, and the place to dwell, through which the work of accomplishing the conduct of all beings is fruitful and not in vain, and the accomplishments of the application of all mantras are achieved? I shall explain it: great being, listen.

"First of all, having first properly undertaken the observances of the vidyā and properly taken up moral discipline, one should first of all properly follow the commitments explained by the maṇḍala master. He should be one who has expounded your king of ritual manuals, clear about what was definitively taught before, conscientious, who has received empowerment as a master, who knows the rite you have taught, learned, clear-minded, endowed with the Dharma, truthful, of great enthusiasm, grateful, steadfast, good-hearted, neither too old nor too young, free of desire for any gain or honor, living a celibate life, and compassionate. He would not tell a lie even for mere gain, or for the sake of enjoyment, or out of attachment, so what need is there to speak of something utterly trifling, of gain, or of the forms of delusion? He should be firm in his pledges, possessed of compassion equally toward all beings, of generosity and moral discipline; one who has done the earlier practice of your secret vidyā, the repetition of the mantra and the preliminary approach of the vidyā; who has properly entered your maṇḍala; who knows the world; who properly cares for others; fruitful and skilled; thoroughly engaged in what is good; fearless and harmless; unattached; heroic; firm in diligence; and free of illness, that is, not of a constitution made unfit for the work by any illness; and born into a great and high family. One endowed with these qualities becomes a maṇḍala master. The practitioner too should be like him, or lacking only slightly in some of these qualities.

"Having made offerings to such a maṇḍala master, one should make this request for the purpose: 'Master, since we wish to follow the vidyā and mantra of the bodhisattva, the great being, and the commitments of the maṇḍala of that Blessed Lady, out of compassion for us, and having given rise to a beneficial intention, master, please teach it.'

"Then the maṇḍala master, by the rite taught before, should examine the disciples one by one as is proper and admit them, and having conferred empowerment as before, should give them the vidyā and the mantra and teach the commitments in their proper order. The great secret, the mudrās, the tantras, the mantras and the rites, too, he should examine over a long time; once he knows their dispositions, he should teach the tantras, the mantras and so forth, and all the rites. This rite, that it is not to be done otherwise, has been proclaimed.

"Then the disciple should offer to the maṇḍala master, as far as he is able, whatever pleases the master, or even his own person and his wealth. Then the maṇḍala master should regard him as a son. He should look after him like a son, and like a mother support him with provisions.

Then that practitioner should take up any vidyā or mantra whatsoever and go to a solitary place. Applying in full, as above, the site taught earlier, he should, with those very vidyās and so forth, perform the invitation, the request to depart, and the lamps, scents, incense, tormas and food offerings in full, by the very rite taught for the maṇḍala. Having invited the deities and offered them seats, he should bathe three times at the three junctures of the day, change his clothes three times, and do the mantra recitation every day.

Here, as for what is called the time of the junctures: the period from the end of the night until about the time the sun rises is explained as the first. Midday is this: after the sun has risen, at the juncture measured by a period of time, when the disk of the sun stands fully in the sky, one who knows the rite should know it as the midday juncture. At the time of sunset, too, about the remaining quarter is to be called the third juncture.

A master who is learned and has good friends,
Who is perfectly endowed with moral discipline and vows,
Who is born in a great family,
And steadfast in diligence in every way,
Perfectly endowed with mantras, tantras and so forth,
Clear-minded in all activities,
Subtle, learned, and knowing the right measure,
Who always holds to the realm of phenomena (dharmadhātu),
Of great enthusiasm and endowed with splendor,
Without regard for worldly concerns,
With faith in the Dharma of the supreme Sage,
Who has abandoned worldly people,
Who does recitation and keeps to solitude,
Who has relied on approach beforehand,
Who knows the secret mantras of the bodhisattvas,
And sees the conditions other than these,
Who knows the secret mantras spoken by the Buddha
And the applications of the worldly ones,
Who has made protection and is steadfast in power,
Always delighting in the conduct of cleanliness,

Who follows in every way
The path the buddhas have taught,
And the secret mantras the Victor has spoken,
Always diligent in reciting secret mantras,
Always mindful of the fruit in this very life
And likewise in the world beyond,
Fearful of every wrongdoing,
And likewise even of the slightest,
Pure, learned and without laziness,
Honest in mind and lovely to behold,
Who in whatever mantras the One with Ten Powers has taught,
And likewise in those of the Victor's heirs,
And in whatever mantras belong to the worldly ones,
And in those of the vajra and lotus families too,
Has always labored,
Who holds the meaning of scriptures and treatises,
Healthy and not lacking in capacity,
Free from old age and sickness,
Likewise having good friends, accomplished in mantra,
Quick in everything he does,
And likewise not overly tall,
Living in celibacy and great in wisdom,
Especially knowledgeable,
Alone and free of bustle,
Brave, and one who has received empowerment,
Who here has reached the far shore of awakening,
Diligent in bringing existence to peace,
Who likewise practices the spells,
Of great power and knowing the world,
Caring for beings, for sentient beings,
And fully endowed with glory,
Delighting in giving and in benefiting the bhūtas:
To such an exceptional master
One should always make supplication.
He bestows the accomplishment of the mantras
Of the maṇḍala that has been drawn;
Through the empowerment he gives,

The great fruit will be granted.
The disciple who desires accomplishment
Should always honor him like the Sage.
Not to transgress his words
Is what the disciple must strive to do.
As far as his means and possessions allow,
He should offer his goods to him,
Whether a little or a great deal,
Whatever will please him.
Just as, for the sake of sustaining the body,
One gives wealth to one's father,
So the disciple who knows the Dharma
Should offer wealth to the master.
He will gain the accomplishment of ultimate lordship,
Long life and likewise health,
And will attain a flourishing destiny.
If the disciple honors that guru,
His mantras will succeed.
Through seeing the path and the rite,
Through relying on approach,
And likewise through worship made with paintings,
All the buddhas will be pleased,
And likewise the heirs of the supreme Victor,
And all the gods will be pleased.
If one always attends on and honors the guru,
Then through seeing the guru and the mantras
All of these will become stable.
The practitioner, beforehand and at the very start,
Should follow the commitments.
Whether the guru is lesser than he or his equal,
Or even if he is far more eminent,
Out of delusion or excessive anger
One should never despise the guru.
He in turn, in this tantra,
Should always give him the instructions.
When he has bestowed the accomplishment of mantra,
He has not been miserly in this.

To the disciple described before
He should always give the instructions.
When he has bestowed the accomplishment of mantra,
The one who has an eye
That increases the affection of embodied beings
Is the one he should make his disciple.
Where master and disciple, for each other's sake,
Follow one another in turn,
Where a continuity of affection is maintained,
And a gentle disposition is upheld,
To such a one mantras should be given.
The master, and likewise the disciple:
When the disciple looks upon the guru,
He will always be glad,
Or both will perfectly attain accomplishment.
To him one should always teach
The path itself and the conduct of mantra.
Since both know each other as father and son,
They follow the mantras together with their fruit,
And likewise attain stability and joy.
The disciple should always Protect the guru with great effort.
Sons who are great beings
Keep the stream of the Buddha's Dharma unbroken.
To those who lack this, who have no protector,
Give the mantras as they have been taught,
Even to destitute beings and to eunuchs.
For all, and above all,
The conduct of mantra is supremely excellent.
For the lowest, the highest and the middling,
It is to be practiced at all times.
Toward the teachings that have been fully received,
One should keep up the continuity of upholding them.

To beings of settled understanding
One should give fully, even what they desire.
Therefore the mantra that he desires

The disciple himself should take up.
Since it has been shown to him by that master,
That is the path, and no other.
The one who desires accomplishment,
When he is to go far from that father,
Bows his head to him as to a father,
And then goes wherever he wishes.
Then, having gone to this place,
In meditative equipoise he recites the secret mantra.
Following the practice of begging for alms,
And keeping silence, he recites at the three times.
In this way it comes about just as taught.
Fully entering the path as it is,
At that time he cuts off all wavering.
Empty houses and great wildernesses,
Great mountains and the banks of rivers,
Clean places, cow pens and great lakes,
Secluded places that people have abandoned: these he should frequent;
Temples and the foot of trees,
A solitary high mountain,
The delightful shore of the great ocean,
River islands or islands,
And the many kinds of place taught before,
Various lands that please the mind;
And in other quarters besides these
He should recite the mantra in meditative equipoise.
A companion who has the right characteristics
Is a reasoner certain of the meaning of the mantras,
Who knows the very kinds of omens,
Brave and victorious in battle,
Courageous and patient,
Perfectly endowed with faith and moral discipline.
In this domain taught by the Victor,
With a companion who has the highly praised characteristics
And is endowed with patience,
The rites will be accomplished victoriously, without effort.
Rising from his bed at dawn,

In water from a stream or a great lake,
Free of living creatures and free of impurity,
In that water he bathes;
Then with earth and powdered cow dung
The knower of mantra should rub his body.
Then in water purified with mantra,
Exceedingly stainless,
The diligent reciter should bathe.
He should not bathe too long.
Then, rising, he should wash
His hands with earth as well.
Seven times, and seven, and seven times again,
Twenty-one times he should rinse.
There, again, he uses a tooth stick;
Having cleaned his teeth, he should throw it away.
Then, bowing to the Protector,
And having bowed to the Lord of the World,
The knower of mantra makes pleasing offerings.
With various acts of praise and offering
He praises him perfectly again and again.
Likewise, with fragrant flowers,
He offers water to the Teacher, the Protector,
And bows his head to the buddhas.
Then those who have become disciples
Confess their wrongdoing
In the very presence of those lords of the world.
Having offered themselves as well,
They should sit before the painted cloth.
He sits upon a mat of kuśa grass.
When the knowers of mantra have both sat down,
In accordance with the characteristics,
There, with a rosary,
He should recite with great effort.
At that time he does not recite other mantras.
A deficient rite is to be avoided,
And likewise one that is excessive.
For rites of the middling kind

Those who keep the vows should recite the mantra.
Reciting too loudly is to be avoided,
And the words should not be too faint either.
For rites of the middling kind
The Victor has highly praised this.
Neither too loud nor too soft,
One should always recite at a middling pitch.
All the buddhas of the past
Have said such words are glorious.
He should not recite in the presence of others,
And should always keep his course of practice secret from others.
He recites within range of his own hearing.
Likewise, with the mantra at a middling pitch,
Through recitation he will greatly prosper.
Some who have heard the mantra well
And desire the middling accomplishment
Should recite the mantra virtuously.
Therefore, apart from people,
Having heard well the true meaning of the mantra,
Free from crowds and in seclusion,
The reciter should recite the mantra.
A quarter of the night,
And half of its half:
About the time of the red dawn,
When the disk of the sun rises,
Is the first session, as is fitting;
So the Sage, the supreme being, has said.
The measure of the time is four,
And it is proclaimed as the middle.
Then, when the sun has half set,
At that time one leaves off the mantra recitation.
At the time the mantra recitation is set aside,
He offers water and requests the deities to depart.
The one who keeps the vows avoids other ways.
If, when he has then set it aside, some of the day remains,
He should do virtue within the Sage's teaching:
Reading the sublime Dharma,

Such as the Perfection of Wisdom,
And always honoring and reading
The volume of the Ten Grounds.
Then, when the time has come,
Having bowed to his own mantra, the lord of mantras,
And to the Sage, the supreme being,
He then goes out for his livelihood,
And likewise keeps to conduct at the proper time.
He eats at the proper time and subdues his senses.
The practitioner who is endowed with the Dharma
Has deep faith in the Buddha's teaching and is diligent.
When he enters another village,
He keeps silent and delights in clean conduct.
He goes for alms to the houses
Of beings who always keep the Dharma.
The reciter regards as pure
Water free of living creatures and food that is properly cooked.
Those perfectly endowed with right view,
Who have deep faith in the Buddha's teaching:
At such houses he should always Accept alms for the sake of his alms food.
Just as one who is valiant, clad in armor,
Enters a perilous land,
Always vanquishes his enemies,
And cannot be overcome by enemies,
So the mantra practitioner lives by alms.
When he always enters the village,
Likewise, if he sees forms and hears sounds
That are apt to arouse attachment, which is unwholesome,
For the sake of calming desire
He should meditate on the wholesome contemplation of the unattractive.
Even when he sees a woman's body
Adorned with the features of youth,
He should meditate on bodies despised and rotting,
Eaten by worms, lying in the charnel ground,
On the body as impermanent and suffering,
Impure and foul-smelling.

Because of it, the childish and deluded
Go and circle among the five destinies,
And, strung on the thread of karma,
Grieve for a long time.
Those deluded by the obscuration of ignorance
Are blind, and have suffering as their cause.

Where the mind is inverted,
Through attachment people come to ruin.
By the various paths of karma,
Attached in many different ways,
Going crookedly for a long time,
They engage in going and coming.
Clinging as though things were permanent,
They act in every way out of grasping.
Where beings delight in what is unwholesome,
They wander long upon the road.
Like the circling of a water wheel,
Those born in the little lake of existence,
Those beings, are tossed about everywhere
By the unbearable river of suffering.
Likewise, that women are
The very root of suffering
Has been declared by the buddhas and bodhisattvas,
And likewise by the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas,
And by the sages.
The ocean of existence, never stilled:
These great lakes are hard to dry up.
Where beings sink,
Deceived by thoughts of women, is this:
They go to the hells, the world of animals,
The world of pretas, the asuras,
And likewise the human world itself,
And the destiny of the gods,
Always circling round and round.
Those deceived by attachment to women
Sink into the great mire

Of the prison of the ocean of saṃsāra.
A foolish man attached to women
Is like a jackal attached to a corpse.
In that which beings always delight in,
They endure unbearable suffering,
And surely fall away from the white Dharma.
One who dwells firmly in the Buddha's teaching Turns back all the suffering
Of the ocean of existence.
Those who delight and strive in reciting mantra,
Renowned for great power and possessed of a steady mind,
Endowed with splendor and capable in mantra:
For them there is no suffering.
Those who know true restraint, measure and truth,
Who honor the guru and the gods,
And who are respectful to mother and father:
For these three there is no suffering.
One should attend to impermanence, suffering and emptiness,
And to the benefit of others.
A woman's body is a ghostly form,
Likewise a boil and a thorn.
Seized by the hook of the aggregates of bad understanding,
One does not pass beyond saṃsāra.
For one always attached to women
There is no accomplishment.
For him there is no supreme destiny,
Nor is there even a middling one,
Nor is there even a minor accomplishment.
Here, if the reciter breaks his discipline,
To one of broken moral discipline the Lord of Sages
Has not taught the accomplishment of mantra.
He has no path to go to the city of nirvāṇa,
And is bereft of any direction.
Here, for the despicable childish one,
How could there be accomplishment of mantra?
For this person of broken discipline
Not even a good destiny will come,

Nor is he even inclined toward happiness;
Likewise, what need is there to say
That the mantras spoken by the Victor will not succeed for him?
When the crown of a palm tree
Has once been cut off,
It does not turn green again;
When would a shoot ever come again?
Likewise the deluded one seeking accomplishment in mantra,
Of broken discipline and sinful deeds,
Always attached to women again and again,
And keeping company with bad friends:
How could the king of mantras succeed for him?
Therefore, when a reciter
Indulges in the faults of women
That the Sugata has rejected,
And yet seeks to gain accomplishment,
The childish one deluded about women
Has not been taught by any other to succeed.
Then, first of all, the intelligent,
Clean, delighting in freedom from bustle,
Of good family, steadfast and brave,
Of good mind and pleasing to behold,
Who know how to discern Dharma and what is not Dharma:
For them accomplishment is not hard to find.
The knower of mantra who has entered upon this Thus enters the village for alms.
Having gone as he wishes,
In places examined beforehand,
The wise one, with a pure mind, sets the food aside,
And, having set aside the food,
Goes outside and washes his feet.
Then, back at that place again,
With waters free of living creatures,
First he draws the water;
Second, with the left hand,
He scrubs below the waist.
Then, applying the right hand again,

He should wash with his hands.
With the pure earth set down beforehand,
Clean, seven times,
And with pure water, he makes himself clean.
Yellow dung from a tawny cow
He takes in a clean, stainless vessel,
Mixes it with water free of living creatures,
And first, for the supreme one,
The Teacher, the Sage, he makes a maṇḍala,
In particular about a cubit across.
The second is for the lord of his own mantra,
The third for the goddess of the family:
These the mantra practitioner who recites
Should always make again and again.
The fourth is known to be
For the enjoyment of all sentient beings.
On the right, for the Lord of the World,
He should always make this maṇḍala.
For the sake of the Three Jewels
That maṇḍala is square.
The second is for the pratyekabuddhas,
The third for the heirs of the One with Ten Powers.
These seven maṇḍalas
Are all square.
A cubit or half a cubit is acceptable,
And they are to be made every day.
At that time the reciter, in a hidden spot,
Destroys his wrongdoing every day.
Then the mantra practitioner, the sage, rises,
Carefully washes both hands,
And rinses with clean water.
Pure water, free of living creatures,
Stainless and clean,
He carefully takes up in a clean vessel.
From a great lake or a stream,
Or from a spring or a river,
Coming from a clean place,

Strained by hand so it is clean of creatures,
The mantra practitioner rinses again,
Always two or three times.
Then he should touch his mouth,
And likewise the openings of the ears,
The eyes and the nostrils,
And touch the crown of the head and the region of the navel.
The one who does virtue, five or seven times,
Should do everything according to the rite.
Perfect in the conduct of cleanliness,
The reciter, having become clean,
Takes up his alms bowl
And goes into the water.
Where a river stands,
Or likewise where it runs low,
Or where streams flow, and so on,
As a means of caring for the human world,
Likewise he should always recite mantra.
For that very reason the Chief of Sages,
With great diligence, has taught this.

By the one whose name is Kāśyapa,
Long ago, at that time, upon that earth,
In this king of Tārā's ritual manuals,
For the welfare of the bhūtas,
This mantra was fully proclaimed.
The whole world, fallen into suffering,
Poor, weary and emaciated,
Those who were most deeply afflicted:
It was spoken for their sake.
Welfare itself for the bhūtas,
For those who rely on it again and everywhere,
For the sake of food for all the bhūtas,
This secret mantra was supremely spoken:
"I shall utter this secret mantra.
All who rely upon the bodhisattvas,
And you śrāvakas, listen!

It vanquishes the grip of illness.
Those tormented by the sickness of hunger,
Whatever beings suffer from thirst,
For the pacifying of all suffering,
You who desire prosperity, listen!"
Kāśyapa, the great light,
The Chief of Sages, spoke thus.
The afflicted ones, their minds gladdened,
Made supplication to that all-pervading lord:
"Great Sage, King of Dharma,
Knower of Dharma, please explain the secret mantra.
Be compassionate toward beings
Who abide by the supreme commitment."
When they had made this request, the Sage Proclaims the supreme mantra in full,
With the voice of the kalaviṅka bird,
The great drum and the thunder of clouds,
With the voice of Brahmā, of great diligence,
He who is the son of Brahmā, the supreme Victor:
"Whatever beings have come here at all,
The footless and the many-footed,
The two-footed and the four-footed,
All you hosts of bhūtas, listen!
In short, for the benefit of all beings,
I shall explain the mantra from which happiness arises.
For beings and others of past, future and present
Who have gathered here,
I shall explain it concisely.
You who desire prosperity, listen!
namaḥ samanta buddhānāṃ apratihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā oṃ gagane gagana gañjo ānaya sarva lahu lahu samaya manu smara ākarṣaṇe mā vilamba yathe pitaṃ saṃpādāya svāhā"

When the Blessed One Kāśyapa had spoken thus, he fell silent. In the interval during which the Perfectly Complete Buddha Kāśyapa proclaimed these words of the vidyā-mantra in full, the whole of the great sky became completely filled with clouds of food fit for the great. The whole expanse of the sky in all the worlds of the great trichiliocosm appeared to be completely covered with clouds of food. In accordance with one's intention, for the sake of what one desires, one should take it up and wash.

Then, rising once again,
He goes to the monastery or his dwelling.
Wherever he has properly stayed before,
Wherever he lives, there he should go.
Having gone there, the reciter, in that spot,
Should set down his alms bowl.
Then he should quickly rinse,
And likewise take up the bowl again.
The alms bowl may be of earth or of leaves,
Or of silver, or likewise of gold,
Or of copper, or even of bark.
He offers a food offering to the Teacher.
Having offered food to the Teacher,
Then again he offers to the king of vidyā-mantras.
If a single guest has come,
Or to one who is suffering, he gives what he can.
The food itself, in every case,
Is certainly to be eaten.
He should not give away too much.
Here the knower of mantra should not torment himself;
He should be fully endowed with awareness.
Keeping just the measure of the stomach,
The rest of the food is always for others.
One oppressed by hunger and thirst
Cannot accomplish the aim of the mantra;
If one eats too little or too much,
One cannot perform the approach for the mantra's aim.
For that very reason the Lord of Victors
Said to all embodied beings,
"Beings subsist by food."
That by which humans live,
And gods, asuras, gandharvas,
Nāgas, yakṣas, kinnaras,
Rākṣasas, pretas, piśācas,

Bhūtas, stars and planets:
Any that do not depend on food
Do not exist at all.
The coarse food that is always eaten
Is known as morsel food.
Beings whose food is subtle are set apart.
As the Tathāgata has taught,
Those who always have meditative concentration as their food
Move in form and stir;
And the gods of the formless realm as well
Feed on the fruit of absorption.
The beings of the intermediate existence, too,
Are well known as eaters of smells.
Likewise the beings of the desire realm
Eat food of many different kinds;
The gods and humans who are possessed of desire Eat morsel food.
For that very reason the Lord of Sages
Taught, as a cause of the Dharma,
That "beings subsist by food."
These things are well known.
The reciter who is always diligent Should know the right measure of food,
Because the approach of the vidyā
Rests upon this food.
For one whose conduct is unerring and pure,
Who is virtuous and lives in celibacy,
And who knows the right measure of food,
Accomplishment is not hard to find.
Just as, so that it can pull its load,
And so that the cart may last a long time,
One greases the hub of the cart's wheel,
So the mantra practitioner who knows mantra
Takes food for the sake of sustaining himself.
For the sake of nourishing the body,
The reciter should always nourish it,
For the sake of accomplishing the mantras,

And as a cause of the accumulations for awakening.
All food and,

and whatever foods they craved, those rained down upon them. With whatever foods they craved, for the act of eating and for the pacifying of the suffering of hunger; and for the thirsty, drink like the current of a river of water endowed with the eight qualities, to be drunk, also rained down there just as their minds desired. In that instant all beings had every sickness of hunger completely pacified and all thirst removed. The whole assembly, endowed with everything, was filled with wonder and satisfaction; they rejoiced in what the Blessed One had said and delighted in it, bowed their heads at the Blessed One's feet, and vanished right there. The Blessed One Kāśyapa, too, remained in the abode of the tathāgatas.

"I, the Blessed One Śākyamuni, also at that time rejoiced in what was taught in this rite of the king of ritual manuals, for the benefit of all beings, for the removal of hunger and thirst, and especially for the sake of all who recite mantra. First of all, the reciter should accomplish this mantra."

If he has no wish to go for alms, he should climb to the summit of a mountain and do seven hundred thousand recitations. Then he should eat the three white substances or drink milk. On that very mountain summit he should set up a middle-sized painted cloth of the noble Tārā as before, make a great offering, and make tormas and food offerings on a vast scale. Then, with this very secret mantra spoken by the Perfectly Complete Buddha Kāśyapa, he should kindle a fire with sticks of khadira wood and perform eight thousand fire offerings with moist udumbara sticks smeared with curd, honey and butter, or else with sticks of bilva wood.

Then, at midnight, a great black cloud and a whirlwind will come; he should not be afraid, and if he rises he should not go away. He should protect himself with the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, seal the maṇḍala, and protect his companions too, as before. Then the black whirlwind will vanish, and a woman adorned with every ornament, with a garland of light illuminating all the directions, will sit before the practitioner and say, "O great being, rise! You have succeeded!" Then the practitioner should offer her water for the feet, scented water mixed with jasmine flowers. Then she will vanish right there. From that day on, she gives him, or twenty-five of his companions, whatever foods they desire, and she also provides every requisite they wish for. Then the practitioner should offer water for the feet and request her to depart. He should circumambulate the painted cloth three times, take up the painted cloth, bow to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and then go to a mountain summit or an uninhabited place. There, once he himself or his companion has swept it, he should spread out what is to be spread out, and in that place perform the rites of traveling through the sky and the like.

Then the practitioner, as before, should sit upon a mat of kuśa grass, invite the middle-sized painted cloth to be present as before, kindle a fire with khadira wood, and for twenty-one days, in three sessions, with white lotus flowers smeared with curd, honey and butter, perform eight thousand fire offerings with the root vidyā, the heart mantra or the near-heart mantra, for the sake of any great rite, or for the sake of the one-syllable mantra. Then at midnight, at the close of the fire offering, he will see the Blessed Lady Tārā directly, and she will grant the supreme boon he desires: traveling through the sky, invisibility, the ground of a bodhisattva, the state of a pratyekabuddha, the five higher knowledges, long life, great kingship and great wealth, the favor of a great king, or the course of practice that follows the noble Avalokiteśvara. In short, she grants everything the mind desires. Whatever he asks for, she grants accordingly, and he obtains all the substances of accomplishment. She summons great beings; in short, she does everything just as it is requested. She also thoroughly purifies even the faults of karma that have heaped up. So spoke the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

Another rite of activity, which serves as the middling sādhana, is this. First of all, in a special place, a clean spot, a riverbank, or the shore of a river island, he should do everything as before, set up the painted cloth facing west, and himself face east. Sitting upon a mat of kuśa grass, he should apply everything in full as above and do six hundred thousand recitations in three sessions. When the recitation is complete, he should kindle the fire exactly as before and perform eight thousand fire offerings with cassia flowers mixed with white sandalwood or with saffron. If, at the close of the fire offering, the painted cloth moves, he will become a minister. If a radiance of light appears on the painted cloth, through that light comes kingship. If the painted cloth is stirred all over by garlands of flame, it is kingship of the family of the Four Great Kings. If fire appears on the painted cloth, it is lordship over the Thirty-Three, that is, the state of Śakra. If the painted cloth appears to teach the Dharma, it is the lordship of the three bodhisattvas. If the hand of the figure on the painted cloth touches the crown of his head, he will gradually attain the five higher knowledges, the realization of the seven grounds, and the certainty of the ten powers.

Then the practitioner, having accomplished the mantra spoken by the Blessed One Kāśyapa, should, by that very attainment of the means of dispelling hunger and thirst, and by that very rite, apply himself diligently to the procedures of the rite that is the means of accomplishing the aims of the vidyā conduct concerning requisites; otherwise he will not succeed. Following in this way, step by step, the conduct of mantra, in short he diligently and definitely accomplishes it, and accomplishes the special substances, medicines and requisites, and the precious jewels, just as was definitively taught before.

The knower of mantra, the reciter of mantra,
Intent upon the rite that has been explained,
The mantra practitioner, at that time, in that place,
Having eaten food from pure people,
With a joyful mind
And with his senses fully satisfied,
Always takes up what remains in his bowl,
And with a good mind goes to a clean river.
Having set it down in a solitary spot,
The one who keeps the vows gives it to the animals.
Having given suitably to the animals,
He carefully washes his bowl.
What is to be done with the bowl's remainder:
Food without leavings and free of odor
The Sage has called the bowl's remainder.
In the vessel used for begging
One does not eat the food there;
Food, fruits and substances
Should never be eaten there.
Nor should one eat from lotus petals,
Or from what comes from the blue lotus;
Those with sweet fragrance are rejected,
And the mantra practitioner does not eat from them.

Nor should the mantra practitioner eat from the kumuda,
Or from what comes from the plakṣa or the udumbara,
Nor yet from the leaves of the pāṭī,
Nor from what comes from thorny branches in the mountain wilds,

Nor on the leaves of the mango either;
Likewise from what comes from the sāṭala,
From sāla leaves, from the śirīṣa,
And from what comes from the bodhi tree;
The tree beneath which the Blessed One, the Buddha,
The Lion of the Śākyas, sat:
That tree should be carefully avoided.
Nor on the branches of that tree,
Nor on the nāgakesara tree either:
On these one should never eat at all.
The wise avoid all of them by every means.
A hut of leaves of the Sage Should never be trodden on out of folly;
The mantra practitioner's pledge would be broken.
Food should be eaten on leaves
Other than those leaves.
Earthenware and copper are prescribed,
Likewise what is made of gold and silver,
And what is made of crystal and of stone;
Having likewise taken one's food,
The mantra practitioner should always eat from these.
One should not eat on the back of a leaf,
Nor likewise in the palm of the hand.
The sons of the One with Ten Powers,
The pratyekabuddhas who are like the rhinoceros,
The chief śrāvakas of the Tathāgata:
Other leaves, and the food offered to them,
The reciter should avoid.
Nor should he tread on written letters with his feet.
Various foods and oil cakes,
And likewise drinks and foods,
The mantra practitioner should take with care.
All the food offerings
Offered to the Victors and the supreme Victors,
And likewise to the śrāvakas, the supreme persons,
And to the Three Jewels,
The reciter should always avoid.

For an embodied being who takes even a little,
His mantras will not succeed because of it,
Let alone every kind of good fortune
And lasting glory.
One who eats the food offerings and tormas
Of the Victor's followers and of Śiva's followers,
Then none of his rites will succeed.
One who is pure, learned and endowed with moral discipline,
Compassionate and engaged in compassionate deeds,
Delighting in the conduct of cleanliness,
Accomplishes vidyā-mantras in every way.
Food that has been given to other beings
The reciter should not eat.
Nor should he eat other food
That has not been carefully examined by others.
Food that is given to oneself
Should be accepted, even if it is only a little.
For the knower of mantra who proceeds in this way,
His accomplishment, the enemy of evil,
Comes to be brought to full completion.
The reciter who by this rite
Keeps the observance of taking food
Is well praised by the sages.
In accomplishing all mantras,
In brief, by seeing the rite,
It applies to all eating and to all actions.

Then I shall explain still more.
The mantra purifies everything.
Then the reciter should rinse with water,
And at that time recite this mantra.
Then the mantra practitioner, having recited
The body-purifying mantra seven times, says:
"Hosts of bhūtas and gods, here Listen to its meaning in full!"
Having touched the whole body with water,
The sage should recite this mantra:

namaḥ sarva buddhānāṃ aprahihata śāsanānāṃ tadyathā oṃ sarva kilbiṣa nāśani nāśaya sarva duṣṭa prayuktaṃ samaya manusmara hūṃ jaḥ svāhā

When partaking of any other food allowed by the training, one should first consecrate it by reciting this mantra over it seven times, and then partake of it. Having eaten, one should rinse with water as before and smear it on the whole body, beginning with the crown of the head, and then one should rest. One rests for half a moment or for one watch.

Then, having bowed to the painted image and to all the buddhas, one should read the volumes of the true Dharma: the noble Perfection of Wisdom, the noble Samādhi of the Moon Lamp, the noble Ten Grounds, the noble Sublime Golden Light, the noble Great Peacock, and the noble Ratnaketu Dhāraṇī; one should read any one of these or of others besides. This is for about a quarter of the length of the day. Then, having become fully calm, one may read as one wishes. Having folded up the volume, one should put on clean clothes and bow to the true Dharma. Then, for the sake of bathing, one goes to the bank of a river or to a large pool that can be entered. Having drawn water free of living creatures and consecrated it by reciting over it seven times, one should cast it into the water with this vidyā. What is it?

Having made protection with this, it serves for binding the directions, for the companions, for binding the maṇḍala, for binding the mouth, and for summoning all the wicked and the extremely wicked. For binding obstructors too, one recites it seven times over a thread and ties it around the waist, and thereby everything is completely bound. At all times of recitation and all times of bathing, in order to destroy wicked obstructors and for complete pacification, this mantra should be recited one thousand times. Then all the rites are performed. One should be set upon a lotus seat, endowed with the great mudrā. In all the rites, nothing whatever will turn out otherwise.

Then the practitioner should take powders made of earth and the like and bathe as is comfortable, bathing with water free of living creatures. In everything, in all actions, it should be done only with what is free of living creatures. Then, having bathed, one should anoint oneself with an earthen substance or with other perfumes of pleasant fragrance, and with special requisites. One should not throw spittle, excrement, urine and the like into the water. Nor should one play in it.

Endowed with compassion, one should contemplate oneself and all sentient beings individually: as selfless, as empty, as possessed of suffering, as choked by suffering, as overwhelmed by feelings, as beings possessed of the suffering of bondage that arises like waves. Seeing these beings, who are thus without practice, as the ones whose mass of suffering from poison, cutting, falling, scattering, terror and the like the knower of mantra is to bring to cessation in just that way, as dwelling in the dense ocean of saṃsāra, and considering them as without a resting place, without a protector, without a refuge, and of extremely lowly mind, the meditator, standing in water up to the neck or up to the navel, should hold the mind one-pointedly within that very water.

First of all, one should imagine a great lotus on whose petals are great flowers, beautified by the leaves of a great lotus and lovely to behold. It has a stalk made of precious beryl, lotus filaments made of the precious madaka, and a well-opened stem made of crystal, and it is beautified by the crystal and ruby flowers that grow along it. Upon it is a lion throne beautified by many jewels and covered with a pair of fine cloths.

One should imagine the Blessed One, the Buddha, seated upon it. He is seated teaching the Dharma, golden in color, adorned with a maṇḍala of light pervaded all around by garlands of blazing light, vast like the sky, as if supremely painted, seated with legs crossed. On his right is the noble Avalokiteśvara, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, seated on a great lotus seat and holding a yak-tail whisk, placed at the side where the Blessed One sits; his body is reddish yellow, like the color of ground saffron. On the left is the noble Mahāsthāmaprāpta, white like an autumn cloud, holding a yak-tail whisk in his hand.

Likewise there are the eight bodhisattvas: the noble Maitreya, Samantabhadra, Kṣitigarbha, Gaganagañja, Sarvanīvaraṇaviṣkambhin, the noble Mañjuśrī, the noble Vajrapāṇi, and the one called Sudhana. To the right of these ten bodhisattvas one should imagine eight pratyekabuddhas: Candana, Gandhamādana, Ketu, Sitaketu, Desire, Near Desire, Nemi, and Nemi; these are the eight. In that same place are eight great śrāvakas, namely the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana, the noble Śāriputra, Gavāṃpati, Bharadvāja Piṇḍola, Pilindavatsa, the noble Rāhula, the noble Mahākāśyapa, and the noble Ānanda. Near these great śrāvakas one should visualize an infinite saṅgha of monks. Near the pratyekabuddhas one should visualize infinite pratyekabuddhas. At the place of the eight bodhisattvas, too, one should visualize an infinite saṅgha of bodhisattvas. Likewise, all around, one should visualize the maṇḍala of the retinue as possessed of a great maṇḍala of retinue.

The great bodhisattva himself, while standing in water up to the navel, should make offering to the Blessed One with a shower of flowers as large as Mount Meru, lying in vast, great heaps, of many kinds of divine and human flowers: māndārava flowers and great māndārava flowers, lotuses and great lotuses, dhānuskārika, parṣika, and indravara flowers of many kinds. And to all the noble śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas and to the bodhisattvas he should make offerings of powders, robes, parasols, victory banners and pennants, and of many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of delightful divine and human lamps. Likewise he should present tormas, incense, food offerings, offerings, honors and the like, the requisites needed by gods and humans.

One should visualize rays of light streaming forth from the ūrṇā hair between the eyebrows of the Blessed One Śākyamuni, illuminating oneself and all the directions. As soon as the meditator enters this meditative concentration, he obtains the fruit of Brahmā's merit. He will certainly become directed toward supreme awakening.

Meditative concentrations such as this
Were taught by the supreme beings of the world.
For the well-being of all bhūtas,
And for the benefit of mantra practitioners,
At that time the chief of the first concentrations,
For the benefit of all mantra practitioners,
Was taught for the sake of sentient beings.
Then the maṇḍala of the seventh supreme Sage Shall be explained in detail.
The Sage taught it as the first,
And the maṇḍala of the second,
And the third, other than these.
In the first is the supreme accomplishment;
In the middling, likewise, others;
In the lesser, minor things are accomplished:
So the supreme Sage has definitively taught.
Likewise the meditations on the painted image
Are superior, middling and lesser,
And all of them destroy evil.
Besides these, the wise

Should practice the kinds of meditative concentration.
If one abides firmly in that concentration,
The mantras will succeed for him.
The rite has been explained as one wishes.
The reciter, having cultivated meditative concentration,
Having offered there the mantra's guest water,
Requests the deities to depart as they please.
Having come out of that body of water,
He then goes as is comfortable.
In the place prescribed before,
Well calmed by seeing the rite,
The mantra practitioner recites the secret mantra there,
Just as was stated earlier.
His own deity, who was invited,
He there requests with mantra to depart.
Then, having protected himself
And likewise his companions,
He knows that very thing through wholesome action,
And delights in and bows to the acts of the rite.
With many kinds of praise and offering,
Having praised in every way the supreme persons,
With his own mantra he praises the Protector,
The śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas like the rhinoceros,
And the bodhisattvas, the great beings,
Able to care for the three worlds.
Then the reciter of secret mantra
Rises again from that seat,
And having gone to a distant place,
Avoiding the direction of the outer wind,
He casts away mucus and spittle,
And likewise excrement and urine.
By day he faces the north,
And at night he faces the south.
There the reciter of mantra
Should never think about his aims.
There he should not do the recitation
Of the mantras said to perform his rites.

Having gone, by night or at other times,
The good mantra practitioner then sits on the ground,
And rinses with pure water.
He should put the hem of a clean cloth into the water.
With seven lumps of earth
He carefully washes his feet;
Having taken seven applications thoroughly,
For excrement there are thirty applications;
For the hands, at both ends,
And likewise for spitting,
And for mucus, two each in the same way.

Then one should carefully rinse with water.
In a spot that has gone far from the dwelling,
Having likewise gone as far as a sound carries,
In an open space, by a road or the like,
Then elsewhere, as one wishes,
Outside, at the southern edge,
Where there is no water and no precipice,
And likewise where it is covered with sand,
Avoiding rivers and avoiding their banks too,
Carefully avoiding unclean water,
Hidden and thoroughly cleansed,
And avoiding the outlying regions,
Having gone to a spot that is utterly secluded,
The mantra practitioner should discard the impurities.
The reciter, knowing the proper time,
Does not follow his urges as he pleases.
Then, going to a clean spot,
Likewise at the outskirts, having done
The business of excrement
And of urine,
There, with his body at ease,
With both parts covered and hidden,
In a spot where there are no people,
He should accomplish the king of secret mantras.
Likewise, in all such places,

On mountains and in thickets,
In delightful dwellings at the outskirts,
And likewise free of the vicious beings
Whom the Victor rejected,
One accomplishes all the kings of secret mantra.
In a land whose king is righteous,
Where people delight in clean conduct
And are respectful to mother and father,
Where the twice-born castes have left,
The accomplishment of the deities will be attained.
It is in that place, and not elsewhere.
The delightful, fortunate banks of the Bhagīrathī,
The very beautiful Yamunā,
The Sindhu, the Narmadā, the Vakṣu,
The pure banks of the Candrabhāgā,
The Kāverī and the Sarasvatī,
And the great river Śītā:
These are fields of accomplishment, and no others,
So the sons of the One with Ten Powers have explained.
The fields that the One with Ten Powers spoke of:
The pathless mountains of the north,
Kashmir and China,
Nepal, and likewise Mangyul,
Great China and Khotan:
All of these without exception are fields of accomplishment.
Whatever mountains and rivers
Lie in the northern direction
Are declared to be lands of merit,
Where barley and wheat are eaten.
Wherever sentient beings are compassionate,
There accomplishment always comes.
Śrīparvata, the great rocky mountain,
Which lies in the southern land,
And the glorious stūpa of Dhānyakaṭaka,
Which holds the relics of the Victor on earth:
There one should accomplish mantras,
Swiftly, every rite and every rite.

The Vajrāsana and the great stūpa,
The beautiful place of the wheel of Dharma,
And where the chief of Sages passed into peace:
There too one should look for accomplishment.
The stūpa of the descent from the gods,
Sāpakṣe, and the place of the great miracle,
The supreme town called Kapilavastu,
And there in the Lumbinī grove where he was born:
The king of secret mantras will succeed there.
On Vulture Peak, which the Victor Praised and greatly lauded,
And likewise the rock and the Cool Grove,
The supreme town called Kusuma,
Likewise ever the city of Kāśī,
Mathurā and Kanyakubja,
The city of Ujjayinī on earth,
Likewise the stūpa at Vaiśālī,
Ever Mithilā on earth,
The chief towns and cities,
And other places where Victors appear:
In these lands of merit, highly praised,
In them one accomplishes siddhi.
Lands other than these,
Villages, regions and mountains,
Sites and chief towns,
That lie by milk or by flowing water:
There, keeping to solitude,
One will delight in recitation and fire offering.
In places without a roof,
And always in empty houses,
One should first perform the approach.
The rites that accord with the mantras,
The mantra practitioner, always in the central land,
Should properly be intent on mantra recitation.
Fully engaged in recitation, always diligent,
Accustomed to mantra, knowledge and giving,
Practicing moral discipline, very steadfast,

Delighting in benefiting all beings,
With faith in the conduct of mantra,
The one who keeps the observances recites as before.
In a clean land, being cleanly,
Free of barbarians and thieves.
There one remains for a great eon,
Because of being parted from the light of the pledge;
In the unbearable darkness of hell
Childish people are cooked.
Those who disparage the true Dharma,
Who are obscured by the darkness of ignorance,
Or who are childish in wisdom,
Deluded and with perverse pride,
Who despise the king of vidyās,
Will fall into unbearable hell.
Therefore one should not do evil;
Speaking falsely is also reprehensible.
Contempt for the true Dharma
And wrong views are reprehensible.
Therefore, always having faith,
Always rely on the rites of secret mantra.
Speaking the truth and knowing the Dharma,
Always benefiting sentient beings,
The knower of mantra relies on mantra,
And his accomplishment is certain.
With the supreme, the middling and the lowest,
One performs rites of many kinds.
Rites are performed through actions.
Through actions that are always beneficial,
Being properly endowed with the rites of action,
One will always succeed in them.
For the aim of the task and for every aim,
One should perform rites of many kinds.
Whatever, for the task's sake, is not a task
Should be applied to the work of the task.
The purpose of acts that bear fruit
Should always be carried out as an act.

Action, rite and fruit:
From action, rite and fruit always come.
What lacks fruit becomes fruit,
And fruit itself always bears fruit.
What lacks fruit is itself fruitful;
All things, indeed, bear fruit.
The yogin's mantra is to be accomplished:
Even one lacking proper application,
The one who lacks it and the one endowed with it both accomplish.
Without what is to be accomplished and one who accomplishes,
There is no accomplishment in it.
All substances of accomplishment
Are contrary to the cause of accomplishment.
When the mantra's accomplishment is not accomplished,
The mantra is the cause that accomplishes it.
From the wish to act
The desired rite becomes clear.
In all rites that are not rites,
One should not perform the tantra of rites.
Rites endowed with the meaning of mantra and tantra
Should all be undertaken.
A rite driven by eagerness for what is begun and for beginning
Should not be undertaken.

Mantras whose work has not been undertaken
Will not succeed for any embodied being.
This was taught of old by the Chief of Sages,
Who cares for all sentient beings:
The true vow of the Victor's sons,
Taught by the speaker of secret mantra.
The practitioner knows all the mantras,
And in this king of ritual manuals the words
Are taught in the manner of mantra.
The path that has become the cause of awakening
Accomplishes all mantras themselves;
It becomes equal to knowledge.
Before long, then,

The wise one will gain accomplishment.
For the pacification of all bhūtas
It was proclaimed by all the buddhas.
By this path of the way of secret mantra,
Which goes to the city of nirvāṇa,
And likewise ever the path of awakening,
All the aims of the Dharma are perfected.
Its ultimate ally
Is first to abide as the Buddha himself.
Likewise, here, spontaneously,
One gains accomplishment together with its fruit.
Knowing the various rites and teachings,
One will put the mantras to work.
Moral discipline, meditative concentration and the liberations:
These are obtained in brief.
That it accomplishes siddhi and every aim
Was taught by the chief Victor.
The person who gains the aim of the feet
And abides in an excellent destiny,
And likewise ever the chief of yakṣas;
The lowest is the cause of kingship.
Of the worlds of the asuras and the gods,
And likewise lordship over them:
The mantra practitioner will obtain them all.
He will perform acts that bear fruit.
Properly endowed with the conduct of cleanliness,
Always delighting in moral discipline and meditative concentration:
So the mantras have been taught in full.
Then the mantra practitioner should recite the mantras.
The mantra practitioner who wishes for wealth
Performs rites of many kinds,
And likewise the supreme, the middling
And the lowest are to be done.
By the lowest, enjoyments increase;
By the middling, a higher embodiment;
And by the supreme, ascent:
These the reciter always obtains.

At the end of recitation the mantra practitioner rests,
And should observe for as long as the time lasts.
When the time for recitation comes,
Then the practice is to be done there,
And likewise one accomplishes the rites.

By constantly reciting in this way, a person exhausts his own evil. Whatever rite of former karma the mantra practitioner has performed, which remains to be accomplished over a succession of births, and likewise what will be found in his collection of karma, when it arises, through reciting mantra it serves again to exhaust the evil of the reciter of mantra; that karma is destroyed and the mantra becomes accomplished. Likewise, through supreme, middling and lowest worldly offerings and recitation, evil is exhausted without remainder, and all the evil that has filled the succession of births is destroyed. Through reciting the mantras of the tathāgatas, one becomes adorned with ornaments of many kinds on one's body, delighted by the presence of the sages, and renowned for every good quality; one becomes the king who dwells in the abode of the yakṣas, and is always endowed with the attainment of the siddhi of every aim.

From the Root Ritual Manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, Ūrdhvajaṭā, from the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, a Great Vehicle sūtra of vast extent: the ninth chapter, the rite of the middling painting, is complete.

Then again the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked upon the maṇḍala of the entire assembly and spoke to the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara: "Great bodhisattva, listen! Your followers of vidyā-mantra strive for the benefit of all sentient beings. Listen well to the vidyā-mantra that sentient beings are to recite, the rite of the rosary with which they are to count it, the rite of the means of accomplishment common to all the tantras, the rite for all mantras, and hold it well in mind. I shall explain it."

When he had spoken thus, the great being said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, excellent, excellent! Blessed One, out of compassion for us, please take this up and teach it, for the sake of the sentient beings who have fully entered into the conduct and the pledges of all vidyā-mantras, and for the benefit of all sentient beings."

When he had made this request, the Blessed One said this to the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara: "Great being, I shall explain its divisions in detail. Listen! What is it by which one strives earnestly in the conduct of all mantras and accomplishes every aim of sentient beings? First of all, what becomes the mantra is:

namaḥ sarva budhānāṃ acintyaddhūta rūpināṃ acintyaddhuta rūpināṃ tadyathā oṃ kuru kuru sarva artha sādhāya sarva duṣṭa vimohani gaganābalaṃbe viśodhāya svāhā

With this vidyā one should perform the rites for all rosaries. One should perform the rites of purifying, enlivening, taking, setting in motion and the like.

First, at the tree for the rosary,
Having consecrated it with this Thirty-seven times,
The one who keeps the observances should make protection.
Having slept one night there,
One should examine one's dreams.
A nonhuman, complete in form,
Ugly, baring its fangs fiercely,
Says to the mantra practitioner,
'Blessed one, take it as you wish.'
The practitioner, rising at dawn,
Goes to that tree.
If even in a dream one does not see
That ugly form baring its great fangs,
The mantra practitioner should leave that tree
And go somewhere else.
First is the rudrākṣa;
Other than that, the Indra tree;
The bodetse is also desirable.
Moreover, one should climb a fruit-bearing tree
Together with a companion
Accomplished and skilled in climbing trees.
If one has no companion,
One should climb it oneself.
Having climbed to where the fruit is on the upper branches,
The one of excellent observances,
Always heedful there,
Takes the fruit from the upper branches.
One should apply it well to the upper level.

The upper is for supreme accomplishment,
So the supreme person has taught;
The middle is for middling accomplishment,
And the lowest is for the lower."

Fruits that creatures have not spoiled:
These one should properly take.
Those gained from the western branch
Should be employed as the cause of substances.
The yakṣiṇīs of the north and the like:
These summon the gods together.
The act of summoning that is explained
Is for pacification, for the sake of all.
War between the gods and the asuras,
Kinnaras and rākṣasas,
Bring about desires of many kinds.
For the flourishing of all bhūtas,
The rites that bear fruit
Accomplish the whole of conduct.
The branches on the eastern side
And the fruits that grow there,
If likewise taken with care,
Are the cause of the aim of long life;
Through mantra they always produce
The fruits of accomplishment of many kinds.
Whatever branch grows toward the south,
Full of leaves,
Steals the life of sentient beings;
The reciter should carefully avoid it.
Wherever fruit is declared
On branches that lean to the south,
In that direction lies the destruction
Of enemies' lives and the splitting of lineages,
The cause of much that is without merit;
The reciter carefully avoids it.
Whatever fruits are proclaimed
To grow on branches that hang down below:

Through them one goes beneath the earth,
Where the asuras dwell.
Having taken those fruit-bearing garlands,
Which are well proclaimed,
On a creeper that goes downward,
One then goes beneath the earth.
Having entered there, the reciter
Attains there the very bliss of the gods.
Joined with the daughters of the asuras,
He remains there for an eon.
Having taken all the fruits for the rosary,
The reciter then performs recitation.
Having made protection together with it,
He then goes as is comfortable.
In that distant place,
In that clean spot, the mantra practitioner
Should likewise always stay,
And should arrange the rosary that has been produced.
With diligence he takes the rosary fruits,
And then thoroughly purifies them.
That is known as enlivening the rosary.
Three, seven, eight and one,
And twenty-one times,
The knower of mantra should purify it there.
Always with the previous mantra,
Recited eight or seven times:
After that it is considered pure.
With a well-praised lotus fiber,
And thread spun by a girl,
Threefold and with five strands,
The one who keeps the observances makes the rosary cord.
The one who knows the reality of mantra strings it.
The fruits are small and round,
Always without holes made by creatures,
Their parts unimpaired and unspoiled,
Beautiful and of pleasing color,
Without holes and without cracks,

Round beads just as they should be:
Likewise rudrākṣa,
Bodetse and intrakṣa,
The fruits always even and beautiful.
When there is excellent fruit,
The mantra practitioner, supremely diligent,
Should carefully string the rosary.
Of gold, or else of silver,
Or made of gems and crystal,
Of pearl, of conch, of musāra,
And of coral one may make them too:
Rosaries of many kinds are to be made.
Moreover, fine rosaries
Made of precious substances are to be made,
And those with rosaries of beads
Of herbs that grow from the earth
Should string the thread in meditative equipoise.
Moreover, some beads,
Or those made of fruits or of minerals,
Strung with the tip of kuśa grass,
The reciter should also make with care.
One hundred and eight, or twenty-five,
Or fifty: these are middling.
The mantra practitioner, in meditative equipoise,
Should string the measures of fruits.
One thousand and eight is also to be made;
This rosary is the superior one.
These four kinds of rosary
The mantra practitioner should always string.
Then, having strung it, the mantras,
With three or two marker beads,
And with rings made of brass,
And likewise of gold and of silver,
And then with rings made of copper,
One should string the rosary throughout.
Then at the end one should make an eyelet,
And arrange them on it in order.

One should carefully wind it beautifully.
Having made it clearly
The abode of all the buddhas without exception,
It is then seen as like a maṇḍala.
Like the shape of a snake's hood,
It is adorned by being wound around.
It is like strings of pearls,
Fashioned as a necklace.
Then, at the edge of a wholesome stream,
Having bathed in the stainless water,
Having bathed in due order,
One should rise from the place of water.
Likewise one should diligently rinse.
Having taken the rosary thread,
One washes it thoroughly with the five products of the cow;
Having washed it thoroughly with powdered earth,
On a clean cloth, with fragrant scent,
One anoints it thereafter,
And with a highly praised color,
White sandalwood and saffron,
One should carefully wash it with warm water.
Likewise both will go.
Having gone to the appropriate place,
Where there is the middling painting,
Of the supreme Victor, the Chief of Sages,
The Lion of the Śākyas, supreme among humans,
Or likewise an image of the Teacher,
Or one that holds the relics of the Victor on earth,
One places it before that object of offering.
Having set it down near it,
Then, in its presence,
Abiding in the pledge, one recites
One thousand and eight times,
Or else one hundred
Together with eight.
Having observed a fast for a day and a night,
One offers the rosary to the seventh Sage.

One should recite as before,
Making the amount equal to that.
Then one recites fully on the rosary.
Staying there that very night,
On ground strewn with kuśa grass,
The knower of mantra should sleep there.
Whatever dreams one sees,
If one sees an auspicious dream,
The dream is a definite indication,
And one should accomplish siddhi by it.
If in a dream one sees
Buddhas, śrāvakas, or those like the rhinoceros,
The mantra practitioner will succeed, with its fruit;
One should certainly perform its rite.
One sees the form of a monk,
Or various beautiful images of brahmins:
If one sees that dream,
One should likewise offer the rosary.
The one who accomplishes all the aims of mantra
Will likewise succeed without doubt.

From the Root Ritual Manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, Ūrdhvajaṭā, from the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, a Great Vehicle sūtra of vast extent: from the chapter on the rite of the middling painting, the tenth chapter, the chapter on the rite of the rosary, is complete.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked out over the great maṇḍala of the assembly, complete in every respect, and said to the great bodhisattva, the noble Avalokiteśvara: "Great being, there is the special rite that completes your chapter on the knowledge mantras (vidyāmantras), and the accomplishment of the knowledge mantra that applies the work of the fire offering. Within the special rite for making use of the fire, what is it that beings who strive in the conduct of the knowledge mantras apply and abide in? The great secret of the collection of knowledge mantras is this: tadyathā oṃ tiṣṭha hari piṅgale hi rakṣa di hi da dā dī pā ya hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā. Avalokiteśvara, this supreme heart mantra performs every action and grants every desire. First of all, the practitioner, reciting this heart mantra of the fire once, should offer three oblations of ghee into the fire as a fire offering; thereby the fire god will have been invited. Applying it in the same way, for pacifying, increasing, and fierce rites, there are three kinds of kindling sticks.

For pacifying, wood of the aśoka tree,
Especially when it is still moist,
A span or about a cubit long,
Or a span with three finger-widths more:
Know well the proper form of the sticks.
This is the rite to be performed.
Without holes and without cracks,
Likewise resembling a parrot's wing,
Green or white in color;
Black in color should be avoided.
Avoid those eaten by worms;
Offer those that have no holes.
Further, those not of the finest color,
And those of inferior quality, are rejected.
They may be dry or moist;
At that time one should begin.
Not rotten and not crooked,
And those too long should be avoided.

Then, when making the hearth,
Square on every side,
Dig carefully downward
To a measure of four cubits,
Or three cubits, or two,
Or likewise just one cubit;
Always free of living creatures,
And well filled with sand.
Then a rim shaped like a lotus,
Circular all around;
Or else, carefully, a square one
Made with three tiers.
For pacifying and increasing rites
This too has been rightly proclaimed.
For fierce rites, in the center of the ground
Make a vajra, two-pronged
Or three-pronged.

The hearth is two cubits across.
In a clean place smooth it likewise.
Likewise practice on a riverbank,
In places by a solitary tree,
In charnel grounds and empty houses:
There one should properly begin the fire offering.
Likewise on mountain peaks,
In empty temples,
And likewise in great wildernesses:
Whatever places of practice
The supreme person has taught,
For all the rites of fire offering
These have been taught as the sites.
Seated on a mat of kuśa grass
A cubit in size,
There the knower of mantra in particular
Should perform the work of the fire offering.
By abiding firmly in that very place,
Accomplishment comes swiftly, without doubt.
Facing east or north,
Perform the pacifying and the increasing rites.
The south is for the ways of fierce rites;
The mantra practitioner should avoid it.
Facing east brings the accomplishment of pacifying;
For increasing, too, face north.
Thus at all times one should Undertake the recitation of the knowledge mantra.
With bilva, arka, plakṣa,
And nyagrodha, perform the increasing rites.
The wood of fierce rites, which is dry,
And the hot, the sour, and the sharp:
All these should be avoided;
The sages have always forbidden them.
For pacifying and increasing rites,
Moist wood is most auspicious.
Likewise for fierce rites, dry wood,
And the hot, the sour, and the sharp.

If those kindling sticks are not to be had,
One should always regard other wood as them.
They should be examined for two tips.

Green and glossy and even,
Like the neck of a peacock:
With kuśa grass of such a kind,
Kuśa all around the perimeter
Should always be spread;
For pacifying and increasing rites,
With grass the color of emerald.
Likewise, it is with dry grass always
That evil deeds are done;
Here the supreme Victor has forbidden it.
With stainless, pure water,
Always free of insects,
Then sprinkle all around.
Circling to the right,
One should diligently kindle the fire.
Perform the ablution according to the rite.
With the roots of clean grass
Make a lamp of proper measure;
Then, forming a fist,
Carefully kindle the fire.
Not with the breath of the mouth,
Nor ever with the hem of a garment;
The lower robe and upper robe are to be avoided.
Fanning with another cloth,
Or with the wind of the hand,
Is not approved.
With a clean fan, likewise with a cloth,
Or with a jeweled fan, one should fan it.
When by this the wind rightly arises
And the fire has been made even,
The knower of mantra should kindle the fire.
Composed in equipoise for the fire offering,
Then, with the left hand,

Having sprinkled there,
There, with the ghee of a cow,
One should offer three oblations.
Then, after that, pay homage
To all the buddhas, the protectors,
And to one's own mantra, the lord of mantra;
Then pay homage as one wishes.
At that time, reciting the mantra
Of the heart of the fire a hundred times,
The diligent one, with fragrant flowers,
Should always invite the fire.
Having always invited it, the knower of mantra,
Skilled in the rite of the site, offers seat and abode
With that mantra, and with no other.
Kindling sticks mixed with curd and ghee
And smeared with honey:
Of these, make the fire offering three times.
For increase, with mantra and action,
With garlands of flame blazing all around,
Where it is stirred up, apply them without fail;
Imagine the thirsty one satisfied.
In pacifying and increasing rites,
By the one who knows the secret mantra,
The form of the deity is delighted.

For fierce rites, one should visualize a form
Other than the common deities
That are certain to appear.
In due order, here in the hearth,
With whatever flowers are to be found,
And reciting seven times over the ghee,
Then invite the deity in that manner.
When it has been invited once again,
By firm establishment both remain.
Kindling sticks mixed with the substances,
Ghee and honey in equal measure as taught,
And likewise mixed with curd:

To the count of a thousand or a hundred thousand,
Or a hundred and eight, one should always offer.
Likewise the mantra practitioner, holding the knowledge mantra,
Recites it once for each and casts it into the fire.
With garlands of blazing fire,
And likewise with flames become one,
Perform the fire offering of the pacifying rite.
When it is smokeless, the increasing rite.
Fierce rites with smoke
Have been censured and rejected by the Victor.
When the fire takes on its proper color,
Apply the work of the fire offering.
For pacifying, the color white
Is always praised by the supreme Victor.
If one makes the fire offering with white fire,
The mantras will succeed for that one.
Likewise the color white is always Wished for by one who seeks the accomplishment of increase.
Black, the color of smoke,
And tawny too are inauspicious.
Through the changing of the three colors,
These are the three kinds of accomplishment.
Another color, the color of clouds,
Or again, if it stays fixed on the ground there,
For that mantra practitioner there is no accomplishment.
If one sees colors like these,
Or a fire of many varied colors
Blazing, then
One should begin the rites over again,
And the recitation is to be done once more.
If the mantra has succeeded,
Having seen this in the rite,
Engage again in the fire offering.
For both the dismissal and the invitation
One should recite the mantra of the fire.
And having examined it carefully beforehand,
Request this maṇḍala to depart.

The acts of invitation,
And the other acts done there as well,
Are to be performed with that same mantra.
The practice of the fire, and likewise the image,
Should be undertaken in the presence of the painting.
That the mantras succeed there
Was taught by the tathāgatas of the past.
The rites praised by the Victor
Are all to be performed right there.
The other rites that are done,
Evil rites in particular,
Are those the supreme Victor reviles,
That go against the world and are censured.

Rising aloft, universal sovereignty,
The grounds of the bodhisattvas,
Likewise the five superknowledges,
And the possession of worldly godhood are accomplished.
One always diligent with the painting,
Skilled in the work of the fire offering,
Becomes a lord of the underworld,
Or else moves through the sky.
The gods above the earth and the yakṣas,
And the yakṣiṇīs, one always summons;
Lordship of a kingdom,
Of a country, or of a town;
Vidyādharas and asuras:
One brings all beings under one's power
And summons all the bhūtas.
If the great beings, the great-souled,
The bodhisattvas, the great beings,
Who rest firmly on the ten grounds,
Are summoned by the work of the fire offering,
What need is there to speak of humans on the earth?
Likewise chieftains and lords,
And above all the lords of the world,
And all the bhūtas, one brings fully under one's power.

Likewise lords of men,
For the sake of power over all the bhūtas,
Or one becomes equal to a king upon the earth.
Likewise, always, in all rites,
Do everything by means of the fire offering.
The one who is diligent in every way
Should rightly practice all the rites;
For that purpose one should surely accomplish them.
The rite for glory is supreme;
It accomplishes the middling as well,
And the lesser too.
Likewise all the substances
Are said to be accomplished in the same way.
By engaging in the work of the fire offering,
One sees accomplishment together with its fruit.
Binding the mudrā, and the knowledge mantra,
Should always be done in all the rites.
By engaging in the work of the fire offering,
One comes to be protected.
Then one should recite this mantra;
In the rites it is always Recited seven times or eight:
namaḥ sarva buddha bodhi satvā nāṃ a pra ti ha ta ga ti ma ga tā nāṃ tadya thā oṃ jvā la tiṣ tha hūṃ ru ru bi śva sambha be svā hā

With this application of the mantra,
One should recite it again over the wood,
Twice or seven times,
And that knower of mantra makes the fire offering into the fire.
Flowers, incense, and perfumes,
In short, everything,
With waters over which the secret mantra has been recited,
With this very mantra, one should sprinkle.
Then, for all the rites,
One should begin the ritual by this means.
For all the rites,
Proceed with the same application as before.

Having bound the earlier mudrā, the one with tresses,
The renowned great mudrā,
Protection will have been made; then
The reciter, with the single knowledge mantra,
Should begin all the rites.
For one skilled in the causes of accomplishment,
If auspicious signs are seen,
If auspicious sounds are always heard,
Then the fruit of the mantra
Will grant the supreme, just as one wishes.
First, by applying oneself to the rite
And engaging in the causes of the mantra,
Whether fruitless or bearing fruit,
That accomplishment shall be told.
If the sound of victory, or of the paṭaha drum,
Or the sound of the great drum is heard,
O diligent one, it is the all-pervading accomplishment;
Rely rightly on the work of the fire offering.
Further, auspicious signs and splendor,
The pleasant sound of birds,
Or melodies of many kinds,
Praised and highly praised by the Victor,
Auspicious, excellent, and delightful,
And sounds of many kinds;
Parasols, victory banners, and flags,
Women adorned with ornaments,
Likewise full vases,
And offering water: if these are seen, they are causes of accomplishment.
Colors of many kinds,
And monks and nuns
Highly praised and honored by the world:
On seeing and looking upon them,
The various modes of secret mantra conduct succeed.

From the Root Ritual Manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, Ūrdhvajaṭā, from the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka, a Great Vehicle sūtra of vast extent: the eleventh chapter, the chapter on the rite of the rosary thread, is complete.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked out over the great maṇḍala of the assembly and said to the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara: "Great being, there is your great secret of knowledge.

It knows the commitments of the rites for the means of accomplishment of all mantras; it has arisen from the Dharma treasury of all the tathāgatas; it has fully entered into accord with the cloud of Dharma; its nature is space; and it has become the foremost sovereign of mantras, both worldly and beyond the world. Great being, just as, for example, the Tathāgata is the chief of all beings, and the one who is foremost among gods and humans, the bull among men, is the Blessed One, the Buddha, so too, bodhisattva, this king of knowledge is taught to be supreme among all mantras and is the sacred chief. It was spoken before by the countless blessed buddhas, tathāgatas as numerous as the sands of the river Ganges. It is the supreme heart of the tathāgata Ratnaketu, supremely secret, held to be auspicious in every way, rightly extolled and highly praised by all the buddhas. It brings relief to all beings, fully pacifies all evil, grants every desire, and fulfills every hope. What is it?"

At that moment there came forth from the ūrṇā hair between the eyebrows of the Blessed One Śākyamuni a ray of light called Fully Urging All the Buddhas. It shone throughout the buddha fields of all ten directions, above and below, and satisfied the minds of all beings, and then it sank back into the crown protuberance (uṣṇīṣa) of the Blessed One Śākyamuni. From the Blessed One's crown protuberance there arose a great light, with a body blazing all around and radiating, which no being whatever could bear to look upon, its body adorned with a maṇḍala of light, of many and various forms, having the form of a great universal monarch: it became the king of knowledge called the Single Syllable. Having come forth, it illuminated the whole expanse of the sky. It was surrounded by all the kings of knowledge, and worshipped by many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of vidyādharas arrayed before it. It was being extolled by the king who is the universal monarch of knowledge, the guru of all the world. It held sway over all the buddhas, and with great intelligence it was serving the buddhas and the bodhisattvas who abide on the ten grounds. It adorned the whole expanse of the sky with the jewels of the gods and filled it entirely with what had been made into precious gems. Of beautiful form and supremely luminous, an emanator sending forth hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of forms of every kind, uttering the sound of the single syllable, radiating great blazing rays of light, it came to rest in the region of the sky. Turning toward the Blessed One Śākyamuni, it gazed upon him, and it gazed upon and illuminated the whole great maṇḍala of the assembly of the Pure Abodes, complete in every respect.

Then the Blessed One Śākyamuni spoke this great king of ritual manuals of the Single Syllable: namaḥ sarva buddhā nāṃ bhruṃ. The moment he spoke it, all the world systems, all the buddha fields, quaked in six ways. No being whatever experienced suffering such as hunger and thirst.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni spoke this ritual manual of the great king of knowledge: in order to fully display the miraculous power of the samādhi of all the tathāgatas; in order to destroy all evil; in order to purify all suffering; in order that this king of ritual manuals may fully protect all beings; in order to pacify all the sufferings of the hells; in order to display fully the bringing about of inconceivable miracles; and in order to display fully the inconceivable miraculous power of all the buddhas and all the bodhisattvas.

"Great being, for whoever wishes to accomplish this king of mantras, this is the rite for that purpose. First of all, with the power that is said to come from being free of discursive thought, from keeping silence, and from fasting; being earnestly devoted to taming through mantra; with great love for all the bhūtas; endowed with the wisdom that rightly sees the suffering of others as one's own suffering; keeping the senses well restrained; in order to check thoroughly a distracted mind, pride, and the avarice that clings to the hand, giving away one's goods in full measure; not bowing to other gods; with the wealth of faith, a vivid clear confidence in the Three Jewels, having clear faith in the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā; with a nature of great compassion and a well-resolved intention, one generates the mind set on awakening. In short, having made the aspiration for great awakening, one should practice continuously.

"Here, first of all, there is the rite of the painted image. On cloth of good color, undamaged, and not a leftover remnant, one should have the image of the Blessed One drawn as the universal monarch, lord of all kings. It is a golden-yellow figure teaching the Dharma, seated on a lion throne, endowed with the supreme of all aspects, its whole body blazing all around, wearing a necklace. Above it, on a mountain peak, there should be clouds with lightning. Below it, a lotus lake should be made. The Blessed One's crown protuberance should be shown emitting rays of light. The practitioner too, true to his place, dress, and shape, holding a censer in his hand, should be shown gazing at the Blessed One. Having painted the cloth painting in that way, the practitioner should bathe three times a day and put on clean clothes. In a solitary place, away from people, he should install the painting for a long period, and, in every way, with body, speech, and mind, tirelessly make vast offerings to the Blessed One, the Buddha. Then on the day of the full moon he should keep a fast, day and night, and begin the practice. He should eat leaves, gruel, milk, alms food obtained by begging, water, and flour; or else he should eat milk and barley meal.

Burning agaru incense, he should perform the recitation ten hundred thousand times. Thereby the preliminary approach will have been done and the preliminary practice performed.

Then, if he wishes to accomplish the eye ointment, he should take one measure of sauvīra eye ointment bought at the hero's price, and have a brahmin girl, facing north, grind it with the five products of the cow. With the ring finger he should make four pills, cover them with lotus petals, and leave them to dry. Kindling the fire according to the rite of the Blessed One, the Buddha, he should perform the fire offering until a full thousand is complete. Then he should install the painting at a stūpa that contains relics and make vast, vast offerings. Kindling fires of palāśa wood in the eight directions, he should perform the fire offering for the vināyakas with sticks smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. Then he should make maṇḍalas in the four directions and set the guardians of the directions in them. In the second maṇḍala is the one who awakens, holding white mustard seed in his hand. In the third maṇḍala there should be a good companion, though it is also permissible to be without a companion. Having made a great offering of the mantra, he should perform the protection. Sitting facing east, having spread out and strewn kuśa grass, he should cover the pills with three leaves of the aśvattha tree above and four below, press them with his hand, and recite until they grow warm, give off smoke, and blaze.

The first accomplishment is that by this one gains the eye whose nature is that of the Victor: whatever one looks upon, and whoever sees it, all come under one's power. The second accomplishment is that one gains the strength of nine elephants, is swift as the wind, lives five hundred years, and can carry off ten elephants. One cannot be overpowered by any of the vidyādharas; one is like the blazing rising sun, one's body adorned with jewels; one lives for an intermediate eon and leads others; one becomes a universal monarch of the vidyādharas who cannot be overpowered, ever renewed, roaming through the seven paths of the wind. Applying the ointment to the ears, and the hand with orpiment: these too are the three kinds of accomplishment.

Then, if he wishes to accomplish the vajra, he should take wood struck by lightning and make it into the shape of a vajra sixteen finger-widths in length. He should make a round stūpa about a cubit in size and, in front of it, observing this rite, keep a fast for three nights at the full moon. Having made vast offerings to the Blessed One, the Buddha, and gazing at the vajra with his mind fixed on it, he should take up the vajra and go to the charnel ground. He should make a channel following a stream that flows to the east. Taking earth from both banks of the river, he should make a round base with the five products of the cow. Having made the round base, he should make a stūpa about a cubit in size and, in front of it, observing this rite, make offerings. Then, in the charnel ground, he should set the vajra near the painting, place his hand upon it, press it down, and recite until it falls into the hole beneath the mound. Then, having bathed, he should take up the vajra in his hand right there and enter. Taking the alms food he has begged, he should worship the Blessed One with a torma. Having bathed, he should set it down apart, smearing the vajra with ash from the charnel ground until it is covered. By this rite he should recite over flesh from the charnel ground. Finally, having presented torma offerings for three nights according to the rite, and having made protection for himself or for a good companion, he should press it down with both hands and recite until the three kinds of accomplishment occur.

With the first accomplishment, whomever one looks upon, and whoever sees one, they become delighted and come under one's power. With the second, merely by wiping dust from the ground of the painting one becomes invisible; one has the strength of nine thousand elephants, is swift as the wind, seizes six shares, travels at will, brings down rain, illuminates, and becomes greatly powerful. With the third, one becomes like the rising sun, lives ten thousand years, and leads even a universal monarch. One roams about with the vajra in hand; and likewise by the rites of the lotus in hand and the axe in hand.

Then, if he wishes to accomplish pills, having first done the approach, he should take the index finger of a one-year-old. Having made a stūpa by the earlier rite and made vast offerings in the charnel ground, he should sit facing east and, pressing the finger down with the gesture of teaching, recite until rays of light shine from the vajra. By day he should guard it from the wind of the sky, and by night, without sleeping, he should draw in the fingers until dawn. In the place where they have been drawn in, he should keep a fast for three nights. Taking the milk of a cow of good repute whose calf is of the same stock, he should make a sandalwood maṇḍala for the Blessed One, the Buddha, light lamps of ghee, sit on a mat of kuśa grass, and consecrate it eight thousand times with the mantra. He should pour the milk into an earthen vessel and mark out a maṇḍala with ash. At dawn, having bathed, he should take the butter churned beforehand from this very milk, make offerings to the Blessed One, consecrate it eight thousand times, and eat it without touching it. This is called Seeing, and it grants every desire.

If he wishes for release, he should buy at the hero's price all the fragrances and other things beneficial to the place, keep a fast for three nights, make vast offerings to the Blessed One, the Buddha, light lamps of ghee, and himself recite the mantra and examine. Then, making an effigy, he should place it on seven leaves of the aśvattha tree and, in front of the Blessed One, recite for as long as his knowledge mantra lasts. Then he should grind it into powder: whoever is touched by that powder comes under his power. By this same rite, if he makes an effigy from nāgakesara powder and makes eight hundred fire offerings of it in pieces, with incense, whoever he thinks of comes under his power. By this same rite he should perform the fire offering with kindling sticks of apāmārga.

If one wants wealth, one should go to a cattle pen and, in the presence of the Blessed One, the Buddha, make a stūpa, not shaped by hand, out of cow dung that has not fallen to the ground. Having worshipped it according to the rite, one should burn guggulu and recite a hundred thousand times. One will obtain a thousand cattle, or wealth. By this same rite one should burn ghee, honey, and the like and recite a hundred thousand times; one will obtain a domain encircled by twelve villages. By this same rite, having made a stūpa, one should offer lotus seats smeared with sandalwood and a hundred thousand food offerings; one will become the governor of a province. By this same rite, burning guggulu incense, one should offer a hundred thousand campaka flowers; one will obtain a thousand pieces of gold. By this same rite one should offer a hundred thousand nāgakesara flowers; one will obtain a thousand garments of fine cloth.

Likewise, for all the rites in which flowers of every kind are desired: taking ash from a burned corpse in the charnel ground, one should keep a fast, day and night, at the full moon. Making a circle with blood from the ring finger, one should draw an effigy, press it down with the left foot, and recite eight thousand times. First one obtains seven garments, and in short, one obtains everything together with its kind. Having made a stūpa, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of adhibalaja wood smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. Whatever girl one points out, that girl will be given to one; if she is not given, the one who refuses will die.

Making an effigy from the bark of the sāla tree, filling it with mustard oil, piercing it with an iron spike, and smearing it with hot sesame oil, one should recite eight thousand times in the charnel ground. A woman on her own, or a śūdra, comes under one's power. With the second, vaiśya and kṣatriya women; with the third, monks and brahmin women. In short, even without having accomplished it, it performs these rites.

Having consecrated bezoar seven times and marked oneself with it, whatever one sees and whoever sees one, all become delighted. Likewise with eye ointment. If, rising at dawn, one bathes at ease in water consecrated seven times, whoever one looks upon gives to one and even becomes one's subject. Likewise, by eating sesame oil without its touching the teeth, and by drinking water carried at will that has been consecrated seven times, one obtains food even without seeking it. Entering the royal palace, one should take hold of the hem of one's Dharma robe, recite fully twenty-one times, and tie a knot with the left hand. If one goes without looking back, one becomes supreme among all speakers. On going among bandits, by reciting over the very things that would be stolen, one makes them safe. So too the mantras for cutting, piercing, and the like.

Making an effigy from grains of śāli rice, white karavīra, siddhārtha, and kāba, pressing it with the left hand, and reciting eight thousand times, one makes it rise up. If one wishes to destroy fever, one should recite eight thousand times over the flowers of girikarṇikā; within seven days it overcomes the fever of the piśācas. If one makes eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of khadira wood, it destroys all the grahas. Reciting seven times over ash binds the mantras of others; reciting once over water releases them. Such are these rites and others like them.

Then once again the Blessed One Śākyamuni looked out over that great maṇḍala of the assembly and said to the great bodhisattva: "Great being, there is one called Fulfiller of Desires. He is the lord of the family. This king of ritual manuals, rejoiced in by all the buddhas, the rite of the means of accomplishment that is the great secret of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, should without fail be kept in mind by the practitioner. That, great being, I shall explain to you."

When he had said this, the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, requested the Blessed One to speak the lord of the family for the sake of accomplishing the Blessed Lady:

"O Fulfiller of Desires,
Blessed One, freed from passion and darkness,
Fully at peace from attachment,
Who leads out from evil to awakening:
To the moon who gazes on all,
The noble Avalokiteśvara,
Destroyer of the seed of existence,
I bow, I make offering, and I rely on you.
If what is to be taught is brought forth,
It will come forth again in the world."

tadyathā śvete śveteṃ ge śve bhu je śve ta mā lye rā laṃ kṛ te ja ye bi ja ye a ji te a pa rā ji te svā hā

By mere recollection of it, the accomplishment of this mantra comes swiftly. As for its mantra: rising at dawn, the practitioner of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, having become clean, should enter a river seven times, join the palms, recite it fully, and, facing east, scatter the water. All obstructors will be pacified, and the accomplishment of rites will come as well. If one places the thumb at the heart and recites once, one will be blessed by the gods, and one will also become purified. Its mudrā too should be applied here. All obstructors will cease to be, and the accomplishment of rites will come as well. If one places the thumb at the heart and recites once, one will be blessed by the gods, and one will also become purified. Its mudrā too should be applied here.

Then there is the rite of its means of accomplishment. On undamaged cloth free of hair and with a fringe, a painter who keeps the poṣadha vows should draw the noble Avalokiteśvara with unmixed colors. He is seated on the heart of a lotus, wears a lower garment of tiger skin, and his hair is bound up high and hanging down. In his hand he holds a water pot, or else he holds white lotus petals. On his left side the goddess, the noble Mahāśvetā, is seated on a lion seat; her hands hold a lotus and make the gesture of granting boons. The practitioner is as before. Then the vidyādhara, eating milk and barley meal, should perform the preliminary approach in front of the painting.

The vidyādhara should likewise make offerings with handfuls of fragrant flowers, and should offer lamps of butter, incense of aloeswood and of turuṣka, and torma.

namo buddhāsya namo dharmāsya namaḥ saṃghasya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo āryāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā surume suruma kuru kuru surume karmasādhāya buddhasadyena dharmasatyena saṃghasatyena āgaccha śīghrāṃ devadatte svāhā

This is the vidyā for invoking.

tadyathā dame dase svāhā

This is the vidyā of fragrance.

tadyathā hu hu hura hu mahāmede svare svāhā

This is the vidyā of flowers.

tadyathā meghavihrate svāhā

This is the vidyā of incense.

tadyathā tu tu tu tu turu mahāturuṇe svāhā

This is the vidyā of the torma.

With these very vidyās, seated close upon a mat of kuśa grass in front of the painting, before which a garland of seven lamps has been set, one should perform a fire offering of lotuses smeared with curd, honey and butter, up to seven hundred thousand times. One's own body will tremble, and one will see the noble Avalokiteśvara directly. One will obtain whatever one desires. If, by this same rite, one performs a fire offering of a hundred thousand sticks of bilva wood, whatever one desires will be completely fulfilled.

On the bank of the river Ganges, in a place free of harm and without people, one should build stūpas in the sand, offer fragrances, flowers, incense and so forth, and recite eight thousand times. One should build a stūpa each and every day.

This concludes the twelfth of the extensive chapters from the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, a Great Vehicle sūtra of the Avataṃsaka of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, surveyed the entire world system with his divine eye and entered the samādhi called Endowed with Vastness. Then, rising from that samādhi, he spoke this great king of mantras called Endowed with Vastness:

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā vimale vimale vipulaprabhe vipulapriye vipulamati samayamanusmara tvame varusāṃ sādhaya sādhaya garja garja hana hana vipulamati hṛdaya manusmara buddhasatyena dharmasatyena saṃghasatyena bodhisatvāsatyena vipulamatisatyena vajrapāṇisatyena satyavātisatyena le le le le oṃ oṃ oṃ bhuva bhuva bhuva ga ga ga matha matha matha hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ avalokite muce svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās called Endowed with Vastness, which has attained great power, arisen from the samādhi of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, and accomplished simply by being read. It protects oneself, protects others and protects the village; and the danger of mountains, the danger of the vicious, the danger of piśācas, in short all dangers, it dispels merely by being read.

Further, the mantra rites that follow from this are these:

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā dade śānte prasannacite svāhā

This is the mantra for invoking.

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā śvete samayetyethā viśuddhavasti svāhā

This is the mantra for putting on garments.

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā mune mune śānte viśuddhe gaganatale pugandhe gandha udakabaliṃ ca hara hara kara kara vibhu svāhā

Having consecrated all the flowers, fragrances, incense and lamps by reciting this mantra over them seven times, one should recite it once, or else offer them. One should always purify oneself with balls of white clay. To the Blessed One one should offer saffron water, sandalwood, the fragrance of camphor, turuṣka and the like, incense of aloeswood, garlands of mallikā or campaka flowers, and milk in thirty-two portions, together with tormas of barley meal and lamps of cow's butter.

Next, its painting is described. On a cloth of whatever kind can be found, free of hair and with its fringe left uncut, one should draw the Blessed One Avalokiteśvara in saffron. He should be drawn like this: on a seat of a water-born lotus, holding a lotus in his hand and adorned with a garland of lotuses, clad in white garments, holding it up for the sake of worship, his hand granting fearlessness, his hair bound up high.

Having invited the Blessed One to reside in the painting, set facing east in the place described before, one should recite a million times. When the recitation is complete, one should kindle a fire and, with honey and butter mixed together, perform the fire offering at the three times of day until a hundred thousand are completed; then one will obtain whatever one longs for. If one wishes for the enjoyments of kingship, one should mix together saffron, sandalwood, hundred-petaled flowers and puffed rice, smear them with butter and honey, and perform the fire offering in three sessions. On the last day of the fire offering he grants a vision of himself. He also grants these signs: one's crown lock will stand straight up. He bestows or speaks of a flawless banner of light and a painting of blazing garlands. The vidyādhara should recite mentally. If one hears a divine voice in the sky, it is accomplished. Then, if one regains the kingdom, one should have it governed in accordance with the Dharma.

Then, once more cultivating that same samādhi, he spoke the great king of vidyās called One-Footed, the great king of the ritual manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo buddha abhiṣekasya prajvalitadīptanepra bhujāya prajvalitaṃ dīptahapukamaṇḍalāya tadyathā hṛdayamāvartayiṣyamighuṭa bandha dhuṃ dhaṃ dhaṃ dhaṃ dhaṃ cara cara varaya śasma oṃ karaṃ prata vidyāteja yamahā vidyāyaya svayaska pravartaya haraṇe raṇe rakaruṇe muni muni vimuni śānta cinta svāhā

This is the king of vidyās called One-Footed, which has attained great power. It is unobstructed; merely by being recited it crushes all fighting, quarrels, disputes and the like. It is a king of vidyās that overpowers opponents with immeasurable strength. A son of good family, having generated the mind set on awakening, should undertake the practice, bathe three times, and recite eight thousand times in three sessions. Until the full moon, having made great offerings before the Blessed One, one should recite it countless times. All minor rites will be accomplished.

These are the mantras that form its retinue:

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā vibhuri vibhuri bhumi ākāma bhumi ākāma bhumi ākāma tiṣṭha tiṣṭha vijaya varta śa śa śa śa śa śa tha tha tha tha tha tha tha tha akantha akndha padmahastāya svāhā

This is the mantra for consecrating the painting.

First comes the painter's work, and after it the rite of the painting. One should have Avalokiteśvara painted in unmixed colors, standing on one foot. He holds up a garland of jasmine flowers as an offering, is adorned with the radiance of flower garlands, and holds in his hands a staff and a round water pitcher; a black antelope skin should hang all about his shoulder. Having had painted a painting in which his right hand seems to be giving consolation, one should give a feast to the community of monks in front of it, and also offer a gift according to one's means.

namo ratnatrayāṃya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā jaladhara vimuktayathāya svāhā

This is the mantra for anointing.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā sugandha vimukta vijaya svāhā

This is the mantra of fragrance.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā sumanaśriye sasaṃdarśana sosomana sosomana svāhā

This is the mantra of flowers.

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā dhumra varcasi ra ra ra ra lalāya mune svāhā

This is the mantra of incense.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ priyaṃkara pritivijaye oṃ jaye vijaye saṃkalpa svāhā

This is the mantra of the torma.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ śucini mati vimali viśuddhagati svāhā

This is the mantra for rinsing with water.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ tadyathā śvete paṇḍavāsini rakṣa rakṣa māṃ svāhā

With this one should protect oneself in every circumstance.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya dhara dhariścitte javari śupaci vati svāhā

With this one should take up earth.

namo ratnatrayāya namo ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya nama jali jali calārale vavare rarare svāhā

With this mantra one should bathe.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā namaḥ śulambi vastraṃ tadhārāri phavane svāhā

This is the mantra of garments. One should recite it over one's garments and then put them on, and likewise offer garments to the Blessed One.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā nama ucchuṣma parama daśa śodhana śodhaya svāhā

If urine, excrement, spittle and every impurity are wiped away with this, one becomes clean. This is the mantra of cleanliness.

Two measures of Indian incense, two of sandalwood, two of leafy rumru, and two of saffron: these fragrances should be offered to the Blessed One. The incense is of camphor and sandalwood. By a rite such as this, having invited the Blessed One into the painting, set facing east in the place described, one should bathe three times, change one's clothes three times, and, constantly keeping the poṣadha vows, recite six hundred thousand times. At the end one should strew white lotuses one at a time at the feet of the Blessed One as an offering, eight thousand over three days. Then, keeping a fast for three nights and not speaking the whole night through, one should perform a fire offering with lotuses smeared with butter.

The characteristic sign of accomplishment is this: the vidyādhara, fully liberated, will move about in three ways. Then the Blessed One will be accomplished. If one wishes to be a vidyādhara, one will become a vidyādhara. If one wishes to be an asura, one will become an asura. If one wishes for kingship, one will attain a great kingship over all. One will obtain everything that one wishes for. The samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of the Blessed Lady Tārā, will certainly arise.

This completes the king of vidyās called One-Footed.

Then again the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, while cultivating that same king of samādhis, spoke the great king of vidyās called Entering the Ritual Manual of the Blessed Lady, the Queen of Vidyās.

Here these become the great words of the mantra:

namo ratnatrayāya nama āryāvajiyaśrīgarbhasya samyaksaṃbuddhesya namo maheśvaresva bodhisatvasya namaḥ īśaprabhasya bodhisatvasya namaḥ ākāśagarbhasya bodhisatvasya namo vajramatesya bodhisatvasya nama āryāvalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā bhagavate hṛdaya māvāhayiṣyāmi oṃ tara tara oṃ oṃ oṃ oṃ bhuva abhaya abhaya varade ucuṣmati ucuṣmati sukhāvati sukhāvati ra ra ra ra la la la la culuṣka khaga khaga āgaccha āgaccha bhagavate mama varaṃ dāsyasi abhasvara maprāpta vipulamati samādhi vijate svāhā

The great king of vidyās called Entering is accomplished merely by being read. It protects from all fears and performs rites in every field.

Next comes the rite of its painting. The Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, entirely white, with the features of the painting described before, is seated on a jeweled lotus, holding a white lotus in his hand, his crown lock loosened, and holding a round water pitcher in his hand. On the right and left are figures as appropriate. On the left side one should have painted a white youth holding a lotus in his hand and paying homage to the Blessed One. On the right side one should have painted the Blessed Lady Mahāśrī holding a lotus in her hand and seated upon a lotus. On the left side is the earth goddess Pṛthivī, holding in her hand a basin of the four kinds of jewels. In the sky one should have painted the white bodhisattva of clear light, holding a garland of flowers. On the right side is the practitioner holding a censer, as before.

Having made a painting of this kind and installed it in the place described before, one should make vast offerings and, eating milk and barley meal, invite the deity with the root mantra.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvebhyaḥ tadyathā paṇḍa paṇḍalaghu śuci vimale svāhā

This is the mantra of the maṇḍala.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvebhyaḥ tadyathā agni julu julu hu ramame

svāhā

This is the mantra of fragrance.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvebhyaḥ tadyathā dhuva siddhi brahmatejo svāhā

This is the mantra of flowers.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvebhyaḥ tadyathā vipulateja prahmaśvara svāhā

This is the mantra of incense.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namaḥ sarvabuddhabodhisatvebhyaḥ nidhi vipuni abhayaprada svāhā

This is the mantra of the torma. This same one is the mantra of the lamps.

A garland of fragrance made of equal parts of bushel-tsé, bālaka and camphor; red karavīra flowers and handfuls of jasmine flowers; incense compounded of śrīveṣṭaka, sarjarasa resin, gum, śallakī and molasses; torma of the three white substances; and lamps of cow's butter: having arranged things in this way, one should recite six hundred thousand times.

At the end, at the full moon, observing a fast for three nights, one should perform a fire offering of eight thousand karavīra flowers smeared with curd, honey and butter at the three times of day, and one should do this for three days. Then, on the third day, having made vast offerings according to the rite as described, with twelve bowls in all, of curd and honey, and ten bowls of milk porridge, one should sit on a mat of kuśa grass and, beginning at dusk, recite until a sign of accomplishment appears. A rain of divine flowers will fall, thunder and great drums will resound, the painting will tremble, and the flames of the lamps will grow tall. Then it is accomplished, and one will become a king with power over the whole earth. Whatever one longs for, one will obtain it all.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Entering the Root Ritual Manual of the King of Samādhis Endowed with Vastness of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, in order to care for beings, once more cultivating that same king of samādhis, spoke the vidyā of Mahāśvetā within the great king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, in order to care for poor people. Here these are the words of the vidyā mantra that accomplishes all aims:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya kṛṣṇajinaṃ varadhara kamalāya tīkṣaṃ padma asanasthaṃ abhayaprad magrahataṃ bhāṣasvajjaṭamakuṭadhari ṇau padmavarṇa ārya avalokiteśvari mahaṃ saraṇaṃ prapadya tadyathā śvete vijaye śvetavastra śvetabhuje śvetapadma alaṃkīrta jaye vijaye abhaye śvetaṃ aṃśumabhayaprate śvetaṃ ca gaganaśuddhaṃ śvetaṃ vidyā samapra samaprabhe śvetebhyaḥ bhavasya śaklāṃśuraṃ bhavāntare paṇḍara paṭa paṭāya ra ra ra ra raya vijaye svāhā pariklīvale vare varāya svāhā

This is the queen of vidyās called Mahāśvetā, who has attained great power. She performs all rites, completely pacifies poverty and disease, accomplishes all aims, and brings all aims to fulfillment. Whatever son or daughter of good family, having generated the mind set on awakening, constantly keeps her in mind and worships her will protect people, and all people will rejoice in them.

Then her rite is this. Following the rite described before, one should have a cloth ten cubits long made, with its fringe cut off, and press it smooth with sandalwood water. Then one should paint the Blessed One in unmixed colors, with a brush and fragrant liquid.

He is white like an autumn cloud, holds a round water pitcher in his hand, and holds a lotus in his right hand. His hair is bound up high; he has a lotus seat and white garments, is adorned with ornaments of white garlands, and is adorned with sixteen garlands of lotuses. Everything is white, with all things white.

Sixteen bodhisattvas should be drawn below. The four world guardians are in the surrounding directions. The earth goddess Pṛthivī should be drawn holding a basket in her right hand. At the crown of the noble Avalokiteśvara's head is the Tathāgata Padmāvataṃsaka. On the left is the Tathāgata Akṣobhya, granting fearlessness, holding his Dharma robe with his left hand, golden in color, with rays of light streaming from his hand. All the bodhisattvas too have garlands of light, their bodies adorned with every kind of brilliant ornament. One should also have the practitioner painted on the right side, with his attire and appearance just as they are.

With water of white fragrance one should anoint the maṇḍala.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya ablokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo mahāsvahāya svetagandha viśuddhaya sugandhāya svāhā

This is the mantra of fragrance.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo mahāsvetāya jyotisma tījyetipara svāhā

This is the vidyā of flowers.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo mahāsvetāya svetaparāya dhupaparāya svāhā

One should offer incense mixed with white substances.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo mahāsvetāya valavīryapravara vara śukllaṃ śukllodna varapriyāya vara vara vara vara śukle śuklā śukle svāhā

This is the mantra of the torma; the rest should be offered with the root vidyā itself.

One should perform a fire offering with flowers, incense, fragrances and garlands, all of them white, smeared with curd, honey and butter. Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight and continuing until the full moon, there are eight thousand fire offerings with sesame oil; the vidyādhara, wearing white clothes, eating a meal of caru, wearing a white sacred thread, and seated close upon a mat of kuśa grass, should perform the fire offerings and the rest. Having made great offerings, one should make torma offerings and so forth day and night. Beginning at dusk, one should recite until a sign of accomplishment appears. The sound of great divine drums will ring out, the earth will quake, a rain of flowers will fall from the sky, and rays of light will stream forth from the painting. At this juncture the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, arrives, and in that instant the hells, the hungry ghosts and the animals are soothed. When he has arrived, one should offer him arghya water. Then the Blessed One will speak and grant whatever is desired. Whether one wishes to become a vidyādhara, or a king of vidyādharas, or to exchange one's body for a great kingdom, or to enter the underworld, or for eye ointment, realgar or bezoar, or for the power to retain what one has heard, or for the five superknowledges, one will obtain whatever one seeks.

This completes the ritual manual of Mahāśvetā, the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, from the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, having surveyed all beings by means of the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the king of vidyās called the Blessed One Who Follows All Kings of Vidyās. Here these are the rites of the accomplished mantra:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya vimukticetapāya vijaya parākramaya apratihata glīyāya aparimita dharmmadeśahanāya duḥkhviśodhanāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya arttaparidranahṛdayamādhayiṣyamimiti tadyathā lave ālaṃve lamba pramukta lamba sthire lamba vidyāyate namaḥ kāruni kāruṇe kāruṇayati vo mune kuruṇāndha hṛdaye kāruṇanhra namastute śānta mukte ca śāneka yavivo stata śānta prabhāte nityaṃ vagavatya namastute suru suru āgaccha āgaccha bhagavāna mama varaṃ dīsyasi duḥkhitānāma saradriṇikaraṃ svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās that has attained great power and keeps all beings from going to ruin. Merely by being remembered it follows one closely behind; it protects the afflicted, turns back the lower realms, and is accomplished by being read. In short, in every danger, merely by its being remembered, its eight companions are set to protecting one. Whoever recites this king of vidyās, practices it and fully engages in it will never fall into the lower realms. Whatever son of good family who is poor, having generated the mind set on awakening, reads it, recites it, practices it and holds it dear in his mind will, after he dies and passes on, be born in Sukhāvatī.

Next, the rite of its sādhana is this. One should draw the Blessed One Avalokiteśvara as he arrives: granting fearlessness, his hair bound up high, his body adorned with the marks of a great being, three-eyed, his body ablaze with the rays of moonlight, protecting from all the eight fears, the Blessed One Amitābha seated upon his head, and wearing a white sacred thread. The practitioner is as before.

Having drawn a painting of this kind, one should make great offerings, and with this very mantra offer fragrances, flowers, incense and torma according to the rite. Whoever undertakes it, single-mindedly heroic and remaining wholly absorbed in this great king of vidyās even outside the proper times, should sit close upon a mat of kuśa grass and, with a nature of pure loving-kindness that reaches out to all beings, recite it eight thousand times. Then it will be accomplished, and it will do everything one wishes, as well as the minor rites and the like. With water it destroys poison. By sprinkling with kuśa grass it destroys fevers that come every day, every second day, every fourth day and so forth. When the mantra is recited over a flower, whoever it is given to comes under one's power. In short, by applying it one destroys all diseases.

As for its sādhana: having invited the deity into the painting in the place described before, one recites a hundred thousand times. At the end, keeping a fast for one night, one should offer torma to the guardians of the directions; the torma consists of the three white substances. Having performed the rite of offering, one should sit close upon a mat of kuśa grass and, beginning at dusk, recite until a sign of accomplishment appears. If the painting shakes strongly and the flames of the lamps grow tall, one will become a king with power over all. Even if it is not accomplished, one will obtain a land. It grants every kind of fearlessness. By recitation one brings all beings under one's power. It completely pacifies all diseases. It cuts through all bonds. Or else, by remembering it, one is able to travel.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Who Causes All Beings to Follow, in the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness of the root ritual manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then again the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, while cultivating the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of ritual manuals of the great vidyā called Golden Light, as a further great king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahākāruṇikāya prajvalitahastakamaṇḍalupriyāya tadyathā surasya amṛta apratihatai veve cacare carṭhare veve ruru veruru dhve the the sara dhve sara sara dhvi gu gu meghane ghana ghane apratihaste buddhasatyaṃ dharmmasatyaṃ saṃghasatyaṃ uparisatyena bhagavāna samayamanusmara padmagarbha svāhā padmasuvarṇati svāhā padmaja svāhā padmapriyāya svāhā padmasutritiṣṭhatacaraṇāya svāhā sarvabhayadada svāhā ārya amitābha samājñāpayati svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās called Golden Light, which has attained great power. It is sanctioned by many buddhas, sustains all beings like gold, and is accomplished by being read. It frees one from all yakṣas and drives them away, and merely by being recited it dispels disease.

Next comes the rite of its painting. The Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, appears golden in color, his hair bound up high, his right hand granting fearlessness, adorned here and there with garlands of lotuses, holding a round water pitcher in his hand, wearing white garments, his face broadly smiling, and both his feet resting on a lotus. The practitioner holds a censer in his hand, as before. Having carried out the rite of the painting in this way and installed it in the place described before, one should recite five hundred thousand times.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya bodhisatvāya mahāsasvāya jale jale da śuci durvace aprade śucini prabhute svāhā

This is the mantra for anointing.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya padmagarbhe sugandhaya muru suru svāhā

This is the mantra of fragrance.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya bhuvaḥ bhurbhuva vidyācandra cale cale svāhā

This is the mantra of flowers.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya padmaśriye varvarile svāhā

This is the mantra of incense.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya amṛte amṛte gahvare sumukhe svāhā

This is the mantra of the torma.

Having done this as before, by a fire offering of aloeswood one obtains whatever one wishes. By a fire offering of sandalwood one summons. By a fire offering of jasmine flowers all people will be delighted. Beginning on the first day of the fortnight of miracles, one should recite eight thousand times in three sessions before the painting, with the rite of offering, until the full moon. Keeping a fast for three nights, one should install the painting on the bank of a river that flows to the ocean, or on an island, and perform the rite of offering; beginning at dusk, one should recite until a sign of accomplishment appears. The painting may shake strongly, or the flames of the lamps may grow tall, or a rain of flowers may fall from the sky, or the sound of thunder may be heard.

If the painting shakes, one will become a great king. If the lamps grow, one will become the lord of a town. If flowers fall, one will become the master of a land. With the sound of thunder one will obtain sixteen towns. Even if it is not accomplished, all one's work and requisites will be fully provided, and all one's diseases will be cast off.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Golden Light, of the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, in order fully to reveal the power of the Blessed Lady's great king of vidyās, her great king of ritual manuals, brought to mind the king of vidyās called Empowered by the Twelve Buddhas, and spoke:

This is the great king of vidyās called the Vidyā Empowerment, which has attained great power. Whoever reads it or recites it will have paid homage to twelve koṭis of buddhas. By reciting it constantly, one will not fall into any of the evil destinies. One will remember one's births through twelve hundred births. At all times one will remember the five higher knowledges and the three junctures of the day. None of one's diseases, nor piśācas and the like, nor rākṣasas, will pass into one's body, and so it will be even for hundreds of koṭis of eons.

The rite of the painting for this is as follows. On undamaged cloth having the characteristics stated before, one should draw the noble Avalokiteśvara in full: white, his matted locks piled upward, Padmapāṇi, with the right hand granting boons and the left hand holding a lotus. Above him one should draw twelve perfectly complete buddhas, golden in color, granting fearlessness. Namely, one should draw in full these perfectly complete buddhas: Padmottara, Guṇottara, Jñāneśvara, Ever Melodious, Vipaśyin, Śikhin, Viśvabhū, Krakucchanda, Kanakamuni, Kāśyapa, Śākyamuni, Amitābha, and Akṣobhya.

Having had such a painting made, and having seated oneself in the place described before, one should do three hundred thousand recitations. With this very vidyā one should offer scent, flowers, incense and so forth. Whatever one is doing, with single-minded heroism one should recite it a hundred thousand times. Then one should keep a fast for three nights, make a great offering to the painting, and take eye ointment, or realgar, or gorocanā, recited over a thousand times. Wrapping it in a leaf of the aśvattha tree in front of the painting, according to the rite as described, one should sit on a mat of kuśa grass and, beginning at dusk, recite until it grows warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. If one makes a tilaka with it while it is growing warm, one brings everyone under one's power. With it while it is smoking, one becomes invisible. With it blazing, one travels through the sky. If the painting shakes strongly, one will come to kingship.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Empowered by the Twelve Buddhas, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, and fully considering the world systems endowed with everything, spoke this great king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, called the Garland of Devotion, which was spoken by the buddhas:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya namo namaḥ sarba bodhisatvāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā maṇḍa biśāla kīrti sarba bidyā svāhā

This is the great queen of vidyās called the Garland of Devotion, which has attained great power, which many buddhas have sanctioned, and which fully generates the samādhis of many bodhisattvas. It should be accomplished. For any poor person who would accomplish it, within a month of the painting his prosperity will increase. For any poor person who obtains it, this vidyā, since it bestows great benefit, will become an object of worship. It is the rite that brings about worldly prosperity.

Then, as for the means of accomplishment: one should draw the painting of the Blessed Avalokiteśvara described before. Beginning it on the ninth day, one should have it completed on the full moon of the bright fortnight. He is seated on a seat of white lotus, his matted locks piled upward. Above, as a second figure, is the noble Amitābha, and at his side Śākyamuni as well. To the right of the noble Avalokiteśvara one should draw Mahāśrī. On the left side one should draw Vajrasena, white in color, white like an autumn cloud, holding in his hands a round flask and a water vessel. On the crown of the noble Avalokiteśvara there should be atimuktaka flowers; for the noble Amitābha, a garland of varṣa flowers; for Śākyamuni, a garland of jasmine flowers; for Mahāśrī, a garland of nāgakesara flowers; and for Vajrasena, a garland of white flowers. One should offer these, and fragrant incense, as far as one's means allow. Having installed the painting in the place described before, one should do three hundred thousand recitations.

Then, on the full moon, having made a great offering to the painting of garlands of flowers and the like, one should sit on a mat of kuśa grass, and whatever one does with this vidyā, one should do it all with single-minded heroism. One should recite the great queen of vidyās until the sign appears of all the garlands shaking. When the mark of accomplishment appears, one will obtain everything one desires. If in every respect one performs before the painting six hundred thousand fire offerings mixed with sesame, one will gain a kingdom. If one desires the riches of a land, by performing before the painting three hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed, sesame and cekata, one will gain a land. If before the painting one makes seven hundred thousand fire offerings of saffron, resin incense, black pepper and costus mixed with butter and honey, one will gain a great kingdom. If it is not accomplished, one will gain a land and become a great lord of wealth.

This completes the king of vidyās called the Garland of Devotion, of the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then once more the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke to the bodhisattva, the great being Vajrapāṇi: "In order to summon constantly the deities of your family, who have many different forms, the yakṣas, the yakṣiṇīs, the great yakṣa generals, Divine Flower, Moon herself, and those means endowed with the wish for peace, this mantra will be made sovereign."

Here, the words of the great mantra that summons all yakṣas are these:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya namaḥ sarba sena sataye nama āryābalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahasatvaya mahākāruṇikāya yakṣa jrimbhana muktāya sarbaṃ yakṣaṃ hṛdayaṃ guhya adhipatāya bhagabān āryābalokiteśvarāya hṛdaya manu smara satya manusāla tadyathā śīle śīlabati dāni praye śante satvā darṣanan tathāgata sarba jñā jñāna darṣana mama saraṃ prayacche sarba satvā hitārthāya svāhā

When this secret mantra that overcomes adversaries with great strength had been spoken, and all who dwell in the great trichiliocosm world system had been summoned, then through the power of the bodhisattva, Vajrapāṇi, the lord of all yakṣas, the Lord of Secrets, who is no trifling being and is endowed with great miraculous power, spoke these words: "Whoever, with a mind intent on the welfare of beings, accomplishes Tārā, to him you must surely grant accomplishment! Each of you, doing your share, should always act to help him. When beings call to mind this goddess Tārā, you are to protect, guard and shelter those embodied beings. Whoever does not carry out my command will have his head split into seven pieces by Vajrapāṇi, the Lord of Secrets, Vajradhara of great strength."

This king of vidyās called the Summoner of All Yakṣas, which is preceded by the wisdom of omniscience and has attained great power, protects from all malignant beings and all fears merely by being read.

Now I shall explain the means of accomplishing it. Following the rite of the painting taught before, one should have the noble Avalokiteśvara painted: his matted locks piled upward, holding a lotus stem in his hand, Padmapāṇi, with a black antelope skin hanging from him, wearing white garments and seated cross-legged; so one should have him painted. On the right side one should draw the great yakṣa generals, namely Jaya, Vijaya, Sātāgiri, the Son of the Secret One, Maṇibhadra, the Son of Fair Gait, the Son of the Loving One, the Son of the Noble Hero, Brahmā, and Mindful of Water. One should have many yakṣa kings such as these painted, and the yakṣa generals, holding in their hands sacks filled with seeds, should be placed close by. On the left side are the yakṣa generals called End of Victory, Trunk, Attainer of Victory, Aniruddha, and King of Garuḍas; all of these are green in color, as before. On the right of the Blessed One there is also a vidyādhara, holding a censer in his hand, as before. One should have it painted under the lunar mansion Āśleṣā.

Then, having installed the painting in a stūpa that contains relics or in some other clean place, one should invite the deities with this mantra:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya namaḥ yakṣa senāpataye nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā jaye bijaye aguru ehi ehi sthānāṃ ākrama bijaye baha śāntikara svāhā

With this mantra one should invite the Blessed One and all the yakṣas.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya namaḥ sarba yakṣa sena pataye namo nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya ra ra ra ra śānti bijaye svāhā

With this one should offer all the scents, incense and so forth. Likewise one should do three hundred thousand recitations before the painting. On the full moon, keeping a fast day and night, one should offer the Blessed One a torma of curd and milk porridge. To the great yakṣa generals on the right side one should offer curd and molasses. To those drawn on the left side one should offer sesame and sesame soup. To Avalokiteśvara one offers aloeswood incense, one offers sandalwood scent, and one should offer garlands of jasmine flowers. To the generals on the right side one offers incense of the five resins and white karavīra flowers. To those on the left side one should offer resin incense and atimuktaka flowers.

Having made offerings in this way, as far as one is able, one should recite eight thousand times. Then at the three times of day one should make offerings in the same way, eating milk and barley porridge; and reciting over each white lotus in full, one should offer it to the Blessed One before the painting. When one has done this up to the completion of one hundred thousand, all the yakṣas that were drawn display miracles. At the junctures between sessions one sees the painting move and the flowers stir. Then it is accomplished, and all the yakṣas come under one's power. In the sky, too, one hears the sound "It is accomplished!" They bestow the supreme state of a vidyādhara. Whatever one seeks, the yakṣas will carry it out as commanded. If it is not accomplished, one becomes a king of all rites. Constantly, in dreams, the yakṣas grant visions of what is virtuous and what is nonvirtuous.

This completes the great king of vidyās called the Coming of All Yakṣas, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then once more the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, spoke to the lord of bhūtas, the son of the gods Īśāna: "Son of the gods, you of great miraculous power, I shall explain the Blessed Lady's great queen of vidyās, the great king of ritual manuals, into which you will duly enter. Its mantra words are rightly held to be the vidyā mantra of all worldly beings:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā īśana kula ma batu yiṣyami bhagabate ārya abalokiteśvara tejana ra ra ra ra ra bipuci bipuci bramathā prama pramatha pramathā garja garja garja ṭi ṭi ṭi sa sa sa u u u la la la ca ca ca āgaccha agaccha bhagabāna āryābalokiteśvarāya parama hṛdayaṃ dhārayiṣyati iśvorāsya bipomati tvāṃ prasāṃtha baraṃ ṅeyaṃ sarba satvā hiti dhutaṃ bara yakṣaya sarkara muni muni apratihata bītyokṛta hatikṛta yakṣakṛta nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya svāhā"

This is the mantra that draws forth the entire family of Īśāna, spoken from the mouths of the bodhisattvas, the great beings. The sons of the gods of great miraculous power said: "This mantra has been proclaimed in order to fulfill the wishes of people on earth who desire the welfare of beings."

"Whatever practitioner accomplishes this and desires accomplishment, to him you are to grant the supreme. For the hundred million whose minds are intent on the welfare of beings, and for those who on earth accomplish the mantras you yourselves have proclaimed, this mantra, proclaimed for summoning the gods, accomplishes great power; and you are to bestow the splendor and strength of Tārā, the great vidyā of many forms. All you hosts of bhūtas, protect them!"

Then comes the rite for accomplishing this. Following the rite described before, on cloth one should draw the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, appearing golden in color, Padmapāṇi, his right hand granting boons and his left hand holding a lotus, with a crown of matted locks hanging down, and the Blessed Amitābha seated on the crown of his head. To the right of the noble Avalokiteśvara one should draw the bodhisattva who embodies the samādhi called Endowed with Vastness, surrounded by a host of bodhisattvas. On the left side one should draw the great beings Īśāna and the rest; he is three-eyed.

Having set this painting up high in the place described before, one should perform the rite of offering beginning on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, and with this very mantra one should recite a hundred thousand times; thus the preliminary approach will have been done. Keeping a fast day and night, on the fourteenth of the dark fortnight one should offer a white torma to all the bodhisattvas and offer incense of aloeswood and olibanum. To the noble Avalokiteśvara one should offer incense together with milk; and to the family of the one who appears in every color and desires everything, one should offer food of curd and molasses and incense of guggulu. Outside the painting one offers a torma for all the bhūtas, and one offers the monks a feast together with gifts. One should offer curd and rice to the Pāśupatas and so gain their peace.

Until the full moon one should recite eight thousand times at the three times of day. Then, beginning at dusk, one should recite until the sign of accomplishment appears: the eyes of Īśāna flashing. When the sign of accomplishment has appeared here, one should offer garlands of flowers and offer guggulu incense. When the ascetics have eaten whatever there is, one should offer them gifts. Then it accomplishes everything. Whoever is given flowers, fruit, scent, clothing or the like over which the mantra has been spoken will stay close by as one's servant.

If one desires the enjoyments of a kingdom, one should make fire offerings of curd, butter and milk soup before the painting; at the end of one hundred thousand, the crest of a vidyādhara will blaze. If one wishes to bring the agents of punishment under one's power, one makes fire offerings of sesame and sesame soup before the painting for three nights in three sessions, and they come under one's power. If one wishes to bring a maiden under one's power, by making eight thousand fire offerings of the milk of a cow that has calved for the first time, before the painting for three nights in three sessions, one will win her. If one wishes to bring the Pāśupatas under one's power, by making fire offerings of ash they come under one's power. If one recites eight thousand times in three sessions for seven days, it brings about all the samādhis, of every kind, of people on earth, as far as those that transcend worldly activity. There is no doubt about this mantra.

This completes the great king of vidyās, the Coming of the Whole Family of Īśāna, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, out of compassion for beings recollected the king of vidyās called Entering, which leads into the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals, and spoke:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bidyārājāya tadyathā biśuddha praba karṣa karṣa bhaśiṣe bidyādhara guhyeka manusmāra buddha satyena dharma satvāna saṃgha satyena ārya abalokiteśvara satvena sidhyantā me mantra padā phaṭ phaṭ yā muni munāya samatha samāya uddharaṃ te kokarānte manusmāraṭa hṛdata sakārā ṭoṭaṃ kaṭaṭe svāhā

This great king of vidyās called Entering, which has attained great power, when recited terrifies all malignant beings, turns back all grahas and hostile vidyās, and in short fulfills every hope.

Next comes its accomplishment. One should have the Blessed Avalokiteśvara painted: white in color, with smoke-colored matted locks, his face broadly smiling, his right hand granting boons and his left hand holding a lotus; he should be drawn stepping onto a fine golden staircase.

One should draw much-praised birds such as geese, ospreys, ruddy shelducks, partridges and parrots, circling him, moving to the right. One should draw two kinnaras singing, and draw them covering their ears with the left hand. The practitioner too, facing down from below, holding a censer in his hand, gazing at the Blessed One who is entering, kneeling, should be drawn below on the right, overwhelmed by the light from the bodhisattva's body. Having had a painting of this kind made, and having installed the painting in the place described before, one should begin properly.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvaraya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahāsatvāya jāti huti mama abatādya svāhā

This is the maṇḍala mantra.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mune mune svāhā

With this one does everything. One should recite it five hundred thousand times; thus the preliminary approach will have been done. At the end one should make fire offerings of a hundred thousand lotuses smeared with curd, honey and butter. At the end one keeps a fast day and night, and recites countless times. If, as the sign of accomplishment, the painting shakes strongly, one will become lord of a great land. If it does not shake, one will become lord of a district. Through constant recitation one will come to see treasures. One should offer a million lotuses before the painting, and one gains a town. One should offer thirty thousand, and one will gain five towns. If, through the practice of the king of vidyās, one constantly longs for it and keeps it in mind, one will not become poor.

This completes the great king of vidyās, Entering, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then once more the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke to the Blessed One, within the great king of ritual manuals, the great king of mantras that forms the great king of vidyās called Ten Syllables: of great and wondrous benefit, rejoiced in by ten koṭis of buddhas, dispelling all subtle harms, and protecting all beings.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvaraya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikaya tadyathā oṃ ghaṭṭani phumatana svāhā

This great king of vidyās called Ten Syllables, which has attained great power, is unobstructed and serves for every rite. Sanctioned by ten koṭis of buddhas, it is beautiful and protects. One should worship it at all times.

Then comes the offering for accomplishing it. Having made offerings, as far as one's means allow, to a stūpa that contains relics, and having offered scent, incense and the like with this very mantra, one should recite it ten million times. One gains a great kingdom. If one recites it a million times, one gains a thousand pieces of gold. If one smears a thousand maṇḍalas near a stūpa, offers scent, incense and the like, and recites it a hundred thousand times, whatever king one wishes will come under one's power. At a great river, at an island, or at a stūpa of the Sugata one span in height, one should do three hundred thousand recitations. One gains a great kingdom, and great benefit is truly realized. Whoever constantly keeps this mantra in mind is rejoiced in by ten koṭis of buddhas, is highly praised, and reaches everything.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Ten Syllables, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Consecration on the Crown, the great king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā:

namo ratnatrayāya namo akṣobhyaya tadyathā namo bimukta darṣanāya tathāgatāya namo gambhira ghoṣaya tathāgatāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā kumāri kumāri manojabeṣu nājaye śarada bijayāya duṃdubhi svarāya debi debi debi pūjitāya nama skṛta garjatāya ra ra la la khagāya svāhā baruṇāya svāhā apratihata badanāya svāhā brahma śvara ghoṣa rutraya svāhā bisati sati rājāya svāhā ārya abalokiteśvarāya mūrdhānā baraṇa svāhā mama karyaṃ kuru svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās called Consecration on the Crown, which has attained great power. It arose on my crown, was spoken by many koṭis of buddhas, was conferred in the consecration by the hands of many buddhas, and has become the abode of the Tathāgata Amitābha. Merely by reading it, one quickly accomplishes all minor rites.

Then comes the rite of its means of accomplishment. Observing the poṣadha vows near a stūpa that contains relics, one recites it a hundred thousand times. One will be freed from all who seek an opening to do harm. On the day of the lunar mansion Viśākhā, having offered scent, flowers and the like to a stūpa that contains relics, one should have the noble Avalokiteśvara painted on cloth whose edges have not been cut: his matted locks piled upward, seated on a lotus, joining his palms and bowing to the Blessed Amitābha, the Sage; so he should be drawn. A vidyādhara holding a censer in his hand gazes at the Blessed One. In this form it should be painted within a fortnight or twelve days. Having had a painting of this kind made, and having installed the painting near the stūpa, one should do everything there with this very mantra and recite it five hundred thousand times. At the end, keeping a fast through the night, one should make a great offering to the painting, recite over each of eight thousand jasmine flowers in full, and cast them at the feet of the Blessed One.

When one has done a hundred thousand in this way, in three sessions, at the end the Blessed One will grant the supreme. If the vidyādhara's own body blazes, or the painting moves and sways and the tip of the lamp flame grows, it means kingship. If one wishes to perform an accomplishment, whether retention of what one has heard, or supremacy in speech, or one performed on eye ointment, realgar and gorocanā, and one accomplishes it all before the painting, there will be three kinds of accomplishment.

This completes the great king of ritual manuals called Consecration on the Crown, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, having once again spoken of the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke this great king of vidyās called Characterized by Light, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya namo bipaśyāṃ śikhī biśvabhuḥ nma ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya mahāśānta prabhāya pramudita kāpacanāya nityotāba cittaya bhagabāna hṛdaya manusmara aciśmatyaṃ lokādhāto sarba bodhisatvā sarṣatma dhye bhāṣitaṃ buṇḍha satyaṃ dharma satyaṃ saṃgha satyaṃ anāghami satyaṃ srota ābanni satyaṃ yakṣa satyaṃ kuśmāṇḍā satyaṃ būrba bodhisatvāṃ hṛdaya manusmara he he he he he tve tve tve tve tve ra ra ra ra ra la la la la la

oṃkāra prabhe bhebhyaṃ pañcaya bhaśritaṃ kalpa sarba buddha sarājataṃ tvameba rakṣaṃ baṃ datvā sira sva praṇāmya haṃ khaga khaga bija asara jatiya svāhā abalokiteśvarā bijaya svāhā

This great king of vidyās called Endowed with Rays, which has attained great power, accomplishes all minor rites by being read.

Then comes its means of accomplishment. Near a stūpa that contains relics, or on a mountain peak, or on the bank of a river flowing to the ocean, or in the middle of water, or on an island, eating milk and porridge, one should do everything with this very mantra and recite it a hundred thousand times; thus the preliminary approach will have been done. Then one should combine eye ointment, realgar and gorocanā, wrap them in a leaf of the aśvattha tree, and make offerings to a stūpa that contains relics. Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass in three sessions, one should recite over the substances for exactly twenty-one days. If they grow warm, give off smoke and blaze, it is accomplished. With the first, one brings others under one's power. With the second, one becomes invisible. With the third, one travels through the sky. If the painting shakes strongly, one gains a kingdom.

This completes the great king of ritual manuals called Endowed with Rays, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Lotus All-Illuminating, within the Blessed Lady's great queen of vidyās, the king of ritual manuals:

namaḥ subarna babhasāya tathāgatāya arhate sammyaksaṃbuddhāya beṣṭi koṭi yakṣa paribritiya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā utddha jjaṭa prajvalitaya padma abhāsaḥ tthāgatā bacanena tvaya bhaśītaṃ kalpaṃ sarba kṣāya kīrtanāya sarba satvā hita anukarta sarba satvā parajitāya sarba satvā hitārthāya sarba siddhā catāya ganiḥ nma ārya abalokiteśvarāya tadyathā dhamani dhamani bhurbhuba oṃ oṃ oṃ oṃ oṃ bipuriri pune svāhā bijaya paṭa paṭa kāra svāhā mahāyaśa anumune svāhā apratihata pacane svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās called Lotus All-Illuminating, which has attained great power. Just as the lotus illuminates all, so too with this heart essence of mine: merely by recalling it, all great fears will cease for one. Whoever performs it three times by day and night will purify all the five acts of immediate retribution committed over a long time. One will see dreams of many kinds.

The rite of the means of accomplishment is this. Having offered scent, incense and the like to a stūpa that contains relics, one should recite three hundred thousand times. At the end, keeping a fast through the night, for twelve months one should offer twelve portions of milk, twelve of curd, twelve full vases, twelve vases of honey, twelve vases of sesame and soup, incense in twelve gourd bowls, and lotuses in twelve bowls, and one should eat twelve meals of alms food. Then that evening, having performed such a rite of offering, one should smear saffron and offer there garlands of jasmine flowers like the color of the blue utpala. Before the stūpa, on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight or on the full moon, holding a sword in the right hand and sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, one should recite eight thousand times. At the end, as the sign of accomplishment, one will hear from the sky the words "Excellent! Excellent!" Then the sword will blaze, and in that very instant one will have a divine body, together with a retinue. One lives for a great eon. Then, if the sword moves or the stūpa shakes, one will become a king of men. Or else whatever one desires and pursues is accomplished, and one gains the domain of accomplishment.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Lotus All-Illuminating, arisen from the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Conforming to the Eighty Minor Marks, within the Blessed Lady's great king of vidyās, the great king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya oṃ drijaṭāya namaḥ kmaṇḍaluhastāya namaḥ padmavibhuṣitāya namaḥ padmayānāyā namaḥ padmahastāyā namo maṇḍalaśikhāya namo aśītyanūbyaṃjana lakṣaṇāya namo asurā rekuñcitāya svāhā

This is the great king of vidyās called Conforming to the Eighty Minor Marks, which has attained great power, the ritual of Tārā that bestows great benefit. Whoever keeps it in mind will accomplish all their aims.

Next, the rite for its means of accomplishment. On the bank of a river that flows to the ocean, or on an island, or on an island in the ocean, wherever is convenient, one should make stūpas of sand, each the size of a sugata-span. Having set up the central life-pole, with scents, incense and so forth, as one's means allow, one should recite eight thousand times before each one. This continues until the eight thousand stūpas are complete. If afterward a stūpa blazes, one becomes a great lord. Then, when it blazes, one will be accomplished. From then on it serves for all rites.

If one wishes to bring under one's control a king, a king's minister, a woman or a man, one should offer scents and the like before the stūpa and recite eight thousand times. If this is done for seven days in three sessions, that person will become delighted. Whatever one asks for, one obtains. In time of fear, if one recites while keeping the sacred commitments, one will become free of fear. Minor rites are accomplished merely by reciting it; it performs all rites.

This completes the king of vidyās called Conforming to the Eighty Minor Marks, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Ornament of Qualities, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals.

This is the one called Ornament of Qualities, which has attained great power and bestows every aim that all sentient beings desire. Whoever constantly keeps in mind this king of vidyās, Ornament of Qualities, will before long be able to perform all rites.

Next comes the rite for its means of accomplishment. Following the rite described earlier, one should have a painting made of the Blessed One Amitābha, the Sage. He should be painted seated in the cross-legged posture on a thousand-petaled lotus, teaching the Dharma. At his right side is the noble Avalokiteśvara, seated on a lotus, white in color, wearing a crown of matted locks, paying homage to the Blessed One. Below him is the practitioner, holding a censer in his hand, kneeling, as before.

Having installed the painting at a stūpa that contains relics, on a day when the lunar date, the karaṇa and the hour are auspicious, keeping the eight-branched restoration observance (poṣadha) and abiding in loving-kindness, one should make vast offerings and, on the full moon, recite ten thousand times. Having first done the approach with this, at that same stūpa one should recite over each lotus and offer it before the painting. One should offer a thousand each day, beginning on the first day of the month and continuing until the twelfth. Fasting for three nights, one should make vast offerings to the painting and then make a fire offering of three thousand white lotuses smeared with curd, honey and ghee. If the garland on the painting stirs, and the butter lamp swells and its light streams out elsewhere, this is the sign of accomplishment: one will obtain a great kingdom. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a province.

This fully completes the great king of vidyās called Ornament of Qualities, arisen from the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the great king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the king of vidyās called Array of Sukhāvatī, within that great king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya podhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya uddhaprajvalitajaṭāya sukhābatyaṃ pramocate tadyathā bhagabato amitābhāsāya pādāmūle mamaca hṛdaya pratigṛhṇa bhagabāna mama anu kampamusatāya tadyathā sādhu sadhuṃ suṣṭhu pariṣyamitilaṃghalaṅghajyotiṣpapati bibhudhapadmahastaya sume sume bisuma giri giriṇi svāhā

This great king of vidyās called Array of Sukhāvatī, which has attained great power, protects from all fears merely by being recited.

Its rite is as follows. In the open, with no roof overhead, beneath a single tree, one should make a stūpa about the size of a vase, and before it make a fire offering of a hundred thousand pieces of aloeswood. Whatever one makes the fire offering for, one obtains the best of it.

One who wishes to bring a king or a king's minister under control should make an effigy of salt before the stūpa and offer it into a fire of palāśa wood seven times at each of the three junctures of the day for three days; that person will then come under one's control.

If one wishes to bring a woman under control, then in an open field one should make a fire offering, into a fire of khadira wood, of white mustard seeds smeared with blood, together with smeared mustard seed and khadira, one thousand and eight times at each of the three junctures of the day for three days; she will then come under one's control.

On the sand of a river that flows to the ocean, one should make one thousand and eight stūpas, each about four finger-widths high, or about a span, or about the measure of a sugata-span. Having set up the life-pole in each, and with an assortment of offerings and the like, one should recite one thousand and eight times before each one. For as long as the one thousand and eight remain standing, one will obtain a thousand coins at a time.

If, on the shore of the ocean, before each stūpa, with the rite performed first, one recites a hundred thousand times, one will see the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, who will grant whatever supreme boon one desires, and one will obtain whatever one seeks.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Array of Sukhāvatī, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on that same samādhi, spoke the king of vidyās called Endowed with Heroism, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā śiri bisiri smṛti bacane tejobadhani hara hara amukaṃ me basamāgacchaturamani biramaṇi birabāsi minisau tamutakhepātibarṇa svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the great queen of vidyās called Endowed with Heroism, which protects all sentient beings. Whoever constantly keeps in mind this vidyā, endowed with the heroism of the supreme sons of the Victor, will surely attain the accomplishment of wealth, in keeping with their effort and their wishes.

Next comes the rite for its means of accomplishment. One should have the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, painted: Padmapāṇi on a lotus seat, his right hand granting fearlessness, adorned with every ornament. To his right is the practitioner, as before. Having offered scents, incense and garlands to that painting at a stūpa containing relics, and fasting day and night, on the full moon one should offer twelve bowls of milk porridge and present aloeswood incense. Then, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, one should recite one thousand and eight times. This will constitute the preliminary approach.

For the accomplishment of all rites, one should recite a hundred thousand times following this same rite. Afterward, having smeared a maṇḍala close before the painting, one should recite over each jasmine flower and scatter it on the maṇḍala. If one does this for seven days, in three sessions, until one thousand and eight are complete, then on the seventh day whomever one wishes will come under one's control. If one makes a fire offering of three hundred thousand pieces of black aloeswood before the painting, one will obtain a kingdom; if one does not succeed, a village.

This fully completes the great queen of vidyās called Endowed with Heroism, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then again the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, meditating on that same king of samādhis, spoke the great king of vidyās called Perfect Bestowal of Fearlessness, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya dīptapiṅgale haripiṅgale asonitādhadrāle hi ehi mama paraṃ prayaccha svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the king of vidyās called Perfect Bestowal of Fearlessness.

Next, its rite. On cloth or on a panel, one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara with lac dye, on a lotus seat, holding a lotus in his hand, perfectly bestowing fearlessness. The practitioner, too, is as before. If, before him, in three sessions, one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand pieces of red sandalwood smeared with ghee, one will obtain a hundred pieces of gold. If one makes a fire offering seven hundred thousand times, one will obtain a kingdom.

Here is the mantra for producing rubies:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā yige cchitve ca paripraṇa aiśratyaṃ dadāti me bajriṇi ghiṇi mohani mohaja jaṃbhani staṃbhani abhayapradi abhayapradi la la la la la la la svāhā

This, which has attained great power, is the mantra that bestows rubies. Its rite: one should draw the noble Avalokiteśvara with red sandalwood. If, before him, one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand red flowers smeared with ghee and honey, one will obtain eight rubies.

The rite of the food mantra is as follows:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā prabyākarī prabhakāri jyotiṣmati sucibimucāya svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the mantra that bestows food and clothing. Its rite: one should draw the noble Avalokiteśvara with blood and cow bezoar. If, before him, one makes a fire offering of milk porridge smeared with ghee, up to a hundred thousand times, one will obtain food and clothing wherever one is.

This one bestows silver:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā jvala jvala prajvala bhana ghana haṭāya sādaya sādaya ehi ehi phu phu phu phu ghu ghu phura svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the mantra that bestows silver. Its rite: one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara with saffron. If, before him, one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand nāgakesara blossoms smeared with curd, honey, and honey and ghee, one will obtain a hundred pieces of silver.

Also here is the mantra that abundantly bestows gold:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bobhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā garuru phara bara barili svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the mantra that bestows gold. Its rite: at a stūpa containing relics, one should recite over each mallikā flower and scatter it at the foot of the stūpa. If one scatters eight thousand in three sessions, within a month one will obtain a hundred pieces of gold.

The rite of the painting is as follows. On cloth one should paint the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, with his matted locks piled high, holding a water flask in his hand, seated on a lotus seat.

If one installs the painting in a town or in a hermitage in the wilds, beneath an aśvattha tree, in a clean place, and makes a fire offering of seven hundred thousand oblations of resin incense, the Blessed One will swiftly grant a kingdom.

With these five, then, this completes Perfect Bestowal of Fearlessness, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of the Blessed Lady Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, having once again meditated on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Arising of the Syllable Oṃ, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhyāsya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhasya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā amukte amukte cacchadane mādheni mādheni surudhi rutamāya dharī huhu huhu matha matha matha oṃ rapramukha pāla pāla mahāpāripāla teja namastute sarbaduṣṭatvaṃ bāsisātāṇimāne svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the great king of vidyās called Releasing the Tether of Saṃsāra. Whoever constantly keeps it in mind will not wander long in saṃsāra. By mere recitation it purifies the five acts of immediate retribution.

Next, the rite for its means of accomplishment. On cloth, as described before, one should paint the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, moving through the sky, blazing with light on all sides, holding a lotus in his hand, his right hand granting fearlessness. The practitioner should be painted in his true bodily likeness, burning incense, his dress and appearance exactly as they are.

Then, having installed that painting in the place described before, and offering scents, flowers, incense and so forth with this very mantra, one should recite three hundred thousand times. This will constitute the preliminary approach. It purifies the five acts of immediate retribution. By reciting six hundred thousand times one will obtain what one has vowed.

If one wishes to bind malevolent piśācas and rākṣasas, one should encircle them with a cord of kuśa grass consecrated with eight thousand recitations, and wind it around the tree, house or other place where the malevolent ones dwell. All the malevolent ones will be bound. Malicious minds and malicious beings will be overpowered.

If one wishes to prepare an eye salve, one should make a full thousand oblations before the painting, place the salve within seven aśvattha leaves, and fumigate it with smoke; then those eyes will become equal to the eyes of a Victor, and one will live for three thousand years.

One should offer three hundred thousand white lotuses before the painting; one will obtain a kingdom. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a province.

This completes the great king of vidyās called Releasing the Tether of Saṃsāra, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke this great king of vidyās called the Eleven-Syllable, within the Blessed Lady's great king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā daśani karaṇi bikaraṇi bidhuli bīlaya svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the king of vidyās called the Eleven-Syllable, which I taught in the past, constantly, even to eleven buddhas. By reciting it constantly one obtains gold.

Next, the rite for its means of accomplishment, for the sake of accomplishment. One should paint the painting described before with powdered nāgakesara mixed with pālika: Avalokiteśvara seated on a lotus seat, meditating in concentration, holding a lotus in his hand and a rosary in his right hand, white in color. The practitioner, too, is as before. Having set up the painting in the first place, one should recite five hundred thousand times. This will constitute the preliminary approach. On a mountain peak, going without food for three days, one should recite twenty thousand times; one will obtain a thousand pieces of gold.

With white sandalwood pigment one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara as described before. If, before him, one makes a fire offering of three hundred thousand, together with white sandalwood chips, one will obtain a kingdom. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a village. This is for one who is meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness.

This fully completes the great king of vidyās that bestows what one desires and seeks, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Abode of the Painting, within the great king of ritual manuals, Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady Tārā.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā kaṭeni kaṭe kaṭāṃ kaṭe jyoti tiṣmatī bipule svāhā

This, which has attained great power, is the great king of vidyās called Abode of the Painting. Recited constantly, it grants one's aims, destroys all wrongdoing, and also brings accomplishment.

Again, its rite. On the cloth described before, one should paint Amitābha seated in the cross-legged posture, absorbed in samādhi. At the Blessed One's right is the noble Avalokiteśvara, wearing a crown of matted locks and an upper garment of white silk, joining his palms toward the Blessed One. At his left is the noble Mahāsthāmaprāpta, dark blue like the priyaṅgu flower, seated on a lotus seat, joining his palms toward the Blessed One. Having painted such a painting, one should set it up in a clean place, each figure separately, on a frame of paṭa wood, and, offering scents, flowers and so forth with this very mantra, recite seven hundred thousand times. This will constitute the preliminary approach.

At the end, fasting for three nights, one should recite over each of eight thousand white flowers and offer them before Avalokiteśvara. The sign of accomplishment is that those one thousand and eight lotuses come together in one place; this is the sign of accomplishment.

Having ground these into powder and mixed it with other meat, whoever it is given to, whether a king or a king's minister, will come under one's control. If it is given to someone tormented by illness, all illnesses will be pacified. If one sprinkles that powder on a woman who bears the signs, one will obtain a son. If at dawn one sprinkles that powder on the crown of one's own head, all people will be delighted. In this way that powder does whatever one wishes.

To bring release, for an illness that has been inflicted, or for bleeding, or for a discharge from the private parts, and likewise for poison and all such things, one should give it to drink or give a little as an ointment, and all illnesses will be pacified.

Further, here is the rite of the powder of the Abode of the Painting. Nāgakesara, sandalwood, damanaka, tamāla leaves, pushel tsé, costus and the hundred-petaled flower: these should be combined in equal parts and made into powder. This is the powder of the Abode of the Painting. Having consecrated it with eight hundred recitations, whoever it is given to, in a drink or the like, will come under one's control: that person will remain near as a servant, and one will be free of the fear of weapons; both of these are obtained together and take effect.

Likewise, in time of fear one should offer three hundred thousand white lotuses before the painting; one will obtain a great province. If one kindles a fire with arka wood and makes a fire offering of seven hundred thousand red lotuses, one will obtain a great kingdom. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a great city. If one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand sesame seeds, one will obtain a village. If one makes five hundred thousand fire offerings, it bestows wealth and grants boons, and brings that under one's control. Merely by reciting a hundred times over a conch, one will attain all one's aims.

This fully completes the Abode of the Painting, the great tantra of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Once again the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of vidyās called Lotus Edge.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā byajani bejani bejahate padmaṣaṇḍani pāsīnibuddhe buddhāya paraṃparāya sarbagatibijayāya svāhā

This, which has attained great power, is the great vidyā called Lotus Edge. By reciting it constantly, harm is turned back and one is freed from all illnesses.

Next comes the rite for its means of accomplishment. On a leaf of birch bark one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara with gorocanā: seated on a lotus, entirely white, his matted locks piled high, holding a lotus in his left hand and a water flask in his right. Then, having installed the painting in a clean place, one should perform everything, scents, incense and so forth, with this very mantra, and recite three hundred thousand times.

At the end, fasting day and night, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should recite once over each of eight thousand flowers for the Blessed One and touch them to the Blessed One's feet. Continuing in this way until eighty thousand are complete, at the end one should make vast offerings and recite, beginning at dusk. Then the words "It is accomplished!" will come from the sky, and one will obtain whatever one desires.

If one wishes to bring a king or anyone else under control, one should take a garland of jasmine, consecrate each of its flowers, and offer them before the painting. If one offers them for seven days and nights in three sessions, that person will come under one's control.

If one wishes to bring a brahmin under control, one should make a fire offering of the skin of a black antelope into a fire of palāśa wood before the painting, for seven days and nights in three sessions; he will come under one's control. If one makes a fire offering of udumbara flowers into a fire of bilva wood before the painting, he will come under one's control within three days.

If one wishes to bring a śūdra under control, one should make a fire offering of salt into a fire of arka wood before the painting; within three days he will come under one's control. If one wishes to bring an ordinary woman under control, one should make a fire offering of barley into that same fire.

If one wishes to bring a monk or a brahmin under control, one should make a fire offering of dūrvā grass into a fire of khadira wood before the painting, in three sessions for seven days; on the seventh day he will come under one's control. By reciting for one month toward whomever one would bring under control, that person will come under one's control.

This fully completes the great king of mantras called Lotus Edge, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the great king of mantras called Lotus Splendor, within the king of ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the great king of mantras called Lotus Splendor. By reciting it constantly, all illness will disappear.

Next comes the rite for its means of accomplishment. With pigment mixed with the juice of legen dye, one should paint a painting of the noble Avalokiteśvara: white, his matted locks piled high, holding a lotus in his hand, seated on a lotus seat, encircled by a garland of light blazing on all sides. Then, having installed it in a clean place, one should burn scents, flowers and incense with this very mantra and recite five hundred thousand times.

Then one should make three hundred thousand fire offerings of white sandalwood smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One will immediately obtain a kingdom. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a village. If one makes a fire offering of palāśa or of aloeswood smeared with ghee before the painting, one will obtain a hundred koṭis of garments. If one makes a hundred thousand oblations of legen dye, one will see a treasure. If one recites for a month toward whatever has been indicated, one will obtain that aim, except for what has been set up out of mere desire.

This fully completes the great king of mantras called Lotus Splendor, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, spoke the great king of vidyās called Śrīvatsa, within the Blessed Lady's king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā basura mara bana ghughu naṃparaṃ pārayanaṃ ehi ehi budhya budhya bodhyaye svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the great king of vidyās called Śrīvatsa, which, merely by being remembered, destroys all harm.

Its rite: with pigment mixed with saffron one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara, his matted locks piled high, seated on a lotus, holding a lotus in his left hand, his right hand granting boons, adorned at his heart with the mark of the śrīvatsa. On his right one should draw a śrīvatsa in saffron. At a stūpa containing relics, one should install the painting facing west, burn incense at that same stūpa, and recite three hundred thousand times. At the end, fasting day and night, one should recite over each nāgakesara blossom and touch it to the heart of the noble Avalokiteśvara. If one completes this for a month, one will be shown a great treasure. In seven days one will obtain a thousand pieces of gold. One will obtain a regional province.

This fully completes the great king of vidyās called Śrīvatsa, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, once again meditating on the king of samādhis Endowed with Vastness, spoke the king of mantras called Bestowal of Fearlessness, within the Blessed Lady's king of ritual manuals.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā gopatibati carapatipati śasani śasini bhūbhū cili cili cilpaya svāhā

This, together with the great power it has attained, is the great king of mantras called Bestowal of Fearlessness. By reciting it constantly one will become a king of the earth.

The rite for its means of accomplishment is as follows. On cloth, with pigment mixed with powdered red lead, one should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara: his matted locks piled high, holding a water flask in his hand, resting at his side, seated on a lotus seat, perfectly bestowing fearlessness. Then one should install that painting at a stūpa containing relics, on the north side of the stūpa, make offerings with this very mantra as one's means allow, and recite a hundred thousand times. At the end, fasting day and night, one should make vast offerings and recite, beginning at dusk. One will hear a voice from the sky saying, "It is accomplished!", and rain will fall wherever the offerings were made. If one does not succeed, one will obtain a province. If, before it, one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of nāgakesara flowers smeared with ghee into a fire of palāśa wood, one will obtain a hundred thousand pieces of silver; one will obtain a hundred coins.

This fully completes the great king of vidyās called Bestowal of Fearlessness, arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, of the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā.

This completes the thirteenth extensive chapter, the vidyā mantras arisen from the samādhi Endowed with Vastness, from the root ritual manual of Ūrdhvajaṭā of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, a Mahāyāna sūtra of the vast collection of the bodhisattva piṭaka.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, once again entered into the samādhi called Radiating and Destroying the Pure Domain of the Bodhisattvas' Samādhi in the World Systems Endowed with All. Having entered into it, he said:

"Since I am explaining, in this great king of ritual manuals, how the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, is to be accomplished, and since the intention of the tathāgatas, which wards off all the gods, will be transmitted, I shall explain the perfect bestowal of fearlessness against all that terrifies sentient beings. O hosts of gods, all hosts of bhūtas, obstructors and vināyakas, all lords of the yakṣas, and whatever other chiefs of the vidyās there may be, listen! I shall teach the great king of vidyās called Bhṛkuṭī, spoken by the Blessed Lady Tārā, queen of all vidyās; the sovereign of all vidyās, who has gained mastery, spoken by the Tathāgata; which, in keeping with the very act of supplication, seizes, dries up and slays all great terrors.

"In this king of ritual manuals, the ritual procedure of the means of accomplishment of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, is this. Rising in the morning and having become clean, one should look all around, to the east and the other directions, recite over the palm of one's hand, then gaze at the disk of the sun and recite there over the palm of one's hand. All obstructors will be paralyzed. Moreover, for those of malicious intent, if one does the same each day, all the rites of pacification will be accomplished, without long delay. For increase, one should likewise perform the rite with that same mantra at the time of sunset."

For fierce rites, at midnight, in a solitary place, one should untie one's topknot, recite seven times, gaze up at the zenith of the sky, and meditate with a one-pointed mind. Then that person's fierce rites will be accomplished. Whoever, even among the hosts of gods, all the hosts of bhūtas, and the hosts of vināyakas, performs the practice of the great secret of secrets, the king of knowledge mantras (vidyās) that I have spoken in this way, will without doubt gain accomplishment; and the practitioner of the Blessed Lady, the practitioner taught here in this mantra ritual, will without doubt bring it about. It should be understood in this way and not otherwise.

O hosts of gods, listen to the great vidyā, the great secret of secrets of the mātṛkās! I shall also explain the vidyā of the rite that brings it to happiness.

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara entered into the bodhisattva meditative absorption called Illuminating All Extremes. Through his entering into that absorption, all sentient beings changed their births and came to possess strength, diligence, power, and the five consciousnesses. Rising from that absorption, endowed with action and power, he approached the place where the Blessed One was. Having approached, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet and sat down to one side.

Then the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, joined his palms toward the Blessed One, bowed, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, how is it that the vidyā comes or goes?"

When he had said this, the Blessed One said this to the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, excellent, excellent that you have asked about such a thing for the sake of sentient beings! Therefore, son of noble family, listen, and I shall explain.

"In the east, in a buddha field eighty-four thousand buddha fields away, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called Akṣobhya, taught this very queen of vidyās in his own buddha field. In the south, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called All-Illuminating Gold, also spoke this very vidyā of Tārā. In the west, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called Amitāyus, also spoke this vidyā in his own buddha field. In the north, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called Beautiful Body, also spoke this very queen of vidyās. In this way, in the ten directions too, it has been spoken by all such tathāgatas and others; son of noble family, all those tathāgatas proclaim this very heart mantra.

"Son of noble family, in the east, beyond countless buddha fields, there is a world called Vimalā. There, in the buddha field of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha called Vimalaprabha, there is a bodhisattva great being called Ratnākara, and that Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly complete Buddha, Blessed One, taught this vidyā to the bodhisattva Ratnākara. Beyond that, past further buddha fields, there is a world called Ratnavatī. There dwells the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called Jewel Radiance, and there is a bodhisattva great being called Ratnaśrī.

"Then the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One Jewel Radiance, said to the bodhisattva great being Ratnaśrī: 'Son of noble family, I have explained this vidyā for the benefit of sentient beings; hold it supremely!' Then the bodhisattva great being Ratnaśrī, through the blessing of the Tathāgata, held the vidyā supremely.

"Then, in the world Vimalā, in the buddha field of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha, the Blessed One called Vimalaprabha, the bodhisattva great being called Ratnākara took his place. Then the Blessed One said to the bodhisattva great being Ratnākara: 'Son of noble family, this is the heart mantra of all the tathāgatas. For the benefit, welfare, and happiness of sentient beings, in order to care for gods and humans as well, and for the sake of all sentient beings, it should be explained to all sentient beings. Hold it supremely!' Then the bodhisattva great being Ratnākara bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet and held the vidyā supremely.

"Son of noble family, the bodhisattva great being called Ratnākara was none other than this bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, who at that time, on that occasion, was in that buddha field. And the one called the bodhisattva great being Ratnaśrī in the buddha field of the Tathāgata Jewel Radiance is the goddess Pāṇḍaravāsinī. In the place that became the buddha field of the Tathāgata Amitābha, son of noble family, this is the very going and coming of this vidyā; son of noble family, she teaches the king of vidyās."

Then the bodhisattva great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, approached the place where the Blessed One was, bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, I shall give the vidyā to Vajrapāṇi for the sake of accomplishment." Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara said this to the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi:

"Vajrapāṇi, I too shall give the heart vidyā of Pāṇḍaravāsinī."

Then the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi said this to the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara: "Bodhisattva, you who are wholly compassionate toward sentient beings, exceedingly compassionate, grant fearlessness to sentient beings! Teach the vidyā spoken by the Sage!"

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, with a slightly smiling face, entered into the meditative absorption called Blazing Like the Fire of Destruction. All the buddha fields were stirred by its light rays: a third eye appeared on the bodhisattva's forehead, and from that eye there arose light rays that bring all manner of things under control. Those light rays illuminated all the buddha fields. In all the buddha fields, too, these words were heard: "Son of noble family, excellent, excellent that you have spoken such a vidyā!" All the buddhas and bodhisattvas were showered with lotuses, utpalas, kumudas, puṇḍarīkas, saugandhikas, kaṭoras, mañjūṣakas, and great mañjūṣaka flowers. "Son of noble family, speak the king of vidyās!"

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara, through the blessing of the Buddha, spoke the vidyā:

namaḥ sarva tathagatebhyaḥ arhatebhyaḥ samyaka saṃbuddhebhyaḥ oṃ bhaya nāśani trāsani trāsa trāsaya bhṛkuṭi taṭi vaitaṭi vaitaṭi svete jaṭini svāhā

As soon as this vidyā had been spoken, the great trichiliocosm, the world system of a billion worlds, rose in the west and sank in the east, rose in the south and sank in the north, rose in the north and sank in the south, rose in the east and sank in the west. Thus the great trichiliocosm shook in six ways. The gods dwelling in their celestial palaces were moved from their seats. The gandharvas were thrown face down. The voices of the asuras failed, the speed of the garuḍas slackened, the rākṣasas cried out "truṭatatara," and the malevolent ones drew near. The hosts of mātṛkās uttered wretched sounds of wailing and a clamor of lamentation. Likewise the yakṣas, the kinnaras, and the great mahoragas were left without refuge and without ally, and even the divine realms as far as Akaniṣṭha were burning. All the gods hurried in haste into the presence of the Tathāgata.

Then Vajrapāṇi too, delighted by the light rays of the ornament of the Tathāgata's miraculous display, moved from his seat and came into the presence of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha. Then the Blessed One comforted all the gods and bodhisattvas: "Do not be afraid! Friends, do not be afraid!" Then the Blessed One said this to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, enter!" The moment that great being entered the crown protuberance (uṣṇīṣa) of the Tathāgata, the great trichiliocosm shook in six ways.

Then again the Blessed One said to all the gods: "Sons of noble family, sing praises to the heart of the Tathāgata and to the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara!" Then all those gods, the gandharvas, yakṣas, and others, and the bodhisattvas, paid homage to the heart of the Tathāgata and to the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara. Then the whole assembly, filled with wonder, came to where the Blessed One was. Having come, they bowed their heads at the Blessed One's feet and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is wondrous that a bodhisattva has spoken such a secret mantra! Sugata, it is supremely wondrous!"

Then the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi spoke. The bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi came forth from the crown protuberance, bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it is wondrous that the power of the great bodhisattva has been proclaimed, which the gods have never heard before. Sugata, it is wondrous!"

The Blessed One said: "Son of noble family, so it is. In times past, in the east, in the buddha field of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha called Padmanetra, eighty-four koṭis of vidyādharas dwelt, each in their own place. In that buddha field the word 'woman' is not even designated; all of them are flawless vidyādharas and do not pass beyond the state of a vidyādhara. Son of noble family, all the gods, all the bodhisattvas, all the lords of the yakṣas, the gandharvas, bhūtas, piśācas, kinnaras, great mahoragas, and the rest, in short, son of noble family, do not pass beyond the order of all the tathāgatas."

Then the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi went to where the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara was. Having approached, he joyfully spoke the secret mantra:

namo ratna trayāya namaś caṇḍa vajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye oṃ ṭakki hūṃ phaṭ

This too, which is the heart of the bodhisattva great being and of all the hosts of vidyās, the heart of the king of supreme vidyās, the king of vidyās, should be recited a thousand times.

This concludes the first chapter of the subsequent tantra, called "Generation."

Then all the bodhisattvas, the gods, gandharvas, nāgas, yakṣas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, pretas, piśācas, pūtanas, kaṭapūtanas, skandas, unmādas, oppressing spirits, and all the vināyakas, the kings from every land, the gods together with the gods of the earth, the rivers and the oceans, and the great medicine deities came to where the Blessed One was. Having come, they bowed their heads in homage at the Blessed One's feet and sat down to one side.

Then all of them said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, we wish to put some questions to the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha." When they had said this, the Blessed One said this to the bodhisattvas and the gods: "Fair-faced ones, excellent! Ask whatever you wish."

They said this to the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha: "Blessed One, how is the rising or the setting of the vidyās defined, and at what time are the vidyās accomplished?"

When the gods had said this, the Blessed One said this: "O gods, sons of noble family, when tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly complete buddhas appear in the world, at that time the vidyās arise. There are those endowed with diligence, those whose diligence is slack and sluggish, those with courage, the lazy, liars, those of harsh speech, killers, the violent, the craving, and the greedy. Those of them who never know this side and never know the far side, people such as these, do not find accomplishment in the vidyā.

"Son of noble family, in times past, in this very Fortunate Eon, eighteen kings of the vidyādharas passed away. Possessed of great miraculous powers and great might, they became renowned by the name of vidyādharas. All of them, through being vidyādharas and through the might of the vidyā, sported, rejoiced, and took their delight.

"Son of noble family, in the east was the king of the vidyādharas called Sinless, lord of four koṭis of vidyādharas. In the north was the king of the vidyādharas called Sumeru, lord of ten koṭis of vidyādharas. Near Sumeru, king of mountains, were the king of the vidyādharas called Elephant Host, the king of the vidyādharas called Lord of the Asuras, the king of the vidyādharas called White Mount, the king of the vidyādharas called Fine Attire, the king of the vidyādharas called Golden Limbs, the king of the vidyādharas called Ornament of the Lotus Array, the king of the vidyādharas called Vajra Hand, the king of the vidyādharas called All-Illuminating Jewel, the king of the vidyādharas called Noose Mudrā, the king of the vidyādharas called Light of Blazing Flames, the king of the vidyādharas called Displayer of All Illusions, and the king of the vidyādharas called Ever Joyful. These eighteen kings of the vidyādharas, each surrounded by fourteen thousand vidyādharas and possessed of great might, all sport, rejoice, and take their delight together with women.

"Son of noble family, these vidyādharas follow the vidyā within seven lives: wherever they are born, there, by the power of this vidyā, each of them regains their memory. Son of noble family, by abiding in such a state the vidyā is accomplished."

Then that assembly of gods and bodhisattvas, filled with wonder, showered the Blessed One with flowers of many kinds. Then, so that all the gods, the bodhisattvas, and the rest might rejoice with delighted minds in the vidyā, the rite was taught. Then that bodhisattva spoke the vidyā-mantras:

oṃ padma vajri hūṃ

This is the heart mantra.

gagana vidāriṇi

This is the near-heart mantra.

oṃ bhaya nasani phaṭ

This is for the head.

oṃ trapani hūṃ

This is for the crown protuberance.

oṃ taṭi hūṃ

This is the armor.

oṃ vaitaṭi hūṃ

This is the canopy.

oṃ svete jaṭini phaṭ

This is the fence.

These are the remaining mantras of the vidyā's retinue. With the root vidyā itself one offers scent, flowers, incense, and so forth.

Then the bodhisattva great being Avalokiteśvara taught the rite of the painted scroll of the Blessed Lady. First of all, a cloth of no fixed size and free of hairs should be washed. It should be washed seven times with white sandalwood and aguru leaves mixed with spikenard, consecrated seven times with the mantra of the Blessed Lady. Once washed, it should also be anointed. It should be fumigated with bhūtakeśī, gajāhva, śatrughnī, and priyaṅgu; these betoken the accomplishment of whatever one desires. Having kept a one-night fast, an intelligent person should attend to it. Then, at dawn and at night, one should kindle a fire and perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed mixed with one's own blood. By this very rite, no obstructors will arise while the scroll is being painted. It should be anointed further still, for otherwise, through the influence of the vināyakas, it will not be accomplished.

Then the vidyādhara himself, reciting the vidyā-mantra, should have the painter bathe. After he has bathed, one should also give him fine clothing, for as long as the painting lasts. The painter should keep the poṣadha vows, and while he is painting, tormas of many kinds should be offered at the edge of the cloth and four full vases should be set out. In the center a square maṇḍala should be made, and a full vase set there as well. All the vases should be adorned with flowers. Garlands of lamps are also offered. The vidyādhara, keeping the vidyā in mind, should burn incense.

Then the painter, having paid homage to all the tathāgatas and all the bodhisattvas, should lay down the Brahmā lines. Then again the vidyādhara, facing east, should approach and, before the painted scroll, perform eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of apāmārga.

Then the painter, having eaten the feast offered to the deity, should, with unmixed colors, paint the image of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Amitābha. He is golden in color and seated on a white lotus seat. On his right is the noble Avalokiteśvara, white like an autumn cloud, with a hanging crown of matted locks, three-eyed, with light rays streaming from his forehead, seated on a lotus. Behind him should be painted the goddess of the vidyā, clad in white garments, scattering lotuses. Right next to her should be painted Bhṛkuṭī, wearing white garments. On the right should be painted the Blessed Lady Great Compassion, blue-green like priyaṅgu, holding a jewel in her hand. All of them should be made one span of the Sugata in size, each seated on her own lotus.

On the left side is Vajrapāṇi, blue-green, adorned with every ornament, holding a vajra in his hand. On the left side the supreme king of vidyās sits beside a peacock. Beside the king of vidyās should be painted the Golden One and Vajrāṅkuśī. Vajramuṣṭi should be painted, blue-green, fully adorned with every ornament, holding a vajra. Vajradaṇḍa should be painted, holding a staff. Behind Vajradaṇḍa should be painted Vajramati, Vajrī, and the Goddess of Meteoric Iron. On the left should be painted the Terrifier of the Gods. Vajrāṭṭahāsa, wearing a serpent as his sacred thread, should be painted, and beside Vajrapāṇi should be painted Vajrasena, with a hanging crest, fully adorned with every ornament. All of them are each seated on a lotus.

The Four Great Kings should be made, and below them the four classes of vināyakas should be drawn in distorted forms, fleeing. Below them a lotus lake should be made. A nāga holding a lotus in his hand should be painted. All the hosts of gods should be painted scattering flowers. The great drums of the gods should be painted. Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Maheśvara, and the rest should also be painted with their weapons. The king of the vidyādharas, Anaṅga, should be painted. Beside the nāga king, the practitioner should be painted holding a censer in his hand.

Merely by painting this scroll one is freed from all evil deeds. Thereafter one accomplishes the deities with ease. Then the vidyādhara, living on alms food before that supreme king of scrolls, should recite the vidyā one million two hundred thousand times. Then the vidyādhara Anaṅga will appear to him in a dream, saying, "Son of noble family, accomplish it! Accomplish it!"

Then the vidyādhara should have a lotus made of the three metals, with a center of gold, petals of copper, and veins of silver, with a thousand petals. It is surrounded by four lotuses, and these four he should have made with a hundred petals each. Thereafter the practitioner, eating milk and gruel, should recite the vidyā.

Then, on the full moon, having kept a fast for three nights, with the scroll set up facing east, one should invite all the deities of the Blessed Lady onto the right side of the lotus. One should offer torma with great care. White flowers, agaru, costus, and saffron should be offered, and a hundred butter lamps lit. To the asuras, torma; to the yakṣas, white torma and butter lamps; to the gandharvas, torma and butter lamps; to the piśācas, torma, red flowers, and butter lamps. To the garuḍas, yakṣas, kinnaras, great mahoragas, rākṣasas, pretas, piśācas, vetālas, pūtanas, kaṭapūtanas, unmādas, oppressing spirits, and the hosts of mātṛkās, together with the vināyakas: meat, jambulika, svatika, and the like. To the yakṣas: meat, blood, stalks, fruit, and the three sweet substances. To the nāgas: parched rice, mung-bean sweets, and fruits. Foods of many kinds, lamps, and incense are offered to each separately. As the deity's awareness grows, one should make the offering seven times.

Then on the seventh day one should appoint a companion. After careful consideration, one should appoint someone who is grateful, always compassionate by nature, and free from illness. Then the wise one, having properly begun the rite, sitting on a consecrated mat of kuśa grass, pressing the stamens of the lotus with his right hand, should perform eight thousand fire offerings. The scroll will shake violently. The nāgas too will roar, but one should not be afraid. Again one recites eight hundred times. In the directions and the intermediate directions the sound of great drums resounds. The vināyakas flee in all directions, and the vidyādharas who travel together through the world systems come. The daughters of the asuras gather. The clouds rumble and roar. The gods too will come. All the yakṣas and all the kings of the vidyādharas gather. The earth quakes in six ways, and all the hosts of vidyās lose their potency.

Then the vidyādhara should quickly perform eight fire offerings with kindling sticks from the bodhi tree. Then the noble Avalokiteśvara will come together with the gods. When he has come with the gods, one offers him an arghya offering. As soon as he arrives, all the gods and all the kings of vidyās send down a rain of flowers. Then the vidyādhara, pressing the lotus, should recite the vidyā seven times. From each lotus, four koṭis of lotuses will arise.

All sixteen thousand vidyādharas, every one of them, appear seated on lotus seats. Then the vidyādhara should recite once. Then from the body of the Blessed Lady rays of light of many colors stream forth; they anoint the practitioner and then sink into the stamens of the lotus. Then again eighty-four koṭis of vidyādharas, seated upon lotuses, will appear. That lotus array appears adorned with the seven kinds of precious substances, pervading eighty-four thousand leagues on every side. There he becomes worthy of homage from all the tathāgatas and all the bodhisattvas, praised by the gods and honored by the kings of the vidyādharas. Surrounded by a hundred koṭis of vidyādharas he goes forth, and in an instant, a moment, a mere flash, he passes beyond seven buddha fields to the world system of Sukhāvatī. He takes birth at will and dies at will. In the time of the perfectly complete Buddha Kāśyapa there was a king of the vidyādharas called Overpowerer, and he accomplished this rite.

This completes the first chapter of the Blessed Lady, the great queen of vidyās.

Then the bodhisattva great being Vajrapāṇi, out of joy, told Avalokiteśvara the rite. A painter who keeps the poṣadha vows should paint the image of the Blessed One, yellow like gold, teaching the Dharma. On the right is the noble Avalokiteśvara, white like an autumn cloud, made in sublime form, with a white sacred thread over reddish-yellow, wearing an upper garment and lower garment of silk, holding a wooden staff in his hand. On the left is Vajradhara, blue-green, adorned with ornaments, brandishing a wrathful vajra in his left hand. Beside Vajradhara should be painted Vajrāṅkuśī and Vajramuṣṭi. Beside the noble Avalokiteśvara should be painted the heart of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality, blue-green like priyaṅgu and adorned with every ornament. Beside the Blessed Lady should be painted the supreme heart, white in color, holding a kurba in her left hand. Above should be painted the sons of the gods of the Pure Abodes, holding garlands of flowers in their hands. The great drums of the gods should be painted. Below should be painted one holding a censer in his hand.

Living on the three white substances, one should recite the vidyā seven hundred thousand times before the scroll. In this way the preliminary practice will have been done. Then, properly beginning the rite, one first takes realgar and washes it with milk inside a cloth. On the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, having made vast offerings to the scroll, one should set four full vases at the four doors. All of them should be adorned with flowers. All the rites are to be done with this very Blessed Lady. Then, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, one should wrap the realgar in seven leaves of the aśvattha tree, set it down, and recite until the noble Vajrapāṇi moves. Then the vidyādhara should offer arghya mentally. One should recite again until it smokes and bursts into flame. When it has flamed and one takes it up, one becomes like a sixteen-year-old with curled, coiling hair, surrounded by sixteen vidyādharas, and will live for eighty thousand years. When he dies he will be born in the vajra family.

No lunar date is required, no constellation is required, no fast is required. Take the corpse of a man who has died with his head laid toward the east on the shore of the ocean, and adorn it with scents, flowers, and so forth. The practitioner, facing east, with his mind focused on each part in turn, should recite the vidyā over fresh butter from a cow of like stock and pour it into the mouth of the corpse, and should recite the vidyā until the corpse stirs all over and rises. Then the vidyādhara should enter the ocean and stay in the water until the sun rises. By that alone he becomes like an eight-year-old with curled, coiling hair, and by merely forming the wish, all his requisites will appear. He will live for sixty thousand years. He will fly eleven thousand leagues.

One should have a Vajrapāṇi made from the wood of a lightning-struck tree, and a figure of the Blessed Lady She Who Goes in Equality, the heart mantra, made from priyaṅgu wood together with medicinal herbs. One should have an Avalokiteśvara made from nimba wood. All of them should be placed, each separately, on a pankan fruit. One should have the practitioner made kneeling, holding a censer in his hand. Then, wearing clean clothes and keeping a vow of silence, one should recite She Who Goes in Equality one million one hundred thousand times. In this way the preliminary practice will have been done. Then on the fifteenth day, having fasted for three nights, eating maṇḍalaka, one should offer a feast to the Saṅgha. Then at night, having made vast offerings to the Buddha, the Blessed One, one should afterward offer tormas of many kinds together with fruits and light a thousand lamps. Then, having performed the protection, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, one should make twenty garlands of utpala flowers, offer them into the right hand of the noble Avalokiteśvara, and recite until all is seen. Without being afraid, one should recite the vidyā again. When they move and one takes them up, one gains a vajra body blue-green like the petals of a blue utpala, becomes the good fortune of all the vidyādharas, and will live for eighty thousand years. He will soar eighty-four thousand leagues. When he dies he will be born in the vajra family.

On an even cloth a painter who keeps the poṣadha vows should paint the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī: the goddess should be painted blue-green and three-eyed, with her attire and ornaments complete. Below, the practitioner should be shown holding a censer in his hand.

Then the practitioner should recite the vidyā three hundred thousand times before the painting. Then, going at night to a charnel ground, he should set up the painting facing east and offer scent, flowers and incense, and to all the bhūtas on the ground. Then the vidyādhara, sitting alone upon a mat of kuśa grass, should take the soot of the great fat in a skull cup and recite the vidyā of She Who Goes in Equality. Then the vidyādhara should again recite the vidyā until it gives off smoke and blazes. He becomes like a second eye of the Victor, and like the weapon that is the spear of Maheśvara; all the great lords of the earth come under his power through the vidyā.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish eye ointment, one should go to the shore of the ocean. First, as the approach, one should bathe with water and milk and, keeping silent, recite the vidyā eight thousand times. Then the vidyādhara, clean and wearing clean clothes, should smear a patch of ground the size of a cowhide and have an image of the noble Vajrapāṇi consecrated there. Then he should take five skull cups, light them well with fragrant sesame oil, and make them smokeless. Then he should make tormas of various kinds and offer butter lamps; then he should place the ointment separately in the skull cups, and, having performed the protection before Vajrapāṇi, sit upon a mat of kuśa grass and recite eight thousand times. That eye ointment becomes warm. Then the vidyādhara should quickly recite the vidyā seven times in full. It gives off smoke and blazes. When it blazes, he takes the skull cup and goes to the abode of Vajrapāṇi. He becomes like a flax flower, an unprecedented lord of ninety million.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the vajra, a painter who keeps the poṣadha vows should paint with unmixed colors the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī and the Blessed Lady's heart essence, She Who Goes in Equality, blue-green like priyaṅgu and adorned with every ornament; the heart essence, moreover, holds a vajra in her right hand. Then the practitioner should climb to the summit of a mountain and, keeping silent, even without a companion, recite one million six hundred thousand times. Then on the fifteenth day, clean and wearing clean clothes, he should make a vast offering to the painting and light butter lamps. Then the practitioner, having performed the rite of protection, should sit upon a mat of kuśa grass and have a three-pronged vajra, eight finger-widths in size, made of kuśa grass whose tips have not been cut. Pressing that vajra with his right hand, he should recite for as long as it takes for light rays to come from the Blessed Lady. Hearing the sound "ciṭi ciṭi" from the vajra, he should not be afraid but should recite the vidyā again for a moment. When he hears the sound of a great drum, he should again recite the vidyā for a moment. The vidyādhara should quickly perform eight hundred fire offerings with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree smeared with butter and honey. Even after the fire offering is complete, he should recite until light rays come from the vajra. Having bathed at the three times of day, he comes to have hair that is curled and coiled, the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, like a second Vajrapāṇi, and a clear blue-green body, and he lives for an eon. When he dies, he will be born in the vajra family.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the hook, the practitioner should do the preliminary practice as before. Eating milk and barley meal and keeping silent, in a cow pen, on a bed spread with kuśa grass, clean and wearing clean clothes, bathing at the three times of day, he should recite She Who Goes in Equality. Then he should go to a river that flows to the ocean and, living on alms, enter water up to his waist and recite one hundred thousand times. He should offer food to the Saṅgha. Then a painter who keeps the poṣadha vows should paint an image: on the right, the noble Avalokiteśvara, yellow like gold and three-eyed; beside him should be painted the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī. The Vajra Holder too should be painted, entering into the uṣṇīṣa of the Tathāgata. All should be well placed upon lotus seats. Then the practitioner, having made a vast offering, should sit upon a mat of kuśa grass, as the Blessed Lady has commended. Then the vidyādhara should make a hook of kuśa grass whose tips have not been cut, take it in his right hand, and recite countless times until light rays come from the hook. Those light rays circle the practitioner and vanish, and by holding it he becomes a vidyādhara, and all the vidyādharas follow him. Holding the hook in his hand, he becomes the lord of a thousand vidyādharas. He lives for an eon, travels like the wind, has a divine body, and knows his own death. When he dies, he will be born in Sukhāvatī.

This concludes the fourth chapter, on the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās, spoken by the great bodhisattva, the noble Vajrapāṇi.

Then again Great Brahmā, lord of the Sahā world, approached where the bodhisattva mahāsattva, the noble Avalokiteśvara, was. Having approached, he bowed his head to the bodhisattva mahāsattva, circumambulated him, and sat to one side. Then again Great Brahmā said this to the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara: "I shall explain the rite of my queen of vidyās."

The bodhisattva said, "Excellent, Great Brahmā, excellent! For the benefit and happiness of all sentient beings, speak the rite of the great queen of vidyās."

Then again Great Brahmā spoke the rite: "Whatever son of good family recites or holds the queen of vidyās, him I shall always follow. Wherever he is born, I shall grant him the recollection of the Buddha, and he will always remember his births. He will not be born into a low caste. By reading it, his activities will be accomplished. When he goes into the midst of bandits, he should bring it to mind.

In fear of snakes, and when thunderbolts fall, one should recite it once. If one brings it to mind in the presence of someone who is angry, it bestows great glory. If one wishes to heal someone afflicted by a graha, one should consecrate it seven times and burn a measure of it; the person will be freed. If one wishes to break a seal, one should consecrate one's face seven times and then look; the seal will be broken. With white mustard seed the maṇḍala is bound. With the kīla the mansion is purified. With the kīla itself the boundary is bound. Wherever a vajra is present, in that place one should recite the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality, eight hundred times; the vajras will be bound. If one wishes to split a vajra, one should take poison, liṅga, karavīra flowers, and a ram's horn, in equal portions, consecrate them with the vidyā eight hundred times, and then smear this on the fire of the vajra; the vajra will be split apart.

If one wishes to accomplish wealth, after doing the preliminary practice as before, a painter who keeps the poṣadha should paint, on an unspoiled cloth free of hair, an image of the Buddha, the Blessed One, teaching the Dharma. On his right should be the noble Avalokiteśvara, white like an autumn cloud, wearing a crown of matted locks, with Amitābha seated on his head, adorned with every ornament. On his left should be the Vajra Holder, dark blue, adorned with every ornament, holding a vajra in his hand. Beside the noble

Avalokiteśvara one should paint the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī, dark blue like the priyaṅgu flower. Beside the Blessed Lady one should paint the Great Queen of Vidyās. Brahmā too should hold a water flask in his hand. Below, one should paint vināyakas of various forms. All the deities should be placed on lotus seats. The practitioner is as before.

Then, on the fifteenth day, the practitioner should make a protective cord from thread spun by a maiden and twisted, as before, under the constellation Puṣya. Then he should make vast offerings to the painted cloth, present tormas of many kinds, and light butter lamps as well. Then the vidyādhara, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, should consecrate the protective cord seven times and offer it into the right hand of the noble Avalokiteśvara. The vidyādharas also touch it with their eight right hands. One should recite the vidyā until it becomes warm, or gives off smoke, or blazes. When it blazes, one offers water for honoring with the mind. Then the vidyādhara should bring Brahmā to mind; by merely recollecting him, it becomes a wooden staff. One should strike it with white mustard seed over which the mantra has been recited a hundred times, and it becomes the protective cord. Then, recollecting the Blessed Lady, one should take it up. As soon as one has taken it up, one becomes a vidyādhara with curling ringlets of hair, having the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, with a body white and clear, a lord over the twelve lands. One goes to the world of Brahmā. When one passes from there, one will again experience the vidyā.

Another accomplishment: as before, the vidyādhara should recite the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality, in a charnel ground. Then, living on alms food, he should take a shroud from the dead and wash it with these substances: sandalwood, tagara, phushel tsé, bālaka, and rājahā. Having combined these substances, he should wash it. When an intelligent person has washed it, he should offer incense to it for seven days. Then on the fifteenth day the vidyādhara should go to the charnel ground, smear a patch of ground the size of a cowhide, and make offerings of scents, flowers and so on. Having made a torma for all the bhūtas, the practitioner should then sit on a skull, wrap himself completely in that cloth, make protection, and recite the vidyā until it becomes warm, or gives off smoke, or blazes. When it becomes warm, one brings beings under one's power. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. When it blazes, one becomes a lord of sixty vidyādharas, with curling ringlets of hair and a white body. Moreover, merely by wrapping oneself in that cloth in any way at all, one makes it one's own. At that time one will also give a share to the vidyādharas. When one dies, one will be born in Sukhāvatī.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish a rosary, as before one should recite five hundred thousand times at the ocean. Then one should make a rosary of kuśa grass and tie twenty-five knots. Then one should go to a charnel ground and smear a square maṇḍala. Then the vidyādhara should set down a corpse and a kyibung, and place the rosary between them. Having made offerings of scents, flowers and so on, one presents a great torma. Then the practitioner should sit on the corpse's chest and recite the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality. One should not be afraid of the various kinds of obstructors, which come like rain. As long as it becomes heated, one offers water for honoring with the mind, and then one should recite again until it becomes a true rosary. Again, the practitioner, while expounding, should recite the Blessed Lady seven times. Then light rays will issue all around, and one should seize the vidyā with mindfulness. As soon as one seizes it, one has curling ringlets of hair, the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, whatever form one wishes, and the radiance of the rising sun, and is surrounded by thousands of vidyādharas. In an instant, a moment, a split second, one goes to the world of Brahmā and becomes Brahmā himself. When one dies, one will be born in the world Vimalā.

Then, if one wishes to enjoy the daughter of an asura, one should live on alms food and recite the vidyā, She Who Goes in Equality, five hundred thousand times on a mountain peak. Then a painter who keeps the poṣadha should paint an image of the Blessed One teaching the Dharma. If, before it, one relies on all the mantras with the mind, the treasures of the asuras will come under one's power.

This concludes the fifth chapter, the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās, spoken by Brahmā.

Then the king of elephants, Three Pegs, approached the place where the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara was.

Having approached, he circumambulated the bodhisattva mahāsattva, bowed his head at his feet, and spoke to the great bodhisattva as follows: "Great bodhisattva, I shall explain the rite of this king of vidyās."

Then the bodhisattva mahāsattva Avalokiteśvara spoke to the king of elephants, Three Pegs, as follows: "King of elephants, it is excellent, excellent, that you explain the rite for the sake of sentient beings. Therefore, speak whatever you have to say."

The king of elephants, Three Pegs, said: "The practice should be done without regard to the date of the month, without regard to the constellation, and without keeping a fast. One should take the corpse of a woman, and in a charnel ground smear a patch of ground the size of a cowhide. Placing the corpse with its head to the east, one should worship it with offerings of scents, flowers and so on. Then, having put eye ointment into her bhaga, one should recite until it moves. Through this one will have eyes like those of the Victor, and will live for four thousand years.

"On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one should take the limb-born part of a man who has died, dry it, and wash it with an astringent. Having worshiped it with scents, flowers and so on, on the fourteenth day of the following dark fortnight one should go to a shrine of Maheśvara and make a torma for all the bhūtas. Placing it on the right side of the body of Maheśvara, one should put that limb-born part between two bowls joined mouth to mouth, and recite the vidyā eight thousand times. Then, as a sign of accomplishment, the joined bowls will move, and one should take them up while recollecting the vidyā. As soon as one takes them up, one becomes invisible. One travels a thousand yojanas and lives for five thousand years.

"On the eighth or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one should go to a charnel ground, take the five sense organs of a child who died before it was born, and make them into a pill. Having wrapped it all around with the three metals, one should then smear a maṇḍala, place the pill inside a skull cup, and recite the vidyā, She Who Goes in Equality, eight thousand times. By putting the pill in one's mouth, one becomes invisible. One will live for six thousand years and will travel a hundred yojanas.

"On an unspoiled cloth, a painter who keeps the poṣadha should paint the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality. He should paint the king of elephants, Three Pegs. He should paint the forms of obstructors facing downward, in distorted shapes. Below should be the practitioner, holding a censer in his hand. Then, before the painted cloth, one should recite three hundred thousand times.

"Then the vidyādhara should take the corpse of one who was of good birth. In the charnel ground he should worship the Blessed Lady with scents, flowers and so on, and make a torma for all the bhūtas. Guarded by a good companion, pure, and wearing clean clothes, he should stand with his feet placed on the corpse's forehead and recite the vidyā. At some point the corpse will rise up; one should not be afraid. Then the vidyādhara should recite over white mustard seed seven times and strike it with the seed, and it will be subdued. Then the vidyādhara should recite the vidyā and touch it with his right hand. As soon as he touches it, he will see a kharusta. He should recite the vidyā and take it up. As soon as he takes it up, he will have curling ringlets of hair and the appearance of a sixteen-year-old; he will be four-armed, an elephant vidyādhara surrounded by six vidyādharas, moving like the wind, and he will live for an eon. When he dies, he will be born in Sukhāvatī."

This concludes the sixth chapter, the Blessed Lady, the Queen of Vidyās, as explained by Three Pegs.

Then Īśāna, lord of the bhūtas, delighted by her vidyā, spoke a rite: "A painter who keeps the poṣadha should paint an image of the Buddha, the Blessed One. He should paint the noble Avalokiteśvara holding a lotus in his hand. On the left he should paint the noble Vajrapāṇi, resembling a flax flower. Beside the noble Avalokiteśvara he should paint the Blessed Lady, dark blue like the priyaṅgu flower, adorned with every ornament. He should also paint the sons of the gods scattering flowers. Below, he should paint the practitioner holding a censer in his hand.

"Then for one month the vidyādhara should eat milk and barley meal and recite the vidyā before the painted cloth. Then he should take the skulls of five heads, use three of them to make a hearth of three stones, and fill one skull with fat. Then the vidyādhara should make a torma for all the bhūtas. Sitting by the fifth skull, he should consecrate each white mustard seed seven times and perform eight hundred fire offerings. When that fire offering is complete, bubbles will arise. Pressing them down with his right hand, he should recite eight hundred times. Then he will hear the sound of weeping; he should not be afraid. Then the vidyādhara should quickly strike with white mustard seed consecrated seven times, and it will turn into a man. Recollecting the vidyā, he should say, 'Rise up! Rise up!' It becomes a svatika. Then the vidyādhara should consecrate realgar seven times and make a tilaka mark on it with that, and it becomes a lord of elephants. He should mount it. As soon as he mounts it, he will have curling ringlets of hair, the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, and a body white and clear; riding the great elephant, he will live for eight thousand years and fly eighteen thousand yojanas. When he dies, he will be born in the abode of the gods of Tuṣita.

"The practice should be done without regard to the date of the month, without regard to the constellation, and without keeping a fast. One should take the corpse of a man who has died, bathe it with scented water on the bank of a river, adorn it with new clothes of various kinds and with ornaments, and lay it with its head to the east. The practitioner, having a good companion keep guard, should sit on a mat of kuśa grass, consecrate white mustard seed seven times, put it into the corpse's mouth, and recite the vidyā. At some point the corpse's mouth will open. Then the practitioner, being fearless, should press down on its chest with his left foot and recite the vidyā until it lets out a fierce cry.

At some point it will give off smoke. Fearlessly, one should strike its forehead with white mustard seed recited over seven times. A snake will then be seen coming from its mouth. Without fear, one should touch it while recollecting the vidyā; as soon as one touches it, it turns into a sword. One should seize it while recollecting the heart mantra. As soon as one seizes it, one has curling ringlets of hair and the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, and becomes the unobstructed lord of all the elephant vidyādharas, living for sixty thousand years.

There is also the accomplishment of the short spear. As before, eating milk and barley meal, one should climb to the summit of a mountain and recite three hundred thousand times. Then the vidyādhara should mix ash from a charnel ground and earth from an anthill with milk; as before, eating milk and barley meal, he should climb to the summit of a mountain and recite three hundred thousand times. Then the vidyādhara should mix ash from a charnel ground and earth from an anthill with milk and make the figure of a peacock, measuring one span of the Sugata, and paint it with unmixed colors. Then he should go to a charnel ground, smear a maṇḍala with cow dung, worship with scents, flowers, incense and so on, and make a torma for the bhūtas. Then, pure and wearing clean clothes, he should sit on a skull, place the peacock on a second skull, and recite until the peacock moves. Then the vidyādhara should present water for honoring with flowers that have not fallen to the ground, consecrated seven times. Again he should recite the vidyā. Then they will come all together from the directions. Without fear, he should touch the peacock while recollecting the heart mantra, and it will turn into a woman. She will say, "Son, what shall I do?" He should say to her, "Dwell in my body." Then she will vanish into the palm of the vidyādhara's hand. In that very instant he has curling ringlets of hair and the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, holding a short spear in his hand, and all the vidyādharas come under his power, except those cakravartins who see him and gaze upon him. He flies together with them and roams through the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. He lives for an eon, and when he dies he will be born among the sons of the gods of Akaniṣṭha.

If one wishes to accomplish a lion, the vidyādhara, as before, eating only milk and keeping a vow of silence, should recite the vidyā five hundred thousand times as the practice of the vidyā. Then he should put wood struck by lightning in milk for seven days. He should knead white earth with sandalwood water, using the lightning-struck wood. Then, under the constellation Puṣya, the vidyādhara should make two lions. Afterward he should make vast offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha, and offer tormas of many kinds. Then the vidyādhara, pure and wearing clean clothes, should sit on a mat of kuśa grass, press the lion with his right hand, and recite the vidyā, She Who Goes in Equality, until the lion moves. As soon as it moves, it shakes greatly. He should recite correctly and, without fear, keep reciting the vidyā until the sound of the great drum of the gods resounds. Then the vidyādhara should strike the lion with flowers consecrated seven times. When it is struck all over, the lion roars a lion's roar, and other practitioners will surely take heed. Then he should recite the vidyā again, mount the lion, and go. As soon as he has mounted, all the vidyādharas scatter flowers. Riding the lion, he travels like the wind. When the lion roars, the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three fall from their seats, and the daughters of the asuras also come under his power. Surrounded by ten million vidyādharas, he lives for an eon. When he dies, he will be born in the world realm Vimalā.

A painter who keeps the poṣadha should, under the constellation Puṣya, paint with unmixed colors an image of the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī made of priyaṅgu wood. Before it, the vidyādhara, keeping silence, should recite the vidyā six hundred thousand times. Then he should take a corpse obtained from a charnel ground, bathe it with fine fragrant scents, bind it well, and set it facing east. Then the practitioner should worship it with flowers and so on, present a great torma, and sit on a mat of kuśa grass. Having covered it with a jewel and consecrated it seven times with the Blessed Lady's mantra, he should perform a fire offering of twenty-eight ladlefuls into the mouth of the vetāla. The corpse's mouth will open. The practitioner should quickly drive a khadira-wood kīla eight finger-widths long, consecrated seven times with the Blessed Lady's mantra, into its big toe. Again the practitioner should recite the vidyā until its tongue has stretched out a cubit long. Even if the sound of thunder roars, he should not be afraid. Then the vidyādhara should recite quickly and strike the vetāla's forehead with white karavīra flowers, and it will be subdued. On the tip of its tongue he will see a jewel, beautiful, wreathed in a garland of flames; he should recite the vidyā and take it. As soon as he takes it, he has curling ringlets of hair and becomes a sixteen-year-old cakravartin of the vidyādharas. Whatever he thinks of all comes about, except for birth and the exhaustion of the defilements. He lives for an eon, and the jewel adorning his head illuminates eight million yojanas all around. All the vidyādharas also come completely under his power. When the time comes for him to pass from this life, the Blessed Lady herself appears and urges him on. Saying, "Son, those powers of the jewel are exhausted; you should practice again," she vanishes. Afterward he will remember this queen of vidyās. He will not go to or be born in the lower realms, the states of ruin. At all times, this will grant him the recollection of the Buddha.

This completes the chapter of the Blessed Lady, the Queen of Vidyās, as expounded by Īśāna.

The four world guardians spoke the rite of the Blessed Lady: "Merely by recollecting this queen of vidyās, all obstructors are paralyzed. In this world realm there are those who know neither what is near nor what is far: those without Dharma, of sinful mind, of little wisdom, who kill living beings; the fierce, the ill-complexioned, the weak, the crooked, the hunchbacked, the thick-necked, and others with necks like a crow's; those who look like dwarfs, deer, camels or black yaks; those with yellowish-gray hair, bad nails, or the voice of a crow; and likewise the pot-bellied, the filthy, and any others tormented by disease. For these, the vidyā as it has been described will not be accomplished.

"By our words of truth, this is how, having first exhausted their former karma, they may then practice the vidyā: the old, the one-eyed, the blind, the hunchbacked, the crooked, and others like them. Again, one should have a Blessed Lady made of white sandalwood, one cubit of the Sugata in size, and have a painter who keeps the poṣadha paint it with unmixed colors. Then one should invite her to be seated on the shore of the ocean, bathe three times a day, eat alms food, burn guggulu as incense, and offer two million recitations. When the recitation is complete, one should perform eight hundred fire offerings of guggulu and kuñjika with the Blessed Lady's mantra. Then the karma will be exhausted."

Then the Four Great Kings, looking at the vināyaka, said this: "O vināyaka, listen! You must not approach the vidyādhara who holds this queen of vidyās."

The vināyaka said this: "Any vidyādhara who again transgresses the rite and, through conceit, fails in the practice, him we shall approach to obstruct, and we shall destroy even the merit he has gathered over a hundred years."

The king of the gods said: "O, O vicious vināyakas! To destroy you, I shall explain these medicines:

Moon-Bearer, Belly, and Kindly One,
Tiger-Slayer, and Four-Hands too,
Pig's Ear, Elephant-Caller,
Tangled-Conduct, costus, and saffron,
Together with iron filings,
Moistened with an elephant's urine:
Ground, then, just as one wishes,
The wise should make them into pills.
Flowers, lamps, tormas and scents;
After defecating and urinating, wash with clay;
Bed, seat and clothing tied up;
Scents, flowers, and all the rest,
Should all be well prepared with it. Otherwise
The vināyakas will seek an opening."

As soon as this was spoken,
All the vināyakas, their minds
Thrown into confusion, fled
From one another to all quarters, glancing in dread.
They will not cause obstruction again.
Wherever this supreme medicine is,
There they will not draw near;
Even within a hundred yojanas
They will not obstruct this one.
The accomplishment of all of this one's rites
Will come about.
Whatever vidyādhara, again,
Focuses evenly at the three times,
In that practitioner no one at all
Will find an opening.

A painter who keeps the poṣadha should paint an image of the Blessed One, yellow like gold, teaching the Dharma. On his right is the noble Avalokiteśvara, wearing a crown of matted locks, his body dark blue and adorned with a protective cord, holding a lotus in his hand. One should paint Vajrapāṇi, like a flax flower, holding a vajra in his hand and radiating light all around. Beside Vajrapāṇi one should paint the Four Great Kings with their weapons. Beside Avalokiteśvara one should paint the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī, dark blue like the priyaṅgu flower. Below is the practitioner holding a censer in his hand.

Then the practitioner, eating alms food, should recite three hundred thousand times before the painted cloth in a clean place. Then he should take the painted cloth, climb to the summit of a mountain, make a buffalo of black earth, make vast offerings to the painted cloth, and offer a torma to all the bhūtas. Then the practitioner should make protection, put on clean clothes, sit on a mat of kuśa grass, and recite She Who Goes in Equality. He should recite until light rays stream from the buffalo's right horn. Then he offers water for honoring with the mind. Then he should mount the buffalo. As soon as he has mounted it, he takes on the body of a god, surrounded by seventeen vidyādharas. He will fly sixty thousand yojanas. The daughters of the asuras will also come under his power. He will live for five hundred thousand years.

Having purified his body, he should make vast offerings to the painted cloth and tormas of many kinds. Then the practitioner should make a noose of kuśa grass, press it with his right hand, and recite until it blazes. He should touch it while recollecting the vidyā. When he takes it up, he has curling ringlets of hair and the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, holding a noose in his hand, surrounded by sixteen vidyādharas, and he will fly five thousand yojanas. He will live for fourteen thousand years. When he dies, he will be born among the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings.

If one climbs to the summit of a mountain, eats alms food, and recites She Who Goes in Equality ten million times, one becomes a vidyādhara. Surrounded by five vidyādharas, one goes without obstruction; in an instant, a moment, a split second, one travels to the Sahā world, and having gone there one remains for an eon. When one dies, one will be born in a buddha field.

This concludes the eighth chapter, the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās, spoken by the Four Great Kings.

Then all the kings of the garuḍas spoke the rite of the Blessed Lady. To cure poison: one makes colors with water that has dripped from leafy branches, snaps one's fingers, and, while dancing, recites mentally; by reciting seven times over white flowers, one cures the burning. With a thread one frightens the grahas. With guggulu incense one makes fangs fall out.

With jasmine flowers one drives away. By reciting over white mustard seed mixed with blood, one repels enemies. With cow's flesh one causes withering. With ariṣṭa leaves, dripping blood and nettles, one brings under control. With arka flowers one bestows wealth. With hundred-petaled flowers one makes the piśācas flee in terror. With a creeper one drives away a family or a household. The nāgas are dealt with by flowers of the nāga tree. With chaff one cuts off a vidyā. By this one will accomplish the vidyā of an opponent.

Pure and wearing clean clothes, one should bathe three times a day and change one's clothes three times, eat milk and barley meal, and recite one million times; the body will then be purified. Then, under the constellation Puṣya, the practitioner should paint a garuḍa with yellow earth, cow's urine and green pigment, and place a garland of lotuses on its neck. Having worshiped it with the three precious things, the practitioner should then smear a maṇḍala with the products of the cow and place four full vases at the four doors. On the four full vases he should paint the four nāga kings. Then he should take butter from a cow whose calf is of the same color, place it in a copper vessel, press it with his right hand, and recite the vidyā until it gives off smoke and blazes. If he drinks it when it gives off smoke, he becomes invisible, lives for fourteen thousand years, and travels a thousand yojanas. If it blazes, he attains the body and mind of a god. He brings relief to all. He is surrounded by ten vidyādharas. When he dies, he will be born in Sukhāvatī.

If one goes to a river that flows to the ocean, eats alms food, and performs a hundred thousand fire offerings of nāga-tree flowers mixed with curd, honey and ghee, the nāgas will rise. Then the practitioner, without fear, should place in the center a vase adorned with flowers, and on top of it place a wheel diagram. Then the practitioner should make protection, sit on a nāga seat, and recite the vidyā until light rays stream from the garuḍa. The garuḍa will circle the practitioner and sink into the crown of his head. He should take hold of it by reciting the vidyā. When he mounts it, sixty thousand vidyādharas will approach, and he will travel at will like the wind. Like the light of the rising sun, he puts all the nāga vidyādharas to flight for a thousand yojanas. Free of stain, he lives for eighty thousand years. When he dies, he will be born in the world realm of Sukhāvatī.

Having done the preliminary practice, the vidyādhara should then go to a charnel ground, smear a patch of ground the size of a cowhide with cow dung, worship with scents, flowers and so on, and make a great torma. On the eighth day of the following dark fortnight, he should go to the charnel ground, smear a patch of ground the size of a cowhide, and make vast offerings. If the practitioner then recites the vidyā eight thousand times, it will be accomplished. If he puts it in his mouth, he will become invisible. He will live for five thousand years.

This concludes the ninth chapter, the Blessed Lady, the Queen of Vidyās, as explained by the garuḍa.

Then all the hosts of mātṛkās, together with the yakṣas, rākṣasas, pretas, piśācas, kumbhāṇḍas, pūtanas and kaṭapūtanas, rose from their seats and approached the place where the noble Avalokiteśvara was. Having approached, they bowed their heads at the bodhisattva's feet and spoke a rite of the vidyā:

"It is to be done without regard to the date of the month or the constellation, and without keeping a fast; any vidyā at all is complete for it. In a charnel ground, on the right side of the body of Maheśvara, one recites the vidyā eight hundred times; if one then puts it in one's mouth, one becomes invisible and will seize the six portions of the earth.

"One should take a bamboo that has not been touched and wrap it with the three metals. Then, pure and wearing clean clothes, one should go to a charnel ground, worship with scents, flowers, incense and so on, and also make a torma for all the bhūtas. Then the practitioner should take a skull in his left hand, press it with his right hand, and recite the vidyā until it lets out a clamor. He should take it up while recollecting the vidyā; as soon as he takes it up, he becomes invisible. He seizes the six portions of the earth and lives for a thousand years. He takes his pleasure together with the daughters of the gods and the asuras.

"On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, one should take the tongue of a woman who has died and wrap it with the three metals; one then travels as swiftly as thought, like the wind. If, while keeping celibacy with this, one turns one's mind toward what one desires, one goes alone to that world realm and remains there for a great eon. One takes birth at will.

"If, pure and wearing clean clothes, one recites the vidyā in a charnel ground for six months, one becomes invisible and lives for five hundred years. One should grind it together with owl's eye ointment, make a pill wrapped with the three metals, and place it between two bowls joined mouth to mouth on the right side of the body of Maheśvara. Pressing it with the right hand, one should recite the supreme, immeasurable vidyā, and keep reciting until one hears a splitting sound. If one takes the pill while recollecting the vidyā and puts it in one's mouth, one becomes invisible and will live for two thousand years.

"One should take eye ointment, realgar, milk and lotus filaments in equal amounts and wrap them with the three metals. One should understand the procedure for the constellation Puṣya, and then practice.

"One who wishes to accomplish the piśācas should smear a maṇḍala the size of a cowhide in a charnel ground and make a torma of meat, liquor and so on. Facing east, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of human hair mixed with blood, all the piśācas will come. One should not be afraid and should not make protection, but should say this: 'Come under my power!' When this is said, they will reply, 'So be it,' and vanish. Every day they will give five coins each, and these too must be spent in full.

In a charnel ground, a preta called by its own name, Stainless, comes under one's power. In a charnel ground one should make an effigy and pin its feet with a ritual dagger. Then one should recite the vidyā (the spell). For this, too, one should smear a maṇḍala about the size of a cowhide, make extensive offerings, and recite the vidyā a hundred thousand times. In a charnel ground one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of sesame; for seven days one should perform the fire offering at night. Each day it gives five silver coins. If one performs a hundred thousand fire offerings of kumuda lilies smeared with curd, honey and ghee, one will certainly see it.

Having made an effigy of charnel-ground ash and sitting close beside it, one kindles a fire of arka wood; if one then performs eight thousand fire offerings of jasmine flowers smeared with fragrant sesame oil, one becomes invisible. If, by this very rite, one names them by name, one becomes a king of Lāñja or a minister.

To bring a woman under one's power, one performs a fire offering of atimukta flowers, and she comes under one's power: after seven days, whenever one thinks of her in one's mind, at that moment she comes.

Going to a charnel ground, one smears a maṇḍala and performs a fire offering with human flesh; on the seventh day, those seized by piśācas are freed by one's mere glance. In a charnel ground, if one performs ten thousand fire offerings of human flesh, all the piśācas, too, come under one's power. If one performs eight thousand fire offerings of mongoose hair, all the bhūtas, too, come under one's power. In a charnel ground, if one performs a fire offering of excrement, those seized by pūtanas are freed even by one's mind alone. If one performs a fire offering with blood, the ḍākinīs come under one's power. In a charnel ground, if one performs a fire offering of boḍḍaka, the piśācas will not come. If one performs a fire offering of snake sloughs, snakes flee.

Then the practitioner should make a torma and perform eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of arka. A yakṣiṇī of fearsome, changing form will come. One should not be afraid, but, keeping the vidyā in mind, say, "Stay! Stay!" At that she grants a choice of one among three supreme boons: to become one's mother, sister, or wife. As a mother, she does everything that is to be done for a son. As a sister, she gives one coin each day. As a wife, she sports with him, and he will live for five hundred years.

When a vidyādhara's practice has failed, he should do this. At night, clean and dressed in clean clothes, having made protection, he makes offerings to the Buddha, the Blessed One, to the noble Avalokiteśvara, to Vajrapāṇi, and to the Blessed Lady (Tārā). Then, facing east, he offers incense to all the deities of the vidyā, and the vidyādhara should perform eight thousand fire offerings of poison mixed with blood. He lies down on a spread of kuśa grass. If he sees a youth holding a short spear, then the gandharvas have spoiled his substances. When he sees a brahmin, then the gods have spoiled them. When he sees Vajrasena, then the vajra family has spoiled the substances. When he sees Nanda, then the garuḍas have spoiled them. When the asuras have spoiled them, then no cause is seen. When the nāgas have spoiled them, then he sees a king of scent elephants. When the ancestors have spoiled them, then he sees them. When impurity has spoiled them, then he sees Maheśvara wearing an elephant hide. When the yakṣas have spoiled them, then he sees Maṇibhadra. When the piśācas have spoiled them, then he sees a naked man. When the bhūtas have spoiled them, then he sees a cloud. Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of arka, he should perform eight thousand fire offerings smeared with ghee and honey. When the fire offering is complete, the substances come back into his hands.

The fire offering for the gandharvas is this: in a secluded place one smears a maṇḍala with cow dung and also offers a torma to the Blessed One. Then, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of kāmāja smeared with curd, honey and ghee.

When the fire offering is complete, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the vajra family, too, is this: one worships a stūpa containing relics with scents, flowers, incense and the like, and also performs the torma rite for the Blessed One. Then, if the practitioner, facing east, performs eight thousand fire offerings with pellets of guggulu, the substances come back into his hands.

For the garuḍas, one smears a maṇḍala in a charnel ground and makes offerings, and also a torma, as far as one's means allow. If one performs eight thousand fire offerings of karavīra flowers and the like smeared with ghee, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the asuras is this: one worships Maheśvara with various scents and also makes a torma for the Blessed One. Then, with the right side of the body turned toward the east, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of karavīra, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the mātṛkās is this: having offered cooked food and a torma of meat, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of rotten pork mixed with liquor, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the yakṣas is this: in the presence of Vajrapāṇi one offers tormas of various kinds, and then, facing east, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of arka flowers, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the piśācas is this: in a charnel ground one smears a maṇḍala, and if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of nimba flowers smeared with sesame oil, the substances come back into one's hands.

The fire offering for the bhūtas is this: one smears a maṇḍala with charnel-ground ash and also offers a torma as far as one's means allow, and if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of beef, the substances come back into one's hands.

For the pretas, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of nīmala, the substances come back into one's hands.

This completes the tenth chapter of the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās, the chapter on the characteristics taught by all the mātṛkās, yakṣas, rākṣasas, bhūtas and piśācas.

Even without having accomplished the vidyā, it serves for rites. When rain has not fallen, if one enters the water and recites the vidyā, rain will fall within seven days. For binding semen, it is done with a thread. For overcoming intoxication, with charnel-ground ash. For those who are bewitched, with lac. For one tormented by stabbing pain, one removes the pain with arjuna. With sesame oil, a vulture, and a cutting water knife, these three, one makes the fangs go in. With guggulu incense one drives them from their place. These things one can do even without accomplishment. Everything should be accomplished through this very Blessed Lady.

For instance, just as one keeps this as a master copy and reads it, so too this should be read by one wearing clean clothes, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass. If one reads this rite for seven days, there will be peace. If there is too much rain, one climbs onto an anthill and recites the Blessed Lady eight thousand times, and then it subsides.

The scents, flowers and incense that one offers summon all vidyās; they bind, paralyze, and cut; they slay all vidyās, terrify malicious minds, and bind mouths. With this one performs its rites. With saffron water one causes stupefaction. With a yellow substance one summons snakes. With white mustard seed, with what grows from the lotus root, and with fine flowers, one draws spirits out. With incense one makes them speak. With karavīra flowers one makes them enter the maṇḍala. Fumigating at once with agaru incense, one should apply these one thousand and eight rites of the Blessed Lady.

I shall explain the characteristics of the kindling sticks: root, middle, and tip. For the purpose of expulsion, one performs the fire offering with the trunk and the root. With the middle part, one who desires wealth does so. With the tip, it is for pacifying and enriching rites. For one who desires wealth: at the time of dawn the yakṣas roam about, and so it becomes the accomplishment of the rite of bestowing their wealth. One who wishes to expel, staying in the interval, should perform the fire offering of roots in the first part of the night. With sticks the length of a forefinger, smeared with poison and blood, one should perform the fire offering in a charnel-ground fire. After midnight the pretas roam about, and so from that one should accomplish fierce rites.

For the great accomplishment, one should perform the fire offering facing east, with kindling sticks a cubit long smeared with curd, honey and ghee. By that, the practitioner achieves his great accomplishment. For subjugation, one should perform the fire offering with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree, of this same forefinger length. If, for seven days at sunrise, one performs a fire offering of apāmārga kindling sticks smeared with blood, the person will die; it will not be otherwise. If one wishes to cause illness, performing a fire offering of pānāya pellets for seven days causes illness. It is accomplished by naming the person by name, and so it should be applied.

This is the eleventh chapter of the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās.

Then Vemacitrin, Lord of the Asuras, taught a rite of the Blessed Lady. At the entrance of a cave, in a charnel ground, the practitioner, wearing clean clothes, sits on a mat of kuśa grass facing the entrance of the cave and should recite the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality, eight thousand times. Everything will open from its place. One should enter without hesitation and, keeping in mind the vidyā called Dispeller of Asuras, should take what is there. Having recited over a woman with delight, one should touch her, and she comes under one's power.

Then the practitioner who wishes to do this with the three should climb to a mountain peak and recite She Who Goes in Equality three hundred thousand times. Then he smears a maṇḍala the size of a cowhide with red sandalwood, makes protection, sits on a mat of kuśa grass facing the entrance of the cave, and, with the vidyā She Who Goes in Equality, should perform ten thousand fire offerings of apāmārga kindling sticks smeared with poison and blood. Then, when the fire offering is complete, he should recite over the ash and scatter it. The three will come here. He should enter without hesitation, and when the asura maiden sees him, she comes under his power. Then he should take the substances of accomplishment: whatever he desires, he should consecrate with the vidyā and take. With the wheel he becomes the universal monarch over all beings and all vidyādharas, and this lasts as long as the sun, the moon and the stars remain. Likewise, with realgar, a veda, an axe, a paṭṭaka, a śakti, that is, a short spear, a sword, a sword hilt, sandals, a knife, a thread, an implement carried for worship, a rosary, a Dharma seal and so on, he lives as long as the moon, the sun and the stars. He bows to no one except the Blessed Lady, the tathāgatas, the bodhisattvas abiding on the ten grounds, and the saṅgha of the Blessed One's śrāvakas, and he becomes a divine universal monarch.

Then, another method: what blocks all these mantras of the Blessed Lady is white mustard seed.

Then Vemacitrin, Lord of the Asuras, taught the sublime, supreme secret. Going to the mouth of an asura cavern and living on milk and barley meal, one should recite the heart mantra of the Blessed Lady, She Who Goes in Equality, a hundred thousand times. One will see the asura maidens. They give a sword or reveal some other accomplished substance, and by taking it one becomes a vidyādhara just as one wishes.

This is the twelfth chapter of the Blessed Lady, the Great Queen of Vidyās, taught by Vemacitrin, Lord of the Asuras.

From the great Avataṃsaka of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, this is called "The Great Secret that Generates the Blessed Lady, Queen of Vidyās."

Then once more the great being looked upon the maṇḍala of the assembly endowed with everything, and with a completely pure intention, here in the King of Ritual Manuals, for the sake of accomplishing the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā, he spoke the great king of mantras, the vidyā mantra called Trailokyavijaya (Victorious over the Three Worlds). At that moment a ray of light called Perfectly Uniting All Nectars came forth from the heart of the great bodhisattva. That ray of light encircled hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of world systems endowed with everything, illuminated the beings there, and dissolved back into the body of the great bodhisattva.

What was it that was spoken at that moment?

namo ratna trayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya ārolika

This is the supreme heart mantra called Trailokyavijaya. The practitioner should certainly and without fail apply it in the rite of accomplishing the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā. It turns back all that is harmful, exhausts all evil, brings in auspiciousness, and is praised by all the buddhas. That is its mantra.

At dawn, rising from one's seat and having become clean, one should consecrate a handful of water seven times and drink it facing east. One's karmic obscurations will be purified. In the King of Ritual Manuals of the Blessed Lady, all rites are accomplished through pacifying. One will remember without being harmed, and one will be powerful, majestic, and blessed by the gods. Likewise, for enriching rites, one should do these things on another day. In between, for fierce rites, when undertaking the varṇata, one should consecrate the ring finger seven times; so too for pacifying and enriching rites. For fierce rites, one should begin it by reciting on the forefinger. Whoever performs a rite in this way will gain accomplishment. At the time of recitation, one should consecrate one's own heart with this. Its accomplishment is declared to be certain. The practice for the sake of Tārā should be done just as it has been taught, and it is certainly swift.

For the intelligent practitioner, as for all vidyās, I, the king of vidyās of great power, have joyfully proclaimed my supremely virtuous mantra vidyā. The practitioner, too, should make protection and purification for himself, and then, constantly, here in this great king of vidyās, here in this great King of Ritual Manuals, I shall explain some rites of the sādhana procedure of the great Trailokyavijaya, the method by which the Blessed Lady Tārā is accomplished.

Those who undertake the practice must, as vidyādharas, generate the mind set on awakening and proceed with clear faith in the Three Jewels.

Further, this is its rite. At a stūpa containing relics, on a mountain peak, or anywhere else, in a clean place, before an image, eating milk and barley meal, or entirely giving up the feast foods of the practices of the individual vidyās, making complete offerings, whether keeping the poṣadha vows or not keeping them, one should recite two hundred and fifty thousand times. Then the preliminary practice will have been done. Having made offerings, for the approach one should, on the full moon of Vaiśākha or the full moon of the month of miracles, make offerings and recite eight thousand times. The heart mantra will be accomplished.

Then come the rites. On the full moon of the month of miracles one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of agaru kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. With eight thousand flowers one will see the Blessed One. One should strike the image with the eight thousand flowers. Or else, if one again recites throughout the whole night, one will see the Blessed One. Then, having seen, one will always obtain five coins.

If for seven nights, at the three junctures of the day, one performs eight thousand fire offerings smeared with ghee, the king comes under one's power.

One makes an effigy of madana wood and adorns it with every ornament. Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of the royal tree, one pierces its feet with a skewer, and if one performs the fire offering eight hundred times at the three junctures, on the second day the person comes on foot.

One makes a śālabhañjikā figure six finger-widths tall out of aśoka wood. Staying on a mountain peak and eating milk and barley meal, one should recite three hundred thousand times. At the end, on the full moon, one makes offerings, fasts for three nights, places the figure on aśvattha leaves at a stūpa containing relics, and recites for as long as it takes until she comes. One should say, "Welcome!" If she says, "I shall grant a boon," she may become one's wife, sister, or companion. She provides food, clothing and coins for oneself and twelve others, and one will live for a thousand years.

When the moon is seized by the eclipse, one takes fresh butter from a cow of uniform breed and makes an effigy six finger-widths tall. Keeping to the prescribed food and fasting, one places it on aśvattha leaves and recites until the moon is released. For this there are three kinds of accomplishment. When it grows warm, one roams freely on foot, gains a life of five hundred years, and travels five hundred yojanas. One will certainly become invisible everywhere. When it smokes, one becomes invisible, does not touch the ground by twenty-four finger-widths, lives for a thousand years, and travels a thousand yojanas. The strength of ten men blazes forth, and one lives for two thousand years. Vidyādharas cannot overcome one.

One should perform ten thousand fire offerings of lotuses smeared with curd, honey and ghee. In the middle of the embers the form of Śrī (Lakṣmī), holding a lotus in her hand, appears. She grants a boon, and one should say, "Be my mother, sister, or companion." She will grant a thousand coins, and all illnesses will be completely pacified.

Observing the poṣadha vows and eating milk and barley meal, beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of barley and kindling sticks as before. All illnesses will subside.

Entering water up to the navel, one should recite three hundred thousand times. Then one sees all treasures. It shatters all magical devices. It paralyzes. It protects. It summons people as well. It revives the dead. It removes poison. It also pacifies. It summons. It gives a son to a barren woman. If one consecrates with it eight thousand times, one cannot be overcome by any other foe. If one makes protection at the king's gate, a boundary is sealed against enemies.

One should recite six hundred thousand times near a stūpa containing relics. Having clothed oneself in white cloth, one should recite until it blazes. One will fly together with a retinue of a thousand. One may perform rites of various kinds.

Bowing to the noble Avalokiteśvara, white as an autumn cloud, adorned with every ornament, wearing a crown of matted locks, and holding a white water pot, one should make great offerings to him and recite three hundred thousand times. It is accomplished by the mind.

In a clean place on the bank of a river, observing the poṣadha vows, one makes a stūpa containing the heart of dependent origination, makes offerings to it, and recites the heart mantra. In between, one makes stūpas again, and from sunset one recites until eight thousand recitations are reached. Then, by this rite, one becomes a universal monarch of vidyādharas. One goes to Sukhāvatī together with the noble Avalokiteśvara and sees the Buddha. One will remain for an eon.

If a vidyādhara wishes to bring a king or a king's minister under his power, let him perform eight thousand fire offerings of apāmārga kindling sticks smeared with ghee and honey, and the king comes under his power. To bring women and men under one's power, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pellets in the three sessions, and they come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings with pellets of agaru, and all people will be pleased. Even in Rājagṛha one will become the foremost of speakers.

Placing sweet flag in the mouth, one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. When it grows warm, it makes one keen of mind and courageous. When it smokes, it brings invisibility and radiance.

The vidyādhara should recite one million six hundred thousand times before the noble Avalokiteśvara. Living on alms, bathing at the three times of day, and sitting in the hero's posture, one should recite five hundred thousand times. Then the accomplishment one wishes for in one's mind arises: one dwells together with the gods and obtains whatever one desires.

Then, placing realgar in a white casket wrapped round with letters, one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. When it grows warm, one becomes keen of mind. When it smokes, one becomes invisible and radiant.

The vidyādhara should recite one million six hundred thousand times before the noble Avalokiteśvara. Living on alms, keeping silence, and lying on a spread of kuśa grass, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of nāgakesara. On the seventh day one obtains the maiden one desires. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings smeared with ghee; on the seventh day one becomes supremely keen of mind and courageous. If one performs eight thousand fire offerings with nandyāvarta flowers, women and men are roused.

To bring someone under one's power, one fasts day and night on the full moon, kindles a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree before the noble Avalokiteśvara, and performs eight thousand fire offerings of sesame; then the person comes under one's power. Having made pegs of khadira wood four finger-widths long, one plants them in the four directions, and the boundary is sealed.

One who wishes to accomplish an eye salve of realgar should eat milk and barley meal for a month, and on the eighth day of the dark fortnight fast for three nights. At a stūpa containing relics, before the image, one places it on four aśvattha leaves, pressing it down with the fourth, and recites until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. In a lawsuit, by reciting the vidyā and reciting it facing the opponent, one wins. If one recites in front of an angry person, he becomes thoroughly cowed.

If one wishes to bring a widow under one's power, one fasts for three nights on the eighth day of the dark fortnight and performs eight thousand fire offerings of white flowers before the noble Avalokiteśvara; she then grants whatever boon one seeks.

Binding the circle of all fanged creatures with white mustard seed: when one goes among lions, tigers, robbers or elephants, one should call it to mind. Observing the poṣadha vows, bathing at the three times of day, generating the mind set on awakening, abiding in loving-kindness, and wishing to benefit all sentient beings, one recites three hundred thousand times before a stūpa containing relics and an image.

Then one should have the noble Avalokiteśvara painted on fine, unworn cloth: white as an autumn cloud, seated on a lotus, holding a lotus in his hand, adorned with every ornament, wearing a crown of matted locks, with a lower garment of silk and cotton. Having installed the painting before a stūpa containing relics and an image, one should recite three hundred thousand times. Then, on the full moon, one makes great offerings to the Buddha, the Blessed One, and then fasts for three nights, and should perform twenty-four thousand fire offerings of ariṣṭa kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Rays of light come forth from the noble Avalokiteśvara, the earth quakes, the sound of great drums resounds, the flames of the butter lamps grow tall, the bunches of flowers sway, and the painting moves. Then one is accomplished. From then on, one's rites become auspicious. He bestows wealth. One delights in all the accomplishments. Everything remains under one's power.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish an eye salve, one wraps srotāñjana salve in aśvattha leaves and recites until the three kinds of accomplishment occur.

One should have a staff made of red sandalwood, sixteen finger-widths or ten finger-widths long. Before the noble Avalokiteśvara one should recite three hundred thousand times, until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. Then one should have it carry out whatever is to be done.

Beginning from the month of miracles, one who keeps the poṣadha vows should bathe at the three times of day, change clothes three times, and recite a hundred thousand times. One should have the deity painted on smooth cloth: white as an autumn cloud, holding a lotus in his hand, adorned with every ornament, at a stūpa containing relics, as though breathing in its fragrance, both hands filled with jasmine, wearing a crown of matted locks, with a white water pot, and holding a garland of lotuses. Then, beginning from the eighth day of the bright fortnight, one should make fire offerings of white lotuses before the stūpa containing relics and the painting, and recite one million two hundred thousand times.

Another rite: for the vidyādhara who wishes to practice, the king of rites for destroying the vināyakas is this. One performs eight thousand fire offerings of mustard seed smeared with pungent sesame oil, and they flee a thousand yojanas. Then one should accomplish the vidyā. Used otherwise, it destroys poison.

If one wishes to bind another's vidyā, one names it by name, consecrates the fringe of a cloth eight hundred times, and ties a knot. Even if the Buddha, the Blessed One, were to come in person, even he could not untie it until the vidyādhara unties it.

One who wishes for pacification should offer eight thousand jasmine flowers, and there will be peace. Living on alms, one should recite ten million times, and one will directly see the Blessed One Amitābha seated on a lotus seat. By reciting this vidyā ten thousand times, one destroys illness that has struck another. If, living on alms, one recites ten million times, one sees the Blessed One, and he grants three boons: power over all beings, invisibility, and entry into the dwellings of the asuras. If one climbs to a mountain peak and recites ten million times, all the gods come under one's power and always grant one sight of them. At a lotus lake one should perform ten thousand fire offerings of white lotuses, and the king comes under one's power. By merely reading it, everything is accomplished, except what is undertaken out of craving.

Fasting for three nights, one recites over a mirror and shows it, with ash from the fire offering, to a boy or a girl, and they see without end. Smearing a thumbnail with nail dye and scented sesame oil, one should show it to children. Filling a vessel with water, one should show it to everyone; everyone sees, and one brings all beings under one's power. By reciting seven times, one brings them under one's power.

If, having entered a village, one seeks food, one should recite a thousand times, and one will obtain food. In fear of robbers, by reciting one paralyzes them. By reciting ten million times, one becomes capable of every rite.

When the moon is seized by the eclipse, during that interval one takes a root of hakamika, presses it between one's joined palms, and recites until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. When the sun is seized by the eclipse, one should recite before the noble Avalokiteśvara until the three kinds of accomplishment occur.

If one goes to a river and, eating milk and barley meal, recites ten million times, all the nāgas come and come under one's power. Then the practitioner should bring forth the accomplishment of the nāga realms: in all the abodes of the nāgas he roams as he pleases, as if in his own home. Going to an abode of the nāgas and filling an alms bowl with milk porridge, one should recite the vidyā until a seven-headed nāga comes. They also give jewels. They bring out the royal treasures in the earth, or seal them. Then one should accept it wholeheartedly; if one does not accept, the five bonds of the nāgas will come.

With this very mantra one should offer twenty-one thousand recitations on the bank of a river. If the flowers on the great flowing river circle to the right, the vidyādhara should know, "I am accomplished." Then he comes and goes within the water.

One should recite ten million times at a stūpa containing relics or near a bodhi tree. One becomes a king endowed with moral discipline and perfect eloquence, lord of Jambudvīpa, a universal monarch of vidyādharas with great miraculous powers and great might, for as long as the practice lasts. This is the second. In this second, a lotus comes forth from the mouth of the Buddha, the Blessed One, with joyful petals and a delightful fragrance. By taking that lotus, one feeds on joy as one's food, is endowed with youth, has curling, coiled hair, has the appearance of a sixteen-year-old, and has more splendor, bliss and happiness than the young gods. One lives for a hundred thousand koṭis of years and flies.

One should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of vāsaka flowers, and one obtains a thousand gold coins. If one kindles a fire of khadira wood and performs eight thousand fire offerings of aśoka flowers smeared with ghee, the yakṣas come under one's power. If, while reciting, one performs eighty thousand fire offerings mentally, one becomes a vidyādhara whose mind is one-pointed, whose body is like fire, and whose strength and power to overcome others are unobstructed. Again one should recite ten million times; one will directly see Avalokiteśvara and obtain whatever one wishes. Through eight million recitations in the mind, one becomes invisible. One flies eight yojanas. One also travels a hundred yojanas below. One also brings things up out of the earth. One sees all treasures.

One who wishes to bring the yakṣiṇīs under his power should smear a maṇḍala beneath an aśoka tree and say, "Please partake of this!"

Furthermore, it becomes the rite of Trailokyavijaya. One should first carry out the preliminary practice, and, observing the poṣadha, one should bathe at the three times of day. Having made a maṇḍala for the Tathāgata, the arhat, one should recite three hundred thousand times. When the recitation is complete, still observing the poṣadha, one should make offerings as far as one is able, and on the full moon of the month of Āṣāḍha one should eat the almsfood prescribed by the Saṅgha. With very fine food free of meat, having smeared a maṇḍala in a perfumed chamber, one should make offerings of scents, flowers and incense to a reliquary containing relics, or to an image. Then, sitting cross-legged on spread kuśa grass, one should offer, with the almsfood, the immeasurable recitation of the rite. Up to this point is the second accomplishment. At that time one sees the Blessed One, and one obtains whatever one wishes and desires.

The rite of Trailokyavijaya, the rite of the great king of vidyās Trailokyavijaya from the root rite of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, is complete.

Then again the Great Being, once more entering into the meditative absorption that fully stirs all the vidyās, spoke the chapter on the vidyā of the ritual of the means of accomplishment. By reciting it, accomplishment is swiftly achieved: one is accomplished by oneself, and one's aims are achieved even when distracted. In short, however it is applied, just so will it be accomplished, and one should employ it accordingly.

Moreover, here the vidyā is:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo vidyādevatāya namo vidyādevatānāṃ nama sarvasyaiva vīdyākulavaṃśasye tadyathā sarva artha vighna vināśaya āhari hare hare vihare pihātejavimale abhaye calo stambhani puṣkare śuddhe mukke mukke vikurvite prabhāsvare ālokitebhyaḥ vilākala sarva satva avalokani svāhā

These rites are accomplished by this vidyā. At the time of approach and at the time of accomplishment, one should first of all protect oneself with it. Companions bound by the precepts, too, are protected in every way when water over which it has been recited seven times or three times is poured on the crown of their heads. Scents, flowers, incense, praises and the rest should also be done with this very vidyā. When one has taken up the painted cloth, it is also with this very vidyā that one protects the deities and the painted cloth on every side, keeps the site of the painted cloth unmixed with other colors, offers the welcoming water to the invited deities, and establishes them; and oneself and one's helpers should perform the binding of the liquid with it. Through this binding all vināyakas are crushed and every place is protected.

With this very vidyā one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with warm sesame oil. Oneself or one's helpers may do it, twenty-one times, without fail in whichever direction is used for the prior approach, for accomplishment, or for the pacifying, enriching or fierce rites. Or else, elsewhere, on an open plain, or on a piece of ground where the Blessed One is to be accomplished, or where other rites are to be done, one should first clean that place. In this way, for purifying the torma, protecting oneself, protecting others, pouring water, and in short for accomplishment and whatever rite there may be, one should perform the protection and the rest with this.

The protection vidyā is:

sarvanīyaṃ prayacchatha buddha satyena dharmastyena saṃgha satyena svāhā

With whichever is the first vidyā, one should apply it to the maṇḍala according to the maṇḍala ritual. With this vidyā one offers aloeswood incense; with the vidyā stated earlier, recited three or seven times, one does the cleaning; and having consecrated with it twenty-one times, for accomplishment one should recite the vidyā.

One should invite the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhīsatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavatyai ārya tārāyai arhatte sugandha mālya priye cantra cantramati gandhanulepanāṃ pratīcchi svāhā

With this one offers the welcoming water, and also scent and a seat.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya nama ārya tārāyai hili hili mili mili mahāprabhāye prahmasumanonuruha hara hara sara sara kara kara devi prasādha kuru pratīcchatha puṣpa svāhā

This is the flower vidyā; with it one should offer the flowers.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavatyai ārya tārāyai bodhisatvāya mantra manusmar sarva deva priye bhagavati avalokini siddha siddha prathāne buddha satyena dharma satyena saṃgha satyena svāhā

This is the incense vidyā.

This is the torma vidyā.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākaruṇikāya namo bhagavatye ārya tārāyai apratihate bhagavate āhare hare padmabhasini śītāṃge śetaphuje dhume dhume buddha satyena dharma satyena saṃgha satyena svāhā

This is the lamp vidyā. In the same way, one should apply this vidyā.

The vidyā of the ritual of the means of accomplishment of Tārā, the same for all, for the prior approach and for accomplishment, is:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai tadyathā āgama āgama gaganatala saṃpraco dityai sarva vidyā dhara viśodhani svāhā

Having recited this vidyā twenty-one times over water, one should sprinkle oneself from a vase or the like: this is the bathing vidyā. This same one is also the vidyā for bathing the deities.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai dhudhume dhudhume khukhume khukhume nāśuddha siddhikañcani śuddhikāre śucani svāhā

The practitioner should always recite this vidyā over his clothes once or seven times and then put them on. Otherwise the vināyakas will certainly show themselves. The practitioner must do this without fail.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai śāntiṃ me karohi śantimāte śiśānta niśānta kalyāṇiniśānta vijaye devi varade svāhā

Having recited this vidyā seven times over oneself, one should go to sleep. Then one will not see vināyakas in one's dreams.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavati ārya tārāyai sūryata upari travyaṃ dharaṇi bandhiti kardhaśodhani kucamālini śutraviśodhani svāhā kuśaviśodhani svāhā

When one has tied twenty-one knots with kuśa grass, the binding of the liquid is accomplished.

Having consecrated a mat of kuśa grass with this vidyā, one should sit down on it.

This is the binding of the maṇḍala.

This is the vidyā for rinsing the mouth (ācamana). The practitioner who desires accomplishment must apply this vidyā to himself.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai sarva devāsumante asaṃgatāre asaṃgavimu asaṃgatimukta vimukta vijaye nirmālyai aparikalpeni puṣpa gandha viśodhani viśoṣaya hidamaṇi damani svāhā

With this vidyā one should clear away the remains of the offerings.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai sarva satvā krita prikrita prau kdya krita sakaledase sakalo viśodhani svāhā

With this vidyā one should offer the food offering.

Having made offerings to the Blessed Lady with this vidyā, one should kindle a fire with khadira wood. If one then performs one thousand eight hundred fire offerings of nūlakavarti smeared with ghee, she will make revelations in dreams.

namo ratnatrayāya namo bhagavate amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya namo bhagavate ārya tārāyai ehi bhagavāna ārya avalokiteśvarā bhatīna ma bhayaṃ kara bālā nāma bhāyaṃ dada bhaktanā marthaṃ kara atraṇīnāṃ trayaka duḥkhitānāṃ saukhyaṃ kara mama bhagavate manukaṃsaṃ karehi bhagavāna āgaccha āgaccha imaṃ gandha puṣpa bali dhupañceta gṛhna tadyathā prasāde prasādevati mahā devi mahāprabhe sūryaprabhe amoghe amoghasati yaśovati amoghasaṃdarśana amoghavimalaṃ amoghahalaṃ cala cala sar sar hara hara traye himaṃ siddhirame dad svāhā

A capable practitioner should offer scents, flowers and torma with this vidyā, and at the time of approach and the time of accomplishment, or whatever else there may be, such as fruits, all of it should be offered with this very vidyā. With it one purifies the deities; and the virtuous dreams, the offerings, the praises, the practitioner's reading of the scripture, the work on stūpas and all the rest should be offered with this very vidyā.

With ash empowered by this vidyā, the practitioner's maṇḍala is bound.

With this vidyā, together with the mudrā of a handful of flowers, the deity is bidden to go: it is the vidyā for requesting departure.

namo ratnatrayāya namaḥsarva devani namo vidyādevānāṃ nama ārya avalokiteśarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya ehi bhagavate mahārakṣasi caseṭi īṭi miṣṭi asurapramardani ekajaṭi tirākṣasi sahita devi ma ca ma sā vihethiya kirisiti rākapāli karapari kāmārikaṃ para kālicchaṭa priye mahākapāli caṇḍali mahācaṇḍali mahācaṇḍali siddhi sarva artha sādhani sarva vighna praṇāsani svāhā

This is the rākṣasī called Ekajaṭī. In her presence one should smear a maṇḍala, and each day, having consecrated scents, flowers, torma and incense with this vidyā, one should make offerings to her. One should speak these words: "May all obstructors become unable to move against me! And deal with the obstructors for me!" For such a practitioner there will be no obstructors. Whatever accomplishment the practitioner undertakes will be free of obstructors. Otherwise, she crushes them.

These vidyās of the ritual of the means of accomplishment are accomplished through reciting the King of Ritual Manuals. However they are applied here, so do they accomplish all the practitioner's rites. Thus it should be understood.

The chapter on the sequence of the ritual of the means of accomplishment, from the root ritual manual of the Blessed Lady, the noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, is complete.

Then again the Great Being gazed upon the maṇḍala of the assembly, filled with all sentient beings, and, all sentient beings having become fully visible, he entered into the meditative absorption that stirs all the vidyās and spoke the vidyā of the means of accomplishment of the Great Being:

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya hāre svāhā

With this vidyā, living on alms on a mountain peak, one should recite the vidyā eight thousand times in three sessions at a stūpa or at home. Keeping silence, eating milk and barley meal or living on alms, and sleeping on spread kuśa grass, within three months or one month one sees the goddess Tārā together with the noble Avalokiteśvara. Whatever boon one asks for, whether kingship, invisibility, entering into caves, the transfer of treasure, or lordship of a country, whatever one asks for, one obtains, and always obtains. Even without having accomplished it, the vidyā serves for utterly destroying, for reducing to dust, for suppressing, for expelling, for bearing weapons, and for destroying all the mechanical devices of caves; and having protected oneself with it, if one goes into battle one is victorious. If one protects others with it, it performs every deed of accomplishment.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya podhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tāre svāhā

With this vidyā, at the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu, keeping a fast for three nights, whether one has done the prior approach or not, one should kindle a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree at a stūpa containing relics. If one performs eight thousand fire offerings of white jasmine flowers, one obtains a hundred thousand pieces of silver, or else one has a vision.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tuttāre ture svāhā

With this vidyā, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should make the excellent painted image described earlier. At the end, on the day of the full moon, having offered scents, incense, torma and flowers, one should recite it eight thousand times in three sessions. Keeping a fast for three nights, one should kindle a fire with kindling sticks of a tree with milky sap and perform eight thousand fire offerings of blue utpala flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then the sound "Accomplished! Accomplished!" will arise in the sky, or else the painted cloth will move. By such signs one becomes accomplished, and one obtains lordship over a country, a village, a town or a kingdom, each in turn.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā ture ture svāhā

Having recited this vidyā a hundred thousand times, when the moon or the sun is seized by Rāhu, one should place the substance inside seven aśvattha leaves, press it between one's radiant joined palms, and recite until it grows warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. When it has grown warm, one brings others under one's power. While it is smoking, one becomes invisible and seizes a sixth share. When it blazes, one travels through the sky. One will be born among the gods of diverse bodies, with unobstructed strength and vigor, the color of the rising sun, with hair curled and coiled, having the form of one who is twice eight years old, and living for ten thousand years.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā ture ture svāhā

With this, having made a ring of iron obtained under Puṣya, one should recite a hundred thousand times at a stūpa containing relics, perform the rite of scents, flowers and torma, and accomplish it. Taking it up while it is smoking, one becomes invisible. One seizes a sixth share. One will live for five thousand years.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tārāyai bhagavati svāhā

If one consecrates sesame oil with this vidyā eight times and anoints with it, it makes wounds vanish, takes away feeling of pain, and removes stabbing pain.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākaruṇikāya tadyathā tāre tāre tuttāre svāhā

Having fully recited this vidyā a hundred thousand times, one should scatter water over which it has been fully recited seven times. The jaws of makaras, turtles and the like are then bound.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalogiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tāre svāhā

This vidyā performs all the courses of action of the great rites. Having recited it a thousand times over sesame oil, one should have the oil given. If it is given for colic, for diseases of the private parts, for retention of urine, and for cramping of the loins, one becomes free of disease.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā ture svāhā

With this vidyā, by means of a cord, one frees people from the fevers of piśācas, from the fevers of bhūtas, and it serves to crush the grahas. For a woman in labor, if one recites it eight hundred times over sesame oil and anoints her navel or loins, she will be free of pain.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre muḥsvāhā

Having consecrated them with this vidyā eight hundred times, one should place kumbhira, vāraṇi, ananta, betaśi, brāhmī, sweet flag and brihati, well mixed with honey, in a copper vessel, and recite from the time the eclipsed moon is seen until it is released. By eating this one becomes supremely intelligent. When going into battle, recite this vidyā eight hundred times and tie it on the arm! One will have great strength.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tāre mulu mulu svāhā

With this vidyā, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight and keeping a fast for three nights, one should perform, beneath an aśvattha tree, a hundred thousand fire offerings of yutika and karṇikara flowers smeared with milk, curd and ghee. One obtains a hundred pieces of silver, or else one has a vision. On the full moon, keeping a fast for three nights, one should go to a river at midnight and perform a hundred thousand fire offerings with fragrant flowers. One obtains five hundred coins, or else one has a vision. With this, at the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu, at a stūpa containing relics, one should grind somarāja fruits into a fine powder and make pills mixed with ghee and honey. Wrapping them inside seven aśvattha leaves and pressing them with the hand, one should recite until they blaze. Eat them! One will retain whatever one hears.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tadyathā tāre tāre ture ture dara dara svāhā

With this vidyā, keeping a fast day and night, one should perform the rite of offering in the presence of the Blessed One. Then, going to a river that flows to the ocean, eating milk and barley meal and keeping the poṣadha in that place, one should offer a hundred thousand white lotuses in bloom. One will see treasures.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhaya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā tāre tāre tuttāre tuttāre svāhā

This is the vidyā of the noble Tārā called She Who Is Endowed with Eloquence.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāyi arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākaruṇikāya tāre tāre tuttāre tuttāre svāhā

This is the vidyā of the noble Tārā called Bestower of Twofold Light.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya tāre ture ture svāhā

This is the heart essence of the Lamp.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā tāre tāre tuttāre svāhā

This is the vidyā of the noble Tārā called Accomplisher of All Great Rites.

Then, with these vidyās, there is a partial ritual of supreme accomplishment: however they are applied, just so do they accomplish. Thus it should be understood just as it is. In short, for great dangers and for minor rites as well, accomplishment comes through reciting them. In this ritual too, one who wishes to accomplish the vidyā should purify the whole body with the five products of the cow, using that vidyā, and, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, should recite eight thousand times in three sessions in the manner described.

or else, up to the full moon, even a hundred thousand times will do. Then the prior approach will have been accomplished. After that, at the end, keeping a fast day and night and making vast offerings, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings into a fire of khadira wood, using kindling sticks of black aloeswood six finger-widths long smeared with curd, honey and ghee, or smeared with turuṣka sesame oil. One then becomes capable of all rites.

Then one turns to the rites. At the end, keeping a fast for three nights, one should consecrate a thread spun by a maiden ten thousand times, at a stūpa containing relics or in one's own house. If one ties it on one's arm, one becomes invisible.

If one installs the painted cloth at a stūpa containing relics, kindles a fire with khadira charcoal and performs fire offerings of thirty thousand lotuses, one sees the goddess in her own form. Whatever one asks for, one obtains.

Beginning on the first day of the month and continuing up to the fifteenth, keeping a fast for three nights, one should make vast offerings to a stūpa containing relics. If one then kindles a fire with kindling sticks of udumbara and performs a thousand fire offerings with oblations of ghee, one obtains a village.

At a river that flows to the ocean, one should have a thousand stūpas made. Each day one consecrates them at the stūpas eight thousand times and offers scents, flowers and the like to them, until the last stūpa blazes; then one should know that the Blessed One has come. When the Blessed One comes, the earth shakes and a fragrant breeze arises. As long as she remains near in her own form, one should recite. She grants whatever boon one asks for. In the presence of the Blessed One one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of pieces of khadira leaves. Each day one obtains a village.

Going to a wilderness, one should recite the vidyā ten million times. Living on alms, one should perform twenty thousand fire offerings with the dung of wild cattle smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then the gods will come, having taken the form of does; one should not be afraid of them. They will also bestow treasure, and one should accept it. One should say, "Enjoy it yourself!" They give kingship, wealth, grain and jewels; one should always dedicate these to the Three Jewels and offer them to the Blessed One.

Having entered a wilderness, one should recite the vidyā a hundred thousand times. If, in the presence of the Blessed One installed on aloeswood, one performs a thousand fire offerings of patsalaṇḍika wood smeared with curd, honey and ghee, a tawny wish-granting cow will come. One should again perform twenty thousand fire offerings of patsalaṇḍi. When it has come, it is accomplished, and it gives milk for a thousand years.

In front of the painted cloth described earlier, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of jasmine flowers smeared with ghee and honey. Within six months one obtains a thousand gold coins, or else more than a thousand paṇas. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of kumuda lilies. Through devotion to stūpas containing relics and to the Buddha, the gods grant boons.

Having made offerings to the noble Avalokiteśvara, one should consecrate white mustard seed seven times and scatter it in battle; and by reciting this same vidyā a thousand times one becomes able to bring all beings under one's power.

On the thirteenth day of the bright half of the fortnight of miracles, having made offerings of scents, flowers and incense, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings with blossoming flowers and oblations of ghee. Taking the ash, one makes a mark on the foreheads of others and enters villages and towns; all come under one's power.

From the fourteenth of the dark half up to the fifteenth, keeping a fast for one day, one should smear a square maṇḍala beneath a vaṭa tree, offer scents and incense, make offerings to the noble Avalokiteśvara, and offer torma to the yakṣas. Then one should take a human bone and have a trident made of it. Throwing it seven times with the left hand, and keeping a fast for three nights, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings of jasmine flowers, the trident will blaze. Then one becomes accomplished, and whatever one emanates at will comes to be.

In a temple, when the moon or the sun is seized by Rāhu, at a stūpa containing relics or in a house of images, one should take one palam of ghee from a tawny cow with a calf of the same color, and place it in a golden vessel at the stūpa containing relics. Having made offerings to the Blessed One, one should cover it from above with kuśa grass, so as not to look at the moon, and recite. While it is warm, one should drink it: one brings all beings under one's power. When it has thickened, one should drink it: one becomes invisible. When it is blazing, one should drink it: one travels through the sky.

For six months, having done the preliminary practice, eating cow's urine and barley meal, one should practice the vow of silence. By constantly reciting the vidyā of the Blessed Lady, one obtains a hundred gold pieces without asking.

One should begin in the fortnight of miracles and continue for a year. Making offerings in the presence of the noble Avalokiteśvara and likewise presenting scents, flowers and incense, and observing the eightfold poṣadha, when the year is complete one will be accomplished. The Blessed One binds the painted cloth.

Having made offerings to the Blessed One, from the first day of the month up to the full moon one should make especially abundant offerings and live on alms; then the words "It is accomplished!" are uttered. By performing eight thousand fire offerings with oblations of ghee, one's adversaries are pacified.

In the fortnight of miracles, having made offerings to the Buddha, the Blessed One, and likewise presented scents, flowers, incense and the like to the noble Avalokiteśvara, one should perform fire offerings of a hundred thousand flowers of the conch-flower plant smeared with iguta oil. Villages, towns, regions, elephants, horses, cattle and buffalo come under one's power.

Then again, if one wishes to bring down a divinatory vision (prasena), for seven nights one should eat milk and barley gruel. For one night, observing the poṣadha fast, one should fill a lamp to the brim with pure ghee, light the lamp with fresh white butter, and show it to a boy or a girl. In that same place, having set up the painted image, one should sleep on a spread of kuśa grass. In a dream one sees twenty thousand measures of wealth. Half of it should be devoted to the Three Jewels; so it is said.

Before the painted image, beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight until the full moon, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings each day. One should make offerings with scents, flowers, incense and the like. At the end, fasting for three nights and keeping the vow of silence, one should recite the vidyā; then, in the fortnight of miracles, one should go to a highway and stay at a dwelling of bhūtas. One should say, "Bestow!" Taking a measure of white mustard seed and empowering it with mantra twenty-one times, one should scatter it in the ten directions and below. Then the supreme is revealed to oneself.

Likewise, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, one should enter a temple and recite the vidyā a thousand times before the Blessed One. Having made offerings of scents, flowers and the like and performed the torma rite, one then sees in a dream the Blessed One wearing a crest of matted locks.

In the bright fortnight of the month of Vaiśākha, eating milk and barley gruel, one should make offerings of scents, flowers and the like to a stūpa containing relics, and hold a feast each day. Four vases full of water, filled completely with all the medicines and seeds, should be set out. Each night one should empower them eight thousand times, and then bathe a boy and a girl, until young are born in a crow's nest. The aim of kingship or the aim of wealth is accomplished within half a month.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, having worshiped the Blessed Lady and presented scents, flowers, incense and the like, one should kindle a fire with kindling sticks from a milky-sap tree and perform eight thousand fire offerings of hundred-petaled flowers. For a month, inexhaustible food and drink will appear.

Taking ash from a charnel ground, one should recite over it seven times and place it on one's own forehead or on the head of another; if one then enters a village, everyone comes under one's power. By recitation one frees from bonds. It breaks shackles. It wears through seven layers of hide.

One should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of mālikā flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Eating cow's urine and barley gruel, within six months one obtains as many coins as one wishes.

Beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, one should perform a thousand fire offerings of the hearts of blue utpala lotuses; pronouncing the person's name, within seven days that person comes under one's power. One should perform fire offerings with campaka and karṇikā flowers at the three times of day; if one pronounces a name, whomever one wishes comes under one's power.

In the fortnight of miracles, eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite eight thousand times at the three times of day, and before the painted image perform three hundred thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of aloeswood. On the fifteenth one should fully undertake the practice and recite until the Blessed One comes. When the earth trembles, or the tip of the lamp flame grows, or the painted image moves, it is accomplished. If the words "It is accomplished!" are uttered, one obtains kingship or lordship over a region.

Having done the preliminary practice, at a stūpa containing relics, before the noble Avalokiteśvara, within six months one obtains five thousand on each occasion. Having made offerings to a stūpa containing relics and recited a hundred thousand times, one obtains a thousand pieces of silver. One should recite a hundred thousand times at a stūpa containing relics; all one's desires will be granted.

One who wishes to pacify all illnesses should empower eight thousand times a thread spun by a maiden, then take it and wind it around oneself; one obtains good fortune. Entering a river that flows to the ocean, one should recite eight thousand times over black sesame; likewise with a thread, with sesame and with charcoal.

At a stūpa containing relics, beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, on the fifteenth, having fasted for three nights, one should kindle a fire with udumbara wood and perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One becomes the lord of five districts.

Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree, one should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of sesame smeared with curd, ghee and honey. Having fasted for three nights on the fifteenth, if those sesame seeds scatter in every direction, then it is accomplished, and one brings all sentient beings under one's power.

First one should recite a hundred thousand times before the noble Avalokiteśvara. Then, when the moon is seized by Rāhu, having offered sesame oil seventy times, one should recite over it until bubbles appear. If one drinks it, one will retain whatever one hears.

Having recited eight thousand times over kunduru resin and taken it, one obtains a village. One should recite eight hundred times each day before the noble Avalokiteśvara; one becomes endowed with prosperity. If one smears kindling sticks of apāmārga with curd, honey and ghee and performs eight thousand fire offerings each day, one obtains a village.

Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of the bahuputrā plant, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of sweet flag. With that ash one should make a mark on the forehead. One becomes invisible. If this does not happen, one should perform the practice again, up to three times.

When the moon is seized by Rāhu, one should go to the bank of a river, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of bilva, and perform a hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva flowers smeared with ghee; then a young yakṣa will come. At midnight, having recited the vidyā a thousand times, one of them comes, and he does whatever one asks of him in words, whether treasures or making one a lord of wealth.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, one should worship the Blessed One with scents, flowers, incense and the like; then on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight one should perform the torma rite and recite the vidyā eight thousand times. The piśācas come. One should say, "Dig up treasure!" Then they bestow treasure. Having taken it, one should oneself offer it to the Three Jewels.

Likewise, for the rite of binding the painted image as well, one should kindle a fire with wood of the beleric myrobalan tree before the Blessed One, and each day perform a thousand fire offerings of sesame and thick rice gruel. To bring a minister under one's power, he comes under one's power through a fire offering of white mustard seed. Through a fire offering of lac and resin, the king comes under one's power. To bring women and men under one's power, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of chaff. Kindling a fire with wood of the chebulic myrobalan tree before the Blessed One, one should perform a thousand fire offerings each day with torchwood; one obtains a hundred coins. Living on alms, one should perform fire offerings of palāśa each day at the three times of day; one obtains a hundred pieces of gold each time. Going to the ocean, one should recite the vidyā a hundred thousand times; then it gives jewels. They should be taken, and they must be devoted to the Three Jewels.

With this very mantra, on the full moon of the month of Vaiśākha, one should recite without interruption through the whole night. At the foot of the bodhi tree, having worshiped the Blessed One, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of apāmārga kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. She reveals herself, and by means of white mustard seed one becomes free.

If one wishes for pacification, by performing eight hundred fire offerings with oblations of parched rice, there will be pacification. If one wishes for increase, one should kindle a fire with kindling sticks from a milky-sap tree and perform eight hundred fire offerings of sesame and thick rice gruel in three sessions. For three days, kindling a fire with mango kindling sticks, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of dūrvā grass and the thorny plant. One becomes the foremost speaker among those who wish to debate. Each day, having performed fire offerings of moist grain and chaff with the left hand, if one pronounces a person's name, within seven nights that person comes under one's power.

Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of the royal tree, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of sesame and thick rice gruel at the three junctures of the day. For three days, kindling a fire with mango kindling sticks, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of dūrvā grass and the thorny plant. Within seven days great men come under one's power.

Eating milk, cow's urine, barley gruel and alms, or constantly keeping the vow of silence, being pure and wearing clean clothes and garments of bark, one should undertake the practice. In a clean place, free from the sound of the pestle, one should take earth from both banks of a river and make four lumps of earth for a site seven cubits wide; in the center one should make a thousand-petaled lotus. Upon it one should set a wheel made of the five metals, measuring one span of the Sugata, and one should practice in the center of the maṇḍala, before the painted image. Having worshiped with fragrant scents and with white and red sandalwood, and having offered māndārava flowers, incense and a hundred garlands, one should make offerings to the Blessed One of scents, flowers, incense and the like. One should offer seven rows of ghee lamps. In the four directions one should light four vessels of ghee. In the four directions one should set four vases filled with all the seeds, having placed jewels inside them. One should offer incense of aloeswood, kunduru resin, pounded śrīveṣṭaka and guggulu. Having performed the torma rite, one should offer in the four directions, with what was stated before, curd rice together with the first portion. In the south one should give ni na bhu taktra ra, that is, buttermilk, mixed with water. In the north one should make offerings with a torma filled with milk broth. One should let offerings flow without interruption to all sentient beings in the four directions.

Kindling a fire with palāśa kindling sticks, smearing apāmārga kindling sticks with ghee and empowering them seven times, one should perform eight hundred fire offerings. The one whose name is pronounced comes under one's power. Kindling a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree, one should make an effigy of salt, and, beginning from the head and going down to the feet, empowering each oblation seven times, one should perform eight thousand oblations. The king whose name is pronounced comes under one's power.

On the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, observing the eight-branched poṣadha and fasting day and night, one should smear a maṇḍala the size of a cowhide with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground. Before a stūpa containing relics and at the feet of the noble Avalokiteśvara, one should take, in a vessel of gold or silver, ghee from a tawny cow whose calf is of the same color, churned by a maiden, and sit on a mat of kuśa grass. Holding the vessel in the left hand, one should stir it with the ring finger of the right hand until it becomes warm. Then one should drink it; one's mind becomes clear. Hearing something once, one retains what one has heard. In this rite, if smoke arises, one gains the power to bring others under one's sway; if it blazes, one becomes invisible.

One who wishes to pacify illness in all the limbs should, observing the poṣadha, begin on the eighth day of the bright fortnight in the morning. Facing the east and the other directions, one should smear a maṇḍala the size of a bow and set bricks for the patient in the center. In the four directions one should recite eight hundred times over four vases filled with water and set them down. On the bricks one should lay a cloth dyed with lac. It is to be wound round with thread of five colors spun by a maiden and filled with fragrances. Outside one should make a maṇḍala. In the four directions one offers tormas of liquor and meat. Having worshiped with fragrant flowers, one offers the smoke of guggulu. A copper vessel filled with ghee should be set down. Then, holding green kuśa grass, one should brush the patient, who is dressed in white, all the way down to the feet. One should throw the kuśa onto the ghee. One should do this a hundred and eight times. Then, after the ghee has been eaten, one should examine the patient. Then one should take the green kuśa grass and set it down while reciting. Having provided vessels and clothes that have been purified, one should have the patient bow at the feet of all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Then, combining the four, priyaṅgu, nāgakesara and madhuka, in equal measure, if the patient eats the finest food together with ghee, he will naturally remain free of illness.

Having empowered a blue thread seven times, one should tie it around the waist. It pacifies spreading swellings. Likewise one should tie it around the neck; difficulty in breathing is pacified.

Observing the poṣadha, one should smear a maṇḍala before the noble Avalokiteśvara, worship with fragrant flowers, and offer ghee lamps. Then one should kindle a fire well with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree. Having kindled it, one should perform a fire offering of eight thousand oblations of lac and resin, each empowered seven times. It pacifies illness. With the vidyā one pacifies obstructors.

One who wishes to do so should take earth from both banks of a river that flows to the ocean and make a hundred and twenty-one figures of various kinds, with the faces of lions, tigers, pigs, sheep and so on. Then, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, observing the poṣadha, one should stretch a red canopy at night in a clean place and properly begin the rite. One should place the obstructors on fourteen cloths dyed with lac. In the center one should place the vināyaka, chief of the obstructors. With powders of five colors, each empowered once, one should make seven maṇḍalas. Having worshiped with red scented flowers, one offers fourteen ghee lamps. One offers guggulu incense. One offers fourteen tormas with meat. One should also scatter fourteen portions of lac juice. Then, with a red thread empowered seven times, one should bind the boundary marks. One should also bind the bhūtas and the king of obstructors. Then, kindling a fire with udumbara kindling sticks and saying, "The obstructors are to be bound," one should perform eight thousand fire offerings to those of the maṇḍala with the syllables svāhā. Thereupon the obstructors and vināyakas become bound.

When one is accomplishing any of the vidyās, the obstructors work their deceptions. Therefore, of the obstructors and vināyakas, all the obstructors should be put into a single earthen vessel, and into another the great vināyaka. Then one should offer all kinds of flowers to all the obstructors, and offer red sandalwood and red karavīra flowers to the great vināyaka. To all the obstructors one offers incense of all substances. To the great vināyaka one offers guggulu incense. One offers it mixed with ghee. Then one should put each of them into a pit as deep as the navel. In this way all the obstructors cease to be.

Observing the poṣadha, on the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, at a stūpa containing relics, one should smear a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground and worship with flowers, scents, incense, ghee lamps and the like. Then, kindling a fire with udumbara wood, one should perform a fire offering with kindling sticks of the brahma tree; if one eats what has been offered to the deity, one's mind becomes clear. If one performs a fire offering of milk, brahmins come under one's power. If one performs a fire offering of what has been offered to the deity, kṣatriyas come under one's power. If one combines barley, curd and what has been offered to the deity and performs a fire offering, vaiśyas come under one's power.

If one recites while looking at an enemy, he becomes paralyzed. Water empowered seven times brings everything down and brings wealth. It is also smeared on all poisons. Having made a pill of refined collyrium and empowered it seven times, one removes eye disease. One should tie a thread on the sick person; no grahas will arise. By tying the topknot one protects oneself. With ash the maṇḍala is bound. By reciting seven times over a clod of earth, the directions are bound.

For a woman who cannot bring forth her child, one should recite thoroughly over sesame and give it to her; she will give birth easily. When, through some confusion, the term of the months in the womb has passed, she should bathe; one should empower a hundred and eight times milk from a cow whose calf is of the same color and give it to her to drink, and she should eat the finest food mixed with ghee. Then she will give birth to a child. One should perform a hundred and eight fire offerings of bahuputrā. One portion of the ash each should be mixed thoroughly into four vases of water, and these should be set down.

Having recited eight hundred times over sweet flag and tied it to the right hand, for as long as it is worn one becomes supreme among all speakers. If one performs eight thousand fire offerings of aparājitā flowers, one becomes invincible to others in battle. Having tied knots in a thread spun by a maiden and empowered it seven times, one should tie it on the hand. Poisons, whether stationary or moving, will not arise. Then, pronouncing the name of the fanged one that is vicious, one empowers water seven times; by drinking a handful of that water, even one who has died in this way rises up. Likewise, having empowered it fourteen times, one should give it to drink. Even the bite of Takṣaka is to be healed. Having empowered the dregs of liquor seven times, one should give it in the case of a death, if the child does not come forth.

Then the Great Being again entered into the samādhi called Fully Urging All Vidyās and spoke the general vidyā of the means of accomplishment:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya rijuke tāre śānte tuttāre anabhi sāle ture svāhā

This is called the noble Tārā, Tārā of the Crown. With this vidyā, one should enter the water of a river that flows to the ocean up to the shoulders and recite the vidyā a hundred thousand times, until one sees an opening in the disk of the sun in the sky. By doing this the rite is accomplished. If one does not see it, one should practice again. Then, having gone downstream seven times, one should perform the rite of scents, flowers, incense and torma, and, pressing down with the right hand, recite through the whole night, until the words "I breathe out" are spoken. Each day she gives a hundred pieces of silver, and these too should be spent entirely.

This is called the noble Pure Tārā. With this vidyā one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of the dung of a forest cow smeared with curd, honey and ghee. At the three times of day one obtains a hundred cattle.

namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahākāruṇikāya lambe pralambe lambe vīrya sarva siddhimme kuru svāhā

This is called the noble Pendent Tārā. With this vidyā one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of karavīra kindling sticks smeared with ghee; as long as one does so, the king comes under one's power and comes to one. Even one who expounds the Piṭaka and has been placed under guard, for release from bonds and the like, he too is made to undertake the purification. Until he is released, for many accomplishments, the attainment of all siddhis, one adds to the vidyā stated before the words sarva siddhiñca me kuru svāhā, and by reciting it constantly one frees from bonds. Or else, having become pure, one should recite through the whole night; it frees from bonds.

This is the vidyā called the noble Peaceful Tārā. With it one should perform fire offerings in a fire of citron wood, dhālan and straw; then the vināyaka comes, and one should speak to him. Each day he gives one a coin. That too should be spent entirely. He should be made to touch the feet of the Blessed One. Then it is accomplished. Otherwise he does not stay.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhato samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya rijuka dharmamityāte tāre śānta dharmanityāte tuttāre anabhilāsye

dharmanityāte ture svāhā

This is the vidyā called the noble Upright Tārā. With it, at a stūpa containing relics, one should kindle a fire with vikaṅkata kindling sticks and perform eight thousand fire offerings of bilva fruits smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Through this one's undertakings become glorious, or one becomes lord of a region.

This is the vidyā called the noble Supreme Tārā. With it one should enter a river that flows to the ocean and perform eight thousand fire offerings of kikirādhā flowers. Each day, or each day and night, one obtains seven or eight measures. Or else one sees a hundred pieces of silver. With that same vidyā, before the noble Avalokiteśvara, one should kindle a fire with wood of a milky-sap tree and perform fire offerings of ghee. One becomes endowed with prosperity.

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāye bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya agre tāre rijuke tāre śāmte tuttāre anabhilāsye ture svāhā

This is the vidyā called the noble Tārā Who Proclaims. By reciting it constantly one becomes free of illness.

This is the vidyā called the noble Tārā Endowed with Peace. By reciting it constantly one gives rise to a peaceful mind.

nama ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya rijuke tāre rijuka dharma tuttāre rijuka dharmaniryāte ture svāhā

This is the vidyā called the noble Tārā Endowed with Uprightness. By reciting it constantly one gives rise to an upright mind.

These vidyās, which are called All Dharmas, are accomplished by reciting them: they protect oneself, protect others, and grant every happiness. By reciting them a hundred thousand times one should accomplish all the rites stated before. Reciting them ten thousand times increases merit. By reciting them thirty thousand times one becomes endowed with merit. If one recites them three hundred thousand times, even one who has committed the deeds of immediate retribution will succeed. In short, for one of compassionate nature who unerringly gives the intention of accomplishing benefit, by reciting them constantly all illnesses disappear. No epidemics arise. No harms of any kind will arise. This is how it should be understood.

Now the ritual for this is given in part. By reciting a hundred thousand times one becomes invulnerable to all hostile rites. By reciting two hundred thousand times one's misdeeds are exhausted. By reciting three hundred thousand times one accomplishes the supreme attainments. By reciting four hundred thousand times one obtains the superknowledges one by one. By reciting five hundred thousand times one obtains divine knowledges one by one. By reciting six hundred thousand times one obtains the precious wish-fulfilling jewel. By reciting seven hundred thousand times one comes to have the five superknowledges. By reciting a million times one obtains great kingdoms one by one. By reciting one million one hundred thousand times one becomes a vidyādhara.

Then, wrapping eye ointment with orpiment inside seven leaves of the aśvattha tree, one should recite before the Blessed One until it becomes warm, gives off smoke and blazes. If it becomes warm, one brings others under one's power. If it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. If it blazes, one travels through the sky. If one performs a fire offering of a hundred thousand oblations of ghee, whatever one wishes is granted. One should recite one million three hundred thousand times; one sees the noble Avalokiteśvara. Having seen him, one finds whatever one seeks.

One should perform eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of white sandalwood. One gains the power to bind speech or feet and becomes lord of a region. One should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of black aloeswood. The king comes under one's power. One obtains great abundance. One should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of red sandalwood; in all one's accomplishments one obtains thousands gathered together. One should recite seven hundred thousand times beneath the bodhi tree. One obtains essences and rejuvenating elixirs. By eating them, white hair and wrinkles are left behind. By reciting constantly one drives away vultures. By reciting two hundred thousand times one sports by magical display with the king's chief queen.

If one constantly performs fire offerings of royal mustard seed, the king comes under one's power. For this one should perform fire offerings with it smeared with ghee. One constantly obtains wealth. Observing the poṣadha, one should recite a hundred thousand times. Delicious food and drink will appear. One should perform a hundred thousand fire offerings with arka kindling sticks. One obtains a hundred pieces of gold. One should perform fire offerings of oil cake. All people become glad. One should recite while holding it in mind; by reciting constantly one overcomes all illnesses, all grahas, all torments, harms and all fears. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills smeared with ghee. Wealth will come. With three hundred thousand one obtains a kingdom.

Against harm from the lunar mansions, one should perform fire offerings of curd mixed together with milk; it will be pacified. By a fire offering of jasmine flowers, made by oneself or by another, one brings the king under one's power. One should perform fire offerings of dūrvā shoots; there will be pacification. If one wishes increase for oneself and others, one should perform fire offerings of sesame and thick rice gruel; one will obtain great wealth.

Having empowered bāla and kāla eight hundred times each, one should have them shown to all beings struck by the harm of bhūtas. On seeing them, the bhūtas go to their own abodes. If one recites eight hundred times over the eyes, it takes effect on whoever one sees first. Having recited thoroughly over water, one should wash one's face; all people become glad. By reciting constantly over a crow that does not fly away, one obtains whatever one wishes. Each day at dawn one should drink a handful of water empowered seven times. One becomes free of illness.

Then one who wishes to bring a woman under one's power should make an effigy of salt, press it down with the left foot, and recite eight thousand times over its head; within seven days she comes under one's power.

These accomplishments of the means of accomplishment, and these ways of accomplishing every aim that is accomplished in the mind, should also be applied wholeheartedly as causes of awakening. Likewise, from what has been shown here only in part, one should make it become the special power of applying the means of accomplishment.

By the mere melody of verses one enjoys the true accomplishment of practice.
Neither entirely empty nor full,
food should be given in every way.
Of flavors such as pungent, sweet and sour,
free from their objects, even the five,
since in one possessed of craving craving for flavor will arise, recitation, fire offering and the like done with craving should not be undertaken here at all.
Delighting here, discerning here, licking the hands and the rest that is spoken of,
are to be abandoned, or not to be abandoned.
Within, the attendant deities should be carefully examined as abiding in the kīla.
In a temple of the gods,
or an empty house, or within a cave,
at a solitary tree or a charnel ground,
on a mountain or in a thicket, recitation, fire offering and practice
are to be done with a one-pointed mind.
For the impure, the impure, and the wholly pure,
it is the pure that purifies.
With both, and for both,
one who speaks of accomplishment should practice.
Whatever has a corpse's thread, leftovers, and what is stale after that,
whatever a menstruating woman has touched,
what people of caṇḍāla birth have cooked,
what smells putrid, and what is served again,
one who desires merit should give away.
From approaching the deities in due measure
one becomes endowed with such qualities and the rest.
Food or bedding and the like,

whether taken by the practitioner himself or not, should be resorted to.
Drinkers, places of amusement,
together with beings who are base people,
taken by being bound outside,
perpetrators of the five deeds of immediate retribution,
those who cause disease and the great elements,
whether they have nothing or have much,
those overcome by food and laziness,
those hostile to the Saṅgha and the shameless,
those devoted to avarice, who pierce with weapons,
others who always hold wrong views, those endowed with such qualities as these,
all this is taught as fitting.
Even if one is unable to bathe at an untimely hour,
for one who is not able by oneself, one's own wind is proclaimed supreme.
That which exists apart from the three times,
wholly free of the three vehicles,
faults in bathing, and within a river,
destroys what are called the three faults;
bathing is proclaimed supreme.
Therefore, having considered the time, by that fire, or else after that by water, bathing is shown to the practitioner as every accomplishment.
Then, for the sick,
baths with secret mantra
have been proclaimed.

Here, again, the mantra is:
namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya buddhāśuci dharmaśuci saṃghaśuci anenaparya vākyena aśuciśucir bhavāmi svāhā

Having recited this mantra once over water, one should wash. Beforehand, at the time of approach and of accomplishment, and for a sick person, bathing with this mantra makes one clean.

In the first part of the night, through three sessions, one becomes tired from reciting the sublime Dharma and the like; then at midnight, on a seat of kuśa grass or the like, having fully arranged cleanliness, the rite of protection and the mudrā, one should perform the rite of the means of accomplishment. At that time protection will have been made.

On a lion's bed, the practitioner, always in the lion's posture, should point the head toward the south or the east. If in a dream there occurs a fire offering with a pacifying or an increasing fire, then, remaining to the east and to the south of the south, one should stretch out the feet. Placing the head toward the west, one should lie facing south.

For one fully endowed with the vidyās, if in a dream one sees sandalwood, bilva and the like, nyagrodha, udumbara and so forth, it is a sign of one's own true and noble accomplishment. If geese, kāraṇḍava ducks, cranes, peacocks and rohana birds appear in a dream, the accomplishment of that will quickly come to one. If one sees oneself appearing clad in white garments, and one's life increasing, accomplishment will occur without doubt. Being covered with garlands of victory banners, and climbing or pressing down upon a palace and the like in a dream, are marks of accomplishment; so too are boarding a boat, and likewise holding its vīṇā. If in a dream one touches victory banners, pennants and the like, or touches a little water with sesame oil, it is a mark of true accomplishment. If in a dream one sees donkeys, she-camels, chariots and the like, or touches them and so forth, know that they obstruct accomplishment. This is also held to be certain.

Endowed with such qualities as these,
virtuous action and actions other than virtue:
in order to accomplish all of these,
therefore act after understanding dreams.
Dream protection and the mudrā together uphold the vidyā.
Obstructors are always active in sleep;
the destroyer of what is to be destroyed is truly present. For that reason, for all recitation, fire offering and the rest,
one should apply the protection spoken of before.
Among the divisions of the rite of protection,
it is held that by this one truly succeeds.
Gods who move in the sky, yakṣas,

self-arisen pretas and rākṣasas, and wanderers, in order to destroy,
stir up all their own places and minds.
Therefore what is to be done from the very start,
protecting oneself and the signs, indicating them closely and so forth,
takes place at the time of every practice.
If there are no signs,
for the fruit that arises from the obstructors:
a dog going out from the left,
a cow giving, and a beautiful hundred-petaled one and an eared one,
deer, jackals and crows,
and likewise domestic pigs,
lizards, parasols and victory banners,
pennants and all the rest:
of all these, the chief are said to be auspicious.
By knowing the auspicious and the rest,
the inauspicious of the inauspicious, and likewise distinguishing the excellent and the not excellent,
having understood, one should act first.
Bilva and arka flowers are not desired, and arampa;
by a special action, give that!
For all actions the wise mantrin should make three kinds of hearth.

Facing toward the south,
the syllables hūṃ phaṭ
should be placed where svāhā would stand;
having fully contemplated it with the mind, one should act.
The one performing a fierce rite should do the rite thus.
Facing toward the north,
one recites together with the syllables svāhā;
having contemplated with the mind, one should perform pacifying.
For what is virtuous and beautiful,
one should act facing the east.

The pacifying and the increasing are to be stated distinctly:
having faced downward as well,
one should apply oneself to increasing.
For a fierce rite one sits cross-legged on the seat;
for pacifying and increasing, it is said,
one squats upon one's own seat.
The conduct of nonvirtuous action that is spoken of regarding hair and nails:
they should not be bound up, because if the practitioner is endowed with celibacy, then at that time there is no fault;
in performing recitation, fire offering and the rest,
no strife will arise.
As the hair is being fully purified,
the wise, in just that manner,
should shave the hair with a razor;
nor should it be allowed to accumulate.
One who stays desiring accomplishment is proclaimed to be worshipping the gods.
Though not desired, strength that is accumulated for that very reason becomes faulty.
Keeping the nails long,
and likewise teeth, body hair and the like,
filth should not be kept.
Lice and the like are born,
and from them nits and the like arise.
One should not look into a well
while the sun is seized by Rāhu.
One who desires accomplishment should not let the vehicle of the Tathāgata decline.
At the time of worshipping the gods, too,
to gods for whom food has not been set forth the wise should not make offering.
If it is otherwise, one strays from the command of the guru and from the commitment.
In earlier times, all the dharmas are worshipped by listening and so forth.

With awareness, having emanated the form,
one should praise and extol it.
Then one should think one-pointedly and focus.
In the proper order of speech, oneself should utter these words from one's own mouth:
"Buddhas and bodhisattvas possessed of great miraculous power, please turn your minds to this ocean of existence!"
Having repeated just this,
the dream at the dawn of the day is always highly praised.
Fire offerings of butter and the like, honey,
reciting without purpose:
the beautiful fire offering is to be prescribed for the sake of destroying obstructors.
For the purpose of averting each thing,
the peaceful mind is praised;
one should do it for the sake of the accomplishment one desires.
The increasing is also to be explained:
likewise, contemplating fully and truly,
the practitioner should practice well.
Then the beautiful fire offering is to be performed always with effort.
Most certainly miraculous power arises,
for the sake of empowerment in this very life.
Bilva, aśoka and the like,
the renowned palāśa,
aśvattha and pajāka:
all these are for fire offerings of increasing.
The kindling sticks to be used for it are udumbara, nyagrodha, and aśvattha, together with milky trees,
whatever is renowned for pacifying.
As kindling sticks for all the rites of accomplishment, khadira, ariṣṭa, nimba and thorny trees are taught.

Likewise elsewhere, what is beautiful truly accomplishes, without doubt.
For accomplishing substances such as gorocanā, eye medicine and the like,
one uses the cleansing of the five products of the cow;
then, by one endowed with awareness,
or else in divine water,
fragrances, perfumes and the like are properly combined.
Fresh leaves of udumbara,
or those that come from aśvattha, within the mantra of the flowered one,
on a vānatra or with a delay,
having performed the rite of full protection,
one should accomplish it according to the rite.
One keeping the poṣadha, for as long as it takes until the dawn arises, certainly accomplishes; or else this observance should be taken up in order to undertake it.

In the interval here, "Please turn your mind to me" means: "From killing any living being, from always stealing the wealth of others, from impure conduct, from taking what is not given into the hand, from always drinking intoxicants, and from whatever sequence makes people fight with one another; from garlands, colors, the aims of dance, music, arrogance, great beds and high ones I turn away, and so now I become endowed with the poṣadha of the arhats, possessed of eight branches." Thinking that there is something to be said, namely "I shall gather them in," one should invite them as guests for the sake of all sentient beings as well. Having said this, one should gather them in with the awakening mind. Always having truly generated it, preceded by going for refuge whose nature is the Jewels, the practitioner should practice by linking everything together in this sequence. So it is said.

These Tārās, down to the one called Noble Tārā the Inexpressible, are the definite emergence of all phenomena, without intrinsic nature and inexpressible. They accomplish every aim and heal every illness. They are accomplished by being recited in any circumstance. Against all fears and all harms, and in all minor rites, in whatever way they are applied, in just that way they bring about accomplishment.

I shall now set out briefly the rite for these. Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, observing the poṣadha vows, or even without the poṣadha, one should make offerings each day with perfumes, flowers and so forth, and recite one hundred thousand times. At the end, having fasted for one day and night, one sits on a mat of kuśa grass before a painted cloth or an image, and, in the sequence that was taught, facing east oneself, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of the previously mentioned sticks of black agaru wood, four finger-widths long, smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One who, in this king of ritual manuals or in any other, recites with the knowledge mantra of Tārā and trains toward liberation will accomplish limitless knowledge mantras.

If one wishes to proceed other than with a painted cloth, one observing the poṣadha should, on the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, at a stūpa containing relics, smear a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, and make offerings with flowers, incense, butter lamps and so forth. Then, kindling a fire with udumbara wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings with sticks of palāśa wood; and by eating the caru, one becomes keen-minded.

By making fire offerings of milk, brahmins are brought under one's power. One should make fire offerings with caru food: kṣatriyas are brought under one's power. Mixing barley with curd and combining it with caru, one should make fire offerings: vaiśyas are brought under one's power. Gazing at an enemy, one should recite: he becomes paralyzed. Sprinkling with water empowered seven times dispels everything; so too does sprinkling it on any poison. A digestive pill empowered seven times dispels eye disease. One should bind the sick with a thread: it dispels all grahas. Binding one's topknot protects oneself. With ash one seals the maṇḍala. Reciting seven times over a clod of earth seals the directions.

For a woman who cannot deliver her child, one should recite over sesame oil and give it to her: she will give birth easily. If, because the fetus is obstructed, the term of the pregnancy has passed, then after she has bathed, one should empower the milk of a cow of matching lineage eight thousand times and give it to her to drink. Otherwise, one should mix it with an equal measure of ghee and give it to her. Then she will give birth to the child. Then, if she wants many children, one should mix the ash from eight thousand fire offerings with four pots of water and set them in place.

If one binds on one's right hand a thread recited over eight hundred times, then for as long as it is worn one becomes supreme among all speakers. Making eight thousand fire offerings with aparājitā flowers, one becomes invincible by others in battle. Tying knots in a thread spun by a maiden and empowering it seven times, one should bind it on the hand: one becomes lord of all that is stable and moving.

Then, speaking the name of one struck down by violence, one empowers water seven times and gives it to drink from cupped hands: even one who has died is made to rise. Likewise, having empowered it toward the four directions, one gives it to drink: whoever has been seized by the fangs of Takṣaka is revived. If one empowers lumps of the breast and tumors seven times and gives the remedy, they are released, and the person feels no pain.

For epidemics, calamities and battle: in the middle of the city, or at night, having smeared the ground over the extent of an arrow's range and given a white torma offering, one kindles a fire with sticks of a milky-sapped tree and makes fire offerings with a thousand oblations of milk. This pacifies the epidemic. Then, if it is not pacified, at another time, when one has resolved to paralyze it, one kindles a fire with sticks of śleṣmāntaka and makes eight thousand fire offerings of siddhārtha wood smeared with akṣa and sesame oil. This immediately pacifies all epidemics. By this rite one binds poison. By looking upon all beings while reciting, one makes them become one's subjects.

Making eight thousand fire offerings with sticks of kuṣmāṇḍa, kumbhāṇḍas are brought under one's power. Making eight thousand fire offerings of sesame paste, pretas are brought under one's power. Making eight thousand fire offerings of bela and khaṇḍaka in a charnel ground, piśācas are brought under one's power. To bring yakṣas under one's power, one makes eight thousand fire offerings of vaṭa sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee; this brings apasmāras and oppressor spirits under one's power. One should make eight thousand fire offerings with oblations of wool. To destroy obstructors by means of the knowledge mantra, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of khadira tips smeared with pungent sesame oil. Making eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills smeared with ghee, the followers of the Great God (Śiva), and the Great God himself, are brought under one's power.

Taking realgar bought at a hero's price, one kindles a fire with sticks of the king tree and recites until it becomes a mass of fire. Then, from the milk of a tawny cow of matching lineage, one has ghee churned by a maiden and places the realgar in that ghee. Likewise, one does the same with a vessel filled with curd and a vessel filled with ghee and honey. Then, having performed the protection, one places them in a casket, and when the moon is seized by Rāhu, having fasted for three nights, before a stūpa containing relics or at the feet of noble Avalokiteśvara, one makes offerings as one can afford. Facing north, one sets out the four vessels and recites until they become warm, give off smoke, or blaze. This brings beings under one's power, makes one invisible, and carries one into the sky.

Likewise, to produce a superior eye ointment, one oneself, particularly on the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, places it on a lotus-fiber thread at the feet of noble Avalokiteśvara, takes it up with joined palms, and recites until it becomes warm, gives off smoke and blazes. In this very rite there are three signs.

Having a lotus made of the five metals, one grinds saffron, gorocanā and camphor with rainwater and places them in the lotus. Then, on the eighth day of the bright fortnight, one keeping the poṣadha bathes three times a day, puts on clean clothes, and, before a stūpa containing relics or at the feet of noble Avalokiteśvara, takes up the lotus in the right hand and recites until it blazes. Then, by taking it up, one becomes a vidyādhara and lives for ten thousand years. The same holds for bracelets, diadems and chains.

Likewise, one has red mountain sandalwood, guggulu, the root of the coiling joy plant, the five metals, girikarṇikā, grain husks, costus, rgya spos, honey, long pepper and turuṣka, in equal parts, combined and ground into a fine powder. Then, taking the milk of a tawny cow of matching lineage, one combines the ghee churned by a maiden with fresh butter, and with the powder one has pills made. One should offer a lamp with the powder in arka sesame oil. Then, on the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight, fasting day and night, one keeping the poṣadha places the pills inside seven aśvattha leaves and recites before noble Avalokiteśvara until they become warm. By putting one in the mouth, one becomes invisible. Then, by making them blaze, one travels in the sky.

Next, another rite: at a stūpa containing relics, before an image, one keeping the poṣadha makes extensive offerings, kindles a fire with sticks of the fire tree, and makes eight thousand fire offerings with khadira sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, beginning on the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight and continuing until the fifteenth. Then it is accomplished. Likewise, one keeping the poṣadha should always do three thousand recitations. Afterward it serves for all rites.

Or else, if one wishes to bring a king or a minister under one's power, one makes offerings to the Blessed One and then makes eight thousand fire offerings of sticks of the king of trees smeared with iṅguda oil, beginning on the fourteenth and continuing until the fifteenth. By this rite, even one whose moral discipline is broken succeeds just the same. For killing and for expelling, one makes eight thousand fire offerings of nimba sticks smeared with pungent sesame oil: within seven nights one expels the enemy.

One who wishes to bring the four castes under one's power makes fire offerings of water with caru and of what is called yakṣa's bowl: they are brought under one's power. At night one should make eight thousand fire offerings of pucirajata. By recitation one frees from bondage. For obstructors, by fire offerings of husks and sesame, or of anything else, they are fully pacified. Having recited twenty-one times, one should make fire offerings of sesame to bring a young woman of good family under one's power. One who wants clothing should make fire offerings of dūrvā grass and the thorny plant, eight thousand times or for seven nights. Having empowered sweet flag eight thousand times, seven times over, one binds it on the hand. One who wants wealth should make eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills for seven nights. One who wants to be master of a household should make fire offerings of perfume for seven nights. Making eight thousand fire offerings of ghee, one obtains a village. For expulsion, one should make fire offerings of nimba leaves smeared with pungent sesame oil. Human flesh is for the rite of expulsion. Husks are for the rite of causing enmity. For driving someone to roam, snake slough and ash are used. For unmanning someone, cow dung and indra.

Husks are for binding water. For pacification, one uses śamī leaves together with milk.

Each day, rising at dawn, having made offerings to the Buddha, the Blessed One, as one can afford, one should recite one hundred thousand times. This accomplishes what has not been accomplished. To destroy what others have accomplished, it seizes them with binding. Making fire offerings of the thorny plant for seven nights destroys the enemy. One who wants clothing should make eight thousand fire offerings of dūrvā grass and the thorny plant. One who wishes to make a house shake violently should take a human bone, make it into a peg eight finger-widths long, and drive it into the house. If one recites eight hundred times over a flower and gives it, the person is brought under one's power.

At the king's gate, with saffron, rgya spos, tamāla leaves, and hundred-petaled flowers with their stalks, wrapped in cloth, by the proper rite, one sprinkles the powder on the clothes: for one beset by human enemies, those human enemies are brought under one's power.

To be victorious in battle, one recites eight thousand times over a banner, and empowers perfume, flowers and incense with the mantra of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā. Having offered water at the fire hearth seven times, one sends the banner forth and has it displayed to the opposing army. It strikes them as a vajra thunderbolt strikes a tree.

Over black sesame, before an effigy one has made, one recites a thousand times, and, speaking the target's name, one eats it. By reciting eight thousand times, one places all seeds, or all medicines, or all perfumes, or fragrant flowers, or a lotus without black roots, in a vase, and recites a thousand times over it. One should bathe beneath a bodhi tree, or elsewhere. Speaking the target's name, one makes fire offerings of white mustard and lotus, or of the powder of lotus petals, stalks and roots, and of khadira charcoal: the person is brought under one's power. If, inside a bilva fruit, with things mixed with honey, one recites eight thousand times over the smoke and the charcoal, a queen, a minister, or whoever is named is brought under one's power.

Before noble Avalokiteśvara, one offers perfume, flowers and incense and makes offerings to the Blessed Lady. Then whoever one names while making fire offerings of jasmine flowers, blue utpala, or other flowers is brought under one's power. To bring a siddha's beloved under one's power, black sesame; to bring the foremost queen under one's power, priyaṅgu; to bring all beings under one's power, red śāli rice: whoever one names when making the fire offering is brought under one's power. If one speaks the name of a maiden and makes fire offerings of stamen flowers, she is brought under one's power. If one makes eight thousand fire offerings of milk, milk porridge, ghee and honey before the Blessed Lady, it is a rite of increase for whoever one calls by name.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one does this at a stūpa containing relics, before an image, or before a painted cloth facing west. At first light, on a mountain peak, one kindles a fire with kuśa grass and bilva sticks and makes eight thousand fire offerings of fully opened lotuses smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One should offer incense of agaru, kunduruka and śrīveṣṭaka, and a torma of milk and curd; and in addition one gives the obstructors a torma for all the bhūtas. Then, on the eighth day, one becomes a sovereign.

Eating milk and barley gruel, if one makes fire offerings of white lotuses in full bloom, one finds a great treasure or a land. One should make fire offerings into the fire of yellow flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee: one becomes lord of a land. For three nights, subsisting on flour, one should make fire offerings for three nights. Likewise, it is also accomplished by doing seven hundred thousand without interruption. If one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of those same sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, a koṭi of gold appears. Rising early, preceded by bathing, practicing celibacy, and kindling the fire well, one makes eight thousand fire offerings of nāgakesara and priyaṅgu: within three months one experiences an extraordinary accomplishment, and much wealth comes. If one makes fire offerings of beef and khaṇḍa, one obtains a place of cattle. Likewise, if one makes fire offerings with sticks of priyaṅgu and nāgakesara, beings are brought under one's power.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one kindles a fire beneath a bilva tree and makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva and āśibilva smeared with ghee: one sees the goddess Tārā. Having become pure, fasting through four meals, one should make ten thousand fire offerings: one sees a great treasure. Likewise, for twenty nights, eating milk and barley gruel, one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed: one becomes a lord of wealth. Having done the preliminary practice, one makes fire offerings day and night of white mustard seed smeared with ghee: within a month it causes good, steady rain to fall. Fasting through four meals, one makes ten thousand fire offerings: one finds wealth.

When the bright fortnight arrives, the wise one should strike at the three junctures of the day before the painted cloth of the goddess. Within the bright fortnight, this goddess grants him the supreme gift. With this knowledge mantra one should make a fire offering of a thousand oblations of sesame. If one kindles the fire with bilva wood, one sees the goddess, and she makes one a lord of wealth or of grain. Having made extensive offerings to the Blessed Lady, if one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of hundred-petaled flowers, one finds wealth. In front of a stūpa containing relics, in a clean place, if one kindles a fire for the goddess with palāśa sticks and makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of utpalas, a district is brought under one's power. With this knowledge mantra, offering fragrant incense and eating milk and barley gruel, one makes a thousand fire offerings of lotuses: one obtains a thousand pieces of gold. If with this one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of flowers, it grants whatever one has in mind.

If one makes a thousand fire offerings before the painted cloth, one sees a treasure. Eating milk and barley gruel, if in a clean place one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of priyaṅgu smeared with curd, honey and ghee, together with milk, one finds a hundred pieces of gold. A garland of various kinds.

Then, fasting for three nights at the battlefield, one should make eight thousand fire offerings with agaru sticks at the three junctures of the day. Then, reciting throughout the night, if the painted cloth shakes or the bundle of garlands stirs, then it is accomplished, and it grants kingship. It bestows whatever one has in mind: it heals all illnesses, frees from death and bondage, dispels harm, and seals the maṇḍala.

Before noble Avalokiteśvara one should make a thousand fire offerings of flowers: this brings beings under one's power. Or else, placing a painted cloth at the foot of the bodhi tree, by this same rite, eating barley gruel, one should recite one hundred thousand times. Eating a single meal a day and keeping the eight-branched poṣadha, one accomplishes the food rites of noble Avalokiteśvara.

Or else, at the time of an eclipse of the moon or the sun, one should have noble Avalokiteśvara painted, white as an autumn cloud and wearing a white upper robe. To one side one should have the goddess Tārā painted, golden in color, seated on a lotus, adorned with every ornament, and gazing all around upon the practitioner. Having made extensive offerings of perfume, flowers, incense and torma, with one's eyes fixed on the moon, one should offer recitation until the moon is released. The goddess Tārā will come, blazing in her own form, the color of the rising sun, holding a blooming lotus in her hand. One should offer her water and request the supreme boon.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should practice eating milk and gruel. One keeping the eight-branched poṣadha, abstaining from cooked food and salt, should make eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu before the painted cloth: one finds eight coins. This is the rite of kunduruka. This is also the rite of bilva. Devadāru should be applied for the sake of accomplishment. Here, with the root knowledge mantra, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of agaru. If one kindles the fire well with wood of a milky-sapped tree, it grants all wealth.

Having made offerings of perfume, flowers and incense to a stūpa containing relics, one rises early, kindles the fire well with ladle in hand, and makes eight hundred fire offerings of nāgakesara and priyaṅgu: within a month one will come to be looked upon. One should make one hundred thousand fire offerings of vikaṅkata sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. In a clean place, as in the earlier rite, if one kindles the fire well with palāśa sticks and makes offerings to the Blessed Lady, one finds a hundred pieces of gold. With this knowledge mantra, if one makes eight thousand fire offerings of priyaṅgu sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, one finds a thousand pieces of gold. With this knowledge mantra, having offered perfume, flowers and incense before noble Avalokiteśvara, one kindles the fire well with udumbara sticks and should make one hundred thousand fire offerings: this fulfills all desires, together with the supreme. Kindling a fire with aśoka wood, one should make a hundred fire offerings of white mustard seed: she comes in visible form, directly before one.

Having recited one hundred thousand times over incense, one who is clean, wearing clean clothes, eating milk and barley gruel and reciting constantly, obtains every wish one wishes for, and it grants all desires. Having done the preliminary practice, for five nights eating milk and barley gruel, or drinking milk, one should recite one hundred thousand times. At the end, having fasted for three nights, if on the full moon one worships with perfume, flowers and incense, one sees the goddess in her own form. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should make one hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed. Drinking milk for twenty-one days, one kindles the fire well with apāmārga sticks and should make a thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with curd, honey and ghee. If one kindles the fire well with sticks of a milky-sapped tree, by this one will certainly see a treasure. With this knowledge mantra, eating milk and barley gruel, if one kindles a fire with bilva wood and makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of sesame smeared with curd, honey and ghee, one sees the goddess in her own form.

Having offered perfume, flowers and incense before noble Avalokiteśvara, one kindles the fire well with udumbara wood smeared with curd, honey and ghee, and makes one hundred thousand fire offerings with arka sticks: without striving for it, one finds wealth and grain. Kindling the fire well with deva wood, one should make a thousand fire offerings of devadāru: she comes in her own form. A fire offering of ghee is for pacification. A fire offering of dūrvā grass is for increase. By making eight thousand fire offerings smeared with curd, honey and ghee, one likewise finds all the wealth one wants.

Making twenty-one knots in a thread spun by a maiden, one sends a girl off as a bride. One who wishes to sleep at night should recite the knowledge mantra countless times: one will not see bad dreams. If one recites eight hundred times before an effigy made of black sesame, whoever's name one has in mind is brought under one's power. If one recites eight hundred times over black grain, whoever's name one speaks is brought under one's power.

To bring beings under one's power, before the painted cloth, one should make fire offerings of lotuses into a fire of apāmārga sticks. Kindling the fire well with bilva sticks or with sticks of a milky-sapped tree, one makes one hundred thousand fire offerings of lotuses: one becomes a universal monarch of power. Again, with ten thousand lotuses one gains a kingdom. By a fire offering of one hundred thousand lotuses, one gains great wealth. In all these fire offerings, having worshiped with perfume, flowers and incense, eating milk and barley gruel, whoever one calls by name while offering jasmine flowers is brought under one's power. Kindling the fire well with eight hundred bilva sticks, one should make fire offerings of one hundred thousand lotuses. Whoever one calls by name is brought under one's power.

Having recited twenty-one times over an ointment of gorocanā (bezoar), one should anoint the head with it. Or else one should mark a tilaka on the face. All people will be delighted. One should make eight thousand fire offerings of lotus seeds smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Whoever is named comes under one's power. Through the grace of noble Avalokiteśvara, things will turn out otherwise. If lotuses are not to be found, one should make fire offerings of eight thousand blue utpalas. One should make fire offerings of perfume or flowers; with one hundred thousand, the deities will be accomplished.

For bathing, one should put all the medicinal herbs and all the seeds into a vase that is not blackened at its base, and bathe with water empowered by eight thousand recitations. Those struck by obstructors, or oneself, will be pacified.

Utpala, costus, a portion of aloeswood, nakha perfume, and nard, in portions increasing fourfold: before the painted cloth image, having made vast offerings to noble Avalokiteśvara and lit lamps of cow's ghee, one combines all these substances with flowers, and with this one should have bathed whatever king, royal minister, royal queen or practitioner, or those whose lives are passing away untimely. They will become long-lived. Fortunate ones struck by obstructors are freed from the obstructors.

Remaining in a fast day and night in the presence of noble Avalokiteśvara, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of brahmadāri or jitendraya, aloeswood and turuṣka incense; in the same way it will be accomplished. One should make eight thousand fire offerings of black sesame smeared with curd, honey and ghee and mixed with sandalwood powder or dried dung, and it will be accomplished. Another rite: making a hundred thousand fire offerings of sandalwood sticks four finger-widths long, smeared with curd, honey and ghee, it will be accomplished.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, having kindled a fire beneath a bilva tree, one should make eight million fire offerings of bilva fruits smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One sees the goddess in her own form; she bestows a great kingdom, and she also bestows whatever else one asks for.

To free someone from a bhūta graha, one should touch them with the lotus mudrā; it puts the spirit to flight.

Even without having performed the preliminary practice, one should kindle a fire with wood of a milky-sap tree and make a hundred thousand fire offerings of lotuses smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Likewise one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of red and blue utpalas, or else a fire offering of jasmine flowers. Before the painted cloth image, eating milk and barley gruel, one should make ever-increasing offerings and should eat food obtained by begging. Having made vast offerings of perfume, flowers and incense, at the end of a fast kept day and night, one should make a fire offering of fragrant flowers. By this, even without the preliminary practice, even one whose moral discipline is utterly broken accomplishes the grounds. Or else one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed mixed with black sesame and smeared with curd, honey and ghee. It will be accomplished in the same way.

One who desires wealth makes a fire offering of royal mustard or of mustard seed with apāmārga sticks. Or else, to bring a minister under one's power, one makes a fire offering with sesame oil, and this may also be applied in all rites. To bring a maiden under one's power, it is the former fire offering, smeared with curd, honey and ghee. For a royal queen, it is this rite. Having kindled a fire of bodhi-tree wood, one makes a fire offering of articles of enjoyment. To bring under one's power, it is a fire offering of royal mustard. To bring under one's power, one should make a hundred thousand with sticks of the kambojikā flower. Having kindled a fire with bodhi-tree sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, in a fire without a hearth, having honored the god and the goddess with perfume, flowers and incense and made vast offerings, eating milk and barley gruel and wearing clean clothes, it grants whatever one has undertaken. Making a fire offering of a hundred vāsaka flowers brings under one's power whoever is named. A fire offering of black pepper destroys the vināyakas.

Beneath the bodhi tree, having made offerings of perfume and flowers, when the moon is seized by the eclipse planet, one should take realgar, place it on seven aśvattha leaves, and meditate until it blazes. By taking it up, one becomes a vidyādhara, unimpeded among all the gods, who goes quickly and swiftly to supremely beautiful divine palaces, with the color and splendor of the rising sun, who travels in the company of all the vidyādharas and is surrounded by hundreds of divine beings. For eye ointment for the ears, it is this very rite.

One who wishes to accomplish gorocanā should first, while eating milk and barley gruel, recite a hundred thousand times. At the time of a lunar eclipse, on seven pippala leaves, or at a stūpa containing relics, one should set out the gorocanā in a hundred portions and perform the rite by encircling it with the vidyā mantra. It is endowed with enjoyments and the rest; making a tilaka with it, one becomes a vidyādhara whose body is adorned with every ornament and who takes whatever form one desires, and one lives for a thousand years.

Taking flakes of the eye ointment that comes from Sauvīra, purifying them well by heating in fire, and steeping them a hundred times, when the moon is seized by the eclipse, one enters the water and should recite until it becomes a kumbhāṇḍa. Merely by being broken for an instant, it disintegrates. Anointed with this, one becomes endowed with splendor, wearing a crest and earrings, one's body adorned with garlands of lotuses, and goes on aspiring even to the very summit of all vidyādharas. Together with one's retinue, one lives for five thousand years. One becomes a vidyādhara who goes like the wind and travels as swiftly as the mind. By a fire offering of a hundred thousand lotuses and utpalas, one obtains a thousand pieces of gold. The rite of palāśa is just this.

Furthermore, here is what becomes the means of accomplishment of the great rite. It may be done in the presence of a Victor, or before the painted cloth image, or even by the ritual taught in other ritual manuals: that ritual of the painted cloth image in which the names of these vidyās are recited three times each. Or, near a stūpa containing relics, in a clean place, eating milk and barley gruel, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one may live on flowers, fruit, caru, and roots, or on a diet of curd, or on water, flour, and gruel, or on a diet of perfume, or a diet of vakra, or a diet of ghee; or else one should practice the vow of silence. First of all, one should do the approach. Fully observing the eightfold poṣadha, one should make offerings, proclaiming them each day. One should eat alms food in accordance with the scriptures. Fully embracing the awakening mind, one should eat only when tormented by suffering. The practitioner, after bathing at the three times of day, should sit on an auspicious kuśa mat, wear clothes that have been cleansed, and recite one hundred thousand times. At the end, observing a fast day and night, having kindled a fire with khadira wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings at the three times of day of sticks of milky-sap wood or of black aloeswood, four finger-widths or a finger in length, smeared with turuṣka and sesame oil.

Then it will be accomplished. On the fifteenth day, in the four directions, one should set out four vases made of cloth, filled with water, their mouths covered with mango twigs, without defects at the base and without blackening. On the right side, the vase called Fully Victorious, made of clay or of gold, filled completely with jewels and all the seeds, with all the medicinal herbs and roots, the jewel essence, its mouth covered with lotus-net flowers, its neck tied with undamaged dukūla cloth, is to be placed in the center. Likewise in the east is the vase called Rising. In the west is the vase called Haring. Naming the vases in this way and so forth, one should set them in place as in the Perfection of Wisdom.

One should offer twenty fragrant flowers, tormas and garlands, and offer twenty bowls filled with perfume in the four directions. One should set twenty bowls filled with milk in the four directions. One should offer a hundred ghee lamps. One should light four vase lamps. One should offer twelve bowls filled with milk porridge to the nāgas. One should present twelve bowls of sesame soup as torma to the rākṣasas. One gives eight bowls of warm gruel as torma to the bhūtas. One should offer a torma of hwak and other foods to noble Avalokiteśvara. For the others, one should set in the four directions bowls filled with cream and curd, as is fitting and as is suitable. One should offer incense of black aloeswood. One should set in the four directions bowls of incense of camphor, white sandalwood, kunduruka, and śrīvāsa.

Then, beginning the rite in the evening, observing a fast day and night, having kindled a fire with arka sticks or khadira wood, the invitation in this rite is made with this mantra. The mantra is:
namo ratna trayāya nama ārya a ba lo ki te śva rā ya bo dhi satvā ya ma hā satvā ya hi ri hi ri su ru su ru ma hā kā ru ṇi kā ā gaccha ā gaccha ārya a ba lo ki te śva rā dhi ri dhi ri ṇi ya thā sa ma ya ma nu sma ra sā hā
At the time of requesting departure, one urges him on with fragrant flowers.

Having offered the welcoming water in a vessel made of silver or of clay, one should then, during a lunar eclipse or a solar eclipse, make eight thousand fire offerings of black aloeswood sticks of the size stated, or of the other things mentioned, smeared with sesame oil. Then, in the east or another direction, noble Avalokiteśvara, supremely compassionate, holding in his hands a round water flask and a staff, with a crown of matted locks hanging down, will come. Then, having taken white fragrant flowers by the handful in the vessel described, one should offer the welcoming water. Then noble Avalokiteśvara says, "Whatever boon it may be, I shall grant it." He gives whatever boon one has chosen: going through the sky, or invisibility, or kingship, or all the accomplishments of vidyā, or kingship over the vidyādharas, or weapons, or long life, or bringing all beings under one's power, or accomplishing gorocanā, or accomplishing eye ointment, or transferring treasures, or entering caverns, or the elixir of rejuvenation, or accomplishing realgar, or the five higher knowledges, or the rite for the body one desires for oneself, or the divine eye, or the destruction of disease, or divine knowledge, or hands and feet, or freedom from defects of the eyes, or concealment from Indra, lord of the gods, or the destruction of disease, or, for leprosy or whatever bodily disease is incurable, liberation from each of these, and the retention of what one has heard, and the gaining of wealth: whatever boon one has chosen, he grants it. One also goes to the abode of noble Avalokiteśvara. One will live for an eon.

The practitioner of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā, having a kuśa mat, should know the udumbara rite: two wooden sandals of udumbara wood, or on potter's clay; from there on, everything is the same.

There follows the rite of the supremely secret near-heart mantra of Tārā:
namo ratna trayāya nama ārya a ba lo ki śva rā ya bo dhi satvā ya ma hā satvā ya oṃ ku ru ku ru kulle svā hā
This is the supremely secret near-heart mantra of all these vidyās. Merely by reciting it, it suppresses all fears. All diseases are exhausted and destroyed. It destroys all fears. Minor rites too are accomplished by reciting it. Reciting it two million one hundred thousand times makes one travel through the sky. Then one should recite over an eye ointment of realgar placed within seven aśvattha leaves until it becomes warm. When it grows warm, it brings under one's power; when it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible; when it blazes, one goes through the sky. One should make a fire offering of a hundred thousand oblations of sesame.

It grants whatever one desires. One should recite one million one hundred thousand times, until one sees noble Avalokiteśvara. When one sees him, whatever one has undertaken is accomplished. Making a hundred thousand fire offerings with sticks of white sandalwood, each day one obtains a coin. Making a hundred thousand fire offerings with sticks of red sandalwood, each day one obtains six kārṣāpaṇas. One should recite seven hundred thousand times each, and one becomes invisible. One should recite five hundred thousand times, and it destroys disease. By reciting it three times over eight nights, it destroys disease. One should recite one million two hundred thousand times, and one obtains elixir and essence. By eating it, wrinkles and white hair are cast off. With three hundred thousand one removes gṛdhrasī (sciatica): having heated iron, and having smeared the right foot with sesame oil recited over three times, one should burn the foot with that iron and say, "Gṛdhrasī, be cut off!" By reciting two hundred thousand times, one brings a royal queen under one's power. By making oblations of royal mustard one brings under one's power, and in seven nights one becomes a lord of wealth, except for what has been set aside out of desire. If one recites a hundred thousand times over apāmārga and anoints oneself with it, one obtains whatever food and drink one asks for. If one makes a fire offering with arka sticks, one obtains a hundred gold coins. One should make a fire offering with biṇyakaṃ wood, and all people will be delighted. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with tāmūla powder, and one will bind on a crown. One should recite ten million times, and one becomes a vidyādhara surrounded by a retinue of a hundred. One should make a fire offering of eight thousand oblations of parched rice, and in seven days the obstructors cease to be. One should recite one million two hundred thousand times, and dry cow dung will be cooked into hwak. If one anoints oneself while saying "without root" or "without poison", one becomes fragrant. Combining all the ingredients of betel properly, one should make a fire offering with a hundred thousand. One will never be without betel. Apāmārga removes eye disease. For one struck by fever, it is done by sweeping with kuśa grass. Having recited eight hundred times over a thread, one should tie it on, and one becomes fortunate. If one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand of gruel together with curd, for as long as one wishes there will be no lack of food. If one makes a fire offering of a thousand oblations of ghee, one obtains three districts. It is said that beings of little merit should accomplish it by performing the practice three times. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills the size of a cowrie shell; each day one obtains sixteen paṇas. One should spend it all, leaving nothing over. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of donka flowers, and one obtains a hundred and twenty million new garments of various kinds.

It is accomplished by nothing other than giving prompted by compassion, likewise faith, and the approach to the deity. So it should be understood.

As for this king of ritual manuals, contained within all the teachings, this vidyā contained within all ritual manuals: its rites could not be taught in full even in hundreds of years, nor could they be taught by condensing them into this or that. In other rituals too, all those rites for accomplishing this vidyā should be performed, and likewise one accomplishes the actions that have been specifically stated. It is said that in this king of ritual manuals, those vidyā mantras, and whatever is to be accomplished by mantras, should be accomplished just so, with vast and utterly clear samādhi and the rest, and also by the rituals of other ritual manuals.

The conduct of the means of accomplishment of this king of ritual manuals, giving, the various kinds of rites of the means of accomplishment and so on, the maṇḍala rites, the vidyās of worldly and transworldly aims, the mantras, the ten rites of the great mudrā taught at length in all the ritual manuals, and the eight rites of the great bodhisattvas all become the same. That is to say, the ritual manual of noble Samantabhadra, the ritual manual of the four great bodhisattva youths, the Vast Mountain, the Universal Mountain, and the Tantra of Victory over the Three Worlds: these all come to be the same in the rites of conduct of all the great ritual manuals. Just so, what I have spoken and the king of ritual manuals taught by the infinite buddhas are to be easily accomplished, and one goes to the far shore of infinite awakening.

From the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the extensive chapter on the vidyā of the rites common to all the root ritual manuals of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, is complete.

The chapter on mudrās is to be written.

Then the great being entered into the samādhi that fully delights the mudrās, the rite of drawing the mudrās, common to the rites of all maṇḍalas and contained in all the tantras. With a broadly smiling face, he then spoke the characteristics of the mudrās:

The characteristics of the bindings,
Once known, are here set forth.
Of all the tathāgatas,
The mudrās of the family, in three parts:
A sun disk blazing all around,
The mudrā of the complete uṣṇīṣa.
The disk of the rising sun
Is the mudrā of the wheel-turning monarch.
That same uṣṇīṣa, raised a little,
Is the mudrā of the upward-rising uṣṇīṣa.
Entirely white, with a white parasol,
A blazing wheel, radiating out,
A mass of splendor, a vajra essence,
Invincible to others, wound three times:
The mudrā of the Victor's uṣṇīṣa.
A wheel with eight spokes and a hub
Is the characteristic of the wheel of Dharma.
A lotus with a precious jewel
Is the mudrā of the Jewel Essence.
That same, set within separate circles,
With a ring that performs all actions;
What is set in its center is not the center.
That eye is the eye of the tathāgata.
That same, lowered at its base,
Is the tathāgata's ūrṇā.
The sign of power above and below the tip
Is the power of the tathāgata.
A blazing mass, invincible to others,
Is the circle of the blazing essence.
All the mudrās, the alms bowl and the rest,
Through the distinctions of mantra or of mind,

Are the mudrās of the tathāgata family.

On the outer part of an eight-petaled lotus,
Petaled, complete and full,
The form of the moon with its digits:
The root mudrā, bearing a lotus.
Upon a swaying lotus,
A wish-fulfilling jewel firmly set:
This is the mudrā that brings abundance.
For Hayagrīva and for the one facing forward,
It is the anther of the lotus.
A white lotus is Pāṇḍaravāsinī's (the White-Clad One's);
That same anther is Yaśovatī's.
The utpala itself is Tārā's;
The utpala is also the moon's.
Slightly jeweled, with a wrathful frown,
Together with its stalk, it is Śrī's;
This is the family called "all the female messengers."
Opened and in full bloom, it is the queen of the family.
Common to all the rest
Are ointment, or the round flask and water pitcher;
Those forms, for the remaining ones,
Should be known by those who possess the vidyā.
With flames, they are the mudrās of the lotus family.

A five-pronged vajra,
Two-faced, the goddesses each in place,
With a garland of flames, the supreme vidyā:
This is the vajra of the vidyā king.
The samaya vajra set upright;
Rising up from the middle of a vase is Māmakī.
With one uṣṇīṣa is the Victorious One;
With two uṣṇīṣas, the Fully Victorious One;
With three uṣṇīṣas, the sign of the vajra.
The form of a spear in the middle
Is the sign of the vajra.
Having made a coil in the middle,
Coiled about the spear, it faces forward.

In a disk at the center of a vajra,
A disk blazing all around:
This is the Garlanded Lady.
At the tips of both vajras,
The garland-purifier holds a garland.
Slightly to the side of the crest,
A hook: Vajra Hook, the Hook Lady.
A staff is the Staff Lady; likewise
An axe set at the tip of the middle prong.
A vajra fist, also with a vase.
Then, the definite forms:
A single-pointed vajra with flames,
A vajra blade, the point of a spear;
For the female messengers they are long,
For the wrathful ones, short.
Radiating out is the vidyā king;
With an uṣṇīṣa slightly in the middle,
It is called the vidyā king.
A spear below and a vajra above
Is for the hosts; a spear above
And a vajra below, for all the vināyakas.
In the middle, in the four directions of the vedī,
A three-headed vajra with a vedī
Is for the maṇḍala of the vidyā king.
That same, here too, likewise,
Is with flames everywhere:
Make seven, five or three flames.
For all of the vajra family,
The characteristics of the five vajras,
With mudrās, are for the fierce ones,
Together with a vedī.
As for the others, the worldly ones,
With flames, but not fierce,
They are placed separately, without a vedī.
In accordance with how they are to proceed,
The worldly ones by virtuous conduct,
By knowing the transcendent tantra,

Do all things by the maṇḍala of the ritual manual. So it is said.

oṃ sa ra sa ra vajra prā kā raṃ hūṃ phaṭ svā hā
This is the fence.
oṃ bi phu rad rakṣa vajra pañja ra hūṃ phaṭ svā hā
This is the vajra tent.
oṃ kī li kī li vajra vajri bhu bandha bandha hūṃ phaṭ svā hā
This is the stake.

Thus these are the mudrās for drawing their maṇḍalas.

Then that great being once again entered into the samādhi called Fully Urging On the Mudrās, and said, "Those who engage fully and evenly in the mudrās and in all the vidyās, which are the same in the general rite of all the means of accomplishment, will without any doubt realize accomplishment."

Then, with the palms at the center,
Middle finger against middle finger,
That same placed with the tips of the index fingers looking at each other:
This is proclaimed as the samaya mudrā
Of the tathāgata family, together with its mantra.
First, complete it with the mantra;
Then come recitation and the rest.

Here again the mantra is:
namaḥ sarva ta thā ga te bhyaḥ oṃ ta thā ga tā ud bha vā ya svā hā
This is the samaya mantra of the tathāgata family.

The back of the left hand is turned the other way and bent back, the little finger of the hand is grasped, and with it the two thumbs, slightly extended, are pressed down. As for the fingers, this is the supreme samaya mantra, renowned in the vajra family.

Here again the mantra is:
namaḥ sarva ta thā ga te bhyaḥ oṃ vajra ud bha vā ya svā hā
This is the mantra of the samaya mudrā of the vajra family.

Making middle finger meet middle finger,
One joins the palms together,
The two fingers always without a gap.
First binding it, and likewise afterward,
Once it is complete, recitation and the rest follow.

Here again the mantra:
namaḥ sarva ta thā ga te bhyaḥ
These words are for the samaya mudrās.
oṃ padma ud bha vā ya svā hā
This is the samaya mantra of the mudrā of the lotus family.

These samaya mudrās,
These three, are proclaimed everywhere.
They are of immeasurable qualities,
Of great power, overcoming adversaries.
First, and always again, the practitioner
Should bind them before the deity;
He will obtain its accomplishment,
Swiftly, the pacifying and other rites he desires.
The infinite protectors of the world
And their great-souled heirs
Taught the great mudrās for all embodied beings
For the sake of accomplishment.
Always rising early,
One should bind them each and every day.
Pure, endowed with faith and intelligence,
Through that, accomplishment will arise.
The intelligent one who knows
These three samaya mudrās,
Holding them by the noble one's instruction,
Will gain their accomplishment without doubt.
One who understands these,
Even if the ritual is deficient,
As a practitioner achieves its accomplishment.
For the Mahābalas and the others,
In order to protect the mudrās everywhere,
Then that great comforter said:
"I, through the all-illuminating Meditation that fully urges on the mudrās, Always and in every way
Have taught the mudrās,
Common to all the Tārās,
Wherever the eternal is taught.

Whatever vidyās are in other ritual manuals,
These too should be applied."

Here again the characteristics of the mudrā are given.
Again, with the fingers interlaced,
Joined twice and so held,
The two index fingers fully extended,
And likewise the thumbs, O wise one,
With the mind well settled in equipoise,
One binds the root mudrā.
For the purpose of inviting Tārā,
These are joined with the vidyā.
This, the root mudrā of all the Tārās,
Bestows great benefit.
For the practitioner, all aims
Come from applying his own vidyā.
Even if the rite is deficient, through faith
The deities come at once.
That same, with the thumbs bent,
One should offer the welcoming water.
Then it becomes the welcoming-water mudrā,
Bestowing the fruits that people desire.
This is the mudrā of the welcoming water.

Bending the hand back, raise it and extend it;
Carefully set the thumbs as a seat.
That itself, for the sake of the accomplishment one desires,
Fully pleases the deities.
This is the mudrā of the seat.
The tips of the thumbs
Are bent, and whatever becomes separated;
Bathing, one accomplishes one's own excellent aim.
This is the mudrā of bathing.
Close beside the base of the fingers
Set the right thumb;
Wholly avoiding medicines
And the parts of living creatures, offer perfumes.
This is the mudrā of perfume.

Likewise the left thumb too
Is set, placed evenly;
One should offer various flowers
Endowed with supreme divine fragrance.
This is the mudrā of flowers.
The tip of the right index finger
Is bent and comes to rest on the middle finger;
With that, together with the thumb,
One should offer incense.
This is the mudrā of incense.
The left thumb and index finger
Are made to rest upon the middle finger;
Clean, pure, and perfectly endowed,
With that, one makes the offering of torma.
This is the mudrā of torma.
Having set the two thumbs
At the tips of the index fingers,
With excellent ghee of the cow
One should make offering to Tārā.
This is the mudrā of the lamp.
The index finger at the tip of the middle finger
Is joined at its outer tip joint;
The thumb and the ring finger
Hold the thread of the counting rosary.
This is the mudrā of holding the rosary.
Always facing toward the fire,
The ring finger of the right hand
Is placed at the joint of the middle finger;
On the middle fingers of the joined hands
The thumbs are slightly bowed.
This is the mudrā of inviting the fire god.
Having joined the ring finger and thumb,
One applies it together with the mantra;
With that one says, "Please depart."
This is the mudrā of urging on the invited fire god.

This is the mudrā encircled by the assembly of vidyās of all the Tārās. Practitioners who desire unequaled accomplishment should always apply it in common.

Having made the legs crooked,
The mudrā fully extended:
The two hands are extended, and a wheel;
First urging the thumbs,
One binds a fist, and the thumbs,
Lined up evenly, should be extended.
This mudrā with the middle finger raised
Is known as the staff mudrā
Of the wise bodhisattva.
The practitioner should apply it quickly;
It will bring about all accomplishments.
This is the staff mudrā.

Well joined together, the palms become hollow: this is the mudrā of joined palms. Where the thumbs are placed inside, it is the excellent seat: this is the mudrā of the excellent seat. When, from the mudrā of joined palms with hollow palms just described, the ring fingers are properly joined, this, the chief of the mudrās of joined palms, in the form of a lotus, in the form of rays of light, is the lotus mudrā. So the intelligent practitioner should understand. It should be applied for the sake of the seat. This mudrā is of great renown. This is the lotus mudrā. The root mudrā that was described, that utpala, is to be stated here. Opened by about a barley grain, the mudrā's lotus crest is itself a limb. The utpala mudrā is fully proclaimed as the mudrā of the Victory over the Three Worlds and as whatever is the mudrā of all the assemblies of Tārā. Bending it at the three joints is the mudrā of Bhṛkuṭī. That very one, with spaces between the joints, desired just so, is taught as the mudrā of vast samādhi. The mudrā with the index finger and thumb properly joined comes from the crest of Ekajaṭī. The vidyā mantras taught first in the samādhi: the second mudrā is Ekajaṭī's. Joining them together, extending the rest outward in the shape of hair, with the two middle fingers well placed in the form of a spear: this mudrā is explained as the spear. It makes the deity blaze, and it is perfectly the same; merely by showing it, all the wicked are destroyed. This is the spear mudrā.

These great mudrās
Are applied for the sake of the samaya.

Whoever knows them correctly
Will obtain accomplishment.
All the remaining mudrās
Are to be made immeasurable and countless.
The mudrās have been fully proclaimed.
What is said here in brief is this:
Beings whose minds are dull
Cannot perform the great rites;
So it is stated here in brief.

From the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the extensive chapter on mudrās of the root ritual manual of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā Ūrdhvajaṭā, is complete.

Then once more the great being, again meditating on the samādhi of the intrinsic nature of things, which accomplishes all rites, taught in this king of ritual manuals the means of accomplishment of the great vidyā of his own family called Pāṇḍaravāsinī, for the sake of protection and for averting obstructors:

namo ratna trayā ya nama ārya a ba lo ki te śva rā ya bo dhi satvā ya ma hā satvā ya darśa na parṣa ṇa bhyo śra ba ṇa sma ra ṇye na bā syā ma haṃ sarva satvā nāṃ sarva byā dhi ci kitpa ka tadya thā oṃ ka ṭe vi ka ṭe ka ṭāṃ ka ṭe ka ṭā vi ka ṭā vi ka ṭe bha ga va ti vi ja ye svā hā

This is the great vidyā of the one called Pāṇḍaravāsinī, which brings accomplishment through all vidyās and mantras. With this family vidyā of the lotus family one protects oneself, protects others, protects one's servants, keeps the painted cloth image in place, and protects the deities; and for this accomplishment of the painted cloth image, too, one should recite it after doing your means of accomplishment three times or seven times. Then one should begin the recitation of one's own deity, and accomplishment will come swiftly. At the end of the recitation, too, the obstructors pass into another existence. By constant recitation one also becomes free of disease. It frees one from all harm and makes one live long. One also finds happiness. It likewise serves for protecting oneself with a thread, for turning back harm, and so on.

Then, its mudrā is the general root mudrā of all the Tārās. That same, with the index fingers bound and made into a coiled shape, and the pair of thumbs also pressed together, is the mudrā of Pāṇḍaravāsinī. This too is the vidyā of the means of accomplishment through the mudrā, which proceeds evenly, without doubt. First, having bowed at her feet, one should then perform all the rites.

Again, in this great lord among kings of ritual manuals, one becomes able to carry out the noble Tārā, and all the splendid accomplishments of all the Tārās, protection, and the averting of all harm that has been done: the thorough application of the ritual procedures of the manual of all the noble Tārās. What is it? namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya candre candramati sūrye sūryamati ghuni ghuna la la le le sūte sūtani siddhi siddhi parākrame svāhā amitābhāsutā svāhā sarbeṣaṃ ārya avalokiteśvarāya svāhā This is the great vidyā of noble Tārā called the Noble Excellent One, which destroys all harms.

All of this, the vast conduct of the ritual procedures of Tārā's manual, the means of accomplishment, the mudrā rites and the rest, should be accomplished by means of the Moon of noble Tārā. Thus it should be fully understood. One may also accomplish it with the ritual procedure of another manual. Even without a manual one may perform this fierce rite: leaving out the syllables of homage, one should put hūṃ phaṭ in place of the svāhā of the bare vidyā. It may also be done with the ritual procedure of another manual. Whomever one wishes, one will bring under one's power. Or else one will destroy them. In short, one accomplishes whatever one wishes.

Then that great being looked upon the maṇḍala of the entire assembly and, with a pure intention, said to the great beings: "Those who practice this king of ritual manuals, who make offerings to it, and who write it down will attain the accomplishment of every aim. Loving-kindness toward all sentient beings and complete joy toward all sentient beings will also arise. It will protect them. Wherever this king of ritual manuals appears, that place will become a shrine, and that very place will come to be as if in the palm of one's hand.

"In the world with its gods, whatever son of good family or daughter of good family obtains this offering, this Dharma discourse, should practice it as yoga in every way. Knowing the strength and weakness of all sentient beings, one should make it clearly known. And it is to be practiced by everyone in a clean place, not elsewhere. Whoever performs it should apply it in such a way that it does not reach those who have no longing for it, setting aside the attitudes of such beings, nor those who are disrespectful toward the Dharma and the one who teaches the Dharma.

"In this king of ritual manuals, for all practitioners, the mantra that serves as the vidyā king for protection, whether one has leftovers or no leftovers, once one has made oneself clean, is this: namo retnatrayāye nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvaya mahāsatvāya oṃ amṛta udbhava hūṃ phaṭ svāhā This is the vidyā king called Hayagrīva. By empowering ash with it seven times, one protects oneself; and to protect one's attendants one should perform the practice of knots.

"As for this king of ritual manuals, under the constellation Puṣya or Aśvinī, in a virtuous undertaking, one should make offerings and a vast offering of a mass of tormas, and give alms to the Dharma and to the one who compiles the Dharma, and fine food to the Great Vehicle, and above all, with a fee. Then one should bring it to completion. One should act in that way: one should recite the secret mantra of the vidyā of the king of ritual manuals just as the king of ritual manuals says, and in that way it will not decline. Thus it also swiftly bestows accomplishment."

When the Blessed One, the great bodhisattva, had spoken thus, the world with its gods rejoiced in what the Blessed One had said.

Here ends the manual of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā, from the king of ritual manuals called Ūrdhvajaṭā, of the greatly extensive Avataṃsaka, the Bodhisattva Piṭaka.

Then the Blessed One was dwelling on Potala, king of mountains. There the Blessed One called to the bodhisattva, noble Avalokiteśvara, and said this: "Great being, you have explained that great king of ritual manuals of Ūrdhvajaṭā. Now speak the applications of the very king of ritual manuals, Ūrdhvajaṭā: that secret later tantra together with the great secret later one, easy in method and accomplished with ease, set forth with its ritual procedures going first; of the nature of great compassion, for the benefit of many people, for the happiness of many people, and out of compassion for those tormented by suffering; rejoiced in by the buddhas of the past; the vidyā common to all the Tārās."

The great being said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, if the Tathāgata permits it, and the other buddhas, the blessed ones, also rejoice in it, I shall explain it.

"First of all, the practitioner should for the present take up the three refuges, generate the mind set on awakening, see the maṇḍala as it is taught in the Ūrdhvajaṭā, and receive the pledges, the master's permission, and the means of accomplishment. Empowered with the empowerment, having offered a fee to the guru, and having received the vidyā within the maṇḍala, one should again take up the vidyā of any Tārā whatever, before a painted image or in the presence of a statue, and, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, recite it a hundred thousand times. Afterward, keeping a fast for three nights, on the full moon, before the statue or the painted image, one should perform the offering and the torma ritual, kindle the fire with kindling sticks from a milky tree, and make eight thousand fire offerings with sticks of khadira or black aloeswood measuring six finger-widths. At daybreak, having made a most vast night offering and the torma ritual as far as one's means allow, and having eaten food obtained by begging, one should have the accomplishment bestowed. Then the vidyā will be accomplished. Then one should perform all the rites.

Again, here there arises another rite of supremely secret accomplishment. One who wishes to accomplish the vidyā, having seen the great maṇḍala of the Blessed Lady, and having remained in that very maṇḍala in the pledges and the fire rite for as long as the ritual procedure prescribes, should draw three further maṇḍalas as taught in the rite of the means of accomplishment, the vidyā's thorough secret. Having offered a fee in full to the guru, and having received the vidyā in the center of the maṇḍala, one should kindle the fire with kindling sticks of a milky tree. First of all, one should make eight hundred fire offerings of gold powder in the measure of a tuṭi, smeared with ghee. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings with sticks of black aloeswood about a span in length, together with ghee. One should make eight hundred fire offerings of sticks of white sandalwood smeared with ghee. Then once again one should make eight hundred fire offerings of gold powder smeared with ghee. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of silver powder smeared with honey. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of brass powder smeared with milk. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of copper powder smeared with curd. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings with powder of pearls. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings with powder of red sandalwood. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of sticks of red sandalwood smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings with all kinds of grain, food, provisions and the like. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of cloth made thoroughly white, well washed, sweet-smelling and free of hairs.

Having recited once over each one, one should then combine guggulu, śrīvāsa resin, gandharasa, kunduruka and camphor, and offer seven oblations of them smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of fruits and the like, whatever can be found. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of fragrant flowers. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of the finest food. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of thread spun by a maiden, divided into portions and smeared with ghee. One should make a fire offering of seven oblations of karavīra flowers. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of ash. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of stalked plants without fruit, smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of fresh butter. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of kesara powder. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of buttermilk. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of turmeric powder smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of rock salt and salt smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of molasses. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of powdered lac resin. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of iron powder smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, smeared with ghee. Then one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of bilva seeds smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then one should make eight hundred fire offerings of black sesame together with parched rice, smeared with curd, honey and ghee, with gold and silver powder mixed together.

At this juncture all the gods look upon the practitioner. This, then, is my rite for employing the supremely secret, greatly secret practice of accomplishment. Rising, the practitioner should circumambulate the maṇḍala, bow to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, offer the finest fee to the guru, and make the request, either through someone or directly in his presence. Having seen the deities in the drawn maṇḍala and bowed to the guru, one should request the empowerment and also the permission for accomplishment. Then, by this rite of accomplished action, even one whose moral discipline is utterly broken will accomplish the Blessed Lady.

This rite for employing the means of accomplishment is supremely secret, an exceedingly great secret. In short, whatever action there may be, it will be performed by this. All its pacifying, enriching and beautifying rites: however one carries them out, in just that way accomplishment comes. And however the vidyā is applied, in just that way it will be well applied. However one carries it out, so one accomplishes; by this rite called Delight of All Vidyās, actions are supremely accomplished. In short, this lion's roar of mine: whoever delights in vidyā will perform the rites by it. It should be understood that the accomplishments rest, each one, in the palm of that very person's hand. This rite, too, should be understood by those who keep the poṣadha and have previously done the recitation, just as the noble one has taught. This is the rite of secret employment.

The rite of another means of accomplishment: one goes to the shore of the ocean and makes eight thousand stūpas of the Sugata, each a span in height. Before each one, one offers scents, flowers and so on, and recites eight thousand times. At the time of completion, one should eat begged food and offer a fee. Then the vidyā will be accomplished.

Another rite: on the bank of a river one should recite a hundred thousand times according to the ritual procedure, and it will be accomplished. There is also this other rite: one should recite a hundred thousand times on the summit of a mountain, and it will be accomplished. This is another rite: one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with oblations of ghee, and it will be accomplished. This is another rite: one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of black sesame smeared with curd, honey and ghee, and it will be accomplished. Another rite: one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with sticks of black aloeswood, and it will be accomplished. Another rite: one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with all kinds of flowers. This is another rite: one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with all kinds of decoctions, and it will be accomplished.

Another rite: bowing down before the great stūpas, one should recite a hundred thousand times, and it will be accomplished. Likewise, these means of accomplishment then become effective for the rites. By merely calling it to mind, one protects oneself. By merely reciting it, one brings about pacification. A fire offering of white mustard seed brings about enrichment. With the dung of a donkey and of a she-camel it becomes a fierce rite.

Making an effigy of the king out of grains of mustard seed and flowers, and cutting it up again and again with a sharp blade, beginning from the right foot, one should make eight thousand fire offerings. Over that same effigy one should make eight hundred oblations of ghee in three sessions a day for seven days. In one session, or a fortnight, or a month, the king becomes like a subject and comes under one's power.

For a universal monarch as well, one should make a figure out of eighteen palas of salt and, in the fire for the king, make fire offerings, cutting it with a sharp sword, beginning from its left foot. Within one month the king comes under one's power.

This is another rite: gathering up dust pressed by the sole of an enemy's foot that has not yet scattered, and kindling a fire well with wood of the elephant tree, one takes it up with the hand other than the right, and makes a fire offering of eight thousand oblations, reciting once over each. Within one month the king comes under one's power.

This is another rite: kindling a fire with wood of the king of trees, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of royal mustard smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Within one month the lord of the earth comes under one's power.

This is another rite: first of all, kindling a fire with wood of the king of trees, if one makes one thousand and eight fire offerings of lac resin together with salt, mixed with ghee, the lord of the earth will act as he is commanded.

This is another rite: grinding red karavīra flowers that no one has taken, one should make an effigy and, cutting it again and again with a sword, beginning from the right foot, make eight thousand fire offerings in a fire of karavīra kindling sticks. For each month one should make an effigy of thirty-six palas. Then the king comes under one's power.

Another rite: mixing red flowers and salt together and grinding them, one should make an effigy of eight palas and make fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword, beginning from the right foot. Then, if one does this with the wood prepared in the same way, every day for one month, the lord of the earth comes under one's power.

This is another rite: mixing mustard seed and blue utpala and grinding them, one makes an effigy of the person's form out of sixteen palas and presses it down. Kindling a fire well with wood of khadira and kovidāra, one should make eight thousand fire offerings for one month, every day, cutting it again and again with a sword, beginning from the head. Then the one represented by the effigy will serve one in every way, like a subject of the king.

Another rite arises: mixing salt from the ocean with salt, grinding it together with red karavīra flowers, one should complete an effigy. Kindling a fire well with kindling sticks of the king of trees, one should make eight thousand fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp blade, beginning from the right foot. Each day there is one effigy, each one equal to the others. The king will obey commands like a tamed elephant.

Another rite: mixing aśoka flowers, white mustard seed and nāgakesara, and grinding them with ko me and nābhāsa, one makes an effigy of sixteen palas. Beginning from the head of the effigy, cutting it again and again with a sharp blade held in the left hand, and kindling a fire well with wood of that very tree, one should make eight hundred thousand fire offerings. The others are done with the right hand, every day, continuing for one month; at midday one swiftly brings the others under one's power, as one wishes, like subjects.

Another rite: grinding all the fragrant substances mixed with the fruit of somarāja, one makes an effigy of sixteen palas. Kindling a fire well with kindling sticks of a milky tree, one should make fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sword from the navel down to the soles of the feet. Then, if one again makes fire offerings beginning from the head, every day for one month, the king will become like one who asks, "What shall I do?"

This is another, unsurpassed rite: grinding red sandalwood and salt in equal parts, one makes an effigy of twenty-five palas. Every day, in the morning hours, in a fire of red sandalwood wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword, beginning from the right foot. In this rite one offers the oblations with the right hand, and does the covering with it as well. In about one month the king will obey commands like a subject.

Another rite: one should mix cow dung that has not fallen to the ground thoroughly with salt and grind it. Then, making an effigy of twenty-five palas, the knowledgeable one should, in the afternoon hours, make eight hundred fire offerings, one effigy at a time, in a fire of palāśa wood, cutting each again and again with a sharp blade, beginning from the effigy's right foot. The rest of this rite is the same as the first; and it too, in about a month, makes the king carry out one's commands, like one who asks, "What shall I do?"

Another rite: with cow urine, dung, and earth from an anthill, together with honey in equal parts, one forms an effigy of twenty palas. For one month, every day, three times, at midday, in a fire laid with wood of the king of trees, one should make eight thousand fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword, beginning from the effigy's right foot. He will become like a subject.

If these means of accomplishment are applied at all times, in the seasons of autumn, spring, summer and winter, one will always and without fail obtain these great and incomparable riches.

Next come the practices for summer. Combining curd and ghee of matching kind and color together with karavīra flowers and grinding them, one makes an effigy measuring thirty palas. In the morning or the afternoon, kindling a fire with palāśa kindling sticks, and placing the effigy with its head to the right, one should make eight thousand fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword held in the right hand, beginning from the right foot. Within one month the king comes under one's power.

Another rite: mixing white mustard seed and saffron, grinding them well and making an effigy of ten palas, the rest of this is as before. The difference here is that one makes the fire offerings cutting it again and again with the left hand.

Another rite: grinding together ocean salt, barley and wheat, one makes an effigy of thirty palas and fills its mouth with the three hot spices. Having recited over a copper skewer in a fire of dustira, one pierces it from beneath the feet so that it comes out at the crown of the head. Then, placing the head to the right, cutting it up on palāśa leaves with the edge of one's own sword, one should make eight thousand fire offerings with the right hand in a fire of khadira, at whatever time one wishes. Within one month the king comes under one's power for as long as he lives. These are the means of accomplishment for the summer season.

Again, the rites of the rainy season arise here; these are to be carried out without fail in the rainy season. Combining pushel tsé, vālaka, sauvarcala and salt into one effigy, grinding them with rainwater, one makes an effigy of the king of twenty-five palas, and, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword held in the right hand, beginning from the right side, one should make eight thousand fire offerings in a fire of palāśa. This is done every day at whatever session one wishes, for one month. The king comes under one's power.

This is another rite: combining pushel tsé, priyaṅgu, ṭāṃpaṇa and fermenting agents, and grinding them with rainwater, one should make an effigy of the king of thirty palas. Cutting it again and again with a sharp sword held in the right hand, beginning from the head, and kindling a fire with dongka wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings every day for one month, at whatever session one wishes. He will certainly serve one in every way, like a servant.

This is another rite: mixing together sarjikā, milk, barley ferment, sweet flag, māṣa beans and sesame, and grinding them with the water of the body, one makes an effigy of the lord of men of thirty palas. Kindling a fire well with mango wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings every day for one month, at whatever session one wishes, cutting it again and again with the right hand, beginning from the head. The king comes under one's power.

This is another, supreme rite: combining ocean salt and cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, and grinding them with rainwater together with barley ferment, one makes an effigy of the king measuring thirty palas. If, every day for one month, at whatever session one wishes, one makes fire offerings in a fire of udumbara wood, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword held in the right hand, beginning from the right foot, the king comes under one's power. These are the means of accomplishment for the rainy season; for these alone accomplishment draws near.

Again, here another arises: the practice for late winter, in which one accomplishes in a single season. Grinding together husks of grain, barley stalks, gabina and sweet flag, one makes an effigy of the lord of the earth measuring fifty palas. Every day for one month, at whatever time one wishes, in a fire of nimba wood, with the effigy's head placed to the west and its feet facing east, one should make a thousand fire offerings, cutting it again and again with a sharp sword held in the right hand, beginning from the head. The king comes under one's power.

Another rite: grinding together chebulic myrobalan, the fruit of emblic myrobalan, śrīvāsaka, kunduruka and cow's ghee, one makes an effigy of the lord of men of thirty palas. Placing its head to the west, as before, in a fire of palāśa, one should make eight thousand fire offerings every day for one month, at whatever time one wishes. The king will always be under one's power, like a servant.

In the same manner: combining the fruit of beleric myrobalan, barley, tsikaseng with its leaves and roots, sesame and white mustard seed, and grinding them together with cow's ghee, one makes an effigy of the king of thirty palas. With its head pointing west, as before, in a fire of udumbara wood, one should make eight thousand fire offerings every day for one month. The lord of the earth will without doubt come under one's power.

Another rite: combining salt from the ocean, molasses, grains of emblic myrobalan and white mustard seed, and grinding them well, one makes an effigy of the king of thirty palas, with its head to the west. If, as before, in a fire of milky-tree wood, every day for one month, at whatever time one wishes, one makes eight thousand fire offerings in the fire, the king will carry out one's commands.

Another rite: combining sal ammoniac, ocean salt, barley, sesame and molasses, and grinding them thoroughly with cow's ghee, one makes an effigy of the king of fifty palas. Placing its head to the west, as before, at whatever time one desires, one should make eight thousand fire offerings every day for one month. He will always attend on one like a servant. These are what bring the practices of the winter season to accomplishment.

For that very purpose, these are supremely secret. Thus it is said; and may one again become a holder of the vidyā. In the secret practice, the accomplishment bound to the times for applying the practice is set in motion, the rites being performed in the fixed seasons as taught, summer and the rest. Then the king concerned will always be thoroughly bound. Nor is there any loss of accomplishment, for it is present together with the other rites.

Again, as for the other matter in the rite, the ways in which accomplishment slips away: these come from the particular nature of the beings, or from lacking the rite, or from the elements themselves, or from incomplete faculties; or from having no holy guru, so that one takes up one's own vidyā without the master's instruction and follows the Teacher's words piecemeal, without knowing much; or from lacking capacity, so that one has not seen the substances, has made no offering to the master of the maṇḍala of the ritual manual, and, toward the holy guru who is worthy of gifts, lacks the humility to say, "I myself do not know," and so, with neither realization nor vision, presumes to know the practices of the great rites. One who speaks what is without merit, one whose moral discipline is broken, whether monk or nun, layman or laywoman, one who has broken the bounds of his own training, who has fallen into a transgression of defeat, who is devoid of the awakening mind, who has committed a deed of immediate retribution, who has scorned the master, who has trampled the site of a stūpa with his feet, who steps on the master's shadow, who has scorned the Great Vehicle and come to hate the bodhisattvas, or who scorns all the gods: through these faults, any other rite such a person performs is not done properly but is done in some other way. That it is devoid of accomplishment is because it transgresses that very rite.

For whoever does these things, that accomplishment is destroyed in a single instant. The little recitation of the vidyā that was done remains for another time, and whatever is not an accomplishment bound to the time of practice comes about here.

Again, whatever holder of the vidyā, by the rite of secret practice, at this juncture makes a fire offering of eight hundred or five hundred oblations smeared with ghee, together with the king's footprint: the king, for whom all this is done in that very rite, comes under one's power for as long as he lives. For a universal monarch too, one who performs the practice at the times as taught will certainly not be without accomplishment, nor will the accomplishment decline.

Then again the eight thousand great beings remained without saying anything. Then again the bodhisattva, the great being Mahāsthāmaprāpta, as a small offering of virtuous conduct to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, who had come down among many beings, rose from his seat, circumambulated the Blessed One three times, and bowed down. He bowed to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara and said this to that great being, who was endowed with the samādhi of the equality of all beings: "Great being Avalokiteśvara, speak the king of samādhis of the great bodhisattvas called Beholding All Beings. Great being, speak it!"

When he had said this, that great being, meditating on the king of samādhis and smiling, free of obstructors, looked toward the Blessed One. The Blessed One gave his permission, and he said to the bodhisattva, the great being Mahāsthāmaprāpta: "Whoever follow you in great compassion, the ultimate, the supremely secret, and all the coemergent tantras: these will be worshipped by the world with its gods, and even one whose moral discipline is utterly broken will not go to the lower realms. Whoever obtains the ritual manual of the Blessed Lady, noble Tārā, knows it, recites it, copies it, practices it, worships it, writes it in a volume and keeps it in his home, and places it on his head at the time of lying down and at the time of rising from bed, will be the glory of all the gods, all the nāgas and all the yakṣas; he will be rid of all great misfortunes and will come to great wealth. He will also live long. In short, he will come to know the whole of my tantra. That great being will be known by all the gods, nāgas, yakṣas and the rest. Because he will overpower them by this, I shall explain it."

Then, in an instant, the great being meditated on the king of samādhis and took on a nature of broad smiling, and he was seen with his locks bound upward, three-eyed and four-armed, with the Blessed One Amitābha seated on his head, speaking evenly, holding a lotus in his hand, a great divine body, a form that cannot be fathomed by looking, the liberation of all beings, the very center of the tathāgatas, of whom one can conceive only a little. Keeping the Blessed Lady Tārā in mind, bowing deeply to all the buddhas, and seated upon a jewel lotus, he said:

"For the sake of the certain benefit and happiness of the conduct of all beings, their individual practices, the individual conduct of the bodhisattvas, and the sprouts of bodhisattvas, through whatever activity of skillful means the Buddha himself employs, for the sake of perfecting the perfection of generosity, for the sake of attaining the first ground, and for the sake of attaining unsurpassed buddhahood: just as the Buddha, the Blessed One, unsurpassed in the world with its gods, the charioteer who tames persons, continually generated a great accumulation of merit, in just that way, by the power of merit, one will be born as a universal monarch, adorned with the excellent marks praised above all beings.

"Then, by the deeds done before by one of the bodhisattva family, acting likewise, oneself always a universal monarch, one should bring that other universal monarch too under one's power, by just the rites described before. Through that one also becomes lord of the whole earth. Those who have no faith in the Buddha, the Blessed One, will through faith itself come within the circle as well. Or a governor of a province, by whatever merit he has, is made to rule as king above beings. Fully enjoying his enjoyments, he also carries out his duties. And if one applies just the rites stated earlier, he too becomes one's subject.

"Next comes the practice for bringing under one's power kings, ministers and other beings: one should carry it out without fail in the seasons of autumn, summer and the rains."

To bring a king's minister under one's power, mix equal parts of dust from his footprints and mustard seed, and for one month, at whatever hour one likes, at a single sitting, perform eight thousand fire offerings; he will come under one's power. Another rite: with jasmine flowers mixed with sesame he comes under one's power as before. Another rite: with mustard seed together with sprouts of dūrvā grass, perform eight thousand fire offerings for one month, and he comes under one's power as before. Another rite: mix neem seeds, pāśī, kaktukāma and powders with salt, and for one month, at whatever session one likes, perform eight thousand fire offerings; he will come under one's power. Another rite: by eight thousand fire offerings of sesame mixed with arjuna flowers and smeared with ghee, he comes under one's power. Another rite: perform eight thousand fire offerings of neem seeds smeared with pungent sesame oil, and he comes under one's power as before.

One who wishes to bring the king's purohita under his power should, for one month, perform eight thousand fire offerings of mustard seed smeared with curd, honey and ghee; beginning at whatever session one likes, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings at a single sitting, he will come under one's power. Another rite: perform eight thousand fire offerings of camedaka pulses smeared with ghee, and he comes under one's power as before. Another rite: perform fire offerings with iṅguda oil, and he comes under one's power as before. For all of these, kindle the fire with kindling sticks of cassia wood and make the fire offering, or else in a fire of palāśa wood.

To bring a brahmin under one's power, make fire offerings in a fire of milky-sapped wood for one month; beginning at whatever session one likes, if one performs eight thousand fire offerings at a single sitting, he will come under one's power. To bring a kṣatriya under one's power, if one makes fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with pungent sesame oil in a fire of khadira wood, he comes under one's power as before. To bring a vaiśya under one's power, make fire offerings of śāli rice meal together with curd in a fire of mango wood, and he comes under one's power as before. To bring all the lowly under one's power, kindle the fire with thorny kindling sticks, and for one month, beginning at whatever session one likes, if one performs at a single sitting eight thousand fire offerings of mustard seed together with poison and neem, that one will come under one's power.

Further, what applies here in common to the rites that accomplish the supreme, the middling and the lesser is this: whoever is named when one performs a fire offering of eight thousand white mustard seeds comes under one's power. To bring a woman under one's power, perform eight thousand fire offerings of sesame, and she comes under one's power. On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one should make a fire offering of seven oblations of white mustard seed smeared with ghee, curd and honey. Whoever is named comes under one's power within three days.

One who wishes to bring a maiden under his power should make an offering of eight thousand raṅgaṇa flowers to the noble Avalokiteśvara, and she comes under one's power. If one makes an effigy of wax, places it in one's own hand and recites eight thousand times, whoever is named comes under one's power. Before the painted image one should present eight hundred white flowers, and whoever one desires comes under one's power. Conch, musk, sweet flag, bezoar and costus should be put together and ground. Having consecrated it with eight thousand recitations, whoever drinks it, or whoever it is given to, comes under one's power. To bring a brahmin woman under one's power, if one makes eight thousand fire offerings of bilva sprouts before the painted image, she comes under one's power. By reciting seven times in a charnel ground, any woman before whom a man sits and recites eight thousand times comes under his power. Taking a stick one finger in length and consecrating it with eight thousand recitations, whoever and whatever one summons comes under one's power.

One should present eight thousand hundred-petalled flowers before the noble Avalokiteśvara. Taking one flower from among them, one should look at a woman and wave it around; she comes, and comes under one's power. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite in a solitary place. Then one makes a son of Vāsuki out of anthill earth, sits close by it, and recites until it moves. In this way it will be accomplished. The son of Vāsuki himself gives food worth twelve māṣas. He reveals matters of the past, the future and the present. Eating milk and barley gruel and reciting eight thousand times before the image, one obtains enjoyments of every kind.

For one month one eats alms food, and on the eleventh day of the bright fortnight one keeps a fast for one night. Having made a great offering before the image, one should take hold of the feet of the noble Avalokiteśvara, of the image, and recite until the image moves. When it moves, one will see whatever one wishes. One becomes a king of all accomplishments. Whatever one conceives in one's mind, one can bring about. One will live for five thousand years.

Entering the Ganges, one should recite one hundred thousand times. Afterward, for the same length of time, one makes a stupa of sand before the image, combines honey and milk, and makes fire offerings. All the nāgas will come. They will do everything one says. Climbing to a mountain peak and setting up the painted image, one should make fire offerings of sandalwood chips smeared with sesame oil, and the yakṣas will come. They will do everything one says. Setting up the painted image in a forest, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of honey and long pepper combined, and all the vidyādharas will come. They will carry out every command. Setting up, beneath a solitary tree, a stupa containing the essence of dependent origination, one should recite a hundred thousand times.

When the hundred thousand recitations are complete, one who keeps the poṣadha vows should have a trident made of bodhi-tree wood, well formed and possessing the proper characteristics, and perform fire offerings until a full thousand is reached. On the day of the full moon, one anoints it thoroughly with fine perfume, makes offerings to the painted image as one's means allow, and takes it in the right hand. One should practice with it through the whole night, until it blazes. When it blazes, one becomes a second lord of bhūtas, a tamer of the hard to tame, the Great God whom no sentient being can withstand.

Entering the ocean, one recites a hundred thousand times. One then sees whatever nāga one wishes, Sāgara the nāga king and the others. He also bestows a precious jewel upon one. By taking it one becomes a vidyādhara, the king of all the nāga vidyādharas. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite seven hundred thousand times. Then one who keeps the poṣadha vows should have a craftsman make a copper vessel, and on the full moon of the month of miracles fill it completely with every kind of grain and medicine, set it before the painted image, and recite until it blazes. Putting one's hand into it, whatever one desires will come forth. This is the sādhana of the excellent vessel.

Entering a river that flows into the ocean, one should recite a hundred thousand times. Afterward, on the full moon, one makes a stupa of jewels or of earth and has a painted image made in that very place. On the full moon of the month of miracles one fills vessels completely with every kind of grain and medicine and sets each before the painted image. Having made a great offering, one takes up with the right hand the stupa of jewels or of earth that was set there, sits close by in the cross-legged posture, and should recite until it blazes. One becomes a vidyādhara who holds the wish-fulfilling jewel.

Setting up the painted image at a stupa that contains relics, one should recite a hundred thousand times. On the full moon of the month of miracles one makes offerings of every kind and sets out long rows of lamps as well. Holding in the right hand a banner from which white cloth hangs, one should recite until it blazes. One becomes a vidyādhara of the banner, and goes everywhere without hindrance.

On the full moon of the month of miracles, having made a great offering to the painted image, one anoints a volume of the Blessed Mother, the Perfection of Wisdom, with the scent of fine perfume, winds garlands of fragrant flowers about it, holds it in the left hand, sits close by in the cross-legged posture, and should recite until it blazes. One becomes a king of vidyādharas, and goes wherever one wishes.

Having a very beautiful maiden who practices the conduct of a bodhisattva bathe well and adorn herself with ornaments, one makes offerings before the painted image as one's means allow. Holding her firmly with the left hand, one should recite until the right hand blazes together with her. Just as she is, together with her, one becomes a vidyādhara.

Placing one's hand upon a single sign, one should recite until one no longer sees the retinue. When it is no longer seen, all beings come and bestow all three accomplishments.

When the moon is seized by Rāhu, or when the sun is seized by Rāhu, one wraps cow bezoar in leaves of the bodhi tree and, at a stupa containing relics in a temple of Maheśvara, should recite until smoke rises from it. Making a tilaka mark with it, one becomes invisible.

Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite a thousand times in three sessions on the shore of the ocean or at the foot of a tree. Within seven nights one sees the treasures that lie in the ocean, and should take as much as one wishes. Eating lentils, one climbs a mountain and should recite eight thousand times. Within twenty nights the gold and precious jewels that lie in the mountain are shown and spoken of to one, and one should take as much as one wishes. On the bank of a river that flows to the ocean, or at the edge of a wood, one should recite day and night for one month. One sees all of them on the bank of the river, and should take as much as one wishes.

To bring a man or a woman under one's power, draw an effigy on the ground with charcoal, sit upon it, and recite eight thousand times in three sessions for three days and nights. They will come under one's power.

One who desires the king, or the king's garments, should put fully pleasing white flowers into water that has been recited over once. Within seven nights one obtains garments. Merely by reciting eight thousand times over cow's ghee one becomes fortunate. Through the recitation one causes the stationary and the moving to shift in a special way.

Taking an iron sword about a finger in length, one sets up the painted image at a stupa that contains relics and makes a vast offering. Surrounding the sword clockwise with leaves of the aśvattha tree, one sets it down and should recite until it blazes. By taking it up one flies together with one's retinue, surrounded by a thousand vidyādharas, known to all the vidyādharas, and lives for an intermediate eon. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite seven hundred thousand times.

Having done the preliminary practice, on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight one makes a vast offering to the painted image. Either living on what the Saṅgha provides or eating alms food, one takes realgar bought at a hero's price, and with it, as described, draws on the ground a lotus with a hundred petals. Sitting close by the lotus petals, one should recite day after day until the lotus breaks through the ground and rises upward. Twenty vidyādharas seated on the lotus petals will appear. A divine celestial palace will appear as well. Then he, together with his retinue, ascends that celestial palace and flies. It becomes a divine celestial palace adorned with many precious lotuses. He lives for an intermediate eon. He goes even to Sukhāvatī and returns again. He obtains births in various different bodies.

If one sprinkles a dry tree with water consecrated by eight thousand recitations, it will come to abound in flowers and fruit.

Entering a dried-up river, one should recite a hundred thousand times, and water will spring forth. If one recites in a river that is full and flowing, it becomes dry ground.

If one wishes to bring a king or a king's minister under one's power, one should present, before the painted image, eight thousand flowers of whatever kind one can find, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight. One should also make eight thousand fire offerings with oblations of salt. The king will surely come under one's power. With that same rite, from the eighth day through to the eleventh, one recites eight hundred times in three sessions over bezoar; if one makes a tilaka mark with it, whoever one wishes comes under one's power.

If one wishes to bring a boy or a girl under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed before the image. If one takes ash from that place and makes an effigy, whoever's name one speaks comes under one's power.

For the sake of purity, one takes cow's ghee and, at the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu or the sun is seized by Rāhu, puts it in a copper vessel and should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment come about. If it stirs, one becomes able to retain whatever one hears. If it smokes, one gains the power of rejuvenation. If it blazes, one becomes invisible and remembers one's former births.

If one makes fire offerings with a hundred thousand arka flowers, one is granted a hundred thousand coins. One should present eight thousand flowers before the image, and one obtains eight coins. If one makes eight thousand fire offerings of śāli rice and thick gruel smeared with ghee before the image, one obtains five hundred coins. Having done the preliminary practice, one should make eight thousand fire offerings smeared with curd, honey and ghee before the painted image. One obtains three hundred coins. One should make eight thousand fire offerings before the image. One obtains more than a hundred coins.

One who wishes to bring the lord or the lady of a household under his power should make eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of arka before the image, in three sessions over seven nights. The lord of the household comes under one's power. One who wishes to become the lord of a household oneself should make eight thousand fire offerings of dūrvā grass before the image, in three sessions over seven nights, and one becomes the lord of the household. One who wishes to bring the noble Saṅgha under his power for as long as he lives should present eight thousand arka flowers before the painted image. For seven nights one should declare whatever aim one desires and pursues. By reciting constantly one obtains riches.

One should make eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills before the painted image. One obtains a thousand pieces of gold. Before the image, for one month, one should make a thousand fire offerings of kunduru incense. One obtains treasures of various kinds. Before the image, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of arka kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains a thousand coins.

One who wishes to bring an enemy under his power, keeping the poṣadha vows, should make eight thousand oblations of mustard seed in a fire of palāśa wood before the image, in three sessions. The enemy comes under one's power. Over the space of one month, one should make eight thousand fire offerings with lac. All people will be delighted. One makes eight thousand fire offerings of śāli rice and thick gruel, and in three sessions one obtains a hundred kārṣāpaṇas. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite a hundred thousand times.

Having done the preliminary practice, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight or the eleventh day of the dark fortnight, one takes an undamaged corpse of a man, washes it, adorns it with ornaments, and dresses it in the guise of a courtesan taken as a bride. Having worshipped it with scents, flowers and incense, one presses down firmly on its chest with the left foot, recites the vidyā again and again at the crown of its head, and strikes it with the flat of the hand, until it rises. Having risen, it reveals the past, the future and the present. Then one should strike it with a sword made of iron forged under Puṣya. It turns into the substance of silver and gold. Then one should say, "I do not want this. Give me what I desire!" Then it vomits forth a wish-fulfilling jewel. Taking that, one becomes a vidyādhara of the wish-fulfilling jewel, swift as thought, and lives for an intermediate eon.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, one enters a river that flows to the ocean and, for about a month, should let fall into it a hundred thousand jasmine flowers, each the size of a māṣa bean. One obtains ten districts. Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should offer a hundred thousand lotuses into a river that flows to the ocean, and one finds a hidden treasure. Having done the preliminary practice, one enters that same river and should offer a hundred thousand jasmine flowers. At the end, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of black sesame. One obtains ten districts together with their lands.

If one makes pills of aśoka wood, each about the size of a camedaka pulse, and makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of them smeared with curd, honey and ghee before the image, one finds whatever one seeks. By this very rite, using kindling sticks of apāmārga, one obtains a thousand pieces of gold. If one mixes aśoka and ḍeḍeka and makes a hundred thousand fire offerings smeared with apāmārga and the three kinds of rice grain, one obtains a king's daughter and queen.

One who wishes to bring kings together with their ministers under his power should kindle a fire before the image with kindling sticks of aśoka, and for one month make eight thousand fire offerings of aśoka flowers alone, smeared with curd, honey and ghee; one will see treasure in one's own house.

Entering a river that flows to the ocean until the water reaches one's waist, one should offer a hundred thousand hundred-petalled flowers. Then, having recited eight thousand times over a hundred-petalled flower, whoever holds it, or is given it to look at, comes under one's power. One who wishes to bring a king or a king's minister under his power should make eight thousand fire offerings of mustard seed smeared with curd, honey and ghee for one month, and he comes under one's power.

He does whatever one says. To bring a king fully under one's power, one should make eight hundred fire offerings before the image, for one month, in three sessions, in the order just stated: first of mustard seed together with curd and honey, then together with lita, and then together with honey. He will come under one's power.

One who wishes to bring the king's purohita under his power should make fire offerings with puffed rice together with ghee. For a kṣatriya, with it mixed with milk porridge. For a vaiśya, with it together with milk. For a śūdra, with offerings smeared with sesame oil. For all three, with fire offerings of salt. For a widow, with fire offerings of māṣa beans. All sentient beings are brought under one's power with sesame seeds smeared with pungent sesame oil. For all of them there are eight thousand fire offerings in a fire of palāśa wood, at a single sitting, over one month.

Having become pure and keeping a fast day and night, one kindles a fire before the image with kindling sticks of bilva and should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva. One will see treasure. For twenty nights, eating milk and barley gruel, one makes fire offerings of white mustard seed in a fire of palāśa wood, and one finds riches. Eating milk and barley gruel, one should recite five hundred thousand times. Then, before the painted image, for one month, in three sessions, one makes eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with ghee, and causes a stream of riches to fall wherever one wishes. Keeping the fast with regard to food, one should make fire offerings with white mustard seed. This pacifies harm from the lunar mansions.

Before the image, for eight nights, one kindles a fire with bilva wood and should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with sesame. This reveals treasure. Or else one obtains lordship. Having made a vast offering before the image, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, for one month, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of hundred-petalled flowers in a fire of palāśa wood. One obtains riches as one desires. At a stupa containing relics, one kindles a fire with palāśa wood and should make a hundred thousand fire offerings smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains the enjoyment of ten districts. Before the image, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, eating milk and barley gruel, one should offer a hundred thousand lotuses. One finds treasure. Or else one obtains lordship. These alone make up the rite of the kumuda lily; one obtains from the king whatever one seeks.

Before the image one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva and sesame mixed together. This reveals treasure. Before the image, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of chips of priyaṅgu wood smeared with curd, honey and ghee in a fire of bilva wood. One comes to great wealth. Before the image, keeping a fast day and night, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should make fire offerings with a hundred thousand lotuses smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains lordship.

Before the painted image one should recite three hundred thousand times. Then one should make three hundred thousand fire offerings of sugarcane kindling sticks, each one finger in length. The painted image will move greatly. Its clusters of flowers will sway, and then one obtains the rank of a kṣatriya, or else whatever one has thought of in one's mind.

To bring a great man under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings before the image of jasmine flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee, at a single session, over one month. He will come under one's power. To bring a country under one's power, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings before the image of karavīra flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains lands. One who wishes to become governor of a country should make three hundred thousand fire offerings of cassia flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One becomes lord of the country. This is done in a fire of palāśa wood. One who wishes to become a commander should make a hundred thousand fire offerings before the image of kunda flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee, and one obtains command. Before the image, in a fire of palāśa wood, one should make ten thousand fire offerings of tangzung flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One becomes lord of a district. Before the image, if one makes three hundred thousand fire offerings of karavīra flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee, one comes to wear the triple diadem.

Before the image, each day, with offerings made first, beginning at whatever session one likes, one then kindles a fire with arka wood and should make eight thousand fire offerings, each of about a pinch of tree-gold powder smeared with fragrant sesame oil. Within six months one obtains kingdoms. Wealth not yet arisen will arise. Within three years one obtains great kingdoms. By this very same rite one should make fire offerings of iron filings, and within three years one becomes able to bind weapons. By this same rite one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of oblations of saffron smeared with fragrant sesame oil. One becomes a great lord of wealth. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings with oblations of every kind of fragrance and oblations of ghee. One becomes governor in whatever place one wishes, or else obtains whatever lands one desires. If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of camphor oblations smeared with ghee in a fire of palāśa wood itself, the king will be pleased. In a fire of palāśa wood one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of sandalwood kindling sticks smeared with fragrant sesame oil. One becomes governor of a great country. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of oblations of gold in a fire of palāśa wood. One becomes such that no being can withstand one. If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of aguru kindling sticks smeared with ghee, one becomes able to retain whatever one hears. If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of pāśaka kindling sticks smeared with fragrant sesame oil, great illness is pacified. If one makes a hundred thousand fire offerings of neem fruit smeared with fragrant sesame oil, one releases whatever bondage one wishes.

Take ghee from a cow whose calf is of the same colour, consecrate it with a hundred thousand recitations, and drink it: one will become supremely sharp of mind.

In a fire of arka wood one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of arka flowers smeared with fragrant sesame oil. One will find great favor with all beings. All of these fire offerings should be made before a stupa containing relics and before the image. If one consecrates a flower or a fruit with seven recitations, whoever it is given to will be pleased.

One who keeps the poṣadha vows, on the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, at a stupa containing relics, should smear a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground and make offerings with scents, flowers, incense and the like. Then, kindling a fire before the image with udumbara wood, for one month, at a single sitting, eating the caru oblation food, one should make eight thousand fire offerings with kindling sticks of the brahma tree. One becomes sharp of mind.

To bring a brahmin under one's power, one should make fire offerings of milk before the image for one month. He will come under one's power. To bring a kṣatriya under one's power, if one makes fire offerings of caru before the image, he will come under one's power. To bring a vaiśya under one's power, one should make fire offerings of barley mixed with curd, and he comes under one's power as before. To bring a śūdra under one's power, one should make fire offerings of barley smeared with fragrant sesame oil, and he comes under one's power as before. For others, those whom no one else can overcome, one should make fire offerings smeared with poison, and they come under one's power. By looking at an enemy and reciting, he becomes afraid. With water consecrated by eight hundred recitations, whether the vidyā is applied once or seven times, one's word prevails in the king's palace.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of guggulu pills smeared with ghee before the image in a fire of khadira wood, in three sessions. One obtains whatever one wishes. At a stupa containing relics, eating milk and barley gruel, recite a hundred thousand times; then one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of sugarcane kindling sticks, each one finger in length. One comes to wear the triple diadem.

One who wishes to accomplish the pills should combine the stamens of cassia flowers, nāgakesara and white sandalwood, make pills the size of a juniper berry, and wrap them in three unequal metals: first in copper, then in silver, then in gold. Then one puts the pills in a casket and, before the Blessed Mother, at a stupa containing relics, keeping a fast day and night, at the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu, performs the rite of offerings and torma, sets them in front, and should recite until they sound forth khaṭa khaṭa. Then one should offer one to the deity who gives prophecies. The others should be given to the servants. One should offer them to the Buddha, the Blessed One, because he is the guru of gurus. Then one should buy them back at a price. Whenever one places one in one's own mouth, one becomes invisible. One should watch for the supreme proclamation. One will live for ten thousand years.

If one makes eight thousand fire offerings before the image of kadamba flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee, whoever one thinks of comes under one's power. Entering a river that flows to the ocean and keeping a fast, one should offer eight thousand nāgakesara flowers, and one obtains some clothing. Before the image one should offer eight thousand jasmine flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee. All beings will be pleased. With these kumuda lilies alone the king will be pleased.

To bring a king under one's power, in every case one should make fire offerings smeared with sandalwood powder for one month, and the king comes under one's power. To bring a brahmin under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of kuruṇṭaka flowers. To bring a vaiśya under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of saugandhika flowers. To bring a śūdra under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of kiṃkarāṭa flowers. To bring a girl under one's power, one should make eight thousand fire offerings of yūthikā flowers. These fire offerings should all be made before the image in a fire of vikaṅkata kindling sticks. For a widow, one should make fire offerings of vikaṅkata kindling sticks smeared with ghee.

At a stupa containing relics, before the image, one makes a tilaka mark with bezoar consecrated by seven recitations and should go to the royal palace. Everyone will be pleased. Having recited eight hundred times over one's face, one should go to the royal palace. Everyone will be pleased.

Before the image, one should first make fire offerings of sprouts smeared with ghee in a fire of palāśa wood. Within seven nights the other is pacified. For pacifying oneself, one should make fire offerings of milk together with ghee in that same palāśa fire, in three sessions. Within seven nights there will be pacification.

Before the image, one places ghee in a copper vessel and, at the time when the sun or moon is seized by Rāhu, performs the torma rite and should recite. The vessel stirs. The ghee too becomes accomplished. One should make a tilaka mark on the forehead. All people will be pleased. Drink it, and one becomes sharp of mind.

To gain powers, before the noble Avalokiteśvara, place cow's ghee in a vessel of silver and copper and recite a hundred thousand times according to the rite. Then one should accomplish it at the time of an eclipse, and it becomes accomplished. If one drinks it, powers arise: one gains swiftness, flight, being unobstructed and the like. If one anoints the body with that same ghee and enters a fire, one is not burned. If one enters water, one's feet do not sink in any water at all. If one anoints the hands, it renders red-hot iron harmless.

Eating lotus roots, one takes realgar before the image, places it in one's joined palms, and should recite until the eclipse is over. By making a tilaka mark with it, all living creatures will be pleased. By this same rite, one puts a single māṣa bean in the mouth and should recite until a sprout appears. With the powder of the sprout one brings beings under one's power.

For summoning another, one renders him immobile with the sprout.

One who wishes to accomplish the rite with realgar should place it on an aśvattha leaf before the image and recite a hundred thousand times. When the sun or the moon is seized by the planet in an eclipse, one should accomplish it by the rite. When it is accomplished, if one makes a tilaka mark with it, one becomes invisible.

One who wishes to bring satisfaction should kindle a fire with kindling sticks of a milky-sapped tree, and then make a fire offering of eight thousand kindling sticks of a milky-sapped tree smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. Then the vidyā, together with all that belongs to it, is satisfied.

Go to a solitary place where a brahmarākṣasa or some other being dwells apart, and recite a hundred thousand times. By that it will be accomplished here. It bestows treasure.

Eating milk and barley gruel, install a painted scroll at a stūpa containing relics, and recite for one year. Then, on the eighth or the eleventh day of the dark fortnight, observing a fast day and night, one should make extensive offerings and present torma. To the yakṣas one presents the yakṣa torma: cooked legumes, kākamoṭika, curd, dried cheese, cakes, sokhavadhi, and the like. Outside, having presented a torma for all the bhūtas, one should then, before the painted scroll, in a fire of milky-sapped kindling sticks, make a fire offering of eight thousand kindling sticks of a milky-sapped tree, each a cubit long, smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. As one sits on a mat of kuśa grass, a wealth-giving yakṣa will come. When he stands before one, one should offer him a guest offering of scented water. Then he declares, "Tell me what I am to do for them." If one says, "Yakṣa, carry out my command; let it be so," he becomes invisible. Then he bestows on each of many hundreds in the retinue, one by one, immeasurable divine food. The gods bestow ornaments such as jeweled crowns, elixirs and rejuvenating elixirs, and medicines. Or else, whatever one seeks.

In a place where yakṣiṇīs dwell, make a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen on the ground, and recite a hundred thousand times. Then, on smokeless embers of khadira wood, one should make a fire offering of eight thousand pellets of guggulu smeared with curd, honey, and ghee, continuing until dawn, until the gods one longs for come. Together they bestow a boon. Or else they bestow divine medicine. If one eats it, one lives for an eon.

Gathering śārthi, dūrvā grass, and thorns, one should make a fire offering of eight thousand of them smeared with ghee. One obtains clothing.

Having empowered sweet flag with eight thousand recitations, if one puts it in the mouth, one becomes the foremost speaker in whatever disputes one wishes. Recite over fragrant sesame oil and anoint the mouth with it: one becomes the foremost of speakers in the royal court. Having empowered eye ointment with eight thousand recitations, one should apply it to the eyes as an ointment. One becomes the foremost of speakers in disputes.

When the sun or the moon is eclipsed, put antimony in the mouth and recite until the eclipse is over. Then, having protected it, one should grind it according to the proper rite. Having empowered it with eight thousand recitations, one should apply it to the eyes as an ointment. One becomes invisible, to all beings.

Before the painted scroll, one should make a hundred thousand fire offerings. One sees Śrī. One obtains the boon of her who bestows boons. Keeping silent and eating alms food, recite a hundred thousand times. One becomes invisible. Before the painted scroll, holding the left hand clenched in a fist, recite a hundred thousand times. Then it is accomplished. By clenching the fist one becomes invisible, and by opening it one becomes visible.

At a stūpa containing relics, or on the bank of a river, install the painted scroll and make a fire offering of a hundred thousand lotuses, and one sees Śrī. With māṣa beans, likewise, she bestows a boon. By this same rite, make a fire offering of a hundred thousand blue utpala lotuses, and one sees treasure. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand pellets of guggulu, and one obtains a hundred thousand gold coins. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand fragrant flowers, and one obtains ten million garments. With guggulu incense eight hundred times, one obtains what the mind longs for. Before the painted scroll, each day make a fire offering of eight thousand white mustard seeds, and in three days one obtains twenty-five gold coins. By this same rite one should make fire offerings for seven nights. One truly obtains gold coins.

Make an effigy of salt and, cutting it again and again, make a fire offering of it. The man or woman one desires comes under one's power. Even with a quarter of it, one obtains clothing.

One should make a fire offering of eight thousand white mustard seeds smeared with ghee. In three days it pacifies all obstructors.

Placing one foot in water and the other likewise on dry ground, one should recite until the foot standing in the water becomes light. One is freed from evil.

Kindle a fire with arka wood and make a fire offering of eight thousand mustard seeds; in seven days this exhausts the obscuration of karma.

Take equal parts of powdered brāhmī, guḍūcī, sweet flag, and long pepper, and with honey recite over it twenty-one times before the noble Mañjuśrī. Having consecrated it further, do likewise for seven days, and one becomes intelligent. By two weeks of days and nights, one becomes supremely intelligent. By two months of this practice, one retains whatever one hears. Doing eight thousand recitations before the painted scroll or before the image, one is afterward able to read. Likewise, each day one should recite in silence. One becomes intelligent.

Whether one is bound or imprisoned, merely by reciting one is freed. By reciting while looking at robbers, one cannot be harmed by robbers. Having empowered sesame oil with eight thousand recitations, anoint the head with it, and all people will be pleased.

Before the Buddha, the Blessed One, smear a maṇḍala, strew it with flowers, empower a palmful of water with seven recitations, and one should drink it. In seven days one becomes intelligent. It removes earlier faults of speech.

Recite eight hundred times over one measure of brāhmī juice, one measure of milk, and one measure of honey, and one should drink it each day, for as long as twenty-one nights. One becomes intelligent, able to grasp five hundred verses, to hold them, and to preserve them.

Reciting seven times over water and pouring it on the head binds the protective circle. Reciting twenty-one times over a khadira peg, together with guggulu incense, causes it to be revealed. For curing poison, use water and a knife. With a leafy twig recited over seven times, one overcomes grahas. With white flowers or guggulu incense, this is for those seized by grahas. With bathing or with a thread, one binds oneself in protection. At night one should make a fire offering of white mustard seed mixed with sesame and smeared with ghee, and it will grant a boon.

At a stūpa containing relics, on the full moon, first smear a maṇḍala; then, with eight full vases and eight garlands, and burning incense of aloeswood, turuṣka, sandalwood, and kunduru, one should recite. One is granted bodily accomplishment.

At a stūpa containing relics, eating milk and barley gruel, and having made offerings as one can afford, one should recite a hundred thousand times. One becomes able to perform rites such as stupefying and bewildering.

Eating flour and entering the water of a river, one should recite a hundred thousand times. One becomes able to perform subjugation, invisibility, and accomplishments with realgar and the like.

At an abode of nāgas, one should make a fire offering of gathered karbāpa. The nāgas come under one's power. One finds whatever one seeks.

Having empowered the fingers of the right hand with protection, recite in the king's presence. He comes under one's power. By this very rite alone one frightens kings, buffaloes, tigers, leopards, and the like. By a fire offering of sesame one brings the rasavatī under one's power. By selling flesh one protects oneself and protects others. Empowered with seven recitations, one binds the crown knot. By reciting in battle, and in a dispute at the royal palace, one becomes victorious.

One who wishes to consecrate with water should take four vases free of flaws at the base, of blackening, and the like, adorn their mouths with leafy twigs, put in flowing water, scents, and all kinds of seeds, and empower them with eight thousand recitations. If one consecrates oneself with that water, one is freed from all obstructors and misleading forces. For thirst and fever, empower scented water with eight hundred recitations and sprinkle it, and one returns to one's natural state.

For a vetāla, by the application performed with a khadira peg, having strenuously and properly prepared the device, place four men holding swords in the four directions, sit close at its heart, and make a fire offering of iron filings with an iron ladle. Its tongue will certainly come out of its mouth. Cut it off with a sharp sword, and it becomes a sword like a blue utpala. By taking it, one rises up together with one's retinue and becomes a king of vidyādharas. One lives for a hundred and ten million years. When the time comes, one is reborn among the gods.

Having made a forehead plate of iron possessing the proper characteristics, one should recite a hundred thousand times before the painted scroll. Having remained in retreat for seven nights, make a burnt offering completing a thousand. Then, on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, observing a fast for three nights, make extensive offerings, perform the rite of torma, and carry out the protection, the boundary, the binding of the maṇḍala, and the like. Having offered a feast to the noble Saṅgha as best one can, and having bowed at their feet, one should request permission from the noble Saṅgha. Before the painted scroll make a heap of white mustard seed, and over it one should offer recitation upon recitation.

For all incursions of grahas, use guggulu incense. It fully pacifies all untimely death. For suppressing all winds and clouds, use recitation. Reciting over white mustard seed and pressing it, one should scatter it into the sky, and water becomes still. Reciting seven times over a khadira peg, one should drive it into the ground. All enemies or weapons are suppressed.

For all fights, disputes, and quarrels, empower a five-colored thread with eight hundred recitations and tie it on a hidden place of the body; unrest, fights, disputes, and quarrels are subdued. For all poisons and mantras, reciting seven times over water, one should make a fire offering, and they become harmless.

One who desires wealth, being pure and wearing clean clothes, observing a fast day and night, should offer kunduru incense before the painted scroll. In a dream it shows what is virtuous and nonvirtuous. By reciting seven thousand times, it gives silver. For causing division among all, use ashes.

One who seeks wealth should install the painted scroll at a confluence of rivers or at a pond, in a clean spot, and begin recitation and fire offering. One should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of lotuses smeared with curd, honey, and ghee, or else two hundred thousand. Then one obtains all one desires. By three hundred thousand fire offerings one becomes invisible. By three hundred thousand fire offerings one obtains a kingdom of one's own. By two million one hundred thousand fire offerings one becomes a great lord of wealth. One obtains whatever one undertakes. One accomplishes travel through the sky, invisibility, driving in the ritual dagger, and the like.

One should burn a hundred thousand dūrvā grasses smeared with ghee. In seven days one prospers. One should make eight thousand fire offerings smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. In twenty-one nights one prospers. One obtains a thousand gold coins.

One should set it upon molasses, and all enemies become paralyzed.

Having made a maṇḍala of cow dung, place a thread in the center of the secret maṇḍala, offer guggulu incense, and one should recite the mantra. If the person will live, the thread dances. If the person will not live, it does not dance.

Having made a maṇḍala of cow dung four cubits across, offer flowers and incense, and remaining there one should recite. For enemies, reciting over it seven times each, one should bury it in the ground.

All curses and hostile sorcery come to nothing.

Against the army of an enemy, recite over a staff and one should throw it there. There will be no harm.

For possession by the forgetfulness-causing spirit, kindle a fire with apāmārga kindling sticks and make a fire offering, burning black sesame and white karavīra flowers. It destroys the forgetfulness-causing graha. For all grahas one should tie on a black thread. For cutting off sudden fright, tumors, blisters, foul sores, and mange, use white earth, and there will be no harm to any being.

When the sun or the moon is eclipsed, observe a fast, recite over sesame oil, smear the face with the sesame oil, and one should enter the house of an enemy. He will come to have a mind of loving-kindness. By this same rite, having empowered a protective cord with eight hundred recitations, tie it on the hand, and one should enter battle. One becomes invincible to others.

Rising at the proper time, make a maṇḍala at a stūpa containing relics, recite seven times over each of three palmfuls of water, and one should drink them. One should cook while reciting mentally, until it is done. Then recite three times over the first mouthful of food, and, having recited eight hundred times outside the proper time, one should set it aside. All the obscurations of karma are purified. Speech too becomes completely pure, and each day one retains a hundred ślokas. Likewise, for seven days, by reciting seven times over water.

Wrapping realgar inside an aśvattha leaf, one should recite before the painted scroll until the three kinds of accomplishment appear. Before the image one should make a fire offering with eight thousand apāmārga kindling sticks. The king, together with the king's ministers, comes under one's power.

One observing the poṣadha vows, drinking only milk or eating leaves, should recite three hundred thousand times at a stūpa containing relics. Then, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one should make a fire offering of eight thousand black sesame seeds. One obtains a thousand kārṣāpaṇas.

Before the image make a fire offering of eight thousand pellets of guggulu. Whatever man or woman one desires comes under one's power. Make a fire offering of eight thousand pellets of guggulu. All people are pleased. Or else, one commands speech in the royal palace.

Putting sweet flag in the mouth, one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment appear. When it grows warm, it brings others under one's power. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. When it blazes, one travels through the sky.

If, having installed the painted scroll at a stūpa containing relics, one makes a fire offering of a hundred thousand lotuses, beginning on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, the king comes under one's power.

Have a craftsman who observes the poṣadha vows make a wooden staff of red sandalwood, sixteen finger-widths long. Then, before the painted scroll, observing a fast day and night, one should recite three hundred thousand times. On the full moon, having made extensive offerings, take the wooden staff in the right hand, and one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment appear. When it grows warm, all whom one wishes to have speak will quickly speak. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. When it blazes, one travels through the sky.

Having covered the painted scroll entirely with a white cloth, one should recite until it blazes. One flies up together with a retinue of a thousand.

Before the painted scroll, eating milk and barley gruel, keeping silent, on a seat spread with kuśa grass, beginning on the first day of the month and continuing until the full moon, one should recite one million six hundred thousand times. Making a fire offering of eight thousand udumbara kindling sticks dispels all illness.

Then, having made an iron lotus six or eight finger-widths across, install the painted scroll at a stūpa containing relics, and one should recite at the three times of day. One should recite five hundred thousand times. Afterward, having made extensive offerings and observing a fast for three nights, place the lotus before the painted scroll, and one should recite until it blazes. Merely by taking it up, one's hair, together with that of one's retinue, becomes curled and coiled. Recite ten million times mentally, and it will be accomplished. Whatever one thinks of is brought to perfection, lacking nothing.

In whatever direction one travels, recite seven times over a clod of earth and one should throw it. All the vicious are suppressed. Having empowered a garment, one should wear it. One becomes unobstructed in every undertaking. If one wipes the face with it, one becomes the foremost of speakers. It makes one gravely poisoned rise up again. It frees one from bhūta grahas. It renders obstructors powerless.

If the painted scroll is installed in a house, one becomes the master of the house. If it is installed on a heap of grain, the grain increases. Likewise, if one installs it on a leaf, that brings its accomplishment. In the same way, immeasurable praise of one's qualities arises.

Then, if one wishes to perform pacifying, make a fire offering of eight thousand fragrant flowers smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. One becomes supremely at peace. For increasing, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of a milky-sapped tree, and make a fire offering of eight thousand portions of sesame, thick rice gruel, peas, lentils, and the like, smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. There is supreme increase.

Whether with the painted scroll or without it, one observing the poṣadha vows, having taken up the three refuges, generates the awakening mind. One should recite ten thousand times. Then, on the full moon, when the moon is eclipsed, having given torma to all who have desires, observe a fast day and night, and one should recite throughout the night. Then one becomes able to perform all rites. One takes up all distinctions by oneself. Merely by wiping with it, one restores life. Empower water with seven recitations. If it is quickly drunk, one returns to one's natural state.

For grahas and living creatures, make a fire offering of a thousand white mustard seeds. Having settled oneself at the entrance of an asura cave and remaining there steadfastly, one should recite a hundred thousand times. An asura maiden will surely come and lead one inside. Dwelling there, one finds whatever one seeks. One dwells wherever one wishes.

On the shore of the ocean, install the painted scrolls one by one, and by reciting a hundred thousand times over the painted scroll, even Sāgara the nāga king will admit one into his own abode. There one should seek the wish-fulfilling jewel. Having taken it, one will enjoy all that one desires. One will travel in the fields of the tathāgatas. One will live for an eon and become unobstructed.

Having empowered a thread spun by a young girl with eight thousand recitations, one ties knots in it. All obstructors and misleading forces become bound.

At a river or on an island, eating alms food, one should recite three hundred thousand times. One becomes invisible. Eating caru, recite a hundred thousand times at a confluence of rivers. One becomes invisible. One becomes lord of all the invisible ones.

One who is properly restrained should take an alms bowl in the right hand, sit in the cross-legged posture, and recite before the painted scroll until it blazes. One becomes a vidyādhara. One lives for an eon and is honored by all the hosts of vidyādharas. For the alms bowl, the ringed staff, and the like, it is by this same rite. When the sun or the moon is eclipsed, a monk should accomplish it, doing everything by this alone. He lives for an eon, practicing pure conduct, travels without obstruction, and acts just as he wishes.

Eating cow's urine and barley gruel, one should recite three hundred thousand times. One obtains eight districts, each of one's own.

With pusīlāka leaves one destroys scorpions, spiders, and all poisons. By reciting two hundred thousand times one averts at all times the hour of death by snakebite. One becomes an abode of jasmine flowers.

Smear mallikā, utpala, kumuda, saugandhika, and the like with curd, honey, and ghee, and make eight thousand fire offerings at the three sessions. Whether it be a king, a king's minister, or a brahmin chaplain, in seven nights one brings him under one's power.

For one whose vidyā has declined, write with saffron on a leaf of birch bark, and one should recite a hundred times before the Blessed One at a stūpa containing relics. By dawn it will be restored to fullness.

Then, when the moon is eclipsed, having made offerings of scent, flowers, and incense beneath a bodhi tree, take one measure of realgar and place it on seven aśvattha leaves. Having subdued the body, one should set it down. In that very instant it arises, and one becomes a vidyādhara. One becomes unobstructed by all gods, nāgas, and yakṣas. Having the divine ear, swift as thought, with the color of the rising sun, one becomes much sought after by all vidyādharas. One is surrounded by hundreds of vidyādharas.

One who wishes to accomplish gorocana should recite a hundred thousand times while eating milk and barley gruel. When the moon is eclipsed, placing it upon leaves of the saptaparṇa tree, set out the gorocana at a stūpa containing relics, and one should accomplish it by the rite as it has been taught, until it blazes. If one makes a tilaka mark with it, one becomes a vidyādhara adorned with ornaments, taking whatever form one desires. One lives for a thousand years.

One who wishes to accomplish the eye ointment should take one measure of sauvīra, heat it well with fire, and become versed in the practices of eye ointment. When the moon is eclipsed, entering the water, one should recite until it becomes a kumbhāṇḍa. Merely by applying it for an instant, one becomes a splendid vidyādhara, fully adorned with every ornament, unharmed by the vidyādharas who wear earrings and crowns, and one flies up together with one's retinue. One lives for five thousand years.

One should make a fire offering of a hundred thousand lotuses or utpalas. One obtains a thousand gold coins each time. One should make a fire offering of a hundred thousand palāśa kindling sticks. One obtains a thousand gold coins.

Observing a fast for three nights and eating milk and barley gruel, one should accomplish it. It brings the king under one's power.

Kindle a fire with kindling sticks of a milky-sapped tree, and for seven days, with white mustard seed smeared with curd, honey, and ghee, for seven days or for twice seven, at the three sessions, make eight thousand fire offerings. Even those of superior understanding come under one's power.

For bringing a king's minister under one's power, kindle a fire with arka wood and make a fire offering of black mustard seed for seven days, and he comes under one's power.

For bringing the four castes under one's power, before the painted scroll, for seven days, at the three sessions, make eight thousand fire offerings of black sesame smeared with curd, honey, and ghee. All beings come under one's power. By this same rite make a fire offering of sesame. It brings all beings under one's power.

Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand arka kindling sticks. One obtains a hundred measures of gold. Make a fire offering of pināka wood. All people become pleased. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand portions of betel powder. One will have a crown bound on one's head. With the right hand one dispels diseases of the eye. For one stricken with fever, by sweeping with kuśa grass. Recite eight hundred times over a thread spun by a young girl and tie it on. One becomes fortunate.

Kindle a fire with arka wood and make a fire offering of a hundred thousand sesame seeds. Inexhaustible food will appear. Gather all the grains in one place and make a fire offering of a hundred thousand. All the grains become inexhaustible. Make a fire offering of the banyan tree with its hanging roots. One's goods will never run out. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand pieces of the honey tree. Wealth will arise.

Combine realgar, ox bile, and bamboo manna, empower the mixture with eight thousand recitations before the painted scroll, place it on a leaf of the bodhi tree, and recite. Then by that the gorocana will be accomplished. Whatever woman or man it is given to comes under one's power.

Make a fire offering of eight thousand oblations of parched rice, for as long as seven days. One becomes free of obstructors. Before the painted scroll make a fire offering of a hundred thousand dongka flowers. One obtains a hundred and twenty million fine garments. Make a fire offering of barley flour together with curd. For as long as one lives, one will never lack food. Make a fire offering of a thousand oblations of ghee. One obtains a village. By reciting ten million times one becomes a vidyādhara with a retinue of a hundred.

One who wishes to bring a woman or a man under one's power should recite twenty-one times over pellets of guggulu and make a fire offering of them. The person whose name is spoken comes under one's power. If one recites twenty-one times over sweet flag and puts it in the mouth, one becomes the foremost of speakers. Recite a hundred thousand times on the road. One obtains whatever delicious food and drink one takes. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand. One becomes endowed with glory. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand portions of sesame and thick rice gruel together with māṣa beans. One brings under one's power whomever one wishes.

Kindle a fire of sindhuvāra and make a fire offering of the first portion of everything cooked. As it is accomplished, one's food never runs out. One obtains the crown one desires. Make a fire offering of a hundred thousand nimba flowers. All people become pleased. Make a fire offering of unbroken śāli rice and thick gruel. One obtains a village.

Kindle a fire with aśoka wood and make a fire offering of a hundred thousand divine oblations. One obtains, each in turn, whatever maiden one seeks. Before the painted scroll, burning incense of aloeswood, one recites a hundred thousand times. Then the king of that land will do as one commands.

With a vessel of milk, make a fire offering of a hundred thousand mango leaves. One is freed from all illness. Making a fire offering of a hundred thousand priyaṅgu kernels, one obtains gold coins to that same measure. Make a fire offering of eight thousand oblations of milk. One is freed from illness. If one seeks food, make a fire offering of food.

Climbing to the summit of a mountain and eating alms food, one should recite three hundred thousand times. At the end, observing a fast for three nights, kindle a fire with aśvattha wood and make a fire offering of sesame smeared with curd, honey, and ghee throughout the night. One becomes a king. By a fire offering of sesame and ghee one accomplishes everything. Make a fire offering of honey. All people become pleased. Make a fire offering of ghee. One becomes endowed with splendor. Make a fire offering of milk. There will be peace. Make a fire offering of curd. There will be increase.

On the summit of a mountain, at a stūpa containing the essence of dependent arising, a stūpa containing relics, remain there and offer a hundred thousand lotuses. One becomes a king or the lord of a land. Even if the rites are not accomplished, one obtains a hundred districts.

For bringing a king under one's power and for drawing him in, when the moon is eclipsed, have the ghee of a tawny cow placed in a copper vessel, and one should recite over a copper spoon until the three kinds of accomplishment appear. When bubbles arise, one will retain whatever one hears. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. When it blazes, one travels through the sky.

Having done the preliminary practice, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight and continuing until the full moon, hang garlands of flowers and a canopy all around, make a maṇḍala one span across with fragrant scents, make offerings of various kinds of scents and flowers, present torma, and one should offer eight thousand lamps of ghee.

Then, on the full moon, one should sit cross-legged and recite until one hears from somewhere the sound baghastanita. Then signs will quickly arise: the flower garlands sway, the tips of the lamp flames grow, rays of light appear, and the painted image moves. When one has seen these, whatever one is practicing will be accomplished, and one's negative deeds will also be exhausted.

One who wishes to bring under control gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas should, before the painted image, for seven nights in three sessions, kindle a fire with charcoal of acacia wood and make eight thousand fire offerings of salt, sesame, and white mustard seed mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. They will come under control.

Empower any one of water, ash, or white mustard seed with eight thousand recitations and scatter it in the four directions. The binding of the maṇḍala will thereby be accomplished.

Before the painted image, offer torma of various kinds and make vast offerings; place gorocanā on a lotus petal, sit cross-legged, and one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment occur. From an unusual scent, one brings all beings under control and lives for a thousand years. When it grows warm, one lives for a thousand years, travels thousands of yojanas, and returns to that very place. One becomes king of all the accomplished ones, accomplishes things by mind alone, and produces food by mind alone. Then, when it blazes, one appears with the color of the rising sun, in the form of a sixteen-year-old, with hair of a bronze hue, living for an eon, and, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of vidyādharas, one goes wherever one wishes.

Having done the preliminary practice, before the painted image, in the fortnight of the Month of Miracles, bathe three times a day and change one's clothes three times, and recite eight thousand times in three sessions, until the full moon. At the end, fasting for three nights, one should accomplish the outer robe. Anoint it thoroughly with all kinds of scents, light eight thousand lamps, and sit cross-legged; smear a maṇḍala with scents, place the robe upon it, press it down with the left hand, and one should recite until it flies up. At once it flies up to the height of a palm tree. While it stays at just that height, one should pay homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas and take it. As soon as one has taken it, one becomes a vidyādhara. Gods, nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, and mahoragas will line up before one, pay homage, and become one's servants. When one constantly recites over the robe, then, by directing one's mind, one makes a person of malicious mind fall down; by reciting again mentally, one makes him rise.

Make a pellet of fresh butter, place it on four aśvattha leaves, and one should recite until it becomes warm. Eat it without touching it with the teeth. Merely by eating it, whatever one thinks of will all come about: many objects of desire, the strength of ten men, and one lives for ten thousand years.

Having done the preliminary practice, on the full moon, before the painted image, fasting for three nights, make offerings with scents, flowers, and so on to a stūpa containing relics. Then place a sword made of kuśa grass on seven aśvattha leaves, take it up in the fingers of the fist, and one should recite until it emits light. By taking it up, one travels through the sky, and no being will be able to do one harm.

With ash, a fence of fire is made. With water or gravel, the directions are bound.

Take natural collyrium, recite over it twenty-one times, and apply it to the eyes: all people will be pleased with one. Empower collyrium, tagara, costus, sweet flag, lotus filaments, gorocanā, nāgakesara, and musk with eight thousand recitations and anoint oneself all over: everyone will be pleased.

Empower salt with twenty-one recitations; if one scatters it facing toward someone's house, within seven days that person will come under control. If one empowers a handful of water seven times, whoever bathes in it or drinks it comes under control. By reciting twenty-one times over whatever one sees, one brings under control all that one sees. With a hundred thousand fire offerings of guggulu, one wins over the kṣatriyas, each one. By offering blue lotuses, white water lilies, white lotuses, and so on, one brings under control whomever one wishes.

During an eclipse of the moon, fasting for three nights, make offerings for one night; then, to the right of one's body, smear a maṇḍala with red sandalwood, press the maṇḍala with the right hand, and one should recite while calling out, or until the earth of the maṇḍala turns black. The hand becomes accomplished. By clenching the fist, one becomes invisible.

To accomplish the topknot, begin on the first day of the bright fortnight and recite until the juncture of the month. Then, having empowered the topknot with eight hundred recitations, go on the alms round; when one is seen in that way by those who give alms, at that time it is accomplished. On the first day, one round of begging; likewise up to the seventh day. Even one who lacks merit accomplishes it.

During an eclipse of the moon, recite over milk and drink it: it becomes a great elixir. With a hundred burnt offerings of kindling sticks of vāśaka, one brings under control whomever one wishes.

Empower a sword with eight hundred recitations and place it at the door of a cave or of a temple. By bowing toward the cast-metal door panels, one opens the door. Reciting once, one protects oneself. Through burnt offerings of milk, women come under control. By mind alone one paralyzes accomplished secret mantras. One opens all secret mantras. One brings asura maidens under control. Through burnt offerings of all kinds of scents, women of the kṣatriya class come under control. Through fire offerings of pure deodar, tīrthika ascetics and renunciants come under control.

With the hand placed at the heart, recite a hundred times. This thoroughly pacifies all negative deeds and summons all beings. Place the hand on the head and recite eight hundred times. This paralyzes beings and thoroughly pacifies negative deeds. If one recites over a bilva fruit and gives it away, it summons all beings. To the right of the deity's body one should recite countless times. Women and men, boys and old men too will come under control. By empowering ash seven times, one should make it into armor. No being can break through it. Reciting eight hundred times over water, let it be applied to the limbs: illness will be pacified.

Fasting for a day and a night, make a sword of acacia wood, take it up on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, and in a charnel ground one should recite until it blazes. Having taken it up, one will travel without obstruction. One becomes a sword vidyādhara, with bronze-hued, curling hair, living for an eon, and much sought after by all vidyādharas.

Or else, during an eclipse of the sun or the moon, having done the preliminary practice, rise at dawn and make offerings to the painted image; eating food obtained by begging, and with gifts, one should have accomplishment bestowed. Then the activities of speech will be fully accomplished. Make eight thousand fire offerings of dūrvā grass and coral mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. This frees those who are bound.

To make oneself supreme, recite eight thousand times over gorocanā and make a mark on the forehead with it; if one then goes to the king's palace, one will be supremely praised. So too in receiving and in speaking.

To bring a girl under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of jasmine flowers. One obtains the girl. By this same rite one obtains a woman in her full bloom. All fevers, all grahas, and all seals too are released when that word is given. It cures all poisons. It frees from grahas.

The activities of speech itself are these: it turns back elephants; it turns back thorns; it paralyzes bandits and armies, paralyzes weapons, paralyzes chariots, paralyzes fire, and paralyzes boats; it summons; it brings down possession on those with fangs or even those without fangs; it raises the dead; and it dispatches them and fevers.

Eating milk and barley flour, recite a hundred thousand times. Fasting for three nights and wearing clean clothes, at a solitary liṅga (ekaliṅga), set it down on kuśa grass, make great offerings, make a torma for all the bhūtas, and, staying to the right of the deity's body, combine orpiment, realgar, collyrium, madder, and gorocanā, wrap them inside an aśvattha leaf, and one should recite until the three kinds of accomplishment appear: it grows warm, it gives off smoke, and it blazes. When it grows warm, one gains the use of the magic sandals and lives for five thousand years. One brings all beings under control. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible and can live for a thousand years. When it blazes, one becomes the vidyādhara who is lord over all vidyādharas. One has a lifespan of an eon, and by reciting a hundred thousand times more and more, one attains supernormal knowledge of speech. One binds above and below and all the directions, seizes with certainty, and one's word too goes unobstructed.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish a vetāla, take a corpse with its limbs intact, and whether in a charnel ground, at a lone tree, at a crossroads, or at a solitary liṅga, honor all the bhūtas with torma, smear a maṇḍala to the right of the body of the Great God, and offer torma. Bathe the corpse and adorn it with ornaments, draw a maṇḍala with ash, lay it in the center with its head pointing east, and cover the body with a white cloth. Having stationed a good companion to guard the directions, sit cross-legged upon it, and in its mouth make fire offerings of sesame and white mustard seed until it brings forth a jewel from its mouth. By taking that jewel from its mouth, one becomes a vidyādhara with bronze-hued, curling hair, the color of the rising sun, possessing the strength of a thousand elephants, taking whatever form one desires, going to the abodes of the gods, living for a great eon, and going wherever one wishes.

Another vetāla rite: by this same procedure, take a man's corpse, empower four pegs of acacia wood, and with this very mantra protect oneself, and likewise guard the directions. Sit upon it and make burnt offerings of ghee until a tongue comes out of its mouth. One should cut it with the sword empowered earlier, and so on until a hundred tongues have come out. By taking that very tongue, one flies together with a retinue of a hundred. One becomes the supreme among vidyādharas, and it becomes a weapon. One lives for a great eon.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, or on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one should grind antimony collyrium at night. Empower it with eight thousand recitations and apply it to the eyes, and one brings all beings under control. One should recite over scented paste and anoint oneself, and one brings all beings under control. Recite over incense and fumigate oneself with it, and one brings all beings under control. Recite over a flower and place it on one's head, and one brings all beings under control and delights them. Recite over the crown-knot and tie it: there will be protection everywhere, and the binding of all beings as well.

One who wishes to bring a widow under control should make fire offerings of black gram. She will come under control at once. To bring a yakṣiṇī under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of lotuses. She will come within three nights. If she has not come by then, she is made to come within seven nights. She will grant boons. She fulfills everything just as one wishes. If one wants a girl, make fire offerings of parched rice. One obtains the girl one desires. If one wants Śrī, make fire offerings of lotuses. Padmā or Śrī will come. If one wants victory, make fire offerings of curd. One will always be victorious.

If one wishes for increase, make fire offerings of ghee. One will obtain wealth.

Remaining pure at all times, to bring under control the piśācas within five nights, the yakṣas and rākṣasas within nine nights, the nāga kings within ten nights, the gandharvas and the water-born beings within half a month, the asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and goddesses within twenty-one days, all the hosts within twenty-two nights, and the king's queen within a month, make eight thousand fire offerings of sweet-tasting ears of grain mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. They will come under control.

To bring men and women under control, make a hundred thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed mixed with curd. One obtains wealth. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of red oleander and cassia flowers. One obtains a princess. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of bilva fruit mixed with curd. Śrī will arise in one's house. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of hundred-petaled flowers mixed with curd. One obtains a hundred coins. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of the golden-colored tree. One obtains a thousand cattle each time. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of flowers. One obtains lands one after another. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of arka. One obtains a thousand coins. Make a hundred thousand burnt offerings of fresh butter. One obtains five districts, one after another. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of white lotus flowers. One obtains four koṭis of garments. Make a hundred thousand burnt offerings of milk. One obtains cattle and wealth in full measure. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of the bodhi tree. Without having to take anything, it makes one's house prosperous. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of jasmine flowers. One obtains a hundred pairs of embroidered garments. Make a hundred thousand burnt offerings of milk rice. Within seven nights one brings brahmins under control. Make a hundred thousand fire offerings of white water lilies. One obtains a wife together with riches.

Climb to the summit of a mountain and recite a hundred thousand times. The king of whatever land one recites in will come, and without one's having sought it, one will be fully endowed with sons and with all wealth. He protects one together with one's children.

Enter a river that flows to the ocean and cast in a hundred thousand fragrant flowers. Afterward the flowers will come back against the current. One should eat them without touching them with the teeth. Each day one will take in five hundred passages of scripture and retain them.

Having done the preliminary practice, recite a hundred thousand times before the image. Then go to wherever a treasure lies, smear with fragrant scent vases that are all sound and without blemish, fill them completely with white sandalwood and water, empower them with eight thousand recitations, and one should place them at the site of the rite. All the earth will split open. Even a treasure will be made to rest at the depth of a man's height. Water does no harm; the treasure stays on top. By mere recollection, all harms are pacified.

Naming a woman who does not desire one, recite over ghee and drink it. One will become fortunate in love.

The means of accomplishing the vajra: make a three-pronged vajra sixteen finger-widths long from iron obtained under Puṣya, anoint it with red sandalwood, make vast offerings to the painted image, and, paying homage each day, one should eat alms food. At the end, fasting for a night, at a stūpa containing relics, set up the painted image and make vast offerings, light a hundred lamps, and sit on a mat of kuśa grass; holding both ends of the vajra in the hands, one should recite until it takes hold. One should fly in seven circuits, and one will become a universal monarch among the vidyādharas. One lives for a great eon.

In the month of Puṣya, beneath an aśoka tree, fasting for three nights, make eight thousand fire offerings of black pepper, and put one peppercorn in the mouth: whoever one looks at will come under control.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, fasting for a day and a night and wearing clean clothes, offer lamps, banners, flower garlands, and so on before the painted image. Place water that one has prepared oneself in a copper vessel, recite over it for one period and drink it, and again by the same rite throughout the whole night. At dawn one should eat alms food as directed by the Saṅgha. After eating, eat also ghee, flour, and pomegranates, and then sleep will come. The fields of knowledge from the four directions enter one's mouth, and one will retain whatever one hears.

Enter a river that flows to the ocean, clench the right hand into a fist, and recite for thirteen days. One makes all who have died of poison and of fangs rise again. With the fist one makes all grahas enter a person, and also sets the person free.

With cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, smear a maṇḍala four cubits across, and on the eighth day of the dark fortnight make fire offerings of kindling sticks of karśara mixed with curd, honey, and ghee, eight thousand each day, up to the fourteenth. In this rite, one wins the favor of the palace of an angry king. With companions, go into a forest, draw a man with charcoal of kupiti wood, press it with the left foot, and one should recite eight thousand times. Then he will be free of anger.

Having done the preliminary practice, take a six-finger stick of wood struck by lightning and, fasting for three nights, set up the painted image at a stūpa containing relics. Furnish that peg with the three metals, and one should place it upon a thousand-petaled lotus with four vases filled with all kinds of medicines. Then press the peg with the left foot, hold it with the left hand, and one should recite until the hand grows numb. Then the hand is released. Then at dawn give a great torma and one should eat pomegranate: it will be accomplished. One should drive that peg into another house: it will grant what one desires, and all necessities will come about. When it is pulled out, everything will vanish.

Kindle a fire with jasmine wood and make eight thousand fire offerings of flowers mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. One obtains five coins.

Kindle a fire with mango wood, and on the bank of a river one should make eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of arka mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. Within five days one obtains five coins. Beginning on the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight, make fire offerings of eight thousand kindling sticks of aśoka mixed with milk, up to the fifteenth. One obtains a hundred coins. Kindle a fire with oleander wood, and from the eighth day of the bright fortnight up to the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight make eight thousand fire offerings of oleander shavings mixed with milk. One obtains a thousand coins each time.

Empower well-strained water, and one should use it for seven days. Then a cowherd for whom protection has been made should milk a tawny cow. Then one should place its milk in a vase in a secluded spot and recite over it. Then, having churned it, one should have a brahmin girl grind these substances with her hands. Then have pills made and wrapped all around with the three metals. Put the pills into the five products of that same tawny cow, and one should leave them for one night. Then take them out, and one should wash them with the cow's urine. One should place them on a lotus petal anointed with gorocanā. Then, having invited the painted image to be set up at a stūpa containing relics, perform the rite of purification and make vast offerings, with torma and lamps as well. Then the vidyādhara takes eight pills, goes to a lotus pond with lotus petals folded together, sets up the painted image, and makes fire offerings of lotuses: Śrī will come and grant boons.

Grind lotus seeds, tagara, lotus filaments, and sandalwood together with honey and have them made into pills. Having empowered them together with incense, whoever they are given to will come under control. Having recited over a flower garland, whoever's head it is tied upon will come under control.

Take red sandalwood, campaka flowers, lotus filaments, husks of red śāli rice, girikarṇikā, kurantaka seeds, grain, sprouted pulses, costus, tagara, turuṣka, and sesame in equal parts, combine them, and have them made into pills with the ghee of a tawny cow. One should first undertake all the practices.

One who wishes to bring the king's queen and her retinue under control should make an image of kuśa grass, press it with the left hand, and recite: she and her retinue will come under control. To bring brahmins under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of sesame mixed with curd, honey, and ghee: they will come under control. To bring kṣatriyas under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of barley mixed with curd, honey, and ghee: they will come under control. To bring vaiśyas under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of black mustard seed: they will come under control. To bring śūdras under control, make eight thousand fire offerings of husks of black grain in a single day.

For three days, tie a tawny cow in the house, and one should have it eat green grass that has been empowered. Having empowered it, one should adorn it with that fine garland. Having empowered water, one should have it drink. A cowherd for whom protection has been made should milk it. Then place that milk in a completely secluded spot, and one should let it set into curd and churn it. Combine that butter with mālatī flowers, and one should make seven burnt offerings. Taking with both hands the pills wrapped in lotus petals, one should recite until they become warm. One who has first completed the approach recites over the pills until they give off smoke and blaze, until they blaze. When they grow warm, one brings under control. When they give off smoke, one becomes invisible. By their blazing one becomes a vidyādhara and lives for five thousand years. After death, too, one goes to Sukhāvatī.

Whoever's head one places white mustard seed upon, after empowering it seven times, will come under control. To bring a king under control, make an image, press it with the left hand, and recite a hundred thousand times: he will come under control together with a thousand. Make eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed mixed with ghee. Then one should take it up, and one becomes invisible.

At a stūpa containing relics, or at a river that flows to the ocean, make from sand or from a lump of earth a stūpa of the Sugata a span in size, containing the heart of dependent origination. Remaining pure and observing the poṣadha, make offerings as best one can, and, eating alms food or eating an oblation of boiled grain, recite a hundred thousand times. One will be capable of all rites. In the area of a great charnel ground, one should recite for binding the maṇḍala and so on, binding the directions, curing all poisons, sweeping clean, crushing grahas and fevers, and crossing great rivers, and one crosses them with ease. One will be honored and freed from tolls and customs. In debate, too, one will become the foremost of speakers. When one has gone to sleep, the semen will be held back.

By reciting a thousand times over a thread and reciting eight thousand times over a peg of acacia wood, one protects all crops; by setting it in the ground, the leaves of the willow grow even, and one makes the harvests of rice, śāli rice, and large grains abundant. With white mustard seed one overcomes all kings and ministers. By reciting eight hundred times over hail, thunderbolts, stones, and so on, one sends them wherever one wishes them to go. By reciting a thousand times over ash, in whichever direction it is scattered, in that direction one turns back thorns. By reciting eight hundred times, one removes all piercing pains.

Having done the preliminary practice, recite two million five hundred thousand times before the painted image. Then make a sword from a palm leaf cut with the fingernails, and draw on that leaf with saffron.

On the day of the eighth of the dark fortnight, or on the fourteenth of the dark fortnight, strictly observing the poṣadha, climb alone to the summit of a mountain. Having cleared a spot, smear a maṇḍala eight cubits or sixteen cubits across, make a stūpa of sand, make offerings to it as best one can, and face east. Taking the sword in the right hand and raising the arm upward, one should recite the secret mantra before the stūpa, until the letters of the mantra that are on the sword blaze. Taking it up, one goes wherever one wishes and becomes a vidyādhara, and no vidyādhara can harm one. No being can withstand one. Taking whatever form one desires, one lives for an eon, and one sees, hears, and smells across a thousand yojanas. One goes straight through mountains. One goes straight through walls. One goes straight through fences. One rises even above the ocean. One finds what has been hoarded.

If one wishes to accomplish orpiment and realgar, set up the painted image before an image containing relics, in that very place, and make offerings on the eighth day of the bright fortnight. In its center lay the corpse of a man with intact limbs, press it firmly on the chest with the left foot, make protection, and one should recite the mantra until it rises. Beforehand one should eat honey and milk porridge, and with a fist empowered seven times, one should melt the substances on its head. Then it makes them drip. By drinking that, one becomes invisible.

Entering a river teeming with fish that flows to the ocean, make eight thousand fire offerings of fragrant flowers. One obtains pairs of garments one after another. Having entered a village, one should recite eight hundred times, and one obtains fine food. By empowering salt and mixed water eight hundred times, one pacifies all stabbing pains. For a woman who cannot deliver her child, empower water eight hundred times and give it to her. She will give birth with ease.

Beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight and continuing until the fifteenth, one should recite, increasing by a thousand each day. At the end, fasting for three nights, accomplish the pills by the procedure for pills; if one puts them in the mouth, one becomes invisible. Take aśoka flowers, the bile of a kṛṣṇasāra antelope, the heart of dūrvā grass, and charcoal of sodriya in equal parts together, wrap them in iron obtained under Puṣya and again wrap them in the three metals, and one should accomplish them before the painted image. Placing them in the mouth, wherever one stays, one should first be freed from bonds.

Make an image of a man or a woman out of wax, kindle a fire in a completely secluded spot, empower the image eight hundred times, and one should melt it; one should pierce it with thorns of datura, and the person comes under control, and one obtains whatever one seeks.

On the full moon of the bright fortnight, fasting for a day and a night, one should offer eight thousand fragrant flowers before the painted image. One obtains five kārṣāpaṇas. On the fourteenth of the dark fortnight, fasting for a day and a night, kindle a fire with priyaṅgu wood before the image and make eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of pekaṅkata. One obtains all kinds of wealth. On the eighth of the bright fortnight, fasting for a day and a night, one should recite eight thousand times before the painted image, until the crows take flight. One obtains ten coins.

Fasting for three nights, on the fourteenth of the dark fortnight, burn guggulu incense, kindle a fire of bāla wood, and one should make eight thousand fire offerings of oleander flowers mixed with curd, honey, and ghee. Then in the fire pit an oleander the size of a lotus springs up, and in the center of the oleander one sees realgar of its color; reciting the mantra, one should take it. Merely by taking it with the mind, one becomes a vidyādhara the color of the rising sun, in the form of a sixteen-year-old, with the swiftness of the wind, and vast desires come to be fulfilled. One lives for ten thousand years. One becomes pleasing to the minds of all beings and knows one's death, and if one performs the practice again, one's life becomes twice as long.

Enter an empty house, set up the painted image in a clean spot, and, keeping silent and eating milk and barley flour, one should recite in solitude. Then make vast offerings to the painted image, offer an exceedingly vast torma, sit with legs crossed, and one should recite until rays of light come forth. By seeing that, even the five acts of immediate retribution come to be exhausted. Then one will be accomplished and will obtain great kingship on every side. One will have no adversary.

Empower gorocanā eight thousand times, fumigate it with incense, and have it applied without interruption; if one then enters the king's palace, one becomes the foremost of speakers. Everyone, too, comes under one's control. If he has not come under control, then, to bring him under control, smear a maṇḍala in the house and with the left hand make a thousand burnt offerings of the abaabīya tree. He will come under control.

To bring an ordinary woman under control, make an image of salt and make fire offerings with the left hand. She will come under control. To bring a servant woman under control, combine punnāga filaments, barley, wheat, and meat, and make eight thousand fire offerings. She will come under control. Make an image of ground śāli rice and, cutting it piece by piece, make fire offerings. She will come under control.

Take antimony collyrium, wrap it together with a single stūpa inside an aśvattha leaf, empower it eight thousand times, and one should apply it to the eyes. Whoever one's glance falls on will come under control. Recite a hundred thousand times at the door of a cave. One makes its mechanical devices fall. At a cattle pen, set up a stūpa containing the heart of dependent origination and recite a hundred thousand times. One obtains a hundred thousand coins each time. At a nāga site, set up the painted image and perform the rite of protection; then kindle a fire with jambu wood, give a torma of the three sweet substances, and one should make eight thousand fire offerings of flowers of the nāga tree.

Then a nāga in the form of a brahmin comes, and he says, "What shall I do?" One should say, "Grant me seven coins every single day." He says, "So be it," and vanishes. Every day he grants seven coins. They should be used up entirely, with nothing left over; half is for the service of the Three Jewels.

One should recite for one month before the painted image. One obtains twelve thousand coins.

Beginning from the eighth day of the bright fortnight, one should recite for six months at a stūpa containing relics. It bestows kingship.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, before the image, one takes the heartwood of the śleṣmāntaka tree and winds it with red thread. Then, having kindled a fire with palāśa wood, one consecrates the peg eight thousand times, splits it into three pieces, recites twenty-one times over each piece, and puts them into the fire. At dawn one obtains three hundred coins each time.

On the eighth day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast for one night, one should offer eight thousand atimuktaka flowers. Every seven days one obtains a thousand coins each time.

On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast for one night, at night make eight thousand fire offerings into a fire mixed with the roots of the vatyaṭaka tree. One obtains a thousand silver coins each time.

On the seventh day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, one should enter a river that flows into the ocean and offer ten thousand lotuses. One obtains a kingdom each time.

To bring a man under control: on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight keeping a fast for one night, one kindles a fire with the wood of the bodhi tree; then make eight thousand fire offerings of white water lilies smeared with curd, honey and ghee. He comes under control.

To bring a woman under control: on the twelfth day of the dark fortnight, cast eight thousand saugandhika flowers at the noble Mañjuśrī. She comes under control.

For binding by means of medicine: one recites twenty-one times over the dung of elephants and of quadrupeds, and it should be placed at the waist. The semen is thereby bound.

If one recites seven times over the corner of a monastic robe and ties a knot, poison is bound. To cure poison, it is done with leaves. To open the seal, it is done with water.

For bringing down a spirit, one binds the graha with guggulu incense, or with water.

Having recited over one's finger, whoever one threatens with it comes under control.

One should recite eight hundred times before the painted image. It shows in a dream just how things will come about.

Having set the painted image in a stūpa containing relics and made vast offerings before it, one kindles a fire with bilva wood and should make a hundred thousand fire offerings of white apāmārga smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains a kingdom each time. If that is not accomplished, one obtains a thousand townships each time.

Before the painted image, one consecrates gorocana or realgar eight thousand times and anoints oneself with it; then, on entering among enemies, one will not be afraid, and the enemies will do no harm.

For bringing down a spirit: one recites three times over warm water with white flowers, and recites three times over karavīra flowers, and one should strike the possessed one with them. It reveals the past and the future.

As for the binding, it is made auspicious with the finger-snapping mudrā.

One who wishes to accomplish the eye ointment should take one measure of sauvīra eye ointment, bought for a hero's price, and have it ground with the five products of the cow by a brahmin girl facing north. With the ring finger make four pills, raise them up to the eight directions, and by this same rite, burning ghee and lac resin, one should recite eight thousand times. One obtains ten of the finest villages.

By this same rite, having made a stūpa, one should offer eight thousand lotuses smeared with sandalwood. One obtains lordship of a region each time.

Having made a stūpa the size of a sugata-span, burn incense and offer eight thousand campaka flowers; one obtains a thousand pieces of gold each time. Having made a stūpa the size of a sugata-span, one should offer eight thousand flower filaments; one obtains a thousand garments each time. In the same way is the rite with any flower for whatever one desires.

Take ash from a corpse burned in a charnel ground, and on the day of the full moon, keeping a fast day and night, make a circle with blood from the ring finger and draw an effigy; press it down with the left foot and recite a thousand times. One brings the person under control together with his family line.

Having made a stūpa the size of a sugata-span, make eight thousand fire offerings into the fire of parched rice smeared with curd, honey and ghee. If one consecrates gorocana a thousand times and makes a mark on the forehead with it, whoever one sees, and all those who see one, one brings under control.

At dawn, consecrate turuṣka water seven times and wash the face; whoever one sees gives one gifts.

All in just the same way: eating sesame oil, consecrate a handful of water seven times and drink it. One obtains food without seeking it.

Entering a king's palace, take that monastic robe, recite twenty-one times, and if one ties a knot in it with the left hand, one becomes unhindered.

Among bandits, by bringing it to mind and reciting, one is freed from bonds.

For cutting, piercing, and the mantras of the hand: make an effigy from palāśa seeds, white karavīra and white mustard seed, and before the painted image press it down with the left hand and recite eight thousand times. The mantras will be roused.

One who wishes to destroy fever should make eight thousand fire offerings of girikarṇikā flowers. The fever will be destroyed.

Make a hundred and eight fire offerings with kindling sticks of khadira wood. One will be freed from all the grahas.

Reciting seven times over ash, one works upon the secret mantras of others. By reciting once over water, they are released.

If one writes it on cloth or birch bark and fastens it to the top of a banner, the opposing army will be paralyzed.

Living on water and flour, on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast for three nights, when a single night has passed, one should set the painted image at the right side of one's body and bind it. Having clenched the fist, one should recite until moisture comes forth. It binds. Thus on the third night the fist will be accomplished. When one makes the fist, one becomes invisible. One will live for seven hundred years. Even Maheśvara will ask, "What shall I do?"

Set the painted image in a clean place and, keeping a fast day and night, make an effigy before the painted image, worship it according to the rite, and make eight thousand fire offerings of bilva kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Rays of light come forth from the forehead of the Blessed Mañjuśrī. Then it is accomplished, and one obtains immeasurable wealth or gold.

Keeping a fast day and night, make eight thousand fire offerings of karavīra flowers before the painted image. Then take a single karavīra flower, go to a nāga abode, put the flower into the nāga lake, and one should recite the mantra. The nāga comes under control together with his nāginīs. One obtains whatever one seeks.

Keeping a fast day and night, on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, make offerings at a crossroads and sit close by; make a pill of realgar the size of a pea, put it in the mouth, and one should recite until it splits open. The realgar will be accomplished, and by making a mark with it on the forehead one becomes invisible. Taking whatever form one wishes, one lives for five hundred years.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight take bronze, and on the following eighth day have a trident made of the bronze. On the eighth day of the next dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, go to a charnel ground, make a great offering to the trident, sit in the cross-legged posture, take up the trident with the right hand, and one should recite until rays of light come forth from the trident. Then it is accomplished: at night a divine mansion appears without being built, and women appear adorned with every ornament. Many men of a retinue also attend, filling the whole place with laughter, playful charm and the like, and one obtains all that one thinks of. At dawn the Teacher sets it all aside.

Beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, before the painted image recite eight hundred times over one measure of brāhmī juice and drink it. In seven days one will retain whatever one hears.

Before the painted image, make protection of various kinds, and one should recite over a dish of food until it turns into a meal. Then it is accomplished, and thereafter it keeps supplying food. So too with what grows from grain.

Having done the preliminary practice, make a wheel of the three metals, sixteen finger-breadths in size. On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, make vast offerings before the principal painted image, set the wheel on seven aśvattha leaves, sit in the cross-legged posture, and one should recite until it blazes. Then, merely by taking it up, one becomes a wheel-turning emperor of the vidyādharas, with hair curled and coiled and the color of the rising sun, and one flies together with all those who see one.

Taking the blazing Sudarśana wheel, press it with the hand and recite seven times; whatever one touches comes under control.

Make a wheel of kuśa grass, recite seven times over it, and put it into water. The nāgas rise up and say, "What shall we do?" One should say, "Give a hundred thousand coins."

Living on alms, climb to the summit of a mountain and one should recite a hundred thousand times. The body of the Tathāgata will appear. Having seen it, one achieves success.

Enter a river that flows into the ocean and make fire offerings of arka flowers. The Sun will grant a boon. Entering that same river up to the waist, scatter bilva flowers. The Grandfather (Brahmā) will grant a boon. Make fire offerings of mandārava flowers. Indra will grant a boon. In that same water, with mandārava flowers, Dhanada (Kubera) will grant a boon.

One should recite two hundred thousand times. It makes one a king. One should recite three hundred thousand times. It summons all sentient beings.

Entering a river that flows into the ocean, one should pour in a hundred thousand flowers of the aśoka tree. In seven nights it summons the yakṣiṇīs.

At a tree, keeping silence, one should recite for six months. One obtains each of the things one desires.

Make an effigy of a king, six finger-breadths tall, from arka wood, and have it painted in unmixed colors and adorned with every ornament. One will become the king of a realm, or else a vidyādhara.

Before the painted image, keeping silence for six months, consecrate the left hand and recite ten thousand times. A hundred thousand treasures that lie close by come to light.

Make ten thousand fire offerings of parched rice smeared with curd, honey and ghee, and ten thousand of apāmārga kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains ten thousand pieces of gold each time.

Take gorocana, make it into a pill, and wrap it in the three metals. Then, wearing clean white clothes, go to a charnel ground, make offerings of scents, incense, flowers and the like, and give a torma to all the bhūtas; then place the pill between two skull cups joined face to face, and one should recite until a terrifying sound is heard. Without becoming afraid, share it with one's companions, and by putting it in the mouth again one becomes invisible. One will live for ten thousand years.

Take the eye of a pig and have it pounded together with cow products by the hand of a young girl. Make it into a pill, wrap it in the three metals, and hold it between the joined hands; then set it between two bowls joined face to face at the right side of the image of Maheśvara, press it with the right hand, and one should recite until the sound "śita" is heard. Reciting the vidyā, give some to one's companions as well, and by putting it in the mouth one becomes invisible. One makes all that is to be accomplished entirely joyful, and lives for thousands of years.

Lotus filaments, eye ointment, or realgar as well: make them into equal parts and have them pounded by the hand of a girl keeping the poṣadha vows. Wrap it in the three metals; then, having done the preliminary practice, at the conjunction of Puṣya, offer a torma to all the bhūtas at the right side of the image of Maheśvara, worship with scents, flowers and incense, place it between two bowls joined face to face, press it with the right hand, and one should recite until it cries out khaṭa khaṭa. Offer one portion to the Buddha, the Blessed One, share it with one's companions as well, and by putting it in the mouth one becomes invisible. One lives for a thousand years.

Having done the preliminary practice, living on milk and barley meal, set the painted image on the summit of a mountain and one should recite a hundred thousand times. Then one keeping the poṣadha vows should take earth from an anthill, mix it with milk and make it smooth, and should make a goose the size of a sugata-span. One should have a painter keeping the poṣadha vows paint it in unmixed colors. Then set the painted image in a secluded place, worship it with scents, flowers and incense, and give a torma to all the bhūtas; then, wearing clean clothes, one should recite before the painted image until the goose moves. Then the vidyādhara should offer as arghya the aparājitā flowers that were recited over beforehand. Again, one should recite eight hundred times. Everything comes; one should not be afraid. One should touch it with a peacock feather over which the mantra has been recited. It says, "What shall I do?" One should say, "Enter into my body." Then it vanishes into the body of the practitioner. In that very instant, with hair curled and coiled, sixteen years of age, appearing the color of the rising sun, one goes without hindrance. One flies together with whoever one sees and whoever looks on. All the vidyādharas come under this one's power; one lives for an eon, and when one dies one is born among the gods.

Having done the preliminary practice, set the painted image in a stūpa containing relics, and one should recite five hundred thousand times. One keeping the poṣadha vows, in silence, should take wood struck by lightning and put it into milk for seven days and nights. Then take it out and, rubbing it with white earth and sandalwood water, have the lightning-struck wood washed. Then the practitioner, keeping the poṣadha vows, should have a craftsman make a lion of it. Then, under the constellation Rohiṇī, having made vast offerings to the Three Jewels, one should eat alms food as directed by the Saṅgha. Having made vast offerings before the painted image, one should offer tormas of various kinds. Then the practitioner, pure and wearing clean clothes, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, presses the lion with the right hand, and one should recite until the lion moves. When it has moved, signs of various kinds arise; one should not be afraid. Then the vidyādhara should pelt the lion with white mustard seeds consecrated seven times. The lion lets out a great roar. And the practitioner will not pass beyond the wilderness without having thought of it. Then the practitioner, having recited seven times, climbs onto the lion; all the vidyādharas too assemble, and riding on the lion, one flies together with the retinue. One goes like the wind by mere thought, with a retinue of many vidyādharas; one lives for an eon, and when one dies one is born wherever one wishes. This is the sādhana of the lion.

If one wishes to accomplish wealth, beginning from the full moon of the bright fortnight, in silence, living on milk and barley meal, one should recite a hundred thousand times before the painted image over the following three months. Then the painted image will move. And the image of the Tathāgata moves too. It becomes a great accomplishment of wealth.

Consecrate nīlāṭaka eight hundred times and one should tie a knot in it. One will be victorious in a wrestling match. If one recites twenty-one times over ash and places it on the crown of the head, one will be victorious in battle. This is the wrestler's accomplishment.

Beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, place it with milk in a copper vessel, recite over it eight hundred times, and drink it. Likewise, in seven days one will retain whatever one hears. Rays of light come forth from the face of the noble Avalokiteśvara; the practitioner circumambulates, goes upward, and becomes a vidyādhara. Taking whatever form one wishes, one lives for three hundred thousand years.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast for one night, place gorocana before the image, and one should recite until it blazes. At that time one should take it up; merely by taking it up one gains the strength of Nārāyaṇa, and the weapons of others become powerless. Whoever has the garland, by keeping it, lives for three hundred years.

On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, kindle a fire with bilva wood before the painted image and make a hundred thousand fire offerings of vikaṅkata kindling sticks smeared with pungent sesame oil. One obtains a coin.

On the thirteenth day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, make a Kāmadeva of clay and make a hundred thousand fire offerings of thick rice gruel into its mouth. In seven days whatever girl one desires comes under control.

On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, go to a charnel ground, smear a maṇḍala with the dung of a cow that has not fallen to the ground, take an intact skull, wash it with red sandalwood water, and worship it with red flowers, scents and flowers. Then sit close to the skull, and one should summon by reciting the secret mantra, until the skull moves. At that time it is accomplished. Then whoever one beckons with the fingernail comes and does whatever one says.

If one wishes to pacify, make eight thousand fire offerings of lotuses before the painted image; it will be pacified. Before the painted image, make eight thousand fire offerings of mālatī flowers smeared with curd, honey and ghee; it will be pacified.

One who has done the preliminary practice should, on the fifteenth day of the dark fortnight, set the painted image in a stūpa containing relics, make a great offering, and offer a vast torma. Outside, give a torma to all the bhūtas, and then draw an image with nāgakesara powder. Having also bound the maṇḍala, sit on a mat of kuśa grass, and one should recite until a shooting star falls. Again, one should recite until the painted image moves. Other signs of accomplishment also appear; then, having paid homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, one becomes a flying vidyādhara. Taking whatever form one wishes, one sees and hears from a thousand yojanas away. None of the vidyādharas can harm one.

Having done the preliminary practice, on the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night, make vast offerings, take an intact body, worship it with scents, flowers and incense, hold it with the right hand, and one should recite until it blazes. As soon as it blazes, surrounded by a thousand vidyādharas, one flies into the vault of the sky, in the form of one sixteen years of age, with hair curled and coiled, and none of the vidyādharas can harm one.

For bringing down a spirit, it is done by sitting. For destroying poison, it is done with a leafy twig. For protecting oneself, it is done by recitation.

Beginning from the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight and up to the fifteenth, one keeping the poṣadha vows, pure and wearing clean clothes, should recite before the image. One obtains whatever one desires.

Consecrate ghee eight hundred times and drink it. In seven days one will become sharp-witted.

Before the painted image, make eight thousand fire offerings of mallikā flowers. In seven nights wealth will arise.

On the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight, keeping a fast for three nights, kindle a fire with udumbara wood and make eight thousand fire offerings of udumbara kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. One obtains five hundred coins.

On the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, one keeping the poṣadha vows should light eight thousand butter lamps and make eight thousand fire offerings of coiled lamp wicks. Afterward one should offer the recitation. Then one obtains sight.

Set a volume of the Perfection of Wisdom in a stūpa containing relics, consecrate it eight thousand times, and pay homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas; then one should recite twelve times in each of three sessions in a single day. One obtains hearing in each ear.

For illness, according to the rite by which the samādhi of the noble Avalokiteśvara is sure to arise, one should have him painted with unmixed colors on cloth or on a panel. Make a great offering before it, and one should recite a hundred thousand times. Sitting on a seat of kuśa grass, living on milk and barley meal, bathing three times a day, wearing clean clothes, and keeping the eightfold poṣadha vows, one should offer recitation from the first day of the month until the first day comes round again. Then the illness will be completely pacified.

One who has done the preliminary practice, living on milk and barley meal or on cow's urine and barley meal, bathing three times a day, and keeping the poṣadha vows, should set the painted image in a stūpa containing relics, light eight lamps on each side, and worship with a thousand lotuses. One should recite during the dark fortnight. One should accomplish it from the first day of the bright fortnight. On the full moon, keeping a fast for three nights, make vast offerings and one should recite throughout the night. If one is to become a king, the practitioner's house blazes; and if the bunch of flowers moves, one will become the king of a realm.

Before the painted image, make a maṇḍala with white sandalwood, offer scents, flowers, incense and so forth, and a torma too; then take three hundred flower filaments, consecrate them eight hundred times, and light three ghee lamps. Kindle a fire with udumbara kindling sticks, consecrate each flower eight hundred times, smear it with ghee, and one should make the fire offering. Whatever one desires comes under one's control.

If one recites at the three times of day for seven nights, one's five deeds of immediate retribution will be diminished. If one recites eight hundred times each day, one's misdeeds will be diminished. Through constant recitation one obtains whatever village one wishes, and whatever one sees with one's eyes comes under control. One becomes victorious in debate and supreme among speakers. Make fire offerings of sesame and māṣa beans: it increases wealth. Make eight thousand fire offerings of vaṭa sprouts smeared with curd, honey and ghee: one will not die an untimely death. Before the painted image, with eight thousand flowers of the nāga tree, the lord of men comes under control.

Then Śākyamuni once more gazed over the whole circle of the assembly, complete in every respect, and said to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, "Great being, through applying the fire-offering rite that is the special collection drawn from the arrangement of all the chapters of your vidyā mantras, there is a special procedure by which practitioners of vidyā work with fire, and when they are established in it, beings devoted to the practice of vidyā should apply it. What is that?" He spoke the words of the vidyā mantra for it:

tadyathā oṃ tiṣṭha hari sirgala lohitākṣa dehi dadāpaya hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

"This is the fire essence of Avalokiteśvara. It is regarded as the very nature that performs all rites and grants all wishes. With this the practitioner should make the fire offering: one should offer into the fire three oblations, reciting once for each. The fire will be invited. Likewise, in applying the rites of pacifying, enriching and fierce activity, the kindling sticks come in three kinds of wood. For pacifying, one should prepare sticks distinguished by being of aśoka wood that still holds its sap, a span or a cubit in length, or three finger-breadths, and smooth and supple; these are highly praised, and with them this rite should be accomplished. Without holes and not hollow, like the wing of a parrot, and likewise green, or with dried leaves, or black in color, should also be offered.

Rejecting those eaten by worms, one keeps only those without holes; rejecting those of other colors, both the best and the worst, and rejecting also those that are dry, one uses the rest for burning. One should use those that are not rotten and not crooked, and avoid the others.

Then make the fire pit square on every side and one should encircle it below; of the measure of a bow-length and a cubit, it is three cubits, or two cubits, or four cubits. Likewise, always free of living creatures, consecrate sand, and on it make the shape of a lotus. Then make the rim all around carefully in the shape of a square maṇḍala as well. Before the painted image, whether for pacifying or for enriching, these have been fully proclaimed.

For the fierce rite, as is taught,
one makes a vajra in the center,
both of its ends three-pronged.
Moreover, the fire pit is two cubits,
and straight across it is seven.
Likewise, behind a clean place,
or at a spot on a river's bank,
or a firm place, or a charnel ground, or an empty house, one should duly begin the fire offering.
Likewise, on a mountain peak too,
in an empty temple of the gods,
and always in a great wilderness:
these three, likewise,
are declared the places of the practitioner.
These are the places of the supreme person.
Of all the fire-offering rites declared,
sitting on a mat of kuśa grass,
a cubit's measure from that place,
the fire-offering rites in particular the knower of secret mantra should perform there.

Accomplishment comes swiftly indeed;
that it will remain, there is no doubt.
Facing east and facing north are for pacifying and enriching;
for the fierce, facing south,
and that the mantra practitioner should shun.
Facing east, pacification increases;
for enriching, too, one faces north.
These the mantra practitioner, at the same time,
should duly begin with recitation of the vidyā.
With bilva, arka, plakṣa
and nyagrodha, one performs the enriching rite.
For the fierce rite, the woods are milky, pungent, sour and sharp;
all of these are to be shunned:
they have been forbidden by the sages.
Always for pacifying and enriching rites moist wood is highly praised;
likewise dry wood is for fierce rites,
which the sages have always shunned.
Where these are lacking, with kindling sticks one should treat them as those woods.
Green, and as if glossy,
like the neck of a peacock,
likewise with kuśa grass of that kind,
always perform pacifying and enriching.
Like emerald,
and likewise with white grasses,
the sinful rites are always done:
these the supreme Victorious One has forbidden.
Here, with stainless water,
pure and free of insects,
one should always then thoroughly wash.
One should also encircle it all around,
or, with diligence, on the outside,
and touch it according to the rite.
The pure one should, with grass, make it the measure of a lamp.

Then, having made it the size of a fist,
one should carefully kindle the fire.
One should not blow on it with the breath of the mouth,
nor likewise with the hem of one's garment,
nor with a bundle of cloth or a lower robe;
avoiding coverings,
the sky's treasure and various winds,
whether harmful or pleasant,
and free from any lapse in purity, likewise with a cloth or with a jewel
one should fan; with a good breeze
one should duly start the fire.
With this breeze that arises from it,
the knower of mantra should kindle the fire.
Well composed, for the sake of the fire offering,
having examined the other excellent fuel, then at the end
three oblations of cow's ghee should be offered there; of that, whatever is fitting is to be the measure.
To all the buddhas, the protectors,
and to the lord, each with his own mantra,
then pay homage as one wishes,
and at that time make fire offerings into the fire.
By reciting the secret mantra seven times
one always invites the fire.
With fragrant flowers that one has gathered oneself,
with flowers alone, one always calls it.
The mantra practitioner skilled in the place who offers a seat in that place does so with that secret mantra and not otherwise.
With ghee mixed with curd,
three kindling sticks smeared with honey,
for enriching, one makes fire offerings into the fire.
In all the rites of mantra,
sitting upon a lotus seat,
one performs the fire offering of the pacifying rite.

For the enriching rite, these very things are to be offered, with mantras of matching form.
For one engaged in the fierce rite,
one should view it in another form.
The stainless deities,
in due order, into the fire pit,
with flowers and scents as they are found,
reciting seven times,
are invoked; at that time,
those that are firmly set in their place remain, just as they do in both.
Kindling sticks mixed with the substances,
well endowed with ghee and honey,
and likewise mixed with curd,
one should offer a thousand, or a hundred thousand,
or else always a hundred and eight.
Having taken up the mantra, likewise,
with the vidyā recited once,
into the garlanded fire with blazing eyes and crest,
a single tongue of flame.
In just the same way, the pacifying rite,
the fire offering that must be done,
and, for enriching, that and control as well.
The fierce rite is disparaged:
the Victorious One has rejected it. In fire-offering rites the well-applied fire will be praised, endowed with the strength of eighty Rāhus, highly praised by the supreme Victorious One.
There one always accomplishes the secret mantra.
Make fire offerings into a white fire.
If the color is red, likewise,
it is always held as the accomplishment of enriching.
Black, smoky and pale yellow are what is called "the left-handed."
The three kinds of color that appear are the three kinds of accomplishment.
Mantra practitioner, other colors than these,

or colors of many kinds:
in that there is no accomplishment of mantra.
Again, here in the palm of the hand,
colors of many kinds:
there are such clear colors.
Having seen the fire blaze,
one should begin the rites again.
Having made the invitation, the form and color:
if accomplishment of mantra is to come,
engaging again in the fire offering,
by seeing the procedure of the rite,
inviting and requesting departure,
one should recite the mantra to the fire.
Even with what was set out before,
here in this maṇḍala, another way:
do it with that very supreme one.
In this fire offering, one who performs the acts of inviting and requesting departure should perform the rites with that very one.
There the rites of fire practice,
likewise before the image and the painted image,
are begun and accomplished.
For that, the mantra spoken before, praised by the Tathāgata, the Victorious One:
with it all the rites are to be performed there.

Other rites are not to be performed, especially sinful rites,
those censured by the supreme Victorious One,
and those censured as contrary to the world.
One rises to the state of a universal monarch (cakravartin);
then a bodhisattva, a lord of the earth,
likewise one who has gained the five superknowledges;
then one accomplishes divinity itself.
Here, one who always knows the application, skilled in the rites of the painted image and the fire offering, attains lordship of the underworld and moves through the sky.

Then the gods above the earth,
yakṣas or yakṣiṇīs,
one summons; and always
lordship of a kingdom,
or else roaming here in this land,
or else knowledge and the state of a vidyādhara.
Asuras and all sentient beings
one brings under control, makes them follow, and summons them.
Genuine great beings,
great-souled bodhisattvas,
beings who abide on the ten grounds,
one summons by the rite of fire offering.
What need is there to mention humans on the earth?
Likewise lordship over the rest,
and especially sovereignty over the world,
truly and certainly over all bhūtas;
the state of a lord of men, and likewise,
for the purpose of subjugation, all sentient beings,
whether by that lord of men or by those men,
by all upon the earth alike:
likewise all the rites, in every way,
should always be performed by fire offering.
Relying properly and certainly on all the rites, undertaking them oneself, one accomplishes them together.
For the sake of good fortune, its rites,
the supreme, the middling,
or else the lesser, should be accomplished.
Right there, in order to declare the accomplishment of every substance, again
one should look for the accomplishments together.
One well engaged in the rites of fire offering binds the mudrā for all the rites;
with self-protection, and with ghee,
one fully enters upon the rite of fire offering.
Then this secret mantra of the painted image, recited seven times or recited eight times:

always conduct yourself by this rite.
namaḥ sarbba buddha bodhisatvānāna apratihatagatisatvānāna tadyathā auṃ jvala tiṣā hūṃ ruru biśva sambhabe svāhā
With this, applying it to the firewood, recite it;
then again, reciting it twice or seven times,
the knower of mantra makes a fire offering into the fire:
flowers, incense, or perfume as well.
For each and every one of them, with this very sevenfold recitation you should pronounce it.
In undertaking all the rites,
by the preceding procedure, the cause,
it is to be done with thorough application.
Having first bound, for all the rites,
the great mudrā Yaśovatī,
and likewise having performed the protection,
one skilled in the causes of accomplishment should undertake all the rites.
If one sees signs of potency,
auspicious sounds,
and always that fruitful ground,
the secret mantra, just as one wishes,
will certainly grant this supreme thing.
First, the thorough application of the rite,
fully entered upon through the secret mantra as cause:
only those accomplishments that bear fruit should be accomplished.
The sound of victory and the paṭaha drum,
the accomplishment of the great drum, is certain;
everywhere these are spoken of as censured.
For one who abides in the fire offering,
moreover, supreme auspicious signs,
birds, or auspicious sounds,
sounds of various kinds proclaimed by them:
any such sound is praised by the Victorious One.
Highly praised are gods appearing at the right time,
pleasing sounds of various kinds,

parasols, victory banners and flags,
women adorned with ornaments,
and likewise full vases;
if one sees an offering of water, these are causes of accomplishment.
Praised in this way, or highly praised and honored by the world,
are monks and nuns:
if one sees them, it is the accomplishment of the secret mantra in its various spheres.

Thus it was said.

This completes the eleventh chapter of the extensive collection, the rite of the thread of the counting rosary, from the Ūrdhvajaṭā Kalpa, a Great Vehicle sūtra of the Bodhisattva Piṭaka, the Avataṃsaka.

Then, before the painted image, with eight thousand flowers of the nāga tree, the lord of men comes under one's control. For all diseases, for ailments of the legs, and for malignant wounds, if one gives a lump of earth empowered with seven recitations, they will be pacified.

Having done the preliminary practice, having purified the body with the five products of the cow, and bathing three times a day, one should drink milk. Before the principal painted image one should recite the mantra eight hundred times. Afterward, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, having made offerings before the painted image as far as one is able, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, perform a fire offering of eight thousand bilva sticks smeared with ghee, curd and honey. Rays of light will issue from the crown of the head of noble Mañjuśrī. They circle around the practitioner and vanish in front of the image of the Blessed One, the Buddha. Then one sees noble Avalokiteśvara and obtains whatever of the three supreme things is to be obtained: the kingdom of the vidyādharas, and the words, "Just as you are, such a Blessed One am I." This accomplishment is achieved by honoring the guru, and by giving, with compassion and with a mind equal toward all sentient beings.

Fasting day and night, having made extensive offerings before the painted image, perform a fire offering of eight thousand arka sticks. Whatever one wishes, one summons in an instant.

Grind agaru, priyaṅgu and nāgakeśara in equal parts into a powder, place it in a pair of earthen bowls joined mouth to mouth, and empower it with eight thousand recitations. If one anoints the body with it and enters battle, one will be invincible to others.

By reciting it two million one hundred thousand times before Avalokiteśvara, one becomes a vidyādhara. Recite it one million one hundred thousand times: one sees noble Mañjuśrī. Recite it seven hundred thousand times before the painted image: fire will appear. For one stricken by disease, recite it one million five hundred thousand times before the painted image: it destroys the disease. Having done the preliminary practice, recite it one million two hundred thousand times: one obtains an elixir or a rejuvenating essence, each in turn. By eating it, wrinkles and grey hair are cast off, and one lives long with the appearance of a sixteen-year-old.

Having recited it three hundred thousand times, perform a fire offering of eight thousand royal mustard seeds: the king's queen comes under one's control. Within seven nights she will lavishly bestow wealth on this one, except for any approach of desire.

Before the painted image, perform a fire offering of a hundred thousand arka sticks: one obtains a hundred gold measures each time.

Perform a fire offering of eight thousand grains of parched rice: one will be free of obstructors. Perform a fire offering of a thousand sticks of piṇyāka wood: all people will be pleased. Recite it three hundred thousand times: one will be free of disease of the waist. For one stricken by fever, one should sweep him with kuśa grass. Having empowered a thread spun by a maiden with eight thousand recitations, one should tie it on: one will become fortunate. Perform a fire offering of a hundred thousand dongka flowers: one obtains a hundred and twenty million garments each time.

On a very beautiful bar made of iron obtained under the constellation Puṣya, make a wheel with ten petals. Having installed the painted image at a stūpa containing relics, fasting day and night, make extensive offerings, take up the wheel, and recite for as long as it takes for signs to appear. When it sends out sparks, and for as long as it blazes, one should recite. Then one becomes accomplished: one gathers all the vidyādharas, and flies together with one's retinue. One becomes a king of the vidyādharas, abides for a great eon, and travels without obstruction.

Rising early, one recites it for a year: it grants the supreme. By reciting it once in six months, one is freed from a great disease. Recite it for a month: even out of season, with the smoke of guggulu, one draws out the venom of fanged creatures. This applies to fevers of one day, of two days, of three days, of four days, and the like.

To bring a woman under one's control: before the painted image, for seven nights, in three sessions, perform twenty-one fire offerings of lāpana smeared with honey: she will come under control. This is also for a widow to use on a man. As for the king: before the painted image, perform a fire offering of eight thousand arka sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee: he will come under control. For the king's ministers and the like: at night, in three sessions, perform a fire offering of salt twenty-one times: they will come under control. Having empowered one's head three or seven times, if one goes in at the king's gate, one will receive the king's great favor. If one sweeps with a peacock feather empowered eight hundred times, it destroys poison. Having wrapped realgar in aśvattha leaves, one should properly undertake the rite by empowering it eight thousand times: one will become fortunate.

Before the painted image, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, eating milk and barley flour, bathing three times a day and changing one's clothes three times, burning agaru, turuṣka and sandalwood, one should offer a torma of the three white substances. For the torma for all the bhūtas: fragrant flowers born in water or born on dry land, and three lamps of clarified butter. At the end, fasting for three nights, one should recite throughout the night. One obtains whatever one seeks. Between sessions, food too is given as far as one is able.

Having installed the painted image at a stūpa containing relics, fasting for three nights, perform a fire offering of eight thousand aśvattha sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then rays of light issue from the painted image, the earth shakes, the flames of the lamps grow, and the garlands sway: by these signs one becomes accomplished.

Having wrapped antimony eye-salve in aśvattha leaves and made burnt offerings to the full number of a thousand, sitting cross-legged, one should recite until the accomplishment occurs in its three forms.

On something bearing fruit, write the name of whatever substance one wishes, empower it eight thousand times, and throw it into a pond where a nāga dwells. That nāga accomplishes all the rites. Within seven days he gives garments just as one wishes.

On something bearing fruit, draw the substance one desires, and likewise place it in a well or a pond. Then have a man dive into the water. There too the man hears a great sound, and in such and such a direction the substances and so on are found. Then they should be taken up. One crosses to the far banks of rivers. At an assembly hall that is hard to approach, or even at the royal palace, having called the gods to mind, one becomes invincible to others. Wherever one wishes, one should bring it under control. Having also placed it in the mouth of the noble one, say, "Please speak a little, truly": before long it will come under control.

Having made a water vessel and visualized noble Avalokiteśvara in it, one should sprinkle the water empowered eight thousand times on one bitten by a fanged creature: he will be free of poison. For this, having fully entered the maṇḍala by the rite that has been described will not be in vain.

Having taken cow dung that has not fallen on the ground, eating caru, keeping silence, and making a maṇḍala, beginning from the full moon one should recite until the third, reciting a hundred thousand times. Practicing celibacy and this very discipline for six months, in one month there is accomplishment, and in six months one comes to see all beings directly. With one's very body one attains the supreme accomplishment. In a month one accomplishes all mantras.

Having drawn whatever nāga king one wishes, place one's left foot upon it and recite a hundred thousand times in a covered place. That nāga king comes and says, "What shall I do?" One should say, "Let me enter the abode of all the nāgas." He lets one enter there. Likewise, if one draws a yakṣa king and practices, he carries out one's commands.

Take a little dust from a clean place that bears all things and scatter it over a snake: the snake will be turned back. Again, if one wishes to release it, one should recite. Having made a seal from something white in color, empower it eight thousand times, have it placed upon the bite, and summon: it raises up even one who has died.

Substances such as realgar, and the sword, the axe, the wheel, the bhuṣuṇḍala and so on, are to be purified with the five products of the cow, and a burnt offering completing a thousand is to be made. Taking any one of these substances, with the rite going first, recite five hundred thousand times before the painted image. Afterward, having obtained realgar at whatever price is asked, kindle a fire with sticks of the bodhi tree and burn it until it turns the color of fire. Then make butter from the milk of a cow of pure strain, churned by a maiden, and put the ash into the butter. Do the same with a vessel filled with curd and with one filled with honey. Then take it out and place it in a saffron casket. Having protected oneself with this very Blessed Mother, at the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu, fasting for three nights, make extensive offerings to the painted image, wrap it all around with three aśvattha leaves, and cover it with four. Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass and pressing it with the right hand, one should recite until it grows warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. If one makes a tilaka with it while it is warm, one brings all beings under control. Through the smoke one becomes invisible. Through the blazing one travels through the sky. One lives for ten thousand years, and is unassailable by any being. This same rite applies to accomplishing eye-salve and orpiment, and to bezoar.

On the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, place it on a lotus petal, make great offerings to the painted image, take it up in joined palms, and recite until it grows warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. In this too there are the three kinds of accomplishment.

Recite one million times before the painted image. Then have a craftsman whose faculties are complete and who keeps the poṣadha vows make, out of the three metals, a lotus of ten or of eight petals, adorned with a seat and ornaments. Put into the lotus saffron, bezoar and camphor ground with rainwater. On the eighth day of the bright fortnight, having made great offerings to the painted image, fasting for three nights, sit cross-legged, confess misdeeds, make supplications, and so on; then take the lotus in the right hand and recite until it blazes. Then through that lotus one, together with one's retinue, becomes joyful. One is unassailable by any being and lives for ten thousand years. It is said that the same holds for a bracelet, a crest ornament, an iron chain, a vajra, a battle-axe, and a wheel as well.

This is the special procedure for the wheel. Make a wheel of the five metals, sharp-edged, a wheel perfect in its characteristics, one span in size. Take earth from both banks of the Ganges and form it into a lump before the painted image. Set the wheel upon it, worship it with red sandalwood, and offer red karavīra flowers and garlands. On the eighth day of the bright fortnight, keeping the poṣadha vows and fasting, provide a feast for the Saṅgha from alms, and ask them to bestow accomplishment. Being clean and wearing clean clothes, one should apply oneself with a mind of compassion. Having made great offerings to the painted image, offering scents, flowers, incense and so on, and offering lamps as far as one's means allow, one should also offer four lamps at the four sides of the wheel, and guggulu incense.

Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, recite once over each of the flowers smeared with red sandalwood and strike the wheel with each one, up to eight thousand. Then the wheel makes a sound and sends out rays of light, and then it blazes. At the second sign the wheel will certainly move. Then the practitioner, having bowed to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, should recite the vidyā and take it up. As soon as he takes it, he, together with his retinue, becomes a vidyādhara: a great vidyādhara over ten thousand leagues, much sought after by all the vidyādharas of the nāgas and the yakṣas. He lives for five thousand years, and when he dies he is reborn in Sukhāvatī.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish pills: have saileṭaka, red sandalwood, lac, guggulu, the root of tārāvartaka, iron filings, girikarṇī, husks of grain, costus, spikenard, honey, long pepper and turuṣka combined and ground into a fine powder. Then take the milk of a tawny cow of pure strain, combine it with butter churned by a maiden, and with that powder have pills made the size of a juniper berry. Then, on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the bright fortnight, fasting day and night and keeping the eightfold poṣadha vows, take about five pills and wrap them in aśvattha leaves. Before the painted image, one should give a rosary, sesame oil, flour and the like to others. Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, having performed the rite of offering, press them with the right hand and recite for as long as they give off smoke. Divide them properly: by putting one in the mouth one becomes invisible. Beings in the form of gods come. All the siddhas come forth and one sees them. One lives for five hundred years. Then, when it blazes, one travels through the sky. These are the two kinds of accomplishment.

This too becomes a means of accomplishing the rites of the root vidyā of the Blessed Mother. In the third or the seventh practice, even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution will succeed. With the root essence mantra too these rites are accomplished; this is to be understood just as it is.

This completes the section called "All the Means of Accomplishment" in the root kalpa of the Blessed Mother.

Then again the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Śākyamuni, having looked thoroughly with his buddha eye upon the world realm with all it contains, addressed the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, who had come into the center of the circle of the assembly:

"Out of love for the sentient beings who dwell among humans and bhūtas,
all the maṇḍalas together with their rites,
great being, speak of them, speak!
The deities of Tārā's maṇḍala, which make all excellence increase,
for the sake of benefiting practitioners,
O Guide, speak of them in full!
All the wondrous marvels:
the embodied beings of middling kind,
having heard your supreme words that are yet to come,
swiftly, in accomplishing the deities,
wherever sentient beings have entered upon it,
right there, as was explained before,
by wise bodhisattvas and by thousands of millions of buddhas
all of it is rejoiced in.
The maṇḍala that destroys all wrongdoing, the virtue that brings about every accomplishment:
Protector of sentient beings, speak of it!
Tārā's maṇḍala, in your words,
will make the rites of sentient beings correct.
Having heard of this maṇḍala, deep faith will arise in them.
It destroys misfortune and pacifies,
likewise it carries off disease and enemies;
the maṇḍala makes the splendor and strength of all sentient beings increase.
Having seen it or heard of it,
they then give rise to deep faith.
Whoever they may be, I prophesy them as well
to attain the awakening of all the buddhas.
The buddhas of the future who will appear,
the protectors of the world, too will rejoice in it.
The maṇḍala that makes excellence increase,

that likewise gathers all good qualities,
the wondrous maṇḍala of Tārā:
great being, Protector of the World,
by true command speak of it, speak!"

When he had said this, the bodhisattva, the great being, noble Avalokiteśvara, rose from his seat, draped his upper robe over one shoulder, placed his right knee on the ground, bowed with joined palms toward the Blessed One, and extolled the Blessed One Śākyamuni with words of praise in verses of one accord:

"King of the Śākyas, king of the gods, possessed of many excellent qualities,
highly praised, your miraculous powers undiminished, ever clothed in white garments, pillar of offering, your face fragrant as a lotus,
of excellent intellect, the heart, holder of the teaching:
for you are excellence itself.
He who delights with joy
these beings here
is the protector of the gods;
through mindfulness of the intrinsic nature he shines everywhere.
His words are fully knowing;
that hero has exhausted attachment;
he holds the three fruits.
Otherwise, by him,
guarded all around by fair goddesses,
by eight, here, from the face of the lord,
the hero born of it, of great strength,
and the lord of stirring delight,
endowed all around with golden mountains,
the crest ornament and the seat together.
Of gods and asuras together with gods,
all the higher vehicles too,
the world, intermediate existence, birth, your life, and so on,
arisen, beautiful, of their own nature:
his eyes are joy,

white as the moon,
the hare-marked one held by the gods,
of white kunda flowers and fine dukūla cloth is the garment he wears, a cakora bird.
Śakra, with eyes like the hundred-petaled lotus,
the guardian of the earth goes at one shoulder, to one side;
the hare-marked moon upon the highest mountain;
Śakra, lord with a royal army,
hundred-eyed, through undiminished diligence,
number, and the ocean, the bringer of water,
the sound of the hosts, and joy,
and in the joy of stainless eyes,
the sublime rays of the Sun
in their forms circle with food and fragrance.
White vases filled, each one,
with those vases conferring empowerment,
sandalwood, the finest earth, the limbs declared,
the bezoar tilaka shining brightly,
the sublime limbs of the pārijāta tree,
the limbs of supreme joy,
made in order to vanquish the Bodiless One, the god of desire.
At the end of the limbs becoming attached,
the bath, dense, unchanging, otherwise the excellent deathless one;
below that, with joined palms,
like one stricken by poison, reviled.
Proclaiming the supreme of the tathāgatas,
rain-laden, in your mouth:
from of old you are the head of the path,
having abandoned them like stains;
in the month of flowers,
fully completed, endowed with enjoyments;
these themselves, as though bound,
having been refined by an unprecedented rite,
on the tenth you are peace;
from endless beings without protector,
because existence is endless,

gods and asuras too, through stains,
his discipline, each in turn,
appear by the light of sublime eyes.
Coiled, wide-eyed, with supreme limbs,
the gods dwelling in the directions,
and humans fully awakened to awakening:
what is called 'will bring it about'
is the action by which humans arise and are gathered.
Therefore the lotus, the water-born,
has reached the sublime limbs of the god.
The hero's limbs are entwined, free of attachment;
as if dying, the body of earth is also set down;
wholly setting forth and wholly gathering in,
truly endowed with the grounds and the directions, endowed with awakening, the four aspects in balance,
having won full victory over the army of Māra at the foot of the bodhi tree, and the unchanging state of a buddha.
At the root of the nāga tree,
through forests of harsh aversion,
for the fire of hollow stalks, illuminating the stains of the darkness of delusion,
in the blazing fire of wrath, unmoving, he gives completely;
he meditates on the vajra-like mudrā;
the measured creeper, the image steadfast;
the red fire blazing,
beautiful as a terrifying sun:
generating strength in my limbs, I bow and praise."

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, having extolled the Blessed One with these verses, sat down on his own seat and entered into the absorption of the great bodhisattvas called All-Seeing. The very moment he entered it, many hundreds of thousands of koṭis of niyutas of light rays came forth from the mouth of the great being, and those light rays illuminated buddha fields as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. All the beings in the hells, too, in that instant and that moment, were freed from all suffering. In those buddha fields, those buddhas, the blessed ones, gave their approval to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara: "Excellent, excellent!"

"Great being, speak! Great powerful one, speak of the empowerment of all sinful beings in the maṇḍala!" When in this way those buddhas, the blessed ones, in the endless and limitless ten directions, surrounded by their hosts of bodhisattvas and śrāvakas, together gave their approval, "Excellent!", to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, this great earth with its mountains, forests and caves shook violently.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, arose from that absorption of the great bodhisattvas and began to explain the mantra of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā.

"First of all, the master of the maṇḍala of the Blessed Mother is one who has seen the samaya and so obtained authorization equal to that of a master; who through faith has generated the mind set on awakening; who knows the strengths and weaknesses of sentient beings; who, being without avarice and without deceit, is free of darkness; who is neither too stout nor too thin; who is free of foul odor; whose faculties are complete; who is handsome; who, being endowed with courage, is fully possessed of generosity, moral discipline, patience, diligence, meditative concentration, wisdom and compassion; who knows the intentions and the dispositions of sentient beings; who has clear faith in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha; who is versed in many branches of learning; who is lucid and speaks lucidly; who is trained in the work of drawing maṇḍalas; who has previously completed the approach practice with a vidyā of any of the three families or the like; who knows the application of the mudrās and the maṇḍala; who has done the work of making stūpas; who is neither too old nor a child, and not born of low caste; who is young and in the bloom of youth; and who is of good conduct. Such a practitioner should draw the secret maṇḍala." So it is said.

Then a master such as this should begin the rite of the maṇḍala of the Blessed Mother:

To one who is neither incapable nor hard to discipline
the maṇḍala should properly be applied.
To those of deluded mind and full of attachment
the maṇḍala should not even be shown.
Whoever, even for a moment,
advances higher in the training,

that embodied one truly gains the higher realms and liberation,
and will attain mastery of mind.
For one whose mind of awakening has later collapsed, accomplishment does not even come into view.
Having gained knowledge rooted in awakening,
from that mind one properly begins.
Then the master of the maṇḍala should himself thoroughly examine the beings who have deep faith in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha.
For them he draws the maṇḍala that is to be shown.
Then the master of the maṇḍala,
having first disciplined his body by strength,
in a fortnight of the month of miracles,
in villages, cities, market towns and districts, in the northeastern quarter, gives an offering of water.
On the surface of the ground, just as it is,
the site becomes mantra through the mantra:
smooth, with trees and fine flowers,
with many excellent fruits,
a place where water flows without ceasing,
on white and yellow ground,
free of potsherds, stones and gravel,
with the sound of great drums,
at crossroads and charnel grounds,
places held by other gods,
auspicious and wholly free of suffering,
where all around, within a range of five krośas, there are rivers and ponds, lakes and flowing streams,
trees, stūpas and temples,
and flowers at all times,
truly endowed in great abundance:
in either fortnight of the month of miracles,
then the master of the maṇḍala
of the Blessed Mother, going to that site

at midday,
should perform the rite of adornment
with the heart mantra of Ekajaṭī.
First, thoroughly purified, with love and compassion for all sentient beings,
he focuses his mind on that site of the maṇḍala and recites the virtuous vidyā.
The sublime heart mantra of Tārā,
and likewise the melody, he recites afterward.
Here, for the sake of worshiping the buddhas,
the maṇḍala is drawn by all embodied beings.
He stays in a place where beings go in the directions.
First having given the torma, equipped with fragrant sticks,
staying in that place, having eaten everything, in proper order, with the melody of invitation, he should say these words:
"I, the master named so-and-so,
wish to draw the maṇḍala
of the Blessed One, noble Tārā.
For myself and for all sentient beings,
having to the end no harmful intent, generating it and showing honor,
and for the sake of the beings
who have deep faith in the Buddha's teaching, that again and again
they may have great faith,
I wish to draw the maṇḍala."

Thus he should say it twice and three times.
Then to those beings
the master of the maṇḍala grants the seeing of signs by night.
Then, whether at the drawing place or having gone elsewhere,
at dawn he should examine the dreams.
Having gone to that site,
to a measure of a hundred cubits

he should make it square on every side.
Outside, going out by the measure of the immeasurable Three Jewels, whatever is in the ground, wood and chaff,
ash, charcoal and potsherds, hair and nails, the black bricks of sacrifice and the like,
and moreover every unwholesome thorn
of the auspicious maṇḍala, having removed them all without remainder,
into that very pit of earth,
having further purified earth from both banks of a great river, he should put it in and pound it with a mallet,
and sprinkle it well with sandalwood water.
Having done so, mixing the cow products that have not fallen to the ground with sandalwood water, on the area of eight cubits,
and outside it too, to a measure of ten cubits,
on what has been thoroughly cleansed,
having given the restoration vows, he should have it smeared, until that ground
has become very smooth
and very well perfected.
Thus for seven days.
Then, to a measure of four cubits,
at the four corners, eight pegs of khadira wood should be made twelve finger-widths in measure.
A thread spun by a maiden,
of five colors, fine and smooth,
very strong, empowered with the root heart mantra of the Blessed Lady seven times, should be wound about the pegs;
making seven windings, he should drive them in at dusk.
Then the master of the maṇḍala,
wearing clean garments,
in the very center of the maṇḍala ground,

should take a vase without a black base,
filled with scented water,
flowers and lamps,
wind a garland of flowers about its neck,
and cover its mouth with sprigs of mango.
Kneeling firmly on his knees,
he should recite the root vidyā seven times,
or else twenty-one times.
Then, looking toward all ten directions,
he should proclaim this: "I, so-and-so,
in this place, in order to worship the buddhas, contemplating the samādhi of all beings,
into this maṇḍala that has been drawn,
may all the buddhas who bring benefit please come into the maṇḍala.
Having come here now,
please accept my offering water."
In its very center, as is to be visualized, the Blessed One drawn in her place should be invited, and having briefly shown the abodes of the deities, he should declare:
"In Tuṣita heaven, the bodhisattvas;
whoever dwells in other worlds;
likewise in the abode of snows,
where the Lord of the Lotus (Padmeśvara) arises;
in Alakāvatī, the Lord of Wealth (Kubera);
on Kailāsa, Śaṅkara (Śiva), it is said."
With the vessel of offering water filled,
he should contemplate their abodes.
Then he should offer water for the face, attend on them and honor them.
In all the rites of the maṇḍala,
if the names and abodes are wholly lost,
it turns back the wrong way.
Thus for seven days,
each and every day, with sandalwood water he should have it smeared, and likewise in the session of the night.

In this interval all the requisites are to be fully assembled.
On this the following is to be said:
With powder like pure crystal,
born of the nature of diamond,
and with powder like the jiba flower,
he should draw the whole maṇḍala.
With ruby and utpala,
it should be laid out with powders entirely;
like saffron water,
the maṇḍala of topaz;
and like the flower of flax,
likewise with emerald as well.
So many are the precious colors;
iron too is allowed, the five so named;
or else with powders ground with scents,
or whatever is found, transformed;
with jewel powders well gathered,
one who desires true accomplishment;
gems and lapis, whatever is unequalled,
and ruby in every way.
All the requisites of the maṇḍala
the master should have prepared by the hands of a maiden:
one born of brahmin or kṣatriya family,
who has generated the mind of awakening,
born without fault, very beautiful,
not lacking in any faculty;
in short, born fully endowed with the characteristics of a woman.
To one, two or three such maidens
he should give the restoration vows, delight them with food of milk,
and, having them wear white garments,
have them make all the requisites of the maṇḍala.
All the requisites of the maṇḍala,
well gathered and examined one by one,

kept quite apart from water,
with the monks having done the discipline,
having done thorough purification,
preceded by conduct of cleanliness, for the master's own preparatory consecration,
all the powders should be fumigated and the drawing made.
The tormas and the butter
he should have made by one versed in the rite.
Then the master, having gathered all the requisites, should draw the maṇḍala himself.
He should take on disciples:
those with deep faith in the Buddha, the Dharma
and the Saṅgha of monks,
complete in all their limbs and parts,
speakers of truth, not coarse,
beautiful to see, and firm of complexion.
Not to be accepted are one, two, three,
eighteen, and another sixteen.
They should take up the three refuges, generate the mind of awakening,
and eat a feast of milk.
Tooth sticks from a milky-sapped tree,
eight finger-widths in measure, empowered with the root heart mantra of the Blessed Lady twenty-seven times,
well steeped in cow's urine:
at the juncture of the night session,
outside the maṇḍala ground, facing toward the east, seated in order
on mats of kuśa grass,
he should place the heart mantra into the hand of each.
He should recite the root heart mantra seven times,
and for tying the topknot also recite it seven times.
Then, having given those tooth sticks to them,
each should chew his own tooth stick.
With scented water empowered seven times
with the heart mantra of Ekajaṭī,

he should sprinkle the crowns of their heads.
Then he should say to them:
"The Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, the compassionate supreme Lord, giver of the great and supreme,

who liberates those hard to liberate: keep him in mind.
And the Blessed Mother Tārā,
the great queen of knowledge-mantras, who gives birth to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas: keep her in mind."
After that, the master,
for all those disciples,
having made firm the Dharma endowed with freedom from attachment, should read the Perfection of Wisdom before them.
By a rite such as this,
women too are to be taken on.
Having risen, a thread spun by a girl,
of five colors,
twisted into an uneven number of strands,
washed with scented water,
for each one, with a lotus rosary,
having sprinkled it in purification,
he should empower it with the root heart mantra
twenty-one times,
and here he should say this over it:
"Because it is the ground of glory,
the mark on the feet of the buddhas,
the source of the bodhisattvas, therefore the lotus rosary is praised."
Then the master himself should tie it with a fine portion onto the hands of the disciples.
Whatever is done for the disciples,
that same he should do for himself as a disciple.
Then the one in the preparatory consecration of the maṇḍala,

facing toward the east,
with his upper robe over one shoulder, planting the cap of his right knee firmly on the ground, should bind the root mudrā
and recite the root knowledge-mantra.
Holding garlands of the scents and flowers of gods and men, to all the buddhas and those of awakening,
the pratyekabuddhas, the noble śrāvakas,
gods, nāgas, yakṣas and gandharvas,
to all of them he should make supplication:
"I, the master of the maṇḍala, named so-and-so,
wish to draw the maṇḍala
of the Blessed noble Tārā;
so may you yourselves come:
all the buddhas, the blessed ones,
the bodhisattvas, the pratyekabuddhas,
the śrāvakas, gods, nāgas and yakṣas,
gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas,
kinnaras and great mahoragas,
surrounded by the hosts of your own knowledge-mantras;
out of compassion for all sentient beings,
having come, please grant me your permission."
Thus again twice and again three times.
Then the master of the maṇḍala
should recite the root knowledge-mantra, and, looking at the maṇḍala ground,
throw a garland of flowers into the center.
If the flower garland moves,
then he should know that they have come.
Then to the buddhas and bodhisattvas
he should offer the offering water with scented water, and flowers. Then,
on the ground outside the hundred cubits,
at a place thoroughly purified,

having kindled a fire well with kindling of apāmārga, facing east, with kuśa grass,
with the root heart mantra, he should offer eight hundred oblations of honey, curd and butter.
Then to the buddhas and bodhisattvas
and to the deities too he should offer the offering water.
Then at the four sides of the maṇḍala
he should station men who have taken up the restoration vows, with protective garlands, and with all their faculties complete.
On this the following is said here:
Whoever does it any other way will come to be without protection, and the eight samayas of the maṇḍala will not truly come about.
Therefore, by the performing of the rite,
the disciple will come to know the samaya.
Then whoever is master of the maṇḍala,
together with the consecrated disciples,
having gone and spread out kuśa grass, recollecting all the hosts of buddhas and bodhisattvas, should lie down on his right side.
Then at dawn the master,
being clean and facing toward the east,
should examine the dreams.
On this the following is to be said:
Whoever sees sandalwood, bilva and the like,
udumbara and the like, and the nyagrodha,
covered with garlands of victory banners,
or a dream that inspires deep faith,
or some beautiful tongues of flame, whoever sees thus, that is accomplishment up to the supreme.
Geese and kāraṇḍavas, cranes,
peacocks and rohaṇas:

whoever comes to see such things,
that dream's middling accomplishment will come about very swiftly indeed.
Or a mother, or a rahaṇa, or likewise one holding a vīṇā,
or earrings and the like,
or likewise if one sees a, dhi and the like:
whatever dream is seen,
that is the lowest accomplishment for people,
as is definitely taught in the rite of Tārā.
Whoever comes to see caṇḍālas and the hands of dogs,
or sees donkeys, camels, carts and the like,
or knowledge itself and the like,
or being touched by lac and sesame oil,
whoever enters these in a dream,
his accomplishment surely remains,
and will come about only as the samaya.
Having examined with intelligence dreams endowed with such qualities as these,
the one of keen mind, knowing thus,
should then explain
the meaning of the dream to that disciple.
Then the master of the maṇḍala,
if he is a householder,
or monks and nuns,
or laymen and laywomen,
those great ones, having taken the restoration vows, afterward the disciples should properly and respectfully keep the restoration.
For a disciple with an unwholesome dream,
before it is explained, a fire offering should be made.
Then the master of the maṇḍala
should have the earlier cloth, and the painted cloth, and at the end the alāsa made of copper, put in,
and have them properly set in place.

Then the ground of the maṇḍala should be well smeared with sandalwood water.
All the disciples in one place,
having been protected with the heart mantra,
seated in one place outside the maṇḍala;
those who know the samaya should be brought well inside.
Then at the time of the setting of the Sun,
the lines of the maṇḍala should be laid down.
A thread spun by a girl,
of five colors, empowered seven times
with the root heart mantra, beginning from the direction of Īśāna,
he should bind those pegs with the thread.
All of them are a cubit in measure;
making three, he should wind them round with the thread.
Outside, all around, conches, great drums and clay drums,
and staff drums of many kinds,
staffs and clappers,
he should have sounded on every side.
Parasols, victory banners, flags and the like should be arrayed outside.
The maṇḍala is square, with four gates;
with a line cord of five colors,
making it a hundred cubits, the lines should be laid down.
That is the second maṇḍala.
Then, having all the colors,
binding the root mudrā,
he should recite the root knowledge-mantra eight hundred times.
Then the master of the maṇḍala,
having bowed to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas,
the pratyekabuddhas, and the noble Saṅgha of śrāvakas,
all around the maṇḍala,
to five krośas, the great preparatory consecration:
with the heart mantra of Ekajaṭī,

the minds of all malicious beings are to be bound.

And all the requisites
of the master of the maṇḍala, having first made protection with the heart mantra of Ekajaṭī itself, beginning from the northeast,
he should lay down the Brahmā line.
Reciting the root knowledge-mantra all the while,
the skilled one draws all the maṇḍalas.
Fully marked off, and white in body,
the master, to the tathāgatas,
should pay homage with jewel powder.
Paying homage to the Lotus family, with yellow powder the Blessed Lady,
noble Tārā; paying homage,
with green ones all the śrāvakas and all the pratyekabuddhas;
and with black for the Vajra family.

Thus by the first, at the heart of the square maṇḍala with four gates. Outside, at the second, one enters to a measure of two cubits. The third is a span, double that. Having thus drawn everything in sequence, wishing to draw within the inner maṇḍala, one should request all the buddhas, the blessed ones, the bodhisattvas and the pratyekabuddhas to come there themselves. Filled with all grains, all jewels, all medicines, all scents and flowers, and sandalwood water, its mouth covered with sprigs of māṣa, its neck tied with white dukūla cloth, made of gold and silver, all the requisites of that maṇḍala: it is wound with a garland of flowers at the edge of the second section and empowered with the root knowledge-mantra. This is called the Fully Victorious vase, and it should be placed in the center of the heart maṇḍala. On this the following is to be said:

For the sake of the samaya, for the sake of merit,
to focus on each aim one desires,
having taken up the vows,
from wherever one dwells,
one should draw this supreme maṇḍala.

Aparājita, the Greatly Compassionate,
the Buddha, Maitreya, together with Locanā:
having invoked all these names,
one should draw the Tathāgata.
Trailokyavijayā, known as the White Lady,
and likewise Bhṛkuṭī,
who is known as the Wrathful Lady:
having recalled all these names,
one should draw Avalokiteśvara.
From the supreme knowledge-mantra, again the Terrifier, Vajrapiṅgala, and Vajra, held to be fierce, and the Lion,
and likewise Vajramuṣṭi itself:
with all these names,
one should draw Vajrapāṇi in full.

Then the master of the maṇḍala, in the center of the heart maṇḍala, with white powder mixed with white mustard seed, should first draw the Buddha, the Blessed One, seated on a jeweled lion throne, teaching the Dharma, with a maṇḍala of light, light radiating all around, rays of light coming forth from his uṣṇīṣa: the Blessed One endowed with every supreme aspect and adorned with the major marks of a great being. On the two sides above the Blessed One, with yellow powder mixed together with lotus pollen, the kings of the uṣṇīṣa, tumultuous with garlands of blazing flame, with the form, attire and shape of a great universal monarch, their bodies serene, facing toward the Tathāgata, full of seeds, and holding fruits in their hands, namely: the Blessed One Victor's Uṣṇīṣa, Cakravartin, the All-Blazing Uṣṇīṣa, the White Parasol (Sitātapatra), Mass of Splendor (Tejorāśi), Mass of Jewels, Mass of Gold, Mass of Renown, the All-Encompassing Mass, the Mass of Afflictions and Secondary Afflictions, the Mass of Unerring Suchness, the Mass of Permanence, the Mass of the Nature of Non-Entity, the Mass of All, the Mass of Melodious Sound, the Mass of the Three Worlds, the Infinite Mass, the Mass of Merit, and the Mass of the Gods: these are seated on the right side. On the left, namely: the Blessed One Victor's Uṣṇīṣa, the Exalted One, the Fully Victorious Uṣṇīṣa, the Lofty One, the Petal of the Earth, the Hundred-Petaled, the Thousand-Petaled, the Ray of Light, the Great Ray of Light, the Stainless Ray of Light, the Ray of Array, the White Ray of Light, the Lotus Ray of Light, the Uṣṇīṣa of Array, the Uṣṇīṣa Who Tames the Four Māras, the Exalted Uṣṇīṣa, and the Inconceivable Uṣṇīṣa: these, together with those called the Power of the Tathāgatas and the Prophecy, are the uṣṇīṣa kings who should be drawn on the upper left.

Beside the Uṣṇīṣa Cakravartin, one should draw the eight great queens of knowledge-mantras resting on a single row: the Blessed Lady Locanā, Ūrṇā, the Moon, the Compassionate Lady, the Loving Lady, the Fearless Lady, the Lady of Prophecy, and the one called the Power of the Tathāgatas. These are seated on lotus thrones, tumultuous with garlands of flame, with serene bodies. The Stain of the Tathāgatas, the Net of Light of the Tathāgatas, the All-Illuminating One of the Tathāgatas, the Heart of the Tathāgatas, and the Near-Heart of the Tathāgatas: these are seated on lotus thrones, tumultuous with garlands of flame, their bodies serene, gazing intently a little toward the Tathāgata; one should draw their bodies shining forth from their own forms. Below the Uṣṇīṣa Cakravartin is the wrathful one of the Tathāgata, the Great Aparājita, in wrathful form, seated on a lotus throne, with a maṇḍala of light all around, his hands busy with a trident and a noose, looking a little toward the image of the Tathāgata. Elsewhere, beside the Victor's Uṣṇīṣa, the eight great queens of knowledge-mantras resting on a single row are these: the Blessed Lady Aparājitā, and then the Śramaṇā, the Beauty of the Tathāgatas, the White Buddha Lady, the Tathāgata Lady of Mind, and the Tathāgata Lady Who Summons with the Hook. These are seated on lotus thrones, with bodies of a maṇḍala of light, facing toward the Tathāgata.

Above these are the eight kings of secret mantra, namely: the Blessed One the End of the Tathāgatas, the All-Illuminating One of the Tathāgatas, the Knowledge of the Tathāgatas, the Three Worlds of the Tathāgatas, the Assembly of the Tathāgatas, the Body of the Tathāgatas, the Emanation of the Tathāgatas, and the World of the Tathāgatas. These are encircled all around by a maṇḍala of light, seated on lotus thrones, their bodies serene, gazing toward the image of the Tathāgata.

Below the Victor's Uṣṇīṣa is the king of knowledge-mantras called Endowed with the Limbs of the Tathāgata, with light all around, seated on a lotus throne, a lotus in his hand. All of them have the forms of deities, the right hand full of seeds and the left hand granting the supreme gift, and each remains in his own attire.

Above the uṣṇīṣa kings one should draw the eight pratyekabuddhas as one knows them, namely: the Blessed One, the pratyekabuddha called the Renowned, the Sage Above, the Great Sage, the Sage of the Gods, Mādara, the Heaped, the Well Heaped, and the Great Heap. These eight pratyekabuddhas are seated cross-legged on lotus thrones, absorbed in samādhi, tumultuous with garlands of flame, and wearing yellow upper robes. Below the Blessed One is the mudrā of the wish-fulfilling jewel; on the left, the outer monastic robe. Below, in front, is the wheel of Dharma with twelve spokes, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, resting on an eight-petaled lotus. Beside that, one should draw the king of wrathful ones called Subdued by Tārā, wearing a crown of matted locks, seated on a lotus throne, receiving the command of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. Below him one should draw the queen of knowledge-mantras called Beauty of the Lotus Family, seated on a lotus throne, wearing a crown of matted locks, with lower and upper garments of silk and cotton, her palms joined, gazing a little toward the form of Tārā, receiving her command. Above that is the wrathful one called Great Lotus, red in color, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, seated on a lotus throne, receiving the command of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. All these kings of wrathful ones should be made with a maṇḍala of light of great blazing all around, bearing transformed forms, with lower garments of silk and cotton, and with bodies fully adorned with every ornament.

On the left side of Tārā is the bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta, white in body, wearing a crown of matted locks, fully adorned with every ornament, with an upper garment of fine silk and a lower garment of silk and cotton, seated on a lotus throne, paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni. Below the lotus of Avalokiteśvara is the bodhisattva called Going Stainlessly, dark blue like the priyaṅgu, with a slightly smiling face, seated on a lotus throne, wearing a crown of matted locks, wearing a fluttering lower garment and an upper garment of fine silk, his body very serene, blazing with rays of light, paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni. To the upper left of Going Stainlessly one should make the Blessed One Avalokiteśvara with a staff, a water pot, a rosary and a black antelope skin, his body serene and tumultuous with garlands of flame. Below him is the Fulfiller of Desires, seated on a lotus throne, white in body, his body entwined with lotus stalks, holding a lotus in his left hand and a wish-fulfilling jewel in his right, tumultuous with garlands of flame, with a slightly smiling face.

On a single panel to the right of Vajrapāṇi one should draw the great kings of knowledge-mantras, namely: the Blessed One Vidyottama, the Sleeper, Susiddhikara, Vajrasena, Subāhu, Ūrdhvajaṭā, Good Knowledge, Good Accomplishment, Good Army, Mahābala, the Destroyer, Kilīkila, the Supreme, Well Tamed, the Soarer, the Ancient, Jewel Kelī, Child Kelī, Good Kelī, the Well Filled, the Great Filled, the Ender of the Gods, the Great Vajra, and the Blazing One. These twenty-four are the great kings of mantra, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, seated on peacocks, dark blue like the utpala, their faces slightly frowning in wrath, paying homage with the left hand to the Blessed One Śākyamuni.

Below these one should draw the great queens of knowledge-mantras, namely: the Blessed Lady Māmakī, the Vajra Hook Lady, the Vajra Chain Lady, the Vajra Victorious Lady, the Vajra Fully Victorious Lady, the Red Lady, Yaśovatī, Biśinī Vajralocanā, the Vajra Frowning Lady, the Vajra Fist Lady, the Vajra Fearless Lady, the Vajra Garland Lady, the Vajra Lady of Sound, the Vajra Auspicious Lady, the Vajra Holder Lady, the Vajra Mother, the Vajra Aparājitā, the Vajra Meteorite Lady, the Vajra Lady of Time, the Vajra Crest Lady, the Vajra Great Command, Vajra Light, the Victorious Lady, the Vajra Lady of Form, and Vajralocanā. These twenty-four are the great queens of knowledge-mantras of the Vajra family, seated on peacocks, dark blue like the utpala, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, their faces made slightly frowning in wrath, wearing skirts of silk and cotton and upper garments of fine silk, holding a vajra in the left hand and with the right paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, bearing forms praised by the gods. They gaze toward the image of the Tathāgata, and should be drawn each according to her own form, attire and shape.

On the right side of the Blessed One is the noble Avalokiteśvara, white like an autumn cloud, wearing a crown of matted locks, with Amitābha seated in its center, with an upper garment of fine silk and a skirt of fine silk and cotton, fully adorned with every ornament, his left hand in the lotus mudrā and his right waving a yak-tail fan for the Blessed One, on a lotus throne, his body adorned with the marks of a great being, gazing a little toward the image of the Tathāgata. On the left of the Blessed One is the noble Vajrapāṇi, the color of the petal of a blue utpala, on a lotus throne, fully adorned with every ornament, his body serene, with a skirt of silk and cotton and wearing a red upper garment, his right hand paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, his left hand busy with a yak-tail fan, his eyes tumultuous with blazing, gazing a little toward the image of the Tathāgata.

To the right of Avalokiteśvara one should draw the Blessed Mother, the Great Tārā, dark blue like the priyaṅgu, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, her body serene, seated on a lotus throne, slightly smiling, with a skirt of silk and cotton and wearing a red upper garment, holding an utpala in her left hand and with her right paying homage to the Blessed One Śākyamuni, her body bowing slightly, in the first bloom of youth, neither too stout nor too slender: so one should draw the Blessed Mother Tārā.

To the right of the noble Avalokiteśvara are the eighteen great kings of knowledge-mantras resting on a single row, namely: the Blessed One the Infinite-Armed, the Thousand-Armed, the Hundred-Armed, the Twelve-Armed, the Six-Armed, the Four-Armed, the Thousand-Footed, the Hundred-Footed, the Twelve-Footed, the Six-Footed, the Four-Footed, Hayagrīva, Amoghapāśa, the One Illuminating with a Thousand Rays, the White-Throated Victory over the Three Worlds, the Infinite Victor, the Great Victor, the End of the Gods, the Immeasurable End, the Chariot of the Mind, and the Giver of Fearlessness. These great kings of knowledge-mantras attend on the chief of the Lotus family, who enters into existence. They are tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, their bodies encircled by lotus forms, a lotus in the hand and the right hand granting the supreme gift, gazing a little toward Tārā.

Beside the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, is Pāṇḍaravāsinī, seated on a lotus throne, her body serene, wearing a crown of matted locks, gazing toward the image of the Tathāgata, a fully opened lotus in her hand and holding a rosary in her right. To her right, again, one should draw the fourteen chief ladies of action of the Lotus family resting on a single row, namely: the Blessed Lady Bhṛkuṭī, the White Lady, the Great White Lady, the Glorious Lady in Front, the Lotus Go Bo Rig, Yaśovatī, the Buddha Hero Moon Lady, the Lady of Enjoyments, the Lady of Bliss, the Lady of Renown, the Lady Robed in Wisdom, the Lady of One Power, the Many Powers, the Lady of Ten Powers, the Mother of the Buddhas, and the Mother of the Limbs of Awakening. These are great queens of knowledge-mantras, tumultuous with garlands blazing all around, seated on lotus thrones, fully adorned with every ornament, wearing the attire of goddesses, their bodies serene, gazing a little toward the image of Tārā. Holding a lotus, and with the right hand granting the supreme gift, they should be drawn each in her own form.

Below Tārā is the one called What Shall I Do, the great wrathful one of the Blessed noble Tārā, four-faced and four-armed, seated on a lotus throne, his body firm, with the form of the black Antaka, frowning in wrath, baring his fangs, one face gaping with fierce laughter, the second gazing at the Tathāgata, the first looking at Tārā. With his first hand he is bringing forth a jewel to be seen, and with his first left he holds a noose, receiving the command of the Blessed Mother Tārā. To his right, again, one should draw the great wrathful one called Subdued by Tārā, seated upon the Great God (Śiva), his body entwined with lotus stalks, dark blue like the utpala, receiving the command of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. All the rites of entry and empowerment are just as stated before.

This is the rite of the great maṇḍala of the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā.

Then the bodhisattva, the great being Avalokiteśvara, said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, I shall give my own heart mantra for the great king of rites of Ūrdhvajaṭā. By merely reciting it, the samādhi of all the tathāgatas becomes manifest, and all fears, harms and epidemics are fully pacified."

Then the Blessed One gave his approval to the bodhisattva, the great being, the noble Avalokiteśvara, saying, "Excellent! Avalokiteśvara, excellent! Speak it."

Then the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara spoke this maṇḍala of his own heart mantra:

Then, greater than this, the maṇḍala that truly holds the sublime:
in the form of a great maṇḍala,
draw the outer maṇḍala all around.
In its center, with an even thread,
surround it with a square.
At the second, the Destroyer goes,
and one should draw the sublime maṇḍala.
In the manner of eight maṇḍalas,
and the four lines as well,
one should draw an eight-petaled lotus.
On the anthers of the syllable of the lotus,
one should set the Protector of the World.
On the garlands of the lotus petals
one should draw images of the buddhas everywhere.
The master, seated well there,
with the supreme mudrā of the Great Lotus,
settled at the place of the maṇḍala,
in equipoise, sets it evenly.
Just as a lotus in water is not stained even by the many faults of its place, so here

one acts rightly through love for beings.
Having spoken this once as an example,
then with the supreme hooks,
having truly summoned, the Great Lotus,
Avalokiteśvara, is released.
For this, here is the great Lotus Hook:

oṃ mahāpadmo hūṃ ja hrī

Then the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, comes and grants the master a vision of himself, or else he sends forth rays of light. Then, with this very mudrā, the disciple should be led in. He should be clothed in white garments of white silk, and his head should be wrapped with a white turban. Having proclaimed this very thing to the world, one then says, "Speak!" Then, placing a lotus in his left hand and a water vessel in his right, one should say this:

"All the buddhas are the Great Lotus.
The sublime maṇḍala of the lotus is noble Avalokiteśvara.
Examine that very thing together with him."

Then he should also be trained in binding the great mudrā and in the meditative absorption. This is the great maṇḍala called the Lotus of the Tathāgata.

Then comes the lotus maṇḍala. Having drawn the maṇḍala in the same way, one should sit close to the central pericarp and recite one hundred thousand times. The meditative absorption of all the tathāgatas, gazing upon that fully opened lotus petal, attains the very state of noble Avalokiteśvara. This is the lotus maṇḍala.

Then comes the pledge maṇḍala. Having arranged the maṇḍala in just the same way, one has a thousand lotuses laid out in the center. Then those thousand lotuses should be offered to the Blessed One, reciting once for each one. Then, having led the disciple in, one should declare the pledge:

"Even for the sake of a son or a disciple,
do not let the pledge decline.
Declare the pledge to me.

For through the form of the lotus,
all the attachment of desire is pure.
This is the pledge maṇḍala.
One should draw the action maṇḍala.
With the four kinds of offering,
with the mind one worships all the buddhas,
with the body the protector Avalokiteśvara,
with speech Vajrapāṇi,
and through action one is born into Ākāśagarbha.
Thus it becomes the rite of the means of accomplishment."

The Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, is seated on the summit of Mount Meru, and from his whole body, which abides everywhere through his own meditative absorption, come eight bodies of tathāgatas. Then, beginning from the first day of the bright fortnight, reciting constantly and without interruption in the meditative absorption of total purity, one should recite until noble Avalokiteśvara becomes manifest. The bodies of the tathāgatas radiate out and settle in the center of the practitioner's lotus, and then again other bodies of the Buddha arise from there, and the practitioner's empowerment becomes established and firm. Then one's whole being becomes equal to Avalokiteśvara; in that instant one is endowed with bliss and flies wherever one wishes. All sentient beings come under one's power, and one's life becomes immeasurable.

Then come the other accomplishments and all the great actions. By reciting one hundred thousand times, all karmic obscurations are purified. By reciting two hundred thousand times, all evil deeds, such as the deeds of immediate retribution, are exhausted without remainder. By reciting three hundred thousand times, all merit becomes manifest. Then all the accomplishments of the yakṣas and all the excellences of the tathāgatas and so forth come about; by reciting three million five hundred thousand times, even the wisdom of omniscience becomes manifest.

Then, for the great mudrā, having made one hundred thousand stūpas, at the end one should recite through the whole night according to the rite. Then at dawn all the tathāgatas come and enter one's heart. Then one finds the bodhisattvas, each one. Then they enter one's mouth. Then one finds Avalokiteśvara himself. Even without the practice of accomplishment, it serves for all actions. By reciting it first, one protects the villages and towns of others, and having beautifully invited the deity, one may perform everything.

For bringing about possession, a graha is made to descend with sandalwood incense. With śirīṣa flowers one brings sentient beings under control. With fragrant flowers one immobilizes all sentient beings. With white clay, women. With sweet-smelling flowers, thieves are immobilized. With a fire offering of white mustard seed, wild animals and birds are immobilized. By scattering white mustard seed one displays magical illusions. With a peacock's breast one causes dreams to be shown. Reciting at the three times of day destroys bad dreams. With a fire offering of sesame one immobilizes all sentient beings. With a fire offering of crow's wings one brings a king under control. With a fire offering of king's-coil flowers one brings all desires under control.

Having made offerings to the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, one should recite while keeping a fast for eight nights. Then one will obtain everything one desires. To bring the chief queen of a king under control, a fire offering of a woman's pubic hair is used; likewise for bringing a maiden under control. For other aims as well, together with a fire offering, one should recite before Avalokiteśvara at the three times of each day.

In the later tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, the magic of all the great actions.

Then that great being, while meditating on that very meditative absorption, taught the secret maṇḍala of equipoise of the wrathful king Subdued by Tārā.

Five cubits in size, with four doors, with door frames and porticos set firmly in place,
its outside should be made in the form of a lotus.
Then in all the corners as well,
having thought this through well,
one should draw the inner maṇḍala.
With this heart mantra spoken earlier, reciting it, there is protection;
and with the fine powders
of the five colors, white, red, yellow,
black and green,
praised with the knowledge mantra of Tārā,
one should make the Blessed One who is to be accomplished.
The wrathful king is in front;
on the left one should make Ekajaṭī;
on the right, the lotus-born; in the outer door frame, the heart mantra, accomplished as is fitting.

As one wishes, one may use kinds of stone;
it is purified with fragrant powder.
Vajramuṣṭi and Mahābala:
where the rite of the three worlds is,
through the wish of the great Vajradhara,
by passing beyond, it dissolves.
The fist, together with Vajramuṣṭi, is in the right gatehouse;
having placed Mahābala there, Mahābala with a fish at the throat is to be made in the west.
In the outer gatehouse on the right
one should likewise make Maheśvara.
On him one should set the mudrā of the spear,
and one should draw Umā as she appears.
In the two southern corners are to be made mudrās of various kinds.
In the western and northern corners,
the vajra, the mudrā of the vināyakas.
In the two northern corners
the wise should make the mudrā of the family.
In the single eastern corner
one should set the mudrā of the hosts of mātṛkās, and Bhṛṅgiriṭi together with the vināyakas.
Then, as far as one's means allow,
one should worship the deities according to the rite.
By reciting the mantra of the wrathful one of great power, Subdued by Tārā, one should protect oneself.
Having taken karavīra and tāla,
keeping the fast in one's own place,
the wise one, in the northern gatehouse,
in whatever place is clean, should lead the disciple in.
The intelligent one should invite the deities.
Through the wrathful king, on every side,
by the rite of the knowledge mantra as is fitting,
is the supreme subduing and caring.

The actions concerning grahas and the body should be ascertained right there.
Having subdued them, ask about their pledge and their well-being.
Making grahas depart, devouring, killing some, whoever they may be,
likewise purifying obscurations,
and for all sentient beings, performing sādhanas and yantras, activities of whatever kind,
the wise one's thousand actions,
summoning the grahas,
and the mudrās of one's own family and of other families,
should be indicated.
From all the maṇḍalas of this,
all the hosts of bhūtas and the rest should then be worshipped extensively with torma, incense and so on.
Through that one sees the graha; one should worship it.
Later, through the empowerment, it is tamed.
Drink given by people, fire offering and the like should destroy it.
Having taken śiṣalāñcana,
one should make the graha that has seized depart.
Lips that rākṣasas have given,
seeing colors of that kind;
for piśācas, the hare-marked moon;
eyes that do not close and that drip;
if one sees terrors of various kinds,
one gazes all around.
Whatever the changes of the withering graha,
with power and relying on the arms,
against enemies everywhere,
the work of the deities and weapons.
The lotus-maker and the matted locks,
the staff, the rosary, the place of fear,
the water pot and flask, invincibility:
this mudrā is said to be the Brāhmī's.

The trident, the crescent moon,
the matted locks, the eye and so on,
the bull, the sound, the fierce one,
and the Īśānas: these are known as seven.
The śakti spear, the serpent hood, the banner,
the cock, and likewise the peacock's tail:
this mudrā is said to be Kaumārī's.
The wheel, the conch and the club,
the sword, the shield, the garuḍa,
and the head: this mudrā is said to be Vaiṣṇavī's.
The great cloud belongs to the Great God.
The vase and the pestle likewise,
and the first, the mudrā of the left side:
this mudrā is said to be Lahirikā's.
The Revatīs and the torma-eaters:
seeing an old, fierce man is the seal of the white Revatīs.
Seeing one's own form
is the begging bowl of the stealers of vitality, and lifting it is release.

Then comes the supremely secret maṇḍala. For all virtuous activities, having found a spot by a solitary tree, or a charnel ground, or a clean empty house without a window, the practitioner, in a wrathful frame of mind, should smear the maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, and make three lines there. It is four cubits all around. The first line is of ash, the second of red ochre, and the third should be drawn with powder of blazing charcoal. One should have a single door made, in the north or in the west. In the middle of the door one should make the Great God holding a spear in his hand. Within the band one should make the Buddha, whose nature is truly wondrous. To the right side of the Buddha one should set out Subdued by Tārā. On the left one places the great heroine of great strength, Ekajaṭī. Those to be set behind the body of the Sugata are the nāga king Ananta, likewise Takṣaka, and the great hero Karkoṭa should also be set there. Likewise Padma, Mahāpadma, Śaṅkhapāla, and Kulika are named among the mighty ones. Those deities, together with their retinues, should be arranged so as to fill the band. From all of this the host of mātṛkās should be left out; Śrīmatī is the band. At the door, a monkey and a goat, and the maidens too at the door, as watchers of the door.

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight one should properly worship the deities, not passing beyond the great mahoragas, and recite a thousand times. The wise one will accomplish the king of mantras. It drives out all fevers and grahas, and it also crushes disputes. The deities then return to their own abodes. Then, by constantly reciting this secret mantra too, with water of guggulu or with kuśa grass, the practices of Aparājita, of pacifying, of increasing, and of attraction, carried out as one wishes, are accomplished. That which destroys everything, Subdued by Tārā, is the maṇḍala of the secret means of accomplishment.

Then again the bodhisattva, the great being Maitreya, bowed to the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni, and said this:

"I know it directly, for I heard it in person from the Tathāgata Ratnaketu. Then, in the later tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara taught the heart mantra called Halāhala. For the benefit of sentient beings, to show the power of Tārā, and out of compassion skilled in means, I shall explain it."

The Blessed One said, "Maitreya, speak!"

namaḥ sarbba tathāgatebhyo mahā buruṣa riṣabhebhyaḥ nma ārya avalokiteśvara mahāsthāma prāpta maitriya mañjuśrī bajra pāṇi prabhiti bhyo mahā satve bhyaḥ

Having paid homage to them: "Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, I shall pronounce your heart mantra, which accomplishes every wish, which no sentient being can withstand, and which destroys the path of existence.

sādya thedaṃ he bodhisatvā mahāsatvā he hale ārya avalokiteśvarāya parama matri citta hita citta kāruṇi kāmāṃ gama biyati mahā biyati dhuru dhuru dhuru calentra bala nama stestu sarbba satvā bhaya prata hari hari hari bāha norbba ba bha bā na kha turu turu ghuru ghuru suru suru su pra śā si pā mala mūrti ārya avalokiteśvarāya kṛṣṇā jina jaṭā mukuṭā bala mutrā la mā la ba la ma la ma la kala kala nala hala hala hulu hulu he bodhisatvā priya bodhisatvā mahā bodhisatvā nama teru kuru kuru hṛdayaṃ manu smara idaṃ ca me kārya kuru svāhā"

This is the heart mantra of the bodhisattva, the great being, called Halāhala, given by the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara. Each day, rising at dawn, one should make the maṇḍala of the Blessed One, lay out scents, flowers and so forth, and then recite it thirteen times. Then it pacifies every illness. By doing this for just six months, one brings the chariot of the mind, one's heart's desire, to complete fulfillment, just as one wishes.

Likewise the Blessed One, the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, said, "If even someone who has committed a deed of immediate retribution does not succeed with it, then may I myself be one who has committed a deed of immediate retribution, and may I have deceived all the tathāgatas!"

Then the Blessed One, the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, bowed to the Blessed One and said this: "Following the Blessed One, in the later tantra of the great ritual manual of the Blessed Mother, are the knowledge mantras against every fear: the four sisters, entering ever higher and higher, beheld by the buddhas, the blessed ones; born into four ritual manuals; of small form; traveling through the sky; going underground, invisibility, vetālas, combat, swift travel on foot, increase, fierce rites, subjugation, and the very bestowal of good fortune. They reverse what was taught by Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Maheśvara and the rest; through the character of their intrinsic nature they show birth into a superior house. For the sake of the power of the knowledge of the buddhas and bodhisattvas, even by a thousand, even by those hundred thousand, it is destroyed merely once; and, as a mere example, with regard to the domain of the bodhisattvas, which abides by its nature as the source of many worlds, these practices following the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, have been taught in the later tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā. The Blessed Mother, mastered by the mind, bestows the accomplishments.

tadyathā namo amitābhāya namo ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya oṃ jaye svāhā

This is the one called Jayā, the Victorious.

tadyathā namo amitābhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya oṃ bijaya svāhā

This is the one called Fully Victorious.

tadyathā namo amitābhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya oṃ ajite svāhā

This is the one called Ajitā, the Invincible.

namo amitābhāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya oṃ aparājite svāhā

This is the one called Aparājitā.

Such are the four sisters. The fifth is the brother:

namo amitābhāya tadyathā arhate nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya oṃ kini kini sarba tathāgatā utbhava śānte barade uttama tathāgatā utbhava hūṃ phaṭ svāhā

This is the brother called Tumburu.

The king of mantras has been fully proclaimed.
In brief, for the proud and conceited,
the actions of the later tantra,
in whatever way they are applied,
in just that way they accomplish."

Then the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, wishing to display his own miraculous power, rose from his seat, circumambulated the Blessed One Śākyamuni three times, and entered into the meditative absorption called Fully Impelling One's Own Vajra. Then, arising from that meditative absorption, he said this to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara:

"Bodhisattva, I too, in this later tantra, the king of ritual manuals, in order to show fully the power of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, shall bestow, through the stūpas of all worldly beings, the practice that follows the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. Great being who rejoices in it, in the time to come, the supreme accomplishment, and even those of corrupt moral discipline who perform the supreme action, will succeed in a special way. These practices following noble Tārā, which have arisen from the one who is called, are the families and that which overpowers adversaries."

Then the bodhisattva, the great being, noble Avalokiteśvara, said this to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi: "Vajrapāṇi, speak!"

Then Vajrapāṇi again entered into meditative absorption. The very moment Vajrapāṇi entered into absorption, this great trichiliocosm, this world system of a billion worlds, was entirely illuminated.

Then Vajrapāṇi stretched out the fingers of his hand. Those that came forth from his left hand, the one called Vajra Utter Destroyer, Vajramuṣṭi, Red Vajra, Vajra Gone to the End, and Black Vajra, are the brothers, the blessed Vajra Youths. Then they bowed to the Blessed One, and also to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi and to Avalokiteśvara. Then the Blessed One said to the five youthful brothers, "Excellent! You are the source of merit for sentient beings, the bestowers of accomplishments, the givers of great benefit in the ritual manual of Tārā, arisen from the family of Vajrapāṇi, who have become lords over the lotus hand."

Then Vajrapāṇi taught the maṇḍala:

"One, two, three, four, five,
and so on up to eight cubits.
One who wants wealth uses one cubit;
one who wants a son, two cubits;
for ruining an enemy, three cubits;
for recitation alone, four cubits;
the fifth is for all accomplishments;
the eighth is for traveling through the sky,
for aims beneath the earth, for rivers,
for oceans, and for places of accomplishment.
It may be done in a house as well, or elsewhere in a clean place that has been covered over;
with whatever is auspicious for the action,
one should lay out the lines of the maṇḍala with a cord.
It is square, with four corners,
with four doors, adorned with porticos and ornaments.
Having divided the maṇḍala into three parts,
in the upper part is the Blessed One,
the Buddha, seated on a lotus seat,
in the act of teaching the Dharma.
On the right is Avalokiteśvara, holding Brahmā's staff and a flask in his hands;
on the left the noble Vajrapāṇi, with a vajra in his hand; or at his side is Viṣṇu, with conch and wheel, holding a club and a wheel in his hands.
In the middle part, riding in a boat with the boat's mast raised up, first are Vajra Utter Destroyer, Māyā and Tumburu;
second, Vajramuṣṭi
together with Jayā; in the third,
Red Body together with Fully Victorious;
in the fourth, Vajra End together with Ajitā; in the fifth,

Black Belly together with Aparājitā.
Green, white, red,
yellow and black, in that order:
having set out the deities,
with white garments and white ornaments,
their hands holding weapons,
club, vajra, pestle,
bow and sword,
in the center, on lotus, moon and sun,
one should set out the deities as if present.
Beneath the boat one should place fire and the treasure of the waters, adorned with conches, fish and makaras.
In the east, south, west and north are Indra,
Yama, Varuṇa and Kubera, with their mounts and their mudrās.
Vases, well wrapped,
filled with scented water,
and beautified with leafy twigs,
should be set in the corners.
Here the fifth vase,
adorned with jewels, its neck wrapped with soft cloth, its mouth covered with twigs of sahakāra,
with a parasol raised and garlands of flowers hanging,
should be set at the eastern door.
Outside the maṇḍala are four oceans,
made with conches, lotuses and so forth,
and with mountain peaks as well.
Banners flutter and a canopy is spread.
With powders of indranīla, of gold,
of silver, of copper and of iron,
one should draw the maṇḍala.
With divine flowers, and perfuming with incense,
one should worship with tormas of various kinds.

Flowers and fruits of the season, wealth, gold and various jewels,
and food should be spread out in the outer courtyard.
One should lead the disciples onto the mountain.
With the later heart mantra, the invitation and the rest,
all the actions, and the request to depart are done.
Then whoever, through faith in the Three Jewels, has given rise to the mind of awakening, women, men and youths
who have kept the fast vow, with their faces bound with cloth, should be made to hear the pledge as well.
With flowers of precious metal and of gold
they should cast with their hand.
Wherever it falls,
that becomes their family. Then,
uncovering their faces, one should show them the deities,
and the mantras and mudrās too become theirs.
Or else, by drawing that maṇḍala
by day and by night, the deities become pleased."

Then come the images. Aśvattha, nyagrodha and udumbāra are for pacifying; cūta, campaka and nāgakesara for increasing; bilva, ariṣṭa and koṭha for fierce rites. For subjugation and for those of ill fortune: śleṣmāntaka, śasmali and dīrghabitta. For causing madness: sandalwood, the aśoka tree, honey and intoxicants. For good fortune itself: those made from asthidatta. For all actions: one made of gold. One who wants kingship uses one made of silver. Copper is for the sake of good fortune. One made of iron is for fierce rites. For causing ruin: campaka, nāgakesara, bakula and atimuktaka. One who wants wealth uses jasmine, yūthikā, mallikā, intoxicants, the golden tree and mālikā. One who wants good fortune uses lotus and kumuda. For pacifying: utpala and saugandhika. For increasing and for other aims as well: flowers that are fragrant. For whatever is for increasing: flowers of lesser fragrance. For fierce rites, causing ruin and the like: sandalwood and the like with their fragrance taken away. For pacifying, increasing, subjugation and good fortune itself, with incense of such kinds, joining the palms, one should perform the actions of these heart mantras.

namo ratna trayāya nama ścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pā ba taye namaśca turnāṃ bhaginīnāṃ namo deba tumburu sārtha kā ha ya jambhani jambhi karoti amitraṃ staṃbhani staṃbhi karotya mitraṃ mohani mohī karotya mitraṃ andhani indhi karotya mitraṃ jaye āgaccha bijaya āgaccha jambhani āgaccha stambhani āgaccha bali bali puṣpa dhūpa upahāraṃ prati gṛhṇa thā samāya yupālāyāthā suṭuṭu susla bajra bhañja nīya svāhā

This knowledge mantra extends to eighty-four thousand applications, namely: traveling through the sky, entering into caves, making treasures move, the state of a knowledge holder itself, accomplishing eye ointment with realgar, subjugation, causing ruin, utterly crushing others, protecting each one's own land, poison, messengers, contagious disease, abiding firmly with fangs bared, binding the maṇḍala of all sentient beings, and accomplishing Rājagṛha through wrath. Other actions such as these should likewise be accomplished as one wishes.

The heart mantra of the four sisters is complete.

Then he taught the maṇḍala again. It is four cubits, square, with four doors, adorned on all sides with porticos. One should have three door guardians made, Yama, Varuṇa and Kubera, with their mounts and their weapons. The north is to be taken as the entrance. Having divided it into three parts, in the upper part is the Blessed Mother Tārā. One should also draw noble Vajrapāṇi, holding a vajra in his left hand, his right hand in the gesture of granting the highest gift, blazing on every side. To the left of the vajra holder is Vajrāṅkuśa, holding a hook in his hand; elsewhere is Vajraśṛṅkhalā, holding a chain in his hand. All of them should be placed on mountain peaks. One should properly draw the Great God, who dwells in the direction of Īśāna, together with his consort and with his bull. The other three should be drawn in order, with their weapons and their abodes, as they are: Bhṛṅgiriṭi and the Mahākālas. In the west are Naradatta, Tumburu, Kāśyapa and Viśvāmitra, holding water pots, flasks and water vessels in their hands. One should draw a well, a raised mast, and tatasphu. He wears a green upper garment, holds a club in his hand, is adorned with a diadem, holds a crest-guard in his hand, and his ears are adorned with lac. The Victorious One is white and holds a vajra in her hand, wearing upper and lower garments. Fully Victorious has a red body and holds a pestle in her hand, wears an upper garment of red cloth, and holds a gold-colored bow in her hand. Aparājitā is black, wears an upper garment of variegated cloth and a skirt of black cloth, holds a sword in her hand, and rides in a boat. Then one should draw the moon, the sun and the deities, with lotuses scattered within. At the northern door is the great vināyaka; on the right side is the Vaitaraṇī river, and all around one should draw vajras, conches, lada and śrīvatsas everywhere.

Having drawn everything properly in this way, one should then offer, as far as one's means allow, tormas, five kinds each of soup, five kinds of food, plenty of kṭrañca, barley dough wrapped with food, jambulika, curd, molasses, butter and honey, as is fitting. There are four water vases, their mouths covered with leafy twigs as one wishes, and vases filled entirely with scented water, with all seeds and all medicines and leafy twigs, their necks wrapped with cloth, five each of vases adorned with precious metal, gold and jewels and with leafy twigs; and outside, jewels are laid out. Having done such auspicious things as these, one should afterward recite.

Then, first, one should lead the disciple in. The mantra that is different from this is:

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye namaśca turbha ginī nāṃ mama jayāya māheti svāhā

With this mantra one subjugates all sentient beings in eight ways: with flowers, white mustard seed, salt, water and ash, and also with an effigy that defiles even the stainless.

namo ratna trayāya namaśca ṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye namo bijayāya haha dhali kumārani piṣṇu mukhe raṭeśa svāhā

By reciting this knowledge mantra a hundred thousand times, the preliminary approach is accomplished. Then, taking wood struck by Śakra's thunderbolt, and having kept a fast for three nights, one should go to a place where there is a stūpa containing relics, and set out all four vases there, their mouths adorned with flowers and leafy twigs. Then, in the maṇḍala laid out on spread kuśa grass, pressing down the peg bound with three metals with the left foot or with the left hand, one should recite until the hand becomes invisible. One should not let go of the hand. Then that peg should be planted in a wilderness; the peg will appear in the house. Having planted it by this very rite, press the peg down firmly with the left foot and bring them under control! By squeezing the hand that destroys cities, it destroys all mudrās and also poisonings. It may also be planted among people, and it serves for everything. For other purposes too, it performs actions just as one wishes.

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye nama śca ta sṛ ṇāṃ bhaginīnāṃ nama stumburu sarbba bahasya mahā karṇasya pici pici amukāya bharga prapatāntu svāhā

On the eighth day of the dark fortnight or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast for three nights, one should write this mantra in blood on a skull cup. Having consecrated it with eight thousand recitations, one should throw it into water. It becomes speech of every kind.

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye namaśca tasṛṇāṃ bhaginīnāṃ namo jambhani cāṭu cāṭu cāṭu cāṭu svāhā

With this knowledge mantra, in the month of Puṣya, beneath an aśoka tree, putting three black peppercorns in one's mouth, one should recite it eight thousand times.

Then, putting a single peppercorn into one's mouth, whoever one gazes at without blinking comes under one's power.

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye namaśca tisṛṇāṃ bhaginīnāṃ namastumburu mahā sārtha bāhāya namo jaye bijaye ajite aparājite svāhā

With this knowledge mantra, having first performed the approach recitation as one wishes, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight or the fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast day and night and wearing clean clothes, one should offer lamps, banners, garlands and so forth, making an extensive offering. Drawing water oneself, one should place it in a copper vessel and recite over it for one session. Having drunk it and bathed, by that same rite, at dawn, having eaten the alms food designated by the Saṅgha, repeat this eight times. Then the fields of knowledge of the four directions enter one's mouth, and one retains whatever one hears.

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā bataye namaśca tasṛṇāṃ bhaginīnāṃ tantri mili mili svāhā

With this knowledge mantra, entering a river that flows to the ocean and making a fist with the right hand, one should recite it for thirteen days. It raises up all who have died of poison or of fangs. With the fist one brings down the grahas.

namo ratna trayāya namaścaṇḍa bajra pāṇaye mahā yakṣa senā pataye namaśca tasṛṇāṃ bhaginīnā namastumburu sarbba mahāya suṭu suṭu bajra prabhañjanīye svāhā

With this mantra, make a maṇḍala of cow dung four cubits across, and there perform eight thousand fire offerings of vāsaka kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, beginning from the eighth day of the dark fortnight and continuing until the fifteenth. It summons whomever one wishes.

With this too one should work upon the palace of an angered king. Having entered it as a wandering ascetic, one should draw him there with charcoal, press the drawing down with the left foot, and recite eight thousand times. Then he becomes free of anger.

Then the mudrās are well explained.
For every action of the virtuous hand,
whatever action is to be done,
for all of them the left hand is joined.
The mudrā held with the thumb is proclaimed to be for the gods;
that with the index finger is for the yakṣas;
for the gandharvas, the middle finger;
for the bhūtas, the nameless finger;
for the nāgas, the little finger of the hand;
for the rākṣasas, the palm;
the staff mudrā is for the pretas.
The mudrās are explained as eightfold.
The thumb is Vajra Crusher;
the index finger is Vajramuṣṭi;
the crooked finger is Vajra Red Body;
the little finger is the Black-Limbed One;
and the thumb, this one is called Tumburu.
Each with its own form, for each one,
the five mudrās are to be set out.

Then once again the bodhisattva, the great being Mahāsthāmaprāpta, bowed his head to the Blessed One Śākyamuni and said this: "Blessed One, greatly compassionate one, who acts for the benefit of all sentient beings, please teach, by way of the later tantra of the great king of ritual manuals, Ūrdhvajaṭā, how one should act, Blessed One, in order to bring to complete fulfillment the perfection of skillful means in the conduct of knowledge mantras."

The Blessed One said: "Excellent, son of noble family! Those knowledge holders who call the knowledge mantra to mind while they are washing, who bathe without the knowledge mantra, and who perversely do so in a place that is not secluded, become rough of body and weak in strength. Those who recite mentally while walking on the road, or while sullied by sexual intercourse, will always be agitated in mind and suffer many illnesses. Those who again and again switch between knowledge mantras indiscriminately, who apply them to improper objects, and who recite without fire offerings, will always fail in their aims and lose their friends. Again, those knowledge holders who show contempt for their own knowledge mantra and who make use of what belongs to the deity are led astray and terrified by it. The world will never be pleased with them, and they will always be despised.

"The knowledge holder should always worship and honor, with flowers, incense and so forth, the knowledge mantras spoken by the buddhas, the bodhisattvas, the pratyekabuddhas and the noble śrāvakas.

"Those without samaya, those who take life, those who work sorcery with mantras, those who defile nuns, those who commit the acts of immediate retribution, those who improperly make use of the property of the Saṅgha, those who resort to grain liquor and brewed liquor, those who kill monks or nuns, those who tread on food with their feet, those without samaya who trample food in anger, those who scatter it, those without samaya who see a dead body and do not go, those who give mudrās and mantras to those without samaya and to those who have not entered the maṇḍala, and moreover those without samaya who tread on medicine with their feet, those who break samaya, those who step over the offering remnants of the buddhas and bodhisattvas and of other gods as well, those without samaya who step over a conch, a discus, a raised trident, a club, a spear, a vajra, a shield, a bow, a plough, a pestle, an arrow, a javelin, an elephant, a bull, a donkey, a pig, a śarabha, a lion, a goose, a peacock, a buffalo, a camel, a swan, a human being, the mounts of the gods, and the various weapons, and those who, seeing these various things being made, press them down with their feet: these the deity leads astray in other ways, and to them it does not grant accomplishment.

"As for the rules of eating here: sesame, meat, parpaṭa, jambulika, fish, many pūpalika cakes, sesame broth, food offered to the gods, and the offering remnants themselves should not be eaten. Stepping on the offering remnants of a deity, stepping on lotuses or on what lives in water, stepping on blue lotuses, cutting down the lords of the forest, and pulling up roots should also be avoided. By constantly recollecting the knowledge mantra and always wearing clean clothes, this is taught for all activities, and one makes offerings in all the other rites of knowledge mantras."

Then the Blessed One again addressed the assemblies of bodhisattvas: "Friends, listen! In the later tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, the words of the mantra accomplished by the mind, which together with their methods easily accomplish the knowledge syllables of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, and which benefit all sentient beings, are these:

namo ratna trayāya nama ārya abalokiteśvaraya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya ghuni ghuni la la la siddhe siddhe pārakrama svāhā amitābhāsuta svāhā sarbbaiśca ārya abalokite svāhā

"This is the one called noble Candrā, the sister of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, who performs all activities. The practitioner should always bind the topknot and also bind the mudrā. It utterly destroys all obstructors. With it, rising at dawn and having become pure, one should make a maṇḍala, scatter flowers and so forth, and, with fivefold diligence, recite it eight hundred times. It fulfills the aim one desires. Or else it brings whomever one wishes under one's power. Then, by scattering cetrājika in the maṇḍala, one drives away whomever one wishes. Whatever accomplishment comes through reading it should be understood just as it is. And here, in this treasury of enumerations, one recollects that which touches them as one.

"Then, if one wishes to rouse an executioner, one should go to a charnel ground, kindle a fire with charnel-ground wood, surround it with a great silk cloth, and perform a fire offering with blood, such as has been obtained. On the seventh day, at midnight, an executioner with a terrifying roar rises up. Praising it properly, one should also grant it consecration for the place one has named. Through the blessing of the Blessed Mother, it brings about whatever well-being one pleases. Then in some places people are seen dying, in some places fire is seen blazing, and in some places people are seen bound in iron chains. In this way that executioner roams about. To pacify it, one should offer eight thousand lotuses before the Blessed One. It becomes supremely pacified.

"If one wishes to rouse enemies, one should go to a charnel ground, kindle a fire of charnel-ground wood, and perform eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with the oil of black sesame. It makes them depart.

"Then, if one wishes someone to be seized by fever, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of charnel-ground ash in a charnel-ground fire. He is seized by a great fever. To pacify it, one should recite one hundred and eight times over water and pour it on his head. He is freed from the fever.

"If one wishes his head to be seized by pain, one should recite eight thousand times over a peg of human bone and strike the peg into the head of an effigy made of cow dung. His head is seized by great pain. When the peg is pulled out, it is pacified. If it is struck into the sexual organ, he becomes impotent; when it is pulled out, he is freed. If it is struck into the heart, he suffers great stabbing pain; when it is pulled out, he is freed.

"A khadira peg smeared with flesh and blood and wound with thread, over which one has recited eight hundred times, should be struck onto the head of the human-bone peg. If it is planted at the enemy's door, he flees at dawn. As long as the peg has not been pulled out, he will not stay anywhere at all.

"If one wishes to rouse a king, one should go to a temple of the Great God (Śiva), smear the god with poison and blood, and offer incense of the great flesh. One should also worship with neem leaves. Then, combining poison, blood and salt, one should perform a fire offering eight hundred times. With the first eight hundred, his own flesh; with the second, flowers; with the third, the queen's retinue; with the fourth, great weapons; with the fifth, elephants; with the sixth, buffaloes. This is the action led by the great wrathful one.

"If one wishes to ruin someone's fine intellect, one should kindle a fire with neem wood and perform eight thousand fire offerings of oblations of neem leaves and charnel-ground ash mixed together. In an instant it is ruined.

"Then, if one wishes to make someone mute, one should make an effigy of kasamaya, recite eight hundred times over a copper peg, and, with the enemy in mind, strike the peg into its mouth. He becomes mute. If the peg is pulled out, he is freed. The section on fierce rites is complete.

"Activities come about even without having accomplished the mantra. Having recited it seven times over a tooth-stick, one should chew it: one obtains food without asking for it. Having recited it eight hundred times, by smearing it on one's head, all people are pleased. If one consecrates clothing seven times and puts it on, one becomes fortunate. If one consecrates eye ointment and applies it to the eyes, those who are gripped by anger are pleased when they see one. If one goes along the road while reciting it, bandits and thieves cannot overcome one. By reciting it seven times over one's finger, all fanged creatures are paralyzed. If one recites it eight hundred times over gravel and scatters it in water, it paralyzes all creatures that move in water. If one recites it for someone bound, or whose road is blocked, he is freed. Having recited it seven times over a karavīra twig, one should smear the maṇḍala with it and strike the ground with a weapon. It moves to wherever one wishes. One should consecrate a handful of water and scatter it upward: it stops untimely rain. If one recites it eight hundred times over ash, the ash becomes a fence. Iron filings become a fence of stone. Three lamps become a fence of lamps. Bilva leaves become a fence of bilva. Water over which it has been recited eight hundred times becomes a fence of water. In brief, in whatever way it is applied through the rites of the other ritual manuals of the Blessed One, the King of the Uṣṇīṣa, in just that way it performs those activities. By accomplishing the knowledge mantra, one is freed from the acts of immediate retribution and finds the awakening mind."

oṃ sarba tathāgata uṣṇiṣa anābalokite murdhani tejorāśi hūṃ jvāla jvāla dhaka dhaka dara bidar chinda chinda hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

It is explained as splendor and as a mass: "It should be placed on the back of a small petal." So it is written in the smaller Tathāgatoṣṇīṣa Tantra, in order that it be completed on each of the petals.

Thread spun by a maiden should be made into cloth; or else cloth bought at the hero's price, obtained however it may be, with its edges uncut and free of hair, should be set on a frame by a painter who keeps the poṣadha, who is not lacking in faculties, and who faces east. Before it, one should invite all the buddhas, bodhisattvas and so forth, and especially the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. Then one should kindle a fire with arka wood and, with the heart mantra of Ekajaṭī, perform eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed smeared with ghee, in a maṇḍala four cubits in size in front of the painting. While the painting is being drawn, there will be no obstructors.

Then, on an auspicious lunar day, karaṇa, constellation and moment, one should mix, with colored water, pigments placed in new vessels, unmixed in color and each ground very finely and separately, and with a brush of cow hair one should paint the Blessed One's tree of awakening: a place praised as manifold, where flocks of birds sing, like a wish-fulfilling tree. Here one should paint the Tathāgata Amitābha: teaching the Dharma, seated in the cross-legged posture, his form adorned with the marks of a great being, his body appearing beautiful, great golden rays of light radiating from his uṣṇīṣa, seated on a white lotus. At the Blessed One's left side is a white figure adorned with ornaments, wearing an upper garment of five colors and holding a yak-tail whisk in the hand.

Alternatively, under the lunar mansion of the Four Fires, one should paint here the bodhisattva called noble Vimalagati, at the Blessed One's right side: entirely white, adorned with golden ornaments, with a mass of matted locks, holding in the hand a water pot and a wooden staff, wearing the sacred cord hanging from the shoulder, dressed in white clothes, the supreme hand stretched out over the practitioner, four-armed, the measure of a sugata's span; noble Vimalagati is slightly raised up.

One should paint here noble Avalokiteśvara, slightly smaller than the Blessed One. At his right side one should paint Tārā: dark blue like the priyaṅgu, her body made brilliant with gold and jewels, adorned with a diadem, wearing a variegated garment, with an upper garment of jewels, her body slightly bowed, her palms joined toward the Blessed One, holding a blue utpala, her hand in the supreme gesture, gazing first upon the Blessed One. Below that, one should make a lotus pond.

At the Blessed One's right side, near the root, one should paint a goddess, white, adorned with all ornaments, with an upper garment of jewels, holding a jewel and a caṅgaṭaka, kneeling with her knee on the ground. At the right side of the Blessed Mother Tārā, one should paint the Blissful One, seated near the root, entirely white, of youthful form, adorned with all ornaments, her palms joined, gazing intently upon the Blessed Mother and the Blessed One.

At the feet of noble Avalokiteśvara, one should make the practitioner, looking toward Avalokiteśvara, wearing white upper and lower garments, with whatever shape and features he has, kneeling on both knees, holding an incense burner in his hands. One should make a son of the gods beating a great drum. One should make clouds with lightning, in the four directions and the intermediate directions too. On the right, at the top of the painting, one should paint the sons of the gods of the Pure Abodes scattering flowers.

Above, one should paint the moon and the sun, adorned with all ornaments. Above them, conches and great drums.

At the right of noble Avalokiteśvara, one should paint the great sister of noble Tārā: black, pot-bellied, wearing every ornament, baring her fangs, with a skirt of tiger skin, wrapped in a hide called go, a garland of skulls hanging from her topknot, seated on a rock, wearing a serpent as her sacred cord, four-armed, holding an axe in her right hand, and in her first left hand a vessel filled with blood, her body clad only in the directions, with eyebrows and hair, her palms joined toward the Blessed One, with long nails, her upper body covered with an elephant hide, receiving the command of the great bodhisattva.

Having thus painted the painting, it should be set in a clean spot that is free of faults in the factors of purity, protection and proper measure: on the bank of a river bearing jewels, or anywhere else, near a pure place. Then, by wafting smoke, one brings under one's power. That is whoever practices the secret mantra together.

One who wishes to make all the deities appear should begin the work, and the eighth day of the bright fortnight is suitable. In a clean piece of ground, one should smear an area the measure of a bow, and in its center place a brick. In the four directions one should set four vases of water, from the earth and without black roots, consecrated eight hundred times.

They are well wound with thread of five colors spun by a maiden. Having made a maṇḍala with fragrant powders, one should offer tormas without liquor or meat in the four directions. One should make an offering of fragrant flowers. One offers guggulu incense. One should set a copper vessel filled with ghee close beside the powders, at the edge. Facing east, outside, in a maṇḍala, one should make offerings and offer a torma to Ekajaṭī.

Then, taking green kuśa grass and wearing a single white garment, one should make it as long as the space between the two feet. Then one should cast it with that kuśa onto the vessel of ghee. Then, if one sees dirt, a nail or a hair in that small amount of ghee, one should gather each of them together into one, until one's own wishes and speech have arisen in abundance. Then one should take up each vase in turn and set it down while reciting. Having made the purified vessel stand firm, one has the person prostrate to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. One should also give him a massage with it. Having combined priyaṅgu, nāgakesara, madhuka and turuṣka, and consecrated them seven times, one should anoint him. He should eat excellent food mixed with cow's ghee. He becomes free of illness.

Thread spun by a maiden and dyed blue should be consecrated seven times and tied on: eye disease is pacified. If it is tied at the throat, it cures vomiting. One should have cloth woven from this same thread. Consecrated eight thousand times, it should be tied on the body of a wrestler: he becomes invincible in battle.

Having smeared a maṇḍala four cubits in size and worshiped the Blessed Mother with fragrant flowers, one should offer lamps of cow's ghee. Then, kindling a fire of wood from the tree of awakening and sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings, in three sessions, of oblations of lac and resin consecrated seven times. In seven days it pacifies even long-standing illness in whomever one wishes.

One who wishes to pacify all obstructors should take earth from one bank of a river that flows to the ocean and make one hundred and twenty-one obstructors of various forms, colored like lions and tigers. Then, on the eighth day of the dark fortnight, keeping a fast for three nights, one should begin the work in a clean place, having brought what is needed for the blood rite. Below that, one should set the obstructors, according to their directions, sitting on leaves of the lac tree. In the midst of the obstructors one should set the great obstructor, the vināyaka. First one should make seven maṇḍalas with the powders of five colors, consecrated once. One should worship them with red flowers and red scents. One should offer butter lamps in the four directions. One should scatter lac juice in the four directions. Then, with a red thread consecrated eight thousand times, or eight hundred times, with the mantra of the Blessed Mother, one should wind it clockwise around all the obstructors.

Then one should bind the great king of obstructors. In their midst, kindling a fire with udumbara kindling sticks, one says, "Bind the obstructors!", and with the syllables svāhā one should perform at night eight thousand fire offerings of calf dung smeared with curd, honey and ghee. Then all the obstructors and vināyakas of that practitioner become bound. When he is accomplishing any knowledge mantra, there will be no obstructors.

As for those, according to what they are to do, having set the great vināyaka apart, one offers every kind of flower to all the obstructors, and every protection as well. As incense, one offers red karavīra and red sandalwood to the great vināyakas. One offers water for welcome to all the obstructors and all harmers. To those together with the vināyaka, one offers water for welcome mixed with guggulu and ghee. Then one should dig a pit to the depth of the navel. Having placed each of them in it separately, one should make the ground level once again. In this way all the obstructors of the knowledge holder will cease to be.

At a stūpa containing relics, having smeared a maṇḍala with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, and having worshiped with scents, flowers and so forth, one should kindle a fire with udumbara kindling sticks and perform eight thousand fire offerings of palāśa kindling sticks in three sessions. By eating caru for one hundred days or for two hundred days, one's mind becomes keen.

Having smeared a maṇḍala four cubits in size and kindled a fire with kindling sticks from a milky tree, one should perform a fire offering of milk: brahmins come under one's power. One should make oblations of caru: kṣatriyas come under one's power. One should make oblations of curd: vaiśyas come under one's power. One should make oblations of barley: śūdras come under one's power. In every case, to accomplish what is to be accomplished, it is one hundred days.

One should recite while looking at an enemy: he becomes paralyzed. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings, in three sessions, of māṣaka kindling sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee: whoever one looks at while reciting becomes incapable of acting. Water consecrated seven times removes all poisons. For every poison one should do as one wishes. Having consecrated a smelter's pellet seven times, one should cleanse the eyes with it: it pacifies eye disease. For a child seized by a graha, one should consecrate a thread seven times and tie it on: it frees him. One should tie it on a sick person: all grahas become powerless. Reciting seven times over ash binds the maṇḍala. For a child who will not come out, one should recite over sesame oil and give it: the birth will be easy. For a woman who is barren, at the time of her fertile season, having had her bathe with water over which the mantra has been recited, one should consecrate seven times ghee from a cow of matching lineage and give it to her to drink. She should eat excellent food. It causes a son to be born.

Then a woman who has many daughters should perform eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks. Having filled four vases with water and that ash and consecrated them eight hundred times, one should set three of them in the maṇḍala. She becomes fortunate. Her sons will not die.

If one recites eight hundred times over birch bark and ties it on the left arm, one becomes the foremost of all speakers. One should perform a thousand fire offerings of aparājitā flowers in three sessions: in one direction one becomes invincible in battle. One should consecrate thread spun by a maiden eight hundred times and tie seven knots in it. When it is tied on the hand, poisons both stationary and moving become powerless.

Then, for the fang venom of a fearsome snake, one should take a handful of water, consecrate it eight hundred times with the mantra up to the syllables svāhā, and give it to drink. It raises up even one whom the poison has laid low. Then, if he does not rise, one should consecrate it in the four directions and give it to drink. It raises up even one struck by the fang venom of Takṣaka.

For a swelling of the breast, one should give an ointment consecrated seven times. Even without binding, it dries it up right there. It makes it painless.

For those afflicted by an epidemic, at midnight in the center of the village or town one should smear an area the size of a cowhide, give a torma of the three white substances, give scents, flowers and a torma from the hand, kindle a fire with leafy wood, and perform eight thousand fire offerings of oblations of milk. In three days it pacifies the epidemic of three villages, and in seven days an epidemic within. Then, if it is not pacified, one should here, for seven days, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of phlegm-ender wood and perform eight thousand fire offerings of parched rice smeared with akṣa oil. In three days it pacifies a sudden epidemic.

Having bound the boundary with ash, whoever one sees while reciting is pleased. Even what one has not accomplished comes about in front of the painting of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā.

Another rite: at a stūpa containing relics, before an image, at the full moon, first, in the dark fortnight, one should make a great offering to the image, kindle a fire with arka kindling sticks, and perform eight thousand fire offerings, in three sessions, of finger-length sticks smeared with curd, honey and ghee, up to the fifteenth day. Then it becomes accomplished. By such an application one should recite it three thousand times. Having recited it three thousand times, it serves for other activities. When the approach has first been done with this, it becomes accomplished.

Then, if one wishes to bring a king or a king's minister under one's power, one should make offerings to the Blessed Mother and perform eight thousand fire offerings, in three sessions, of kindling sticks from the tree of awakening smeared with iṅguda oil. In seven days he comes under one's power. By this same rite kumbhāṇḍas come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of sesame-smeared sticks: bhūtas come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of pieces of a corpse burned in a charnel ground: piśācas come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of vaṭa wood: yakṣas come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of oblations of wool. One should perform fire offerings of milk porridge, caru and sesame porridge: it brings the four castes under control, and they come under one's power. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of pellets of guggulu: the grahas who follow the Great God (Śiva) come under one's power.

Rising at night in purity, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings and recitations: in one fortnight one is freed from bondage. In a month it frees one from great bondage. A fire offering of sesame and piṇḍyaka pacifies anger, or else a fire offering of sesame alone. One who wants clothing should perform a fire offering of dūrvā sprouts: one obtains a hundred pairs of garments. To bring an ordinary person under one's power, one should perform a fire offering of gobetraṃ. To bind the mouths of bees and wasps, one should perform a fire offering of sāla leaves. To bind the power of a tiger, one should perform a fire offering of girikarṇikā. To bind the mouth of a lion, one should perform a fire offering of siṃhakarṇikā. For snakes, one should perform a fire offering of nāgakesara. For pacification, and for every aim one desires, one should perform fire offerings, in three sessions, for seven days or half a month, with sāla leaves and kindling sticks from a milky tree smeared with curd, honey and ghee.

Having made offerings to the bodies of the buddhas, the blessed ones, and to the bodhisattvas, one should recite it a hundred thousand times. It accomplishes what has not been accomplished. It also destroys what others have accomplished. For the grahas of the nāgas and so forth, binding the directions, binding the maṇḍala and so forth are done by recitation alone.

For seven nights, in three sessions, one should perform fire offerings of thorns: it destroys enemies. One should perform eight thousand fire offerings of neem kindling sticks smeared with pungent sesame oil: in seven nights it arises. Especially to bring ruin, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of ariṣṭa kindling sticks, from the hair onward. For flesh that has grown and for madness one should constantly recite: none of it will turn back.

Having recited twenty-one times over bezoar, one should make a mark on the forehead with it and go to the king's gate; and having consecrated birch bark eight thousand times and tied it on the hand, one obtains whatever one asks for. To make grahas flee, one should take a human bone, make it eight fingers long, consecrate it eight hundred times and plant it in the place of the graha: it makes the graha flee. Having consecrated flowers, scents, fruits and so forth eight hundred times, whoever one gives them to comes under one's power. To destroy obstructors by means of the knowledge mantra, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of khadira kindling sticks. From the third day there will be no obstructors. In this way it performs all methods of this kind.

In every case, one who keeps the poṣadha fast should practice before the painted scroll, reciting just as prescribed. Having taken a thousand of them, one should set them on one's right side, consecrate each one seven times, and offer them into the fire as a fire offering. In the course of this, the painted scroll will shake violently, the tip of the lamp flame will grow taller, the sound of great divine drums will resound in the sky, a fragrant wind will rise, and the earth will quake. Then noble Avalokiteśvara, possessed of great compassion, surrounded by many hosts of bodhisattvas and of knowledge mantras, holding a water pot, a wooden staff and a black antelope skin, his crown of matted locks hanging down, will come. Rays of light issue from the body of noble Avalokiteśvara, and by those radiating rays all the sentient beings in the hells, the animals and the hungry ghosts are freed from their painful feelings in an instant. One then sees noble Avalokiteśvara himself, possessed of great compassion, who loves all sentient beings. The practitioner, kneeling on both knees, offers him water for welcome from the Fully Victorious vase that was placed in the east.

Then noble Avalokiteśvara says, "I grant whatever boon you wish." Whatever one asks for, that one obtains: being a universal monarch of the knowledge holders (vidyādharas), great kingship, long life, the retention of all one has heard, or a body lacking none of its faculties, the destruction of diseases hard to cure, or the moving of treasures, entering into caverns, or the accomplishment of all knowledge mantras, invisibility, or lordship over the great earth; whatever one asks for, that one obtains. The blessed noble Avalokiteśvara also goes to wherever one wishes. Through this one's life lasts for an eon. At that time, one who practices the Blessed Mother gains universal sovereignty over all knowledge mantras, is much sought after, is unobstructed, and is longed for by all the gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas and kiṃnaras. On the seventh day of practice, even one who has committed the deeds of immediate retribution will succeed. It should be understood in every respect by just such means as these.

This completes the rite of the first great accomplishment, extracted from the first root text of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā.

Having set up the painted scroll facing east, one should then begin the rite on the eighth day of the bright half of the fortnight of the Miracles, or on the tenth of the fortnight of the Miracles. Living on leaves, barley gruel, flowers, fruits, caru porridge, marsh plants, curd, milk, flour, the food of gandharvas, or else food obtained by begging, one who keeps the poṣadha fast, endowed with loving-kindness and great compassion, should generate the supreme mind set on awakening and, keeping in mind the welfare of sentient beings, should make offerings that increase day by day. Using a bed strewn with kuśa grass, bathing three times and changing one's clothes three times, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, and increasing the offerings each day as far as one's means allow, one should eat food obtained by begging. Setting out with the left foot when walking and so forth, one should recite the mantra one million six hundred thousand times. Having thus first completed the approach, one should begin the accomplishment on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the bright half. A saṅgha of like-minded monks should be sought out.

Then, in the four directions of the painted scroll, one should place earthen vases free of cracks and blackening, forty in all, covered with sprigs of mango and filled with all kinds of seeds. Before the painted scroll one should place a great vase four cubits in size, made of copper, gold or silver, or else of earth, adorned with leaves and creepers of every kind and filled with pure water, holding all the things already spoken of, all medicines, flavors, scents and precious essences, its mouth covered with a cluster of flowers and its neck tied with a matched pair of dukūla cloths: this vase is called Fully Victorious. On the left side of the painted scroll one should place the Blessed Mother Prajñāpāramitā. Then one should offer sixteen garlands of fragrant flowers to the painted scroll. In front there should be those eight vessels, filled with water of fragrant sandalwood and filled with milk. One should offer eight lamps of cow's butter. Having filled bowls with caru porridge, milk porridge, sesame porridge, warm gruel, paṇḍaka cakes and other foods to be chewed, one should offer them in the four directions of the painted scroll. In every case one should offer to the deities painted on the scroll tormas of the three white substances and food for the deities, and outside one should offer torma. Then one should offer as torma, in the four directions of the painted scroll, all the grains and all the fruits one can obtain. One should offer incense of black aloeswood. Then, sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, with one-pointed mind, one should begin the rite toward that direction. Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of a milky tree, perform eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of black aloeswood smeared with curd, honey and butter.

He entered into equipoise in the meditative absorption called Surveying All Sentient Beings. Then, rising from that meditative absorption and surveying with his divine eye the world-system with all it contains, he said to the bodhisattva, the great being Mahāsthāmaprāpta: "Listen, son of noble family! Even without having accomplished the great queen of knowledge mantras, all rites take effect merely by recollecting her. To protect oneself, reciting her once binds the crown knot; reciting twice gives the great protection; reciting three times binds the maṇḍala; reciting four times binds water; reciting five times protects bipeds and quadrupeds and brings them under one's power; reciting six times one may enter a charnel ground; reciting seven times one brings all sentient beings under one's power.

"One who wishes to perform pacification should, before the painted scroll, in the presence of Avalokiteśvara, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of ariṣṭa and of a milky tree, and perform eight thousand fire offerings of parched rice as oblations in three sessions. In three days one person is pacified; in seven days a great multitude of people, the villages of the region and those of the city; and in a month a great kingdom is pacified."

If one wishes for increase, one should, before the painted scroll, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of a milky tree and perform eight thousand fire offerings of grain and thick rice porridge in three sessions. In three weeks there will be increase. In seven days there will be increase. In seven days there will be great increase.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of mango, perform eight thousand fire offerings of shoots of dūrvā grass: one becomes the foremost of speakers among speakers. From sunrise until sunset, into a fire of arka wood, uttering the person's name, perform a fire offering of husks with the left hand seven times: that person comes under one's power.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree, perform fire offerings of śatapuṣpa, śatāvarī, white sweet flag, white mustard seed and barley in three sessions, eight thousand, twenty-one times over: in seven days one brings a great man under one's power. By a fire offering of butter one brings bipeds and quadrupeds under one's power.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of royal arka, perform eight thousand fire offerings of leaves of the lac tree smeared with hot sesame oil: in seven days it destroys an army. Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of khadira, perform eight thousand fire offerings of green kuśa grass: it cuts off the movements of enemies in every direction.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of a milky tree, perform eight thousand fire offerings of kindling sticks of devadāru at the three times of day: in one month one brings the goddesses of the regions below under one's power. Living on caru porridge, kindle a fire with wood of the nāga tree and perform eight thousand fire offerings of nāgakesara smeared with butter in three sessions, making offerings that increase day by day: in seven days or in one month one brings the goddesses who move above under one's power.

Living on caru porridge, kindle a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree and perform eight thousand fire offerings of white mustard seed and royal mustard as oblations, smeared with curd, honey and butter: in three days one brings the king's queen under one's power. She fulfills everything one says, except what is proposed out of lust.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of the bodhi tree, perform eight thousand fire offerings of mango leaves in three sessions: it pacifies harms that come near the house.

Before the painted scroll, smear a ground the size of an arrow's flight. Having made an effigy out of eight thousand barley pellets, cutting and cutting it with a sharp blade consecrated seven times, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings of oblations. Uttering the person's name all the way down to the feet, one should sit with the fist clenched and offer with the hand from above. Then one should visualize him appearing as one without a home. Before him one should open the fist, and he becomes calm and comes under one's power. Thus in seven days he will attend upon one as a subject.

Having kindled a fire with kindling sticks of ariṣṭa, perform eight thousand fire offerings in three sessions of splinters of tārabarta wood, reciting over each seven times: food arises without interruption in that region.

Having kindled a fire of palāśa kindling sticks, uttering the person's name, perform eight thousand fire offerings of anointed apāmārga kindling sticks in three sessions: in seven days whoever one wishes comes under one's power.

Having made an effigy of cow dung, cut it from the head down to the feet with a sharp blade consecrated seven times and perform eight thousand fire offerings: in seven days one who is greatly proud comes under one's power.

On the fifteenth day of the bright half of the month, with cow dung that has not fallen to the ground, smear a ground the size of a cowhide. Having set up the painted scroll at a stūpa containing relics, take, in a vessel of gold, silver or copper, butter churned by a young girl from the milk of a tawny cow whose calf is of the same color. Sitting on a mat of kuśa grass, make a vessel within leaves of the aśvattha tree, set four of them out in a clockwise circle, press down on it with the left hand, and recite eight thousand times in three sessions. On the eighth day one should stir it with the ring finger of the right hand and recite until it becomes warm. Then one should drink it, and the binding of the armor should be done with the Blessed Mother herself. One's mind becomes keen.

This is the application of the lunar rite in the later tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā.

For all the knowledge mantras of the sādhanas of Tārā, one should make a square maṇḍala in a clean place with dung from a tawny cow that has not fallen to the ground. One should complete it entirely with that cow dung, and in that maṇḍala one should place an image of the Buddha. Then, having made leaves from the tips of the bilva tree, with foods of sesame, sesame porridge, sesame oil, the intoxicant, milk porridge, molasses, filled cakes and barley gruel, or, if these are not to be had, one burns incense of aloeswood. Likewise to the south and to the west, and so in all four directions, one should recite, uttering the names of the yakṣiṇīs mentioned before. One recites a knowledge mantra with words such as these: "Come, and accept, each of you, scent, flowers, incense and torma." There one should also place molasses, filled cakes and milk porridge in the eastern direction. For the gandharvas one should place in the southern direction torma, sesame, sesame porridge and a vessel filled with beer. For the yakṣas and kumbhāṇḍas one should place in the western direction torma filled with milk, and milk porridge. For the nāgas and garuḍas one should also place in the northern direction torma filled with parched flour, a vessel filled with curd, and gruel. For the yakṣiṇīs there should be torma filled with buttermilk and mixed with water. Having offered to the Blessed Mother a torma of the three white substances, one should also worship her with every kind of flower. In her four directions one offers incense of guggulu. One should place in the four directions torma of aloeswood, turuṣka, camphor or fragrant sarja resin, or warm gruel and flour. If one does not have these, one should offer torma according to one's means and whatever one has. To the Blessed Mother one also offers a lamp of butter. Then one should quickly place the water pot on one's right side. Taking a cloth, or seven blades, or kuśa grass, one should consecrate it a hundred times and, facing east, cast it twenty-one times with the four knowledge mantras.

With eight hundred, one becomes victorious over weapons. One should recite at the three times of day, uttering that person's very name. Then, having done the casting away in the same manner, one should remove whatever flowers, incense and lamps were offered to the Blessed One, take up all the tormas of the other kinds, and throw them away. They should be put into a dry pond or a well. Or else another clean place that has a covering will also do; there one should dispose of them, where crows, jackals and dogs will not eat them. Nor should they be trodden on by feet. Or else they should be thoroughly burned in fire. This is also the rite for sending off the torma in all maṇḍala practices.

Afterwards, on what is called the maṇḍala arising from the moon, made fivefold in the directions, which has not been smeared, one should make an image of the Buddha and set it in its own place. These are the means of clearing away. In accordance with the rite, in every case, with the complete knowledge mantra and with the heart mantra, for all the great rites, for as long as they last, one should in just this way make the maṇḍala with the dung of a tawny cow that has not fallen to the ground, by the rite described before, and in just this way set out the torma. Having offered incense and flowers as prescribed, one should clear them away. One should tie the cord. One should protect oneself. Whoever wishes to extend this into great rites should accomplish them by that same rite, with only the preceding procedure, for that long.

On whatever cloth one can obtain, free of hair, one should have an image of the Buddha painted with unmixed colors. With the image facing west, on its left side one should have the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, painted. He should be made four-armed, with the śrīvatsa mark in gorocanā. The knowledge mantra one is to accomplish should be written with saffron in its center, appearing the color of lac. Or it may be on the forehead; one should make a golden silk band. To the right of the bodhisattva is the Blessed Mother Tārā, golden and blue-green, wearing white garments, holding offerings, holding a blue utpala in her hand, and with her right hand granting the supreme boon. To her right is the queen of knowledge mantras, Mahāmāyūrī, four-armed. Within the space of Mahāmāyūrī one should paint the king of peacocks called Suvarṇāvabhāsa, with golden wings, adorned with every jeweled ornament. The knowledge queen Mahāmāyūrī should be painted white and pure.

To the right of this is Jambudvīpa, three-pointed, in the shape of the front of a chariot. In the west one should paint the western continent Godānīya, round. In the northern direction one should make the northern continent Uttarakuru, square and even. In the east, at Pūrvavideha, one should paint the great king Dhṛtarāṣṭra, lord of the gandharvas, with his retinue. Beside Jambudvīpa one should make the great king Virūḍhaka, lord of the kumbhāṇḍas. Beside western Godānīya, above the image of the Buddha, one should make the great king Virūpākṣa, lord of the nāgas, on a golden seat, wearing white garments, with eyes like an ox. The noble Ānanda, beside the Blessed One, should be made with palms joined and both knees set on the ground. Behind him, on the right side, Vajrapāṇi should be made holding a yak-tail fan in his hand. All around the image of the Buddha are flowers and small fruits. East of the Buddha is the eastern continent Pūrvavideha. Beside northern Uttarakuru one should paint the great king Vaiśravaṇa, great lord of the yakṣas, with his retinue.

Then, beginning from the first day of the bright half of the month, keeping celibacy and the eightfold upavāsa vow, living on milk and gruel, burning incense of kunduru at the three times of day, one should recite the knowledge mantra twenty-one times before that painted scroll. One should say this: "May the accomplishment of the knowledge mantra come to me!" By abiding in the poṣadha fast for the last three days, on the fifteenth there will be delight.

One should take a cord prepared by a householder from seed sown in the bright half of the month, spun by a young brahmin and made by a maiden, and place it at the feet of the image of the Buddha. The five metals, in pieces the size of a juniper berry, gold, silver, copper, tin and black iron, should be placed at the feet of the image of the Buddha. When the knowledge mantra is accomplished, one should offer those metals. Or else they serve for acts of worship to the Buddha.

Then, with dung from a tawny cow that has not fallen to the ground, one should smear a ground in the shape of a cow, with its head pointing east, and at the root of its mouth one should make the round eastern continent

Pūrvavideha. At its two southern feet is triangular Jambudvīpa; in the southwest, before the painted scroll, one should make the round western continent Godānīya. Before the western feet is the northern continent Uttarakuru, square and even. In the direction of Vāgdāna one should set an image of the Buddha facing west. On its left side one should have the Blessed Mother Tārā painted; one should set up one that is painted or one made of clay.

Then, with reverence for the Buddha, one should offer scents, flowers and the like, yellow in color as is fitting, and countless lamps of butter. Before the Blessed Mother one should offer a lamp of butter. On the continents one should offer vessels filled with honey, and lamps of butter or lamps of sesame oil. In the eastern direction one should offer incense of sandalwood paste to the gandharvas. In the southern direction one should offer to the kumbhāṇḍas vessels filled with molasses, flour paste, milk porridge, incense, parched rice, white mustard seed, sesame and thick rice porridge mixed together, sesame porridge, and a vessel filled with beer. In the western direction one should offer incense of butter and guggulu, and also vessels filled with milk and milk porridge, to the nāgas and garuḍas. In the northern direction one should also offer incense of kunduru, parched flour and curd gruel to the yakṣas.

If kunduru cannot be found, sandalwood paste, or even resin incense, will do. Vessels of flour paste and vessels filled with honey are also to be set in the four directions, well known and determined by one who knows the foods of Dhṛtarāṣṭra and the others, as has been stated. One should offer vases, one for each, filled with water from a river's eddy, along with grain, juniper as one can find it, udumbara, walnuts, grapes and the like. All the seeds as well should be offered a little at a time, keeping some back.

Then, if, while one is accomplishing the knowledge mantra, the howl of a female jackal sounds in the east, one should go from that place and set a torma with the remainder in whatever is the eastern direction, and should scatter it always. If it is in the south, the one who has set out the torma with the remainder should scatter it in that place out of fear of danger. Likewise one should scatter it in the west and the north; this is to be done by the attendant. The practitioner of the knowledge mantra should apply himself wholly to accomplishing the knowledge mantra.

At the base of the former image of the knowledge holder, facing east, having taken kuśa grass, one sits down; having sat down, the knowledge holder should make, outside the four continents, in the four directions, on the four faces of the encircling mountains, a circle with that same tawny cow dung. On the seat where one sits down having taken it, between oneself and the image of the Buddha, one should set charcoal, cow dung and things made of palāśa. Leaving no remainder or the like, one should perform eight thousand fire offerings. Having meditated on what is to be accomplished, one should first place the weapon, and then insert the offering at the svāhā at the end of the complete recitation. Kindling sticks of śāli rice and arka; if these cannot be found, one may put udumbara, palāśa, apāmārga or anything else into the fire to burn.

Then, over whatever thread has been spun by a maiden, one should name it with this mantra: namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya avalokite svāhā. Reciting this mantra eight hundred times, one should make eight knots, saying rakṣa svāhā. Those threads should be tied on one's own hand in order to protect oneself. When it is accomplished at that time with that Buddha, the attendant should take the remaining threads, seeds and so forth and place them high up in the temple. The temple priest should worship them. Then one should offer to the sick bowls of food and drink and the like. The remainder, apportioned in the mind, should be poured into a river. One should bury it in the ground in a dry pond, or a well, or a covered place. One should burn it thoroughly in fire.

Whoever wishes to practice the Blessed Mother Tārā should, in keeping with this meaning taught by the Blessed One, at the very outset generate the mind of awakening along with it. Everything the Blessed One has taught is the ground of the supreme accomplishment of great awakening. Here, what is called the Buddha is the cessation of knowledge mantra and the arising of knowledge mantra; therefore one should accomplish the knowledge mantra before him, and obstructors cannot hinder it.

First of all, the times for accomplishing knowledge mantras in other ways are the full moon on the fifteenth of the month of Vaiśākha, or of Phālguna, or of Āṣāḍha, or the fifteenth of the bright half of Kārttika; any of these will do. Whoever wishes to accomplish a fierce rite should, in this manner, undertake it from the first day of the dark half of the month, and on the fourteenth of the dark half, with this mantra: namo ratnatrayāya nama ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya oṃ vedavid svāhā. With this mantra one should first tie a red thread, then in a charnel ground smear a ground in the shape of a cowhide with tawny cow dung, and in just the same way, by the rite of torma, make various tormas for the other bhūtas. Four attendants bearing weapons should put kindling sticks into the fire. Making eight hundred knots in the thread, one should tie it on for the sake of protecting oneself. Through that Buddha, bhūtas, pretas, piśācas, brahmarākṣasas and the like come under one's power. When the knowledge mantra is accomplished, one requests them to depart in just the same way, by the rite of torma.

For all practices of knowledge mantras, whoever wishes to accomplish a knowledge mantra should, at night, being clean and wearing clothes that are clean, perform the practice himself. Burning incense of kunduru or black aloeswood and facing east, one should recite ten times. One should also say this: "Blessed Mother, come yourself, accept the flowers and the tormas, each of them, and do this task of mine!" Likewise one should say it facing southeast, southwest, northwest and northeast, and toward the zenith and the nadir: "Come yourself, accept the incense, the flowers and so forth, and the lamps, each of them, and do my task as well!" Again at dawn, too, seven or ten times, one should invite her in the same way in the ten directions. When she has come, one should offer incense and the like. Again, at midday, having performed all the torma rites, wishing to take kuśa grass and sit down, one should invite her in the same way in the ten directions: "Blessed Mother, come, accept the scents, the flowers and so forth, and do my task as well!" Then, taking kuśa grass and sitting down, one should perform the accomplishment as explained.

When one accomplishes a knowledge mantra, these signs appear. The dreams seen on account of the knowledge mantra are seeing elephants, horses, temples and palaces, and climbing them. And as for the marks of accomplishment of the knowledge mantra, by seeing a horse one gains the accomplishment of the activity of the wind. Likewise, seeing one's mother, father, grandfather, great-grandfather, a great king, a girl adorned with ornaments; wearing white clothes; food, cattle, a young brahmin, gold, moisture, a peacock, meat, fish, milk, curd, and the performance of rites of butter torma and the like; people speaking pleasantly; and if one sees flowers, fruits and the like, it is in accordance with success.

Then, if one sees barley and wheat standing in moisture, not seen in spring and summer, it portends rain out of season. As for one who wishes for pacification as it has been praised, if one sees a full vase, milk, curd, butter, flowers and fruits, these are the best signs for proceeding. Having seen cows, brahmins, youths, gold, peacocks and the like, and having regarded them as accomplishment, one should begin the rites in all the tasks of accomplishing knowledge mantras.

If one sees these adverse things, one does not sleep: if in a dream one sees scorpions, donkeys, camels, pigs, monkeys, crows, owls, vultures of every kind, rats, cats, a club, naked people, sitarukṣa, empty vessels, dry wood, charcoal from a charnel ground, dried-up rivers, and those who lead one astray, which are inauspicious, the knowledge mantra will not be accomplished. Obstructors will arise in all one's activities. Then one should apply this mantra against all the obstructors: oṃ vajra khuru vikritānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. This mantra belongs to the king of wrathful ones called Hayagrīva. When one has protected oneself by consecrating with this mantra, no fear arises in accomplishing any rite.

Then, for fevers and for children seized by grahas, one should perform the sweeping and tie a thread; the wiping away of poison too is accomplished just by reciting the knowledge mantra once. For this, one should have a vase painted; with the principal mantra one should make eight hundred knots in thread spun by a maiden and tie it on that vase. That procedure shows whether there is accomplishment or no accomplishment. On the second day one should untie all the knots. Otherwise, if what is bound by the knowledge mantra is left untied, it renders things fruitless; effects of this kind and others arise eighteenfold from that mantra.

This is the means of accomplishment for all consecrations and all mantras. Now the particular application of the knowledge mantras should be stated. Wherever the practice is being done, it grants a vision to that person: the person perceives the higher deity as present close by. That mantra grants a vision to whoever is accomplishing it, and he perceives the higher deity as present close by. This is the distinctive feature of the knowledge mantras.

The rite of the means of accomplishing this mantra is as follows. Smear a square maṇḍala; in its center set an image of the Buddha facing west, and on its right side one should place the Blessed Mother. On the left is the king of wrathful ones, Hayagrīva. Then quickly, abiding facing east, take kuśa grass; make offerings of scent, lamps and the like to the image of the Blessed One, burn incense of aloeswood and turuṣka, and also offer whatever torma has been obtained in the four hidden directions. Then, having taken kuśa grass before the image of the Buddha, one sits down and should sweep away every disease in particular. All diseases dissolve and one is freed from them, at dawn on the seventh day, or within three nights.

One upholds the rite of that entire tantra of Tārā together with its retinue. Any other nun who dwells apart by the ocean, in the mountains or in charnel grounds should offer recitation in order to protect herself. Then no fear arises from whatever piśācas, yakṣas and the like there may be.

Then, one who wishes to go in the eastern direction should make a square maṇḍala, offer scent, flowers, incense and so forth there, and offer recitation twenty-seven times in order to protect oneself. Likewise, when the time of night comes, one should offer recitation on the road. One should keep it constantly in mind. One should also tie a thread on oneself. By what was stated before, these too, consecrated seven times, will be inscribed. Likewise, with the heart mantra, one should sweep the grahas with kuśa grass by the rite stated before, with those stated before, with those seven knowledge mantras. Likewise, one who wishes to go in the southern direction should offer incense and flowers and offer recitation twenty-one times. Likewise one should sweep away the grahas of the kumbhāṇḍas by the rite stated before. One should also tie a thread, and they will be pacified. Likewise, one who wishes to go in the western direction should likewise sweep away the grahas of the nāgas and garuḍas by what was stated before, by the rite stated before. Likewise, one who wishes to go in the northern direction should likewise treat the grahas of the yakṣas by the rite stated before. And likewise in the intermediate directions.

Then Avalokiteśvara again spoke to the gods, the yakṣas and the others: "Friends, listen! Having seen the body of the Tathāgata, complete with all the marks of a tathāgata's form, granting the supreme boon with the right hand, teaching the Dharma, and bestowing fearlessness, there one should accomplish the knowledge mantra. One engaged in fierce rites should not practice there; one should accomplish it together with the wrathful one subdued by Tārā. As long as it is before Ekajaṭī, it is close to Vajrapāṇi. He also bears the characteristics of a wrathful one. Before a figure of peaceful form, with all the characteristics perfectly complete, glossy and blue-green, of the kind described before, one should also accomplish other knowledge mantras. For one engaged in fierce rites it should be made in a transformed form. For one engaged in pacification and one engaged in increase it is of peaceful form. Wherever the practitioner faces and looks, there one should practice.

"As for the permission for the rites of the means of accomplishment of all the knowledge mantras taught in the Ūrdhvajaṭā: whatever female deity it is, one should give her that female's characteristics, form and attire. If it is a male, one should make him endowed with the characteristics of a male, adorned with male ornaments, with his implements, just as he is or just as described before. With a mistaken form, accomplishment does not arise. For as long as it lasts, one should place the Tathāgata beside that fierce deity.

a stūpa, or again one that contains the heart of dependent origination and is not cracked or broken into pieces, bestows accomplishment.

Now, this maṇḍala of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, is the maṇḍala called Generating All Commitments. It is called the Fully Victorious Consecration. It performs all auspicious and meritorious activities and increases harvests, life, and health, and even those whose commitments have lapsed come to generate commitment.

This maṇḍala should be drawn on the bank of a river of any kind, or on the bank of a lotus lake. Having made a plot of ground well cleansed with water, free of hair, chaff, charcoal, ash, wood, bricks, gravel, skulls, and skeletons, to the depth of a neck or to the level of water, in a place where there is water nearby, on the right side, or in the west where there are trees bearing flowers and fruit, in a direction that is pleasing to the mind and where there is wealth, one should draw the maṇḍala, square, with four doors, in rice powder of five colors. The lines should be laid out with a thread of five colors, and with pegs of udumbara wood as well. On a day of the bright fortnight when the lunar day, the karaṇa, the moment, the constellation, and the yoga are auspicious, with those colors: first white, second red, third yellow, fourth blue, and fifth black. For the rest, the deities should be drawn in the middle of the east.

In the center of the lotus one should set up a vase filled completely with all grains, jewels, medicines, and flowers. To its east, the Buddha, the Blessed One. To his right, noble Avalokiteśvara. To his left, Stainless Goer. Beside noble Avalokiteśvara, the seven Tārās. To the left, the seven women of Stainless Goer. Beside Śrīdevī, Pāṇḍaravāsinī. Beside the Tārās one should place Candrā. Beginning from Candrā, Śrī, Yaśasvinī, and also Śvetā. Beside them, Mahāśvetā and Bhṛkuṭī. Toward the door, the Courageous Lady and Śakti. Inside the maṇḍala, on both sides, Brahmā and also Rudra. Beside Rudra, the goddess Umā; beside Brahmā, Sarasvatī. Inside the door, a staff and a water pot. On one side, Prajñāpāramitā; on the other, She Who Has Attained Peace. At the door one should place the wrathful one called Hayagrīva, facing inward. Beside him one should set the rākṣasī called Ekajaṭī.

This is the arrangement of the maṇḍala of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. One should draw a maṇḍala of four cubits, or eight cubits, or twelve cubits, or sixteen cubits.

In setting out the forms and the mudrās: everywhere, the Blessed One's lotus is a fully opened lotus mudrā. For the bodhisattvas, the emblems of their excellent families. For noble Tārā, the blue lotus. For Śrī, an opened flower and a white lotus. For Pāṇḍaravāsinī, that same, with its stalk, fully opened. For noble Yaśasvinī, a flower with its stalk. At all the doors and at all the corners, set ten mango twigs on each bundle of kuśa grass, and raise banners above.

Then one should invite each deity with its own mantra, and also request it to depart. Or else, do so with the complete heart knowledge mantra of noble Avalokiteśvara. Or else, invite with white flowers using the heart mantra of noble Tārā, and request departure.

At night, having made offerings of scent, flowers, incense, and lamps, one should make offering with torma: auspicious dishes, ullopika cakes, peas, oily fried foods and the like, laḍḍus of lentils, sesame porridge, milk porridge, rice with curd, buttermilk, broth, other oily foods for the spirits, molasses cakes, and also curd. This is the rite of the torma.

Then, having again made offerings of fragrant scents and of flowers, water-born flowers in particular, one should recite each mantra seven times. Or else one should recite the mantra of noble Tārā eight hundred times. Over the inner vase one should recite the five-syllable heart mantra one thousand eight hundred times. Then, having taken up fire in the fire place, one should perform the fire offering with butter, sesame oil, and food, according to the rite, in its proper form and without limit of number.

Afterward, the practitioner should lead in the student, who has been well examined and is a fit vessel. Covering his face with a cloth, having led him in with his joined palms filled with flowers, one should have him cast them. Wherever they fall, that will be his family. When he has thus been led into the maṇḍala, the student will come to know the commitments. Having given whatever empowerment is desired, facing east from the south and the west, one should fumigate him with incense of sarja resin and bdellium mixed with ghee. At midday, with the vase. One should offer oblations into the fire, reciting each mantra seven times. Having offered the oblations, then, by the great activity of the Blessed Mother, one should place the student on the left side, and then have him circumambulate the maṇḍala. One also gives him the heart mantra. He should bind this mudrā of noble Tārā and recite. In this way he is consecrated.

If all these things are done in every respect, this will quickly bring pacification, and one greatly pleases the Blessed Mother. One who desires kingship should be consecrated as if seated on a lion throne. One who desires wealth, seated on palāśa leaves. One who would cast out wrongful contamination, seated upon bricks. One who desires long life, seated on the essence of the earth that moves upon ten short ones. One who desires to flourish as a master should be consecrated drawn out with ariṣṭa and seated upon a skull. By consecrating seven times, misfortune is pacified. By consecrating twelve times, one becomes a king. By consecrating five times, the poor become wealthy. Afterward one should again make offerings and request departure.

This is the maṇḍala rite of noble Tārā called the Fully Victorious Consecration.

When this maṇḍala has been drawn, before long one greatly pleases the Blessed Mother.

Then again the bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta said to the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi: "Out of compassion for the buddhafield, in order to protect and guard fully the teaching of the whole vajra family, this Ūrdhvajaṭā together with its subsequent tantra brings accomplishment to the whole vajra family itself, and so that all the ways of the Dharma may remain even in this age afflicted by the five degenerations, it performs activities equal to the subjugation by Tārā." And in order to establish the path of this subsequent tantra, at that time he also said this:

"Blessed One, I shall establish it, and I shall utter an aspiration. May this conduct of mantra become for beings a cause of the perfection of wisdom. I shall dispel for them every fear of strife, dispute, famine, disease, enemy armies, untimely rain, people who rain down threats, non-humans, and animals; and also inauspiciousness, bad dreams, evil omens, malevolent yakṣas, hostile persons, loss of taste, cold, heat, foul smells, harsh contact, and poison. As the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, in a woman's form and attire, I shall dispel for them thieves, floods, famine, and violence. I shall completely pacify every fear of kings, lions, tigers, buffalo, wolves, poison, thieves, humans, and non-humans. I shall make all beings skilled in the rite of accomplishing mantra, and I shall bring to completion their enjoyment of fruits of many kinds, medicines, flowers, the taste of fruits to eat, drink, clothing, dwellings, bedding, and seats. I shall make all beings long for the Dharma and set them to the practice of virtuous dharmas.

"This is my ultimate aspiration in the presence of all the buddhas. May all the buddhas, the blessed ones, grant me their permission! May the accomplishment of the activity of the buddhas, the blessed ones, the chariot of the mind, be perfected in me. And in order surely to liberate myself and persons of this kind, I in such a form, and Vajrapāṇi in a woman's form, shall ripen beings with forms and attire of many kinds."

Then again the buddhas, the blessed ones, out of compassion for Avalokiteśvara, summoned Śakra, Brahmā, the other world protectors, the gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, and the rest, and he would act in the manner of a great being in such a form. Then all those buddhas, the blessed ones, declared: "The bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara will be accomplished."

Then Śākyamuni said to the great bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara: "Son of noble family, this makes Māra, Śakra, Brahmā, the other world protectors, the gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, and humans of great splendor, of very great splendor, come; it is fully embraced and blessed by all the buddhas. Your knowledge mantras and mantra words are made in such forms and in the manner of such persons as you are able to assume.

"Son of noble family, you too, in an instant, in the guise of Brahmā, rightly join beings to the way of the Dharma of all the buddhas. In a moment, in the guise of a monk; in an instant, in the form of medicine and elixir; in a moment, in the form of Śakra, you lead them onto the noble path. In an instant, in the form of Māra, you emanate the forms of others: the lord of the gods of Vaśavartin, Tuṣita, Yāma, Akaniṣṭha, the Four Great Kings, all the bhūtas, the charnel ground, Rudra, Viṣṇu, Vāsudeva, Kubera, Maheśvara, yakṣas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, rākṣasas, pretas, piśācas, kumbhāṇḍas, kṣatriyas, brahmins, vaiśyas, śūdras, lions, elephants, buffalo, monkeys, pigs, birds of many forms, mountains, trees, fruits, garments, Dharma robes, mounts, bedding and seats, paṭaha drums, conches, and many kinds of jewels, adorned with forms decked in ornaments; and you become like the form of a buddha. Son of noble family, this becomes like the form of the eighty-four colors, forms, signs, and shapes."

Then the Tathāgata Amitābha said to the Lord of Secrets, Vajrapāṇi: "Son of noble family, this has come here through the great power of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara. In the domain of Māra and his army, all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and wherever they dwell in the domain of Māra and his army, through the means of the conduct of the knowledge mantras and mantras of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, he cares for beings. Beings of every kind, measureless and countless, in the ten directions, in pure and impure buddhafields, he will behold with the unobscured eye of wisdom. With forms that accord with their dispositions, he establishes himself and the beings to be tamed, in whatever way they are to be tamed, in the third state, that of irreversibility. For as long as is needed, in the form of a buddha, he overcomes whatever attachment beings have, and for those who long for necessities and enjoyments of many kinds, in order that they may give up their clinging, he gives them those necessities and then establishes them in irreversibility itself."

Then again, surely, with that commitment, the bodhisattva noble Avalokiteśvara spoke to the whole assembly: "Sons of noble family, I take great delight in what you, Śakra, Brahmā, the world protectors, the gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, and the rest, have expressed in your minds. And may what I, the great king of wrathful ones called Hayagrīva, have spoken become, together with the Blessed One, of mutual benefit and of gentle mind. This secret mantra of mine has great fruit and great splendor and accomplishes every aim of activity. Here it is:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya sarbasatvāya anukaṃpakāya sarbbasatvābyasanaghīteni sarbasatvāmakṣakarāya sarbbabīryarāja adhibhikrāṃtāya mahārājāprokte

Having paid homage to these, I shall recite the mantra spoken by noble Avalokiteśvara, which accomplishes the aims of all beings, slays all obstructors, and conquers all:

oṃ hu hu hu tarule bitarule sarbbabiṣa ghātaka jvalitabiphuliṅka trihāsa keśarāṭepa bajrakhurnirghāta kacalita basudhātala niśvāsa mārutitkṣipti dharaṇīdhara bhīṣaṇā trihasa aparimitabālākramabhītabhutagani bughna bughna hayagrība khāda khāda paramantraṃ siddhi medina ābeśāya jvalarapiśācagraheṣu apratihato bhaba bajrakiñcarāyasi imaṃ duṣṭagraha duṣṭa sarbbaṃ bā dhuna dhuna paṭa paṭa pandha bandha buddha ddharmma

The mantra from the mouth of Hayagrīva, resting on fourteen, increased by eighteen with the three hūṃ syllables and the four phaṭ syllables, is complete.

oṃ bajrakhura bikṛtānana hūṃ phaṭ

This is the near-heart mantra.

oṃ hayagrība hṛdaya mābartayiṣyami ehi ehi mahābāla bajranakha bajraroma bajrakoṭa bajrakoṣa bajrakhura bajradaṃṣṭa hana hana daña daha paca paca gṛhṇa gṛhṇa bandha bandha raṅga raṅga saha saha jalpa jalpa turu turu ruṭu ruṭu dhuna dhuna bidhuna bidhuna matha matha kampa kampa kaṭ kaṭ sarbbadebāṃ sarbbayakṣa sarbbabiheṭhakā sarbbabiṣīprabi prabe prabiśa hayagrība priyajvāla abiśa ābiśa bajrakhur mābilamba buddhadharmmasaṃghabacana manusmara jatimanusmara hṛdayam nusmar pikir pikira gaja gaja nanda nanda gulu gulu mulu mulu nihana nihana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

This is the heart mantra.

nama ārya abalokiteśvarāya

This too is the great king of knowledge mantras, of immeasurable strength and power to overcome others, which destroys the splendor of the supreme body; it is followed by all the tathāgatas and permitted for worship; it subdues all violence; it is worshipped by every host of knowledge mantras; it is truly praised by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas, and worshipped by pretas, piśācas, and kumbhāṇḍas; greatly transformed, baring its fangs. This will be the rite of Hayagrīva the king.

Having purified one's wrongdoing, one recites it three hundred thousand times at a stūpa. Then one should begin the practice. On the fifteenth of the bright fortnight, having kept a fast for three nights, one should have a painter who observes the poṣadha paint, on a cloth free of hair whose fringe has not been cut off, with colors that are not mixed and with a clean new brush, an image of the Blessed One seated on a lotus seat, in the act of teaching the Dharma.

On his left side, noble Avalokiteśvara, wearing a white sacred thread, white like an autumn cloud, with a lotus body, wearing a crown of matted locks in the middle of which is a white Amitābha dwelling within a purified vessel; with his right hand bestowing fearlessness, his left hand occupied in bestowing a lotus. The practitioner too is gazing intently. Below noble Avalokiteśvara, on the left, one should draw Hayagrīva, king of knowledge mantras, white like an autumn cloud, with a wrathful face, red eyes, and tawny hair, his great hand holding an antelope skin, wrapped in a length of cloth, fierce, with a hanging belly, wearing a snake as his sacred thread, gazing intently at Avalokiteśvara, his face blazing, his head adorned with a garland of sixty lotuses. Beside him, a diligent vidyādhara, his hand occupied with an incense bowl, kneeling on both knees.

Then on the left side of the Blessed One, one gazing intently at the wrathful one, his face slightly smiling, stroking a vajra, wreathed in garlands of flame. Below the Blessed One, on both sides of a Dharma wheel, figures seated upon lotuses, and those lotuses are held by young nāgas.

Then, when the vidyādhara has completed the work of painting and has made vast offerings, having kept a fast for three nights, he sets down the rosary and offers large butter lamps and white torma. Then the vidyādhara, having done the preliminary practice, should place it within and leave it for one night. Then, having taken it out, he should have a wheel made of iron under the constellation Puṣya by a craftsman who observes the poṣadha, who is clean and not lacking in any faculty: eight finger-widths across, broad, fully closed, wreathed in garlands of blazing vajras. Then the vidyādhara should place that wheel too in the five products of the cow and leave it for one night.

Then, having taken it out and bathed it in the proper way, and having wrapped it all around with white cloth, one should set up the painting facing west. Taking incense, torma, and a vessel of guest water, one should invite all the deities. Having offered the guest water and then requested them to depart again into oneself, one makes a fence of ash with ash over which the root mantra has been recited seven times, and a fence of lamps with a lamp over which it has been recited seven times. Then, having performed the rite of protection, one binds the ground with white mustard seed over which it has been recited seven times, and binds the sky with water consecrated seven times.

Then the vidyādhara, with a vessel filled with scented water together with white flowers, kneeling on both knees, should invite his own deity with the root mantra, offer the guest water, and satisfy the deities on that seat. One should make a fire offering of seven oblations of butter, honey, and milk. Then the vidyādhara should take up the wheel in both hands and recite until it blazes.

There will be the sound of a great drum heard, thunder rumbling "golu golu" from the clouds, the tips of the lamp flames growing, the painting moving, the sound of a conch heard, the sound of bells ringing out, the sound "haha" resounding, and the words: "Son of noble family, these are accomplished. Excellent, excellent! This wheel travels the path of the bodhisattvas and carries one across the great ocean of existence."

Then the vidyādhara should recite quickly, quickly, until noble Avalokiteśvara comes. When he has come, one should offer him guest water. Then, when the practitioner has offered the guest water, noble Avalokiteśvara says to the practitioner: "Son, you have surely subdued those of Māra's side and traveled those paths of the bodhisattvas. What is to be done?"

Then the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, strokes the crown of the practitioner's head with his right hand. In that very instant of stroking there appears a canopy a thousand leagues wide, hung with nets of little bells and dangling with golden leaves, bound with Tārā, adorned and richly adorned with vajra power by sapphires, rubies, saugandhika gems, and other special ornaments. And with other auspicious things too: daughters of the vidyādharas, of fine form and beautiful, singing and sending forth sweet melodious voices, accompanied by lutes, clay drums, flutes, and cymbals. This canopy of the practitioner of noble Avalokiteśvara, by the power of that king of knowledge mantras itself, sports together with its retinue for as long as the moon, the sun, and the stars endure; and by the power of this king of knowledge mantras he is the sovereign of the universal monarchs of all vidyādharas.

Then, having paid homage to noble Avalokiteśvara, he ascends the celestial palace together with those who share in his enjoyment, and departs. That wheel too, blazing at the summit of the celestial palace, the universal monarch of all knowledge mantras, with a mind that travels where it will, goes to Sukhāvatī. There, where the Tathāgata Amitābha dwells, praised by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, and vidyādharas, amid showers of falling flowers, he remains for an eon as the sovereign of the universal monarchs of all vidyādharas.

When he dies, he is born among brahmins, and he has recollection of his births, all the marks complete, superknowledge of all times, great wealth, great enjoyments, the power to overcome others with great diligence; he is a delight for all beings to see, compassionate, of deep faith in the Buddha, of upright mind, retentive of what he hears, and skilled in every craft, in letters, and in drawing; whatever inconceivable thing he thinks of, he understands with his mind. He is born into a brahmin family, free of every illness. So it is said.

Consecrating seven times, one binds the crown knot. With the syllable hūṃ, increase, suppression, and bewildering. With the syllable ja, one requests departure. With the syllable gha, killing. With the syllable svāhā, the aim of pacification and sustaining life. In brief, it teaches this: the vidyādhara who wishes to accomplish the supreme great secret should perform here cutting, killing, splitting, destroying, threatening, and every other act of killing as well. All of it is to be done with a nature of compassion, never with fierceness. One must never apply the king of knowledge mantras where it should not be applied; whoever does apply it so will not achieve the supreme accomplishment, and will also be without knowledge of the commitment. This accomplishment holds in all sādhanas and in all tantras.

Having consecrated a finger seven times, one suppresses the clouds. Having touched the head, one wins at dice, and likewise in every dispute. Having consecrated white mustard seed seven times and struck with it, one brings ruin. Having consecrated mālatī flowers seven times, if one gives them to a woman to hold, or pours them on her head, she comes under one's control.

Costus, cinnamon, black aloeswood, sandalwood, saffron, sahakāra blossom spikes, leaves of the three pungent spices, black pepper, bakula flowers, and priyaṅgu flowers should be ground to a fine powder, mixed with honey, and made into pills on chickpea leaves. When these have been recited over five times and given, that person comes under one's control. With the root mantra, a woman together with her husband comes under one's control. One who has entered upon the practice, wherever he stays, should carefully undertake it with that very powder, and vināyakas will not overpower him. By this same means, neither will rākṣasas, pretas, and the like.

Kuṭaja seeds, nāgakesara, lotus petals, śirīṣa flowers, spikenard, tagara, costus, the seeds of the plant called hand-born, red sandalwood, and white aparājitā flowers: having combined these seeds, one should have them ground with the urine of a tawny cow by a maiden's hand. Then, having made pills, one should perfume them in the shade with white mālatī flowers. If one anoints the body with these, one will not be overpowered by anyone, whether vināyakas, pretas, kumbhāṇḍas, piśācas, or the like. If one does not give them, then, having consecrated cow's urine seven times, one completely destroys illness.

Guggulu, picumarda seeds, sandalwood, turuṣka, and śrīvāsaka: grind these to powder and fumigate your clothes with them. You will not be overpowered by anyone.

Realgar, bezoar, the hand-born plant, belleric myrobalan, kadamba flowers, licorice, śephālikā flowers, cinnamon, the seeds of white pepper, the two kinds of turmeric, and sweet flag: one should have these ground with the urine of a tawny cow by the hand of a brahmin maiden who observes the poṣadha. Having made pills, one should perfume them with blue lotuses. One should perfume them with atimuktaka, śāla, and blue flowers. One will not be overpowered by anyone, whether vināyakas or others, pretas, piśācas, kumbhāṇḍas, rākṣasas, or the like.

The chapter on freedom from illness is complete.

Next comes the accomplishment of the vetāla. On the fifteenth of the bright fortnight, take the corpse of a man, undamaged and very handsome, and anoint it. Having placed it in a purified vessel, the one who observes the poṣadha lets its hair hang loose, ties a garland of flowers about its neck, and goes down into a dry well. Having placed it in the well at a stūpa that contains relics, with the products of a tawny cow, one should make vast offerings and torma, bind it with four pegs of khadira wood, and set up the guardians of the directions. Mixing puffed rice and flour with the milk of a tawny cow, make oblations into the mouth of that corpse until its tongue comes out. Having cut it off, one becomes a sword vidyādhara. One becomes a great hero who overcomes others. One becomes like the rising sun, of equal radiance. One lives for five thousand years.

Next comes the second accomplishment of the vetāla. Having drawn a vetāla with ash from the charnel ground and made vast offerings and torma, sitting before it on a mat of kuśa grass, one should perform the fire offering with sticks of khadira wood smeared with pungent sesame oil until the vetāla rises. Whatever one thinks of in one's mind, it quickly summons. It bestows the elixir of rejuvenation. Riding upon it, one travels by means of the fire offering, and one lives for thirteen thousand years.

Next comes the third accomplishment of the vetāla. Having anointed a maṇḍala with the products of a tawny cow, drawn a vetāla with the ash of a fire offering made in the fire, made vast offerings, and set it up properly in the same way, one performs the fire offering with oblations of vikaṅkata, and the vidyādhara should strike it all over with vikaṅkata. Remembering the root mantra, one should say: "Rise! Rise!" It gives off smoke, and when one releases it with fierce laughter, it becomes terrifying. If one strikes it until one's own task is done, it follows one, and it quickly summons even the wife of Indra. It becomes an elixir of rejuvenation. Having eaten it, one lives for thirteen thousand years. When one dies, one is born into a family of great wealth, and one also remembers one's births. This is the accomplishment of the vetāla.

On the fifteenth of the bright fortnight, having kneaded well a peacock, a garuḍa, an elephant, and a horse out of anthill earth and milk, and having recited the root mantra over the three separated waters, one should give them to a tawny cow to consume. Then the vidyādhara, with the products of a secluded cow, observing the poṣadha, takes the milk of that tawny cow and kneads that lump of earth. Then, having made any one of a peacock, a garuḍa, an elephant, or a horse, as a drawing or in any other way, one should have a painter who observes the poṣadha paint it. Having set up the painting facing west, made vast offerings and lamps, and performed the rite of protection, one should perform a fire offering of seven oblations with sticks of udumbara wood. Having invited the deities with scented water and again opened it out, one offers guest water, places the peacock in front of the painting, and should recite until it blazes.

Then the vidyādhara should recite quickly, quickly. If one is accomplishing the peacock, the signs of its accomplishment are these: the peacock cries out, the elephant trumpets "gula gula," the horse neighs, and the garuḍa beats its wings. When these signs of accomplishment occur, one becomes a king of peacocks, a second Kārttika, and with great diligence one gains strength and overcomes others. One subdues the pride of the gods. One lives for an intermediate eon. When one dies, one is born into a brahmin family. This is the accomplishment.

Then the one who fashions the vajra accomplishes a wheel, a hook, an axe, a short spear, a vajra, and a trident with a serpent hood, made of aguru, of sandalwood, of devadāru, of khadira, of fragrant wood, of neem wood, of iron made under Puṣya, of anthill earth, of crystal, or of clay. Having had a four-pronged vajra sixteen finger-widths long made, complete in every part, by a craftsman who observes the poṣadha, and having washed it thoroughly with the five products of a tawny cow, on the fifteenth of the bright fortnight, in front of the painting, one makes torma, lamps, and vast offerings. Having bathed the vajra in scented water and made an image arranging all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, one recites over the scented water with the root mantra.

Having invited one's own deities, one offers the welcoming water again and again; then, having requested them to depart, one should perform a fire offering of oblations of ghee. Then the vidyādhara, holding the vajra in his right hand, should recite for as long as it blazes and gives forth a crackling sound, "ciṭi ciṭi."

Then the vidyādhara should recite swiftly, until he sees in the eastern direction Avalokiteśvara, the one of great compassion, the deliverer of bodhisattvas, surrounded by all the perfections; Hayagrīva, the king, surrounded by ten million vidyās; the noble Bhṛkuṭī, Tārā, Pāṇḍaravāsinī, and Parṇaśabarī; and the heart essences of the bodhisattvas, each surrounded by fifty million, coming as they follow behind the Blessed One.

Then the gods worship the noble Avalokiteśvara by letting fall a rain of flowers. The noble Avalokiteśvara holds a water pot and a staff, and with his right hand he comforts the practitioner. He is white like an autumn cloud, steadfast as a pure white vessel, and wears a black antelope skin. In the middle of his crown of matted locks is the Tathāgata Amitābha, blazing like the sun, bearing a golden rod for worship. With words deep as the sound of a great drum, he comforts the practitioner.

Then the practitioner offers welcoming water and seats to all who have come, makes aspirations, and says: "Out of loving kindness, take the Blessed One's loving kindness upon me, and speak! Blessed One, with great compassion toward all sentient beings, toward the evildoer, and toward merit and the other accomplishments, great bodhisattva of great compassion, you whose very nature is great compassion, speak! For the evil I have done, the accomplishment of wealth." Having made aspirations thirteen times, the practitioner should request accomplishment from the Blessed One.

Then the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara touches the crown of the practitioner's head with his right hand and says, "Son, what shall be done?" Then, having offered welcoming water and a bouquet of flowers, kneeling on both knees, one should say this: "Blessed One, grant me the vajra accomplishment! Through your great diligence in activity and your great power, make my body like that of Vajrapāṇi, king of vidyādharas and lord of all vidyādharas!"

Then the Blessed One says: "Son, these are accomplished. This vajra is the power of great diligence and the subduer of adversaries; yours is a body like that of Vajrapāṇi, king of vidyādharas, who moves without obstruction and has great might."

Then the vidyādhara takes the vajra, circumambulates the Blessed One, and becomes a king of vidyās. Surrounded by fifty million vidyādharas, he sports together with vidyādhara maidens. With a fine form, utterly beautiful, perfect in all the major marks, he lives for an intermediate eon. When he dies, he is born into a brahmin family, and he remembers his former births. This is the accomplishment.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the eye salve, at noon one should obtain antimony (srotoñjana) at the hero's price, have it washed seven times with the milk of a tawny cow, and likewise with the five products of that same tawny cow. After that, one should put the eye salve into a copper vessel and grind it. Then, having taken it from the fire, one makes vast offerings and torma before the painting and places the eye salve in the mouth. On the eighth day of the bright fortnight, or when the moon is seized by Rāhu, fasting for three nights, one should recite until it becomes warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. When it has become warm, one brings others under one's power. When it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. When it blazes, one travels through the sky. By anointing one's eyes with it, one lives for five thousand years. When one dies, one is born into a rich family of great wealth, and remembers one's former births.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish a yakṣiṇī, on a cloth free of hair a painter who observes the poṣadha should draw, with colors that are not mixed, an image of the Blessed One one sugata-span in size, adorned with all ornaments, with a slightly smiling face, holding an aśoka in his right hand. On the eighth day of the bright fortnight the vidyādhara, setting up the painting before the image of the Blessed One, makes torma and vast offerings. Fasting for three nights, he invites his own deity, offers welcoming water and a seat, offers the water of requesting departure, and then, with the root mantra, should perform a fire offering of eight oblations of milk. Then the vidyādhara, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, should recite until the yakṣiṇī herself comes.

When she has come, having offered welcoming water, one should say this: "Accept it, accept it, and be seated!" With a broadly smiling face she says, "Excellent!" and, "What command shall I carry out?" Then the practitioner should say, "Be my wife." If he says, "Sister," then the practitioner will be parted from life. If he says, "Wife," then she takes the practitioner by the hand and, with a smiling face, goes to her own abode. She gives him an elixir. By eating it, in that very instant he becomes curly haired, with the appearance of one sixteen years old, colored like the rising sun, a divine image, with a fine form, utterly beautiful, and he lives for five thousand years. He sports together with her. When he dies, he is born into a great family, and he remembers his former births.

By that same rite, on a cloth with uncut fringe, a painter who observes the poṣadha should draw, with colors that are not mixed, a yakṣiṇī one sugata-span in size, hanging from a camphor priyaṅgu tree, wearing a single garment, resembling a sesame flower.

Then, on the eighth day of the bright fortnight, the practitioner, fasting through the night and wearing clean clothes, makes offerings, torma, and lamps at a stūpa containing relics. Having invited his own deity, he offers welcoming water and a seat and then requests it to depart; then he should perform a fire offering of eight oblations of priyaṅgu kindling sticks smeared with the ghee of a tawny cow. Then the vidyādhara should recite until the yakṣiṇī herself comes. When she has come, he should offer her welcoming water. She speaks thus: "What command shall I carry out?" Then the practitioner should say this: "Be my wife." When the practitioner has said this, she replies with a broadly smiling face, "Just as you command." The practitioner takes her by the hand and goes to his own dwelling. She gives him an elixir. In that very instant he comes to have a fine form, utterly beautiful. He lives for five thousand years.

By that same rite, on a cloth with uncut fringe, a painter who observes the poṣadha should draw a yakṣiṇī: yellow like gold, wearing a single garment, her hair loose, gazing intently at the practitioner with a mind wholly filled with desire, hanging from an atimukta tree, with a slightly smiling face, threatening the practitioner with a finger of her right hand.

Then the practitioner installs the painting at a stūpa containing relics. Wearing clean clothes, he fasts for three nights before the painting and makes vast offerings. Having offered welcoming water and made the drawings, and having again offered welcoming water, he requests departure; then he should perform a fire offering of twenty-eight oblations of milk. Then the practitioner should strike the yakṣiṇī with mālatī flowers, one at a time, each enchanted seven times with the root mantra, until she herself comes. Taking the practitioner by the hand, she goes to her own dwelling. Having gone to her dwelling, she gives him an elixir. In that very instant he comes to have a fine form, and he sports together with her. He lives for five thousand years. When he dies, he is born into a family of great wealth, and he remembers his former births.

By this same rite, one should combine sandalwood, tagara, costus, cinnamon, paripālapā, saffron, realgar, bezoar, lotus petals, and lotus seeds, and with scented water and water from the sky have them placed in the hands of a brahmin girl who observes the poṣadha. Having made a white, fragrant image, one makes offerings at a stūpa containing relics on the eighth day of the bright fortnight. Fasting for three nights, one sets that image before the stūpa, invites one's own deity with the root mantra, offers welcoming water and a seat, and offers the water of requesting departure. Then, seated on a mat of kuśa grass, one should perform a fire offering of seven oblations of lotus filaments smeared with the ghee of a tawny cow. Right there, seated on the kuśa mat, one should recite until the yakṣiṇī herself comes. When she has come, one should offer her welcoming water. Then she says, "What command shall I carry out?" One should say this: "Be my wife." Then she says, "So I shall do," and taking the practitioner by the hand she goes to her own dwelling and gives him an elixir. He comes to have a divine form. He lives for five thousand years. When he dies, he is born into a brahmin family, and he also remembers his former births.

By that same rite, one should make an image out of fresh ghee of a tawny cow and, before the painting, cut it piece by piece and offer it into the fire, until the yakṣiṇī appears.

By this same rite, one should make an image of red sandalwood, recite the root mantra over it twenty-one times, and place it in a river. In that very instant a beautiful yakṣiṇī comes and grants every wish.

Having had a yakṣiṇī made of neem wood, one sugata-span in size, one should have a painter who observes the poṣadha paint it with colors that are not mixed. At a stūpa containing relics, one makes torma and vast offerings of lamps according to the rite. Then the practitioner, in complete seclusion, with a purified vessel and clothes, should invite the deities with the root mantra, offer worship and a seat, and request them to depart. For as long as it takes the yakṣiṇī herself to come, making her form manifest and bearing a garland of flowers, for that long one should recite. When she speaks, the practitioner should say, "Be my wife." Then, with a broadly smiling face, she gives the practitioner the garland of flowers. Taking him by her own hand, she goes into the presence of the Blessed One. She gives him an elixir. In that very instant he comes to have a divine form, with a fine form, utterly beautiful. He sports together with her and fully enjoys delight and pleasure. He lives for five thousand years, the lifespan of a god. When he dies, he is born into a family of great wealth: utterly beautiful, a joy to all sentient beings who see him, with great enjoyments, great wealth, great pleasures, compassionate, giving everything, of great diligence, and remembering his former births.

The chapter on the yakṣiṇīs is complete.

Having gone to a lotus lake, the practitioner should perform the fire offering until Śrī comes. Costus, tagara, lotus seeds, lotus filaments, and sandalwood should be ground together with honey. Whoever it is given to comes under one's power. Having recited the root mantra over a garland of flowers, whoever it is given to comes under one's power.

Then one who wishes to gain prowess should make stūpas containing the heart of dependent origination, until the last stūpa trembles strongly. Then, the obscurations of karma being exhausted, success comes even to one who has committed the five deeds of immediate retribution, and not otherwise. Such is the magnificent display of the bodhisattva.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the noble Avalokiteśvara, on a cloth with uncut fringe and free of hair, a painter who observes the poṣadha should draw with a new brush, using colors that are not mixed, the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, yellow like gold, with hanging locks, bearing Amitābha on his head, surrounded by all the perfections. Below, the practitioner should be shown holding a censer in his hand, kneeling on both knees, contemplating awakening intently.

Then the vidyādhara, beginning on the first day of the bright fortnight, should make uninterrupted offerings, torma, and lamps before the painting every single day, until the full moon. On the full moon, having made vast offerings, torma, and lamps, he should also make aspirations. Having paid homage to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, he takes up with both hands a vessel of scented water filled with mālatī flowers, kneels on both knees, recites the root mantra seven times, and invites his own deities. Having offered welcoming water and seats, and having again dismissed them, he should perform a fire offering with mālatī flowers smeared with the ghee of a tawny cow.

Having satisfied the deities and made protection, he sits on a mat of kuśa grass, free of pride, silent, rid of all guile, and, fixing his attention with supreme mindfulness, he should recite until the noble Avalokiteśvara himself arrives, surrounded by all the perfections.

When the great being arrives, the earth trembles, the mountain peaks shake, all the illnesses of all sentient beings are completely pacified, all the gods let fall a rain of flowers, all the vidyādharas let fall a rain of sandalwood powder, the gods of the Pure Abodes let fall a rain of great jewels, and all the asuras let fall a rain of utpalas. All the Rudras become free of anger. Even the hell beings in that instant feel happiness and speak of their supreme fear. The gandharvas make the sound of sweet songs heard. All the vidyādharas too, each surrounded by his own vidyā, come into the presence of the bodhisattva of miraculous display. All the vināyakas, all the obstructing spirits, all the rākṣasas, all the pretas, and every kind of fierce being, seeing the bodhisattva arrive, turn to peaceful minds. From the clouds comes a rumbling sound, "gulu gulu," the earth quakes in six ways, and the guardians of the four directions come into the presence of the bodhisattva. All the vināyakas and all the obstructing spirits come, and the four directions become fully at peace. The wind blows, and blows strongly. The trees burst into flower out of season. All the worldly vidyādharas come, and wherever the vidyādhara performs the practice, there they all gather for the festival of the great being.

The practitioner, on seeing the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, should offer welcoming water and pay homage. He offers welcoming water and seats to all the gods and all the vidyādharas. Then all the gods and all the vidyādharas give their "Excellent!" to the practitioner and to the bodhisattva. Those whom he has ferried across the great river of the three realms of existence are surely sealed by the all-illuminating Victor and live together with the path of the bodhisattva.

Then the noble Avalokiteśvara gives his "Excellent!" to all the gods, and the bodhisattva strokes the crown of the practitioner's head with his right hand. Then whatever essence the practitioner holds in mind, that he becomes: a vidyādhara cakravartin, a vidyādhara king, divinity itself; whatever he wishes appears, and more besides. He should then say this: "Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, I wish to see Potalaka today."

The bodhisattva, the great being, took him by the right hand and entrusted him to Hayagrīva, king of vidyās, saying: "Go to Potalaka. Whatever is wished for will be given."

Then the king of vidyās, surrounded by a host of vidyā kings, takes the practitioner by the right hand and goes to Potalaka, in the midst of the ocean, while gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, mahoragas, and others let fall a rain of flowers on the practitioner's host of vidyās, and great drums, paṭaha drums, drums, single-headed clay drums, and clay drums resound. There, upon the ocean, the great Ocean sees the king of vidyās and that holy person, and, surrounded by all the rivers, presents an offering of welcoming water made of jewels. He also grants his "Excellent!": "Son of noble family, excellent! This is the abode of the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, who lives well and is endowed with splendor."

Then, having crossed the great ocean, he goes to Potalaka. As soon as he sees it, all who are there, the vidyādhara gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas, come to welcome the practitioner with welcoming water, vessels, and a great rain of flowers. Then he sees Potalaka, anointed with various gems and medicines, hung with pearl necklaces, with stairways made of gold, of crystal, of beryl, of sapphire, and of great sapphire, and with cloth hangings beautified by various flowers. They consecrate the king of vidyās and the practitioner, and say to the practitioner: "This abode is the abode of the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, made of four kinds of jewels. In the central chamber, until awakening, enjoy it and dwell as though in your own abode." Then, having consecrated the vidyādhara king, the king of vidyās departed.

This is the accomplishment: through the magnificent display of this Blessed One's might, even one who has committed the deeds of immediate retribution accomplishes it.

King Hayagrīva said to all the kings of vidyās: "In the central chamber of the abode of the Blessed Mother and the noble Avalokiteśvara, made of four kinds of jewels, dwelling on its ground as though in their own abode, are the vidyās Tārā and Bhṛkuṭī and all the other vidyās, the great subduers of adversaries."

This king of vidyās performs its actions even without being accomplished: it cuts through bolts; with the syllable hūṃ it dries up the ocean; with the threatening gesture of the finger it paralyzes all; with the syllable oṃ it summons; with the syllable phaṭ it shatters even the Meru mountains; by mental recitation it brings all sentient beings under its power. With the syllable oṃ the deities are invited, with the syllable hūṃ they are requested to depart, with the syllable phaṭ one kills, and with the syllable svāhā one restores life. In short, whatever rites of the vidyās there are, all of them should be accomplished, in a way that transcends the world, by this very vidyā.

This is the rite common to all mantras: one who has no rite, and even one who does evil, should recite it three times. This Hayagrīva, king of vidyās, of great diligence, authorized by all the buddhas, of great power and a great subduer of adversaries, brings accomplishment through three recitations even to one who has committed the deeds of immediate retribution. For one who has faith, who has embraced the awakening mind, who has great aspiration, whose nature is compassion, who is without avarice, who is grateful, who has deep faith in the Buddha and the Dharma, who honors mother and father, who is quick to be patient, who keeps moral discipline, and who gives gifts, it brings accomplishment even without practice.

In short, it serves for every action: one who wishes to cut through a vidyā, or wishes to remove one, should recite this. This serves for every action.

This is a special samādhi of the bodhisattva, a perfection of giving bestowed by another, namely: the king of vidyās, for the sake of perfecting the happiness of all sentient beings, at the neck of King Hayagrīva.

The chapter called The Magnificent Display of the Bodhisattva's Might is complete.

Then, if one wishes to see Amitābha, on a cloth with uncut fringe and free of hair, a painter who observes the poṣadha should draw, with colors that are not mixed, the noble Amitābha in the world realm of Sukhāvatī, yellow like gold, seated on a lotus. Below, on the left side of the wheel of Dharma, one should draw King Hayagrīva seated on a lotus, his face distorted and terrifying, his belly hanging down, radiating blazing red and yellow fire, bearing a garland of jewels as an offering, adorned with ornaments of snakes, bearing Amitābha in his locks, threatening the vināyakas with his finger, while behind him the vināyakas flee. On the right side is the noble Avalokiteśvara, adorned, with a purified vessel and garments, comforting the practitioner with his right hand, yellow like gold, bearing on his head Amitābha in the middle of his crown of matted locks, subduer of adversaries. On the cloud above Amitābha, one should draw the gods of the Pure Abodes scattering flowers from among the clouds. The lotus of the Blessed One is held up by young nāgas. Below is the practitioner holding a censer in his hand, kneeling on both knees, gazing at Amitābha.

When the work of drawing is complete, the practitioner makes torma, lamps, and vast offerings, and on the full moon, fasting for three nights, with this same purified vessel and garments, he summons Hayagrīva, king of vidyās, offers welcoming water, performs the practice, and requests him to depart again. Then, having combined the ghee of a tawny cow, lotus seeds, and nāgakesara, he should perform a fire offering for seven days. Then the vidyādhara, having satisfied the deities and seated on a mat of kuśa grass, should make aspirations, and he should recite until the earth quakes in six ways, the tips of the lamp flames grow, a rumbling sound, "gulu gulu," comes from the clouds, a rain of flowers falls, a rain of sandalwood powder falls, and the sound of bells is heard. Then the vidyādhara should recite more and more swiftly, until Hayagrīva, king of vidyās, of great diligence, subduer of adversaries, comes with all the vidyās to the place of practice.

Then the practitioner offers welcoming water from a vessel filled with white flowers and scented water and makes aspirations. He spoke thus: "You are welcome! Welcome again, for the sake of the noble Avalokiteśvara together with the perfections." This Hayagrīva is of great diligence, power, and subduer of adversaries, worshipped by all the hosts of vidyās.

Then the vidyādhara should circumambulate Avalokiteśvara three times, kneel, and say this: "Whatever has appeared to you, I ask for all of it together." Then the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, stroked the crown of the practitioner's head with his right hand and said this: "Holy being, of great diligence, power, and subduer of adversaries, you who through great diligence and the subduing of adversaries have accomplished the king of vidyās: excellent, excellent! Speak what you desire. I shall grant you a boon." One should say this: "Blessed One, I wish to go to Sukhāvatī." Then to the Blessed One, the noble Amitābha, with the bodhisattvas, in that world realm. Then the Blessed One, the noble Avalokiteśvara, stretched out his right hand, took the practitioner by the right hand, and entrusted him to King Hayagrīva.

"Great king of vidyās, take this holy being and go to the world realm of Sukhāvatī, where a rain of flowers falls. There, where the Tathāgata Amitābha, the Blessed One, dwells with the maṇḍala of his assembly, have him offer praise, and then come back again to where Potalaka is."

Then Hayagrīva, king of vidyās, took the practitioner and went to the world realm of Sukhāvatī, where a rain of flowers falls, and the practitioner said: "Holy being, look, look at the Tathāgata Amitābha teaching the Dharma to the bodhisattvas!" Then the king of vidyās, having had him offer praise, brought him back again to the Potalaka of the noble Avalokiteśvara. Then the practitioner listens to the Dharma in the presence of the noble Amitābha in that world realm.

This accomplishment must not be applied to those who are unfit vessels; whoever does so transgresses the samaya. Having declared this, among the supreme practices this is not to be applied to those who are unfit vessels, for they have no samaya for it.

All these actions should be performed with the root mantra. With ash, a fence of ash. With three lamps, a fence of fire. By enchanting water seven times, the sky is bound. With white mustard seed, the ground is bound. By a fire offering of sesame, all the vināyakas come under one's power. By a fire offering of mustard, all the pretas and piśācas come under one's power. A fire offering of karavīra flowers accomplishes all the wrathful ones. By a fire offering of all kinds of flowers smeared with pungent sesame oil, all the worldly kings of vidyās come under one's power. By a fire offering of dhudhu, Maheśvara comes under one's power. If one performs a fire offering of priyaṅgu flowers, mālatī, saugandhi, and guggulu combined with the ghee of a tawny cow, one brings under one's power all the vidyās, gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, kinnaras, and all bipeds and quadrupeds. Having enchanted bezoar seven times and made a tilaka with it, one makes fanged creatures eat apart, and one is victorious in disputes. Taking the ghee of a tawny cow according to the rite described before and smearing it over the body, one enters into fire.

Taking a vajra made of khadira wood, together with the syllable hūṃ, at the entrance of a cave, an asura maiden comes forth; and when one has entered, the danger of the wheel does not arise. If the wheel is set in motion, by remembering the samaya, with the syllable hūṃ the wheel is ground to powder.

Next comes the practice of the pills. The vidyādhara who accomplishes the pills should combine red sandalwood, the five flowers, lotus filaments, the husks of red śāli rice, katnika sprouts, ṇūka seeds, grain, māṣa sprouts, costus, tagara, and turuṣka sesame oil, mixing them in equal parts. One who observes the poṣadha, in seclusion, should recite the root mantra over a tawny cow with a calf of the same kind and tether her at home; having enchanted well-strained water, she should be tended for seven days, either at home or in a secluded place. Then a cowherd for whom protection has been made should milk the cow. Then one should recite over that milk in a vase in a clean, secluded place. Then the vidyādhara should have a brahmin girl churn it. With that butter the ingredients are kneaded, and the pills are wrapped all around with the three metals; then they should be placed in the five products of a tawny cow and left for one night. Then, taking them out, one should place them in scented water. Having washed them, one should smear lotus petals with bezoar and set them on these.

Then, setting up the painting facing west and performing the rite of protection, one performs the vast rite of torma, lamps, and offerings. Then the vidyādhara takes up with both hands the eight pills on the lotus petals, holds them in his hands joined in the shape of a lotus, and, combining that same ghee of a tawny cow with mālatī flowers, should perform a fire offering of seven oblations. Then, having invited his own deity with the root mantra, he should recite before the noble Avalokiteśvara until they give off smoke and blaze. While they give off smoke, he becomes a vidyādhara who is invisible, who brings others under his power, and who travels through the sky. With a radiance like the rising sun, the vidyādhara, perfect in all the major marks, sports and delights together with the vidyādhara maidens. He lives for five thousand years. When he dies, he is born into a kṣatriya household, and he also remembers his former births.

With this same rite, lotus seeds, paṇḍītakara seeds, turuṣka, black aguru, red sandalwood, saugandhika, mālā flowers, saffron, realgar, and bezoar should be ground with the five products of a tawny cow by a maiden who observes the poṣadha and is not deficient in her faculties. Then the vidyādhara takes priyaṅgu wood and, in a clean multistoried house, has a casket made by the hands of a carpenter who observes the poṣadha, has generated the mind set on awakening, and is not deficient in his faculties. Having placed twenty-one pills in that casket, he makes vast offerings before the painting and also offers torma; then, taking up the casket, he covers it with a clean cloth and, fasting for three nights, invites the deities of the vidyā and should recite until it grows warm, gives off smoke, and blazes. When it grows warm, he brings others under his power, and he becomes invisible. When it gives off smoke, he becomes the one supreme youthful vidyādhara. When it blazes, he goes together with six vidyādharas and, surrounded by vidyādhara maidens, sports and delights on the summit of Meru and fully enjoys delight and pleasure. He lives for five thousand years.

When he dies, he is born among those of great wealth, and he also remembers his former births.

With this very mantra one accomplishes an eye ointment of realgar. On the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight, one takes gorocana bought at a hero's price, without haggling, and keeps a fast for one night. At midday a brahmin maiden who keeps the poṣadha vow should grind it with lotus petals and the milk of a tawny cow. Having made vast offerings to the painting, with the painting set facing west, one performs the rite of protection and invites one's own deities. Having offered them welcoming water and seats, make a fire offering of seven oblations of priyaṅgu flowers and tawny cow's milk. Having satisfied the deities, again, before those deities, one places the pellet inside two lotuses joined face to face, and one should recite until it gives off smoke, grows warm, and blazes. If, while it is warm, one makes a forehead mark with it, all people become pleased. While it gives off smoke, one becomes invisible. Making a forehead mark with it as it blazes, one sports together with vidyādhara maidens, surrounded by six vidyādharas. When he dies, he is born into a house of great wealth, and he also remembers his former births.

Make a fire offering of sesame, and the nāgas come under one's power. Make a fire offering of fish and meat, and the pretas come under one's power. If one makes a fire offering of mālatī flowers, the goddess Born of the Waters comes under one's power. Make a fire offering of priyaṅgu flowers, and the gods come under one's power. If one makes a fire offering of saugandhika lilies, the yakṣas come under one's power. With white mustard seed empowered by mantra seven times, whoever's crown it is placed upon comes under one's power. Before someone seized by a graha, struck by fever, or seized by a rākṣasa, if one makes a fire offering of mustard seed empowered by mantra seven times and smears him with its ash, he will be freed.

This detailed rite of King Hayagrīva is also complete.

There arises the magnificent power of noble Avalokiteśvara that extends to everything worldly and beyond the world. Those vidyā kings that have no rite of their own are accomplished by this very rite, and everything is done by that very king of ritual manuals. In short, even one who has committed the five acts of immediate retribution will succeed by doing it three times. Any son of good family who has faith, who is without stinginess, without deceit and without slander, who is respectful toward the vidyā king, who honors the one who keeps this ritual manual, reads it, recites it and praises it to others, being free of stinginess, will remember his former births. He will be cared for by spiritual friends and will have deep faith in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṅgha.

The detailed rite of King Hayagrīva in the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā.

Then again, at that time, from the eastern direction, from the world realm Abhirati, the tathāgata called Tārā Akṣobhya, together with bodhisattva great beings in numbers to be measured and counted, through the power of the blessing of the miraculous display of the domain of all the buddhas, came in a single instant to this buddhafield where the secret mantra is obtained, to this very middle world of four continents where the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete Buddha Śākyamuni dwells. They remained on lotus seats as these arose, and those bodhisattva great beings too sat upon those lotus seats according to the power of their growth and their practice. In the same way, as many buddhas, blessed ones, as dwell, equal in number to the finest atoms of immeasurable and countless buddhafields, all came in an instant, a moment, a second, to the buddhafield of the middle world of four continents.

Then those tathāgatas, Akṣobhya and the rest, in order each to rejoice in the conduct by mantra of the Blessed Avalokiteśvara in this Later Tantra of the great king of ritual manuals, for the sake of protection, defense and safeguarding, for the sake of exhausting all karmic obscurations, and for the sake of the accomplishment of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, spoke these words of the dhāraṇī mantra, accomplished by the power of merit:

namo ratnatrayāya nama akṣobhyāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya tadyathā kaṃkani kaṃkani rocani rocani troṭani troṭani trāsani trāsani pratihana pratihana sarvva karmma paraṃ parāṇi svāhā

namo ratnatrayāya namaścaṇḍasūryāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya tadyathā candre mati candre karṇe milā milā buddha adhiṣṭhite sili sili dharmma adhiṣṭhite kili kili saṃgha adhiṣṭhite svāhā

Any son or daughter of good family who holds the name of this tathāgata, and who always, without interruption, recites it for an eon and keeps it in mind, will always live for forty thousand eons. He will remember his former births, and he will attain the unforgetting awakening mind.

namo ratnatrayāya namaḥ puṣpe ketave tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya tadyathā puṣpe puṣpe puṣpe puṣpe puṣpe puṣpe supuṣpe svāhā

Having recited this dhāraṇī twenty-one times over flowers, and having acted in accordance with the rite and with the proper perception, one should scatter them upon a stūpa of the Tathāgata. All one's wishes will be completely fulfilled, and all karmic obscurations will be exhausted.

namo ratnatrayāya namaḥ sarva nivarṇa viṣkaṃbhine tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya tadyathā sphuṭa sphuṭa sphuṭandu me sarva pāpāni sarva buddha satye dharma satyena saṃgha satyena indra satyena varuṇa satyena ye loka satyena virṇa satyena satya sacanena sphuṭantu sarva pāpāni sarva buddha adhiṣṭhānena svāhā

In twenty-one nights one exhausts all karma. Doing it for three days and nights, applying it six times, one will certainly exhaust the acts of immediate retribution.

namo ratnatrayāya namo vairocanāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya nama ākāśagarbhāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya kala kala kili kili huru huru vairocana rasmi sañcodide āgaccha ārya ākāśagarbha mahākāruṇika pūrāya śubaṃ darśaya buddha piṣaya racaracara ciri ciri svāhā

This is the dhāraṇī called the Heart of Vairocana, which is accomplished simply by reciting it. It subdues fears, adversities, poison, persistent poison, sorcery, kings, bandits and the like. Wherever it is kept written down, or for whoever wears it on the head or on the arm, no harms and no contagious diseases will arise. By reciting it constantly, one attains the stainless samādhi.

name ratnatrayāya namo varocanāya tathāgatāya nama ākāśagarbhāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya mahākāruṇikāya tadyathā vajrambu vajrambu vajradhvaje śūnyatāpradeśe vairocanagarbhe sañca indriya śodhane svāhā

The rite: by reciting it constantly, one attains the state of the noble Perfection of Wisdom. One becomes hard to overcome for all māras, all opponents, all enemies, obstructors, and all who lead astray. Likewise, whoever writes it down and wears it on the arm also has these qualities.

namo ratnatrayāya namaḥ sarva durgati pariśodhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya tadyathā śodhane śodhane sarva pāpaṃ viśodhane śuddhe viśuddhe sarva karmma āvaraṇi viśuddhe svāhā

This is the rite of this dhāraṇī: by reciting it constantly, one is freed from all evil deeds. Through the blessing of the buddhas, one will remember one's former births for four lifetimes. Until one finally reaches the seat of awakening, one's roots of virtue will never be used up.

namo ratnatrayāya namo bhagavati āryaprajñāpāramitāyai oṃ śruti smṛti vijaye svāhā

By retaining this, one retains the Perfection of Wisdom. Its rite is this: set out a volume of the noble Perfection of Wisdom, and before it smear a maṇḍala with the dung of a tawny cow that has not fallen to the ground. Fasting for a day and a night, make vast offerings in that place, offer lamps of cow's butter, and, keeping in mind the task to be done, one should recite it. Having spread kuśa grass right there, one sees the golden-colored body of the Tathāgata, and he teaches this person in accordance with the right view. One should recite it aloud at dawn, or else during the night itself. One should cultivate the recollection of the Buddha.

This is the rite of this dhāraṇī: keeping it in mind for one night and reciting it constantly, even obscurations accumulated over a thousand eons will be exhausted. It becomes a root of virtue gathered by a thousand buddhas. One turns back from a thousand eons of saṃsāra. Changing one's birth, one is born among the gods. One is born into kingship among humans, or in pure buddhafields. By reciting it for twenty-one days, one sees whatever dream one wishes. This is the dhāraṇī called the Thousand Turnings. It is of great benefit. One should read the sūtra that the bodhisattva proclaimed, and always keep it in mind.

namo ratnatrayāya namo buddhāya namo dharmāya nama saṃghāya namaḥ ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya svetāya svetābhujāya dvādaśabhujāya ehi ehi bhagavāna ārya avalokiteśvarāya buddha buddha buddha ārya manusmara buddha manusmara dharmma satya manusmara saṃgha satya manusmara tadyathā natu natu kiṇi kiṇi turu turu bhyo bhyo

kuru kuru sarva sarvaṃ me sādhayaṃ hiri miri ṭiṭi nini mama sabarivārasya sidhyantu mantra padā svāhā

Then the Tathāgata Amitābha, having spoken this dhāraṇī, said this to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara: This root vidyā dhāraṇī of the bodhisattvas is accomplished simply by reciting it; even without prior practice, its rites take effect. On the day of the full moon, one who keeps the poṣadha may also fast for a day and a night. In the presence of Avalokiteśvara, kindle a fire with wood of the bodhi tree and make a fire offering of eight thousand black sesame seeds. If one does likewise for seven days, once a day or in three sessions, a king or a king's minister comes under one's power. Fasting for three nights, make a fire offering of eight thousand white mustard seeds. For a fortnight or a month, for the sake of the land, one should go to the tops of seven anthills, climb each one in turn, and recite from morning until afternoon. One is freed from the acts of immediate retribution. If one wants a son, make a fire offering of milk, and a boy endowed with all the marks in perfect completeness will be born. With this very dhāraṇī one protects oneself and puts harmful grahas to flight, whether by performing the rite or by binding it into substances as an amulet. Or else all bandits come under one's power. One who recites it constantly and without interruption will amass wealth and will also be victorious over enemies.

Then the Tathāgata Amitābha again spoke, in the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, these words of the secret mantra of the dhāraṇī:

namo budadhāya namo dharmāya namaḥ saṃghāya tadyathā hulu hulu vimale nirmale śodhani kācati mirpaṭala sarvva nirogaḥ vinaśanicchadani cchadani vātasamutṭhitaṃ vātasamutiṣṭhitaṃ śleṣma sannipātasamutṭhitaṃ sarvva nāśāni ārya avalokiteśvarasya tejana nasyantu akṣirogaḥ svāhā

This is the rite of this dhāraṇī: having made a maṇḍala in the presence of the Blessed One and remaining out of sight, one should consecrate one's hand or kuśa grass with eight hundred recitations and stroke the eyes with it. Even the blind will regain their sight. If one keeps it constantly in mind for six months, eye disease will not arise.

Then the Tathāgata Śākyamuni, having looked well upon the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara and the great assembly dwelling on Potalaka, said to the bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta: Son of good family, these words of the accomplished dhāraṇī mantra, declared in this Later Tantra by the king of ritual manuals, were spoken by the buddhas of the past. The practitioner of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, whether monk, nun, layman or laywoman, should always tie a knot in the corner of the Dharma robe or in the hem of the garment. Whoever practices the Blessed Mother Tārā, having recited it once, wears it on the garment with three knots, whether wishing that enemies come under power, wishing that all the vicious be kept far off, wishing to realize all siddhis, wishing to fulfill all aims, wishing to enter the king's palace, or wishing to vanquish the hostile, for whatever reason it may be; and likewise one of the bodhisattva family, engaged in accomplishing all aims, keeps it. Here the words of the dhāraṇī mantra accomplished in the mind are these:

namo ratnatrayāya namo amitābhāya tathāgatāya arhate samyaksaṃbuddhāya namaḥ ārya avalokiteśvarāya bodhisatvāya mahāsatvāya nama ārya mahāsthāmapraptāya bodhisatvā vāmanetrānnama syāmitānnamaḥ syāmivāmane piśāci parṇaśavari parṇaśavari piśāca bhagavati pāśahasta parśudharaṇi yāni kāni chchata bhayani utpatyante yakṣaśca ritāyo yākaścita mahāvādyo ye kocita upadravī ye kecita ārya vakśa ye kecita upasarga a uvasarga sambhadhava atpatyante sarvvaṇitāne sarvvāṃstaṃ sarvete vālatadhana utpatyantane paṇḍita anena satyena satyavākena ibhiḥ paṇḍita adhiṣṭhatairmantravarairmama rakṣiṃ kuru paritraṇaṃ kuru parigrahaṃ kuru paripālanaṃ kuru svasti yanaṃ kuru daṇḍapariharaṃ kuru viṣapariharaṃ kuru viṣadbuṣaṇaṃ kuru viṣanāśanaṃ kuru tadyathā amrite asvatargemā mara mara sama prasama upasama tunu vitunu tule tumule mama sarva satvānāñca rakṣaṃ kuru svāhā

This is the dhāraṇī called Parṇaśabarī. Through recitation and fire offering, it destroys all diseases, all grahas and all harms. For instance, when people are afflicted by an epidemic, kindle a fire of śamī wood kindling and make a fire offering of eight thousand full oblations in three sessions, as far as one is able. Having made offerings to the Blessed One, noble Avalokiteśvara, one should do so to Parṇaśabarī as well. By performing the rite in this way, all harms are destroyed.

For an affliction of cattle, make a fire offering with cattle hair and bones, and it will be pacified. For all diseases of buffaloes, make a fire offering with their hair and bones for seven days, and it will be pacified. For harm from the lunar mansions, make a fire offering of milk for seven days. One who wishes to realize all siddhis, and for harms, for seven days: a fire offering of khadira powder. For headache, recite over fragrant flowers, take them up, and put them into the fire, and one returns to one's natural state. For fever, tie on a cord, and one returns to one's natural state; one should also eat it and make a fire offering. For a graha, make an effigy of dough and recite seven times, and after seven days one will be freed. For pain in the eyes, make a fire offering with eye ointment, and in seven days one is freed.

One who wishes for pacification should make a fire offering of dūrvā grass, and pacification will come. One who wishes for increase should make a fire offering of mustard seed, and there will be increase. For victory, make a fire offering of sweet flag, and one will be victorious. Make an effigy of salt and make a fire offering, and it comes under one's power. For one seized by a snake's fangs, there is the rite with leafy twigs. For what arises from snakes, in seven days one brings it under control. For an affliction by bhūtas and piśācas, strike with mustard seed recited over twenty times, and they go back to their own place. By constant recitation, all people become pleased. On entering the king's palace, if one recites it twenty-one times over one's face, whoever one sees comes under one's power. For all rites of fire offering, perform the fire offering for seven days. In short, all harms will be destroyed. By a fire offering of jasmine flowers one performs all rites. For all rites, first make a fire offering of full oblations. For all rites, it is said, perform this very rite. It is to be done by one who keeps the poṣadha.

Holding all beings in mind, one should consecrate an earthen bowl and a sellaka with eight hundred recitations, and a young girl should tie eight hundred knots. Then, having washed it with scented water, place it on a stick and tie it to the person's head. Likewise, when buffaloes, goats and livestock are harmed by thieves, tie it to their horns. Fill a vase with water, have one who is pure consecrate it with eight hundred recitations, and tie it to the sick person's waist, and he will return to his natural state. For houses afflicted by brahmarākṣasas and piśācas, make a fire offering and offer torma as far as one is able.

Thus it was spoken. This is the dhāraṇī called Parṇaśabarī, spoken in the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, and it is also the sūtra proclaimed by the bodhisattva.

Again, at that time, all the buddhas, the blessed ones, stretched out their right hands, stroked the crown of the head of the bodhisattva great being, noble Avalokiteśvara, and said this: Son of good family, there is a dhāraṇī called the Jewel Garland. All the buddhas, rejoicing, have declared that it is accomplished by reciting it. For protection and defense in that later great king of ritual manuals, and for the sake of proclaiming it, we set it, in the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā, always to bring about the siddhi of the practitioner of the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā. The wise one does so having written it on any auspicious date.

Then the Tathāgata Śākyamuni spoke these words of mantra:

namo buddhāya namo dharmāya namaḥ saṃghāya namaḥ saptānāṃ samyaksaṃbuddhākoṭīnāṃ namo metreya pramukhānāṃ sarva buddha bodhisatvānāṃ namaḥ samyaggatānāṃ namaḥ samyakpratipannānāṃ namo arhatāṃ namo nāgāmīnāṃ namaḥ sakridāgāmīnāṃ namaḥ śrotāpanmānāṃ namo arhate mardhvatu aparājetahṛdayaṃ mavartayiṣyami samyaksaṃbuddha bhāṣita manumodataṃ devaganai sarva karma karaṃ śubhaṃ papitrañca vā maṃgalyaṃ dhanyaṃ śubhya karaṃ śubhaṃ rākṣo ghna sarva satvānāṃ devañca aparājitā hṛdayaṃ māvartami sarva pāpa praśamānāṃ sarva artha sādhanāṃ dhanyaṃ sarva graha vināśanāṃ nityaṃ jaya kari hyeṣa śakrasye va aparājita paṣa kritye nāśane ceva rājā agni ripu nāśanī kritya karmāṇi vetaḍo duḥsvapha duḥsvapnā vi atha sputana deva dānava gandharva yakṣa rākṣasa pannāga rakṣaṃ kurvantu me nityaṃ samānta ca tejanaṃ ehikā dritīyaka jvarā tritīyakṣa caturthakebhyo rakṣayaṃ viṣama jvara karmāṇi viṣabhuktaṃ garaṃ caiva bhyojye varjayiṣyati yasya vānabhavata garbho hayante yasya dākaraka ratnamāla iyaṃ teṣāṃ kṣipra mamavahate jāyamartha kāmo lavatarthe śrīkāmo labhate śrīyaṃ vithate raṇa saṃgrahe kṣipramāvāte japaṃ atra vityaṃ pravakṣāmi ratnamālati viprutaṃ tavatā lokanātha hri driṣṭa satvānupadrutāṃ tadyathā oṃ dhanakari vipulakari yaśakari viddhakari ayuntati alakṣiprasamani dhaṃnarvānyavinyavivardhani vaśrīkari sarva graha nakṣatra vaśa vartinime thājanani sutrajanani varivāra vadhyani āyundani prītikāri jambhani stambhani amoha śakti kāñcanamāla graha saumya karaṇi sarva kālikālāhā vigraha vivāda praśamani parcatra nivāraṇi parasainya stambhāni citta nirmalīkarṇi sarva pāpraśamani sarva kilbiṣa nāśani svāhā cuṭu cuṭu tuṭu tuṭu muṭu muṭu svāhā sarva deva anujñvāte svāhā sarva nāgasaṃrakṣite svāhā oṃ niri phaṭ hana hana phaṭ daha daha phaṭ paca paca phaṭ yeṣāṃ vidhvaṣanti viśama cittāyanti hahani kakhorda kurvanti karayanti kṛtañca abhayānumodenarthava phaṭ svāhā agniṃ stambhayāmi viṣaṃ śasta udaka cauri sarva duṣṭa sarva vyādhita cantraṃ janayāmi hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā

Having bathed with leaves of the aparājitā plant, adorned with the Jewel Garland, this, which accomplishes all rites, always gives protection. Likewise, written on birch bark, or anywhere at all, it guards some against obstructors, grants supreme merit, destroys evil and defilement, gives victory in battle, in disputes, or in anything, and is auspicious. For whoever keeps this, having written down the fourfold vidyā, and for the man who always recites it, no fear will arise. It always protects all who recite it and keep it. The secret ones guard them. One who always carries this king of rites through to completion holds the vidyā, which is like the splendor blazing upon a garland adorned with jewels. Through it the grahas are destroyed, diseases do not arise, children and grandchildren increase, and one lives with a good retinue. This vidyā was given by the tathāgatas of every quarter for the sake of benefiting beings, and especially for the protection of children. The gods, kings and bodhisattvas, and likewise that Tathāgata, look upon such a one from every side in the ten directions. Wholesome aims increase, all evil deeds are utterly exhausted, and one is freed from bad dreams and from misdeeds; of this there is no doubt.

This is the dhāraṇī of the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā.

Then, in this tantra, the characteristics of the mudrās of the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara were taught. They are of five kinds, namely: the crest, the armor, the enclosure, the heart, and the near-heart. For the root vidyā, sixty are taught. For the one that accomplishes all aims, first of all there are ravita, viṇika, and those that culminate in the Buddha. It is explained as the middle fingers and thumbs pressed firmly together, with the little fingers in the shape of a needle. This is renowned as the full mudrā of noble Tārā, and it accomplishes all aims. To satisfy the vidyā, strike the two little fingers together, and it will be satisfied. For the empowerment, move both thumbs apart in the shape of a needle; this should be known as the heart. It goes by the name of praise alone. For the near-heart, the two thumbs are held thus: in a fist, inside it. The little fingers joined like the links of a chain, and the index fingers opened and made into a needle: this is the characteristic of the armor, which one should always apply to oneself. Pressing the two index fingers firmly together, winding the middle fingers around them, and making the threatening gesture in the shape of a needle: this is the sign of the crest mudrā, which one should apply when binding one's own crest.

Again, binding a fist, with the index finger opened in the shape of a needle: this is the characteristic of the recitation mudrā. Turning that very same one around, with the index finger in the shape of a needle, one should make the enclosure mudrā. Binding a fist, with the two index fingers in the shape of a chain: this sign is the mudrā that guards the samaya. Standing with the feet even, set the right foot forward and turn around with the movement of a dance; having turned the other way, apply with both hands the action of the root mudrā. At the forehead, too, it becomes the samaya mudrā of all rites.

Then it should be applied when binding mudrās, at the time of recitation, at the time of lying down to sleep, and in other ways as well. For rites against grahas and for all rites, the root mudrā should be applied.

Then again the Blessed One, the Tathāgata Śākyamuni, out of affection for Avalokiteśvara, taught in the Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā the binding of mudrās for the sake of practicing the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā:

Here these are to be properly applied:
for easing epidemics, and the homage of the wise;
and the mudrā common to the three families.
The homage mudrā that invites them is this:
on the joints of the right fingers, joint to joint, all the tips;
bind the mudrā itself in this way.
For constant supplication, the pure one's supplication mudrā is just the same: of the right-hand fingers make the joints into points, and then rejoice.
For all offerings, the pure one, always, constantly rejoicing in the offering,
joins all the nectar of the fingers fully,
the tips of the joints fully joined to the thumb at the heart.
These become the mudrās of the Victor.
The fingertips properly joined, the middle fingers and both thumbs, with the mudrā that changes nowhere, recitation grants the supreme; with mental recitation it is the mudrā.

Then again all those blessed ones, while showing the signs of departing to their own buddhafields, made the sign of rising once more. Then the entire assembly, those on the ground and those dwelling in the sky, their minds deeply stirred, were frightened as this whole earth shook of itself; a rain of flowers fell, and ten million bhūtas moving through the sky thoroughly tamed the vicious ones who roam everywhere.

Then again the bodhisattva Mahāsthāmaprāpta asked the Tathāgata Śākyamuni, "Blessed One, what is the name of this Dharma discourse?"

The Blessed One said, "Son of good family, therefore keep it as Ūrdhvajaṭā. Keep it also as The King of Ritual Manuals. Keep it also as The Questions of Avalokiteśvara. Keep it also as The Sūtra on the Conduct of Vidyā and Secret Mantra. Keep it also as The Vast Chapters of the Great King of Ritual Manuals. Keep it also as The Conduct of Skillful Means."

Then the bodhisattva Maitreya said this: "Blessed One, with how many roots of virtue will they be endowed? By how many qualities are they blessed?"

"Maitreya, therefore, whoever merely sees such a text has ten qualities: they will be protected on every side by all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, mahoragas, garuḍas, kinnaras, pretas and the rest; they will be endowed with the profound forbearance of a mind equal to the dhāraṇī; as long as they remain on the ground of abiding in wholesome qualities, they will copy it; having written it, they will keep it; having made it into a volume, they will worship it; they will have long life and freedom from illness, sovereignty, and perfect happiness; and they will go to the good destinies. With its many benefits and its great benefits, this Dharma discourse, blessed together with the gods, this gathering of vidyās and great mantras that has gone beyond saṃsāra, which I too have blessed, will bring rebirth in the higher realms, for happiness through the lunar mansions, the nights and days, the months and years. The ten courses of wholesome action and renown will increase and be perfected. This holds for those who keep the Ūrdhvajaṭā, whether they stay in a household or have gone forth."

When he had spoken thus, the entire assembly, and the world with its gods, humans, asuras and gandharvas, rejoiced in the Blessed One with their minds as well, and delighted in what the Blessed One had said.

The Later Tantra of Ūrdhvajaṭā is complete.

This text, the personal copy of the great Lord Atiśa, was brought from Radreng with great hardship, and the Śākya monk Rinchen Drup completed its translation on the fifteenth day of the Horse month, the month of the Great Miracle, in an intercalary year. The scribe was the Śākya monk Sönam Drup, who lived in close attendance on this great translator.

Since I did not consult a paṇḍita and found no authoritative copy or commentary,
if word or meaning may have gone astray,
I ask the learned to correct it.

Translator's Notes

• "Tārā's ship" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; the image may reflect a Sanskrit play on tārā as "she who ferries across," and the exact locale intended is uncertain. "Wisdom crown" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally. The text names the buddha of Sukhāvatī both Amitāyus and Amitābha within this passage; both are kept as written.
• The clause rendered "at its limit laid open by spreading fragrance"

• The name of the wrathful mantra, sgrol mas gnon pa, is rendered literally as "Tārā's Subjugator"; its Sanskrit form is not identified with confidence. In the list of rites, ltung ba is taken in its ritual sense of "felling" (causing to fall) rather than "transgression," and nyams dgang 'chos pa as "restoring what has declined." The syntax of the closing sentence is loose; the long list is read as the things the buddhas and bodhisattvas have taught.
• Many names in these lists cannot be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning, among them the spirit classes rendered "suckers," "oppressors," "child-spirits," "wailers," "shadow-oppressors" and "vomit-bringers," the gods "the Thunderer," "the Paralysis-Holder," "the Kuṣma-Holder," "the Green One," "the Joy-Maker" and "the Wealth-Maker," most of the rākṣasa, piśāca and nāga names given in English, and the sages "son of the Stream-Knower," "Mountain Mouse," "Side-Born" and "Māra's Arrow." The class written bram pa is unidentified and is given as "brampas." Kampoja, Amasti, Sulasti and Traṃḥgiras are given as the Tibetan spells them. "Paraśu" renders dgra sta, "axe," likely the sage Paraśurāma.
• Many of the names in these lists cannot be identified with confidence and are given by their meaning, among them most of the garuḍa, kinnara, asura and planetary names given in English, the god realms "Light of Joy," "Light of Merit," "Fine Below," "Fine Emanation" and "Total Emanation," and the later, non-standard items in the list of lunar mansions. Bheraṇḍa, Bhuruṇḍa, Maruṇḍa, Danadhāta, Māṣṭi, Riṣṭi, Biśīta, Lubha, Rotra and Adgirasā are given as the Tibetan spells them. "Upasdugu" renders nye bar sdu gu, which is unclear. In the list of lunar mansions, chu stod is the mansion Pūrvāṣāḍhā, not the earlier "Upper Waters." "Maitra" renders byams pa as the name of a celestial body.
• Many names in these lists of houses, yakṣiṇīs and piśācīs cannot be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning; Elā and Talala are given as the Tibetan spells them. The "houses" are the astrological mansions, beginning with the twelve signs of the zodiac.
• The arjaka is a plant whose blossom splits into pieces; it is the stock simile for a head bursting as punishment for breaking a pledge. Several items in the lists of seven and eight qualities run together in the Tibetan, and the count of items is not cleanly marked; they are translated as they stand. The phrase "overpowering the continuum of awakening" (byang chub kyi rgyud gnon par byed pa) is unclear.
• The phrase rendered "they should also be practiced as a cause for the awakening of experience" (nyams sad pa'i rgyur) is uncertain; nyams sad can also mean testing or examining one's practice. In "we shall regard as equal to ourselves" (mtshungs par brtag par bgyi), the sense of the promise to the kings is not fully clear; it may mean that the assembled beings will look after them impartially. The chapter colophon is rendered with its nested titles in English order.
• The text introducing the sandalwood, saffron and camphor offering reads gdug pa'i rig sngags ("malicious vidyā-mantra"); the context of an incense offering makes the reading bdug pa'i ("incense") evident, and it has been translated so. The sentence on applying the mudrā to the root vidyā-mantra is terse and its exact construction is uncertain. "Fragrant herbs" renders rgya spos, an aromatic plant whose identification is unsure. The final sentence calls the preceding flower mantra an "incense mantra," as the Tibetan has it.
• The verse beginning "My son, for your benefit, the utmost of the fierce" is obscure in its syntax; the rendering follows the Tibetan word by word as far as possible. The "Six-Faced One, a limb of Tārā" (zhal drug pa) could not be securely identified with a Sanskrit name. The text reads dpang du byed ("makes witnesses") of the bhūtas; the common phrase dbang du byed ("brings under control") fits the context and has been translated. The sentence on constant recitation ("they will not turn to loving-kindness ... neither release nor binding") is terse and its subject is uncertain. Keśinī renders skra can ma; the second name, nye bar spyod pa'i skra can ma, may correspond to Upakeśinī but is rendered literally. "She of the Stalk" (sdong bu can) could not be identified and is translated literally.

• Several names of vidyās here are Tibetan descriptive renderings that could not be confidently matched to Sanskrit forms and are translated literally: Tārā Endowed with Intention, the Radiant One, Great Diligence, the Manifold One, the Great Glorious Lady. "The Eye" (spyan) may refer to the goddess Locanā. The lines "That very protection on which beings rely / is well marked with the signs of the world" render an obscure couplet (srung ba ltos 'gro). The "Veda of the Guardian of Existence" (srid srung gi rig byed) is unidentified. The verse names "the Four Sisters," while the following mantra invokes three names.
• "Śiva tantra" renders zhi ba'i rgyud, taking zhi ba as the standard rendering of Śiva, since the preceding mantra invokes Maheśvara. The name of the maṇḍala, rendered "the Array of Ornaments of the Jewel Essence in the Hand" (phyag na rin po che'i snying po rgyan bkod pa), is uncertain in its construction. The opening sentence of that paragraph has no main verb in the Tibetan; "there appeared" is supplied from the sense. "The tantra that names the garuḍa" renders mkha' lding mngon par brjod rgyud, which may refer to a garuḍa Abhidhāna tantra.
• The vocative "O being, O great being" is followed by a sentence in the indicative ("Avalokiteśvara spoke the maṇḍala rite"); it may stand for a request ("please speak") in the underlying Sanskrit, but it is rendered as written. "□□□□□" (Rāhu) in the list of months is read as □□□□□□, the month of Vaiśākha, which the context of month names requires. "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" is read as □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, "adorned with four gateways."
• "Coarse grain" renders □□□□□□□□□, literally "great broth," whose exact sense here is uncertain. "Barley" renders □□□□□□□, perhaps barley of the kind used for beer; uncertain. The goddess □□□□□□ ("the Steadfast One") paired with Bhṛkuṭī could not be identified with confidence, nor could several of the bodhisattva names (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) or □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□; these are translated literally. "Two or three" in the first sentence is taken as the number of painters.
• The pratyekabuddha names □□□□□□ and □□□□□□□ are given as Gagana and, literally, "Completely," since the second could not be identified. The door guardians □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("Going Beyond the World") and □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("Victor over the Unvanquished"), and the five Pure Abode bodhisattvas, could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally. □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is read as □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ ("gazing at the king of wrathful ones"), which the following phrase requires. "The Lord of Flower Kings" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is probably the same Tathāgata later called Saṃkusumitarāja.
• "With a vajra in his hand" for Mahābrahmā (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is rendered literally; it is an unusual attribute and might instead be a stray mention of Vajrapāṇi. Among the Four Great Kings' gods, □□□□□□□□□□□□ ("the Two-Lute ones") could not be identified and is translated literally. The god "who holds a noose in his hand" in the west is presumably Varuṇa. The closing "These are the Blessed One's" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is terse and rendered as it stands.
• "The bull among the naked tīrthikas" is presumably the Jain founder (Ṛṣabha or Mahāvīra); the text gives no name. The "lord of the rākṣasas of Laṅkā" is likewise left unnamed in the Tibetan. In the east the text names a triangular maṇḍala but no emblem within it.
• "The ways of the village" renders the Tibetan for grāmyadharma, that is, sexual intercourse; the young disciples are to be those not yet sexually experienced. "Aśoka coils," "filled pastries" and "garbhatkvā cakes" render names of Indian confections whose exact identity is uncertain; garbhatkvā is kept as the Tibetan spells it. "Tagara" for rgya spos is a probable identification. "With their minds set on the Victor" renders rgyal bar dgongs pa, which could also mean "intent on victory."
• "The practitioner should first lead them in before the Blessed Lady" renders bcom ldan 'das ma sgrub pa pos, which is compressed; the Blessed Lady is the goddess of this tantra, Tārā. "Deeds of immediate retribution" are the five inexpiable acts (ānantarya). "Regarding it just like the consecration of a king" renders sems bzhin pas, which is terse.

• "The master's three accomplishments" renders slob dpon gyi sgrub pa gsum, which is not explained here. Kaṭake is a fierce-rite substance not identified with certainty, possibly a pungent plant (kaṭuka); kept as spelled. The sentence on low-caste entrants is compressed and its construction is uncertain in detail. "Who later perform the fire rite" renders phyi nas me'i bya ba mdzad pa literally.

• Several trees named here cannot be identified with confidence and are kept as the Tibetan spells them: the haḍpya tree and the bodeci tree. Pa ṭa is taken as vaṭa, the banyan. "A place protected by Brahmā" and "a nāga tree" are literal renderings of tshangs pas bskyangs pa and klu shing. "In the west, apart from the order of entry" renders a terse phrase, presumably meaning that the western gate, used for entry, receives no emblem. The verse's 'phan is read as phan, "benefit."

• The "hero's price" (Skt. likely vīrakraya) is explained in the verses: paying the craftsman's first asking price without haggling. "Seize it!" renders 'dzin du chu gcig, which is obscure as written. "The fortnight of miracles" is the bright fortnight of the month commemorating the Buddha's miracles at Śrāvastī. Dog pa is taken as the cotton thread.

• "The accomplishment of the ritual dagger" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ as written; since □□□□□ can also mean "to fly," the line may instead refer to the accomplishment of flight (sky-travel), which would suit the highest grade of cloth painting. In "even Śakra and the other lords of bliss," the phrase "lords of bliss" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is uncertain and may name a further deity. "Even" (□□□□□□) is read as □□□□□.

• The bodhisattva on the eighth lotus of the left side, □□□□□□□□, could not be identified with confidence and is translated by meaning as "Fair Eyes." The object Vajrapāṇi holds in his right hand, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, is unclear; it seems to be a plant or fruit name and is translated literally. The flower names in the verse are romanized as the Tibetan spells them.

• Several names could not be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning: the eighth tathāgata (here "Lord Who Utterly Pacifies All Suffering"), and the pratyekabuddhas "Fragrant One" and "White One"; "Sika" is kept as spelled. The phrase □□□□ in the description of the second mountain is unclear and is taken as "likewise." The figure kneeling below the first mountain with a censer is not named in the Tibetan; it is presumably the practitioner or donor.

• "Using the colors taught before" reads the unclear □□□□□ as □□□□□ ("color"). The epithet in the closing title, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, is rendered "of the Upswept Locks" (Skt. Ūrdhvajaṭā, as in the Sanskrit title of the text). "With a crown bearing an auspicious emblem at its center" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, which may refer to a svastika.

• The text announces eight buddhas but names only seven. The first, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, is identified as Saṃkusumitarāja; it may be the same buddha called Saṃkusumitarājendra in the first painting. "Stainless," among the gods of the form realm, is translated by meaning because the Sanskrit name could not be fixed with confidence. Here □□□□□□□□□□ means Avalokiteśvara's "close retinue," not the name Upāli.

• The text reads "right covering" (gyogs) where the parallel "left side" (zhogs) plainly calls for "right side"; translated accordingly. The verse lists both Kubera (lus ngan) and Dhanada, normally two names for the same god; both are kept as the text has them. "The Lion, the Seizer" (seng ge 'phrog byed) is uncertain: it may name two classes of beings or a single figure, and has been rendered literally. After the request, the Tibetan has no explicit verb of speaking for the Blessed One; "said" is supplied from context. The name "Ārya Tārā shin tu rgyas pa" has been translated by meaning ("the Fully Flourishing"), as its Sanskrit form cannot be identified with confidence.

• The six Tārā names (dbus legs ma, legs spyod ma, mtshan legs ma, lho chung ma, legs gnas ma, nye bar 'dud pa) are translated by meaning, as their Sanskrit forms cannot be identified with confidence. "At a hero's price" (dpa' bo'i rin) translates the Tibetan literally; it is likely a stock expression for buying the material at whatever price is asked, without bargaining. The word rendered "material" (dog pa) is uncertain; the following weight measure suggests yarn to be woven. The description of Samantabhadra holds both a jewel and a lotus in the left hand, and the text places him on the right here though on the left in the previous rite; translated as it stands.

• In the verse, "all the deities" reads lha for the written lta ("views"), which makes little sense in context and is evidently a scribal slip. The phrase rendered "bowing with body and knees" (lus dang pus mo'i lha nga 'dud pa) is somewhat obscure in the Tibetan. "Ūrdhvajaṭā" (ral pa gyen brdzes, "with upswept locks") follows the Sanskrit of the text's own title.

• The buddha of Sukhāvatī is named here me tog yang dag par skyes pa'i dbang gis rgyal po, not Amitābha; its Sanskrit form cannot be identified with confidence, so it is translated by meaning ("King Mighty through Perfectly Arisen Flowers").

• Several plant names are given in Tibetan transliteration of Sanskrit; chidhrika and kabuka could not be identified with confidence and are given as written. The description of the chidhrika as coming "from the back of an elephant" and appearing when thunder roars is translated literally; it may refer to a mushroom.

• "The substances of accomplishment they hold out" renders □□□□ a passage whose Tibetan reads "eating" (bza') where washing or rubbing is evidently meant; the sense of the hygiene sequence is somewhat uncertain.

• The Tibetan of this piece appears to have been displaced in transmission: the sentence "In accordance with one's intention ... one should take it up and wash" sits inside the narrative of the food clouds, and the verse on eating breaks off at "All food and," after which the prose resumes the story of the food raining down. The translation keeps the order of the Tibetan as it stands.

• "Scented water" renders dri chu; in some tantric rites the term means urine, but here it is mixed with jasmine flowers as water for the feet. "The lordship of the three bodhisattvas" is a literal rendering of an unclear phrase. In the verse, "food without leavings" renders the obscure sgum med.

• The plant names are given as transliterated in the Tibetan; pāṭī and sāṭala may stand for pāṭalī and pāṭala, but are left as written. "A hut of leaves of the Sage" renders thub pa'i lo ma'i spyil po literally; thub pa'i lo ma may instead be a plant name (the "muni" tree). "The Victor's followers and Śiva's followers" renders rgyal ba can and zhi ba can, which seem to mean devotees of the Jina and Śaivas; this is uncertain. In "the sage should recite this mantra," thub pa seems to refer to the practitioner as an ascetic rather than to the Buddha. In the list of dangers, ltung ba is taken as "falling," not "transgression," and sdug bsngal nye bar 'gags pa as "choked by suffering." "Watch" renders thun as a period of time, not ritual substances.

• Two of the eight pratyekabuddha names ('dod pa and nye ba'i 'dod pa) could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally as Desire and Near Desire; the Tibetan also gives mu khyud (Nemi) twice, which is kept as written. The flower names dhānuskārika, parṣika and indravara, and the jewel madaka, are given as transliterated in the Tibetan. "The seventh supreme Sage" refers to Śākyamuni as the seventh of the buddhas of the past. The line rendered "Having gone, by night or at other times" (rab sngags 'gro ba mtshan sogs kyi) is obscure, and the rendering is tentative. The closing verses on cleansing with earth after relieving oneself are terse, and the counts are given as the Tibetan states them.

• Several place names are identified from their Tibetan renderings: skal ldan shing rta as the Bhagīrathī (Ganges), zla ba'i cha as the Candrabhāgā, dpal gyi ri as Śrīparvata, 'bras phung as Dhānyakaṭaka, me tog as Kusuma(pura), bcom brlag as Mathurā, and 'phags rgyal as Ujjayinī. Rgya yul is taken as China and mang yul is kept as the Tibetan place name Mangyul; both identifications are uncertain. Sāpakṣe and Vakṣu follow the Tibetan spelling, and Sāpakṣe probably stands for Sāṃkāśya, the site of the descent from the gods. "Where the twice-born castes have left" renders gnyis skyes rigs kyis dor ba literally, and its sense is unclear. The verses on action and fruit are very terse and are rendered closely. In the last couplet 'dud pa ("bowing") is read as 'dod pa ("eagerness"), which fits the context.

• "The aim of the feet" renders rkang pa'i don literally; it may refer to the siddhi of swift-footedness, but this is uncertain. The trees for rosary beads are given as the text names them: dbang po'i shing is rendered "the Indra tree," and bo de tse, which may stand for a bodhi-seed tree, is kept as transliterated, "bodetse." The verbs in the list of rosary rites (sbyang ba, dbugs pa, blang ba, rgyu ba) are technical and are rendered as purifying, enlivening, taking and setting in motion.

• "With three or two marker beads" renders phyi mo gsum mam gnyis, whose exact sense in stringing the rosary is uncertain. Intrakṣa and musāra follow the Tibetan spelling. "Those like the rhinoceros" refers to pratyekabuddhas. "The seventh Sage" is Śākyamuni, as the seventh buddha of the past. The line "Likewise both will go" (de bzhin gnyis ka 'gro bar 'gyur) is terse and is rendered as written. "Of minerals" renders khams as mineral substances.

• The term rendered "pacifying" (□□□□□□□) is here clearly the class of pacifying rites, paired with increasing and fierce rites, not a name. The line about the sticks (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is obscure; "the proper form of the sticks" is a contextual rendering. "By a solitary tree" reads

□□□□□□□□□□□ as an evident slip for □□□□□□□□□□□, since "a single teaching" makes no sense in a list of ritual sites. □□□□ is taken as the plakṣa fig tree. Several verse lines on fanning and kindling the fire are terse; the renderings follow the most natural sense of the ritual sequence.

• Several verse lines are terse and their sense is reconstructed from the ritual context, notably "by firm establishment both remain" and "the other rites that are done", where a negative ("are not to be done") may be intended. "The one with tresses" (□□□□□□□□) is taken as the name of a mudrā taught earlier in the text. "Rising aloft" (□□□) is uncertain; it may refer to the power of flight.

• The phrase rendered "free of discursive thought" (□□□□□□□□□) is uncertain in this context, as is "giving away one's goods in full measure" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, literally "fully weighing out substances"), taken here as an antidote to avarice.

• "Sauvīra eye ointment" reads □□□□□□□□□□□□□ as a calque of sauvīra (antimony); "bought at the hero's price" renders the ritual stipulation that materials be bought without haggling. "The vināyakas" interprets □□□□□□□□□□□□□, which could also mean "the Guide" (a buddha). Several phrases are obscure: "seizes six shares" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), "a one-year-old" (□□□□□□□□□□□), "the gesture of teaching" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), and "if he wishes for release" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), which context might suggest is a slip for a summoning or subjugating rite. □□□□ here is sandalwood, not a name.

• The passage on obstructors, the thumb at the heart, and the mudrā is repeated in the Tibetan and is translated as it stands. Several items are uncertain: "adhibalaja" and "kāba" are transliterated plant names not identified with confidence; "for all the rites in which flowers of every kind are desired" and "water carried at will" render obscure phrases literally. □□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken here in its general sense, "the royal palace", rather than the city Rājagṛha, since the rite concerns success in speech at court. The request of Avalokiteśvara (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) could also be read "for the sake of practice, Blessed One". "Mahāśvetā" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□, "the Great White One".

• "Milk in thirty-two portions" renders a terse phrase (literally "milk should be made to go into thirty-two"); the exact measure intended is unclear. The phrase "holding it up for the sake of worship" in the description of the painting is equally terse, and the object held is not named. The names of the samādhi and mantra ("Endowed with Vastness") and of the vidyā king ("One-Footed") are translated by meaning.

• The weights for the fragrances are given as "zho or srang," Tibetan units of weight, rendered here as "measures." "Indian incense" renders rgya spos, and "leafy rumru" renders a plant name that I cannot identify with confidence. The meaning of the sign that the vidyādhara "will move about in three ways" is unclear.

• Several ingredients are hard to identify: "bushel-tsé" is a Tibetan plant name kept in phonetics; "śrīveṣṭaka" and "sarjarasa resin" are interpretations of dpal btags pa and sra rtsi, and "gum" renders pog. The phrase about the twelve bowls is terse; it seems to mean twelve bowls in all, of curd and honey together with ten of milk porridge. "With a brush" renders the obscure gnur bas.

• "Basket" renders the Sanskrit word caṃgauṭaka (caṅgoṭaka) written in Tibetan letters. "Padmāvataṃsaka" interprets "the Tathāgata, the lotus Avataṃsaka"; the identification of this buddha is uncertain. "Keeps all beings from going to ruin" renders a terse phrase, literally "makes all beings not go." "Wearing a white sacred thread" takes mchod phyir thogs as the brahmanical cord (yajñopavīta).

• "Remaining wholly absorbed even outside the proper times" renders an obscure phrase (dus ma yin par gzhol long la gnas pas); its exact sense is uncertain. The vidyā king's name here (Who Causes All Beings to Follow) differs from the name given when it was introduced in the previous piece (Who Follows All Kings of Vidyās); both are rendered as the Tibetan has them. The "fortnight of miracles" is the waxing half of the first month of the year, associated with the Buddha's miracles at Śrāvastī.

• The list of buddhas to be drawn above Avalokiteśvara contains thirteen names although the text says twelve; it is translated as it stands. The buddha rendered "Ever Melodious" could not be identified with confidence and is translated literally. "Having had such a painting made" reads the written "drir bcug" as "bris su bcug" or "bri ru bcug". The substances "cekata" (tse ka ta) and "resin incense" (sra rtsi pog) are uncertain identifications.

• A volume marker of the Kangyur edition ("Here is volume Tsha of the Collection of Tantras") stands after the first colophon; it belongs to the printed edition, not the text, and is not read out. "Divine Flower" and "Moon herself" may be the names of yakṣiṇīs; they are translated literally. Several yakṣa generals could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally: the Son of the Secret One, the Son of Fair Gait, the Son of the Loving One, the Son of the Noble Hero, Mindful of Water, End of Victory, Trunk and Attainer of Victory. Here □□□□□□ is the yakṣa Jaya, paired with Vijaya, not the epithet of a buddha. The phrase "phyed phyed" ("each doing your share") is obscure. The repeated "'drir gzhug" is read as "have it drawn" ("bris su gzhug"). "Five resins" (thang chu lnga) is an uncertain identification.

• The paragraph addressed to the deities ("For the hundred million ... protect them!") is syntactically loose; its sense is given as closely as the Tibetan allows. □□□□□□□□□ ("lords of cattle") is taken as the Pāśupatas, the Śaiva ascetics devoted to Paśupati, which fits the offering of ash; it could also be read literally as cattle owners. □□□□ in "bringing □□□□ under one's power" is read as "the agents of punishment" (Skt. daṇḍa); this is uncertain. The phrase "he is three-eyed" (gang gi tshe mig gsum pa) is elliptical and is taken to describe Īśāna.

• Several of the birds are uncertain identifications: □□□□□□ is taken as the osprey (kurara), □□□□□ as the ruddy shelduck, and □□□□□□□□□□ as a partridge. The phrase "spoke to the Blessed One" (bcom ldan 'das la) may instead mean "within the Blessed Lady's" ritual manual. Some numbers in the lotus offerings (a million lotuses for one town, thirty thousand for five towns) are odd, but they are translated as they stand.

• The vidyā introduced as "Characterized by Light" (od dang ldan pa'i mtshan nyid) is called "Endowed with Rays" (od zer dang ldan pa) in the lines that follow and in its colophon; both titles are kept as the text gives them. In that introduction Avalokiteśvara is said to have "spoken of" (gsungs nas) the samādhi, where the parallel passages have "meditating on" it. "For twelve months" renders zla ba bcu gnyis su; it may mean twelve lunar days or twelve portions.

• The Tibetan reads literally "an effigy of an effigy of salt," apparently a dittography; it is rendered as a single salt effigy. In the rite for a woman, "in an open field" renders thang gi phyogs su, which is terse and slightly uncertain. The coins (dong tse) are given as "a thousand at a time" for stong stong; the interval (per day or per recitation) is not stated.

• In the rite of Endowed with Heroism, the painting instruction contains the unclear syllable "wang gis" (perhaps a slip for a pigment or for "in the proper manner"); it is left implicit in "one should have ... painted." "On a panel" renders 'bras bu can, evidently a calque of Sanskrit phalaka, which means both "fruit" and "board, panel." "Cow bezoar" for ba bla (gorocanā, a yellow pigment) is a probable identification.

• "Resin incense" renders sra rtsi pog, an uncertain compound. In the eye-salve rite the Tibetan reads rna ba'i mig sman, literally "eye salve of the ear"; the qualifier is obscure and is not rendered. Pālika, mixed with the nāgakesara powder, is unidentified and kept as written. "On a frame of paṭa wood ... each figure separately" renders pa Ta'i shing la so so so sor bzhag, which is unclear. The colophon of the Eleven-Syllable section names it "the great king of vidyās that bestows what one desires and seeks" rather than repeating its title.

• "Mixed with other meat" renders gzhan sha la dang bsres te literally; the sense (perhaps food given to another) is unclear. "A discharge from the private parts" for mtshan mar gdol pa is a tentative reading of an obscure phrase. In the powder recipe, pu shel tse and, in the last rite, le brgan rtsi (a dye) are unidentified and given in phonetics. The text gives eight thousand flowers and then speaks of "those one thousand and eight lotuses"; both numbers are kept as written.

• "Except for what has been set up out of mere desire" renders 'dod pas nye bar gzhag pa ma gtogs so, whose exact scope is uncertain. The opening speech after the chapter colophon is syntactically loose in the Tibetan; "I shall teach" supplies the verb implied for "the great king of vidyās called Bhṛkuṭī" (khro gnyer can). Bestowal of Fearlessness (mi 'jigs pa sbyin pa) is distinct in the Tibetan from the earlier Perfect Bestowal of Fearlessness (mi 'jigs pa rab tu sbyin pa).
• The sentence identifying Ratnaśrī with the goddess Pāṇḍaravāsinī and describing the "going and coming" of the vidyā in Amitābha's buddha field is syntactically loose in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most plausible construal as the answer to Vajrapāṇi's question. The buddha names gser kun tu snang ba, lus mdzes and rin chen rab snang could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally (All-Illuminating Gold, Beautiful Body, Jewel Radiance). The samādhi name mtha' kun tu snang ba is likewise translated by meaning.
• "The heart of the Tathāgata" (de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po) here refers to the Tathāgata's heart mantra just proclaimed, not to the doctrine of buddha-nature (tathāgatagarbha). The rākṣasas' cry "truṭatatara" is rendered as an onomatopoeic sound as the Tibetan gives it; its sense is unclear. "sgyu" in the garuḍa clause is read as their swiftness.
• The text announces eighteen vidyādhara kings but names only fourteen; the list is translated as it stands. Their names are translated by meaning, since Sanskrit equivalents could not be identified with confidence; "Sumeru" follows the standard rendering of ri rab lhun po. In the opening list, gnon po is rendered "oppressing spirits" and sman chen po "great medicine deities," both uncertain; "the gods of the earth" reads sgra ("sound") as a slip for sa ("earth"). The cloth "of no fixed size" renders tshad med, whose exact sense here is unclear. The plant names bhūtakeśī, gajāhva, śatrughnī and priyaṅgu are given in their usual Sanskrit forms.
• Several retinue figures could not be identified with certainty: gser ldan ma is rendered "the Golden One," gnam lcags ma "the Goddess of Meteoric Iron," and lha skrag pa "the Terrifier of the Gods"; rdo rje blo gros rdo rje ma is taken as two figures, Vajramati and Vajrī. The vidyādhara king lus med ("Bodiless") is given as Anaṅga, its usual Sanskrit equivalent. jambulika and svatika are left as the Tibetan transcribes them.
• Several terms are uncertain. The vidyādhara king rnam par gnon pa is translated by meaning ("Overpowerer"). "She Who Goes in Equality" renders snying po mnyam par 'gro ma, apparently the name of a heart-mantra goddess. The implement kurba (perhaps kūrca, a bundle of grass) and the "pankan" fruit (pan kan mthar byed) are left uncertain. "Cow of like stock" renders rgyud mtshungs pa'i ba, and "maṇḍalaka" renders maṇḍal dang bcas pa bza', both tentatively.
• The clause "and to all the bhūtas on the ground" is elliptical in the Tibetan; an offering to them is implied. The sentence on the second eye of the Victor and the spear of Maheśvara is loosely constructed; "the great lords of the earth" reads sa dbang phyug chen po, which could also be taken as "Maheśvaras of the earth." "The soot of the great fat" refers to lampblack from human fat, a standard ingredient in such rites. "As the Blessed Lady has commended" renders an instrumental construction whose sense is not fully clear.
• Several ritual items are uncertain. "Burn a measure of it" renders srang, a unit of weight, whose object is unstated. "The fire of the vajra" and the vidyādharas' "eight right hands" are literal renderings of unclear phrases. "Lord over the twelve lands" renders sa bcu gnyis, which may mean twelve regions or grounds; compare "lord of sixty vidyādharas" below. Phushel tsé and kyibung (skyi bung) are unidentified materials, given in phonetics. Rgya spos is taken as tagara. The thread "twisted under Puṣya" renders rgyu skar rgyal. The elephant king's name, Phurbu Sumpa, is translated as "Three Pegs" because no Sanskrit form could be identified with confidence.

• "Limb-born part" renders yan lag las skyes pa, which probably stands for Sanskrit aṅgaja and may mean the hair. Kharusta (kha ru sta) and svatika (swa ti ka) are unidentified and are given as written. Svatika may be a form of "svastika". "Rise up!" renders stod cig, which is uncertain. "Unspoiled cloth" reads mnyams pa'i ras as ma nyams pa'i ras, as in parallel passages.
• Several passages are uncertain. The subject of "they will come all together from the directions" is not stated. "Other practitioners will surely take heed" renders an obscure line, sgrub pa po can gzhan gyis nges par bsam par 'gyur. "Except for birth and the exhaustion of the defilements" is one reading of a sentence that may also mean "except for taking birth as whatever he thinks of." The repeated instruction to eat milk and barley meal and recite three hundred thousand times is translated as it stands.
• The ingredients in the medicine verse (zla bcas, lto ba, byams pa, stag 'joms pa, lag bzhi, phag gi rna ba, glang po 'bod, spyod ral) seem to be coded names of plants. They could not be identified with confidence, so they are translated literally. "Glancing in dread" renders the obscure lta ngan phyogs bzhin. "Kuñjika" is given as the Tibetan spells it. The chapter numbering moves from the sixth chapter to "the eighth" without a numbered seventh chapter. Īśāna's chapter, which closes at the start of this piece, is presumably the seventh.
• Some phrases are uncertain. "The six portions of the earth" is a literal rendering of sa'i cha drug. "A bamboo that has not been touched" renders 'od ma lhags pa. "Free of stain" reads dri mnams pas as dri ma med pas. "A cow whose calf is of the same color" renders rgyud mtshungs pa'i ba, taken in its usual ritual sense. The subject of "it will be accomplished" and "puts it in his mouth" at the end of the garuḍa chapter is not stated in the Tibetan.
• The opening clause (yi dgas dri med nyid kyi ming nas smos pa) is obscure; "Stainless" (dri med) is taken as the preta's name, but it may be an epithet or a scribal slip. "Lāñja" is unidentified, and the sentence about becoming "a king of Lāñja or a minister" is uncertain; it may instead mean that kings and ministers are affected by the rite. The cry "stod cig stong cig" makes little sense as written; it is read as "sdod cig", "Stay!". "dga' ba" in the list of dream signs is taken as the name Nanda rather than "joy". In "then he sees them" (for the ancestors) the Tibetan gives no object. The plant and substance names boḍḍaka, kāmāja and nīmala are given as spelled, since they could not be identified with confidence.
• Several lines in the opening list of minor rites are obscure: "bsud pa" is taken as "bewitched"; the line about the vulture, the "cutting water knife" and "making the fangs go in" is translated literally; "ser mo" is rendered as "a yellow substance". "pānāya", "veda" and "paṭṭaka" are given as spelled, since they could not be identified with confidence. "mchod phyir thogs" is rendered "an implement carried for worship". In the cave rite, "gtogs" is taken as "touch". "The three" (gsum po) is left as the text has it; its referent is not stated. Thags zangs ris is taken as a variant of Thags bzang ris, the asura lord Vemacitrin.
• "Varṇata" (brṇa ta) is given as spelled; its meaning here is unclear. The "month of miracles" (cho 'phrul gyi phyogs) is the month of the Buddha's great miracle at Śrāvastī, the first month in the Tibetan reckoning. "The Blessed One" is masculine in the Tibetan in the vision passage, though the Blessed Lady is probably meant. "Warm" and "smokes" are the standard signs of the effigy's success (heat, smoke, blaze); the third sign is only implied by "blazes forth".
• "Kindling sticks as before" renders snga gyi nas yam shing, read as barley and kindling sticks as in the earlier rite. The "heart of dependent origination" is the verse on dependent origination placed in stūpas. "Nandyāvarta" takes dga' ba 'khyil pa as the Tibetan rendering of that flower's name. In the eye-salve rite the Tibetan says four leaves with the fourth pressing down; this is translated as written. "White water pot" renders mchod phyir thogs, the ascetic's water vessel held by Avalokiteśvara.
• "Srotāñjana" takes rna ba'i mig sman ("ear eye salve") as a rendering of srotāñjana, in which srotas, "stream", seems to have been read as śrotra, "ear". "Hakamika" is given as spelled and is unidentified; the syllable bar before it is read as "in the interval". The phrase "This is the second. In this second" renders an abrupt and unclear transition in the Tibetan (bsgrubs pa gnyis pa'o / zhes pa gnyis pa). "Without end" renders mnyams ma zad par, which may be corrupt.

• "The binding of the liquid" renders khu ba bcing ba literally; the term is unusual, and it may stand for a protective binding such as the binding of the boundary or of the topknot (śikhābandha). "The immeasurable recitation of the rite" and "one's aims are achieved even when distracted" render terse phrases whose exact sense is uncertain. Twice the Tibetan has "the Blessed One" without the feminine ending ("one sees the Blessed One", "where the Blessed One is to be accomplished"); it is kept as written, though the second may refer to Tārā.

• "The remains of the offerings" interprets dri med, which here seems to correspond to nirmālya, the used offerings that are cleared away (the word appears in the mantra). The fire-offering substance is given in the Tibetan only as a transcribed Sanskrit word, nūlakavarti, which I cannot identify with confidence; varti suggests wicks, possibly cotton wicks. "The binding of the liquid" again renders khu ba 'ching ba literally, as in the previous passage.

• In the words to be spoken to Ekajaṭī, the second clause reads literally "and make obstructors for me"; it is taken as a request that she deal with the obstructors, most likely an abbreviated "make me free of obstructors". "At the time when the moon is seized by Rāhu" renders the Tibetan for a lunar eclipse. In the passage on Avalokiteśvara's vidyā, "three months or one month" reads mam (a slip for "or") where the text has ma.

• At the start, the Tibetan does not name what is placed in the aśvattha leaves; "the substance" supplies the evident object. "Seizes a sixth share" renders cha drug 'phrog literally; its exact reference is unclear. The plant names kumbhira, vāraṇi, ananta, betaśi, brihati, yutika, karṇikara and somarāja are given in the Tibetan as transcribed Sanskrit and are kept as written; brāhmī and sweet flag render the Tibetan tshangs ma and shu dag. Manakara is taken as makara, a crocodile-like water creature. The three named forms of Tārā (She Who Is Endowed with Eloquence, Bestower of Twofold Light, Accomplisher of All Great Rites) are translated from the Tibetan because their Sanskrit forms cannot be identified with confidence.

• Patsalaṇḍika and iguta are given in the Tibetan as transcribed Sanskrit plant names and are kept as written; iguta may stand for iṅguda. "The fortnight of miracles" renders cho 'phrul gyi phyogs, the fortnight of the Buddha's miracles at the start of the year. "The Blessed One binds the painted cloth" renders the sentence literally; its sense in context is unclear. In the gold-vessel rite, the words for the second sign (lci ba, "heavy") are taken as the ghee thickening.

• "Bring down a divinatory vision" renders pra dbab pa, the prasena rite of divination through a child seer. Several clauses are terse and their sense uncertain: the bathing of a boy and girl "until young are born in a crow's nest"; "it wears through seven layers of hide" (lpags bdun nyams par byed), apparently a further power of the recitation alongside freeing from bonds; and "likewise with a thread, with sesame and with charcoal" (srad bu can dang til dang sol ba nyid do). "Bahuputrā plant" renders bu mang po can, whose identification is not certain.

• "Lac and resin" renders sra rtsi pog, whose exact identification is uncertain. "She reveals herself, and by means of white mustard seed one becomes free" is a terse clause whose sense is uncertain. "Having placed jewels inside them" reads bcug nas for the written bcu gnas, which makes no sense here. The phrase rendered "curd rice together with the first portion" (zho zan sngon ma can) is obscure. "Four lumps of earth for a site seven cubits wide" interprets an elliptical phrase. In the healing rite the text says "the four" but names only three ingredients. "Royal tree" renders rgyal po'i yam shing, perhaps the rājavṛkṣa.

• "Curd" reads zho for the written zhe, which makes no sense in this list of offering substances. Several clauses are terse and their sense uncertain: "water empowered seven times brings everything down and brings wealth"; "a pill of refined collyrium" (zhun mkhan gyi ril bu); the closing instruction about liquor dregs given "in the case of a death, if the child does not come forth", read as referring to a stillbirth; "having gone downstream seven times" (lan bdun du mar rjes su song nas); and the sign "until the words 'I breathe out' are spoken". The "brahma tree" (tshangs ma'i yam shing) is probably the palāśa.

• The sentence about one who "expounds the Piṭaka and has been placed under guard" (sde snod smra ba yang sgo ba'i las byas pa) is obscure, and its rendering is tentative. "Dhālan" is left as written because the plant cannot be identified with confidence. The "measures" obtained in the Supreme Tārā rite translate tshal, an unclear unit. The names of the Tārā forms are translated from their Tibetan, since their Sanskrit forms cannot be fixed with confidence; Pendent Tārā renders sgrol ma 'phyang ba.

• "Bāla and kāla eight hundred times each" interprets an unclear phrase (bā la dang so so la ka la). Several results are terse and their sense uncertain: "one drives away vultures" (bya rgod sel ba); "one sports by magical display with the king's chief queen"; "it takes effect on whoever one sees first"; and "in all one's accomplishments one obtains thousands gathered together". "Essences and rejuvenating elixirs" reads the written bcu as bcud.

• Several lines of this verse are terse and their sense is uncertain. "Abiding in the kīla" renders phur bu, which could also mean the planet Jupiter (that is, at a Jupiter time). "Rohana birds" renders bya ro ha na, which may be a corrupt or unclear bird name. "Touches them" follows the evident reading reg pa for rig pa ("awareness"), which does not fit the context. In the list of omens, "a cow giving," "hundred-petaled one" (perhaps a lotus or a peacock), "eared one" and "arampa" could not be identified with confidence and are rendered literally.

• "One strays from the command of the guru and from the commitment" reads the verb as 'das pa ("transgress"); the text has bzlas pa ("recite"), which makes no sense here. Several verse lines on ritual woods and substances are terse: "pajāka," "vānatra" (written in Sanskrit in the Tibetan) and "with a delay" (bshol ldan) are uncertain, and "this observance" renders an unclear word (mug) taken to refer to the poṣadha vow. The prose passage is the formula for taking the eightfold poṣadha vow.

• "Food that is utterly without a fixed abode" renders rab tu mi gnas pa'i bza' ba literally; the intended sense (perhaps food that comes from everywhere, or that never runs out) is unclear. The names of the individual vidyās are translated from the Tibetan, since their Sanskrit forms are not given.

• "The king's chaplain" renders mdun na 'don, the standard Tibetan equivalent of purohita, the royal priest and counselor. The names of the individual vidyās are translated from the Tibetan, since their Sanskrit forms are not given.

• "One becomes long-lived" takes tsher 'gyur as tshe ring du 'gyur in sense; the phrasing is compressed. The names of the individual vidyās are translated from the Tibetan, since their Sanskrit forms are not given.

• The seventh vidyā in this piece is given no name in the Tibetan; only its benefit is stated. In the fourth, "all who roam about" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□, whose precise sense here (wandering beings, or perhaps spies or messengers) is uncertain. The name rendered "Dharma Without Flow" (□□□□□□□□□□□) may reflect a Tibetan understanding of araṇa in the mantra; the literal sense is kept. "The farthest limits" renders □□□, which could also mean borderlands or the ends of the earth. "Stationary and moving" poisons are the standard Indian classes sthāvara (plant and mineral) and jaṅgama (animal) poisons.

• In the first vidyā, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered "a domain of a thousand villages," taking □□□□□□ in its sense of a gathered total; the exact sense is uncertain. In the seventh, the subject of "bestow divine medicines" is not stated; it is taken to be the gandharvas just brought under control.

• "Hooded serpents" renders □□□□□□□□, a standard epithet of nāgas and snakes. "Divine destinies" renders □□□□□□□□□□□, the realms of rebirth among the gods.

• The heading "vidyā of perfume" reads □□□□□□□□□□ in the Tibetan; □□ makes no sense here, and the mantra's gandha points to □□□, "scent," which is translated. The sentence on "flowers and the rest" is terse; it is taken to mean that the result of offering flowers and so on with this mantra of Dharma Tārā is power over beings. "Bestows lands upon the teachings" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□ ... □□□□□□□□□□□ literally; the intended recipients are uncertain.
• The names of the Tārā forms are given in English according to the Tibetan, which renders the key word of each mantra (for example, Tibetan "endowed with the moon" for Sanskrit candramatī). Two forms are distinguished in Tibetan by the honorific "all-seeing" (kun tu gzigs) and the ordinary "all-viewing" (kun du lta ba); the English keeps them apart as "All-Seeing Gaze" and "All-Surveying Vision."
• Noble Tārā Endowed with Supreme Wisdom renders Tibetan "endowed with the wisdom of the other (gzhan pa'i shes rab)", which reflects Sanskrit para, "beyond, supreme," in the mantra. Noble Tārā Endowed with the Far-Reaching uses the Tibetan for "gone far" (Skt. dūraṃgamā), the name of the seventh bodhisattva ground. Noble Tārā Endowed with Brahmā renders Tibetan tshangs, the standard rendering of Brahmā or brahma, "pure."
• Noble Tārā Spotless Light renders Tibetan "light without eye-salve" (mig sman med pa'i 'od), a literal rendering of Sanskrit nirañjana, "free of collyrium," that is, stainless, as in the mantra. Noble Tārā Power of Moral Discipline is the name the Tibetan gives, although its mantra (bhāse bhāsavatī) speaks of radiance.
• In the second name the Tibetan reads yam gyi 'od, which gives no sense; it is evidently a slip for lam gyi 'od, "light of the path," matching mārgaprabhe in its mantra, and is translated so. Noble Tārā Tārā of the Middle Way renders dbu ma'i sgrol ma, matching madhye in the mantra; it could also be understood simply as "Tārā of the Middle."
• In the name of the ninth form the Tibetan reads bzar bo, which is not a word; it is evidently a slip for bzang po, "excellent," matching bhadre in the mantra, and the name is rendered as before, Noble Tārā Endowed with Excellence. Noble Tārā Mistress of Generosity renders "lord of giving" (sbyin pa'i bdag po), matching dānapati in the mantra. Noble Tārā Endowed with Lunar Gentleness renders "endowed with moon-ness," a rendering of Sanskrit saumya, "gentle, moonlike."
• In the three names rendered "Ordinance of the Buddha, of the Dharma, of the Saṅgha," the Tibetan brtag pa renders Sanskrit kalpa, as the accompanying mantras show (buddhakalpa, dharmakalpa, saṃghakalpa); "ordinance" or "rite" is intended rather than "examination." The epithet rendered "Mistress of Clear Light" corresponds in the mantra to abhisvara, recalling the Ābhāsvara (Clear Light) gods.
• "Palāśa wood" renders "brahmā sticks" (tshangs pa'i yam shing), palāśa being known as the brahmā tree. "Aparājitā flowers" renders "flowers that others cannot overcome." The sentence rendered "If one wishes to proceed other than with a painted cloth" could also be read "If one wants another painted cloth." The "digestive pill" (zhu mkhan gyi ril bu) is uncertain. "Milk of a cow of matching lineage" (rgyud mtshungs pa'i 'o ma) and "an equal measure" (gzhan gyi tshad) are uncertain. The text has brgyan for brgyad ("eight") in "eight thousand fire offerings" with aparājitā flowers, and shib, read here as shi ba ("one who has died"). "One struck down by violence" (drag shul la nyams pa) and "lumps of the breast" (nu ma'i phur pa, here not a ritual dagger) are tentative.
• Several readings are uncertain: gzhil in the first sentence is taken as gzhi ("ground"); the clause rendered "when one has resolved to paralyze it" is obscure; "siddhārtha wood" (don grub kyi shing) may refer to white mustard. "Realgar bought at a hero's price" renders dpa' bo'i rin gyis nyos pa, apparently meaning bought at whatever price is asked. In the realgar rite, 'gro ba ("goes") is read as dro ba ("becomes warm"), in line with the parallel signs of warmth, smoke and blazing later in the passage. "Superior eye ointment" renders mig sman bla, which is not here the Medicine Buddha. The identities of several substances (bela, khaṇḍaka, "coiling joy plant," rgya spos, "yakṣa's bowl," pucirajata, indra), of the "oppressor spirits" (gnon po), and of "arka sesame oil" are uncertain. The "king tree" and "king of trees" may be the rājavṛkṣa.

• Where bcom ldan 'das appears in this Tārā rite (and with bcom ldan 'das ma), it is rendered "the Blessed Lady," since Tārā is clearly the one being worshiped. The clause "it seizes them with binding" (ma nu la 'ching ba 'dzin par byed do) is obscure. "Strike at the three junctures" (thun mtshams gsum du bsnun pa) is literal and its ritual sense unclear. lta mo is read as lha mo ("goddess"). "At first light" renders sngon gyi mtha' ma, which is uncertain. "In full bloom" renders kha rnam par rgyal ba, apparently for kha rnam par rgyas pa. Several plant names (rgya spos, āśibilva, the "thorny plant," "stamen flowers") are uncertain.

• "At the battlefield" renders g.yul du, which is unexpected here and may be a slip. "Abstaining from cooked food and salt" reads me dang lan tshwa zos pas ("having eaten fire and salt") as a fasting restriction; the text as written is unclear. The phrase rendered "within a month one will come to be looked upon" (zla ba'i nang du blta bar bya bar 'gyur) is obscure. "Countless times" renders rig pa dpag tu med pa, which might instead name a particular "immeasurable" knowledge mantra. As in the preceding rites, bcom ldan 'das is rendered "the Blessed Lady" where Tārā is meant.

• "Through the grace of noble Avalokiteśvara, things will turn out otherwise" renders gzhan du 'gyur ro literally; its sense here (perhaps a change of fortune) is unclear. "Not blackened at its base" (rtsa ba nag po med pa) is a tentative reading. Brahmadāri and jitendraya are given as transliterated in the Tibetan; the plants are not identified with confidence. "Without the preliminary practice" renders bsgrub par bya bzhin pa ma yin pa / sgrub bzhin pa ma yin pa, probably Sanskrit asādhita. "Eye ointment for the ears" (rna ba'i mig sman) is literal and puzzling. The sentence in which the Sauvīra collyrium "becomes a kumbhāṇḍa" (grul bum) follows the house rendering, though kuṣmāṇḍa may here denote a gourd shape; the passage on breaking and disintegration is obscure. The phrase ending "aspiring even to the very summit of all vidyādharas" is uncertain in construction.

• "Vases made of cloth" (ras las byung ba) is literal and odd; a scribal slip for an earthenware vessel is possible. The vase name Haring (ha rings) and the foods vakra (wa kra) and hwak (hwags) could not be identified and are kept as they are written. "Concealment from Indra, lord of the gods" (lha'i dbang po sbas pa) is a tentative reading. "Eat only when tormented by suffering" is literal; it probably means eating only when compelled by hunger.

• "Except for what has been set aside out of desire" ('dod pas nye bar bzhag pa ma gtogs) is a literal rendering of an obscure phrase, as is "dry cow dung will be cooked into hwak". The Vast Mountain and the Universal Mountain (yangs pa'i ri bo, kun tu ri bo) are titles of ritual manuals that could not be identified with confidence and are translated literally. In the verses, several of the descriptive phrases (entirely white, white parasol, radiating, mass of splendor, invincible, Victor's uṣṇīṣa) closely match the names of the uṣṇīṣa kings Sitātapatra, Vikiraṇa, Tejorāśi, Aparājita and Jayoṣṇīṣa, and may be meant as their names. The line "what is set in its center is not the center" is literal and obscure.

• The verses on the mudrā emblems are terse and several lines are uncertain, especially "the one facing forward" (sngon phyogs), "the utpala is also the moon's", the "garland-purifier" line, and the vedī lines (bi dī, probably Skt. vedī or vedikā, a railing or border). "The Victorious One" and "the Fully Victorious One" (rgyal ba, rnam par rgyal) are probably the goddesses Jayā and Vijayā. The prose description of the vajra-family samaya mudrā is obscure, and the closing phrase calling it a "mantra" is translated as written. The "great comforter" (dbugs 'byin chen po) is taken as an epithet of the great being who speaks; "wherever the eternal is taught" is literal.

• The mudrā descriptions are terse and several lines are uncertain, especially "whatever becomes separated" in the bathing mudrā and the opening lines of the staff mudrā. "Dull" renders sems ni dur ba, read as dull or sluggish minds. "Your means of accomplishment" (khyed kyi sgrub thabs) is translated as written.

• "The Noble Excellent One" renders the vidyā's name literally; it may stand for a Sanskrit name such as Āryabhadrā, which could not be confirmed. "By means of the Moon of noble Tārā" is uncertain: the Tibetan zla bas may mean "by the moon" (perhaps referring to this vidyā, whose mantra invokes the moon), "with a companion", or "within a month". The phrase about the place coming to be "as if in the palm of one's hand" is obscure in the Tibetan and is rendered literally. The speaker at the end of the first section is Avalokiteśvara, whom the text here calls "the Blessed One, the great bodhisattva".

• "Tuṭi" renders the Tibetan transcription of an Indian unit of measure (perhaps truṭi), whose exact quantity is unclear. In "stalked plants without fruit, smeared with ghee" the Tibetan reads bar ("between"), evidently a slip for mar ("ghee"), which fits the pattern of the surrounding oblations. The substance rendered "lac resin" (sra rtsi bog) is uncertain. The phrase about making the request "either through someone or directly in his presence" is terse in the Tibetan and its sense is somewhat uncertain.

• "Elephant tree" renders glang chen sdong po literally; the plant could not be identified. "King of trees" renders the Tibetan for rājavṛkṣa, and "royal mustard" that for rājasarṣapa, plant names whose exact identity is uncertain. "Ko me" and "nābhāsa" are given as the Tibetan transcribes them; these substances could not be identified. "Eight hundred thousand" follows the Tibetan stong phrag brgyad brgya literally, although eight thousand eight hundred may be meant. In the last rite the Tibetan gnas ("place") after "cow urine" makes little sense; it has been taken as dung, which is uncertain. The phrase "does the covering with it as well" (g.yogs) is obscure.

• "Kind and color" reads the Tibetan kha deg as kha dog ("color"), an evident slip. "An effigy of ten palas" reads srad bu ("thread") as srang ("pala"), which fits the pattern of the surrounding rites; this is uncertain. Several substances and woods are given as the Tibetan transcribes them because they could not be identified with confidence: dustira, pushel tsé, ṭāṃpaṇa, dongka, gabina and tsikaseng. "Water of the body" may mean urine. The closing lines of the passage are terse and their sense is somewhat uncertain.

• The clause describing Mahāsthāmaprāpta's offering "to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, who had come down among many beings" is obscure in the Tibetan, and its construction is uncertain. In the list of faults the Tibetan sas rdzas appears to contain a stray syllable and has been read as "substances". The sentence beginning "The little recitation of the vidyā" is terse, and its sense is uncertain. "Will through faith itself come within the circle" renders dkyil 'khor bar literally and is uncertain.

• "Pāśī" and "kaktukāma" in the neem-seed rite are given as the Tibetan transcribes them; these ingredients could not be identified with confidence. "Camedaka" pulses likewise follow the Tibetan transcription (perhaps chickpea, caṇaka). In two places the text reads "ma pa'i sa bon," taken as "neem seeds" (nim pa) in line with the parallel phrase that follows. The "twelve māṣas" (a measure of weight) given by the son of Vāsuki is ambiguous in the Tibetan, and could be a weight of gold rather than of food. "The essence of dependent origination" refers to the verse of dependent origination enshrined in stupas.

• Several readings follow evident copyists' slips: "til" (sesame) in "the sesame that lies in the ocean" is taken as "gter" (treasures), in line with the parallel sentences about gold and jewels; "'gra ba" as "'gro ba" (flowing); "'bur ba" as "'phur ba" (flies); "bad gyi bskal pa" as "bar gyi bskal pa" (intermediate eon). "Realgar bought at a hero's price" renders the Tibetan literally; it may stand for a Sanskrit expression for purchase with "great flesh" (mahāmāṃsa), but this is uncertain. "Placing one's hand upon a single sign" is literal; the referent of the "sign" is unclear. "One who desires the king, or the king's garments" is also literal and somewhat obscure.

"Living on what the Saṅgha provides" is a tentative rendering of "dge 'dun gyi bstan pa can."
• The three kinds of accomplishment over the ghee are rendered by the signs the Tibetan gives ("stirs," "smokes," "blazes"); "stirs" ('gro bzhin pa) may stand for the usual sign of warmth. "Ro ma" here is a corpse, not the subtle-body channel. "Ḍeḍeka," "camedaka" and "the three kinds of rice grain" (tan tu la gsum, taṇḍula) are uncertain identifications. "Iron forged under Puṣya" takes rgyal as the asterism Puṣya, as elsewhere in the text. "Hidden treasure" renders gter sbrag ma, whose precise sense is unclear.
• "Lita," "tangzung" (btang bzung) and "tree gold" (shing gser) are unidentified ingredients and are given literally or as transcribed. "Gold" in "oblations of gold" renders gser gyi ngang tshul, whose second element is unclear. "The rank of a kṣatriya" follows rgyal rigs as written, though rgyal srid ("kingship") may be meant. "A cow whose calf is of the same colour" interprets rgyud mtshungs pa'i ba, probably reflecting the Sanskrit sarūpavatsā.
• "The royal palace" renders rgyal po'i khab, here a king's residence in a rite for winning royal favor, not the city of Rājagṛha. "Kindling sticks of the brahma tree" renders tshangs pa'i yam shing, likely palāśa. "The other is pacified" reads zhi bar for the evident slip zhing bar. "One should watch for the supreme proclamation" is literal; its sense is unclear. "Being unobstructed" is a tentative reading of ma chod ba.
• "The vidyā, together with all that belongs to it" renders rig pa dang bcas pa, whose exact referent is unclear. Several food names in the yakṣa torma (kākamoṭika, sokhavadhi) are transliterated as given and could not be identified with confidence; churba and 'khur ba are rendered as dried cheese and cakes. "Cow dung that has not fallen on the ground" reads sa la ma lhung ba for the written sa lam lhung ba, the standard ritual specification. "Antimony" takes rna ba'i mig sman ("ear eye-ointment") as a calque of Sanskrit srotoñjana. "Anoint the mouth" reads khal as kha la. Rgyal po'i khab here is taken as the royal court (rājakula) rather than the city Rājagṛha, given the context of disputes. Ra sa ris is read as ras ris, painted scroll. The sense of bzhi gas kyang gos so ("even with a quarter, clothing") is uncertain, as is the final phrase tshig bla dags, rendered as "faults of speech."
• "Five hundred verses" supplies the unstated object of "five hundred." Several referents are unclear: the thing "revealed" by the khadira peg and guggulu; "water and a knife" (chu gris) for curing poison; karbāpa (perhaps cotton seed, karpāsa); ro ldan ma, given as rasavatī; and sha 'tshong ba, "selling flesh," which may allude to the tantric selling of flesh to spirits. Rtsa ba in the description of the vases is taken as a flaw at the base. Ngang rims is taken as fever. Stong phag is read as stong phrag. The object to be set on molasses and buried at the end is not named in the Tibetan.
• "Forgetfulness-causing spirit" renders brjed byed, probably the apasmāra graha associated with seizures. The ailments in the list (ye 'drog, 'bras, phol mig, btsog shu, khyi rngo) are given approximate English equivalents. Several phrases are obscure: the rite of the first mouthful and "outside the proper time"; 'dod pa can thams cad ("all who have desires"); "takes up all distinctions by oneself"; and installing the scroll "on a leaf." The three kinds of accomplishment are warmth, smoke, and blaze, as the text itself explains.
• Several items are uncertain: pusīlāka and sauvīra (so so bī rā ma na) are transliterated plant and mineral names; "abode of jasmine flowers" renders sna ma'i me tog gi gnas literally; "bought at a hero's price" (dpa' bo'i rin) is unclear; lus rnam par bcom nas is taken as "having subdued the body"; and "until it becomes a kumbhāṇḍa" (grul bum du gyur pa) is translated as written though its sense here is obscure. Gtum po is taken as outcastes (caṇḍāla), and sdig pa and sdom as scorpions and spiders.
• Lhag par rtogs pa, rendered "those of superior understanding," is uncertain. Yungs kar rgyal po is taken as rājasarṣapa, black mustard. Ba bla is given as ox bile and cu gang as bamboo manna; pināka, dongka, and sindhuvāra are tree or flower names whose identification is uncertain. Srang bu is read as srad bu, thread. "Divine oblations" renders lha'i sreg blugs literally.

• The first of the three signs is written "from another scent" (dri gzhan pa); the sense is unclear, and "brings all beings under control" supplies an evident missing "control" (dbang) in "sems can thams cad du byed pa". "Hair of a bronze hue" renders skra li, which is uncertain. "To the height of a palm tree" reads tshad for tshang. "Make offerings for one night" reads mtshan mo gcig for mtshan ma gcig. The sentence on being seen by almsgivers in the topknot rite is obscure; it may intend that one becomes invisible to all but the almsgivers. "Pure deodar" renders lha de dri med, tentatively taken as devadāru; the reading is uncertain.
• "Coral" reads bye ru for bye rul, which is not otherwise attested; the substance is uncertain. "Recite over scented paste" reads dri la for dril ("bell"), which makes little sense here. "Antimony collyrium" takes rna ba'i mig sman as a rendering of srotāñjana. The solitary liṅga (mtshan ma gcig pa) is the ekaliṅga, a classic site for such rites.
• "Ears of grain" takes snyi ma as snye ma. "Cassia" renders dong ka, tentatively. "Milk rice" takes pā mānnā as paramānna. The sentence on the treasure resting "at the depth of a man's height" is obscure; it seems to mean the treasure rises to within reach. "Sound and without blemish" renders the unclear rtsa ba dang nag po med pa.
• "Should milk a tawny cow" renders the unclear deb ser skya la bsnun pa; the sense is supported by the parallel instruction below. "Sweeping clean" renders nges par byab pa, uncertain. The sentence about the willow leaves (brkos pas lcang ma'i 'dab ma nye bar mnyam pa) and "large grains" (thug po che) are obscure, and the rendering is tentative.
• "Melt" takes gzhu ba as bzhu ba; the corpse passage is terse, and what is melted on its head is not stated. "Tree" renders rkang 'thung ("foot-drinker," Skt. pādapa); abaabīya and sodriya are unidentified plants. The phrase "whoever one's glance falls on" renders gang lung phog pa tentatively, and "together with a single stūpa" (mchod rten gcig dang) is unclear.
• "Elephants" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, apparently a calque of Sanskrit dvipa ("drinking twice," i.e. the elephant). The tree name □□□□□□□ is transliterated as found (vatyaṭaka) and not securely identified. "Burn incense" reads □□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□. The □□□ before □□□□ in the fever rite may stand for śīta, "cold fever." The phrase "made auspicious" (□□□□□□□□□□□) for the finger-snapping mudrā, "the mantras will be roused" (□□□□□□□□□□□□), and "works upon the secret mantras of others" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□) are literal renderings of obscure ritual statements. The fasting clause for bringing a man under control is duplicated in the Tibetan and is translated as it stands.
• "Bronze" reads □□□□□□□□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□□□□□□, which follows it. "Bilva kindling sticks" takes □□□□ as bilva; the tree is uncertain. "Ocean" reads □□□□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□□□. "Have it painted" takes □□□□□ as a slip for □□□□. "Sudarśana" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, taken as the name of the discus. Some statements are rendered literally because their sense is obscure: "at dawn the Teacher sets it all aside" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), "it keeps supplying food" (□□□□□□□□□), "until it splits open" (□□□□□□), and the sound "śita" (□□□□).
• "The conjunction of Puṣya" takes □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ as the Puṣya conjunction, since □□□□ is this text's name for that constellation. "A goose" reads □□□□ as a slip for □□□□, which the rite then names ("until the goose moves"). "Aparājitā flowers" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□. "Peacock feather" reads □□□□□□□□□□ as touching with a peacock. Several slips are read as their evident forms: □□□□ for □□□□□ ("fast"), and □□□ for □□□□ ("pacify"). Two statements are rendered literally because their sense is obscure: "will not pass beyond the wilderness without having thought of it" and "whoever has the garland." The substance taken with milk in the copper vessel is not named in the Tibetan, and nīlāṭaka is not securely identified.
• "On a panel" takes □□□□□□□□□□ as a calque of Sanskrit phalaka, "board, panel," confused with phala, "fruit." The final sentence of the passage, listing further qualities of the kindling (green, with dried leaves, or black), is rendered as it stands; it seems to begin a description that continues in the next piece.

• This fire-offering section is terse and in places obscure; several lines are rendered literally. Some evident slips are read in their evident forms: □ for □□ ("fire") in "kindle the fire"; □□□□□□□ ("woman") for □□□□□□□ ("fuel"); and □□□□□□□ for □□□□□□□ ("the Victorious One has rejected it"). "The sky's treasure," "those that are firmly set in their place," "a single tongue of flame," and "in the palm of the hand" follow the Tibetan as it stands, and their exact sense is uncertain.

• The line "everywhere these are spoken of as censured," following the drum sounds called a certain sign of accomplishment, is translated as it stands; it may refer to the opposite signs, or "censured" may be a slip for "praised," but the Tibetan is kept. "Roaming here in this land" renders 'khor ba in a sense that is not certain here. "Ailments of the legs" renders rkang shu, whose exact meaning is unclear. The clause about the queen ("except for any approach of desire") is understood as excluding sexual union; the phrasing is terse.

• Several plant and substance names are uncertain: "piṇyāka wood" follows the Tibetan transcription pi nyā ka; "dongka flowers" keeps the Tibetan name dong ka, which I cannot identify confidently; "lāpana" is kept as transcribed. "Antimony eye-salve" takes rna ba'i mig sman ("ear eye-salve") as a literal rendering of Sanskrit srotoñjana. "Keeping silence" reads mi smra bar for the written mi smya bar ("not going mad"), which does not fit. The fever sentence ("one day, two days ...") is taken as referring to intermittent fevers. The closing sentence about the seal (khug cig, "summon") is terse and its exact procedure uncertain. "A clean place that bears all things" may mean the earth.

• "Bhuṣuṇḍala," "saileṭaka," "tārāvartaka" and "girikarṇī" follow the Tibetan transcriptions; the first is probably a kind of club or missile weapon. "Milk" reads o ma for the written po ma. Ba bla is taken as orpiment and gi wang as bezoar (gorocanā). "In the third or the seventh practice" renders a terse phrase whose exact reference is uncertain.

• Avalokiteśvara's hymn is extremely obscure in the Tibetan, apparently a mechanical rendering of an ornate Sanskrit stotra whose syntax is not recoverable from the translation; it has been translated line by line as literally as the Tibetan allows, and many lines (especially those naming Śakra, the moon, the pārijāta tree and the ritual bath) are uncertain in their connection and reference. "In verses of one accord" renders tha mi dad pa'i tshigs su bcad pa, literally "undifferentiated verses." "The Bodiless One" (lus med) is taken as Kāma, the god of desire. "All-Seeing" renders the name of the absorption (probably Samantāvalokana).

• "Having first disciplined his body by strength" renders a line containing si tha'i lus, whose first word I cannot identify with confidence. "Smooth" takes snun as a variant of a word for an even, soft surface, and "trees" reads ljon shing for ljon shig. "The month of miracles" is taken as the month commemorating the Buddha's miracles at Śrāvastī.

• The line about going out "by the measure of the immeasurable Three Jewels" is obscure in the Tibetan and is rendered literally. "Then he should offer water for the face" renders zhal ni srub, which is unclear; srub ("churn") may be a slip. "Jiba flower" is probably the red japā (hibiscus). The list "one, two, three, eighteen, and another sixteen" of those not to be accepted is unclear in its reference (numbers of disciples or ages) and is given as it stands. Ras la nas is read as bsal nas, "having removed"; bre as bri, "draw"; rab dang as rab dad, "deep faith".

• Several dream images are obscure: "rohaṇa" and "rahaṇa" are transliterations left as written; "a, dhi and the like" seems to refer to letters or syllables seen in a dream; "the hands of dogs" may stand for dog-cooks (śvapaca), an outcaste group paired with caṇḍālas. The "alāsa made of copper" is an unidentified ritual object, given as transliterated.

• Many of the uṣṇīṣa kings and goddesses are named by Tibetan epithets whose Sanskrit forms cannot be identified with confidence; these are rendered by their meaning. Both lists of "eight" goddesses give a number of names differing from eight, as in the Tibetan. The opening verse "Fully marked off, and white in body" reads slob de as slob dpon, "the master". "The Stain of the Tathāgatas" renders dri ma as written.

• Many of the names in these lists are Tibetan epithets whose Sanskrit forms could not be identified with confidence; they are rendered by meaning. Mādara, Kelī and Biśinī are kept as transliterated. The list of mantra kings, said to be twenty-four, is given as it stands; the list of queens likewise.
• Both lists, of "eighteen" kings and "fourteen" ladies, contain more names than the stated number, as in the Tibetan. "Lotus Go Bo Rig" is unclear and left as written. Some lines of the closing verse, especially "the Destroyer goes" and the final line on Avalokiteśvara being released, are obscure and rendered literally.
• "Grants the master a vision of himself" reads □□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□□, "sight, vision" (darśana); as written the word makes no clear sense. The line "through action one is born into Ākāśagarbha" is terse and its exact sense is uncertain. "Peacock's breast" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; it may name a plant or substance not identified here. "King's-coil flowers" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; the plant (perhaps rājāvarta) is not securely identified.
• Much of the verse is extremely terse, and several lines (on Vajramuṣṭi and Mahābala, on the signs of graha possession, and on the emblems of the mother goddesses) are rendered as closely as the wording allows; their precise sense is uncertain. The list of emblems appears to assign attributes to the mātṛkās Brāhmī, Māheśvarī (the "seven" with trident and bull), Kaumārī and Vaiṣṇavī; "Lahirikā" is a transliteration of □□□□□□□□□, which I cannot identify. "Śiṣalāñcana" and "tāla" are transliterations of plant or substance names not securely identified. In the prose, □□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is taken as the nāga Karkoṭa, and □□□ and □□□□□□□□□□ here are the nāga kings Padma and Mahāpadma of the eight great nāgas, distinct from Padmā and the Great Lotus elsewhere in the text. The sentence about the door (monkey, goat, maidens) is obscure in the Tibetan; "as watchers of the door" reads □□□□□□□ as □□□□□□ / watching, tentatively. "Without a window" renders □□□□□□□□□□□ tentatively.
• The long speech of Avalokiteśvara listing the qualities of the four sister knowledge mantras is very obscure in the Tibetan, and the rendering of its middle (from "through the character of their intrinsic nature" to "it is destroyed merely once") is tentative. The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ in Vajrapāṇi's speech appears corrupt; "arisen from the one who is called" is a tentative reading. The four sisters' names are given from the mantras they accompany (Jayā, Vijayā rendered as "Fully Victorious" per earlier usage, Ajitā, Aparājitā).
• The names of the five brothers are translated from the Tibetan; their Sanskrit forms are not securely identifiable. In the boat scene the names given (Red Body, Vajra End, Black Belly) differ slightly from the earlier list of the brothers, and the Tibetan □□□□□□□□ for the fourth may be a slip for □□□□□□□□. "Lords over the lotus hand" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ tentatively. Several plant names are kept in Sanskrit as transliterated in the Tibetan (koṭha, śasmali, dīrghabitta, asthidatta); their exact identification is uncertain. The two consecutive instructions on fragrant flowers and flowers of lesser fragrance for increasing rites are given as the text has them.
• Several phrases in the maṇḍala description are obscure: □□□□□□□ ("tatasphu"), □□□□□□□□□ ("crest-guard"), □□□ ("lada") and □□□□□ ("kṭrañca") are kept or rendered literally as unidentified. □□□□□□□□ is tentatively taken as Naradatta. The clause on the effigy "that defiles even the stainless" and the sentences on planting the peg ("the peg will appear in the house", "the hand that destroys cities") are tentative readings of a terse text. "Wood struck by Śakra's thunderbolt" means lightning-struck wood.
• "Offering remnants" renders dri med (literally "stainless"), taken here as the Tibetan for nirmālya, the remains of offerings made to a deity, which the Indian ritual tradition forbids stepping over or eating; this identification is probable but not certain. The palace rite is read as concerning an angered king, since its result is that "he becomes free of anger"; the instrumental khros pas is ambiguous. In the mudrā verses, "Vajra Crusher" (rab 'joms) may correspond to the Vajraprabhañjanī of the preceding mantra, and "the Black-Limbed One" (nag po'i yan lag can) could not be identified with confidence, so both are translated literally. Several food names (parpaṭa, jambulika, pūpalika) are given as transliterated in the Tibetan.

• Several phrases are obscure: "with fivefold diligence" (lnga brtson pas), "one recollects that which touches them as one" (gcig tu reg pa), and the sense of "rouse" (skyed par byed) in the rites concerning the executioner, enemies and the king are rendered literally. In the king rite, the list "his own flesh ... buffaloes" is given as it stands; its intended meaning (perhaps what is obtained or afflicted with each round) is unclear. Cetrājika and kasamaya are substances whose identity is uncertain and are given as transliterated. "Candrā" renders 'phags ma zla ba ma, "the noble Moon Lady".

• The opening sentences (on "splendor and mass" and the "small petal") and the phrases "free of faults in the factors of purity, protection and proper measure" and "that is whoever practices the secret mantra together" are obscure and rendered closely. "The lunar mansion of the Four Fires" renders rgyu skar me bzhi, which could not be identified with confidence. Vimalagati renders 'phags pa dri ma med par 'gro ba ("noble Stainless Going"); "the Blissful One" renders bde ldan, which could not be identified with confidence. "Clad only in the directions" takes phyogs dang ldan pa'i lus as digambara, naked. The four-armed great sister of Tārā is probably Ekajaṭī, but the text does not name her here.

• Several phrases in the ghee-vessel rite near the start ("make it as long as the space between the two feet", "gather each of them together into one, until one's own wishes and speech have arisen in abundance") are obscure and rendered literally. "Barren" renders rmongs pa (literally "dull, confused"), read from context as infertility; this is uncertain. "Palāśa" renders tshangs pa'i yam shing, "Brahmā's kindling," the usual name of the palāśa tree. Māṣaka (ma sha ka) and "smelter's pellet" (zhu mkhan gyi ril bu) are uncertain identifications.

• Several clauses are obscure and rendered closely: "in one direction one becomes invincible" (phyogs gcig la, possibly "for one fortnight"), "in seven nights it arises" after the neem rite (probably fever or harm arising in the target), "from the hair onward" (skra las), and "for flesh that has grown and for madness ... none of it will turn back". "A swelling of the breast" takes stan gnti ka as stanagranthi(ka). "Phlegm-ender wood" renders bad kan mthar byed, an unidentified plant name, not the deity Antaka. Gobetraṃ, piṇḍyaka (probably oil cake) and the "leafy wood" are uncertain. "Destroys enemies" renders dgra bcom par byed, here a ritual result, not "arhat".

• The one who enters the meditative absorption and addresses Mahāsthāmaprāpta is not named in this piece; "he" follows the Tibetan, which leaves the subject unstated. The sentence on Avalokiteśvara "going wherever one wishes" is ambiguous in the Tibetan and could also mean that the practitioner goes, together with Avalokiteśvara, wherever he wishes. "Marsh plants" renders a word that ordinarily means "mud" (□□□□□), taken here as an edible marsh growth. In the list of the great vase's contents, □□□□□□□□□□□□ ("all that is spoken") is taken as "all the things already spoken of"; the reading is uncertain. "Free of cracks" renders □□□□, read as a term for flaws in the vessel; "forty" renders □□□□□□□.

• "Eight thousand, twenty-one times over" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□

• The piece opens in mid-sentence; "with eight hundred" presumably refers to recitations. Vaiśravaṇa renders □□□□□□□□□, an unusual rendering, identified from the epithet "great lord of the yakṣas" and his place in the north among the four great kings. Suvarṇāvabhāsa renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□, the peacock king of the Mahāmāyūrī tradition. "Not fallen to the ground" reads □□□ for the written □□□□ in one place. The phrase on the maṇḍala "arising from the moon, made fivefold" is obscure as written. "Tin" renders the unclear □□□□□□□□□□□. "The direction of Vāgdāna" renders □□□□□□□□, which is not clearly identifiable as a direction. "Holding offerings" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, which is unclear.
• Twice the Tibetan reads □□□□□□□□, "Buddha," where "mantra" (□□□□) would fit more easily ("when it is accomplished with that Buddha," "through that Buddha, bhūtas ... come under one's power"); the text is translated as written. The month names render the Tibetan lunar mansions (□□□, □□□, □□□□□□□, □□□□□□□□□) as the months named after them; □□□□□□□ is taken as Āṣāḍha. "High up in the temple" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, which is unclear. "People speaking pleasantly" renders the obscure □□□□□□□□□□□□.
• "A club" renders □□□□□, uncertain in this list of inauspicious dream images, and "sitarukṣa" (□□□□□□□□□□) is left unidentified. The statement that effects "arise eighteenfold from that mantra" and the line "these too, consecrated seven times, will be inscribed" are obscure as written. Avalokiteśvara's speech has no closing marker in this piece and probably runs on into the next.
• The deity rendered "Stainless Goer" (Tibetan dri ma med par 'gro ba), the "Courageous Lady" (snying stobs ma), and "She Who Has Attained Peace" (zhi ba thob pa) could not be identified with confidence and are translated by meaning. Several of the seats prescribed for the consecrations are obscure in the Tibetan: "one who would cast out wrongful contamination" and "the essence of the earth that moves upon ten short ones" are literal renderings, as is "drawn out with ariṣṭa" (ariṣṭa being soapnut or neem). "Palāśa leaves" interprets rgya skyegs kyi 'dab ma, literally "lac leaves", as the leaves of the palāśa (lac) tree. The "heart of dependent origination" is the verse of dependent origination enshrined in stūpas.
• The opening speech is compressed in the Tibetan; the closing words "he also said this" are rendered as introducing the aspiration that follows, whose speaker appears from the following lines to be Avalokiteśvara. "As the Blessed Mother, noble Tārā, in a woman's form" interprets the bare name as the form in which the speaker will act. "Yāma" renders mtshe ma ("twins," a literal rendering of yama), taken here as the Yāma heaven in a list of divine realms. □□□□□□□□ is given as Viṣṇu here because it stands among male gods, although the feminine Vaiṣṇavī was used for it in an earlier context. "The third state, that of irreversibility" is literal; the reference is not certain.
• The sentence after the long Hayagrīva mantra, describing it as "resting on fourteen, increased by eighteen with the three hūṃ syllables and the four phaṭ syllables," is obscure in the Tibetan and is rendered literally. The figure on the Blessed One's left, gazing at the wrathful one and stroking a vajra, is not named; it is presumably Vajrapāṇi. "With a lotus body" is literal and may mean lotus-colored. Where the preceding piece leaves the speaker as Avalokiteśvara, this piece has him speak in the first person as Hayagrīva, as the Tibetan says.
• "Seven times" for the ash renders □□□□□□□□□□ ("seven limbs"), evidently a slip for □□□□□□□, the phrase used for the lamp, mustard seed, and water in the same sequence. The canopy "bound with Tārā" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is literal and unclear. "Leaves of the three pungent spices" and "black pepper" (□□□□□□□) are best identifications of the plant names, and "made into pills on chickpea leaves" is literal.
• "If one does not give them" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; the sense of the clause in context is unclear. The plant rendered "hand-born" (□□□□□□□□) could not be identified and is translated by meaning; "tagara" for □□□□□□□□ and several other plant names are best identifications. Several clauses in the vetāla and peacock rites are compressed and are rendered literally: placing the corpse "at a stūpa that contains relics, with the products of a tawny cow"; "one travels by means of the fire offering"; "it gives off smoke"; "the products of a secluded cow"; and "again opened it out."

• "Antimony (srotoñjana)": the Tibetan reads literally "eye salve of the ear," a calque arising from srotas ("stream," also "ear"). In the eye-salve rite, "places the eye salve in the mouth" renders □□□□□□□, which could also mean "places it on top"; the reading □□□□□ is taken as a slip for □□□□□, "warm." Several phrases in the description of Avalokiteśvara ("steadfast as a pure white vessel," "bearing a golden rod for worship," literally "golden srang bu") and in the practitioner's supplication are obscure in the Tibetan and are rendered closely. "Hero's price" (vīrakraya) means buying without haggling. "Camphor priyaṅgu tree" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ as it stands.

• "The practitioner takes her by the hand and goes to his own dwelling" follows the instrumental □□□□□□□□□□ in the first rite; in the parallel rites it is the yakṣiṇī who takes the practitioner by the hand to her own dwelling. "Made the drawings" renders □□□□□□□□□□ as it stands; its sense here is unclear. Among the ingredients, rgya spos is taken as tagara, □□□□□□ as a slip for □□□□□ "cinnamon," and paripālapā is left as transliterated, since the plant is not identified. "The heart of dependent origination" refers to the verse on dependent origination placed in stūpas as a dharma relic.

• "Having again dismissed them" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□, taken in line with the parallel rites as a slip for a phrase requesting departure. "Speak of their supreme fear" follows the Tibetan as written, though the context of the hell beings' relief suggests a reading such as "fearlessness." The sentence on those "ferried across the great river of the three realms of existence," "sealed by the all-illuminating Victor," is obscure and is rendered closely. Potalaka is Avalokiteśvara's island mountain abode.

• The sentence on "a special samādhi of the bodhisattva, a perfection of giving bestowed by another ... at the neck of King Hayagrīva" and the sentence "Then to the Blessed One, the noble Amitābha, with the bodhisattvas, in that world realm" are elliptical in the Tibetan and are rendered closely without supplying missing verbs. "Cuts through bolts" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□, taken as breaking locks or fetters.

• "The practitioner said" follows the instrumental □□□□□□□□□□ as written, though the address "holy being" elsewhere refers to the practitioner, so Hayagrīva may be the intended speaker. "Makes fanged creatures eat apart" renders the obscure □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ closely. "Mustard" renders □□□□□□□. The plant names dhudhu, saugandhi, katnika, ṇūka, and paṇḍītakara are given as the Tibetan transliterates them.

• "The goddess Born of the Waters" translates □□□□□□□□□□□□□ literally; it may refer to Lakṣmī, who arose from the ocean, but the identification is not certain. The tathāgata's name □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered "Tārā Akṣobhya" as written; the same buddha is later simply called Akṣobhya. The bodhisattvas are described as "to be measured and counted" (□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□), translated as it stands, though one might expect "immeasurable and countless." In the list of purposes, □□□□ makes little sense and is read as □□□□, "safeguarding," completing the usual triad with protection and defense. The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□, "recites it for an eon," is unusual and translated literally.

• In the list of dangers, □□□□□□□ does not yield clear sense; it is tentatively rendered "adversities," as if for □□□□□. "Persistent poison" renders □□□□□□□□□□□, probably the "stationary" (vegetable or mineral) poisons as opposed to the venom of moving creatures. The name of the dhāraṇī, □□□□□□□□□□□□, "the Thousand Turnings," echoes the words sahasra āvarta in the dhāraṇī itself. The phrase □□□□□□□□ is unclear and is understood as "by performing the rite."

• "Kept far off" renders □□□□□□□, read as □□□□□□; as written it would mean "hastened." "Sweet flag" renders □□□□□ (Skt. vacā). "Jasmine" renders □□□□ (Skt. jātī). The sellaka (□□□□□□) has not been identified and is left as written. "Remaining out of sight" renders □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, whose exact sense in the rite is unclear. The passage on siddhis, harms and khadira powder is elliptical in the Tibetan and is rendered as it stands.

• □□□□□□□□□□ is here taken as "carries through to completion," since the epithet Antaka does not fit the context. "The fourfold vidyā" renders □□□□□□□□□□, whose exact sense is unclear. "The secret ones" (□□□□□□□□□□) may refer to the guhyakas. ravita and viṇika are transcribed Sanskrit terms for mudrās whose meaning here is not clear. In the armor mudrā, □□□ ("sound") in □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ makes little sense; the phrase is rendered as "like the links of a chain."

• "They will copy it" renders □□□□□□□, read as □□□□□□□ ("write"), since "ask" does not fit and the next item is "having written it." The verse section on the mudrās is terse and irregular; it is rendered line for line as closely as English allows. The sentence on the benefits of the discourse is loosely constructed in the Tibetan, and "which I too have blessed" interprets □□□□□□□□□□.

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
