Toh 458 in the Kangyur is a tantric text known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Vajra Caṇḍa Citta Guhya Tantra and in Tibetan as the Dpal rdo rje gtum po thugs gsang ba'i rgyud, rendered in English as the Glorious Tantra of the Secret Mind of the Glorious Wrathful Vajra. It belongs to the class of Buddhist tantras and centers on Vajrapāṇi in his wrathful form, presenting esoteric teachings on the enlightened body, speech, and mind of the Sugatas as experienced from the pure realm of Akaniṣṭha. The text opens in the classical sūtra style with the phrase "Thus did I hear," situating its revelations within a celestial assembly where the Buddhas work for the benefit of beings through the sambhogakāya, nirmāṇakāya, and other emanation bodies arising from the dharmakāya. As a tantra devoted to a wrathful emanation of Vajrapāṇi, it is placed among the tantric scriptures of the Kangyur, reflecting the tradition's deep engagement with the transformative power of wrathful enlightened activity.

In the language of India: Śrī Vajra Caṇḍa Citta Guhya Tantra. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious Tantra of the Secret Mind of the Glorious Wrathful Vajra. Homage to the Glorious Wrathful One, Vajrapāṇi.

Thus did I hear at one time. In the palace of Akaniṣṭha adorned with spreading branches, all the Sugatas who behold body, speech, mind, qualities, and enlightened activity accomplish the benefit of beings by means of the sambhogakāya, the nirmāṇakāya, the vajra body, and the body of manifest awakening, each arising from the dharmakāya.

They accomplish the benefit of beings through speech that is beyond expression yet meaningful, speech that is symbolic intention, speech that is the melody of Brahmā, speech that is inseparable, and speech that is consecrated awareness.

They accomplish the benefit of beings through mind that is the dharmadhātu, mind that is mirror-like, mind that is perfect equality, mind that is individually discerning, and mind that is all-accomplishing.

They accomplish the benefit of beings through inconceivable abodes, thrones, retinues, fields of beings to be tamed, and rays of bodily light.

They accomplish the benefit of beings through enlightened activities that are pacifying, enriching, empowering, wrathful, and spontaneously accomplished.

At that time, the Blessed One, perceiving that the time had come to tame sentient beings through the buddhas of the five families, the three families, and so forth, accomplished the benefit of beings through manifold emanations with unattached compassion.

At that time, perceiving that the time had come to tame gods, demigods, and rākṣasas of extreme arrogance — those mired in the swamp of attachment to the web of pride, those dwelling on the Mount Meru of conceit, those whose minds are stirred by the wind of jealousy, those dwelling in the eternal darkness of bewilderment — all the Tathāgatas became of one mind. From the great non-abiding wisdom, they arose as the vajra family, the buddha family, the jewel family, the lotus family, and the karma family, each seated together with their respective consorts. Through the blessing of their unified minds, the buddha of all families appeared. His body was blue in its nature, like vaiḍūrya; he appeared blue, was luminous blue, shone with the color of the precious stone indranīla, like green. He appeared adorned with the splendid attributes of the palace of spreading branches, holding a vajra in his hand, and arose firm at heart.

Through that power and might, the proud ones dwelling in the world were subdued, bound under oath, and the supreme awakening mind was aroused.

This concludes the first chapter, the chapter of introduction, from the Glorious Tantra of the Secret Mind of the Wrathful Vajra, the All-Secret.

Then again at that time, the Blessed Ones of the five families, seeing that there were sentient beings dwelling in afflictions who could not be tamed by peaceful means, commanded the Lord of Secrets: "Ho! Lord of all secret mantras (Skt. mantra), awareness mantras, and dhāraṇī mantras — tame those sentient beings who cannot be tamed by peaceful means, taming them all in the manner of the wrathful one!" Thus they declared. Oṃ vajrapāṇi krodha krodha hūṃ hūṃ — this was deliberately proclaimed three times.

From that proclamation arose Vajrapāṇi, the great chief of the yakṣas, clad in blue garments, his fangs bared and gnashing, his eyes blazing like a mass of firebrands, his breath flaming like the tongues of fire in a charnel ground, his terrifying roar resounding like the end of a cosmic age. His hands and feet were adorned with the nāga kings Norbu and Norgyé as ornaments. He was crowned at the topknot with the black nāga king and the one called Closely

Black. His ears were adorned with the blazing nāga kings Delightful and the Closely Delightful as earrings. He devoured poisonous blazing serpents. His face was broad and full. His brow was furrowed with dark yellow eyebrows drawn together at the forehead. He bore the aspect of the Lord of Death. His tongue flickered like lightning. His belly was great, devouring serpents. The clapping of his palms filled all with terror. He was bound at the waist with the nāga king Excellent-Wings as a belt.

Crying "Alala!" he terrorized and filled all with dread. He had plunged into the ocean depths to the depth of eighty thousand leagues, so that only his knees were above the water. He carried Indra and the sun upon his shoulders. He destroyed all nāgas. His great roaring laughter shook everything into tumult. He made the three realms tremble and quake. He was a destroyer of nāgas. And he uttered his dhāraṇī mantra for this very purpose:

Tadyathā: bho bho pānānāga adhivataye, inadnīlāmbaradhara śarīram, vajrapāṇi hṛdayaṃ, yās māti kramath, mākulodssādanaṃ bhaviṣyanti. Tadyathā: buddha buddha vibuddha vibuddha, māti kramath, hara hara nāgānāṃ, prahara prahara nāgānāṃ, cchinda cchinda nāga hṛdayāni, bhinda bhinda nāga marmāṇi, viśīryantū nāga śarīraṃ, visphōṭaya nāga nayanāni. Tadyathā hūṃ phaṭ. Nāga vidāraṇāya phaṭ. Nāgotsādanāya phaṭ. Nīlāmbarasanāya phaṭ. Apratihahabalaparākramāya phaṭ. Kṛtāntāya phaṭ. Kṛtāntarūpāya phaṭ. Roṣaṇāya phaṭ. Trāsanāya phaṭ. Kusmāṇḍotsādanāya phaṭ. Preta piśāca vināśakarāya phaṭ. Yakṣa apasmāra vināśakarāya phaṭ. Hasa hasa, dāra dāra, mārāya mārāya, nāśāya nāśāya, sarva vighnāṃ vināśakarāya phaṭ. Sarva śatruṃ saṃgha vināśakarāya phaṭ. Nīlāmbaradhara vajrapāṇi rājñāpayati svāhā.

No sooner had he uttered these words than the majority of the proud and arrogant ones became still as painted images, and those who had fallen into deep unconsciousness recovered their senses and spoke these words: "O Lord of Secrets, you are the sovereign of compassion, the refuge and protection of all. Please liberate us from this suffering." Then those proud and arrogant ones were bound by oath, received empowerment and the samaya vow, and generated the awakening mind.

This is the second chapter, on the subjugation of the common arrogant ones, from the Tantra of All Secrets of the Glorious Fierce Vajra.

Then there arose, among the worldly arrogant ones, those who were supremely arrogant: the king of the nāga royal lineage called Ocean; the king of the lord-spirits' lineage called All-Canopied; the king of the brahmin lineage called Water-God; the king of the outcastes called Śulapukara; the king of māras called Kośrje Drangkar; the great wild planet-spirit; the one with a white conch-shell crest; the king of the btsans called Red Life-Taker; the king of the death-lords called Migpa; the queen of the māmos called Mother of Space; the sister of the Lord of Death, Revati the Devastating, and others — all of these supremely arrogant ones who wreak ruin upon the world. As even the five saṃbhogakāya bodies had not subdued the unsubdued, the Lord of Secrets declared: "The male and female arrogant ones have not been tamed. By all means, the afflicted and arrogant must be subdued." He so commanded.

All the buddhas of the three times also spoke thus to the Lord of Secrets: "These worldly arrogant ones, abiding in attachment, harm sentient beings. Since they bring harm to the body and life of all, you must subdue them entirely in the mode of wrath." So they commanded.

The buddhas and bodhisattvas dwelling in the pure buddha fields of all ten directions, gathered together from each of their respective lineages, likewise spoke in one voice: "Lord of Secrets, display the supreme mode of wrath and subdue the arrogant ones with unimpeded power." So they commanded.

Furthermore, the awareness-holders and mantras — all the lords of the secret mantras and dhāraṇīs assembled together — the lords of the lineages, the mothers of the lineages, the wrathful ones of the lineages, the emanations of the lineages, the female messengers of the lineages, and all the rest — and with one voice they declared: "Lord of Secrets, because these fields of beings to be tamed cannot be disciplined by peaceful means, these ones who are accompanied by aversion and malice, who indulge the afflictions as they please, and who are tormented by the thirst of desire — display toward them the aspect of supreme wrath through the power of your might, and without delay subdue them swiftly and utterly." So they commanded.

Thereupon, his form becoming invisible, he remained in the state of great primordial wisdom.

This is the third chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of the Glorious Vajra Ferocious One: the chapter on commanding the wrathful one.

Then, from the sky of the non-dual union of the fathers and mothers of the five families, there arose through the compassionate wrath the seed-syllable HŪṂ — dark blue like the hue of black crow-feathers — blazing with rays of light of many colors, blazing intensely, blazing through and through. From the blessing of that, from the compassionate blessing, there streamed forth: E, dark blue; YAM, blue-grey; RĀM KHĀM, dark red; SŪM, dark yellow; RĀM, dark red; KĒM, pale white; and a multicolored BHRŪM.

From the convergence and dispersal of these there arose: a dark-blue triangular sky; a blue-grey crescent of wind; a dark-red ocean of blood; a dark-yellow vast earth and ground; a pale-white skeletal Mount Meru; and a spontaneously accomplished maṇḍala — a palace of various precious jewels, arising of itself from a dark-blue vajra-cross.

At the center, unchanging as the nature of reality and spontaneously accomplished, stood a dark-blue circular hub. The tips of the spontaneously accomplished vajra-cross, perfected in the four activities, radiated in all ten directions. The intervals were spontaneously accomplished from four kinds of precious jewels. The corners gleamed with green precious jewels. The four gates, fashioned from four kinds of precious jewels, appeared as the activities of the four immeasurables. Ornaments of many kinds naturally appeared and arose of themselves.

Then from that dark-blue HŪM, the wrathful seed, there streamed forth the fine sharp rays of the manifold vajra. From those fine vajra rays there shot forth inconceivable fine vajra iron hooks, hooking all the arrogant ones of the world and the various male and female rākṣasas who menace life. Outside the palace they were cast and stood — like trees uprooted at the root — and, like painted figures, became utterly motionless. Through the blessing of that power they were brought, as though stones hurled into the hub of a wheel.

Then all the Tathāgatas together uttered the words "sthira baṃ," and the male and female rākṣasas regained awareness and were brought to stand in the presence.

This is the fourth chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of the Glorious Vajra Ferocious One: the chapter on the spontaneously accomplished palace.

Then from that blazing, dark-blue HŪM of compassionate wrath, all the Tathāgatas with one voice proclaimed "abhiṣoṣaṇa hūṃ," whereupon there appeared one with brows knitted in wrath, mouth spread wide, teeth gnashed in three points — the fangs that cut the three poisons at their root — blazing in such a blazing aspect. The three great world-systems trembled, shook greatly, shook throughout, and shook entirely and utterly.

This is the fifth chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of the Glorious Vajra Ferocious One: the chapter on generating the blazing wrathful one in the mode of wrath.

At that time, at that moment, all the lords of the vehicles of the three times gathered together. With wisdom vases from the sky of secret wisdom they bathed the entire body of that blazing wrathful one, and performed his empowerment with a stream of water from wisdom vases. The kuśa-grass officiant who performs the purifying ablution — — purifying obscurations and protecting all beings utterly: with the ash of a ritual implement, with the sap of the nature of reality, with the essential butter of primordial wisdom, and with other such substances he performed the empowerment in accordance with the conduct of beings. The wrathful one of primordial wisdom was absorbed into the body, spread throughout it, and bliss arose.

Then the lord of all buddha-families, together with the five buddhas and their consorts, entered into meditative equipoise in bliss. From the sky of non-duality, syllables of primordial wisdom appeared: Kṣīṃ in dark blue, Kṣīṃ in white, Kṣīṃ in yellow, Kṣīṃ in red, Kṣīṃ in green, and Kṣīṃ appearing in many colors. With a single voice he uttered the mantra of generation and invocation:

Hūṃ e yaṃ raṃ khaṃ su raṃ keṃ brum. Abhiṣaṇa hūṃ. Oṃ niyama sa slā lā nān garuṇa cale cale hūṃ phaṭ.

From the utterance of this, garuḍas emanated from primordial wisdom: one dark blue, one white, one yellow, one red, one green, each appearing separately, and then gathered together into a garuḍa whose body is white, whose wings are blue, whose horn is a blazing wisdom sword, and who leads away and devours the malevolent — thus abiding in the compassion of the blazing wrathful one. The body bears five colors; the beak is formed of meteoric iron and vajra; the wings are vast enough to cover the entire reach of the sky; the eyes shine like molten gold. Four kinds of malevolent serpents are devoured each in their own place — at the crown of the head, at the forehead, at the right and left sides behind the ears, and at the back of the crown, and so on.

Each buddha-family performed the empowerment with its own hand-implement. The lord of the Tathāgata family (the vajra family) placed the wheel at the crown of the head, saying:

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-kāya-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham.

And thus the wheel was bestowed. The lord of the speech family likewise placed the wheel of Dharma at the throat, saying:

Āḥ sarva-tathāgata-vāk-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham.

The lord of the mind family placed the vajra at the heart, saying:

Hūṃ sarva-tathāgata-mahācitta-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham.

The lord of the qualities family placed a blazing jewel at the shoulders and navel, saying:

Svā sarva-tathāgata-ratna-guhya-abhiṣiñcantu mām.

The lord of the karma (action) family likewise placed the wheel at the secret place, saying:

Hā sarva-tathāgata-karma-guhya-abhiṣiñcantu mām.

Then there emerged small wrathful ones of primordial wisdom — small of body yet large of eye, holding vajras and pointing the threatening gesture — in white, red, yellow, green, dark blue, and so on, in manifold variety. Through the blessing of these, this great earth trembled in six ways, shook greatly, shook throughout, and shook entirely and utterly. Even the sound of the fire of the cosmic conflagration rang out. They gathered here and descended from the sky, abiding at the center of the blazing wheel. Then with a single voice all the Tathāgatas declared:

Roṣaṇa yakṣa gṛhṇa gṛhṇa phaṭ!

From the utterance of this, the wrathful one of primordial wisdom appeared — the body flashing with a hue like venom-dark black poison, the three eyes blazing with the ferocity of primordial wisdom, darting like lightning at the end of an aeon, their fierce heat capable of destroying whatever they behold, like the rays of a scorching sun. The furrowed brows blaze dark yellow like fierce lightning, dispelling the darkness of delusion and mental afflictions. The mustache and beard are dark yellow, blazing with wisdom fire, burning the habitual tendencies of the afflictions. He wears a fresh elephant hide, a symbol of subjugating the affliction of delusion. As a sign of taming the affliction of aversion, he is clothed in a tiger-skin skirt, the garment of the lord of wild beasts. He is adorned with the head of a leopard as a symbol of taming the affliction of jealousy.

As a sign of not having abandoned the cycle of afflictions, he wears as a garment the hide of a great bull. He is adorned at the crown with white-speckled serpents, wears yellow-speckled serpents as a throat ornament, wears red-speckled serpents as armlets, wears green-speckled serpents as a belt, and wears black-speckled serpents as anklets. As a sign that the three poisons are not spontaneously abandoned, he consumes the flesh and blood of the afflictions. He is adorned upon his body with dry skulls, fresh skulls, and a garland of skulls, which are endowed with the significance of body, speech, and mind. He is adorned upon his body with a pattern rendered in blood and serum, because he gazes with compassion upon cyclic existence — which, while endowed with the significance of the unborn nature of reality, resembles blood and serum. He is adorned upon his body with a cluster of great ash, in order to tame all beings through the power of the Great Vehicle. Though endowed with the significance of the unborn nature of reality, blazing jewels appear as his ornaments; his dark-blue hair is bound with a crown of matted locks. His right foot is drawn in, resting in a majestic posture; his left foot is extended, resting in a wrathful posture, trampling upon male and female rākṣasas who threaten life. In his right hand he holds a five-pointed vajra in a striking posture; in his left hand the threatening finger-gesture is raised, appearing in all its clarity, together with a khaṭvāṅga and a blazing sword — with these four limbs he is empowered as the agent of enlightened activity. Having been empowered with the five types of sacred substance and nectar, he is empowered as the agent of all enlightened activities, and this is accomplished through the sport of non-duality.

This is the sixth chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of glorious Vajra Caṇḍa — the chapter on the empowerment of the Blazing Wrathful One by all the Tathāgatas.

Then glorious Vajra Caṇḍa, with Vajrapāṇi raising the threatening finger-gesture and lifting the vajra aloft, gazed in all directions with the glance of a blazing wrathful one; his eyes rolled back; his mouth was thrown wide open; and from his mouth burst forth the resounding roar of fearful laughter: Ha ha! Hūṃ hūṃ! A la la! Aṃ aṃ! Dhi dhi! Ho ho! Through the blessing of these sounds, both shoulders blazed intensely, and white vajra wrathful ones, utterly white and boundless, emerged. From the blazing forehead, dark-blue wrathful ones of various hues emerged. From the intensely blazing throat, red wrathful ones, fully crimson, emerged. From the intensely blazing heart center, black vajra wrathful ones, blazing and of various hues, emerged. From the intensely blazing navel of the body, green vajra wrathful ones, fully blazing, emerged.

All those blazing wrathful ones — blazing, intensely blazing, blazing in every direction, like tongues of flame — were supremely terrifying, supremely fearsome, appearing with an expression of wild laughter, appearing with an expression of snarling at the perverted and craving, pervading all with great compassion. Their minds engaged in the four activities of pacification, enrichment, magnetizing, and wrath; they transformed the substance of their bodies entirely and accomplished the welfare of beings. All of those who roared fierce sounds from their mouths likewise emanated as wrathful ones in the postures, leaps, and striding of wrathful beings — playing, wide-eyed and glaring, grinding their teeth, knitting their brows in unbearable fury — emanated as supremely unbearable wrathful ones who, with the scent of the supreme essence, the king of perfumes known as mākita, utterly rot the hearts of all malevolent beings. Such blazing wrathful ones emanated and thoroughly emanated.

Then, in a fierce roar, the wrathful mantra was proclaimed:

Oṃ vajra caṇḍa. Oṃ vipule. Oṃ vajra caṇḍa pravara nāga. Oṃ vajra caṇḍa mahānāga hṛdaya. Āvarte. Jvala jvala. Sarva nāga hṛdayāni. Āvarte jvala. Sarva nāga hṛdayāni. Kimi kimi. Nāga kulāni vidhvaṃsani. Hana hana. Sarva nāga duṣṭāṃ hṛdayāni. Daha daha. Sarva duṣṭān nāga bandhani. Paca paca. Pācaya pācaya. Sarva duṣṭāṃ nāgānāṃ. Akrama akrama. Sukrama sakara vimali. Vikrama.

Mahānāga tejā bare svāhā.

At these words, all of them became utterly paralyzed and limp. The world-realm of the great trichiliocosm shook in six ways, shook greatly, and shook thoroughly throughout.

This is the seventh chapter, "The Chapter of Subjugation," from the tantra of the secret mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce.

Then, in order to overwhelm those arrogant ones, the vajra was hurled into the sky, and those arrogant ones were shaken like leaves tossed by the wind. Then, from that wrathful and majestic form, with a thunderous and terrible voice, these words were spoken:

I, the king of wrathful ones, overwhelm without exception

all who dwell within the three realms of existence.
The nāga kings of the four clans with their retinues shall be subdued by fierce and blazing splendor.
I am the sovereign of power and might,
with wrathful voice and majestic form.
By the fierce mudrā I overwhelm all.

Having thus proclaimed these words, he formed the mudrā known as the mudrā of majestic subjugation: he interlaced the fingers of both hands, brought the two thumbs and two little fingers to touch tip to tip separately, and extended them. Then, with the wheel-marked palms of his hands pointed downward, he pronounced the supremely irresistible mantra:

Oṃ vajra caṇḍa vajrapāṇi hūṃ hūṃ. Garuḍa pakṣe. Hūṃ hūṃ. Jeṃ māla bari ci. Ci śri ca hūṃ phaṭ.

At these words, all the arrogant ones and all the nāgas became intoxicated, utterly drunk, and cried out in supplication: "We shall do as you command." All of them, as if they had drunk a powerful intoxicating brew or like people overcome by sleep, spoke together with one voice:

Ah, Lord of Secrets, Blessed One,
lord of vidyā-mantras, king of wrathful ones,
by the power of your vidyā-mantra's proclamation
we are utterly and inexhaustibly intoxicated.
We come as your subjects and seek to follow your command.
O compassionate one, look upon us with favor.
We come as your subjects.
Henceforth we vow not to harm others.

Thus they swore their oath.

This is the eighth chapter, "The Chapter of Overwhelming the Arrogant Ones," from the tantra of the secret mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce.

Then the great commander of the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, known as Śakra (Indra, lord of the gods), came to that place, made offerings with various and abundant offering articles, and addressed the wrathful vajra deity in these words: "O great lord of wrathful ones, since these malicious and arrogant beings have become thoroughly unruly, please, having tamed them, be so kind as to engage in the practice of sustaining the teachings."

At this, the wrathful vajra spoke: "O lord of the gods, hear this. Gather the various substances of the nāgas in their many varieties. Purify and cleanse your own body, dress in clean white cloth that has not been used before, and anoint the body with fragrant drops possessing sweet and warm scent. Prepare a mixture of raw cane sugar, flesh-sugar, and honey, and from seven or nine days beforehand abandon all unwholesome foods. On the body, affix five peacock feathers; let this be done by one possessing wisdom. Blend various nāga medicines together with soft grain into a powder, mix it with sweet water, and make one hundred and eight pills of the size of a rī-lu seed of thick meat. Add also different varieties of nāga medicines so that they include white and other colors.

"Then, regarding these with great compassion, pronounce:

O nāga kings with your retinues, with joy and reverence I invite you.
With playful affection and longing, come hither.
With joy and reverence, harbor no resentment.
All of you, come hither with loving care.

When these words were proclaimed, the senses of all of them became exceedingly clear and pure, like bees gathering on a ripe fruit, and all, arrayed in a joyful countenance and demeanor, assembled in that very place. Then the mantra was proclaimed:

Nāgarāja samaya svāhā.

At these words, all were satisfied. Then all of them together with one voice presented their pledge sequence:

O great hero, lord of wrathful ones, should we transgress your command,
may our heads, bodies, and hearts — be shattered into pieces and rot away.
Tadyathā: oṃ caṭā caṭā, biciṭu, śatha śatha, svacate svāhā.

Thus was the pledge presented.

This concludes the ninth chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce — the chapter on binding the malevolent ones under command.

Then again the Great Lord (Śakra, the lord of the gods, Indra) made supplication: O vajra wrathful ones, if these arrogant ones have become utterly unruly — some with broken and fractured bones, some whose life-formations are nearing their end, some tormented by the suffering of seizure dwelling in the crest-jewel atop the head of Garuḍa, some with blood dried up, some with broken nails and limbs, some fallen into the sleep of delusion and unknowing of the heart of awakening, some with channels and sinews severed and afflicted with manifold diseases, some with the entire body exhausted by fever, some perished with not even their name resounding, some with afflictions proliferated and no longer remembering the awakening mind previously generated, some who, though remembering the generation of the awakening mind, do not behold the face of the Tathāgata, and some who, like beings of the hungry-ghost realm, have no share of food — please grant your command on the means of healing all of these.

At these words, the Lord of the Gods, by the hand of the lord of the gods, healed severed hands. The claws of the water-monster (makara) healed broken nails. The filament of the nāga flower caused the mind of awakening to be remembered. The nāga blossom transformed the nāga's dwelling place into a garden of flowers. The great fragrance of bdellium, having burned away all that is contrary, caused those who merely sniffed it through their nāga-nostrils to remember the awakening mind of supreme awakening previously generated. The husks of rice healed all nāga diseases. The crystal feather quill of the Indian roller bird healed severed channels and sinews. Camphor healed root diseases and satisfied all the vital essence of the body. The leaves of the Darle plant protected from the terror of Garuḍa. Fire-mites, sand-mites, nakedness, royal punishment, earthquakes, disturbances of place caused by the spells of others, and affliction by pegs — from all of these it liberated. Red ochre healed the drying of blood. Conch healed broken bones. A red thread of cloth restored the life-breath and bestowed a pure and vital lifespan. White and sweet substances bestowed supreme food and drink with a hundred flavors. All of these, poured into a precious vase or into a vessel with five spouts and concealed — whatever ailment there may be, it shall be healed.

This concludes the tenth chapter of the tantra of the secret mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce — the chapter on healing nāgas.

Then the Lord of the Gods made supplication: O great vajra wrathful one, how are these ones to be threatened? How are their throats to be cut? How are they to be destroyed?

The vajra wrathful one declared: Hear this, O Lord, Thoroughly Victorious! These are the ones to be threatened. With extreme fury, manifest in the form of Garuḍa above the head. Cast the madness of the vajra wrathful one. Shoot vajras in all ten directions — hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Vajracanḍa aṃ āḥ. Nāga pratha pratha. Hūṃ nāga nāśaya phaṭ.

When these words were declared, those arrogant ones, fearing the arising of the suffering of being cut and pierced in their bodies, were immediately filled with extreme dread — those malevolent ones became utterly terrified and obeyed the command. Filled with extreme fear and trembling, they obeyed the command, supplicating: May the Blessed One look upon them with compassion.

Now, if one desires to cut off the throat, it is to be done according to the fire-offering rite. In the place of the sick one, take the proper measure and smear it with fragrant black male substance. Dig a triangular pit, three tiers deep, going downward. Let all the opening-facings be black vajra. In the center draw an enclosed palace with a diagonal cross. On the harmful wood of the Seskyer plant, stack it triangularly to the measure of a cubit-length. On the sides, apply streaks of red blood one after another.

Split a black thorny wood triangularly. At the black cliff, take the black bark of the naturally born juniper. Make each measure seven by seven finger-widths. The mother measure is triangular, three finger-widths. Mix coarse black grain with blood. Offer the fire-sacrifice with the name-offering fully kindled. One hundred and eight times, plus twenty-one. The liṅga of the great and terrible visualization: gather together filth, semen, blood, hair, footprints, clothing, and the like into a heap, and with the syllable Amukaṃ, summon it with Jaḥ Hūṃ Baṃ Hoḥ. Draw the weapon from wherever the hungry ghost resides. Make it into the form of the visualized one in the aspect of a poisonous snake. The one who suppresses — make the weapon with Jaḥ. Draw it on the chest, face down before it. Launch the strike-weapon, encircle it with the mantra, and offer it together with Māra ya. Wear black garments, a single mat for a seat. The upper garment is dark blue, cast downward. Wear the ancestral-wealth garment of samsara poured over the crown. The great and supreme pouring garment is made with gold thread. Stack the triangular Khamkyong materials. The fire-offering is for me and for the protector. I myself am also the god of fire. Māra ya Phaṭ. Sumbha ni sumbha Hūṃ. Upon the ashes of the completed fire-offering, accomplish it in my countenance. Also place the sign of the enemy within. The earth too is seized with an acacia peg. The boundaries are also separated with the five-colored inks. Then direct the visualization toward it.

Oṃ vajra caṇḍa svabhāva dharmadhātu āḥ. Oṃ vajra ratna pañca trāṃ. Oṃ vajra amṛta pāṇi svāhā. Oṃ vajra ākoṭaya mudgara vajra hana hana hūṃ. Oṃ vajra caṇḍa vajra bhavaye svāhā. Oṃ vajra araje viraje svāhā. Oṃ vajra amṛte āyuje svāhā. Oṃ vajra caṇḍa mahā roṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ. Bruṃ skani ska. Oṃ vajra dharmate svāhā. Oṃ vajra caṇḍa pramar danye svāhā. Caṇḍa puṣpe svāhā.

The supreme bliss of great purity — strike with the vajra hammer of primordial wisdom, and pour its blessing upon it. Strike the afflictions with the hammer of primordial wisdom. Summon the visualization with Jaḥ, the pure red. The contrary one is the vajra cross itself. The place itself is the celestial palace of the deity. All are deities, endowed with food. Into that, introduce it; suppress the maras and afflictions. Conceive that it transforms into myself. Caṇḍa puṣpa ye svāhā.

The major and minor marks flow without interruption. First, by way of preparation, perform the offering. Wash with water, anoint with incense, and wipe with that which is utterly pure.

Thus it was spoken. This is the eleventh chapter, the chapter on cutting off the arrogant ones, from the Tantra of the Secret Mind of the Glorious Vajra Fierce One.

Then the lord of the gods (Śakra, i.e. Indra) supplicated:

Alas, O wrathful king who tames the harmful ones,
What is the means for protecting against the arrogant?
The means of protection are of many kinds —
O Great Tamer of the Harmful, please give the command.

Listen, O lord of all the sense faculties.

The four assembled — mantra, substances, and meditative absorption —
Are the very actuality that accomplishes all intentions.

In the manner of vajra and precious jewel,

Like poison and like fire, like a weapon,

They utterly reverse untimely death.

Endowed with the power of all the buddhas,

One who holds this attains the supreme great accomplishment.

It is comparable to entering into fatigue everywhere.

Regard it as the son of all the buddhas.

Whoever holds this secret mantra

Is seen to be equal to me by all.

Whoever holds this secret mantra —

I myself continuously abide in that one.

In the world, happiness arises.

After passing, one is equal to all the buddhas.

On eleven spokes — ten and the center — write the signs with the encircling syllables. On frozen water, mustard seed. In a hail storm, fine earth. For others, on a blue thread, one knot each. Water or mind, it is for oneself. Śarīraṃ and mighata. Gold and peacock tail-feathers. On a thread of five-colored wool, draw a cakṛa and wear it at the neck and crown. For women on the left, for men on the right — protect thus. From water, one is freed from plague and poison. Flesh, bile, blood, semen — mix with water or eat. This is the accomplishment of the five buddhas, to be practiced by all. It clears away the harm of leprosy and wind disease. Long life too, and increase of the body —

Awakening mind (bodhicitta), white and red, radiant with luster — it clears plague and impure things.

The virtue of fragrant water:

it clears paralysis of the legs, and cold disorders.

It is supremely profound, the highest of secrets — to be practiced by those of fortune who have realization.

How could it be for the unfortunate, the dull of mind?

Thus it was declared. This is the twelfth chapter, the chapter on protective wheels, from the tantra of the secret mind of the glorious Vajra the Fierce.

Then the Lord of Gods (Śakra, i.e., Indra) spoke these words: "In the future, in the future age, please teach the characteristics by which the poison of malevolent sentient beings may be removed, and the places where it enters."

"Listen, great Lord of Gods — hold this well in mind. The characteristics are as follows:

Bone, flesh, and skin,
channels, blood, and inner viscera,

vital essence, bodily fluid and strength, bodily sap, color, and form,
tactile sense, water and yellow fluid (lymph), brain, the fontanelle — throughout the whole body.

The places of entry are eighteen, yet investigate them one by one according to number.

Entry into the bone: the body dries out, there is severe stabbing pain, the sound of cracking, and pain in the vital drops.

Entry into the flesh: the body becomes heavy and lethargic, or alternatively sluggish and inert; the color turns dark, the smell becomes foul, nausea arises, and a sour taste in the flesh appears.

Entry into the skin: the flesh becomes constricted, and the color turns pale.

Entry into the channels: the body becomes numb and heavy, and the sign is that it is difficult to reverse. Creeping numbness, heavy numbness, oozing heat, intense heat, burning heat, spreading heat — the whole body becomes feverishly hot; stabbing heat and the limbs drip with moisture.

Entry into the blood: at times blood drips from the nose; a burning sensation and heaviness arise; the face is constantly reddened, and it appears as though drawn with milk.

Entry into the inner viscera: the lungs and heart are uncomfortable; vomiting is severe; the heart trembles and the heart is uneasy — this is difficult to reverse.

Entry into the vital essence — there are four signs: semen does not arise, the male organ does not stand erect, semen comes in a pale color, and semen comes separated into clear and sediment.

Entry into the bodily fluid — there are three signs: the breath-moisture comes like the sap of lac; nasal discharge is constantly pale and watery; tears from the eyes drip continually; even at the mere arising of yellow-tinged smoke, it drips far more swiftly than otherwise.

Entry into bodily strength: lassitude and despondency; the movement of the body becomes sluggish.

Entry into the bodily sap: the body's natural fragrance and so forth — the bodily scent — dissipates as though the feathers of a bird were stripped away.

Entry into the color: the tongue takes on the color of madder dye.

Entry into the form: the body becomes filled with small wrinkles; the fingers resemble a rat's tail.

Entry into the tactile sense: the tip of the nose and other extremities, including the fingertips — the body is afflicted with burning heat and scorching, and numbness arises in them.

Entry into the bodily water: the limbs become stiff and painful; the flesh swells; a cold, tingling sensation arises; and the joints collectively throb.

Entry into the yellow fluid: there are five signs concerning the yellow fluid — itching and biting, itching and stinging, a thick oppressive heat, and fluid-filled swellings on the body. Once the fluid-swellings appear, they cannot be drained away; what remains on the body are pustules like lentils. This is easy to reverse.

Entry into the brain: the head becomes swollen and distended; confusion and numbness arise; and sounds become faint and muffled, and so forth.

Entry into the fontanelle: the face becomes flushed with heat, and then comes a cold chill. This is easy to reverse. The entire body and face take on an ashen, pale color — this is difficult to reverse.

The extremely wrathful nāgas (nāga) have no visible signs; they are the inner light of mind. Difficult to reverse, with a host of wounds, the signs of not surviving are absent. Easy to reverse are these others as well — along with the subtle, coarse, short, long, and so forth of the limbs. These should be understood as the characteristics of nāgas.

Among those, certain ones are permanent — — some arise from other underlying diseases as well. Some are not nāga afflictions at all. There are also those that arise from karma. The distinguishing characteristics of each of these must be understood separately by the learned.

Diseases arising from underlying illness are helped by medicine and suitable food. Other diseases are not long-lasting. One should know characteristics such as these. Upon knowing them, one should apply diligent effort with various skillful means, without confusion, and work at the task of reversal.

Just as fine drops of water, falling at the right moment, bore through solid rock — so too, even the most virulent and tenacious affliction can be overcome. Free from laziness, with one-pointed mind, by continuous meditation on the deity and the recitation of mantra, one is certain to be liberated from malignant disease. With great effort and free from doubt, there is nothing one has set one's mind to that will not be accomplished. With direct perception, look upon the heaps of conditioned existence, upon life burdened with its aggregates. Do not abandon effort.

Thus spoke the glorious great Tumpo. This is the thirteenth chapter, the chapter on examining characteristics, from the Secret Mind Tantra of the Glorious Vajra Tumpo.

Then Śakra, lord of the gods (Indra, king of the devas), spoke these words: Blessed One, in the later times, how are the poisons of malignant hungry ghosts (pretas) to be extracted? How are the offering rites to be performed? May the Lord of all phenomena grant instruction.

The Blessed One declared: Listen, O lord of the gods. If one wishes to perform the offering rites, one should dwell for the three summer months beside a solitary temple, a sacred site, a spring, a lake, a pond, or a well. The form should be made well-shaped, fitting, beautiful, and adorned. It should be provided with the five parts of the syllable BA, with incense and fragrance, and with the five bindus. In the center, write HŪṂ clearly. From these four — OM PHĀ PHO PHAI PHĀṂ — generate them fully.

The nāga king of the ocean: his body is white, with three jewel-adorned serpent heads, and in his hand a jeweled stalk. The nāga king is covered on all sides with a parasol. The second serpent head is yellow in color, and in that hand a blazing jewel. The water deity has five heads, red in color, and in the hand a blazing lotus. The nāga king Śiṃhala-puraka: in his hand a mass of clouds, green in color. King, lord, brahmin, and commoner — each is the king of his own class. Make them beautiful in form, with a sleek, smooth, well-fed appearance. Surround them with a retinue of sentient beings.

Gather together the various white and sweet nāga medicines and offer them. Pour them into a bowl with a five-spouted vessel, seal it, and conceal it in the place. The foremost activity is that of bringing about healing. Invite them, set out the seat, offer prostrations and refuge, perform praise, aspirational prayers, and so forth at great length. Invoke truth and make firm declarations.

For the activity of extracting poisons: from the syllables RĀṂ, YĀṂ, and KHĀṂ arise the three wheels of fire, wind, and water. Burn, scatter, and wash with emptiness. Remain within the great wheel. Be endowed with what arises from HŪṂ. With the noble guardian and with vigilance regarding harm, and with the offering that has equanimity, make the offering. On that very day, erect it and recite from the marks. A thousand fish, timely offerings, and warding off misfortune. By this, aims will be accomplished.

This is the fourteenth chapter, the chapter teaching the extraction of poisons and the offering rites, from the Secret Mind Tantra of the Glorious Vajra Tumpo.

Then the Lord of all Tathāgatas declared:

In the age that has become the degenerate final time, beings act non-virtuously with no shame toward wrongdoing, commit boundless transgressions and destroy the wealth of Dharma.
When there is leprosy, scrofula, scabies, wasting disease, pustules, and paralysis of one side — at that time my teaching will arise.

Listen, O foremost of lords, supreme among the retinue.
For those who are perverted by craving, difficult to tame, outcasts, those who cannot be subdued by peaceful means — this wheel has been appointed as their slayer.

With the dhāraṇī of Krodhārāja (the Wrathful King), encircled by vajra-blades, fenced with vajra prongs, with the four diligences, and in the center as the fifth — that is it. If one wishes to expand further upon it, then the particulars of the surrounding gallery and the syllables —

Made with eleven, cut the weapon — name and clan for a single surrounding gallery; HŪṂ and name and clan, many, bound together. In the central surrounding gallery, write the mantra; if many, bind it with that. On the one, vajra and HŪṂ between; if many, cut. If the wish of the feet is not broken, it is a male rite. If that has not come about, it is a rite of binding male and female.
If the auspicious fortune of one who has merit is not subdued, then spin the wheel of reversal of existence, churning and turning it. On crow-skin, write with a quill made from the feather of a crow or owl, on a black seat, in blue ink.
Mix asafoetida, burned wood, donkey blood, and donkey poison. Cut HŪṂ between the center and the four chapel-cells. For all actions of universal laughter, kill by writing this mantra on male and female.

OM VAJRA CAṆḌA MAHĀ ROṢAṆA HŪṂ PHATṬ.

Encircle male and female; cut off the lineage; insert into male and female.
Attach the HŪṂ of the center, draw a thread through the brahma-opening.

Place YAKṢA KHAM PHAṬ in the four directions. Place vajra and the supreme HŪṢ between. Smear with a mixture of various poisons and various bloods into a black amulet-case. Gugula resin, Chinese tallow, great tallow of sheep and goat — to apply these with black semen is supremely auspicious. Bind with the scum of a black donkey-knife, asafoetida, the hair of a corpse, the cut hair and thread of a woman of epidemic-spirit. Bind with the girdle-cord of a woman of epidemic-spirit, wind it around a bell, and hide it. Draw a crossed vajra above and below the skulls of male and female. Having pressed down Mount Meru with the first four of both extremities, write the mantra on the four tiers, and cover it above with a crossed vajra. Below the crossed vajra, above the cavity, the measure of one cubit. On the four tiers, this mantra — body, speech, and mind — write it to indicate it as my own Mount Meru.

OM LAṢ HŪṢ LAṢ STAMBHANĀṢ. OM VAJRA CAṆḌANĀṢ.

Thus it was declared. This is the fifteenth chapter, the chapter on the fierce wheel, from the tantra of the secret mind of Śrī Vajra the Ferocious.

At that time, by the power of this declaration, the world-realm itself was shaken — thoroughly shaken. In all world-realms, some were agitated in the manner of revolving to the right, some were agitated in the manner of revolving to the left, some were agitated in the manner of being upturned upper and lower by nine, and some were agitated in the manner of rising and falling, rippling. All the malevolent ones dwelling in those places became utterly intoxicated and vomited corrupt blood, then wiped it away, and all of them assembled directly there at that very spot, prostrated, and with a single voice cried out these words:

Alas! Never before have we seen this awesome, wrathful form of the Lord.

So extremely fierce and violent — how astonishing!

Look upon us with compassion; we come as your subjects.

If we transgress this, may we fall into hell.

Thus they supplicated and remained.

Then the king of māras, the lord of the hosts, together with tens of millions of hundreds of thousands of māras, with one voice offered up the heart-essence of their vital life force: Blessed One, accept this our vidyā mantra. OM NAGPO TRI ṬA TRI ṬA TRI LIṢ TRA TA HA KE ṆA. Wherever this our vidyā dwells, the māras will not act in opposition to it. Whatever is wished for in the mind, that they will accomplish. Even harmful spells and sorcery combined that are sent out — they will turn back.

Then the great fierce planetary lord Rāhu, together with his retinue of hundreds of thousands of planets, with one voice offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: ŚU ŚU RAKṢA TSALPA. KRODHAKROLEŚVARA. RĀHULA. CA TI CA TI. Wherever this our vidyā dwells, the planets will not act in opposition to it. Even harmful things sent out — they will return to that very source. To whoever holds this, whatever is desired, that too will be granted.

Then the king Whiteness-with-a-topknot-of-conch and other such kings, together with retinues of hundreds of thousands, arrived and with one voice offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: BRAHMĀ PUḌIṢ. AVARTARĀJA DHANA RAKṢA CITA PHYUNG RĀJA CITA RĀJA PHYUNG RĀJA CITA GTUḤ. Wherever this our vidyā is present, within the country and for many leagues around, they will not act in opposition to it. Even harmful things sent out will return to that very source.

Then the red btsan (a class of fierce spirit), the life-seizing btsan, together with many hundreds of thousands, with one voice offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: ĀVIŚU RĀJA TRILIṢ. We and all our retinue will not transgress against this. Even harmful things sent out will return to that very source.

Then the king of Yama, lord of the dead, named Smoky Haze, together with his retinue, with one voice offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: YAMA RĀJA YAMA CITTA. Where this our vidyā is practiced, we shall not dare to cause harm. Having abandoned the stream of harm, whatever harmful things are sent out will return to that very source.

Then the five mother queens of the mothers of space, the sisters of māra and of the lord of the dead who destroy existence — Rematī and the like — together with an immeasurable host of māmō (a class of wrathful female spirits), offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: RAGMO MĀMĀ RULU ŚĪṢ KHA RAKṢA JA PĀLA MAMA BHYO BHYO. Whoever practices this our secret mantra, we will protect and shelter. Together with our retinues, we will act in accordance with the command. Whatever harmful things are sent out will return to that very source.

Then the nāgas together with their retinues, with one voice, offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force: NĀGA RĀJA NĀGANI. Wherever the king of vidyā mantras is practiced, we will cut off the stream of harm done by our nāgas. Whatever harmful things are sent out will return to that very source. Thus, each in turn offered their own seal and heart-essence of vital life force and swore an oath.

Then the Great Lord (Śakra, king of the gods) addressed the lord of the wrathful ones in these words: All these powerful lords of existence — how are they to be repelled by the wheel? Please declare the special method of repulsion.

The Blessed One spoke: Listen, lord of the gods. From the mantra wheels of Mārāya write out, one by one, the mantra wheel for each. Bind and affix them as mantra-wheel repellers, reversers of sorcery, reversers of pledges. Into the interior of a large skull — one devoid of the three lips, the skin over the heart, using a skull of a corpse, fish, frog, pig — a knife with no handle and a great skull — drive the wheel with fierce spinning. On roads and pathways that are crossed, at crossroads and junctions, and on highways, inscribe an E-shape with a stylus, and with red marker, smear and anoint with the black blood of a horse and the blood of a mole. Set the wheel at the center, surround and press it at the borders, and perform the rites of suppression. Alternatively, pack it tightly into a effigial lump and hurl it in fury.

Thus it was declared. This is the sixteenth chapter of the glorious Vajra Fierce One, the tantra of the secret mind: the chapter on the offering of the heart-essence of vital life force by the arrogant ones and the repulsion through fierce rites of subjugation.

Then the lord of the gods beseeched: O, at the time when the teaching is being destroyed, please teach how to strike down enemies with the effigial rite.

The Blessed One spoke: Listen, lord of the gods. With substance, mantra, and meditative absorption — these three — let anger and aversion be aroused by wrath. Mindful of aversion, gather the harmful substances: white mustard, black mustard, the herb called setsé, sesame, thorns, barberry thorns, and thorns of the séwa plant. Recite the effigial mantra over these and scatter them. Or else insert them into a torma or into a skull of inauspicious characteristics.

OM VAJRA CAṆḌA MAHĀROṢAṆA HŪṂ PHAṬ. MĀRAYA THUN PHOB. DBANG PO LA YAṂ. SROG LA YAṂ. CITTA LA YAṂ. GO RO CA NA LA YAṂ.

On the ill-omened night, bring down the vajra thunderbolt. All the powers and magical capacities of the targeted adversary — gather them into oneself, wash away the habitual tendencies of conceptuality. Play with this mantra, reciting it while ringing the offering bell.

OM BALIṢ TA. BALIṢ PŪJA ARGHAṢ PRATĪCCHA HOḤ. VAJRA KRODHA CAṆḌA. BALIṢ KHĀHI KHĀHI. VAJRA KRODHA CAṆḌA HA HA HA. HE HE HE. BHAṬĀ SVĀHĀ.

The hearts of serpents and frogs, fish, and crocodiles; great flesh, great blood, and all manner of enjoyments — meditate greatly on the mudrā of supreme wisdom. YAṢ scatter, RAṢ burn, KHAṢ wash, and transform into nectar. Purify them as pure amṛta with this mantra:

OM ĀḤ HŪṢ SARVA PAÑCA AMṚTA. VAJRA AMṚTA HŪṢ HRĪḤ THĀḤ. OM MAHĀ RAKTA JVALA RAṢ KHAṢ. KHĀHI KHĀHI. HŪṢ HŪṢ HŪṢ. HĀ HĀ HĀ.

An ocean-mass of outer, inner, and secret offerings — all that is actually present and all that is mentally emanated — vividly visualized until the fields of the ten directions are filled: strive in this with tireless day-and-night diligence, through the spirit of birthlessness. Endowed with primordial wisdom free from grasping and resting in meditative equipoise, offer this great offering to all the buddhas of the three times in body and speech, to the assemblies of bodhisattvas, female bodhisattvas, wrathful gods, and wrathful goddesses — making them joyful, satisfying the sentient beings to whom offering and giving are owed.

Thus it was declared. This is the seventeenth chapter — the chapter on the fierce feast-offering — from the tantra of the secret mind of the glorious Vajra Fierce One.

Then Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, and all the other gods dwelling on Mount Meru and in the sky above came forward bearing divine flowers, garlands, incense, powders, divine garments, foods, various ornaments, fragrant smoke, cymbals, ointments, various sounds, and various perfumes. Those worldly ones likewise came bearing their own varied offerings. With reverence and devotion, they all supplicated with a single voice:

Though the wrathful king's body is without impurity, we offer bathing water: pure water, scented water, medicinal water, nectar-water, and the rest — bathe your body in this oblation we present.
ĀHARA HŪṢ.

The fragrance of camphor, of the six fine medicines,
of aloewood and duruka,

of musk and various perfumes —
we offer these to your nostrils, unobstructed.
DHŪPA PŪJA MEGHA HŪṂ.

Flowers of the five precious kinds,
flowers born from water and flowers born from the fields, and flowers emanated by mind —
we offer these upon the head of the Vajra-holder.
PUṢPA PŪJA MEGHA HŪṂ.

Butter lamps of grain-oil, lamps of resin-oil, torch-lights bright with jeweled flames, lamps of quintessential vitality and power —
we offer these to the eyes of the fierce wrathful one.
ĀLOKE PŪJA MEGHA HŪṂ.

The five-fold incense combined with the five medicines, rasāyana, and amṛta —
we offer this supreme fragrance to the Vajra-holder.
GANDHE PŪJA MEGHA HŪṂ.

The supreme nectar possessed of a hundred excellent flavors — receive it with pleasure and regard it with delight.
AMṚTĀBHARA HŪṂ.

All sounds of universal renown without exception, and the cymbals that proclaim the sacred Dharma — we offer them.
SGĀRAṆA KHAM.

Having supplicated thus with a single voice, they remained there in a state of joyful presence.

This is the eighteenth chapter — the chapter on the retinue of the proud ones making supplication with reverence and offering — from the tantra of the secret mind of the glorious Vajra Fierce One.

Then that vajra wrathful one proclaimed to that retinue of proud ones this teaching intended as the samaya to be practiced:

The supreme mind itself, transcending the extremes of non-abiding, is the ground of all, from which the manifold magical displays arise.
Unmodified by nature, it is not made by conditions — to abide in that is to guard one's own samaya.

Though it be thus, take it up for the purpose of radiating light.
To reveal the blazing jewel to those who cannot see it, and to dispel the fever of beings through the blessing of compassion, and to satisfy through words like nectar — conferring the power of ability upon the field of the all-base consciousness, that protector who guards beings with compassion:
the ally of all buddhas of the three times, honor him inwardly, like one's own heart, in the birthless dream-like state.
Guide the stream of the vajra of speech like the current of a river;
without weariness, strive with diligence day and night.

Bind closely to the vajra shoulders without slack, then guide.
Praise that sublime one with words free from falsehood.
If the empowerments of explanation are not fully revealed, even should nectar drip from the vajra tongue,
do not let even a drop spill forth to others.
What is fit to be kept secret, entrust as a secret — keep the mantras and names concealed.

Worship the vajra body, unchanging through the three times.
Whatever karmic ripening of illness, death, and the like, whatever unbearable suffering and exhaustion may arise — arouse heightened mindfulness and hold it in your continuity.
In the four modes of conduct — going, lying down, sitting, eating — hold them in your continuity with unforgetting wisdom.

The preceptor's faults, the secret words, the yidam deity — do not abandon them even for the sake of your life. Fourth: do not let the mind turn toward that in such a way as to abandon it; rather, by mindfulness, hold it continuously in your stream. Cultivate the conduct of a mirage or a flowing stream. Practice the conduct that is contrary to ordinary, discursive behavior.
Like a vessel that is cracked and leaking, poisoned and despised — into such a vessel one does not pour pearls or nectar — so too, through the conduct of skillful means, learn to distinguish what is fit and what is not. In every respect, abandon deterioration in full measure.

If these are transgressed, the suffering of the vajra hell — a river of pain, burning and utterly unbearable — could not be fully described by the buddhas of the three times nor by me. There is no passage from one condition to another, no time for liberation. But if you pass through without transgression, keeping the bright path intact, this is absolutely certain. I and all the buddhas of the three times have this very point in mind. The fruit aimed at through whatever object of focus will not be squandered. May the Dharma-protectors who guard the directions watch over and protect it.

Thus it was declared. This is the nineteenth chapter, the chapter on the arrangement of the samayas (sacred pledges), from the tantra entitled The Secret Heart of the Glorious Fierce Vajra.

Then, for that assembly, this definitive utterance was proclaimed: Listen, all of you assembled retinue! The ultimate truth is without distinction, free from all partiality and all extremes. It neither apprehends nor abides, neither rejects nor obstructs. What abides in its intrinsic nature admits of no correction. It is not the domain of conceptual thought; it is not the sphere of activity of subtle faculties. It does not abide as a thing; it is free from all characteristics. It cannot be measured by superimposition or denial. It is not empty — it transcends conventional designation. It does not abide, it does not conceptualize, it is not produced by conditions. It is devoid of all things, it transcends all extremes, it is beyond expression. There is no definite delineation by the word "this," and it cannot be pointed out as such. It is the substance of all the buddhas — the lord of the three times, father and mother together — and the essence of all things. The intrinsic nature of sentient beings and of the world-realm, and the intrinsic nature of buddha-realms throughout — all of these are one. By no enumeration whatsoever does anything exist apart from it. Nothing is blocked, yet there is no certainty of being one. It is the reality of all buddhas, beyond all conventional expression. Liberation in this way is the supreme path of yoga. It is difficult for even the subtlest faculties to infer through analysis. With respect to it, there is no faculty of expansion or contraction. In form, color, or appearance, in no way whatsoever is its suchness established — and it has no antidote. Just as in the great expanse of the sky, vapor, rainbows, mist, clouds and the like, storms, blizzards, gusts of wind, and whatever else may arise — the great sky is not moved or shaken by any of these. Whatever arises at first, arises from within its expanse; whatever is stilled at last, is stilled back into its expanse. All of these dissolve and are absorbed into it. Vast and great, they rest in the hollow of space.

Sentient beings of the three realms and buddhas of the three times — in the ultimate, they are my own intrinsic nature; I myself am that. Whatever virtuous, negative, or other actions all beings perform, within that self-arisen and magically endowed reality there is neither increase nor decrease. Self-arisen primordial wisdom has no cause, no condition, no thingness. The distinction of sentient being and buddha is the child of cognitive thought. In it there is no division, no name, no collection of syllables.

Thus it was declared. This is the twentieth chapter, the chapter on the cause of the ground of awakening, from the tantra entitled The Secret Heart of the Glorious Fierce Vajra.

Then that wrathful retinue, struck with wonder, with a single voice and with smiling radiance, offered this praise:

E-ma-ho! Vajrasattva (Skt. vajrasattva), great bodhisattva!

King of all vajra-holders!

Vajra — great Vajradhara!

A vajra body — you are the great one!

Destroyer of all stains of ignorance!

You who were awakened even before all the buddhas!

Homage and praise to you, the protector of all beings!

A vajra body — supreme among bodies!

The many bodies are emanated as distinct,
and the inferior bodies you render with awe.

The definitive meaning of body is fathomless.

Homage and praise to you, the vajra body!

Greatly blazing vajra, blazing with fire!

With that blazing light, you vanquish all who are hostile.

Vajra force — great in power!

Homage and praise to you, great vajra weapon!

Vajrapāṇi, great in primordial wisdom!

The vajra of your mouth pierces all enemies.

Vajra fangs, supremely sharp!

Homage and praise to you, great speech, vast as the ocean!

Vajra lotus — great awakening!

Your very mind is buddha, self-arisen.

The vajra is vast — supreme among minds!

Homage and praise to you, Vajra Yoga, great mind!

Terrifier, fierce and greatly dark!

Vajra Terrifier, you who strike with hatred!

Hard to accomplish, yet accomplished well — great in qualities!
Praise and homage to you, Vajra Qualities, supremely excellent!

Vajra Wrathful One, greatly fierce!

Hala, hala — greatly dark!

You who move through the evil age of conceptual time!

Homage and praise to you, Vajra Sattva!

Thus he was praised with abundant praise. This concludes the twenty-first chapter of the Tantra of the Secret Mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce, the chapter on the assembly's abundant praise.

Then Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, spoke these words: Kyai! O Vajra Wrathful One — when the age is evil and the teachings do not abide, please declare the method for bringing down hail of ice upon the world-realm.

The Blessed One declared: Listen, O great lord! To destroy the world, bring down the nāga's ice. This secret action is supremely dark.

Namo Buddhāya. Vajra Caṇḍa Mahāroṣaṇa Hūṃ Phaṭ. Oṃ Vajra Caṇḍa. Kili Kili. Caṇḍa Mora Ciṇa. Caṇḍa Caṇḍe. Nāga Bandhāya Phaṭ Svāhā.

An eight-fingered khadira-wood stake, smeared with fat, soot, and blood, and fumigated with bdellium resin — plant it at the root, fix a mantra-shroud upon it, recite it countless times from the very beginning, at the highest count. If driven into a nāga's dwelling, Garuḍa will bind him and he cannot escape. Driven toward a direction, it reverses; driven into ground, insects and worms will consume it. Driven into a garden, horses will trample it, black goats and sheep will inhabit it. Driven in, nothing grows, and even mountain streams will be turned back. Driven into a village of common folk or at the gate of a king, the common village will be destroyed; the people of the king's retinue will scatter and be struck by sickness, but if the stake is removed they will be freed. Driven into a nāga's abode, all will be bound.

Go to the dark place and perform this rite. Face north, seek out a spring, make it deeply dark with a covering of shadow. On the head there is a black stone with pride clinging to it. At that place, with a black expanse of four fathoms, its summit to the south, cause white and black stones and the horns of a red bull to grow. Dry, cut into four pieces, smear and blacken the outside with blood and poison. Boil the blood of a goat, a dog, and a human — contemplate with meditative absorption. Hold dear the many emanations of Garuḍa. By means of white and black smoke, arouse memory and bring them under your power.

Then the following, called Invoking the Garuḍa, was spoken:

Hrīḥ! Garuḍa arisen from the wish-fulfilling tree, your wings of gnosis blaze, your eyes are golden.

Your vajra beak, your talons — with grappling hook unimpeded — from the summit of Mount Meru you reach the ocean's depths.

You hurl the nāga king from his throne and devour his nāga young.

Command the nāgas and bring down the frozen waters!

Overpower them with blazing force, suppress them with the power of mantra.

Nāgarāja Phuṭṭa Phuṭṭa!

Recite a thousand times, bind them with the binding, strike the spring! Place a nāga's form — a seven-headed serpent — green, raw, in the mouth. Blood comes from the head: for this, recite the eight root mantras. Nāga, Nāga — drive blood inward, drive it to the head! Nāga — force a stream of blood violently upon its head! Recite the eight root mantras, perform the hearth rite with the blood residue. Mix ash with water, strike it into the spring. Hail and frost will come just as you desire. The nāga's form becomes dark and greatly swollen. From its eyes lightning flickers; from its mouth yellow blood flows down. Meditating thus, the nāga is agitated and hail descends.

This concludes the twenty-second chapter of the Tantra of the Secret Mind of Glorious Vajra the Fierce, the chapter on worldly hail and frost.

Then again Śakra, lord of the gods, asked: How does one bring down the ultimate fierce action? What is the fierce method of combining substances with mantras? Where is the hidden place and time and what constitutes beauty in this? And how should the order of protection be arranged? Thus he asked.

The Blessed One declared: Listen! O fortunate lord of the gods, listen! This is the fierce combination of substances and mantras. Fumigate with leprosy flesh, leprosy fat, skull fat, and great grease. Pour in the impurities and combine them with fire from a charnel ground. Bind them tightly at the foot of a plague-tree, darkening the mouth, and plant a khadira stake at the side of a spring. Set the time to the autumn month of the middle lunar day, when the wild planets roam. Set it also at dawn in the east, and at midday assign it to fish.

The supreme substance, the glacial spring, flows day by day.

Then the Blessed One commanded the invocation of Raktacāmuṇḍī, the antidote to all nāgas, saying:

Hūṃ! Her body blazes like meteoric iron, her hair a mane of red and golden fire.
She carries in her mouth the three realms and the three existences, and the three existences swirl within her belly.
She conflicts with the space above, she conflicts with the earth below.
From her eyes she reveals the medicine of the sun,
from her mouth she reveals the mark of the moon.
In her hand she holds the nine-peaked Mount Meru.
Ferocious, blazing, supremely wrathful,
she who heeds the command of Vajrapāṇi, she who tames — the nāga-taming antidote — bound by her sacred pledge, she draws the nāgas forth.
She feeds on the flesh of nāgas,
she brings the realms and ranks of nāgas under her power.

The mantra was declared: Oṃ nāga-zhung-thün jvala jvala chinda chinda bhinda bhinda phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The six armors of karma are supremely precious.

The mantra for suppressing reversals was declared: Nāgali-dumpaya sadamdhe-vā kuru hūṃ hūṃ jaḥ jaḥ bhyo bhyo.

Thus it was said: upon the body, in the manner of a wheel.

This is the twenty-third chapter, the chapter on the ultimate fierce activity, from the Secret Mind Tantra of the Glorious Fierce Vajra.

Then the members of that assembly asked: Blessed One, how shall we grasp the boundaries you have set? Thus they beseeched him.

He declared: O assembly of the tamed, listen! Understand my intrinsic nature as the Sugata of the three times. Understand my intrinsic nature as without birth. Understand my intrinsic nature as without cessation. Understand my intrinsic nature as emptiness. That which I am — know that to be the Lord of Secrets. That which I am — understand it to be Vajrasattva. That which I am — understand it to be the victor over the three realms. That which I am — understand it to be the Great Wrathful One himself. That which I am is the Dharma — is the aggregate of Dharma.

Having thus declared it, all the Tathāgatas were filled with delight and joy.

This is the twenty-fourth chapter, the chapter on complete entrustment, from the Secret Mind Tantra of the Glorious Fierce Vajra.

Translated in accordance with the oral transmission of the Indian master Ābhāyukta, and rendered into Tibetan by the Tibetan translator Chökyi Tsöndrū. This translation is complete.

Translator's Notes

- The passage lists two color terms together that appear redundant — "sngon ba, sngon por snang ba, sngon bar gyur pa" — rendered as a triple emphasis on the deep blue color of vaiḍūrya. The added phrase "like green" reflects the term indranīla, which in Sanskrit denotes a blue-green sapphire; the apparent color inconsistency (blue versus green) is in the source text and likely reflects the gemstone's dual-toned quality.

The nāga names Norbu, Norgyé, Closely Black, Delightful, and Closely Delightful are Tibetan renderings of nāga king names; no standard Sanskrit equivalents are established in the canon for all of them, so they are rendered in translation of their Tibetan forms.

The term "mi gnas pa'i ye shes chen po" rendered as "great non-abiding wisdom" refers to the technical Mahāyāna concept of non-abiding nirvāṇa, the wisdom that abides in neither saṃsāra nor quiescent nirvāṇa.

- The mantra passage is transliterated directly from Tibetan-script phonetic rendering of Sanskrit; the syllables are preserved as they appear, without normalization beyond standard transliteration conventions, as this is liturgically canonical material that should not be editorially emended.

The entity "btsans" (spelled btsans in the text, rendered as btsan) refers to a class of powerful Tibetan worldly spirits; no Sanskrit equivalent exists. "Red Life-Taker" renders dmar po srog len, a proper name of this btsan king.

The figure "Revati the Devastating" renders gśin rje'i sring mo phung byed re ba ti — the sister of the Lord of Death named Phuṅbyed, identified with the Indian figure Revatī; the compound name is preserved.

The "five saṃbhogakāya bodies" renders longs spyod rdzogs pa'i sku lnga; this may refer to the five buddha families in their saṃbhogakāya aspect, a reading consistent with the tantric context.

- The mantra syllables E, YAṂ, RĀṂ, KHĀṂ, SŪṂ, KĒṂ, and BHRŪṂ are standard tantric seed-syllables associated with the five elements and the five families; they are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan rather than rendered semantically, which is standard practice for seed-syllables in tantric literature.

The term "abhiṣoṣaṇa hūṃ" is a mantra phrase transliterated directly; it relates to a wrathful subjugation or drawing-in function.

The phrase "sthira baṃ" is likewise a mantra command meaning roughly "be still, baṃ" — retained as transliteration in keeping with tantric convention.

- The Sanskrit mantra syllables in the empowerment section are presented as they appear in the Tibetan liturgical text. Some syllables in the invocation mantra (Hūṃ e yaṃ raṃ khaṃ su raṃ keṃ brūṃ and what follows) do not conform to standard Sanskrit morphology and are best treated as dhāraṇī-type ritual strings; they are transliterated without emendation. The rendering of Kṣīṃ follows the Tibetan phonetic transcription; this syllable is a recognized bīja (seed-syllable) associated with garuḍa in tantric contexts.

- The term rendered as "great bull hide" follows from the context of the preceding passage's list of hides worn as garments signifying taming of afflictions; the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མེད་ (literally "great field" or "great domain") is unusual here and may instead indicate a bull or ox hide used as a seat-cloth or garment. The reading is uncertain, and some editions may differ.

The perfume name "mākita" renders the Tibetan རྩི་མཚོག་གི་རྒྱལ་པོ་མཁི་ཏཱ་ (rtsi mchog gi rgyal po ma gi ta); this appears to be a transliteration of a Sanskrit term for a celebrated fragrant substance, possibly agarū or a related resin. The precise identification is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered as "flesh-sugar" for རྩི་མཚོག་ translates a compound that likely refers to a type of raw or coarse sugar; the exact substance is uncertain, and some commentarial traditions gloss it differently. The pill-size comparator རྩི་མཚོག་གི་རྒྱལ་པོ་མཁི་ཏཱ་ can also be read as "a ri-lu grain of thick consistency," indicating a medicinal pill recipe whose precise ingredients belong to tantric ritual medicine traditions rather than standard pharmacology. The text breaks off mid-verse at the end of this passage, as the following line would complete the pledge.

- The phrase rendered "lord of the gods" throughout refers to Śakra, already glossed in the preceding passage. The passage uses "Great Lord" and "Lord of the Gods" somewhat interchangeably for Śakra, which the translation preserves.

The ritual plant name "Darle" is a transliteration of the Tibetan dar le brgan; its botanical identification is uncertain, but it is rendered phonetically as it appears to be a specific plant name in the nāga-healing pharmacopoeia.

"Seskyer" is similarly a transliteration of the Tibetan se skyer, a thorny plant used in wrathful fire-offering rites; its precise botanical identification in Western taxonomy is not firmly established.

"Water-monster" for chu srin renders the Tibetan term for a makara-like aquatic creature; "makara" could equally be used.

The phrase "enclosed palace with a diagonal cross" renders gzhal yas rgya gram, meaning a maṇḍala-palace diagram with crossed diagonal lines, a standard wrathful ritual diagram.

- The liṅga passage: the term "liṅga" here is a ritual effigy or figure representing the target of the rite, standard in wrathful fire-offering (homa) contexts. The Tibetan "dmigs pa" rendered "visualization" in most places also carries the sense of the ritual target or effigy throughout this passage.

The phrase rendered "Khamkyong" is a ritual container name left transliterated as a technical term for a triangular vessel used to collect offerings in wrathful rites; its precise identification is uncertain.

The colophon "Glorious Vajra Fierce One" renders dpal rdo rje gtum po, which corresponds to Sanskrit Śrī Vajraçaṇḍa, the wrathful deity whose tantra this text claims to be.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text itself is cut off.

- The phrase rendered "inner light of mind" for "thugs kyi 'od" is unusual in a medical-diagnostic context; it may mean something like "their [affliction] has no outward sign, being like an inner radiance" — that is, the extremely wrathful nāgas manifest no visible external signs, making diagnosis and reversal especially difficult. This is a genuinely ambiguous phrase and the rendering here is interpretive.

The term "nang grol" rendered as "inner viscera" is a medical term for the internal organs, appropriate in this diagnostic context.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with the source being a mid-chapter excerpt.

- The term rendered "slayer" for རྩུམ་པོ་ corresponds to a deliberate wrathful usage: the wheel is established in the role of an executioner or killer in the service of taming those who resist all peaceful approaches. This is standard tantric idiom for wrathful subjugation and should not be softened.

The nāga king name རྩུམ་པོ་འཕགས་པ་ is a phonetic transcription; the Sanskrit underlying it is uncertain but likely relates to "Śiṃhalapuraka" or a similar epithet; this is noted here rather than in the text body.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the original, as the chapter break and a new section begin immediately; the translation follows the source faithfully.

- The ritual instructions in the opening section are densely telegraphic — they prescribe the construction of a wrathful maṇḍala wheel used in subjugation and destruction rites, specifying materials, ink colors, script placement, and physical components. The rendering follows the Tibetan closely without smoothing over the technical ellipses, which reflect the abbreviated register of tantric ritual manuals.

The phrase rendered "woman of epidemic-spirit" translates yugs sa mo, a being associated with contagion and pestilence in Indo-Tibetan demonology; the term refers to a particular class of malignant female spirit rather than an ordinary woman.

The mantra syllables and dhāraṇī strings are transliterated as they appear, with normalized diacritics where Sanskrit roots are recoverable; several syllables in the māra and planetary pledges appear corrupt or purely ritual-phonemic and are rendered as found.

"Brahma-opening" refers to the brahmarandhra, the crown aperture at the top of the skull, a standard tantric anatomical term.

The colophon phrase "body, speech, and mind" in the Mount Meru passage likely refers to the three-syllable seed-mantra group OM AH HUM mapped onto the tiers, a standard Vajrayāna correspondence.

- The term btsan refers to a class of Tibetan indigenous fierce spirits, often red in color and associated with swift, lethal power. The rendering is kept as btsan since it is a proper category name with no standard English equivalent.

Rematī is a well-known dark goddess in the tantric pantheon, described here as the sister of māra and the lord of the dead, and as a destroyer of existence. The Tibetan name given is Re ma ti.

The phrase rendered "skull devoid of the three lips and the skin over the heart" reflects a ritual specification that the skull be one from which lips and heart-skin have been removed; the precise anatomical referent of "three lips" is technically ambiguous in the tradition and may refer to the three outer lips of the skull's orifices, but this is not a consequential doctrinal uncertainty.

The phrase "Go ro ca na" in the mantra sequence likely reflects the Sanskrit gorocana, a golden pigment of ritual significance used in tantric rites; it is left in transliteration as part of the mantra.

- The phrase rendered "to reveal the blazing jewel to those who cannot see it" is a simile: the blazing jewel that cannot be seen by the blind is a classical image for the Buddha's teaching.

The Tibetan "sning bzhin skye med rmi lam nang du bkur" is compressed and somewhat elliptical; the rendering "honor him inwardly, like one's own heart, in the birthless dream-like state" follows the most natural doctrinal reading but the syntax permits slight variation. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, indicating the passage continues beyond the excerpt provided.

- The phrase rendered "father and mother together" translates Tibetan yab yum shul, a technical tantric term for the union of method and wisdom as embodied by a buddha in the yab-yum iconographic form. The word shul here likely carries the sense of "form" or "trace/image."

The line rendered "the hollow of space" translates nam mkha'i khog par, literally "in the cavity or hollow of the sky/space," a distinctive spatial metaphor.

The colophon chapter title "the cause of the ground of awakening" renders gzhi byang chub snying po'i rgyu — this is a somewhat compressed theological title; it could also be read as "the cause, the heart-essence of the ground of awakening."

- The ritual mantra syllables throughout this passage are left in transliterated Sanskrit as they appear in the source text, which is standard practice for dhāraṇī and mantra material.

The phrase rendered "eight-fingered khadira-wood stake" reflects the stake being measured at eight finger-widths; khadira is the Acacia catechu tree, traditional in ritual contexts. The term "bdellium resin" renders gugul, a ritual fumigant.

"Plague-tree" for yugs-sa'i shing is interpretive; the term literally suggests a tree associated with epidemic or pestilence, used in wrathful ritual contexts.

The phrase "bring down the frozen waters" and related expressions for causing hail are consistent throughout; the Tibetan chu 'khyags literally means "frozen water," used idiomatically for hail and ice storms called down by nāga-binding rites.

- The opening line "the supreme substance, the glacial spring, flows day by day" is metrically and syntactically terse and may form the conclusion of the preceding verse passage rather than the opening of what follows; it likely describes a daily-flowing icy spring as a ritual substance. The connection to the preceding context is unclear from this passage alone.

The mantra syllables are rendered phonetically as they appear in the Tibetan; the Sanskrit underlying "nāga-zhung-thün" is uncertain — "zhung-thün" may be a Tibetan gloss or phonetic corruption rather than pure Sanskrit.

"Raktacāmuṇḍī" is the name of a fierce goddess, literally "Red Cāmuṇḍī," here identified as the antidote or counteragent to nāgas; the Tibetan reads Rakta Cāmuṇḍī and this Sanskrit reconstruction is straightforward.

"Vajrasattva" renders rdo rje sems dpa' following the house glossary for this deity's proper name.

The "six armors of karma" is a tantric technical category; no further gloss is provided here as it belongs to the internal technical vocabulary of this tantra.
