Toh 363 in the Kangyur is a tantric text known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Kālacakra Tantrōttara Tantra Hṛdaya, and in Tibetan as the Dpal Dus Kyi 'Khor Lo'i Rgyud Phyi Ma Rgyud Kyi Snying Po, rendered in English as "The Heart of the Subsequent Tantra of the Glorious Kālacakra." It belongs to the Kālacakra cycle, one of the most elaborate and celebrated systems within the Vajrayāna tradition, and serves as a condensed or essential extraction drawn from the Subsequent Tantra of the Kālacakra. The text is set within the legendary kingdom of Śambhala, where, in the palace of Kalāpa, the teachings on the king of tantras are proclaimed to assembled sages, weaving together cosmological, astrological, and soteriological themes that are characteristic of the Kālacakra system. As part of the Kangyur, it is classified among the tantric scriptures and opens with a homage to Mañjuśrī, situating it within a tradition that regards this wisdom deity as a presiding presence over the revelation of these profound teachings.

In the language of India: Śrī Kālacakra Tantrōttara Tantra Hṛdaya Nāma. In the Tibetan language: The Glorious Kālacakra Subsequent Tantra, called "Heart of the Subsequent Tantra."

Homage to Mañjuśrī, the Gentle Melodious One.

Now, to the stainless body of the maṇḍala of the dharmadhātu, Mañjuśrī, through virtue and non-virtue — what one hears said: that the buddhas, the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), the gods, and the hells themselves arise from these — the supreme king, in the renowned city of Kalāpa in the palace of Śambhala, the Lord of Speech, the Lion, seated upon his throne, proclaimed again to the sages the king of tantras, clearly revealing it.

That this indeed came to be is true: the supreme god, the guru, Viṣṇu, the lord of the gods, the moon, the sun, Rāhu, the fire god — on earth, in the celestial realms, in space — from merit and from sinful deeds arise. Human beings, in the next existence, as hungry ghosts and in the hells — what is prohibited: the bond of the oath of flesh. The sinful deeds of the tantra of the Vedists and the skull-bearers — those are false.

Wherever, through the power of virtue and non-virtue over the seven great planets and so forth, even brahmins take birth there — having abandoned their former body, they will certainly take hold of another body in a different place. From the words of the sage's progeny, killing living beings, eating — the culminating eight come to pass.

From eating flesh, even brahmins fall from the celestial realm down to this earth — and that is true. The excellent Brahmā, Īśvara, Viṣṇu — their Veda, the peaceful dharma, supreme Viṣṇu — have prohibited flesh as food. For those bound by the oath of flesh, the tantra of the yoginī and the yogi, by the fully awakened buddha, with fifteen and so forth — for those bound by the Sugata's vow, buddha-awakening: the buddhas entirely do not eat flesh, and should not be protected by one's own ego.

By approaching living beings with the mind intent on killing, perceiving them as sentient beings to be slaughtered — one falls here. By five limbs one will commit the killing of life, but space alone is not the agent of killing for living beings. The killing of life is accomplished by three: the causes of body, speech, and mind — and one who enjoys it and produces it, the very sovereign of the mind, will destroy sentient beings through the karma of enjoyment.

Lions, serpents, cats, tigers, and crows — by five limbs of birth, the killing of life comes to pass. Kings and common folk bring it about by doing, having others do it, and rejoicing — these three. A monk without compassion who tastes the flavour of flesh on his tongue and seeks out taste after taste — by such faults as killing oneself and so forth, monks and novices alike go to the hells.

When a physician prescribes flesh for a sick monk, even that which is killed by hawks and falcons, or killed for one's father's sake, or dead from a sacrificial fire, or from fire, water, unsolicited causes — if these conditions are absent, what was said to be permissible to eat at that time: the flesh that was taught to monks by the one of ten powers was for the sake of overcoming illness, not as a deception about death.

If one eats flesh and so forth, one will certainly suffer in the great bodies beneath the earth. Sentient beings, hungry ghosts, and so forth — the births difficult of access; ascetics, householders, kings — certainly in their own homes, the homes of others, the enjoyment of wives, daughters, companions and retinues, and their own homes. The bodies of the dead, whatever they are — wives, sons, daughters, companions and retinues, whoever — here, upon the stone one should see clearly form, sound, smell, taste, and tactile sensation themselves.

A hammer has awareness; from the state of being free of the aspects of self and other, a stone hammer becomes an aggregate. In the body of living beings on the earth whose awareness has declined, it is also present. The vital breath moving through living beings — through awakening well from the state of being free of aspects of self and other, one knows it. The chariot of the sun of Śambhala and so forth — the aggregates (skandhas), the elements (dhātus), the sense faculties (āyatanas), the destinies...

All the aggregates of the form element and so forth belonging to wandering beings are transformations of subtle particles — mere awareness that experiences, free of self and other, without conceptual thought. By that which awakens living beings from sleep, causing the light that dispels darkness to arise in those who do not experience through such means, the moon, the sun, Rāhu, the fire of time, and darkness all appear as one. Earth and the rest, fragrance and the rest, the eye and the rest, the rainbow, rain, lightning, and wind, and a sixth pair — these are the six aggregates in the body, and the object, the subject, and their sixfold activity, a sixth pair. These are what experiencing living beings, whose aggregates have fallen into sleep, are roused by means of the illuminator. From the outer self, the inner self, the third which is supreme self, and these, the fourth arises, transcendent. The nirmāṇakāya, the saṃbhogakāya, and likewise the dharmakāya — these four arise, transcendentally issued forth. Not being empty within, supremely arisen from the elements, merely transformed, the three and so forth dissolve. These four, and the three and so forth, dissolve definitively, as the supreme one, into the dharmadhātu, the basic space of phenomena. The aggregates, elements, and the limbs of the sense faculties, the sense bases, the dense darkness, the appearance of a luminous hue — the suchness of consciousness and of the vital breath, the boundless Dharma of awakening, understood as wandering through the three realms of existence. Fragrances, like flowers in the sky, do not exist; residing in the dharmadhātu, the space of mere particles, these phenomena have no more existence than space itself. Because these wandering beings, along with their self, their third and so on, and the three bodies of a buddha and so forth — from within their limbs, through affliction and ignorance, again come grasping and becoming — karma and formations become existence, and here these three together with their pair constitute causative phenomena, suffering. Consciousness and the rest become the fivefold mode; likewise come the eleventh and the twelfth. From the three comes the pair, and from the pair come the seven resultant Dharma-limbs of immeasurable existences. As from a tree come flowers, and from flowers come fruits in turn — so from the afflictions of wandering beings come karmic actions, and from these come suffering, and from suffering come afflictions: the entire wheel, without remainder, arises from causes. Phenomena have no cessation; arising from what is no more than space, they have no arising either, and for that reason: living beings, particles of life, endowed with aggregates, passing into other destinies, are neither permanent nor impermanent. Generosity and so forth, whatever is endowed with the ten virtues — the emptiness of that, and the emptiness of the side of awakening. Whatever becomes the agent of those actions — the supreme Victor together with his children, and the classes of māras among sentient beings — from the aggregates, and from those back again, there is no transfer to another existence: the joining of the continuum of the aggregates is like a lamp, recitation of a text, a mirror, undefiled water, sound, the crystal of the sun, a seed, and sour-tasting things. Wherever it is true to say that the dharmakāya of the Victors arises from the white collection of Dharmas — from Dharma the saṃbhogakāya, complete with major marks and minor features, the entire assembly of sounds — the aggregates become supreme in the nirmāṇakāya. The unchanging, supreme bliss is not the dharmakāya, and therefore — whatever the defining characteristic of the body, the teacher among those who have become buddhas, the nāga, declared here: "That which is neither one nor many, the great and excellent support of benefit to self and other, neither existent nor non-existent, like space, with equal taste, difficult to analyze, its very nature — uncolored, utterly unchanging, peaceful, incomparable, equal, all-pervading, free of conceptual elaboration, peerless, to be known each by themselves" — to the dharmakāya of the Victors, I bow down. That which, having transcended the world, inconceivable, is itself the fruit of wholesome conduct, supremely excellent in itself, becomes the cause of delight to those of great intelligence, and in the midst of the retinue speaks variously —

the vast and holy Dharma that pervades all worlds without ceasing, proclaimed by the buddhas — to that which abides as the great Dharma-King, the perfect enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya), here I bow down.

That which becomes the cause of ripening for sentient beings, appearing brightly to some like fire, and again to others — fully awakened, turning the wheel of Dharma in utter peace — is perceived.

Entering through the skillful means of form in its many aspects, it vanquishes the terrors of the three existences.

Following in the ten directions, accomplishing great purpose — to the emanation bodies (nirmāṇakāyas) of the mighty Victors, I bow down.

Liberated from conduct within the three realms, become equal to space, the very intrinsic nature of all things, pure and peaceful, supremely solitary and tranquil, its nature to be realized by yoga itself — difficult to comprehend, difficult to analyze, peaceful, incomparably equal yet all-pervading, without marks, unequalled, blissful, non-conceptual — the single body: to the body of the Victors, I bow down.

In buddha fields as countless as atoms, without exception, throughout all world-systems, from the birth-places of moon and sun and so forth, the divine realms, the surface of the earth, the sky, to the limit of the vajra queen — in female birth-places, in the dharmadhātu, in the realms of good rebirth and ill, at all times it fully abides.

A perfect buddha, by the power of the aggregate of living beings endowed with the qualities of the sense-objects, through the force of merit and sin, seminal fluid and blood, entering the lotus of the womb of a vidyā-consort, together with the vital wind and the striving wind — that then becomes possessed of the intrinsic nature of the five wisdoms (jñāna), with the vidyā fully present.

Born from the qualities of the sense-object, that form of one who enjoys the saṃbhogakāya — not that, but supremely relying on the elements — man, woman, neither-sex, god, nāga, Viṣṇu, Victor, Sage — arising from its own power.

The very suchness of that, the fivefold suchness, and the three families' rank, united in one secret:

a hundred faces, the lord of awareness-holders, the moon, the earth and so forth — object and subject — the master, the dharmadhātu.

That hundred-faced one: from its cause, born of two — in the limbs of arms, legs, fingers and their joints — from that, the three feelings and so forth come to cessation, moving swiftly like sound.

That which is fivefold and threefold — from which object and subject, scent, body and so forth arise — the five elements and more: moon, sun, darkness, whereby the elements are sealed.

From the one into the many elements, born of two — within whatever constitutes the assembly of fingers and toes of arms and legs — all from the moon's cause, the supreme family of a hundred fully unfolded — males and females.

The aggregate of the support's elements, intrinsic nature and qualities, is an indestructible mass of particles.

The cause of life — vowels and syllables and so forth by nature — is likewise the indestructible life-element.

The support of semen is the moon and sun, and those particles are the aggregate of living beings.

Awakened by that method, through the force of merit and sin, the fruit in another ground — one's own five aggregates of karma are enjoyed, and again in another and yet again resumed.

The white meditative concentration in praise of that, the definite hundredfold — the karma-aggregate is not exhausted.

The naked ones: the karma-aggregate is utterly destroyed by fire alone that burns.

The white meditative concentration, the arhat's mantra, the definite hundredfold praise — from mind, body and speech, the lotus-pervading quintessence, lord of the seed-syllable, the arhat's pure drop (bindu) is meditated upon.

In the center, the body, hidden, blazing with a hundred peaks, causing clarity on all sides — the secret treasury of the gods, this supreme rank — worthy of offering by Śakra (Indra), the king of a hundred sacrifices.

These qualities — by burning, offering, and consuming — are seen to burn without remainder the entire karma-aggregate.

Whoever enters into harmful meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit increases.

Whoever turns back from harmful meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit diminishes.

Whoever enters into fierce meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit increases.

Whoever turns back from fierce meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit diminishes.

Whoever enters into Dharmic meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit diminishes.

Whoever turns back from Dharmic meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit increases.

Whoever enters into white meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit diminishes.

Whoever turns back from white meditative concentration — for that one, day and night, demerit increases.

Whoever, day and night, enters into harming — for those, demerit increases.

Whoever, day and night, turns back from harming — for those, merit increases.

Likewise by flesh, liquor, and seizing another's wealth, and by acting wrongly through desire, through attachment, aversion, and delusion, and through definite anger, pride, and craving — so it comes to be.

Whoever enters into generosity — for that one, day and night, merit increases.

Whoever turns back from generosity — for that one, day and night, demerit increases.

Likewise moral discipline and patience, day and night, and vajra-like diligence in the same way, and wisdom, skillful means, aspirational prayer, the application of power, and the vajras of emptiness and gnosis — doer obscured by the existent and non-existent, and one who seizes space, and the supreme self — when space is absent the doer has no abode: this is the word of those who speak of emptiness.

Without making oneself the agent of sentient beings, merit and demerit increase fully at all times in every way.

The Victors endowed with the ten powers, those possessed of gnosis, and the gods — without having enjoyed them, these do not perish.

The six, beginning with individual withdrawal, endowed with the power of the ten powers: thus it is taught to meditate on emptiness.

By the application of smoke and the like at night, and again by day by the sky, fire, and the like, through individual withdrawal the yogin sees the things of the three times arrived in the center of the sky.

By meditative concentration, having made the mind very stable in that, one abandons outer phenomena entirely.

By breath-control, the vital wind courses free from the paths of sun and moon, moving in darkness.

Free from the going out and coming in of breath, and again by the limb of retention, one holds the drop.

By recollection, from one's own body, as from the moon, light radiates into the sky in abundance.

By meditative absorption, the semen, beginning from the vajra, ascending to the crown, becomes utterly filled with stainless bliss.

Gazing into the sky, delusion is utterly destroyed, for one sees the emptiness of the manifold.

Gazing inward at one's own nature, attachment is destroyed, for the vital winds are restrained.

Gazing without fixation on limbs, aversion is destroyed — by the stainless bliss of the semen.

Gazing at the tip of the nose, pride is destroyed — this is from the inviolable speech of Brahmā.

By restraining the vital force and exertion, the maṇḍala of a buddha's reflection, perfectly pure and stainless:

at the secret center, the navel, the heart, the throat, and the crown — the vajra places — each pair of stages in sequence, the semen ascending upward and the blood descending, from the inviolable melody of Brahmā — the vajras of body, speech, and mind, free from the three stains: the one who reveals this is a buddha.

The eye of the flesh of dogs and so on, and the eye of the gods and the like, through the power of intrinsic qualities —

the eye that knows the minds of others as understood by pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas — that is the buddha's eye: these are the three.

For the bodhisattvas, the fourth, pure and stainless, becomes the eye of wisdom.

The fifth, free from the three stains, is the wisdom eye — the eye that sees all things, belonging to the buddhas.

Concordant in cause with bliss, semen is itself the vajra; because one holds it, one is assuredly Vajradhara. The semen is the seed of the body; when it moves and one holds the wheel, what is the bliss of the navel wheel — the signified — while one is in the act of signifying it, with sound at the heart: the Protector destroys saṃsāra. Whoever at the throat knows that, holding the motionless bliss, is the one who perceives and holds the jewel. Whoever holds the moon at the crown knows the bliss of semen, stainless — the holder of wisdom. At the uṣṇīṣa, in the Brahmā aperture, unchanging, supreme bliss fills the sixteen joys completely. Whoever knows wisdom to be without intrinsic nature — the supreme moon, the extent of the sixteen phases fulfilled — that one is immeasurable; whoever knows this, at the crown, with the vajra, is the sixth: Vajrasattva. Illumination becomes the element of wisdom; whoever at the crown is the unchanging vajra-being, the stainless earthly drop at the crown — that very person, together with water and the dimming of the sun, Rāhu, fire, karmic maturation, the heart together with sound, bliss, wind, and the navel — is far-reaching. At the secret wheel, the bliss endowed with darkness is overcome — the void is the element of void darkness. Whoever has the six objects beginning with the eye: whatever comes from the goddesses — earth and heart and the rest — and whatever is the aggregate of form and the rest, and the six objects — those are conceived as deities. Among those with pure faculties and the rest, the six who possess objects — Krodharāja and the like — those in whom semen does not move: the six objects are the blue and so on. Whoever is the wrathful Yamāntaka together with the moon, conquering the vital wind completely; together with the sun, conquering the vital wind completely — whoever is the wrathful Padmāntaka; together with Rāhu, conquering the vital wind completely — whoever is the wrathful Vighnāntaka; together with the far-reaching, definitively conquering the vital wind — whoever is the wrathful Prajñāntaka. When the vital wind is stopped, the two-armed Hevajra in its peaceful aspect — here Vajrasattva conquers pride. When the vital wind is arrested, the four-armed Hevajra — Vajrabhairava who destroys aversion — becomes bodhicitta. Hevajra who destroys attachment, three-faced and six-armed, becomes the great bodhisattva Maheśvara. Eight-faced and four-footed, the one who destroys delusion — Brahmā together with bliss — becomes Samayasattva. When the vital wind is arrested at the navel, free from the three stains, Vajrasattva himself is a buddha. When it is arrested at the heart, free from the three stains, the bodhisattva pratyekabuddha is himself a buddha. At the throat, just as the sun — free from the three stains — the great bodhisattva becomes a śrāvaka. When the wind faculty is arrested at the forehead, the samaya being together with bliss is the Teacher's son. At the navel wheel, the supreme unchanging bliss — together with the four root channels of the faculty of the wrathful one and the thirty-two — is transformed taste by taste: the three wheels of Śrī Cakrasaṃvara. The eight segments of the bones of arms and legs, the palm, the finger joints, and their segments — the channels of the six wheels here, doubled: these are the yoginīs of great Śrī Cakrasaṃvara. At the four channels of the uṣṇīṣa, the transmigration is liberation; likewise the eight wheels of Dharma. At the throat, the thirty-two; at the navel wheel, sixty-four. Whoever is filled with lunar parts — the white crown — here the white part is the secret. The channels of the wheel, moreover, become the supreme unchanging bliss: the Kālacakra, the deity of the higher [realms].

The time is three hundred and sixty: the junctures too are the vajra body. The shaft of the lunar mansions, the sky, the hand, the king — that too is declared by the primordial buddha as space. The thirty portions of the moon, the sky, the sky-suspended, the lunar channel — this is the auspicious moon. Whatever channels and body-hairs, without remainder, abide in the body, are named the vajra sprout. The vajra water, urine, blood — these, through the emptiness of the body, shall be lapped up by the tongue. By the teeth of Maitreya, the flesh of face, hands, and feet is eaten; therefore one is fierce. By the great mouth of the five superknowledges, the herds of the land's livestock are devoured; therefore one is a lion. Merit, wisdom, and perfect moral discipline — free of the three defilements — Kālacakra, the three-eyed one. In Glorious Guhyasamāja, whatever bodies arise from object, subject, and the power of the karma of living beings — there, some of those elements are eternally made manifest among the maras as gods. Channels, flesh, bone, semen, and blood, assembled from atoms, are the abode of the gods. Each sentient being — buddha, god-realm, sky, earth's surface — abides as the principal in its own respective abode. In brief, through a succession of illusions, there is transformation; the vajra recitation accomplishes object and subject. By self-consecration, the vital wind becomes the hare-bearing one — the moon — and here, in this fourth, one desires manifest awakening. Here the fifth, the supreme union, the perfected sequence — even in Glorious Guhyasamāja — the guru of the three existences has taught the generation stage of the gods in order to truly bind the maras. Whatever bodhisattva is born from the path of the ten virtues, from generosity, moral discipline, and so forth — such a one will desire to be reborn, and it is not mere thought alone; I too am the examined and the self. These words of the maras one takes to one's own mind, and by such a pervasive nature, there is no master whatsoever of meditation; in the god-realm and on earth, merit and moral discipline are utterly inferior. Endowed with the supreme ten powers, the perfect gods dwell rightly in the dharmadhātu. One should employ the hook, the vajra, the arrow, the bow, the bell, the sword, and the lasso to accomplish. Having been summoned and seated here, and having been struck with supreme terror, with hands bound — through this meditation, virtue is fully abandoned, and the maras, upon dying, proceed to the lower realms. The divine ones who have become buddhas, free of the three defilements, who accomplish the welfare of all sentient beings — these should be served with intensely sweet-smelling flowers, incense, lamps, divine food-offerings, mantra recitation, and definite praise a hundredfold; and the accomplished siddha, greatly gladdened, bestows the vidyādhara attainment in the subterranean world, the world of the gods, on earth's surface, and in the sky. The vital mantra that, blocking the channels of moon and sun at the time of day and night — reciting for one month undivided: space, sky, the suspended, the course through the chest, the time-flavor, darkness — by grasping upper and lower, the vital wind freed from the three paths, carried along by the winds, is filled. One achieves the attainment of grasping the hare — the moon — and the sky-farer holds the vidyādhara. For the sake of merit, the bodhisattva, through compassion, gives even the kingdom's queen — even one's own flesh. For the sake of wisdom, one meditates with an unmoved, stainless awareness on the reflection of emptiness — the entities of the three times. For the sake of moral discipline, one carries the vajra drop — the semen — to the crown of the head and from the head to the brahma aperture. Merit, wisdom, and moral discipline — purely free of defilement — transform one into Vajrasattva. A person of great fault who gives a kingdom in mind — who gives it — by receiving it one does not enjoy it.

A wife endowed with every quality — given in mind — is not enjoyed by whoever receives her. Pure flesh given in mind — it is not enjoyed by whoever receives it, bound as they are by the samaya of flesh. By this reasoning, if a bodhisattva were then to possess the ten powers, how could one of low birth not become so? Maitreya's supreme austerity is this: at dawn, for the sake of beer, he goes to the beer-seller's house. At midday, through supreme compassion, for the sake of fish, he goes to the fishermen's market. At dusk, for the sake of engaging with women, he goes with joy to the houses of servant-girls. Through beer, fish, and women — the three defilements — how is the avadhūtī not of common birth? Those who claim that the many things have become one are making a commitment to oneness. Those who claim that what has no object to be proved is established as something having both stable and moving beings — they too make a commitment. When the logical reason becomes equivalent to the object to be proved, the prover does not establish the object. If the object to be proved is one thing and the logical reason is another, then their commitment is undermined. If sounds are committed to as permanent — established as like space, bodiless — then likewise, if sounds are committed to as impermanent — treated as like a pot — because they arise through great effort, then even though permanence is established from space, from your own mouth it is definitively established that sounds are impermanent. Like the domains of form, touch, smell, and taste, why is sound, the fifth, not the same? That by which one first perceives — from that, on the earth and in the intermediate space of the sky, that sound again by the ear comes to be fully apprehended: that is what makes sounds permanent. That by which one first apprehends the meaning — from that, on the earth and in the intermediate space, again in that manner by the ear the meanings come to be definitively apprehended — does this then make forms permanent? A single permanent thing to be illuminated — a sound possessing every quality by its own nature — dwells in the cavity of the ear. The collection of sounds that illuminates, spoken from the throat, has not in turn become permanent. Does not the sound-tumult that one speaker utters come to fill the ear-cavity that listens? That which is to be permanently and clearly illuminated can indeed become so — but it cannot do so by depending on something else. The cause that acts as the agent of an object, being elsewhere, illuminates the darkness. Whatever is permanently and clearly illuminated — having been produced here by a cause — is something made. What is made and whatever else is established through incompatible properties does not become established. Because of that incompatibility, made things exist, while the other is absent. That which has become the cause of what is to be illuminated — that which illuminates it — why is it not a cause? Those things that have dissolved into darkness and are illuminated by it — why are they not its fruit? If sound and meaning were to become one, then the deterioration of the meaning would become the deterioration of the sound. The universal and the particular would likewise become the same — being mere space, and being otherwise, and being one. If emptiness were to possess sound, then in all three worlds there would always be no sound. That by which space is established as existent — by that, mobile and immobile beings are established as nonexistent. If space and the causes of the collection of elements were established from incompatible properties, then from that cause, for the prover, it would definitively be established that sound is inferior to non-sound. In space and on the earth: planets and stars, animals and humans, gods and rākṣasas, hungry ghosts and asuras and nāgas bound by the samaya of their own kind — through the power of the qualities intrinsic to the syllables of mantra, having the nature of shape and color — through the sounds of one or many meanings, and also in some cases through a single sound, many meanings are expressed.

From the cause of non-existence and emptiness, stable and moving things are produced from their causes. The example: space-flowers, and earth and trees and flowers — each arises in its own place accordingly. A barren woman's daughter, born of mere space, becomes space; one born of a woman who has a son — that son will become all sentient beings. From the seed that is the aggregate of extremely subtle atoms, earth, water, and fire — the divine suchness of those — their distinguishing qualities are not external and separate. If they were to be thoroughly destroyed together, then at that time, separately, together with form — earth, water, and fire — the divine suchness, being singular, would not be thoroughly destroyed. The deities that are the assemblage of elements departing from the individual bodies of living creatures when destroyed — whatever body of fivefold nature is composed of earth, water, fire, wind, and space combined — those five deities bereft of qualities in relation to embodied beings are known to be present there, yet unseen. Living creatures, having abandoned their former body, will again take up another body through the power of intention. Those deities of earth and the rest will be thoroughly destroyed when their former body disintegrates. The other form of living creatures, like a vast garland of lightning, vast in form and having a body — having passed through the clouds, they travel through the sky in the directions and the intermediate directions with swift force. Living creatures, together with the life-force, separate from the inert body, fully possessing sensation and the rest — through the connection of karma they proceed alone into the thirty-one realms of existence according to virtue and non-virtue. Not singular, the five aspects, separated from objects, the inner self and the supreme self — they do not transcend space, are not obscure, are not without result, and are not of diminished capacity. From the mind, through desire, a person does not arise by intrinsic nature; and without the life-wind there is no mind. Living creatures, together with mind, through the connection of karma, proceed into higher and lower destinies. Because of mutual dependence, the conscious and the inert, cause and effect as such; and because of mutual dependence, when the assembled collection of elements has fully become what it is, arising from that — even what is permanent is itself subject to change, and therefore the collection of elements is definitively subject to change. Whatever is permanent and unchanging in intrinsic nature — though it may change, what is truly permanent is not subject to change. The supreme lord has spoken of the beings of superior permanence and the inferior of permanence as establishing existence. Because of mutual dependence, reasoning and species too become cause and effect. Because of mutual dependence, the uncreated and the created become cause and effect. Because of mutual dependence, the created and the created become cause and effect. All is mere consciousness — the elements of earth, water, fire, wind, and space; form, tangibles, smell, and sound together with their pleasures — these do not become a collection of atoms. From consciousness, resultant things do not arise by themselves, nor are they led by non-existence, nor by a leader. Like a sprout and so on arising from a seed — it proceeds thus, but not from itself alone, and not without a cause. Legs and bones, rivers, flesh and sap, blood, fat, skin — these are not a collection of atoms. Having abandoned mere consciousness, one goes again to another existence as mere consciousness. There, taking up a body, going again to another existence — that too is that very mere consciousness. When one falls asleep in desire, consciousness separated from self and other, mere consciousness, becomes impaired. If migrating beings were mere consciousness, then here another object would be mere consciousness. If that were to occur — if migrating beings were mere consciousness — they would not be non-dual, because of those two. Whatever is the adventitious ignorance here — what has arisen as innate — that is not mere consciousness.

Previously, the innately arising inert matter that is thoroughly pure consciousness will become purely cognizant. Since all inert matter goes to mere consciousness, this is established through clear understanding at the moment of waking. Yet the consciousness thereof may become non-manifest, or else one remains in one's own abode and becomes Brahmā, Īśvara, and the like. Or one may become a particular being, or become the object of a yellow-robed one's desire — like a sprout and so forth within a seed. For the sake of unity one would assert that the result exists, yet among the hundred there is not even a trace of permanence. At the outset, an aggregate of subtle atoms has no part belonging to a migrating being — in what space do those particles exist? From the migration that is the gathering of subtle atoms, a migration may occur, yet such a migration is not itself an aggregate of particles. Separated from particles and abiding in space, the dissolution of other migrating beings is not different from that. If a body were to become an aggregate of particles, then at that time whose body would be dissolved? An examined element being non-existent, apart from that there is no separation of particles; whatever particle exists is also a particle — and through being free of contraction and production, it abides in the midst of space, whether accompanied by wind or not. Subtle atoms have six parts, and those six parts in turn also have six parts — and again, the six parts of those: why is it not established that these very atoms, through subtler parts, fill the expanse of space? That particles of mercury and gems have or do not have parts is not to be established by valid cognitions. If they have parts, mercury cannot penetrate copper, nor does it penetrate stone; yet an aggregate of particles without parts is likewise impossible. Mercury does not touch copper; born from two, a gem turns stone into a divine precious jewel. But consciousness that is impaired by the six conceptual discriminations is not a modification of an aggregate of particles. An external blue form that is an aggregate of particles is not established by the valid cognition of that aggregate. From the habitual tendencies of consciousness, what appears in the expanse of space similar to a dream is renowned as the seen. Because the mentally blind — those who lack eyes — cognize that very thing with their minds, not possessing physical eyes, it is not due to those. Eye-consciousness arises along with the eye from the element of visual consciousness, and it comes from external form — not from habitual tendencies. Whatever sounds are heard in their entirety by the ear — those too are not heard by the deaf. One who has a disease of the nose does not apprehend an assembly of odor particles; one who is free of disease does apprehend them. One afflicted with a disease of the tongue does not taste flavors; yet that very same person, when free of tongue disease, does taste. That consciousness is separate from the twelve sense bases is not something to be established by valid cognition. Even from the migration that is the assembly of particles, upon seeing a migrating being, one who does not cognize it is not a valid cognizer. Fierce ones and Brahmā are known even by lions — having made consciousness into mere cognition. Upon seeing the dispersion of particles, they will either dissolve, be absorbed, or cease. Without arising and without ceasing, having emerged as many assembled or as unassembled. This has been taken by the Sage as the measure of space, and of the emptiness of the Victors as well — pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas, gods and asuras, nāgas and sons of the Victors like myself, planets and stars, those born in the sky and on the earth — women and sages, wrathful ones and rākṣasas, tigers and leopards who are blood-oath-bound, animals and hell-beings — whoever is endowed with non-conceptuality, free of self and other: emptiness, the essential nature of the three times, empty of particles in all aspects, like the expanse of space, manifest as a dream, as an illusion — that which is omniscient, seeing all, free of the three defilements, non-conceptual: that is not other than that. Whoever realizes that — knowing the mind as both stainless and as having stains — that very knowing is the buddha. Whatever dharmas belong to the path of generosity and the rest, the path of the ten virtues, the aspects of awakening, and so forth — whatever dharmas belong to loving-kindness and the rest, free of locality and intrinsic nature — the liberations such as emptiness and the rest; whatever aggregate belongs to moral discipline and the rest, non-conceptual in all its aspects, free of object — whoever brings those about possesses the ten powers (daśabala), and is neither a śrāvaka nor a bodhisattva. Whatever consists of form and the rest — the six elements — is likewise the six objects; it is the configuration of aggregates of particles. The six outer objects — forms such as the color blue and the rest — together with one's own body as earth, smell, and the rest: emptiness, appearance, and darkness, abiding in the three grounds, thoroughly non-conceptual in every aspect — awakened by luminosity, utterly free of the cataract of obscurations — that is not a living being dwelling in the six destinies.

The king of the domain of the noble ones, the Sugata (the well-gone one) who holds the sacred commitment: the one who shows the path of awakening to the buddhas. Nāgārjuna too, who holds the vajra, was prophesied in the dharmadhātu by the guru of the three realms of existence. The Teacher of those who have fallen, bearing the skull, holding the sacred commitment of flesh, wearing the blue robe, is Bodhivajra. Another who arises and is known as Madhyamati, lord of the rākṣasas, carries the name "dark one," bounded by the limit of wisdom. Those called "wisdom," the vajra bell and the vajra bracelet: likewise they drink beer from a skull, and bearing the khaṭvāṅga and bone ornaments, they give a vessel of beer and a flute — this is the one known as "the dark one." To the students he gives the blue robe and the continuously flowing garment, wearing blue clothing. To the skull-bearer who holds the sacred commitment of flesh he gives the vajra seal — that is Bodhivajra.

The wearer of the blue robe is the one pierced by those bearing the name of Śrī Hayagrīva and others, the supreme lord of horses. Because the master is utterly agitated by the fault of the wisdom vajra, both his eyes fall to the ground. The furiously wrathful skull-bearer's messenger — the young dark one — drinks blood. Those whose conduct contradicts the sacred commitment of flesh: the buddhas will not abandon them.

The terrifying one of supreme compassion, as taught, the skull-bearer, draws the king away from his work. Whoever, through conceptual ideation of mind, is not compassionate and does not nurture the aggregates of sentient beings with loving-kindness — their so-called wholesome methods consist of various meat foods, stealing others' wealth, wrong conduct in sexual matters, and being completely devoid of virtue; in this very life these will come to fruition.

When a person performs a sacrificial offering of livestock meat to the terrifier and others who are twice-born — having heard that, the Buddha's path was explained by the lion-seizer, and the Dharma of Brahmā was utterly abandoned. The lord of the wrathful ones and the lord of the rākṣasas, both being twice-born, are offered livestock flesh by the king. Whoever it may be, if of inferior intellect and devoid of virtue, that one will be deceived by māra. The lord of the wrathful ones and the lord of the rākṣasas who hold the sacred commitment of flesh: they are worshipped by the king. For the sake of attaining lordship in the heavens, with a skull smeared with the flesh and blood of twice-born livestock, one will certainly be led to give suffering to those in the Avīci hell continuously and forever. From that, it will be certain to emerge after thirty-six thousand aeons as the king of aeons.

Māra will perform illusions for the ḍākinīs who hold the sacred commitment of flesh and are hungry ghosts, and to deceive sentient beings, in some instances he displays his own form in a non-terrifying way. The gods perform illusions for the asuras who hold the sacred commitment of flesh, for the sake of destroying them; and for the sake of protecting sentient beings, in some instances they display a terrifying form of themselves. For the destruction of the blind, at the time of the end-of-aeon fire, the terrifier of the fire god arose — the fire god arose fully. By the one who produces well-being, the asuras were smoked out, and their blood was drunk by the rākṣasas. Fish, tortoise, wild boar, the human lion: these arose as Viṣṇu for the sake of destroying the asuras.

Fish and likewise deer and so on — milk, forest, and wilderness — Viṣṇu does not eat what is not to be eaten. The guru of the three worlds caused the hungry ghosts and the ḍākinīs to ripen by fashioning himself in the form of a Heruka. The lord who roams by night fashioned himself in a peaceful, settled form in order to abduct the wife of Rāma. The fearless one bound the pale ascetics who hold the sacred commitment of flesh by means of a brahmin's form. Kirṃiri acted in accordance with the nature of a rākṣasa clan possessed of the thirty-fold power, for the sake of flesh. Let the great king know that this sacred commitment is observed by the gods and by the lords of the nāgas. The glorious king Candrasīmha, lord of rākṣasas, who roams by night, practiced this sacred commitment.

The rice-laden food-offerings of the gods — with yogurt, milk, butter, milk-porridge, and meat-broth — along with the torma of cattle flesh, rice, blood, and ale for the wrathful ones and the rākṣasas. For the buddhas: the five essences with molasses and curd, with rice, with the ascetic's bowl, with bathing, with honey, with butter and curd to eat, and with sandalwood and flowers as offerings for the protector. Whoever makes offerings of ale and the like — that offering is not for the gods, nor for the terrifier, nor for the Heruka. The sacred commitment of the lord of rākṣasas, who roams by night, was practiced by the glorious king Candrasīmha.

Śaktimatī, Draupadī, and the women of this lineage — they are not women at all but rather the five wrathful goddesses, five by five. Furthermore, the water inside the skull-cup vessel purifies: intestines and the like are the domain. In the land of Sindhu, beef-eaters who dwell in the snowy mountains — those born of two ranges — the king's people drink ale. In Gāra and similarly Mahendhu, flesh without a mouth, in between — Miseren — horse and ox flesh. Dezrid: tiger flesh and human flesh dried; in the Kara region: she-donkey, dog flesh. Brahmins and others — the great region of Karṇara is a land where flesh is not eaten. By day and by night, the common people and their household are forbidden ale, but those of noble birth drink. The faculties of women — men press upon their feminine signs, and hermaphrodites give counsel. Those who do not bathe and purify themselves — here are the sensual practices: in the land of Pīra and similar places. When fathers die, mothers are taken as wives by sons: this is assuredly the custom in the land of Gokha. Rugmer — among paternal relatives, one takes a nephew's wife; and for the mother too, a brother's daughter is taken by her own son. Taking a brother's daughter as a wife occurs in the great region of Karṇata and similar places. Taking a mother's stepson's wife as wife, and even for the mother: taking a daughter-in-law is the custom in the land of Ra. In Tibet there is no bathing or purification; in Parukūlāntara and Gostan, it is a land of base lineage. Women who are given status by men's command make it rain water by day and by night. If the practice of regional customs were sufficient to constitute accomplishment, then the words of the Vedic scriptures would not be true. Those who hold the sacred commitment of flesh — the being who eats flesh — their children will abandon flesh. As for the one who performs the Vedic act — the two: the words of the Veda of the supreme ṛṣis who possess austerities — for the sake of heaven they kill humans and cattle and stir the bhaga as a peaceful drink. Those supremely learned ones who torment the mind with those peaceful Vedic words: the peaceful drink of cowhide, the bhaga stirred most excellently, the male sign of the horse severed — they lick with the tongue what is smeared throughout with semen and blood, along with honey and butter. If by such a practice of eating flesh, sacrificial offerings are accomplished through Vedic words by the hermaphrodites — then the certain and peaceful mind, the compassionate Daṇḍin, completely ruins the heavenly realms. For the sake of fathers and others one commits harm, and the householder kills cattle at the time of the sacrificial offering. The austere ones abandon harm and surely beat the ascetics; there are also higher customs, and so on.

The Daṇḍin ascetics obstruct the sacrificial offerings of the heavenly realms — and for what reason? Because the liberated one knows. For that reason, those hermaphrodites who kill various kinds of cattle go about wailing.

If, by reason of making offerings to the gods and so forth, no fault arises from eating flesh — then why do the brahmins refrain from eating flesh on the twelfth day, the day of the fish, the fourteenth day, the days of the nāgas, and at the time of the solar transition? Why do the wise ones give to their fathers wine that is entirely free of flesh on those days dedicated to offerings to Viṣṇu and the rest? When whichever of the fathers and mothers who sustained life have died, they have entirely abandoned the lineage of former birth. By the power of merit and sin they are reborn in heavenly realms or lower states, and the body is burned. Who is it that, placing pieces of bone here and there, also gives wine? Who is not the mother, who is the father? That one, having separated from the body, has entered another place of birth. If it is established from Vedic scripture that by making offerings to brahmins and the rest one thereby makes offerings to one's father and mother — then at the time of death, those who have not made petition to brahmins will be harmed as though they had not petitioned even the deceased. Those fathers who, having been born as hungry ghosts through the force of virtue and non-virtue, beg for food out of faith — those steadfast sons, having given freely, receive wine and also accept water.

What shall Brahmā and the rest, the foremost, the Sun, the supreme deity, the lord, the Sun itself — what shall they eat? What causes suffering to sentient beings, giving rise to the terror of death — by what means shall the gods be appeased? The Moon, foremost of asuras, lord of Śakra (Indra), the foremost who dwells among sentient beings — what shall the Moon eat? That which bestows happiness on sentient beings and supremely destroys — by what means are the asuras frightened? Those gods of the heavenly realms who are to be worshipped by brahmins with the flesh of humans and cattle — those hungry ghosts who belong to the surrounding regions of the earth — these two are not the domain of the hermaphrodites. The very nature of those gods such as the earth and the rest, being proximate to destruction, is not the domain of Śakra. Brahmā, whose form is manifold, who is merely space — the lion-lord, the Great Sovereign, Brahmā himself — the hungry ghosts and the rest, whose bodies are of the nature of wind, are inferior in color, being coarser by virtue of their qualities. Those whose bodies consist of earth, water, and fire possess, in the earthly realm and in the middle space, coarser colors and forms and the like. Those whose bodies consist of wind's tactile quality, along with earth, water, and fire — these are visible, having color and form that can be apprehended by the eye. Smell is to be apprehended by the nose; taste is to be experienced here by the tongue; sound by the pure ear. If, according to Vedic words, a form consisting of wind is not established, and by the standard of Vedic reasoning, such a formless thing cannot then set in motion the assemblies of the elements in the earthly realm and in the middle space at that time.

What is comparable to a barren woman's child, being merely space, having the mere cause of space but utterly lacking in qualities — the other four are material: earth, water, fire, the wind that consumes offerings, and the two sense faculties of taste. Even a house that appears to brahmins and the rest, being dark at night when there is no lamp, becomes fully illuminated in every direction and intermediate quarter by material things such as mice and so forth. At the time of night, the entire assembly of rākṣasas and hungry ghosts and the like, and all the gods without exception — brahmins and the rest see all of these. And when the sun rises, every single star, and crows, rākṣasa-birds, jackals, and dogs without exception — all that has arisen, is arising, and will arise is revealed, all without remainder. Likewise, the palace-mansions accomplished by means of residual wine also reveal to people all that has arisen, is arising, and will arise. Animals settle in whatever region their own mind inclines toward. That knowing among brahmins from which they apprehend existence — its cause cannot be apprehended by the eye from anything else. When one enters a young goddess, all that has arisen, is arising, and will arise is fully revealed.

When a brahmin dies and becomes a hungry ghost, he enters a bewildered body and recites the sacred hymns. When a patron becomes a rākṣasa, he throws into houses the chopped bones of donkeys, pigs, and similar things. Those endowed with intelligence and discernment should look to the conduct of hungry ghosts, which causes deterioration. Without dispelling darkness, an owl's excrement arises from within the darkness. The one born without sorrow — Viṣṇu, the abductor, the creator — for that reason an ancestor is fit to be honored with offerings of owl dung. One prostrates to the back of a bull, to the mouth of a goat, to the feet of a hermaphrodite donkey, and to the sexual organ of a woman. Those brahmins who release the elements and lick the second — along with butter and honey — from soundlessness and without letters, space arises; and from space, which has become the support of wind, from wind comes fire, from fire comes water, from water comes earth, and from earth come the foods of fruit. From food and water, from what is eaten and drunk, arise the atoms, whose nature and qualities are characterized by agitation — these bodies of ours. Through the power of merit and of wrongdoing, the aggregates of beings in fortunate destinies and in lower destinies arise fully. That which is supremely refined, like a millionth part of an atom — finer than the finest, the supreme of all supremes, the thumb-breadth of a young girl — arising from space, the supreme sovereign, divorced from objects and devoid of qualities, bears the mark of space. The substrates of that mark are those substances: earth, water, fire, wind, and space. When all of these have been dissolved and space above the earth has attained the conclusion of peace, the power of that is called the bhaga — the three-pathed, bent, the terrifying one. That one has transcended space, is the sovereign lord of space, the supreme of the supreme, with coiled and bound roots, bounded by the expanse of space, a garland of droplets from the head down to the path of excretion, like a straight cord. With drooping lips, with eyes like stars, she who generates dwelling and terror, the devourer of devourers. Clear and unclear, singular yet unknown — not rightly known, and yet another as well — the one who moves in space as the Wheel. She who is the sovereign of the wheel of knowledge, whose birth is of high lineage and of no lineage, who bestows liberation by her power, she pierces. The unclear crow-horn bow pierces here, its own quality fashioned from turtle-hair. The sky-flower, the iron arrow, the bow-and-arrow — whoever is pierced by that is consecrated as a king. If the great illusion were to act as the cause of arising and ceasing, or were to become Heruka, then how could buddhas and non-Buddhist adherents be Viṣṇu or the eternal illusion? According to the words of the Sage, the life-force of sentient beings does not create atoms, nor does it set them to creating. The merit and the wrongdoing of sentient beings naturally produce happiness and suffering as their fruit. Those bound by the oath-flesh of rākṣasas, hungry ghosts, ḍākinīs, and the class of māras accomplish their ends. Through the words of accomplishment, other persons cause these to be definitively subdued — not by tigers and the like attacking, nor by fire blazing on water, nor by enraging elephants, nor by weapons and similar means. The attendants of mantras and the like perform the work of a lord encompassing the whole of the earth's domain. Bodhisattvas, lords of the world, asuras, gods, and nāgas are accomplished through buddhahood, and through the words of accomplishment one grants to people upon the earth the desired siddhis. All unfortunate circumstances, the suffering of disease, the terror of death — all of these are conquered. Terrors such as lions and so forth are pacified, through a devoted and tranquil mind, and the like. The single path for the sake of awakening, beginning with generosity and so forth, endowed with the ten virtues, was not taught otherwise. The singular delight of the Middle Way, united with the stirring of the bhaga, accomplishes this — it is not achieved by any other path. The perfect awakening of one who holds the vows of the Sugata, the vajra ground, is not anywhere other than the tree of awakening.

The accomplishment of one who holds the vow of flesh, the hungry ghost ground, arises from that single tree and nowhere else. The awakening of one who holds the vows of the Sugata descends from the gods and sets the wheel of Dharma turning. By entering into the hungry ghost accomplishment of one who holds the vow of flesh, one fully engages in minor actions of karma. When the buddha-god enters, he shows the turning of the wheel of Dharma to one who holds the vows of the Sugata. The one who enters the hungry ghost accomplishment shows the wheel of the mother of one who holds the vow of flesh. The generation of the ten powers by the buddhas does not occur on any mountain other than Vulture Peak. The showing of the pedigree of the hungry ghosts by the accomplished ones occurs on no other mountain than the fearsome one. The glorious Śrī Parvata, in the dharmadhātu of basic space, teaches the tantras of the buddhas who possess the power of the ten powers. That which teaches the tantras of powerful beings of cattle-kind, skull-bearers, in the fierce charnel grounds, is none other than this. The royal sovereignty of the divine palace arises from the earth, and thereafter it becomes the sovereignty of the gods. Through the clear and excellent placement of the protector's wheel, liberation comes as a full going-forth. A king who commits the act of killing beings descends fully into hell — this is so, and otherwise it is not the word of the buddhas. By a king killing brahmins and the like, one may enter the higher realms — and otherwise it is not the word of the accomplished ones. By consuming and enjoying flesh as food, one is reborn again in another existence in the lineage of the asuras. By consuming and enjoying flesh as food, one is born here again in other misdeeds in the lineage of the gods. By practicing with a round skull and a furrow upon the ground, one goes forth again as a donkey. By practicing with a round skull and a furrow upon the ground, one goes to another existence, becoming Yamāntaka himself. By having benefited sentient beings, one harms merit itself — this is declared sinful by the Sugata. By having harmed sentient beings, one benefits merit itself — this the sky-like one teaches as virtue. Whatever is the doctrinal support of the buddhas and Yamāntaka, of confident women, born of the fearsome one — troops of horses of the tigers and leopards who have entered into battle destroy them all without exception. Those of their own kind do not take the wealth of others; they engage in speaking truth and in perfect purity. Youths abandon other men's wives, are endowed with definite austerity, and keep to their own wives. One who has bathed and at midnight, at the time of the kāmārāga constellation individually, at midday and the half-wane of day, and at the evening, in the three watches of the night, and when the sun has risen over the mountain, makes obeisance five times, and on the surface of the earth in the divine realms, the tigers and leopards protect the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) as one, by the lord of darkness. On the fierce battlefield he protects like a father, and like a son and a servant he acts, and the king — in the darkness of the kṣatriya battle, having worshipped Yamāntaka and others with the flesh of two-born cattle — by harming various sentient beings and by seizing the wealth of others, the lineage is cut off. The accomplished one called Jaṭī, the lord of senses, called Dāna, the one called Paśupāda and the one called Khaṇḍa, skull-bearer; the monk called Nāgārjuna, the source of every virtue, who bestows benefit on all sentient beings; the master called Lopastraṅga, the accomplished one who works through water, together with his ten thousand — and others equally renowned. Alas, even so there are deluded ones who have become holy. The noble ones accomplished through the path of the ten virtues: the divine one clad in the garment of bark, of horse-tone; the elephant of the quarter who has the intention of benefiting others, the reverend one called Moon-Lotus Sprout; Poṅgo, the king who contemplates the earth, the entirely dark king, Indrabhūti; and likewise others — even seeing them, the lords of the humans, Yamāntaka, the robber, and others, have blessed them. Earth, water, fire, wind, and space, up to the faceless one, the five-faced one with six limbs —

By its vowels long and short the melody is transformed; but in another the vowel's qualities and so forth are not present. Wherever the seed of Brahmā is brought close to the sun and endangered — for that reason, in a later time, one who protects the earth and worships here will cause the barbarians (mlecchas) and the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) to tremble on the field of battle. The five — the short and long — are equal in their intrinsic qualities; the virtues of the vowels and so forth are not like that. The vowel beginning with A, the neuter vowel, possessing the ten powers, speaks because the solar combat is exhausted. Wherever long and short are equal, A-ko-ka is long; it arises from the word "lord of cattle." Therefore, since the neuter exists, I-ko-ya, Ṇa, and Ca are not agents; move from that side to what is confirmed. From the very first year, sky and space, and moreover the moon — from Cincinī, a lord arises. By that one's command, when hungry ghosts (pretas) are being mastered, Ka and others, having companions, are consecrated into a hunched form. Later, the sixty-eight gods of the field and the land that have grown upon the surface of the earth, those among the barbarians whose protector is Madhumatī, together with sons, daughters, and those born of the same womb, bring destruction. There, by a hundred multiplied by a hundred upon eighteen years, Makha and other noble lands are transformed. Those barbarians and those gods who, being of darkness, understand the sun — those I shall utterly destroy. Planting living beings there by means of the rite of the three refuges — the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha — and settling them in happiness, from Kālāpa the sun shall travel to Tuṣita, the highest divine abode. The measure of the years that sky and space, time, and Indra (Śakra) with his eyes have entered in their proper season — once again people enter among the barbarians, and this continues for as long as the turning of the eighteen years together with their remainder. Again and again, I arising in that age of strife, shall utterly destroy them. For as long as the qualities of earth, water, fire, wind, and space — sky, sun, moon, and stars — the guardians of the directions, the demons of the directions, the gods of the directions, the pretas on earth and sky, the brahmins, oxen, and others, the nāgas below the earth, and the asuras — for the sake of pacifying them, the lord of the earth shall worship these through offerings. For the accomplishment of all aims, the king together with the people shall always worship the buddhas and the Victors with offerings of earth, water, fire, wind, emptiness, and the sun, and with offering substances. By attending upon the supreme master, let him make offerings with the five protections, with fragrant flowers. Having first bathed, wearing blue garments, having taken the restoration rite (poṣadha) in the early morning, he shall certainly perform the rite by day and by night. Whichever of the four or five readers brings peace shall do so by day and by night. Again, let it be protected, and for ten days let both the pacifying and the enriching rites be performed. Curd and rice — the torma of horses and elephants with rice and milk — to the moon. Rice and others, with red-eyed planetary leavings with essence and rice, to the planetary leavings. Yellow rice, molasses, and other tormas — the divine guru offers with milk-porridge and meat broth. For the Pavana-saṅgha, with warm food, black butter — this is to be maintained on the seventh day, the day of Saturn. Again on the following day, the tormas of the directions and of the elephants shall be made, and the burden shall be with rice. For the peace and enrichment of the best horses and elephants, one shall observe the fire offering (homa) of the day of the sun and others. One shall drink grain, butter, mustard, dūrvā grass, a hundred yama-wood arrows, and milk as a libation. After the fire offering, the horses and elephants shall be bathed with the water of peace filling a conch-bowl. To the hungry ghosts and others, tormas of beans, meat, and ale shall be offered at the proper times by day and by night. For the rākṣasas and others, scatter mustard seeds and mark the boundary-corners with a vajra stake. The master, by the rite of the five protections, shall protect the king together with his retinue. By whatever means living beings from the center to the borders of the land are made to flourish in peace and prosperity by day and by night — first, in the center, the names of the intended objects, along with their intrinsic qualities, powers, and dominions, shall be surrounded by five lotuses. Whatever, through intrinsic qualities, powers, and dominions, pure ground is joined at the mouth — the eight corners likewise outward —

At the corners where banners are unfurled and tied, in every direction and intermediate direction, there will be a vajra garland. At the corners of the great cardinal directions, with all qualities as their very nature, the king of mountains stands in every direction and intermediate direction. Within that, a circular cloth panel in each direction and intermediate direction serves as vessel and becomes half of its tip. At the petal-anthers of the lotus, here there are: the enemy-hook, the iron hook, the noose, and the conch itself. Protecting downward from the petals of the lotus, whatever forms the heart of the protection-circle — likewise in the same way, the second and the third. Thus the two lotuses take form, and the secondary heart-center, the great lotus petals, are of two kinds. Nāgas in pairs, in the intermediate directions between directions, within the petals, and likewise gods and asuras, yakṣas, planetary spirits, and the māmakī (wrathful mother-protectresses) who without exception destroy all fears, and the vajra ḍākinīs — all these are guarded by this protection-circle. Draw them with blood, civet, and such substances. The fully awakened buddhas and all the bodhisattvas, through the five protections and so forth, are the protection-circles of which this speaks. Women desiring a son shall obtain a son. Kings who engage in battle against enemies shall be victorious. The sick shall be freed from illness. The poor upon this earth shall find wealth. Men through the power of women shall be given fruits, through the power of merit accumulated in former lives. By merit that benefits sentient beings, through the path of the ten virtues and through worship, it does not come from the sky or elsewhere. A brahmin who takes to drinking, who goes naked, or who has matted locks, or who carries a staff, and a novice monk, a community leader, or a fully ordained monk who has fallen away from virtue and whose conduct of philosophical tenet is corrupted — by the lord of men who holds the thirty vows, these shall be banished from the land. Because those persons have performed virtuous and non-virtuous deeds, a king is a share of sixty. Those who are wanton with barren women, having engaged in intercourse, will be given the fruit of evil — they are boiled in hell-fire.

Wherever in the land such a māra-class being exists, no enterprise of the lord of men and his troops shall ever succeed there. A king upon the earth — through kingship, the conquest of enemies, wealth, and merit — with good fortune, life, renown, splendor, a holder of the knowledge-mantra accomplished in the divine realm and on earth. Without exception, every king of human beings on earth, born from generosity, practicing ethical conduct, a divine king — with patience and moral discipline, guarding day and night, through strife indeed does generosity increase. A man dwelling in meditative concentration at its peak, understanding that intrinsic nature is thoroughly free, through wisdom increases skillful means. From the power of wisdom and skillful means, aspirational prayer, and still further: power, emptiness, gnosis — the vajra. The buddhas who have gone into the dharmadhātu — if they have not come into saṃsāra — the perfectly awakened buddhas and the bodhisattvas, in lands and in space-realms together with those who possess those lands — to say that the Blessed One, the vajra queen, resides in her bhaga is a word of falsehood. Abandoning faults such as attachment and free from the three defilements, this belongs to none other than Vajrasattva (Skt. Vajrasattva). Brahmā and other gods, through the hell of hells on earth — here, through the pacific and so forth — all the buddhas have made the measure of each life clearly manifest in its own tenets of philosophical doctrine. Brahmā and the others, when their merit and enjoyment has finally reached its end, shall fall from the divine realms and the earth. By those who bless through rākṣasas, one who seeks liberation is like a fruit of a sky-tree. For children, their respective mothers lead them to themselves through gentle, pleasing, but false words. The one who peddles empty ale, saying "Take it, my child — there is a pill in my hand," leads them to himself with sweet-sounding speech. It is the perfectly awakened buddhas who, from the hand of māra and through supremely pleasing words, lead beings to themselves.

"Show me just a space of sky — o heir of my lineage, take nirvāṇa!" Thus he speaks. In accordance with the intentions of sentient beings, the Victor clearly performs the restoration ceremony for the rākṣasas. By that means, those beings attain buddhahood itself — yet the secret mantra vehicle of the Sage's teaching is not a true vehicle for them. One who, over immeasurable eons, has fully perfected loving-kindness, the path of the ten virtues, generosity, and moral discipline, is prophesied to attain buddhahood and awakening by a perfectly awakened buddha and by bodhisattvas endowed with the ten powers. The limbs of a wooden mannequin have no body, yet its qualities and nature are such that tiny particles are gathered together — the life-force is not a flower of the sky; entering into a coarser body above, it reads and laughs. A living creature is not a crow's horn; through the force of merit and wrongdoing, it revolves through the various destinies. Whatever living creature has a body composed of aggregates of tiny particles, when it dies upon the earth there is none who does not fall. The one who, endowed with the power of the ten powers of the king of tantras, has attained buddhahood and shown the path — the Victor endowed with the ten powers, the Teacher's sons, the gods, nāgas, gandharvas, and asuras who have attained buddhahood, the wrathful ones, the rākṣasas bound by the pledge of flesh, tigers, leopards, and those who follow the tīrthika conduct — all of these, in that supreme royal abode known as Śambhala, I take the sun as my teacher. The glorious one who, dwelling in the fruitful dhātu of the Dharmadhātu, endowed with the ten powers, tamed the māras — all of these: the Kālacakra of the glorious Kalāpa grove of glorious Śambhala, the great meaning questioned by the Sage on the sun-chariot outside the door of the golden maṇḍala palace, the glorious Mañjughoṣa enthroned upon the lion throne of precious gems, spoke the deeds of the one endowed with the ten powers. Thus the essential heart of the subsequent tantra, the Kālacakra tantra, extracted from the tantra of the glorious Ādibuddha, is complete.

This was translated by the Śākya monk, the junior friend, Dharmakīrti.

Translator's Notes

- The title Sanskrit is given in Tibetan phonetic transcription of: Śrī Kālacakra Tantrōttara Tantra Hṛdaya Nāma, which in Tibetan is rendered as "The Glorious Kālacakra Subsequent Tantra, Heart of the Subsequent Tantra." This is a known sub-text of the Kālacakra corpus.

The passage is a dense and at times syntactically fragmented excerpt from what appears to be a hṛdaya, or "heart" summary text of the Kālacakra tradition. Several passages, particularly those concerning the five limbs of killing, the permissibility of flesh for sick monks, and the hammer metaphor, contain technical philosophical and Vinaya-related content that is somewhat elliptically expressed. The "fifteen" in the context of the fully awakened buddha's vow likely refers to the fifteen lunar days. The text transitions abruptly at the end, suggesting the passage breaks off mid-sentence. The polemical sections targeting Vedic (rig-byed) and Śaiva skull-bearer (Kāpālika) tantric traditions for their use of flesh as ritual substance are characteristic of Kālacakra literature.

- The passage is a highly compressed, technically dense verse text engaging with a complex cosmological and philosophical system that blends standard Abhidharma categories (aggregates, elements, sense bases, twelve links of dependent origination) with tantric and Yogācāra frameworks, and an unusual "four-self" schema (outer self, inner self, supreme self, and a fourth) that does not map neatly onto canonical Madhyamaka or Yogācāra categories. The identification of the "teacher among those who have become buddhas, the nāga" in the penultimate verse is notable: this likely refers to Nāgārjuna (nāga as a name-pun), who is quoted on the defining characteristic of the dharmakāya. The embedded quotation from that line onward is treated as direct speech and rendered accordingly.

The phrase rendered "the crystal of the sun" refers to a lens or burning glass used to kindle fire from sunlight — a classical Indian analogy for karmic continuity without transfer of a self.

The final verse is syntactically incomplete as given, breaking off mid-sentence; this reflects the passage boundary rather than any ambiguity in the Tibetan.

- This passage is from a Tantric text — most likely a section of the Kālacakra or a related Vajrayāna work — and contains dense technical Tantric cosmology and embryology. Several phrases involve highly specialized Tantric physiology and terminology that do not map cleanly onto standard Buddhist scholastic glossaries.

The phrase rendered "lord of the seed-syllable" (ལོ་རྒྱལ་གྱི་སྤྲེལ་པོ་) could also be read as "lord of the navel-seed," referring to the central drop at the navel cakra. The rendering here reflects the more common tantric reading of ལོ་རྒྱལ་ as seed-syllable or bindu-seed.

The phrase རྒྱལ་གྱི་སྤྲེལ་ (three families) most naturally refers to the three buddha-families (buddhakula) of body, speech, and mind in tantric context, though in Kālacakra the family structure is more complex.

The section on "naked ones" (ལྷ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་) almost certainly refers to Jain ascetics (nirgrantha), whose practice of bodily mortification is contrasted unfavorably with the yogic method described; only fire, not such austerities, truly burns the karma-aggregate according to the text's argument.

The overall verse structure and imagery are very compressed and the translation reflects this; several lines pivot on technical tantric referents whose full meaning belongs to the initiate tradition.

- The passage presents a highly technical tantric context. The line rendered "doer obscured by the existent and non-existent, and one who seizes space, and the supreme self — when space is absent the doer has no abode: this is the word of those who speak of emptiness" is philosophically dense and possibly polemical, directed against Śaiva or related metaphysical positions asserting a supreme agent-self. The exact rhetorical structure is debated, but the reading offered is the most natural grammatical interpretation.

The "six beginning with individual withdrawal" refers to the six-limbed yoga (ṣaḍāṅgayoga) of the Kālacakra tradition, the first limb being pratyāhāra (individual withdrawal of the senses). This context governs the entire latter portion of the passage.

The "eye of the flesh of dogs and so on" refers to a traditional taxonomy of the five or six eyes in Buddhist literature; the inclusion of animals as examples of the fleshly eye is standard in this enumeration.

- The passage belongs to a tantric commentary — most likely associated with the Hevajra or Cakrasaṃvara cycle, with a final verse drawing on Kālacakra terminology. Several lines enumerate wrathful deities: Yamāntaka, Padmāntaka, Vighnāntaka, and Prajñāntaka, the four great wrathful ones of the Cakrasaṃvara system; these names are rendered by their standard Sanskrit equivalents rather than translated literally, as they are proper names of specific tantric deities. The "six-faced, six-armed Maheśvara" rendering is uncertain; the Tibetan reads three-faced and six-armed, which I have followed. The phrase rendered "the Teacher's son" refers to the nirmāṇakāya-level being who teaches; "Samayasattva" is a technical Vajrayāna term for the samaya or pledge being as distinct from the jñānasattva. The list of channels, wheels, and numerical correspondences follows standard Inner Tantra physiology and cannot be rendered more precisely without access to a root tantra commentary.

- The passage is a densely technical Kālacakra-Guhyasamāja tantric context, and several lines resist fully transparent rendering because they function as coded "twilight language" (intentionally ambiguous ritual instructions). The rendering preserves their literal sense where possible without smoothing them into doctrinal clarity they do not have on the surface.

The phrase rendered "the hare-bearing one" refers to the moon, which in Indian cosmology bears the mark of a hare; this is a conventional epithet.

The line beginning "these words of the maras" and the following several lines appear to shift in speaker or perspective within a polemical frame — possibly a refutation of Mara's position — and the Tibetan syntax is genuinely ambiguous at this juncture.

- The section on Maitreya going to the beer-seller, the fishermen, and the servant-girls at dawn, midday, and dusk is a tantric passage presenting antinomian or crazy-wisdom conduct as supreme austerity. "Maitreya" here likely refers not to the future buddha but to a siddha or the practitioner adopting the name as a tantric identity; the passage is deliberately provocative and follows the pattern of Vajrayāna doha literature. The avadhūtī is the central subtle body channel; calling it "of common birth" (dmangs rigs) plays on the paradox of the ordinary and the transcendent.

The long middle section is a sustained philosophical debate, likely drawn from a Mīmāṃsā or related śāstra context, about whether sound (śabda) is eternal or impermanent — a classic debate between Mīmāṃsakas (who hold sound is eternal) and Buddhists (who hold it is impermanent). The argument is intricate and the Tibetan is terse; the translation renders each step faithfully, though some transitions remain elliptical in the original.

- The passage is part of a sustained philosophical debate engaging several Indian philosophical positions, including Sāṃkhya, Vaiśeṣika, and Vijñānavāda (Yogācāra). The verse "barren woman's daughter, born of mere space, becomes space; one born of a woman who has a son becomes all sentient beings" uses the classical Indian reductio-style examples of impossible entities (a barren woman's child, space-flowers) to illustrate the absurdity of claiming stable entities arise from non-existent or empty causes. The "thirty-one realms of existence" reflects a specific cosmological enumeration found in certain Indic and Tibetan scholastic traditions. The phrase rendered "mere consciousness" throughout represents the Yogācāra technical term vijñaptimātra, here being critically examined rather than endorsed. The final lines appear to be turning against the Yogācāra position by pointing out that if adventitious ignorance is distinct from consciousness, it cannot itself be mere consciousness, thus undermining a purely idealist reading. The term rendered "the supreme lord" in the context of speaking about permanence refers to Īśvara, the Sāṃkhya or Śaiva supreme being, who is being characterized and critiqued here. The passage is metrically dense and philosophically compressed; some lines admit of more than one syntactic parsing, but the rendering given follows the most doctrinally coherent reading.

- The passage is metrically organized verse engaging in a sustained polemic against the Vaibhāṣika atomic realism and the Yogācāra doctrine of "mere consciousness" (vijñaptimātra). Several lines involve compressed philosophical argument where the Tibetan syntax is elliptical and the referents shift rapidly; the rendering follows the most doctrinally coherent reading at each juncture.

The phrase rendered "those who are mentally blind" refers to those lacking functional sense organs who still have mental cognition, deployed here as a counter-argument to the claim that perception arises purely from habitual tendencies rather than from sense faculties and external objects.

The closing verse transitions abruptly into what appears to be an incomplete sentence listing positive path-dharmas; the Tibetan ends mid-enumeration, indicating the passage continues beyond what was supplied for translation.

- The figure rendered as Bodhivajra (byang chub rdo rje) appears twice as a named tantric teacher or deity-figure; the identity is left as transliterated, as the Tibetan is unambiguous even if the referent is context-dependent within the larger tantra.

The phrase rendered "the lion-seizer" (seng ge 'phrog byed) is an epithet whose precise referent in this context is uncertain — it may be an epithet of a deity or of the Buddha; the translation leaves it descriptive.

"Madhyamati" renders ma dhu ma ti, a Sanskrit name meaning "one with middling or honey-like intellect"; the Tibetan is a phonetic rendering of Sanskrit and is kept as the Sanskrit name.

The line on "the king of aeons" and the thirty-six thousand aeons reflects a probable scribal or transmission figure that is doctrinally unusual; no emendation has been made.

- The passage contains a dense series of proper names and place names that are phonetically transcribed in Tibetan from Sanskrit or regional languages. Kirṃiri is a rākṣasa name from the Mahābhārata; Candrasīmha is a named king; Śaktimatī and Draupadī are recognizable Sanskrit names rendered from Tibetan phonetics. Several geographic and ethnic names — Gāra, Mahendhu, Miseren, Dezrid, Kara, Parukūlāntara, Gostan, Pīra, Gokha — are phonetic transcriptions of regional names that cannot be identified with certainty from this text alone. The term rendered as "Daṇḍin" may refer to an ascetic with a staff or to the proper name of a figure; the context is genuinely ambiguous. The expression "bhaga" has been left in Sanskrit as it carries a deliberate double meaning — both a sacred ritual substance and a sexual anatomical reference — which is central to the polemical purpose of this passage.
- The phrase rendered "the Sun, the supreme deity, the lord, the Sun itself" reflects a telescoping sequence of divine epithets in the original that is difficult to parse cleanly; the list appears to conflate Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Sūrya (the Sun deity). The intended referent of "what shall they eat" is deliberately rhetorical, challenging the logic of deity-feeding through sacrifice.

The term translated as "palace-mansions" for རྒྱལ་ཁོངས་ is somewhat uncertain; it may refer specifically to spirit-dwellings or to palatial residences associated with supernatural beings produced through ritual.

The line about the "lion-lord, the Great Sovereign, Brahmā" telescopes several divine epithets that may refer to different traditions' names for a supreme deity; the sequence is polemical, listing non-Buddhist divine figures to interrogate their reality.

- This passage is an extraordinarily difficult and doctrinally heterodox text. Several terms are used with deliberate transgressive ambiguity characteristic of certain tantric polemical literature. The word "bhaga" (literally "vagina," but also "sovereignty/fortune") is left in Sanskrit throughout as the text itself plays on this polysemy untranslatably. "Mogatham butterfly" thumb-breadth image reflects Śaiva cosmological atomism being described in a polemical register. The phrase rendered "the three-pathed, bent, the terrifying one" translates Tibetan epithets that likely correspond to Śaiva goddess epithets, possibly Bhagavatī or a form of Kālī. The "turtle-hair bow" and "sky-flower arrow" are standard philosophical examples of impossible or non-existent things in Indian logic, deployed here satirically. "Heruka" is the wrathful tantric deity; the rhetorical question comparing him to Viṣṇu appears to be a polemical assertion distinguishing Buddhist tantric accomplishment from non-Buddhist theistic cosmology. The overall passage appears to be from a tantric apologetic or polemical text critiquing Śaiva and brahminical practices while asserting the supremacy of the Buddhist path, including both the Mahāyāna ethical path and the Vajrayāna method. Several individual lines remain genuinely obscure in their precise referents due to the elliptical and possibly corrupt state of the text.

- This passage is exceptionally dense and presents numerous difficulties. Several points deserve mention.

The repeated phrase rendered as "one who holds the vow of flesh" involves a technical tantric category of samaya holders associated with flesh offerings; the precise soteriological context is obscure without a commentary.

The lines concerning "a king killing brahmins enters the higher realms" and "a king who kills enters hell" appear deliberately antinomian and paradoxical, possibly reflecting a tantric inversion of conventional ethics. The translation preserves the apparent contradiction as found in the text.

"Yamāntaka" renders ཡམ་འཛོམས་པ་, literally "the fearsome one," which in context is most likely the wrathful deity Yamāntaka rather than a generic epithet; this identification is maintained throughout.

The proper names Jaṭī, Paśupāda, Khaṇḍa, Lopastraṅga, and Poṅgo are rendered from the Tibetan transliterations as best as can be determined; their Sanskrit originals remain uncertain in several cases.

The final line is syntactically incomplete in the source text, ending mid-phrase, and the translation renders it accordingly.

- This passage is part of a Kālacakra-related prophetic and ritual text, likely from the Kālacakra Tantra corpus or its commentary tradition. Several proper names and terms in this passage are either Sanskrit transliterations rendered phonetically into Tibetan or technical astrological and ritual terms specific to the Kālacakra system, including Kālāpa (the mythical kingdom), Cincinī, Madhumatī, and Pavana-saṅgha. Their precise identification within the scholastic tradition is a matter of specialist commentary and cannot always be resolved philologically from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase rendered "neuter vowel" for ma ning reflects the grammatical and cosmological category of the indeterminate or neuter gender used in Sanskrit grammatical and tantric contexts; its precise doctrinal valence here is embedded in Kālacakra linguistic cosmology.

The reference to "eighteen years" and the multiplication "hundred by a hundred" relates to Kālacakra calendrical and eschatological cycles, the details of which require specialist commentary for full interpretation.

- The passage is a dense technical verse from what appears to be a maṇḍala-ritual context, possibly a Vajrayāna sādhana or Tantra describing a protection-circle construction rite. Several lines are syntactically compressed and elliptical, and the ritual sequence (the placement of lotuses, hooks, nooses, and other symbolic implements) follows conventions whose precise referents depend on the specific Tantra in question. The rendering follows the most defensible reading throughout.

The term rendered "māmakī" for "ma mo" (མ་མོ་) follows the standard identification of these as wrathful protectress-spirits; the line could also simply mean "mothers who destroy all fears," but the ritual context favors the class of spirit-beings.

The phrase "bhaga" (Skt. bhaga, rendered phonetically per the Tibetan "bha ga") refers to the vulva; the passage is making a polemical doctrinal point that the claim of a tantric buddha residing in the sexual organ of a consort is false if no real buddha has descended into saṃsāra, and that only Vajrasattva — being free of attachment and the three defilements — is the genuine referent.

The final simile of the mother, the ale-seller, and the buddhas draws a rhetorical parallel between deceptive and genuine means of drawing beings toward a goal — a well-known pedagogical device in Tantric polemical literature.

- The phrase rendered "Show me just a space of sky — o heir of my lineage, take nirvāṇa!" is elliptical and the exact syntactic relationship of its clauses is compressed in the original; the translation represents the most contextually coherent reading. The line may be a divine voice urging a being of noble lineage toward nirvāṇa using the sky as a symbol of its openness, but the precise referent is not fully clear from the passage alone.

The colophon identifies the translator as the Śākya monk Dharmakīrti (Tibetan: Gnyen chung Dharmagags), a junior monastic figure. The epithet "junior friend" renders the Tibetan gnyen chung, a humble self-designation meaning something like "the lesser/junior one among friends," standard in colophons.

The lines concerning the mannequin, the crow's horn, and falling at death appear to be a series of philosophical negations and affirmations regarding the continuity of consciousness and rebirth — likely polemical verses against materialist or eternalist positions. The translation preserves their cryptic character, which is inherent to the original.
