

The Detailed Exposition of the Vinaya

Vinayavibhaṅga · Toh 3 · Derge Kangyur

འདུལ་བ་རྒྱ་པར་འབདྱེ་པ།

Toh 3 in the Kangyur is the Vinaya Vibhaṅga, known in Tibetan as Dulwa Rnampar Jépa (འདུལ་བ་རྒྱ་པར་འབདྱེ་པ), meaning "The Detailed Exposition of the Vinaya." It is a foundational Vinaya text — one of the great disciplinary scriptures of the Buddhist canon — that provides a systematic, rule-by-rule analysis and explanation of monastic conduct, elaborating on the precepts governing the behavior of ordained monks and nuns. As its opening verse suggests, the text reveres the Buddha as the supreme lord of the Vinaya and situates the monastic code as the very root and cause of all Buddhist practice. Belonging to the Vinaya section of the Kangyur, it represents one of the most extensive and authoritative texts on monastic discipline preserved in the Tibetan canonical tradition.

In the language of India: Vinaya Vibhaṅga. In the Tibetan language: The Detailed Exposition of the Vinaya (Skt. vinaya-vibhaṅga). First fascicle.

Homage to the Three Jewels.

I pay homage to the Victor, born of noble royal lineage, who tamed his disciples and thoroughly subdued all faults, the buddha, foremost lord of the Vinaya.
Now I shall speak briefly in praise of the Vinaya.

The far shore unseen, the depths unfathomed, the ocean of the Vinaya divided by the distinctions drawn by the assemblies of masters wrapped in the dense darkness of ignorance —

I have not the strength or the wit to praise all its qualities.

Just as in this world there is a great root-tree, which is the ground for both spreading and sustaining, so too has it been said that the Vinaya is the cause and root of all the assemblies of the sacred Dharma.

Just as the earth is the foundation of all living beings, from which all grains grow and arise, so too the Vinaya is the foundation of those who strive in the vows, and from it likewise does all merit arise.

Moral discipline has been understood as the dwelling-place of all virtuous qualities, and it has been said that the dwelling of moral discipline is the Vinaya.

If one abides in this, one will reach the final end;

if one does not abide in this, how could one ever reach it?

Just as a dam of solid stone that cannot be eroded will turn back even a great river, so too this noble dam of the Vinaya will turn back the river of broken moral discipline.

The buddhas and the pratyekabuddhas, the awakening they attained — the pure disciples of the Sage, and sentient beings who are arhats endowed with qualities:

even for all of these, it has been said, the Vinaya was the cause.

As long as in this world the supreme treasury of all Victors, this complete Vinaya, endures,

so long shall this lamp of the Dharma remain, and if it is turned back, peace will be attained.

When a buddha no longer dwells, one resorts to the worldly ślokas (metrical verses) and to such and such branches of the sūtras.

Without guidance into training, the Vinaya too would be no more.

Therefore the Victors have declared this to be most rare.

This is the iron hook for the unrestrained mind, like an elephant;

this is the bridle for those disciples who are yet untamed.

Like the embankment that marks the field's boundary, the Vinaya is the dam that holds back every defilement.

The treatises of the Victor, the Teacher, are said to be the sūtras and the Abhidharma; but the Vinaya is both the Teacher himself and the treatise directly — for this reason it becomes worthy of double veneration: as the Buddha and as the Dharma, both in one.

The buddhas who dwell in dependence upon it regard it with reverence and honor it as their guru.

It is that which protects, serving as protector and as refuge.

Therefore strive earnestly and pay homage to the Vinaya.

Whoever grows careless toward the compassionate teaching of the Teacher and allows even a little to pass by — that one, through other forces of suffering, attains a state of misery, as when a mango grove is ruined by the intrusion of a bamboo thicket.

Here there are those who recite even the great royal words, yet if recited only a few times without continuity, no cessation of faults is attained.

If the scriptural teachings of the Sage are recited improperly, one will go to the animal realm, like an eel's fin shaken by a nāga.

That by which individual liberation is to be attained, the great ocean of the Vinaya of the buddhas — bottomless and boundless — is the very heart and essence of all that abides.

This is the supreme guide of all the phenomena of the holy Dharma, the king of Dharma.

This is the great warehouse of training and the great marketplace for the merchant-community of monks.

This is the medicine that clears the poison from those seized by broken moral discipline.

This is the iron hook for two-footed youth who are confused and bewildered by their prime of life.

This is the means of crossing to liberation from saṃsāra, which is deeper than the ocean.

This is the certain dam and bridge for those who journey on to better realms.

This is the path that defeats the afflictions, the supreme guide for the noble ones.

This is what stands like the first step of the stairway by which one enters the city of liberation.

"When I have passed into nirvāṇa, this will be your Teacher" — with reverence, the Self-Arisen One himself solemnly praised it before the assembly of monks.

Since it is understood that this Vinaya is the very analysis of individual liberation, those who long for liberation should attend to it with reverence and diligence.

Here ends the Praise of the Vinaya.

Even across ten million eons, the chance to hear the Vinaya, to receive and hold it, is hard to find — and harder still to put it into practice.

The arising of buddhas is a blessing.

The teaching of the Dharma is a blessing.

The harmony of the Saṅgha is a blessing, and the austerity of those in harmony is a blessing.

To see the noble ones is a blessing.

To keep company with the holy is a blessing.

If the childish are not encountered, one dwells in perpetual ease.

To see one of moral discipline is a blessing.

To see one of great learning is a blessing.

To see an arhat who is fully freed from renewed existence is a blessing.

A river easy to enter, with pleasant banks, is a blessing.

A person accustomed to the Dharma is a blessing.

One who has attained wisdom is a blessing.

One in whom pride and conceit are exhausted is a blessing.

Those who are resolute, with senses tamed, who have grown old in tranquil hermitages, and those of great learning who dwell in forest groves once the flush of youth has passed — their dwelling is a blessing.

To the Lion of the Śākya, pressing palms together with ten fingers,
I have set forth the Vinaya with full emphasis:
listen to me for the sake of those to be tamed.

Having heard it, practice exactly as the great sage has declared, and toward even the subtler faults, be careful and conscientious.

The mind-horse, which even with constant effort is hard to rein in, is broken by this Vinaya — the sharp hundred-pointed goad of harmony.

Those great ones who turn back and do not cross the boundary at a mere word of rebuke: they are fine human horses, and they will pass surely through the battle with the afflictions.

Those who lack this goad and never come to desire it will be roiled by the battle of the afflictions and will wander without rest, scattered and lost.

For twelve years the śrāvaka Saṅgha of the Blessed One was without fault and without blemish. Then the Blessed One summarized the sūtra of individual liberation for the śrāvakas in brief:

Do not commit any evil.

Accomplish virtue in full abundance.

Tame your own mind completely.

This is the teaching of the buddhas.

Restraint of body is good.

Restraint of speech is good.

Restraint of mind is good.

Restraint in all things is good.

The monk who is restrained in all things is fully freed from every suffering.

Guarding speech, and with the mind fully restrained, not committing any non-virtue of body, having purified these three paths of action,
one attains the path proclaimed by the great sage.

Thus he taught.

When the thirteenth year arrived, the Blessed One, the buddha, was residing in the Kalandaka village in the land of the Śroṇas. At that time in Kalandaka village there lived a certain son of Kalandaka named Supriya, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches and extensive property, and whose holdings were broad and vast, with wealth rivaling that of Vaiśravaṇa and comparable to Vaiśravaṇa in riches. He had taken a wife from his own social rank and delighted in sporting with her, enjoying her company and living in pleasure with her.

Then at another time he came to have full confidence in the buddha, full confidence in the Dharma and the Saṅgha. He went for refuge to the buddha, went for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha. He abandoned the taking of life and turned back from taking life. He abandoned taking what is not given, sexual misconduct, false speech, and the heedless states induced by fermented grain-liquor and prepared intoxicants, and turned back from those heedless states induced by fermented grain-liquor and prepared intoxicants.

He continued to foster that same faith as before, and then, having shaved off his hair and beard, he put on ochre-colored robes and, in genuine faith, went forth from home into homelessness.

Having thus gone forth, he still lived mixing and staying together with relatives, just as he had done when he was a householder.

Then the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, thought to himself: "Having gone forth into the well-spoken Dharma and discipline, I am still living and mixing together with relatives just as I did when I was a householder. I have not found what is to be found, and what I have found is not good — rather, I have found fault and not found the good. Let me part from my relatives, take up my bowl and robes, and go wandering from region to region."

And so the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, parted from his relatives, took up his bowl and robes, and went wandering from region to region. At that time there was a harsh and grievous famine, such that wandering mendicants found it difficult to obtain food, and even parents found it hard to give food to their own children and to do what was needed for them — let alone for wandering mendicants, of whom nothing need be said.

Then the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, thought to himself: "Right now there is this harsh and grievous famine, wandering mendicants find it difficult to obtain food, and even parents find it hard to give food to their own children and to do what is needed for them — let alone for wandering mendicants, of whom nothing need be said. And yet I have wealthy relatives with great resources. Let me go to the village of Kalandaka, visit my relatives there, arrange for the Saṅgha to be provided with food, and have the Saṅgha supplied with porridge, soup for drinking, regular meals by turns, invited meals, the eighth-day feast, the fourteenth-day feast, fish feasts, and various small special offerings."

So the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, stayed in whatever regions he pleased for as long as he liked, then took up his bowl and robes and set off for the village of Kalandaka. Wandering along in stages, in time he arrived at the village of Kalandaka and took up residence in a forest hermitage at the edge of that village.

The venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, then went to visit his relatives, and upon arriving before them he recited praises of the buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and had food arranged for the Saṅgha. He had the Saṅgha provided with porridge, soup for drinking, regular meals by turns, invited meals, the eighth-day feast, the fourteenth-day feast, fish feasts, and various small special offerings.

At that time the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was one who dwelt in the forest, wore the three robes, collected rags from charnel grounds, and went on alms-round in strict order from house to house.

Then, on another occasion, having first satisfied the community of monks with a meal of porridge, he put on his lower robe in the morning, took up his bowl and robes, and entered the village of Kalandaka for alms. Going through the village of Kalandaka on his alms-round in order, he came to his own former home. At that home he received no gift and was not sent away — but left quickly.

At that moment, something improper concerning the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, had come to pass outside. An old female servant, seeing that the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, had received no gift at his own former home and had not been sent away but had departed swiftly, observed this.

Having seen this, she went to where the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was, and when she arrived she said to the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka: "My lady, please know this. The reverend Bhadradatta came home late, late indeed, to his own former home, and received no gift there and was not sent away, but departed swiftly."

Then the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, thought to herself: "Alas — can it be that my son Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, is feeling desire, or disenchantment, or a wish to wander, and is no longer seeking the life of a renunciant? Or that he has grown weary of the renunciant's way, or that depression has arisen in him, or that he is troubled by doubt, or that he is reviling it, or that he wishes to abandon the renunciant's way entirely? I wonder whether something of that sort has come to pass." Thinking and knowing this, she came out from the village of Kalandaka, went to where the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was, and when she arrived said to him:

"My son Bhadradatta, if you are feeling desire, or disenchantment, or a wish to wander, and are no longer seeking the renunciant's way, or have grown weary of the renunciant's way, or depression has arisen in you, or you are troubled by doubt, or you are reviling it, or you wish to abandon the renunciant's way — then, my son Bhadradatta, know this: the wealth of women that belongs to women, called women's treasure, or women's dowry, or the substance that is women's domain — that which was your mother's silver and great heap of gold is such that a person standing at one end cannot see a person sitting at the other end, and a person sitting at one end cannot see a person standing at the other end. That belongs to your mother. And beyond that, there is your father's silver and unstamped gold amounting to many hundreds, many thousands, and many hundreds of thousands — and what need is there even to speak of your father and others? My son Bhadradatta, come back. Remain here, enjoy pleasures, give gifts, and make merit."

When she had spoken thus, the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, said to his mother: "Mother, I am not feeling desire, or disenchantment, or a wish to wander while failing to seek the renunciant's way, nor am I weary of the renunciant's way, nor has depression arisen in me, nor am I troubled by doubt, nor do I revile it. I will not abandon the renunciant's way."

Then the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, thought: "Even though I have said all this, I have not been able to turn my son Bhadradatta back. Let me go home and keep his former wife hidden away." So the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, went home and said to her daughter-in-law: "Dear daughter, whenever the time comes and the lunar signs are favorable for you, let her be informed." The former wife of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, listened respectfully and replied: "As my lady commands."

Then, at another time, when the former wife of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, found that the time had come and the lunar signs were favorable, she went to where the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was and said to her: "Dear mother-in-law, now that the time has come and the lunar signs are favorable, please tell me what I should do. For his sake, with what sort of massage should I massage him, with what sort of bath should I bathe him, and with what fragrances, garlands, incense, powder, garments, and ornaments should I adorn myself, so that Bhadradatta, when he was still a householder, would delight in—"

"massage him with such a massage as he would delight in and find pleasing, bathe him with such a bath, and adorn yourself with such fragrances, garlands, incense, powder, garments, and ornaments."

Then the former wife of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, received instruction from her mother-in-law as to what kind of massage to give, what kind of bath to prepare, and with what fragrances, garlands, incense, powder, garments, and ornaments to adorn herself so that the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, when he was still a householder, would rejoice and find pleasing. She gave him just such a massage, bathed him with just such a bath, and adorned herself with just such fragrances, garlands, incense, powder, garments, and ornaments. She then went to where the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was, and said to his mother: "Dear mother-in-law, in a situation like this, what should I do?"

Then the mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, mounted a single carriage together with her daughter-in-law, set out from the village of Kalandaka, and traveled to where the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was. She rode by carriage as far as the road permitted, then dismounted and went on foot alone to where the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was.

At that time the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, was pacing back and forth in an open, unenclosed walking place outside his dwelling. The mother of the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, caught sight of her son from a great distance. When she saw him, she went to where he was and said to him:

"My son, Bhadradatta, if you have no disaffection, no disenchantment, no wish to wander away, if you are not one who fails to seek the purpose of the ascetic's way of life, not one who is weary of the ascetic's way of life, not one who is despondent, not one who wavers in doubt, not one who is disparaging, and not one who wishes to abandon the ascetic's way of life — then, my son, your wife is now in her season, the lunar signs are favorable. Bestow upon her a little of the seed. Since you have no son, it would not be fitting that all the property over which you hold authority should, by whatever means, come to be controlled by the king."

Now the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, had not yet established a foundation in the training, and had not perceived any fault in it. Seeing a young woman of fair complexion and lovely appearance such as would arouse attachment, he was overcome by desire in his mind. Overwhelmed by desire, he found himself with a body utterly tormented and a mind utterly tormented, and with that tormented body and tormented mind he said to his mother:

"Mother, may I do as you ask? My son Bhadradatta — yes, regarding the matter of the seed, it is entirely fitting."

Then the venerable Bhadradatta, son of Kalandaka, heeded his mother, took his former wife by both hands, went to one side, set aside his monastic robes, and engaged in sexual intercourse with her two or three times. He was a being in his last existence, one who seeks conduct, one who had grasped the essence of liberation, one oriented toward nirvāṇa.

Turned away from cyclic existence, one who did not seek death and rebirth in any of the existences of saṃsāra, one who held a final body — this being passed away from a wholesome divine realm and entered the womb of that woman who was the mother of living beings.

Now a woman skilled in the ways of women possesses five qualities unmixed with others. What are those five? She knows when a man has become aroused and knows when the arousal has passed. She knows the time and knows the lunar signs. She knows when a being has entered and is dwelling in the womb. She knows from whom the being dwelling in the womb has entered. And she knows whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, it rests leaning against the right hip, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning against the left hip.

She, delighted and gladdened, said to Śyāmā: "Dear mother, please be informed. A being has entered into me, and since it rests leaning against my right hip, it will certainly be a boy."

She too, delighted and gladdened, spoke thus: she would cause to be announced by name the offering of gifts — saying that this nephew, seen to be devout toward her for such a long time, had been born in accordance with her and not contrary to her, that he performs her tasks, that he tends to her in return for her having tended to him, that he partakes of his share, that her lineage and family line would continue for a long time, that when they had died and the proper time had come, whether a little or a great deal of giving had been done and merit had been made, let him go and follow wherever these two had been reborn — she would have this proclaimed, announced by name.

Knowing that a being had entered, and in order to bring the one dwelling in the womb to full maturity, she arranged for the chambers of an upper storey to be made available, and had her waited upon without any hindrance: in the cold season with implements for warmth, and in the warm season with implements for coolness; with food prescribed by physicians that was not too bitter, not too sour, not too salty, not too sweet, not too hot, not too pungent, and that was free from bitterness, sourness, saltiness, sweetness, heat, and pungency; with garlands and ornaments adorning her body, moving about as though in the pleasure grove of divine maidens; so that she would not descend from couch to couch, from seat to seat, to the ground below, and that she would not hear even the slightest disagreeable sound.

After eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth, and a boy appeared — handsome of form, pleasing to behold, beautiful, radiant, with a complexion like gold, bearing a head like a parasol, with long arms, a broad forehead, arching eyebrows, and a high bridge of the nose.

The relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day, the third set of seven days from the birth, a great birth-feast was held, and they proceeded to give the boy a name. They thought: "Since this boy was found through the matter of the seed, let the boy's name be Sāvana," and so his name was given as Sāvana.

The boy Sāvana was entrusted to eight nurses — two nurses to hold him on their laps and keep him alive, two nurses to give him suck, two nurses to bathe and cleanse him of impurity, and two nurses to play with him as companions. Those eight nurses nourished and raised him with milk, yogurt, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and other principal provisions of every kind, and swiftly grew him like a lotus dwelling in a pond.

When he had grown up, he took up the study of letters, numbers, calculation, reckoning on the fingers, drawing out, inserting, and setting down, and reached the end of learning in letters, as well as the ability to open, to read, and — mastery, clear conduct, and these eight forms of examination: examination of precious stones, examination of land, examination of cloth, examination of wood, examination of elephants, examination of horses, examination of women, and examination of men — in all of these he became proficient.

Then at another time he came to have manifest faith in the Buddha, manifest faith in the Dharma and the Saṅgha, and went for refuge to the Buddha, went for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha. He abandoned the taking of life and turned back from taking life. He abandoned taking what is not given, sexual misconduct in the pursuit of desires, false speech, and the heedless indulgence in fermented grain-liquor and brewed liquor, and turned back from the heedless indulgence in fermented grain-liquor and brewed liquor.

Continuing in that very faith which had come down from his father, and nurturing it further, he shaved off his hair and beard, dressed himself in saffron-colored robes, and with perfectly pure faith went forth from home into homelessness in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya. Having thus gone forth, he dwelt alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, persistence, and self-abandonment. Dwelling alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, persistence, and self-abandonment, he realized through his own direct knowledge, and in that very lifetime accomplished and witnessed, that supreme culmination of the holy life for the sake of which noble sons shave off their hair and beard, dress in saffron-colored robes, and with perfectly pure faith go forth from home into homelessness. He came to know directly: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. I know no further becoming beyond this." He became an arhat, free of attachment toward the three realms, with a mind equally disposed toward a clod of earth and gold, equal to the sky and the palm of the hand, his awareness like sandalwood placed at rest, having cleaved through the mouth of the den of birth. He attained the knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the individual discriminating awarenesses. He turned his back on becoming, on the gains that come from desire, and on honors. He became one to be venerated, celebrated, and addressed directly by the gods of the sense faculties and those with faculties close by.

Then the venerable Śāṇavāsa, upon attaining arhatship and fully realizing with individual knowledge the joy and happiness of complete liberation, at that moment spoke this verse:

I have obtained my share from among the Dharmas.
I do not enrich myself with my father's wealth.
I learned only after much procrastination — and yet I was greatly delayed in youth.

At that time the Blessed One was seated before a retinue of many hundreds of monks and was teaching the śrāvakas the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom in order to free attachment from attachment, teaching the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom in order to free aversion from attachment, and in order to free delusion from attachment.

At that time the venerable Śāṇavāsa, the son of Kalandaka, was present in that very assembly and was in harmony with it. Yet just as the Blessed One taught, step by step, the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom in order to free attachment from attachment, and the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom in order to free aversion from attachment and delusion from attachment — even so, the venerable Śāṇavāsa, the son of Kalandaka, began to feel a measure of remorse, grew deeply remorseful, became utterly remorseful, and sat there filled with regret, having obtained remorse, silent, with loosened shoulders, downcast face, and no confidence.

Then at another time, while a great many monks were wandering about in their travels, they went to the place where the venerable Śāṇavāsa, son of Kalandaka, was staying. Having arrived, they exchanged various pleasantries with the venerable Śāṇavāsa, son of Kalandaka, delighting and rejoicing together with him, and then sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, those many monks said this to the venerable Śāṇavāsa, son of Kalandaka:

"Venerable Śāṇavāsa, in the past, whenever you saw monks who had just arrived unexpectedly, you would greet them with friendly words and accept their alms-bowls, their robes, their staffs, their strainers, their round water vessels, their oil containers, their hats, their sandals with straps, and their slippers. But now, when you see monks who have just arrived unexpectedly, you have grown somewhat remorseful, deeply remorseful, utterly remorseful, and you sit there filled with remorse. You have obtained remorse, you are silent, your shoulders are loose, your face is downcast, you have no confidence, and you remain sunk within yourself. Venerable Śāṇavāsa, surely there is no physical affliction or mental distress troubling you now?"

"Venerable ones, there is no physical affliction of any kind troubling me now. Yet I do have a mental distress. Venerable ones, what is the mental distress that afflicts you?" At that point he explained the matter in full to the monks, yet those monks neither praised nor dissuaded him from it — they neither praised nor dissuaded him — and rising from their seats, they went to the place where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, they bowed their heads to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, those many monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One.

When this was reported, the Blessed One addressed those many monks thus:

"Monks, among the many phenomena that resemble the bases of defilement, Śāṇavāsa, son of Kalandaka, has been the first to commit this one — namely, what was done through the condition of unchaste conduct."

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis, and this occasion, convened the community of monks. The Tathāgata convened the community of monks, seeing it to be necessary for two purposes: so that all my hearers might come to know of it fully, and so that a proper foundation for training in the Vinaya might be well established.

The blessed buddhas inquire knowingly. They inquire knowingly but do not inquire unknowingly. They inquire at the right time and do not inquire at the wrong time. They inquire about what is meaningful and do not inquire about what is without meaning. Therefore, when blessed buddhas inquire about something without meaning, they check and turn it aside with a word. And when blessed buddhas inquire about something meaningful, they know the right time to do so.

Thus the Blessed One inquired of the venerable Śāṇavāsa, son of Kalandaka: "Śāṇavāsa, is it true that you have done something so unseemly?"

"Blessed one, it is true."

The Blessed One declared: "What is not proper conduct for a monk, what is not in accordance with it, what is not fitting, what does not accord with proper conduct — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth into renunciation. Śāṇavāsa, I have taught the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom in order to free attachment from attachment, and to free aversion from attachment —"

"— and in order to free delusion from attachment, I have taught the Dharma of liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom. Why have you done something so unseemly? You, deluded man — it would be better to place one's own limb into the mouth of a black snake whose venom spreads swiftly, whose poison is fierce, whose poison is sharp, than to do as you have done with a woman." Thus he rebuked him.

Then the Blessed One, having rebuked him many times over, addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits fully, one should establish rules of training in the Vinaya for the hearers. They are as follows: for the sake of gathering the Saṅgha together; for the sake of benefiting the Saṅgha; for the sake of the Saṅgha dwelling at ease; for the sake of subduing those individuals who are shameless and disrespectful; for the sake of those who have a sense of shame dwelling at ease; for the sake of causing those who have no faith to generate faith; for the sake of those who have faith continuing to grow further; for the sake of restraining the defilements of this very life; for the sake of warding off those of future lives; and for the sake of the pure conduct I teach, which is of widespread benefit to many beings, being correctly demonstrated for a long time among gods and humans alike. Thus should my hearers proclaim this rule of training in the Vinaya: Whatever monk, having taken up the same training together with the monks, without having relinquished that training and without having made clear that his training has deteriorated, engages in the act of unchastity — the way of sexual intercourse — that monk has incurred a defeat and may not remain."

Thus did the Blessed One establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

The awakened Blessed One was residing in Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the Kalandaka birds.

At that time, a certain monk was dwelling in a forest thicket near Rājagṛha. Then that monk, having tempted a female forest monkey repeatedly with food, engaged in the act of unchastity — the way of sexual intercourse — with her.

Thereafter, a great number of monks, wandering on their alms rounds, happened to come to the place where that monk's thicket was, and went there. They engaged in various conversations that brought open delight and full satisfaction to that monk, and they sat down to one side. Then that female monkey, remembering that same former evil and improper act, went to the place where that monk was and gazed directly into his face, and bared her rump, and attempted to entice that monk in such a manner — yet he repelled her out of shame before those other monks. The monkey gazed into his face a second time and a third time, and bared her rump, and attempted to entice that monk in such a manner — and he repelled her a second time and a third time, out of shame before those monks.

Then that monkey, having become angry, agitated, and fierce, and being displeased in mind, used her claws on his face, nose, robe, and feet, and went off to one side, and sat crouching like a dog, whimpering.

Then those monks said to that monk: "Venerable one, why does this forest monkey gaze into your face and bare her rump, and try to entice you in such a manner — while you repel her out of shame before us? Why does this forest monkey gaze into your face a second and third time and bare her rump, and try to entice you in such a manner —" while we repel him out of shame before us. And yet this forest monkey, angered, agitated, and fierce, displeased in mind, scratched his face, nose, robe, and feet with her claws, went off to one side, and sat crouching like a dog, whimpering."

And at that point those monks related the whole matter in full to that monk. When they had spoken thus, those monks said to that monk: "Venerable one, has the Blessed One not prohibited unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse? Venerable ones, it has indeed been prohibited — but that prohibition applies to human beings, not to one born in the animal realm." Those monks neither praised nor reproved him, and without either praising or reproving they rose from their seats, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived they bowed with their heads to the Blessed One's two feet and stood to one side. Standing to one side, a great many monks then related that matter in full to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, since I have already prohibited it even for human beings, what need is there to speak of one born in the animal realm? Monks, that deluded man has incurred defeat."

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this case, convened a gathering of the community of monks. From the words "The blessed buddhas, while knowing full well, make inquiry" down to "the Blessed One rebuked that monk," everything proceeds as before. "Monk, is it true that you did such an ugly thing as this?" "Venerable one, I did." The blessed Buddha then, from the words "this is not the conduct of a renunciant" down to "you deluded man — it would be better for you to have thrust a limb of your own body into the mouth of a black serpent whose venom spreads swiftly, whose venom is fierce, whose venom is sharp, rather than to do what you have done; but what has been done cannot apply to one born in the animal realm" — the Blessed One delivered a rebuke in full.

Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, for that reason the former rule is the primary ruling, and this is the supplementary ruling. My hearers are to recite this training rule of the Vinaya in this way:

Furthermore, whatever monk, while sharing the same training equally with the monks and without having relinquished the training, without having declared the training to be impaired, engages in unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse — even if it be with one born in the animal realm — that monk has incurred defeat and is not to remain in the community.

Now as to the phrase 'whatever monk': a monk is of four kinds — a monk in name, a monk by self-proclamation, a monk for the sake of alms, and a monk through having overcome the afflictions. Among these, who is a monk in name? Whoever bears the name, is addressed by that name, is referred to by the second term, by an honorific term, by a designation, by a calling, by an appellation, by a conventional expression — 'a monk,' or 'one of the monk's kind,' or 'one who has become like a monk' — such a one is called a monk in name. Who is a monk by self-proclamation? Whoever, while not being a monk, declares himself to be one, and who dwells in deception and claims to be a monk — such a one is called a monk by self-proclamation. Who is a monk for the sake of alms? Whoever sustains his life by wandering for alms in the proper manner — such a one is called a monk for the sake of alms. Who is a monk through having overcome the afflictions?

Whoever abandons, fully understands, cuts off at the root, renders without remainder like a palm tree cut down at its base, and brings to the nature of non-arising in future lives — those very things which are defilements (āsravas) that utterly afflict through the outflows, that produce renewed existence, that are accompanied by the fever of sickness, whose karmic maturation is suffering, and which will lead to birth, aging, and death in future lives — such a one is called a monk by reason of having overcome the afflictions.

In this context, because it is not appropriate to establish here a petition and an unshakeable act of four motions, what is meant by full ordination is understood to mean a monk. Therefore the phrase "and what monk" is stated.

The phrase "together with monks" refers to others besides that one — those who practise the holy life in conformity with the Dharma, those who lead a pure life of equal conduct.

The phrase "having become equal in training" means this: whatever is to be trained in by a monk who has been fully ordained for a hundred years, that same training is also to be trained in by one newly fully ordained today; and whatever is to be trained in by one newly fully ordained today, that same training is also to be trained in by one who has been fully ordained for a hundred years. What is equal here is equality in moral discipline itself, equality in training itself, and equality in the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra — that is what is meant by "having become equal in training." Therefore the phrase "having become equal in training" is stated.

Regarding the phrase "without having surrendered the training," the question arises: in what circumstances is the training considered not surrendered? It is as follows. If a monk, in anger, overwhelmed by the force of rage, surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who is out of his mind, whose thoughts are disordered, or who is oppressed by painful sensations surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who is insane surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one whose thoughts are disordered and who is oppressed by painful sensations surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who is dull-witted, mute, or deaf surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who perceives solitude as solitude surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who perceives what is solitary as not being solitary surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who perceives what is not solitary as solitary surrenders the training, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If a central-country person intends to surrender the training to another central-country person using a borderland dialect, and that central-country person does not understand the borderland words that were spoken, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If a borderlands person intends to surrender the training to another borderlands person using the speech of the central country, and that borderlands person does not understand the central-country words that were spoken, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If a borderlands person intends to surrender the training to a central-country person using a borderland dialect, and that central-country person does not understand the borderland words that were spoken, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If a central-country person intends to surrender the training to a borderlands person using central-country speech, and that borderlands person does not understand the central-country words that were spoken, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one surrenders the training to someone who is asleep, to someone in meditative absorption, to a god, to an emanation, to an animal, or to a reflection, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one who does not possess a tongue surrenders the training to another who does not possess a tongue, it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. If one has no intention to give it up, wishes to remain in the renunciant's way of life, has no wish to remain in household life, and does not make this known clearly to even a single person who understands the natural state of things — it is to be said that the training has not been surrendered. Therefore the phrase "without having surrendered the training" is stated.

Regarding the phrase "without having caused a deterioration of the training," there is also the case of one who has surrendered the training and yet has not caused a deterioration of the training.

There is also the case of one who has caused a deterioration of the training without having surrendered it. And there is the case of one who has both caused a deterioration of the training and surrendered it. And there is the case of one who has neither surrendered the training nor caused a deterioration of it.

Of these, first: the case of one who has surrendered the training without having caused a deterioration of it is as follows. A monk who is experiencing desire, or who is experiencing discontentment, or who wishes to wander about, and who either does not seek the state of an ascetic, or who is weary of the ascetic's way of life, or who is dejected, or who is in doubt, or who is speaking disparagingly, or who wishes to relinquish the ascetic's state entirely — such a one goes before a monk and says these words: "Venerable one, please hear me. I, who am called such-and-such, surrender the training." If he says this, it is to be declared that the training has been surrendered. If he says, "I surrender the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha," it is to be declared that the training has been surrendered. If he says, "I surrender the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Mātṛkā," it is to be declared that the training has been surrendered. If he says, "I surrender to the abbot and the preceptor," it is to be declared that the training has been surrendered. If he says, "I am a layman," or "I am a novice," or "I am an eater," or "I am a paṇḍaka," or "I have expelled a nun," or "I have killed my mother," or "I have killed my father," or "I have killed an arhat," or "I have created a schism in the Saṅgha," or "With malicious intent I have drawn blood from a Tathāgata," or "I am a tīrthika," or "I have entered among the tīrthikas," or "I am dwelling as a thief," or "I am dwelling separately," or "Please accept me as one who should not be allowed to remain" — or even if he says, "I, one such as I, am content with those who share the same view and who walk in the holy life as companions" — if he says this, it is to be declared that the training has been surrendered. Thus it is that one has surrendered the training without having caused a deterioration of it.

As for how one may cause a deterioration of the training without having surrendered it: a monk who is experiencing desire, or who is experiencing discontentment, or who wishes to wander about and does not desire the state of an ascetic, or who is weary of the ascetic's way of life, or who is dejected, or who is in doubt, or who is speaking disparagingly, or who wishes to relinquish the ascetic's state entirely — such a one goes before a monk and says these words: "Venerable one, please know this: the holy life is difficult to lead; solitude is difficult to maintain; delight in being alone is difficult; dwelling in remote places — in forests, at the foot of mountains, at the edges of charnel grounds — is difficult to bear; dwelling alone in isolation is suffering. I remember my father and mother, my brothers and sisters. Let me be taught crafts; let all of my livelihood be sought out; let me be established in a good household." When he speaks in this way, expressing desire, or discontentment, or a wish to wander and a lack of desire for the ascetic's state, or weariness of the ascetic's way of life, or dejection, or doubt, or disparagement, or a wish to relinquish the ascetic's state entirely — whatever speech, words, expressions, sounds, utterances, definite statements, forms of expression, vocal sounds, verbal actions, and vocal communications he produces — if by these he says, "Venerable one, please hear me: I, who am called such-and-such, surrender the training," or "I surrender the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha," or "I surrender the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Mātṛkā," or "I surrender to the abbot and the preceptor," or "I am a layman," or "I am a novice," or "I am an eater," or "I am a paṇḍaka," or "I have expelled a nun," or "I have killed my mother," or "I have killed my father," or "I have killed an arhat," or "I have created a schism in the Saṅgha," or "With malicious intent I have drawn blood from a Tathāgata," or "I am a tīrthika," or "I have entered among the tīrthikas," or "I am dwelling as a thief," or "I am dwelling separately," or "Please accept me as one who should not be allowed to remain" —

But he does not say, "I am content to remain with those who share compatible Dharma practices and who live the holy life alongside me, such as you." In that case, the training has been transgressed and yet the training has not been surrendered.

How then does one both transgress the training and surrender the training? It is as follows. When a monk is filled with desire, or with discontent, or with the wish to wander about and has no wish to continue the way of the ascetic, or is wearied of the way of the ascetic, or is overcome with exhaustion, or is filled with doubt, or is filled with disgust, or wishes to abandon the way of the ascetic entirely, he goes before a monk and says: "Venerable one, please know this: the holy life is difficult to live. Strict seclusion is difficult to maintain. Finding delight in solitude is difficult. It is difficult to bear deeply within oneself dwelling in remote lodgings, forests, groves, the foot of mountains, and the farthest reaches of the open air. Dwelling alone in a wilderness is painful. I think of my father and mother, my brothers and sisters. Let me be apprenticed to a craft. Let me seek out the limits of my livelihood. Let me be entrusted to good households." And so, whether he is filled with desire, or discontent, or the wish to wander about and has no wish for the way of the ascetic, or is wearied of the way of the ascetic, or is overcome with exhaustion, or is filled with doubt, or is filled with disgust, or wishes to abandon the way of the ascetic entirely — whatever speech, words, common expressions, utterances, statements, definitive words, verbal pathways, verbal sounds, verbal actions, and verbal communications there may be that express such desire, discontent, wish to wander, unwillingness to continue the way of the ascetic, weariness with the way of the ascetic, exhaustion, doubt, disgust, or wish to abandon the way of the ascetic entirely — and he speaks them, saying: "Venerable ones, please hear me. I, known by the name such-and-such, surrender the training," or "I surrender the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha," or "I surrender the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Mātṛkā," or "I surrender the abbot and the preceptor," or "I am a layman," or "I am a novice," or "I am an eater," or "I am a paṇḍaka," or "I have expelled a nun," or "I have killed my mother," or "I have killed my father," or "I have killed an arhat," or "I have created a schism in the Saṅgha," or "With malicious intent I have drawn blood from a Tathāgata," or "I am a tīrthika," or "I have entered among the tīrthikas," or "I am dwelling as a thief," or "I am dwelling separately," or "Please accept me as one who should not be allowed to remain" — or even if he says, "I am content to remain with those who share compatible Dharma practices and who live the holy life alongside me, such as you" — in any such case, it should be declared that the training has been surrendered. And so the training has been both transgressed and surrendered.

How then does one neither surrender the training nor transgress it? It is by none of those modes described above. Therefore, it is said, the training has not been transgressed.

Unchaste conduct refers to two parties giving themselves to each other. The act of sexual intercourse is precisely that unchaste conduct. Dharma — here the term "Dharma" is used to name what is not Dharma at all. "If he engages in it" means if he practises it excessively. "Even with a female born in an animal realm, or with one like unto such" refers to a female monkey, or to one who resembles or is included among the like of a female monkey. "A monk" refers to whoever possesses the essential properties of a monk. What are the essential properties of a monk? Full ordination. What is full ordination? It is the carrying out of the formal act consisting of the motion and the three proclamations, together with the deliberation itself, the proper deliberation, the bringing to completion, the proper bringing to completion — and that individual's consent, explicit consent, non-retraction, and non-reversal — together with whatever speech, words, common expressions, utterances, statements, definitive words, verbal pathways, verbal sounds, verbal actions, and verbal intimations there may be. The word "that" is a term of immediate indication and of comprehensive indication. The phrase "has incurred defeat" means: it has come to its end, it is a transgression, it is a diminishment, it stands at the conclusion, it is a cutting off, it is contrary to the mind.

Moreover, whoever commits that transgression becomes, immediately upon committing it, unfit to be a monk, unfit to be a contemplative, unfit to be a son of the Śākyas. He falls away from the substance of monkhood. His mode of the contemplative life is shattered — degraded, broken, fallen, defeated — and his mode of the contemplative life can never be restored. It is as follows: just as when the crown of a palm tree is cut off it can no longer turn green, nor can it grow and spread and become expansive, so too when a monk has done such a deed, he becomes immediately upon doing it unfit to be a monk, unfit to be a contemplative, unfit to be a son of the Śākyas. He falls away from the substance of monkhood. His mode of the contemplative life is shattered — degraded, broken, fallen, defeated — and his mode of the contemplative life can never be restored. It is for this reason that it is said, "has incurred defeat."

The phrase "should not dwell" means that monks should not dwell together with such a person in the restoration ceremony, in the invitation ceremony, in the formal act requiring one motion, in the formal act requiring a motion and two proclamations, or in the formal act requiring a motion and four proclamations. He should not be appointed to any of the twelve roles to which persons are appointed. It is for this reason that it is said, "should not dwell."

Now, in what circumstances does one incur the transgression?

In verse summary: alone and in three locations, with woman, man, and neuter, inclining toward contact and striving, causing intoxication and taking by force.

If a monk engages in the practice of unchastity — the act of sexual intercourse — he incurs defeat. If a monk engages in the practice of unchastity in any of three locations, he incurs defeat. If he causes the organ to enter, whether into the urinary passage or the anal passage, he incurs defeat immediately upon insertion. If a monk engages in the practice of unchastity with any of the three — a woman, a man, or a neuter — he incurs defeat.

If a monk's mind inclines toward contact, falls toward contact, and has fallen toward contact, and with a mind so inclining, so falling, and so fallen, he causes his organ — with an interval and together with an interval, or with an interval and without an interval, or without an interval and together with an interval, or without an interval and without an interval — to enter into the urinary passage or the anal passage of a living human woman who is undamaged, he incurs defeat immediately upon insertion.

If a monk's mind inclines toward contact, falls toward contact, and has fallen toward contact, and with a mind so inclining, so falling, and so fallen, he causes his organ — with an interval and together with an interval, or with an interval and without an interval, or without an interval and together with an interval, or without an interval and without an interval — to enter into the urinary passage or the anal passage of a living human woman who is damaged, he incurs a gross offense immediately upon insertion.

If a monk's mind inclines toward contact, falls toward contact, and has fallen toward contact, and with a mind so inclining, so falling, and so fallen, he causes his organ — with an interval and together with an interval, or with an interval and without an interval, or without an interval and together with an interval, or without an interval and without an interval — to enter into the urinary passage or the anal passage of a dead human woman who is undamaged, he incurs defeat immediately upon insertion.

If a monk's mind inclines toward contact, falls toward contact, and has fallen toward contact, and with a mind so inclining, so falling, and so fallen —

fallen toward contact, and with a mind so inclining, so falling, and so fallen, he causes his organ — with an interval and together with an interval, or with an interval and without an interval, or without an interval and together with an interval, or without an interval and without an interval — to enter into the urinary passage or the anal passage of a dead human woman who is undamaged, he incurs defeat immediately upon insertion.

Just as with a living and a dead human woman, so too it is the same with a living non-human woman, a dead non-human woman, a living female born in an animal womb, and a dead female born in an animal womb. And with a living man and a dead man, it is likewise through both openings of the wound. Just as with a living man and a dead man through both openings of the wound, so too with a living non-human male and a dead non-human male through both openings of the wound, and with a living male born in an animal womb and a dead male born in an animal womb through both openings of the wound. Just as with a man, so too it is the same with a living human pandaka and a dead human pandaka through both openings of the wound, with a living non-human pandaka and a dead non-human pandaka through both openings of the wound, and with a living pandaka born in an animal womb and a dead pandaka born in an animal womb through both openings of the wound.

When a monk makes an attempt upon a sleeping monk, if the monk who is being acted upon does not know it at the beginning, does not know it in the middle, and does not know it at the end, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk makes an attempt upon a sleeping monk, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning but does not know it in the middle and does not know it at the end, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk makes an attempt upon a sleeping monk, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning and knows it in the middle but does not know it at the end, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk makes an attempt upon a sleeping monk, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning, knows it in the middle, and knows it at the end, but knowing it does not consent, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk makes an attempt upon a sleeping monk, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning, knows it in the middle, and knows it at the end, and knowing it does consent, then both are to be expelled.

Just as with a monk acting upon a monk, so too it is the same with a monk acting upon a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, a female novice; with a nun acting upon a monk or a male novice; with a female novice acting upon a monk or a male novice; and with a male novice acting upon a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice.

When a monk causes a monk to become intoxicated with grain liquor and then makes an attempt upon him, if the monk who is being acted upon does not know it at the beginning, does not know it in the middle, and does not know it at the end, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk causes a monk to become intoxicated with grain liquor and then makes an attempt upon him, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning but does not know it in the middle and does not know it at the end, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk causes a monk to become intoxicated with grain liquor and then makes an attempt upon him, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning, knows it in the middle, and knows it at the end, but knowing it does not consent, then the one who makes the attempt is to be expelled. When a monk causes a monk to become intoxicated with grain liquor and then makes an attempt upon him, if the monk who is being acted upon knows it at the beginning, knows it in the middle, and knows it at the end, and knowing it does consent, then both are to be expelled.

Just as it is with a monk acting upon a monk, so too it is the same when a monk acts upon a nun, a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice monk, or a novice nun; when a nun acts upon a monk or a novice monk; when a female trainee acts upon a monk or a novice monk; when a novice nun acts upon a monk or a novice monk; and likewise with all such combinations involving novice nuns.

Just as it is with grain liquor, so too it is the same with prepared liquor, compounded liquor, and intoxicating drinks made from roots, from stalks, from leaves, from flowers, or from fruits; and likewise with spells, incantations, or medicines used to disturb the mind or induce sleep.

When a monk seizes another monk by force, holding him in suspense, and makes an attempt upon him: if, at the moment of entry, the monk who is acted upon makes it his own, both are to be expelled. If he does not do so at the moment of entry but does so at the moment of full insertion, both are to be expelled. If he does not do so at the moment of entry nor at the moment of full insertion, but does so at the moment of withdrawal, both are to be expelled. If he does not do so at the moment of entry, nor at the moment of full insertion, nor at the moment of withdrawal, then the one who made the attempt is to be expelled.

Just as it is with a monk acting upon a monk, so too it is the same in all combinations: a monk with a nun, a female trainee, a novice monk, or a novice nun; a nun with a monk or a novice monk; a female trainee with a monk or a novice monk; a novice nun with a monk or a novice monk; and a novice monk with a monk, a female trainee, a novice monk, or a novice nun.

The Vinaya, its Distinctions. The Second Fascicle.

In summary verse:

One with a cushion at the back and one hanging down, one who delights in adornment and belongs to a company, an old woman, and a monk who lies asleep — seeking these involves no offense.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was a householder living in Śrāvastī who took a wife from among his equals in station. He sported with her, rejoiced in her, and passed his time in happiness with her. At a certain later time, as he was thus sporting, rejoicing, and living in happiness with her, a being entered into his wife's womb. After eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth, and the child that was born had a back that was soft and exceedingly soft, like that of a rabbit or a cat. His kinsmen gathered and came together, and on the twenty-first day after the birth they held a great birth-feast and proceeded to give the child a name, deliberating as to what it should be. They thought to themselves: because this child's back is soft and exceedingly soft, like that of a rabbit or a cat, let the child's name be Soft-Back. And so they gave him the name Soft-Back.

He was raised and nurtured with milk, yogurt, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and many other excellent provisions, and he grew quickly, like a lotus growing in a pond. When he had grown up, he went forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya. Having thus gone forth, one morning he put on his lower robe, took up his outer robe and his alms bowl, and went out for alms into the very village or township near which he was staying — but he did not guard his body, did not restrain his faculties, did not establish mindfulness, and entered upon his alms round without care. Having made his way through that village or township on his alms round and finished his meal, he returned from the alms round for the after-meal food, set down his alms bowl and outer robe, washed both feet, and entered his dwelling in order to settle properly within. At that time, when his mind became thoroughly ensnared by attachment toward sensual objects, he made use of his own limbs in an appropriate way, inserted himself, and applied effort. Then at another time, a great many wandering monks who were traveling about came to where that monk was dwelling, and those monks saw him doing as he did. Seeing this, they were displeased and deeply dissatisfied, and they said these words to that monk: "Venerable one, what are you doing?" He replied, "I am making contact with something of my own." The monks said, "Venerable one, did the Blessed One not prohibit the unchaste practice, the act of sexual intercourse?" He replied, "Venerable ones, he prohibited it, but that pertains to what belongs to another — not to what is one's own." Those monks neither praised nor reproached him, neither commended nor turned him back, but departed and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, they bowed their heads to the Blessed One's feet and stood to one side. Standing to one side, those many monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "O monks, if I have prohibited what belongs to another, what need is there even to mention what belongs to oneself? That deluded one has incurred defeat." When a monk's mind inclines toward, falls upon, and has fallen upon a support — and with a mind that inclines toward, falls upon, and has fallen upon that support, he makes use of his limbs in an appropriate way and inserts himself, whether by himself or into another — the moment of insertion is the moment of defeat.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. There in Śrāvastī a certain householder took a wife of equal birth and made merry with her, rejoiced with her, and passed his time with her in delight. Then at another time, while they were making merry, rejoicing, and taking delight together, a being entered into his wife's womb, and after eight or nine months had passed she gave birth, and a boy was born with limbs of surpassingly excellent measure. His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — the third set of seven days after the birth — they held a great birth celebration and proceeded to give the boy a name. "What shall the boy's name be?" They thought to themselves: "Because this boy's limbs are of surpassingly excellent measure, this boy shall be called 'Pendent' " — and they gave him the name Pendent. He was nourished and raised on milk, curds, butter, the essence of clarified butter, and many other excellent provisions, and he grew swiftly, like a lotus growing in a pond.

When he had grown up, he went forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya. Having thus gone forth, one morning he put on his lower robe, took up his outer robe and his alms bowl, and went out for alms into the very village or township near which he was staying — but he did not guard his body, did not restrain his faculties, did not establish mindfulness, and entered upon his alms round without care. Having made his way through that village or township on his alms round and finished his meal, he returned from the alms round for the after-meal food, set down his alms bowl and outer robe, washed both feet, and entered his dwelling in order to settle properly within.

At that time, his mind became entirely ensnared by attachment to sensual objects. He then made his own limb serviceable for that purpose, introduced it into his own urinary passage, and exerted himself. Then at another time, a great many wandering monks came to the place where that monk was staying, and those monks saw him doing this. Seeing it, they were displeased and deeply dissatisfied, and said to that monk: "Venerable one, what are you doing?" "I am gratifying myself by touch." "Venerable one, has not the Blessed One forbidden the unchaste practice, the act of sexual intercourse?" The other monks replied: "Venerable ones, it has been forbidden — but that pertains to another's passage, not to one's own." Those monks neither praised him for it nor turned him back from it. Having neither praised him nor turned him back, they departed, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they prostrated themselves at the Blessed One's feet with their heads and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the many monks reported this matter to the Blessed One in full detail. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, when I have already forbidden even another's passage, what need is there even to speak of one's own? That deluded man has incurred defeat. Monks, when a monk's mind is inclined toward filth, falls toward filth, and has fallen into filth — when his mind is inclined toward filth, falls toward filth, and has fallen into filth — if he makes his own limb serviceable for that purpose and introduces it into his own or another's urinary passage and exerts himself, he incurs defeat the moment it is introduced."

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time in the noble land there was a merchant caravan leader named Joyful — wealthy, possessed of abundant riches, of great resources, holdings extensive and wide-ranging, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, a rival to Vaiśravaṇa himself in wealth. He had taken a wife from among his own social equals, and with her he sported, rejoiced, and took his pleasure. He sported, rejoiced, and took his pleasure with her, yet they had no son and no daughter. Having no son and earnestly desiring one, he offered prayers to the gods of peace, to the water deity, to the malevolent spirits, to Śakra, to Brahmā, and to other such divine beings — and also to the following further categories of deity: the gods of the pleasure grove, the gods of the forest, the gods of the crossroads, the gods of the three-way junctures, the gods who receive torma offerings, the co-natal gods, the gods of the same Dharma nature, and the gods who ever follow as attendants. Now, in the world there exists a saying of the following kind: "From the causes of such prayers, sons and daughters are born." But it is not so. If it were so, then from those prayers alone each person would have a thousand sons, just like a wheel-turning king (cakravartin). Sons and daughters are born rather from the coming together of three conditions made fully present. What are those three? First, the father and mother come together in desire and union; second, the mother is in her season and her fertile time has arrived; and third, a gandharva is nearby and wishing to enter. When those three conditions are fully present, sons and daughters are born. Now, while he was thus engaged, earnestly occupied with his prayers, a being died and passed away from among the divine realms and entered the womb of that man's household mistress.

There are certain women who are skilled in reading the nature of things, and they possess five unmixed qualities. What are those five? They know when a man has become attached and when he is free from attachment; they know the time and recognize the days of the month; they know when a being has entered and is dwelling in the womb; they know from whom that being entered and is dwelling in the womb; and they know whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, it rests leaning to the right side, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning to the left side.

Now the household mistress was filled with joy, and, delighted, she spoke to her husband: "O son of my lord, a sentient being has entered within me — I know this because it rests leaning to the right flank, so it is certainly a boy. Please be glad." And he, too, was filled with joy, and, delighted, he straightened his upper body, extended his right hand, and made this solemn declaration: "May I behold the face of this son whom I have long desired; may he be born in harmony with me and not in discord; may he perform my deeds; may he care for me in return for the care I give him; may he enjoy his inheritance; may he cause my lineage and family to endure for a long time; and when we have died and our time has come, may he, having given gifts large or small and having made merit in our name, go forth to wherever the two of us are reborn and follow after us." Thus he made this solemn declaration.

Then, knowing that a sentient being had entered, in order to bring the one dwelling in the womb to full maturity, in the chamber of the fine upper-story apartment, he arranged for her comfortable care: when cold, things that relieve cold; when warm, things that relieve warmth; food prepared on the physician's advice that was not too bitter, not too sour, not too salty, not too sweet, not too hot, and not too pungent — food from which bitterness, sourness, saltiness, sweetness, heat, and pungency had been removed entirely. He had her attended to, without harm and without the least unpleasant sound reaching her, wandering as if she were the body of a goddess's daughter adorned with necklaces, earrings, and ornaments moving through a pleasure grove — going from couch to couch, from seat to seat, never descending to the bare floor.

After eight or nine months had passed, a boy was born from her delivery: handsome of form, lovely to behold, beautiful, radiant, resembling the color of gold, furnished with a head like a parasol, long-armed, with a large fontanelle, with gracefully arched brows and a well-bridged nose.

Then his kinsmen and relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — that is, three groups of seven days — after the birth, they held a great birth-feast and set about giving the boy a name, deliberating on what name he should receive. Now the general custom in the central region was that whoever was handsome, lovely to behold, and beautiful should be called "Beautiful." Thinking of this, they considered: "Because this boy is handsome, lovely to behold, and beautiful, and because he is the son of the caravan leader Joyous, let his name be Śobhānanda — Beautiful-Joy." And so he was given the name Śobhānanda.

The boy Śobhānanda was then entrusted to eight nurses: two nurses to carry him and keep him alive, two nurses to suckle him, two nurses to bathe him and clean him, and two nurses to play with him. Those eight nurses nourished and raised him with milk, curd, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and many other finest provisions, causing him to grow quickly, like a lotus dwelling in a pond. When he had grown up, he was taught writing, numbers, and arithmetic, accounting — addition, subtraction, and setting down figures. He became fully accomplished in writing: composing, reading, mastering a subject, making its application clear, and examining. He also became skilled in the eight kinds of examination, which are as follows: examining precious gems, examining land, examining cloth, examining wood, examining elephants, examining horses, examining women, and examining men.

His father arranged the three grades of his wife's retinue — the highest, the middle, and the lowest. He had the three residential quarters prepared for his use in each of the three seasons: winter, spring, and summer. He had the three pleasure gardens likewise prepared for the winter season, the spring season, and the summer season. There, within the grounds belonging to the fine upper chambers, women — with no men present — would play, take delight, and amuse themselves with music.

Now the caravan leader Joyous was perpetually absorbed in accounts and ledgers, and was also practicing their arrangement and presentation. Śobhānanda said to him: "Father, why do you remain so constantly absorbed in your accounts?" He replied: "My son, can wealth truly be won merely by playing in the fine upper chambers? I must think about the work of the household too."

Śobhānanda, understanding that his father was urging him on for his own benefit, touched his father's two feet and said: "Father, if you would grant me permission to do so, I will go to another land and earn wealth." His father replied: "My son, since we have wealth in abundance, why go to another land? Stay here." He said: "Father, I will not leave a bad son behind." The caravan leader Joyous, thinking that this was indeed what the boy desired, took the keys and the crooked keys and the like, opened the seven treasury storehouses full of worked gold, of unworked gold, and of silver, displayed them, and said: "My son Śobhānanda, we have wealth in this measure. You stay right here, enjoy whatever you wish, give generously, and accumulate merit. There is no need to go to another land."

He replied: "Father, if you set a bad example before a bad son, what will that bad son then set before his own sons?" The caravan leader Joyous thought: "What he says is good. After I am gone, he will need to learn to manage the affairs of the household. Therefore, for as long as I live, let him go on a trading expedition to another land; there too he will come to know his father's friends and contacts. In that way, when I am gone, the path this one travels will have no darkness."

Knowing and understanding this, he spoke to his wife: "My good woman, after I am gone, Śobhānanda will need to manage the affairs of the household. Therefore, for as long as I live, let him go on a trading expedition to another land; there too he will come to know his father's friends and contacts. In that way, when I am gone, the path this one travels will have no darkness." She replied: "My lord's son has done no wrong — let it be as you say; I agree."

Then the caravan leader Joyous spoke to Śobhānanda: "My son, I am glad that you have set your mind on undertaking a trading expedition to another land. After I am gone, you will need to manage the affairs of the household. Therefore, for as long as I live, go on a trading expedition to another land; there too you will come to know your father's friends and contacts. In that way, when I am gone, the path you travel will have no darkness." Śobhānanda said: "Father, I shall do as you command."

Then the caravan leader Joyous had a proclamation made throughout Rājagṛha: "Hear this, all you wise ones — merchants dwelling in Rājagṛha and merchants who have come from various directions! The caravan leader Śobhānanda is setting out on a trading expedition to another land."

"All of you who wish to travel to another land together with the caravan leader Śobhānanda, without hazard of passes, without mountain crossings, and without river crossings — let those who are willing to journey to another land on such terms assemble their goods accordingly." Five hundred merchants who wished to travel to another land on such terms assembled their goods accordingly.

The caravan leader Joyous invited those merchants as guests, fed them, and then said: "Wise ones, just as Śobhānanda is my son, so too is he yours. There are three obstacles for merchants who travel to foreign lands: gambling, unsuitable women, and intoxicants. You must certainly turn away from these harmful things and devote yourselves fully to what is beneficial. If, by turning away from harm and devoting yourselves to benefit, you are able to remain firmly established, that is well and good. But if you are unable to remain firm, you must abandon your goods, recoup whatever price you can, and go on your way." He spoke also to Śobhānanda: "Son Śobhānanda, just as you are my son, so too are you the son of all these merchants. Listen to their words and counsel, and bear their instructions in mind."

The caravan leader Śobhānanda said: "Father, I will act as you command." Having heard this from the caravan leader Joyous, he performed auspicious rites, propitious ceremonies, and rites for good fortune. Then, loading abundant goods onto carts, pack-carriers, mules, horses, mares, oxen, and donkeys, he set out for another land together with five hundred merchants. Traveling gradually through towns, villages, districts, and royal residences, he arrived at Śrāvastī, and there he deposited his goods in a great warehouse and settled in.

At that time in Śrāvastī there lived a beautiful courtesan (a seller of her form) named Bhadramukhī — lovely in appearance, delightful to behold, beautiful, and pleasing to men. She would enjoy herself in the company of men for the price of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas. She heard tell that there had arrived in the city a young man named Śobhānanda, son of the caravan leader Joyous — a man of great wealth and fine appearance, lovely to behold and beautiful — and that he had come with five hundred merchants and deposited his goods in a very large warehouse.

Hearing this, she thought to herself: "If I do not rob him of all his goods, I shall not deserve the name 'the Beautiful One.'" She said to her serving-maid: "Girl, the caravan leader Śobhānanda is a man of great wealth. He has brought his goods here and stored them in a large warehouse. Take incense and garlands and go to him. Bow at his feet and say these words: 'My lady Bhadramukhī prostrates herself at your feet. Noble son, why have you forsaken your own palace and taken up lodging in a warehouse like an ordinary man? This is your palace — please come hither.' Say that to him."

The maid said: "As my lady commands." She took incense and garlands, went to where the caravan leader Śobhānanda was, and said to him: "My lady Bhadramukhī prostrates herself at your feet, and sends you this incense and these garlands. She says: 'Noble son, why have you forsaken your palace and taken up lodging in a warehouse like an ordinary man? This is your palace — please come hither.'"

Śobhānanda said: "Girl, you may go. I shall put on these garlands and incense and come." Then the serving-maid went back to where the courtesan Bhadramukhī was, and reported to Bhadramukhī everything that had been said in the conversation she had had with the caravan leader Śobhānanda.

Then the courtesan Bhadramukhī, having heard from the serving-maid messenger what had been said, felt joy and gladness arise within her. She had the house washed and swept clean, strewed it with flowers of every variety, and perfumed it with sweet-smelling incense. She spread out a bed furnished with a canopy and bolsters, and sat there waiting, intent above all else on the caravan leader Śobhānanda.

The caravan leader Śobhānanda, for his part, adorned himself with perfumes, garlands, and ornaments, mounted his riding animal, and set off surrounded by a retinue of young servant boys. Gloriously beautiful in the full radiance of his youth, he made his way to the place where the courtesan Bhadramukhī resided.

Bhadramukhī saw the caravan leader Śobhānanda approaching in all the splendor of his youthful beauty. Upon seeing him she asked the serving-maid messenger: "Girl, is that the caravan leader Śobhānanda?" She replied: "My lady, that is none other than the caravan leader Śobhānanda himself."

Then the courtesan Bhadramukhī, feeling joy and gladness arise within her, spoke these verses:

Whether born of noble lineage or not, whether a man who has lost his wealth or one endowed with riches — the sight of one rich in beauty steals away the hearts of women.

He rode his mount for as long as the road permitted, then dismounted and began to enter the courtesan Bhadramukhī's house on foot. She came down quickly, quickly from the upper floor, went out to receive him, embraced him with all her limbs, led him inside the house, and seated him on the women's seat. She asked: "What is the name of this noble son?" He replied: "Śobhānanda." She said: "How wonderful! Your name matches your beauty, and your beauty matches your name. If your mother and father have not yet requested that you be given the name Śobhānanda, then I myself shall make the request for that name today." He then asked her: "And what is your name?" She replied: "Bhadramukhī." He said: "How wonderful! Your name matches your beauty, and your beauty matches your name. If your mother and father have not yet requested that you be given the name Bhadramukhī, then I myself shall make the request for that name today."

Śobhānanda said: "Bhadramukhī, what is the fee for one night?" She replied: "The noble son speaks not like a common man." Her serving-maid messenger then said: "One night is five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." Śobhānanda instructed his man: "Send her five hundred kārṣāpaṇas every day." And so he stayed and sported with her, enjoyed himself, and indulged in pleasures with her. Since desires, when pursued, know no turning back, no satiation, and no end, many days passed and still he was not sated, and his man continued bringing five hundred kārṣāpaṇas day after day.

Now the merchants said: "Good friends, since the caravan leader Śobhānanda is nowhere to be seen, as he was entrusted to us by a companion, let us search everywhere for him." The merchants asked his servants: "Where has the caravan leader gone?" They replied: "The very day the caravan leader departed for Śrāvastī, he entered the house of a courtesan and has been staying there — have you only now remembered?" The merchants said: "Good friends, it was wrong of us to have left the caravan leader Śobhānanda and let him be forgotten like this. His father will have a grievance against us for it." The merchants then sent a large message to Śobhānanda conveying the words of his fellow merchants: "Please come back." That messenger delivered the message to Śobhānanda, and Śobhānanda was about to set out —

Bāṇamālikā seized him by the hem of his robe and said: "Noble son, those who wish to enjoy pleasures are maintained by two things: a handsome appearance and youth. Since you are endowed with good looks and the bloom of youth, spend this time of youth in play, joy, and pleasure — and in old age apply yourself to acquiring wealth." Śobhānanda said to that messenger: "Go now, and come back." The messenger went and said to the merchants: "The caravan leader says: 'Go now, and come back.'" The merchants gathered together, and while they were staying there, Śobhānanda took hold of them all. All the merchants gathered and went to the courtesan's house. The merchants waited at the door and said to a servant: "Good man, go and tell the caravan leader that the company of merchants is waiting at the door and wishes to see the caravan leader." The servant went and reported this to Śobhānanda, and Śobhānanda was about to come out — but again the courtesan Bāṇamālikā seized him by the hem of his robe and said: "Noble son, let those merchants too enjoy pleasure here together with me — stay and take your pleasure along with them." Since the pursuit of pleasures only increases entanglement, Śobhānanda said: "I will come out when I am free of all that binds me." The servant went and told the company of merchants: "The caravan leader says: 'I will come out when I am free of all that binds me.'" The merchants said: "Alas! Śobhānanda has fallen into what is wrong and is heading into ruin!" And so they abandoned all their goods, took their payment, and departed. From that time on, the man who had been paying Bāṇamālikā five hundred kārṣāpaṇas each day ceased to bring payment any longer.

Then at another time Bāṇamālikā questioned that man and said: "Good man, why do you no longer bring the kārṣāpaṇas?" He replied: "The associates have left — from where should I bring them? Or did the associates perhaps take away Śobhānanda's goods as well?" "They did." Bāṇamālikā spent two or three days taking her pleasure together with Śobhānanda and then said: "Noble son, I have no fields, no workers to manage my affairs, and no townspeople who have pledged goods and are going to other districts. I can only live on whatever I obtain from someone like you — so either give me kārṣāpaṇas, or let another man take your place." Śobhānanda said: "Bāṇamālikā, have you no affection for me at all?" Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble son, have you not heard the saying:

There is no affection for those with a crowd of companions — they by nature do not stay long.

Like birds on a fruitless tree, they abandon the old and move on.

Śobhānanda said: "Bāṇamālikā, as long as a man gives you wealth, so long you are under his power?" Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble son, have you not heard the saying:

As long as Śakra (Indra) sends down rain, so long do rivers and streams flow down the mountains.
As long as a man gives wealth, so long does a courtesan's man hold sway.

Śobhānanda said: "Bāṇamālikā, do you lead any man you like astray?"
Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble son, have you not heard the saying:

A courtesan makes a man glad with embrace and sweet words as though he were her own body, dwelling with him through the evening and the middle of the night — then from dawn onward casts him off like old grass.

Śobhānanda said: "Bāṇamālikā, do you behave in this way toward men of wealth?" Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble son, have you not heard the saying:

We use men with wealth, and even those who have spent it all,
as cattle graze on fresh green grass.

Have you not heard this saying?"

Now Śobhānanda had begun to feel desire arise, and Bāṇamālikā thought to herself: "This Śobhānanda is handsome, pleasant to look upon, and beautiful. Even though he has come from very far away, he is just the sort of man with whom one should sport, rejoice, and take pleasure. Therefore, so long as no other man comes bearing five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, I shall sport with this one, rejoice with him, and take pleasure with him." Having understood this and recognized it clearly, Bāṇamālikā took hold of Śobhānanda by the edge of his garment and said: "Noble son, will you not laugh with me here in the house?" "You may laugh at me if you wish — but stop. Let him not leave."

Now Śobhānanda was greatly overcome with desire, and just then another man arrived bearing five hundred kārṣāpaṇas and entered the house. He said: "Let Bāṇamālikā enjoy herself with me — and let the other one go." Bāṇamālikā drew a curtain directly in front of Śobhānanda, shutting him off, and began to take pleasure with the newcomer. Śobhānanda, perceiving and understanding clearly that Bāṇamālikā was taking pleasure with that man right there before him, went away.

Not knowing his way along the main road, Śobhānanda did not know where to go. Just then he saw a monk who had gone through Śrāvastī on his alms round and was coming back out. Śobhānanda followed directly behind that monk. The monk went to the monastery, set his bowl and water pot together to one side, shook out his outer robe, washed his two feet, dried his two hands, drew water, picked off the leaves that had clung to him, sat down, and began to prepare his food. Śobhānanda stood before him.

The monk said to Śobhānanda: "Fair one, do you want what remains in the bowl?" Śobhānanda, perceiving and understanding clearly that if he did not eat he would die of hunger, said: "Noble one, yes, I do."

The monk gave Śobhānanda what remained in the bowl, and Śobhānanda ate it. When he had eaten, the monk asked: "Fair one, where do you come from?" Śobhānanda answered: "Noble one, I am from a region of border guardsmen, in a city called Āryarāja. There was a caravan leader named Priya, and his son am I, Śobhānanda. I came seeking many debts owed to me, but a certain improper woman did me harm."

The monk said: "Fair one, why do you not go forth into the renunciant life?" Śobhānanda thought to himself: "If I return to Āryarāja, who will be there to spit on the ground? It will fall only upon me alone." Perceiving and understanding this clearly, he said: "Noble one, I will go forth."

The monk gave Śobhānanda the going-forth and conferred full ordination upon him. Then, for two or three days thereafter, he had him learn the rules of proper conduct, and said: "Fair one, a wild animal is not healed by another wild animal. Śrāvastī is vast; it is both your own domain and your father's territory — gather alms and sustain yourself."

Śobhānanda put on his lower robe in the morning, took his bowl and his Dharma robe, and entered Śrāvastī to go on the alms round.

Now the courtesan Bāṇamālikā felt remorse. She thought: "Because I desired kārṣāpaṇas I drove away the caravan leader's son Śobhānanda, who was so handsome and in the full bloom of youth — that was wrong of me. I should have known that even if such a man comes from very far away, he is exactly the sort with whom one should take pleasure and rejoice." She instructed a young female servant: "Girl, if you happen to see the caravan leader's son Śobhānanda, let him come in."

Not knowing his way around the neighborhood, Śobhānanda arrived on his alms round at none other than the very house of the improper woman.

The young female servant who had been posted as lookout saw him and, overjoyed, went to Bāṇamālikā and whispered: "My lady, the handsome Śobhānanda is at the door." Bāṇamālikā said, "Let him come in." The girl said, "He has gone forth into the religious life." Bāṇamālikā said, "Even so, let him come in."

The servant let Śobhānanda enter, and when the courtesan Bāṇamālikā saw him, she beat her breast and said: "Śobhānanda, why did you abandon a fine young man's life and go forth?" Śobhānanda replied: "Unfortunate woman — while you disport yourself in pleasure with other men right before my very eyes, how could I not go forth?" Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble one, a woman's domain is one of constant transgression where a man is concerned, and so I beg you to forgive me my transgression. Now please take your belongings back from me, and let us enjoy pleasure together." Śobhānanda replied: "At that time you utterly ruined me over money and material concerns — do you now wish to ruin me utterly in my moral discipline as well?" Bāṇamālikā said: "Noble one, pull the robe from outside and push it inside — pull it from inside and push it outside! What violation of moral discipline is there in that?" For Śobhānanda realized and understood: "She knows that all the elder monks who come here on their alms round do exactly this without missing a beat — and so she speaks in this way." Śobhānanda set down his alms bowl and his monastic robe in one corner, and then pulled them from outside and pushed them inside, pulled them from inside and pushed them outside — and thus found himself entirely bereft of wonder. Then Bāṇamālikā filled his alms bowl with pure and choice food and drink, gave it to him, and said: "Noble one, if you should wish to come again, please do so." Śobhānanda took his alms and departed.

Now, to whatever degree the Blessed One taught the Dharma of mental liberation and liberation through wisdom in order to free attachment from attachment, in order to free aversion from attachment, in order to free delusion from attachment — to just that degree the venerable Śobhānanda, as he sat there, became a little remorseful, became more remorseful, became deeply remorseful, and was filled with regret, overcome by regret, and said nothing at all. He became vacant, his gaze wandered, his shoulders drooped, his face fell, he had no confidence, his mind turned inward, and he sat there like a clump of blue grass that has been trodden down and left to wither and dry up.

The monks said to him: "Venerable Śobhānanda, do you not have some physical affliction, or some inner torment of mind?" And he, out of shame, neither spoke nor said anything at all.

A physician who happened to come that way was addressed by the monks: "Good young man, examine this one — what sickness does he have?" The physician began to examine him, and seeing that his senses were clear, said: "Noble ones, since his senses are clear, there is no physical illness whatsoever. However, there is an inner torment of mind that has not at all been suppressed." The monks said: "Good man, what kind of inner torment of mind does he have?" The physician said: "Noble ones, we physicians heal the body, but it is not for us to heal the mind.

"It is the noble ones themselves who heal the mind — the noble ones will understand." So saying, he departed.

The monks then addressed Mañjudeva: "Friend, here you have neither father nor mother nor any other relative. We alone are your companions in the holy life, and so we have been attending to you. Tell us what has happened."

Mañjudeva then related to those monks the whole affair in full detail.

The monks said: "The venerable one has been burned by his fruit alone. By the mere act of going forth, the venerable one has cast a blot upon the teaching."

Yet even as Mañjudeva said this, those monks neither praised nor refuted him, and without having praised or refuted him they rose and went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed their heads to the feet of the Blessed One and stood to one side. Standing to one side, those monks reported the whole affair in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that one too has incurred a defeat. When a monk inclines the mind toward intercourse, falls toward intercourse, and has fallen into intercourse — and because the mind inclines toward intercourse, falls toward intercourse, and has fallen into intercourse — he causes what produces outflow to draw outward and discharge inward, or to draw inward and discharge outward: he thereby incurs a defeat."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. There was a certain householder in Śrāvastī who had taken a wife from an equal family, and that wife came to her end through her own karma. He took a second, and she too came to her end. In the same way he took wife after wife up to a seventh, and she too came to her end. That householder, through the karma of having accumulated slander, came to bear the name "wife-killer."

That householder then looked for a girl, but found none to give him, and the families said: "Why should we give our daughter to you?" He sought for matchmakers, but even they said: "Why should we go about seeking a bride only to have her come into your household?" The householder, utterly discouraged by everything, began to attend to his own household chores himself. Then on another occasion a young friend of the householder came and, seeing him, asked: "What are you doing?" "I am attending to the household chores." He asked: "Why are you doing the household chores yourself?" The householder said: "I took one wife and she came to her end through her own karma. I took a second and she too came to her end. In the same way I took wives up to a seventh and she too came to her end." He said: "Why not seek others?" The householder said: "When I have sought them, no one will give them — the families say, 'Why should we give our daughter to you?'" He said: "Then why not seek matchmakers?" The householder said: "I sought them too, but they said, 'Why should we go about seeking a bride for you only to have her come into your household?'"

Not far from that householder's house there lived an old woman of a guild family, and that young friend said to the householder: "Why not bring that old guild woman in?" The householder said: "Do you want me to make a wife of her?" He said: "Let that woman — who is wicked and of evil ways — come in after turning away from those unwholesome ways."

When the young friend pressed that householder again and again, he went to the old guild woman's house and said, "Greetings, greetings." The old woman replied: "Welcome! What do you wish?" The householder said: "If I were to seek you, whose would you be?" The old woman replied: "I belong to whoever gives me food and clothing." The householder said: "Would you not everywhere practise your former afflictions?" The old woman replied: "Do I not see that I am old? I have turned back from those sinful, unvirtuous ways." The householder said: "Come in then, and I will provide you with food and clothing. You shall keep the doors and doorposts of my household." So that householder brought the old guild woman into his home, handed her the keys and the crooked keys, and said: "This is your house — I shall act according to what you give me." The old guild woman set to work keeping the doors and doorposts of that householder's home, and in not a long while, with good clothing and good food, her skin, flesh, and blood grew full and lustrous.

Then, from near the gateway of that house, the old guild woman saw a great many young women going off toward the Jeta Grove and asked them where they were going. The young women said: "We are going to the Jeta Grove." The old woman said: "Wait just until that one has put on her clothes and ornaments." So while she dressed herself in clothes and ornaments, the young women went on ahead and left. The old woman too put on her clothes and ornaments and quickly, quickly slipped out after them.

By the time those young women had entered the monastery, there was a monk inside who, with his cell door left unlocked, had fallen asleep, and whose robe had become dishevelled while his limbs had fallen into an exposed and unseemly state. Seeing him thus, those young women laughed and came back out of the monastery. The old guild woman was also going in, and when she saw those young women coming out she said: "What are you laughing at? Have you not heard the saying, 'One who laughs at a dwelling place becomes a stumbling block for oneself'?" The young women fell completely silent and went on their way.

The old guild woman, thinking to herself "I wonder whether those girls might have seen a crow or a monkey here — let it not go to waste," entered with her mind intent and making a careful inspection. And when she had gone in, she saw the monk lying there just as he was. Having seen him, desire arose in her, and the old guild woman lay herself down upon that monk and began to make advances. But the monk, overcome by deep sleep, did not wake up. The old guild woman thought to herself: "We guild women know sixty-four arts — and this ordained one knows sixty-five, inasmuch as he accepts the touch and takes possession of it while giving not a word." Having recognized and understood this, when the time came that the old guild woman had untangled herself and disengaged, she woke the monk up and said: "Noble one, my shawl — where on earth might it be? If you would be so kind, please return it."

The monk said: "You, miserable ruiner of dwellings — so long as you do not take possession of me, perhaps I might come to your house some time." The monk then thought with remorse: "Has a defeat (pārājika) not come upon me?" and he told the whole matter in detail to the other monks. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One then addressed that monk: "Monk, did you take possession of the touch?" He replied: "Venerable One, I did not take possession of the touch —"

"I was from the very beginning overcome by deep sleep, so how could I have taken possession of the touch?" The Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, for this monk who did not take possession of the touch there is indeed no transgression. Nevertheless, I shall establish rules of conduct for monks who dwell near villages. A monk who dwells near a village, when he lies down to sleep in the daytime with his robe loosened, must either firmly bolt every door, or station a monk as a guard, or bind up his robe. If he does not firmly bolt every door, does not station a monk as a guard, and does not bind up his robe, and yet in that same way loosens his robe and lies down to sleep, he will incur a serious offense."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At Śrāvastī there was a certain monk who dwelt in a forest hermitage and had attained the fourth meditative concentration. He would go again and again to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and of the senior monks, the elders, and so the younger monks came to know him well. Then on another occasion he fell ill with a skin disease, and those younger monks said to him: "Elder, have you fallen ill with a skin disease?" He replied: "Yes, friends, it is so." They said: "Elder, why do you not go to a physician for treatment?" He replied: "Friends, this is the way of things — unwanted by many people, unpleasant to many people, disagreeable to many people, unwelcome to many people — shared by all the world: the thing called death will come, and it will lead both this disease and me myself from this world to the next. What is there, then, to be done?" They said: "Elder, has not the Blessed One declared that a virtuous person of good ethical conduct, so long as he lives, continually accumulates great merit, and for as long as great merit accumulates, for that long he shall rejoice in the higher realms? Come, please attend to the matter." When he had been pressed by them with urgency, he went to the physician. The physician, seeing him, said: "Noble one, have you fallen ill with a skin disease?" He replied: "Yes, friend, it is so. It is for that very purpose that I have come. Please prescribe medicine for me." "Noble one, take warm broth, anoint your body with mustard oil, and sit in the shade, and you will recover." "Friend, please give me some mustard oil." "Noble one, we physicians prescribe medicine; we do not supply it. If we were to supply it to each and every person, we would have neither shelter nor provisions." "As it happens, a certain great householder has come down with a disease of this kind. I have prepared mustard oil that will thoroughly cure his skin disease. Go to him and ask him for it." "Friend, he will not give it." "Noble one, go — he is a person of faith and he will give it." "Friend, then by your saying so it will be as though you yourself have given it." So he went and arrived at the house of that householder, and when the householder saw him coming from afar he said: "Noble one, have you fallen ill with a skin disease?" "Yes, friend, it is so." "Noble one, anoint your body with mustard oil and sit in the shade, and you will recover." "Friend, it is for that very purpose that I have come. I know that you have mustard oil that will thoroughly cure my skin disease — please give it to me, and it will be merit for you." "Noble one, I shall make an offering with all due solemnity —"

"— if you come to beg alms from me." "Very well, please eat." The householder satisfied him with good food, then filled a small bowl with mustard oil that would thoroughly cure the skin disease and gave it to him. The monk said "Thank you" and left, going to a forest dwelling. He put on rags, anointed his body with that mustard oil, and sat in the sun. A feeling of comfort arose in him, and he fell asleep. While he slept, the limbs of his body were seized by insects called uddzating, and having been worked upon by them his clothing fell away. Just then a great young woman who was heavy with child came along that way, and she saw the monk in that altered state. Seeing him, desire arose in her, fully enveloped in attachment to sensual objects, and she began to act upon the monk. When the monk awoke, he was too feeble to resist. When she had become free of that envelopment, she said: "Noble one, my husband is somewhere in such-and-such a direction — if you should wish, do come." The monk said: "I, a wretch who defiles the resting place, will not make even that my own — would I then come to your house?" The monk grew remorseful, thinking: "Has a defeat, a root downfall, come upon me?" He reported the full circumstances to the other monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then said to that monk: "Monk, did you not take hold of the contact?" He replied: "Venerable One, I did not take hold of the contact. Since from the very beginning I have been free from attachment to sensual objects, how could I take hold of the contact?" The Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, for a monk who does not take hold of contact there is no downfall. Nevertheless, I shall establish rules of conduct for monks who dwell in forest hermitages. A forest-dwelling monk who, in the daytime, lets down his upper robe and falls asleep must either have that area enclosed with branches, fence posts, or railings, or have a guardian monk posted, or have his robes tied. If he lets down his upper robe and falls asleep without enclosing that area with branches, fence posts, or railings, without posting a guardian monk, and without tying his robes, he incurs a wrong."

The monks were uncertain, and they put all their uncertainty to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, if this monk was already free from attachment to sensual objects, why did the limbs of his body become workable?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, in one who has not been freed from attachment, the limbs of the body become workable through five causes; in one who has been freed from attachment, through four. What are the five causes for one not freed from attachment? Being overcome by defecation, being overcome by urination, being overcome by wind, being seized by insects called uddzating, and being fully enveloped by attachment to sensual objects — that is the fifth. Those are the five causes for one not freed from attachment. What are the four causes for one freed from attachment? Being overcome by defecation, being overcome by urination, being overcome by wind, and being seized by insects called uddzating. Those are the four causes for one freed from attachment. At that time this monk's limbs became workable because they were seized by insects called uddzating — and that is why his body became workable."

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga. The third bundle.

The monks, having developed doubt, asked the Blessed One, the buddha, to resolve all their doubts. "Venerable one, the elder Śubhākara, son of Kalanda, saw the Saṅgha of monks — which was without fault and without blemish — create a blemish from the very beginning in this way: through the condition of unchaste conduct a blemish was produced."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now but also in times past did he create a blemish from the very beginning in a world that was without fault and without blemish — by producing a blemish through the condition of unchaste conduct. Listen to this.

"Monks, there is a time when this world disintegrates. When the world disintegrates, most sentient beings are reborn in the class of the gods of Luminosity (the Ābhāsvara gods of the form realm). There they are form-born from mind, lacking nothing, with faculties unimpaired, endowed with all major and minor limbs, beautiful, possessed of good color, self-luminous, traversing the sky, feeding on joy, sustained by joy as their nourishment, long-lived and dwelling there for a great span of time.

"At that time this great earth becomes nothing but water and nothing but ocean. Upon that great earth turned to nothing but water and nothing but ocean, the wind causes foam to gather all over, to consolidate all over, and to spread all over — just as when boiled milk cools, the wind causes foam to gather all over it, to consolidate all over it, and to spread all over it. In the same way, upon the great earth turned to nothing but water and nothing but ocean, the wind causes foam to gather all over, to consolidate all over, and to spread all over. That becomes an earth-essence of excellent color, excellent fragrance, and excellent taste. In color it is like this: like ghee. In taste it is like this: like uncooked wild honey.

"Monks, there is also a time when this world reforms. When the world reforms, some sentient beings from that class of the gods of Luminosity, their lifespan exhausted, their merit exhausted, their store of merit depleted, die and transmigrate — and they come to be in the very same condition as human beings, arriving here. Here too they are form-born from mind, lacking nothing, with faculties unimpaired, endowed with all major and minor limbs, beautiful, possessed of good color, self-luminous, traversing the sky, feeding on joy, sustained by joy as their nourishment, long-lived and dwelling there for a great span of time.

"At that time there is no arising of the sun or moon in the world. There is no arising of stars in the world. There is no night and no day. There is no moment, no interval, no instant. There is no month, no fortnight, no season, no year.

There is no female, no male — beings go simply by the count of 'sentient being, sentient being.'

"Then a certain sentient being of a covetous nature tastes the earth-essence with the tip of a finger. The more it tastes, the more it craves; the more it craves, the more it comes to eat of it, resorting to the eating of solid food. Other sentient beings then see that sentient being tasting the earth-essence with the tip of a finger — and the more it tastes, the more it craves, and the more it craves, the more it comes to eat of it, resorting to the eating of solid food. Seeing this, those sentient beings too begin to taste the earth-essence with the tip of a finger. The more they taste, the more they crave; the more they crave, the more they come to eat of it, resorting to the eating of solid food."

Because those sentient beings had begun eating the earth-essence as their food and had consumed it, hardness and heaviness arose in their bodies, and whatever fine, bright complexion they had possessed disappeared. Darkness arose in the world. Monks, it is in the nature of reality that when darkness arises in the world, the sun and moon too appear in the world. Stars appear in the world, and night and day appear, and moments, instants, and brief intervals appear, and months and fortnights and seasons and years appear. Those beings ate that food and, sustained by it, lived long and endured for a great while. Among them, whoever ate very little became endowed with fine complexion, while whoever ate a great deal became ugly in complexion. Thus, because there were two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion became manifest. And when two kinds of complexion had come to be, one sentient being would belittle another, saying: "Ha! I am endowed with fine complexion, whereas you are ugly in complexion." Because they had become proud on account of their complexion, and because they had fully taken up those sinful, unwholesome qualities, the earth-essence disappeared.

Monks, when the earth-essence had disappeared for those sentient beings, they gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" Just as today, when people find some good and delicious food, they use the old words that have been preserved in letters, giving voice to them and saying: "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" — in the very same way, those sentient beings too, when the earth-essence was gone, gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" — yet what those words mean they do not know.

Monks, when the earth-essence had disappeared for those sentient beings, there arose earth-cream splendid in color, splendid in fragrance, and splendid in taste. In color it was like the kunikuma flower. In taste it was like fresh honey of young bees, unboiled. Those beings ate that and, sustained by it, lived long and endured for a great while. Among them, whoever ate very little became endowed with fine complexion, while whoever ate a great deal became ugly in complexion. Thus, because there were two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion became manifest. And when two kinds of complexion had come to be, one sentient being would belittle another, saying: "Ha! I am endowed with fine complexion, whereas you are ugly in complexion." Because they had become proud on account of their complexion, and because they had fully taken up those sinful, unwholesome qualities, the earth-cream disappeared.

Monks, when the earth-cream had disappeared for those sentient beings, they gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Alas! Alas!" Just as today, when people are struck by some suffering or mental distress, they use the old words that have been preserved in letters, giving voice to them and saying: "Alas! Alas!" — in the very same way, those sentient beings too, when the earth-cream was gone, gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Alas! Alas!" — yet even as they said "Alas! Alas!," they did not know the meaning of what was said; they did not know the meaning of what was said.

Monks, when the earth-cream had disappeared for those sentient beings, a grove of bamboo-shoots appeared — its color magnificent, its fragrance magnificent, its taste magnificent. Its color was like this: like the flower of the kadam tree. Its taste was like this: like unboiled honey of wild bees. Those beings ate of it and, sustained by that food, lived long and endured for a great time. Of those who ate but little, their complexion became beautiful; of those who ate much, their complexion became poor. And so it was that, on account of two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion appeared. When two kinds of complexion appeared, one sentient being would look down upon another sentient being, saying: "Hey, sentient being! I have a beautiful complexion, while you have a poor complexion!" — and so they would despise one another. Because they had become arrogant on account of their complexion, through taking up those very sinful, unwholesome qualities, the grove of bamboo-shoots disappeared.

Monks, when the grove of bamboo-shoots had disappeared for those sentient beings, they gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Begone! Begone!" — just as today, when people are reviled with some sharp abuse, they use those very same old words that have been preserved in letters, giving voice to them and saying: "Begone! Begone!" — in the very same way, those sentient beings too, when the grove of bamboo-shoots was gone, gathered together, and grief arose in them, despondency arose in them, lamentation arose in them, and they cried out: "Begone! Begone!" — yet even as they said "Begone! Begone!," they did not know the meaning of what was said; they did not know the meaning of what was said.

Monks, when the grove of bamboo-shoots had disappeared for those sentient beings, rice appeared — unsown, uncultivated, without husk, without chaff, pure and clean, ripening in one day, so that when threshed in the evening it was restored by morning, and when threshed in the morning it was restored by evening; indeed, however much was threshed, it kept replenishing itself and showed no sign of diminishing. Those beings ate of it and, sustained by that food, lived long and endured for a great time.

Because those sentient beings ate the uncooked grain of that unsown, uncultivated rice as their beginning of food, differentiated faculties arose among them: some were endowed with male faculties, and some were endowed with female faculties. And then those who were endowed with male faculties and those who were endowed with female faculties looked upon one another eye to eye. The more they looked upon one another eye to eye, the more attachment arose in them. The more attachment arose in them, the more they came together. The more they came together, the more they engaged in wrong conduct. Other sentient beings, seeing sentient beings engage in wrong conduct, threw clods of earth, threw ashes, threw sand and gravel, saying aloud: "Perish, wicked being! Perish, wicked being! Do your wicked deed elsewhere! Why, O sentient being, do you harm another sentient being?" — just as today —

just as today, when sentient beings take a bride or a groom, flour is scattered, and fragrant substances, flowers, fruits, and grains are scattered as well, and the words are spoken, "May you be at ease together" — so too, in that ancient time, when those sentient beings saw sentient beings engage in wrong conduct with other sentient beings, they threw clods of earth and threw ashes, sand, and gravel, saying aloud: "Perish, wicked being! Perish, wicked being! Why, O sentient being, do you harm another sentient being?"

Monks, thus what was formerly known as contrary to Dharma is now known as Dharma; what was formerly known as contrary to discipline is now known as discipline; and what was formerly deserving of reproach is now deserving of praise. They would abstain from it for a single day, or for two or three or even seven days. Because those sinful sentient beings felt deep revulsion toward that ignoble and unworthy conduct, they entered upon a vow of restraint. Then they began to build enclosures, saying to one another, "Let us do what should not be done here somewhere else; let us do what should not be done here somewhere else" — and from this saying arose the name "house" (khyim khyim, meaning "home"). Monks, this was the very first arising in the world of all the affairs of the household; and that came about through Dharma, not through what is contrary to Dharma. The Dharma here is this: it is the supreme Dharma of the victorious lords of kings.

Monks, at that time and at that moment, the very first sentient being who rebuked another sentient being for that conduct — that was none other than Kalandaka's son Svāgata. Just as at that time he introduced the very first blemish into a world that was flawless and free of turbulence, namely by making unchaste conduct the occasion for turbulence, so now too he has introduced the very first blemish into the flawless and untarnished Saṅgha of monks, making unchaste conduct the occasion for turbulence.

Monks, therefore train yourselves thus: strive to abandon attachment, strive to abandon aversion, strive to abandon delusion. Train yourselves thus, O monks. For one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by acute sensation, there is no transgression. The first defeat is hereby complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove at Veṇuvana. At that time the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, was staying in a secluded forest dwelling at Rājagṛha. Then, when the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, entered Rājagṛha on alms round, the cow-herders, cattle-herders, grass-cutters, wood-cutters, travelers, and road-side vendors of Rājagṛha broke up and ransacked the secluded grove, carrying off all the grass and wood. Afterward, when the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, returned, he saw that the grove had been broken up and ransacked and that all the grass and wood had been carried off. Seeing this, he gathered grass and wood and made another shelter. When the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, went on alms round into Rājagṛha a second and a third time, the cow-herders, cattle-herders, grass-cutters, wood-cutters, travelers, and road-side vendors of Rājagṛha broke up and ransacked the secluded grove, carrying off all the grass and wood. Afterward, when the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, returned, he saw that the grove had been broken up and ransacked and that all the grass and wood had been carried off.

Then the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, thought to himself: "How painful it is, how unbearable, that from the moment I entered upon my alms-round in Rājagṛha, the cow-herders, cattle-herders, grass-cutters, wood-cutters, travelers, and road-side vendors of Rājagṛha have now broken up and ransacked the grove and carried off all the grass and wood — not once, not twice, but three times. I am skilled in my father's craft and trade. Let me build all the dwelling places out of clay."

And so the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, trod the clay with his body again and again, rinsed it with water free of living creatures, and set about building the foundation, the roof, the pillars, and the upper courses of walls for the dwelling. He also made niches for robes, robe-hooks, platforms, seats, stools, low stools, and door-panels. When he saw that the clay had dried, he coated it with pigment and painted it, then pressed in wood, dung, and dry grass, firing it in a kiln. That dwelling, so perfectly fired and so supremely finished, turned red — a deep red color, radiant with a crimson glow — like the bandhujīvaka flower.

Then the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, thought to himself: "My dwelling is perfectly fired and supremely finished, red, deep red in color, radiant with a crimson glow, like the bandhujīvaka flower. Let me now hold a housewarming festival for the dwelling."

And so the monk Dhanavatī, formerly a potter, had the neighboring monks look after the dwelling, and taking his bowl and robe he went off on a walking tour through the countryside.

Now, by the very nature of things, the Buddha, the Blessed One, while living and dwelling, vital and well, would from time to time — in accordance with those who were to be tamed — travel down to the hells, travel through the realms of animals, travel through the realms of hungry ghosts, travel through the realms of gods, travel through the countryside, travel along river banks, travel through forests, travel through charnel grounds, travel through mountains, and travel to monastic halls.

On this occasion, since the Blessed One intended to travel to monastic halls, he said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and inform the monks: 'The Tathāgata is now setting out to tour the monastic halls. Whichever of you wishes to accompany the Tathāgata on a tour of the monastic halls — let him take his robes.'"

The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One and replied "As the Blessed One commands," took up a bunch of keys, and walking from one courtyard to another, from one monastic hall to another, from one dwelling to another — going directly and without deviation through the walking paths — he saw the monks and said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is setting out to tour the monastic halls. Whichever of you wishes to accompany the Blessed One on a tour of the monastic halls — let him take his robes."

Those monks, having heard the venerable Ānanda and replied "As the elder commands," took their robes and went to where the Blessed One was.

Then the Blessed One, together with a great many monks, set out on a tour of the monastic halls.

Gradually touring the monastic halls and proceeding onward, the Blessed One arrived at the place where the former potter, the monk Nandaka, had his monastic hall. The Blessed One saw that the dwelling of the former potter, the monk Nandaka, was deeply dyed, most excellently dyed, red, of a red hue, of a red glow — just like the bandhujiīvaka flower. Having seen this, he addressed the monks: "Monks, whose dwelling is this?" "Venerable sir, it belongs to the former potter, the monk Nandaka." "Monks, on account of this, non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) will slander us, saying: 'While the ascetic Gautama is still alive, among his hearers there have appeared certain teachings resembling the defilement-prone views of outsiders.' Therefore, tear down and dismantle that dwelling."

And so those monks, by the command and instruction of the Teacher, tore down and dismantled the dwelling. The Blessed One, having had the dwelling torn down and dismantled, departed.

When the former potter, the monk Nandaka, arrived, he saw his dwelling torn down and dismantled. Upon seeing this he said to the monks nearby: "Venerable ones, who has torn down and dismantled my dwelling?" "Venerable sir, it was the monks, by the command and instruction of the Teacher." "If the Blessed One, the lord of Dharma, the Sugata, the lord of Dharma, tore it down, then the tearing down was good."

At that time in the city of Rājagṛha, a report of the former potter, the monk Nandaka, mixed with the talk of the great retinue of foresters, went about, and people said: "There is a companion worth speaking of and spending time with."

Then the former potter, the monk Nandaka, thought to himself: "In the city of Rājagṛha, among the great retinue of foresters, there is someone spreading a report about me, saying I am a companion worth speaking of and spending time with. For this reason I should make all my dwelling furnishings from wood." Knowing and understanding this, he went to where the great retinue of foresters was, and going there, he said to the great retinue of foresters: "Dear friend, know this: King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, who arose from Māgadhā, granted me certain timbers — I wish to have them brought. Please give them to me. Noble one, if the deity requests timber from you as a petition, it is a fine petition — take whatever you like." Then the former potter, the monk Nandaka, from among those timbers belonging to King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady — timbers that had been set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to give to just anyone — he drew out some of the timber, had it cut and split, and had it carried away.

Now one of the great retinue of city guards, while patrolling the outer road of the fortress of Rājagṛha, saw someone drawing out timber — from those timbers of King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, that had been set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to give to just anyone — cutting and splitting it and hauling it away.

Upon seeing this, he saw that from the timbers of King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady — set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to give to just anyone — some timber had been drawn out, cut, split, and hauled away, and so — he became afraid, alarmed, and his hair stood on end, thinking: might a spy, a thief, or some enemy have entered the city of Rājagṛha belonging to King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage?

He then went to where the chief of the great timber-guard was, and having gone there, he said this to the chief of the great timber-guard: "Friend, know this. While I was making my rounds along the outer roads of the fortress of the city of Rājagṛha, I saw that from the timbers of King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage — set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to give to just anyone — some timber had been drawn out, cut, split, and hauled away. Having seen this, I became afraid, alarmed, and my hair stood on end, thinking: might a spy, a thief, or some enemy have entered the city of Rājagṛha belonging to King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage — because some timber had been drawn out, cut, split, and hauled away from those timbers set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to give to just anyone? Friend, did you give the timber to anyone?"

"Friend, I did not give it to anyone. However, previously the monk Norchen, a potter by trade, came and said this: 'Friend, know this. King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage, gave me some timber, and I wish to haul it away — please give it to me.' And I said to him: 'Noble one, if the king has authorized the timber for you, then by all means, take as much as you wish.' And he hauled it away — or did he not?"

Then the chief of the great city-guard went to where King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage, was, and having gone there, spoke these words to King Ajātaśatru, son of the Vaidehi lady, born of the Māgadhā lineage: "May your majesty know this. While I was making my rounds along the outer roads of the fortress of the city of Rājagṛha, I saw that from the royal timbers — set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve out of your majesty's concern for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy for your majesty to bestow upon just anyone — some timber had been drawn out, cut, split, and hauled away. Having seen this, I became afraid, alarmed, and my hair stood on end, thinking: might a spy, a thief, or some enemy have entered your majesty's city of Rājagṛha — because some timber had been drawn out, cut, split, and hauled away from those timbers kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve out of your majesty's concern for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to bestow upon just anyone? And so I went to where the chief of the great timber-guard was, and having gone there, I said to the chief of the great timber-guard: 'Friend, know this. While I was making my rounds along the outer roads of the fortress of the city of Rājagṛha, I saw that from the timbers of your majesty — set aside, kept with great secrecy, guarded with great care, placed in reserve for the purpose of repairing what was broken and crumbled in the city of Rājagṛha, and not easy to bestow upon just anyone — some timber had been drawn out, cut, and hauled away. If I were to say, "Friend, have you given the timber to someone?" and he were to reply, "Friend, I have given it to no one — however, previously the monk Norchen, a former potter, came and said this: 'Friend, know this. King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, has given me those timbers. I wish to have them transported, so give them to me.' And I said to him, 'Noble one, if His Majesty has authorized you to receive the reserved timbers, then the authorization is good — take whatever you please.' Did he then haul them away, or did that not happen?" — and if I were to ask, "Did His Majesty bestow the reserved timbers upon someone?" — "Respected friend, he gave them to no one." — this is what the chief of the great timber-guard said.

Then King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, said to a man: "Respected friend, come here. Go to where the chief of the great timber-guard is, and when you have gone there, say to him: 'Respected friend, King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, speaks to you thus.'" The man replied, "As His Majesty commands," and having received the order from King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, he went to where the chief of the great timber-guard was, and when he had arrived he said to him: "Friend, know this. King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, speaks to you."

The chief of the great timber-guard replied, "As His Majesty commands," and having received this from the man, he hastened to the presence of King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch.

Now at that moment the monk Norchen, the former potter, had for some reason gone up into Rājagṛha, and the chief of the great timber-guard caught sight of the monk Norchen, the former potter, from some distance away. Having seen him, he said to the monk Norchen, the former potter: "Noble one, please be informed — I summoned you on account of those reserved timbers. Friend, you should go ahead, and I too shall come."

Then the chief of the great timber-guard, the monk Norchen the former potter, and that man all went to where King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, was staying, and they waited at the gate of the palace.

Then that man went to where King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, was, and having arrived he said to King Ajātaśatru: "Your Majesty, the chief of the great timber-guard is waiting at the gate. That monk, too, has come along without being summoned. Your Majesty, please set aside the chief of the great timber-guard for the moment and first allow that monk to enter." The man replied, "As His Majesty commands," and having received this from King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, he went to where the monk Norchen, the former potter, was, and said to him: "Noble one, please be informed — King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, speaks to you."

The monk Norchen, the former potter, replied, "As His Majesty commands," and having received this from the man, he went to where King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, was. Having arrived, he greeted King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, with the word "Ārogya," and sat to one side.

As the monk Norchen, the former potter, sat to one side, King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, spoke to him thus: "Noble one, is it permissible to take timber that has not been given? It is not permissible, Your Majesty." "Then why did you take it?" "Because Your Majesty had granted it." "The noble one does not remember. I will recall what His Majesty intended. Not long after His Majesty assumed lordship and sovereign power over his father's kingdom, I issued a great royal proclamation of this kind to those ascetics and brahmins throughout my realm who are reputed to be of good character — that from that day forth they might freely make use of grass, timber, and water that had not been given — and I had it publicly declared with a lion's roar throughout the assembly with full acceptance. Noble one, it is on the basis of what I, for my part, had not seized that I spoke thus; what is involved here is something that had indeed been seized." "Your Majesty, whatever has not been seized — what has Your Majesty to do with that?"

When this was said, King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, grew furious and agitated and wrathful, and his displeasure showed: he furrowed his brow and raised three forehead-veins, creased his brow in anger, distorted his face, widened his eyes, and rubbed both his palms together, and said: "You of the class of slain ascetics — go! And do not act like that again!"

Then the wise ones of the retinue, knowing that King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, was so fierce, so rough, so formidable, and so utterly without hesitation, cried out in a great outcry, raising their voices high with a great clamor: "It is astonishing that he has been dismissed with the empty phrase 'You of the class of slain ascetics'!"

Then the monk Norchen, the former potter, went to the assembly hall and said to the monks: "Venerable ones, King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, has accused me and threatened me with the loss of my life." The monks asked, "Why?" He related to the monks what had occurred, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, put on your patched robe, go together with a wandering ascetic who accompanies monks from behind, enter Rājagṛha, and take up a position on the main road of the city of Rājagṛha, and on the lanes, the crossroads, the intersections, and at the places where proclamations are made. Then question the faithful and the unfaithful, the brahmins and householders, the villagers and townspeople, the wealthy and the merchants and the caravan leaders — ask them: 'Has King Ajātaśatru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch, accused someone and threatened him with the loss of his life for taking what had not been given?'"

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having received this from the Blessed One, he entered Rājagṛha and took up a position on the main road of the city of Rājagṛha, and on the lanes, the crossroads, the intersections, and at the places where proclamations are made, and he spoke to the faithful and the unfaithful, the brahmins and householders, the villagers and townspeople, the wealthy and the merchants and the caravan leaders:

"O wise ones, by how much has King Ajātaśatru of the Māgadhā branch, born of the Vṛji lineage, accused someone and threatened him with the loss of his life for taking what had not been given?" They replied: "Venerable Ānanda, by five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas."

Then the venerable Ānanda departed from Rājagṛha, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Venerable One, I have just now seen fit to undertake this matter. Following a monk who was going along in the manner of a monk, I entered Rājagṛha and went to the main road of the city of Rājagṛha, and to the lanes, the crossroads, the intersections, and the places where proclamations are made, and I asked the faithful and the unfaithful, the brahmins and householders, the villagers and townspeople, the wealthy and the merchants and the caravan leaders: 'O wise ones, by how much has King Ajātaśatru of the Māgadhā branch accused someone and threatened him with the loss of his life for taking what had not been given?' And from their mouths came the reply: 'Venerable Ānanda, by five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas.'"

Then, on account of this occurrence and this basis and this occasion, the Blessed One convened an assembly of the community of monks. Now, a Tathāgata, when he beholds the two aspects of purpose, convenes the community of monks — as follows: so that it may be universally known to my hearers, and so that I may properly establish a rule of training in the Vinaya. The blessed buddhas act upon occasion with full knowing: they act with full knowing, and they do not act without knowing; they act at the right time, and they do not act at the wrong time; they act when there is purpose, and they do not act when there is no purpose. Thus the blessed buddhas, by the rule of propriety, refrain from acting when there is no purpose. And in this regard, since the blessed buddhas know the right time for acting when there is purpose, the Blessed One had previously asked the monk Nandaka the Potter: "Nandaka, is it true that you have done something as unseemly as that?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One then rebuked him: "That conduct is unworthy of a renunciant, is not fitting, is not proper, and is not in accord with the discipline — it is not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Nandaka, I have taught the Dharma of mental liberation and wisdom liberation in order to free attachment from attachment, and taught the Dharma of mental liberation and wisdom liberation in order to free aversion from attachment and delusion from attachment. Why have you done something so unseemly?" And thus he rebuked him.

Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, having seen ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers is to be established in the Vinaya — as follows: for the sake of uniting the Saṅgha; for the sake of the well-being of the Saṅgha; for the sake of the comfort of the Saṅgha; for the sake of restraining those individuals who are shameless and difficult to admonish; for the sake of the ease of those who are conscientious; for the sake of bringing those who are not yet truly faithful to faith; for the sake of increasing the faith of those who are already faithful; for the sake of restraining the defilements of this present life; for the sake of warding off those of future lives; and for the sake of my pure conduct being widely beneficial to the many, and for the sake of its being correctly taught and lasting long among gods and humans alike.

My hearers are to be trained in the following rule, which is to be proclaimed as a basis of training in the Vinaya: Furthermore, whatever monk takes what has not been given that belongs to others residing in a village or residing in the wilderness — taking it in the category of theft — however much he takes without it being given, if he is then seized by a king or a great minister and told, "You, person, are a thief, a fool, a dullard, a robber," and is killed, or bound, or expelled — if a monk takes in such a manner what has not been given, that monk too has incurred defeat and is not to remain.

Now, as for the phrase "whatever monk": monks are of four kinds — the monk in name only, the monk by self-declaration, the monk for the sake of begging, and the monk who is such by reason of having destroyed the afflictions. In the present context, since one who cannot properly be settled by a formal motion or by a fourfold act of the Saṅgha is not qualified for full ordination, the one who has received full ordination is to be understood as the monk intended. Therefore the phrase "whatever monk" is used.

The phrase "belonging to others" refers to what belongs to men, women, or people of indeterminate sex.

"Residing in a village" means residing within an enclosure.

"Residing in the wilderness" means residing outside an enclosure.

"Not given" means not given by any man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex in connection with that property.

"In the category of theft" means that whatever is not given falls into the category of theft.

"Takes" means if one takes it.

"However much he takes without it being given" means to the value of five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas.

"A king" — this is as follows: if a woman has been anointed with sovereignty over a kingdom, she too is a king anointed at the crown in the royal warrior caste; and if one of the warrior caste, brahmin caste, merchant caste, or common caste has been anointed with sovereignty over a kingdom, that person too is a king anointed at the crown in the royal warrior caste.

"A great minister" refers to other than that — ministers, accountants, and those of high standing who govern the kingdom, who live by sharing a common password and whose livelihood depends upon that office.

"Seized" means apprehended.

The words "You, person, are a thief, a fool, a dullard, a robber" — these are words of insult.

"Saying" means declaring and proclaiming.

"Killed" means deprived of life.

"Bound" means bound with any of the three kinds of restraints — those made of iron, those made of wood, and those made of grass.

"Or expelled" means rendered without a place of resort, whatever form that may take.

"Monk" means whoever possesses the qualities of a monk. What are the qualities of a monk? Full ordination. What is full ordination? It is: the performance of the act of a formal motion and fourfold procedure; the scrutiny; the complete scrutiny; the bringing to completion; the full bringing to completion; and that individual's acceptance, explicit acceptance, non-reversal, and the state of non-reversal — as expressed in speech, in words, in conventional designation, in utterance, in statement, in definitive words, in the course of words, in the sound of words, in verbal action, and in verbal expression.

"That too" is a particle of specification and comprehensiveness.

"Has incurred defeat" means: it has come to its end; it is a transgression; it is a fall; it is a downfall; it is a severance; and it is what is contrary to one's aspiration.

Furthermore, whoever commits that transgression incurs, the very moment it is committed, the state of being unfit to serve as a monk, unfit to serve as a contemplative (śramaṇa), and unfit to be called a son of the Śākyas. He falls away from the substance of being a monk; his conduct as a contemplative is shattered; he is degraded, broken, fallen, and defeated. His conduct as a contemplative cannot be restored. It is just like this: when the top of a palm tree is cut off, it cannot turn green again, it cannot grow and spread and flourish. In the same way, when a monk has committed such an act, the very moment it is committed he becomes unfit to serve as a monk, unfit to serve as a contemplative, and unfit to be called a son of the Śākyas. He falls away from the substance of being a monk; his conduct as a contemplative is shattered; he is degraded, broken, fallen, and defeated. His conduct as a contemplative cannot be restored. It is for this reason that it was declared: "He has incurred defeat."

"He shall not dwell" means: monks shall not dwell together with such a person in the restoration ceremony, in the invitation ceremony, in a single motion, in a motion with one proclamation, or in a motion with three proclamations. Nor shall such a person be appointed to any of the twelve categories of persons. It is for this reason that it was declared: "He shall not dwell."

Now, how does a transgression come about?

Summary verse:

By oneself, by one not given,
by mind, by complete appropriation,
by perception, with four as the fourth —
the fifth is made twofold.

Summary verse:

By oneself, by what is not given,
by mind, by complete appropriation,
by perception, with four as the fourth —
the fifth is rendered twofold.

If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others — by any of three causes — he incurs defeat. What are the three? By oneself, by arrangement, or by commission.

How is it "by oneself"? By stealing oneself, by entering upon theft oneself, or by moving an object from place to place oneself. That is how it is "by oneself."

How is it "by arrangement"? By stealing through arrangement, by entering upon theft through arrangement, or by moving an object from place to place through arrangement. That is how it is "by arrangement."

How is it "by commission"? By stealing through commission of another, by entering upon theft through commission, or by moving an object from place to place through commission. That is how it is "by commission."

If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those three causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by three causes, he incurs defeat. What are the three? It is not given, it is heavy in value, and it is moved from place to place. How is it "not given"? When it has not been given by any man, woman, or person of the third gender. That is how it is "not given." How is it "heavy in value"? When it is five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas. That is how it is "heavy in value." How is it "moved from place to place"? When an object is taken from the location where it had been placed and moved to another location. That is how it is "moved from place to place."

If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those three causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by three causes, he incurs defeat. What are the three? Forming the intention, exerting effort, and moving it from place to place. How is it "forming the intention"? When a mind of theft has arisen and is present. That is how it is "forming the intention." How is it "exerting effort"? By exerting effort with the hands and feet.

That is how it is "exerting effort." How is it "moving from place to place"? One lifts it from the place where it had been set down and puts it in another place. That is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those three causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by three causes, he incurs defeat. What are the three? Being held by another, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "being held by another"? It is this: what is heavy in value is held by another man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. That is how it is "being held by another." How is it "being heavy in value"? Five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas. That is how it is "being heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? One lifts it from the place where it had been set down and puts it in another place. That is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those three causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by three causes, he incurs defeat. What are the three? Perceiving it as held by another, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "perceiving it as held by another"? It is this: the monk perceives these things of heavy value as being held by another man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. That is how it is "perceiving it as held by another." How is it "being heavy in value"? Five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas. That is how it is "being heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? One lifts it from the place where it had been set down and puts it in another place. That is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those three causes, he incurs defeat.

If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by four causes, he incurs defeat. What are the four? Being held by another, perceiving it as held by another, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "being held by another"? It is this: what is heavy in value is held by another man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. That is how it is "being held by another." How is it "perceiving it as held by another"? It is this: the monk perceives these things of heavy value as being held by another man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex. That is how it is "perceiving it as held by another." How is it "being heavy in value"? Five māṣakas, or more than five māṣakas. That is how it is "being heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? One lifts it from the place where it had been set down and puts it in another place. That is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those four causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by four causes, he incurs defeat. What are the four? Forming the intention, exerting effort, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "forming the intention"? A mind of theft has arisen and is present. That is how it is "forming the intention." How is it "exerting effort"? By exerting effort with the hands and feet.

That is how it is "exerting effort." How is it "heavy in value"? Five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas — that is how it is "heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? It is lifted from the place where it had been set down and placed in another place — that is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those four causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by four causes, he incurs defeat. What are the four? Being guarded, being claimed as one's own, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "being guarded"? People's valuable belongings have been placed in containers such as large bronze vessels, copper vessels, earthenware vessels, boxes, and leather bags, and moreover guards of the following kinds have been stationed there — troops of elephants, troops of cavalry, troops of charioteers, and troops of foot soldiers — and they are standing guard there. That is how it is "being guarded." How is it "being claimed as one's own"? People's valuable belongings have previously been placed in containers such as large bronze vessels, copper vessels, earthenware vessels, boxes, and leather bags, and those people claim those things as their own, saying, "These belong to us." That is how it is "being claimed as one's own." How is it "heavy in value"? Five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas — that is how it is "heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? It is lifted from the place where it had been set down and placed in another place — that is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those four causes, he incurs defeat.

Furthermore, if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by four causes, he incurs defeat. What are the four? Being guarded without being claimed as one's own, being claimed as one's own without being guarded, being heavy in value, and moving from place to place. How is it "being guarded without being claimed as one's own"? Bandits have sacked villages, towns, and districts, gathering everything into the wilderness, and there, when the people who owned those things have fled, robbers seize those stolen goods from them, pile them up, and keep watch over them without claiming them as their own. That is how it is "being guarded without being claimed as one's own." How is it "being claimed as one's own without being guarded"? People's valuable belongings have previously been placed in containers such as large bronze vessels, copper vessels, earthenware vessels, boxes, and leather bags, and those people claim those things as their own, saying, "These belong to us," but guards of the following kinds — troops of elephants, troops of cavalry, troops of charioteers, and troops of foot soldiers — have not been stationed there. That is how it is "being claimed as one's own without being guarded." How is it "heavy in value"? Five māṣakas or more than five māṣakas — that is how it is "heavy in value." How is it "moving from place to place"? It is lifted from the place where it had been set down and placed in another place — that is how it is "moving from place to place." If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those four causes, he incurs defeat.

If a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by five causes, he incurs defeat. What are the five? Not taking it with the perception that it is one's own, not taking it with the perception of entrusting it, not taking it with the perception that it is temporary, not making it known to another while taking it, and with a stealing mind present in him — if a monk takes, without it being given, what is heavy in value belonging to others by those five causes, he incurs defeat. By five causes there is no transgression. What are the five? Taking it with the perception that it is one's own, taking it with the perception of entrusting it, taking it with the perception that it is temporary, making it known to another while taking it, and with no stealing mind present in him — by those five causes there is no transgression.

The Vinaya Analysis, the Fourth Fascicle. The summary verse:

Resting on the ground, resting in a vessel, resting in a sack, resting in a pit — the fifth is the root remedies;
these are the properly collected sections.

Now, what is heavy in value belonging to others — namely, neck ornaments, bracelets with decorations, arm ornaments, necklaces, finger rings, and strings

of pearls — that is resting on the ground: if a monk, applying himself to them, lifts them from their resting place, puts on his lower robe, and sets off, then for as long as he has not grasped them firmly and not tucked them away, that constitutes a wrongdoing. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense. If that ground is smooth and of a single expanse, it is to be declared as a single case. If it is uneven, or cracked, or marked with writing, or variegated with many colors, it is to be declared as separate cases.

Now, what is heavy in value belonging to others — namely, neck ornaments, bracelets with decorations, arm ornaments, necklaces, finger rings, and strings of pearls — that is resting in a vessel: if a monk, applying himself to them, lifts them from their resting place, puts on his lower robe, and sets off, then for as long as he has not grasped them firmly and not tucked them away, that constitutes a wrongdoing. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense. If that vessel is smooth and of a single piece, it is to be declared as a single case. If it is uneven, or cracked, or has a seam, or is marked with writing, or variegated with many colors, it is to be declared as separate cases.

Now, what is heavy in value belonging to others — namely, neck ornaments, bracelets with decorations, arm ornaments, necklaces, finger rings, and strings of pearls — that is resting in a sack: if a monk, applying himself to them, lifts them from their resting place, puts on his lower robe, and sets off, then for as long as he has not grasped them firmly and not tucked them away, that constitutes a wrongdoing. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense. If that sack is filled with grain of a single color, it is to be declared as a single case. If it is filled with grain of many different colors, it is to be declared as separate cases.

Now, what is heavy in value belonging to others — namely, necklaces, bracelets with ornaments, armlets, pendants, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls lying in a basket — when a monk applies himself to them, causing them to rise from their seat, putting on his lower robe, and setting out, for as long as he does not grasp them firmly and does not tuck them away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, and brings them out and hoists them onto his shoulder, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense.

If that basket is filled with grain of a single color, it is to be declared as a single case. If it is filled with grain of many different colors, it is to be declared as separate cases. If that basket is full and the rim and mouth are intact, it is to be declared as a single case. If it is not full, then whatever divisions are made within it — whether separated by wooden partitions, by clay partitions, or by reed partitions — each of those is to be declared as a separate case.

Now, what is the boundary of the root action of persons in such matters — namely, a pack-saddle, fleeces, a mortar, a window-frame, a white donkey, and the like, standing nearby — when a monk applies himself to them, causing them to rise from their seat, putting on his lower robe, and setting out, for as long as he does not grasp them firmly and does not tuck them away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, brings them out, and hoists them onto his shoulder, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense.

Summary verse:

In the sky, three are to be counted;
birds, with three ornaments, drawn by secret mantras —
this gathers the correct groupings.

Now, when cloths of many different colors have been laid out on the rooftops of people's houses, and a monk applies himself to them, causing them to rise from their seat, putting on his lower robe, setting out, erecting a ladder, adjusting the rungs and ropes of the ladder, casting off the hanging rope, and climbing up, yet for as long as he does not grasp them firmly and does not tuck them away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps them firmly, tucks them away, gathers up the cloths, and ties them into a bundle, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense.

Now, when cloths that have been laid out by a dyer are carried off by the wind and fall upon the walking paths, gardens, or gatehouses of monks, and a monk applies himself to them, causing them to rise from their seat, putting on his lower robe, and setting out, yet for as long as he does not grasp them firmly and does not tuck them away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps them firmly, tucks them away, gathers up the cloths, and ties them into a bundle, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense.

Now, on multi-storied buildings or atop multi-storied buildings, heavy valuables belonging to people — namely, necklaces, anklets with ornaments, armlets, necklaces, finger-rings, and strings of pearls that have been set down — when a monk, applying himself to these, rises from his seat, puts on his lower robe, sets out, picks up the objects, adjusts a ladder or a rope-and-rung device, lets go of a supporting rope, and climbs up, yet for as long as he does not grasp them firmly and does not tuck them away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps them firmly and tucks them away, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a grave offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

Now, in people's homes or at waterside locations, decorative trees that have been grown and adorned with various ornaments — namely, necklaces, anklets with ornaments, armlets, necklaces, finger-rings, strings of pearls — and from which any food-lure ornament whatsoever is suspended: when a monk, applying himself to these, rises from his seat, puts on his lower robe, sets out, and takes hold of a bird, yet for as long as he does not grasp the ornament firmly and does not tuck it away, that constitutes a serious offense.

When he grasps it firmly and tucks it away, yet for as long as he has not moved it from place to place, and if he thinks, "I will steal this from the bird, not from a person," that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a grave offense; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense. But if he thinks, "I will steal from a person — where indeed is the ornament on the bird?" then for as long as he has not moved it from place to place, that constitutes a grave offense. If he moves it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

Now, in people's multi-storied buildings or on terraces, various ornaments have been set down — namely, necklaces, anklets with ornaments, armlets, necklaces, finger-rings, and strings of pearls — and from these any food-lure ornament whatsoever is suspended: when a monk, applying himself to these, rises from his seat, puts on his lower robe, sets out, and takes hold of a bird, yet for as long as he does not grasp the ornament firmly and does not tuck it away, that constitutes a serious offense. When he grasps it firmly and tucks it away, yet for as long as he has not moved it from place to place, and if he thinks, "I will steal this from the bird, not from a person," that constitutes a serious offense. If he moves it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a grave offense; if the object is not complete, he incurs a serious offense. But if he thinks, "I will steal from a person — where indeed is the ornament on the bird?" then for as long as he has not moved it from place to place, that constitutes a grave offense. If he moves it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

Now, in people's homes or at waterside locations, the following pet birds have been kept — namely, parrots, or mynah birds, or cuckoos, or kalavinka birds, or peacocks — and these have been adorned with various ornaments, namely necklaces, anklets with ornaments, arm ornaments, necklaces, finger rings, and clusters of pearls. If a monk, with the intention of stealing from a person, causes the bird to rise from its perch, puts on a lower robe, starts to walk, and takes hold of the bird, then for as long as he has not yet touched the ornaments or made them slip off, that constitutes a grave offense. If he touches them and makes them slip off, yet for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, and he thinks to himself, "I shall steal from the bird, not from a person" — that too constitutes a grave offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense. If, however, he thinks to himself, "I shall steal from the person — where indeed is any ornament on the bird?" then for as long as he has not moved them from place to place, that constitutes a grave offense. If he moves them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

Regarding the two kinds of treasure — treasure that has an owner and treasure that has no owner — if a monk, for the sake of a treasure that has an owner, rises from his seat, puts on a lower robe, draws a ritual circle, plants khadira-wood pegs at the four directions, surrounds them with five-colored threads, kindles a fire, inserts fuel for the fire offering, recites secret mantras, and does all this thinking, "May there come to me a treasure that has an owner, and may there not come one that has no owner," then if indeed a treasure that has an owner comes to him and one without an owner does not come, for as long as it has not yet appeared before his eyes, that constitutes a grave offense. If it does appear before his eyes, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk makes preparations for a treasure that has an owner, yet thinks to himself, "May there come to me a treasure that has no owner, and may one that has an owner not come," then if indeed a treasure without an owner comes to him and one with an owner does not come, for as long as it has not yet appeared before his eyes, that constitutes a grave offense. If it does appear before his eyes, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a grave offense; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, for the sake of a treasure that has no owner, rises from his seat, puts on a lower robe, draws a ritual circle, plants khadira-wood pegs at the four directions, surrounds them with five-colored threads, kindles a fire, inserts fuel for the fire offering, recites secret mantras, and does all this thinking, "May there come to me a treasure that has no owner, and may there not come one that has an owner," then if indeed a treasure without an owner comes to him and one with an owner does not come, for as long as it has not yet appeared before his eyes, that constitutes a grave offense. If it does appear before his eyes, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a grave offense; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk makes preparations for a treasure that has no owner, yet thinks to himself, "May there come to me a treasure that has an owner, and may one without an owner not come" —

If indeed a treasure with an owner comes to him and one without an owner does not come, then for as long as it has not yet appeared before his eyes, that constitutes a grave offense. If it does appear before his eyes, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

A summary verse:

Earth cuttings, stone,
flat slabs, foundations,
wall-tops, coverings, successive layers, robe-rack niches,
robe-racks, pairs,
iron pegs, seats and small seats, armchair seats and door-lintels, and three kinds of tree — these are the eight.

Now as follows: concerning those heavy goods of people, namely necklaces, ornamental anklets, armlets, garlands, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls, placed upon an earth cutting — when a monk, applying himself to them, causes one to rise from a seat, puts on a lower robe, walks away, yet for as long as he has not taken hold of them nor gathered them up, that constitutes a misdeed. If he does take hold of them and gather them up, yet for as long as he has not conveyed them from place to place, that constitutes a grave offense. If he does convey them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense.

If that earth cutting is spread with grasses of a single color, it is to be spoken of as a single portion. If it is spread with grasses of various colors, it is to be spoken of as separate portions.

Now as follows: concerning those heavy goods of people, namely necklaces, ornamental anklets, armlets, garlands, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls, placed upon a stone — when a monk applies himself to them, causing one to rise from a seat, and so forth, the sequence is the same as before, from "causing one to rise from a seat" down to "if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense." If that stone is smooth and of a single piece, it is to be spoken of as a single portion. If it is hollow, cracked, has divisions, has writing on it, or is marked with various colors, it is to be spoken of as separate portions.

Just as with stone, the same applies likewise to flat slabs, foundations, walls, wall-tops, coverings, successive layers, robe-rack niches, robe-racks, pairs, iron pegs, seats, small seats, armchair seats, door-lintels, and the three kinds of tree — namely flowering trees, fruit-bearing trees, and incense trees. The same principle applies to all of them. If a monk removes and steals a flowering tree, the value of the flowering tree is to be assessed, and if the object is complete, he incurs a defeat; if the object is not complete, he incurs a grave offense. Just as with a flowering tree, the same applies likewise to a fruit-bearing tree and an incense tree.

A summary verse:

Mounts and the house of scales,
riding an elephant, riding a horse, riding a chariot, traveling on foot,
riding a litter, a cart,
a sedan-chair, and a child's conveyance.

Now as follows: concerning those heavy goods of people, namely necklaces, ornamental anklets, armlets, garlands, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls, placed upon a mount — when a monk, applying himself to them, causes one to rise from a seat, puts on a lower robe, walks away, and mounts the mount, yet for as long as he has not taken hold of them nor gathered them up, that constitutes a misdeed. If he does take hold of them and gathers them up, then for as long as he does not convey them from place to place, a grave offense results. If he does convey them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results, while if the full threshold is not met, a grave offense results. If that mount is draped with cloths of a single color, it is to be declared as one category. If it is draped with cloths of various colors, it is to be declared as separate categories. Just as it is with the mount, so too is it with the house of scales.

Now as follows: concerning those heavy goods of people, namely necklaces, ornamental anklets, armlets, garlands, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls, placed upon the back of an elephant — when a monk, applying himself to them, causes one to rise from a seat, puts on a lower robe, walks away, and mounts the elephant, yet for as long as he has not taken hold of them nor gathered them up, that constitutes a misdeed. If he does take hold of them and gather them up, then for as long as he does not convey them from place to place, a grave offense results. If he does convey them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results, while if the full threshold is not met, a grave offense results. If those elephants are plump, with full hide, flesh, and blood, it is to be declared as one category. If they are lean, feeble, thin, dried up, or have not yet reached full body, then whichever of the following divisions applies — cut off at the jaw, cut off at the nose, cut off at the ears, cut off at the ribs, cut off at the waist, or cut off at the haunches — those are to be declared as separate categories.

Now, if on the back of the elephant there is erected a multi-storied pavilion, and within that multi-storied pavilion various ornaments have been placed — namely necklaces, ornamental anklets, armlets, garlands, finger-rings, and bundles of pearls — and a monk, applying himself to them, causes one to rise from a seat, puts on a lower robe, walks away, mounts the elephant, and enters the multi-storied pavilion, yet for as long as he has not taken hold of them nor gathered them up, that constitutes a misdeed. If he does take hold of them and gather them up, then for as long as he does not convey them from place to place, a grave offense results. If he does convey them from place to place, it is to be declared theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results, while if the full threshold is not met, a grave offense results. If that multi-storied pavilion is draped with cloths of a single color, it is to be declared as one category. If it is draped with cloths of various colors, it is to be declared as separate categories. Just as it is with the multi-storied pavilion, so too is it with a half-pavilion. Just as it is with riding an elephant, so too is it with riding a horse, riding a chariot, traveling on foot, riding a litter, a cart, a sedan-chair, and a child's conveyance.

Summary verse:

A boat set in motion, downstream, against the current, and with the current,
this shore, the far shore, dry land, conveying through the shallows, and consumption causing loss without ease.

If a monk with intent to steal causes a moored boat to move, a misdeed results. If he directs it downstream, then for as long as it remains visible before one's eyes, a grave offense results.

When it passes from sight, the theft is considered complete. The value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If he directs the boat against the current, then for as long as it has not passed beyond its mooring-place, a grave offense results. Once it has passed beyond its mooring-place, the theft is considered complete. The value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If he conveys it from this shore to the far shore, or draws it from the far shore to this shore, then for as long as it remains visible before one's eyes, a grave offense results. When it passes from sight, the theft is considered complete. The value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If he draws it up onto dry land and steals it, then for as long as it remains visible before one's eyes, a grave offense results. When it passes from sight, the theft is considered complete. The value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If, thinking "I will take it later," he hides it in the shallows, the theft is considered complete. The value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If, with the intention of causing loss without ease, thinking "Let it neither become someone else's nor become my own," he hides it in the shallows, or burns it, or breaks it, or tramples it, a grave offense results.

Summary verse:

Autumn crops arising, the three kinds of boat,
the goose and the utpala,
born from water and born from dry land,

the hunter's use, and the hateful fish.

Now, the boundaries of action regarding the autumn crops of people are as follows. The boundary of action for rice crops, for sugarcane crops, and for salt crops are all similar; they are in proximity to one another. Sometimes water is extremely abundant and sometimes water becomes extremely scarce. When water is extremely scarce, if a monk, thinking "Let my own crop flourish and let another's be ruined," diverts the irrigation channel to his own rice field and cuts off another's, and if his crop does indeed flourish while the other's is ruined, the value of that flourishing is to be assessed. If the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

When water is extremely abundant, if a monk, thinking "Let my own crop flourish and let another's be ruined," cuts off his own channel and diverts water to another's, and if his crop does indeed flourish while the other's is ruined, the value of that flourishing is to be assessed. If the full threshold is met, a defeat results; if the threshold is not met, a grave offense results.

If, with the intention of causing loss without ease, thinking "Let it neither become someone else's nor become my own," he diverts both his own channel and another's, a grave offense results.

What applies to the boundary of action for rice crops applies equally to the boundary of action for sugarcane crops and for salt crops.

There are three kinds of boat: a pot-shaped boat, a clay boat, and a raft.

There are four kinds of bundle: a bundle that is heavy and of great value, a bundle that is light but of great value, a bundle that is heavy but of little value, and a bundle that is light and of little value.

What is a bundle that is heavy and of great value? It is as follows: jewels, pearls, beryl (vaiḍūrya), white crystal, coral, silver, refined gold ore, the essence of stone, red coral, and right-spiraling shell — — these constitute a bundle that is heavy and of great value. What is a bundle that is light but of great value? It is as follows: silks, wool from the silkworm (serin), saffron, and cardamom. These constitute a bundle that is light but of great value. What is a bundle that is heavy but of little value? It is as follows: iron, stone, and saltpeter. These constitute a bundle that is heavy but of little value. What is a bundle that is light and of little value? It is as follows: wool, hemp, cotton wadding, and nameru. These constitute a bundle that is light and of little value.

Now, when a bundle that is heavy and of great value and a bundle that is light and of little value are loaded together onto one boat, and that boat founders and does not make it across, and the bundles begin to float away — when the crew call out triumphantly, "Wise ones, whatever has sunk belongs to us, and whatever floats we will each pull out as we please" — then, for as long as a monk rises from his seat in order to retrieve the sunken bundle, puts on his lower robe, sets out, ties up his robe, enters the water, wades in deep, and comes up out of the water, yet does not grasp it or hold it fast, he incurs a wrong deed. If he grasps it and holds it fast, yet for as long as he does not carry it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. If he carries it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; its value is to be assessed; and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met, it incurs a grave offense. If he submerges it in the mud thinking "I will pick it up later," it is to be declared theft; its value is to be assessed; and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met, it incurs a grave offense. If he submerges it in the mud with the intention of causing harm, thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine," he incurs a grave offense.

Now, when a bundle that is light but of great value and a bundle that is heavy but of little value are loaded together onto one boat, and that boat founders and does not make it across, and the bundles sink — when the crew call out triumphantly, "Wise ones, whatever floats belongs to us, and whatever has sunk we will each pull out as we please" — then, for as long as a monk rises from his seat in order to retrieve the floating bundle, puts on his lower robe, sets out, ties up his robe, enters the water, wades in deep, and comes up out of the water, yet does not grasp it or hold it fast, he incurs a wrong deed. If he grasps it and holds it fast, yet for as long as he does not carry it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. If he carries it from place to place, it is to be declared theft; its value is to be assessed; and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met, it incurs a grave offense. If he submerges it in the mud thinking "I will pick it up later," it is to be declared theft; its value is to be assessed; and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met, it incurs a grave offense. If he submerges it in the mud with the intention of causing harm, thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine," he incurs a grave offense.

In the following case: in people's homes or at bodies of water, various ponds have been made, and in those ponds various birds kept for sport — namely geese, kāraṇḍava ducks, and cranes — adorned with various ornaments such as necklaces, ankle-rings with bells, armlets, garlands, chains, and strings of pearls —

If a monk, by way of preparation, causes it to rise from its seat, causes it to put on a lower garment, causes it to move, causes it to tie its cloth, causes it to enter the water, causes it to go into the depths, and takes hold of the bird — so long as he has not yet grasped at the ornament, not yet plucked it, he incurs a grave offense. When he grasps at it and plucks it, and so long as he has not yet conveyed it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. If he thinks to himself, "I shall steal from the bird, not from a person," he incurs a grave offense. When he conveys it from place to place, it is to be declared as theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a grave offense, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If he thinks, "I shall steal from a person — but where are the ornaments on the bird?" then so long as he does not convey it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. If he conveys it from place to place, it is to be declared as theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense.

In those same ponds, various garland-material grows from the water — namely blue lotuses (utpala), white water-lilies (kumuda), white lotuses (padma), supreme-fragrance flowers, soft-fragrance flowers, those that bloom in every season, those that bloom at all times, and those protected from all people — and in connection with these: if a monk, by way of preparation, causes it to rise from its seat, causes it to put on a lower garment, causes it to move, causes it to tie its cloth, causes it to enter the water, causes it to go into the depths — so long as he has not yet grasped at it, not yet plucked it, he incurs a grave offense. When he grasps at it and plucks it, and so long as he has not yet harvested it, not yet lifted it as a load, not yet conveyed it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. When he conveys it from place to place, it is to be declared as theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense.

On both banks of those same ponds, various garland-material grows from dry land — namely atimuktaka, campaka, yellow jasmine, varsika, mallikā, nava-mallikā, priyangu, yūthikā, and dhānuskari flowers, those that bloom in every season, those that bloom at all times, and those protected from all people — and in connection with these: if a monk, by way of preparation, causes it to rise from its seat, causes it to put on a lower garment, and causes it to move — so long as he has not yet grasped at it, not yet plucked it, he incurs a grave offense. When he grasps at it and plucks it, climbs the flowering tree, harvests the flowers, and fills a basket — so long as he has not yet conveyed it from place to place, he incurs a grave offense. When he harvests the flowers, fills a basket, and conveys it from place to place, it is to be declared as theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense.

In the following case: a skilled hunter of wild animals, or a student of such a hunter, has set out hunting equipment in a forest wilderness in order to drive many wild animals away, to harm them, and to torment them in an improper manner. If a monk, with the intention of stealing, steals that hunting equipment, the value of the hunting equipment is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If with the intention of causing no benefit — thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine" — he burns it, breaks it, or destroys it, he incurs a grave offense.

If, however, with a mind of compassion he thinks, "It would be wrong if these sentient beings were to be deprived of their lives on account of this; it would be wrong if this device were to generate a great deal of demerit for those sentient beings," and with that thought he burns it, breaks it, or destroys it, he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, with the intention of stealing, steals a wild animal that has been caught in a hunter's snare, the value of the wild animal is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If with the intention of causing no benefit — thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine" — he releases it, he incurs a grave offense. If with a mind of compassion he thinks, "It would be wrong if these sentient beings were to be deprived of their lives on account of this; it would be wrong if this device were to generate a great deal of demerit for those sentient beings," and with that thought he releases it, he incurs a grave offense.

Now, in this way, a fisherman, or a skilled student of a fisherman, has set fish traps at the bank of a river or at the mouth of a large pond in order to drive many fish away, to harm them, and to torment them in an improper manner. If a monk, with the intention of stealing, steals the fish traps, the value of the fish traps is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If with the intention of causing no benefit — thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine" — he burns, breaks, or destroys them, he incurs a grave offense. If with a mind of compassion he thinks, "It would be wrong if these sentient beings were to be deprived of their lives on account of this; it would be wrong if this device were to generate a great deal of demerit for those sentient beings," and with that thought he burns, cuts, or destroys them, he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, with the intention of stealing, steals fish that have been caught in a fish trap, the value of the fish is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If with the intention of causing no benefit — thinking "Let it become neither theirs nor mine" — he releases them, he incurs a grave offense. If with a mind of compassion he thinks, "It would be wrong if these sentient beings were to be deprived of their lives on account of this; it would be wrong if this device were to generate a great deal of demerit for those sentient beings," and with that thought he releases them, he incurs a grave offense.

A summary verse:

Water for humans on dry land, and likewise water for animals there;
water for humans on the ocean, and water for animals likewise.

Now, a very great number of merchants, taking provisions, have set out on a path through a wilderness. There, where water is scarce and precious, they have pooled their water supply in various containers — clay jars, leather bags, round vessels, and wooden troughs — and they dispense it in measured portions, saying, "This much is the share for a human being, and this much is the share for an animal." If a monk, with the intention of stealing, appropriates for himself the water that is the humans' portion, the value of that water is to be assessed at that time, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If he appropriates the water that is the animals' portion, the value of the animals' portion of water is to be assessed at that time, and if the full threshold is met it incurs a grave offense, while if the full threshold is not met he incurs a wrongdoing.

Now, a very great number of merchants from Jambudvīpa, seeking wealth, have boarded a ship and are venturing out onto the great ocean. Since the great ocean contains nothing but the taste of salt, they have there various containers — rafts to collect the water, and there they distribute it, saying: this much water is the portion for the humans, and this much is the portion for the animals. If a monk, with intent to steal, appropriates for himself the water that is the humans' portion, the value of the humans' portion of water is to be assessed at that time, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If he appropriates for himself the water that is the animals' portion, the value of the animals' portion of water is to be assessed at that time, and if the full threshold is met it incurs a grave offense, while if the full threshold is not met he incurs a wrongdoing.

Summary verse: Taking theft step by step to completion, likewise generating each step, going from the dwelling to the corridor and so forth — these are the fully collected categories.

Now, when a preceptor and a teacher have set out to travel on a road, and they have entrusted their robes to the keeping of their attendants, if those attendants harbor a thieving intent and walk along taking steps to carry off the robes, each step incurs a wrongdoing. For as long as the object remains visible before their eyes, each such moment incurs a grave offense. Once it passes from sight, it is declared to have been stolen: the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense. If instead they take steps and move forward with the intent of stealing, each step incurs a wrongdoing. For as long as the object remains visible before their eyes, each such moment incurs a grave offense. Once it passes from sight, it is declared to have been stolen: the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense.

Now, when monks who share a dwelling with a preceptor and a teacher, and their attendants, steal those preceptors' and teachers' robes with thieving intent, and carry them off — going from the dwelling cell into the corridor, from the corridor into the dwelling cell, emerging again from the dwelling cell into the corridor, climbing up to an upper floor, then descending from there and coming down to a lower floor, entering a gatehouse, going out from the gatehouse onto the outer steps, descending from the outer steps into a stairwell, climbing from the stairwell up to a terrace, descending again from the terrace into the stairwell, going from the stairwell into a dense enclosure, and then emerging from that enclosure into the open — in all these movements, each single step incurs a wrongdoing. For as long as the object remains visible before their eyes, each such moment incurs a grave offense. Once it passes from sight, it is declared to have been stolen: the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met it constitutes a defeat, while if the full threshold is not met it incurs a grave offense.

Summary verse: Receiving a tip-off about the loot, repenting and turning back, and guiding the thieves to the house — these are the fully collected categories.

Now, a monk dwelling in a hermitage is approached by bandits who raid villages, and they ask him: "Noble one, do you know of any large village nearby?" He says: "Yes, I do." They say: "Noble one, then tell us — that village has many women and few men, the guard is lax, it is far from other settlements, there are no guard dogs, it is easy to enter and easy to leave. Are you able to tell us in which direction it lies, so that we may do our work there without harming or injuring anyone? If we return safely, we will give a share to you as well, noble one." If in response to this the monk says: "Knowledgeable ones, that village lies in such and such a direction — it has many women and few men, the guard is lax, it is far from other settlements, there are no guard dogs, it is easy to enter and easy to leave; you are indeed able to do your work there without harming or injuring anyone" — and having said this, the thieves carry out their work there and return safely, then present the monk with a share of the stolen goods, and the monk accepts it for himself — the value of the stolen share is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat; if the threshold is not fully met, it is a grave offense.

If, however, that monk, having spoken those words, comes to regret them and goes to those thieves and says: "Knowledgeable ones, hear me well. Knowledgeable ones, take heed. I spoke those words like a child, a fool, someone confused and unskilled — I spoke carelessly and rashly, without having carefully assessed the situation. That village has few women and many men, its guard is tight, it lies close to other settlements, there are guard dogs, it is difficult to enter, and difficult to leave; you are not able to do your work there without harming or injuring anyone" — then regardless of whether the thieves carry out their work there or not, that same prior act of engagement incurs a grave offense for that monk.

If that monk searches for those thieves but does not find them, and then goes to that household and says: "Knowledgeable ones, be on your guard! Knowledgeable ones, be vigilant! Thieves who plunder villages are coming here today. They may rob you of your possessions, and it would be dreadful if you were to lose your lives entirely" — then regardless of whether the thieves carry out their work there or not, that same prior act of engagement incurs a grave offense for that monk.

Summary verse:

Field ground and undercroft below, and likewise the upper cells above;
household ground has likewise two divisions, and market ground is also twofold.

There are three kinds of ground: field ground, household ground, and market ground. Field ground is stolen in two ways: by means of a sickle-share, and by means of encirclement.

How is it done by means of a sickle-share? If a monk enters into a sickle-share arrangement together with a layperson for the sake of a plot of field ground — if the layperson causes the monk to suffer defeat, the monk incurs a grave offense. If the monk causes the layperson to suffer defeat, for as long as the layperson has not abandoned the undertaking, the monk incurs a grave offense. Once the layperson abandons the undertaking, it is to be declared a theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat; if the threshold is not fully met, it is a grave offense.

If a monk enters into a sickle-share arrangement together with a layperson for upper cells — if the layperson causes the monk to suffer defeat, the monk incurs a grave offense. If the monk causes the layperson to suffer defeat — since the king is the lord of all disputes for monks — it is to be declared a theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat; if the threshold is not fully met, it is a grave offense. Such is the way by sickle-share.

How is it done by encirclement? If a monk encircles a plot of field ground with walls, palings, stakes, a thorn fence, a ditch, or thorn-bushes — for as long as the boundary-tip does not meet another boundary-tip, the monk incurs a grave offense. When boundary-tip meets boundary-tip, it is to be declared a theft; the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it constitutes a defeat; if the threshold is not fully met, it is a grave offense.

Just as described for field ground, so too it is for household ground and market ground.

Summary verse:

Stray animals, taking, guarding, reading out, parents, soliciting from those who come forward, the great load, young and old alike,
what to ask, the small window, and reviling.

At the time when the Blessed One had realized unsurpassed primordial wisdom but the Teaching had not yet spread widely — at that time, when monks found it easy to beg and householders found it difficult to beg, there came an occasion when a great many monks, traveling through the provinces together with a company of merchants on a shared errand, arrived at the place of a weighing station. There the monks said to the merchants: "Good friends, we have certain goods that need to be weighed. Rather than having the weighers put them on the scales, please first retrieve them back from the weighing station." The merchants replied: "As you command, noble ones; it shall be done." And those merchants retrieved the monks' goods that needed weighing from the weighing station and returned them.

As the monks continued on their way, they returned to the monastery. The other monks greeted them, saying: "Welcome, welcome, venerable ones! How was your journey? Were you not harassed by the weighers, the bandits, or the ferryman who cuts the boat-rope?" They replied: "Venerable ones, the journey was comfortable; no one harassed us at all." The monks then asked: "Did you not have goods that needed to be weighed?" They replied: "We did have goods that needed to be weighed, but our merchant friends retrieved them from the weighing station and returned them to us." The monks then asked: "Was it permissible for you to have goods already entered for weighing recalled?" They replied: "It may have been permissible, or it may not have been — for we ourselves did the recalling." Then, fearing that a defeat-level transgression might have arisen for those monks, remorse arose in them, and they recounted the matter in full to the assembled monks. The monks then reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, no transgression arose for those monks. However, a monk should not have goods that have already been entered for weighing recalled. If a monk causes goods already entered for weighing to be recalled, he commits an offense requiring expiation."

At the time when the Blessed One was staying in the grove of the mango trees, he tamed Bimbisāra, King of Magadha — a king whose body was refined and beautiful — together with eighty thousand gods of Magadha and many hundreds of thousands of brahmins and householders of Magadha, and then traveled to Śrāvastī. There he tamed Prasenajit, King of Kośala, by means of the discourse of the parable of the youth. The two kings then gave to the monks a grant of dismissal from the obligations of youth, and to the nuns a grant of dismissal from the obligations pertaining to a queen's retinue, releasing the monks free from weighers, free from bandits, and free from the ferryman who cuts the boat-rope.

At that time the Blessed One's Teaching had spread widely. Then, at another time when householders found it easy to beg and monks found it difficult to beg, a great many monks, traveling through the provinces together with a company of merchants on a shared errand, arrived at the place of a weighing station. Those merchants, touching the monks' feet with their own two feet, said: "Noble ones, while we are afflicted by cold when it is cold, and tormented by heat when it is hot, and harmed by hunger and thirst, and endangered by the touch of horseflies, insects, wind, sun, and venomous snakes — all that we do with enthusiasm, with effort, and with exertion is for the sake of acquiring possessions. All of this — the buddhas, the Dharma, and...

the Saṅgha — we wish to make offerings. Therefore it is fitting that the goods we have here for weighing be retrieved from the weighing station and given to us." The monks said: "Good friends, go ahead and retrieve them by measurement." And those monks retrieved the goods the merchants needed weighed, took them from the weighing station, and gave them over.

Later, as the monks continued traveling through the provinces, they returned to Śrāvastī. There the monks said to them: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How was the journey? Were you not troubled by toll-collectors, highway robbers, and those who cut ferry ropes?" They replied: "Venerable ones, we brought joy to others along the way — how much more so ourselves — and no one troubled us at all." The monks then said: "How did things go?" And those travelers gave a full account to the monks of what had occurred. The monks then asked: "Is it permitted for monks to retrieve goods that have been passed through customs?" They replied: "It may be permitted or it may not — but this is what we did." The monks then felt remorse, thinking: "Has there arisen for us a transgression that would constitute a defeat?" And they gave the monks a full account of the whole matter. The monks then reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, those monks have incurred no transgression — yet a monk should not retrieve goods that have already passed through customs. If a monk does retrieve goods that have already passed through customs, it becomes an offense of wrongdoing." Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training.

Now some time later, a great many monks, traveling through the provinces together with a company of merchants on a shared errand, arrived at the place of a weighing station. Those merchants, touching the monks' feet with their own two feet, said: "Noble ones, while we are afflicted by cold when it is cold, and tormented by heat when it is hot, and harmed by hunger and thirst, and endangered by the touch of horseflies, insects, wind, sun, and venomous snakes — all that we do with enthusiasm, with effort, and with exertion is for the sake of acquiring possessions. All of this — the buddhas, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha — we wish to make offerings to. Therefore it is fitting that the goods we have here for weighing be retrieved from the weighing station and given to us." Those monks said: "Good friends, the Blessed One has established a rule of training that a monk should not retrieve goods that have already passed through customs. Therefore we cannot do so."

The merchants, perceiving that these noble ones were refusing and thinking to themselves that they must find some other means, conferred with one another and said: "Noble ones, today we are busy. Without waiting for us to bring alms to you, please go into the village to collect alms." When those monks had entered the village for alms, the merchants placed the goods needing to be weighed into the monks' carrying bags, their alms bowls, and their containers for small items. The monks collected alms and came back out of the village. After they had eaten their meal, when they passed by the weighing station, the merchants began rifling through the vessels of those monks. The monks said: "Good friends, why are you going through our vessels?" The merchants replied:

"Noble ones, we are retrieving the goods we placed in your vessels here for weighing." The monks said: "Good friends, you have deliberately caused us to incur a transgression." The merchants replied: "Noble ones, in this matter there was neither a bodily action nor a verbal action on your part — how then could you have incurred a transgression?" The monks, thinking, "Has a defeat-level transgression not arisen for us?" arose with remorse, and they eventually departed back to Śrāvastī. When the other monks there said to them, "Welcome, welcome, venerable ones! Was the journey comfortable? Were you not harassed by gamblers, highwaymen, and river-crossing brigands?" they replied: "Venerable ones, we were not harassed by those, yet remorse has arisen in us, for the merchants placed goods needing to be weighed into the carrying bags, the alms bowls, and the containers for small items of those of us who had entered upon alms-round, and without our knowing it, we passed through the weighing station — and so we wondered whether a defeat-level transgression has not arisen for us." The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no transgression for those monks. However, monks are not to leave their vessels unattended and go off carelessly — a guard monk is to be appointed."

They appointed a guard monk and went on alms-round, and on one occasion, when that guard monk went to relieve himself, to urinate, or to fetch water, the merchants at that very moment placed the goods requiring weighing into the carrying bags, the alms bowls, and the containers for small items — and they passed through the weighing station in just that way. At that point the merchants rifled through the vessels of those monks, and the monks arose with remorse and reported it to the other monks. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no transgression for those monks. However, two guard monks are to be appointed."

When a large number of monks were travelling together with merchants who had business in common, they appointed two guard monks and entered upon alms-round. Whenever one of those two went to relieve himself, to urinate, or to fetch water, the merchants would seize that one by the hands, seize him by the feet, and meanwhile the others would load goods into the vessels. That monk, knowing that he should call back those who were nearby keeping pure conduct, called them back from their rounds — and the merchants then contrived such tricks that those two guard monks would in no way be able to report the matter to the other monks. When the group passed through the weighing station, the merchants rifled through the vessels, and the monks said to them: "Good friends, why are you rifling through the vessels?" They replied: "Noble ones, we are retrieving our goods for weighing that we placed in there." The monks then said to the two guard monks: "By your being appointed here you have caused us to incur a transgression," and challenged them angrily. The two recounted the full sequence of what had occurred. Remorse arose in those monks, thinking, "Has a defeat-level transgression not arisen for us?" and they reported the matter to the other monks at that time. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, there is no transgression for those monks. However, the goods requiring weighing on the scales should be taken out by a layman or a novice and returned to those merchants. If there is no layman or novice available, one should take them out oneself, place them in front of the merchants, and say: 'These are your goods — please take note of them.'"

The Vinaya Analysis, the Fifth Fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was a householder in Śrāvastī who took a wife from among his equals in station, and with her he sported, rejoiced, and took his pleasure. As they sported, rejoiced, and took their pleasure together, a son was born to him from that wife, who nursed and nurtured him, and raised him swiftly, like a lotus growing in a pond — and so forth as before up to that point.

When he had grown up, he went forth into the well-taught Dharma and Vinaya. He went wandering through the countryside and found two large bolts of cloth. Knowing that the Blessed One had said that even one who has gone forth should provide for the needs of one's parents, he thought: "I will offer one to my father and the other to my mother." He remained in the countryside as long as he pleased, then, taking up his alms bowl and robes, set out traveling toward Śrāvastī. As he traveled along, step by step, he came to the place of the weighing scales, and the weighmaster said to him: "Noble one, do you not have some goods for weighing on the scales?" The monk replied: "Good sir, I have none." The weighmaster said: "Please let me look — do set them down." As the monk began to be examined, the weighmaster caught sight of the two large bolts of cloth and said: "Noble one, would one who has gone forth into the well-taught Dharma and Vinaya tell a lie for the sake of a mere two bolts of cloth?" The monk replied: "Good sir, these two are not mine to dispose of." "Noble one, then whose are they?" "Good sir, one belongs to my father and the other to my mother." "Noble one, since you have sought neither your father nor your mother, hand over the toll and be on your way."

The monk was detained by that weighmaster for quite some time before being released, and he eventually made his way back to Śrāvastī. Remorse arose in him, and he reported the matter at that time to the monks. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, there is no transgression for that monk. Nevertheless, a monk should not proceed in that same way. Instead, one should speak a praise of one's parents before the weighmaster, saying: 'Good sir, the Blessed One has said that a father and mother who carry their children, sustain them, raise them, suckle them at the breast, and show them the variety of Jambudvīpa — these two do what is difficult to do. Were a son to carry one parent on one shoulder and the other on the other shoulder for a full hundred years, or were he to establish himself as a lord of wealth on this great earth with all its jewels, pearls, beryl, white quartz, coral, silver, rice, the essence of stones, crystal, rubies, right-spiraling conches, and all such riches — even that would not be adequate repayment for what a son owes his father and mother, nor would it come close. But if he leads parents who have no faith into complete and perfect faith, establishes them, disciplines them, and installs them in it; if he leads those who lack moral discipline into perfect moral discipline; if he leads those who are miserly into perfect generosity;"

"if he leads those two who lack wisdom into perfect wisdom, disciplines them, and installs them in it — by that much alone does a son render what he has done and what he has done in service for his father and mother." This is what should be said.

If, when one recites such a praise of one's father and mother, they let it go, then well and good. If they do not let it go, one should go before the adjudicator. If one does not go in like manner, there will be an offense.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who took a wife from among those of equal caste. With her he sported, rejoiced, and made merry. As he sported, rejoiced, and made merry with her, a son was born to him from that wife. He nurtured him, raised him, and caused him to grow swiftly, like a lotus growing in a pond. All that preceded is as before, up to the passage that reads "he raised him swiftly, like a lotus dwelling in a pond." When that son came of age, he went forth in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya.

The Blessed One declared:

Merit is something to be done.

Where merit is not made, suffering follows.

In this world and in the world beyond, one who has made merit will rejoice.

Hearing this, the monks made a heartfelt request and began performing acts of offering to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and the teaching of the Blessed One flourished. Then a certain monk, knowing that begging from heartfelt motivation had become widespread and that these resources had been exhausted throughout Śrāvastī, thought: "I will go to the provinces and have them properly engaged there." He went to the provinces, and in those regions he had three chests filled with robes of various colors properly gathered as offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. Having stayed in those provinces as long as he wished, he took up his bowl and robes and set out, journeying back toward Śrāvastī. As he travelled along the road, he came to the place of the adjudicator. The adjudicator said: "Noble one, do you not have even a small sum for the adjudicator's weighing?" The monk replied: "Good sir, I do not." The adjudicator said: "Please wait while I inspect." As he began to examine, he saw three chests filled with robes of various colors. He said: "Noble one, these three chests filled with robes of many colors — if even a small amount of them were to come to a mare's load, then you would need to pay the adjudicator's toll." The monk said: "Good sir, I have no authority over these. Noble one, then who does have authority?" "Good sir, one belongs to the Buddha, one to the Dharma, and one to the Saṅgha. Noble one, I have not obtained them from the Buddha, nor from the Dharma, nor from the Saṅgha. Grant the toll and let me pass." The adjudicator detained that monk for a long while and then released him, and the monk eventually returned to Śrāvastī. Remorse arose in him, and he reported the matter to the monks. The monks informed the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no transgression for that monk; however, a monk should not travel in that manner. Rather, in the presence of an adjudicator one should recite the praises of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, as follows: 'The Blessed One is a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and fully awakened Buddha, endowed with knowledge and good conduct, a Sugata, a knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, the Teacher of gods and humans — the Blessed One, the Buddha.' The Dharma of the Blessed One is well proclaimed, visible to the eye, without sickness, not limited to a particular time, an invitation to come and see, bearing fruit for those who see it here and now, to be known individually by the wise, each for themselves. The Saṅgha of the śrāvakas of the Blessed One has entered well, has entered rightly, has entered directly, has entered harmoniously, has entered into the practice that accords with the Dharma, and acts in accordance with the Dharma. Within that Saṅgha there are those who have entered in order to realize directly the fruit of stream-entry, and those who have attained stream-entry; those who have entered in order to realize directly the fruit of once-returning, and those who have attained once-returning; those who have entered in order to realize directly the fruit of non-returning, and those who have attained non-returning; those who have entered in order to realize directly the fruit of arhatship, and those who have attained arhatship. Thus they are the four pairs of persons and the eight individual persons. This Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Blessed One is endowed with perfect moral discipline, endowed with perfect meditative absorption, endowed with perfect wisdom, endowed with perfect liberation, endowed with perfect knowledge and vision of liberation. It is worthy of offerings from afar, worthy of lavish offerings, worthy of joined palms in homage, worthy of reverence — the unsurpassed field of merit, the place where the world may earn merit.' If, upon reciting the praises of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha in this way, the captor releases one, that is good. If he does not release one, then one should determine the matter by casting lots, and to go otherwise would constitute a serious offense."

Some monks had begun sending items for the purpose of casting lots for the sake of the Three Jewels, and when they were at the place of lot-casting and had recited the praises of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha yet were still not released, the monks gave from the share of one among them. The Blessed One declared: "One should give equally from all three shares." When the monks were giving equally from all three shares, they became separated from their traveling companions and were set upon by lions, tigers, and bandits. The Blessed One then declared: "Give from one person's share, and afterward make up the remaining shares."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there resided a monk who was versed in the Three Baskets (Tripiṭaka), a speaker of Dharma, endowed with the confidence that comes from reasoning and liberation. When he went travelling through the regions and eventually reached Rājagṛha, he spent the rains retreat there. When the three months had passed and he set out for Śrāvastī to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, a noble one who sought a companion for the journey had just been engaged, and a caravan leader who had set out from Rājagṛha happened to arrive at Śrāvastī around the same time. That caravan leader went to the monk, recited the praises of the three bases of merit-making, organized offerings to them, and explained things this way and that in order to arouse in the monk's mind a clear and heartfelt faith. When faith arose in that man, he gave food to the monk, covered him with a fine and costly large length of cloth, prostrated at his feet from below, and said, "Noble one, please give me whatever instruction you command." The monk replied:

"Good man, I wish to go and pay homage at the feet of the Teacher in Śrāvastī. For that reason, please care for me with loving-kindness."

The householder replied, "Noble one, I shall do exactly as you command. Please proceed without hesitation."

That monk then set out together with that noble one and the caravan leader. The caravan leader said, "Noble one, you seek alms, while I seek merit. From Rājagṛha all the way to Śrāvastī, please allow me to attend to you with the least of trouble in regard to your robe, alms-food, lodging, provisions for illness, and medicinal requisites."

The monk accepted this offer. After some time, they arrived at the place of a customs post. The caravan leader's goods were assessed at the customs post, and when that caravan leader saw that his own goods had been assessed but the monk's large length of cloth had not been assessed, he realized that a situation had arisen where he alone would have to measure it through the customs post. Thinking to himself that he should put it into his own container, the caravan leader said to the monk, "Noble one, please return the large length of cloth."

The monk replied, "Good man, why do you say this? Have you come to regret your gift?"

The caravan leader replied, "Noble one, I have no regret at all. The matter is this: my own goods have been assessed at customs, but your large length of cloth has not. If the customs officers were to demand assessment of the large length of cloth, I alone would in effect have to declare it. So I shall take it back from the customs post and hand it over to you."

The monk said, "Good man, the Blessed One has set down a training rule that a monk must not remove from a customs post goods that are subject to customs assessment. If I were to incur a transgression, that would be improper, so I will not give it."

The caravan leader understood that the noble one was creating a difficulty and thought, "I shall find a moment for this." He said to the monk, "Noble one, I am busy today and cannot manage to procure even a small amount of alms for you. Please go ahead and enter the village for alms."

When the monk entered the village for alms, in the time during which he was thus occupied, the caravan leader placed that large length of cloth in his own container.

After some time, the customs officers asked the monk, "Noble one, do you have any goods subject to customs assessment?"

The monk replied, "Good man, there is one large length of cloth."

The customs officer said, "Noble one, please present it for inspection."

When the monk looked into his carrying bundle, the large length of cloth was nowhere to be found, and he turned this way and that, rubbing his two hands together.

The customs officer asked, "Noble one, why do you act like this?"

The monk replied, "Good man, the large length of cloth of mine has been stolen by those who take what is not given."

The customs officer replied, "Noble one, it was not stolen by those who take what is not given. Rather, I myself stole it. Therefore I have not obtained the customs payment."

When the monk had passed through the customs post, the caravan leader said to him, "Noble one, why are you troubled at heart? Good man, from your act of complete giving, merit has indeed arisen for you, but from the act of complete enjoyment, merit has not arisen."

"Noble one, why was my large length of cloth stolen by those who take what is not given?"

The caravan leader replied, "Noble one, it was not stolen by those who take what is not given. The matter is this: I myself, out of fear of the customs post, placed it into my own container and handed it over. In that case, what should I do? Should I declare it?" The monk replied:

"Good sir, it is indeed good that it was stolen by those who take what is not given, but it is not good that I have thereby incurred a transgression."

The caravan leader said, "Noble one, you had performed no bodily action and no verbal action in this matter — so why would you have incurred a transgression?"

That monk, having given rise to remorse, eventually departed and returned to Śrāvastī. The monks said to him, "Welcome, venerable one! Welcome! How was the journey?" That monk then recounted the matter to the monks. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, that monk has indeed incurred no transgression. Nevertheless, I shall now establish rules of proper conduct for monks who are traveling the road. A monk traveling the road who is going into a village for alms shall mark his container with a sign and proceed, and upon returning shall examine it carefully. If a monk traveling the road does not, having properly received the rules of conduct thus established, conduct himself in accordance with them, he commits a serious offense."

The Blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time two monks — one old and one young — set out to travel through a region. The old one was learned, had many goods, and many possessions. The young one was little-learned and lax regarding the three robes. Since the old monk had goods that needed to pass through a customs post, they eventually arrived at the place of the customs post. The old monk thought: "I have goods that need to pass through customs. If the customs officer asks me, 'Noble one, do you have any goods at all subject to customs duty?' and I say 'I do not,' that would be speaking a lie; but if I say 'I do,' I shall certainly be required to pay customs duty. Therefore I must find a way neither to pay customs duty nor to speak a lie." He then thought: "I will give these things to the young monk and retrieve them after passing through the customs post." So he said to the young monk, "Venerable one, hold my bowl and robe for a moment." The young monk understood that the elder would be slowed down and thought, "This way the gift to me will not be lost," and so he accepted them and carried them on ahead.

The customs officer saw him and said, "Noble one, do you have any goods at all subject to customs duty?" The monk replied, "Good sir, I do not." The customs officer paid no further attention to that monk and let him pass the customs post.

The old monk then followed behind, traveling light and unencumbered, and the customs officer did not question him at all. When the old monk had passed the customs post, he said, "Venerable one, bring the goods." The young monk replied, "Elder, what do you mean? Have you recovered from your fatigue?" The old monk said, "Venerable one, I did not give them to you out of fatigue. The matter was this: I had goods that needed to pass through customs, and I thought: if the customs officer were to ask me, 'Noble one, do you have any goods subject to customs duty?' and I were to say 'I do not,' that would be speaking a lie, but if I were to say 'I do,' I would certainly be required to pay customs duty. It was with that thought in mind that I gave you the bowl and robe. Now I have passed the customs post, so I take them back."

The young monk said, "In that case, the elder has saved himself and made this wretched one incur a transgression!"

The old monk said, "Venerable one, since you did not know, what transgression could you possibly have in this?"

That young monk, filled with remorse, eventually made his way back to Śrāvastī. The monks there said, "Welcome, venerable one, welcome! How was your journey — did you travel comfortably?" The monk replied, "What comfort was there on that journey?" The monks said, "Venerable one, why do you say that?" He then related to the monks what had happened. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk has no transgression. However, a monk who is traveling should not take goods subject to customs duty without first asking. When taking such goods, one should inquire: 'Householder, is there not even a small amount of goods here that are subject to customs duty?' If one takes them without asking, it becomes a serious offence. Furthermore, a monk must not carry goods subject to customs duty along the road. If one does so, it becomes a serious offence."

When the Blessed One had thus prohibited monks from carrying goods subject to customs duty along the road, sixty monks who were traveling through the countryside arrived at a certain mountain cliff. At that cliff there lived a householder who was wealthy, rich in possessions, and of great means, and who was also a man of faith. He invited those monks as his guests, gave them food, and draped a piece of cloth over each of them. The monks said to him, "Householder, the Blessed One has prohibited monks from carrying goods subject to customs duty along the road, and therefore we do not know how we are to accept these." The householder said nothing. The monks expressed their thanks, departed, and eventually made their way back to Śrāvastī. The other monks there asked them, "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How was your journey — did you travel comfortably?" They replied, "We traveled comfortably enough, but a certain householder gave us food and draped a piece of cloth over each of us. We said to him that the Blessed One had prohibited monks from carrying goods subject to customs duty along the road, and therefore we could not accept them — and so we did not take them."

The monks then reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "They should be accepted. Having accepted them and made proper use of them, one may carry them along the road."

"Monks, when searching for dyes, wood, copper, and pots, some monks became weary and exhausted on the road, lost their purpose, and were set upon by lions, tigers, and bandits." The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Travel in a group at the border or go as you choose." When that very problem continued, the Blessed One declared: "It is permissible to anoint oneself with pressed cow-dung or to wash with it." When that very problem still persisted, the Blessed One declared: "One may even cut the hair of the face — the beard or the moustache. What I have permitted out of necessity must not be made into habitual ordinary practice. If one makes it into habitual practice, it becomes a serious offence."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's Park. At that time a certain monk had committed to spending the rains retreat at Rājagṛha. The three months of the rains had passed and he had not obtained so much as his robe. He came to Śrāvastī solely to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, and the monks there said to him:

"Venerable one, do not go until you have obtained your robe allowance." But he was unhappy at this and did not stay. Then a certain monk gave him a large piece of cloth, thinking: "If he makes this up into a robe here, he will not be seen by the celibate practitioners, so I will have a monk who is a friend of mine make it up for him." Knowing this, he said to the monk who was his friend: "Please make up this large piece of cloth into a robe before I have had a chance to visit the celibate practitioners, and have it stitched." But that monk was a lazy fellow, and he did not make it up. He had it stitched just as it was. As soon as the monk had picked up the bundle of cloth and set off, he eventually came to a place where dice players were gathered. One of the dice players said: "Noble one, do you have a little something suitable for wagering at dice?" "No, I do not." "Let me take a look." He began to examine it, and seeing the large piece of cloth he said: "Noble one, when you have gone forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya, how can you speak a falsehood over a large piece of cloth?" The monk replied: "Good sir, I truly did not know. Noble one, when I had obtained this large piece of cloth, I said to my friend: 'While I go to visit the celibate practitioners, please make up this large piece of cloth into a robe and have it stitched.' But he was a lazy fellow and did not make it up, and I had it stitched just as it was." The dice player said: "Noble one, that is not your friend. Now this, you see, is my friend, and so give me the dice-stake you have received and go on your way." The monk was filled with remorse, and eventually he went to Śrāvastī. The monks said to him: "Venerable one, welcome, welcome. Did you travel comfortably?" He replied: "Venerable ones, I traveled comfortably." They said: "Venerable one, why do you say that?" And he then recounted the whole matter to the monks in full. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no offence for that monk, yet one must not take something without having first asked whether the other has made it up or not. If one takes it without asking, it becomes a serious offence."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's Park. The group of six monks said: "Friends, Nanda and Upananda with their black begging bowls smear their feet with monkey grease. When they go out, they go prepared to acquire gains by their going; when they come back, they acquire gains by their unexpected return, and they please and attract many people. We are like frogs in a well, going nowhere and coming from nowhere, so how could we ever acquire gains or please and attract many people? We too shall set out. Where shall we go? Wherever our common purpose is accomplished." And so they began to search for their common purpose, and seeing on the north road some travelers whose purpose was the same, they went up to them and said: "Good sirs, where are you going, noble ones?" "Noble ones, we are going north." "Good sirs, we too will travel with you." "Noble ones, the northern road is rough and uneven, frequented by dogs, and the villages along it are places where women behave lewdly at every turn, so you will not enjoy it there." "Good sirs, even so, since we will get to see that country, let us go."

"Noble ones, if that is the case, then come, let us go in." And so the group of six, sharing a common purpose, set out together along the northern road and traveled on until at last they arrived there. Yet on the very same day that they arrived on the northern road, they became displeased with it. The next morning they rose early and set out along the road, and the merchants, seeing the group of six, bowed at their feet and said: "Noble ones, how is the northern road? You have not become displeased with it, have you?" "Good sirs, on the very same day we arrived on the northern road, we became displeased with it." "Noble ones, did we not tell you from the very beginning that the northern road is rough and uneven, frequented by dogs, and a place where women behave lewdly at every turn, so that you would not enjoy it there?" "Good sirs, is it indeed so then, shall we go on?" "Noble ones, we ourselves have not changed our route. Even so, there are other merchant friends of ours who have changed their route. Entrust yourselves to them and go with them." The group of six replied: "By all means, let it be so." And so the group of six, sharing a common purpose, set out together with those to whom they had been entrusted.

Now the group of six, in going about, would sometimes walk ahead of their companions out of fear of the dust, and sometimes behind them. When they began walking behind, some companions who were returning from the central region arrived, and the merchants welcomed those returning companions warmly, greeting them with joy one by one, and asked: "Where have you come from?" "From the central region." "Wise ones, were many profits obtained in the central region? Were you not ruined entirely by gamblers, thieves, or boatmen?" They replied: "Wise ones, indeed many profits were obtained in the central region. However, there were dishonest people there who, like white-robed robbers, were settled in the region, living by the patronage of gamblers, thieves, and boatmen, displeasing folk with falsehoods and stripping everyone of all their goods, so that ruin by gamblers, thieves, and boatmen did indeed occur."

Upon hearing this, the merchants were stricken with anguish, and going off to one side, they rested there with their arms folded, lost in troubled thought. The group of six arrived and said to them: "Wise ones, why are you sitting there with your arms folded, lost in troubled thought?" The merchants replied: "Noble ones, we set out eagerly, making every effort and exertion in order to acquire goods, enduring cold when it was cold, scorched by heat when it was hot, afflicted by hunger and thirst, and imperiled by the touch of horseflies, insects, wind, sun, and venomous snakes. We have indeed traveled to the central region, noble ones, and many profits have indeed been obtained there. Yet from our companions who are returning, we have heard that there are dishonest people settled there, like white-robed robbers, who live by the patronage of gamblers, thieves, and boatmen and who, displeasing folk with falsehoods, strip everyone of all their goods — and so we shall be ruined by gamblers, thieves, and boatmen."

The group of six said: "Good sirs, do those you regard as your friends also sit thus, lost in troubled thought?" "Noble ones, what of it? Will you petition the king on our behalf?" "Good sirs, we will not petition the king. But Śrāvastī has a gaming supervisor, and its gates are forty-eight —"

"There are thirty-six windows, so have your people enter through the windows and enjoy themselves — off you go."

The merchants were thoroughly pleased, and they went with the noble ones to a rocky outcrop not far from Śrāvastī. The group of six said: "Good friends, rest here for a while, and enter Śrāvastī by night. Release the mares, the oxen, and the donkeys." The merchants let them go, and rested a while, waiting for the time when the sun would set. They heard word that from the northern road a well-matched and splendid caravan was coming. They therefore made an offering cake to the yakṣas, pressed shut the gates, and remained where they were. The group of six said: "Wise ones, take your fill with your eyes open and go — we shall see to it that you enter comfortably through the windows without anyone knowing." They set off, and presently loaded up the donkeys, the mares, and the oxen, entered Śrāvastī through the windows, and by dawn had gone to the market street, spread out the northern traders' wares, and begun to sell them.

A certain man who had been separated from that same well-matched caravan entered through the gate, and the gamblers saw him and said: "Hey, friend, where have you come from?" The man said: "From a great rocky outcrop." They said: "Hey, friend, we have heard there is a northern traders' caravan at that rocky outcrop — did you not see it?" The man said: "Wise ones, I myself was with that caravan but then parted from it and came on; it had already gone ahead." When the gamblers heard this they became uneasy and said: "Hey, friend, we were holding the gates shut — how did it get in?" The man said: "Wise ones, if you do not believe me, come along to the market street and you will see for yourselves." They went to the market street together with him, and seeing the associates of the caravan spreading out the northern traders' wares and selling them, the gamblers asked: "Wise ones, how did you enter?" The associates said: "On foot." The gamblers said: "We know well enough how you entered on foot. Tell us exactly how you were let in and through which gate you entered, and we shall be friends with you." They said: "The noble ones of the group of six had us enter through the windows."

The gamblers then thought: "These group of six are unworthy monastics — we should feel contempt for them." And so they began to revile them, to mock them, and to speak ill of them, saying: "The conduct of the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya is scorched away, the conduct of brahmins is scorched away — and now they even harm the livelihoods of others."

At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "A monk must not harm the livelihoods of others. If he does so, he shall be guilty of a serious offence."

The gamblers, thinking "These group of six are unworthy monastics and should be put to shame," waited for an opportunity; and in time it happened that the venerable Upananda, having dressed in his inner robe in the morning and taken up his bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms. A gambler saw him and said: "Noble one, I pay homage to you. Is there anything in your bowl? Please look." Upananda said: "Good sir, why do you ask? There is nothing in the bowl for gambling." The gambler said: "Noble one, may the wrong be appeased. I do not think that — but if there were a little cooked food and solid provisions in the bowl, I would take it from you and request it for myself." Upananda said: "Good sir, does a river run backwards against its current?"

"It is you who should give to me; it is not I who should give to you." The gambler said: "Noble one, I am amused." He called Upananda into his home, and filled the bowl with cooked food and solid provisions that had been prepared, and gave it to him. He said: "Noble one, please instruct me, and I will act according to your instruction and carry out everything the noble one commands." Upananda said with a pleasant expression: "May you be free from illness," and departed.

Now, the customary practice of the Group of Six was this: "Here we shall teach Dharma to the brahmins and householders who come and gather, refute opponents, proclaim our own fame, and also acquire gain." So they would take up their position either at a doorway or beside a road near a temple. And Upananda, having taken up his position beside the road near the temple, remained there engaged in the practice of not sleeping during the first and last watches of the night.

Then at another time some gambling merchants were passing not far from the temple, and Upananda, who was skilled in sounds, heard the sound of their footsteps approaching and stirred, and said: "Who are these people passing by?" The merchants remained silent. Upananda swiftly descended from the top of the temple, went to those merchants, and said: "Good sirs, who would be travelling at night with all their goods?" Those merchants replied: "Noble one, we are merchants who are gamblers." Upananda said: "Poor fellows! The king resides with us, provided with all his requisites. Even the elder Kauṇḍinya praises him, saying: 'May what has not come to this king come to be; may what has come grow, increase, and become abundant.' If you are going while rolling dice under his authority, why should we let it simply slip away? Today I shall have harm brought upon you." They were frightened and said: "Noble one, you are compassionate — please be forbearing, and we will provide whatever the noble one needs." Upananda said: "What will you do? Offer the price of the lodging." "Shall we offer it? We will offer it right now." They then departed from Upananda's presence, and went about saying: "Even King Prasenajit, who has arisen in the land of Kosala, does not get dice played against him — so what need is there to speak of the monk Upananda being paid off with a touch of the head?" Upananda also quickly finished his meal, and from the doorway began to wash his bowl and looked about in all four directions. A young man saw Upananda looking in all four directions and said: "Elder, why do you look about in all directions?" Upananda said: "Venerable sir, I am looking for those merchant friends of mine who entered Śrāvastī carrying their packs." The young man said: "Elder, they left just as long as it took you to finish your meal." Upananda grew indignant and thought: "I too have been deceived by them — I shall strike a knife with my fist and pound grass into the stone of my own loom, for I know what to do to them." When those merchants arrived again as before, Upananda caught them in that very same way a second time and said: "You have deceived me again," and the merchants replied —

"Venerable sir, some business came up for us, and that is why we left without taking our leave. Now we will offer you everything — that and more besides."

"You will offer it?"

"Yes, we will offer it."

That very day they departed from there and left the presence of Upananda, and they spread the saying everywhere: "If one would not even pay dice debts to King Prasenajit (Skt. prasenajit), who rules over Kosala, why say anything at all about paying a shaven-headed śramaṇa — a companion of Upananda?"

Upananda thought: "Those merchants have made me many promises, yet they have gone again without so much as a glance in my direction. That is not fitting. I shall rise still in the night and go to them." So he arranged his patched robe and went out into the street. The merchants had spread out their wares and were selling them, and when Upananda began to show them the mark, they said: "Venerable sir, please wait while we finish a transaction, and then we will come and pay you." Upananda said: "Very well, if you mean it." They replied: "Venerable sir, you need have no quarrel with us — please go." Upananda left and went quickly, very quickly, to the monastery, took his meal, washed his bowl, and began to look about in all directions. A young man said to him: "Elder, why do you keep looking all around?" Upananda replied: "Friend, I am looking for those merchant friends of mine who entered Śrāvastī carrying their packs." The young man said: "Elder, they left just as long as it took you to finish your meal." Upananda became greatly enraged, and scratching his head he thought: "I have now been deceived by them a second time. If I meet them again, I will introduce a rule of such a kind that they will never again be able to trade as merchants." However long it was, those merchants came again just as before, and Upananda said: "Wise ones, you have deceived me again and again. Now see what is to come." They replied: "Venerable sir, please be patient. We merchants are always distracted by the business of weighing and trading. We ask your forgiveness for what we promised before, and we will now offer all of that, whatever we promised before and whatever we promised since — every bit of it." Upananda, knowing that if he tried to press them into a corner they would understand and he should speak in a conciliatory way, said having understood and recognized this: "Good friends, will you truly offer it?"

"Venerable sir, we will truly offer it."

"If that is so, has any harm come to you? And as for us — would it not be bad if we were established near the monastery as merchants who are not considered merchants? So for now, stay here watching the road for as long as it takes." While they were staying there, Upananda went to where the dice players were.

At that time the dice players were saying among themselves: "Friends, the dice-cheating merchants are cheating at dice and slipping through the window, so that the tax revenues are not being collected, and the time has come. The king is fierce, and there is a situation such that he will have us — our sons, wives, and relatives — thrown into prison and put to death," and they sat there with deep anguish in their hearts.

Seeing them sitting thus in deep anguish, Upananda asked: "Why are you sitting there like that, with such anguish in your hearts?"

"Venerable sir, how could we not be in anguish? Those dice-cheating merchants are cheating at dice and slipping through the window, so that the tax revenues are not being collected, and the time has come. The king is fierce, and there is a situation such that he will have us — our sons, wives, and relatives — thrown into prison and put to death. Such is our situation."

"You wretches, who put you in charge of the dice hall? You deserve to be given many lashes or sent to be broken on the rack."

"Why do you not strip every last coin from even a single one of these dice-cheating merchants?"

"Venerable sir, Śrāvastī possesses the dice of omniscience, not the dice of wrongdoing. How then can we strip them of all their wealth?"

"You wretches! Śrāvastī has the dice of wrongdoing, not the dice of omniscience." Then he said: "Venerable sir, for as long as we have been working at dice, there was never a time when we had the dice of wrongdoing — how then would we have them now? You stay here, wretches, and I will go and have the dice-cheating merchants sent over. You seize them and strip them of all their wealth."

"If it is said that Śrāvastī has the dice of omniscience but not the dice of wrongdoing, then reply: 'Śrāvastī has the dice of wrongdoing, not the dice of omniscience.' If they say, 'For as long as we merchants have been in business, there was never a time when Śrāvastī had the dice of wrongdoing — how then would it have them now? Come, let us go before the merchants' assembly,' then drag them off to the royal palace. And if the king says, 'O wise ones, for as long as you have let Śrāvastī operate under my royal governance, there was never a time that I heard of Śrāvastī having the dice of wrongdoing — how then would it have them now?' then reply: 'Your Majesty, King Arada Brahmadata, together with the merchants' assembly — whoever enters Śrāvastī from a pleasure grove, an assembly hall, or a great divine dwelling: that person has the dice of omniscience; and whoever enters Śrāvastī from a pleasure grove, an assembly hall, or a great divine dwelling: that person has the dice of wrongdoing. Ask the king whether this ordinance that has been established stands firm.' If he says it does stand firm, then say: 'Your Majesty, in a great treasury there is a box, and in that box is a copper tablet with writing on it — please examine it, Your Majesty.'"

When the dice-keepers had seized the dice-cheating merchants and stripped them of all their wealth, those merchants said: "Wise ones, why do you strip us of all our wealth? Śrāvastī has the dice of omniscience, not the dice of wrongdoing."

The dice-keepers replied: "Śrāvastī has the dice of wrongdoing, not the dice of omniscience."

The merchants said: "For as long as we merchants have been in business, there was never a time when Śrāvastī had the dice of wrongdoing — how then would it have them now? Come, let us go before the merchants' assembly."

The dice-keepers said: "Do not go to the merchants' assembly — come this way. We are going to the royal palace." And with that they dragged them off to the royal palace by force, despite their resistance. The merchants raised a cry to the merchants' assembly: "Wise ones, the dice-keepers have stripped us of all our wealth — come to our aid!" The merchants' assembly also went together with them before the king's presence and said: "Your Majesty, in your kingdom the dice-keepers have stripped merchants who have newly arrived of all their wealth — we beg you to grant them full protection."

The king commanded his ministers: "Wise ones, summon the dice-keepers." The ministers summoned the dice-keepers, and the king said:

"Wise ones, why have you stripped these merchants of all their wealth?" The dice-keepers replied: "Your Majesty, these merchants are cheats at dice, and Śrāvastī is known as a city where dishonest dice-players operate — for that reason we stripped them of all their wealth." The king said: "Wise ones, for as long as I have ruled my kingdom, I have never once heard that Śrāvastī harbors dishonest dice-players. Has it now become a city of dishonest dice-players? Acquire proper dice, and let them go." The dice-keepers replied: "Your Majesty, in the great treasury there is a chest, and in that chest there is a copper plate with an inscription upon it — may Your Majesty be pleased to examine it." The king commanded his attendants: "Bring that copper plate," and when it was brought and read aloud, the king heard his father's praises and spoke with a voice full of tears: "Wise ones, what my father did was done by Śakra (Indra), done by Brahmā — it is supremely authoritative. If they have been stripped of all their wealth, that is well."

The merchants, having lost all hope, went away with voices full of tears, and they said to the dice-keepers: "Wise ones, tell us — who reported on us?" The dice-keepers replied: "Who would report on you? We knew it ourselves — but out of compassion we let it pass. It is because you yourselves began to behave in a most outrageous manner that we lost our patience." The merchants said: "How can you claim to have had compassion? Tell us, and we will become friends with you." The dice-keepers replied: "It was the group of six noble ones." The merchants then began to abuse the renunciants who were sons of the Śākya, saying: "The conduct of these renunciants, sons of the Śākyans, is burned away. The conduct of brahmins is burned away. One such as this even harms the livelihoods of others" — reviling them, spreading slander, and gossiping about them. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "A monk must not harm the livelihood of others. If he does so, he is guilty of a serious offence."

Summary verse:

Those without feet, those with two feet, those with four feet, and those with many feet — all these classes are here collected.

"Those without feet" refers to snakes, leeches, and vermicular creatures. These are made use of for subsistence by three kinds of people: snake-charmers, royal physicians, and those who practice cupping. How do snake-charmers do so? Snake-charmers make their living in dependence on snakes — that is how snake-charmers do so. How do royal physicians do so? Royal physicians make their living in dependence on leeches — that is how royal physicians do so. How do those who practice cupping do so?

Those who practice cupping do so in the following way: they cause the worm-creatures to emerge, drawing them out and applying them to the surface of swollen flesh, and the worm-creatures become intoxicated and inebriate, drinking various kinds of intoxicating liquids. That is how those who practice cupping do so.

If a monk steals footless creatures, the value of the footless creatures is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression.

"Those with two feet" refers to humans and certain birds. Humans steal by three means: by location, by signal, and by sign. How is it done by location? When someone says: "When I am seen in the park, or in the assembly hall, or at such-and-such a divine shrine, know at that moment that you have done the deed" — that is how it is done by location. How is it done by signal? When someone says: "When I am seen in the morning, or at midday, or in the late afternoon, know at that moment that you have done the deed" — that is how it is done by signal. How is it done by sign? When someone says: "When you see me having had my hair and beard newly trimmed, or wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe, or carrying a bowl covered with a beeswax-leaf wrapping, or a hollow-handled bowl, or a bowl of melted butter, or a bowl of oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl with a lid of molasses — know at that moment that you have done the deed" — that is how it is done by sign.

If a monk steals a human being, the value of the human is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression.

Birds steal by two means: by entrapment and by coming into the open. How is it by entrapment? If a monk steals a bird by trapping it, the value of the bird is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression. That is how it is by entrapment.

How is it by coming into the open? When a trainer of birds, or a skilled student of such a trainer, sets fire to a forest in order to flush the birds out, to spoil their feeding grounds, or to cause them distress by improper means, and some birds, overcome and bewildered by the smoke, come to roost on the walking grounds of the monks, or in the courtyards, or in the gatehouse — if a monk then steals birds that have come in this way, the value of the birds is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression. That is how it is by coming into the open.

This is the Vinaya Analysis (Skt. Vibhaṅga), the sixth section.

"Those with four feet" refers to elephants, horses, mules, cattle, donkeys, goats, deer, buffalo, and pigs. These are stolen by two means: by luring from the herd and by prodding. How is it by luring from the herd? If a monk steals an elephant by luring it from the herd, for as long as it remains visible a serious transgression accrues; when it passes out of sight, it is declared stolen — the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression. That is how it is by luring from the herd.

How is it by prodding? If a monk prods an elephant, driving it against various trees, shrubs, walls, or other objects, for as long as it remains visible a serious transgression accrues; when it passes out of sight, it is declared stolen — the value is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression. That is how it is by prodding.

Just as it is with elephants, so too it is the same with horses and other remaining four-footed animals.

Now, "many-legged creatures" refers to ants, flat insects, sesame worms, caterpillars, carrion-eaters, scorpions, beetles, and crawling insects. These are used in three ways: by brigands, by those belonging to the great frontier-guard of cities, and by sea-merchants.

How do brigands use them? Brigands fill jars with many-legged creatures, leaving the lids off, and set them down. When they cut and sever whoever they wish to harm, they insert that person's foot or hand into those jars. When the creatures seize hold of the limb, they quickly pull it away, causing numerous deep wounds. That is how brigands do it.

How do those belonging to the great frontier-guard of cities use them? Those belonging to the great frontier-guard of cities fill jars with many-legged creatures, leaving the lids off, and set them down. When an enemy army approaches, they engage them in battle. If they are able to defeat the enemy, well and good. If they are not able, they hurl jars filled with many-legged creatures, with the lids left off, at the fence line; and when the creatures seize hold of the enemy troops, they scatter and flee. That is how those belonging to the great frontier-guard of cities do it.

How do sea-merchants use them? Sea-merchants fill jars with many-legged creatures, leaving the lids off. When they outfit sea-vessels and set out across the great ocean to seek wealth, and pirates bearing blue or black insignia come and attack their ships, the merchants engage those pirates in battle. If they are able to defeat them, well and good. If they are not able, they hurl the jars filled with many-legged creatures, with the lids left off; and when the creatures seize hold of the pirates, those pirates scatter and flee. That is how sea-merchants do it.

If a monk steals many-legged creatures, the value of the many-legged creatures is to be assessed, and if the full threshold is met, it is a defeat; if the full threshold is not met, it is a serious transgression.

A summary verse:

An outcast and one with mange,
a patched robe, for a while a time, given by fine features and by wealth, knowing it to be one's own, one takes the bowl.
Undeclared, concealed by a companion —
one who is self-shaming is indeed a thief.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two monks who were friends, companions, associates, and frequent companions — one known as the outcast and one known as the mangy one. The outcast was renowned and of great merit, but small of body. He had extra alms-bowls, robes, a net, a cup, and a belt. The mangy one was large of body, but of little renown and little merit. He made do with the three robes, yet those three robes of his were shabby, and the patched robe in particular was thoroughly worn out.

The monks said to the mangy one: "Venerable sir, if you have come to have few desires, why do you display yourself naked? Is it because you have obtained something, or because you have not obtained something?" The mangy one replied: "It is because I have not obtained something."

"Why do you not make use of them? You have abandoned the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. Who then will give to you?" The mangy monk said: "You are his intimate companion, his constant visitor, his close friend, one who exchanges courtesies with him. He has extra alms-bowls, robes, a net, a cup, and a belt — why do you not ask him for them?" The mangy one replied: "He will not give them." "Have you ever asked him even once before?" "I have never asked him even once." "Are you going to remove your sandals merely at the sound of water? Go and ask — he will give them."

Encouraged by the monks, the mangy one went to the renowned monk's dwelling. Finding him absent, the mangy one thought: "The renowned monk is small of body, so I should measure this patched robe of his. If it fits my body, I will ask for it; if it does not fit, why should I put him in a position of owing me a debt of gratitude?" Thinking thus, the mangy one entered the renowned monk's cell and began to examine the patched robe. He saw that on the collar of the robe there was a red-and-yellow patched piece, and he took it, put it on, and stood adjusting it, checking side after side. At that moment the renowned monk arrived, and the instant he saw him he said: "Venerable sir, you have taken that patched piece with a mind to steal." The mangy one replied: "Venerable sir, I did not take it with a mind to steal. It was like this: since the renowned monk is small of body, I wished to measure his robe — thinking that if it fit my body I would ask for it, and if it did not fit, I thought: what use is this article to me?" The renowned monk said: "Venerable sir, why do you shift from one thing to another? You took it with a mind to steal, and so a defeat has occurred for you." The mangy one then felt remorse, thinking: "Has a defeat perhaps occurred for me?" And he reported the matter to the monks of that occasion. The monks informed the Blessed One, and the Buddha, the Blessed One, questioned that monk: "Monk, with what intention did you take that patched robe?" The mangy one reported to the Blessed One what had happened, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, for this monk whose intention was to examine and assess, there is no transgression. Nevertheless, a monk should not generate trust toward one in whom trust is not warranted. Friends, you see, are of three kinds: lesser, middling, and great. Toward a lesser friend one may place a small degree of trust, but not middling trust and not great trust. Toward a middling friend one may place small and middling trust, but not great trust. Toward a great friend one may place small, middling, and great trust. If a monk generates trust toward one in whom trust is not warranted, he incurs an offense."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two monks — intimate companions, constant visitors, close friends, who exchanged courtesies equally — named Sudarśana and Dhanadata. The alms-bowl of Sudarśana was beautiful, clear, round, and serviceable, and the alms-bowl of Dhanadata, though small, was also beautiful, clear, round, and serviceable. On a certain other occasion the two of them had finished the business of eating and

When they had finished washing their bowls, Sudarśana placed Dhanadata's small bowl inside his own bowl and said, "Venerable Dhanadata, one who possesses bowls like this — a bowl and a small bowl — practises the wholesome with a heart that is content with little." Dhanadata replied, "If you want it, take it." After some time had passed, a small piece of work came up for Dhanadata at a rocky cliff, and he said, "Venerable Sudarśana, a small piece of work has come up for me at a rocky cliff. For whoever does that work for me, I will give the small bowl." Sudarśana asked, "Will you give it?" "I will give it." "That is a bargain." But then, having said "That is a bargain," Sudarśana thought to himself, "On account of this, those who lead the holy life will say that Sudarśana works for wages," and so remorse arose in him and he did not go.

After some further time had passed, some work of his own came up for Sudarśana at that same rocky cliff. He thought, "I will go and do both tasks and come back," so Sudarśana went, did both tasks, and returned. He then said, "Venerable Dhanadata, I have accomplished your work; now give me the small bowl." Dhanadata replied, "You went for your own work, not for mine, so I will not give it." Sudarśana said, "If you will not give it, I will take it myself. See if you can stop me." Then, while Dhanadata had gone out, Sudarśana took the small bowl, placed it inside his own bowl, and set it down. When Dhanadata returned and the small bowl was not to be seen, he said, "Venerable Sudarśana, who has taken my small bowl?" Sudarśana replied, "Who had the power? I had the power — I took it." Dhanadata was displeased and said, "You have taken it with a thieving intention, and so a defeat-level offense has arisen for you." Sudarśana became remorseful, thinking, "Has a defeat-level offense truly arisen for me?" He then reported the matter to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Buddha, the Blessed One, questioned Sudarśana: "Monk, with what intention did you take that small bowl?" Sudarśana reported to the Blessed One exactly what had occurred, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, when a monk takes a small bowl understanding it as his own, in this case there is no offense. Furthermore, a monk should not work for wages; rather, let him work with open-handedness or with the wish to gain merit. If a monk works for wages, it becomes a serious matter."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two monks — constant companions who spoke freely together — named Ajita and Candragarbha (Śaśigarbha). Candragarbha was of great renown and great merit; he had extra bowls, robes, a net, a bowl-bag, and a waist-cloth. Ajita was of little renown and little merit; he made do with just the three robes, and those three robes were poor and his patched outer robe was entirely worn out. The monks said to Ajita, "Venerable, if you wish to have few desires, why do you expose yourself in this way? Is it because you have received something, or because you have not received anything?" Ajita replied, "It is because I have not received anything." "Then why do you not put yourself forward? Having abandoned the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, who will give to you?" "Monk Candragarbha — he is your companion who speaks freely with you.

goes freely." "He is your companion, your close friend, and there is a bond of mutual speech. If he has a spare alms bowl, a robe, a sitting cloth, a small bowl, or a belt, why do you not ask him for them?" Ajita said, "He will not give." "Have you ever asked him even once before?" "I have not asked even once." "Then why do you take off your sandals when you hear the sound of water? Go and ask him, and he will give."

The monks thus encouraged Ajita, and he went to Candragarbha's dwelling and said, "Venerable Candragarbha, give me an alms bowl." Candragarbha replied, "I will not give." Ajita said, "If you will not give an alms bowl, then give me a robe." Candragarbha replied, "Do you think I see you as a worthy lay donor to whom I should bow my head? If I will not even give you a word of greeting, how much less need there be any question of a robe." Ajita became annoyed and thought to himself, "If I am always the first to attend to all his immediate needs, yet he says, 'I will not even give you a word of greeting, so how much less a robe,' then if today I do not steal all his robes, I shall not be worthy of the name Ajita." And so Ajita stayed there watching for an opportunity, always keeping this plan in mind, intent on stealing Candragarbha's robes at some moment.

Then at a certain time, Candragarbha came to be engaged in the tasks of cooking and attending to the fire, and Ajita went to Candragarbha's side and said, "Venerable Candragarbha, I too will help." Candragarbha said, "Very well, do so then." Ajita began to turn over, dust off, shake out, and inspect Candragarbha's robes one after another. Candragarbha thought, "Watching him in this way, turning over and carefully inspecting my robes again and again, he will surely steal my robes." With this suspicion, Candragarbha turned his robes inside out, stuffed them into a bundle, placed them in his own sleeping place, and lay down on them.

The monks, not sleeping during the first or last watches of the night, were engaged in the practice of diligent striving, and Ajita called out, "Venerable Candragarbha, come here. Go and do your wholesome practice." Candragarbha said, "You go; I am tired and will come later." Ajita said, "Venerable, please come," and left the room. Candragarbha thought, "If I go, my robes will be ruined. But if I do not go, my wholesome practice will be entirely lost. What is the means by which my robes will not be ruined and my wholesome practice will not be lost either?" Thinking and reasoning this through, he placed his own bundle in Ajita's sleeping place, and placed the bundle that Ajita had control of in his own sleeping place, and lay down.

When the monks began reciting in the latter watch of the night, Candragarbha said to Ajita, "Venerable Ajita, get up and do your wholesome practice." Ajita said, "I have already done my wholesome practice. Now you go and do your wholesome practice. I am tired, tired, and I am resting," and so Candragarbha went off for the sake of his wholesome practice. Ajita waited a while and thought to himself whether it was yet the right time or not, and seeing that the moment was good, he took his own bundle from Candragarbha's sleeping place and left.

When dawn broke and night had become day, Ajita thought, "Let me look and see what kind of robes have made me guilty, and what transgression has arisen."

When he saw his own worn and tattered robes, he became distressed and thought: "It is only my own robe that has made me guilty of a defeat. What use is there in taking on an iron ball to swallow? I should return to lay life." And so he went before the Blessed One, thinking: "If I have the fortune, I will practice the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One. But if I have no such fortune, I will return to lay life." With that thought, he went to where the Blessed One was. At that time, the Blessed One was seated before a retinue of many hundreds of monks, teaching the Dharma. The Blessed One caught sight of the venerable Ajita while he was still far in the distance. Having seen him, the Blessed One said to the monks: "Monks, do you see that monk coming from far away?" "Venerable one, we see him." "Monks, this Ajita, free of delusion, has incurred a serious transgression on account of his own worn and tattered robe. Monks, since there are these and other faults of a theft-motivated mind, a monk must not take even his own alms-bowl or robe with a theft-motivated mind. If a monk takes his own alms-bowl or robe with a theft-motivated mind, it becomes a serious transgression."

Summary verse: A patchwork robe left hanging, begging grain and butter for a wager, a householder's son and grandson, a child of the divine servant Pilinda.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two nuns: one born in the east and one born in the south. The one born in the east was a nun who walked ahead; the one born in the south was a nun who followed behind. The two of them paid homage at the feet of the Blessed One, approached his presence, bowed their heads to the Blessed One's two feet, and stood to one side. The Blessed One taught them the Dharma. They paid homage at the Blessed One's feet and departed. As they walked, the patchwork robe worn over the shoulder of the one born in the east, who was walking ahead, slipped and fell loose. The one born in the south, who was coming behind, called out: "Noble one! Avasaṭṭha! Avasaṭṭha!" But the one born in the east, carried away by the momentum of the Dharma teaching, did not notice, and the patchwork robe fell to the ground. The one born in the south picked it up, and thinking: "If I give it to her right now, the noble one will lose the merit of her wholesome state," she went to the assembly hall to give it to her there. When the two of them arrived at the assembly hall, the one born in the east, quickly and without delay, washed her two feet outside the assembly hall, entered, and sat down in a half-crossed posture. The one born in the south thought: "If I give it to her now, that very fault will be incurred," and so she resolved to give it to her a little later when she rose. She carried the patchwork robe to her own cell and placed it on the robe-rack.

On another day when night had turned to dawn, the one born in the east said: "Young woman, bring the patchwork robe — let us go for alms." The young attendant entered the cell, looked at the robe-rack, and not seeing the patchwork robe, said: "Noble one, the patchwork robe is not here." The one born in the east said: "Look in the cell of the one born in the south." When the attendant entered the cell of the one born in the south, she saw the patchwork robe placed on the robe-rack. Seeing it, she thought: "Who has brought the noble one's patchwork robe here?" The one born in the south, hearing this, said: "I brought it here." For the one born in the south had come to understand how things had come to pass.

That nun scolded her with hostility and said: "You placed it in your own cell with the intention to steal it, and by keeping it there a defeat has come upon you." The nun born in the south then felt remorse, thinking: "Has a defeat truly come upon me as well?" She reported the matter at that time to the nuns, the nuns reported it to the monks, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. The Buddha, the Blessed One, questioned that nun: "Nun, what did you mean when you said 'avasatha'?" She replied: "Venerable one, in the central land, a storehouse — and whatever fallen article there is — we call 'avasatha.'" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, this nun incurs no transgression by virtue of a term specific to language, a term specific to region, and a term specific to locality. However, every fault that has arisen came about through keeping another's fallen article for a long time. Therefore, neither a monk nor a nun should keep another's fallen article for a long time; if kept, it becomes a serious offence." After the Blessed One had declared that a monk or nun should not keep another's fallen article for a long time, there was a monk who saw a fallen article belonging to someone else, recognized it as belonging to a certain senior monk, went to that monk's cell, and knocked gently at the door, knock after knock. That monk, rising from meditative absorption, said: "Who is there?" The other said: "Venerable one, I have found this fallen article of yours — please take it." The monk replied: "It would be preferable for me to have been robbed of that article by those who take without being given. But disturbing me from such a fine sign of meditative absorption — that is not acceptable." That monk then felt remorse, thinking: "Have I incurred a transgression by disturbing a monk from meditative absorption?" He reported the matter to the monks, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk incurs no transgression. Furthermore, when a monk wishes to return an article on that account, he should hang it in plain sight before him on a peg and leave it there." There was then a monk who saw a fallen article belonging to someone else, recognized it as belonging to a certain senior monk, took it, went to that monk, and said: "Venerable one, I have found this fallen article of yours — please take it." That monk, being hostile toward him, said: "Venerable one, it is not that you found a fallen article — rather, you stole it with the intention to steal." That monk then felt remorse, thinking: "Have I incurred a transgression?" He reported the matter to the monks at that time, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk incurs no transgression. However, when a monk sees a fallen article belonging to a fellow monk, he should entrust it to the rector (Sanskrit: karma-kāraka), and the rector should make it known within the Saṅgha for two or three days. If the owner is identified, it should be given to him. If not, the Saṅgha may do with it as seems fit."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At Śrāvastī there was a nun named Rimā, an arhat who had conquered — she had conquered all that is to be conquered. A young spice-merchant's son conceived deep faith in her, prostrated at her feet, and said: "Noble Lady, whatever you might need, please command me and I shall accomplish it all." He offered her every requisite, and she accepted, saying: "Young man, very well, so be it."

Now at some later time the nun Rimā fell ill and was unable to go on alms-round, while the other nuns set out on their rounds. The young spice-merchant bowed to those nuns and asked: "Noble Ladies, the noble Rimā is not to be seen just now — where has she gone?" They replied: "Young man, she is unwell." He said: "Noble Ladies, I have supplied her with every requisite, and yet she has not sent me a single word in return. Should there be anything at all she needs, please let her know she should send word." They said: "Young man, very well, so be it," and departed.

He made that same offer three times over. Meanwhile a certain young woman noticed that this spice-merchant's son kept offering and offering again, and she thought: "Is he doing this out of pure faith, or is he doing it with ulterior motives — trying to seduce her? I should find out." She therefore brought him a small bowl and said to him: "Noble Rimā needs sesame oil." He at once pressed fresh sesame oil on the spot, filled the small bowl, gave it to her, and said: "Noble Lady, should she need anything more, please let her know she should send word." The young woman replied: "Young man, very well, so be it," and went away.

Then she used that sesame oil to massage the nun Rimā's hands, to massage her feet, and to massage her head and body, and she also used it as lamp oil.

Now at some later time the nun Rimā recovered from her illness and set out on alms-round. The young spice-merchant saw her, prostrated, and said: "Noble Lady, it is such a long time since I have seen you." She replied: "Son, I was ill." He continued: "Noble Lady, I supplied you with every requisite, and yet you did not send me so much as a single word in return. But then a certain noble lady came and said, 'The noble Rimā needs sesame oil,' and I immediately pressed fresh sesame oil on the spot, filled a small bowl, and gave it to her. She also told me that should you need anything more, please send word." The nun Rimā said: "Ārya, you have done no wrong," and she went on her way, completed her alms-round, returned to her dwelling, and said to the young woman: "Young woman, did you accept sesame oil just once from that great spice-merchant's son, doing so in my name?" The young woman replied: "Noble Lady, when I went on alms-round, he said to me three times: 'I have supplied the noble Rimā with every requisite, and she has not sent me a single word in return — should the noble Lady need anything, please let her know to send word.' When he kept offering again and again, the thought arose in me: is he doing this out of genuine faith, or is he doing it with ulterior motives — trying to seduce her? I want to find out. So I told him, 'The noble Rimā needs sesame oil,' and gave him a small bowl. He took the bowl, filled it with sesame oil, and gave it to me, and I used it to massage the noble Lady's hands, feet, head, and body, and as lamp oil." The nun Rimā asked: "Did she say that I had sent you to fetch sesame oil from him as repayment for some occasion? Did she instruct you to bring it back in exchange for something?" "She gave no such instruction whatsoever." Then another nun, one who had companions, said: "Noble Lady, do you suppose this amounts to something?"

This had spread the word about the noble Rimā throughout all of Śrāvastī, and those guilty of a defeat were living off her. The nun in question then felt remorse, thinking, "Has a transgression entailing defeat arisen for me?" She thereupon reported the matter to the nuns, the nuns reported it to the monks, and the monks brought it before the Blessed One. The Buddha, the Blessed One, asked that nun: "With what intention did you take the sesame oil?" "With the intention of nursing someone who was ill, Blessed One." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no transgression for this nun, since she acted with the intention of nursing the sick. Furthermore, monks and nuns should not administer medicine to a sick person without first asking that person. Rather, they should either obtain it from the Saṅgha's infirmary, or else ask the sick person what medicine they wish to be given — whether it be from a devoted donor, from a relative, or even from many relatives — and then obtain it from whatever source the person names. If a monk or nun administers medicine to a sick person without first asking, it becomes an offense involving a misdeed."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, in the morning, dressed himself, took up his bowl and robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Going along from house to house, he came to the place where the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's house stood. At that time the sons of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada were reading texts of the non-Buddhists. The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana saw the sons of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada reading these non-Buddhist texts. Having seen this, he said to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada: "Householder, what are the boys reading?" "Noble one, they are reading non-Buddhist texts." "Householder, non-Buddhist texts are like iron thorns — they are difficult to understand, and even if understood they do not lead to certainty, nor do they bring about the exhaustion of defilements. The word of the Buddha, however, is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good at the end — it leads to higher knowledge, to complete awakening, and to passing beyond sorrow. Why do they not read that instead?" "Noble one, who would permit them to read it?" "I will have them read it." "Noble one, please do graciously allow them to read it." The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to the boys: "Boys, go today to the noble one at the Jeta Grove and read the word of the Buddha." Each day the boys adorned themselves with ornaments and, surrounded by a retinue of attendants, went to the Jeta Grove and began to read the word of the Buddha with the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana.

Now in Śrāvastī there were thieves known as those of "the last month of autumn" whose customary practice was this: immediately after the invitation ceremony, they would deliberate among themselves, saying, "By doing what shall we obtain means of comfortable living for a whole year without having to work?" When those boys — adorned each day with all their ornaments and surrounded by their retinue of attendants — were going to the Jeta Grove to read the word of the Buddha with the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana, these thieves waited for them along the road, intending to seize them. But the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana perceived that the boys had remained at home,

The householder, for his part, knew that the boys were in the presence of the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana, and so the thought arose in the thieves' minds: "If we can strip the boys of their persons, we shall have enough to live on for the rest of our lives; and if we cannot, then by stripping them of their ornaments we shall be able to live in comfort for a whole year without having to work." They gave one another the signal and positioned themselves along the road. The boys then came along adorned with all their ornaments, and the thieves seized them.

The escort boys who had been sent along behind them saw that the boys had been seized by thieves, and they ran at once to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada to report to him: "Householder, your sons have been taken by the thieves of the last month of autumn — please think of some means to help!" The householder Anāthapiṇḍada ran to the presence of Prasenajit, the king who had arisen in Kośala, and said: "Sire, my sons have been seized by the thieves of the last month of autumn — please bestow upon me the gift of my sons' return!" King Prasenajit gave orders to the young prince Ajātaśatru:

"Go and quickly bring back the householder's sons along with the thieves." But Ajātaśatru had long been a close companion of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, and so he did not set out at that very moment.

Then the gods who had faith in the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana spoke to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana as follows: "Noble one, please take notice! Your attendants have been seized by the thieves of the last month of autumn — please exert yourself on their behalf!" The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana reflected: "If I give no thought to the boys, for the time being the boys will experience the suffering that comes from being separated from their parents, and the parents too will experience the suffering that comes from being separated from their sons. Those who lack faith will find an opening to disparage the teaching, and even those who have faith will think, 'Look — even those going to the Jeta Grove are robbed by the thieves of the last month of autumn; who then will go there in future?' and they will turn away entirely. Therefore I shall display my miraculous power." With this thought and this understanding, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana miraculously conjured up the army of Ajātaśatru by his supernatural power, and drums were beaten with a resounding roll in all four directions. The thieves of the last month of autumn, realizing this, thought: "We are surrounded on all four sides by the troops of the commander Ajātaśatru — it is wrong to be caught; let us flee!" And so they abandoned the boys and dispersed.

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana then dissolved the miraculous display he had conjured up and sat down near a tree by the roadside. When the boys arrived, the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana said to them: "Boys, where have you been?" They replied: "Noble one, we were robbed by the thieves of the last month of autumn." "And who has freed you?" "The commander Ajātaśatru." "Boys, today your parents have been sitting in distress — go home now and comfort them." The boys returned home. The commander Ajātaśatru, meanwhile, equipped with a fourfold army — a corps of elephants, a corps of cavalry, a corps of chariots, and a corps of infantry — marched out from Śrāvastī.

When Ajātaśatru saw the boys he said: "Boys, where have you been?" And they replied:

"While we were going to the Jeta Grove, we were robbed by the thieves of the last month of autumn." "And who freed you?" "The commander Ajātaśatru." Ajātaśatru thought to himself: "I am marching on campaign right now — how could I have freed them? Surely it was some noble one of great supernatural power and great might who freed them." Having reflected and understood this, he asked: "Boys, whom did you see in that place?" "The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana." Ajātaśatru thought: "It was he who freed them — who else could have done it?" And understanding this, he rejoiced and rejoiced again, and uttered this solemn declaration: "In our land there dwells such a noble one, so great in supernatural power, so great in might, who is a protector for the welfare of this life, the welfare of the next life, and the welfare of both this life and the next — truly we have found what is most excellent to find." Uttering this praise, he marched on and entered Śrāvastī.

As he was pronouncing this praise and entering Śrāvastī, the group of six monks also came out. The group of six said: "Whose praises are you singing?" Ajātaśatru replied: "Yours." "What have we done?" "The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana freed the sons of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, who had been seized by the thieves of the last month of autumn." The group of six monks said: "We beggars — that may be so, yet there are some here who have great faith in naked wanderers. If only the naked ones had seen them, they too would have pointed out the way." The boys stood there in silence. Then the group of six said: "Nanda and Upananda, they have been made to hear this. A minor transgression has arisen — make them perform the act of expulsion from the dwelling."

The group of six went to the monastery and, after performing the meal duties, paid homage in order of seniority and went to where the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was. Having approached, they said to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Venerable one, we pay homage to you. Reverend ones, please open the matter of the Ārokyā dwelling. We open the matter regarding the five classes of transgression. Did the elder free the sons of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada who had been seized by the thieves of the last month of autumn?" "It is so — I freed them." "Reverend one, we understand that the elder has understood. We wish that the elder remain, experiencing the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, meditative absorption, and meditative attainment. We do not wish that the elder, while showing compassion to one side and showing compassion to those nearby, should show no compassion to the thieves of the last month of autumn. As for the transgression of freeing the goods that others had made their own, please reverse it in accordance with the Dharma." "I see no transgression." "Reverend ones, since the Blessed One has said that when a transgression is not seen, the act of suspension from residence should be performed — therefore, let whoever is watching over the dwelling strike the gong. This act of suspension from residence is to be performed." Having gone to the dwelling-keeper, he said: "Venerable one, strike the gong. Since the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana will not reverse the transgression that has arisen in accordance with the Dharma, the act of suspension from residence is to be performed."

At that time the venerable Śāriputra, as the elder of the Saṅgha, overseeing the teaching and carefully attending to whether any discordant element might arise in the teaching through deceitful means, examined this proceeding and said to the dwelling-keeper: "Venerable one, who performs the act of full residence, or the act of basic full residence, or the act of satisfaction, or the act of basic satisfaction, or the act of expulsion?"

"No elder does so. For the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, not reversing in accordance with the Dharma the transgression that has arisen, an act of suspension from residence is performed on account of his not seeing the transgression."

The venerable monk said to the dwelling-keeper in a fitting manner: "The Buddha, the Blessed One, is omniscient, all-seeing, and has attained unsurpassed mastery over knowledge and all objects of knowledge; he cuts through every doubt. Go before him and ask. Whatever the Blessed One teaches you, hold to that accordingly."

The monks then presented the matter before the Blessed One. Since the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, act with full knowledge, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, what was the intention with which you displayed the miraculous powers? I thought to myself: if I give no thought to the boys, the boys will experience the suffering that arises from separation from their parents, and the parents will experience the suffering that arises from separation from their children. Those without faith will find their opportunity, and those who have faith, thinking that such displays are carried on here by those of base conduct in the last month of autumn, will be turned away — and then who will come to the Jeta Grove hereafter? I thought that it would change matters, and so I chose to display the miraculous powers."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, in Maudgalyāyana's displaying of miraculous powers with such an intention, there is no transgression."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove, at the place of the Kalandakas.

Then the venerable Pilindavatsa, in the morning, having dressed and taken his bowl and robes, entered Rājagṛha for alms. Going from house to house for alms in due order, he came to the house of a certain soldier.

At that time the nephews of the venerable Pilindavatsa were reading the treatises of outsiders (tīrthikas). The venerable Pilindavatsa saw the nephews reading the treatises of outsiders. Having seen this, he said to the soldier: "Nephew-boys, what are you reading?" "Noble one, these are the treatises of outsiders." "Nephews, the treatises of outsiders are like iron grass — difficult to understand, and even when understood they do not lead one to certainty, nor do they bring the defilements to exhaustion. The word of the Buddha is wholesome in the beginning, wholesome in the middle, and wholesome at the end; it leads to direct knowledge, to complete awakening, and to passing beyond sorrow. Why do you not read that instead?" "Noble one, who will give us leave to read it?" "I will have you read it." "Noble one, please do give us leave to read it."

The soldier said to those boys: "Boys, go to the Bamboo Grove today, to the noble one's presence, and take up the word of the Buddha." Each day those boys, adorned with all their ornaments and surrounded by attendant youths sent with them, went to the Bamboo Grove and began to read the word of the Buddha under the venerable Pilindavatsa's guidance.

Now in Rājagṛha there were thieves known as the miscreants of the last month of autumn, who roamed about. Immediately after the invitation ceremony had been performed, these men conferred among themselves: "Friends, what act might we perform so that without exertion we could enjoy ourselves and live at ease throughout the year?" Those boys — the nephews of the noble Pilindavatsa — came each day adorned with all their ornaments, surrounded by attendant youths, going to the Bamboo Grove and reading the word of the Buddha under the noble Pilindavatsa. The thieves waited along the road,

Knowing that if they seized those boys, the noble Pilindavatsa's nephews, the boys would be confined at home, and knowing also that the brahmin attendants would remain at the noble Pilindavatsa's side, the thieves reasoned: "If we can abduct the boys, we shall have our livelihood secured for the rest of our lives; and if we cannot, we will steal their ornaments — either way, we will be able to enjoy ourselves throughout the year without any effort and live at ease." With this thought in mind, they gave the signal, went and stationed themselves along the road, and when the boys came adorned with all their ornaments, the thieves bundled them into a boat and carried them away.

The attendant youths who had been sent along behind the boys saw them being taken by the thieves, ran immediately to the soldiers of the venerable Pilindavatsa, and reported: "Master, your lord's sons have been abducted by the miscreants of the last month of autumn — please take heed!" The brahmin too ran off to Bimbisāra, the king of Magadha (whose epithet means "one of handsome form, essence of the splendid"), entered his inner chambers, and said: "O king, my sons have been carried off by the miscreants of the last month of autumn — please grant them your rescue!" King Bimbisāra then commanded the young prince Ajātaśatru (whose name means "he whose enemy is yet unborn"): "Go quickly, round up the brahmin's sons and the thieves!" But Ajātaśatru had for a long time been intimate with that brahmin and his household, and so he did not go at once.

Then those gods who had devotion toward the venerable Pilindavatsa spoke to him thus: "O noble one, please be aware — your nephews have been seized by the miscreants of the last month of autumn. Please exert yourself!" The venerable Pilindavatsa reflected: "If I give no thought to these boys, for the moment the boys will experience the suffering that comes from being separated from their parents, and the parents will experience the suffering that comes from being separated from their sons. The faithless will find occasion to slander, and even the faithful will think: 'So, all these boys can be abducted by the miscreants of the last month of autumn — who then will go to the Bamboo Grove from now on?' This would change everything. Therefore I shall display my supernatural powers." Having thought and understood this, the venerable Pilindavatsa went by supernatural power and sat down beside the boat — and the boat would not move.

The thieves wondered: "Why does this boat not move?" And they saw the venerable Pilindavatsa sitting nearby. Seeing him, they addressed him thus: "O noble one, why do you block us? Are things subject to aging — are we the only ones you would obstruct? If you had not attained such a collection of qualities as this, would you not today be robbed of your nephews? O noble one, please release us now!"

The venerable Pilindavatsa withdrew those supernatural exertions he had set in motion, and then said to the boys: "Boys, your parents are sitting in distress today — go home tomorrow morning." The boys went home with the noble one, and young Ajātaśatru too came out of Rājagṛha with the four divisions of his army — the host of elephants, the host of cavalry, the host of chariots, and the host of infantry — in full armor. When Ajātaśatru saw the boys, he said: "Boys, where were you going?" And they replied:

"As we were going to the Amra Grove, we were abducted by disciples of the last month of autumn who possess the left hand." "Then who freed you?" "It was the son of the noble Pilindavatsa." Ajātaśatru was pleased, most pleased, and gave voice to this solemn declaration: "We have gained a great gain, in that in our land there dwells such a noble one of such great supernatural power, of such great might, who provides refuge for the aims of this life and the aims of the next life and the aims of both this life and the next." And so he continued to give utterance to that praise.

As he was giving utterance to that praise and was entering Rājagṛha, the Group of Six came out as well, and the Group of Six said: "Whose praise are you uttering?" Ajātaśatru said: "Yours." "What have we done?" "The son of the noble Pilindavatsa freed the brahmin boys who had been seized by disciples of the last month of autumn." The Group of Six said: "We who are poor — and yet here some people have confident faith in naked ascetics. If only the naked ones could see, they would even point out the road. But these stand in silence." And the Group of Six said: "Agreed — let an understanding be reached concerning the Venerable Priya-Upananda. A downfall has arisen over a minor matter; send them into a hollow."

The Group of Six then went to the monastery, performed the meal duties, and paid homage in order of seniority. They went to where the venerable Pilindavatsa was staying and said to him: "Venerable one, we pay homage. Venerable ones, be so kind as to open the procedure for the monk Ārogy. Open the procedure with respect to the five categories of downfalls." "Did the elder rescue the brahmin boys who had been seized by disciples of the last month of autumn?" "Yes, I freed them." "Then we wish the elder to abide experiencing the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, meditative absorption, and the ease of entering meditative equipoise. Yet we hope that, while possessing one-pointed compassion, you will show compassion toward the brahmin boys but will not refrain from showing compassion toward the disciples of the last month of autumn. As for the downfall that arose from freeing property that others had claimed as their own, please restore it in accordance with Dharma." "I see no downfall." "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared: because a downfall is not acknowledged, the act of suspension from one's dwelling is to be performed. Strike the wooden gong for the attendant." Going to the attendant's quarters, they said: "Venerable one, strike the wooden gong. Because the venerable Pilindavatsa refuses to restore in accordance with Dharma the downfall that has arisen, the act of suspension from his dwelling is to be performed." At that time, the venerable Śāriputra was serving as the Saṅgha's elder, and seeing that in the practice of the teaching some slight irregularity through doctrinal cunning might arise, he said to the attendant: "Venerable one, who is it that is in complete residence, or initially in complete residence, or to be satisfied, or initially to be satisfied, that you would expel? There is no elder at all — it is this: because the venerable Pilindavatsa does not restore the downfall that has arisen in accordance with Dharma, the act of suspension from dwelling is being performed for him on account of not acknowledging a downfall." "Venerable monk, it is not appropriate to act thus toward an elder. This Buddha, the Blessed One, is omniscient, all-seeing, having attained supreme sovereignty over knowledge and the knowable, and dispels all doubt. Go before him and inquire."

"Whatever the Blessed One has foretold for you, accept it just as it was spoken." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Because the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, perceive while knowing, the Buddha, the Blessed One, then addressed the venerable Pilindavatsa: "Pilindavatsa, with what intention did you display the miraculous power?"

"Blessed One, my thought was this: if I gave no thought to the children, they would for a time experience the suffering arising from separation from their parents, and their parents too would experience the suffering arising from separation from their children; those without faith would find an opening, and those with faith, thinking, 'Look — all these were seized by the demons of the last month of autumn,' would turn away, saying, 'Who would ever go to the Bamboo Grove again?' It was with this in mind that I thought to display the miraculous power."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, in Pilindavatsa's display of miraculous power with such an intention, there is no downfall."

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the seventh fascicle.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of Kalandaka. King Bimbisāra's regular practice was to go each day to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and of the elder monks, one by one. On a certain occasion, King Bimbisāra paid homage at the feet of the Blessed One and sat before him in order to hear the Dharma. The Blessed One then perfectly instructed King Bimbisāra of Magadha, that skilled craftsman of form, as he sat there attentively, with discourse endowed with Dharma; he led him to take it up rightly; he gave him proper praise; he caused him to rejoice fully. In many ways he perfectly taught him with discourse endowed with Dharma, led him to take it up rightly, praised him properly, caused him to rejoice fully — and then said nothing further.

Thereupon King Bimbisāra of Magadha paid homage at the feet of the Blessed One, rose from his seat, and departed, going to the shrine of the venerable Pilindavatsa. At that time the venerable Pilindavatsa was in that shrine repairing his matted hair and beard himself. The venerable Pilindavatsa saw King Bimbisāra of Magadha from a great distance. Seeing him, he washed his hands and feet and remained seated on a prepared seat. Then King Bimbisāra of Magadha prostrated at the feet of the venerable Pilindavatsa with his head and sat attentively to one side. Seated thus to one side, King Bimbisāra of Magadha said this to the venerable Pilindavatsa: "Noble one, are you yourself repairing your matted hair and beard?"

"Great King, the one who goes forth does it himself — we have gone forth, so who else would do it?"

"Noble one, if that is so, then I offer my services to the noble one."

The Great King said the same thing a second, a third, and a fourth time. On the fifth occasion as well, when he said exactly those words — "I offer my services to the noble one" — one of the companions of the venerable Pilindavatsa who was truthful, harmonious, and bold enough to speak in rebuke said:

From that point on, the Great King had servants assigned to the preceptor, and the preceptor thought: "If I were simply to abandon this temple now, that would itself be an affront." The king said, "Noble one, have we not pledged this again and again?" "Great King, you pledged it not just once — this is in fact the fifth time." The king was forgetful, and it was his habit to have any small pledge he had made to anyone whatsoever written down in a record by a scribe who sat outside. So the king said to that man, "Hey, steward — is it true that I pledged this again and again?" "Sire, this is the fifth time." "In that case I have incurred a punishable offense; I shall offer the noble one five hundred servants." He then instructed his ministers: "Present five hundred servants to the noble one."

The venerable Pilindavatsa said, "Great King, I myself renounced having servants when I went forth — what use are servants to one who has gone forth? Accept them on behalf of the Saṅgha." "Noble one, if that is so, then I shall submit the matter to the Blessed One." "Noble one, please submit it without delay."

At that time the venerable Pilindavatsa reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Servants may be accepted on behalf of the Saṅgha." The venerable Pilindavatsa accepted those servants, and those servants were repeatedly sent to do work at the royal palace. They then said this to the venerable Pilindavatsa: "Noble one, we have been offered as servants to the noble ones. If we are content, why should we be repeatedly sent to do menial labor at the royal palace? Honorable ones, do not make trouble — I shall petition the king about this."

Some time later, Seniya, the son of the King of Magadha, a prince of fine appearance and handsome form, came to the venerable Pilindavatsa, paid homage at his feet, and sat before him. The venerable Pilindavatsa said, "Great King, do you not regret having offered servants for the sake of the Saṅgha?" "Noble one, I have not the slightest regret." "Then why were those servants again sent to do work at the royal palace?" Right there, seated on his throne, the king instructed his ministers: "Wise ones, do not send the servants of the noble ones to do work at the royal palace from now on." When the ministers told any of the workers to do work at the palace, those workers said, "We belong to the noble ones," and so the ministers reported to the king: "Sire, we are embarrassed to give orders to anyone, for when we told the workers to do menial labor at the royal palace, they said they belonged to the noble ones." The king said, "Go and let them all continue working." They were all again put to work at the royal palace, and once more they said to the venerable Pilindavatsa: "Noble one, in exactly the same way we are again being sent to do menial labor at the royal palace — did the noble one not petition?" "Good friends, I did petition, and I shall petition again."

The venerable Pilindavatsa spoke to Seniya, son of the King of Magadha, who had likewise come again: "Great King, what has happened? Have you had a change of heart and become regretful?"

"Noble one, what fault is there? The servants were again put to work in exactly the same way." "I had not yet been able to petition anyone; but when I did petition at the appropriate time, they replied that they belonged to us noble ones." "How wonderful — if the noble ones' boundary wall for their servants were built as a separate enclosure, these would be the king's, and those would be the noble ones'." The venerable Pilindavatsa said, "I shall present this to the Blessed One."

The venerable Pilindavatsa then reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Then I permit the building of a boundary wall for the servants." The monks, not knowing where to have the servants' boundary wall built, the Blessed One declared: "Have the boundary wall built in the area between the outside of the royal palace and the outside of the Bamboo Grove — wherever, upon hearing a call, one could accomplish the business of the Saṅgha."

The monks instructed the ministers: "The Blessed One has declared that a boundary wall is to be built on this side; let this be made known to you." The ministers had a drum beaten throughout Rājagṛha, and announced: "Those who are servants of the noble ones are henceforth to reside in the area between the outside of Rājagṛha and the outside of the Bamboo Grove; let them go there today and build the boundary wall." They went there and built the boundary wall.

Having built the servants' boundary wall, they went to the monastery and continued their work. The monks then showed them which work was allowable, saying, "This is allowable — do this," and "This is not allowable — do not do that." Because they performed the allowable work, they came to be called "servants" — lha-bong — by name. Because they maintained the pleasant grounds of the Saṅgha, they came to be called "groundskeepers" — tse-göd — by name.

As they all entered the monastery, the noise and clamor prevented the monks from achieving one-pointed concentration, and the Blessed One declared: "Admit only as many as are needed to accomplish the work, and not all of them." When the monks gave food and clothing to all of them, the Blessed One declared: "Give food and clothing to those who do the work, but not to all." When the monks abandoned the sick among them, the Blessed One declared: "Those who are sick are to be given food and clothing, and are also to be waited upon."

Then at some later time, the attendant who served as disciplinarian spoke to those servants: "Good people, since I am acting as disciplinarian, you must come inside early in the morning." Now in Rājagṛha there was a band of thieves who went about under the name "The Left Hand of the Last Month of Autumn," and no sooner had the invitation ceremony concluded than they deliberated among themselves: "Friends, what could we do so that we need not go searching year after year but could enjoy ourselves and live comfortably?" Then someone there who knew the ways of monks said, "Friends, the servants of the noble ones who are stationed outside the city — let us raid them." Others said, "Wait — even their masters, the monks themselves, get no more than a full belly despite soliciting a hundred doorways; so if even they have next to nothing, what need is there even to speak of their servants?" That person who knew the ways of monks then said:

"Friends, you do not understand. These servants eat food supplied by others and devote themselves to carrying out their own duties. By many means they accumulate wealth, and what they possess is nowhere to be found elsewhere in this city — so let us attack them a little."

Having signaled to one another, the thieves set out from their lair and began to attack the servants.

Now the gods who had faith in the venerable Pilindavatsa spoke to him thus: "Noble one, please take note: your servants are about to be set upon by those who sided with the last month of autumn — please make haste." The venerable Pilindavatsa reflected: if he gave no thought to his servants, the servants would for a time suffer the distress that arises from loss of property, the faithless would find an opportunity, and the faithful who had given gifts in accordance with the Dharma of giving would no longer be protected — and in the future, who would think of making offerings and rendering service to the monks who are sons of the Śākyan? He decided: "I shall display a manifestation of supernatural power." Having thus reflected and understood the situation, the venerable Pilindavatsa surrounded the settlement of the divine servants with an iron fence.

The thieves took up their stolen goods, and when they saw the noble one and the iron fence, they began to move about in every direction but could find no way out. They dropped the stolen goods, and both the noble one and the iron fence became invisible. They picked up the stolen goods again, and the iron fence reappeared. This happened seven times in succession. Then they said among themselves: "Friends, some noble one of great supernatural power, of great might, has his eyes upon us — let us drop the goods and flee." They threw the stolen goods to one side and ran away.

When the divine servants awoke, they cried out: "Friends, we are ruined! We are ruined!" And full of mental distress born of the loss of their property, they all assembled and began searching throughout the settlement of divine servants. In one spot they found all their goods heaped up and set down together. Then joy and gladness arose in them, and each took up their own belongings and went home to their respective houses. They posted guards at their individual homes.

As they slept, that god entered their dreams and said: "Friends, all this — your not being destroyed by those who sided with the last month of autumn — is due to the power of the noble Pilindavatsa."

Then, when night had turned to dawn, they all assembled and said: "Friends, a god appeared to us in our dreams and declared: 'All this — your not being destroyed by those who sided with the last month of autumn — is due to the power of the noble Pilindavatsa.' This is indeed exactly as he said, for apart from the noble Pilindavatsa, who else would have compassion on us?" At that, they cleaned and tidied themselves, and said they would go to the temple afterwards. They bathed, adorned themselves with white robes, perfume, and garlands, tidied themselves up, and went to the temple.

Now Ānanda had risen early before dawn, taken the key and the hooked key, opened the gate of the temple, cleared away the lamp-stands, swept and wiped the temple, spread out the seats, scattered incense around the area of the stūpa, climbed to the upper story, struck the gaṇḍī bell, and looked out in all four directions. He saw the people in their white robes with perfume and garlands, and thought: "Who are these people coming toward the temple — wealthy men, or merchants, or sea-captains?" But when they entered the precinct around the stūpa, he recognized them, and Ānanda reproached them angrily, saying: "Did I not tell you to come early this morning? Where have you been?" They replied: "Noble one, if venerable Pilindavatsa has not taken thought for us, we shall suffer distress this very day at the hands of the wicked ones of the last autumn month."

Ānanda reproached them angrily and said: "You should know that I will also lay a rule upon the one by whose power you are so proud." So knowing, he assembled the group of six monks, went to where the venerable Pilindavatsa was staying, and spoke to him thus: "Homage to the elder. Venerable ones, be at ease. Elder, please open the matter of the five classes of transgressions. Elder, did you obtain release for the servants' goods that the wicked ones of the last autumn month stole? That is correct — he did obtain release for them." "Elder, we understand. Please remain dwelling in the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, meditative absorption, and meditative attainment. But do not, we beg, show compassion only to one side — showing compassion to the servants while showing none to the wicked ones of the last autumn month. The transgression that has arisen from freeing goods claimed as one's own — please restore it properly in accordance with the Dharma." "No transgression is seen." "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has said that for one who does not see a transgression, the act of suspension from residence is to be performed. Steward, strike the gaṇḍī bell. The act of suspension from residence is to be performed." They went to the steward and said: "Venerable one, strike the gaṇḍī bell. Because he refuses to properly restore a transgression over a trifling matter, the act of suspension from residence is to be performed."

Now at that time the venerable Śāriputra was acting as elder of the Saṅgha and observing: might there not arise some discord in the teaching through dishonest conduct in Dharma? And because he was investigating conduct related to the community's affairs, he asked the steward: "Who is to be suspended, or fundamentally suspended, or to be pleased, or to be fundamentally pleased? Who is performing the expulsion? Nobody else is doing it. It is being done like this: because the venerable Pilindavatsa refuses to properly restore a transgression that has arisen, the act of suspension from residence is being performed on account of not seeing a transgression."

The venerable monk elder said, in a gentle and fitting manner: "Venerable ones, the awakened Blessed One is omniscient, all-seeing, supreme in knowledge and objects of knowledge, the one who cuts through all doubt. So go before him today and inquire about this matter, and hold precisely to whatever the Blessed One declares to you."

Then the monks petitioned the Blessed One: "Awakened Blessed Ones act even while knowing." The awakened Blessed One then asked the venerable Pilindavatsa: "With what intention did you display miraculous powers?" "Blessed one, I thought this: if I gave no thought to the servants, the servants would for a time experience the suffering born of separation from their wealth, and those without faith would also find an opportunity — those with faith would likewise cease to cherish and protect the gift of Dharma that ought to be given as a gift, and from that point forward whoever thought of giving to and associating with the monks who are sons of the Śākyan would be turned away entirely. For this reason I displayed miraculous powers." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, for the monk Pilindavatsa there is no transgression in displaying miraculous powers with such an intention."

The monks grew doubtful, and in their doubt they petitioned the awakened Blessed One, the cutter of all doubt: "Venerable one, the elder Norchen saw the Saṅgha of monks as blameless and unblemished, yet at the very outset he caused a blemish to arise in it — look at how a blemish appeared through the condition of taking what was not given." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now — in times past as well, this one caused a blemish to arise in a world that was blameless and unblemished, and at the very outset it was through the condition of taking what was not given that the blemish appeared.

Listen to this, monks. There is a time when this world is destroyed. When the world is being destroyed, most sentient beings are reborn in the class of the gods of luminosity. There they are beings of form, mind-born, complete in all respects, with faculties unimpaired, possessed of all major and minor limbs, beautiful, endowed with fine complexion, self-luminous, moving through the sky, feeding on joy, sustained by the food of joy, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration. At that time this great earth becomes nothing but water, nothing but ocean. Upon the surface of what the great earth has become — nothing but water, nothing but ocean — wind causes a film to gather, to thicken, and to spread over it entirely. Just as when boiled milk cools and wind causes a film to gather, to thicken, and to spread over it, so too upon the surface of what the great earth has become — nothing but water, nothing but ocean — wind causes a film to gather, to thicken, and to spread over it entirely. That is the earth-essence, perfect in color, perfect in fragrance, perfect in taste. In color it is like this: like butter, for example. In taste it is like this: like unboiled wild honey, for example.

Monks, there is also a time when this world is being formed. As the world is forming, some sentient beings pass away from that class of gods of luminosity, their lifespan exhausted, their karma exhausted, their merit exhausted, and they come here to be of the same fortune as human beings. Here too they are beings of form, mind-born, complete in all respects, with faculties unimpaired, possessed of all major and minor limbs, beautiful, endowed with fine complexion, self-luminous, moving through the sky, feeding on joy, sustained by the food of joy, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration. At that time in the world the sun and moon had not yet appeared. In the world the stars had not yet appeared. Night and day had not yet appeared. Moments, instants, and brief intervals had not yet appeared. Months, fortnights, seasons, and years had not yet appeared. There was no woman and no man; beings were counted simply as beings, nothing more.

Then a certain sentient being of greedy nature tasted the earth-essence with the tip of a finger. As it tasted it again and again, so did its craving grow."

The more it craved, the more it ate of the earth-essence, consuming it in mouthful after mouthful. Other sentient beings, seeing that first being taste the earth-essence with the tip of a finger, and seeing how the more it tasted the more it craved, and how the more it craved the more it ate of the earth-essence in mouthful after mouthful, thought to themselves: "Ah, how fine that is! Ah, how good that is! Let us too taste the earth-essence with the tip of a finger." And so they too began to taste the earth-essence with the tip of a finger. The more they tasted, the more they craved. The more they craved, the more they ate of the earth-essence in mouthful after mouthful.

Because those sentient beings had eaten of the earth-essence in mouthful after mouthful, solidity and heaviness arose in their bodies, and whatever fair complexion they had possessed disappeared. Darkness arose in the world. Monks, it is the nature of reality that when darkness arises in the world, the sun and moon then appear in the world. And in the world, stars appear, and night and day appear, and moments, instants, and brief intervals appear, and months, fortnights, seasons, and years appear. They ate of that food and were sustained by it, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration.

Among them, those who ate but little became fair in complexion, while those who ate a great deal became poor in complexion. And so, two kinds of food giving rise to two kinds of complexion, one being would reproach another, saying: "Ha! I have a fine complexion, while you have a poor complexion." Because they became proud on account of their complexions, and because they thus took up those wicked, unwholesome qualities, the earth-essence disappeared.

Monks, when the earth-essence had disappeared, those beings gathered together in one place and lamented, grew despondent, and cried out again and again: "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" Just as nowadays, when people come upon some fine and savory food, they employ letters and old words to speak of it, saying "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" — in exactly the same way, those beings too, when the earth-essence had disappeared, gathered together and lamented, grew despondent, and cried out: "Alas, the essence! Alas, the essence!" — though when they said it they did not know the meaning of what they were saying. Such was the meaning of those words.

Monks, after the earth-essence had disappeared for those sentient beings, a growth appeared that was perfect in color, perfect in fragrance, and perfect in taste. In color it was like the flower of the trumpet-vine. In taste it was like unboiled wild honey. They ate of that growth and were sustained by it, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration. Among them, those who ate but little became fair in complexion, while those who ate a great deal became poor in complexion. And so, owing to two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion became manifest, and when two kinds of complexion had come about, one being would reproach another,

"Hey there, sentient being! I have fine complexion, while you have poor complexion!" — and so one being would reproach another. As they grew arrogant on account of complexion, it was by reason of having fully taken up those very sinful, non-virtuous qualities that the growth disappeared for them.

Monks, when those sentient beings found that the growth had disappeared, they gathered together, assembled, and fell into sorrow, into despondency, into lamentation, crying out in this way: "Alas! Alas!" — just as today, when people are touched by nothing but pain and mental discomfort, they use written and verbal expressions, those same ancient words, to describe it, crying out: "Alas! Alas!" — so too those sentient beings, when the growth had vanished, gathered together, assembled, fell into sorrow, into despondency, into lamentation, crying out: "Alas! Alas!" — though they uttered those words, the meaning of what was said was this, and the meaning of the words "the meaning of what was said was this" they did not understand.

Monks, when those sentient beings found that the growth had disappeared, a grove of shoots appeared that was perfect in color, perfect in fragrance, and perfect in taste. In color it was like the flower of the trumpet-vine. In taste it was like unboiled wild honey. They ate of that and were sustained by it, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration. Among them, those who ate but little became fair in complexion, while those who ate a great deal became poor in complexion. And so, owing to two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion became manifest, and when two kinds of complexion had come about, one being would reproach another: "Hey there, sentient being! I have fine complexion, while you have poor complexion!" As they grew arrogant on account of complexion, it was by reason of having fully taken up those very sinful, non-virtuous qualities that the grove of shoots disappeared for them.

Monks, when those sentient beings found that the grove of shoots had disappeared, they gathered together, assembled, and fell into sorrow, into despondency, into lamentation, crying out in this way: "It is gone! It is gone!" — just as today, when people are rebuked with some sharp reproach, they use written and verbal expressions, those same ancient words, to describe it, crying out: "It is gone! It is gone!" — so too those sentient beings, when the grove of shoots had vanished, gathered together, assembled, fell into sorrow, into despondency, into lamentation, crying out: "It is gone! It is gone!" — though they uttered those words, the meaning of what was said was this, and the meaning of the words "the meaning of what was said was this" they did not understand.

Monks, when those sentient beings found that the grove of shoots had disappeared, there arose uncultivated, unsown rice — grains of sālī rice without any husk, without any bran, pure and clean, ready to measure out in fistfuls, not covered over all around; when pressed on the western side, it would win out and spring back on the eastern side; when pressed on the eastern side, it would win out and spring back on the western side; when pressed on every side, it would spring back on every side; and it appeared so as not to be diminished by pressing. They ate of that and were sustained by it, long-lived and abiding for a vast duration. And because those sentient beings began to subsist on uncultivated, unsown sālī rice grain taken raw as their food, distinct sense faculties appeared among them — some came to possess male faculties, and some came to possess female faculties. Then those who possessed male faculties and those who possessed female faculties gazed at one another, eye meeting eye. The more they gazed at one another, eye meeting eye, the more attachment arose in them all. The more attachment arose in them all, the more they pressed close together. The more they pressed close together, the more they engaged in sexual intercourse. Other sentient beings, seeing sentient beings engage in sexual intercourse with one another, threw dirt and threw clods of earth and threw ashes and threw sticks, crying out: "Vile creature! Doing what should not be done! Vile creature! Doing what should not be done! Hey, creature — why do you shame a sentient being?" — just as today, when sentient beings take a bride and groom, they scatter flour and scatter perfumes and flowers and fruits, saying, "May they be prosperous." In the same way, those beings, seeing sentient beings engage in sexual intercourse with one another, threw dirt, threw clods of earth, threw ashes and sticks, crying out: "Vile creature! Doing what should not be done! Vile creature! Doing what should not be done! Hey, creature — why do you shame a sentient being?"

Thus it is, monks, that what was formerly known as improper conduct is now known as proper conduct; what was formerly known as contrary to the Vinaya is now known as Vinaya; and what was formerly to be censured is now to be praised. And so they would conceal themselves for a day, or for two or three or seven days. Because those sinful beings fell so deeply into that ignoble and impure practice, they entered upon the ascetic observance of building houses, saying, "We shall do here what should not be done, we shall do here what should not be done" — and from that saying arose the very word and name "house." Monks, this was the first beginning of all the activities of the household arising in the world, and it arose rightly, not wrongly. The right way in this is as follows: the most excellent of laws belongs to the victorious sovereigns.

Then those beings, wishing to eat their morning meal, would go out for sālī rice in the morning; wishing to eat their evening meal, would go out for sālī rice in the evening. Then a certain sentient being of lazy character gathered at one stroke the sālī rice for both morning and evening. Another sentient being said to that one: "Hey, creature, come — let us go for sālī rice." That being replied: "Hey, creature, see to your own sālī rice yourself. I have already gathered the sālī rice for both morning and evening at one time." Then that second sentient being thought: "Ah, how excellent! Ah, how fine! I too shall gather sālī rice enough for two days, three days, seven days." And so that being gathered the sālī rice sufficient for two days, three days, and up to seven days. Then another sentient being said to that being: "Hey, creature, come — let us go for sālī rice." That being replied: "Hey, creature, see to your own sālī rice yourself. I have already gathered the sālī rice for two days, three days, and seven days." Then that sentient being thought: "Ah, how excellent! Ah, how fine!"

"I too shall gather sālī rice enough for half a month and a full month." And so that being gathered the sālī rice sufficient for half a month and a full month.

Because those sentient beings had been consuming and eating up the sāli rice grain that grew without plowing or planting, simply by taking it and using it, the sāli rice came to have husks and bran, with the grain entirely wrapped around, and what had been cut did not grow back; it was clear that it had been cut, and the sāli rice stood in separate clumps, distinct from one another.

Then those sentient beings gathered together and, coming to assembly, lamented, became downcast, and cried out in distress: "Alas, O wise ones — once we were mind-born, made of form, complete in every way, with faculties unimpaired, endowed with all our limbs and secondary limbs, beautiful, with fine complexion, self-luminous, moving through the sky, feeding on joy, sustained by joy as our food, long-lived and enduring for a great span. Then there came to us an earth-essence of excellent color, excellent fragrance, and excellent taste. Because we began eating and consuming that earth-essence as our food, our bodies became solid and heavy, and that fine and radiant complexion of ours disappeared. Darkness arose in the world. When we were eating that food, sustained by it, and living long for a great span, among us whoever ate the least food became fair in complexion, and whoever ate the most food became ugly in complexion. Thus, depending on just these two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion manifested; and when two kinds of complexion had appeared, one sentient being would disparage another, saying: 'Hey, creature — I am fine in complexion, while you are ugly in complexion!' Because we became proud on account of our complexion, it was precisely through taking up those evil, non-virtuous qualities that the earth-essence disappeared.

"When the earth-essence had disappeared, there arose an earth-film of excellent color, excellent fragrance, and excellent taste. We ate that, sustained by it, and lived long for a great span. Among us whoever ate the least became fine in complexion, and whoever ate the most became ugly in complexion. Thus, depending on just these two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion manifested; and when two kinds of complexion had appeared, one sentient being would disparage another, saying: 'Hey, creature — I am fine in complexion, while you are ugly in complexion!' Because we became proud on account of our complexion, it was precisely through taking up those evil, non-virtuous qualities that the earth-film too disappeared.

"When the earth-film had disappeared, there arose thickets of sprouts of excellent color, excellent fragrance, and excellent taste. We ate that, sustained by it, and lived long for a great span. Among us whoever ate the least became fine in complexion, and whoever ate the most became ugly in complexion. Thus, depending on just these two kinds of food, two kinds of complexion manifested; and when two kinds of complexion had appeared, one sentient being would disparage another, saying: 'Hey, creature — I am fine in complexion, while you are ugly in complexion!' Because we became proud on account of our complexion, it was precisely through taking up those evil, non-virtuous qualities that the thickets of sprouts disappeared.

"When the thickets of sprouts had disappeared, there arose sālī rice grain that grew without plowing or planting — with no husk, no bran, pure and clean, four-fingered in size, unwrapped all around, and when harvested in the evening it would grow back again by morning, when harvested in the morning it would grow back again by evening. When it had been harvested, the stalks too grew back. When every stalk had been harvested, it came to pass that the harvested stalks no longer grew back. We ate of it and, sustained by that food, we lived long and endured for a very long time.

"Now, because we had consumed the sālī rice grain that grew without plowing or planting by simply going to gather and use it, there came a time when that sālī rice developed a husk, a bran, and a wrapping all around the grain, and when harvested the stalks no longer grew back, and the marks of harvesting became visible. And the sālī rice became established in separate stands — harvested ground here, unharvested ground there. Then the thought arose among us: 'Let us come together and assemble, divide the fields with boundaries, and establish which is yours and which is mine.' And so they came together and assembled, divided with boundaries, and established: 'This is yours, this is mine.'

"Monks, this was the very first arising in the world of the boundary of property — the first beginning of what pertains to property. And this took place through Dharma, not through what is contrary to Dharma. The Dharma here is this: it is the supreme Dharma of victorious lords and sovereigns.

"Then a certain sentient being, while having his own sālī rice, took the sālī rice of another without it having been given. Another sentient being saw this — saw that being taking the sālī rice of another without it being given, even while having his own. Having seen it, that sentient being said to the other: 'Hey, creature! Why do you take the sālī rice of another without it being given, when you have your own? Hey, creature — go, and do not act like that again!' Yet that sentient being, a second time and a third time, again took the sālī rice of another without it being given, even while having his own. The other sentient being, again seeing him take the sālī rice of another a second time and a third time without it being given, even while having his own, again said: 'Hey, creature! Why do you take the sālī rice of another without it being given, when you have your own?' — and that sentient being dragged him along, led him away, and denounced him before the assembly of the wise, saying: 'This sentient being takes the sālī rice of another without it being given, even while having his own!'

"Thereupon the other sentient beings said to that being: 'Hey, creature! Why do you take the sālī rice of another without it being given, when you have your own? Hey, creature — go, and do not act like that again!'

"Then the being who had taken without giving said to those sentient beings: 'O wise ones, this being here, on account of rice, has spoken against me, dragged me along, led me away, and denounced me before the assembly!'

"Thereupon those sentient beings said to the one who had spoken on account of the rice: 'Hey, creature! Why, on account of rice, did you speak against a sentient being, drag him along, lead him away, and denounce him before the assembly? Hey, creature — go, and do not act like that again!'

"Then those sentient beings thought: 'O wise ones, we see here one dragging along and leading away on account of rice, and denouncing before the assembly. Let us come together and assemble, and from among us appoint as lord of the fields whichever sentient being is most handsome, most pleasing to behold, most beautiful, and most physically imposing. Then whatever judgment he pronounces upon us shall be the judgment, and whatever benefit he bestows shall be the benefit.

'We shall give a rightful portion of whatever comes forth from our fields.' Having thus resolved, those sentient beings came together and assembled, and from among them they appointed as lord of the fields whichever one was most handsome, most pleasing to behold, most beautiful, and most physically imposing. They addressed him thus: 'Come here, O sentient being! Whatever judgment among us is to be judged, let it be judged. Whatever benefit is to be bestowed, let it be bestowed. And from whatever comes forth from our fields, we shall give you a rightful portion in accordance with Dharma.' And so it was that by reason of being honored by the many people, of being honored by the many people, he came to bear the name 'honored by the many, honored by the many.' And by reason of being lord of the fields, and of being one who protects them as was said, he came to bear the name 'Warrior-clan, Warrior-clan.' And by reason of conducting himself everywhere in the conduct of ethical discipline, and conducting himself everywhere in the conduct of wisdom, and by delighting the populace through Dharma, he came to bear the name 'King, King.'

Monks, this is the very first arising of the circle of the warrior nobility in the world, and it arose through Dharma, not through anything contrary to Dharma. And as for that Dharma — it is the supreme Dharma of the victorious lords.

Monks, what then is the first arising of the circle of the brahmins in the world? Monks, at that time some sentient beings, having understood that grasping is sickness, grasping is its fruit, grasping is pain, and grasping is the root of suffering, went forth from the village to a secluded place in the wilderness. There they made shelters of branches and leaves and took up their dwelling. Morning and evening, desiring morning food and evening food, they entered the village for alms. Then other sentient beings thought: 'These wise ones have understood that grasping is sickness, grasping is its fruit, grasping is pain, and grasping is the root of suffering, and have gone forth from the village to a secluded place in the wilderness, where they have made shelters of branches and leaves and taken up their dwelling. Morning and evening, desiring morning and evening food, they enter the village for alms — this is indeed a hard practice!' Thinking thus, those others resolved to give to them and to act in their service.

Then some among those sentient beings, not having fully comprehended that meditation and that deep solitude, went instead to the outskirts, made shelters of branches and leaves, and settled there, saying: 'Here let us compose texts of secret mantra and engage in the recitation of the Vedas.' And there they composed texts of secret mantra and engaged in recitation of the Vedas.

Then some among those sentient beings, not having fully comprehended that meditation, that deep solitude, those texts of secret mantra, and that recitation of the Vedas, came back from the wilderness to the edge of the village, built four-doored houses, and said: 'Here let us give gifts, accumulate merit, and satisfy to the best of our ability all the traveling people who come and arrive, with food and drink.' And there they gave gifts, accumulated merit, and satisfied to the best of their ability all the traveling people who came and arrived with food and drink. Because these ones dwelt in dependence on what was outside the village, and contemplated what was outside the village, they came to bear the name 'brahmin, brahmin.'

Furthermore, from the phrase 'these ones do not practice meditative concentration,' the act of taking up recitation came to bear the name 'taking up recitation, taking up recitation.' And because some returned from the wilderness back to the edge of the village, they came to bear the name 'villager, villager.'

Monks, this is the beginning of the arising of the circle of brahmins in the world, and it arose through the Dharma, not through what is contrary to the Dharma. In this regard, the Dharma is this: it is the supreme Dharma of the victorious lords.

Monks, what then is the beginning of the arising of the circle of the merchant class in the world? Monks, from that time some sentient beings applied themselves to separate household crafts and occupational activities, and because of the phrase 'these sentient beings carry out separate crafts and occupational activities,' they came to bear the name 'merchant class, merchant class.' Monks, this is the beginning of the arising of the circle of the merchant class in the world, and it arose through the Dharma, not through what is contrary to the Dharma. In this regard, the Dharma is this: it is the supreme Dharma of the victorious lords.

Monks, since by the very nature of reality the three circles arose in the world, a fourth circle — the circle of ascetics — will likewise arise in the world. How so? Monks, noble sons from warrior-caste households, shaving off hair and beard, donning saffron robes, and going forth from home to homelessness with perfect faith — the warrior caste ought to address them respectfully, pay homage to them, rise before them, fold their hands, and render them the act of bowing; and brahmins and the merchant class too ought to address them respectfully, pay homage to them, rise before them, fold their hands, and render them the act of bowing. Noble sons from brahmin households and from merchant-class households, shaving off hair and beard, donning saffron robes, and going forth from home to homelessness with perfect faith — the warrior caste ought to address them respectfully, pay homage to them, rise before them, fold their hands, and render them the act of bowing; and brahmins and the merchant class too ought to address them respectfully, pay homage to them, rise before them, fold their hands, and render them the act of bowing.

Monks, in that time and at that period, whichever sentient being first took without giving what was another's grain while his own grain still remained — that sentient being is a monk who possesses wealth. And just as at that time a world that was without fault and free of bubbles was, on that very first occasion, caused to bubble up by the condition of taking what was not given, so too today has that sentient being first caused the Saṅgha of monks — which is without fault and free of bubbles — to bubble up by the condition of taking what was not given.

Monks, therefore train in this way: strive to abandon attachment, strive to abandon aversion, and strive to abandon delusion. Thus, monks, should you train. For one who acts for the first time, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, and for one who is afflicted by feelings, there is no transgression.

The second defeat is complete.

Vinaya-vibhaṅga, the eighth section.

The general summary of the third defeat:

Rubbing, oneself, poison, a reanimated corpse, and warming — these are the topics of the summary.

The summary: rubbing, nursing, one with a mouth, Śirikā, the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, dwelling in a womb, and the caravan leader.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two monks, one called Rubbing and one called Nursing, who were on familiar terms with each other, were in the habit of visiting one another, and spoke of each other as companions and dear friends. Then at a certain later time Nursing fell ill, and while Rubbing was serving as his nurse, Nursing began crying out in the night. Rubbing asked him, "Venerable Nursing, why do you cry out?" Nursing replied, "I am hungry. I am thirsty." Rubbing said, "Venerable Nursing, settle your mind on the intention to go forth into the monastic life. Even if medicine were available right now, if there is no strength to receive and take it, what need is there to speak of medicine — there is none. Since Nursing has no faculty of discernment, he goes on crying out, 'I am thirsty, I am hungry,' until dawn comes." Then Rubbing said, "Venerable Nursing, I will go and ask the physician. In the meantime, please chew on a tooth-stick." Rubbing went to the physician and said, "A young man of good complexion is ill; please show what medicine is appropriate for him." The physician replied, "Noble monk, the medicine for that monk is such-and-such." While Rubbing was still at the physician's, Venerable Nursing rose from his bed, put on his lower robe, took his washing things, his pills, his head-pouring preparation, and his tooth-stick, came out to the porch, and began to discard his tooth-stick. The monks said to him, "Venerable Nursing, why do you cry out alone in the night?" Nursing said, "Venerable ones, I was alone, thirsty and hungry." Then one monk said, "Venerable Nursing, if I have some water-porridge, why would you not drink it?" Nursing said, "Please, pour it out," and he drank it. Other monks said, "We have milk-porridge, yoghurt-porridge, broth, meat, and sweet treats — why would you not eat?" Nursing, while guarding his practice of celibacy in relation to those monks and being somewhat drawn by craving, partook of a little of each. Having eaten too much, he lay down feeling ill. Rubbing also questioned the physician and came back quickly. Then the physician prepared the medicine as he had described and said, "Venerable Nursing, please rise and chew the tooth-stick." Nursing replied, "I have already discarded it." Rubbing said, "No harm done," and he anointed the maṇḍala, cleaned the vessel and the spoon, and said, "Please rise and eat." Nursing, being looked after by him, got up. Rubbing had him take the medicine, prepared it, and offered it, and Nursing filled the spoon two or three times, ate, and then lay back down feeling ill. Rubbing said, "Venerable Nursing, why do you not eat?" Nursing said, "I have no desire for it." Rubbing said, "You roused me in the night crying, 'I am hungry, I am thirsty,' and now you say you have no desire — now you are behaving badly." The monks said to Rubbing, "Venerable Rubbing, be careful with this one. He has drunk our water-porridge and milk-porridge, and eaten our broth, meat, and sweet treats." Rubbing said, "Venerable Nursing, is it true that you have done this?" Nursing, filled with remorse, lowered his gaze and said, "It is so." Rubbing said, "My alms bowl is empty, empty; my Dharma robe is worn thin; the side of virtue is fading away — and you are behaving this contrary way while I nurse you. It would be better that you had eaten poison."

"I have not been behaving in this contrary way. It is good that Nursing, out of shame, speaks of practicing pure conduct equal to mine. And yet, while my alms bowl is empty, empty, my Dharma robe is worn thin, and the side of virtue is fading away, he nurses me in my sickness — and because I am behaving in this contrary way, it would be better that I had eaten poison. Since I have not been behaving in this contrary way, I shall eat poison." With that thought arising in his mind, he rose and began to search among the vessels.

He found a lump of poison in one of the bowls, and he ate it. The poison spread through him and, his mind overwhelmed, he began to die — saliva dripping from his mouth, his eyes rolling — and he cried out: "Servant, I am dying! I am dying!"

When the servant heard this, he looked up and, hurrying over quickly, said, "Venerable Rubbing, why do you cry out like that?" Rubbing said, "You — you told me, 'Venerable Rubbing, your alms bowl is empty, empty, your Dharma robe is worn thin, and the side of virtue is fading away, while I nurse you in your sickness, yet you behave in this contrary way — it would be better that you ate poison than that you behave in this contrary way.' Because you said that to me, the thought arose in my mind: 'It is good that Nursing speaks of practicing pure conduct equal to mine. And yet, while my alms bowl is empty, empty, my Dharma robe is worn thin, and the side of virtue is fading away, he nurses me in my sickness, and because I am behaving in this contrary way, it would be better that I ate poison than to go on behaving so contrarily.' That thought arose in my mind. I began searching among the vessels, I found a lump of poison in one of the bowls, and I ate it."

The servant, his face fallen with dismay, said, "Venerable one, you have done something terrible." Then they went to a physician. But the poison was of a sharp kind and could not be stopped — his time had come. The servant brought the physician and, upon arriving, saw that his time had come. Remorse arose in the servant's mind: "Have I caused him to die?" He then told the monks what had happened. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "O monks, that monk has no transgression. Moreover, a monk must not speak words of such a kind to a sick person — words that, upon hearing them, the sick person will strive to bring about their own death. If a monk speaks such words to a sick person — words that, upon hearing them, the sick person will strive to bring about their own death — this constitutes a serious offense. This, however, is merely an event that has occurred; the buddha, the Blessed One, does not yet lay down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya."

The buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there were two monks who were close companions — one named Lips and one named Śirikā — who walked together, spoke together, and addressed one another with the same warm familiarity. Lips had gone forth from the household of a hunter, and Śirikā had gone forth from a householder's family. At a certain time, two nephews of Lips, having lost their parents, were wandering here and there, and they came to the Jeta Grove and stood at the gate. Lips came out and recognized the two boys by their faces, and he said to them, "Where have your parents gone?" The two said, "Their time has come." When the kinsman heard this, he wept with tears in his voice and sat weeping, and the monks said to him,

The venerable Lips was asked about the two boys, and Lips said, "They are my two nephews." The monks then said, "Why do you not take them in?" Lips said, "I myself am barely managing to go about seeking alms — how am I to take these two in?" The monks said, "If they are willing, let them bring leaves, flowers, fruits, and tooth-sticks to the monks, and the monks in turn will give the two of them the leavings from their alms bowls." Lips took the two of them in, and the two proved to be diligent, not lazy, and capable of effort, so they would bring leaves, flowers, fruits, and tooth-sticks to the monks, and the monks in turn would give the two of them the leavings from their alms bowls. In no long time, the two had good clothing and good food, and their skin, flesh, and blood filled out, and they became sturdy and proud.

Then on another occasion the two were playing at the gate of the Jeta Grove when some of their kinsmen came by carrying bows and arrows in their hands, passing through the gate of the Jeta Grove to go in pursuit of wild game. These kinsmen saw the two boys and said to them, "You two, where have you come from to be here?" The two boys said, "Here, within this community of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākyaas, we dwell with our maternal uncle who has gone forth." The kinsmen said, "Your maternal uncle too has gone forth among ascetics who are sons of the Śākyaas — those who follow a livelihood of doing nothing. Are you two also going to follow a way of doing nothing? Come here and follow the occupation of your father." The two said, "Our uncle has done us good, and we should ask him about it," and the two went off to where the venerable Lips was, and they said to the venerable Lips: "Uncle, we wish to follow the occupation of our father." Lips said, "I have been raising you two through gifts given in faith — why then do you wish to pursue such a wrongful livelihood as this?" The two said, "Uncle, to be adorned on the head with a golden garland is honorable; to follow the occupation of one's father is not otherwise — that is how it is." And making nothing of his words, the two went off and began to live by hunting wild game.

After some time had passed, Śirikā fell ill, and while Lips was nursing her through her sickness, Śirikā was beset by feelings of suffering and thought to herself: "I have discipline and moral conduct; if I were to go to another land, the higher realms would be as close as the width of a silk cloth, and liberation would be as close as the thickness of a veil. Should this body die, I will be reborn among the gods — so in every way I should bring about my own death." Then she thought again: "But bringing about my own death would be painful. I should find someone to kill me," and she fell to considering who there might be who could cut off her life. She then reflected that Lips's two nephews were fierce and red-handed, habituated to striking and to striking hard, who took the lives of others, who were ready to cut the lives of others, who lived by cutting the lives of others — and so the thought arose in her that they would be capable of killing her, whereas no one else could do it. She realized this and said to the venerable Lips:

"Venerable Lips, your two nephews are nowhere to be seen — where have they gone?"

Lips said,

"Do not take those two by name. The two of them are just the sort who commit such wrongdoing. I raised them by giving with faith, and now they have entered into a life of wrongdoing, following their father's trade — they take the lives of others; they live by cutting the lives of others."

Śirikā said, "Do not harbor malice toward those two on all sides. That is the discipline of the assembly. When the two of them were dwelling in the Jeta Grove, they did not so much as cut the life of a tiny worm. If, by living in that kind of company, they commit such wrongdoing, they should be kept well apart from those people. And consider this: when you go anywhere, I have no one to guard me — so if those two happen to appear, send them to me and let them be my guards."

Now, when Lips set out for alms, those two nephews of his were sitting in the marketplace selling meat. They saw him, rose, went to him, and touched his two feet. He said to them, "Boys, why have you come to Lips? We have come to our uncle. Why have you come to me? We have come to our uncle. All this time while I was ill, did the two of you not visit me even once? Uncle, we did not know. We have only just heard, and so we have come on that account."

"Nephews, do the two of you wish to be reborn among the gods?"

"Uncle, if even we of all people wish to be reborn among the gods, what need is there to speak of it? Of course we do."

"Nephews, if that is so, when I go to another region, the good years are only as much as a silk curtain drawn across them, and liberation is only as much as a veil drawn over it — yet if this body were to be reborn among the gods, then those who would harass me are a torment to me. So you two must kill me."

"Uncle, even if someone else were to kill you, we would still kill that person — let alone that we ourselves would kill uncle. Whatever Lips commands the two of you, do exactly as uncle says."

"Nephews, if that is so, let me say this: I am afflicted by painful feeling — kill me." The two of them then thought: surely this and the earlier conversation with uncle cannot have gone differently from this, and so uncle has sent us here for this purpose. Then the fiercer of the two drew a sharp blade, cut off her head, and covered it under her with a cloth.

Lips returned from her alms round. Seeing the figure covered with the cloth, she said, "The two of you are right here, yet is this one sleeping?" "Uncle, she lies there in a way that she will never rise again." When Lips then spoke words of astonishment, thinking she should inquire, she questioned the two of them, and they told her the whole account in full.

Lips was stricken with distress. She pulled back the cloth and, seeing what lay there, the thought arose in her — could I not have sought a sharp weapon myself? — and remorse arose in her too. Bereft of her companion, tormented by remorse, her mind filled with anguish, she was overcome with misery.

She then related everything in full to the monks. The monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk has incurred no transgression. Furthermore, a monk must not leave behind an unskilled attendant and go away from a sick person. If circumstances are such that he must go, he should instruct the unskilled attendant, saying, 'Do not let this person jump into fire, take poison, bring out a weapon, throw themselves into a ravine, tie themselves with a rope, or eat anything else that is harmful,' and only then depart. If a monk goes away without giving such instructions, he commits a serious offense."

This too was an occurrence, but the Blessed One, the Buddha, did not yet establish a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Now there was a monk in Śrāvastī whose alms bowl had become cracked. The monks said to him, "Venerable one, since your alms bowl is cracked, why do you not fire it?" He replied, "For that one needs a kiln, fuel, sesame stalks, and many other implements." The monks said, "Venerable one, will it really not get done without an alms bowl?" He replied, "It will not get done without an alms bowl. There is a great household where a monk has fallen gravely ill and is suffering, and the illness is so severe that he will pass away before long. His alms bowl is clean and round and fit for use — I should take that one." The monks said, "Venerable one, is it right for you to harbor such a fierce, outcast-like attitude over an alms bowl?" The monk fell silent with embarrassment.

The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk has incurred no transgression. Furthermore, a monk must not harbor such a fierce, outcast-like attitude over an alms bowl. If a monk harbors such a fierce, outcast-like attitude over an alms bowl, he commits a serious offense. Moreover, a monk should look after his alms bowl as he would his own eye: what needs repair should be repaired; what needs to be fired should be fired. If a monk fails to repair what needs repairing or to fire what needs firing, he commits a serious offense."

This too was an occurrence, but the Blessed One, the Buddha, did not yet establish a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Now there was a monk in Śrāvastī whose outer robe had become old, soiled with filth, and torn. The monks said to him, "Venerable one, your outer robe is old, soiled with filth, and torn — why do you not wash it, mend it, or turn it?" He replied, "For that one needs copper, water, wood, thread, dye, and many other things." The monks said, "Venerable one, will it really not get done without an outer robe?" He replied, "It will not get done without an outer robe. There is a great household where a monk has fallen gravely ill and is suffering, and the illness is so severe that he will pass away before long. His outer robe has been turned with dye of reddish-yellow colour —

— it should be taken for use." The monks said to him, "Venerable one, is it really fitting that you, for the sake of an outer robe, should arouse such a forceful and violent state of mind, as though you were a butcher?" He fell silent with shame, saying nothing. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, that monk has committed no transgression. Nevertheless, a monk should not arouse such a forceful and violent state of mind as though he were a butcher, for the sake of an outer robe. If a monk arouses such a forceful and violent state of mind as though he were a butcher, for the sake of an outer robe, it becomes an offence of wrongdoing. Furthermore, a monk should care for his outer robe as though it were his own skin — what needs washing should be washed, what needs mending should be mended, what needs to be turned should be turned. If a monk, when his outer robe needs washing, does not wash it, or when it needs mending does not mend it, or when it needs to be turned does not turn it, it becomes an offence of wrongdoing."

Now, this has come about — but for the time being the buddha, the Blessed One, has not yet laid down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there was a householder named Balasena — wealthy, of great means, and of great possessions — who had taken a wife from among an equal family. He sported with her, rejoiced with her, and lived in happiness and delight together with her. While they were thus sporting, rejoicing, and living in happiness and delight, his wife in due course became pregnant. After eight or nine months had passed she gave birth, and a handsome, pleasant-looking, and beautiful boy was born. On the twenty-first day, when the birth celebration was held on a great scale and the question arose of what name to give the child, the relatives said, "Because this boy is the son of householder Balasena, let him be called Senapa." And so he was given the name Senapa. Householder Balasena, continuing to sport, to rejoice, and to live in happiness and delight, had another son born, who was given the name Nyesena. Then, in due course, the wife of householder Balasena passed away, and she was adorned and wrapped in blue, yellow, red, and white cloth, carried to the charnel ground, cremated, and the mourning rites were performed, and he withdrew. Householder Balasena thought, "If I take another wife, my two boys will suffer. I shall manage the household of Senapa." And so he did manage that household. Then, in due course, householder Balasena became ill. Although he was tended with medicines made from roots, stems, leaves, flowers, and fruits, the illness did not subside but worsened, and he took leave of Senapa and Nyesena with a grieving heart, and said:

All that is accumulated reaches its end;
all that is lofty comes to fall.

All meetings end in parting;
all that lives ends in death.

And so he met with what is the nature of time. The two boys adorned him, wrapping him in blue, yellow, red, and white cloth, carried him to the charnel ground, and cremated him. After that, the mourning rites were performed, the funeral observances were completed, and they withdrew. Senapa then thought:

"When our father was still alive, others provided for our livelihood. Now that the time has come, we must attend to the affairs of the household. If we neglect and abandon the household duties, we will bring shame upon our kinsmen. I shall take my provisions and travel to another land." Recognizing this, Senapa said to his younger brother Nyesena: "Brother, when our father was still alive, others provided for our livelihood. Now that the time has come, we must attend to the affairs of the household. If we neglect and abandon the household duties, we will bring shame upon our kinsmen. You shall remain here and manage the affairs of the household, while I shall take my provisions and go to another land." Nyesena replied: "So be it."

Senapa took many provisions and departed for another land, and there he made great profits. He then sent a message to his younger brother Nyesena saying: "Brother, I have made great profits here and will return before long. Be steadfast, and be of great cheer and joy." Senapa traveled back and again made great profits, and afterward he sent the same kind of message again. Once more Senapa went back and forth and again made great profits, and again he sent the same kind of message. Thus Senapa continued to send messages at appropriate times and regular intervals.

Now it is the nature of things that:

Because one gains, attachment arises for the gain;
from that gain, clinging comes to be born.
A person overpowered by clinging will fail to discern what should and should not be done.

And so it was that Senapa traveled to very distant places and thereafter sent no more messages. Then Senapa's wife, overcome by afflictions on account of fine clothes and good food, began to make advances to his younger brother Nyesena, but Nyesena withdrew his senses and sat apart. Since knowledge of the domain of women is learned only by those who have studied it well, Senapa's wife went to the house of a kinsman, put on soiled garments, sat and remained on a broken couch. His mother and the people of the household said to her: "Why are you sitting like this?" Senapa's wife replied: "Does one not know what brings harm in the domain of women? She has been grievously afflicted by the afflictions." They said: "Your brother-in-law Nyesena is handsome, lovely to look upon, and beautiful — why do you not make advances to him?" Senapa's wife said: "I tried to approach him but it did not succeed." They said: "Other women whose husbands have been away for a very long time and do not return at the right season — those women have the hardest time of it." Senapa's wife said: "When those women's husbands were away, at least their husbands sent messages at appropriate times and regular intervals. As for her, when her husband was still alive he too used to send messages at appropriate times and regular intervals, but now he sends none at all, so the right season has passed and is lost." Although they tried by many means to coax Senapa's wife up from the couch, she would not rise, and she said: "If she does not give herself to another, she will certainly bring disgrace upon both families." Then the father and mother of Senapa's wife and the assembled kinsmen and relatives began to take counsel.

Since she could not be turned away from this course and would certainly bring disgrace upon both families, they decided to invite the kinsmen as guests, give them a meal, and take counsel together, saying: "It is now the right moment to give her to him." Having deliberated thus, they invited the kinsmen as guests, gave them a meal, and said: "Kinsman, this wife of your elder brother has become utterly distracted through her constant indulgence in affliction, and will certainly bring disgrace upon both families. If you will live together with her, that would be well. If you will not, then we must give her to another." The kinsman thought to himself: "We raised her from childhood, and if she were to go to another and bring disgrace upon both families, that would not be good. I should make her my own." Recognizing this, he accepted and agreed. Then the kinsman brought Senapa's wife to his own home and made merry with her, took joy in her, and lived with her in happiness and delight.

When signs of pregnancy appeared in her, the other wives said: "Where has this come from?" Senapa's wife replied: "She is a woman of pure virtue only — do not slander her with lies." Her closest friend said: "Why keep it secret? This will certainly become known — speak up." Senapa's wife said: "It is from the kinsman." "Well then — whether from a husband or from a relation by marriage, there is no fault in this whatsoever."

When Senapa's wife had conceived, Senapa sent a message to the kinsman saying: "Tend to my younger brother carefully, with attentiveness and great cheer, and give him full provision and support. I myself will come in person exactly as the letter says." When the kinsman heard this, he was overcome with shame and thought: "When I longed to see my elder brother clearly, as one longs to see a cloud in the sky, he did not come — and now, having acted so wrongfully, he is coming. Among the grudges people hold, there are situations of this kind: a woman's grudge is bitter and final, and she will harm me. There is such a danger here — I must flee and go away." He thought again: "To abandon one's own district entirely is a painful thing. These śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyaas — having obtained from King Prasenajit of Kosala the renunciation that belongs to the young, they have gone forth into their ranks. What might I do among them?" And so the kinsman went to the Jeta Grove, approached a monk, and said: "Noble one, I wish to go forth." The monk replied: "Good sir, excellent — worldly possessions are subject to change; go forth." The monk received the kinsman into the going forth, conferred full ordination upon him, and then for the next two or three days had him study the rules of conduct, saying: "Good sir, a deer is not cured by a deer. Śrāvastī is vast — it is your own familiar domain and your father's district. Live by going on alms rounds." The kinsman, now a junior monk under his preceptor, replied: "So be it — I shall do as the preceptor commands," and in the morning, having put on his robe and taken up his bowl and outer garment, he entered Śrāvastī for alms.

Not knowing his way around the district, he went house by house and entered his own home. Senapa's wife saw the kinsman and struck her breast, saying: "Kinsman, why did you abandon her and go forth?" The kinsman replied: "And why do you say such a thing? Why do you say that I abandoned her and went forth? At the time when I longed to see my elder brother clearly, as one longs to see a cloud in the sky, he did not come —"

"Now, if I do such a wrong, he will come. Among all quarrels, there is this kind: a wife's final break of estrangement will harm me — that kind of situation exists."

Senapa's wife said: "If you first rescued yourself, how is she supposed to manage?" The kinsman replied: "It is you yourself who have thought it through under the power of affliction. I was made to act against my will — you know that yourself," and so saying, he left.

Now the kinsman's younger friend, a boy who had formerly been an incense seller, went to Senapa's wife's house and asked where the kinsman was. Senapa's wife said: "The kinsman made a clean break and went forth. He went among the śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), the sons of the Śākya. If you don't believe it, go to the Jeta Grove and see for yourself."

He went to the Jeta Grove, but since all who had gone forth wore the same robes, he could not tell which one was the kinsman. He asked a monk: "Noble one, there is one here called Kinsman, the son of a householder of Śrāvastī — where has he gone forth?" That monk showed him, and the incense seller's boy went before the kinsman and said: "Kinsman, without consulting me, pursuing what goal did you go forth?" The kinsman replied: "And do you say the same thing — without consulting me, pursuing what goal did you go forth? At the time when I longed to see my elder brother clearly, as one longs to see a cloud in the sky, he did not come. Now, having done such a wrong as this, he will come. Among all quarrels, there is this kind: a wife's final break of estrangement will harm me — that kind of situation exists."

The incense seller's boy said: "We incense sellers are physicians by trade. If I were to give such a thing as an abortifacient that is administered to one who is bearing a child in the womb, it would cause the child in the womb to be torn apart piece by piece — so why did you not tell me? I can still give it even now." The kinsman consented.

Then the incense seller's boy ground sharp-cutting substances into a powder, gave it to a girl, and said: "Go to Senapa's house and say to Senapa's wife: 'The kinsman says — mix this powder with warm water and drink it, and you will recover.'" The girl obeyed her master's instruction, and heeding the incense seller's boy she went directly to Senapa's house. When she arrived, she said to Senapa's wife: "The kinsman's words are: 'Mix this powder with warm water and drink it, and you will recover.'" Senapa's wife mixed that powder with warm water and drank it, and thereupon the child she was bearing in the womb was torn apart piece by piece, and every sign of the child in the womb disappeared entirely.

Some time later, when her companions saw her, they said: "Where has the child you were carrying gone?" Senapa's wife said: "Did she not say from the very beginning that she herself was a woman of virtue and ask you not to slander her and treat her badly in every way? Go to her." Her dearest companion went to her and said: "You previously told her that what she carried was indeed from the kinsman — where has that child in the womb gone now?" Senapa's wife said: "It has gone exactly where it came from." "How so?" "The kinsman gave such a sharp powder, and on account of that, the child in the womb was torn apart piece by piece."

"The conduct of the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya is merely words. The conduct of the brahmins is merely words. For look — they destroy even what dwells in the womb." So they reviled them, mocked them, and spoke slander against them. The report that the kinsman had committed such and such an evil deed spread throughout Śrāvastī, and the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Buddha, the Blessed One, asked the venerable Kinsman: "Kinsman, is it true that you committed such an evil deed?" "Venerable One, I did not do it. Rather, I consented to it afterward." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the monk Kinsman has incurred no downfall. Nevertheless, a monk should not give consent to such a matter. If a monk does give consent to such a matter, he commits an offense of conflict."

In the meantime, the householder Doṇakṛta completed his affairs and approached Śrāvastī. Now the world desires prosperity and is at odds with decline and adversity, so some people ran quickly ahead and said to the householder's wife: "Your husband Doṇakṛta has come back to Śrāvastī — be glad!" Women are naturally clever without needing to be taught, and so the householder's wife, with a mind filled with spite, put on soiled and dirty clothes and sat slumped on a broken chair. Presently Doṇakṛta entered Śrāvastī, deposited his goods in the treasury, and came to his own home. He saw that the house had not been whitewashed, had not been swept, and had no brightness about it. He asked the maidservant: "Where has the mistress of the house gone?" The girl said: "My lord's wife has broken off her usual conduct and is sitting there on a broken chair."

Thereupon Doṇakṛta felt uneasy and went to his wife's side and said: "My dear, are you not glad that I have come?" She said: "My lord, I am not displeased that you have come. But these very guardians of yours, my lord — those men are thieves." "What did they do?" "Even while I was refusing, the kinsman forced himself on me and made me his own." "My dear, it is not that he has humiliated you — it is that he has humiliated me. Very well, I shall repudiate that one and have done with him entirely." "My dear, where is Kinsman?" "My lord, upon hearing of your return he took ordination." "Where?" "In the Jeta Grove, among the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya." "My dear, is that city without fear? I shall go there and utterly cut off all ties with him."

Now the world has friends, enemies, and those in between, and so some people went to the monk Kinsman and said: "Kinsman, your elder brother has come." Kinsman said: "What does he say?" They told him: "He is saying, 'Is that city without fear? I shall go there too and utterly cut off all ties with him.'" When Kinsman heard this he became distressed and thought: "Might not the very fear from which I took ordination pursue me even here? For our king did give a pardon for my youthful transgressions, yet I am still a guilty man. If there is a chance that harm could come to me here as well, I should flee and go." And so he told his preceptor in full detail of everything that had come about, saying: "Preceptor, the very fear from which I took ordination has now followed me here as well." The preceptor said:

"My child, where will you go?" "To Rājagṛha, Preceptor." "My child, there is a monk who is a friend of mine staying there. Carry a letter to him, stay in his company, and he will look after you with loving-kindness." "Excellent, Preceptor."

So Kinsman wrote that monk a letter in advance, saying: "This companion of mine I am sending to you in my stead. For his sake, please look after him with loving-kindness, just as you would delight in my presence here." Having written the letter, he entrusted it to his kinsman. The young man, full of anxiety and unease, glancing in all directions, set out and eventually made his way to Rājagṛha. There, following directions he had received, he went to that monk's dwelling, prostrated himself with his head at the monk's feet, presented the letter, and sat quietly to one side.

The monk took up the letter and said: "Welcome, venerable one, welcome! Just as you are his kinsman, so too shall you be mine. Be diligent in your training, and I shall provide you with an alms-bowl, robes, a straining cloth, a bowl stand, and a belt — you shall have no lack of these. Now, as for the practice of a monk, there are two: meditative concentration and recitation. Which do you prefer?" "I wish for meditative concentration." "Excellent, my child."

He gave him instructions, and his kinsman went to the charnel ground of the Cool Grove and, through diligence, effort, and exertion, abandoned all mental afflictions and directly realized the state of an arhat — an arhat freed from attachment, belonging to no higher of the three realms, his mind equal toward mud and gold, equal toward sky and the palm of a hand, like sandalwood placed in offering, his doors of sense burst open by knowledge, possessed of knowledge, supernormal cognition, and individual analytical understanding, turned away from the gains and esteem that come with existence and desire, fit to be honored, revered, and praised by gods together with Indra and their attendants.

In the meantime, the elder Sena went to the Jeta Grove and asked the monks there: "Noble ones, is there among you one who has gone forth from the household of a householder of Śrāvastī?" "There is." "Where has he gone?" "To Rājagṛha." "And what is he to you?" "He is my younger brother." Sena paid homage at the monks' feet and departed, thinking to himself: "Rājagṛha is not a city free of fear either, so I shall go there as well and utterly cut off all ties with him." And so he took provisions for the road, many in number, and coins, and set out for Rājagṛha.

He went to the Bamboo Grove and asked the monks there: "Noble ones, is there among you one who has gone forth from the household of a householder of Śrāvastī?" "He has come here." "And what is he to you?" "He is my younger brother." "Where is he now?" "In the charnel ground of the Cool Grove."

Sena went to the charnel ground of the Cool Grove. When he saw his kinsman, who had been a small child when he last knew him, now grown great, though he could not recognize him for his skill and the authority of his bearing, he looked carefully, and —

— by his face he recognized him. Sena thought: "If he recognizes me, he will certainly kill me, so I must devise a plan." He moved off to one side and sat looking around in all directions.

Just then, a hunter came along that road carrying a bow and arrows, having come in pursuit of a deer that had slipped away. Sena went up to that man and said: "Friend, where are you going with that bow and arrows?" The man replied: "Friend, a deer has escaped me." "And how much do you usually get from it?" "Friend, sometimes it works out, sometimes it does not." "And when it does, how much, more or less?" "Friend, something in the range of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." Sena said: "Friend, if that is so, kill this monk here and I will give you five hundred kārṣāpaṇas."

The hunter, his mind drawn on by desire, accepted five hundred kārṣāpaṇas from Sena. But then he reflected: "These monks have been entrusted to the care of King Bimbisāra, surrendered from his youth. I myself pass through this area all the time, and if I were to kill this monk, I too — along with my children, my relations, and my livestock — would certainly be imprisoned and put to death. Moreover, this householder is like the appearance of a white mushroom: no one knows where he has come from. In any case, I must kill him."

So the hunter loaded a poisoned arrow, drawing it back to his ear in the shape of a bow, and shot it into Sena's vital spot. Sena, overwhelmed by feelings of acute suffering, thought as he was dying: "Whatever is happening — my being slain — it is surely because this monk conspired with this hunter." And with that wrong aspiration he died, and was reborn as a snake, one that spreads its venom swiftly, under the threshold of the neighboring dwelling.

Now, arhats do not employ knowledge and vision without deliberate reflection, and so when a neighbor opened the door, the snake that spreads its venom swiftly killed him. Then, reborn on top of the threshold, it died there as well. Then, reborn beneath one of the legs of a chair, it died there too. In the same way, being reborn below things a second, third, and fourth time, it died each time. With each successive death, the poison grew keener and the body grew finer, so that it would take on the next existence through the moment of conception. After some time it was reborn on the flat board above that place, and it fell upon the body of the venerable Neyade as he had gone alone into seclusion and entered into proper composure.

Then the venerable Neyade said to the monks: "Venerable ones, a snake — one that spreads its venom swiftly — burning, sharp, of fierce poison, has fallen upon my body, fine as a needle used for applying eye-medicine. Venerable ones, take hold of my body from the extremities and carry it outside the assembly hall without letting it be shattered, as though it were a bundle of chaff."

At that time the venerable Śāriputra was sitting at the base of a tree not far from the venerable Neyade, having taken up his daytime abode there. The venerable Śāriputra heard those very words spoken by the venerable Neyade. Having heard them, he went to where the venerable Neyade was, approached him, and spoke to the venerable Neyade in these words:

"I myself do not see that the venerable Neyade's appearance has changed or that his faculties have become disordered. And yet the venerable Neyade has said these words: 'Venerable ones, the snake-venom spreading swiftly through my body, blazing, sharp, and virulent — fine as a needle used for applying eye-medicine — has fallen upon it heavily. Venerable ones, take hold of my body from the extremities and carry it outside the assembly hall without letting it be shattered, as though it were a bundle of chaff.' Now, venerable Śāriputra, for one who holds such views as these — 'The eye is the self; the eye belongs to the self. The ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind are the self; the mind belongs to the self. Form is the self; form belongs to the self. Sound, smell, taste, touch, and phenomena are the self; phenomena belong to the self. The earth element is the self; the earth element belongs to the self. The water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element are the self; the consciousness element belongs to the self. The aggregate of form is the self; the aggregate of form belongs to the self. The aggregate of feeling, the aggregate of perception, the aggregate of formations, and the aggregate of consciousness are the self; the aggregate of consciousness belongs to the self' — for one who holds such views, it would indeed be the case that the appearance changes and the faculties become disordered. But as for me, venerable Śāriputra, since I do not hold such views as these — that the eye is the self or belongs to the self, that the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind are the self or belong to the self, that form is the self or belongs to the self, that sound, smell, taste, touch, and phenomena are the self or belong to the self, that the earth element is the self or belongs to the self, that the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element are the self or belong to the self, that the aggregate of form is the self or belongs to the self, that the aggregate of feeling, the aggregate of perception, the aggregate of formations, and the aggregate of consciousness are the self or belong to the self — how could my appearance change or my faculties become disordered? The venerable Neyade, having long since abandoned and fully understood the grasping at self, the grasping at what is mine, the conceit of thinking 'I am,' clinging, and underlying tendencies — having, like a palm tree cut off at the root, been severed at the base, made without foundation, and rendered incapable of arising again — how could his appearance change or his faculties become disordered?"

Then the venerable Śāriputra, together with a great many monks, took hold of the venerable Neyade's body from the extremities and carried it outside the assembly hall. And the venerable Neyade's body shattered in a hundred pieces, like a bundle of chaff.

Then the venerable Śāriputra at that time spoke these verses:

One who has practiced the holy life well
and cultivated the path itself well —
at the end of life, finds joy, just as one freed from illness.

One who has practiced the holy life well
and cultivated the path itself well —
at the end of life, finds joy, just as one who has cast aside a poisoned vessel.

One who has practiced the holy life well
and cultivated the path itself well —
at death's end there is no sorrow, like one who escapes a burning house.

One who has practiced the holy life well
and cultivated the path itself well —
when one perceives the world with wisdom as no different from grass and wood, then one longs for nothing else beyond the joining that leaves no further becoming.

Then the venerable Śāriputra paid bodily homage to the body of the venerable Nanda, and went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Śāriputra addressed the Blessed One with these words:

Venerable One, the snake's venom that has spread swiftly through the body of the venerable Nanda — burning, sharp, and fierce — is like this: it fell as fine as the tip of an eye-salve needle, and that body of his has crumbled like a stalk of hollow cane. Śāriputra, if at that time these verses and these mantra syllables had become manifest for the venerable Nanda, then the swift-spreading, burning, fierce snake's venom would not have taken hold in his body, and his body would not have crumbled like a stalk of hollow cane — not even in a hundred ways. Venerable One, what are those verses and those mantra syllables?

Then the Blessed One at that time spoke these verses:

I have loving-kindness for Āṅkura's realm, and loving-kindness for the son of the earth-guardian.
I have loving-kindness for Lābu and for the swiftest, and loving-kindness for the son born with a crest.

Gautama is black,
and toward the ill-eyed I have loving-kindness;
toward the nāga named Nandaka and Upanandaka, toward those two I always have loving-kindness.

I have loving-kindness toward the footless ones, and toward the two-footed I have loving-kindness.
I have loving-kindness toward the four-footed, and toward the many-footed I have loving-kindness.

Toward all the nāgas that dwell supported by the ocean, toward all of them I have loving-kindness.

Toward all sentient beings that dwell in the throat, toward all such sentient beings I have loving-kindness.

May all sentient beings and all living creatures and all spirits be without harm.

May all be endowed with happiness, may all be free from illness.

May all see what is good, and may no evil come to any.

Though I dwell always in the shelter of a bird with snakes filling it, may the swift-spreading venom and fierce poison bring no harm to my life.

By the truth of my words — that the Teacher is supreme in the world — by that truth of my words, may poison not enter my body.

Attachment, aversion, and delusion:
these are the three poisons of the world.
The awakened Blessed One is without poison;
by the truth of the Buddha, the poison is defeated.

Attachment, aversion, and delusion:
these are the three poisons of the world.
The Dharma of the Buddha is without poison;

by the truth of the Dharma, the poison is defeated.

Attachment, aversion, and delusion:

these are the three poisons of the world.

The Saṅgha of the Blessed One is without poison;

by the truth of the Saṅgha, the poison is defeated.

Venom and fierce poison are overcome, thoroughly guarded by this protection.

All the buddhas have overcome poison —

O crawler, your poison too is overcome.

Now these are the mantra syllables:

Tadyathā: om̐ tumbile tumbile tumabe pratumabe naṭaṭe sunaṭaṭa kevaṭaṭe munaye samaye dante dantile nīle nīlakeṣe bāle bālakobe ole nyaṅgole svāhā.

Śāriputra, if at that time these verses and these mantra syllables had become manifest for the young man of good family, Nanda, then the swift-spreading venom would not have taken hold in his body, and that body of his would not have crumbled in a hundred ways like a stalk of hollow cane. Then at that time the venerable Nanda, with those verses and those mantra syllables not having been heard before, how could things now appear to him as they truly are in the presence of the Blessed One?

Then the venerable Śāriputra, delighting in and rejoicing at what the Blessed One had declared, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga. The ninth fascicle. The monks, having arisen in doubt, requested the buddha, the Blessed One, to resolve all their doubts.

Revered one, what action did the venerable Nanda perform such that, by the karmic maturation of that action, he was born into a household of wealth, great possessions, and abundant resources? What action did he perform such that he went forth into homelessness in the presence of the Blessed One and, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhathood? And what action did he perform such that, even having attained arhathood, he passed into nirvāṇa through an illness tormented by poison?

The Blessed One declared: Monks, it was Nanda himself who found the collection of karma, who fully transformed the conditions, who abided like a flame, who performed and accumulated those actions that were bound to arise without fail. And those actions performed and accumulated by Nanda himself — by whom else could they be individually experienced? Monks, actions performed and accumulated do not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous actions performed and accumulated ripen in just those appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said:

Even if a hundred aeons pass, actions do not perish but are stored, and when conditions and the time are met they bear their fruits for embodied beings.

Monks, in a former time long past, in an age when no buddhas had appeared, there arose in the world solitary buddhas (pratyekabuddhas) of inferior rank — those compassionate toward the poor, fond of remote dwelling places, wandering alone like rhinoceroses, who had become fields of offering for the world. Now at a certain time, a hunter was sitting at a cliff face. Not far from that cliff there was a lake that served as a haven for many wild beasts and birds. Day after day that hunter would go there to drive away the many wild beasts and birds, to injure them, and to set many snares, traps, and nets in order to cause them suffering by improper means. And those snares, traps, and nets of his did catch game.

Now at another time, a solitary buddha who was wandering and traveling through the region went to that cliff and agreed to spend the night in what appeared to be a divine abode. Early the next morning he dressed himself, took up his almsbowl and Dharma robes, and entered the cliff face for alms. Having collected alms there, he thought to himself, "This divine abode is well-traveled by people during the day, so I shall eat my alms-food in a peaceful place outside the cliff." Leaving the cliff, thinking "This is peaceful, this is peaceful," he went toward that lake. Arriving there, he placed his almsbowl and water-vessel side by side at the edge. He washed both feet, wiped both hands, drew water, took up some leaves that had fallen, sat down, and performed the act of eating. Then he wiped both hands, rinsed his mouth, replaced the almsbowl and water-vessel just as they were, washed both feet, and leaning against the base of a tree, sat in cross-legged posture like a serpent king coiled at rest, abiding with peaceful comportment. That day, on account of the human scent, not a single wild beast was caught.

Then the hunter rose early the next morning and went to that very lake, where he began searching with his hunting dogs, his traps, and his snares. Not a single wild animal did he see. He thought to himself: if my dogs, traps, and snares are of any use, then what is the reason that today not a single animal has been caught? He began to make a circuit around the edge of the lake, and when he saw human footprints he followed them. He then saw the pratyekabuddha sitting in peaceful composure, and he thought: these gone-forth ones of peaceful mind take delight in dwelling in such places as this. If I do not kill him, he will certainly cut off my livelihood. I must kill him by any means. With a mind devoid of compassion, that one who had cast aside concern for the next world drew his poisoned arrow full to the ear, bent like the curve of a bow, and shot it into a vital point of that pratyekabuddha.

The great being, that pratyekabuddha, thought: it would not be right for this hunter, overcome by afflictions, to become so deeply fallen and ruined — I should extend a helping hand to him. And so, like a great king of geese spreading wide its wings, he rose up into the sky above and began to perform miracles: blazing with fire, shining with radiance, raining down water, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary beings quickly fix their minds upon miraculous displays, and so the hunter collapsed like a tree cut off at the root and prostrated himself at the feet of that pratyekabuddha, saying: "O worthy one who has become a true field of merit, please descend, please descend. Please extend your hand to pull me, who am sinking in the mire of afflictions, up from the depths."

Out of compassion for that hunter, the pratyekabuddha descended from the sky above. Then the hunter removed the arrow, closed the wound cleanly, and said: "Noble one, please draw near. If it would please you to heal this with a golden salve, I will provide that as well." The pratyekabuddha thought: whatever was to be obtained through this body of filth and pus, I have already obtained. Therefore, now I shall enter into the peaceful realm of nirvāṇa without remainder of aggregates. And so, right before that very hunter, he rose again into the midst of the sky, displayed various miracles, and passed into the realm of nirvāṇa without remainder of aggregates — the utterly peaceful passing beyond sorrow.

As the hunter was a man of wealth, he gathered all fragrant woods, built up the body into a pyre, and burned it. He then quenched the pyre with milk, placed the bones in a golden urn, and had a bodily reliquary stupa erected at a crossroads of a great thoroughfare. He raised parasols, victory banners, and pennants, and made offerings of fragrant substances, garlands and perfumes, incense, powders, and cymbals. He bowed at the feet of the stupa and made this aspiration prayer: "By whatever root of virtue there is in having made these offerings — and may it not be commensurate with the deed of having harmed such a truly worthy one, a true field of merit — may I be born handsome, pleasing to behold, and beautiful in a wealthy household of great resources and possessions, and may I attain such qualities of character that I please even a Teacher far more exalted than this one, without causing him any displeasure."

Now monks, whoever was the hunter at that time and on that occasion is none other than this very intimate disciple here.

As for the karma of having struck a pratyekabuddha (solitary buddha) with a poisoned arrow, the karmic maturation of that deed caused him to be tormented in the great hell of Unceasing Torment for an entire aeon. Then, through the remaining force of that same karma, he was struck by poison at the appointed hour across five hundred lifetimes. And even now, though he has attained the state of an arhat, he has passed into final nirvāṇa through that poison.

As for the one who made offerings and set forth that aspiration prayer, he has now been born handsome, pleasing to behold, and beautiful in a wealthy household of great resources and possessions. Having gone forth into my teaching and abandoned all afflictions, he has directly realized arhatship. And he has pleased me, the Teacher who surpasses even a hundred thousand billion pratyekabuddhas, without causing me any displeasure.

Therefore, monks, the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is itself wholly dark. The karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is itself wholly bright. And the karmic maturation of mixed actions is itself mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are wholly dark and actions that are mixed, and strive for actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train in this way.

Now, this account is incidental. The Buddha, the Blessed One, does not yet lay down rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. There in Śrāvastī there lived a merchant. He had taken a wife from his own social class, and together with her he played, rejoiced, and enjoyed himself in pleasure. While they were playing, rejoicing, and enjoying themselves, a son was born to her. As the child was born, they gave him a name appropriate to his family line, raised him, cared for him, and he grew up.

In the course of time, the merchant's wife passed away, and he took another wife. The merchant said to this new wife: "My good woman, a child born of another woman can be of service, but one born of a rival cannot. This boy here is your own son, so you should attend to his needs."

Then after some time had passed, the second wife also conceived a child. She thought to herself: "Now that I too have a child of my own, this boy will become a rival to mine, so I shall not treat him well." From that moment on she gave the boy bad food, dressed him in poor clothing, and beat him again and again with her fists and with a switch.

The boy went to his father and said: "Father, this stepmother of mine gives me bad food and poor clothing, and beats me again and again with her fists and a switch."

The merchant said: "Son, whatever the case, put a stop to this — she must not continue to behave that way."

The merchant then said to his wife: "My good woman, did I not tell you from the very beginning that a child born of another woman can be of service, but one born of a rival cannot, and that this boy is your own son, and that you should attend to his needs? Why then do you give him bad food and poor clothing, and beat him again and again with your fists and a switch?"

The wife replied: "My lord's son, I will discipline him. Since he is the merchant's son, if he is not disciplined, the whole world will certainly reproach my lord's son himself."

The merchant said: "I have not appointed you to discipline him. Henceforth do not give him bad food and poor clothing, and do not beat him again and again with your fists and a switch."

Because that wife was greatly indulged by the merchant, she continued once more to give the boy bad food and poor clothing, and to beat him again and again with her fists and a switch. The boy thought to himself: "Since my father has not firmly restrained this stepmother of mine, she goes on giving me bad food and poor clothing, and beating me again and again with her fists and a switch. I will go forth into homelessness." And so he implored his father in every way he could, saying: "Father, even though you have restrained this stepmother of mine, she continues to give me bad food and poor clothing, and to beat me again and again with her fists and a switch. I will go forth into homelessness."

The merchant, being deeply in love with that wife and guarding her feelings, was unable to restrain her firmly, and so he said: "My son, this wife of your householder father is fierce and stubborn, and of a violent temper. Go, then, and take ordination. I will be able to see you living, and yet there is also the possibility that she might come to do you harm."

With his father's permission, the boy went to the Jeta Grove and approached a monk, prostrated at his feet, and said: "Noble one, I wish to go forth into homelessness."

The monk said: "Good-looking one, it is excellent that you have generated this intention. Pleasures and possessions are impermanent — go forth and take ordination."

The monk gave the boy the going forth and conferred upon him full ordination, and then said: "Good-looking one, the tasks of a monk are two: meditative concentration and study. I myself am one who practices meditative concentration. As for you — will you practice meditation or study?"

The boy replied: "Preceptor, I will study."

"Good, my son. You should read all three scriptural collections."

The boy thought: "There is much text, and one needs a preceptor to guide one through it. Here there is no one to instruct me in study, so I shall go to another region." And he went to another region. There he read all three scriptural collections, and became one who possessed all three collections, who proclaimed the Dharma, and who had the eloquence of reasoning and liberation.

He then reflected: "The Blessed One has declared to the monks that those who give birth to a child, nourish a child, raise a child, suckle a child, and show the child the manifold diversity of Jambudvīpa — these two perform a difficult deed. Even if a son were to carry his father on one shoulder and his mother on the other for a hundred full years, or even if he were to arrange for them to be the lords and owners of all the wealth of this great earth — its jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, the essence of the earth, burnished metal, red gold, and the swastika and all such riches — even that would not constitute a son having done something for his parents and having benefited them. But if his parents, who lack faith, he leads to take hold of perfect faith, tames them, introduces them to it, and establishes them firmly in it; if his parents, who lack moral discipline, he leads to take hold of perfect moral discipline; if his parents, who are miserly, he leads to take hold of perfect generosity; and if his parents, who lack wisdom, he leads to take hold of perfect wisdom, tames them, introduces them to it, and establishes them firmly in it — then, by that much, a son will have done something for his parents and will have truly benefited them."

When this was said, he thought: "My own father lacks faith; let me go to him and teach him the Dharma." And so, taking up his alms bowl and robes, he made his way toward Śrāvastī, and in due course arrived there. Upon entering Śrāvastī itself, he went to the Jeta Grove. Throughout Śrāvastī the word had spread: "A son of a certain great merchant has come from the provinces, having studied the three scriptural collections (Tripiṭaka), and has arrived at the Jeta Grove." When the merchant heard this, he thought: "My son has studied the three scriptural collections and come from the provinces to the Jeta Grove — I shall go and make him truly glad." The merchant went to the Jeta Grove, and upon seeing his son he said: "My son, though you renounced me and went forth, it is excellent that you have become a monk and have come to be deeply learned. I too rejoice entirely." Having said this, he sat down before him. The monk then taught the merchant the Dharma in such a way as to give rise in him to faith, so that he would take refuge and take hold of the bases of training. The merchant prostrated to his son's two feet and invited him for a meal the following day, and the son accepted in silence without saying anything. The merchant then prostrated to his son's two feet and departed. But on the way home a thought arose in him: "I have invited my son for a meal without first consulting anyone — yet my wife is fierce, quarrelsome, and domineering, and she will not treat my son with respect. How am I to manage this?" Then he thought again: "Well, the invitation has already been given, so there is nothing to be done about that. I must arrange things on all sides with pleasing and agreeable words, so that my wife will not be upset." And so he went home and said to his wife: "Good lady, do wandering, dying, and going forth amount to the same thing — or is there some slight difference?" The wife replied: "My lord's heir, there is not the slightest difference." The merchant said: "Good lady, others are saying that your fine son has become an excellent monk and, having studied the three scriptural collections in the provinces, has arrived at the Jeta Grove — and that he is not only fully equipped with the three scriptural collections, but also preaches the Dharma and is endowed with eloquence in reasoning and liberation." The wife replied: "My lord's heir, if that is so, why have you not brought him home as a guest? Good lady, he has been invited — go now and prepare food." That wife, freed from the grip of aversion toward him, prepared on that very day the foods that were of the cool variety, and prepared on the following morning the foods that were of the warm variety. Then she sent a messenger with the invitation: "Venerable one, you were invited for midday — please know that the time has now come." The monk, in the early morning, tied on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and robes, and went to his father's house, arriving and sitting down just as the seat was being spread. Then the merchant together with his wife, with their own hands, offered food to the monk until he was fully satisfied, and with their own hands they removed the bowl. Knowing that he was satisfied and that the meal was finished, and seeing him wipe his hands and set down the bowl, they prostrated to his feet and sat down before him to hear the Dharma. He then taught the Dharma to that mother as well, in such a way that upon hearing it she too would take refuge and take hold of the bases of training.

That household had become, as it were, a well for monks and nuns to draw from, and having been disciplined in this way, whatever the household members intended to give or do, all of it was directed toward the monks and the nuns.

Then some time later, the merchant fell gravely ill. His son, upon hearing that his father was ill, thought: "I will go and teach my father the Dharma in such a way that it will bring him the highest joy." The monk then went to him at an appropriate time and spoke thus: "Father, I will not cause you displeasure. Consider: relying on me as your spiritual friend, you have gone for refuge to the Buddha, gone for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha, taken up the bases of training, given gifts, and made merit. If you pass on to another realm, you have had a good year, and the higher realms are as close as a silk curtain — liberation is as near as a veil that merely covers it. Even when this body perishes, you will be born among the gods." He taught the Dharma in this way.

The merchant replied: "Son, it is just so. It is exactly so. Relying on you as my spiritual friend, I have gone for refuge to the Buddha, gone for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha, taken up the bases of training, given gifts, and made merit. If I pass on to another realm, I have had a good year, and the higher realms are as close as a silk curtain — liberation is as near as a veil that merely covers it. Even when this body perishes, I will be born among the gods."

Having taught his father the Dharma in this way, the monk's son departed.

A thought then arose in the merchant's mind: "My son, who possesses all three scriptural collections, who proclaims the Dharma, who has the eloquence of reasoning and of liberation — he will speak this to no one else. My affliction of suffering is without equal, and so I should put an end to myself." Then he thought again: "But to lay hands on oneself is painful. So who is there who could take my life from me?" He had a maidservant named Skyong-ma, who was fat, foolish, and of low intelligence. The merchant thought: "This maidservant Skyong-ma, being fat, foolish, and of low intelligence, she would be capable of taking my life — others could not do it."

Now not far from the merchant's house, a householder's son had taken a wife, and the merchant's wife was invited as a guest along with the maidservant Skyong-ma. When the bride had been received and the wedding feast was underway, the merchant's wife said to Skyong-ma: "Skyong-ma, go back and make sure the merchant does not fall asleep; I will follow shortly."

Skyong-ma heeded her mistress's words and went home. She went to the merchant's side, and the merchant said: "Skyong-ma, where have you come from to be here?" Skyong-ma replied: "My lord's son, the householder's great son, has taken a bride, and I went to look and pay respects before coming back." The merchant said: "Skyong-ma, is the bride fine? Is the son of my lord fine?" "Yes, the son of my lord is fine." "Well then, if I were to give you to him as a bride, would you be pleased?" "My lord's son would be pleased." "If that is so, and you do whatever I say, I will make you happy — know that." Skyong-ma replied: "My lord's son, I will do just so." "Skyong-ma, if that is so, then let something non-human enter my belly and tear it open." "My lord's son, what is the procedure?" "Skyong-ma, first squeeze my two feet. After that, the two calves. After that, the two knees. After that, the two thighs. After that, the hips. After that, the belly. After that, the chest. After that, squeeze the throat —"

"If I move, do not release." The foolish Skyong-ma did exactly as instructed and squeezed him firmly. The merchant thought to himself, "Oh dear — if Skyong-ma releases, what could be wrong with that?" — but at that, Skyong-ma squeezed even more tightly. A god spoke these verses:

Grasped by a dull-witted mind, as a turtle grips and holds, seized now in Skyong-ma's clutch —
I see no life left for you.

The merchant's time had come. Skyong-ma wrapped him in cloth and laid him out. Then the merchant's wife came in from outside and said, "Skyong-ma, have you been sitting here all this while letting the merchant sleep?" and she began to rouse the merchant. Skyong-ma said, "A wicked child drew out the enemy that was in this man's belly, and because of that he has fallen into this sleep — do not rouse him." The merchant's wife thought, "What sort of enemy is this? I must examine," and she began to investigate and saw that his time had come.

Then a thought arose in the merchant's wife: "This is not Skyong-ma's own wit. This is the wit of the monk who is the son of Bū-zan-mo and who possesses the three collections of scripture. When he has read through the three collections, teaching nothing of any other doctrine, he will not cause your father distress. If you go to another land, the harvest will be fine, and the higher realms will be fully covered with silk; liberation will be fully covered with a curtain — yet even when the body perishes, one will be reborn among the gods." She spoke these words in her grief and sorrow. "Now this body too has perished, and he has already been born among the gods. Come back — enjoy happiness together with me, carry on the household affairs as well."

Thus, overcome with grief, she spoke those words aloud. After that, having adorned the body with blue, yellow, red, and white robes, she had it cremated in the charnel ground outside Śrāvastī, and then performed the mourning rites.

From time to time the wife would repeat these very words. The monk who possessed the three collections of scripture heard that his father's time had come and thought, "This is indeed the nature of conditioned things, yet I will go and perform the mourning rites for that dear mother." He went, and while still at a great distance that dear mother caught sight of the monk. When she saw him, she again began to say, "The son of Bū-zan-mo, possessed of the three collections — when he has read through the three collections, teaching nothing of any other doctrine, he will not cause your father distress. If you go to another land, the harvest will be fine, and the higher realms will be fully covered with silk; liberation will be fully covered with a curtain — yet even when the body perishes, one will be reborn among the gods. Now this body too has perished, and he has already been born among the gods. Come back — enjoy happiness together with me, carry on the household affairs as well."

At this the monk was stricken with anguish and turned back from that very spot. A feeling of remorse arose in him, thinking, "Did I not cause him to die?" He then reported the matter to the other monks. The monks laid it before the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, that monk has incurred no transgression. Nevertheless, a monk must not teach to a sick person any Dharma of that kind — having heard it, he thinks the sick person will die. If a monk teaches to a sick person Dharma of that kind — having heard it, he thinks the sick person will die — it becomes a serious offense. This, moreover, occurred before the time: the Blessed Buddha does not, in the Vinaya, lay down a rule of training for the hearers."

The Blessed Buddha was dwelling in a grove of torch-trees on the bank of the pleasant river at Varāṇā. There the Blessed One taught the community of monks, saying: "Monks, cultivate the meditation on the unattractive. If you dwell on the unattractive, grow accustomed to it, and practice it repeatedly, it will yield great fruit and great benefit." And he praised the meditation on the unattractive and extolled its virtues. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, cultivate the meditation on the unattractive. If you dwell on it, grow accustomed to it, and practice it repeatedly, it will yield great fruit and great benefit." At that time the monks undertook the meditation on the unattractive. As they did so, they became weary and disgusted with their pus-filled bodies, grew troubled and full of doubt, condemned those bodies, and began drawing weapons on themselves, swallowing poison, hanging themselves with ropes, leaping into ravines — and in this way monks were also urging other monks to do the same. Then another monk who had become weary and disgusted with his pus-filled body, troubled, full of doubt, and condemning it, went to where the wandering ascetic Migalandika was staying, and arriving there, said to Migalandika: "Come here, dear friend. Take my life, and my bowl and robes shall be yours." Then Migalandika killed that monk, and carrying the blood-stained sword, made his way to the pleasant river and sat down on the bank of that river, squatting there, washing the sword stained with blood. A god of Māra's host who was sitting across the current of the pleasant river, undivided, then said to Migalandika: "Excellent, excellent, dear friend! In this way you cause monks who are endowed with moral discipline and virtue to cross over what they have not yet crossed, to be freed from what they have not yet been freed from, to breathe out where they have not yet breathed out, to pass fully into nirvāṇa who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — and in doing so great merit arises for you, and their bowls and robes become yours, which is moreover a gain beyond measure for you." When the god had spoken thus to him, Migalandika formed the view, extensively and with a most sinful character: "It is true that I cause monks who are endowed with moral discipline and virtue to cross over what they have not yet crossed, to be freed from what they have not yet been freed from, to breathe out where they have not yet breathed out, to pass fully into nirvāṇa who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — and great merit thereby arises for me, and their bowls and robes become mine, which is moreover a gain beyond measure for me." From that time onward Migalandika carried a sharp sword under his arm and wandered from park to park, from monastery to monastery, from house to house, from walkway to walkway, and along side-paths. Seeing various monks, he spoke to them thus: "You, ascetic — endowed with moral discipline, endowed with virtue — you who are to be helped across what you have not yet crossed, to be freed from what you have not yet been freed from, to breathe out where you have not yet breathed out, to pass fully into nirvāṇa who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — come now." Then a certain monk who was staying in a state of weariness and disgust with his pus-filled body, troubled and full of doubt and condemning it, came out, and said to Migalandika: "Dear friend, I have not yet crossed over — liberate me. I have not yet been freed — release me."

"I have not yet breathed out — cause me to breathe out. I have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — help me pass fully into nirvāṇa." Then Migalandika killed that monk. And in the same way he killed two, then three, until he had killed sixty monks.

At that time the monks became few, diminished, and hushed, and the monastic Saṅgha of monks grew thin. Then, on that very fifteenth day, the Blessed One took his seat on the cushion spread before the monastic Saṅgha of monks for the restoration ceremony (poṣadha). Having taken his seat, the Blessed One surveyed the entire assembly and then said to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, what is the cause, what is the condition, that the monks have now become few, diminished, and hushed, and the monastic Saṅgha of monks has grown thin?"

"Venerable One, at one time the Blessed One instructed the monastic Saṅgha of monks: 'Monks, cultivate the meditation on foulness. If you cultivate, habituate, and repeatedly practice the meditation on foulness, it will yield great fruit and great benefit.' And he both taught the meditation on foulness and spoke its praises. At that time the monks set about cultivating the meditation on foulness. But as they cultivated it, being wearied, troubled, full of doubt, and condemning this pus-filled body, some drew out weapons, some sought poison, some hanged themselves with rope, some leapt from precipices, and some monks incited other monks."

"Then a certain other monk, wearied, troubled, full of doubt, and condemning this pus-filled body, went to where the ascetic Migalandika was, and arriving there, said to him: 'Good friend, come — kill me. My alms bowl and robes, whatever they are, shall be yours.' Then Migalandika killed that monk, and with his sword stained with blood he went to where the pleasant river was, and arriving at the bank of the pleasant river, crouched down and began to wash the blood-stained sword."

"Then a god of the māra class (Skt. māra) came to the bank of the pleasant river without breaking its flow, and said to the ascetic Migalandika: 'Good friend — excellent, excellent! Thus you are one who helps monks endowed with moral discipline, endowed with virtue, to cross what they have not yet crossed, to be freed from what they have not yet been freed from, to breathe out where they have not yet breathed out, to pass fully into nirvāṇa who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — and great merit will be generated for you; and whatever alms bowls and robes are theirs shall become yours — this too is excellent gain for you.' Speaking thus, he caused Migalandika to form a very broad and sinful view, namely the thought: 'It is true that I help monks endowed with moral discipline, endowed with virtue, to cross what they have not yet crossed, to be freed from what they have not yet been freed from, to breathe out where they have not yet breathed out, to pass fully into nirvāṇa who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — and great merit is indeed generated for me; and whatever alms bowls and robes are theirs, those becoming mine — this too is excellent gain for me.' Having attained this broadly sinful view, Migalandika then took up a sharp sword under his arm and went from park to park, from monastery to monastery, from house to house, from cloister to cloister, roaming through the passages and walkways, and whenever he caught sight of such and such a monk he would approach and say: "Reverend one, you who are endowed with moral discipline, endowed with virtue — you who have not crossed over, I will help you cross; you who have not been freed, I will free you; you who have not yet breathed out, I will let you breathe out; you who have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa, I will bring you to pass fully into nirvāṇa."

Then one monk, wearied by this body of pus and filth, overcome with torpor, afflicted with doubt and remorse, came forward from where he had been staying and addressed the ascetic Migalandika in these words: "Good sir, I have not yet crossed over — free me. I have not yet been freed — release me. I have not yet breathed out — let me breathe out. I have not yet passed fully into nirvāṇa — bring me to nirvāṇa."

Thereupon the ascetic Migalandika deprived that monk of his life. And in the same way, from a second and third up to sixty monks he deprived of their lives. This, reverend ones, was the cause and condition by which the number of monks had now become few, had diminished, had dwindled, and the Saṅgha of monks had grown thin.

"Ānanda, do the monks then stir up action against a monk?" "Reverend one, they do stir it up." The Blessed One, the Buddha, censured what was improper conduct for a renunciant, conduct not in conformity, not befitting, not in accord with the rule — that this was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. And having censured it in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks:

"Monks, therefore, seeing ten genuine benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be laid down — namely: for the cohesion of the Saṅgha; for the well-being of the Saṅgha; for the comfortable abiding of the Saṅgha; for the restraint of shameless persons; for the comfortable abiding of those who are conscientious; for the conversion of the faithless to faith; for the increase and growth of those who are already faithful; for the restraint of the defilements of this present life; for the prevention of defilements in future lives; and so that my holy life, being of great benefit to the many, widely proclaimed and fully expounded among gods and humans, may long endure.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Should any monk, with deliberate intention, deprive a human being — or one of human form — of life with his own hand, or procure a weapon for that person's death, or seek out a weapon for him, or cause him to be killed, or praise death to him, speaking thus: 'O person, what use is this wretched, impure, evil life to you? O person, death is better than living' — and with such intent of mind and such deliberation of mind, in various ways causes him to be killed or praises death to him, and that being at whose instigation this is done then dies — that monk too is one who has incurred defeat and is not to remain."

"Furthermore, 'any monk' — there are four kinds of monk: the monk in name only, the monk by self-proclamation, the monk who begs, and the monk by reason of having subdued the afflictions. What is the monk in name only? One whose name is given and spoken as 'monk,' or a secondary term, or a polite term, a concept, a designation, an appellation, a conventional expression — whether it be 'monk' or 'of the class of monks' —

"one who has become like a monk" — that is called the monk in name only.

What is the monk by self-proclamation? One who, while not actually being a monk, proclaims himself to be a monk, and who, while acting by stealth, pledges himself as a monk — that is called the monk by self-proclamation.

What is the monk who begs? One who sustains himself by living as a mendicant in conformity with the Dharma — that is called the monk who begs.

What is the monk by reason of having subdued the afflictions? One who has abandoned, thoroughly understood, cut off at the root, and rendered without remainder — like a palm tree felled at the base — and brought to the nature of non-arising in future lives those things which are the defilements, which cause renewed existence, which are accompanied by affliction, which ripen as suffering, and which lead to future birth, aging, and death — that is called the monk by reason of having subdued the afflictions.

In the present context, since one who has received full ordination through the act of the fourfold formal procedure with a motion is to be regarded as the monk who is intended, and since it is not fitting to leave aside an unshakable formal act established by a motion and three proclamations, therefore it is said again "any monk."

"A human being" means one who has obtained, within the mother's womb, these six faculties — the faculty of the eye, the faculty of the ear, the faculty of the nose, the faculty of the tongue, the faculty of the body, and the faculty of the mind.

"In the category of a human being" means one who has obtained, within the mother's womb, these three faculties — the faculty of the body, the faculty of feeling, and the faculty of the mind.

"Intentionally" means having deliberated.

"With his own hand" means with the hand, by hand.

"Takes life" means that the life of that being has been severed.

"Or provides him with a weapon" means a sword, a knife, or a water-blade.

"Or seeks to obtain a weapon-bearer for him" means a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex.

"Or causes him to die" — causing to die is of three kinds: one who has broken his moral discipline, one who possesses moral discipline, and one who is sick.

How is it in the case of one who has broken moral discipline? In this way: when a monk who has broken his moral discipline has obtained some leftover item — be it an alms bowl, a monastic robe, a strainer, a small cup, a belt, or any article whatsoever that belongs to the life of a renunciant — he thinks to himself: "For as long as this venerable one remains alive, I will not be able to obtain it; I will go to him and cause him to die." And he goes to that one and speaks thus: "Venerable one, you have broken your moral discipline, you are one of unwholesome qualities, you have engaged in misconduct in body, and you have engaged in misconduct in speech and mind. For as long as you continue to live, demerit will grow ever more abundant; and if demerit grows ever more abundant, you will be reborn for a long time in the hell realms." When he has spoken thus, that one who has broken moral discipline says to that monk: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" The monk replies: "Come here, venerable one. Abandon yourself! Kill yourself! Allow yourself to be deprived of life!" If that one who has broken moral discipline then abandons himself, kills himself, or proceeds to deprive himself of life, that monk incurs defeat.

If that one who has broken moral discipline thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will not abandon myself. I will not kill myself. I will not proceed to deprive myself of life" — and if he does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, and does not proceed to deprive himself of life — then that monk incurs a grave offense by reason of that very prior act of engagement.

If that monk, having spoken those words, comes to feel remorse and goes before the one who has broken moral discipline, saying: "Venerable one, be informed of this. It was I who, being childish, dull, unclear, and unskilled, spoke words of doubt and uncertainty — words spoken without careful discernment — to the effect that if the venerable one were to please some virtuous friend, then that one could be lifted from this impure conduct of body and established in pure conduct of body, and lifted from impure conduct of speech and mind and established in pure conduct of speech and mind. In that case, venerable one, since your conduct of body, speech, and mind would be perfectly pure, even when this body perishes you would be reborn in a happy destiny, in a high realm, among the gods" — and if, when that monk has spoken thus, the one who has broken moral discipline says to him: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" and the monk replies: "Venerable one, do not abandon yourself. Do not kill yourself. Do not proceed to deprive yourself of life" — then even though the one who has broken moral discipline does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, and does not proceed to deprive himself of life, that monk still incurs a grave offense by reason of that very prior act of engagement.

If the one who has broken moral discipline thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will abandon myself. I will kill myself. I will proceed to deprive myself of life" — and if he does abandon himself, does kill himself, and does proceed to deprive himself of life, that monk incurs a grave offense by reason of that very prior act of engagement. So much, then, for the case of the one who has broken moral discipline.

Now, how does this apply to one who maintains moral discipline? Suppose a monk who maintains moral discipline, having some small remainder of a begging bowl, a robe, a net, a cup, a sash, or any article of a contemplative's livelihood left to him, thinks: "As long as this venerable one is alive, I will not come to obtain it. I shall go before him and have him killed." He then goes before that person and says: "Venerable one maintains moral discipline, has virtuous qualities, is generous to a fault, delights in giving away possessions, is one who continually offers gifts, is magnificent in giving, and delights in making the gift of generosity. If the venerable one were to go to another region, harvests are good there and the high realms are as close as the span of a silk cloth, while liberation is obscured only by a veil — and even when this body perishes, one would be reborn among the gods." When the monk has spoken thus, and the one who maintains moral discipline asks: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" the monk replies: "Come here, venerable one. Abandon yourself! Kill yourself! Allow yourself to be deprived of life!" If the one who maintains moral discipline then abandons himself, kills himself, or proceeds to deprive himself of life, that monk incurs defeat.

If the one who maintains moral discipline thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will not abandon myself. I will not kill myself.

I will not proceed to deprive myself of life." If that one who maintains moral discipline does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, and does not proceed to deprive himself of life, then for that monk, by that very prior effort, a grave offense is incurred.

If that monk, having spoken thus, comes to feel remorse, and goes to the one who maintains moral discipline and speaks as follows: "Venerable one, know this: it was I who was childish, foolish, unclear, and unskilled — acting in haste and confusion, speaking without having examined the matter properly, saying this: 'Venerable one, you who maintain moral discipline are one of virtuous qualities, generous in giving freely, delighting in extending a helping hand, one who makes offerings regularly, excelling in generosity, and rejoicing in the act of giving — therefore, as long as the venerable one lives for a long time, merit will increase greatly, and when merit increases greatly, one will long rejoice in the higher realms.' " When the monk has spoken thus, and the one who maintains moral discipline asks him: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" and the monk says: "Venerable one, do not abandon yourself! Do not kill yourself! Do not proceed to deprive yourself of life!" — then, even if that one who maintains moral discipline does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, and does not proceed to deprive himself of life, for that monk, by that very prior effort, a grave offense is incurred.

If the one who maintains moral discipline thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will abandon myself. I will kill myself. I will proceed to deprive myself of life" — and if that one then does abandon himself, does kill himself, or does proceed to deprive himself of life, then for that monk, by that very prior effort, a grave offense is incurred. Such is the case with regard to the one who maintains moral discipline.

As for the case of a sick person: a monk, when a sick person lacks a begging bowl, or a robe, or a net, or a cup, or a belt, or any remaining requisite for the livelihood of a contemplative, thinks to himself: "This venerable one who is ill, suffering, and gravely sick — for as long as he lives, he will not give these to me. Let me go to him and have him die." Having thought this, he goes to that person and says: "Venerable one, you are ill, suffering, and gravely sick. As long as the venerable one lives for a long time, feelings of pain — unbearable, harsh, burning, and disagreeable — will be experienced." When the monk has said this and the sick person asks: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" the monk replies: "Come here, venerable one. Abandon yourself! Kill yourself! Allow yourself to be deprived of life!" If that sick person then abandons himself, kills himself, or proceeds to deprive himself of life, that monk incurs defeat.

If that sick person thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will not abandon myself. I will not kill myself. I will not proceed to deprive myself of life." If that one does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, does not proceed to deprive himself of life — that monk, through that very prior effort, incurs a grave offence.

If that monk, having spoken as described, then feels remorse and goes to that sick person, saying: "Venerable one, know this: it was I who was childish, foolish, unclear in mind, unskilled — I who spoke words without examination, following a confused tangle of thoughts and hasty conclusions. In this way, if the venerable one would please some good spiritual friend, he could attend upon you with medicines that are suitable and beneficial, with appropriate foods and diets, and with nursing care befitting your illness; and thus, before long, the venerable one will come to be at ease, free of illness, possessed of strength, and able to go wherever he pleases." When the monk has said this, and if that sick person then says to the monk: "Venerable one, then what am I to do?" — and the monk replies: "Venerable one, do not abandon yourself! Do not kill yourself! Do not proceed to deprive yourself of life!" — then even if that sick person does not abandon himself, does not kill himself, and does not proceed to deprive himself of life, that monk, through that very prior effort, incurs a grave offence.

If that sick person thinks: "That is indeed so" — yet nevertheless says: "I will abandon myself. I will kill myself. I will proceed to deprive myself of life" — and if he does abandon himself, does kill himself, and does proceed to deprive himself of life — that monk, through that very prior effort, incurs a grave offence. As for the sick person, that is simply how it is with him. It is for this reason that the phrase "caused him to die" is spoken.

Now regarding the phrase "or spoke praise of death in his presence": this means that praise of death is spoken before one who delights in dying. As for the phrase "O man" — this is an address, a respectful vocative. The words "What use is this wretched, defiled, miserable life? O man, it is better for you dead than alive" — these are words of disparagement, the commentary says, meaning they are uttered as reproach. The phrase "with the intention of the mind and the deliberate thought of the mind" means with the mind's manifest desire and the mind's conceptual determination. The phrase "in many ways" means in numerous modes. The mention of "caused him to die, or spoke praise of death before him" is stated in order to reverse the speaking of praise of death — in multiple modes — before one who delights in dying. The phrase "if that one then dies" means that it is through that monk himself alone, and not through another. The phrase "a monk" means whoever possesses the substance of a monk. What is the substance of a monk? It is full ordination. What is full ordination? It is the petition, the performance of the fourfold act of the community, the initial examination, the thorough examination, the completion, and the thorough completion; and that person's acceptance, explicit acceptance, non-reversal, the state of non-reversal, together with the speech, the words, the conventional expression, the utterance, the declaration, the definitive statement, the path of speech, the sound of speech, the act of voice, and the communicative expression of voice. The phrase "that" is an expression of direct and comprehensive indication. The phrase "has incurred defeat" means that one has reached the end, has fallen, has descended, stands at the last, is cut off, and is at variance with the mind.

Furthermore, whoever commits that transgression, immediately upon doing so they become unfit to be a monk, unfit to be a contemplative, unfit to be a son of the Śākyas. They fall away from the substance of monkhood; their manner of being a contemplative is destroyed — diminished, broken, fallen, and defeated — and that manner of being a contemplative cannot be recovered. It is just as when the crown of a palm tree is cut off: it cannot turn green again, cannot grow, flourish, or spread. Likewise, when a monk does such a thing, immediately upon doing so they become unfit to be a monk, unfit to be a contemplative, unfit to be a son of the Śākyas. They fall away from the substance of monkhood; their manner of being a contemplative is destroyed — diminished, broken, fallen, and defeated — and that manner of being a contemplative cannot be recovered. And for this reason it has been declared: "he has incurred defeat; he is not to remain."

The phrase "is not to remain" means that monks are not to carry out with such a person the restoration ceremony (poṣadha), the invitation ceremony (pravāraṇā), a formal act with one motion, a formal act with two motions, or a formal act with four motions. He is not to be appointed to any of the twelve categories of persons. Therefore it has been declared: "is not to remain."

Here ends the Vinaya Analysis, the tenth fascicle.

Now, how does one incur a transgression in this matter? In summary:

By one's own taking hold,
by being cast outward, and by what bears both together — these constitute the complete set of categories.

How is it by one's own taking hold? When a monk, with murderous intent toward a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time," and then presses with a single finger, and that agent does indeed bring about the death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. Even if it does not happen at that time but does happen afterward as a result of what was done, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone.

Just as with a single finger — when one thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" — so too if one presses with two fingers, three, four, or five, with a fist, with an elbow, with a shoulder, with the head, with the chest, with the hip, with the thigh, with the knee, with the heel, with the ankle bone, with the sole of the foot, or even pressing with the big toe of the foot, and that agent does indeed bring about the death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. Even if it does not happen at that time but does happen afterward as a result, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone. Thus it is by one's own taking hold.

How is it by being cast outward? When a monk, with murderous intent toward a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time," and then hurls an arrow, and that agent does indeed bring about the death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. Even if it does not happen at that time but does happen afterward as a result, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone.

Just as with an arrow — when one thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" — so too if one uses an iron arrow, a half-arrow made of iron, a javelin tip, something like a saw-tooth blade, a four-cornered blade, a blade like a karavīra leaf, a blade like a bird's beak, a discus, a single-pointed vajra, a great arrow, or a single-pointed weapon, even if one pierces with a seed of the Chinese juniper — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward as a result, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone — and so it is in the case of what is thrown outward.

How is it that both apply together? If a monk, with intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" and pierces with a sword — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone.

Just as with a sword, so too if one thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" and pierces with a lance, or a single-edged sword, or a double-edged sword, or a spear, or a short spear, or a throwing spear, or a notched blade, or a fire-iron, or even a grass arrow — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone. And so it is in the case where both apply together.

Summary verse: Preparation by poison and by powder; binding to the earth and to a tree; causing intoxication and causing fright; mechanical devices and hunting methods.

If a monk, with intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" — namely, by preparing a poison compound to be placed in food, to be eaten, to be licked, to be chewed, or to be drunk — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone.

If a monk, with intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" and prepares a poison-powder compound to be used in rinsing the mouth, or for bathing, or for rubbing, or in a garland, or a scent, or an unguent, or as incense smoke — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, then the monk incurs a grave offense by virtue of that prior act of engagement alone.

Binding is of two kinds: binding to the earth, and binding to a tree.

If a monk, with intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "May this agent, by this means, bring about that one's death at this time" — whether so that they may be devoured by lions, or tigers, or leopards, or wolves, or jackals; or so that they may be utterly dried out, utterly consumed, or utterly crushed by wind and sun; or so that, oppressed by the feebleness of hunger and thirst, they may die — and with that thought binds them to the earth and then inserts a stake up to its cross-piece — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat.

If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement. And just as with binding up to the cross-piece, so too: with the thought "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — whether so that they may be devoured by lions, or tigers, or leopards, or wolves, or jackals; or so that they may be utterly dried out, utterly consumed, or utterly crushed by wind and sun; or so that, oppressed by the feebleness of hunger and thirst, they may die — and with that thought inserts a stake up to the shoulder, or up to the thigh, or up to the waist, or up to the chest, or up to the throat — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement.

If a monk, with the intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — whether so that they may be devoured by lions, or tigers, or leopards, or wolves, or jackals; or so that they may be utterly dried out, utterly consumed, or utterly crushed by wind and sun; or so that, oppressed by the feebleness of hunger and thirst, they may die — and with that thought binds them to a tree, sets them there, and then binds them with wet rope to a pillar or a firm stake up to the cross-piece — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement.

And just as with binding up to the cross-piece, so too: with the thought "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — whether so that they may be devoured by lions, or tigers, or leopards, or wolves, or jackals; or so that they may be utterly dried out, utterly consumed, or utterly crushed by wind and sun; or so that, oppressed by the feebleness of hunger and thirst, they may die — and with that thought inserts a stake up to the shoulder, or up to the thigh, or up to the waist, or up to the chest, or up to the throat — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement.

If a monk, with the intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinks "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — whether so that they may be devoured by lions, or tigers, or leopards, or wolves, or jackals; or so that they may be utterly dried out, utterly consumed, or utterly crushed by wind and sun; or so that, oppressed by the feebleness of hunger and thirst, they may die — and with that thought causes them to be made intoxicated with liquor — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement.

And just as with liquor, so too: with the thought "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — whether by a king, or a minister, or thieves, or deceitful persons, or ransom-seekers, or enemies —

— or with the thought "may the enemies on the opposing side bring about death at this time" — whether through prepared liquor or grain-based liquor, whether prepared liquor or a drink made from roots, a drink made from stems, a drink made from leaves, a drink made from flowers, or a drink made from fruit, causing that person to become intoxicated; or through secret mantras, or medicines, or incantations, causing mental disturbance or inducing sleep — and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement.

If a monk, with the intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, engages in an undertaking with the thought "by this agent thus commencing, may this one's death be brought about at this time" — striking the chest — and with the thought "may whatever hand, or foot, or face, or limb, or secondary limb of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex who comes there be cut off," or "may that person in every respect be deprived of life" — and accordingly provides that person with a sword, or a knife, or a razor: if that agent then cuts off whatever hand, or foot, or face, or limb, or secondary limb, or in every respect deprives that person of life, and if that very agent, having so commenced, brings about death at that time, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time but happens afterward, the monk incurs defeat. If it does not happen at that time and does not happen afterward either, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very prior engagement. The same is to be said regarding mechanical devices and hunting implements.

Summary verse:

A zombie, and half a zombie, pressing the side, and cutting off life,
a precipice, water, and fire,
an emissary, and cold and heat.

A monk, with the intent to kill a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, goes to a charnel ground on the fourteenth day of the waning fortnight of the month, and there seeks out a fresh corpse not yet damaged or decomposed — one not so much as disturbed by tiny insects — and having found one, rolls it up with white clay and works it over, and having done so, washes it with fragrant water, and having washed it with fragrant water, puts on it a garment of white cloth, and binds its two feet together with thread, and recites secret mantras — and it rises up and begins to stagger about. At that point, the monk places it on a chariot with two wheels, and hangs two bells at its neck, and gives into its hands a double-edged sword, and it rises up, lurching and clattering, and says: "Whom shall I let go? Whom shall I kill? Whom shall I deprive of life?" At that point, if the monk says to the zombie: "Do you know of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex?" and when it says "I know," the monk then says: "Release that one. Slay that one. Deprive that one of life." And if the zombie then releases, or slays, or deprives that person of life, the monk incurs defeat.

If, however, something acts as a protection at that moment — such as a garland of black wood hung at the door, or a full vase set in place, or a tethered cow and calf, or a tethered sheep, or a scattering of mustard seed set out, or a wheel inscribed at the threshold, or a fire lit there, or a Victor (a buddha image) placed there, or a Victor's teaching proclaimed there, or a wheel-turning king, or a wheel-turning king present in the womb of a wheel-turning king's mother, or a bodhisattva present in the womb of a bodhisattva's mother, or someone reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra who has not yet recited it before, or someone chanting it at length with melodious voice when it has already been recited, or someone reciting any one of the four divisions of the sūtra collections when it has not previously been recited, or someone chanting it at length with melodious voice when it has already been recited, or one of these great and mighty great sūtras being recited or chanted — namely: the Lesser Emptiness, the Greater Emptiness, the Fifty-Three, the Net of Illusion, the Reception by the Embodied Essence, the Sacred Victory Banner, the All-Pervading, the Non-Pervading, the Harmonious Sūtra, and the Sūtra of the Great Assembly — then, because it amounts to releasing the zombie, the zombie will form the intention to kill the monk himself. If the zombie then kills the monk, the monk incurs a grave offence. If the monk kills the zombie, the monk incurs two grave offences: one arising from having killed the zombie, and the second from that very prior act of preparation.

What applies to a full zombie applies equally to a half-zombie, and yet there is this distinction between a full zombie and a half-zombie: placing it on a cart that has a single wheel, hanging a single bell around its neck, or giving it into its hand a sword with a single edge — this is called a half-zombie. The analysis of the transgressions is to be stated in every respect as before.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a woman, strikes a pregnant woman's belly thinking "I will kill the woman but not the one dwelling in the womb," and if the woman dies but the one dwelling in the womb does not die, the monk incurs defeat. If the one dwelling in the womb dies but the woman does not die, the monk incurs a grave offence arising from that very prior act of preparation. If both die, the monk incurs defeat. If neither dies, the monk incurs a grave offence arising from that very prior act of preparation.

If a monk, with the intention of killing the one dwelling in the womb, strikes a pregnant woman's belly thinking "I will kill the one in the womb but not the woman," and if the one dwelling in the womb dies but the woman does not die, the monk incurs defeat. If the woman dies but the one dwelling in the womb does not die, the monk incurs a grave offence arising from that very prior act of preparation. If both die, the monk incurs defeat. If neither dies, the monk incurs a grave offence arising from that very prior act of preparation.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, causes someone to rise from a seat, has them don a lower robe, has them walk, draws a maṇḍala, lights a fire, inserts fuel-sticks for burning, recites secret mantras, and thinks "May these fuel-sticks for burning be consumed, and may the life of some man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex be extinguished" — then, if those fuel-sticks burn yet the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is not extinguished, the monk incurs a grave offence. If those fuel-sticks burn and the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is thereby extinguished, the monk incurs defeat.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, causes someone to rise from a seat, has them don a lower robe, has them walk, pours a small measure of sesame or a small measure of white mustard into a mortar and strikes it with the tip of the pestle, recites a secret mantra, thinking, "May these grains also become mixed, and may the life of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex be thereby extinguished" — then, if those grains become mixed but the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is not thereby extinguished, the monk incurs a grave offence. If those grains become mixed and the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is thereby extinguished, the monk incurs defeat.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, causes someone to rise from a seat, has them don a lower robe, has them walk, pours a small measure of milk or a small measure of yoghurt into a vessel and stirs it with a finger, recites a secret mantra, thinking, "May this too become blood, and may the life of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex be thereby extinguished" — then, if that liquid becomes blood but the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is not thereby extinguished, the monk incurs a grave offence. If that liquid becomes blood and the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is thereby extinguished, the monk incurs defeat.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, threads a needle with a five-coloured thread and sews a patch, recites a secret mantra, thinking, "May this patch also be sewn through, and may the life of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex be thereby extinguished" — then, if that patch is sewn through but the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is not thereby extinguished, the monk incurs a grave offence. If that patch is sewn through and the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is thereby extinguished, the monk incurs defeat.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, draws seven lines on the ground, recites a secret mantra, thinking, "May these lines also be crossed, and may the life of some man, or woman, or person of indeterminate sex be thereby extinguished" — then, if those lines are crossed but the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is not thereby extinguished, the monk incurs a grave offence. If those lines are crossed and the life of that man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex is thereby extinguished, the monk incurs defeat.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinking, "May this one, by means of such-and-such an action, meet their end at such-and-such a time," causes them to be thrown from a precipice — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that action, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

Similarly with regard to a precipice: if a monk, thinking, "May this one, by means of such-and-such an action, meet their end at such-and-such a time," causes them to fall to the ground from a mansion, or from a wall, or from the back of an elephant, or from the back of a horse, or from a coiled rope, or from a throne, or from a small seat, or from the shoulder, or from the chest, or from the hip, or from the thigh, or from the knee, or from the shin, or even from the ankle — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that action, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, causes that person to be submerged in water, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end," and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

Just as it is with water, so too, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end," if a monk causes that person to be submerged in the great ocean to the east, or in the great ocean to the south, or in the great ocean to the west, or in the great ocean to the north, or in a lake, or in a pond, or in a marsh — or even causes only a handful of water to be poured into that person's mouth — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, causes that person to be cast into fire, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end," and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

Just as it is with fire, so too, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end," if a monk sets fire to a city, or sets fire to a village, or sets fire to a district, or to a royal palace, or causes that person to be driven into such a conflagration — or even causes only a spark to be introduced — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end — whether devoured by lions, or by tigers, or by leopards, or by bears, or by wolves, or wasted away, utterly consumed, or utterly destroyed by sun and wind, or brought to their end through the debilitation of hunger and thirst" — sends that person off toward a place of danger, and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person neither meets their end at that time nor dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offence by reason of that prior act of engagement alone.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, or a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, thinking, "By this act of engagement may this one meet their end" — during those cold seasons and times of extreme cold, on the eighth-day intervals of those months when piercing winds arise that let no light through, causes that person to be held in the open above during the day and kept without shelter or covering through the night, and upon them repeatedly inflicts blows with a bundle of grass — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat.

If that person does not meet their end at that time, nor thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very same act of engagement.

If a monk, with the intention of killing a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex, undertakes an act of engagement thinking "may this one meet their end" — during those hot seasons and times of extreme heat, on the eighth-day intervals of those months when fine creatures are born from the heat that falls upon open ground, causes that person to be held without shelter or covering during the day and kept above, exposed, through the night, and upon their body inflicts cuts with a sickle or scraping with an awl, and also causes them to inhale smoke and sit in it — and if that person does indeed meet their end through that act of engagement, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time but dies thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs defeat. If that person does not meet their end at that time, nor thereafter from that same cause, the monk incurs a grave offense through that very same act of engagement.

Summary verse:

The warming house and the fire house, the sunlit place and the second,
the protective enclosure — seventeen categories.
The cliff-dwellers and the aged are included.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in a pastoral region, in the finest forest of that pastoral place. There a certain monk who was an almsman used to go at regular, fitting times to the home of a certain householder, and would also give Dharma teachings there. In due course that monk established the householder in taking refuge and set him firmly in the bases of the training. Thereafter the monk again approached that householder and gave an extensive account in praise of the seven bases for the performance of merit arising from material goods. The householder said, "Noble one, I too would be pleased to perform some basis for merit arising from material goods for the Saṅgha." The almsman said, "Householder, do it well indeed! Noble one, what do you wish to do?" "Householder, the Saṅgha has no warming house — please let that be done." "Noble one, I do have kārṣāpaṇa coins, yet I have no assistant for merit." "Householder, I myself will be your assistant for merit."

"Noble one, excellent!" That householder presented the almsman with kārṣāpaṇa coins, and the almsman set about having a warming house built for the Saṅgha.

Then, on a certain other occasion, a seasonal festival arose in that pastoral region, and the hired workers did not come. The almsman called to them and said, "Good friends, why have you not come today?" They said, "Noble one, today is a festival of the world, and for that reason we have not come." The almsman said, "Good friends — those who live by the fruit of merit, they have a festival; what sort of festival do you who live by the fruit of hired labor have? Come here and do your work, and for that reason I will give you double wages." They said, "Noble one, those who live by the fruit of merit always have their festival; but we live by the fruit of hired labor, and for that very reason a festival comes to us once in a hundred times — even if you were to give us triple wages, today we will not work." They refused and went away, and the almsman sat there feeling quite disheartened.

The householder thought, "How much of the virtuous giving that I intended to undertake has been accomplished, and how much has not?" and thinking thus, the next morning he rose early and went, and seeing that no work at all was being done he went to the almsman, prostrated at his feet, and said, "Noble one, are the hired workers not working today?" "Householder, they are not working."

"Why?" Because they said, "Today is a worldly festival, and so we will not work." The householder said, "Noble one, those workers live by the fruit of wage-labor, so if you do not pay them wages, noble one, it is no wonder that it did not succeed and nothing was accomplished." The almsman said, "Householder, even when I offered to double their wages it was not enough. They said, 'Those noble ones who live by the fruit of merit — for them every single day is a festival. But we live by the fruit of wage-labor, and for that very reason a festival comes to us once in a hundred times — even if you were to give us triple wages, today we will not work.'" The householder said, "Noble one, I do not do this for my own sake, nor for the sake of my relatives; I do it for the sake of the noble ones. Ah, would that the noble ones too might once in every hundred times keep an empty alms-bowl day!" The almsman then spoke to the monks about this matter, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "So long as no rule has been established, monks may keep an empty alms-bowl day."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks might keep an empty alms-bowl day so long as no rule had been established, the monks began to keep the empty alms-bowl day and proceeded to fling pot-scraping tools at one another. In the course of this, one monk flung a pot-scrapers at another monk, it slipped from his hand and struck the other monk on the head, and the monk died on the spot. Those monks were stricken with remorse, and being ill at ease they said, "Venerable ones, because the almsman had nothing to do, and work has been abandoned, we have come to dislike our celibate practice, and we have fallen into remorse wondering whether a defeat downfall may not have occurred for us." At this the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "There is no downfall for you. Furthermore, monks should not fling pot-scrapers; rather they should pass them hand to hand. If something is sharp-edged or broken, one should give warning and then pass it. If one passes it without giving warning, it becomes a serious offense."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks should keep an empty alms-bowl day, the monks did their work in the early dawn, and brahmins and householders reproached them, mocked them, and criticized them, saying, "Why do these monks do their work in the early dawn like hired workers?" At this the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Do not work in the early dawn; do it once in this way instead." The monks then did their work in the afternoon in summer and in the morning in winter, whereupon the Blessed One declared, "Do it in the morning in summer and in the afternoon in winter."

When they reached the end of their allotted time and then went out on alms-rounds with bodies smeared with mud and filth, the non-believers would jeer at them saying, "Noble ones, you have even surpassed the hired workers — those workers abandon the meal-time altogether, yet you do not even abandon the meal-time!" At this the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Those who are on alms-rounds should, having prepared in advance, enter the village for alms at a suitable time, and those who manage the Saṅgha's requisites should, having prepared in advance, send the monks off into the midst of the Saṅgha at a suitable time, knowing the right moment to do so."

Having declared that one should enter the village for alms after preparing in advance, and should likewise enter into the midst of the Saṅgha, the monks did not know how much preparation was to be considered sufficient. The Blessed One then declared, "The amount of preparation that is sufficient is just this: having washed both hands, both feet, and the alms bowl."

"Furthermore, I shall set out the rules of conduct for monks who do carrying work. A monk who does carrying work should, at the appropriate time of day, have boys employed for the morning shift. In the afternoon, those employed should be for carrying water and for massaging the hands and feet. If a monk who does carrying work does not properly take up and perform the rules of conduct as they have been prescribed, he shall incur an offense. As for the case of alms-gatherers in a pastoral area being made to build a warming hut, that full account is to be given in exactly the same way as the case of the fire house. There is, however, this distinction: after the Blessed One had declared that a monk should carry the empty frame before the ground has been leveled, the monks were doing the work on the fire house while moving the planks back and forth, and a carpenter was underneath them. While the planks were being moved, a plank slipped from a monk's hands and struck the carpenter on the head, killing him on the spot. Thereupon those monks, thinking with remorse that since they had dismissed the monk-workers from the alms-round, a defeat transgression might have come upon them, reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, 'Monks, you have incurred no transgression. Yet monks should not lift a load that is beyond their strength. If such a circumstance arises, lay people should in brief be engaged to help with lifting, and what is to be lifted and what is to be set down should be stated, so that lifting and setting down are done together. If monks lift a load beyond their strength, they incur an offense.'"

After the Blessed One had declared that monks should not lift loads beyond their strength, the monks did not know how much was within their strength and how much was beyond it. The Blessed One then declared, "Whatever is the load of one layman, that load should be carried by two monks."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Śārika subdued a wild woman and she took refuge and undertook the bases of training, she prostrated at the feet of the venerable Śārika and offered him all her possessions, and the venerable Śārika accepted them and said, "Sister, the teaching of the Blessed One has entered into taking care of others with benefit; therefore I too must bring benefit to others." The wild woman said, "Noble one, if that is indeed so and you are not unwilling, I have arranged a sage's seat for the noble one; it would be fitting for you to enjoy the sage's seat after going on alms-rounds and then depart." The venerable Śārika said, "Sister, let it be so." And so each day the venerable Śārika would go on alms-rounds, then enjoy the sage's seat at the wild woman's home, and depart.

Some time later an occasion arose for the venerable Śārika to go on a tour of the region, and the venerable Śārika thought, "I shall go and visit my sister." So the venerable Śārika went to the wild woman's home and said, "Sister, I am going on a regional tour. Please take care of your Dharma-body." The wild woman said, "Noble one, it would be fitting to return quickly. Please do not stay there long or take delight in it." The venerable Śārika looked after the wild woman and departed on his regional tour. Then the venerable Ānanda said to the monks, "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is going on a regional tour; whoever among you wishes to go on tour together with the Blessed One should prepare your robes and bowl."

When the venerable Śārika heard this, he thought, "Travelling as a buddha has eighteen benefits: freedom from the fear of kings, freedom from the fear of thieves, freedom from the fear of fire, freedom from the fear of humans, freedom from the fear of non-human beings, freedom from the fear of nāgas, freedom from the fear of the vicious, freedom from the fear of lions, freedom from the fear of tigers, freedom from the fear of bears, freedom from the fear of enemy armies, freedom from the fear of wolves, freedom from the fear of scorpions, freedom from the fear of foxes, freedom from the fear of crocodiles; from time to time one sees divine forms and hears divine sounds, one hears the speech of omniscient ones, and one partakes of Dharma-enjoyment and material enjoyment, and harm is rare when travelling as a buddha. Therefore I too shall turn back in order to go on tour together with the Blessed One." And so the venerable Śārika turned back.

In the meantime, a young woman in the wild woman's household had given birth to a baby boy, and the wild woman said to the boy's mother, "Daughter, wash this baby, wrap him in white cloth, and lay him on this sage's seat; he will live long and grow up with a long life." The young woman washed the baby, wrapped him in white cloth, and regularly laid him on that sage's seat.

Then on another day the venerable Śārika went on alms-rounds and came to the place of the wild woman's home. Now, arhats do not apply knowledge or perception without prior reflection; so the venerable Śārika sat down on that sage's seat in the usual way. As he was examining the scene around him, there came cries of "Noble one! Noble one! The baby!" — and the venerable Śārika quickly rose and looked, and saw that the baby had passed his time. The household members began to wail, and the venerable Śārika said, "Sister, do not weep. This sentient being has performed the karma that leads to a short life; and the Blessed One himself has declared, 'All formations are impermanent.' Nevertheless, it falls to me to wail here, for although I myself have attained arhathood, because of me the Blessed One will establish a training rule in the Vinaya by which the hearers shall abide."

He then reported the occasion to the monks, and the monks presented it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, the monk Śārika has committed no transgression. Nevertheless, a monk must not sit down on a seat in another's home without examining it first. If he does so, it will constitute an offense of wrong conduct."

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there was a wealthy householder of great possessions and large estate — a companion in conversation, one spoken of with welcome, a friend and associate — and they were a pair joined in close mutual affection.

In time it came to pass that the two of them lost their wealth and their possessions were exhausted. They began to take counsel together: "We two have fallen into poverty and ruin right here. What is the use of living on and enjoying life in such a condition as this? Let us go forth into renunciation." And so the two of them went forth into renunciation in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya.

Then at a certain point one of them fell ill, and the other took to nursing him. The sick monk's condition was grave and he did not recover. The nurse-monk said to the sick monk, "Venerable one, when you were a householder in former times, did an illness such as this occur on more than one occasion?" "It occurred before as well." "Then what brought it to remission?" "A salt-medicine preparation." "Then why are you not drinking a salt-medicine preparation?" The nurse-monk prepared a salt-medicine preparation and administered it to the sick monk. The sick monk then met with the phenomenon of his time — that is, he died — and the monk who had nursed him was stricken with remorse, thinking, "Might it be that I gave him something that was not medicine?" He reported the matter to the other monks at that time, the monks brought it before the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that monk has committed no transgression. Nevertheless, a monk must not administer medicine to a sick person on his own judgment without first consulting a physician. If no physician is available, he should consult an ordained physician. If there is no ordained physician, he should consult one trained by a physician. If there is no one trained by a physician, he should consult those who have themselves been afflicted by illness. If there is no one who has been afflicted by illness, he should consult the senior monks, the elders. If a monk administers medicine to a sick person on his own judgment, without consulting a physician or following the prescribed order of inquiry as taught, it will constitute a serious offense."

The monks were troubled by doubt, and in order to resolve all their doubts they addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, what was the cause, what was the condition, by which what was medicine for that monk became non-medicine?" The Blessed One declared: "In former times when he was a householder, his disorder was one of wind and phlegm; but now it has become one of wind and bile. Therefore what was medicine for him then has now become non-medicine for him."

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the Blessed One had set out the Truths before the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, together with eighty thousand gods and many hundreds and thousands of the brahmaṇas and householders of Magadha, at that time the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, had a proclamation sounded by drum throughout Rājagṛha, declaring: "Let the wise assemblies of merchants dwelling in Rājagṛha, those who circulate within the palace precincts, and those who have come from various regions, hear this: no one shall commit robbery in my territory. Whoever commits robbery in my territory, I shall expel him from the territory. As for whatever stolen goods belong to those who have been robbed, I will give restitution from my treasury and storerooms."

Then at the time when the Blessed One had tamed the king of Kosala, Prasenajit, by means of the sūtra of the simile of the youth, the king of Kosala, Prasenajit, likewise had a proclamation sounded by drum throughout Śrāvastī, declaring: "Let the wise assemblies of merchants dwelling in Śrāvastī, those who circulate within the palace precincts, and those who have come from various regions, hear this: no one shall commit robbery in my territory. Whoever commits robbery in my territory, I shall have him bound over to the capital case of death. As for whatever stolen goods belong to those who have been robbed, I will give restitution from my treasury and storerooms."

Now at that time, those robbers who dwelt in the territory of Magadha and those robbers who dwelt in the territory of Kosala went as far as the border and encamped there. And the rumor spread everywhere that the robbers dwelling in the territory of Magadha and the robbers dwelling in the territory of Kosala had gone as far as the border, encamped there, and were about to join forces and make common cause.

Hearing this, those from Magadha, with their confederates dispersed, set out toward the territory of Kosala, while those from Kosala, with their confederates dispersed, set out toward the territory of Magadha. Then at a later time, the confederates from Magadha advanced into Kosala, and when they crossed the border and entered the territory of Kosala, the caravan leader spoke: "Friends, this King Prasenajit of Kosala is known to be fierce, ruthless, greatly savage, brave, and powerful. Even if our confederate robbers are defeated, he would still be able to give us the stolen goods. So release the confederates." The confederates replied, "Leader, if that is so, then we will do as you say," and they released the confederates.

Now the robbers had set out their decoy horses and encamped, and when the decoy horses saw the confederates being released, the robbers said: "Friends, the confederates have turned back. Let us go and break the alliance and destroy them." So they attacked the alliance as it entered the Śāla grove.

There some of the merchants were slain, and some fled. Those who fled came with dust-covered heads to King Prasenajit of Kosala and said: "Sire, we merchants have been declared unfit to trade in your territory. What happened? Sire, we were attacked by robbers."

The king commanded his military officer Āryajanman: "Young man, go at once and bring back those robbers and the stolen goods quickly." The military officer Āryajanman, obeying the command of King Prasenajit of Kosala, saying "As the king commands," armored the fourfold military force — the host of elephants, the host of cavalry, the host of chariots, and the host of infantry — and went swiftly and quickly to the Śāla grove. Meanwhile, the robbers had entered into the very dense heart of the Śāla grove, relaxed their guard, and were dividing the stolen goods. Āryajanman fell upon them, and there some of the robbers were slain, some fled, and sixty robbers were taken alive.

Then, victorious in battle, he took the robbers and the stolen goods and went to King Prasenajit of Kosala, prostrated at his feet, and said: "Sire, here are the robbers; here are the stolen goods."

The king said to the robbers: "Friends, did you not hear me have this proclamation sounded by drum: that no one shall commit robbery in my territory; that whoever commits robbery in my territory I shall bind over to the capital case of death; and that the stolen goods belonging to those who have been robbed I will give restitution from my treasury and storerooms?"

"Sire, we heard."

"Then why did you attack these merchants?"

"Sire, we had no livelihood."

"But even so, why did you slay others?"

"Sire, it was to inspire fear."

"I too will now inspire in you such fear as no one has ever inspired in you before."

The king, in his fury, commanded his ministers: "Friends, take these criminals to their place of execution today and cut off their hands and feet."

"Give back whatever was stolen from these merchants out of my treasury and storerooms." The ministers led those robbers to the charnel ground, cut off their hands and feet, and gave the merchants their stolen goods from the royal treasury and storerooms.

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, again and again examine carefully your own ruin and the ruin of others. Again and again examine carefully your own prosperity and the prosperity of others. And why? Because both one's own ruin and the ruin of others are grounds for disenchantment, and because both one's own prosperity and the prosperity of others are likewise grounds for disenchantment."

Having so declared, the monks rose up again and again and set out to wander through the charnel ground. The nuns too rose up again and again and set out to wander through the charnel ground. At that time a great many people went wandering through the charnel ground, and they began to examine the robbers one by one. And then a certain other person who had been sitting there watching them said: "If someone who wished to do good were to pour a salt-water medicinal decoction into these people, when they die and pass from this place they would go on to drink the milk of young mothers."

Among those nuns there was one nun named Skyongma — a stout, foolish, dim-witted creature — who heard this and thought to herself: "If I am going to be wholly spent from a stock of merit such as this, then what do I gain by having gone forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya? Let me go and fetch salt-water medicinal decoction and pour it into these people." So nun Skyongma stepped out from among the nuns, went to her lodgings, gathered up a bag of salt-water medicinal decoction and sixty bowls, and went to where the robbers were. The robbers, tormented by painful sensations and heedless of their lives, were burning with thirst, and they thought: "Oh! If this noble woman were to pour water from that vessel to quench our thirst, how fitting that would be!" Skyongma, with a perception of merit, gave each one a bowl and let them drink the salt-water medicinal decoction; and whoever drank it died at that very moment, and thus all of them died at the right time. While Skyongma was administering the salt-water medicinal decoction to the robbers it became night, and when she arrived at the bolted door of the nuns' summer residence, Skyongma came and knocked at the door gently, tap by tap. The nuns asked: "Who is it knocking at the door?" Skyongma said: "It is I, Skyongma." "You — where have you come from at this hour of the night?" "Sisters, rejoice! Rejoice! Have you yourself realized arhatship, or the fruit of non-returning, or the fruit of once-returning, or the fruit of stream-entry? Or have you had a Dharma hall built for the Saṅgha?" "No, sisters, none of those." "Then have you provided cooked rice, or congee, or porridge, or a full bolt of cloth?" Skyongma said: "Sisters, is there really no work other than providing cooked rice, congee, porridge, and bolts of cloth? What else have you done?" "Have you seen those sixty robbers whose hands and feet were cut off?" "Yes, we have." "I fetched salt-water medicinal decoction, made them drink it, and when they drank it they died at the right time, and so they went on to drink the milk of young mothers." "You wretch! You, whose belly is destined to be filled by those who have lost their share — do you expect us to rejoice in that?"

Then she thought, "Has there perhaps come upon me a transgression amounting to a full defeat?" Remorse arose in her, and she immediately reported the matter to the monks. The monks informed the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "O monks, since that nun had both the perception and the intention, a defeat has occurred. Therefore, a monk or a nun must not administer medicine to a sick person with the intention that the sick person should die at the right time; one must administer medicine only with the intention that the sick person recover from illness. If a monk administers medicine to a sick person with the intention that the sick person should die at the right time, that constitutes a serious offence."

The awakened one, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At a certain time, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had fully ordained and brought to complete ordination the group of seventeen young men born near Sārpaskṛta, beginners and youths. From that time onward, whenever any one member of the group of seventeen was assigned a duty, all of them would gather together and do it. So it was that one evening the same thing happened in that temple: a Dharma teaching was being given in the night, and all of them gathered together and made noise. The following day a warming house for the Saṅgha was arranged, and again all of them gathered together and made noise. The day after that, the duty of disciplinarian fell to one member of the group of seventeen, and on that day too all of them decorated the temple and stood assembled. Then when it came time for the disciplinarian to make the announcement, one thought arose in that member of the group of seventeen: "I alone will stay behind on account of exhaustion — why should the sixteen others be unable to make the announcement?" And in exactly the same way, the same thought arose in each of the others, so all sixteen went off separately to sleep. The disciplinarian alone, working from the night onward, at the break of dawn gathered up the lamp-vessels, opened the doors, swept the temple clean, applied plaster, arranged the time signal, spread out the seats, wafted incense around the area of the stūpa, then went up onto the roof of the temple and began to strike the gong. At the sound of the gong the sixteen awoke in their respective quarters, took their bowls, and came out. When they saw the disciplinarian running back and forth alone, they said to one another: "Venerable friends, while this one is running back and forth alone, did none of us among you help him?" One of them said: "The thought came to me: I will stay behind on account of exhaustion — why should the sixteen others be unable to make the announcement?" And in the same way the others said the same thing, and still others said the same thing, until all of them had said the very same words. Then the sixteen said: "Venerable friends, since this one is the first to go to all our immediate duties, our not having helped him was something we did badly, and he will reproach us for it. Let us eat our meal at once and then beg his pardon." So they ate, and then began to beg his pardon. The junior ones touched both his feet; the senior ones embraced him around the neck, saying "Venerable one, please grant forgiveness," but he sat there without saying a word. One of them who was his closest friend tickled him, and then he began to laugh and said "Forgiven!" The others thought, "That is a good method," and another also tickled him, and so on until all of them in turn had tickled him. At that, wind stirred upward in him and he died at the right time. They began to mourn for him with lamentation and grief,

The monks said, "Hey, you of the Group of Seventeen — why are you sitting there grieving and lamenting?" They replied, "We who were formerly the Group of Seventeen are now the Group of Sixteen. A beloved companion in the holy life has departed from us, and a defeat downfall has come about." The monks said "That is not good!" and left. Those sixteen then all departed together, and when other monks saw them sitting there absorbed in grief, those monks began to taunt them, saying, "These venerable ones of the Group of Seventeen flare up and die out in an instant, like a grass fire — one moment they are raucous and the next they are sitting there sunk in silence." But those sixteen, their hearts burned by the fire of grief, said nothing, and sat there even as the others mocked them. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no transgression for those monks. Yet a monk should not tickle. If he does, it is an offense entailing a penalty."

The Vinaya, Section Eleven.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. Not far from Śrāvastī there was a rocky cliff, and dwelling there was a householder who was wealthy, possessed of great riches and abundant means. He was a man of faith, of good character, and of wholesome intentions, and so he had a magnificent temple built for the Saṅgha — with lofty gabled roofs, with windows, with latticed windows, adorned with balustrades, a structure that could steal the heart and captivate the eyes, like a stairway to the heavens. Sixty monks spent the rains retreat in that temple, and when they had departed, the householder stationed a guard there, saying, "Let no one steal the seats or benches."

Now at another time sixty other monks were traveling on a journey through the region and came to that rocky cliff to seek lodging for the night. A man said to them, "Venerable ones, why do you not stay in the temple? There is a fine temple here." "Noble friend, where is it?" "Venerable ones, it is in this hermitage." So those monks went there, and when the guard saw them arrive he welcomed them with words of greeting, assigned them their quarters, and provided them with seats, small seats, cushions with inner padding, and similar furnishings. He swept and cleaned the place, and said to them, "Venerable ones, please wait a little while — I will go and inform the householder." He went to the householder and said, "Householder, rejoice! Sixty monks have arrived unexpectedly at your temple." The householder roused himself with zeal and said to his household people, "Good people, satisfy the Saṅgha of monks who have come to my temple with a well-prepared drink — with sugar, molasses, licorice, ginger, and the drink of Nepalese oranges." The householder prepared the well-prepared drink and went to the temple, and the monks, having washed, were seated each in their customary manner. The householder saw those monks from a great distance, and seeing the temple as though it were filled with lotus blossoms on a lake, moved by a surge of broad and deep faith, he spoke these verses:

Whether village or forest hermitage,
Whether valley or open plain,
Wherever noble ones abide and practice —
That ground itself becomes a place of joy.

Then, having prepared the well-prepared drink beforehand, he satisfied the community of monks with it from his own hands. He himself took up a small round vessel and, together with the community of monks, paid homage at the stūpa, then entered the temple and sat down to one side of the elders. The senior elder of the community gave the thanks-offering, and the householder prostrated at his feet and said, "Venerable ones, I request that tomorrow the noble Saṅgha accept noon refreshments at my home — whatever it pleases you to take." The monks accepted, and the householder prostrated at their feet and departed.

The next day, the householder satisfied the monks with an abundant meal, and at an off-hour also poured out drink for them; and the monks, in turn, taught the Dharma. Later, as before, the senior elder of the community again gave the thanks-offering. The householder sat to one side of the elders and spoke: "Noble ones, this temple was not built by me for my own sake, nor was it built for the sake of my relatives — it was built entirely for the sake of the noble ones. Therefore, please consent to observe the rains retreat here, and I shall ensure that the noble ones lack for none of their requisites."

The monks replied, "Householder, in Śrāvastī the Blessed One, the Lord of the Dharma, is himself present, and from time to time one hears news that a certain eminent monk has actualized arhatship, and a certain eminent monk has understood the interval up to the end of this unpleasant life. The king, too, has the very deepest faith in the teaching. There are also the garland-wearing queen, the royal-clan woman Varṣakula, the chaplain sage Jina, the elder Nyingpa, the laywoman Sāgā, the mother Mṛgadhāra, and many others who have faith — and through them great material provision and great Dharma provision alike will be obtained. We intend to go there."

The householder said, "Noble ones, Dharma provision depends on the noble ones themselves, while material provision depends on me. Therefore be pleased to stay, and not the slightest thing will be lacking." The senior elder of the community spoke: "Friends, the Blessed One has instructed that the faith of the faithful is to be increased and that the sponsor is to be treated with affectionate care. Therefore let us remain here." And so they resolved to remain there.

Then, with settled minds, they began to inspect that temple, both inside and outside, and they found it exceedingly delightful, adorned with abundant flowers and abundant fruit. The senior elder of the community spoke: "Friends, this temple is adorned with abundant flowers and abundant fruit and is exceedingly delightful. If we were to accept observing the earlier rains retreat here, we would not be able to enjoy all the flowers and fruits in full. Let us therefore definitely accept observing the later rains retreat." And so they accepted to observe the later rains retreat there.

The householder had only that single temple, and so everything he wished to give and to do he gave and did in that temple alone. As for that cliff face, since there was no other temple there either, whatever the cliff-dwellers wished to give and to do, they too gave and did in that very temple.

Since there was no other temple in the vicinity of that cliff face either, all those who lived near the cliff likewise gave and did in that very temple whatever they wished to give and to do. And so the monks who had accepted to observe the rains retreat there received abundant offerings.

When the invitation ceremony had just concluded at the end of the last month of autumn, those with sinister intentions gathered together and began to deliberate among themselves, saying: "What shall we do so that we may live in ease and plenty throughout the year without having to search for our needs?" And they conceived this thought: "We must destroy these renunciants, the sons of the Śākyas."

But others among them said: "Even if they were to recite a hundred times at a door without getting a full meal, it would be hard for them to fill their bellies. If they have nothing at all, why should we stay here this long?" Then one among them who knew something of monks' affairs said: "What do you know? Those monks have a great deal. For how could it be otherwise? The householder who owns this temple is a man of faith, good and virtuous in his intentions, and since this temple is his only one, everything he wishes to give and to do he gives and does in this temple alone. And since there is no other temple in this cliff area either, those who live on the cliff likewise give and do in this very temple whatever they wish to give and to do. And since there is no other temple in the vicinity of this cliff either, those who live near the cliff also give and do in this very temple whatever they wish to give and to do. That is why the monks who accepted to observe the rains retreat here have received abundant offerings. If you do not believe it, go and see for yourself — it will be evident to you with your own eyes."

"If that is so, you yourself go first and see with your own eyes, and we will come after." The other replied: "Excellent! Very well — I will go," and adjusting his robe, he paid homage to the stūpa with melodious verses from a noble tree, and entered that temple.

Just as he was entering the gatehouse, he found an elder monk sitting there. The man with sinister intentions bowed at the elder's feet and began to ask: "Noble one, this temple that steals the heart and dazzles the eyes, this stairway to the heavenly realms — who does it belong to?"

"Fair-faced one, it belongs to a great householder."

"Noble one, is this a proper temple, or is it a poor one?"

"Fair-faced one, what is a proper temple, and what is a poor one?"

"Noble one, where the furnishings are complete and well-appointed, that is a proper temple. Where the furnishings are absent, that is a poor one."

"Fair-faced one, then this is indeed a proper temple and not a poor one, for it has complete furnishings, and furnishings are not lacking here."

"Noble one, those who eat food never eat bare earth, and those who wear robes never wear tree-bark — so do you all happen to have any robes?"

Now the elder was of an upright and honest nature. He took the man with sinister intentions by the hand, led him inside a storeroom, and said: "Fair-faced one, look at these stacks of cloth and robes piled high."

"Noble one, are these yours, or do they belong to the Saṅgha?"

"Fair-faced one, these belong to me personally."

"Noble one, then you yourself are surely a senior elder of the Saṅgha, or perhaps a Dharma-teacher?"

"Fair-faced one, I am neither a senior elder of the Saṅgha nor a Dharma-teacher. Rather, I am a newly admitted member of the Saṅgha — a novice."

"Noble one, is there perhaps a little bedding here belonging to the Saṅgha?"

"Fair-faced one, there is plenty. And for the time being, from my own painted storeroom you may also obtain those seven goods." "Noble one, please go then, and make this request: in this temple, is there anyone who does not do temple service? Now, are they cooking in earthenware vessels or in copper vessels?" "Fair-faced one, do you see these dwelling rooms?" "Noble one, I do." "Fair-faced one, these dwelling rooms are filled with copper vessels."

The man with sinister intentions thought: "I have now gathered good information — it is time to go." So the man with sinister intentions said: "Noble one, your side of virtue is entirely lost, and my own purpose has entirely miscarried, so I shall be going now." "Fair-faced one, be on your way then."

The man with sinister intentions paid homage at the feet of that elder and departed. He then went to those thieves and said: "Lotus-eyed ones, there is a great boat laden with all manner of goods moored on the bank — seize it! Seize it!" Then one among them said: "The sixty renunciants (pravrajyā) staying there are said to be masters of the throwing arts alone, so it will not be possible to overpower them in that way. When they gather at night to hear the Dharma, attack them then." Others said: "On what day does their Dharma hearing take place?" He replied: "On the eighth and the fourteenth, and since the eighth has already passed, it will take place on the fourteenth." They then counted the days on their fingers, and in due course the fourteenth arrived.

The elder of the Saṅgha recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra, the Saṅgha performed the restoration ceremony (poṣadha), and the Dharma-preacher ascended the lion throne and began to speak these words:

"The Tathāgata, foremost of men, steers the helm of discipline, cuts the bonds of all entanglement — thus-gone. Skilled in the pacification of the senses, in thorough calm, residing in Śrāvastī, he acts in accordance with his word."

Just as he began to speak, the men with sinister intentions knocked at the gate. The monks, hearing this, said: "Wise ones, who are you?" "Noble ones, we are sons of good family." The monks thought: "Surely groups of people have come down from the rocky hills to hear the Dharma — it would not be right to break off. Open the gate." They opened the gate and those men entered. No sooner had they begun to attack than the monks said: "Wise ones! Did you not say you were sons of good family? And now you are attacking us?" They replied: "Noble ones, we have two names: outwardly we are called sons of good family; inwardly we are called thieves. You who name us thus are mistaken."

Those men with sinister intentions beat the monks and were done with it. The beaten monks then deliberated: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has said that the remainder should be donated — but what good does it do to have this householder give to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions? And what good has it done that he gave to us? If we go to Śrāvastī itself, those there who live the Brahma-like life will ensure that each of us is not wanting for Dharma robes." And so they resolved. As for how they would travel: they would travel by night under cover of darkness, and by day they would go in dense hiding. Without so much as a glance back at the householder, they departed. And in due course they arrived at last in Śrāvastī.

The monks who were keeping up their practice without sleeping at the first and last watches of the night — those monks saw these others wandering about, shivering, at the monastery gate in the dark, and said to them: "You naked wretches, what do you want here? This is not your monastery, and this is not your lodging." Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, we are not naked wretches." "Then who are you?" "We are monks." "Are the likes of you monks? What sort are those who have been stripped by robbers? What are your names?" "Buddharakṣita." "Dharmarakṣita." "Saṅgharakṣita." "Venerable ones, welcome! Welcome!" And with that, they opened the gate and let those monks in. To some of them they gave Dharma robes, to some they gave lower robes, to some they gave dust-cloaks, to some they gave alms bowls, and to some they gave water-strainers, and they made a full and proper distribution of everything. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One must not open the gate of the monastery at random to someone unknown. If someone wishes to enter at night, one should ask their name and which group they belong to, and if they are recognized, the gate should be opened, and if they are not recognized, the gate should not be opened. Furthermore, when the time comes for a Dharma-teaching, a monk on duty should be appointed as watchman. If robbers come, one should sound the gaṇḍī, sound the small gaṇḍī striker, sound the time-wheel, and raise a cry with the outer robe, the seven-cubit cloth, the five-cubit cloth, the coarse mat, the large gong, the small gong, the stick-bundle, and the small gong-clapper. Moreover, I shall set down rules for the elder of the community of monks to carry out universally. When the time for a Dharma-teaching has come, the monk on duty should ask the elder: 'Venerable one, have you had the monastery gate shut? Have you made a thorough inspection? Have you made a request of the Dharma-teacher? Have you had the toilet and urinal shelters cleared away?' If the elder of the community of monks, having thus received the rules I have set down for universal practice, does not properly take them up and apply them, he will be guilty of a serious offense."

Then the monks said to those monks who had been stripped by robbers: "Venerable ones, we have made a proper distribution to you, and yet you are still in want of Dharma robes. Now, the householder at whose monastery you were stripped — he is a man of faith, of good character, of wholesome intention. So today, if you go to his very monastery, he himself will see to it that you are not without Dharma robes." Those monks withdrew to one side and began to deliberate together among themselves: "Venerable ones, those who live the Brahma-like life here are indeed generous. Yet since we departed without so much as a glance back at that householder, if we now return to that very place, there is every chance he will make a proper distribution of Dharma robes to us." And so they turned back and went there again.

When the householder saw them, he said: "Noble ones, why did you depart without looking back at me?" The monks replied: "Householder, because the Blessed One said that the remainder should be donated, it occurred to us for a moment: what good is it that you gave to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and what good has it done that you gave to us? If we go to Śrāvastī, those there who live the Brahma-like life will see to it that we are not wanting for Dharma robes."

And so it was that they set off for Śrāvastī. The householder said: "Noble ones, if my temple has been broken into, do you think the goods belonging to me in the house have been destroyed as well? Noble ones, it is good that you have come — good indeed, for whatever reason you have come." And so that householder again, with great reverence and respect, made full provision for them and offered each and every monk a complete set of the thirteen requisites.

The thieves then returned and began beating on the door of the temple. When the monks heard this, they said: "Venerable ones, those wicked fellows have come back — sound the ghaṇṭā (the wooden sounding-board) to chase them off!" And so they began sounding an alarm with the ghaṇṭā's mallet, the time-wheel, the saṃghāṭī, the seven-cubit robe, the five-cubit robe, the carrying bag, the waistband, the under-robe, the bundle-strips, and the small under-sash. When the wicked ones were startled and began to flee, a deity spoke in verse:

Well has the Mighty One, foremost of bipeds, spoken — the confession ceremony he set forth for the śrāvakas:
those who apply themselves to the confession with zeal are supreme.
The wicked ones who put on armor to go to battle beforehand — these five hundred are not of that kind.

A monk who was knowledgeable about them said to the thieves: "Intelligent ones, why do you flee?" They replied: "You yourself say that the sixty who have gone forth and are staying here are masters of the throwing-spear alone — how could one not flee? Moreover, the names of such weapons as the ghaṇṭā and the rest — we had never heard them even once before." He said: "Those are not weapons." "Then what are they?" "First of all: what is called the ghaṇṭā — that is their drum. What is called the ghaṇṭā's mallet — that is what one strikes it with. What is called the time-wheel — that is what marks off the periods of time. The saṃghāṭī, the seven-cubit robe, and the five-cubit robe — these are the names of Dharma robes. What is called the carrying bag — that is what they are folded and placed in. The waistband, the under-robe, the bundle-strips, and the small under-sash — these are the names of girdles. So do not flee; go back and plunder it!" And having said that, they turned back.

When the thieves' commander set up a ladder and began to climb, there was an elderly monk who had been placed there as a night-watchman. He saw the thieves' commander climbing and thought: "These are the very wicked ones who robbed us of our bowls and Dharma robes and left us stranded. If I show equanimity toward them, they will rob us of our bowls and Dharma robes and strand us again — so I must frighten them." And so the elderly monk crept forward slowly and stealthily and hurled the ghaṇṭā at the head of the thieves' commander, crushing his skull. He was struck with a powerful blow and, beset by feelings of intense suffering, he fell with great difficulty and went off a little way — and the time of his death arrived. The elderly monk then raised the alarm, crying out "Thieves! Thieves!" and the monks, interrupting their Dharma listening, climbed up to the roof and said: "Where did those thieves go?" The elderly monk said: "They set up a ladder on this side and climbed, but I frightened them and they fled." The monks said: "If they have fled, that is good." They came down, and as the night was now turning to dawn, they began to do separate inspections of the rounds of the temple's perimeter.

When they separately inspected the place from which the thieves had climbed, they found blood. Following the trail of blood, they came upon the dead body of the captain of the thieves. Upon seeing this, they were seized with fear lest their training be broken, and they began to speak: "Venerable ones, we have already incurred a defeat — a root downfall has arisen for us through which we are defeated — and now that defeat stands." Remorse arose in them at that point, and they brought the matter before the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no downfall for you. However, a monk must not throw something at another person with such an intent as 'Let me strike this one at all costs' — rather, one should throw it to the side or behind, and should do a clapping-sound to cause alarm. If a monk throws with such a mind as 'Let me strike this one at all costs' and does strike, it becomes a serious offense."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was staying at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had taken a wife from a family of equal standing, and he sported with her, delighted in her, and reveled with her. As he sported with her, delighted in her, and reveled with her, in the course of time his wife became pregnant with a sentient being. Eight or nine months passed, and from the birth a boy appeared. They raised him and nurtured him, and he grew to adulthood.

In the course of time the householder's relatives were exhausted and gone, and his wealth and possessions too were exhausted. His wife also reached her time and died. He spoke to his son: "My son, in the circumstances of my old age I am unable to go out to seek wealth, so I shall go forth into renunciation." The son said: "Father, if that is so, I too shall go forth." "Excellent, my son." So saying, he took the boy and went to the Jeta Grove, approached a monk, paid homage at his two feet, and said: "Noble one, I wish to go forth into renunciation." The monk asked: "Is this boy also going forth?" "Noble one, he is going forth." That monk, out of his fondness for the boy, ordained him along with the boy, receiving both into the going-forth.

By the nature of things, those in the senior class receive material offerings, and those in the junior class are assigned to duties. Since the boy was in the junior class he was constantly being assigned to duties, and he spoke to his father: "Father, whatever slight frustration has afflicted the two of us has come about from our lack of learning. Rise up, and let the two of us go to another region and acquire learning." The elder monk said: "Son, it is good — let us go." And the two of them set out for another region. However, since those of the junior class are precisely the ones assigned to duties, as soon as those two departed they were assigned to duties again. The son then said to the elder monk: "Father, though there are duties assigned to us in Śrāvastī, the Blessed One, the sovereign of the Dharma, dwells there in person, and from time to time one may hear of great monks who have directly actualized arhatship, and of others who have been told they have completed the path to the unlovely — one hears such proclamations given. The king too has very great faith in the teaching, and there are the queen Mṛgāramatā, the queen Kṣemā, the minister Prasenadeva-datta, and also Priyā and the laywoman Sāgā and the mother of Mṛgāra, and many others full of faith, so that there are great material enjoyments and great Dharma enjoyments to be had there. Let us go there," he said.

The two of them wandered at will through the countryside, and traveling in the direction of Śrāvastī they journeyed on and on until at last, making their way step by step, they arrived outside Śrāvastī. Just as they drew near to the Jeta Grove, a wooden signal board was struck, and the son said, "Father, they are striking the signal board at the temple — let us go quickly!" The elder was old and worn out, very weary and unable to walk, so he was moving along slowly when his son took him by the nape of the neck and pushed him forward, and the elder began to move quickly. The son thought to himself, "This is a good method — I should do it again." So the son pushed the elder in the same way once more, but this time the elder pitched forward and fell headlong to the ground, and his neck was broken by a wheel-rut in the road, and his time came. The son wept and cast the old man's body to one side of the road. He then took up the alms bowl and the robe and went to the Jeta Grove, and when the monks saw him they said, "Welcome, son of the elder! Welcome! Where is your elder?" At that the young novice began to weep. The monks asked, "Child, why do you weep?" The young novice said, "My elder has passed away." The monks said, "Child, such is the nature of all formations — be not sorrowful, for you have gone forth in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya." But the young novice said, "I killed him." The monks said, "Child, then you have committed an act without interval and a defeat downfall has arisen, and for a very long time you will dwell in the great Avīci hell — now indeed it is fitting to weep." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is no downfall for that monk. Moreover, monks, one who has entered the path must not be pushed when weary from the road. I shall establish rules of conduct for one who has entered the path: one who has entered the path and is weary from traveling should be allowed to rest. One may take the three robes, the alms bowl, the water strainer, the bowl vessel, and the articles of the needle case. One must be mindful of time: if one is able to go, then that is well; if one is not able to go, one should set out earlier — the alms bowl should be washed, the robe laid out, and the vessels given over for receiving and then inspected one by one. If, however, one is unable to come, food should be prepared and sent to meet one. If it is not the proper time, one should be received with drink. If one who has entered the path does not properly take up and act according to the rules of conduct as established, it becomes an offense." The monks, having doubts, put all their doubts to the Blessed One who cuts through all doubt: "Venerable One, this son of the elder, though he separated his father from his life, did not touch even the gross wrongdoing of an act without interval, and no defeat downfall has arisen — please look upon this." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only is it so at present — in the past as well this one did not touch even the gross wrongdoing of an act without interval even when separating his father from his life. Listen to this. Monks, in a former time long past there was a cook who lived on a certain cliff, and he took a wife from his own social class. With her he played, delighted, and made merry; he played, delighted, and made merry with her, and from his wife a son was born, and he raised and nurtured him until he grew up.

Now at another time a festival arose there on that cliff, and many garments that needed washing came to him. He said to his son: "Son, many garments need to be washed. I cannot go home to eat, so come here, bring the garments, and set out. Go back, bring food, and come." The son went along with him, carrying the garments. The son returned home, brought food, and came back. The cook ate the food and said: "Son, I am exhausted and will sleep. You go ahead and wash the garments." The son said: "So I will do." The cook lay down on one side and fell asleep. Now he was bald, and a fly settled on his head. When the cook's son had finished washing the garments and came to his father's side, he saw a fly on his father's head. He began to shoo it away, but the fly, drunk on blood, would not fly off, and the son became unable to bear it. He thought: "This fly is drinking my father's blood while he yet lives — I must kill it." The son struck at it with a flat stone, but the fly fled and he shattered his father's skull, and his father died then and there. A deity then spoke in verse:

The finest enemy is one possessed of wisdom;
not so a friend who lacks discernment.
Thinking to kill a fly with little wit, he struck and broke his father's skull.

Monks, what do you think? He who was the cook at that time is this elder himself. He who was the cook's son at that time is this very son of the elder. And just as at that time, even in separating his father from his life, he did not touch even the gross wrongdoing of an act without interval — so too at present, even in separating his father from his life, he has not touched the gross wrongdoing of an act without interval, and no defeat downfall has arisen. For one who is a beginner, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who acts under the duress of painful sensation — for such a one there is no downfall. The third case of defeat is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Vaiśālī, in the Gabled Hall by the Monkey Pond. At that time five hundred fishermen were established along the Lovely River. Among them were two nets called Broad-Movement and Great-Movement. Sometimes they would put in the Broad-Movement net and sometimes the Great-Movement net: whenever fish were not being bought, they put in the Broad-Movement net, and whenever fish were being bought, they put in the Great-Movement net. At another time a festival arose in Vaiśālī, and they put in both nets: two hundred and fifty put in the Broad-Movement net, and two hundred and fifty put in the Great-Movement net. Those who had put in the Broad-Movement net arranged great heaps of fish, turtles, frogs, young crocodiles, and catfish and the like — heaps like piles of sesame, thick rice gruel, juniper, and broad beans. Those who had put in the Great-Movement net caught a crocodile-fish of great size, like a rabbit, that had come from the great ocean into the Lovely River and was lying there asleep, and they began to haul it in. As they hauled it, it awoke, and seized those two hundred and fifty fishermen together with the Great-Movement net, and moved off upstream. Those fishermen called out to the other two hundred and fifty fishermen: "Knowledgeable ones — the Great-Movement net has seized us; turn it back!"

When they heard this, the other two hundred and fifty fishermen also rushed in and joined them, yet the creature carried off all five hundred fishermen together with the Great-Movement net, moved upstream, and could not be restrained. Those helpless ones cried out on every side: "Knowledgeable ones — carry us away with the Great-Movement net and help us!" — and turning back those who had scattered like arrows, there were cowherds and ox-herders who had not yet perceived what was happening, and shepherds, and those who gather firewood, and those who gather grass, and those who live by traveling the roads, and those who live by guiding travelers along the roads, and yet others — many hundreds of thousands of living creatures — who turned back and, with their bodies and limbs hacking and tearing at it, with the net rent and utterly torn apart, they pulled that crocodile-fish from the water onto dry land. It had eighteen heads and thirty-six eyes. Some of its heads resembled the head of an elephant, some the head of a horse, and some resembled the heads of a she-camel, a donkey, an ox, a monkey, a lion, a tiger, a bear, a female bear, a mongoose, a cat, a goat, a sheep, a deer, a buffalo, a pig, and a dog. The word spread abroad that the five hundred fishermen of the Lovely River, using the Great-Movement net, had caught a crocodile-fish of the species that is as large as a rabbit, one that had come from the great ocean into the Lovely River, and had pulled it from the water onto dry land, and that it had eighteen heads and thirty-six eyes. Hearing this, many hundreds of thousands of living creatures gathered on the banks of the Lovely River. Some of them were filled with wonder at the sight. Others were stirred by the roots of virtue they had planted in former lives. The six teachers dwelling and residing in Vaiśālī, Pūraṇa and the rest, were likewise struck with curiosity and came to the place. A great multitude of people arose in amazement, and standing there gazing with fixed eyes they said: "Knowledgeable ones — some of its heads resemble the head of an elephant; reckon from that. Some of its heads resemble those ranging up to the head of a dog; reckon from that as well."

Now, for the blessed buddhas (Skt. buddha) there is not the slightest trace of unknowing, of not-seeing, of ignorance, or of non-discernment. Therefore the blessed Buddha, endowed with great compassion, entered upon benefiting the world, the sole protector, the uniquely courageous one, without a second, who speaks nothing of a second, abiding in calm abiding and insight, making the three knowledges radiant, perfectly trained in the three trainings, skilled in the ground of the three fields of taming, who has crossed beyond the four rivers, well-established in the ground of practice of the four bases of miraculous power, long purified in the four means of attraction, not intimidated by the four fearlessnesses, who has abandoned the five limbs, who has truly transcended the five destinies, endowed with the six limbs, fully perfected in the six perfections, abiding in the six constant abidings, enriched with the flowers of the seven branches of awakening, who teaches the eight branches of the path, skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions, endowed with the powers of the ten powers, whose fame has spread perfectly in the ten directions, who is supremely distinguished above those who exercise sovereignty over a hundredfold — it is the very nature of such ones to survey the world with the eye of a buddha three times by day and three times by night, observing who has declined and who has increased, who has been harmed, who has become wretched, who has become unhappy, and who has come to harm, wretchedness, and misery.

who is inclined toward the lower realms, who has fallen toward the lower realms, who is falling toward the lower realms — those I shall raise up from the path of the lower realms and establish in higher states, in liberation, and in the fruit. Those sunk in the mire of desire I shall draw out by the hand. Those bereft of the wealth of the noble ones I shall establish in lordship over the wealth of the noble ones. The world adorned by the arising of buddhas I shall make fruitful. Those whose roots of virtue have not yet been produced I shall cause to produce them. Those whose roots of virtue have already been produced I shall cause to ripen fully. Those that have fully ripened I shall cause to be completely liberated." With such knowing and seeing, the Blessed One's awareness engages.

Then it was said in verse:

One who dwells among sea-monsters, filled with poison, may perhaps pass beyond their appointed time — but the loving-kindness of a buddha for those to be tamed shall never pass beyond its appointed time.

Just as a mother, toward her only beloved child, thinks and acts to guard that child's very life, so too the Tathāgata, toward those persons to be tamed, thinks and acts to guard their very life.

The compassion that dwells in the stream of the omniscient one is a young mother never wearying in seeking the calf to be tamed.
That loving-kindness for those fallen in existence and the lower realms is like the love of a vast herd's mother-cow for her calf.

The Blessed One reflected: "These beings of the fish-species of the sea-monster have met with harm, distress, and misery. This is because they rendered special service to the buddhas of the past. Therefore, relying upon these fish of the sea-monster species, I have drawn forth a great host of those who have become tamed. For that reason I shall go to the bank of the pleasant river." And the Blessed One smiled.

Now it is the very nature of reality that whenever the Blessed Buddhas smile, rays of light of blue, yellow, red, white, crimson, crystal, and silver in hue issue forth from their mouths. Some descend downward, and some ascend upward. Those that descend downward go into the hell realms — Reviving, Black Thread, Crushing Together, Crying Out, Great Crying Out, Hot, Very Hot, Unrelenting, Blister-Forming, Burst Blisters, Chattering Teeth, One Who Cries "Kyihu," One Who Cries "Achu," Split Like an Utpala Flower, Split Like a Lotus, and Split Wide Open Like a Great Lotus — and into whatever hot hells there are, those rays fall as coolness, and into whatever cold hells there are, they fall as warmth. In this way they sever the specific torments of those sentient beings, and those beings think to themselves: "Wise ones, have we died and transmigrated from here, or have we been born elsewhere?" In order to generate faith in them, the Blessed One sent forth an emanation. Upon seeing the emanation, they thought: "Wise ones, we have not died and transmigrated from here, nor have we been born elsewhere. Rather, by the power of this being we had not previously seen, our specific torments have been cut off." Their minds became filled with manifest faith toward the emanation, and having exhausted the karma by which those sentient beings would have experienced the hells, they are made to take rebirth among those gods and humans who are vessels for the truths, wherever such a rebirth may occur.

Those who proceed upward are born among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Joyful Heaven, the Heaven of Delight in Emanation, the Heaven of Mastery over Others' Emanations, the Heaven of Brahmā's Retinue, the Heaven of Brahmā's Ministers, the Great Brahmā Heaven, the Heaven of Minor Light, the Heaven of Boundless Light, the Heaven of Radiant Light, the Heaven of Minor Virtue, the Heaven of Boundless Virtue, the Heaven of Vast Virtue, the Cloudless Heaven, the Heaven of Merit-Born Ones, the Heaven of Great Fruit, the Heaven of Non-Greatness, the Heaven of Non-Affliction, the Heaven of Sublime Appearance, the Heaven of Clear Vision, and the Heaven of Akaniṣṭha. Having arrived among those gods, they proclaim the words: "impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness," and they set forth and deliver the following two verses:

Undertake and bring forth what is to be done.

Enter into the teaching of the buddhas.

Like a great elephant against a house of mud, crush the armies of the lord of death.

Whoever practices with utmost diligence in this taming Dharma shall, having utterly abandoned the cycle of rebirth, make an end of suffering at last.

Then those rays of light, having traversed the great trichiliocosm, follow after the Blessed One himself, step by step. If the Blessed One intends to prophesy karma of the past, the rays sink into his back. If he intends to prophesy karma of the future, they sink into his front. If he intends to prophesy birth in the hells, they sink into the soles of his feet. If he intends to prophesy birth as an animal, they sink into his heels. If he intends to prophesy birth as a hungry ghost, they sink into his big toes. If he intends to prophesy birth as a human, they sink into his knees. If he intends to prophesy the sovereignty of a wheel-turning king of power, they sink into his left palm. If he intends to prophesy the sovereignty of a wheel-turning king, they sink into his right palm. If he intends to prophesy birth as a god, they sink into his navel. If he intends to prophesy the awakening of a śrāvaka, they sink into his mouth. If he intends to prophesy the awakening of a pratyekabuddha, they sink into his eyebrow hair. If he intends to prophesy unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening, they sink into his uṣṇīṣa.

Then those rays of light, having circled the Blessed One three times, sank into the Blessed One's navel.

Thereupon the Venerable Ānanda joined his palms together and addressed the Blessed One with this question: "Venerable One, Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not smile without cause or condition. Venerable One, what then is the cause of this smile? What is the condition?" And he also addressed him in verse:

They emerged from the gateway of the face, blazing with a thousand varied hues, illuminating all directions on every side, like an outstretched parasol of sunlight.

Free from agitation and timidity, utterly beyond conceit, the buddhas are the supreme cause for beings' journey onward.
Yet the Victor who subdues all foes does not without cause display a smile white as a conch-flower's root and branch.

Therefore, O Steadfast One, knowing the time by your own mind, O Sage, foremost of the herd, lord of ascetics and of birth, dispel with words of certainty and with noble virtue the doubt that has arisen in those listening beings filled with apprehension.

Steady as the king of salt-water mountains, the protector buddhas do not show a sudden smile.
For what purpose does the Steadfast One display a smile?

The assembled multitude of people wished to hear it. The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, it is so. It is indeed so. Ānanda, the Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas never display a smile without cause and condition. Ānanda, go and tell the monks: 'Monks, the Tathāgata wishes to proceed to the bank of the river. Among you, whoever wishes to go together with the Tathāgata to the bank of the river — let him take his robes and set out.'" The venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he spoke to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One wishes to proceed to the bank of the river. Among you, whoever wishes to go together with the Blessed One to the bank of the river — let him take his robes and set out."

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the twelfth fascicle.

Then the Blessed One, himself tamed, surrounded by a retinue that was tamed; himself at peace, surrounded by a retinue at peace; himself liberated, surrounded by a retinue that was liberated; himself at ease, surrounded by a retinue at ease; himself subdued, surrounded by a retinue that was subdued; himself an arhat, surrounded by a retinue of arhats; himself free from attachment, surrounded by a retinue free from attachment; himself resplendent, surrounded by a retinue that was resplendent — encircled by a herd of bulls like the finest bull of the herd, encircled by a host of elephant calves like a great elephant, encircled by a host of fanged beasts like a lion, encircled by a flock of swans like the king of swans, encircled by a host of birds like the king of birds (Garuḍa), encircled by a host of disciples like a brahmin, encircled by a host of patients like a skilled physician, encircled by a host of troops like a hero, encircled by a host of those who have entered the path like a caravan guide, encircled by a host of merchants like a caravan leader, encircled by a host of merchants like a master merchant, encircled by a host of ministers like the king of a fortress, encircled by a host of a thousand sons like a wheel-turning monarch, encircled by a host of constellations like the moon, encircled by a host of a thousand rays like the sun, encircled by a host of gandharvas like the guardian of the directions (Dhṛtarāṣṭra), encircled by a host of flying vessels like the noble-born, encircled by a host of nāgas like Mignyi Zang (Varuṇa, king of nāgas), encircled by a host of yakṣas like the wealth-giver (Jambhala), encircled by a host of asuras like Thakzangri (Vemacitrin), encircled by a host of the gods of the Thirty-Three like Śakra (Indra, king of the gods), encircled by a host of Brahmā's realm like Brahmā himself — with his senses perfectly restrained, his conduct and comportment undisturbed, steady as an ocean of water, laden with virtue as a cloud is laden with rain, free from arrogance like the great king of elephants — his body beautifully adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being, his form gloriously adorned with the eighty minor marks, ornamented with a bodily radiance of one fathom, possessed of a light exceeding a thousand suns, altogether glorious like a moving mountain of jewels — endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unshared foundations of mindfulness, and great compassion — accompanied by the great śrāvakas: omniscient Kauṇḍinya, Udāyin, Mahānāman, Avikampita, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, Nandaka (Nanda), and others, and further surrounded by a great Saṅgha of monks — he proceeded and walked toward that delightful bank of the river.

From a great distance, that retinue caught sight of the Blessed One accompanied by the Saṅgha of śrāvakas. When some among them who lacked faith saw this, they said, "The ascetic Gautama is known to be one who has no interest in spectacles — yet even he has come near, drawn by curiosity, to see the species of fish and sea-monsters." But those who were possessed of faith said to those lacking faith, "O wise ones, awakened buddhas, Blessed Ones, are precisely those who are free of all desire for spectacles. The Blessed One, taking the fish and sea-monsters as his occasion, intends to teach something wondrous and extraordinary to this great assembly of people — do not be mistaken about this." And they spoke these words in verse:

The Sage, possessing an intent free of all spectacle, speaks purposelessly to the wretched where no spectacle exists.
This Victor, who is wholly devoted to benefiting others, has surely come here for the welfare of embodied beings.

Then, upon seeing the Blessed One, that retinue immediately rose to their feet — for it had been the Blessed One's custom, even when he was still a bodhisattva, to rise in the presence of his father, his mother, his preceptors, his teachers, his gurus, and those who held the place of a guru. Thereupon the Blessed One proceeded into the midst of that retinue and took his seat upon a prepared throne placed at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Having seated himself, the Blessed One addressed those five hundred fishermen: "Good men, you are engaged in a livelihood that involves wrongful actions. Therefore you are now born into the lowly birth-station of fishermen, and at present you are violent, your hands are stained with blood, you are attached to the most depraved of depraved practices, you steal the lives of others, and you sustain yourselves by cutting the lives of others. When you die and pass on from here, what will your destiny be? What will your birth be? What will your future life be?"

They replied, "Blessed One, please declare to us what we should do."

The Blessed One declared, "Release these beings — the fish, the turtles, the frogs, the young of the sea-monster species that you are slaughtering, and the otters and so forth that you have pulled from the water."

"As the Blessed One has declared, so shall we release them," they said — and at the very moment the Blessed One finished speaking, they let them all go.

Then the Blessed One thought to himself: "I shall bring about by supernormal power a miracle of such a kind that all these living creatures — the fish, the turtles, the frogs, the young of the sea-monsters being slaughtered, the otters and the rest, all of them except for the species of adult fish-eating sea-monsters — will enter the pleasant river just as they naturally should in water; and that the sea-monster species too will recall their former births, will speak in human speech, and will converse together with me."

Then the Blessed One actually brought about that supernormal power, so that all those living creatures — the fish, the turtles, the frogs, the young of the sea-monsters being slaughtered, the otters and the rest, all except for the species of adult fish-eating sea-monsters — entered the pleasant river just as they naturally should in water; and the sea-monster species too recalled their former births, spoke in human speech, and conversed together with the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then addressed the sea-monster species: "Child, are you a novice?"

"Blessed One, I am a novice."

"Child, are you a novice?"

"Sugata, I am a novice."

"Child, have you engaged in misconduct of body?"

"Blessed One, I have."

"Child, have you engaged in misconduct of speech and mind?"

"Sugata, I have."

"Then who is your companion in non-virtue?"

"It is my mother, Blessed One."

"And where was she born?"

"Among the hell-beings."

"And where were you born?"

"As an animal."

"What do you think? When you pass away from here, where will you be reborn?"

"Blessed One, among the hell-beings." "Sugata, among the hell-beings," the sea-monster said, and then broke into weeping.

The Blessed One then at that moment spoke these verses:

You were born in the realm of animals, fallen into a state of no leisure.
Even now there is nothing I can do.
What use is there in weeping without purpose?

Have faith in me, the compassionate Victor, think well of me with trusting devotion, and being free of attachment to this animal birth, from here you shall pass on to the higher realms.

With that, the sea-monster directed its mind toward the Blessed One with faith. The Blessed One then taught it the Dharma with these three phrases, in the gentlest way: "All formations (saṃskāra) are impermanent. All phenomena (dharma) are without self. Nirvāṇa is peace."

Then the assembly was filled with supreme wonder, and those among the wise said among themselves: "By the Blessed One's word, this one recalls its former births, speaks in human speech, and converses together with the Blessed One — who can this be? Blessed Buddhas are difficult to approach and difficult to bear, so we are unable to ask the Blessed One about this matter. Let us go to where the noble Ānanda is, approach the noble Ānanda, ask him this matter, and whatever the noble Ānanda teaches us in reply, that very thing we shall take to heart."

The assembly then went to where the venerable Ānanda was and said to him: "Noble Ānanda, by the Blessed One's word, this one recalls its former births, speaks in human speech, and converses together with the Blessed One — who is this?"

Ānanda replied: "O wise ones, ask the Blessed One himself about this matter."

"Noble Ānanda, Blessed Buddhas are difficult to approach and difficult to bear, so we dare not ask the Blessed One about this matter."

"O wise ones, I too find that Blessed Buddhas are difficult to approach and difficult to bear, so I myself am not able to ask the Blessed One about this matter. Nevertheless, I will ask for your sake."

So saying, Ānanda went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One thus:

"Reverend Blessed One, by your word, this one recalls its former births, speaks in human speech, and converses together with the Blessed One — who is this?"

"Ānanda, this is of the species of fish-eating sea-monsters. Ānanda, do you wish to hear an account of the former karmic activities of the species of fish-eating sea-monsters? If the Blessed One, drawing on the former karmic activities of the species of fish-eating sea-monsters, were to speak a Dharma-laden discourse to the monks and to the assembly of people —"

— would be retained by the monks and the assembly of people upon hearing it from the Blessed One, now is the time, O Blessed One; now is the time, O Sugata." "Ānanda, therefore listen, and attend most carefully; I shall speak." "So be it, Ānanda. Listen then."

Long ago, in this very Good Great Aeon, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared in the world a Teacher — a Tathāgata, a foe-destroyer, a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, a knower of the world, an unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, a teacher of gods and humans — a Blessed One, a buddha, by name Kāśyapa. He dwelt attended by twenty thousand monks, near the city of Vārāṇasī, in the deer forest called Ṛṣivadana.

At that time, a king named Kṛkī ruled the city of Vārāṇasī. His kingdom was prosperous, flourishing, and happy; the harvests were good; it was filled with many people and with a great populace; strife, conflict, foreign enemies, and internal discord had been completely pacified; it was free from bandits, famine, and disease; and rice, rows of sugar-cane, cattle, and buffalo were made to abound. He was a righteous king, a dharma-king, and he governed his realm by the Dharma.

Now at that time, a brahmin student who desired secret teachings and was seeking those secret teachings set out southward from the central land. He found a brahmin sitting there — one who had mastered the Vedas and their ancillary sciences and who had become a teacher to brahmins dwelling in various regions. The brahmin student went to that brahmin, and having approached with calm bearing and a tranquil manner of conduct, he bowed his head at his feet and sat down to one side.

The brahmin then welcomed him with words of greeting and said, "Ho there, student! From where have you come? What do you desire?" The student replied, "I have come from the central land and wish to place myself at my teacher's feet in attendance. For what purpose? In order to study the Vedas." "Excellent, student — so be it. You are a brahmin."

And so that student began to study the Vedas under that brahmin.

Now the customary practice among students was this: during times when they were not reading they would sometimes go to draw water at the riverbank, sometimes go toward the city, and sometimes go to fetch kindling wood. And it came to pass that at another such time, when they had not been reading and had gone to fetch firewood, an impromptu exchange of words arose among them along the way, something of this sort:

"Ho, you of the Kutsā lineage! You of the Bātsā lineage! You of the Śāṇḍilya lineage! You of the Bhāradvāja lineage! You of the lineage of the fifth! You of the lineage of the fifth-adjacent! Come now — let us ask one another from which region each has come."

One student said, "I have come from the eastern region." Another said, "I have come from the southern road." Yet another said, "I have come from the western land." And yet another said, "I have come from the northern road." That student said, "I have come from the central land."

The others said, "Wise ones, though we have seen and heard of all the regions, the central land we have not seen nor heard of."

And they also recited this verse:

In the east dwell those of keen intelligence.

In the south direction there are those who give.

In the western land there are the slanderous.

In the north direction speech is rough and coarse.

Then they asked, "Student, what is the central land like?"

"Wise ones, the central land is the finest of all regions. It has rice, sugarcane plantations, cattle, and buffaloes in abundance, teeming with hundreds of wandering beggars, filled with people of the central land, shunned by the people of the borderlands, frequented by the learned. There flows the river Gaṅgā, renowned as a place of merit, auspiciousness, purity, and purity itself, its two banks moist and cool, called the dwelling place of sages, into which one hundred and eight tributaries flow. When sages practice austerities there, by the power of their very bodies they ascend to the higher realms. Oh wise ones, visit it, and ask about this further."

The student said, "Wise ones, are there, in the central land, those who are reckoned as learned?" The wise ones replied, "We have known from the very beginning, wise ones, that the central land is filled with people of the central land, shunned by those who are quarrelsome, and frequented by the learned — did you not say so?" "Student, you yourself said those words."

"Wise ones, in the central land it is like this: are there, for instance, those who are like our own preceptor — supreme orators of that kind?" The wise ones replied, "In the central land there are supreme orators of that kind, men so gifted in eloquent speech that even our own preceptor cannot look them in the face."

When that student had spoken in praise of the central land in this way, all of them became filled with the desire to go to the central land.

Then those students went and gathered kindling wood. Taking up their loads of kindling, they went to where the brahmin was. They arrived, set down their bundles of kindling to one side, went to where that brahmin was, and said to him, "Preceptor, please know this: this student has spoken such praises of the central land that all of us without exception now wish to go to the central land."

The brahmin said, "Children, must one travel as far as one has heard? Regions are pleasant to hear about, so you may listen, but you should not travel there."

"Preceptor, it is from the words of this student that we report: in the central land there are supreme orators, men of such eloquent speech that even our own preceptor cannot look them in the face."

"Children, do I say that I alone on this earth am the only speaker and there is no other speaker whatsoever? The earth holds many precious things, and therefore the surface of the earth is filled with wonders upon wonders."

"Preceptor, let us see that land as well, and we shall also draw close to the river's bank. We shall pay homage to those supreme orators. We shall also vanquish opponents. We shall also spread our own renown. We shall also secure material gain. We shall go to the central land."

Now the brahmin was affectionate toward his students and his retinue was small, and so he said to those students, "Children, if that is so, then take up the bark strips, the peeled sticks, the wands, the ladles for pouring, the ladles for filling, the balls, and go to the central land."

They took these things up, and the brahmin went forth together with those students to the central land. There he defeated some opponents and yoked them to the chariot of defeat. Some he struck with earthen pots shattered over their heads. Some he abandoned from afar, like a crow fleeing from a catapult's fulcrum. Some he received with parasols, victory banners, and flags. Some acknowledged him as their own preceptor, and in this way, gradually, defeating opponents in villages, cities, towns, market settlements, and trading posts, he arrived at Vārāṇasī.

That brahmin thought, "Why should I abandon the root and cling to the branches, the leaves, and the foliage?"

All the opponents and all who were counted as learned were close to the king, and so that brahmin thought, "I too shall go before the king." So the brahmin went to where King Kṛkī was, and having arrived, he offered the king praises of victory and prayers for long life, then sat down to one side.

Sitting to one side, he addressed King Kṛkī with these words: "O divine one, I have received a few letters from my teacher, and on that account I wish to settle a decisive debate together with opponents in the presence of the divine one."

The king spoke to his ministers: "O wise ones, is there in my land any opponent who can engage this brahmin in a decisive verbal contest?"

The ministers said: "O divine one, on a certain great rocky crag there lives a brahmin by the name of Śerśkya Śīwa, who has gone beyond the Vedas and the Vedic branches and who has the understanding of one who has entered deeply. He is skilled at making his own doctrine clear and sharp in cutting down the doctrines of others. Let that master be summoned." The king replied, "I will have him summoned." So they summoned him, and he came to where King Kṛkī was, and having arrived, he offered the king praises of victory and prayers for long life, and sat down to one side. The ministers said, "O divine one, this is that master."

The king greeted him with words of welcome and said: "Master, can you conduct a decisive debate together with this brahmin before me?"

Śerśkya Śīwa replied: "I shall cut him down to whatever degree, and in so doing shall please the king."

The king instructed the ministers: "O wise ones, prepare the arena of debate. Set out the positions of both sides." The ministers prepared the arena of debate and set out the positions of both sides.

Then the ministers prostrated at the two feet of the king and said, "O divine one, which side shall be granted the first position?" The king said, "This brahmin is a guest; let him take the first position."

The brahmin was given the first position and recited five hundred arguments drawn from the tantras. Śerśkya Śiwa rebutted them in turn: "This is without reasoning. This is inconsistent. This is untenable," heaping fault upon fault, until that brahmin sat there without a word to say. Among the grounds for refutation, the greatest is this: being unable to reply — that is defeat.

Then the king, greatly pleased, asked, "Master, where do you reside?" Śerśkya Śiwa replied, "O divine one, on a great rocky crag." The king said, "Go, and make use of that crag as the estate of your debate-victory." Śerśkya Śiwa was overjoyed, elated, and supremely delighted, and surrounded by wise people he went to that rocky crag.

Now, since the world desires prosperity, Śerśkya Śiwa took a wife of equal birth, and together with her he made merry, delighted, and took his pleasure. While they were making merry, delighting, and taking their pleasure, his wife gave birth to a shaggy-haired, yellowish-clad child, and seven times three — twenty-one days — after the birth, they held a great birth-celebration, and they set about giving the boy a name.

The relatives said: "This boy is the son of the brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa, and since his hair is also yellowish, let this boy's name be Śerśkya." And so they named him Śerśkya.

He was nourished with milk, yogurt, butter, clarified butter, and the essential cream of butter, and raised up and developed swiftly by the choicest and finest of nourishments, like a lotus growing in a pond.

When he came of age, he became accomplished in letters, arithmetic, calculation, finger-reckoning, drawing out, entering, placing, dividing, and reading. At that time he mastered brahminical conduct and practice: purity, general deportment, the taking of ashes, the taking of the water-jar and the fire-vessel, the taking of earth, the arm-staff, the topknot, recitations of praise, the invocation known as "Kye," the Veda of grammatical expression, the Veda of sacrifice, the Veda of poetic composition, the Veda of statecraft and protection; and he became learned in the six duties of the brahmin: performing sacrifice, causing others to perform sacrifice, reciting, causing others to recite, giving, and receiving. He mastered the Vedas and their ancillary branches, and with a brilliance of mind like fire he could clearly expound his own position and refute the positions of others.

At that time the brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa set some five hundred brahmin youths to reciting the brahminical sacred formulas. Then one day, as the youth Śerśkya was reciting, he asked his father: "Father, what is the meaning of 'ritsa'?" The brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa replied: "My son, these are letters that have long fallen out of use; the words of the teachers are hard to know, and so those sages composed this treatise without understanding the meaning — I do not know what it signifies." Śerśkya said: "Father, I wish to find the meaning of that word 'ritsa.'" The brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa reflected: "A father's wish is for a son who equals or surpasses him; therefore, since this boy surpasses me, I should entrust these five hundred brahmin youths to him." Thinking thus, he recognized this to be so, and said to the brahmin youth Śerśkya: "My son, it is a father's wish to have a son who equals or surpasses him; therefore, since you surpass me, you should now set these five hundred brahmin youths to reciting the brahminical sacred formulas." Śerśkya replied: "As you command — I shall do so," and he began to lead those five hundred brahmin youths in the recitation of the brahminical sacred formulas. And the brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa, now free from duties, began to spend his time going wherever he pleased and enjoying himself in pleasurable activities.

Then on another occasion, a sage went out to discourse, and approaching a certain monk he asked: "Teacher, what is the meaning of this word?" The monk said: "Venerable one, that is not the proper way to ask that question; if you ask it that way, you will not get a complete answer. You should ask the question in this way: if you ask it thus, you will get the complete meaning of the word." The brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa thought: "If I cannot even ask a question of these people properly, how shall I ever be able to discourse together with them?" And with that he developed very deep faith in the monks, and at intervals he invited the monks as guests and served them food in his home.

Then on another occasion, having fallen ill, he said to the youth Śerśkya: "My son, from sunrise to sunset there is no one who can speak the way you can; therefore, after I am gone, you should speak together with all who debate and do so without fear and without hesitation."

"Excepting only the renunciants of the Kāśyapa lineage — for they possess a vast stream of learning, a profound stream of learning, a noble stream of learning; they cannot be defeated by worldly people, and they are unfathomable to those who have transcended the world; and they are many, harmonious, and do not seek material gain."

The youth Śerśkya said: "Father, I shall do so."

But the brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa did not rise from his sickbed. Though he was tended with medicines of roots, stems, leaves, flowers, and fruits, he only grew worse, and in accordance with the way things are:

All that is accumulated must be exhausted to the end,

All that has risen high must fall.

All that has met must in the end be parted.

All that lives must in the end die.

He passed on in accordance with the law of his time. The youth Śerśkya and his household wrapped him in blue, yellow, red, and white cloth, carried him to the charnel ground, cremated him, and afterwards performed the mourning purification rites and settled there for a time.

The debaters who had come from the south heard that the brahmin Śerśkya Śiwa had passed on in his time. Hearing this, they began speaking among themselves: "Wise ones, the brahmin debater has passed on in his time — now let us go forth." And so they all gathered and went to the presence of King Kṛkī. They paid homage to the king with words of victory and long life and said: "O king, we have received a few letters from our teacher, and we wish to resolve a dispute in the matter of teaching before your royal presence."

The king said to his ministers: "Wise ones, summon that learned master." The ministers said: "O king, that brahmin debater has passed on in his time." The king said: "Then let these people gather here before me like warriors assembled for battle. Does that brahmin have a son or a younger brother?" A minister said: "O king, he has a son called the youth Śerśkya." The king said: "Summon the son of the learned master."

They summoned him, and he came before the king. He paid homage to the king with words of victory and long life and sat off to one side. The ministers said: "O king, this is the one called the youth Śerśkya, the son of the learned master." The king greeted him with words of welcome and then said: "Son of the learned master, these people who dwell in different regions have come to my presence wishing to debate with the brahmin. Are you able to debate with them? Whatever remuneration you desire, we shall gladly provide it to please you."

Then the arena of debate was arranged, the sides and the opposing sides were set out, and those debaters were made to state their positions first. And then, on whatever point any one of those debaters engaged the brahmin Śerśkya in debate, he left them without the power to respond, and they sat there without being able to say a word. For among the grounds of defeat, the chief is this: being without the power to reply is itself a defeat.

The king was amazed. "How wonderful," he thought, "that one so young in years possesses such eloquence and wisdom as this!" And filled with profound faith at that, he installed him on an elephant's back and anointed him sovereign of the realm of debate.

As for Śerśkya's mother, she harbored resentment within herself and fell into unwholesome thoughts, thinking: "That Śerśkya has swiftly seized the wealth and resources of the debaters — will he not meet with trouble on account of this?" Thus she sat there harboring that resentment and dwelling in unwholesome thoughts.

But the youth Śerśkya, having been anointed sovereign of the realm of debate, came surrounded by wise and learned people to his own home.

Then his mother, with respectful and earnest composure, said to him: "My son, have you defeated all the debaters?" Śerśkya said: "Mother, I have defeated them all — with the exception of the śramaṇas (wandering ascetics) of Kāśyapa." At that, Śerśkya's mother did as follows: she rubbed her two palms together.

The youth Śerśkya said: "Mother, why do you rub your two palms together?" The mother said: "My son, you still have rivals, and there exists a situation in which those śramaṇas of Kāśyapa could seize the wealth and resources of the debaters. So go and defeat them."

Śerśkya said: "Mother, my father has spoken to me thus: 'As long as the sun rises and sets each day, there is no other debater equal to you — therefore, once I am gone, you should speak with all debaters together, without fear and without hesitation — with the exception of the śramaṇas of Kāśyapa. For they possess a vast stream of learning, a profound stream of learning, a wholesome stream of learning; they cannot be defeated by worldly people, and what lies beyond the world is for them unfathomable in its depth. They are many, they are harmonious, and they do not seek after wealth and resources.' So he told me." The mother said: "My son, if your father has become a servant to the śramaṇas, will you too become a servant to the śramaṇas? Go and defeat them."

Since Śerśkya was respectful toward his mother, he took his mother's words to heart and set out. A noble debating sage and a certain monk had come from Vārāṇasī. Śerśkya saw that monk along the way and said: "Ho, monk, where have you come from?" "From the settlement of the debating sages." "In that settlement of debating sages, how many monks are there?" "Slightly more than twenty thousand monks." "Well then, if the monks are so numerous, how extensive is their treatise canon?" "Three Baskets (Tripiṭaka)." "What is the measure of the Baskets?" "One hundred thousand verses." "Is it fitting for a householder to take them up?" "The Sūtra Basket and the Abhidharma (the higher teachings) are fitting. But the Vinaya is the text of the ceremonial rule, so it is not fitting."

Śerśkya reflected: "The treatise that is the subject of their debate — they do not expound it to householders." Understanding this, he said: "Ho, monk, recite something from the word of the Buddha." That monk thought: "This brahmin is a debater — is he asking because he wants to gauge its measure, or is he asking because he wants to know everything?" Thinking he should see, the monk spoke a verse:

Where do the lakes turn back?
Where does the road turn back?
Where do all the world's pleasures and pains, without remainder, cease?

Having recited it, he said: "Brahmin, tell me the meaning of this verse." The brahmin, having begun to analyze it through all the fields of knowledge, found that he knew neither the lake, nor the road, nor the turning back, and thought: "Has this not defeated me in my own eyes?" He looked in all four directions and reflected: "If there were some wise person here today, I would now be thoroughly defeated — so I must avoid this by every means." Understanding this, he said: "Ho, monk, that verse is endowed with a vast stream of meaning and is possessed of profound meaning. You too have come from Vārāṇasī, and I too have come from the settlement of the debating sages — so I cannot explain the meaning of this on the spot. Go now, and later it will not be difficult to explain its meaning." Having said this, he went to the settlement of the debating sages. There he saw monks engaged in the diligent practice of reading, recitation, and mental application. As soon as he saw them, his mind became filled with bright faith, and he thought:

Realizing that this was someone without compassion, one who had abandoned any thought of the next world, and that such a person would give rise to a mind of intense hatred toward the monks and would stir up conflict with them, he went to his own home. There his mother said to him: "My son, have you defeated the renunciants of Kāśyapa?" The young brahmin replied: "Mother, are you not pleased with the wealth I have won in debate? It seems you would prefer to have that wealth of victory seized away." "Son, what do you mean?" "Mother, today I went to the settlement of sages who are noble in speech, and just as I had gone a little way further I caught sight of a monk, and I said to him: 'Ho, monk, speak something of the Buddha's teaching.' He then recited the verse:

Where do the rivers turn?

Where does the road turn back?

Where do all the joys and sorrows of the world

Come to a complete and total cessation?

After he spoke this, I began to examine all fields of knowledge I possessed, yet I could not find the rivers, could not find the road, and could not find the turning point. Had there been anyone capable there at the time, I would have been utterly defeated on the spot." "Son, if that is so, go and learn the Buddha's teaching." "Mother, what am I to read? The treatises that these monks teach through their speech are not shown to householders." "Son, then go forth and learn." "Mother, having been born into the highest caste, how could I go forth into renunciation among those of different castes?" "Son, what — do you want bamboo and grass to sprout on your head? Then get out!" And when his mother pressed him insistently with deference, he went forth, going to the settlement of the sages of speech, and approaching a monk, he said: "Ho, monk, I wish to go forth." The monk thought to himself: "If I ordain this brahmin debater, he will become a treasure bestowed upon the teaching," and understanding this, said: "Brahmin, well and good, let it be so. Possessions are impermanent — go forth!" The young brahmin said: "Ho, monk, I am a brahmin of great learning, and so I shall proceed to the region to take my going forth here without delay." The monk then led that brahmin to the region and gave him the going forth and the full ordination, and set him firmly to reading and recitation. When that young monk read and recited, he read all three scriptural collections and became one endowed with the three collections of scripture, a proclaimer of Dharma, gifted with eloquence for reasoning and liberation. Whenever he wished to bestow the gift of hearing

Dharma, he would have a lion throne adorned with many precious things prepared, would have conch shells wound and sounded, would have great drums beaten, and would gather an assembly including kings, and even the multitudes of common people would be filled with manifest faith.

The Dharma-proclaiming young monk thought: "Let me attain what is to be attained through what I have heard. I shall go to Vārāṇasī and pay homage to the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa." And so, delighting in traveling through the region, he set out wandering toward Vārāṇasī, and journeying on by stages, he at last arrived at Vārāṇasī.

Then his mother, having heard of this, went in search of her son to the settlement of the sages of speech, and seeing her son, said: "My son, have you defeated the renunciants of Kāśyapa?" "Mother, I possess only scripture, while they possess both scripture and realization — so how could I possibly defeat them?" "Son, you must certainly defeat them — defeat them!" The young monk, pressing his mother respectfully yet insistently, accepted her words and said: "Mother, when the lion throne has been prepared, the conch shells wound and about to be blown —"

"when the great drum has been beaten and the retinue together with the king has assembled — then, mother, you must come. Very well, son; you shall come." Then, at some later time, having been invited to teach the Dharma to the monks, the lion throne was prepared, the conch shells wound and blown, the great drum was beaten, and the retinue together with the king assembled. When the monk's mother heard the sound of the conch and the great drum, she went straightaway, without delay, to the settlement of the sages of speech, entered the assembly hall, and sat behind the lion throne. The monk who was to teach the Dharma ascended the lion throne and began to expound the teaching. Having taught as much Dharma as he taught, he then began to teach what was not Dharma. At that point the monks said to him: "Venerable one, do not harm the limits of the sūtras. Do not disturb the guidance of the Dharma. Do not tear open the womb of the Dharma. Do not lower the victory banner of the Dharma. Do not raise the victory banner of Māra. Do not cause sentient beings to incline toward the hells." The monk, humiliated, descended from the throne and said to his mother below: "Mother, did you see?" "Son, I saw. Did I not say to you from the very beginning: 'Mother, I possess only scripture, while they possess both scripture and realization — so how can I possibly defeat them'? Son, when you teach the Dharma, teach as much Dharma as there is to teach, and then teach what is not Dharma. If they then say to you: 'Venerable one, do not harm the limits of the sūtras; do not disturb the guidance of the Dharma; do not tear open the womb of the Dharma; do not lower the victory banner of the Dharma; do not raise the victory banner of Māra; do not cause sentient beings to incline toward the hells' — at that moment, strike them with the sword of words. Since they do wrong and are in dread of it, they will sit in silence; and thereby, in the eyes of the world, it will be understood that they have been defeated." "Mother, that method is good. But at that time you too must come." "Son, do as I say — I shall come." Then, at some point, a lion throne for hearing the Dharma was prepared, the monk was invited to teach the Dharma, the conch shells were wound and blown, the great drum was beaten, the retinue together with the king assembled, and the monk's mother came as before and sat behind the lion throne. The monk who was to teach the Dharma ascended the lion throne and began to expound the teaching. Having taught as much Dharma as there was to teach, he then began to teach what was not Dharma. The monks said to him: "Venerable one, do not harm the limits of the sūtras. Do not disturb the guidance of the Dharma. Do not tear open the womb of the Dharma. Do not lower the victory banner of the Dharma. Do not raise the victory banner of Māra. Do not cause sentient beings to incline toward the hells." The monk, goaded by his mother and unable to restrain himself, began to strike them with the sword of words: "You with the elephant's head — what do you know of Dharma or non-Dharma, of Vinaya or non-Vinaya? You with the horse's head! You with the tail-head! You with the donkey's head! You with the ox's head! You with the monkey's head! You with the lion's head! You with the tiger's head! You with the bear's head! You with the hyena's head! You with the owl's head! You with the cat's head! You with the goat's head! You with the sheep's head! You with the deer's head! You with the buffalo's head! You with the pig's head! You with the dog's head! — what do you know of Dharma or non-Dharma, of Vinaya or non-Vinaya?" At those words, the monks said:

"This man has begun to strike us with the sword of words — let us leave!" So said the monks. Those among them who had little discernment departed. Those who were patient-natured remained right there, thinking: if he teaches Dharma, let us listen; if he teaches non-Dharma, let it simply be what it is.

Then the yellow-clad Dharma-proclaimer, having verbally abused the monk-trainees (those in training and those beyond training) with eighteen verbal offenses, descended from the lion throne and said to his mother: "Mother, are you pleased? Is your son's mother happy? Come, let us go home."

The yellow-clad one replied: "Mother, I will not come, out of delight in the scriptural word of the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha Kāśyapa."

"Son, have you not heard that one must not make one's mother's words mere empty words? Come, let us go."

The yellow-clad one replied: "As I wander through saṃsāra, may I never be without a mother like you. But today, having relied on you as a harmful spiritual companion, I have uttered coarse verbal karma toward persons in training and beyond training, and I shall experience the unwanted ripening of that action individually."

Then that mother of the yellow-clad one began to cry out along the great roads, the markets, the crossroads, and the intersections of Vārāṇasī to those dwelling in Vārāṇasī, those going about the palace, and the townspeople: "Hear me! The monks of Kāśyapa have abducted my son — help me!" Those who were faithful among the crowd were truly relieved. Those who lacked faith jeered. When that mother of the yellow-clad one was being jeered, such an affliction came upon her that she vomited hot blood, and when her time came, she was born among the hell-beings.

As for the yellow-clad Dharma-proclaimer himself, because he had committed the eighteen verbal offenses toward monk-trainees and those beyond training, when his time came he was born here among the animals — in the form of a terrifying species of water-monster fish.

Then the assembly reflected with concern: "Wise ones, if the yellow-clad Dharma-proclaimer, who was endowed with the three baskets of scripture, possessed of reasoning and liberated eloquence, who filled the ear-canals of many hundreds of thousands of living beings — if he was born in the wretched realm of animals simply through verbal offenses, then for those of us who pass from this world, where will we go? What will our birth be? What will our next life be?"

Then the Blessed One, having understood with his mind the intentions, latent dispositions, constitutions, and natures of that assembly, taught the Dharma in such a way that, upon hearing it: some attained heat, some attained the summit, some attained acceptance, some attained the supreme mundane Dharma; some directly realized the fruit of stream-entry; some the fruit of once-returning; some the fruit of non-returning; some, having gone forth and abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship; some generated the mind set on the awakening of a śrāvaka; some on the awakening of a pratyekabuddha; and some generated the mind set on unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening. And of that assembly, the great majority were established as having turned toward the Buddha, as having arrived at the Dharma, and as having come to rest in the Saṅgha — such was the Dharma he taught.

Then the Blessed One, having accomplished the great purpose of taming beings, departed.

Then the makara of the fish clan thought to itself: "Since I have heard the Dharma of the three statements in the presence of the Blessed One and then proceeded to eat, this is not in keeping with my proper conduct." And so it entered upon a fast and abstained from food. Now, the hunger of those born in the animal destiny burns fierce and sharp, and when it had grown weak and faint with hunger, it turned its mind to the Blessed One with sincere faith — and when the right moment came, it was born among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings. It is the natural condition of divine sons and daughters that, not long after birth, three thoughts arise: from where did I pass away, where have I been born, and by what karma was I born here? And so that being saw that it had passed away from among the animals and been born among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, and that it had been born there because it had turned its mind to the Blessed One with sincere faith.

Then the former makara, now a divine son, thought to itself: "To approach the Blessed One by first arranging my dwelling and attending to my comforts and then going to see him and pay him homage — that is not in keeping with my proper conduct. Instead I will go to see the Blessed One and pay him homage without first arranging any dwelling at all."

And so the former makara, now a divine son, taking up shining, unstained pendant earrings and adorning his body with necklaces and bracelets, filled his cupped palms with divine blue lotuses, red lotuses, white night-blooming lotuses, and white lotuses — and, radiant with colour of surpassing brilliance, he set out at nightfall, went to where the Blessed One was, scattered the flowers upon the Blessed One as an offering, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and sat down to one side. And such was the power of the divine son's radiance that the entire palace building, every chamber of that many-storied mansion, was filled with a great blaze of light.

Then the Blessed One, having perceived the intention, latent disposition, constitution, and temperament of the former makara divine son, and having known what teaching would be heard by him so as to enable him — even as he sat on that very seat — to shatter with the vajra of wisdom the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, and directly to realize the fruit of stream-entry, taught him the Dharma in such a way as to lead him to a full and individual understanding of the Four Noble Truths.

And having seen the Truths, that divine son spoke aloud three times with deliberate intent these words:

"What the venerable Blessed One has done for me now, this no father has done, no mother has done, no king has done, no gods have done, no ancestors of former generations have done, no ascetics or brahmins have done, and no assembly of kin, friends, or relatives has done — for he has drained the ocean of blood and tears, freed me from the mountains of bones, closed the doors to the lower destinies, opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, lifted me out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed me among gods and humans."

And he spoke again in verse:

By your power, O supremely mighty one, with abundant faults, I have blocked the trail to lower birth, become richly endowed with merit.

The path to higher realms was opened, and I myself have come to gain even the track of nirvāṇa.

Relying on you, O utterly pure one, today I have gained the eye that is free from fault and stainless, and reached the peaceful, noble station — sublime joy — and have crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

One worshipped in all destinies by asuras, humans, and gods, free from birth, old age, sickness, and death, seeing existence as empty — a rare and wondrous sight —
the Sage: today there is the fruit of beholding you.

Then, with gathered robes and long-hanging necklaces trailing —

he bowed at the feet with joy arising in his heart, circumambulated the Subduer of Foes (the Buddha) from the right, and departed into the sky in the direction of the divine world.

Then those who had formerly been like that nāga-spirit's son — like a merchant who finds profit, like a farmer who obtains a harvest, like a hero who triumphs in battle, like a sick person fully freed from all illness — departed in the very same manner in which they had come before the Blessed One, and returned to their own abodes.

Now the monks who dwelt in diligent practice, not sleeping in the first watch of the night or the last watch of the night, saw a great and vast radiance flood the presence of the Blessed One. Seeing this, their minds filled with wonder and doubt, and when dawn came they asked the Blessed One: "Blessed One, last night who was it that came to behold you — the Lord of the Pure Abode (Brahmā), sovereign of the immaculate world? Or Śakra, lord of the gods? Or the Four World-Guardians? Or some other mighty and powerful son of the gods?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it was not Brahmā, lord of the immaculate world, who came to behold me. It was not Śakra, lord of the gods. It was not the Four World-Guardians. It was not some other mighty and powerful son of the gods. Monks, do you see, then, that being of the nāga-fish lineage to whom I earlier taught the Dharma in three words? The Blessed One confirmed: 'Yes, we see.' Monks, that one passed away from there and was reborn among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, and came to my presence last night. I taught him the Dharma, and he saw the truth, then returned to his own abode."

Again the monks asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, what karma did the former son of the nāga-spirit perform that he was reborn among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings? And what karma did he perform that he came to see the truth in the presence of the Blessed One?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the former son of the nāga-spirit had accumulated a store of karma, thoroughly transformed its conditions, dwelt close to it as to a lamp, and fashioned and gathered deeds certain to arise without fail. Monks, by whom else could the karma fashioned and gathered by that son of the nāga-spirit be experienced? Monks, karma that has been done and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been done and accumulated ripens solely within the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources."

Actions, even for a hundred aeons, do not perish, but when the moment and conditions come together, they bear their fruit for embodied beings.

"Monks, there is karma to be experienced in the very life in which it is born, and there is karma to be experienced in another turn of lives. What is the karma to be experienced in the life in which it is born? When that being was still a nāga-fish, the pure and manifest faith in me that it generated — that is called karma to be experienced in the life in which it is born, and through its ripening it was reborn among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings. What is the karma to be experienced in another turn of lives? It went forth into renunciation under the teaching of the completely and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa of the golden complexion; it received scriptural transmission, read, recited, became learned in the aggregates, learned in the elements, learned in the sense sources, learned in dependent origination, learned in what is possible and what is impossible — that is called karma to be experienced in another turn of lives, and through the accumulated substance of that karma, having now been reborn as a son of the gods, it was caused to see the truth in my presence.

Monks, that being so: the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is itself wholly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is itself wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is itself mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are wholly dark and actions that are mixed, and strive for actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train in precisely this way.

When the Blessed One had spoken these words, those monks rejoiced and praised what the Blessed One had said.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga. The thirteenth fascicle.

Then those five hundred young men of good family thought to themselves: Friends, consider this — a preacher of Dharma, a śramaṇa, who possesses all three scriptural collections, who has become endowed with the eloquence of reason and liberation, who has filled the ear-cavities of many hundreds of thousands of living beings — if, through no more than a verbal misdeed, he came to be reborn in a wretched animal existence, then what of us, who are right now violent, red-handed, engaged in beating and extreme beating, who snatch away the lives of others, who incite the killing of others' lives, who make their livelihood by taking the lives of others? When those of us who pass away from here die and transmigrate, what will become of our destiny? What will our rebirth be? What will our future life be? If we were not born in lowly circumstances, we too should rejoice, strive, and make effort in going forth into renunciation under the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, so that we might cross over the rivers and truly pass beyond the conditionings. It is the very nature of the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, while alive, living, present, and dwelling, to survey the world with the buddha-eye, out of loving care for beings who are ripe for training, three times by day and three times by night. And the great śrāvakas likewise do so — so the elder Śāriputra, surveying the world with the śrāvaka-eye, saw those five hundred young men of good family sitting lost in thought, propping their chins on their hands, absorbed and settled in their own minds.

Having seen them, Śāriputra went to where those five hundred young men of good family were and said to them: Good friends, why do you sit propping your chins on your hands, absorbed and settled in thought?

They replied: Noble one, it is like this — a preacher of Dharma, a śramaṇa, who possessed all three scriptural collections and became endowed with the eloquence of reason and liberation, who filled the ear-cavities of many hundreds of thousands of living beings — if, through no more than a verbal misdeed, he came to be reborn in a wretched animal existence, then what of us, who are right now violent, red-handed, engaged in beating and extreme beating, who snatch away the lives of others, who incite the killing of others' lives, who make their livelihood by taking the lives of others? When those of us who pass away from here die and transmigrate, what will become of our destiny? What will our rebirth be? What will our future life be? If we were not born in lowly circumstances, we too should rejoice, strive, and make effort in going forth into renunciation under the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, so that we might cross over the rivers and truly pass beyond the conditionings. That is why it is altogether fitting that we sit absorbed in thought.

"Fair-featured ones, in this sacred teaching of the Lord of Sages what is held dear is not lineage, not household, not clan. In this sacred teaching of the Lord of Sages, what is held dear is practice." And further it was said in verse:

The Tathāgatas take no account of lineage, of household, or of clan.

Though deeds have been performed across a long span of time, it is the deeds themselves they fully examine.

"If you wish for the going forth into renunciation and full ordination as monks under the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, come here. You should go to where the Blessed One is, and the Blessed One will grant you the going forth."

"Excellent, noble one. If that is so, we will come to go forth in the presence of the Blessed One."

Then the venerable Śāriputra led those five hundred young men of good family to where the Blessed One was and, arriving there, bowed with his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Śāriputra addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Reverend One, these five hundred young men of good family wish for the going forth into renunciation and full ordination as monks under the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya. May the Blessed One, out of compassion, please grant them the going forth and confer full ordination upon them."

The Blessed One, saying to them "Come, monks," gave them the going forth, and then declared, "Come, monks — live the holy life." At the very conclusion of the Blessed One's words, their bodies became shaved and robed in patched ochre cloth. It was as though seven days' growth of hair and beard had appeared, their hands were occupied with begging bowl and water vessel, and they abided as if they were monks who had been fully ordained for a hundred years.

And further it was said in verse:

The Tathāgata spoke the word "Come" — and those who bore bodies shaved and robed in ochre cloth instantly became utterly tranquil in their faculties, their bodily forms covered by the intention of the Buddha.

Then the Blessed One, having given those five hundred young men of good family the going forth and full ordination, stayed at ease in Vaiśālī and set out wandering toward the village of Āmra-kāra. Going along, gradually wandering, he arrived at the village of Āmra-kāra and dwelt there in a grove of mango trees to the north of the village.

At that time there was a severe famine. The countryside was desolate. Mendicants found food hard to obtain, and parents themselves found it difficult even to think of feeding their own children — so what need to say anything about what happened to the mendicants?

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, right now there is a severe famine, the countryside is desolate, mendicants find food hard to obtain, and parents themselves find it difficult even to think of feeding their own children — so what need to say anything about what has befallen the mendicants? Therefore, monks, come here and according to whatever invitations have been given, whatever speech of arrival has been made, and whatever companionship of friends has been arranged, accept the rains retreat in the villages surrounding Vaiśālī. I too will accept the rains retreat right here in this village of Āmra-kāra, being served by the monk Ānanda. It is not fitting that all of you should be worn down by begging for alms."

Those monks, having heard this from the Blessed One, responded "Reverend One, as you command," and according to whatever invitations had been given, whatever speech of arrival had been made, and whatever companionship of friends had been arranged, they accepted the rains retreat in the villages surrounding Vaiśālī.

The Blessed One too accepted the rains retreat right there in that same village of Āmra-kāra, being served by the venerable Ānanda.

Then those five hundred monks thought to themselves: "Reverend ones, take note of this. The Blessed One has declared: 'Monks, at present the famine is severe and wretched; it is hard for wandering mendicants to find food, and even parents find it difficult to give food to their own children — how much more so for wandering mendicants. Monks, come here. According to whatever invitations had been given, whatever speech of arrival had been made, and whatever companionship of friends had been arranged, accept the rains retreat in the villages surrounding Vaiśālī. I too will accept the rains retreat right here in this village of Āmra-kāra, being served by the monk Ānanda. It is not fitting that all of you should be worn down by begging for alms.' Since we have no relatives here, and our relatives are settled in the fishing village, we should go to the fishing village, visit our relatives, make shelters of leaves and foliage in the surroundings of the fishing village, and accept the rains retreat there — that would be fitting." And so those five hundred monks went to the fishing village, visited their relatives, made shelters of leaves and foliage in the surroundings of the fishing village, and accepted the rains retreat there.

Then they thought to themselves: "Reverend ones, take note of this. We are ones of little learning, and should our relatives come to visit us, we would not be able to teach them the Dharma. We could say to our visiting relatives: 'Relatives, those of you in whose village this community of monks has accepted the rains retreat — those relatives of theirs have obtained a fine and excellent gain. For this monk has attained the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, the perception of selflessness in what is suffering, the perception of revulsion toward food, the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of faultiness, the perception of relinquishment, the perception of dispassion, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of the unattractive, the perception of the bloated, the perception of the putrefied, the perception of the festering, the perception of the gnawed-apart, the perception of the devoured, the perception of the blood-red, the perception of the scattered, the perception of bones, and the perception that analytically discerns emptiness. This monk has attained the first meditative concentration, the second, the third, and the fourth; loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity; the sense base of infinite space, the sense base of infinite consciousness, the sense base of nothingness, the sense base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception; the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning; the sphere of miraculous powers, the divine ear, the thorough knowledge of minds, the recollection of former abodes, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of defilements. This monk meditates upon the eight liberations (vimokṣas) of an arhat. This monk is liberated in both respects' — we should proclaim each other's qualities in this way. That would be fitting." And so, when their relatives came to visit, those monks began to proclaim each other's qualities to those visiting relatives.

"Relatives, those of you in whose village a community of monks accepted the rains retreat at such a lodging supplied by patrons — those relatives have obtained a fine acquisition indeed. This monk has attained the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, the perception of selflessness in what is suffering, the perception of repulsion toward food, the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of faultiness, the perception of abandonment, the perception of dispassion, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of the unattractive, the perception of the bloated, the perception of the festering, the perception of the worm-infested, the perception of the gnawed, the perception of the devoured, the perception of the blood-red, the perception of the scattered, the perception of bones, and the perception that analytically discerns emptiness. This monk has attained the first, second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations; loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity; the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception; the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning; the sphere of miraculous powers, the divine ear, the thorough knowledge of minds, the recollection of former abodes, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of defilements. This monk meditates upon the eight liberations of an arhat. This monk is liberated in both respects."

Those relatives then said, "Noble ones, have you yourselves attained such an accumulation of qualities?" "We have." The world is fond of qualities, so they at once took the matter away even from their own children and conceived the wish to offer alms to those monks.

Now, while the Blessed One, the Buddha, was living and dwelling, alive and present, it was natural that there were two great assemblies of hearers. The first was during the rains retreat, on the day of the middle month of the summer season. The second was on the full-moon day of the middle month of autumn. At that time, those who during the rains retreat, on the day of the middle month of the summer season, had taken up an instruction and accepted the rains retreat in villages, market towns, districts, and royal palaces — when the full-moon day of the middle month of autumn came around, they would report what they had attained, and would inquire below about what they had not yet attained, in order to attain it.

Then, after the three months of the rains retreat had passed, those monks who had accepted the rains retreat in the village of Pūrvavideha near Vaiśālī, wearing their robes and holding their robes, thin and emaciated, haggard, gaunt, and dried out, their bodies worn down, took up their begging bowls and robes and set off walking toward the village of Vaiśālī. As they were making their way and eventually arrived at the village of Vaiśālī, the Venerable Ānanda saw those very many monks from a great distance. Seeing them, delighted and gladdened at their conduct in the holy life, he greeted them with words of friendship, and took their begging bowls, robes, shoulder bags, water strainers, round vessels for pouring over the head, containers of oil, hats, worn sandals, and leather shoes, saying these words: "Welcome, venerable ones! You have come well! Venerable ones, where have you come from just now? Where did you accept the rains retreat?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we have come here from the village of Spongbyed. We accepted the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed."

"Venerable ones, did you accept the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed comfortably, in ease? Were you not wearied by going on alms round?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we did indeed accept the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed in ease and comfort at first, but we were wearied by going on alms round. So it appeared to us, venerable ones — wearied and troubled by the alms round, we became thin, feeble, gaunt, and thirsty; our complexions faded, and our skin, flesh, and blood diminished."

Those monks who had accepted the rains retreat in the vicinity of the fishermen's village — they too, once the three months of the rains retreat had passed, took up their robes and, possessing their robes, with their complexions, skin, flesh, and blood flourishing, they took up their begging bowls and robes and made their way, going and travelling toward the village of Vaiśālī. As they were making their way and eventually arrived at the village of Vaiśālī, the Venerable Ānanda saw those very many monks from a great distance. Seeing them, delighted and gladdened at their conduct in the holy life, he greeted them with words of friendship, and took their begging bowls, robes, shoulder bags, water strainers, round vessels for pouring over the head, containers of oil, hats, worn sandals, and leather shoes, saying these words: "Welcome, venerable ones! You have come well! Venerable ones, where have you come from just now? Where did you accept the rains retreat?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we have come here from the fishermen's village. We accepted the rains retreat in the fishermen's village."

"Venerable ones, did you accept the rains retreat in the fishermen's village comfortably, in ease? Were you not wearied by going on alms round?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we did indeed accept the rains retreat in the fishermen's village in ease and comfort, and we were not wearied by going on alms round. So it appeared to us, venerable ones — since we were not troubled by the alms round, our complexions, skin, flesh, and blood flourished."

"Venerable ones, at present there is a severe famine, the wilderness is hard to forage in, food is difficult to find, and even parents find it hard to give food to their own children or even to think of doing so — to say nothing of what happens when mendicants come looking for alms. So here, what was the cause and what was the condition for your not being wearied by the alms round?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we praised one another's virtuous qualities in the presence of our lay relatives, saying: 'This monk has attained the perception of impermanence; the perception of suffering in what is impermanent; the perception of no-self in what is suffering; the perception of disenchantment with food; the perception of non-delight in the entire world; the perception of faults; the perception of abandonment; the perception of freedom from attachment; the perception of cessation; the perception of death; the perception of the unattractive; the perception of the bluish-discoloured; the perception of the festering; the perception of the bloated; the perception of the worm-eaten; the perception of the devoured; the perception of the reddish; the perception of the scattered; the perception of bones; and the perception that individually discerns emptiness. This monk has also attained the first meditative concentration and the second — the third and the fourth; loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity; the sphere of boundless space, the sphere of boundless consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, and the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception; the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, and the fruit of non-returning; the domain of supernormal powers, the divine ear, knowledge of others' minds, recollection of previous lives, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of defilements. This monk is one who meditates upon the eight liberations of an arhat. This monk is one who is liberated from both sides." In this way they proclaimed one another's qualities to each other — whether accurately or inaccurately; inaccurately.

"Is it right for you, for the sake of a trifling gain, to claim for yourselves a supreme human quality that you do not possess? It may be permissible, or it may not be permissible — and yet you have spoken in this way." Monks of little worth — why do monks, for the sake of a trifling gain, claim a supreme human quality they do not possess? They reproach, rebuke, and condemn one another. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in reference to this occasion and this matter, convened the community of monks. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though they know, they inquire — and so forth, as before.

The Blessed One addressed the monks who were dwelling on the bank of the beautiful river: "Monks, is it true that you claimed, for the sake of a trifling gain, a supreme human quality that you did not possess?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One then condemned this thoroughly, saying that it is not in keeping with the conduct of a renunciant, not appropriate, not suitable, not in harmony with the rules — it is not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

"Monks, these three are thieves and great thieves found in the world and in existence. What are the three? Monks, here a thief attended by a retinue of a hundred, or attended by a retinue of a thousand, marches before those hundred or thousand, breaks into houses, cuts through fastenings, carries off plunder outright, lies in ambush on the road, sets fires, kills travelers on the way, steals from the royal treasury, sacks villages, sacks towns, and sacks provinces. That, monks, is the first thief and great thief found in the world and in existence.

"Monks, there is also another thief and great thief who is attended neither by a retinue of a hundred nor by a retinue of a thousand, and who marches before no such hundred or thousand, who does not break into houses, does not cut through fastenings, does not carry off plunder outright, does not lie in ambush on the road, does not set fires, does not kill travelers on the way, does not steal from the royal treasury, does not sack villages, does not sack towns, and does not sack provinces — and yet he makes his living by repeatedly selling grass, wood, flowers, fruit, leaves, or whatever belongings of the Saṅgha there may be, without supporting a household. That, monks, is the second thief and great thief found in the world and in existence.

"Monks, there is also another thief and great thief who is attended neither by a retinue of a hundred nor by a retinue of a thousand, and who marches before no such hundred or thousand — does not sack households, does not cut bonds, does not seize by violent assault, does not lie in ambush on the road, does not set fires, does not kill travelers on the way, does not steal from the royal treasury, does not sack villages, does not sack towns, and does not sack provinces — and yet he does not make his living by repeatedly selling grass, wood, flowers, fruit, leaves, or whatever belongings of the Saṅgha there may be, and he does not support a household — and yet he speaks of the supreme human quality as being present when it is absent. That, monks, is the third thief and great thief found in the world and in existence.

"Monks, among thieves, any thief who is attended by a retinue of a hundred or a retinue of a thousand, who marches before such a hundred or thousand, who sacks households, cuts bonds, seizes by violent assault, lies in ambush on the road, sets fires, kills travelers on the way, steals from the royal treasury, sacks villages, sacks towns, and sacks provinces — that is but a small thing. Among thieves, any thief who makes his living by repeatedly selling grass, wood, flowers, fruit, leaves, or whatever belongings of the Saṅgha there may be, and does not support a household — that too is but a small thing. Monks, among all thieves, the one who speaks of the supreme human quality as being present when it is absent — that one is the greatest thief and great thief in the world together with its gods, its māras, its Brahmā, its ascetics and brahmins, its beings, its gods and humans.

The Blessed One having declared this, the Sugata having spoken thus, the Teacher then further declared these words in verse:

Whoever, not having become an arhat, proclaims himself to be an arhat —
he is a thief among the world together with Brahmā, and is to be declared one of corrupt moral discipline.

Thereupon the Blessed One, having censured this in many ways, addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — beginning with the words 'for the sake of sustaining the Saṅgha,' and ending with the words 'so that this holy life of mine, which is of benefit to many people, may be broadly and thoroughly demonstrated to gods and humans and may long endure' — just as before. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk who does not know, who does not fully know, who has not the supreme human quality, the utter and noble distinction of attainment, the knowledge, the seeing, and the abiding in direct experience — and who, being without it, falsely claims 'I know this, I see this' — then if a downfall arises from that, and wishing to purify it, he says at another time, whether asked or not asked: 'Venerable ones, I who did not know claimed to know, I who had not seen said that I saw — I spoke an empty, false lie' — then that monk, too, has incurred defeat and is not to remain in the community." Thus the Blessed One established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

Now, the many monks who were dwelling in lodgings in forest hermitages, at the foot of trees, and at the edges of cave retreats, striving in pursuit of the practice of yoga — relying on some slight grasping at the distinguishing characteristic that is the basis of calm abiding, and through worldly mental engagement suppressing the afflictions — on account of this they would experience, regarding objects of desire, attachment, aversion and malice did not arise continually in their mental streams. After that, they would declare to one another: "Venerable ones, know this! Whatever is to be attained by those who dwell in forest hermitages, we have attained. Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done; we know nothing further beyond this existence." And having said that, they abandoned their forest dwelling places and entered lodgings at the edges of villages. There, they would repeatedly encounter objects of the feminine kind, and they would mix and dwell together with novices who frequented pleasure groves. Afflictions arose in them as well — attachment regarding objects of desire, and aversion and malice arose continually in their mental streams. And then they thought: "Venerable ones, know this! Whatever is to be attained by those who dwell in forest hermitages, we have attained. Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done; we know nothing further beyond this existence. Come, let us abandon our forest dwelling places and enter lodgings at the edges of villages." And having said this, they abandoned their forest dwelling places and entered lodgings at the edges of villages. There, they too repeatedly encountered objects of the feminine kind and mixed and dwelt together with novices who frequented pleasure groves. In them too afflictions arose — attachment regarding objects of desire, and aversion and malice arose continually in their mental streams. Then the Blessed One established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: "Furthermore, if a monk, without knowing or fully knowing, claims 'I know this, I see this' — claiming to possess a supreme human quality, a noble distinction, an attainment, knowledge, vision, and direct experience that do not exist in him — and if, arising from that transgression, wishing to purify himself, he then at another time, whether asked or not asked, says: 'Venerable ones, I spoke without knowing, claiming to know; I spoke claiming to see what I had not seen; I spoke what was empty and false' — that monk too has incurred defeat and is not to remain in the community."

When this rule of training had been established, those of us who were dwelling in forest hermitages, at the foot of trees, and at the edges of cave retreats — relying on some slight grasping at the distinguishing characteristic that is the basis of calm abiding, and through worldly mental engagement suppressing the afflictions — would find that attachment regarding objects of desire, and aversion and malice, did not arise continually in our mental streams. And we would declare to one another: "Venerable ones, know this! Whatever is to be attained by those who dwell in forest hermitages, we have attained. Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done; we know nothing further beyond this existence. Come, let us abandon our forest dwelling places and enter lodgings at the edges of villages." And having said this, we abandoned our forest dwelling places and entered lodgings at the edges of villages. There, we too repeatedly encountered objects of the feminine kind and mixed and dwelt together with novices who frequented pleasure groves, and in us too afflictions arose — attachment regarding objects of desire, and aversion and malice arose continually in our mental streams. Has there not now arisen in us a defeat transgression? Come, let us go to where the Venerable Ānanda is, and having gone, let us put this matter fully to him. Whatever the Venerable Ānanda instructs us, exactly that we shall take to heart.

Then they went to where the Venerable Ānanda was, and having arrived, they said to the Venerable Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda, please know this. The Blessed One established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: 'Furthermore, if a monk, without knowing or fully knowing, claims "I know this, I see this" — — and that having given rise to that downfall, wishing to purify it, at another time whether asked or not asked, he says: 'Venerable ones, I spoke of knowing what I do not know, and spoke of seeing what I have not seen — I spoke emptily and falsely.' In that case, that monk too has incurred a defeat and is not to remain in the community." — the Blessed One having established this as a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: we who were dwelling in forest lodgings in secluded groves, at the foot of mountains, and on the edges of hayricks, relying upon a certain slight grasping at the defining characteristics that are the basis for calm abiding, and suppressing the afflictions by means of worldly mental application, such that attachment to sense objects and ill will did not arise continuously in our mental streams — we said to one another: "Venerable ones, know this! We have attained what forest-dwellers are supposed to attain. Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done, and we shall know no further existence beyond this." Having said so, we abandoned our forest lodgings and entered lodgings near villages. And there, repeatedly seeing women as objects of attention and dwelling together and mixing with novices of the pleasure gardens, afflictions arose in us as well — attachment to sense objects and ill will arose continuously in our mental streams. Has there not now arisen in us a defeat transgression? Come, let us go to where the Venerable Ānanda is, and having gone there, let us put this matter fully to him. Whatever the Venerable Ānanda instructs us, exactly that we shall take to heart." And so thinking, we went to put this very matter fully to the Venerable Ānanda.

Then the Venerable Ānanda led those many monks to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Having sat to one side, the Venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable Blessed One, the Blessed One established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: 'Furthermore, if a monk, without knowing or fully knowing, claims — when there is no supreme human Dharma, no attainment of something noble and distinguished, no knowing, no seeing, no touching or entering into it — "I know this, I see this" — and that having given rise to that downfall, wishing to purify it, at another time whether asked or not asked, he says: "Venerable ones, I spoke of knowing what I do not know, and spoke of seeing what I have not seen — I spoke emptily and falsely" — in that case that monk too has incurred a defeat and is not to remain in the community.' — the Blessed One having established this as a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: these venerable ones dwelling in forest lodgings in secluded groves, at the foot of mountains, and on the edges of hayricks, relying upon a certain slight grasping at the defining characteristics that are the basis for calm abiding, and suppressing the afflictions by means of worldly mental application, such that attachment to sense objects and ill will did not arise continuously in their mental streams — they said to one another: 'Venerable ones, know this! We have attained what forest-dwellers are supposed to attain. Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what was to be done has been done, and we shall know no further existence beyond this.'

'Come, let us leave our forest dwellings and take up lodgings on the outskirts of towns.' Having said this, they abandoned their forest dwellings and moved into lodgings near villages. There, encountering women again and again, and living in association with novices who dwelt in pleasure groves, afflictions arose in them — attachment to sense pleasures and ill will arose continuously in their mental streams. And then remorse arose in them, with the thought: 'Has there not occurred in us a defeat, a root downfall?' For that reason I shall fully present this matter to the Blessed One, asking: 'Has there not occurred in them a defeat, a root downfall?'

The Blessed One declared: 'Ānanda, with the exception of conceited presumption, it has not.'

Then the Blessed One, having spoken praise in many categories of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who are equipped with the provisions for training, and having addressed the monks with words consonant with this, weighted toward this, and endowed with qualities appropriate to this, declared to the monks: 'Monks, the former was a rule, and this is a permission. My hearers shall recite the foundational rule of training in the Vinaya in the following way.'

Furthermore, any monk who, without directly knowing or fully knowing, without having the supreme human quality (uttaramanuṣyadharma), its culmination, that which is noble, that which is distinctly attained, the knowledge, the vision, and the direct experience — who, lacking these, claims "I know this" or "I see this," and who, wishing to purify a defeat-level downfall that has arisen, whether questioned at another time or not questioned, says: "Venerable ones, I, for my part, said I knew what I did not know" — who said "I see" what was not seen — if it is said that he spoke a specious lie, then with the exception of conceited presumption, that monk too has incurred defeat and is not to be allowed to remain.

Now the phrase "whatever monk" refers to the four classes of monks, as stated from there onward. In the present context, since it is not appropriate to establish the action of the fourfold assembly with a petition, one should understand "monk" to mean one who has received full ordination, and so on as before. Thus it is that "whatever monk" is taught.

As for the phrase "without directly knowing," what is it that is not directly known? Not directly knowing form, not directly knowing feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

As for "without fully knowing," what is it that is not fully known? Not fully knowing form itself, not fully knowing feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

As for "human quality," this refers to nirvāṇa, the quality belonging to human beings — attained by human beings, yet not attained by eunuchs, hermaphrodites, or those of indeterminate sex, let alone by hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, which goes without saying.

As for "supreme," the form realm is supreme relative to the desire realm, and the formless realm is supreme relative to the form realm.

Alternatively, "human quality" refers to the five hindrances, and "supreme" refers to the abandonment of those same hindrances.

As for "culmination," culmination here means nirvāṇa.

As for "noble," the noble ones are the buddhas and the śrāvakas of the buddhas.

As for "distinctly attained," the distinct attainments are the four fruits of the contemplative life: the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning, and arhatship.

As for "knowing," the knowings are fourfold: knowing suffering, knowing the origin, knowing cessation, and knowing the path. As for "seeing," the seeings are fourfold: seeing suffering, seeing the origin, seeing cessation, and seeing the path. As for "dwelling in contact," dwelling in contact refers to the four meditative concentrations (dhyānas), and it arises from meditative absorption, not from birth. As for "in the absence of," this means in the absence of that thing's substantiality. As for "while absent," this means with respect to oneself.

As for the phrase "one knows this" — what does one know? One knows suffering, the origin, cessation, and the path.

As for the phrase "one sees this" — what does one see? One sees gods (devas), nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas (Skt. garuḍa), gandharvas (Skt. gandharva), kinnaras (Skt. kinnara), great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas (Skt. kumbhāṇḍa), putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds. And gods in turn see oneself. Nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds in turn see oneself.

One hears the sounds of gods, and the sounds of nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds. And gods in turn hear one's own sound. Nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds in turn hear one's own sound.

One goes to behold gods, and one goes to behold nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds. And gods come to behold oneself. Nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds come to behold oneself.

One converses together with gods, speaks graciously with them, pleases each of them, and always dwells together with them. One converses together with nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds, speaks graciously with them, pleases each of them, and always dwells together with them. Gods in turn converse together with oneself, speak graciously with oneself, are each pleased with oneself, and always dwell together with oneself. Nāgas, yakṣas, garuḍas, gandharvas, kinnaras, great serpents, hungry ghosts, flesh-eaters, kumbhāṇḍas, putrescent ones, body-putrescent ones, and the flesh-eaters of charnel grounds in turn converse together with oneself, speak graciously with oneself, are each pleased with oneself, and always dwell together with oneself.

Without yet having attained them, I have attained the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, the perception of selflessness in what is suffering, the perception of repulsion toward food, the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of faults, the perception of abandonment, the perception of freedom from attachment, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of the unattractive, the perception of the bloated, the perception of the festering, the perception of the putrefied, the perception of the worm-eaten, the perception of the devoured, the perception of the blood-red, the perception of the scattered, the perception of a heap of bones, and the perception that individually examines emptiness.

Without yet having attained them, I have attained the first meditative concentration, the second, the third, and the fourth; loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity; the base of infinite space, the base of infinite consciousness, the base of nothingness, the base of neither-perception-nor-non-perception; the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning, and the fruit of arhatship; the sphere of supernormal powers, the divine ear, knowledge of others' minds, recollection of former lives, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of defilements. I am an arhat who meditates on the eight liberations and who is liberated from both sides.

The phrase "from a claim" means: from something one has taken upon oneself. "A transgression arose from that" refers to that very basis. "Wishing to be purified" means wishing to arise and clear oneself. "On some other occasion" means at another time. "Whether asked" means by others. "Whether not asked" means that in oneself remorse, slight remorse, manifest remorse, and deep remorse have arisen. The phrase "having spoken thus, venerable ones, I who did not know have declared that I knew" refers to mental consciousness. "Having declared, I saw what I had not seen" refers to visual consciousness. The phrases "having spoken empty falsehood" and so on are synonymous words for the act of having spoken. "If one says" means if one states it. "Except for overweening pride" means having set aside overweening pride. "Monk" means one who possesses the attributes of a monk, as before. "And that" is a phrase of concise and comprehensive indication. "Has incurred defeat" is as before. "Is not to be maintained" — up to the point of "is not to be appointed by the twelve persons" — is as before, and therefore it is said "is not to be maintained."

Now, how does a transgression arise in regard to this?

Summary verse:

Altering perception, and in forest hermitages and in households displaying seats, grasping one's own distinguishing marks, and presenting oneself — these are the cases.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "I have seen gods," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "I have seen them," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "I have seen the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "I have heard the sound of the gods," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "I have heard their sound," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "I have heard the sound of the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "I am going in order to see the gods," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "I am going in order to see them," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "I am going in order to see the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "The gods are coming in order to see me," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "They are coming in order to see me," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "Even the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground are coming in order to see me," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "I converse together with the gods, I speak of their comings and goings, I delight each of them individually, and I always dwell together with them," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "I converse together with them, I speak of their comings and goings, I delight each of them individually, and I always dwell together with them," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "I converse together with the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground, I speak of their comings and goings, I delight each of them individually, and I always dwell together with them," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "The gods converse together with me, speak of coming to me, delight me individually, and always dwell together with me," he incurs defeat. With nāgas, with yakṣas, and so on as before, down to decomposing corpses — if he says "They also converse together with me, speak of coming to me, delight me individually, and always dwell together with me," he incurs defeat. Even if he says only this: "Even the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground converse together with me, speak of coming to me, delight me individually, and always dwell together with me," he incurs a grave offense.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "Though I have not attained it, I have attained the perception of impermanence," he incurs defeat. If he says he has attained, beginning with the perception of suffering in impermanence and continuing as before down to the perception that analytically discerns emptiness, he incurs defeat.

If a monk, having altered his perception — having altered his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, or his view — says "Though I have not attained it, I have attained the first meditative concentration," he incurs defeat. Likewise, if he says he has attained the second, the third, and the fourth, and, continuing as before, says "I am an arhat accomplished in the eight liberations (vimokṣa), and I am liberated in both respects," he incurs defeat.

Fourteenth fascicle of the Vinaya Analysis.

Now, when a great many monks are dwelling in a wilderness hermitage without a village nearby, and non-human beings are harming them there, and there is among them a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and the non-human beings do not harm that monk — then if another monk, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "I too am dwelling in that wilderness hermitage, and the non-humans do not harm me there," he incurs defeat.

When a great many monks are invited as guests to houses and given food to eat, and striped seats are spread out for them there, and there is among them a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and the striped seats are spread out for that monk — then if another monk, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "I too was invited as a guest to that house and ate there, and striped seats were spread out for me as well," he incurs defeat.

When a great many monks dwelling in a hermitage, relying upon a slight grasping at the defining characteristic of calm abiding as their basis, suppress their afflictions through a worldly path, so that attachment toward sensual objects and malice do not arise pervasively in their mental continuum — then if a monk, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "I too am dwelling in that wilderness hermitage, and while dwelling there, relying upon a slight grasping at the defining characteristic of calm abiding, I have suppressed my afflictions through a worldly path, so that attachment toward sensual objects and malice do not arise pervasively in my mental continuum," he incurs a grave offense.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk who sees the gods" — and yet does not add "and that monk is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one who sees nāgas, yakṣas," and, continuing as before down to "one who sees decomposing bodies" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Even if he says "There exists a monk who sees the flesh-eaters of the charnel grounds" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk who hears the voices of gods" — and yet does not add "and that monk is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one who hears the voices of nāgas, yakṣas," and, continuing as before down to "one who hears the voices of decomposing bodies" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Even going so far as to say "There exists a monk who goes to see the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk who goes to see the gods" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one who goes to see the nāgas, the yakṣas," and, continuing as before down to "one who goes to see decomposing bodies" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. Even going so far as to say "There exists a monk who goes to see the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk to whom the gods come to see" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one to whom the nāgas, the yakṣas come," and, continuing as before down to "one to whom decomposing bodies come to see" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. Even going so far as to say "There exists a monk to whom the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground come to see" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk who converses together with the gods, who speaks of their comings and goings, who rejoices with each of them individually, and who dwells together with them constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one who converses together with the nāgas, the yakṣas," and, continuing as before down to "one who converses with decomposing bodies, speaks of their comings and goings, rejoices with each of them individually, and dwells together with them constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. Even going so far as to say "There exists a monk who converses together with the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground, who speaks of their comings and goings, who rejoices with each of them individually, and who dwells together with them constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk makes a self-referential disclosure and, having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, says "There exists a monk together with whom the gods converse, speak of their comings and goings, rejoice with him individually, and dwell together with him constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. If he says "There exists one together with whom nāgas, yakṣas," and, continuing as before down to "decomposing bodies converse, speak of their comings and goings, rejoice with him individually, and dwell together with him constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Even if he says "There exists a monk together with whom the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground converse, speak of their comings and goings, rejoice with him individually, and dwell together with him constantly" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

When a monk misrepresents himself, shifting his perception and altering his patience, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, and says "There exists a monk who has attained the perception of impermanence" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. Just as with the perception of impermanence, so too if he says, continuing as before down through the perception of individually discerning emptiness, "There exists one who has attained such" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

When a monk misrepresents himself, shifting his perception and altering his patience, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, and says "There exists a monk who has attained the first meditative concentration (dhyāna)" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense. Just as with the first meditative concentration, so too continuing as before through the second, the third, and the fourth, down to the monk who is an arhat accomplished in the eight liberations and who is liberated through both aspects — if he says "There exists such a one" and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Now, suppose a large number of monks are dwelling in a certain isolated forest hermitage, and non-human beings are afflicting them there. Among those monks there is one who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and the non-human beings do not afflict that one. Then a monk, misrepresenting himself and shifting his perception, alters his patience, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, and says "There exists a monk who dwells in that isolated forest hermitage and whom the non-human beings there do not afflict" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Now, suppose a large number of monks have been invited as guests into households to eat, and there, for them, striped seats have been spread and arranged. Among those monks there is one who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and striped seats are arranged for that one there. Then a monk, misrepresenting himself and shifting his perception, alters his patience, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, and says "There exists a monk who was invited as a guest to that household and dined there, and for whom striped seats are likewise arranged" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Now, suppose a large number of monks dwelling in a forest hermitage, relying upon some small characteristic sign belonging to the defining mark of calm abiding, suppress their afflictions by means of a worldly path, so that attachment to sensual objects and malicious thoughts do not arise continuously in their mental stream. Then a monk, misrepresenting himself and shifting his perception, alters his patience, his desire, his intention, his conceptual thought, and his view, and says: "Whatever monk dwells in that forest hermitage devoid of a village, and relying upon some small characteristic sign belonging to the defining mark of calm abiding, suppresses afflictions by means of a worldly path, so that attachment to sensual objects and malicious thoughts do not arise continuously in his mental stream — that exists" — and yet does not add "and that is I" — he incurs a grave offense.

Summary verse:

Mutual quarreling, falling of rain, and the coming of night,
the hot springs of Rājagṛha, and the sounds of the great elephants.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Vaiśālī, in the Pavilion with the Gabled Hall by the shore of the Monkey Pond. At that time, King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, and the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī fell into mutual quarreling. Then King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, equipped his fourfold army with its divisions of elephants, cavalry, chariots, and infantry, and set about destroying and crushing the outlying territories. The people of the outlying territories who dwelt there sent word to the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, saying: "Wise ones, King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, has equipped his fourfold army with its divisions of elephants, cavalry, chariots, and infantry, and is crushing and destroying the outlying territories." The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, upon hearing this, likewise equipped their own fourfold army with its divisions of elephants, cavalry, chariots, and infantry, and set out from Vaiśālī. As they were setting out, the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, early in the morning, having arranged his robes and taken his almsbowl and outer cloak, entered Vaiśālī for alms. The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī caught sight of the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana from a great distance. Seeing him, they thought to themselves: "Wise ones, this one is the third highest — it is said that there is nothing whatsoever that he does not know, has not seen, does not understand, or does not cognize. Let us ask him which side we will be victorious on." And so they asked the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Noble one, since King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, is crushing and destroying the outlying territories, and we are now going forth to do battle, which side will be victorious?" Mahāmaudgalyāyana replied: "People of the Vāsiṣṭha clan, you will be victorious." At those words, they rejoiced, thinking "The noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana has prophesied our victory," and gladness, joy, exultation, delight, and happiness arose in them. Without even reckoning with King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, they advanced against him with utter confidence and without hesitation. Then King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, was defeated, terrified, broken, vanquished, and put to flight, and he fled to the bank of the river Gaṅgā. The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī followed right behind him, their minds filled with immense and exuberant joy. And King Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, born of Magadha, thought to himself:

"These Licchavīs of Vaiśālī are vicious and crushing in their might. Should I enter the river Gaṅgā, there is every chance that they will drag me out with nets or fish me out with ladles, and torment me in ways utterly unseemly. It is better for me to die by rushing forward to meet them openly." Knowing this, he charged forward with the force of one resolved on death. Then his entire army turned back, and the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī were defeated, terrified, broken, vanquished, and put to flight. Without making any detour whatsoever, King Ajātaśatru entered Vaiśālī, shut the gates, raised the drawbridge at the rampart's edge, and remained within. The forces of Ajātaśatru, king of Magadha, son of Vaidehī, having won the battle and overcome and expelled the inhabitants of that land, departed for Rājagṛha. Then the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, on the great roads, the lanes, the crossroads, and the junctions, began to mock, scoff, and jeer, saying: "If the noble great Maudgalyāyana has prophesied our victory, then what sort of victory is this — when Vaiśālī has been taken from us?"

While they were mocking thus, the six monks (the Group of Six) were also out on their alms round, and when they heard the Licchavīs heaping these reproaches on them, the Group of Six said: "Good sirs, whom are you mocking?" The Licchavīs replied: "We are mocking you. The noble great Maudgalyāyana prophesied our victory — so if Vaiśālī has been taken from us, how is that victory?" The Group of Six then said: "Good sirs, who won the very first engagement in battle? We did. If you yourselves were victorious, why then did you turn back afterward? Do you wish to conquer Magadha and seize Rājagṛha? Have you not heard the saying: when pressed too hard, even a fox becomes like a lion?" The Licchavīs had nothing to say and fell silent, at a loss for words. Then the Group of Six said: "Dear friends, that much has been settled for them — but a minor fault has now arisen here. Come back, go before him, and make him acknowledge it." Having performed the duties of the meal, they paid homage and went to where the venerable great Maudgalyāyana was staying. When they arrived, they spoke to the venerable great Maudgalyāyana as follows:

"Homage to the elder. Good health to you, venerable ones. Elder, please open the floor. Venerable ones, we open the floor regarding a downfall in one of the five categories. Elder, did you or did you not prophesy victory to the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī? You did prophesy it. Now if Vaiśālī has been taken from them, how is that a victory? Your black bowl does not feed you — that is why you tell everyone what to do, and yet it comes to nothing. Because you have burned up your alms territory, we cannot even get alms. The transgression that has fallen to you — redress it properly in accordance with the Dharma."

The venerable great Maudgalyāyana replied: "Venerable ones, I see no transgression."

The Group of Six said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that for one who does not see a transgression, the act of suspension must be carried out. Therefore why should we overlook this? Who is the monastery warden? He is someone of importance. Call for him. He has been called. Venerable one, strike the gaṇḍī." "Because the great Maudgalyāyana, for a trifling reason, does not redress a transgression that has occurred, the act of suspension for not seeing a transgression must be carried out." The monastery warden went to the senior elder of the Saṅgha's residence, and the Group of Six went with him. At that time the venerable Śāriputra was serving as the senior elder of the Saṅgha. It was always he who struck the gaṇḍī, and when the venerable one did so, which among the venerable ones would not fully remain?

remained fully, or be fully appeased, or be appeased from the ground, or be expelled" — these options were then examined according to the Dharma, and a resolution was sought. The Group of Six said: "No elder will fully remain, nor remain from the ground, nor be appeased, nor be appeased from the ground, nor be expelled. For the venerable great Maudgalyāyana, by covering up a transgression, causes the teaching of the Blessed One to be torn apart. He does not earn his living by means of a black alms-bowl. Therefore he makes a pledge to a superior person's code, announces it to all, and yet it comes to nothing, and because he has scorched his sphere of conduct, we ourselves cannot obtain alms either. Since a transgression has arisen with regard to him and he does not redress it properly according to the Dharma — because he does not see that transgression — the act of suspension must now be carried out."

The venerable monks struck the gaṇḍī for the elder monk, and said: "The Buddha, the Blessed One, is omniscient, sees all things, and has attained supreme sovereignty over knowledge and all that is to be known; he cuts through every doubt. Go before him and present this matter. Receive precisely what the Blessed One pronounces as his ruling, and hold to it as it truly is."

At that time the monks made their appeal to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, in battle, non-humans engage in combat first, and afterward humans engage in combat. Wherever the non-humans emerge victorious, humans too emerge victorious. Therefore, monks, when the great Maudgalyāyana made that prophecy to the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, it was at that very moment that the non-humans of Vaiśālī defeated the non-humans of Rājagṛha. And when those armies went to the bank of the Ganges, the non-humans of Rājagṛha defeated the non-humans of Vaiśālī. Now if the great Maudgalyāyana were to be asked about that as well, the great Maudgalyāyana would give prophecy about that too. Monks, there is no transgression in the great Maudgalyāyana having given prophecy with such an understanding. Just as the people of Vaiśālī won first, and later King Ajātaśatru defeated them on the bank of the Ganges by the force of death, so too in like manner it was King Ajātaśatru who won first, and afterward those people of Vaiśālī defeated him on the bank of the Ganges by the force of death — and this account should be set out in full."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in Vaiśālī, in the Peaked House in the great forest near the Monkey Pond. At that time the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) announced that in twelve years a drought would come.

The venerable great Maudgalyāyana dressed in his robe in the morning, took up his alms-bowl and his monastic robe, and entered Vaiśālī to seek alms. The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī asked him: "Noble one, how long before the gods will send rain?" He said: "Friends of wisdom, after seven days have passed." Those people then announced: "The noble great Maudgalyāyana has prophesied that after seven days the gods will send rain." And so they took whatever grain was stored in their houses and storerooms and carried it outside and discarded it.

When precisely seven days had passed, the gods sounded thunder and the sky rumbled, and having split the earth open they sent forth rain. And those people were standing in the great avenues, the market streets, the crossroads, and the three-way junctions, saying: "Friends of wisdom, the non-Buddhists are truly holy —

"The śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), the sons of the Śākya, are not like that — they simply wander about like moving trees, their bodies wrapped in saffron robes, and they know nothing whatsoever." And so they mocked, ridiculed, and reviled them.

While those people were mocking them in this way, the Group of Six had also gone out for alms, and hearing those people mock them, the Group of Six said: "Friends of wisdom, whom are you mocking?" "We are mocking you." "What have we done? The non-Buddhists proclaimed that in twelve years a famine would come, and the noble great Maudgalyāyana prophesied that after seven days had passed the gods would send rain. We took whatever grain was stored in our houses and storerooms and carried it outside and discarded it, and then the gods did not send rain." The Group of Six said: "Friends of wisdom, as for the conduct of non-Buddhists — even if there were clouds, even if thunder were to rumble from those clouds, even if lightning were to flash, even if a cool wind were to rise from the four directions, and even if the gods were to send just a slight drizzle of rain drop by drop, that is when they and the world would indeed say the gods without fail will send rain. So when heavy rain fell and split open the earth, what need is there even to speak of it? In this way, just as the noble great Maudgalyāyana prophesied, all the crops shall come to fruition." At these words, those people were rendered speechless and stood there in silence.

Then the Group of Six said: "Dear friends, we have made it clear enough to those people; nevertheless, a minor transgression has arisen in this matter, so come here. Go in their stead and make them feel at ease." Having done them the service of food and having paid homage, they went to where the venerable great Maudgalyāyana was and, having gone there, they said this to the venerable great Maudgalyāyana: "Venerable one, we pay homage.

Venerables, be well. Venerable one, please open the matter when the time is right. Venerables, please open the matter regarding the five classes of transgression. The non-Buddhists proclaimed that in twelve years a famine would come, and you prophesied that rain would fall. If the hem of a monastic robe has been made improper by being soiled by mud, then since that is improper, take it off. Since you do not live by a black alms bowl, on that account everyone who knows is giving signs — and that too has come to nothing. Since you have burned up your domain of alms, we cannot even find alms. A transgression has arisen in you; please rectify it in accordance with the Dharma." The venerable one said: "Venerables, I see no transgression." The Group of Six said: "Venerables, the Blessed One has said that because one who does not see a transgression must be suspended from the community, therefore why should one be especially indifferent in this matter? Who is the guardian of the residence? Something quite important is happening. Summon him! He has been summoned." "Venerables, strike the wooden signal-board." "Since the great Maudgalyāyana, having committed a minor transgression, will not rectify it in accordance with the Dharma, let the act of suspension from the community be performed because he does not see the transgression."

The guardian of the residence went to where the Saṅgha's elder was, and the Group of Six went along with him. At that time the venerable Śāriputra was serving as elder of the Saṅgha. Whenever the wooden signal-board was struck, he would investigate in accordance with the Dharma which venerable one was fully present, or fully present from the beginning, or to be satisfied, or to be satisfied from the beginning, or to be expelled. The Group of Six said: "Venerable elder, no one is fully present, fully present from the beginning, to be satisfied, to be satisfied from the beginning, or to be expelled —

"For it is in this way that the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, through a transgression involving a physical fall, tears apart the teaching of the Blessed One. Because he does not live off a black alms-bowl, he claims mastery of the Dharma of men and proclaims to all that he knows — yet that too has come to nothing. He has burnt up his domain of activity, so that we cannot even find alms. When a transgression arises, he does not restore it in accordance with the Dharma, and so, since he dwells in non-acknowledgment of that transgression, we shall carry out the act of suspension."

The venerable ones said to the elder of the Saṅgha at the striking of the wooden signal-board: "The Buddha, the Blessed One, is omniscient, all-seeing, sovereign over knowledge and over all objects of knowledge without peer, and he cuts through all doubt. Therefore go before him today and present this matter. Whatever authoritative instruction the Blessed One gives you, accept it exactly as it is."

At that point the monks petitioned the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, even when rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they may proclaim — it is a great, overwhelming torrent that does not comprehend, and has five causes and five conditions. What are those five? It is like this: there are clouds, lightning flashes, thunder rolls from the clouds, cool winds arise from the four directions, and rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim. Yet because the fire element rises up exceedingly from within this great earth, it dries up that very rain before it has fallen halfway. This is how rain-callers may cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim — yet it is not understood: this is the first cause and the first condition for a great overwhelming torrent.

Furthermore, there are clouds, lightning flashes, thunder rolls from the clouds, cool winds arise from the four directions, and rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim. Yet because unequal winds arise in the sky, they carry that rain off to the forests of Daṇḍaka, and to the forests of Kaliṅga, and to the forests of Maṭaṅga. This is how rain-callers may cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim — yet it is not understood: this is the second cause and the second condition for a great overwhelming torrent.

Furthermore, there are clouds, lightning flashes, thunder rolls from the clouds, cool winds arise from the four directions, and rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim. Yet because the rain-bearing divine sons abide in utter intoxication and heedlessness, and abiding in utter intoxication and heedlessness, the gods do not cause the stream of water to flow down well at the proper times. This is how rain-callers may cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim — yet it is not understood: this is the third cause and the third condition for a great overwhelming torrent.

Furthermore, there are clouds, lightning flashes, thunder rolls from the clouds, cool winds arise from the four directions, and rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim. Yet because people are attached with unlawful desire, overwhelmed by the delight of craving, and bound by wrong conduct — those who are so attached with unlawful desire, overwhelmed by the delight of craving, and bound by wrong conduct — the gods do not cause the stream of water to flow down well for them at the proper times. This is how rain-callers may cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim — yet it is not understood: this is the fourth cause and the fourth condition for a great overwhelming torrent.

Furthermore, there are clouds, lightning flashes, thunder rolls from the clouds, cool winds arise from the four directions, and rain-callers cause the gods to bring down rain — this they proclaim. Yet —"

Yet the lord of the asuras (demigods) named Thunderous rises up from the great ocean and catches that rain in both hands, pouring it back into the great ocean. This is what rain-callers proclaim as the gods bringing down rain — yet it is not understood: this is the fifth cause and the fifth condition for a great overwhelming torrent.

Monks, thus, even when the gods have brought down rain at that time, the lord of the asuras named Thunderous rises up from the great ocean and catches that rain in both hands and pours it into the great ocean. Will all crops nonetheless come to completion?" — so one might ask. And if, monks, that question were put to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, he would prophesy accordingly. Monks, there is no transgression for the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana in making a prophecy with such a perception.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Vaiśālī, in the Monkey Pond pavilion, in the multi-storied hall. At that time there was living at Vaiśālī a śrāvaka of the naked ascetics, and his wife had become pregnant. On another occasion, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana dressed in the morning, took up his bowl and robe, and entered Vaiśālī for alms. As he was going on his alms round in sequence, he entered that man's house. The man thought to himself: "The noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana is said to be supreme among three — one in whom there is not even a trace of unknowing, unseeing, ignorance, or lack of discernment. I should ask him to declare whether this pregnant wife of mine will give birth to a boy or a girl." So, realizing this, he spoke these words to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Noble one, this attendant of mine is pregnant — is there a boy in her womb, or is there a girl?" He replied: "Good sir, it is a boy."

The householder, wishing for prosperity as worldly people do, was satisfied, joyful, and greatly delighted. He filled the bowl of the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana with clean and pure food and drink, gave it to him, and said: "Noble one, please proceed." The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana said "Thank you" and departed.

Not far from that house, a naked ascetic who was sitting there saw the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana go off with a full bowl. He thought to himself: "The only house that gives alms to me alone — it is not good that the monks, the sons of the Śākya, should now frequent it. I will therefore go quickly to that householder and ask what conversation he had with him." He went swiftly to the householder and said: "Householder, did the ascetic Mahāmaudgalyāyana come?" "He came." "Did he ask you something?" "He did." "What did he ask?" "He asked whether, this attendant of mine being pregnant, there was a boy in the womb or a girl." "And what was said?" "He said it was a boy."

The naked ascetic was skilled in reckoning by inferential reasoning, and began to calculate. After a moment, seeing it as a girl, he changed his account accordingly and twisted his hands together. The householder asked the naked ascetic: "Why do you change your expression and twist your hands together?" The naked ascetic said: "I see a girl — I do not see a boy." The householder immediately flew into a rage, rose up, drew his three topknots erect and furrowed his brow in anger, saying: "You wretched naked ascetic, what do you know? Do you dare to impugn the knowledge of the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana as defiled? The noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana has prophesied that it is a boy —

"Do you dare say it is a girl?" And with that rebuke he began to calculate again, and seeing it was indeed a girl, he was completely flustered and said: "Even if the ascetic, the son of the Śākyas, has given a prophecy to that effect, still this is a girl and not a boy." When the nine months had passed and the birth occurred, a girl was indeed born. The householder, together with his household, declared that the naked ascetics were the true ones, and that the ascetics who were sons of the Śākyas were not so: "When the great noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana prophesied that it was a boy, it has turned out to be a girl." And so they began to slander them, to mock them publicly, and to speak ill of them. The word spread from one person to the next, and the crowds of people dwelling in Vaiśālī, on the main roads, in the markets, at crossroads and at intersections, all fell to slandering. While they were slandering them, the Group of Six, in the morning, having put on their lower robes, took up their bowls and outer robes and went out to beg alms in Vaiśālī. They heard those people slandering them, and upon hearing it they said: "Good people, whom are you slandering?" "We are slandering you." "What have we done?" "The great noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana prophesied that there was a boy in the womb of the naked ascetic's wife, and yet from it a girl was born." The Group of Six said: "Good people, in an ocean of knowledge spanning the whole world there can be mistakes. Only the Blessed One alone is the protector of phenomena; there is no other protector. Furthermore, when humans give birth, they give birth to either a boy or a girl — what other distinguishing mark could there be? Do you suppose it might be a dog, or perhaps a monkey?" Those people were left speechless and stood there unable to say a thing. Then the Group of Six said: "Friends, we have already made it clear enough to them; but a minor downfall has arisen over this small matter, so come back. Go before him and make your confession." And having eaten their meal, they paid homage and went directly to where the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was, and addressed the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana thus: "Venerable one, we pay homage. May the venerable ones be well and free from illness. Venerable elder, please open a session. Venerable ones, we open a session regarding the five categories of downfalls. Venerable elder, did you or did you not prophesy that there was a boy in the womb of the naked ascetic's wife?" "I did prophesy it. Depart now, and may you experience joy and increase, and may you obtain grain, butter, and sugar. Since you do not sustain yourselves from a black bowl, the omniscient one gives signs of it — yet even that has come to nothing. Because you have scorched our alms-round territory, we cannot even obtain alms; and a downfall has arisen for you over this, so restore it properly in accordance with the Dharma." "Venerable ones, we do not see a downfall." The Group of Six said: "Venerable ones, since the Blessed One has declared that when a downfall is not seen, the act of formal suspension from residence should be performed, why then should we be indifferent to this? Who is the guardian of the house? It must be someone of importance. Summon him!" "He has been summoned." "Venerable one, sound the gong. Mahāmaudgalyāyana has incurred a downfall over a trifling matter and does not restore it properly; therefore, since he does not see the downfall, the act of formal suspension from residence is to be performed." The house-guardian went before the Saṅgha's elder, and the Group of Six went along with him. At that time, the venerable Śāriputra was serving as the Saṅgha's elder.

Whenever the gong was sounded, the venerable monks would ask, in the proper form of a Dharma matter, who was in residence, who had taken up residence from the beginning, who was to be made content, who was to be made content from the beginning, and who was being expelled. The Group of Six said: "No elder whatsoever is in residence, has taken up residence from the beginning, is to be made content, is to be made content from the beginning, or is being expelled. For the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana incurs a downfall through a fault of dissimulation and thereby tears apart the teaching of the Blessed One; he does not sustain himself by the black bowl, so he claims for himself the highest human Dharma and makes known to all that he is one who knows — yet this too has come to nothing, for he has consumed the alms-field and we cannot even obtain alms. Since a downfall has arisen and he does not restore it properly in accordance with the Dharma, and since he does not see the downfall, we will perform the act of formal suspension from residence." The venerable monks replied to the elder monk with words not befitting a monk: "The Blessed One, the buddha, is omniscient, sees all, has attained unsurpassed sovereignty over knowledge and objects of knowledge, and dispels all doubt. Go before him today and request this matter from him. Whatever the Blessed One proclaims to you, accept that as it truly is."

At that time the monks made their request to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, these four domains are not to be speculated about. Those who engage in speculation about them will become intoxicated, bewildered, and will come to distraction of mind. What are the four? They are: speculation about the self, speculation about the world, speculation about the karmic maturation of sentient beings, and the buddha-domain of buddhas. Now, when the monk Maudgalyāyana made the prophecy at that time, that person was still a child; later, through the maturation of his karma, he became marked in that way. If the monk Maudgalyāyana had been asked further about that matter, the monk Maudgalyāyana would have prophesied further. Monks, there is no downfall for the monk Maudgalyāyana in having made a prophecy with such a perception."

The Blessed One was dwelling in Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove. In Rājagṛha there was a householder who heard it said that whoever gave food to the monastic Saṅgha of monks without making individual distinctions among them would in that very moment experience a great flourishing of wealth. Having heard this, he thought to himself: "That is an excellent method for acquiring wealth; I too shall give food to the monastic Saṅgha of monks without making individual distinctions." So he went to the market, bought a great deal of meat, and beneath it boiled a broth mixed with a great quantity of clarified butter in a copper vessel. He then sent word to the gatekeeper at the city gate: "Ho there, gatekeeper! If any monk enters for alms, send him to my house." The gatekeeper replied: "Householder, it shall be done." Whenever he saw a monk entering for alms, he said: "Noble one, a certain great householder today is offering alms to the monks; please go inside to him." And that monk went to his house. In this way the gatekeeper conveyed the message to all those on alms-round, and all those on alms-round went to the householder's house. The householder then filled each of their bowls with a very rich meat-broth and gave it to them.

That day the sky became overcast and the weather turned foul. The monks, having eaten, found they could not scrub those greasy bowls clean on the spot, and so they said: "There is hot water here; let us go to where the hot water is and wash them." So they went to where the hot water was and began to wash them.

Now, a young monk happened to wonder, with genuine curiosity, where this hot water was coming from. Not far away, the venerable Ānanda was washing his bowl. The young monk went over to him and asked: "Venerable Ānanda, where does this hot water come from?" Not far from there, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was also washing his bowl. Ānanda said: "Go to him and ask about this small matter." So the young monk was sent to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana. The young monk approached him with a calm and dignified bearing, and asked with reverence: "Elder, where does this hot water come from?" He replied: "Venerable one, it comes from the great lake Anavatapta." When Ānanda heard this, he said: "Venerable one, do not harm the intent of the sūtras. Do not disturb the guidance of the Dharma. Do not break open the womb of the Dharma. Even if we ourselves have no direct realization of this, is there not scripture? The Blessed One has declared that the water of the great lake Anavatapta is endowed with eight qualities: it is cool, it is sweet, it is light, it is soft, it is clear, it is free from foul smell, it does not harm the throat when drunk, and it does not harm the stomach when drunk. Therefore, you have been deceived by the very first quality alone. You do not sustain yourself by a black alms-bowl, and so you make a display of knowing everything to no effect — and that too has come to nothing. Because you have scorched your own domain, we cannot even obtain alms. The transgression that has arisen for you — please restore it in accordance with the Dharma." "Venerable one, I see no transgression." The group of six monks then said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that for one who does not see a transgression, the act of formal suspension should be carried out. Therefore, why should we simply remain indifferent in this matter? Who is the monastery warden? He is quite something! Call him! Call him!" "Venerable one, strike the board." "Since the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana has committed a transgression in this minor matter and will not restore it in accordance with the Dharma, the act of formal suspension for not seeing a transgression should be carried out against him." The monastery warden went to the elder of the Saṅgha, and the group of six went along with him. At that time the venerable Śāriputra was serving as the elder of the Saṅgha. Whenever the board was regularly struck, the venerable ones would be asked, as a matter of Dharma, who should be upheld, who should be upheld from the beginning, who should be satisfied, who should be satisfied from the beginning, and who should be removed. The group of six monks said: "Elder, no one is to be upheld, upheld from the beginning, satisfied, satisfied from the beginning, or removed. For the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana tears apart the teaching of the Blessed One with contaminating transgressions. He does not sustain himself by a black alms-bowl, and so he makes a display to humans of claiming a supreme teacher and knowing everything — and that too has come to nothing. Because he has scorched his own domain, we cannot obtain alms. Since he does not restore the transgression that has arisen in accordance with the Dharma, the act of formal suspension for not seeing a transgression should be carried out against him." "Venerable ones, it is not right to treat a senior monk of the Saṅgha in this way. The buddha Blessed One is omniscient, all-seeing, and has attained unsurpassed sovereignty over knowledge and its objects, and he cuts through all doubt. Go to him today and ask about this matter. Whatever the Blessed One declares to you, take it as it truly is." At that time the monks made their petition to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is indeed so. It is indeed so. That warm water comes from none other than the great unheated lake." The monks asked: "Blessed One, if that water comes from the great unheated lake, why is it warm?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is because that water passes over five hundred hells of short-lived beings as it flows down. If the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana were also asked about this, he too would give the same answer by scripture. Monks, there is no transgression in the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana having given a scriptural answer with a perception of that kind." The buddha Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana said to the monks: "Venerable ones, while I had entered into meditative absorption on the sense base of nothingness, I heard on the bank of a slowly flowing pool the sounds of a great many chief elephants." At that time the venerable Ānanda was present right there in that company, and being in agreement he said: "Venerable one, do not harm the boundaries of the sūtra collections. Do not disturb the guide of the Dharma. Do not split open the womb of the Dharma. Although we have no such realization, is there also no scriptural authority for it? The Blessed One has declared that one who has entered into the meditative absorption on the sense base of nothingness has dismantled the perception of form and is separated from the perception of sound — therefore it is impossible that one who has dismantled the perception of form and is separated from the perception of sound should see forms and hear sounds. You do not sustain yourself by means of a black begging bowl, so you present yourself as all-knowing, and that too has come to nothing. You have scorched your alms-round domain, so we too cannot find alms. A transgression has arisen in you — restore it in accordance with the Dharma." The venerable one replied: "I do not see a transgression."

The group of six said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One should carry out the act of formal suspension for not seeing a transgression against him." They said this, and therefore: "Why in this matter should one be further treated with equanimity? Who is the room-guardian? Something has happened. Call someone. He has been called." "Venerable one, strike the wooden signal board. The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana has not restored in accordance with the Dharma a transgression that arose in a minor matter — carry out against him the act of formal suspension for not seeing a transgression." The room-guardian went to the place where the Saṅgha's senior monks were staying, and the group of six went along with him. At that time the venerable Śāriputra was presiding as senior monk of the Saṅgha. When the wooden board was continually struck, the venerable ones would ask, as a matter of Dharma, which monk among them was to be fully sustained, or completely sustained from the ground up, or satisfied, or satisfied from the ground up, or expelled. The group of six said: "No senior monk here is to be fully sustained, or completely sustained from the ground up, or satisfied, or satisfied from the ground up, or expelled — for the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana the Great, through a transgression he has fallen into, is tearing apart the teaching of the Blessed One. He does not sustain himself by a black begging bowl, and so he claims to know all things and presents himself as omniscient, and that too has come to nothing. He has scorched his alms-round domain, so we too find no alms. Since he does not restore in accordance with the Dharma the transgression that has arisen in him, and since he does not see a transgression, we shall carry out the act of formal suspension for not seeing a transgression. Venerable ones, the wooden signal board was struck against the senior monk of the Saṅgha without proper cause, in this manner: 'The buddha Blessed One is omniscient — all-seeing, who has attained supreme mastery over what is to be known and over knowledge, who cuts through all doubt — go and present this matter to him today. Whatever the Blessed One declares to you, receive it as exactly so.'

At that point the monks appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: 'Monks, it is exactly so. It is exactly so. One who has entered meditative absorption into the sense base of nothingness, having dissolved the perception of form and being dissociated from the perception of sound — such a one, having dissolved the perception of form and being dissociated from the perception of sound, will not come to see forms nor come to hear sounds. That is not a possibility. Now, the monk Maudgalyāyana has attained the dhyānas, liberations, meditative absorptions, and meditative attainments. He enters and rises from these absorptions swiftly, and by this swiftness he is aware of the mind in meditative absorption yet unaware of the mind as it is arising. Monks, it was upon emerging that the monk Maudgalyāyana heard that sound. Monks, for the monk Maudgalyāyana there is no transgression in having made such a declaration with a perception of that kind. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, or who is mad, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by feeling. The fourth defeat is complete. The defeats are complete.'

The Vinaya, the Vibhaṅga, the fifteenth fascicle. Summary verse: emission of semen, lewd speech, flattery, a hut, a large dwelling, groundlessness, a slight thing, schism in the Saṅgha and siding with it, defaming a household, and a declaration causing discomfort of mind.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Charka's daily practice was this: whichever village or town he was residing near, he would rise early in the morning, go to the shrine hall, sweep it carefully, wash it well, and daub it with a paste of fresh cow dung. Then, outside the shrine hall, he would wash both feet, extend both hands, discard his tooth-stick, and in the early morning put on his lower robe. Taking his bowl and monastic robe, he would go into that very village or town to collect alms without guarding his body, without restraining his faculties, without establishing mindfulness. Having completed his alms round through that village or town and finished the meal, returning from the subsequent alms round for food he would set down his bowl and monastic robe, wash both feet, and enter the shrine hall in order to settle properly inside.

If at that time his mind became thoroughly bound by attachment to desire, he would make the form of his own limbs serviceable, grasp with both hands, exert himself, and emit semen.

Then, as a great many monks were wandering and walking through the shrine hall, they went over to where the venerable Charka was in the shrine hall. Coming there, they engaged in various conversations with the venerable Charka that were pleasing and gratifying, and then sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the many monks said to the venerable Charka: 'Venerable one, how do you endure? How do you fare? Do you dwell in the touch of ease? Have you not grown weary from the alms round?' The venerable Charka replied: 'Venerable ones, I endure well. I fare well. I dwell in the touch of ease. I have not grown weary from the alms round.' 'Venerable Charka, how you endure, how you fare, dwelling in the touch of ease, and not growing weary from the alms round — venerable ones, the village or township upon which I depend and where I dwell: in the early morning I rise and go to the shrine hall, where I sweep and clean it thoroughly, smear it with a plaster of fresh cow dung, wash both feet outside the shrine hall, rinse my hands, set aside my tooth-stick, dress in my lower robe in the morning, take up my bowl and outer robe, and enter that very village or township for alms. Having collected alms in that same village or township, I perform the meal, and upon returning from the later alms collection I set aside my bowl and outer robe, wash both feet, and enter the shrine hall to settle properly within. If desire with its attachment should come to envelop my mind, I bring the limbs of my body into a serviceable condition, take them in both hands, work at it, and draw off the seminal fluid, so that I am free of fever, free of the burning that afflicts the whole body, and thus dwell in the touch of ease without weariness from the alms round. That, venerable ones, is how I endure, how I fare, how I dwell in the touch of ease, and how I am not wearied from the alms round.'

The monks neither praised nor contradicted what he had said; they neither applauded nor refuted it. Rising from their seats, they went to where the Blessed One was. Having gone there, they bowed their heads to the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, those many monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this circumstance, assembled the community of monks. The Tathāgata, perceiving both aspects of purpose, assembled the community of monks — that is, so that his hearers might come to know it fully, and so that a rule of training properly grounded in the Vinaya might be established. The blessed buddhas take action knowingly: they act knowingly, they do not act unknowingly; they act at the right time, they do not act at the wrong time; they act when there is purpose, they do not act when there is no purpose. Because the blessed buddhas do not act when there is no purpose, they repel pointless action with a water-strainer. And because the blessed buddhas know the right moment for purposeful action, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Charka: 'Charka, is it true that you did something as unseemly as this?' 'It is true, Blessed One.' The Blessed One said: 'That which is contrary to a monk's rule of conduct, not in harmony with it, not permissible, not in accord with the discipline — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Charka, I have taught the Dharma — the liberation of mind and the liberation by wisdom — precisely in order to abandon attachment, to become free of attachment; I have taught the liberation of mind and the liberation by wisdom in order to abandon aversion, to become free of attachment to it; and in order to abandon delusion, to become free of attachment to it. Why then did you do something as unseemly as this? You who are not deluded — why, with the very hands by which you receive what is given in faith by brahmin and householder faithful donors, did you do something as unseemly as this? You who are not deluded — you who are like a black snake spreading venom swiftly, a virulent poison — it would be better to grasp it with both hands in that venomous state. For one who has fallen into that condition to take hold of the limbs of one's own body is not acceptable." Thus he rebuked him in every way.

"Cāraka, what do you think? Has your own body not been treated with due respect and care?" "Venerable one, it has indeed."

Then the Blessed One, having rebuked him with many expressions of censure, spoke to the monks: "Monks, seeing clearly ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — namely: for the sake of uniting the Saṅgha; for the sake of making the Saṅgha excellent; for the sake of the Saṅgha's comfortable dwelling; for the sake of restraining those individuals who are brazen and disrespectful; for the sake of the comfortable dwelling of those who are conscientious; for the sake of those who have not yet developed faith developing faith; for the sake of those who already have faith increasing and growing; for the sake of restraining the defilements of this present life; for the sake of turning back the defilements of future lives; and so that the holy life I have taught, which is of broad benefit to many beings, may long endure and be genuinely revealed to gods and humans alike. My hearers are to proclaim this rule of training in the Vinaya in the following manner: 'If one intentionally emits semen, this is a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.'" The Blessed One thus established that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time, a great many monks, while sleeping, had nocturnal emissions during their dreams, and semen was released. In those monks there was both perception and intention, and so remorse arose in them. They thought: "The Blessed One has established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers, declaring, 'If one intentionally emits semen, this is a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.' Now we, a great many monks lying asleep, have had nocturnal emissions during our dreams, and semen has been released. Since there was both perception and intention in us, has a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense occurred for us or not? Let us go to the venerable Ānanda and, having gone, tell him what has happened. Whatever instruction the venerable Ānanda gives us, we shall take that as authoritative."

Then those many monks went to where the venerable Ānanda was, and having arrived, they said to him: "Venerable Ānanda, please hear this. The Blessed One has established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: 'If one intentionally emits semen, this is a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.' Now we, a great many monks lying asleep, had nocturnal emissions during our dreams and semen was released. Since there was both perception and intention in us, has a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense occurred for us or not?"

Then the venerable Ānanda led those many monks to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side. Having sat to one side, the venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable Blessed One, you have established this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers: 'If one intentionally emits semen, this is a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.' Now here are these many venerable monks who, while lying asleep and during their dreams, had nocturnal emissions and semen was released.

"For these monks there was both perception and intention — has a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense therefore not arisen for them?"

The Blessed One replied: "Ānanda, I do not say that these monks had neither perception nor intention — they did have both. But their perception and intention in this matter are not to be reckoned in the conventional way. Therefore, Ānanda, this is the exception for dreams."

Then the Blessed One uttered words of praise for those who desire the training, who revere the training, and who are furnished with the requisites for the training, and having done so, he delivered to the monks a discourse in accordance with this matter, extensive in its treatment and harmonious in character. He then addressed the monks thus:

"Monks, what was stated before was a rule, and what is now given is a permission. My hearers should recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: 'If one intentionally emits semen, save in a dream, this is a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.'"

The word "intentionally" means after deliberate consideration. The word "semen" refers to semen of five kinds: blue, yellow, red, thick, and thin. Of these, blue semen belongs to a wheel-turning king. Also blue is the semen of whichever eldest son of a wheel-turning king has reached the appropriate stage — eligible for enthronement but not yet enthroned. Yellow belongs to the other sons of a wheel-turning king. Red belongs to those on the periphery of the great wheel-domain, that is, those at the rim of the realm. Thick belongs to those whose faculties are fully matured. Thin belongs to those whose faculties are not yet fully matured. Also thin is the semen of one exhausted by a woman, exhausted by a burden, exhausted by the road, one who is old, or one who is in a state of decline.

The phrase "emits" means discharged immediately, that is, at once. The phrase "save in a dream" means setting aside the case of dreaming. The phrase "saṅghāvaśeṣa offense" means that this transgression depends upon the Saṅgha, is connected with the Saṅgha, and relies upon the Saṅgha — that is, one is lifted from this transgression by the Saṅgha, not by an individual. Moreover, the other four offenses entailing defeat have no remainder, whereas this one has a remainder; that is why it is called a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

As to how a transgression comes about in this case: it does so through five factors — desiring pleasure, desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

How does it come about through desiring pleasure? If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, holds it tightly, holds it firmly, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, holds it tightly, holds it firmly, and thereby also experiences and undergoes the pleasure of particular definite sensation, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, holds it tightly, holds it firmly, and thereby also experiences and undergoes the pleasure of arising contact, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, holds it tightly, holds it firmly, and thereby also experiences and undergoes the pleasure of emanating fragrance, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

If a monk, desiring pleasure, takes up and dwells upon an internal physical object, makes an effort, holds it tightly, holds it firmly, and thereby also experiences and undergoes the pleasure of particular definite sensation, the pleasure of arising contact, and the pleasure of rising fragrance, and emits semen, this becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a grave offense. And just as in the case of desiring pleasure, so too with desiring seed, desiring the power of a spell, desiring medicine, and desiring examination.

And just as with an internal physical object, so too the same exposition applies in full to taking up an external physical object.

The intermediate summary verse:

Moving and moving greatly, space, force, and entering into a hollow, rubbing all over and particular sensation, measuring and looking, turning back from a flowing stream and turning back from urine — these are the collected categories.

If a monk emits semen through moving, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk emits semen through moving greatly, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk emits semen by gyrating the hips in the air, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk emits semen by applying force, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk emits semen that has entered into a hollow, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk experiences the pleasure of rubbing all over and emits semen, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk experiences the pleasure of particular definite sensation and emits semen, it becomes a grave offense. If no semen is emitted, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk, with a mind of complete attachment, measures the appearance of his own limbs, it becomes a grave offense. If a monk, with a mind of attachment, looks upon the appearance of his own limbs, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk, with a mind of attachment, directs the appearance of his own limbs against the current of a flowing stream, it becomes a grave offense. If he directs it with the current of the stream, it becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk, with a mind of attachment, directs the appearance of his own limbs in a direction other than toward urine, it becomes a grave offense. If he directs it in the direction of urine, it becomes a wrongdoing.

Wounds, swellings, scabies, leprosy, pustules, dropsy, mange, swelling, pimples, discharges jumping outward, discharges jumping into a pool, contact with the thigh, contact with clothing, seeing forms that would produce attachment, recalling a previously enjoyed place, and emission that occurs as a result of undergoing a sweat-house treatment — in none of these cases is there a transgression. There is no transgression either for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is overcome by sensations. This concludes the first part of the chapter on the Saṅgha's rule against causing emission.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The conduct of the group of six was this: "We shall teach the Dharma to the brahmins and householders who come and arrive here; we shall defeat our opponents; and we shall proclaim our own renown." And so, not leaving the gate of the Jeta Grove unattended, some member of the group of six would rise at dawn before everyone else, discard the tooth-stick, put on a dyed reddish-yellow robe, and stand or sit at the gate of the Jeta Grove.

Now the conduct of the wives of the brahmins and householders living in Śrāvastī was to go to the park, enter the Jeta Grove, visit the temple, and go to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, the monks, and the elders. And so a great many wives of brahmins and householders had come out to the park, wishing to visit the temple, and made their way toward the Jeta Grove.

The group of six knew that among the people dwelling in those six great cities, there was not a single person whom they did not know by clan, by family line, by lineage, by name, by physical appearance, by craft, or by livelihood — none who was unseen, unheard of, unknown, or unrecognized. And so when Venerable Cāraka saw that great multitude of wives of brahmins and householders from quite some distance away, he said: "Welcome, mothers of the elder! Welcome, wives of the elder! Welcome, daughters-in-law of the elder! Welcome, daughters of the elder! Welcome, sisters of the elder! You are very welcome, you are very welcome! Why do you wander about for so long, like the moon?"

They replied: "Venerable Cāraka, since the Blessed One has well declared that the eight inopportune times are not the time for a person to practice the holy life, we — being burdened with the busyness of household life — are in the ninth inopportune condition."

Cāraka said: "Sisters, have you not heard someone say:

The deeds of kings such as those tainted with poison and so on, left undone —

those very beings and their deeds alike have come to ruin.

And even those very deeds,
before they could be fully accomplished, death, the enemy of the world, will come."

They replied: "Venerable Cāraka, it is precisely for that reason that we have come to the park — to enter the Jeta Grove, to visit the temple, and to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, the monks, and the elders."

Cāraka said: "Sisters, if that is why you have come, then the Blessed One has also declared, 'One should extract what is essential from a body that has nothing essential.' Excellent, excellent! Sisters, go in and look about just as one watches a spectacle and ask whatever you wish. Sisters, where do you intend to enter?"

"Venerable Cāraka, we wish to enter the monastery and visit the temple."

"Sisters, the Blessed One has said:

A wise person who directs the mind with care —"

"When one circumambulates the buddha stūpas, even a hundred thousand measures of gold from the Jambu River cannot equal the merit of a single step."

Having spoken thus, Cāraka said: "Excellent! Sisters, have you found any monk who will show you the temple?" The women replied: "Noble one, should we enter carrying our lamps on their stands and then go looking elsewhere? Venerable Cāraka, why leave here to seek another monk? Who among others is more distinguished than you? Please, show it to us yourself."

Then the venerable Cāraka thought to himself: "If I show them the temple, it may cause my own wholesome side to decline entirely. But if I do not show them, I will not receive so much as a scorched morsel of alms — and moreover, the Blessed One has declared that one should cause those who lack faith to take on a full and genuine faith, that one should tame them, hold them, and establish them well. Therefore I must engage these women in virtue and show them everything completely." Recognizing this, he took up various offerings — flowers, incense, and the like — held an alms bowl in his hand, and began to show them the temple in proper order.

"Sisters, this is the Blessed One's bathhouse. Here, three times by day and three times by night, the Blessed One surveys the world with the eye of a buddha and knows: who is declining, who is progressing, who has come to harm, who has fallen into distress, who has become unhappy, who has come to harm, distress, and misery, who is heading toward the lower destinies, who is about to fall into the lower destinies, who has fallen into the lower destinies — and those who have fallen into the path of the lower destinies I shall raise up and establish in the higher realms, in liberation, and in the fruit. Those sinking in the mire of desire I shall draw out by the hand. Those who lack the wealth of the noble ones I shall establish in possession of the noble ones' wealth. The world adorned by the arising of a buddha I shall cause to bear its fruit. Those whose roots of virtue have not yet been planted, I shall cause them to be planted. Those whose roots of virtue have been planted, I shall cause them to fully ripen. Those whose roots of virtue have fully ripened, I shall cause them to be completely liberated."

With such knowledge and vision fully engaged, it was as follows:

A poisonous creature dwelling in a crocodile's lair may well pass beyond its appointed time — but the loving-kindness of a buddha toward those to be tamed never passes beyond its appointed time.

Just as a mother who has only one beloved child watches over and guards that child's life, so too the Tathāgata watches over those to be tamed and guards their life.

The mount of compassion dwelling in the stream of omniscience seeks tirelessly for the foal that is to be tamed.
The loving-kindness toward those declining in existence and the lower destinies is like a cow's love for a gravely weakened calf.

Thus it proceeds.

"Seek here to bow at the feet of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, who possesses the ten powers, who is untroubled by the four kinds of fearlessness, who is pledged to the abode of the great waves as supreme leader of the herd, and who roars the lion's roar fully in the midst of the assembly.

This is the temple of the venerable Kauṇḍinya of universal knowledge. When the world was in the darkness of ignorance, without guide and without one to lead it fully, the Blessed One was the first to open someone's eye of Dharma with the probe of the ointment of the eye of wisdom. The Blessed One, the elders, those who are like regents, those who have long since gone forth, those who have visibly cultivated the pure life —"

— who among those who bear the victory banner of the patched robe was foremost in prophecy, and it is on account of him that the Blessed One first turned the wheel of Dharma, possessed of the Dharma, which is of benefit to the many, which brings happiness to the many, which arises out of compassion for the world, which is for the good and benefit and happiness of gods and humans — that wheel which no ascetic (śramaṇa), brahmin, god, māra, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world is able to turn in conformity with the Dharma — turning it three times in twelve aspects. It is on his account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Mahākāśyapa. He is like a great sal tree among brahmins, who abandoned one supreme household and went forth, endowed with sixty million in property. He possessed eighty small granaries of gold. He owned eighteen servant villages. He owned sixteen villages of laborers. He was endowed with an excellent brahmin woman whose body surpassed gold, and he abandoned her like the ash of a ripened fruit. In the final watch of the night he took up a patched robe of sewn cloth worth a hundred thousand, and went forth for the sake of whatever arhats there were dwelling in the world, in order to cultivate meditative concentration, liberation, meditative absorption, and meditative attainment, and he dwells in the forest. At the mere sight of him even intoxicated bull elephants are pacified and freed from their pride. He undertook to show the Blessed One at the Bamboo Grove Stūpa, and received the vow of a monk. The Blessed One also declared: "O monks, among my monk-disciples who are śrāvakas, who are of few wishes and know contentment, and who speak of the virtues of ascetic practice, the foremost is none other than the monk Mahākāśyapa." It is on account of him — whom the Blessed One thus praised — that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Śāriputra. He is the son who obtained the supreme attainment, who in two periods of eight years mastered the grammatical analysis of the sense faculties, who defeated all opponents. He went forth in the teaching of the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared him the foremost among those of great wisdom and great eloquence. The Blessed One placed all the world at one-sixteenth of him, and the Blessed One proclaimed in verse:

All the wisdom of the entire world, apart from that of the Tathāgata, does not equal even a sixteenth part of the wisdom of Śāriputra.

Even if this world with its gods were to become equal to Śāriputra, it still would not equal a sixteenth part of the gnosis of the Tathāgata.

It is on his account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana. He is the son born from the womb of a foremost one, who abandoned a kingdom without a crown and went forth. With the big toe of his right foot he shook, completely shook, and utterly shook the palace of Vijaya belonging to Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, three times. By his miraculous powers he traveled to the world-realm of the Blessed One endowed with rays of light in seven days and nights. He is the one whom the Blessed One declared foremost among those of great miraculous powers and great might. It is on his account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Aniruddha. He went forth from among humans of excellent fortune. He is the son of the paternal uncle of the Blessed One's father. When merchants who are at sea properly hear his name correctly proclaimed, their vessels will be well completed and will arrive safely.

It is on account of the one whom the Blessed One declared foremost among those endowed with the divine eye that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Ānanda. He is the one who for a long time attended upon the Blessed One, who served close at the Blessed One's feet, who was properly praised by the Teacher, who practiced a life equal to that of Brahmā, and who was properly venerated by the wise. He went forth from among the sons of the Blessed One's father's younger kinsmen. He is the one whom the Blessed One declared foremost among those of great learning, those who retain what they have heard, and those who have amassed learning. It is on his account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Nandā. She went forth as the child of the younger sister of the Blessed One. Had she not gone forth, she would have become a wheel-turning king endowed with power. She is the one whom the Blessed One declared foremost among those who desire the training, those who are devoted to the training, and those who have attained the requisites for the training. It is on her account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Rāhula. He went forth as the son of the Blessed One. Had he not gone forth, he would have become a king endowed with might, one revered by many kings, his royal lineage passing unbroken from one generation to the next. He is the one whom the Blessed One declared foremost among those who desire the training, those who are devoted to the training, and those who have attained the requisites for the training. It is on his account that reverence is sought here too at his feet.

This is the temple of the venerable Nanda. This is that of Upananda. This is that of Chanda. This is that of Svāgata. This is that of Nābhasa. This is my own temple. Shall we look at this one too? Noble one, shall we not look at the temple of the noble Śāriputra after having seen all the other temples? We now most earnestly wish to see this temple of the noble Śāriputra. Sisters, let it be so.

The venerable Śāriputra was a person of desire, and so in his temple there are floors swept with ground red kidney-bean flour, the walls somewhat freshly whitewashed, beds with hearts of calf set out, and ten drinking vessels filled with drink along with their accessories arranged there, and within the shrine various provisions in abundance.

The venerable Śāriputra addressed a great many wives of brahmins and householders who had come to his temple, saying: Sisters, shall the little child do it, or will you drink the drink? Noble one, can a river flow backward?

Whatever it is that we would ask of the noble one, may the noble one grant us that very thing. Grant us what is rare for us.

Sisters, what is rare for you? Noble one, it is hearing the Dharma.

Sisters, the Blessed One has taught well that six things arising in the world are wondrous and marvelous. What are those six? A Tathāgata, an arhat, a fully awakened buddha; the Dharma and Vinaya taught by the Tathāgata; being human; being born in a central land; having all one's faculties intact; and having aspiration toward wholesome phenomena. Therefore, that you have now generated aspiration toward wholesome phenomena is like a buddha arising in the world. Excellent, excellent! Sisters, be seated, and I shall teach you the Dharma.

They paid homage at his two feet and sat before him in order to hear the Dharma.

He began to teach them the Dharma. The more he taught the Dharma, the more attached they became. The more attached they became, the more shameless they grew. The more shameless they grew, the more they began to stroke his limbs and extremities. It was just like a spirit that recites secret mantras aloud, or like one who has been pierced with a skewer of flesh and ash — in just the same way, the more he taught them the Dharma, the more attached they became, the more attached they became the more shameless they grew, and the more shameless they grew the more they began to stroke his limbs and extremities.

Now those among them who took possession of him sat together with him on raised seats, swinging, making noise, playing, shouting, laughing, acting with pride, and writhing their bodies. Those who did not take possession of him came out from there and gathered at the entrances, corridors, and doorways, where they spoke these words of blame:

From that which gives water, fire blazes forth.

From that which protects, terror is born.

Fear has arisen from what holds no fear.

Danger has sprung up from the very refuge.

"From that which was peace and happiness on our side, that which spoke of well-being and that which was to become well-being — from that, fear, plague, harm, contagious disease, and trouble have now arisen." They spoke in blame; they raised a clamor; they spoke reproachfully.

While they were blaming and complaining in this way, it came about that the monks became directly aware of it, and having heard these women blaming him, the monks said to them: "Sisters, whom do you blame? Noble ones, it is you we blame." The monks asked: "What have we done?" The women replied: "Noble ones, those limbs and extremities of ours that even our own husbands have never anointed — those the venerable Śārka has anointed." And they said: "If our parents or our brothers were to hear of this, they would not even send someone to the Jetavana, let alone come there themselves. Sisters, be quiet! This monk is one who went forth from a reciter's family, and though he possesses moral discipline, he is nevertheless one in whom attachment is predominant, and by his striving he removes afflictions." The women replied: "Noble ones, would a young bull with two sharp horns gore its own flanks? That would be improper. Sisters, be quiet and stop him." The women said: "Noble ones, if he is stopped, well and good. But if he is not stopped, we shall never again come to the Jetavana." The monks replied: "Sisters, be quiet — he shall be restrained, so that from now on he shall no longer act in this way."

The monks instructed him and he departed, and the remaining monks also came out of the temple and left. Then the venerable Śārka, still laughing, came out of the temple, and the monks seeing him said: "Venerable Śārka, having done such an unseemly thing, why do you now laugh?" Śārka replied: "Have I drunk liquor? Have I eaten leavings? What is it that I have done, venerable ones? What else did I do? I went about reviling the many wives of brahmins and householders." Śārka said further: "Venerable ones, the nature of those who carry black begging-bowls is that out of stinginess they will not teach even a single four-line verse to anyone, yet they blame anyone else who teaches those very things." They said: "Have you really set those women in the truths?" He replied: "If one begins to bring their faculties to full maturity, in due course they too will come to see the truths."

The monks who were of few wants criticized, disparaged, spread rumors about, and rebuked him, saying: "Why do monks fill themselves with that very conduct that ought to be a cause of shame?" Then the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this opportunity, convened a gathering of the monk Saṅgha — and so forth, as before.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, asked the venerable Śārka: "Śārka, is it true that you did something so unseemly?" He replied: "Venerable one, I did."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, censured him, saying that such conduct was unbecoming of a monk, not in conformity with the rule, not appropriate, not in accord with proper discipline — it is not what one who has gone forth should do.

After censuring him in many ways, the Blessed One then spoke to the monks: "Therefore, monks, having fully seen the ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, makes bodily contact with a woman, or grasps her by the hand, or grasps her by the upper arm, or grasps her by the hair or garments connected with it, or touches or handles any other limb or secondary limb — if he does so for the sake of pleasure, it is a matter for the Saṅgha's decision."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to Śārka or any other who is similar to him.

As for "with a mind inflamed and disordered": there is a mind that is inflamed but not disordered; a mind that is disordered but not inflamed; a mind that is both inflamed and disordered; and a mind that is neither inflamed nor disordered. Of these, "inflamed but not disordered" refers to a mind that is attached, fully attached, and bound up. "Disordered but not inflamed" refers to a mind that is expectant and connected. "Both inflamed and disordered" refers to a mind that is attached, fully attached, and bound up, and also expectant and connected. "Neither inflamed nor disordered" is the mind that falls outside those three modes.

"With a woman" refers to a woman or a girl who is capable of engaging in unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse.

"Makes bodily contact" means body leaning against body.

"Does so" means having done it.

"Grasps her by the hand" means from the wrist downward.

"Grasps her by the upper arm" means from the elbow upward.

As for "grasps her by the hair," hair refers to the hair itself and to garments connected with it.

"Any other limb or secondary limb" refers to any other form of bodily member apart from grasping the hand and grasping the upper arm.

"For the sake of pleasure" means if he does so to savor the sensation.

"A matter for the Saṅgha's decision" means that the transgression depends upon the Saṅgha; it is therefore said to be "a matter for the Saṅgha's decision" — and so forth, as before.

How does this become a transgression? Through nine bases: touching, handling, pushing, grasping, pulling, drawing fully toward oneself, embracing from below, embracing from above, and pressing close.

As to how it becomes a transgression through touching — if a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, toward a woman or a young woman capable of sexual intercourse — touching her on the crown of the head, if he touches her without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he touches her with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense.

Just as it is for the crown of the head, so too for the forehead, the cheek, the lips, the chin, the neck, the ear, the nose, the jaw, the shoulder, the armpit, the back of the hand, the chest, the back, the breast, the waist, the knee, the thigh, the ankle, the tip of the foot, and even the big toe — if he touches her without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he touches her with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense.

Just as with touching, so too with handling, delivering, and grasping — it is the same in each case.

How does it become a transgression through pulling? If a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, pulls a woman or a young woman capable of sexual intercourse from far away close to him, or from close by pulls her far away — if he pulls her without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he pulls her with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Thus it is through pulling.

How does it become a transgression through drawing fully toward oneself? If a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, draws a woman or a young woman capable of sexual intercourse fully from the feet upward to the crown, or from the crown downward to the feet, or from the left side across to the right, or from the right side across to the left — if he does so without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he does so with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Thus it is through drawing fully toward oneself.

How does it become a transgression through embracing from below? If a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, embraces a woman or a young woman capable of sexual intercourse from below, from the ground up to the tips of the feet — if he embraces from below without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he embraces from below with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense.

Just as it is from the ground to the tips of the feet, so too from the tips of the feet to the ankle, from the ankle to the thigh, from the thigh to the waist, from the waist to the breast, from the breast to the chest, from the chest to the back, from the back to the shoulder, from the shoulder to the neck, from the neck to the chin, from the chin to the jaw, from the jaw to the cheek, from the cheek to the forehead, from the forehead to the crown, from the crown to a low seat, from a low seat to a seat, from a seat to a cushioned seat, from a cushioned seat to the back of a horse, from the back of a horse to the back of an elephant, from the back of an elephant to an upper chamber — if he embraces from below in any of these without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he embraces from below with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Thus it is through embracing from below.

How does it become a transgression through embracing from above? If a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, a woman or

If he embraces from above, without clothing intervening, a young woman or girl capable of bearing the practice of sexual intercourse — going from the upper chamber to the back of an elephant — it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he embraces from above with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Just as it is from the upper chamber to the back of the elephant, so too from the back of the elephant to the back of a horse, from the back of a horse to a cushioned seat, from a cushioned seat to a seat, from a seat to a low seat, from a low seat to the crown, from the crown to the forehead, from the forehead to the cheek, from the cheek to the jaw, from the jaw to the collar, from the collar to the throat, from the throat to the shoulder, from the shoulder to the back, from the back to the lung, from the lung to the chest, from the chest to the waist, from the waist to the thigh, from the thigh to the knee, from the knee to the tip of the foot, from the tip of the foot to the ground — if he embraces from above without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he embraces from above with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Thus it is through embracing from above.

How does it become a transgression through pressing against? If a monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, presses against the crown of a woman or girl capable of bearing the practice of sexual intercourse without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he presses against with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Just as it is at the crown, so too at the forehead, the cheek, the lips, the collar, the throat, the ear, the nose, the jaw, the shoulder, the armpit, the palm, the lung, the back, the chest, the waist, the knee, the thigh, the knee-joint, the tip of the foot, and even the big toe — if he presses against without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision. If he presses against with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. Thus it is through pressing against.

Furthermore, how does it become a transgression through stroking? When a woman or girl capable of bearing the practice of sexual intercourse strokes the crown of a monk's head, if that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk. Just as it is at the crown, so too when she strokes the forehead, the cheek, the lips, the collar, the throat, the ear, the nose, the jaw, the shoulder, the armpit, the palm, the lung, the back, the chest, the waist, the knee, the thigh, the knee-joint, the tip of the foot, and even the big toe — if, with a mind inflamed and disordered, he savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense.

Just as it is with savoring, so too is it with pressing, offering, and grasping — they are the same in every respect.

How is it with drawing close? If a woman or girl who is capable of supporting unchaste conduct and the act of sexual intercourse draws a monk toward her from a distance, or draws him away from nearby to a distance, and if that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense. That is how it is with drawing close.

How is it with drawing all the way? If a woman or girl who is capable of supporting unchaste conduct and the act of sexual intercourse draws a monk all the way from the tips of the feet to the top of the head, or from the top of the head to the tips of the feet — or from the left lung to the right lung, or from the right lung to the left lung — and if that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk. That is how it is with drawing all the way.

How is it with embracing from below? If a woman or girl who is capable of supporting unchaste conduct and the act of sexual intercourse embraces a monk from below, from the ground up to the tips of the toes, and if that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk.

Just as it is from the ground to the tips of the toes, so too is it from the tips of the toes up to the ankle, from the ankle to the calf, from the calf to the knee, from the knee to the chest, from the chest to the lungs, from the lungs to the back, from the back to the shoulder, from the shoulder to the throat, from the throat to the ear, from the ear to the cheek, from the cheek to the jaw, from the jaw to the temple, from the temple to the forehead, from the forehead to a stool, from a stool to a chair, from a chair to a couch, from a couch to a horse's back, from a horse's back to an elephant's back, and from an elephant's back to an upper story — embracing from below in all of these cases. If that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk. That is how it is with embracing from below.

How is it with embracing from above? If a woman or girl —

a woman or girl who is capable of supporting sexual intercourse — if she embraces a monk from above, from an upper story onto the back of an elephant, and that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk.

Just as it is from an upper story onto an elephant's back, so too it is the same in turn from an elephant's back to a horse's back, from a horse's back to a palanquin, from a palanquin to a throne, from a throne to a low seat, from a low seat to the crown of the head, from the crown of the head to the forehead, from the forehead to the cheek, from the cheek to the chin, from the chin to the collar, from the collar to the throat, from the throat to the shoulder, from the shoulder to the back, from the back to the ribs, from the ribs to the chest, from the chest to the waist, from the waist to the hip, from the hip to the knee, from the knee to the shin, from the shin to the tip of the foot, and from the tip of the foot down to the ground — embracing from above in all of these cases. If that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk. That is how it is with embracing from above.

How is it with pressing close? If a woman or girl who is capable of supporting sexual intercourse presses close against the crown of a monk's head, and that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk.

Just as it is with the crown of the head, so too it is the same with the forehead, the cheek, the lips, the collar, the throat, the ear, the nose, the chin, the shoulder, the armpit, the elbow, the ribs, the back, the chest, the waist, the knee, the hip, the shin, the tip of the foot, and even the big toe — if she presses close against any of these. If that monk, with a mind inflamed and disordered, savors the sensation, fully comprehends it, becomes further attached, remains sitting in further attachment, and in that way draws his body close — then if he draws close without clothing intervening, it becomes a matter for the Saṅgha's decision for that monk. If he draws close with clothing intervening, it becomes a grave offense for that monk. That is how it is with pressing close.

Where the offense for one who is capable is a matter for the Saṅgha's decision, for one who is incapable it is a grave offense. With a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, or a person of ambiguous sex, it is likewise a grave offense. Where the offense for one who is capable is a grave offense, for one who is incapable it is a misdeed. With a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, or a person of ambiguous sex, it is likewise a misdeed. And with one born in an animal realm, it is also a misdeed.

Where the offense for one who is capable is a misdeed, for one who is incapable it is likewise a misdeed. With a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, a person of ambiguous sex, or one born in an animal realm, it is likewise a misdeed. Where the woman is also one's mother and is perceived as one's mother, where she is also one's sister and is perceived as one's sister, where she is also one's daughter and is perceived as one's daughter, there is no transgression. Where one leaps into fire, is carried away by water, takes poison, draws a weapon, leaps from a precipice, is bound with a rope, or rescues from death one who is on the verge of dying, there is no transgression. For one who is a first offender, who is mad, who is mentally disturbed, or who is afflicted with acute pain, there is no transgression.

This completes the second Saṅgha Remainder concerning physical contact. End of the second Saṅgha Remainder.

The Analysis of the Vinaya, the sixteenth bundle.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The conduct of the Group of Six was as follows:

thinking, "We too shall teach the Dharma to the brahmins and householders who come and arrive here; we shall refute opponents; and we shall spread our own reputation," one or another of the Group of Six would not leave the gateway of the Jeta Grove empty, but would rise before dawn, discard the tooth-stick, put on a reddish-yellow patched robe, and walk about and sit at the gateway of the Jeta Grove.

The usual conduct of the wives of the brahmins and householders living at Śrāvastī was to go to the pleasure grove, to enter the Jeta Grove, to visit the temple, and to go to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and of the senior monks. So many wives of brahmins and householders would come out to the pleasure grove, and wishing to visit the temple, they would go toward the Jeta Grove. From that point, up to and including where it is said that he began to teach them the Dharma — all of this is to be understood exactly as was set forth in the context of the second Saṅgha Remainder.

The more he taught them the Dharma, the more they became attached to him. The more they became attached, the more they revealed themselves. The more they revealed themselves, the more those who were involved in affairs, who had collected foul words of base reproach that ought not to be uttered, began to speak to him in front of their husbands with utter frankness — just as, for example, a spirit that recites secret spells aloud, or one who has been stung by a meat-fly with a stinging tail: in the same way, the more he taught them the Dharma, the more they became attached. The more they became attached, the more they revealed themselves. The more they revealed themselves, the more those who were involved in affairs, who had collected foul words of base reproach that ought not to be uttered, began to speak to him in front of their husbands with utter frankness.

Then those among the husbands who were partial to him would sit with him on reclining seats, swinging back and forth, tapping along, playing about, chattering away, laughing, swaggering, and posturing with their bodies. But those who were not partial to him would depart from there and, in the walkways, in the clean areas, and at the gateways, would say and recite:

From that which brings water there arises fire;
from that which gives protection there arises fear.
From the fearless one fear has been born;
from the refuge fear has arisen.

In our direction there was happiness, peace, words of well-being and blessing — from that very source from which well-being was to come, fear, plague, harm, contagious disease, and strife have appeared.

So they would heap abuse, they would mock and jeer, and they would spread malicious talk. And while they were heaping abuse — — the monks became directly visible to those women as they were passing by.

The women heard the monks heaping abuse on them, and those women said:
"Sisters, whom are you mocking?" "Noble ones, we are mocking you." "What have we done?" "Noble ones, we heard from the venerable Cāraka words that we had never before heard from anyone — not from barbers, not from garland-makers, not even from the children of fishermen. If our parents and siblings were to hear this, they would not even give us so much as the Jeta Grove — to say nothing of anything more. Sisters, be quiet! That monk did indeed go forth from a family of preceptors and he does possess moral discipline, yet because his attachment is excessive, this composition of his is meant to dispel afflictions." "Noble ones, what of it — would a bull with two sharp horns gore its own flank? That would be improper." "Sisters, be quiet — and put a stop to it!" "Noble ones, if he is stopped, then well and good. But if you will not stop him, we will never again come to the Jeta Grove." "Sisters, be quiet! Whatever happens, see to it that he does not continue to behave in this way — put a stop to it."

The monks instructed those women, and the women departed. The remaining ones too came out of the monastery and left. Then the venerable Cāraka came out of the monastery still laughing, and when the monks saw him they said:
"Venerable Cāraka, why are you laughing after doing something so unseemly?" Cāraka said: "Did I drink liquor? Did I eat a meal in common?
Venerable ones, did I even do that? What else have I done? Those many wives of brahmins and householders went away while heaping abuse." Cāraka said:
"Venerable ones, the nature of those who hold the black bowl is that, out of miserliness, they do not show so much as a single four-line verse to anyone at all, and yet they heap abuse on whoever else teaches others." Those women said: "Did you then arrange those teachings on the truths for their sake?" He replied: "If they begin to ripen the faculties of those women, in the end they will come to see the truths as well." While the monks of few desires were saying — why do monks use the very limb by which they should be ashamed to puff themselves up? — while they were heaping abuse, speaking disparagingly, and spreading malicious talk, the monks reported it to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, in connection with this occurrence, this genesis, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and the rest follows as before. The buddha, the Blessed One, then questioned the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you did something so unseemly?" "Blessed holy one, it is so." The buddha, the Blessed One, rebuked him: "That which is not the manner of an ascetic, not in accord, not fitting, not in keeping with proper conduct — that is not something one who has gone forth ought to do." Having rebuked him in this way, the Blessed One then rebuked him again through many synonymous expressions, and declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing the ten benefits clearly, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and the rest follows as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, with a mind that is agitated and disturbed, directs at a woman base and vulgar words of sensual import — of the kind that a young man speaks to a young woman — that is an offense entailing expiation (pācittika) requiring communal confession."

"Whatever monk" refers to Cāraka, or to anyone else of that kind.

Regarding the phrase "with a mind that is agitated and disturbed": there are minds that are agitated but not disturbed, minds that are disturbed but not agitated, minds that are both agitated and disturbed, and minds that are neither agitated nor disturbed. Of these, a mind that is agitated but not disturbed is a mind that has attachment, complete attachment, and entanglement. A mind that is disturbed but not agitated is a mind that is accompanied by longing and connected to its object. A mind that is both agitated and disturbed is a mind that has attachment, complete attachment, and entanglement, and is also accompanied by longing and connected to its object. A mind that is neither agitated nor disturbed is any mind that does not fall into those categories.

Regarding the phrase "directed at a woman": it refers to any woman or girl who is capable of understanding the full import of words spoken to her, whether those words were spoken well or badly.

Regarding the term "base and vulgar words": there are two kinds. The first is that which instigates a defeat, and the second is that which instigates expiation by the Saṅgha as a remainder. Why are these called base and vulgar? Because of what they are by their own nature and because of what they instigate.

The word "words" means utterances. Regarding the phrase "of sensual import": "sensual" means blameworthy, that is, what is reprehensible. "Communal confession" means going beyond the bounds of what is middling, which is contrary to proper conduct. "Of the kind that a young man speaks" — "man" here means a male, and "young" here means a woman. "Speaks" means saying something that has not been said before, or responding to something that has already been said. "Requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha" is as before.

As for how transgression arises in this case, it does so through nine bases: by making praise, by making disparagement, by making a request, by making an entreaty, by asking, by thoroughly asking, by announcing, by expressing a wish, and by rebuking.

How does transgression arise through making praise? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, your three bodily orifices are perfectly suited, perfectly placed, and perfectly formed," and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through making praise.

How does transgression arise through making disparagement? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, your three bodily orifices are not perfectly suited, not perfectly placed, and not perfectly formed," and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through making disparagement.

How does transgression arise through making a request? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, come here and let us do such-and-such," and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense.

That is how transgression arises through making a request.

How does transgression arise through making an offering? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, what such-and-such a man does with such-and-such a woman — that is her joy and delight. So if we too were to do such-and-such, that would become my joy and delight as well," and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through making an offering.

How does transgression arise through asking? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, if a man were to do such-and-such with a woman, that would become her joy and delight — so if I too were to do such-and-such with you, would that not become your joy and delight?" and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through asking.

How does transgression arise through fully asking? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, if a man were to do such-and-such with a woman, that would become her joy and delight — and if I were to do such-and-such with you, it would likewise become your joy and delight. Is that not so, or is it not? What do you think, Lady?" and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through fully asking.

How does transgression arise through describing? A monk, with a mind that is both agitated and disturbed, approaches a woman or girl capable of understanding the full import of well-spoken and badly-spoken words, and says to her: "Lady, the day before yesterday, in my dwelling, in a garden, or in a divine abode, or in some great and spacious chamber, a woman just like you came there for that very purpose. I spread a bed strewn with flowers, set up a lamp of sesame oil throughout the night, prepared such-and-such food for us to eat together and ate just such things, drank just such drinks, and together with her did such-and-such. If you, Lady, were to come there for that very purpose, I would spread a bed strewn with flowers, set up a lamp of sesame oil throughout the night, prepare just such food for us to eat together and eat just such things, drink just such drinks, and together with you I would do such-and-such as well," and then utters with sensual import the name "ears of grain" — this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he utters the words without using the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through describing.

How does transgression arise through expressing longing?

How does transgression arise through expressing longing? A monk, with a mind seized by lust, goes before a woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, and says the following: "Those who do such-and-such things together with a wife are happy and attain the higher realms. Therefore if I too were to do such-and-such together with a wife, I would become happy and would attain the higher realms." If, while saying this with sensual import, he utters the name "ears of grain," this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through expressing longing.

How does transgression arise through reviling? A monk, with a mind seized by lust, goes before a woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, and reviles her with terms of abuse such as "you are like a corpse" and the like. If, while reviling her in this way with sensual import, he utters the name "ears of grain," this incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through reviling.

Furthermore, how does transgression arise through praising? A woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, your three bodily doors are well formed, well positioned, and fine." When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through praising.

How does transgression arise through disparaging? A woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, your three bodily doors are ill formed, ill positioned, and unbecoming." When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how transgression arises through disparaging.

How does transgression arise through soliciting? A woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, come here; let us do such-and-such." When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense.

That is how it occurs by means of requesting. And how does it occur by means of beseeching? A woman or a girl capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, such-and-such that a woman and a man do together — that brings joy and delight to such-and-such a person. Noble one, if we too were to do such-and-such, it would bring joy and delight to me as well." When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how it occurs by means of beseeching.

And how does it occur by means of questioning? A woman or a girl capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, a man who does such-and-such to a woman — does that bring joy and delight to that woman? If she were to do such-and-such to the noble one, would it bring joy and delight to the noble one?" When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how it occurs by means of questioning.

And how does it occur by means of thorough questioning? A woman or a girl capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, a man who does such-and-such to a woman — that brings joy and delight to her; and if she were to do such-and-such to the noble one, it would bring joy and delight to the noble one as well. Is that so, or is it not so? Noble one, what does the noble one think of this?" When she says this, the monk, with a mind seized by lust, savors the taste of her words, attends to them with certainty, becomes greatly attached, remains sitting in great attachment, and then speaks back to her accordingly with sensual import, uttering the name "ears of grain." This incurs expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha. If he does not utter the name "ears of grain," it becomes a grave offense. That is how it occurs by means of thorough questioning.

And how does it occur by means of declaration? A woman or a girl capable of understanding the full meaning of what is spoken, whether the words be proper or improper, comes before a monk and says: "Noble one, last night in her presence, in a grove or in a divine abode or in some great and spacious bed-chamber, there appeared a man of such-and-such a kind, come for that very purpose. She had spread and prepared a bed strewn with flowers, and set a butter-lamp burning in the middle of the night, and together with him she had prepared such-and-such arrangements and sought such-and-such food and sought such-and-such drink, and together with him she had done such-and-such. Noble one, if you too were to come for that very purpose —"

She had spread and prepared a bed strewn with flowers, and set a butter-lamp burning in the middle of the night, and together with the noble one she had prepared such-and-such arrangements and sought such-and-such food and sought such-and-such drink, and together with the noble one she had done such-and-such as well." When this is said, if the monk, with a mind aroused and inflamed, savors the taste of it, comes to a definite apprehension of it, becomes further attached to it, and, being further attached, remains in that state — and if, speaking accordingly in reply while in a state of sexual arousal, he utters the name called "ear of grain" — he incurs a Saṅgha Remainder offense. If he does not utter the name called "ear of grain," it becomes a serious transgression — and this is so because he speaks in reply.

Now, how does one speak in reply by way of entreaty? A woman or a girl who is able to understand the meaning of both well-spoken words and ill-spoken words comes before the monk and says: "Noble one, those noble ones who do such-and-such together with a noble one — they are happy and have attained a higher rebirth. She too, if she were to do such-and-such together with the noble one, would become happy and would attain a higher rebirth." When this is said, if the monk, with a mind aroused and inflamed, savors the taste of it, comes to a definite apprehension of it, becomes further attached to it, and, being further attached, remains in that state — and if, speaking accordingly in reply while in a state of sexual arousal, he utters the name called "ear of grain" — he incurs a Saṅgha Remainder offense. If he does not utter the name called "ear of grain," it becomes a serious transgression — and this is so because he speaks in reply by way of entreaty.

Now, how does one speak in reply by way of reviling? A woman or a girl who is able to understand the meaning of all the teachings, whether well-spoken or ill-spoken, comes before the monk and reviles him with revilings such as "he is like a corpse" and the like. If the monk, with a mind aroused and inflamed, savors the taste of it, comes to a definite apprehension of it, becomes further attached to it, and, being further attached, remains in that state — and if, speaking accordingly in reply while in a state of sexual arousal, he utters the name called "ear of grain" — he incurs a Saṅgha Remainder offense. If he does not utter the name called "ear of grain," it becomes a serious transgression — and this is so because he speaks in reply by way of reviling.

Where there is a Saṅgha Remainder offense with respect to one who is capable, there is a serious transgression with respect to one who is incapable. With respect to a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, or one who has both characteristics, there is a serious transgression. Where there is a serious transgression with respect to one who is capable, there is a minor transgression with respect to one who is incapable. With respect to a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, or one who has both characteristics, it is likewise a minor transgression. With respect to one born in an animal realm, it is likewise a minor transgression. Where there is a minor transgression with respect to one who is capable, there is likewise a minor transgression with respect to one who is incapable. With respect to a man, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, or one who has both characteristics, it is likewise a minor transgression. With respect to one born in an animal realm, it is likewise a minor transgression.

When the words used are ambiguous with regard to language, ambiguous with regard to locality, or ambiguous with regard to region, there is no transgression. When one utters the name of a grain, the name of a grass, or the name of a winnowing basket, there is no transgression. For one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by feelings, there is no transgression.

This concludes the third Saṅgha Remainder, speaking in a state of sexual arousal.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The conduct of the Group of Six was as follows: "Here, we too shall teach the Dharma to brahmins and householders who have come and arrived."

They also thought: "We shall silence our opponents and spread our own reputation." And so one or another of the Group of Six, unwilling to leave the gate of the Jeta Grove unattended, had the venerable Cāraka rise early, discard his tooth-stick, put on a reddish-yellow patched robe, and walk about and sit at the gate of the Jeta Grove.

Now the customary practice of the brahmin wives and householders' wives who lived in Śrāvastī was to go to the park, to enter the Jeta Grove, to visit the temple, and to go to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and of the elder monks. And so a great many brahmin wives and householders' wives came to the park, and wishing to see the temple, they went toward the Jeta

Grove.

From the point where he began teaching them the Dharma — as was set forth in the context of the second Saṅgha Remainder — up to the point where he began teaching them the Dharma, the account runs as follows:

The more he taught the Dharma, the more they became attached. The more they became attached, the more they became aroused. The more they became aroused, he then began, in order to obtain bodily service from them in person, to utter this praise before them: "For a monk like me — one possessed of moral discipline, endowed with virtuous qualities, living the holy life — to be honored with this quality of sensual union: this honor is the highest of all forms of honor."

It was just as when a spirit recites a love spell aloud, or as when one is pressed upon by the poultice of meat and a whipping rod — in exactly the same way, the more he taught them the Dharma, the more they became attached. The more they became attached, the more they became aroused. The more they became aroused, he then began, before them, in order to obtain bodily service in person, to utter this praise: "For a monk like me — one possessed of moral discipline, endowed with virtuous qualities, living the holy life — to be honored with this quality of sensual union: this honor is the highest of all forms of honor."

Those among them who became his own then stayed with him, reclining on side-couches, fanning themselves, pressing close to him, playing with him, chattering noisily, laughing, showing pride, and moving their bodies about. Those who did not become his own departed from there. And in the walkways, courtyards, and gatehouse they recited these words:

From what gives water, fire blazes forth.

From what gives shelter, terror arises.

From the fearless one, fear has been born.

From the refuge, terror has come to be.

"In our quarter there was happiness, peace, the declaration of good fortune, the arising of good fortune — and from that very thing fear, plague, harm, epidemic disease, and conflict have arisen." Thus they spoke in reproach, flung words back, and gossiped.

As they were speaking in reproach and leaving, they came directly before the monks. The monks heard them speaking in reproach and said to them:

"Sisters, whom do you reproach? Noble ones, it is you we reproach. What have we done? Noble ones, words that we have never heard even in our own homes — those we have heard from the noble Cāraka. If our fathers or brothers or sisters were to hear of this, they would not even give so much as food to the Jeta Grove, let alone what else might be expected. Sisters, be quiet. That monk has indeed gone forth from a chanter's family, he is possessed of moral discipline, and yet he is greatly overcome by attachment, so that this undertaking removes the afflictions." Noble ones, what is this?

Would a bull with two sharp horns gore its own flank? That would be unseemly. Sisters, be quiet and turn back." "Noble ones, if you turn back, then well and good. But if you do not turn back, we will no longer come to the Jeta Grove." "Sisters, be quiet. Turn back, and make sure that he never does such a thing again."

The monks then instructed them and sent them on their way, and the rest of the assembly also departed from the monastery. Then the venerable Cāraka came out of the monastery laughing, and when the monks saw this they said, "Venerable Cāraka, why do you laugh, having done something so unseemly?" Cāraka replied, "Have I been drinking ale, or eating garlic, or what? Venerable ones, have I even done that much? What else have I done? I departed having reviled a great many wives of brahmins and householders."

Cāraka then said, "Venerable ones, the nature of those with black begging bowls is that out of miserliness they will not show even a single verse of four lines to anyone, and yet they condemn the one who does show such things to others." They said to him, "Are you saying that what you did to them was truthful?" He replied, "If they were to begin ripening their faculties, they would in the end come to see the truth as well."

The monks scolded him, saying, "Why do monks of little benefit — why do monks use the very faculty by which one ought to feel shame to fill themselves with pride?" — and they censured him, spoke harshly, and reproached him. Thereupon the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this circumstance, convened the community of monks, and so forth as before. The buddha, the Blessed One, questioned the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you did something so unseemly?" "Blessed one, it is true." The buddha, the Blessed One, censured him, saying that what is unbecoming a monk, discordant with the Dharma, unsuitable, and contrary to proper conduct is not something that one who has gone forth should do. Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers," and so forth as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Furthermore, if any monk, with a mind that is both impassioned and altered, in the presence of a woman, for the sake of his own bodily service, were to speak praise in such terms as these — 'A monk like me, endowed with moral discipline, possessing virtuous qualities, who, practicing the holy life, is served in such an amorous manner by this virtue — that service is the highest of all services' — then there is a remainder for the Saṅgha."

Now the phrase "if any monk" refers to Cāraka or anyone else similar to him. "With a mind both impassioned and altered" — there are four possibilities: the mind may be impassioned but not altered; altered but not impassioned; both impassioned and altered; and neither impassioned nor altered. Of these, "impassioned but not altered" refers to a mind of attachment, total attachment, and entanglement. "Altered but not impassioned" refers to a mind possessed of longing and bound by longing. "Both impassioned and altered" refers to a mind of attachment, total attachment, and entanglement, which is also possessed of longing and bound by longing. "Neither impassioned nor altered" refers to a mind not belonging to any of those categories. "In the presence of a woman" refers to a woman, or — a maiden — one capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings, whether well spoken or badly spoken. "In the presence of" means in front of, directly before. "For the sake of serving one's own body" means for the sake of making use of one's own body. "Such as one like me" — this is an expression of pointing out and indicating. "A monk" means one who possesses the qualities of a monk as described. "Possessed of moral discipline" means one who possesses the aggregate of moral discipline as described. "One who has virtuous qualities" means one who possesses the aggregate of meditative absorption as described. "In the holy life" means one who possesses the aggregate of wisdom as described. "Engaged in such intercourse as this" means one who is engaged in unchaste conduct. "By this Dharma" means: by this thing that is not the Dharma but is expressed by the word "Dharma" — and not by anything else. "If served" means if made use of. "Dear one" is an expression of affection. As for "this is the supreme among all services" — "supreme" means foremost. "If one speaks praise" means if one praises. As for

"the Saṅgha remains," meaning that the transgression rests with the Saṅgha — and therefore, it is said, "the Saṅgha remains" — and so on up to that point, it is as before. Now, one may ask: how does a transgression arise in this case? It arises through eighteen bases: supreme, surpassing, supremely distinguished, excellent, beautiful, virtuous, worthy of veneration, worthy of praise, extensive — and the intensified forms of each: most supreme, most surpassing, most supremely distinguished, most excellent, most beautiful, most virtuous, most worthy of veneration, most worthy of praise, and most extensive.

Now, one may ask: how does the case of "supreme" apply? If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk possessed of moral discipline, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all acts of service" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk who has virtuous qualities, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk in the holy life, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one such as I, a monk endowed with moral discipline and wholesome qualities, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk endowed with moral discipline, in the holy life, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk with wholesome qualities and endowed with moral discipline, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk with wholesome qualities, in the holy life, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk in the holy life and endowed with moral discipline, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk in the holy life and with wholesome qualities, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following: "If one such as I, a monk endowed with moral discipline, with wholesome qualities, and in the holy life, is served by this Dharma that involves such intercourse as this, dear one, this is the supreme among all services" — then he incurs a transgression remaining with the Saṅgha.

And just as it is the supreme, so too it is the foremost, the distinguished, the excellent, the beautiful, the virtuous, the worthy of honor, the worthy of praise, the extensive, the most supreme, the most foremost, the most distinguished, the most excellent, the most beautiful, the most virtuous, the most worthy of honor, the most worthy of praise, and the most extensive.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses moral discipline, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses virtue, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses moral discipline and who possesses virtue, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion"

when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses moral discipline and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses virtue and who possesses moral discipline, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "arising from an offering" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses virtue and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who follows the celibate life and possesses virtue, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who follows the celibate life and possesses virtuous qualities, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching a monk such as myself who possesses virtue, possesses virtuous qualities, and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "endowed with passion" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

The same applies equally to that which is foremost, supremely excellent, distinguished, fine, beautiful, wholesome, worthy of veneration, worthy of praise, vast, most supreme, most foremost, most distinguished, most fine, most beautiful, most wholesome, most worthy of veneration, most worthy of praise, and most vast.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who possesses virtue, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who possesses virtuous qualities and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who possesses virtue and is of wholesome character, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who follows the celibate life and possesses moral discipline, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who is of wholesome character and possesses moral discipline, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who is of wholesome character and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who follows the celibate life and possesses moral discipline, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who follows the celibate life and is of wholesome character, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind of desire and passion, goes to a woman or a maiden who is capable of understanding the meaning of all teachings whether well spoken or badly spoken, and says to her the following:

"If one honours with this teaching of passion a monk who possesses moral discipline, is of wholesome character, and follows the celibate life, this service of honour is the foremost of all acts of honour" — yet if he does not say the words "such as myself" when he says this, a grave transgression is incurred.

And just as with "foremost," so too with each of the following synonyms in turn: supreme, excellent, surpassing, good, beautiful, virtuous, worthy of veneration, worthy of praise, vast — and likewise with the intensified forms: the most supreme, the most excellent, the most surpassing, the most good, the most beautiful, the most virtuous, the most worthy of veneration, the most worthy of praise, and the most vast.

This concludes the Vinaya-vibhaṅga.

The Seventeenth Fascicle.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of moral discipline were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of virtuous qualities were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of moral discipline and living the holy life were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of moral discipline and of virtuous qualities were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of moral discipline and living the holy life were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of virtuous qualities and of moral discipline were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of virtuous qualities and living the holy life were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words

"such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk living the holy life and possessed of moral discipline were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk living the holy life and possessed of virtuous qualities were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

If a monk, with a mind aroused by lust, goes to a woman or a girl who is able to understand the full meaning of words spoken well and words spoken improperly, and speaks to her as follows: "If a monk possessed of moral discipline and virtuous qualities, living the holy life, were to be honoured in this way, through this act of honour, this act of service would be the foremost of all acts of honour" — and yet does not say the words "possessed of sexual union" nor the words "such as myself" — a grave transgression is incurred.

Likewise for "the best, the finest, the most excellent, the most superior, the most beautiful, the most wholesome, the most worthy of veneration, the most praiseworthy, the most extensive, and the most supremely best, the most supremely fine, the most supremely excellent, the most supremely superior, the most supremely beautiful, the most supremely wholesome, the most supremely worthy of veneration, the most supremely praiseworthy, and the most supremely extensive."

With respect to one capable of understanding: whatever remainder of the Saṅgha there is, for one incapable of understanding a grave transgression is incurred. With respect to a man, a woman, a eunuch, and a hermaphrodite also, a grave transgression is incurred. With respect to one capable of understanding, where a grave transgression applies, for one incapable of understanding a minor transgression applies. With respect to a man, a woman, a eunuch, and a hermaphrodite also, a minor transgression applies. With respect to one born in the realm of animals also, a minor transgression applies. With respect to one capable of understanding, where a minor transgression applies, for one incapable of understanding it is likewise a minor transgression. With respect to a man, a woman, a eunuch, and a hermaphrodite also, it is likewise a minor transgression. With respect to one born in the realm of animals also, it is likewise a minor transgression. For one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is assailed by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

The fourth section of the Saṅgha's surplus rules concerning honouring and praising is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was in Śrāvastī a man named Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, who was skilled at going among the brahmins and householders of Śrāvastī and conversing with them, accompanying them, befriending them, winning their affection, and gaining entry into their homes. And so those who had daughters to give in marriage went to Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and asked him: "Kṛṣṇa, do you know of any great household?" When he replied that he did, they would ask him: "What is that household like, Kṛṣṇa? Is the boy clever and free from laziness and capable of accomplishing things? Is the boy able to give the girl abundant food and clothing? And is his workload light?"

But if Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, were to report that the boy was not clever, was lazy, was not capable of accomplishing things, that the boy could not give the girl abundant food and clothing, and that his workload was heavy, then those people would not give their daughter to that boy. And if Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, were to report that the boy was clever, was free from laziness, was capable of accomplishing things, that the boy could give the girl abundant food and clothing, and that his workload was light, then those people would give their daughter to that boy.

Now those who had daughters to seek in marriage would likewise go to Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and ask him: "Kṛṣṇa, do you know of any great household?" When he replied that he did, they would ask him: "Kṛṣṇa, what is the girl of that household like? Is she clever and free from laziness and capable of accomplishing things? And is she able to dwell in the home with care and diligence?" If Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, were to report that the girl was not clever, was lazy, was not capable of accomplishing things, and that she was not able to dwell in the home with care and diligence, then those people would not seek that girl. But if Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, were to report that the girl was clever, was free from laziness, was capable of accomplishing things, and was able to dwell in the home with care and diligence, then those people would seek that girl.

Now when Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had reported in this way and any of those who had daughters to give in marriage came to give their daughter badly — that is, when a daughter was given and the boy turned out to be not clever, lazy, not capable of accomplishing things, unable to give the girl abundant food and clothing, and with a heavy workload — those people would speak ill of Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, saying: "Those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, has conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes — it has turned out like this for them too." But when any of those who had daughters to give in marriage came to give their daughter well — that is, when a daughter was given and the boy turned out to be clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, able to give the girl abundant food and clothing, and with a light workload — those people would speak praise of Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, saying: "Those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, has conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes — it has turned out like this for them too."

Likewise, when any of those who had daughters to seek in marriage came to seek a daughter badly — that is, when a daughter was taken and the girl turned out to be not clever, lazy, not capable of accomplishing things, and unable to dwell in the home with care and diligence — those people would speak ill of Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, saying: "Those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, has conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes — it has turned out like this for them too." But when any of those who had daughters to seek in marriage came to seek a daughter well — that is, when a daughter was taken and the girl turned out to be clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, and able to dwell in the home with care and diligence — those people would speak praise of Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, saying: "Those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, has conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes — — conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes — it has turned out like this for them too." In this way, both praise and blame arose simultaneously for Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, in Śrāvastī.

Then at another time he became filled with faith in the Buddha, filled with faith in the Dharma and the Saṅgha. He went for refuge to the Buddha, went for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha. He abandoned the taking of life and turned back from the taking of life. He abandoned the taking of what is not given, sexual misconduct, false speech, and the state of heedlessness that is intoxication by grain-spirits or distilled liquors, and he turned back from that state of heedlessness.

After dwelling for a time as a householder in the household life, he extended and deepened that very same former faith, shaved off his hair and beard, put on the ochre robes, and with genuine faith went forth from home into homelessness into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya.

Having gone forth in this way, he continued, by virtue of his former friendships, to converse, speak pleasantly, chat, befriend, win affection, and gain entry into the homes of the brahmins and householders of Śrāvastī. Those among them who had sons to offer in marriage came to Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and asked: "Noble one, do you know of a suitable household?" He said he did, and they asked him: "Noble one, is that boy clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things? Is he in a position to give the girl abundant food and clothing, and is the burden of work light?" If Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, indicated, "Good people, that boy is in truth not clever, is lazy, incapable of accomplishing things, unable to provide the girl with abundant food and clothing, and the burden of work is heavy," then they would not give their daughter to that boy. But if Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, indicated, "Good people, that boy is in truth clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, able to provide the girl with abundant food and clothing, and the burden of work is light," then they would give their daughter to that boy.

Those among them who had daughters to offer in marriage also came to Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and asked: "Noble one, do you know of a suitable household?" He said he did, and they asked him: "Noble one, is that girl clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things? Is she able to dwell in the home with care and diligence?" If Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, indicated, "Good people, that girl is in truth not clever, is lazy, incapable of accomplishing things, and unable to dwell in the home with care and diligence," then they would not offer their daughter in marriage. But if Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, indicated, "Good people, that girl is in truth clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, and able to dwell in the home with care and diligence," then they would offer their daughter in marriage.

After Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had indicated in this way, if those who had given their daughter in marriage fared badly, they would say: "We asked Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and then gave our daughter in marriage, and that boy is not clever, is lazy, incapable of accomplishing things, and the boy is unable to provide the girl with abundant food and clothing — his burden is heavy." And so they would speak ill of those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had mingled in conversation, spoken of as a welcome visitor, befriended as a companion, held in esteem, and brought into their homes, saying, "It will turn out thus for them as well." But if those who had given their daughter in marriage fared well, they would say: "We asked Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and then gave our daughter in marriage, and that boy is clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, and the boy is able to provide the girl with abundant food and clothing — his burden is light." And so they would speak in praise of those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had mingled in conversation, spoken of as a welcome visitor, befriended as a companion, held in esteem, and brought into their homes, saying, "It will turn out thus for them as well."

Likewise, if those who had taken a daughter in marriage fared badly, they would say: "We asked Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and then took that girl in marriage, and that girl is not clever, is lazy, incapable of accomplishing things, and that girl is unable to dwell in the home with care and diligence." And so they would speak ill of those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had mingled in conversation, spoken of as a welcome visitor, befriended as a companion, held in esteem, and brought into their homes, saying, "It will turn out thus for them as well." But if those who had taken a daughter in marriage fared well, they would say: "We asked Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, and then took that girl in marriage, and that girl is clever, free from laziness, capable of accomplishing things, and that girl is able to dwell in the home with care and diligence." And so they would speak in praise of those with whom Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, had mingled in conversation, spoken of as a welcome visitor, befriended as a companion, held in esteem, and brought into their homes, saying, "It will turn out thus for them as well."

And so it came about that praise and blame arose for Kṛṣṇa, son of Mṛgādhāra, at one and the same time in Śrāvastī. Now, this had occurred for the time being, but the awakened Blessed One had not yet for his part established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

At that time the Blessed One was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks (Skt. ṣaḍvargika), using with women the language one uses with a man, and using with men the language one uses with a woman, were acting as though they were wives or intimate female companions to one another. The non-Buddhist adherents who were learned said: "These monks, sons of the Śākya, use with women the language one uses with a man, and use with men the language one uses with a woman, acting as wives or intimate female companions to one another. And others as well — brahmins and householders who have not properly taken up the rule of training — also use with women the language one uses with a man, and use with men the language one uses with a woman, acting as wives or intimate female companions. What distinction then, O learned ones, is there between the monks who are sons of the Śākya and those brahmins and householders who have not properly taken up the rule of training? What difference in intention is there? What difference in conduct is there?" They mocked and taunted and gossiped, saying, "Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed wanderers?" Upon this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and on account of this occasion, the Blessed One convened a gathering of the community of monks. Now, the Tathāgata, perceiving the twofold purpose of the matter, convened the community of monks, thinking: "This is so that my hearers may come to know everything fully, and so that I may properly establish the foundations of training in the Vinaya." The blessed buddhas deliberate knowingly — they deliberate knowingly, yet do not deliberate unknowingly; they deliberate at the right time, not at the wrong time; they deliberate when there is purpose, not when there is no purpose. Therefore, when the blessed buddhas encounter something purposeless, they turn it away like a bucket of water. In this regard, since the blessed buddhas know the right time when something purposeful presents itself, the Blessed One questioned the group of six, saying: "Monks, is it true that you behaved in such an unseemly manner?" "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed One then censured them, saying that such conduct was unworthy of one who has gone forth, did not accord with the ascetic life, was not proper, was not in conformity with the rule, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth — and so on in this fashion. After censuring them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, therefore, having perceived the ten benefits, one should establish the foundations of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so on as before. "My hearers shall recite this foundation of training in the Vinaya as follows: Should any monk address a woman using the language one uses with a man, or address a man using the language one uses with a woman, acting as wives or as intimate female companions — even if only a brief meeting occurs — he incurs a Saṅgha transgression."

"Should any monk" refers to those of the group of six or any other who behaves similarly. "Address a woman using the language one uses with a man" means: language expressing the intention of conduct proper to a man, spoken toward a woman. "Address a man using the language one uses with a woman" means: language expressing the intention of conduct proper to a woman, spoken toward a man. "Acting as wives or as intimate female companions" means: as one of seven kinds of wives or as one of ten kinds of intimate female companions.

What are the seven kinds of wives? A wife given in exchange for a water-libation, a wife purchased for a price, a wife obtained by force, a wife who has gathered together of her own accord, a wife who is sustained with food and clothing, a wife who has been broken and tamed, and a wife encountered briefly — that is the seventh. Of these, what is a wife given in exchange for a water-libation? It is a woman or girl whom her parents have given to a man, pouring a water-libation and saying, "Let her be your wife and mistress of your household," and who, having become that man's wife and mistress of his household, is guarded most carefully and kept most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife given in exchange for a water-libation. What is a wife purchased for a price? It is a woman or girl whom a man has purchased from her parents, saying, "Let her be my wife and mistress of my household," and who, having become that man's wife and mistress of his household, is guarded most carefully and kept most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife purchased for a price. What is a wife obtained by force? When a king who has been consecrated with the royal anointment of a kṣatriya marshals a fourfold army with all its divisions, goes to a foreign territory and province, and brings back those who had not come — — and who, having arrived there, proclaims the victory: when a man seizes a woman or girl in that moment of triumph, saying, "Let her be my wife and mistress of my household," and she becomes his wife and mistress of his household, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife obtained by force.

Furthermore, what is another kind of wife obtained by force? It is as follows: when brigands have sacked a village, or sacked a town, or sacked a province, and a man, making his own head the banner of victory, seizes a woman or girl, saying, "Let this one be my wife and mistress of my household," and she becomes his wife and mistress of his household, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such too is a wife obtained by force.

What is a wife who comes of her own accord? When a woman or girl comes to a man of her own faith, her own inclination, and her own joy, and says, "O prince, come here. Make me your mistress of the household, and I will be your noble wife and lady of the household," and she becomes his wife and mistress of his household, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife who comes of her own accord.

What is a wife sustained by clothing and food? When a woman or girl comes to a man and says, "O prince, come here. Give me clothing and food, and I will be your noble wife and lady of the household," and she becomes his wife and mistress of his household, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife sustained by clothing and food.

What is a wife united by mutual agreement? When a woman or girl comes to a man and says, "O prince, come here. Whatever wealth you have and whatever wealth I have, let us pool it together and live on it jointly; and whatever sons or daughters may come from the two of us — when we two have died and our time has come, let us make offerings, whether small or great, perform acts of merit, and go together to whatever world we are reborn in, and may we follow each other there. I will name you in that dedication by name," and she becomes his wife and mistress of his household, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife united by mutual agreement.

What is a wife met for a time? When a man thinks, "Today I will enjoy pleasure with this one," and at that time he has occasion to meet with a woman or girl for just a moment, and he guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a wife met for a time.

What are the ten kinds of women who are under protection? They are: one guarded by her mother, one guarded by her father, one guarded by her brother, one guarded by her sister, one guarded by her husband's female relatives, one guarded by her clan, one guarded by her kinsmen, one guarded by her lineage, one guarded by those of shared blood, and the tenth is one who is not in dispute.

Of these, what is a woman under the protection of her mother?

A woman or girl whose husband has died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — and who dwells under her mother's care, while her mother guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her mother.

What is a woman under the protection of her father? A woman or girl whose husband has died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — and who dwells under her father's care, while her father guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her father.

What is a woman under the protection of her brother? A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — and who dwells under her brother's care, while her brother guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her brother.

What is a woman under the protection of her sister? A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — and who dwells under her sister's care, while her sister guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her sister.

What is a woman under the protection of her husband's female relatives? A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — and who dwells under the care of her husband's female relatives, while those relatives speak to her thus: "Whoever is seen by our son is also seen by you, and whoever is seen by you is also seen by our son; therefore maintain yourself as a daughter-in-law on our food and clothing, and make yourself pleasing as a daughter-in-law" — and having said so, those relatives guard her most carefully and keep her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her husband's female relatives.

What is a woman under the protection of her clan? A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings —

she dwells under the protection of a relative, and the relative says to her, "Whomsoever I see as my son, that same one is someone you may see; and whomsoever you see, that same one is someone I see as my son — so remain content with my food and clothing, and let yourself be pleased as a daughter-in-law" — and having said so, the relative guards her most carefully and keeps her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her relatives.

What is a woman under the protection of her clan? By "clan" is meant the brahmin caste, the warrior caste, the merchant caste, and the commoner caste. A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — she dwells under the protection of members of her own clan, and those clanspeople guard her most carefully and keep her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her clan.

What is a woman under the protection of her lineage? By "lineage" is meant the lineage of Kuśa, the lineage of Vātsya, the lineage of Śāṇḍilya, the lineage of Bharadvāja, the lineage of the fifth, the lineage of the near-fifth, and the lineage of Gautama. A woman or girl whose parents and husband have died and the time has come upon her, or who has been imprisoned or executed by the king, or who has fled out of fear of the king to another district or another land, or who has become mad, or mentally disturbed, or endangered by her feelings — she dwells under the protection of her lineage, and the members of that lineage guard her most carefully and keep her most hidden so that she may not go about with others out of desire — such is a woman under the protection of her lineage.

What is a woman who is without dispute? A fully ordained nun (bhikṣuṇī), a woman who lives by the rule, a wandering woman, one who follows in accord with a husband's marital bed, and one who conducts herself according to the Dharma — such is a woman who is without dispute.

"A messenger" means one who carries communications. "If one does so" means if one were to do so. "Even a chance meeting for just a moment" means even for just an instant. "A remainder for the Saṅgha" — as before.

How does a transgression arise in regard to that?

In summary verse:

The message that is sent, and two monks,
the mode of conduct, and the preliminary act, self and non-self, the object and the direction,
a written message, a hand-sign, and a wife.

If a monk himself undertakes the sending and himself conveys the message in the outward direction, and himself also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk himself undertakes the sending and — himself conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk himself undertakes the sending and a deputy conveys the message in the outward direction and he himself conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk himself undertakes the sending and a deputy conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and himself also conveys the message in the outward direction and himself also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and himself conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and a deputy conveys the message in the outward direction and he himself conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and a deputy conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy of a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and himself also conveys the message in the outward direction and himself also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy of a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and himself conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy of a deputy conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy of a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and a deputy of a deputy conveys the message in the outward direction and he himself conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha. If a monk, having received the commission from a deputy of a deputy, himself undertakes the sending, and a deputy of a deputy also conveys the message in the outward direction and a deputy of a deputy also conveys the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and both also convey the message in the outward direction and both also convey the reply in the inward direction, it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha for both of them.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and one of them says, "For the moment, on my behalf, convey the message in the outward direction and also convey the reply in the inward direction," and the other then conveys the message in the outward direction and conveys the reply in the inward direction on his behalf — it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha for both of them.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and one of them says, "I will convey the message in the outward direction, but I will not convey the reply in the inward direction" — then of those two, the one who conveys the message both in the outward direction and in the inward direction incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha, while the one who conveys the message in the outward direction but does not convey the reply in the inward direction incurs two gross offenses.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and one of them says, "I will not convey the message in the outward direction, nor will I convey the reply in the inward direction" — then of those two, the one who conveys the message both in the outward direction and in the inward direction incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha, while the one who conveys the message neither in the outward direction nor in the inward direction incurs one gross offense.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and both of them convey the message in the outward direction but do not convey the reply in the inward direction, then each of the two incurs two gross offenses.

If two monks both undertake the sending, and both of them say, "Neither of us will convey the message in the outward direction, nor will either of us convey the reply in the inward direction" — then each of the two incurs one gross offense.

If a single monk is traveling on a road together with a layman and a laywoman, and the layman says to that monk, "Noble one, can you say to this laywoman such words as: 'Are you this layman's wife, or his sweetheart?' or greet her on my behalf?" — or if the laywoman says to that monk, "Noble one, can you say to this layman such words as: 'Are you this laywoman's husband, or her beloved?' or greet him on my behalf?" — and that monk accepts a message of that kind and then conveys it in the outward direction or conveys the reply in the inward direction, he incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha. The same applies likewise to standing, sitting, and lying down in place of traveling. And just as has been set out for one monk, one layman, and one laywoman, so too the same applies in full, as appropriate, for two monks, two laymen, and two laywomen, and for many monks, many laymen, and many laywomen.

Of the two novices — the one who goes in front and the one who follows behind — if the one who goes in front undertakes the sending, and the novice who goes in front conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who goes in front also conveys the reply in the inward direction, then that novice who goes in front incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If the novice who goes in front undertakes the sending, and the novice who goes in front conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who follows behind conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who goes in front incurs two gross offenses, and the novice who follows behind incurs one gross offense.

If the novice who goes in front undertakes the sending, and the novice who follows behind conveys the message in the outward direction while the monk who goes in front conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who goes in front incurs two gross offenses, and the novice who follows behind incurs one gross offense.

If the novice who goes in front undertakes the sending, and the novice who follows behind conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who follows behind also conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who goes in front incurs one gross offense, and the novice who follows behind incurs two gross offenses.

Of the two novices — the one who goes in front and the one who follows behind — if the novice who follows behind undertakes the sending, and the novice who follows behind conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who follows behind also conveys the reply in the inward direction, then that novice who follows behind incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If the novice who follows behind undertakes the sending, and the novice who follows behind conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who goes in front conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who follows behind incurs two gross offenses, and the novice who goes in front incurs one gross offense.

If the novice who follows behind undertakes the sending, and the novice who goes in front conveys the message in the outward direction while the novice who follows behind conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who follows behind incurs two gross offenses, and the novice who goes in front incurs one gross offense.

If the novice who follows behind undertakes the sending, and the novice who goes in front conveys the message in the outward direction and the novice who goes in front also conveys the reply in the inward direction, then the novice who follows behind incurs one gross offense, and the novice who goes in front incurs two gross offenses.

Now, householders are of two kinds: the guardian and the non-guardian. A guardian is one who has become the master of a girl through giving or through taking by force, whether she has entered an upper chamber or a lower room, and whose word — even if it is not true — should be accepted. Such a person is called a guardian. A non-guardian is one who has not become the master of a girl through giving or through taking by force, whether she has entered an upper chamber or a lower room, and whose word — even if it is true — need not be accepted. Such a person is called a non-guardian.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to the guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from the guardian, he incurs a remainder for the Saṅgha.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to the guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from a non-guardian, he incurs two gross offenses and one minor offense.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to a non-guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from the guardian, he incurs two gross offenses and one minor offense.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to a non-guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from a non-guardian, he incurs one gross offense and two minor offenses.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a non-guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to the non-guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from the non-guardian, he incurs three minor offenses.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a non-guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to a guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from a non-guardian, he incurs one gross offense and two minor offenses.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a non-guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to a non-guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from a guardian, he incurs one gross offense and two minor offenses.

If a monk undertakes the sending at the request of a non-guardian, conveys the message in the outward direction to a guardian, and conveys the reply in the inward direction from the guardian, he incurs two gross offenses and one minor offense.

There are three circumstances by which a message is conveyed in the inward direction but not in the outward direction. What are the three? By location, by sign, and by mark.

How is it by location? When someone says, "When you see me in a pleasure grove, an assembly place, or somewhere in a divine residence, know that the matter has been done." That is how it is by location.

How is it by sign? When someone says, "When I am in the morning, at midday, or —"

"—in the evening, when you see me snap my fingers, know that the matter has been done." That is how it is by sign.

How is it by mark? When someone says, "When you see me shortly after having had my head and beard shaved, or wearing a red-and-yellow patched robe, or carrying a bowl with a lotus-leaf cover, or a wooden-handled iron-staff bowl, or a bowl of clarified butter, or a bowl of oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl of molasses with a stopper — when you see me carrying any of these, know that the matter has been done." That is how it is by mark.

There are three circumstances by which a message is conveyed both in the outward direction and in the inward direction. What are the three? By word, by written message, and by hand-delivered letter.

When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or by mark, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by word, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or by mark, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or — by sign, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by written message, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or by mark, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by word, and conveys the message in the inward direction by word, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or by mark, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by hand-delivered letter, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by written message, and conveys the message in the inward direction by written message, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense. When a monk accepts a message by hand-delivered letter, conveys the message in the outward direction by hand-delivered letter, and conveys the message in the inward direction by location, by sign, or by mark, he incurs a Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

The Vinaya Analysis, the eighteenth fascicle.

When a monk brings together and reconciles any combination of the first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is still in the midst of a quarrel and not yet after the quarrel has ended, and the division has not been made, the three lots have not been cast, the proper procedure has not been performed, it has not been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs a single offense of wrongdoing.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is both one that is still in the midst of a quarrel and one that is after the quarrel has ended, and the division has not been made, the three lots have not been cast, the proper procedure has not been performed, it has not been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs two offenses of wrongdoing.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, but the three lots have not been cast, the proper procedure has not been performed, it has not been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs three offenses of wrongdoing.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, and the three lots have been cast, but the proper procedure has not been performed, it has not been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs three offenses of wrongdoing and one grave offense.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, and the three lots have been cast, and the proper procedure has been performed, but it has not been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs three offenses of wrongdoing and two grave offenses.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, and the three lots have been cast, and the proper procedure has been performed, and it has been announced that she is not a wife, but the bell has not been proclaimed, he incurs three offenses of wrongdoing, three grave offenses, and one saṅghāvaśeṣa.

When a monk brings together any combination of those same first three types of wife — one given through a water-rite, one purchased with a price, and one obtained by seizure — and the situation is one that is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, and the three lots have been cast, and the proper procedure has been performed, and it has been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has been proclaimed, he incurs three offenses of wrongdoing, four grave offenses, and two saṅghāvaśeṣas.

When a monk brings together wives other than the foregoing — in a situation where it is in the midst of a quarrel, and after the quarrel has ended, and the division has been made, and the three lots have been cast, and the proper procedure has been performed, and it has been announced that she is not a wife, and the bell has been proclaimed — he incurs a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk going to a household arrives there and says, "Why is the household of this great young man not being maintained?" he incurs an offense of wrongdoing. If he says, "Why is this great young woman not being escorted?" he incurs an offense of wrongdoing. If he says, "Why is this young man and this young woman not being joined together?" he incurs an offense of wrongdoing. If he says, "Why does this young man not go to the house of his wife?" he incurs an offense of wrongdoing. If he says, "Why is this young woman not being taken to her husband's house?" he incurs an offense of wrongdoing. In short, if a monk going to a household utters any words that are in accord with such matters, he incurs an offense of wrongdoing in every case. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations.

The fifth chapter, concerning the saṅghāvaśeṣa of acting as a matchmaker, is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, dwelling places of the following kinds had become numerous among the monks. Some said, "This dwelling place is far too long," and having abandoned it, had it rebuilt differently. Some said, "This dwelling place is far too short. This one is far too wide. This one is far too narrow. This one is far too old."

"This one is far too weak in structure," and "This one is built quite badly," and having abandoned it, had it rebuilt differently. By their building dwelling places and having them built, their duties and building works had become manifold, and they were abandoning the recitation of scriptural transmissions, reading, chanting, the practice of yoga, and contemplation, and were repeatedly calling up laborers — for timber, for hired men, and for cart work — so that brahmins and householders began to censure them.

At that time, the venerable Mahākāśyapa was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the eastern Kubjārāma, in the pleasant hall of Mṛgāramāṭṭṛ. Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa heard that dwelling places of such a kind had become numerous among the many monks. Having heard this, he rose from his afternoon meditation, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Mahākāśyapa addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Reverend One, at the present time dwelling places of this kind have become numerous among the monks. Some said, 'This dwelling place is far too long,' and having abandoned it, had it rebuilt. Some said, 'This one is far too short. This one is far too wide. This one is far too narrow. This one is far too old. This one is far too weak in structure. This one is built quite badly,' and having abandoned it, had it rebuilt. By their building dwelling places and having them built, their duties and building works became manifold, and they abandoned the recitation of scriptural transmissions, reading, chanting, the practice of yoga, and contemplation, and repeatedly called up laborers for timber posts, for hired men, and for cart work, so that brahmins and householders censured them. May the Blessed One, out of compassion, instruct the monks well regarding dwelling places and the foundations of dwelling places."

The Blessed One, by remaining silent, granted permission to the venerable Mahākāśyapa. Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa, understanding that the Blessed One's silence was his permission, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and withdrew from the presence of the Blessed One. Then that very night the venerable Mahākāśyapa, in order to guard the minds of those who live the holy life (brahmacarya), took up his bowl and monastic robe and went walking through the countryside.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident and this occasion and this context, convened the community of monks — and so on, as before. The buddha, the Blessed One, then asked the many monks: "Monks, is it true that dwelling places of this kind have become numerous among you, that some said, 'This dwelling place is far too long,' and had it rebuilt, that some said, 'This one is far too short, this one is far too wide, this one is far too narrow, this one is far too old, this one is far too weak in structure, this one is built quite badly,' and had it rebuilt?"

"Reverend One, it is so."

The buddha, the Blessed One, criticized those of great desire, who know no contentment, who are difficult to care for and difficult to satisfy. Then the Blessed One praised the qualities of having few desires, of knowing contentment, of being easy to care for, of being easy to satisfy, of being retiring, of using few requisites, of being disciplined, of being accomplished, and of knowing moderation. Having so praised them, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing these ten benefits fully, the training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be established" — and so on, as before. "My hearers in the Vinaya shall recite this training rule as follows:

"If a monk, having solicited materials himself, with no owner present, were to have a dwelling built for his own sake, he should have it built according to the prescribed measure. The prescribed measure for a dwelling is as follows: twelve Sugata-cubits in height on the inside and seven Sugata-cubits in width. That monk should bring along other monks to inspect the site. The monks who are brought should examine whether the site is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. If a monk, having solicited materials himself with no owner present, were to have a dwelling built for his own sake, yet fails to bring monks to inspect the site, or the monks who are brought are not shown the site, or the site is unsuitable, involves a dispute, or is unfit to build upon — if it exceeds the measure, it is an offence requiring forfeiture to the Saṅgha."

Now the word-by-word commentary:

"A monk" refers to the monk of this Dharma, that is, one who belongs to this teaching. "Having solicited himself" means begging that arises from one's own desire — from some people one solicits timber, from others grass, from others labour, from others the work of carpenters. "With no owner" means there is no owner who has appeared — neither a man, a woman, nor a person of indeterminate sex. "For his own sake" means dedicated to himself. "A dwelling" means any structure that can accommodate the four postures: walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. "Were to have built" means by himself or by another.

"He should have it built according to the prescribed measure. The prescribed measure for a dwelling is as follows: twelve Sugata-cubits in height on the inside and seven Sugata-cubits in width." Here, "Sugata" means the Teacher. His twelve cubits — those twelve Sugata-heights — each correspond to twenty-eight standard hand-spans of a standard cubit, so the inner height amounts to twenty-eight standard cubits. The seven Sugata-widths — those seven Sugata-widths — each correspond to eleven and a half standard hand-spans of a standard cubit, so the inner width amounts to eleven and a half standard cubits.

"That monk should bring along other monks to inspect the site." As for "to inspect the site," this means for the purpose of examining whether the ground is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. "That monk" means whichever monk it is. "Should bring along monks" means not that he need bring as many monks as could lay eyes on the site, but rather the monks who are present there. If there happen to be snakes, harmful animals, insects, or ants at that site, then since it is unsuitable it should not be indicated. If it appears suitable, one should then examine what lies nearby: if the site belongs to the king, or is a stūpa ground, or belongs to a householder, or belongs to non-Buddhist adherents, or is a rains-retreat dwelling of nuns, or has trees that would need to be cut down, then since it involves dispute it should not be indicated. If the site is suitable and free from dispute, one should then examine the surrounding area within a circumference of a fathom all around: if the site rests upon a riverbank, upon a well, upon a road, or upon a cliff or ravine, then since it is unfit to build upon it should not be indicated. If the site is suitable and perfect in every respect, then that monk should go to the assembly hall, prepare the seats, strike the gong, and summon the monks with the words of inquiry. When the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in concord, he should remove his sandals, arrange his upper robe over one shoulder, pay homage in order of seniority, and then sitting cross-legged to the side of the most senior monk, joining his palms, should speak these words:

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. I, the monk known as so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, have sought out a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon.

"I, the monk known as so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, having sought from the Saṅgha a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon, respectfully present this request. May the venerable, compassionate Saṅgha, out of compassion, please show me, the monk known as so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, a site that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon." This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

The other monks, however, should not simply follow that monk out of personal trust or confidence in him. Rather, either the entire Saṅgha should go to the site together, or monks appointed by the Saṅgha should be sent. These appointed monks should inspect the site with their own eyes. If the site harbors snakes, is a place of ill omen, frequented by beetles, or infested with ants, it is unsuitable and must not be indicated. If it is suitable, they must then examine the area immediately surrounding it. If the site rests upon land belonging to the king, upon land of a stūpa, upon land of a householder, upon land of non-Buddhists, upon the site of a nuns' rains-retreat dwelling, or upon land where trees that would need to be felled are standing, then it is a site in dispute and must not be indicated. If the site is suitable and free from dispute, they must then examine the perimeter, measuring approximately one armspan around its circumference. If the site rests upon a river or stream, upon a well, upon a road, or upon a ravine or gully, it may not be built upon and must not be indicated.

If the site is suitable and complete in every respect, the monks should then sit respectfully to one side, facing the elder, and speak these words: "Venerable elders, this site is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. Please now be aware that the time has come." After that, one monk should make the formal request and carry out the legal act.

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk, so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, has sought out a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. This monk, so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, requests of the Saṅgha that the site for a dwelling — suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon — be shown to him. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it pleases them, may the Saṅgha grant this. The Saṅgha shall show the monk so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon." This is the motion. The legal act is to be performed as follows:

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk, so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, has sought out a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. This monk, so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, requests of the Saṅgha that the site — suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon — be shown to him. On his behalf, the Saṅgha shall show the monk so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, the site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. Those venerable ones who consent to the Saṅgha's showing the monk so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon should remain silent. Those who do not consent should speak."

The Saṅgha has consented and approved: the Saṅgha has shown the monk so-and-so, apprentice of the elder, a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. Since no one has spoken, it is so held.

The Saṅgha has shown the monk so-and-so, apprentice of the elder — whatever his name — a site for a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, and fit to build upon. He may proceed to have the dwelling constructed and should have no regrets in this matter.

The phrase "and also by the escorting monks" means: also by whichever monks escorted him there.

The word "site" means: whatever site is intended for the construction of a dwelling.

The word "suitable" means: free from snake-haunted places, inauspicious places, and the like.

The phrase "free from dispute" means: free from hearths, places used for tanning, and the like.

The phrase "fit to build upon" means: that there are no faults anywhere within the surrounding area of one standard measure around that site.

The phrase "should be inspected" means: should be individually examined.

The phrase "if a monk considers the site unsuitable" means: that snake-haunted places, inauspicious places, and the like predominate there.

The phrase "or subject to dispute" means: that it contains a hearth, or a place for tanning, or that it is subject to dispute or contention.

The phrase "not fit to build upon" means: that there is no surrounding area of one standard measure around that site.

"I myself initiated this; it has no owner; may I have the dwelling built for my own sake — or else may I not bring monks along to inspect the site, or may I not show the site to the escorting monks."

The phrase "if it exceeds the measure" means: if one has the dwelling built so as to exceed the measure as prescribed.

The phrase "a saṅghāvaśeṣa (Skt. saṅghāvaśeṣa) offense" — this is as before; therefore it is said to be a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

Now, as to how transgressions come about: if a monk has a dwelling built and has it built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred. If he has it built on a site subject to dispute, a grave offense is incurred. If he has it built on a site not fit to build upon, a grave offense is incurred. If he has it built without having shown the site, a grave offense is incurred. If he has it built so as to exceed the measure, a grave offense is incurred. If he has it built in violation of all these conditions, it becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense.

If a monk goes to another monk and says: "Please allow me to have built for my own sake a dwelling that is suitable, free from dispute, fit to build upon, properly shown, and within the proper measure" — and that other monk, acting on his behalf, has it built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If he has it built on a site subject to dispute, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If he has it built on a site not fit to build upon, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If he has it built without having shown the site, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If he has it built so as to exceed the measure, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If he has it built in violation of all these conditions, a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work.

If that monk then goes to the other and says: "Well done! Excellently done! I instructed you in exactly this way" — and then that monk also offers him timber, grass, clay, or mud — and if that monk then has it built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred by both. If he has it built on a site subject to dispute, a grave offense is incurred by both. If he has it built on a site not fit to build upon, a grave offense is incurred by both. If he has it built without having shown the site, a grave offense is incurred by both. If he has it built so as to exceed the measure, a grave offense is incurred by both. If he has it built in violation of all these conditions, a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense is incurred by both.

If that monk then goes to the other and says: "It was not well done. It was very poorly done. I gave you no such instruction" — and that monk does not offer him timber, grass, clay, or mud — and if that monk then has it built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work.

If one causes it to be built so as to occasion dispute, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If one causes it to be built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If one causes it to be built without having shown the site, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If one causes it to be built so as to exceed the measure, a grave offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. If one causes it to be built in violation of all these conditions, a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense is incurred by the one who carries out the work. For those who obtain what has been built and make use of what has been built, there is no transgression. For one who repairs what is old, there is likewise no transgression. For a first offender, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, and for those afflicted by painful sensation, there is no transgression. This is the sixth saṅghāvaśeṣa concerning dwelling places, and it is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Kauśāmbī in the garden of Kubjā. The group of six were residing in temple buildings that others had caused to be built, and while they were staying in those places, they began to taunt Nandā and Upanandā, saying: "Look at these temple buildings — they are dilapidated ruins. They are cracked. Their boundaries are ruined. Their facades are ruined. They are like a widow's house." The monks then said to them: "Venerable ones, you are staying in temple buildings that others had built, for you are not even able to set one stone upon another, yet you taunt." When this was said, the group of six became swollen with pride and began to speak among themselves: "These black-bowled ones — Nandā and Upanandā — have said to us: 'You are staying in temple buildings that others had built, for you cannot even set one stone upon another, yet you taunt.' How utterly humiliating. Come away. Previously we caused no temple buildings whatsoever to be built — not one of any kind by these black-bowled ones. What sort of temple buildings shall we now cause to be built? If all of us devote ourselves to the work of our own hands, these black-bowled ones will constantly seek occasion against us, and they will find the occasion to say that all the group of six have taken to working with their own hands, and they will also go to the households where we beg alms and, pointing out our faults and failings, turn those households against us. We must not fail to go to whichever one among us is skilled, whose conduct is clear, and who is able to thread a needle through its eye, and encourage him. For that reason, whichever one among us is skilled, whose conduct is clear, and who is able to thread a needle through its eye — the venerable Dundupa among us, who is skilled, whose conduct is clear, and who is able to thread a needle through its eye — let us go to him and encourage him." And so they went to Dundupa and said to him: "Venerable Dundupa, these black-bowled ones have so utterly humiliated us, saying: 'You are staying in temple buildings that others had built, for you cannot even set one stone upon another, yet you taunt.' And so we thought: these black-bowled ones have humiliated us by saying, 'You are staying in temple buildings that others had built, for you cannot even set one stone upon another, yet you taunt.' Come away. Previously we caused no temple buildings at all to be built — not one of any kind by these black-bowled ones. Now let us cause temple buildings of just such a kind to be built."

"If all of us were to devote ourselves to manual work, the black-bowled ones would constantly be looking for an occasion against us, and they would find occasion to say that all the members of the six groups have taken up manual work. And they would go to the houses from which we beg alms, fault us for being busy, and bring those householders to turn against us. But if we can manage to rouse enthusiasm in the one among us who is skilled, whose conduct is exemplary, and who is capable of threading a needle, then it need not fall apart. Therefore, the one among us who is skilled, whose conduct is exemplary, and who is capable of threading a needle — venerable Dundupa is skilled, his conduct is exemplary, he is capable of threading a needle — and so let us rouse enthusiasm in him, let us go to him. We shall rouse enthusiasm in the venerable one for the sake of the temple building, and we petition you: overwhelm the black-bowled ones with this very point."

Dundupa said: "It is a good plan. Do so, then." They were glad at heart and departed.

The venerable Dundupa then washed both feet outside the temple building, entered it, sat down, and turned his mind to this thought: by whatever means the Saṅgha's temple building might be accomplished. He began to reflect on who among people had true devotion. And he thought to himself: "For the time being, in this world together with its gods, it is the Blessed One who commands devotion. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Kauṇḍinya. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Mahākāśyapa. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Śāriputra. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Aniruddha. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Aśvajit. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Bhadrīka. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Vāṣpa. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Mahānāman. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Gavāṃpati. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Vimāla. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Gavampati. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Ānanda. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Sundarananda, the nephew of the Blessed One by his younger sister. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Rāhula, the son of the Blessed One. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Vīranandana. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Nandika. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Upānanda. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Śīghragāmin. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Carka. One great house has devotion toward the venerable Nābhasa. Since it is not possible to have any of these engaged in the work, there is in Kauśāmbī a brahmin who is wealthy, of great possessions, with extensive property, expansive and broad — yet he is miserly and narrow-eyed, one who will not even give a scrap of food to a crow, and who holds tightly to all his goods. Yet he has much wealth and gold, and if one could get him to participate, the Saṅgha's temple building would be accomplished." Having entered upon that thought, he spent the night in great effort, and in the early morning he put on his lower robe, took his bowl and outer robe, and went into Kauśāmbī for alms. He passed through two or three houses collecting alms, took a small amount of flour, and started to enter that brahmin's house, when the doorman stopped him, saying: "Noble one, wait. Do not enter."

He then said:

"Good sir, the Blessed One taught five kinds of places that are not proper domains for us. They are: the dwelling of musicians, the dwelling of a woman of loose conduct, the dwelling of a liquor-seller, the dwelling of an outcaste, and a royal palace. Now, is this house the dwelling of a musician? Or is it the dwelling of a woman of loose conduct? Or a liquor-seller's dwelling? Or an outcaste's dwelling? Or a royal palace? Why then do you stop me?" The doorman replied: "Noble one, you may well take offense at many things, but this is not the dwelling of a musician, nor the dwelling of a woman of loose conduct, nor a liquor-seller's dwelling, nor an outcaste's dwelling, nor a royal palace. Rather, this is the house of a certain great brahmin." The venerable Udāyin thought: "Where there is not even a chance of a brief encounter, what else can there be?" He remained thus, stopped at the gate, his mind turned inward in reflection.

While he was sitting there, the son of the householder was born, and to mark the occasion, twelve assembled companies entered in festivity, with dance, song, and instrumental music. The doorman, occupied with attending to them and not looking toward the gate, gave the venerable Udāyin the opportunity to enter. He went in, and began to purify the ground of those free from attachment by conducting himself according to his way of practice. The brahmin, seeing him, said: "Venerable Udāyin, welcome! Please be seated on this cushion." Udāyin sat, but found no opening for meaningful conversation. So the venerable Udāyin said: "Brahmin, I have obtained a small amount of alms-flour. Please have it sieved and give it here." The brahmin instructed his daughter: "Daughter, gather the noble one's alms-flour and present it." When the daughter began to sieve it, the venerable Udāyin started to examine the flour. The brahmin said: "Noble one, what are you looking at?" "Living creatures." "If there are any, what should be done?" "Do not eat them." "If they were consumed, what fault would there be?" "Brahmin, the Blessed One has taught that one who thoroughly takes up, practices, and repeatedly commits the killing of living beings will, when this body breaks up and death comes, be reborn in a state of woe, an evil destiny, a fallen state, in the hells. And even if one were to come back among human beings in such a form, one's life would be short." And so forth — he went on to teach at length the paths of karma of the ten non-virtues and the ten virtues. The brahmin became filled with confident faith, and himself prepared food and pure drink, filled a vessel with what was wholesome, and said: "Noble one, out of kindness, please accept this." The venerable Udāyin thought: "If I accept it, it will be like cooking in a wooden vessel — what began as my first visit will end up as my last." He then said: "Brahmin, I have obtained just this small amount of alms-flour — I shall enjoy it entirely myself. As for accepting a gift given with faith, how could one rightly throw that away?" The brahmin said: "Noble one, the custom among us brahmins is this: if one obtains something inferior and then obtains something superior, one sets aside the inferior and thoroughly enjoys the superior. What fault is there in that for you all?" "Brahmin, we have properly undertaken the rules of training. You brahmins have not properly undertaken the rules of training, and so you brahmins do as you please. As for us, the Blessed One has proclaimed four noble lineages for us. What are the four? The noble lineage of being content with whatever robe one has; the noble lineage of being content with whatever alms-food one obtains; the noble lineage of being content with whatever dwelling and bedding one has; and the noble lineage of delight in relinquishment and delight in cultivation." The brahmin became greatly filled with confident faith, and said:

"Noble one, please come to this household at any time. Brahmin, this gatekeeper of yours is like the rod of Yama, the Lord of Death — do not let anyone in. Give him proper instructions, and then he will not obstruct me."

The brahmin called the gatekeeper and gave him proper instructions: "Head of household, this house belongs to the noble Dundupa. Do not obstruct him." He also gave instructions to the household members: "You must not be disrespectful toward the noble Dundupa."

The venerable Dundupa thought to himself: "This brahmin has indeed become filled with confident faith, yet if those with black begging bowls should enter here, that would inevitably cause disturbance. I should devise a skillful means." So Dundupa said to the gatekeeper: "Head of household, did you see how that brahmin came to have confident faith in me? You have seen it, noble one. Let only me enter here, and do not allow anyone with a black begging bowl to come in. If you allow anyone with a black begging bowl to enter, I will see to it that a great punishment befalls you. Noble one, please come and go with complete ease. As for yourself, even if you were to forget this for a time and another with a black begging bowl were to enter, what would that matter?"

The venerable Dundupa departed with a glad mind, and from then on he went to that brahmin's house regularly. When the brahmin likewise kept offering again and again, the venerable Dundupa would not accept his offerings but merely taught and retaught the Dharma of generosity and then departed.

Some time later, the venerable Dundupa spoke in praise of the seven bases of meritorious action arising from material gifts to that brahmin, and explained them extensively and well. The brahmin said: "Noble one, I too would perform some of the bases of meritorious action arising from material gifts." "Brahmin, do so." "Noble one, what should I do?" "Let a hall be built for the Saṅgha." The brahmin thought: "I have offered the noble Dundupa gifts in many forms, and he has accepted them but few times. Yet even that which he has accepted has been for the sake of the Saṅgha." Marveling at this, he said: "Noble one, I do have kārṣāpaṇas, yet the land is under the king's control, and there is no vacant plot where a hall for the Saṅgha could be built." "Brahmin, take heart in this small matter — I will obtain land from the king." "Noble one, if that is so, excellent!"

The venerable Dundupa thought: "How should I proceed — should I approach the king directly, or rather approach the ministers?" Then he reflected: "Some say that one should rely not on those on whom one merely relies but on those on whom one truly ought to rely." And so he began to approach the ministers, and after cultivating them for some time, the ministers asked: "Noble one, what is your wish?" Dundupa replied: "Good sirs, a brahmin has undertaken to build a hall for the Saṅgha, yet since the land is under the king's control and there is no site where the hall may be constructed, I wish to have this matter of the land brought before the king's ear — would you assist with this?" "Noble one, when the king is seated with a small retinue in a quiet place, we will inform you — watch for that time."

When, some time later, the king was seated with a small retinue in a quiet place, those ministers sent a great messenger to the venerable Dundupa, saying: "Noble one, the king is seated with a small retinue in a quiet place — come now!"

Dundupa arrived, greeted the king with "Arogyā," and sat to one side. The ministers then addressed the king: "Sire, this is the noble Dundupa — one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the three scriptural collections, who teaches the Dharma, and who is endowed with the eloquence of reasoning and liberation." The king said: "It is good that the noble one has come. For what purpose have you come?" Dundupa replied: "Sire, a brahmin has been given leave to build a hall for the Saṅgha, yet since the land is under the king's authority and there is no suitable site, it is fitting that Your Majesty grant a site. Noble one, save for the royal palace alone, wherever you please, grant leave to build the hall there." The venerable Dundupa said "Arogyā" to the king, and, his heart at ease, he departed from the royal palace and went to the dwelling of the six monks. There he said to them: "Friends, a certain distinguished brahmin benefactor has been commissioned to build a hall for the Saṅgha, and when I petitioned the king for a site, the king said: 'Noble one, save for the royal palace alone, wherever you wish, build the hall there.' So measure out the land."

They all assembled and went before that brahmin and said: "Brahmin, the king has authorized us, saying: 'Save for the royal palace alone, wherever you wish, build the hall there.' So bring the kārṣāpaṇas and proceed with the construction of the hall." The brahmin gave the six monks the kārṣāpaṇas, and they, having received the coins, began to deliberate among themselves, discussing in which direction the hall should be built.

Between Kauśāmbī and the pleasure grove of Ghāṃśakā there stood a beautiful shade tree. Beside that tree there was a brahmin accompanied by a very large retinue, having five hundred brahmin boys recite brahminic sacred texts. Those five hundred brahmin boys, whenever the six monks set out or returned from their alms round, would repeatedly call out: "Ho, six monks — did you get excellent alms food? Did you get alms food at all from the first house? Were your bowls full?" Because of this, the six monks thought to themselves: "Those five hundred brahmin students of that brahmin are always harassing us with their cries of 'Ho, six monks — did you get excellent alms food? Did you get alms food at all from the first house? Were your bowls full?' We must make them unhappy. If we have that beautiful shade tree cut down and build the hall in that spot, then they will never again pester us repeatedly in this way." Having thus resolved, they took the kārṣāpaṇas, went to the carpenters' market, and said to the skilled workers: "Work on the hall for these wages." And those workers were engaged.

The six monks gave those hired workers oil for their bodies and oil for their heads. Pleased, the workers said: "Noble ones, proceed — let the work orders reach us." The six monks said: "The work will indeed get done — stay for now." Having held them back for a while, when the sun had set those workers said: "Noble ones, we will return tomorrow — please give us today's wages." The six monks said: "You have done a great deal of work, so shall we give those wages then?" The workers replied: "Noble ones, of what you instructed us to do, we have not done it yet — skilled workers take up axes, adzes, and chisels, and set out to do the work." The hired workers, together with the six monks, took up axes, adzes, and chisels, and when they were out of sight they went to that beautiful shade tree. And the six monks said:

"Friends, cut down this monastery shade tree!" But those workers said: "Noble ones, this is the monastery shade tree — do we have two heads, that we would cut it down? We will not cut it down." The poor men said: "The land is under the king's authority, and he has given his solemn word to us that, excepting only the royal palace, wherever we wish we may build a temple. So who would cut off your head? Cut it down without fear or worry." They cut down that monastery shade tree, pulled out all the wood from the roots, and leveled that plot of ground in such a way that no one could tell where the monastery shade tree had stood. The six monks then began to survey the site with their eyes, saying: "Dear Nanda, Upananda — on this side let us build the Blessed One's bathroom; on this side let us build a gatehouse; on this side let us build a kitchen; on this side let us build a storeroom; on this side let us build a dwelling for the attendants." Having marked it all out, they left.

Now the practice of those brahmin boys was to take turns going each day to the foot of that monastery shade tree to make offerings: they would bow down, walk around it, and smear it with an ointment of cow dung mixed with ghee. One time it was a particular brahmin boy's turn, and he rose early in the morning and went there. Not finding the monastery shade tree, he came to the preceptor and said: "Preceptor, that monastery shade tree is gone." The brahmin said: "Alas, brahmin boy, did you not go the wrong way? In the night, where did that tree go?" Another brahmin boy who was with him broke into laughter and said: "Preceptor, this brahmin boy was out last night searching for fallen fruit, and that is why he did not see it." The brahmin then sent another more senior brahmin boy, and he likewise did not find it, and coming back he said: "Preceptor, it is so — that monastery shade tree is simply gone." Then they all gathered and went there, and finding that it was indeed so, one mindful brahmin boy among them said: "In this direction the preceptor used to recite his sacred formulas. In this direction I used to perform my own practice — how has this fault come about and what has happened? I do not understand." While they were standing there turning this over in their minds, a man came and said: "Brahmin, why do you and your retinue stand there, lost in thought? My friend, I do not know where in the night that shade tree that stood in this place has gone." The brahmin replied: "My friend, last night when my eyes stopped working in the dark, I saw the six monks right here, busy with axes, adzes, and chisels, together with some hired workers — could it not be that they cut it down?" The brahmin said: "My friend, yes, indeed that must be it." While they were standing there, having come to this understanding, the six monks arrived, and those monks said: "Brahmins, why do you stand there lost in thought? Noble ones, I do not know where in the night that monastery shade tree that stood in this place has gone." The six monks began to laugh, and the brahmin said: "Noble ones, did you not cut it down? You poor ones — you were always stationed near it, and you used to call out to us: 'Hey, six monks! Have you received the finest alms? Have you received alms at all? Is your bowl full?' That is why you should not be glad about this." And they derided them, saying: "That is the conduct of the monks, the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyans — it is mere talk; the conduct of brahmins — that too is mere talk; yet see, even the monastery shade tree has ended up being cut down."

They mocked them and spoke ill of them. The news passed from one to another, and the assembled people living in Kauśāmbī, as well as those who had come there from other regions, also heard of it; and they too, in the main roads, the market streets, the crossroads, and the three-way junctions, denounced, mocked, and spoke ill of them. Those among them who had no faith would not give alms even to those who had gone out on alms rounds. It was then that the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, given this occurrence, this occasion, and these circumstances, convened the community of monks — and so forth as before. He then declared: "My hearers are to train in the Vinaya, and the rule is to be recited as follows.

If a monk, in order to have a great monastery built for the Saṅgha by a donor who has a proprietor — whether male, female, or of indeterminate sex — wishes to inspect a site, then that monk is to invite other monks along. The monks who are brought along are to examine whether the site is suitable, free from dispute, and fit for construction.

If the monk either intends to have a great monastery built for the Saṅgha by such a donor without the site being suitable, or while it is disputed, or while it is unfit for construction — or if he does not bring monks along to inspect the site, or does not show the site to the monks who have been brought — that is an offense involving the remainder of the Saṅgha.

'A monk' means one of the six monks or, further, any follower of this Dharma. 'A donor who has a proprietor' means someone for whom a proprietor has arisen — whether male, female, or of indeterminate sex. 'For the Saṅgha' means for the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. 'A monastery' is a place in which the four modes of deportment — walking, standing, sitting, and lying down — can be accommodated. 'Great' has two meanings: greatness in terms of what is to be given, and greatness in terms of measure. Here it is the greatness of what is to be given that is intended, not greatness of measure. 'To have it built' means by oneself or by another. As for the clause 'in order to inspect the site, that monk is to bring monks along,' the phrase 'in order to inspect the site' means in order to examine whether the ground itself is suitable, free from dispute, and fit for construction. 'That monk' means whichever monk it may be. 'Is to invite monks along' means the monks who are present at that place; it does not mean that however many monks it would take for the site to be fully seen by all of their eyes are to be brought along.

If in that place there is a serpent's den, a den of vicious creatures, a scorpion's nest, or an anthill, then it is not to be pointed out, because it would be unsuitable. If it is suitable, one should then examine the vicinity more closely. If the site borders on royal ground, a stūpa site, a householder's property, a non-Buddhist's property, nuns' rain-retreat quarters, or if there are trees that would need to be felled, then it is not to be pointed out, because it would be disputed.

If the site is suitable and free from dispute, one should then examine the surrounding space — an area of how many fathoms encompassing it on all sides. If the ground of the site rests against a river, a well, a road, or a ravine, then it is not to be pointed out, because it would be unfit for construction.

If the site is suitable and complete in every respect, then that monk should go to the monastery, arrange the seats, strike the wooden gong, and summon the monks with words of inquiry. Once the entire Saṅgha is gathered and in harmony, he should remove his sandals, arrange his upper robe over one shoulder, bow in order of seniority, then sit in a squatting posture off to the side near the most senior monk, join his palms together, and speak as follows.

May the venerable Saṅgha please give ear. I, the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, have sought a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. I, the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, request that the Saṅgha indicate to me a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. May the venerable and compassionate members of the Saṅgha, out of compassion, please grant to me, the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, the indication of a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction.

This is to be repeated a second and third time.

Those monks, however, should not go to the site out of personal faith in or partiality toward that monk. Rather, the entire Saṅgha should go there together, or the Saṅgha should send monks appointed by it. Those monks are to inspect the site with their own eyes. If there is found at that place a haunt of snakes, a haunt of malignant spirits, a haunt of crickets, or a haunt of ants, it is not to be pointed out, because it would be unfit. If it is suitable, then the immediate surroundings are to be carefully examined. If the site belongs to the king, to a stūpa, to a householder, or to a non-Buddhist adherent, or if it is a rains-retreat dwelling of nuns, or if there are trees that would need to be felled, it is not to be pointed out, because it would be a matter of dispute. If the site is suitable and free of dispute, then the surrounding perimeter of one bow-length on all sides is to be carefully examined. If the site there rests against a river, a well, a road, or a ravine, then it is not to be pointed out, because it would be unfit for construction.

If the site is suitable and complete in every respect, then those monks should sit respectfully off to the side near the most senior elder and speak as follows: "Venerables, this site is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. Please be aware that the time for it has now come."

After that, one monk is to make the motion and perform the formal act. May the venerable Saṅgha please give ear. The monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, has sought a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. The monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, requests that the Saṅgha indicate a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it consents, may the Saṅgha please grant permission, and may the Saṅgha indicate to the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. This is the motion.

The formal act is to be performed as follows. May the venerable Saṅgha please give ear. The monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, has sought a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. The monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, requests that the Saṅgha indicate a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. Therefore, the Saṅgha is to indicate to the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. Those venerable ones who consent to the Saṅgha's indication to the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, of a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction should remain silent. Those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha has consented and granted it. The Saṅgha has indicated to the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction has been granted. Since no one has spoken, it is held to be so.

The Saṅgha has given the indication to the monk so-and-so, son of so-and-so, of a site for a monastery that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction. He should proceed to build the monastery and should have no regret about this. As for the phrase "the monks who were brought along" — this refers to whatever monks were brought along to that place. The word "site" refers to whatever site is designated for the monastery. The word "suitable" means free from places inhabited by snakes, inauspicious places, and the like. The phrase "free of dispute" means free from hearths, uncovered latrines, and the like. The phrase "fit for construction" means that the perimeter of one bow-length surrounding it is free of faults. The phrase "should be inspected" means it should be examined individually.

The phrase "if the monk considers the site unsuitable" means that places infested with snakes, inauspicious places, and the like are predominant there. The phrase "or with dispute" means that there is a hearth, or an uncovered latrine, or dispute, or refuse. The phrase "unfit for construction" means that the surrounding perimeter of one bow-length is absent. If an owner causes a great monastery to be built for the Saṅgha, or if monks are not brought to inspect the site, or if the site is not shown to the monks who were brought along, that constitutes a Saṅgha-remainder offense — the earlier rule applies — and for this reason it was said to be a Saṅgha-remainder offense.

As for how a transgression arises in this matter: if a monk, in causing a monastery to be built for the Saṅgha, causes it to be built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense is incurred. If he causes it to be built on a site with dispute, a grave offense is incurred. If he causes it to be built on a site unfit for construction, a grave offense is incurred. If he causes it to be built without the indication having been given, a grave offense is incurred. If he causes it to be built in violation of all these conditions, it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense.

If a monk goes to another monk and says, "Let the indication be given of a site for a monastery for the Saṅgha that is suitable, free of dispute, and fit for construction," and if that monk then causes it to be built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense accrues to the one who actually does it. If he causes it to be built on a site with dispute, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built on a site unfit for construction, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built without the indication having been given, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built in violation of all these conditions, it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense for the one who does it.

Now if the one who was approached goes to the other and says, "Well done! Excellent! I give you this instruction," and that one then offers him wood, or grass, or dung, or clay, and then causes it to be built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense accrues to both of them. If he causes it to be built on a site with dispute, a grave offense accrues to both. If he causes it to be built on a site unfit for construction, a grave offense accrues to both. If he causes it to be built without the indication having been given, a grave offense accrues to both. If he causes it to be built in violation of all these conditions, it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense for both.

Now if the one who was approached goes to the other and says, "Not well done! Not at all well done! I gave you no such instruction," and that one does not offer him wood, or grass, or dung, or clay, yet still causes it to be built on an unsuitable site, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built on a site with dispute, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built on a site unfit for construction, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it.

If he causes it to be built without instruction, a grave offense accrues to the one who does it. If he causes it to be built in violation of all these conditions, it becomes a Saṅgha-remainder offense for the one who does it. If the cell was already built and he obtains it, or if he makes use of one already built, there is no transgression. There is also no transgression for repairing an old one. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations. The seventh Saṅgha-remainder rule concerning a dwelling-hall is thus complete.

The Vinaya-vibhaṅga, the nineteenth fascicle.

The blessed buddha Śākyamuni was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove of the Veṇuvana. At that time a wrongdoing arose. There was a man of the warrior class (kṣatriya), a man of great name, belonging to the warrior lineage, wealthy and possessed of many riches and great resources, whose domain of possession was vast and wide, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa and rivaling Vaiśravaṇa in riches, who was engaged in ruling a kingdom without a crown among the warriors. He had taken a wife of equal birth and lived with her in play, in joy, and in delightful enjoyment. Though they played together and rejoiced and lived in delight, they had no son and no daughter. Lacking a son and longing ardently for one, he made supplications to Śiva, to water deities, to spirits of ill form, to Śakra, to Brahmā, and to others of that kind; and also to various other classes of deity, such as the deities of pleasure parks, the deities of forests, the deities of crossroads, the deities of junctions, the deities who receive torma offerings, the deities born together with one, the deities of concordant disposition, and the deities who follow as attendants.

There is in the world a saying of this kind: "Sons and daughters are born from the cause of making supplications." But that is not so. If it were so, then each person who made such supplications would have a thousand sons, just like a wheel-turning king. Rather, sons and daughters are born when three conditions are simultaneously present. What are those three? The father and mother come together with desire; the mother's time has arrived and she is in her fertile season; and a gandharva (Skt. gandharva) is present nearby and ready to enter. When these three conditions are simultaneously present, sons and daughters are born.

Now while he was thus persisting in making his supplications, a being in its final existence, one who had lived the conduct of a final-existence being, who had grasped the essence of liberation, who was turned toward nirvāṇa, who was turned away from saṃsāra, who had no wish for death and transmigration or for rebirth in any of the destinies of existence, who held his last body — that being passed away from a fine divine realm and entered the womb of that householder's wife.

Some women who are skilled in the ways of women possess five qualities that are unmixed. What are those five? They know when a man has become attached and know when his attachment has passed; they know the right time and know their fertile season; they know when a being has entered the womb; they know from where the being that has entered the womb has come; and they know whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, it rests leaning to the right side of the flank, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning to the left side of the flank.

She, delighted and glad, spoke to the householder: "My lord's son, a being has entered into me — and since it rests here leaning to the right side of my flank, it will certainly be a boy. Please rejoice." He too, delighted and glad, straightened his upper body, stretched out his right hand, and spoke these words: "I shall now see the face of the son I have longed for these many years; one who is born in accord with me and not discordant with me; who performs my duties; who nurtures me in return for my having nurtured him; who enjoys his rightful share; and who causes my lineage to continue for a long time, and who, when we have died and our time has come, will give gifts great or small and make merit on our behalf, and who will follow after us wherever those two have been reborn" — thus he deliberately uttered that earnest declaration.

When they knew that a sentient being had entered her, they arranged for her care in the following manner, in order to bring to full maturation what was dwelling in the womb: in the upper chambers of the mansion, when it was cold, they provided cooling things, and when it was warm, they provided warming things; and they provided food prepared by a physician — not too bitter, not too sour, not too salty, not too sweet, not too hot, not too sharp, and free from bitterness, sourness, saltiness, sweetness, heat, and sharpness. And her body, adorned with necklaces and ornaments, was like that of a divine maiden moving at ease in a pleasure grove. She was carried from couch to couch, and from seat to seat, and was not set down on the bare ground, lest she hear even the slightest unpleasant sound. Thus they attended to her without any harm.

When eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth, and there came forth a boy handsome in form, lovely to behold, beautiful, radiant, of a color resembling gold, with a head like a canopy, long arms, broad shoulders at the collarbone, curved eyebrows, and a high-bridged nose.

His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — three groups of seven — they celebrated the birth feast on a grand scale, and they proceeded to give the boy a name, asking what name he should be given. Since his deportment — so long as he had not been taken down from the great bed he would not defecate or urinate — and since in the central lands, deportment in which the practice of the wise is manifest is called "like a jewel," the relatives said: "Friends, this boy belongs to the great warrior clan and is also the son of a noble family. Since he does not defecate or urinate so long as he has not been taken down from the great bed, and since, with the practice of the wise being manifest, he is also like a jewel — let the boy's name therefore be Warrior-Son Jewel." And so his name was fixed as Warrior-Son Jewel.

On the very same day that Warrior-Son Jewel was born, five hundred ministers also had sons born to them, and those sons too were given names suited to their households, and they were made into the companions of Warrior-Son Jewel.

The boy Warrior-Son Jewel was entrusted to eight nurses: two nurses who would carry him at the hip and sustain him, two nurses who would suckle him, two nurses who would wipe away his impurities, and two nurses who would play with him. These eight nurses nourished and raised him with milk, curd, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and other principal provisions of various kinds, and they caused him to grow swiftly, like a lotus dwelling in a pond.

While he was sitting in the lap of his nurse, a brahmin physiognomist saw him and examined him very carefully. The physiognomist thought to himself: "This boy is a field of merit for two-footed beings. For those who make offerings to him, those very acts of offering will bring exceedingly great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great breadth." The brahmin physiognomist then said to the nurse: "Give this boy to me for just a moment, so that I may make offerings to him." The nurse replied:

"Brahmin, it is not within my power to give this boy away. If you want the boy, go and make your request to the military commander."

The brahmin then went before the great warrior's encampment, and after first offering words of good omen, he spoke: "Military commander, this boy of yours is a field of merit for two-footed beings. For those who make offerings to him, those very acts of offering will bring exceedingly great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great breadth. Therefore, give this boy to me for just a moment, so that I may make offerings to him."

The military commander said: "Brahmin, if that is so, then take him and welcome."

The brahmin, filled with delight of mind, took the boy to his own home. He went to his wife and spoke of the boy's qualities: "Good woman, know this: this boy is a field of merit for two-footed beings. For those who make offerings to him, those very acts of offering will bring exceedingly great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great breadth. Therefore make offerings to him."

She heard him praise the boy's qualities, and a sense of joy arose in her. She said: "Brahmin, if that is so, wait a moment while I make the house ready and put everything in proper order." She had the house plastered and swept, then invited those dear and close to her heart from among her kinfolk and connections, and after that she bathed the boy with great honor, adorned him with incense and flowers, and anointed him well with honey and milk. Thus adorned and surrounded by his relatives, she brought him back to her own home.

When he had grown to maturity, he entered into the study of letters, numbers, arithmetic, finger-reckoning, casting up, entering, and setting down accounts. He brought his learning in letters to its completion, together with eight forms of expertise — skill in reading, in decipherment, in fluency of application, and in clarity of usage — as well as the eight sciences of assessment: the assessment of precious gems, of land, of cloth, of timber, of elephants, of horses, of women, and of men.

He was consecrated from the crown of the head in the manner of royal warriors, a lord of the realm who had attained power and diligence, who had prevailed over and established dominion over the maṇḍala of the great earth.

And among the various crafts and occupational stations belonging to those who dwell in such a position, he became thoroughly trained in these: riding on the neck of an elephant, riding a horse, the methods of the chariot, the methods of the sword, the spear, pushing back and pushing forward, the technique of guiding with a hook, the casting of a lasso, the methods of firing a great bow, the posture of holding, the posture of training, the topknot strike, cutting, cleaving, striking to pierce — and also in these five modes of hitting a mark: hitting from a distance, hitting so as to make a sound, hitting a vital point, hitting without missing, and hitting with great force. He became trained and expert in all of these.

Those five hundred sons of ministers likewise became fully trained in the crafts and occupational stations.

His father established the three retinues of his wives — superior, middling, and lesser — in their proper order. He set them to occupy three residences: winter quarters, spring quarters, and summer quarters. He placed them in three pleasure gardens: those for winter, those for spring, and those for summer. There, within the enclosure of the fine upper palace chambers, in the absence of men, they played with musical instruments, took delight, and passed their time in pleasure and enjoyment.

Those five hundred companions likewise came to him at all three times of day, and together with him they played all manner of games, sharing in the joy of close companionship.

Then it came to pass that on a certain occasion the five hundred young men rose early in the morning and set out to drive wild game. But that day they did not find so much as a single animal. They thought to themselves: "Today we have not found even one animal — how then can we return home empty-handed? Let us stay here this very night, drive the game tomorrow, and then go home." And so they camped there that evening, and the following morning drove the animals, and then departed for their own homes as night fell and their eyes could no longer see the way.

Among themselves they thought: "Tonight I shall sleep, and tomorrow we go again like the young man." So when night brightened into dawn, and it came to the third day, the young man's attendant went to look after his master. The young man said to him: "Wise ones, you are born as my companions and playmates on the same ground — why have you not come to me all this while, arriving only today, the third day?" The young man replied: "We went off to drive wild game, and for that reason we did not come." "And what did you do there?" "Young man, we killed animals." "And what do those animals eat and drink?" "Young man, they feed on what they find, and drink whatever water they find."

"Wise ones, if that is how it is — what harm have those animals done to you, that you kill them?" "Young man, that brings us sheer delight." "Wise ones, that is not good delight. Delight obtained by harming others — abandon that."

The five hundred young men stood silent and said nothing. They left the royal palace and spoke among themselves: "Wise ones, this young man has no wish to abandon his wives' retinue and go away, and so he rebukes us for this. Therefore we must by some means make it known to the military commander, and by such a stratagem bring it about that he too will go to drive wild game — for then he will come along with us." Having made this plan, they went before the military commander, bowed at his feet, and said: "Commander, those young men who are born in the shade are surely ones who will be overpowered by the kings under the sun. Why then does the young man keep us in the shade and not send us to drive wild game with him? If we accompany him, we will be fierce and skilled, and the kings under the sun will not be able to overpower us." "Wise ones, if that is so, let the young man go now."

The commander summoned the young man and said: "Young man, your companions are going to drive wild game — go with them." "Father, if we do not harm the lives of others, why should I go with them?" "Young man, we of the warrior caste live by the sword. This is the way of the warrior caste and does not conflict with it — go." Since the young man was respectful and obedient to his father, he agreed, and the following day he went with them to drive wild game.

And the five hundred young men then began to deliberate among themselves: "Wise ones, this young man will pass the present commander and himself become commander. If we cultivate his friendship at this time, it will bear fruit. Let us now cultivate his friendship." And so with one mind they addressed him thus.

"Young man, you stay right here, and we shall arrange things so that the wild game comes to you alone, no matter what. Then you will be able to take your fill of the game."

They stationed the young man in a fixed position, then drove a great multitude of wild animals from every direction, pressing them in so tightly that the creatures, overcome by the terror of death, came crashing and tumbling toward the young man, panting and lolling out their tongues. The young man, watching from a distance as the animals were brought to this state, reflected: "Who among men could harden his heart to cast away all compassion and set his mind in fierce hatred against these creatures — to the point of taking their lives? What need is there even to speak of it?" Understanding this, he began to look out in all four directions, and not far off he saw a man sitting there. To protect the man's safety he shot two or three arrows, sending them between the animals' ribs and between their legs, and then drove them away from below, sitting still where he was. At that the wild animals scattered and fled.

The sons of the ministers thought to themselves: "The young man is trained in the five arts, so he will certainly have slain many game. Let us go quickly." They hurried over — and saw that not a single animal had been killed. They thought: "The young man has surely scattered them ahead with chariots and elephants, just as was done before." So they said: "Young man, where have the animals gone?"

"Wise friends, where are the animals? What animals? Whose animals are they? They are wild animals — they cannot be recalled. Running as they do, with such behavior and such speed, in the process they nearly killed even me."

The man who had been sitting there spoke up. "Wise friends, by placing your love of Dharma to one side you are nowhere near killing any animals. If this man had been willing, not a single animal would have escaped." At this the others grew indignant and spoke in one voice: "Wise friends, it was through our own broken-bodied and exhausted efforts that we drove those animals right here, so that he could kill them — and he has let them all slip away. Let us leave this one behind and go, and kill him ourselves."

But then they reconsidered: "If he were killed, word would travel from one person to the next until the commander heard, and that would bring harm to us. We should not kill him. Let us simply abandon him right here and leave." And so they went without a backward glance at him.

The young man thought: "These men and I were born as childhood companions together in the same land, playing on the ground side by side — and for the sake of nothing more than some wild game they have deserted me, abandoned me alone in the wilderness, and gone. Moreover, when my father has passed and I become commander, I will inevitably have to commit many wrongs in my dealings with sentient beings." His heart felt hollow and aching, as though pierced by a thorn. He went home and sat with his cheek resting in his hand, lost in his own thoughts.

Just then the retinue of his wife came and he saw them, but he turned his senses away. They passed word from one to the next until it reached the commander: the young man was deep in thought, paying no attention even to his own wife's retinue, and had turned his senses away. This was reported to him.

When the commander heard this he too became uneasy. He went to the young man and said: "My son, young man — why are you sitting there with your cheek in your hand, lost in thought? Your father has appointed me over you differently, and now that you are a powerful hunter, with red hands — one who has taken up the chase and excelled at it —

"— those who seize the life of others, who lead others to the cutting of life, who make their living by the cutting of the life of others: if I were to commit myself firmly to that karma, how could I bear it in my heart and not be overcome? My son, young man, if that is how it is for you, then sit comfortably, let go of your brooding, and do not go on as before."

Thereupon the young man, arising with certainty from the disquiet of mind that had been born from causing harm to sentient beings, became joyful, and thinking, "What is virtue?" he began to seek the joy of renunciation.

At that time, Pūraṇa and the other six teachers — all of them without omniscience, yet publicly claiming omniscience with arrogant pride — were nearby, and whenever wrongdoing arose they would resort to it and abide in it.

Then the young warrior Dhanaśreṣṭhi, without looking back at his father's retinue or his wife's retinue, went to where Kāśyapa Pūraṇa was and, having arrived, spoke these words to him:

"Learned one, what is your way of Dharma? What is the instruction you give to your disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life, and what are its benefits?"

Pūraṇa replied:

"Young man, my view is this, and this is what I teach: There is no giving. There is no sacrificial offering. There is no fire-oblation. There is no good conduct and no bad conduct. There is no fruit, no karmic maturation of deeds done well or done ill. There is no this world and no world beyond. There is no mother and no father. There are no beings born by spontaneous generation. In the world there exist no arhats who have rightly understood, who have rightly accomplished, who in this very life have directly known both this world and the world beyond through their own direct knowledge and proclaimed: 'Birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, the task is done, and we know of no further existence' — none who make that declaration exist. The life principle lives here and then is afterwards cut off, it is destroyed, and after death it does not appear again. The body of a person arises from the four great elements, and when the moment of death comes, the earth part of the body dissolves back into earth, the water part into water, the fire part into fire, and the wind part into wind. The sense faculties pass away following space. The corpse of the person is carried by four or five men to the charnel ground, where it is cremated and thereafter becomes invisible. What is burned becomes ash. The bones remain, the colour of a dove. Thus what is taught by a fool, give away; what is taught by the wise, take in. All those who assert the existence of anything whatsoever are speakers of empty, hollow falsehood. In this way both the fool and the wise man are afterwards cut off, destroyed, and do not appear again after death."

Then the warrior Dhanaśreṣṭhi thought to himself: "This teacher Pūraṇa has entered a wrong path. He is one who accomplishes an evil path well — a path filled with danger, one that the wise should abandon just as it is." Having understood this, he spoke in verse:

One who teaches the wrongly-minded wrong,
who is renowned as teacher of the low —
one whose Dharma is of such a kind,
what could that one's Dharma be at all?

Having said this, he left, as though striking an empty vessel.

Then the warrior Dhanaśreṣṭhi went to where Gosāla Maskarin was and, having arrived, spoke these words to him:

"Learned one, what is your way of Dharma? What is the instruction you give to your disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life, what is the benefit?" Gosāla Maskarin replied: "Young man, I hold this view and speak thus: there is no cause, no condition for the defilement of sentient beings. Sentient beings become defiled without cause, without condition. There is no cause, no condition for the purification of sentient beings. Sentient beings become purified without cause, without condition. There is no cause, no condition for sentient beings coming to lack knowledge and vision. Sentient beings come to lack knowledge and vision without cause, without condition.

There is no cause, no condition for sentient beings coming to have knowledge and vision. Sentient beings come to have knowledge and vision without cause, without condition. There is no strength, no diligence, no strength and diligence combined. There is no personal power, no overcoming of what lies beyond, no personal power and overcoming of what lies beyond combined. There is no power of self, no power of others, no power of self and others combined. All sentient beings, all living creatures, all beings have no might, no strength, no agency, no diligence, no overcoming of what lies beyond. The existences that connect to the various destinies are fixed and certain. Thus, among the six destinies, pleasure and suffering are experienced severally."

Then the warrior Dhanaśreṣṭhi thought to himself: "This teacher too, though learned, has entered a wrong path — one who perfects a bad path, a path filled with danger, which is precisely the kind that the wise should abandon." Having understood this, he spoke in verse:

One who teaches the wrongly-minded wrong,
who is renowned as teacher of the low —
one whose Dharma is of such a kind,
what could that one's Dharma be at all?

Having said this, he left, as though striking an empty vessel.

Then the warrior Dhanaśreṣṭhi went to where Saṃjaya Vairāṭīputra was, and having arrived, spoke these words to Saṃjaya Vairāṭīputra: "Learned one, what is your way of Dharma? What is the instruction you give to your disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life, and what is the benefit?"

Saṃjaya Vairāṭīputra replied: "Young man, I hold this view and speak thus: one who acts and one who causes others to act; one who cuts and one who causes others to cut; one who burns and one who causes others to burn; one who strikes and one who causes others to strike; one who harms living creatures; one who takes what is not given; one who engages in sexual misconduct; one who knowingly speaks falsehood; one who drinks intoxicating beverages; one who breaks into houses; one who unties knots; one who seizes by force; one who stands in the road and blocks it; one who destroys villages; one who destroys towns; one who destroys whole districts — even if one were to take all the sentient beings on this great earth and cut them, hack them, beat them, and tear them apart with a wheel whose rim is fitted with razor blades, making every one of those sentient beings cut up, sliced through, beaten, and torn, reducing them into one great plain of flesh, one great thicket of flesh, one great heap of flesh, one great mound of flesh — having made them into one great plain of flesh, one great thicket of flesh, one great heap of flesh, one great mound of flesh — in doing all this, there would be no evil arising from that basis, no evil that could arise from that basis. Were one to go about the south bank of the river Gaṅgā cutting, hacking, beating, and tearing apart, and were one then to go to the north bank of the Gaṅgā and give generously and perform offerings and sacrifices — from that basis too there would be no evil and no merit, no evil or merit arising from that basis whatsoever. Through generosity, through restraint, through perfect moral discipline, through acting for the benefit of others, through harmonious conduct — even doing all these things produces no merit whatsoever.

Then the youth Nor thought to himself: This Teacher, learned though he claims to be, has entered upon a wrong path, a bad path, and is perfectly pursuing it — a path filled with danger, the kind that the wise must abandon, just as it truly is. Having understood this, he spoke these verses:

One who teaches with a corrupt and inverted mind, who is known as a teacher of what is inferior — if this is the nature of someone's Dharma, what could be unlike Dharma, if not this?

Having said this, he struck his hand against his palm as if striking an empty vessel, and departed.

Then the youth Nor went to where the one with braided hair called Ajita was, and having arrived, he said this to the one with braided hair called Ajita: Learned one, what is the manner of your Dharma? What is the instruction you give to your disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life? What are its benefits?

Ajita replied: Young man, I hold the following view and speak as follows. These seven bodies are unmade, not made by what is made, uncreated, not created by what is created, incapable of being harmed, permanent, abiding like pillars. What seven? These: the body of earth, the body of water, the body of fire, the body of wind, pleasure, pain, and the living vital force — that is the seventh. These seven bodies are unmade, not made by what is made, uncreated, not created by what is created, incapable of being harmed, permanent, abiding like pillars. They do not move, do not undergo transformation, do not harm one another — whether for the sake of becoming merit, or becoming demerit, or becoming both merit and demerit, or becoming happiness, or becoming suffering, or becoming both happiness and suffering. When a person cuts off another person's head, he causes not even the slightest disturbance or harm to anything standing or abiding in the world, for the sword passes through the gaps between the seven bodies without impediment, and there is no harm done to the life therein. In that act there is no one who kills or causes killing, no one who urges or causes urging, no one who intends harm or causes another to intend harm, no one who makes known or causes another to make known anything whatsoever.

Whether foolish or wise, those beings who exist pass through eighty-four principal states of birth, sixty-six thousand and six hundred great conceptual states, five actions, three actions, two actions, one action, half an action, sixty-two actions, sixty-two intermediate conceptual states, one hundred and twenty hell realms, one hundred and twenty sense faculties, sixty-two elemental dust-particles, forty-nine thousand classes of nāgas, forty-nine thousand classes of garuḍas, forty-nine thousand classes of wanderers, forty-nine thousand classes of sustaining forces, forty-nine thousand classes of the naked ones, seven abodes of conscious beings, seven abodes of non-conscious beings, seven abodes of the naked ones, seven asuras, seven flesh-eaters, seven gods, seven humans, seven great oceans, seven hundred oceans, seven great dreams, seven hundred dreams, seven great decreases, seven hundred decreases, seven great increases, seven hundred increases, seven great awakenings, seven hundred awakenings — seven great precipices, seven hundred precipices, seven noble lineages, ten states of clear distinction, and those eight grounds of a great being — through all of these one wanders in cyclic existence, bound by eighty-four thousand great eons, and thereby brings suffering to an end. It is just as when a ball of thread thrown from the sky above a haystack unravels and falls to the ground: even so, whether one is foolish or wise, one wanders through these for eighty-four thousand great eons and thereby brings suffering to an end.

In all of this, there is no monk or brahmin who can rightly say: "By my moral discipline, my vows, my austerities, or my life of celibacy, I shall ripen karma that is not yet ripe, and having brought already-ripened karma to fruition through direct contact, I shall thereby purify it." Pleasure and pain are fixed. There is no rising higher or falling lower — such a thing is impossible. The measure of cyclic existence is reckoned by this very nature alone, and by nothing other than it.

Then the youth Nor thought to himself: This teacher Śeṣalin has also entered upon a wrong path. He is one who skillfully pursues a bad path — a fearful path — of the kind that the wise must abandon, exactly as it truly is. And having understood this, he spoke a verse:

One who teaches with a corrupt and perverted mind, who is renowned for teaching what is base —
if his Dharma is of such a kind, what could his non-Dharma possibly resemble?

Having said this, he struck him as one would strike an empty vessel, and departed.

Then the youth Nor went to where Kātyāyana Nogcanga was, and when he arrived he spoke to Kātyāyana Nogcanga as follows: "Venerable one, what is your manner of Dharma? What is the instruction you give to disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life? What are its benefits?"

Nogcanga replied: "Young man, I hold this view and speak as follows. If anyone should come to me and ask: 'Does the other world exist?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world exists.' If anyone should ask: 'Does the other world not exist?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world does not exist.' If anyone should ask: 'Does the other world both exist and not exist?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world both exists and does not exist.' If anyone should ask: 'Does the other world neither exist nor not exist?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world neither exists nor does not exist.'

"Likewise, if anyone should come to me and ask: 'Is the other world of this very nature, or not of this very nature?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world is of this nature and not of this nature.' If anyone should ask: 'Is the other world otherwise, or not otherwise?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world is otherwise and not otherwise.' If anyone should ask: 'Is the other world not-otherwise, or not not-otherwise?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world is not-otherwise and not not-otherwise.' If anyone should ask: 'Is the other world of that very nature, or not of that very nature?' — to that I give a categorical answer: 'The other world is of that very nature and not of that very nature.'"

Then the youth Nor thought to himself: This teacher Nogcanga has also entered upon a wrong path. He is one who skillfully pursues a bad path — a path that is dangerous and fearsome, just as it should be abandoned by the wise. Knowing this, the youth Nor spoke these verses:

One who teaches with inferior understanding, teaching wrongly,
renowned for teaching what is base —
if one's Dharma is of such a kind,
what could count as not-Dharma?

Having spoken thus, he struck the ground like an empty vessel and departed.

Then the youth Nor went to where the naked ascetic Genyikyi Bu Gerbu (Ājīvika) was, and arriving there, spoke to the naked ascetic Genyikyi Bu Gerbu as follows: "Wise one, what is your way of Dharma? What instruction do you give your disciples? What is the fruit of the holy life? What is its benefit?"

The naked ascetic replied: "Young man, I hold this view and speak thus: whatever feeling a person or individual experiences, any of it whatsoever — all of it arises from causes previously made. Old karma is purified through ascetic practice, and new karma is to be turned back by abstaining from action. Thus, henceforth there will be no more outflows. When there are no more outflows, karma is exhausted. When karma is exhausted, suffering is exhausted. When suffering is exhausted, one arrives at the end of suffering."

Then the youth Nor thought to himself: This teacher, the so-called Wise One, has also entered upon a wrong path. He is one who skillfully pursues a bad path — a path that is dangerous and fearsome, just as it should be abandoned by the wise. Knowing this, he spoke these verses:

One who teaches with inferior understanding, teaching wrongly,
renowned for teaching what is base —
if one's Dharma is of such a kind,
what could count as not-Dharma?

Having spoken thus, he struck the ground like an empty vessel and departed.

Then the youth Nor went toward his own home, and arriving there, he leaned his arm against the base of the upper mansion, and stood absorbed in thought. He thought to himself: In all this world with its gods, its māras, and its Brahmā, among all the beings that include ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins, gods and humans — is there any ascetic or brahmin who could declare, in one word or two words or four words, a medicine, a mantra, or a knowledge-spell by which I might be perfectly freed from this desolate wilderness of saṃsāra?

Now at that very time, the buddha Blessed Ones possess not even the slightest degree of unknowing, unseeing, ignorance, or lack of discernment. Therefore the buddha Blessed Ones, endowed with great compassion, devoted to the welfare of the world, sole protectors, uniquely heroic, without a second, speaking no duality, entered into calm abiding and insight, who illuminate the three knowledges, well trained in the three trainings, skilled in the ground of the three bases of Vinaya, who have crossed the four rivers, well established in the ground of the practice of the four bases of miraculous power, who have for a long time thoroughly purified themselves in the four means of attraction, who are without the fear of being intimidated by the four fearlessnesses, who have abandoned the five limbs, who have thoroughly transcended the five destinies, who are endowed with the six limbs, who have perfectly completed the six perfections, who abide in the six constant abidings, who are rich with the flowers of the seven branches of awakening, who teach the eight branches of the path, who are skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions, who are endowed with the power of the ten powers, whose fame has spread throughout the ten directions, who are supremely exalted above those who hold sway over hundreds of thousands — the very nature of such beings is to survey the world three times by day and three times by night with the eye of a buddha, seeing who has declined, who has advanced, who has been harmed, who has become afflicted, who has become unhappy — who has been harmed, who has declined, who has become unhappy — who is inclining toward the lower realms, who is falling toward the lower realms, who has already fallen into the lower realms — these I shall lift from the path of the lower realms and establish in the higher states, in liberation, and in the fruit. Those who have sunk into the mire of desire I shall draw out by the hand. Those who are without the wealth of the noble ones I shall establish in the lordship of noble wealth. The worlds adorned by the arising of buddhas I shall cause to bear fruit. Those in whom the roots of virtue have not yet arisen I shall cause to arise. Those in whom the roots of virtue have arisen I shall cause to fully ripen. Those that are fully ripened I shall cause to be completely liberated. Thus did that knowledge and vision engage.

Then it was said in verse:

The venomous creature dwelling in the crocodile's lair may perhaps pass beyond its time — but the loving-kindness of the buddhas toward those they tame shall never pass beyond its time.

Just as a mother thinks only of her single beloved child and guards that child's very life, so too the Tathāgata thinks of those who are to be tamed and guards their very lives.

The compassion that dwells in the mindstream of the omniscient one is a mother who tirelessly seeks her calf among those to be tamed — toward those to be tamed who have fallen into ruin through saṃsāra and the lower realms, it is like the love of a mother cow for a calf utterly weakened and lost.

Thus when the Blessed One surveys the world with the eye of a buddha, he sees that the young man Norgye (the one called Gyad Bu Nor) — his mindstream now fully ripened, his former service to the previous buddhas made excellent — is, at this moment of ripening for taming, like fully ripened fruit that stands ready to be cut by a blade. Seeing this, the Blessed One reflects: "Is this one to be tamed by the Teacher himself, or by a śrāvaka?" He sees that it is to be by a śrāvaka. "Through which door will the taming proceed — through miraculous powers, or through conduct?" He sees that it is through conduct. For the Blessed One, in taming through conduct, sends the venerable Rataṭhula (the monk known as Ratathul) on his way, since it is through that conduct that the minds of gods and humans are to be drawn in.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Ratathul: "Ratathul, you should be mindful in the presence of Gyad Bu Nor." The venerable Ratathul, without a word, accepted the instruction of the Blessed One. Then the venerable Ratathul, wishing to go beyond what was asked in response to the Blessed One's command, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet in prostration, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

That same night having passed, in the early morning the venerable Ratathul put on his robe, took up his bowl and Dharma robe, and entered Rājagṛha for alms. Having gone through Rājagṛha on alms-round and completed the business of the meal, he returned from the alms-round for the midday meal.
Having set out his dwelling things for use in whatever way was fitting, he took up his bowl and Dharma robe, and set out walking in the direction of Gyad Bu Nor. Walking along gradually, he came to Gyad Bu Nor and found Gyad Bu Nor in a lotus grove.

Then the venerable Ratathul, in the early morning, having put on his robe and taken up his bowl and Dharma robe, walking forward and back, glancing slightly, looking carefully, drawing in and extending his limbs, his robe-cloth, his Dharma robe, and his bowl all held beautifully — entered Gyad Bu Nor for alms. At that time Gyad Bu Nor, being on the upper floor of his mansion, was looking out over the city in search of whatever virtue there might be to find; and Gyad Bu Nor saw the venerable Ratathul walking — — walking forward and back, glancing slightly, looking carefully, drawing in and extending his limbs, his robe-cloth, his Dharma robe, and his bowl all held beautifully — as he walked for alms through the city, Gyad Bu Nor saw him from a great distance.

Having seen him, Gyad Bu Nor thought to himself: "Among all the renunciants who have come to dwell in this city, I have never before seen a single one whose conduct resembles that of this renunciant." And then he thought further: "There are renunciants who comport themselves properly in the city yet do as they please in the hermitage. I should therefore go and examine this one's conduct in the hermitage." Having thus resolved, he said to a man: "Good sir, come here. Follow behind this renunciant, step for step, and find out whether his conduct in the hermitage is as peaceful as it is in the city, or whether it is otherwise. Understand this and report back." That man replied, "As the young master commands," and having heard these words from Gyad Bu Nor, he followed behind the venerable Ratathul, step for step.

Then the venerable Ratathul, having completed his alms round through the city, went to the place of the lotus grove. Having arrived, he set his bowl and his water vessel down together to one side, shook out his robe-cloth, washed both feet, dried both hands, drew water, gathered up some fallen leaves, sat down, took his meal, discarded the fallen leaves, dried both hands again, set his bowl and water vessel together to one side, washed both feet, and, resting against the trunk of a great tree, sat in cross-legged posture with his body composed in the manner of the resting posture of the king of serpents, and remained there with peaceful comportment.

Then that man, his mind captivated — for the venerable Ratathul's peaceful conduct was such as to draw together the minds of gods and human beings — went to the place where Gyad Bu Nor was and, having arrived, said to Gyad Bu Nor: "Young master, please know this: the conduct with which that renunciant goes for alms in the city is surpassed a hundredfold, a thousandfold, by the conduct with which he dwells in the hermitage."

Then Gyad Bu Nor, his mind captivated upon hearing of the venerable Ratathul's conduct, so utterly splendid and complete, said to that man with respectful urgency: "Good sir, quickly prepare a comfortable mount, and I will ride it and go at once to see that renunciant." That man replied, "As the young master commands," and having heard these words from Gyad Bu Nor, he quickly prepared a comfortable mount. Gyad Bu Nor came to the place where the venerable Ratathul was, and said to him: "Young master Gorbu Drön, please know that the right moment has now come."

Then Gyad Bu Nor mounted the comfortable conveyance and set out from the city, directing his carriage toward the lotus grove; he rode as far as the road permitted, then descended from the mount and entered the lotus grove on foot. Gyad Bu Nor saw the venerable Ratathul sitting there, his faculties perfectly composed, in peaceful comportment.

Having seen him, he thought to himself: "To rouse this renunciant from his meditative absorption would not accord with my way of doing things. I shall wait until he rises from absorption, and only then go to him." Having thus resolved, he sat quietly to one side, remaining there, waiting for him to rise.

Then the venerable Ratathul, in the late afternoon, emerged from perfect inner settling, and sat quietly to one side. Then Gyad Bu Nor went to the place where the venerable Ratathul was, and having arrived, exchanged with the venerable Ratathul various words of mutual delight and satisfaction, and sat to one side.

Seated to one side, Gyad Bu Nor then said this to the venerable Ratathul: "Learned one, are you yourself a Teacher, or a śrāvaka?"

"Good friend, I am one who has entered the path of a śrāvaka teacher."

"Learned one, what is the difference between a Teacher and a śrāvaka?"

"Good friend, the difference is exceedingly great. It is like this: like the difference between Mount Meru, the king of mountains, and a mustard seed; like the difference between the great ocean and a cow's footprint; like the difference between the sun and a firefly; and like the difference between the sky and the hole at the root of a lotus."

"In this regard, just as is Mount Meru, the king of mountains, so should the Teacher be regarded; and just as is the mustard seed, so should the śrāvaka be regarded. Just as is the great ocean, so should the Teacher be regarded; and just as is the cow's footprint, so should the śrāvaka be regarded. Just as is the sun, so should the Teacher be regarded; and just as is the firefly, so should the śrāvaka be regarded. Just as is the sky, so should the Teacher be regarded; and just as is the hole at the root of a lotus, so should the śrāvaka be regarded."

Having said this, he then spoke in verse:

Whatever difference lies between the king of mountains and a mustard seed, Whatever difference lies between the great ocean and a poisonous bull's footprint,

Whatever difference lies between the sun and a firefly,

Whatever difference lies between the sky and a lotus's root-hole —

Such is the difference between a buddha, a śrāvaka, and awakening.

Then Gyad Bu Nor thought to himself: "Given that this renunciant praises his Teacher so and yet speaks disparagingly of himself, it cannot be that the buddha is not excellent, nor can it be that the Dharma he has taught is not excellent." Recognizing this, he said the following to the venerable Ratathul: "Noble one, may you grant me the going forth and full ordination in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, and may I live the holy life in the presence of the noble one."

"Good friend, have your parents consented?"

"Noble one, they have not consented."

"Good friend, the Tathāgata and the śrāvakas of the Tathāgata do not grant the going forth to a son of good family whose parents have not consented; they do not grant full ordination to such a one. Noble one, let me do just this much for you: grant me the going forth alone, and I shall myself act in such a way that my parents will come to give their consent."

The venerable Ratathul said to him, "Good friend, very well then — do as you have said."

Thereupon Gyad Bu Nor expressed open delight and rejoicing at the words of the venerable Ratathul, and then went to the place where his own home was. Having arrived, he spoke as follows to his father and mother: "Father and mother, please take note. With genuine and wholehearted faith in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, I shall go forth from the home life into homelessness."

"Dear boy, understand this: you are our only son, beloved and pleasing to behold. So long as we see you, nothing is amiss. If you were to die, we would be parted from you against our will — that is simply what must be. But to let you go while you are still alive — what need is there even to speak of it? Father and mother: if you consent, that is well and good. But if you do not consent, then from this day forward I shall seek neither food nor water from your hands."

"Dear boy, do not withhold consent from us. For as long as we live, remain before our eyes and think of nothing else."

Thereupon Gyad Bu Nor fasted for a single day. On the second through the sixth days he fasted as well. Then his father and mother said this to Gyad Bu Nor: "Dear boy, understand this. You are very young and given to pleasure; you do not know what suffering is. The holy life is difficult to live."

"It is hard to live in true seclusion. It is hard to find delight in solitude. It is hard to truly embrace dwelling in remote lodgings — in forest groves, at the foot of mountains, and at the edges of ravines. To dwell alone in the wilderness is suffering. For as long as you live you will have to dwell together with savage wild beasts. For as long as you live you will have to subsist on what others give you. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human pleasures. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human joys and amusements. Dear boy, come back. Stay here and enjoy pleasures to the full; give gifts and accumulate merit."

Even when they spoke thus, Gyad Bu Nor said nothing at all.

Then Gyad Bu Nor's father and mother instructed his relatives: "Come, kinsmen. Go and rouse the boy Gyad Bu Nor."

So Gyad Bu Nor's relatives went to where he was, approached him, and spoke to him thus: "Young master, please understand. You are very young and given to pleasure; you do not know what suffering is. The holy life is difficult to live. It is hard to live in true seclusion. It is hard to find delight in solitude. It is hard to truly embrace dwelling in remote lodgings — in forest groves, at the foot of mountains, and at the edges of ravines. To dwell alone in the wilderness is suffering. For as long as you live you will have to dwell together with savage wild beasts. For as long as you live you will have to subsist on what others give you. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human pleasures. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human joys and amusements. Young master, come back and stay here; enjoy pleasures to the full, bestow gifts, and accumulate merit."

Even when they spoke thus, Gyad Bu Nor said nothing at all.

Then Gyad Bu Nor's father and mother instructed his young male companions: "Come, young friends. Go and rouse the boy Gyad Bu Nor."

So Gyad Bu Nor's young companions went to where he was, approached him, and spoke to him thus: "Young master, please understand. You are very young and given to pleasure; you do not know what suffering is. The holy life is difficult to live. It is hard to live in true seclusion. It is hard to find delight in solitude. It is hard to truly embrace dwelling in remote lodgings — in forest groves, at the foot of mountains, and at the edges of ravines. To dwell alone in the wilderness is suffering. For as long as you live you will have to dwell together with savage wild beasts. For as long as you live you will have to subsist on what others give you. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human pleasures. For as long as you live you will have to keep apart from human joys and amusements. Young master, come back and stay here; enjoy pleasures to the full, bestow gifts, and accumulate merit."

Even when they spoke thus, Gyad Bu Nor said nothing at all.

Then Gyad Bu Nor's young companions went to where his father and mother were, approached them, and spoke to them thus: "Father and mother, please understand. Since the young man is calm, what is to be done by force? Going forth is praised by the wise; and if, having gone forth, he becomes joyful and content, then you will see him alive and well.

But even if he does not become joyful and content, sages do turn back, and apart from his father and mother there is no one else who can be his refuge. Therefore, going forth is good."

Then Gyad Bu Nor's father and mother spoke to Gyad Bu Nor thus: "Young son, is it not the case that going forth is good for you, and that staying at home is not good? Father and mother: going forth is indeed good for us, and staying at home is not good. Young son, know now that the time for it has come."

Then Gyad Bu Nor, with his parents' permission, gradually roused through nourishment the bodily vitality, strength, and diligence that had waned, and having emerged from his seclusion, he went to where the venerable Aśvajit was. Arriving there, he touched his head to the feet of the venerable Aśvajit and sat to one side. Seated to one side, Gyad Bu Nor spoke to the venerable Aśvajit thus: "Noble one, please know this. With my parents' permission, I wish to go forth and receive full ordination in the well-taught Dharma-Vinaya and obtain the status of a monk. I wish to live the holy life in the presence of the noble one."

The venerable Aśvajit said: "Well-favored one, excellent! Possessions are impermanent; going forth is good. Do it so. The Blessed One too, seeing rightly the five benefits, has taught that a wise person should aspire to going forth alone. What are the five? First, seeing rightly that one will attain one's own unsullied aim, a wise person should aspire to going forth alone. Second, seeing rightly that one will become an object of veneration and praise for those over whom one is a servant, an assignee, one under orders, one without independence, and one unable to go where one wishes, a wise person should aspire to going forth alone. Third, seeing rightly that one will attain accomplishment and the unsurpassed bliss of nirvāṇa, a wise person should aspire to going forth alone. Fourth, seeing rightly that even if one falls short of attaining the unsurpassed blissful nirvāṇa, one will be reborn among the gods, a wise person should aspire to going forth alone. Fifth, seeing rightly that going forth is praised in many ways by buddhas, by the holy śrāvakas of buddhas who have rightly understood and rightly accomplished, and by holy persons, a wise person should aspire to going forth alone."

Having said this, he gave him the going forth.

Then the venerable Aśvajit gave the son of good family Gyad Bu Nor the going forth and full ordination, and said: "Son, a monk's work is twofold: meditative concentration and recitation. Which do you wish — meditative concentration or recitation?"

Gyad Bu Nor said: "Preceptor, I will do both. By day I will do recitation; by night I will do meditative concentration."

The venerable Aśvajit said: "Son, do it so."

Then the venerable Gyad Bu Nor, reciting and chanting by day, mastered all three collections of scriptures. Practicing meditative concentration by night, he progressively attained ever higher distinctions of mental application, came to know this very wheel of saṃsāra in its five parts — moving and unmoving — and recognized the decline and downfall of all conditioning formations and their dispersal and dissolution. Overpowered by the very nature of reality — the nature of dispersion and disintegration — and having abandoned all afflictions, he, noble sons, realized in that very lifetime, through his own direct knowledge, the supreme culmination of the holy life, for the sake of which sons of good family shave their hair and beard, don the ochre robes, and go forth from home into homelessness with genuine and wholehearted faith. He came to understand: "My birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. I know no further existence beyond this." Thus he became an arhat, free from attachment to all three realms — one to whom a clod of earth and gold are equal, whose mind is like the sky and like the palm of the hand, like sandalwood set down without preference, who has torn open the shell of ignorance with wisdom, who has attained the three higher knowledges, the five superknowledges, and the four analytical discriminations — one who has turned his back on continued existence, on gain, and on honors born of desire, worthy of veneration, of reverence, and of being openly praised by gods together with Indra and those gods with their attendants.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the twentieth fascicle.

Just as, during the lifetime of the Buddha, the Blessed One — while he lived, dwelt, and was present — there were by the nature of things two great assemblies of śrāvakas: one at the time of the invitation ceremony at the full moon of the middle month of the rains, and the second at the full moon of the middle month of autumn; so too, for the great śrāvakas there were two great assemblies of śrāvakas: one at the full moon of the middle month of the rains, at the time of the invitation ceremony, and the second at the full moon of the middle month of autumn.

Now, those who, having taken on a commitment at the full moon of the middle month of the rains — having received counsel and accepted a rains retreat in towns, villages, districts, and royal palaces — would arrive at the full moon of the middle month of autumn and then report what they had attained, and, in order to attain what they had not yet attained, would seek below recitations from the collections of sūtras, Vinaya, and Abhidharma, and would seek thorough questioning.

Then the venerable Aśvajit's fellow residents, and those attendants who had accepted a rains retreat in the region, once the three months of the rains had passed, took up their robe-cloth, received their robe-cloth, and taking up their bowls and robes, went to where the venerable Aśvajit was and arrived there. They prostrated with their heads at the venerable Aśvajit's feet and stood to one side. Standing to one side, some of them reported what they had attained, while others sought recitations from sūtras, Vinaya, and Abhidharma, and sought thorough questioning.

The venerable Aśvajit resolved their doubts and uncertainties regarding the three collections and the path of meditative concentration, and they, having begun to speak among themselves — "Venerable ones, we have seen our preceptor and paid him our respects; now let us go to Rājagṛha to pay respects to the Blessed One" — departed.

Then the venerable Gyad Bu Nor, hearing them speak thus, thought to himself: "Alas, I too wish to behold the Blessed One!" and, knowing this wish had arisen in him, he went to where the venerable Aśvajit was. Arriving there, he prostrated with his head at the venerable Aśvajit's feet and spoke these words to him: "Preceptor, please hear me. I have seen the Blessed One through the dharmakāya — through the body of truth — but have not seen him through the form body. Therefore, if I may be permitted to go and behold the Blessed One's form body, please grant me this." The venerable Aśvajit said:

"My son, look with a careful and discerning eye. My son, Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and fully awakened buddhas — and their arising — are like this: they are as rare as the udumbara flower. Bear that in mind."

Then the venerable Gyad Bu Nor, having received his preceptor's permission, arose with a mind full of joy and gladness at the prospect of beholding the Blessed One. That very night passed, and in the early morning he girded his lower robe, took up his begging bowl and his Dharma robes, and went into the village of Sdigbyung to collect alms. Having completed his alms round in Sdigbyung and finished his meal, he returned from the later alms round, set out the bedding and provisions for comfortable use, took up his begging bowl and Dharma robes, and, accompanied by one preceptor and one teacher, set off walking toward Rājagṛha, journeying steadily onward until at last he arrived in Rājagṛha.

Then the venerable Gyad Bu Nor set down his begging bowl and Dharma robes, washed his two feet, and went to where the Blessed One was.

At that time the Blessed One was sitting before a great assembly of many hundreds of monks, teaching the Dharma. The Blessed One caught sight of the venerable Gyad Bu Nor from a great distance. Having seen him, the Blessed One called out to the venerable Gyad Bu Nor: "Gyad Bu Nor, come here. Welcome. You have come at the right time. Gyad Bu Nor, sit down in whatever seat suits you."

Then the venerable Gyad Bu Nor prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side.

Now at that time in Rājagṛha there was a practice of assigning lodgings without regard to compatibility — lodgings of those who hold the sūtras and those who hold the Vinaya were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the sūtras and those who hold the mātṛkā were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the sūtras and those who preach the Dharma were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the sūtras and those who are practitioners of renunciation were assigned together. Lodgings of those who hold the Vinaya and those who hold the sūtras were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the Vinaya and those who hold the mātṛkā were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the Vinaya and those who preach the Dharma were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the Vinaya and those who are practitioners of renunciation were assigned together. Lodgings of those who hold the mātṛkā and those who hold the sūtras were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the mātṛkā and those who hold the Vinaya were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the mātṛkā and those who preach the Dharma were assigned together; lodgings of those who hold the mātṛkā and those who are practitioners of renunciation were assigned together. Lodgings of those who preach the Dharma and those who hold the sūtras were assigned together; lodgings of those who preach the Dharma and those who hold the Vinaya were assigned together; lodgings of those who preach the Dharma and those who hold the mātṛkā were assigned together; lodgings of those who preach the Dharma and those who are practitioners of renunciation were assigned together. Lodgings of practitioners of renunciation and those who hold the sūtras were assigned together; lodgings of practitioners of renunciation and those who hold the Vinaya were assigned together; lodgings of practitioners of renunciation and those who hold the mātṛkā were assigned together; and lodgings of practitioners of renunciation and those who preach the Dharma were assigned together.

When lodgings were assigned in this incompatible manner, the monks, out of mutual guardedness toward one another, did not cultivate the aspects of virtue, and they did not increase in virtuous qualities — like a blue lotus in a place without water.

The Blessed One reflected: "This Gyad Bu Nor, in the presence of former buddhas, and in the presence of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, in a lifetime of one hundred years — having gone forth in the teaching of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha Śākyamuni, may I become the foremost among those who assign lodgings" — it was with that aspiration that he had made this prayer. Reflecting thus, the Blessed One thought: "I should have this monk go around assigning lodgings to the monks."

The Blessed One then spoke to the monks: "Monks, you should appoint the monk Gyad Bu Nor, or any other monk of similar qualities, as assigner of lodgings. An assigner of lodgings who possesses five qualities should not be appointed if not yet appointed, and should be removed if already appointed. What are the five? He proceeds by desire, he proceeds by aversion, he proceeds by delusion, he proceeds by fear, and he does not know what lodgings have been received and what lodgings have not been received.

An assigner of lodgings who possesses five qualities should be appointed if not yet appointed, and should not be removed if already appointed. What are the five? He does not proceed by desire, he does not proceed by aversion, he does not proceed by delusion, he does not proceed by fear, and he knows what lodgings have been received and what have not been received.

The appointment should be made in this manner. Having prepared the lodgings and struck the wooden signal board, one summons the monks with words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is gathered and in harmony, one first asks the candidate with enthusiasm, saying: 'You, whose name is such-and-such — are you willing to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha? If you are willing, say that you are willing.' After that, a single monk makes a motion and the formal act is performed.

May the venerable Saṅgha hear. If the monk named such-and-such is willing to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha, and if the time is right for the Saṅgha and it consents, may the Saṅgha please grant approval. The Saṅgha hereby appoints the monk named such-and-such to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha. The monk named such-and-such will assign lodgings to the Saṅgha. This is the motion.

The formal act is to be performed as follows. May the venerable Saṅgha hear. The monk named such-and-such is willing to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha. Therefore, the Saṅgha hereby appoints the monk named such-and-such to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha. Those venerable ones who consent to the appointment of the monk named such-and-such as assigner of lodgings to the Saṅgha should remain silent. Those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha has consented and approved. The Saṅgha has appointed the monk named such-and-such to assign lodgings to the Saṅgha. Because no one has spoken, it is held to be so."

When the venerable Gyad Bu Nor was appointed as assigner of lodgings, he arranged those lodgings in a compatible manner: those who hold the sūtras were placed together with those who hold the sūtras; those who hold the Vinaya were placed with those who hold the Vinaya; those who hold the Māṭṛkā were placed with those who hold the Māṭṛkā; those who preach the Dharma were placed with those who preach the Dharma; and those who practice renunciation were placed with those who practice renunciation.

Because they received their lodgings compatibly, they refined one another through conversation and meaningful discourse, and they flourished in virtuous qualities — like a blue lotus in water.

For those who came in the early part of the night, the venerable Gyad Bu Nor would by his miraculous power kindle light from one finger and assign them their lodgings. For those who came even later in the night, the venerable Gyad Bu Nor would by his miraculous power kindle light from two fingers and assign them their lodgings.

Then those monks who wished to witness the venerable Gyad Bu Nor's superhuman qualities and his miraculous display made a deliberate plan and came at night. For those monks, the venerable Gyad Bu Nor would by his miraculous power kindle light from all five fingers and assign them their lodgings.

Those monks then thought to themselves: "For us to receive our lodging assignment from such a great śrāvaka as this, one who is like the Teacher himself, and then simply to lay our heads down and sleep — that is not in keeping with our proper conduct. Rather, we should devote ourselves to practice, not sleeping in the first part of the night nor in the last part of the night." And so they devoted themselves to practice, not sleeping in the first part of the night nor in the last part of the night. Because of this, what had not yet been attained came to be attained, and what had already been attained was not lost.

Then the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Among my monk disciples who assign lodgings, this one — my Gyad Bu Nor — is supreme."

Now, at a time when the Blessed One's teaching had flourished, faithful brahmins and householders would prepare food for the Saṅgha in their homes.

The group of six monks would go to wherever food was being given out and enjoy it fully. The faithful brahmins and householders said to them: "Noble ones, you have come all together like a single canopy. Why did the senior elder monks not come?"

The group of six monks said: "They do not enjoy food of this sort."

"Well then, what kind of food do they enjoy?"

"They enjoy alms food."

"Noble ones, if the Blessed One has taught that those who give alms food are supreme, why then do you say that the elders do not enjoy food of this sort? Go. Do not come here again."

The group of six monks fell silent and left without a word.

The news passed from one person to another until the monks heard of it, and the monks at that time reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should appoint monk Gyad Bu Nor, or another of the same caliber, as food-server. One who possesses five qualities should not be appointed as food-server even if not yet appointed, and if already appointed should be removed. What are the five? One who goes by desire, one who goes by aversion, one who goes by delusion, one who goes by fear, and one who does not know who has or has not been appointed as food-server.

"One who possesses five qualities should be appointed as food-server even if not yet appointed, and if already appointed should not be removed. What are the five? One who does not go by desire, one who does not go by aversion, one who does not go by delusion, one who does not go by fear, and one who knows who has or has not been appointed as food-server.

"The appointment should be made as follows: After the lodgings have been laid out, the wooden signal-board is struck, and with the words of inquiry the monks are summoned. When the entire Saṅgha is seated and in concord, one first asks the willing candidate: 'You whose name is such-and-such, are you willing to serve as food-server for the monks?' If he is willing, he is to say: 'I am willing.'"

After that, a single monk is to make the formal motion and the act is to be performed. "Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear me. The monk named such-and-such is willing to serve as food-server for the monks. If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha please grant its approval, and the Saṅgha shall appoint the monk named such-and-such as food-server for the monks. The monk named such-and-such is hereby appointed as food-server for the monks." This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows. "Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear me. The monk named such-and-such is willing to serve as food-server for the monks. The Saṅgha is appointing the monk named such-and-such as food-server for the monks. Those venerable ones who consent to the appointment of the monk named such-and-such as food-server for the monks are to remain silent; those who do not consent are to speak." The Saṅgha having consented and approved, the Saṅgha has appointed the monk named such-and-such as food-server for the monks. Since no one has spoken, it is so held.

Now, when the Venerable Jāyasena was appointed as food-server, he set out three grades of food for the Saṅgha: the excellent, the middling, and the poor. For monks who arrived unexpectedly, on the first day he would assign them excellent food, on the second day middling food, and on the third day poor food. On the fourth day, knowing their own circumstances, they were to go out on alms-round themselves.

At that time, the Venerable Jāyasena was residing in Rājagṛha, carrying out his regular residence, making the formal motion, receiving those newly arrived, assigning lodgings, and serving as food-server, and so he assigned food to the Saṅgha in proper accordance with custom, seniority, and rank, without skipping anyone in order.

Now the Venerable Jāyasena and a friendly monk — the two of them, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, having been enemies across many lifetimes — were wandering and traveling through the southern mountains. When they arrived at Rājagṛha, the two of them asked a monk: "Who is the venerable one appointed to assign lodgings for the Saṅgha?" He replied: "It is the Venerable Jāyasena." The two then went to where the Venerable Jāyasena was, and when they arrived they said to him: "Assign us our two lodgings."

At that time, whatever fine bedding there was had already been allocated to the elders among elders, and only the inferior pieces remained. Likewise, whatever temple quarters were in the central precinct had already been assigned to the elders among elders, and only the outlying temple quarters remained, so the Venerable Jāyasena assigned those two inferior bedding pieces and lodged them in the outlying quarters.

The two then asked: "Who is the food-server for the Saṅgha?" The Venerable Jāyasena replied: "It is I, Jāyasena." They said: "Then assign us our two food portions." The Venerable Jāyasena assigned those two excellent food on the first day. Then some faithful brahmins (brāhmaṇas) and householders asked: "Who will be coming here as guests tomorrow?" Others replied: "It will be the two friends, Jāyasena and the earth-born one." Those people then thought:

"Those two are of thoroughly depraved conduct — who would show them respect? Let them eat whatever is available and be gone." With that thought, those people showed no respect to the two and gave them inferior food.

On the second day, the Venerable Jāyasena assigned those two to the middling food portions. Likewise, when the faithful brahmins and householders asked, "Who will be coming here as guests tomorrow?" others replied, "It will be the two friends, Jāyasena and the earth-born one." Those people thought: "Those two are of thoroughly depraved conduct — who would show them respect? Let them eat whatever is available and be gone." And with that thought, those people showed no respect to the two and gave them inferior food.

On the third day, the Venerable Jāyasena assigned those two to the inferior food portions by natural consequence. Then the two, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, reflected: "Alas, this is suffering! Alas, this is unbearable!" The Venerable Jāyasena thought: "He has quite deliberately — three times in a row — set upon us with the most disagreeable and revolting food, food that would make anyone who ate it fall ill. What harm should we now do to him in this matter?"

At that time, the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, had a sister, a nun named Jāyā, who was residing in Rājagṛha during the nuns' rains retreat, in the royal pleasure garden. Then the nun Jāyā made her way to where the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, were staying, and having arrived, she bowed her head to the feet of the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, and sat down to one side.

When she had sat down to one side, the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, did not exchange words with the nun Jāyā, did not speak of her arrival, did not glance at her, and did not look at her at all. Then the nun Jāyā spoke to the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, saying: "Noble ones, why do you two not exchange words with me, not speak of my arrival, not glance at me, not look at me at all?"

"Sister, the Venerable Jāyasena has quite deliberately — three times in a row — set upon us with the most disagreeable and revolting food, food that would make anyone who ate it fall ill. Have you let that pass?"

"Noble ones, what then should I do?"

"Sister, come. Go to where the Blessed One is, and having arrived, say to the Blessed One: 'Venerable One, it is unseemly and improper that the noble Jāyasena should slander, with the charge of a defeat (pārājika), without basis and without grounds, a monk who is pure and without transgression and who has engaged in unchaste conduct together with me.' And we two shall likewise say to the Blessed One: 'So it is, O Blessed One; just so, O Sugata — we two also acknowledge exactly what our sister has reported.'"

"Noble ones, how could I falsely accuse a pure monk who has no transgression, charging him with an offense entailing defeat without any basis? Sister, for as long as you do not say that, for so long we two will not exchange words with you, will not speak of your arrival, will not glance at you, will not look at you at all."

Then the nun Jāyā sat for a short while in silence, and then spoke to the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, as follows:

"Noble ones, if that is so, then I shall say exactly that. Sister, until such time as we two have arrived at the place where the Blessed One is, please remain here for a while. When we two have come into the presence of the Blessed One, then you may follow after."

Then the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, went to the place where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, they prostrated with their heads to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. The nun Jāyā, realizing that the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, had left and that no great time had passed, went to the place where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, she prostrated with her head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the nun Jāyā addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Reverend One, this is unseemly and improper — that the noble Śvetaketu (Jayabala) engaged in unchaste conduct with me and has thereby incurred a defeat."

The two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, likewise said: "O Blessed One, it is so. O Sugata, it is just so — we two also acknowledge exactly what our sister has reported."

At that very moment, the venerable Śvetaketu (Jayabala) was present there, right in that same assembly.

Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Śvetaketu (Jayabala): "Śvetaketu (Jayabala), did you hear that?" "Blessed One, I heard it." "Śvetaketu (Jayabala), did you hear that?" "O Sugata, I heard it." "Śvetaketu (Jayabala), what do you think of this matter?" "Blessed One, I defer to whatever you know. O Sugata, I defer to whatever you know." "Śvetaketu (Jayabala), that response — 'I defer to whatever the Blessed One knows, I defer to whatever the Sugata knows' — is untimely; it is not the appropriate occasion. If you remember, say 'I remember.' If you do not remember, say 'I do not remember.'" "O Blessed One, I do not remember. O Sugata, I do not remember."

At that very moment, the venerable Śāriputra was sitting at the Blessed One's side, holding a fan, fanning the Blessed One.

Then the venerable Śāriputra addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Reverend One, the nun Jāyā came to where the Blessed One was, prostrated with her head to the Blessed One's two feet, sat to one side, and then, seated to one side, addressed the Blessed One with these words: 'Reverend One, this is unseemly and improper — that the noble Śvetaketu (Jayabala) engaged in unchaste conduct with me and has thereby incurred a defeat.' And the two monks, Jāyasena and the earth-born one, likewise said to the Blessed One: 'It is so, O Blessed One; it is just so, O Sugata — we two also acknowledge exactly what our sister has reported.' Reverend One, for the sake of this matter, what fault has the venerable Śvetaketu (Jayabala) incurred? Śāriputra, that is for you yourself to inquire into — answer him in whatever way you are able to bear, exactly as it is. Śāriputra, if the nun Jāyā had come to that place, prostrated with her head to my two feet, sat to one side, and then, seated to one side, addressed me with these words: 'Reverend One, this is unseemly and improper — that the noble Śāriputra engaged in unchaste conduct with me and has thereby incurred a defeat,' and then—"

The monk Priya and the earth-born one likewise spoke thus to the Blessed One: "So it is, O Blessed One. So it is, O Sugata. We two, just as our sister has reported, we two acknowledge exactly the same." Then I said to you: "You have heard the charge — what do you think of it? How will you reply?" The Reverend One replied: "Reverend Sir, if I remember it, I will say I remember; if I do not remember it, I will say I do not remember." The Blessed One then said:

"You are not deluded. In that case, if the venerable Jayabala, a monk pure and free of transgression, has attained that understanding, why would he fail to attain it?"

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, you shall hold the venerable Jayabala to be one possessed of mindfulness. The nun Priyā shall be censured by her own admission. As for the monk Priya and the earth-born one — what did you see? How did you see it? Where did you see it? Since you two appeared there for some purpose, state clearly what you saw there and investigate the matter."

Having thus spoken, the Blessed One rose from his seat and went to the assembly hall in order to enter into inner meditative composure. Then a great many monks, knowing that the Blessed One had entered into inner meditative composure and that no long time had passed, held the venerable Jayabala to be one possessed of mindfulness, censured the nun Priyā by her own admission, and thoroughly questioned and examined the monk Priya and the earth-born one thus: "Venerable ones, what did you see? How did you see it? Where did you see it? Why, having gone there for some purpose, did you see it there?"

When the great many monks had thoroughly questioned and examined them, those two said: "Venerable ones, the venerable Jayabala has not incurred a defeat through unchaste conduct. For the venerable Jayabala struck us both three times with vile and utterly repugnant food — the sort that causes one's bowels to run loose if eaten — and because of that, we two spoke against the venerable Jayabala out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, and out of fear. The venerable Jayabala has not incurred a defeat through unchaste conduct. He is a monk who is pure and without transgression."

Then, the following morning, the Blessed One arose from inner meditative composure and took his seat on the throne arranged before the assembly of monks. A great many monks then reported to the Blessed One as follows: "Reverend Sir, we, a great many monks, knowing that the Blessed One had entered into inner meditative composure and that no long time had passed, held the venerable Jayabala to be one possessed of mindfulness, censured the nun Priyā by her own words and admission, and thoroughly questioned and examined the monk Priya and the earth-born one thus: 'Venerable ones, what did you see? How did you see it? Where did you see it? Why, having gone there for some purpose, did you see it there?' When we, the great many monks, had thoroughly questioned and examined them, from the mouths of those two came this: 'Venerable ones, the venerable Jayabala has not incurred a defeat through unchaste conduct. For the venerable Jayabala struck us both three times with vile and utterly repugnant food — the sort that causes one's bowels to run loose if eaten — and because of that, we two, speaking against the venerable Jayabala, spoke out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, and out of—'"

"— it was said out of fear alone. The venerable Gyabu Nor has not incurred a defeat through unchaste conduct. Thus, venerable ones, the monks are pure and without transgression," they said.

"Monks, why did those two, devoid of wisdom, knowingly speak false words for the sake of a mere trifle of material goods?"

Then the Blessed One, on that occasion, declared two verses:

One who is embodied and speaks falsehood has transgressed the single Dharma, and one who has renounced the world beyond — there is no evil they will not commit.

Better that one should eat iron balls blazing like tongues of flame than that one who is morally corrupt and truly without restraint should eat alms gathered throughout the land.

At that moment, the gods dwelling in the midst of the sky cried out, "Splendid! Splendid! Intolerable! Supremely intolerable! That monks who have spoken thus, for the sake of a mere trifle of material goods, should falsely accuse a pure monk without transgression, by means of a groundless charge of a defeating offense!" And they spoke again: "Who among the wise would delight in wandering through saṃsāra in this world? For even the wealth that liberates from the three realms of existence is now met with slander."

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this as the basis and in this context, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. "The Blessed One, the buddhas, though fully knowing, feigned not to know" — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One, the buddha, questioned the venerable Dzawo and Sala Lé Kyé, the two of them, saying: "You two, devoid of wisdom — is it true that you falsely accused a pure monk without transgression, by means of a groundless charge of a defeating offense?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One, the buddha, rebuked them with words such as these: "That is not the way of the ascetic, it is not appropriate, it is not fitting — it is not something that one who has gone forth ought to do." And so on, in the form of a rebuke.

Then the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, these three types of persons, if they do not abandon those ways, will go to the lower realms, will go to the hells. What are the three? First, there is the person who frequents sensual pleasures and also commits evil deeds — this is the first type of person who, if that is not abandoned, will go to the lower realms, will go to the hells. Furthermore, there is the person who is themselves morally degenerate yet speaks of others under the power of ethics — this is the second type of person who, if that is not abandoned, will go to the lower realms, will go to the hells. Furthermore, there is the person who themselves engage in unchaste conduct and yet falsely accuse another of the groundless charge of unchaste conduct, a defeating offense — this is the third type of person who, if that is not abandoned, will go to the lower realms, will go to the hells."

The Blessed One declared this, and having spoken thus, the Sugata, the Teacher, declared further:

In the mouth of a man, when he speaks slandering words of blame, an axe is born — and by it he cuts himself down.

One who praises what should be blamed and blames what should be praised — from his mouth he breeds strife, and one who brings strife finds no happiness.

This strife that loses one's own wealth at dice is but a small and trifling thing; but one who arouses fierce anger in the mind of the Sugata — that strife here is exceedingly great.

One who slanders a noble one, relying on evil, will go to the hells for a hundred thousands, a hundred million, thirty-six, and five more — as many as those [aeons] may be.

Then the Blessed One, having censured this in many ways, addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, whatever monk, having become enraged and filled with aversion, thinking, 'By whatever means I will separate this one from the holy life,' should, on the basis of a groundless defeat, accuse a pure monk — one free of any transgression — with a matter involving a pārājika (root downfall), whether he is questioned about it at another time or not questioned, that dispute too is groundless; and if the monk, abiding in aversion and speaking from aversion, should say that he acted out of aversion — the remainder is for the Saṅgha to decide."

Now, "whatever monk" means: a friend, one born of the same soil, or another of that kind. "Having become enraged" means: having become agitated and disturbed. "Filled with aversion" means: having become displeased, and that agitation not having been cleared away. "Thinking, 'By whatever means I will separate this one from the holy life'" means: thinking, "By whatever means I will separate this one from the conduct of a renunciant." "A pure monk" means: a warrior's son, or another of that kind. "Free of any transgression" means: free of a transgression in that particular matter. "Groundless" means: without the three grounds — the ground of having seen, the ground of having heard, and the ground of having suspected. "With a matter involving a pārājika" means: by any one of the four matters — for that is something that is not Dharma expressed in the name of Dharma. "Should accuse" means: having leveled an accusation. "At another time" means: at a different time from that. "Whether questioned" means: questioned by others. "Or not questioned" means: he himself having become remorseful — somewhat remorseful, fully remorseful, or deeply remorseful. "That dispute too" refers to the four disputes: a dispute for the sake of quarreling, a dispute for the sake of not giving advice, a dispute concerning a transgression, and a dispute concerning an obligation. "Is groundless" means: those three grounds being absent. "The monk abiding in aversion" means: one who intends to make an accusation. "Should say that he acted out of aversion" means: one who says, "He has made a false accusation." "The remainder is for the Saṅgha to decide" — this is as before; thus it is said, "the remainder is for the Saṅgha to decide."

Now, how does a transgression occur in this matter? Accusing a pure person with ten grounds constitutes a transgression; with five grounds it does not constitute a transgression.

How does it constitute a transgression with ten grounds? When one, having altered one's perception and patience regarding something not seen, not heard, and not suspected, and having altered one's wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I have seen this," "I have heard this," "I suspect this" — all of these statements become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide. If one heard something and forgot it, or suspected something and forgot it, yet having altered one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I heard it and have not forgotten it," or "I suspected it and have not forgotten it" — all of those statements too become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide. Whether one trusted what one heard and says "I have seen it," or did not trust what one heard and says "I have seen it," or suspected what one heard and says "I have seen it," or did not suspect what one heard and says "I have seen it" — or suspected what one heard and says "I have seen it" — all of those statements become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide, and one incurs a transgression through ten grounds. How is it that one does not incur a transgression through five grounds? If one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected something, and without having altered one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I have seen it," "I have heard it," or "I have suspected it" — one does not incur a transgression. If one heard something and forgot it, or suspected something and forgot it, and without having altered one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I heard it and have not forgotten it," or "I suspected it and have not forgotten it" — one does not incur a transgression. In this way, one does not incur a transgression through five grounds.

Just as one incurs a transgression through ten grounds and does not incur a transgression through five grounds when making a false accusation against a pure person, so too when making a false accusation against a pure person by representing them as impure, one likewise incurs a transgression through ten grounds and does not incur a transgression through five grounds.

For making a false accusation against an impure person, one incurs a transgression through eleven grounds and does not incur a transgression through six grounds. How is it that one incurs a transgression through eleven grounds? If, having not seen, not heard, and not suspected something, one alters one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, and then declares: "I have seen it," "I have heard it," or "I have suspected it" — all of those statements become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide. If one saw something and forgot it, or heard something and forgot it, or suspected something and forgot it, and having altered one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I saw it and have not forgotten it," "I heard it and have not forgotten it," or "I suspected it and have not forgotten it" — all of those statements too become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide. Whether one trusted what one heard and says "I have seen it," or did not trust what one heard and says "I have seen it," or suspected what one heard and says "I have seen it," or did not suspect what one heard and says "I have seen it," or suspected what one heard and says "I have seen it" — all of those statements become a matter for the Saṅgha to decide, and in this way one incurs a transgression through eleven grounds.

How is it that one does not incur a transgression through six grounds? If one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected something, and without altering one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I have seen it," "I have heard it," or "I have suspected it" — one does not incur a transgression. If one saw something and has not forgotten it, or heard something and has not forgotten it, or suspected something and has not forgotten it, and without altering one's perception, patience, wish, understanding, conceptual thought, and view, declares: "I saw it and have not forgotten it," "I heard it and have not forgotten it," or "I suspected it and have not forgotten it" — one does not incur a transgression. In this way, one does not incur a transgression through six grounds.

Just as one incurs a transgression through eleven grounds and does not incur a transgression through six grounds when making a false accusation against an impure person, so too when making a false accusation against an impure person by representing them as pure, one likewise incurs a transgression through eleven grounds and does not incur a transgression through six grounds.

When a public announcement has been made, there is no transgression. From the time something is inscribed on a surface onward, there is likewise no transgression.

thinking, "Just as I myself know it, so too does the whole world know it." There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The monks, having given rise to doubt, asked the Blessed One, the Buddha, to resolve all their doubts: "Venerable one, what action did the noble Gyabu Nor perform such that through the karmic maturation of that action he was born into a household that was wealthy, with abundant riches and great prosperity? What action did he perform such that he went forth into the Blessed One's teaching and, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhathood? What action did he perform such that even though he had attained arhathood, he was falsely accused of what was not true? And what action did he perform such that he was declared supreme among those who dwell in forest retreats?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, this noble son Gyabu Nor himself performed and accumulated karma that was gathered, that thoroughly transformed its conditions, that remained close like a lamp's flame, that would arise without fail. And those actions performed and accumulated by Gyabu Nor himself — could anyone else experience their maturation separately? Monks, actions that have been performed and accumulated do not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, wholesome and unwholesome actions that have been performed and accumulated ripen in the aggregates, elements, and sense bases that have been appropriated, as it is said:

Even were it a hundred aeons, actions do not perish or waste away.
When the conditions and the time are met they come to bear their fruit for embodied beings.

Monks, in a former time, long past, there was at a rocky cliff a merchant of great renown called Gyalchenchen. He set out with a vessel heading for the great ocean, and together with his company of like-minded companions he sailed out upon the great ocean. At a time when no buddhas had arisen, there appeared in the world pratyekabuddhas — humble and destitute — who cherished those who were lowly and poor, who delighted in remote and isolated dwellings, who lived alone like a rhinoceros's horn, and who had become worthy fields of merit for the world. Then a pratyekabuddha set out voyaging together with that very merchant, and that night he entered into meditative absorption in the fire element. Now the custom among the chief men of the crew was to take turns night by night keeping the fire-watch. On a certain night it was the turn of one man to keep the fire-watch. He, seeing that the pratyekabuddha was blazing like a mass of fire, was seized with amazement, and when dawn broke he said to the merchant Gyalchenchen: 'Merchant, this renunciant who set sail together with the merchant is a great being perfected in ascetic discipline. I saw him blazing through the night like a mass of fire.' The merchant replied: 'Good fellow, in which direction is he dwelling?' The man said: 'Right over there, merchant.' The merchant, filled with joy, went to him, prostrated at his two feet, and said: 'Noble one, it is your wish to go for alms, and I too am one who seeks merit. Please accept my alms offering and go forth.' The pratyekabuddha consented, and by and by, as the merchant Gyalchenchen traveled in succession through villages, hamlets, districts, royal palaces, and market towns, he arrived at the shore of the great ocean. There, having dispelled the weariness of the journey, he outfitted five hundred old boats with provisions of sour milk, and taking with him those who bailed the boats, the sailors, the helmsmen, the boat hands, and those who managed the sails, he went to where the pratyekabuddha was and arrived, and prostrated with his whole body to his two feet and spoke these words to the pratyekabuddha: "Noble one, when I venture out upon the great ocean, will you, the noble one, also venture forth?" He replied: "Good sir, you are setting out upon the great ocean for the sake of your father and mother, your children, your wife, your male and female servants, your workers, those who live on wages, ascetics and brahmins, the poor and destitute — whereas I have left behind the affairs of household life, I have no inclination toward continued existence or worldly possessions, and I live without companion or associate. For whose sake, then, should I venture upon the great ocean?"

The merchant Gyalchenchen thought to himself: "I have offered alms to this noble one, and yet he has put on no robe. Let me now give him food, and then clothe him in a great bolt of cloth befitting one of high standing." And so the merchant satisfied him with food as alms, and then clothed him in a great bolt of cloth befitting one of high standing.

Thereupon the pratyekabuddha, having received the alms of food, and out of affectionate regard for him, rose up into the sky above like a king of geese spreading wide his wings, and began to perform miracles: blazing with fire, shining with radiance, letting fall rain, and sending forth lightning.

Now, ordinary persons are quick to fix their minds upon miraculous powers, and so the merchant fell to the ground at the feet of that pratyekabuddha as though a great tree had been cut down at its root, and began to make this aspiration: "By the root of virtue that I have created through making offerings to such a perfectly true field of merit as this, may I be reborn in a household that is wealthy, of great riches, and of great prosperity. And may I also attain qualities such as these — qualities by which one pleases a Teacher superior even to this, a Teacher most supremely excellent, without causing him displeasure." Thus he made his aspiration prayer.

Monks, the merchant Gyalchenchen of that time and that occasion is this very Gaurava, the son of a warrior. He made offerings to the pratyekabuddha and made this aspiration: "By this root of virtue, through making offerings to such a perfectly true field of merit, may I be reborn in a household that is wealthy, of great riches, and of great prosperity." By that aspiration, he was indeed reborn in a household that was wealthy, of great riches, and of great prosperity. And he also made this aspiration: "May I attain qualities such as these — qualities by which one pleases a Teacher most supremely excellent above this, without causing him displeasure." Through that aspiration, he went forth in my teaching, abandoned all afflictions, and directly actualized the state of an arhat. And through this he pleased me, the Teacher most supremely excellent above ten trillion pratyekabuddhas, without causing me displeasure.

But hear now how, although he attained the state of an arhat, he came to be disparaged for something that was not right.

Monks, once upon a time in the past, on a certain rocky cliff, there lived a householder who was wealthy, of great riches, and of great prosperity, possessed of vast and extensive estates, endowed with wealth like the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa (the divine lord of riches), rivaling Vaiśravaṇa in his treasure. He took a wife from among his own equals in station, and together with her he sported, took delight, and enjoyed pleasures. Yet although he sported, took delight, and enjoyed pleasures with her, he had no son and no daughter. And he thought: "My household is endowed with great wealth, yet I have no son and no daughter. When I am gone, because I have no son, all my wealth will come under the king's control." And so he sat resting his chin upon his hand, absorbed in his own thoughts.

His wife saw this and said:

"O son of the lord, why do you sit resting your chin upon your hand, absorbed in your own thoughts?"

He replied: "Good woman, my household is endowed with great wealth, yet I have no son and no daughter. When I am gone, because I have no son, all my wealth will come under the king's control. How could I not sit absorbed in thought?"

The wife thought to herself: "Is it that he has no fortune, so that he has neither son nor daughter? Or is it that I too have no fortune, so that there is neither son nor daughter? If the latter is the case and there is no way to know whose fault it is, then he will certainly blame me and wish to take another wife. That is why he says these words: 'My household is endowed with great wealth, yet I have no son and no daughter; when I am gone, because I have no son, all my wealth will come under the king's control' — and sits there before me resting his chin upon his hand, feigning absorption in thought. Therefore, I had better first secure my own position."

And so she spoke: "Son of the lord, if indeed it is because I have no fortune that you have neither son nor daughter, then take another queen. After that you may well have both son and daughter."

He replied: "Good woman, have you not heard it said that a man who has two wives never once drinks warm water, never drinks cool water in peace, but his household is perpetually filled with quarreling, tale-bearing, dispute, and strife among all the household members, and he is never free to attend to his own affairs?"

The wife said: "Son of the lord, please do take another. If she should be like an elder or younger sister to me, I will care for her with the thought of a sister. If she should be like a daughter to me, I will care for her with the thought of a daughter."

The householder, moved by his wife's guileful and persuasive words, began to search for a girl. Now at a certain cliff-side dwelling there lived a householder who had taken a wife from among his own equals in station, and together with her he sported, took delight, and enjoyed pleasures. From their sporting, delight, and pleasures she bore two sons and a daughter, and having raised and brought up those children, that householder passed away in due time.

Then the first-mentioned householder, who was searching for a girl, approached that couple's daughter, took her as his bride with great and splendid ceremony, and brought her home. It is in the very nature of things that whatever is new overshadows and surpasses the old, and so the householder became greatly attentive to his new bride, his mind drawn to her.

Thereupon his first wife, driven by jealousy, purified her own womb and caused a sentient being to enter it. Filled with the greatest joy, she spoke to her husband: "Son of the lord, a being has entered me — rejoice!"

The householder said: "Good woman, excellent! If it is born as a boy, he shall become the master of the household after I am gone."

The first wife then said: "Son of the lord, if you do not cause the child dwelling in the womb of your new bride to be aborted in the manner of aborting, then this boy will become master of the household."

The householder replied: "Good woman, did I not make this very matter clear to you from the very beginning? And you have now begun it when nothing has yet changed."

That wife fell silent, without a word, having lost her nerve.

Eight or nine months passed, and from the birth a boy was born. A birth-celebration was held, a name fitting to the household was given, and the child was raised and nourished with milk, yoghurt, butter, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and other such finest and most excellent provisions.

nourishing him swiftly, like a lotus growing in a pond.

When he came to be able to speak, whatever he said he spoke truly and never told a lie. The name that had been given to fit the household now faded away, and the name Truth-Speaker came to be attached to him, and from his very mouth there arose the fragrance of blue lotus flowers.

His mother thought to herself: "Although I have a son, this householder still pays attention to that first wife, just as if fate had not changed, and keeps his heart bound to her. I must find some way to deal with this." And so, her mind overcome by jealousy and miserliness, she went to where the householder was and said: "My lord's son, as for this new wife of yours — do not be so very attached to her and so bound up with her in your heart."

The householder said: "Good woman, you have started again."

And she fell silent, without a word, having lost her nerve.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga (the Analysis of the Discipline), the twenty-first section.

Because there is nothing wicked that those who consort with men or women consumed by desire will not do, the mother said to her son: "Son, do you know what the greatest harm that women do is?"

The son replied: "Honored mother, it is jealousy and miserliness."

"Son, you are not wrong. You understand with wisdom, and that is indeed so. But she is defaming your stepmother to me, your mother. You must clarify the four great matters. Has she done so rightly or wrongly?"

"Mother, not rightly."

"Son, if I am known throughout the entire world as Truth-Speaker, how then could I now speak falsely? Son, when she carried you in her womb for nine months she would groan and writhe in pain and could not even utter a word. Therefore, do not say a word now, and when your father questions you, simply nod your head."

The son thought: "It would not be right to dismiss my mother's words as worthless," and so he said: "Mother, if that is so, then I will not refuse. I will nod."

She then bound the boy by an oath and went to the householder and said: "My lord's son, I have seen a fault in your new wife. What did she do? She was taking pleasure and sporting with another man."

The householder, seized by passion, said: "You wicked woman — you have done it again. My lord's son, do you not trust Truth-Speaker? I believe her — for if she speaks truth to the whole world, how could she speak falsely to me? My lord's son, if that is so, call her here while she is at play."

The householder called the boy and set him on his lap and said: "Son, is it true that this stepmother of yours was taking pleasure and sporting with another man?"

Now, women are skilled in these matters without having been taught, and so she covered the boy's mouth with her hand and said: "Son, this is like your own mother — do not say a word. If it is true, nod your head."

The boy nodded.

For karma that is exceedingly fierce and fully complete regards not the destruction of the body. And so from that very boy's mouth, in that very life, a foul stench arose.

Moreover, the report spread everywhere that Truth-Speaker had falsely slandered his stepmother with what was not true, and so he was not Truth-Speaker but a liar. The name Truth-Speaker, which had been his, faded away, and the name Liar came to be attached to him.

Then the householder said to that wife: "You have behaved badly. Do not remain in my house."

The wife protested that she had done no wrong, but fearing the blame and harsh words of the world, she was driven out of the house.

Discontented, she went to the house of her two brothers. The two brothers said to her: "Sister, why have you come here?" She replied: "My husband has driven me from his own house, saying that I behaved badly." They said: "If that is so, do not stay here either." She replied: "I did not behave badly. It is rather this: Truth-Speaker deceived me, and with what was not true he slandered me, saying that I am not Truth-Speaker but a liar. How is that known?" She continued: "If the two of you do not believe me, the neighbors will speak on your behalf, and they are persons of standing." Fearing the blame and harsh words of the world, the two of them went and questioned the householder's neighbors, and those neighbors said: "She did not behave badly. Rather, Truth-Speaker deceived her, and with what was not true he slandered her — he is not Truth-Speaker but a liar." Then the two brothers, seized by the anger that arose in them toward Truth-Speaker, made sure that their beloved kinsmen and close ones came to understand what had happened. They kept their sister in their own home and devoted themselves fully to seeking to expose him further.

Now, in a time when no buddhas had appeared in the world, there arose in the world solitary buddhas (pratyekabuddhas) of the lesser kind — those who had compassion for the poor and destitute, who delighted in dwelling in remote and lonely forest hermitages, who, like rhinoceroses, lived alone, and who had become worthy objects of offering for the world.

At a certain time, as one such solitary buddha was wandering through the region, he came to that rocky cliff. Early in the morning he had tied on his lower robe, taken up his bowl and his dharma robe, and was going from house to house in order on his alms round — his conduct being so serene that it drew the minds of gods and humans alike — when he entered that house. The stepmother who had been falsely slandered with what was not true saw him, and she thought: "From the very conduct of this one who has gone forth, it is clear that he is a great being of accomplished discipline. Whoever makes offerings to him and places aspirations before him — all that they think and all that they wish will be accomplished for them." Knowing this, she prostrated at his two feet and said: "Noble one, you seek alms, and I seek merit, so please take your midday meal right here." As that great being was one who had entered into the welfare of others, he accepted.

Then, having satisfied the solitary buddha with food accompanied by the proper offering, she prostrated at his two feet and made this wrongful aspiration, saying: "By the root of virtue of making such offerings to one who is a truly worthy field of merit — just as Truth-Speaker falsely slandered me without cause, though I had done nothing blameworthy and no harm had been done — so too, may I likewise, in whatever life and wherever that one is reborn, falsely slander him in that very place, until he attains the state of an arhat."

Her two brothers asked her: "Sister, what aspiration have you made?" She told them: "Brothers, it was this: such and such." The two of them said: "If that is so, we two are also your brothers, so the four witnesses should be called to hear it."

Now, monks, you should know this: the householder's son, Truth-Speaker, of that time and that age — he is Jātila Nanda of the present. The stepmother of that time and that age — she is the nun Mṛgī of the present. The two brothers of that time and that age — they are the monks Mitra and Jātilaka. The karmic maturation of the act of falsely slandering the stepmother with what was not true — through that ripening, for many hundreds of years...

...for many thousands of years he was tormented in the hell realms, and through the residual force of that very same karma, for five hundred lifetimes this one falsely slandered her with what was not true, and the two of them called the four witnesses against him. Thus it is that even now, having attained arhatship itself, the nun who is his friend falsely slandered him with what was not true, and his friend and the two born of the earth called the four witnesses against him.

As for the fact that he was declared supreme among those who dwell in forest lodgings — that came about through the power of aspiration. And where was that aspiration made? Monks, long ago in a time that has passed, in this very fortunate eon, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher — the Tathāgata, the arhat, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, the knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, the Teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One — the buddha Kāśyapa appeared in the world. He dwelt in dependence upon the Deer Park forest called Ṛṣivadana near Vārāṇasī.

In that Teacher's dispensation this one went forth, and the monk who ordained him was declared supreme among those who dwell in forest lodgings by the Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa. Now this one, practicing the holy life for as long as he lived, attained not even a single accumulation of good qualities, and at the time of his death he made an aspiration in these words: "Throughout the Blessed One's — the Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened, the unsurpassed field of offering, Kāśyapa's — dispensation, I have practiced the holy life for as long as I lived and attained not a single accumulation of good qualities. By this root of virtue of practicing the holy life for as long as I lived, may I, in the future — when the lifespan of beings is one hundred years, in the time when the Tathāgata, the arhat, the fully and perfectly awakened, endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, the knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, the Teacher of gods and humans, the buddha and Blessed One to be called Śākyamuni, has been prophesied by the Blessed One Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa, who said to the brahmin youth who was his teacher: 'Brahmin youth, in the future, when the lifespan of beings is one hundred years, there will appear a Tathāgata, arhat, fully and perfectly awakened, endowed with knowledge and conduct, Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, Teacher of gods and humans, a buddha and Blessed One named Śākyamuni' — in that dispensation may I go forth, and by abandoning all afflictions may I realize arhatship, and just as this preceptor was declared supreme among those who dwell in forest lodgings by the Blessed One Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa, so too may I be declared supreme among those who dwell in forest lodgings by the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, the chief king of the Śākyas." Having begun to set down that aspiration, through the power of that aspiration, he has now been declared by the Tathāgata supreme among those who dwell in forest lodgings.

Monks, that being so: the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is wholly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is also mixed.

Monks, therefore, having abandoned actions that are wholly dark and mixed, you should strive for actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train yourselves in just this way.

The eighth section on the Saṅgha's remainder, concerning baseless slander, is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove of the Cool Forest. At that time the venerable Śreṇika Bimbisāra was sitting on Vulture Peak Hill at Rājagṛha...

Not far from there was a pond called the Stone-walled Pond. Beside it the venerable Nandaka used to spend his days.

Now, at the time when the blue-lotus-hued spiritual friend, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, had gone forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya in reliance on him, and had conquered what was to be conquered — fully achieved the arhat's liberation — at that time, Śreṇika Bimbisāra, having learned of this and filled with faith, would go again and again to see the Blessed One and the elder monks, the elders. And in particular, thinking that it must be a hardship for the venerable Nandaka — though he had attained meditative absorption in the eight liberations of the arhat's liberation — to have set aside the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, and entering into meditative absorption and to apply himself instead to the administrative duties belonging to the Saṅgha, Bimbisāra would go again and again to look upon him.

Then on another occasion, having paid homage at the feet of the Blessed One and the elder monks, the elders, Bimbisāra went to where the venerable Nandaka was, arrived there, touched his head to the venerable Nandaka's two feet in homage, and sat down before him in order to hear the Dharma.

At that time, two monks — one called Friend and one called Earth-born — found a heap of dirty rags. These two had harbored enmity against the venerable Nandaka from life to life across many lifetimes, and were always striving to find some fault with him. So Friend said to Earth-born: "Earth-born, where shall we take these dirty rags to wash them?" Earth-born replied: "The Stone-walled Pond has little traffic and clean surroundings, so let us go there." The two of them carried the dirty rags, went to the Stone-walled Pond, rinsed the rags there, spread them out in the sun, and laid them down to dry.

At that time, herds of deer came to the Stone-walled Pond, drank the water, and then departed. Now it is the nature of deer to mount one another's backs, and so it happened that one stag mounted the back of a doe and began engaging in unchaste conduct, the act of mating.

Friend saw this and said: "Earth-born! Go and tell the monks that Nandaka has engaged in unchaste conduct, the act of mating, with the nun Utpalavarṇā." Earth-born replied: "Venerable Friend, even then it would have been better for the two of us to stay and do the work of washing right there. Do you really still want to take up that work of staying and washing?" Friend said: "Venerable Earth-born, at that time it was indeed not proper — but now I have a plan in mind. Did you not see Nandaka engaging in unchaste conduct, the act of mating, with the nun Utpalavarṇā? Venerable one, how could there be any lying about this? Come, let us go and report it to the monks."

Earth-born, deceived by Friend, was persuaded, and the two of them went to the monastery hall and said to the monks: "Venerable ones, we ourselves have seen the venerable Nandaka engaging in unchaste conduct, the act of mating, with the nun Utpalavarṇā. On whose faith or trust should we go?" The monks replied: "Venerable two — could you really be reviling, by a charge consistent with the portion belonging to others that is contrary to their part, one who has gods and humans within his purview, who does not abide among hell-beings, hungry ghosts, or animals — a monk who is an arhat, who has attained meditative absorption in the eight liberations, who demonstrates the supreme superhuman miracle of the higher faculties of a noble one — accusing him in a manner that would bring about a defeat?"

The two of them said: "Venerable ones, we have not wronged him — rather, it is as follows: we should pluck out our own eyes that saw what they saw. What did the Blessed One previously see with regard to those two? How did he see it? Where did he see it? Since you two went there for some purpose and saw it there, explain this thoroughly and examine it well." And thus the Blessed One declared: "Examine them as to what they saw, how they saw it, where they saw it, and why, having gone there for some reason, they claim to have seen it there — explain this well and investigate." The monks then questioned those two thoroughly, examining them as to what they saw, how they saw it, where they saw it, and why they had gone there and seen it there. After the many monks had questioned and examined them thoroughly, the two said: "Venerable ones, the venerable Nandaka did not engage with the nun Utpalavarṇā in the act of mating, which is unchaste conduct. Rather, venerable ones, Nandaka gave us — three times in a row, by striking us with extremely unpleasant and utterly repulsive food of the kind that, when eaten, causes one's stomach to heave — cause to revile the venerable Nandaka by a charge consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part, a charge that would bring about a defeat. But the venerable Nandaka did not engage with the nun Utpalavarṇā in unchaste conduct, the act of mating. Thus, monks, a pure monk is one without a downfall. Why do monks of little account revile, mock, disparage, and slander a pure monk who is without a downfall by leveling against him a charge consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part, a charge that would bring about a defeat?" At that, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this founding case, and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The rule of training to be proclaimed by my hearers in the Vinaya shall be as follows:

"If any monk, out of anger and aversion, with the intention 'by some means I will sever this one from the celibate life,' charges a pure monk who is without a downfall with a defeat-incurring offense by a charge consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part, and later — whether he is asked or not — that same dispute proves to be consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part, and that dispute, being consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part, involves something that was conceived only slightly and barely deliberated upon and taken up as a matter of some concern, and the monk remains in aversion and spoke from aversion — that is an offense requiring the deliberation of the Saṅgha."

Now, "any monk" means a friend, one born of the land, or anyone else of that sort. "Out of anger" means being agitated and upset. "Having become averse" means having become displeased, without having dispelled the agitation. "With the intention of by some means severing this one from the celibate life" means with the thought of severing this one from the monk's way of life by any means. "A pure monk" means Nandaka or anyone else of that kind. "Without a downfall" means without a downfall in that particular matter. As for "consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part" — "what belongs to others" refers to nirvāṇa, and "contrary to their part" refers to the four defeat-incurring phenomena. "Defeat-incurring" means any one of the four. "By a charge" means that what is not the Dharma is stated under the name of the Dharma. "From a charge" means from having made the accusation. "Later" means at a different time. "Whether he is asked" means asked by others. "Whether not asked" means that he himself — having become remorseful, somewhat remorseful, thoroughly remorseful, or extremely remorseful — comes to regret it on his own. "That same dispute" refers to the fourfold dispute that is to be examined: a dispute arising from a failure to select, a dispute arising from a transgression, and a dispute arising from a matter of procedure.

"Contrary to their part and in conformity with it" means: "contrary to the part of nirvāṇa and in conformity with it, which results in defeat."

As for the expression "that dispute, through something contrary to their part and in conformity with it, took up some phenomenon conceived of as no more than a fleeting thought beyond a mere impulse" — "no more than a fleeting thought beyond a mere impulse" refers to a male or female deer. "Phenomenon" means that what is not the Dharma is stated under the name of the Dharma. "Took up" means having grasped it.

"A monk, moreover, while abiding in aversion" means with the intention of making a false accusation. "If it is said that he spoke out of aversion" means: if one were to say that he made a false accusation. "A saṅghāvaśeṣa" is as before — and therefore it is said to be a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

Now, how does a transgression come about in that regard?

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that results in defeat, comes to form the view that there is no transgression in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that results in defeat, comes to form the view that it is a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that results in defeat, comes to form the view that it is a transgression entailing expiation in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that results in defeat, comes to form the view that it is a transgression to be individually confessed in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that results in defeat, comes to form the view that it is a wrongdoing in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that there is no transgression in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is precisely a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is precisely a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is a transgression requiring individual confession in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is a wrongdoing in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that there is no transgression in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is a transgression requiring individual confession in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression, comes to form the view that it is a wrongdoing in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression requiring individual confession, comes to form the view that there is no transgression in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression requiring individual confession, comes to form the view that there is a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression requiring individual confession, comes to form the view that it is a wrongdoing in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression requiring individual confession, comes to form the very view that it is itself a transgression requiring individual confession, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression requiring individual confession, comes to form the view that it is a misdeed in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that is a misdeed, comes to form the view that there is no transgression in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that is a misdeed, comes to form the view that there is a saṅghāvaśeṣa in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that is a misdeed, comes to form the view that it is a wrongdoing in that act, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that is a misdeed, comes to form the view that it is a transgression requiring individual confession, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

If a monk, having seen another monk committing a transgression that is a misdeed, comes to form the very view that it is itself a misdeed, and then — having shifted his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, and his view — says: "I saw a monk committing a transgression that results in defeat," that becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

There is no transgression when a bell has been rung. There is likewise no transgression from the point at which something has been written in outline on a surface. And there is no transgression if one thinks: "Just as I myself know it, so too does the whole world know it."

There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is deranged, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations. The ninth section of the saṅghāvaśeṣa rules concerned with what is not another's part is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove of the Cool Forest. At that time a severe famine arose, and it became difficult for wandering mendicants in the wilderness to obtain alms. There were among them certain monks who had attained supernormal powers. These monks went to the Jambu tree — the tree from which Jambudvīpa takes its name — and gathered ripe Jambu fruits endowed with color, fragrance, and flavor. They also went to the surrounding groves of myrobalan, bilva, and kapittha trees and gathered ripe fruits from those groves, fruits endowed with color, fragrance, and flavor, filled their bowls with them and carried them back; they themselves enjoyed them fully, and when there was any remainder they distributed it among the other monks as well. They went east to Videha and west to Godānīya, and north to Uttarakuru, where they gathered ripe grains of sāli rice that had grown unsown and unplanted, filled their bowls with them and carried them back; they themselves enjoyed them fully, and when there was any remainder they distributed it among the other monks as well. They went among the gods of the class of the Four Great Kings, and they went among the gods of the class of the Thirty-Three, gathering divine ambrosia, filling their bowls with it and carrying it back; they themselves enjoyed it fully, and when there was any remainder they distributed it among the other monks as well. They went to whatever lands were prosperous and flourishing, happy and blessed with good harvests, filled with many people and inhabitants, and gathered there fine prepared foods and pure eatables, filled their bowls with them and carried them back; they themselves enjoyed them fully, and when there was any remainder they distributed it among the other monks as well.

Then the monk Lhaje thought to himself: Right now a severe famine has arisen, and it has become difficult for wandering mendicants in the wilderness to obtain alms. Here there are certain monks who have attained supernormal powers. They go to the Jambu tree — the tree from which Jambudvīpa takes its name — and gather ripe Jambu fruits endowed with color, fragrance, and flavor; and from the surrounding groves of myrobalan, bilva, and kapittha trees they gather ripe fruits endowed with color, fragrance, and flavor, fill their bowls with them and carry them back; they themselves enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder they distribute it among the other monks as well. They go east to Videha and west to Godānīya, and north to Uttarakuru, and gather ripe grains of sāli rice that have grown unsown and unplanted, fill their bowls with them and carry them back; they themselves enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder they distribute it among the other monks as well. They go among the gods of the class of the Four Great Kings and among the gods of the class of the Thirty-Three, gather divine ambrosia, fill their bowls with it and carry it back; they themselves enjoy it fully, and when there is any remainder they distribute it among the other monks as well. They go to whatever lands are prosperous and flourishing, happy and blessed with good harvests, filled with many people and inhabitants, and gather there fine prepared foods and pure eatables, fill their bowls with them and carry them back; they themselves enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder they distribute it among the other monks as well. But as for me —

"If I too were to attain supernatural powers, I too would go to the jambu tree — that very tree from which Jambudvīpa takes its name — and gather ripe fruits of the jambu, endowed with fine color, fragrance, and taste. And in the groves round about it — the groves of myrobalan, of bilva, and of kapittha — I would gather ripe fruits of those trees as well, endowed with fine color, fragrance, and taste, fill my bowl with them and carry it back; I myself would enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder I would distribute it among the monks as well. I would go to the Eastern Continent of Videha, and to the Western Continent of Aparagodānīya, and to the Northern Continent of Uttarakuru, and gather grains of unhusked, unsown sāli rice, fill my bowl with them and carry it back; I myself would enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder I would distribute it among the monks as well. I would go among the gods of the class of the Four Great Kings, and among the gods of the class of the Thirty-Three, and gather divine ambrosia, fill my bowl with it and carry it back; I myself would enjoy it fully, and when there is any remainder I would distribute it among the monks as well. I would go to whatever lands are prosperous and flourishing, happy and blessed with good harvests, filled with many people and inhabitants, and gather there fine prepared foods and pure eatables, fill my bowl with them and carry it back; I myself would enjoy them fully, and when there is any remainder I would distribute it among the monks as well. But then, who is there who is able to show me the path to supernatural power?" And so thinking, Devadat went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, Devadatta spoke thus to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please show me the path to supernatural power." Thereupon the Blessed One, having understood in his mind that such a sinful and corrupt desire had arisen in Devadatta, spoke to Devadatta thus: "Son of Gautama, apply yourself strenuously to the higher moral discipline, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well. Son of Gautama, apply yourself strenuously to the higher mind and the higher wisdom, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well." Then Devadatta thought to himself: "The Blessed One will not show me the path to supernatural power." Recognizing this, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, departed from the presence of the Blessed One, went to where the Venerable Ājñātakauṇḍinya was, and having arrived, spoke to the Venerable Ājñātakauṇḍinya thus: "Venerable elder, please show me the path to supernatural power." Then the Venerable Ājñātakauṇḍinya reflected on the mind of the Blessed One, and recognizing as well that such a sinful and corrupt desire had arisen in Devadatta, spoke to Devadatta thus: "Devadatta, attend to form properly and correctly, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well. Devadatta, attend to feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness properly and correctly, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well." Then Devadatta thought to himself: "The elder Ājñātakauṇḍinya too will not show me the path to supernatural power." Recognizing this, he went to where the Venerable Aśvajit, the Venerable Bhadrika, the Venerable Vāṣpa, the Venerable Mahānāman, the Venerable Bhadrakṣita, the Venerable Kimbila, the Venerable Nirmala, and the Venerable Gavāmpati went to where the Venerable Suhastin and the other five hundred elders were staying. Having arrived, he said to them: "May the elders please show me the path to supernatural power." Then the five hundred elders looked carefully into the minds of the Blessed One and of the monks, the elder and the elders, and recognized that such a wicked form of desire had arisen in Devadatta. They spoke to Devadatta as follows: "Devadatta, attend to form properly and correctly, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well. Devadatta, attend to feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness properly and correctly, and supernatural powers and other qualities will come to you as well." Then Devadatta thought to himself: "The five hundred elders too will not show me the path to supernatural power. These venerable ones have long walked together with the Blessed One, and for that reason not one of them will show me the path to supernatural power. Who else, then, is there who is capable of showing me the path to supernatural power?"

At that time the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers was dwelling in a cave on Grdhrakūṭa Hill at Rājagṛha. Then Devadatta thought to himself: "This elder, the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers, has from of old been without guile, without deceit, straightforward and of a straightforward nature, and he is the preceptor of my elder brother Ānanda. The Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers is capable of showing me the path to supernatural power." Recognizing this, he went to where the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers was staying. Having arrived, he prostrated himself with his head at the feet of the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, Devadatta said to the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers: "May the elder please show me the path to supernatural power."

Then the Venerable Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers, without looking into the minds of the Blessed One and of the monks, the elder and the elders, and without taking into account that such a wicked form of desire had arisen in Devadatta, showed Devadatta the path to supernatural power.

Then Devadatta, neither sleeping during the first watch of the night nor the last, striving with diligent effort throughout, and relying upon the first meditative concentration (dhyāna), accomplished supernatural powers through a worldly path. Having done so, from being one he became many; from being many he became one. He experienced both appearance and non-appearance through knowing and seeing. He passed through walls, through embankments, through mountains with his body without obstruction, just as a bird moves through the sky. He rose up through the earth and submerged into it, just as a bird moves through water. He walked upon water without sinking, going along its surface, just as upon the great earth. He traveled through the sky seated cross-legged, just as a winged bird does. He produced smoke and he produced flames, like a great mass of fire. From his body he drew forth great streams of water, like a great cloud. And he reached out and touched with his hand the sun and the moon, great as they are in supernatural power, great in might, and great in splendor.

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "From that Jambu tree by whose name this continent is known as Jambudvīpa, ripe Jambu fruits have fallen — fruits endowed with color and fragrance and taste — and in the groves of emblic myrobalan, bael fruit, and kapittha that lay nearby, ripe fruits fell from those very trees — fruits endowed with color and fragrance and taste — and with these he filled his begging bowl and carried it away, to enjoy himself and, if any remained, to share the rest among the monks as well. And he went to the Eastern Continent of Videha, and to the Western Continent of Aparagodānīya, and to the Northern Continent of Uttarakuru, where unplowed and unsown rice grains filled his begging bowl, which he carried away to enjoy himself and, if any remained, to share the rest among the monks as well. And he went among the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings, and among the gods of the realm of the Thirty-Three, where he filled his begging bowl with divine nectar and carried it away to enjoy himself and, if any remained, to share the rest among the monks as well. And from those lands that were prosperous, flourishing, pleasant, of good harvest, and filled with people and multitudes, he gathered clean and choice prepared foods and dishes, filled his begging bowl with them and carried it away to enjoy himself and, if any remained, to share the rest among the monks as well. What good did all this do? In this land of Magadha, I should find a chief man to follow, he thought — and in this land of Magadha, whoever it is that, if followed, would with little effort cause the common multitude of people to follow as well — that is the chief man I should follow.

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "This young man, the Son of the Enemy, will, when his father has passed, stand as lord and master of his father's royal kingdom. Let me then follow the young Son of the Enemy, for if he follows me, the common multitude of people will follow along with little effort."

Then Devadatta transformed himself into a noble youth of a great elephant's power and entered through the gate of the young Son of the Enemy's house, came out through the window and entered through the window and came out through the gate. He transformed himself into a noble youth of a great horse's power and entered through the gate and came out through the window, and entered through the window and came out through the gate. Then, transforming himself into a shaven-headed monk wearing a patched robe, he entered through the gate of the young Son of the Enemy's house, came out through the window, and entered through the window and came out through the gate — whereupon the young Son of the Enemy recognized him, thinking: "Ah, this is the noble Devadatta!"

Then Devadatta transformed himself into a small golden-hued infant boy and crawled about on the lap of the young Son of the Enemy, and wriggled away, while the young Son of the Enemy embraced him, kissed him, and held him close, and even licked into his mouth — and this too happened thus: Devadatta, overwhelmed by gain and honor and with his mind entirely captivated, swallowed it down. And the young Son of the Enemy also recognized him, thinking: "Ah, this is the noble Devadatta!"

And then the young Son of the Enemy arrived at the vast and wicked view that "the noble Devadatta possesses greater miraculous powers even than the Teacher," and having come to faith in him, he set about performing acts of devotion on account of that faith: in the morning and in the evening he would come with a retinue of some five hundred chariots and pay attendance upon him. He would also offer clusters of food cooked in some five hundred vessels.

Devadatta, too, would seat some five hundred monks in rows for a meal. Then, as a great many monks were out in the early morning — having put on their robes, taken up their bowls and outer cloaks, and entered Rājagṛha on alms-round — while wandering for alms in Rājagṛha, those many monks saw that gain and honor of such a kind had come to Devadatta: that King Ajātaśatru, son of Queen Vaidehī, born of the Licchavis of Magadha, was coming in the evening with a retinue of some five hundred chariots and paying attendance upon him; that he was offering clusters of food cooked in some five hundred vessels; and that Devadatta, too, was seating some five hundred monks in rows for a meal. Having seen this, those monks completed their alms-round in Rājagṛha and attended to the business of eating. Returning from the afternoon alms-round, they set aside their bowls and outer cloaks, washed their two feet, and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, they bowed down with their heads at the Blessed One's two feet and took a seat to one side. Seated to one side, a great many monks addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable One, this morning we many monks, having put on our robes, taken up our bowls and outer cloaks, and entered Rājagṛha on alms-round, while wandering for alms in Rājagṛha, saw that gain and honor of such a kind had come to Devadatta: that King Ajātaśatru, son of Queen Vaidehī, born of the Licchavis of Magadha, was coming in the evening with a retinue of some five hundred chariots and paying attendance upon him; that he was offering clusters of food cooked in some five hundred vessels; and that Devadatta, too, was seating some five hundred monks in rows for a meal. We have heard this, Venerable One."

The Blessed One said: "Monks, do not delight in Devadatta's gain and honor. Why is that? Because Devadatta's gain and honor will be his ruin; Devadatta's gain and honor will be his downfall.

"Monks, consider this: just as a plantain tree laden with fruit is ruined and brought down by that very fruit, so too Devadatta's gain and honor will be his ruin, and Devadatta's gain and honor will be his downfall.

"Consider this as well: just as a bamboo shoot and a reed are ruined and brought down by their fruit when they bear it, so too Devadatta's gain and honor will be his ruin, and Devadatta's gain and honor will be his downfall.

"Consider this further: just as a she-mule, when carrying the young within her womb, is ruined and brought down by that which she carries, so too Devadatta's gain and honor will be his ruin, and Devadatta's gain and honor will be his downfall.

"Monks, for as long as such gain and honor of that kind keep arising for Devadatta, it will be for that foolish man's long-lasting harm, injury, and suffering.

"Therefore, monks, you should train yourselves as follows: subdue gain and honor; and when gain and honor arise, do not let your minds become thoroughly entangled and abide in them. Monks, you should train yourselves in exactly this way."

The Blessed One had spoken those words, and having spoken them, the Sugata, the Teacher, further declared this:

The plantain is killed by its own fruit;
the bamboo is killed by bearing seed;
the she-mule is killed by what she carries in her womb — so too is the wicked one killed by honor.

Whatever fame a fool may win will turn to nothing but his ruin;

it destroys the white virtue of the fool and brings him crashing down from every height.

Then Devadatta, overwhelmed by gain and honor, his mind utterly addled, was visited by a wicked desire of this sort: "The Blessed One is now elderly, old, and worn; teaching the fourfold assembly — monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen — must tire him out. If only the Blessed One would entrust the community of monks to me, I would guide the community of monks, and the Blessed One, by applying himself diligently to the practice of dwelling at ease in this very life, would live with far less on his mind."

The very moment he gave rise to this thought, his supernatural powers were utterly lost. Though they were entirely lost, he did not even know that they were lost.

At that time, Kauṇḍinya's son, the venerable monk Moggalla of the Spotted Hair, a hearer of the Blessed One, had lived the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One, had cultivated the four divine abodes, had abandoned desire and craving for sense pleasures, and through dwelling long in that cultivation, he had been reborn in the brahma world in accordance with his deeds and station.

At that same time, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, the great son of Mudgala, was seated in the fearsome forest of Crocodile-Child-Killing Mountain, in the game-haunted wood among the sons of Śuddhodana.

Then Moggalla of the Spotted Hair, from that brahma world, perceived that Devadatta's supernatural powers had been entirely lost. Just as a man of great strength might extend an arm that had been drawn in, or draw in an arm that had been extended, so Moggalla of the Spotted Hair vanished from the brahma world and appeared in the fearsome forest of Crocodile-Child-Killing Mountain among the sons of Śuddhodana, seated before the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana.

Then Moggalla of the Spotted Hair said this to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana, please take note. Devadatta, overwhelmed by gain and honor, his mind utterly addled, has been visited by a wicked desire of this sort: 'The Blessed One is now elderly, old, and worn; teaching the fourfold assembly — monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen — must tire him out. If only the Blessed One would entrust the community of monks to me; I would then guide the community of monks, and the Blessed One, by applying himself diligently to the practice of dwelling at ease in this very life, would live with far less on his mind.' The very moment he gave rise to this thought, his supernatural powers were entirely lost, and though they were entirely lost, he does not even know that they are lost. Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, it would be well if you were to go to where the Blessed One is, approach him, and report this matter to the Blessed One in full."

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana said nothing in reply to Moggalla of the Spotted Hair and silently consented.

Then Moggalla of the Spotted Hair, having understood from the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana's silence that he had consented, prostrated his head at the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana's two feet and vanished from that very spot.

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, not long after Moggalla of the Spotted Hair had gone, entered into such a meditative absorption that, just as a strong man might stretch out an arm that was bent or draw back an arm that was stretched, so the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana disappeared from the Vulture's Sons and arrived dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, the Kalandaka's abode, at Rājagṛha.

Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived he prostrated his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana reported in full to the Blessed One everything that had been spoken in conversation between himself and Moggalla of the Spotted Hair.

When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One declared to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Son of Maudgala, did Devadatta speak those words only after you had already encompassed his mind with your mind and understood it?" "Venerable sir, it is so. I had already encompassed his mind with my mind and understood it, and it was after that that Moggalla of the Spotted Hair spoke."

Now, while the Blessed One was speaking these words in conversation with the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, Devadatta's companion monks — the four, namely Kokālika, Khaṇḍa the Raven-like, Katamoraka-tiṣya, and Samudradatta — went to where the Blessed One was. The Blessed One saw Devadatta from a great distance. Having seen him, he declared to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Son of Maudgala, Devadatta is coming. Now that fool will proclaim himself a prophet before me — so be silent."

Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana prostrated his head at the Blessed One's two feet and, just as a strong man might stretch out an arm that was bent or draw back an arm that was stretched, so the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana disappeared from the Bamboo Grove, the Kalandaka's abode, at Rājagṛha, and arrived dwelling among the Vulture's Sons, at the frightening forest on the mountain where the young crocodiles are slain, in the deer park. He entered into such a meditative absorption.

Then Devadatta went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived he prostrated his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, Devadatta addressed the Blessed One thus: "At present the Blessed One is old, aged, and worn. Since teaching all four assemblies — monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen — is a burden, it would be well if the Blessed One were to hand the community of monks over to me. I shall lead the community of monks in full, and the Blessed One, by applying himself to the practice of dwelling at ease in this very life, would live with far less on his mind. That fool Śāriputra and —"

— and Maudgalyāyana's son who keeps the holy life — I would not hand over the community of monks even to those two. As for handing it over to you — a spittle-eater, a leftover-licker — hardly!"

Then Devadatta thought to himself: "The Blessed One has praised Śāriputra's son and Maudgalyāyana's son, while calling me a spittle-eater and a leftover-licker — he has acted against me." And from that moment Devadatta harbored resentment toward the Blessed One, along with intolerance and distrust. Then Devadatta said, "Stay," bowed his head three times in dismissal, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

After Devadatta had gone and not long had passed, the Blessed One understood this in his mind and addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and gather together into the assembly hall every monk who is dwelling nearby in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Wood." The venerable Ānanda replied, "Reverend sir, I hear and obey," and having assembled into the assembly hall every monk who was dwelling nearby in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Wood, he went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived he prostrated his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Ānanda said this to the Blessed One: "Reverend sir, all the monks who are dwelling nearby in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Wood have assembled in the assembly hall and are ready. Blessed One, please consider that the time has now come." Then the Blessed One proceeded to the assembly hall, and having arrived he sat down on the seat that had been prepared at the head of the community of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks thus:

"Monks, these five kinds of teachers exist in the world and appear in existence. What are the five? Here, one kind of teacher, while his own moral discipline is not fully pure, claims: 'My moral discipline is fully pure and without any affliction.' His hearers, knowing this teacher to be wise through long association with him, come to know that he claims his moral discipline to be fully pure and without any affliction even though it is not so. Yet they think: 'If we were to tell others about this teacher, it would displease him; and what would we gain by displeasing him and thereby acting against the teacher? This wise teacher knows himself as he is.' And they think: 'He is sustaining us with robes, alms-food, lodging, and the requisites for illness and medicine.' So the hearers are minded to protect him in the matter of moral discipline as well. Such a teacher expects his hearers to protect him with respect to moral discipline. This is the first kind of teacher who exists in the world and appears in existence.

"Furthermore, here another kind of teacher, while his livelihood is not fully pure, claims: 'My livelihood is fully pure and without any affliction.'

Regarding that teacher, the hearers, through their close association with him, come to know: 'This wise teacher, even though his livelihood is not fully pure, claims: "My livelihood is fully pure and without any affliction." Yet if we were to speak of this teacher's failing to others, he would be displeased with us. And what use is it for someone whose displeasure makes him act badly toward his teacher? This wise teacher knows himself as he is.' And they think: 'He is sustaining us with robes, alms-food, lodging, and the requisites for illness and medicine.' So the hearers are minded to protect him in the matter of livelihood as well. Such a teacher expects his hearers to protect him with respect to livelihood. This is the second kind of teacher who exists in the world and appears in existence.

Furthermore, here another kind of teacher, while his knowledge and vision are not fully pure, claims: 'My knowledge and vision are fully pure and without any affliction.' Regarding that teacher, the hearers, through their close association with him, come to know: 'This wise teacher, even though his knowledge and vision are not fully pure, claims: "My knowledge and vision are fully pure and without any affliction." Yet if we were to speak of this teacher's failing to others, he would be displeased with us. And what use is it for someone whose displeasure makes him act badly toward his teacher? This wise teacher knows himself as he is.' And they think: 'He is sustaining us with robes, alms-food, lodging, and the requisites for illness and medicine.' So the hearers are minded to protect him in the matter of knowledge and vision as well. Such a teacher expects his hearers to protect him with respect to knowledge and vision. This is the third kind of teacher who exists in the world and appears in existence.

Furthermore, here another kind of teacher, while his skill in exposition is not excellent, claims: 'My skill in exposition is excellent and without any affliction.' Regarding that teacher, the hearers, through their close association with him, come to know: 'This wise teacher, even though his skill in exposition is not excellent, claims: "My skill in exposition is excellent and without any affliction." Yet if we were to speak of this teacher's failing to others, he would be displeased with us. And what use is it for someone whose displeasure makes him act badly toward his teacher? This wise teacher knows himself as he is.' And they think: 'He is sustaining us with robes, alms-food, lodging, and the requisites for illness and medicine.' So the hearers are minded to protect him in the matter of skill in exposition as well. Such a teacher expects his hearers to protect him with respect to skill in exposition. This is the fourth kind of teacher who exists in the world and appears in existence.

Furthermore, here another kind of teacher, while he possesses a Dharma and Vinaya that is poorly expounded, claims: 'I possess a Dharma and Vinaya that is well expounded and without any affliction.' Regarding that teacher, the hearers, through their close association with him, come to know: 'This wise teacher, even though he possesses a Dharma and Vinaya that is poorly expounded, claims: "I possess a Dharma and Vinaya that is well expounded and without any affliction." Yet if we were to speak of this teacher's failing to others, he would be displeased by it, and so they think: 'What is the use of going to this teacher and causing him displeasure through that very displeasure? This wise teacher knows only what he himself knows. He thinks of us like this: in terms of robes, alms-food, lodging, care in sickness, and medicinal requisites.' And so the hearers resolve to protect and guard him through the door of the Dharma and Vinaya as well expounded. Such a teacher expects the hearers to guard what is well expounded in the Dharma and Vinaya. This is the fifth kind of teacher who exists in the world and appears in existence.

O monks, I declare: 'I alone am one whose moral discipline is perfectly pure; my moral discipline is perfectly pure and utterly without affliction.' I do not think that the hearers should guard me through the door of moral discipline, nor do I expect the hearers to guard what pertains to moral discipline.

O monks, I declare: 'I alone am one whose livelihood is perfectly pure; my livelihood is perfectly pure and utterly without affliction.' I do not think that the hearers should guard me through the door of livelihood, nor do I expect the hearers to guard what pertains to livelihood.

O monks, I declare: 'I alone am one whose knowledge and vision are perfectly pure; my knowledge and vision are perfectly pure and utterly without affliction.' I do not think that the hearers should guard me through the door of knowledge and vision, nor do I expect the hearers to guard what pertains to knowledge and vision.

O monks, I declare: 'I alone am one of excellent instruction; my instruction is excellent and utterly without affliction.' I do not think that the hearers should guard me through the door of excellent instruction, nor do I expect the hearers to guard what pertains to excellent instruction.

O monks, I declare: 'I alone possess a Dharma and Vinaya that is well expounded; my Dharma and Vinaya is well expounded and utterly without affliction.' I do not think that the hearers should guard me through the door of the well-expounded Dharma and Vinaya, nor do I expect the hearers to guard what is well expounded in the Dharma and Vinaya.

O monks, I speak to you having cut through and cut through again, having overpowered and overpowered again. I do not hold you as worthless. Like a potter setting down unfired vessels, I place whatever is essential there. Bear with the paths of my words.

Then Devadatta said to Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyā, Kaṭamorakātiyā, and Samudradatta: 'Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyā, Kaṭamorakātiyā, Samudradatta — come here. While the ascetic Gautama sits by, let us divide the harmonious Saṅgha of hearers and break the wheel as well. If we do so, then after we have died, when the time comes, a great and widely renowned sound of praise will spread in all directions and in all quarters, declaring: "Even though the ascetic Gautama was possessed of such great miraculous power and such great might, Devadatta, Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyā, Kaṭamorakātiyā, and Samudradatta divided the harmonious Saṅgha of hearers and broke the wheel."

Devadatta replied: 'We are not able to do this. Why? Because the hearers of the Blessed One are possessed of great power, great miraculous ability, and the divine eye.

Those who have knowledge of others' minds can see from a great distance, and though someone sits right beside them they may not perceive it that way — yet those knowers will pervade our minds with their own minds, and through their mental consciousness they will come to know us. And so they will come to know our very intentions. Kokālika replied: 'There is one method, however.' Devadatta asked: 'What is that method?' Kokālika answered: 'Come here, and let us go to the elder monks, the venerable ones among our community of monks. Let us ask the elders to regard us with a little kindness, and let us attend upon all the elders with all manner of requisites, saying: "We will relieve you of all concern about every requisite." For the young monks, let us serve and honor them with alms bowl, robe, net, small bowl, belt, the recitation of texts, the reading of texts, the chanting of texts, yoga, and mental application, and let us remain with them in that way.' Devadatta replied: 'If there is such a method as this, let it be done so.'

Then Devadatta began to intrigue with the intention of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. The elder monks of the community immediately came to know: 'Devadatta is intriguing with the intention of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha.' The monks then reported this matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One addressed the monks: 'Monks, go and admonish Devadatta and anyone else of that kind. Admonish them with these words: "Venerable Devadatta, do not intrigue with the intention of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not take up a dispute that would cause division and cling to it and persist in it. Venerable Devadatta, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha that is harmonious, undivided, rejoicing together, without strife, is most excellent — reciting with one voice, blended together like water and milk — and if it illumines the teaching of the Teacher, you will dwell in contact with happiness. Venerable Devadatta, give up this kind of basis for dividing the Saṅgha." Go and admonish him thus.'

The monks replied: 'As you command, Venerable One,' and having heard the Blessed One, they went to Devadatta and admonished him: 'Venerable Devadatta, do not intrigue with the intention of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not take up a dispute that would cause division and cling to it and persist in it. Venerable Devadatta, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha that is harmonious, undivided, rejoicing together, without strife, is most excellent — reciting with one voice, blended together like water and milk — and if it illumines the teaching of the Teacher, you will dwell in contact with happiness. Venerable Devadatta, give up this kind of basis for dividing the Saṅgha.' They went and admonished him thus.

But though the monks admonished him, he stubbornly clung to that very basis, held to it tenaciously, became attached to it, and continued to assert: 'This alone is the truth; everything else is false.' The monks then reported all of this in full to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: 'Monks, you should admonish Devadatta and anyone else of that kind with a formal act performed through a motion and three announcements. Admonish him in this way: having prepared the seats and struck the wooden signal board, and having properly informed all the monks with the words of inquiry, when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, one monk shall make the motion and perform the formal act. Let the noble members of the Saṅgha hear. This monk Devadatta has intrigued with the intention of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha —' — having fully taken up and firmly grasped the dispute that would cause division, and having come forward. Even though many monks admonish him in this matter, even when admonished by many monks in this matter, he tenaciously and supremely grasps at that very position, clings to it, and declares in its regard: "This alone is true; everything else is false." If it suits the moment and is acceptable to the Saṅgha, let the Saṅgha grant permission. Let the Saṅgha admonish the venerable Devadatta: "Venerable Devadatta, do not intrigue for the purpose of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not sit having fully taken up and firmly grasped the dispute that would cause division. Venerable Devadatta, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha, undivided and harmonious, joyful on all sides, without dispute, one in recitation, blended together like water and milk — if it illumines the teaching of the Teacher, it will abide in the touch of well-being. Venerable Devadatta, abandon this ground of a kind that divides the Saṅgha." This is the motion. The formal act is to be performed as follows.

Let the noble members of the Saṅgha hear. This monk Devadatta, having intrigued for the purpose of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha, has fully taken up and firmly grasped the dispute that would cause division, and has come forward. Even though many monks admonish him in this matter, even when admonished by many monks in this matter, he tenaciously and supremely grasps at that very position, clings to it, and declares: "This alone is true; everything else is false." Therefore, let the Saṅgha admonish Devadatta: "Venerable Devadatta, do not intrigue for the purpose of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not sit having fully taken up and firmly grasped the dispute that would cause division. Venerable Devadatta, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha, undivided and harmonious, joyful on all sides, without dispute, one in recitation, blended together like water and milk — if it illumines the teaching of the Teacher, it will abide in the touch of well-being. Venerable Devadatta, abandon this ground of a kind that divides the Saṅgha." Let the Saṅgha perform the formal act of admonishing Devadatta through a motion and three announcements. Those among the venerable ones who accept and approve of performing the formal act of admonishing Devadatta through a motion and three announcements — let them remain silent. Those who do not accept — let them speak. This is the first announcement of the formal act. In the same way it is repeated a second and a third time.

The Saṅgha has accepted and approved, and the Saṅgha has performed the formal act of admonishing Devadatta through a motion and three announcements. Since no one has spoken, it is accordingly upheld. The monks, having heard from the Blessed One, replied: "Venerable one, we shall act in accordance with your command," and performed the formal act of admonishing Devadatta through a motion and three announcements. Even when admonished through a motion and three announcements, he tenaciously and supremely grasped at that very position, clung to it, and declared: "This alone is true; everything else is false."

Now the four monks who were his accomplices, who followed after him and spoke in his support — Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyāputra, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradatta — said this to the monks: "Venerable ones, whether it be virtue or non-virtue, say nothing whatsoever against this monk. For why is this? Venerable ones, this monk speaks the Dharma; this monk speaks the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and Vinaya and so declares accordingly. This monk speaks with full awareness."

— for he does not speak in ignorance. Whatever this monk approves and accepts, we too approve and accept." This is what they had been saying. At that point the monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, summon Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyāputra, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata, and anyone else of that same kind, and deliver this message to them:

'Venerable Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyāputra, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata — you are knowingly acting as companions to a monk who, with full awareness, is undermining the Saṅgha for the sake of dividing it, and who, having taken up and firmly grasped a dispute that leads to schism, remains fixed in that position. Do not align yourselves with him or speak in opposition to the Saṅgha. And do not say to the monks: "Venerable ones, whether it be virtue or non-virtue, say nothing whatsoever against this monk — for this monk speaks the Dharma, this monk speaks the Vinaya; this monk, having fully taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and Vinaya, declares accordingly; this monk speaks with full awareness, not in ignorance; whatever this monk approves and accepts, we too approve and accept." For why is this? Venerable ones, this monk does not speak the Dharma; this monk does not speak the Vinaya. Rather, venerable ones, this monk speaks what is not the Dharma and speaks what is not the Vinaya. This monk, having fully taken up and firmly grasped what is not the Dharma and not the Vinaya, declares accordingly. This monk speaks in ignorance, not with awareness. Therefore, venerable ones, do not approve and accept what this monk approves and accepts.

Venerable ones, do not seek to divide the Saṅgha; rather, venerable ones, seek harmony in the Saṅgha. Venerable ones, be of one accord with the Saṅgha. A Saṅgha that is harmonious, not divided, rejoices together, does not quarrel, recites with one voice, lives blended as one like water and milk, and illuminates the Teacher's teaching — such a Saṅgha abides in contact with happiness. Venerable ones, abandon this course of aligning with those who speak in opposition and who support the division of the Saṅgha."

The monks replied: "Reverend sir, as you command," and having heard the Blessed One, they went to the four monks — Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyāputra, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata — who were acting as companions to the schismatic monk and speaking in his support, and said this to them:

"Venerable ones, you are knowingly acting as companions to a monk who, with full awareness, is undermining the Saṅgha for the sake of dividing it, and who, having taken up and firmly grasped a dispute that leads to schism, remains fixed in that position. Do not align yourselves with him or speak in opposition. Do not say to the monks: 'Venerable ones, whether it be virtue or non-virtue, say nothing whatsoever against this monk,' — for why? Venerable ones, this monk does not speak the Dharma; this monk does not speak the Vinaya. Rather, venerable ones, this monk speaks what is not the Dharma and speaks what is not the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped what is not the Dharma and what is not the Vinaya, and applies designations accordingly. This monk speaks in ignorance, not in knowledge. Therefore, venerable ones, do not desire and consent to what this monk desires and consents to. Venerable ones, do not wish to divide the Saṅgha; rather, venerable ones, wish for the Saṅgha to be in harmony. Venerable ones, be in accord with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha in harmony, undivided, rejoicing together, without quarrel — like a single recitation recited in unison, like water and milk blended into one — will, by making the teaching of the Teacher shine clearly, come to dwell in the touch of happiness. Venerable ones, instruct and admonish those who side with the dividers of the Saṅgha and who speak in opposition, saying: Abandon this conduct of siding with those who divide the Saṅgha and speaking in opposition.

When the monks had gently admonished them in this way, those monks nonetheless forcefully seized that very same position, clung to it with attachment, and continued to apply their designations, saying: "This alone is true; everything else is false." At that point, the monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

Monks, you should admonish Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviya, Kaṭamorakatissaka, and Samuddadatta, and others of that kind, by means of the formal act of admonishment with the triple request. The admonishment is to be carried out thus: having arranged the seats, having sounded the wooden signal board, having duly instructed the monks with the proper words of inquiry, with the entire Saṅgha assembled and in harmony, one monk shall make the formal motion and perform the act.

May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. These monks — Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviya, Kaṭamorakatissaka, and Samuddadatta — have fully taken up and firmly grasped a dispute that will lead them to undermine and divide the harmony of the Saṅgha, and they act as companions to the one who holds it, speaking in opposition. When the monks gently admonished them, though admonished by the monks, they still forcefully seized that very same position, clung to it with attachment, and continued to apply their designations, saying: "This alone is true; everything else is false." If it seems to the Saṅgha that the time is right and that it consents, the Saṅgha should approve. The Saṅgha hereby admonishes the monks Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviya, Kaṭamorakatissaka, and Samuddadatta:

Venerable ones, knowingly do not act as companions to, and do not speak in opposition alongside, a monk who, with full awareness, takes up and firmly grasps a dispute that leads to undermining and dividing the harmony of the Saṅgha. Do not say to the monks: "Venerable ones, whether it be virtue or non-virtue, say nothing whatsoever against this monk" — for why? Venerable ones, this monk speaks the Dharma; this monk speaks the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and the Vinaya, and applies designations accordingly. This monk speaks knowingly, not in ignorance. Therefore, venerable ones, do not say: "We too desire and consent to what this monk desires and consents to" — for why? Venerable ones, this monk does not speak the Dharma; this monk does not speak the Vinaya. Rather, venerable ones, this monk speaks what is not the Dharma and speaks what is not the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped what is not the Dharma and what is not the Vinaya, and applies designations accordingly. This monk speaks in ignorance, not in knowledge. Therefore, venerable ones, do not desire and consent to what this monk desires and consents to. Venerable ones, do not wish to divide the Saṅgha; rather, venerable ones, wish only for the harmony of the Saṅgha. Venerable ones, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha, undivided and harmonious, rejoices together without dispute, with one recitation and one accord, blended together like water and milk. If you illuminate the teaching of the Teacher, you will abide in contact with happiness. Venerable ones, abandon this — this siding with those who would divide the Saṅgha and speaking in discord." Such was the motion, and the act was carried out by the formal procedure of motion-and-three-announcements.

This is the motion. The act is to be performed as follows: "Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeva, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradatta — these monks, supporting one who has fully taken up and firmly grasped a dispute by which he would corrupt and divide the harmonious Saṅgha, and speaking in discord — the monks have admonished them and given them formal instruction. Even though they have been admonished and given formal instruction by the monks, they still stubbornly cling to and are attached to that very same position, and they apply the designation: 'This alone is true; anything else is false.' Therefore the Saṅgha, addressing Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeva, Kaṭamorakāṭīṣya, and Samudradatta: 'Venerable ones, you, knowingly, are supporting one who has fully taken up and firmly grasped a dispute by which he would corrupt and divide the harmonious Saṅgha, and you are siding with one who speaks in discord — do not do this. And do not say to the monks: "Venerable ones, whether it be wholesome or unwholesome, say nothing at all against this monk." For why? Venerable ones, this monk speaks the Dharma; this monk speaks the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and the Vinaya, and applies designations accordingly. This monk speaks in knowledge, not in ignorance. Therefore do not say: 'We too desire and consent to what this monk desires and consents to.' For why? Venerable ones, this monk does not speak the Dharma; this monk does not speak the Vinaya. Rather, venerable ones, this monk speaks what is not the Dharma and speaks what is not the Vinaya. This monk has fully taken up and firmly grasped what is not the Dharma and what is not the Vinaya, and applies designations accordingly. This monk speaks in ignorance, not in knowledge. Therefore, venerable ones, do not desire and consent to what this monk desires and consents to. Venerable ones, do not wish to divide the Saṅgha; rather, venerable ones, wish only for the harmony of the Saṅgha. Venerable ones, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha, undivided and harmonious, rejoices together without dispute, with one recitation and one accord, blended together like water and milk. If you illuminate the teaching of the Teacher, you will abide in contact with happiness. Venerable ones, abandon this — this siding with those who would divide the Saṅgha and speaking in discord." If such formal instruction is given by motion-and-three-announcements,

Those venerable ones — Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakāṭīṣya, and Samudradatta — who consent to the formal instruction given to them by motion-and-three-announcements should say nothing. Those who do not consent should speak. This is the first recitation of the motion. In the same way it is recited a second and a third time. The Saṅgha, having consented and agreed, hereby gives formal instruction to Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakāṭīṣya, and Samudradatta by motion-and-three-announcements. Since no one speaks, it is accordingly thus accepted.

The monks, having heard from the Blessed One, said, "Venerable ones, we ask that you follow the instruction," and gave formal instruction to Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata by motion-and-three-announcements. Even though they were given that formal instruction by motion-and-three-announcements, those four seized even more tightly upon that very same position, clung to it with attachment, and continued to designate it, saying, "This alone is true; all else is false." Thereupon the monks reported this in full to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, Devadatta is capable of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha of my śrāvakas and of turning the wheel of schism — for there are these four monks who side with the one who speaks in discord, who are his companions and allies: Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata."

Then Devadatta heard it said: "The ascetic Gautama has declared to the monks that Devadatta is capable of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha of his śrāvakas and of turning the wheel of schism — for there are these four monks who side with the one who speaks in discord, who are his companions: Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata — and has thus prophesied concerning me." Having heard this, Devadatta said to Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata: "Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata — know this! The ascetic Gautama has prophesied concerning me, saying that Devadatta is capable of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha of his śrāvakas and of turning the wheel of schism — for there are these four monks who side with the one who speaks in discord, who are his companions: Kokālika, Khaṇḍadevi, Kaṭamorakatisya, and Samudradata."

They replied, "Devadatta, if that is so, then excellent!" And as he then set about earnestly striving to divide the Saṅgha on a wide scale, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon, regarding this occurrence, this ground, and this occasion, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, said to Devadatta: "Devadatta, is it true that you have taken up and firmly held to a dispute aimed at dividing the harmonious Saṅgha, and are sitting set upon causing a schism?"

"Venerable one, it is not so."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, then censured him, saying that what is not the conduct of an ascetic, what is not in accord, what is not proper, what does not accord with the rules — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth, and so forth — the censure being as before.

Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing the ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, if any monk, for the purpose of dividing the harmonious Saṅgha, strives to cause a schism, and sits having fully taken up and firmly holding to a dispute aimed at causing division, the monks are to address that monk, saying: 'Venerable one, do not strive to divide the harmonious Saṅgha. Do not sit having fully taken up and firmly held to a dispute aimed at causing division. Venerable one, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. Let the Saṅgha be undivided; rejoice together, without dispute; be as one in recitation, blended as water and milk are blended. Illuminating the Teacher's teaching, dwell in the touch of ease. Venerable one, abandon this very ground that would cause division in the Saṅgha.' That monk is to be instructed in these words by the monks.

If, when the monks so instruct him, he abandons that ground, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, he is to be instructed and admonished a second time and a third time for the sake of his abandoning that ground. If, when instructed and admonished a second and third time, he abandons that ground, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, the matter rests with the Saṅgha."

Now, "any monk" refers to Devadatta or anyone else of that kind. "Saṅgha" refers to the Tathāgata's Saṅgha of hearers. "Harmonious" means of one flavor. "For the purpose of division" means for the purpose of making two. "Strives" means makes effort. "Sitting having fully taken up and firmly holding to a dispute aimed at causing division" refers to Kokālika, Khaṇḍadeviyāputra, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradatta sitting having fully taken up and firmly held to such a dispute.

"That monk" refers to Devadatta. "The monks" refers to those of this teaching. "Saying these words" means that, having gathered, they are to instruct him with the words of instruction as shown before. "When the monks so instruct that monk" means having gathered and instructed him. "If he abandons that ground" means if he fully relinquishes that view. "So much the better" means that would be good. "If he does not abandon it" means if he does not fully relinquish it.

"To be instructed and admonished a second time and a third time" means by the motion-and-three-proclamations act, the instruction is given as shown before. "The instruction" is just that, and "the admonishment" is just that.

"The matter rests with the Saṅgha" means, as before, that this transgression depends on the Saṅgha, and therefore it is said "the matter rests with the Saṅgha."

How does the transgression come about? To whatever small degree a monk strives to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, it becomes an offense throughout. When the monks, having gathered, give instruction, if he abandons that ground, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, there is a grave offense. When instruction is given by the motion-and-three-proclamations act, if he abandons that ground, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, at the conclusion of the motion there is a grave offense. When the first proclamation of the act is being uttered, if he abandons that ground before its completion, so much the better.

If he does not abandon it, at the completion of the first proclamation there is a grave offense. When the second proclamation of the act is being uttered, if he abandons that ground before its completion, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, at the completion of that proclamation there is a grave offense. When the third proclamation of the act is being uttered, if he abandons that ground before its completion, so much the better. If he does not abandon it, there is a grave offense. At the completion of the proclamation, if the instruction is given in a harmonious manner yet contrary to the Dharma, there is no transgression. If the instruction is given in a discordant manner yet in accordance with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If the instruction is given in a harmonious manner and in conformity with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If the instruction is given in a discordant manner and contrary to the Dharma, there is no transgression. If one does not give instruction in accordance with what the Dharma is, what the Vinaya is, and what the Teacher's teaching is, there is no transgression. If, when the proclamation is complete, one does give instruction in harmony and in accordance with what the Dharma is, what the Vinaya is, and what the Teacher's teaching is, the monk incurs a Saṅgha remainder offense. That monk, while remaining seated in that place, must then say the following: "Venerable ones, I have incurred a Saṅgha remainder offense." If he speaks thus, so much the better. If he does not speak thus, from that point onward he will incur the offense of concealment. Therefore, for as long as a monk performs the motion-and-one-proclamation act, the motion-and-two-proclamations act, or the motion-and-four-proclamations act without having confessed and individually confessed that ground, it becomes an offense in every instance. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by pain. This concludes the tenth Saṅgha remainder offense of causing a schism in the Saṅgha.

Then the Blessed One, while remaining on that very seat, wishing to establish the second rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers, declared to the monks: "Monks, there is a small matter of Saṅgha business; please do not yet rise from your seats." The passage beginning with "The blessed buddhas, knowing yet inquiring" and so forth continues as before.

The blessed Buddha then questioned Kokālika, Khaṇḍadrabya, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradata, saying: "Kokālika, Khaṇḍadrabya, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, Samudradata — you knowingly befriend and act in concert with that monk who, in order to divide the harmonious Saṅgha, stubbornly persists and has taken up and firmly grasped the cause of schism; and siding with him you speak discordantly, saying to the monks: 'Venerable ones, whether good or bad, say nothing at all against this monk. Why is that? Venerable ones, this monk is one who speaks the Dharma, one who speaks the Vinaya; he has rightly taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and the Vinaya, and he designates things accordingly. This monk speaks with knowledge, not without knowledge. Whatever he wishes and accepts, that we too wish and accept.' Is this true?" "Venerable sir, it is not." The Blessed One then censured those monks with words such as: "This behavior — unbecoming of a monk, discordant, unsuitable, not in keeping with the conduct of one who has gone forth" — and so on, just as before.

Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks:

"Monks, seeing these ten benefits, a rule of training for hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so on, just as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

If there is one monk, or two, or many, who are companions to that monk and who side with his discordant speech, and if those monks say to the other monks: 'Venerable ones, do not say anything to this monk — whether in praise or in blame. Why is that? Venerable ones, this monk is one who speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya. He has rightly taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and the Vinaya, and he designates things accordingly. This monk speaks with knowledge, not without knowledge. Whatever he wishes and accepts, that we too wish and accept' — then the monks are to say to those monks: 'Venerable ones, do not say that this monk is one who speaks the Dharma and speaks the Vinaya, that he has rightly taken up and firmly grasped the Dharma and the Vinaya and designates things accordingly, that he speaks with knowledge and not without knowledge, and that whatever he wishes and accepts, you too wish and accept. Why is that? Venerable ones, this monk is not one who speaks the Dharma; he is not one who speaks the Vinaya. Venerable ones, this monk is one who speaks what is not Dharma and speaks what is not Vinaya. He has rightly taken up and firmly grasped what is not Dharma and what is not Vinaya, and he designates things accordingly. This monk speaks without knowledge, not with knowledge. As for whatever he wishes and accepts — venerable ones, do not wish and accept that. Venerable ones, do not seek to divide the Saṅgha; instead, venerable ones, seek harmony within the Saṅgha. Venerable ones, be in harmony with the Saṅgha. May the Saṅgha be harmonious, undivided, rejoicing together, free of dispute — reciting together with one voice, blended like water and milk — and, illuminating the Teacher's dispensation, may you abide in the touch of happiness. Venerable ones, instruct those monks who thus side with the one who divides the Saṅgha and speak discordantly: Abandon this!' When the monks have given that instruction to those monks, if they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, for the sake of abandoning that ground they are to be instructed a second and a third time, and admonished properly. If, upon being properly instructed and properly admonished a second and a third time, they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, that is a saṅghāvaśeṣa."

"That monk" refers to Devadatta. "Companion monks" refers to Kokalika, Khaṇḍadeva, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradatta. "Siding with his discordant speech" means holding those same views, those same wishes, and those same intentions. "One, or two, or many" — more than two is many. "If those" refers to those who thus side with him. "The monks" refers to those who follow this Dharma. "Saying thus" means speaking in those words. "Whether in praise" means: do not even engage in what is virtuous.

"Whether it is a misdeed" means: do not even turn him away from a misdeed. "Toward this monk" refers to Devadatta. "Say nothing at all" means: do not say even a word.

Why so? "Venerable ones, this monk speaks the Dharma, this monk speaks the Vinaya; this monk has properly taken up the Dharma and the Vinaya, has embraced it, and continues to apply those designations accordingly" — this means he applies those designations in accordance with what the Dharma actually is, in accordance with what the Vinaya actually is, and in accordance with what the Teacher's teaching actually is. "This monk speaks knowingly, not unknowingly" means he does so having understood the meaning, not without having understood it. "That which this monk approves and accepts, we too approve and accept" — if one says that, it means: whatever grounds Devadatta approves of, we too approve of.

"Those monks" refers to Kokalika, Khaṇḍadeva, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradatta. "The monks" refers to those who follow this Dharma. "Saying thus" means: having assembled and admonished them, the admonishment is to be given as was shown before. "When the monks have thus admonished those monks" means: having assembled and given the admonishment. "If they abandon that ground" means: if they relinquish that view. "Well and good" means: in that case it is good. "If they do not abandon it" means: if they do not relinquish it. "They are to be admonished a second and a third time, properly instructed" — this means the admonishment is to be given by means of the motion-and-three-proclamations act, as was shown before. The proper admonishment is precisely that, and the proper instruction is precisely that. "A saṅghāvaśeṣa" — as before, that offense depends upon the Saṅgha, and therefore it is called a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

Now, how does it become an offense? To whatever degree a monk sides with and supports one who has taken up a dispute and holds to it — a dispute that will weaken and divide a harmonious Saṅgha — and who speaks discordant words, in all such cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

If, when a monk has assembled and admonished them, they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, it becomes a grave offense. If they are admonished by the motion-and-three-proclamations act and they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, then at the conclusion of the motion it becomes a grave offense. If, while the first proclamation is being recited and it is not yet complete, they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, at the completion of that recitation it becomes a grave offense. If, while the second proclamation is being recited and it is not yet complete, they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, at the completion of that recitation it becomes a grave offense. If, while the third proclamation is being recited and it is not yet complete, they abandon that ground, well and good. If they do not abandon it, it becomes a grave offense.

If, at the time of the completed recitation, one admonishes them in a concordant manner but contrary to the Dharma, there is no downfall. If one admonishes them in a discordant manner but according to the Dharma, there is no downfall. If one admonishes them in a concordant manner but altered from what is proper, there is no downfall. If one admonishes them in a discordant manner and in a manner altered from what is proper, there is no downfall. If one does not admonish them in accordance with what the Dharma actually is, in accordance with what the Vinaya actually is, and in accordance with what the Teacher's teaching actually is, there is no downfall. If one admonishes them in a concordant manner, in accordance with what the Dharma actually is, in accordance with what the Vinaya actually is, and in accordance with what the Teacher's teaching actually is, then at the completion of the recitation it becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa.

That monk, while remaining seated on his seat, should declare the following: "Venerable ones, a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression has arisen for me." If he makes that declaration, well and good. If he does not make it, from that point onward a transgression of concealment will arise for him. Therefore, for as long as that monk has not confessed that basis and has not confessed it individually, and continues to act under motions of one, two, and four — performing all of those — it will become a grave offense in all cases. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no downfall. The eleventh saṅghāvaśeṣa, that of the faction, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there were at Reḷe Hill monks who were swift in movement, and together with them Nabso and a reddish-yellow-robed monk who brought disgrace upon households and who engaged in every manner of evil conduct. They consorted intimately with women in their domain. They played with them everywhere. They chattered and made noise in their company. They laughed uproariously, they were arrogant, and they contorted their bodies. They sat together on a single seat. They ate from a single vessel. They drank various intoxicating beverages that made them drunk from a single cup. They gathered flowers and caused others to gather them. They threaded garlands and caused others to thread them. They wore garlands and caused others to wear them. They wore floral ear ornaments and caused others to wear them. They danced and caused others to dance. They sang and caused others to sing. They played musical instruments and caused others to play them. To those skilled in dancing, skilled in singing, and skilled in playing instruments they gave donations drawn from their own shares. They cast off their robes and ran. They leapt. They jumped high. They circled with their thighs. They whirled their arms. They circled like fish. They hurled themselves diving into water. They beat the water with their hands like crocodiles beating their tails. They made the sound of an elephant's cry. They made the sound of a horse's cry. They made the sound of a bull's cry. They made the sound of a peacock's cry. They made the sound of a cuckoo's cry. They made the sound of a clay drum. They made the sound of a conch shell. They made the sound of a great drum. They imitated elephants and caused others to imitate elephants. They imitated horses, they imitated bulls, they imitated buffaloes, they imitated goats, they imitated sheep, they imitated women, they imitated men, they imitated boys, they imitated girls, they imitated crows, they imitated pigeons, and they imitated mynah birds. They caused others to imitate all of these as well. They themselves performed and caused others to perform these and yet other actions that were not proper conduct for monks. Their mode of conduct, their behavior, and their corrupt practices caused monks who had not yet come to Reḷe Hill not to come, and those who had come to be displeased and to abandon their residence on Reḷe Hill. The brahmins and householders living on Reḷe Hill, having become displeased and disgusted, found it difficult even to think of giving alms and rendering service to the resident monks who were the established community there — to say nothing of those who had arrived from elsewhere. Then, at some later time, the venerable Ānanda, while wandering on tour through the districts of Kāśīka, came to Reḷe Hill and sat in the forest of Reḷe Hill.

Then the venerable Ānanda, in the morning, having dressed, took up his bowl and robe and entered Reḷe Hill for alms. And just as he had entered Reḷe Hill for alms with only his washed bowl, so too he departed with only his washed bowl — without receiving so much as a single ladle of alms, and without being invited back. Then the venerable Ānanda thought to himself: "In former times this Reḷe Hill was prosperous, flourishing, comfortable, well-provisioned, populous, and full of people — so much so that even a beggar could easily find alms here. Even now this Reḷe Hill is prosperous, flourishing, comfortable, well-provisioned, populous, and full of people. Yet I have entered Reḷe Hill for alms with only my washed bowl, and I depart with only my washed bowl — without receiving so much as a single ladle of alms, and without being invited back. Can it be that some foolish, dull, unclear, and unskilled śrāvakas of the Blessed One, overcome by afflictions, have been speaking indecently to, making lewd overtures to, or touching the women of good family or the young girls of good family in their alms-round territory, the villages of their alms-round territory?"

At that time, some five hundred brahmins and householders of Reḷe Hill were gathered together in their assembly hall for some matter. Then the venerable Ānanda went to the assembly hall of the brahmins and householders of Reḷe Hill, and upon arriving he addressed the brahmins and householders of Reḷe Hill in these words: "Learned ones, in former times this Reḷe Hill was prosperous, flourishing, comfortable, well-provisioned, populous, and full of people — so much so that even a beggar could easily find alms here. Even now this Reḷe Hill is prosperous, flourishing, comfortable, well-provisioned, populous, and full of people. Yet I have entered Reḷe Hill for alms with only my washed bowl, and I have departed with only my washed bowl — without receiving so much as a single ladle of alms, and without being invited back."

When he had spoken these words, the brahmins and householders of Reḷe Hill composed their senses and became attentive. At that time the lay practitioner (upāsaka) Śrotasrota was also present there in that assembly. Then the lay practitioner Śrotasrota took the venerable Ānanda by both hands, led him aside, and said to him: "Venerable Ānanda, please take note. On this Reḷe Hill there are monks who are swift-footed and who loiter about, reddish-yellow monks who bring disgrace upon households and engage in all manner of wicked practices. They keep close company with women, playing and cavorting with them, raising a clamor and din, strutting about and acting arrogantly, presenting themselves in the same seat, begging from the same vessel, drinking various intoxicating drinks from the same cup until they are drunk, picking flowers and giving flowers to be picked, wearing garlands and giving garlands to be worn, wearing floral ear-ornaments and giving them to be worn, playing drums and having drums played for them, dancing — making music, causing music to be made, giving gifts to skilled dancers, skilled singers, and skilled musicians out of face-saving obligation, exchanging their robes and running about, leaping, jumping high, spinning on their haunches, spinning on their hands, spinning like fish, hurling themselves into the water, beating the water like a small drum, beating the water like a large drum, making the cry of an elephant, making the cry of a horse, making the cry of a bull, making the cry of a peacock, making the cry of a cuckoo, imitating the sound of clay drums, imitating the sound of conch shells, imitating the sound of large drums, performing elephant fights, causing elephant fights to be performed, and likewise performing horse fights, bull fights, buffalo fights, goat fights, sheep fights, women's fights, men's fights, boys' fights, girls' fights, cock fights, quail fights, and pheasant fights, and causing all of these to be performed as well. These and other activities unbecoming of a contemplative they themselves do, and they cause others to do them.

By their manner of conduct, their behavior, and their wrongful practice, those nuns who were not at R̥leḍiri have not come there, and those who had been there become displeased and abandon the place of R̥leḍiri. The brahmins and householders living at R̥leḍiri also become displeased and disgusted, and if they already find it difficult to offer alms and to wish to give to the monks who reside there ordinarily, what need is there to say anything about giving to those who have newly arrived? Therefore, Venerable Ānanda, if it is not troublesome for you, please, out of compassion, present this matter at length to the Blessed One.

The Venerable Ānanda accepted the request of the layman Jālinīrabha by remaining silent. Then, understanding that the Venerable Ānanda had accepted by remaining silent, the layman Jālinīrabha said this to the Venerable Ānanda: Venerable Ānanda, would you kindly permit me to offer a single meal at my home? The Venerable Ānanda accepted the request of the layman Jālinīrabha by remaining silent. Then, understanding that the Venerable Ānanda had accepted by remaining silent, the layman Jālinīrabha, with his own hands, satisfied and delighted the Venerable Ānanda as he sat comfortably, with clean and abundant food and drink, and having satisfied and served him with an abundance of clean and ample food and drink with his own hands, and understanding that the Venerable Ānanda had eaten and set down his bowl after washing his hands, he brought a low seat and sat down in front of the Venerable Ānanda in order to listen to the Dharma.

Then the Venerable Ānanda properly taught the layman Jālinīprabha a Dharmic discourse, established him in it properly, properly encouraged him, and properly gladdened him. Having properly taught the Dharmic discourse, properly established him in it, properly encouraged him, and properly gladdened him, he rose from his seat and departed.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the twenty-third section.

Then the Venerable Ānanda, having tidied up his lodging as he had customarily used it, took up his begging bowl and robe, and set out walking toward Śrāvastī, traveling gradually along the way, and in due course arrived at Śrāvastī.

Then the Venerable Ānanda set down his begging bowl and robe, washed both feet, and went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, he bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Venerable Ānanda reported in full to the Blessed One everything that had been said in conversation together with the layman Jālinīprabha.

When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One declared to the Venerable Ānanda as follows: "Ānanda, you are to go with the senior monks to Reḷḍe Mountain and carry out the act of censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. It is to be done in this way. Seat yourself along the way, and appoint a monk as spokesman. A monk-spokesman who possesses five qualities is not to be appointed if not yet appointed, and if already appointed is to be removed. What are the five? He goes by desire, he goes by aversion, he goes by delusion, he goes by fear, and he does not know what has been adjudicated and what has not been adjudicated. A monk-spokesman who possesses these five qualities is not to be appointed if not yet appointed, and if already appointed is to be removed.

A monk-spokesman who possesses five qualities is to be appointed if not yet appointed, and if already appointed is not to be removed. What are the five? He does not go by desire, he does not go by aversion, he does not go by delusion, he does not go by fear, and he knows what has been adjudicated and what has not been adjudicated. A monk-spokesman who possesses these five qualities is to be appointed if not yet appointed, and if already appointed is not to be removed.

The appointment is to be made in this way. After the lodgings have been prepared and the gong struck, the monks are to be properly informed with words of inquiry. Then, with the entire Saṅgha assembled and in harmony, the first one who is willing should be encouraged, saying: 'Venerable one of such-and-such a name, you are to go to Reḍḍe Mountain and speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so regarding the many ways in which they have engaged in conduct unbecoming to a contemplative. Are you willing?' If willing, he should say, 'I am willing.'

After that, one monk makes the motion and the act is carried out. The venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear. If the monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name is willing to go to Reḍḍe Mountain and speak against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so regarding the many ways in which they have engaged in conduct unbecoming to a contemplative, and if it is the right time and the Saṅgha approves, may the Saṅgha grant its consent, and may the Saṅgha appoint the monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name to speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows. The venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear. This monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name has gone to Reḍḍe Mountain and is willing to speak against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so regarding the many ways in which they have engaged in conduct unbecoming to a contemplative. Therefore the Saṅgha appoints the monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name to speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. Venerables, those who consent to the Saṅgha appointing the monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name to speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so should remain silent. Those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha has consented and granted its approval, and has appointed the monk-spokesman called such-and-such a name to speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. Thus it is held, since no one has spoken."

"Monks, I shall now establish the rules of conduct for the monk-spokesman. The monk-spokesman is to go to the dwelling of those who have harbored grudges, prepare the lodging, strike the gong, and properly address the monks with words of inquiry. When the entire Saṅgha has assembled and reached agreement, he shall then speak the censure against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. If those monks do not grant their consent, the act of expulsion from the residence shall be carried out against those very individuals on account of their disrespect. If they do grant their consent, they shall be made to open a gap in the proceedings. If they do not open a gap, the act of expulsion from the residence shall likewise be carried out against those very individuals on account of their disrespect. If they do open a gap, then the censure shall be spoken. If they say, 'We do not see a transgression,' the act of expulsion from the residence shall again be carried out against them on account of their disrespect. If they say, 'We do see the transgression,' then the following shall be declared to them: 'For this very reason the Saṅgha has performed against you two the act of expulsion.' If the monk-spokesman, having duly accepted the rules of conduct for a monk-spokesman as established, fails to put them into practice, he will be in a state of serious fault."

The venerable Ānanda, having heard this from the Blessed One and having received the instruction saying, "Venerable one, as the Blessed One has commanded," went together with the elder monks to Mount Relvde and, sitting along the road, appointed the monk-spokesman.

Now the reddish-yellow monks who were acting in concert with the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so heard that the venerable Ānanda had come there together with the elder monks and, sitting along the road, had appointed a monk-spokesman who would perform the act of expulsion against the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so. Upon hearing this, those monks thought to themselves: "There is nothing that these two venerable ones have practiced, said, or undertaken that we ourselves have not also practiced, said, and undertaken. Therefore, if the expulsion is performed against these two, why should it not also be performed against us? When the venerable Ānanda and the elder monks come here and first perform the act of expulsion against Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so, there will then be grounds for the expulsion to be performed against us as well. We had better take up our bedrolls and belongings and, listening carefully and remaining in place, so that when the venerable Ānanda and the elder monks enter through one door, we can take up our bedrolls and go out through another door and make our way to Śrāvastī without missing our chance."

Then the monk-spokesman went to Mount Relvde, prepared the lodging, struck the gong, and properly addressed the monks with words of inquiry. When the entire Saṅgha had assembled and reached agreement, and the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so had granted their consent and opened a gap in the proceedings, the monk-spokesman spoke the censure. The two then declared: "Venerable one, we see the transgression." The monk-spokesman said: "For this very reason the Saṅgha has performed against you two the act of expulsion."

Then, as the venerable Ānanda and the elder monks entered through one door, the reddish-yellow monks took up their bedrolls, went out through another door, and set off for Śrāvastī. Those among them who had transgressions to confess confessed them, and those who had various forms of mental conceptuality to restrain restrained them in their minds. They came to dwell together with the monks who were living according to the natural rule, and they also continued to protect and uphold the activities of the Saṅgha.

Thereupon the venerable Ānanda and the elder monks addressed the monks Gro-mgyogs and performed the act of expulsion against the two of them, Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so, and then set out for Śrāvastī, traveling gradually along the way until they arrived at Śrāvastī.

The two monks, Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so, reflected: "Just as one who has been knocked down by the ground must rise up from that very ground, so too we two should go directly to Śrāvastī and ask forgiveness of the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks." With that, Gro-mgyogs said to Nab-so: "Nab-so, just as one who has been knocked down by the ground must rise up from that very ground, so too we two should go directly to Śrāvastī and ask forgiveness of the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks. Let us go and do so." Nab-so replied: "There is no fault in it — come, let us go and ask forgiveness." The two of them agreed on this, and when that same night had passed and the early morning came, they put on their lower and upper robes, took up their bowls and dharma robes, and entered the city of Rete for alms. Having completed their alms round in Rete and eaten their meal, they returned from the midday alms round, put away their lodging things as was customary, took up their bowls and dharma robes, set off toward Śrāvastī, traveling gradually along the way, until they arrived at Śrāvastī.

When the elder monks who were residing there saw those two, they neither engaged them in conversation nor greeted them with a welcome. When the reddish-yellow monks saw those two as well, they likewise neither engaged them in conversation nor greeted them with a welcome.

Then the monks Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so said to the reddish-yellow monks: "Venerable ones, it is fitting that the elder monks do not engage us two in conversation or greet us with a welcome. But why do you not engage us two in conversation or greet us with a welcome? What is there that we two have done, said, or undertaken that you have not done, said, or undertaken?"

Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, that is true. Nevertheless, we too have confessed whatever transgressions were to be confessed, and we too have restrained in our minds the various forms of mental conceptuality that were to be restrained. Now we dwell together with the monks who are living according to the natural rule, and we continue to protect and uphold the activities of the Saṅgha. Therefore from this point on we will no longer share in living together with those who engage in inferior conduct."

Then the two of them said to the monks: "Venerable ones, here among the monks there are some who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear — for with regard to precisely similar transgressions, some monks are expelled while others are not expelled." And they began to make this accusation. Then the monks said to those two: "Venerable ones, you two say there are monks who act out of desire, monks who act out of aversion, monks who act out of delusion, and monks who act out of fear? Venerable ones, it is the monk Ānanda and those elder monks who went to Rete Mountain and performed the act of expulsion against us to whom you are saying this." The few monks said: "Why do monks who know full well that it was the monk Ānanda and those elder monks who went to Rete Mountain and performed the act of expulsion against them still say of those monks that they act out of desire, or say they act out of aversion, act out of delusion, or act out of fear? And why do they say to the monks as well these very words: Venerable ones, here among the monks there are some who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear — and in this way, from one and the same transgression, some monks perform the act of expulsion while others do not" — thus speaking ill of them, spreading word against them, and slandering them. At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should summon the monks Drogo and Napso, and others of that kind, and convey to them the following message. The message to be conveyed is this: Venerable Drogo and Napso, do not say of the venerable monk Ānanda and of those elder monks who went to Rete Mountain and performed the act of expulsion against you that they act out of desire. Do not say that they act out of aversion, out of delusion, or out of fear. And do not say to the monks these words: Venerable ones, here among the monks there are some who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear, and in this way, from one and the same transgression, some monks perform the act of expulsion while others do not. And why not? Because those monks do not act out of desire, they do not act out of aversion, they do not act out of delusion, and they do not act out of fear. Rather, it is you yourselves, venerable ones, who are corrupters of households and practitioners of evil conduct. For it is seen, heard, and well known that you yourselves corrupt households, and it is seen, heard, and well known that you engage in evil conduct. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon this kind of language — the phrases 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' and 'acting out of fear.' Let this message be conveyed to them." The monks replied, "As the Venerable One commands, we will obey," and, having heard it from the Blessed One, they conveyed to the monks Drogo and Napso the following: "Venerable Drogo and Napso, do not say of the venerable monk Ānanda and of those elder monks who went to Rete Mountain and performed the act of expulsion against you that they act out of desire. Do not say that they act out of aversion, out of delusion, or out of fear. And do not say to the monks these words: Venerable ones, here among the monks there are some who act out of desire, some who act out of aversion, some who act out of delusion, and some who act out of fear, and in this way, from one and the same transgression, some monks perform the act of expulsion while others do not. And why not? Because those monks do not act out of desire, they do not act out of aversion, they do not act out of delusion, and they do not act out of fear. Rather, it is you yourselves, venerable ones, who are corrupters of households and practitioners of evil conduct. For it is seen, heard, and well known that you yourselves corrupt households, and it is seen, heard, and well known that you engage in evil conduct. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon this kind of language — the phrases 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' and 'acting out of fear.'" This message was thus conveyed to the two of them. Yet those two stubbornly clung to that very same position and, fixing upon it as supreme and remaining firmly attached, continued to designate it with the words: "This alone is true; everything else is false." At that point the monks again reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should summon the monks Drogo and Napso, and others of that kind, and —

"and others of that same kind — should be addressed by means of the formal act of admonition performed with a motion and three readings. The admonition is to be carried out as follows: having arranged the seats and struck the gong, having duly notified the monks with the words of inquiry, and with the entire Saṅgha assembled and in harmony, one monk is to make a motion and then carry out the act. May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. These two monks, Drogo and Napso, went to the venerable Ānanda and to the elders, the various elders at Rede Mountain, and while seeking to have these two expelled, continued to say to them: 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' 'acting out of fear.' And they also said this to the monks: 'Venerable ones, here there are monks who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear — and thus, from one and the same transgression, some monks expel while others do not expel.' The Saṅgha has therefore addressed these two with a formal act carried out by many monks. Yet even after being addressed by many monks with a formal act, these two cling stubbornly to that very same position, fix upon it as supreme, and remain attached to it, continuing to designate it with the words: 'This alone is true; everything else is false.' If the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, then let the Saṅgha approve this: the Saṅgha shall address the two monks Drogo and Napso, telling them — 'Venerable ones Drogo and Napso, you went to the venerable Ānanda and to the elders, the various elders at Rede Mountain, knowing that they had carried out the act of expelling you, and yet you continued to say to them: "acting out of desire," "acting out of aversion," "acting out of delusion," "acting out of fear." And you also said this to the monks: "Venerable ones, here there are monks who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, who act out of fear — and thus, from one and the same transgression, some monks expel while others do not expel." Do not say such things. And why not? Because those monks were not acting out of desire, nor out of aversion, nor out of delusion, nor out of fear. Rather, it is you yourselves, venerable ones, who are household-despoilers, practitioners of wicked conduct — you are seen and heard and well known as despoilers of households, and you are seen and heard and well known as practitioners of wickedness. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon the verbal usage of the phrase "acting out of desire," and abandon the verbal usage of such phrases as "acting out of aversion," "acting out of delusion," and "acting out of fear.'" This is the formal admonition performed with a motion and three readings.' This is the motion. The act is to be performed as follows: May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. These two monks, Drogo and Napso, went to the venerable Ānanda and to the elders, the various elders at Rede Mountain, and while seeking to have these two expelled, continued to say to them: 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' 'acting out of fear.' And they also said this to the monks: 'Venerable ones, here there are monks who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear — and thus, from one and the same transgression, some monks expel while others do not expel.' —"

Even though many monks had convened and administered the formal act against these two, they tenaciously clung to that very same position, remaining firmly attached to it, and continued to designate it with the words: "This alone is true; everything else is false." For that reason the Saṅgha wishes to convene and administer to the monks Drogo and Napso, with a formal act by petition and three proclamations, the following charge: "Venerable ones Drogo and Napso, do not say to the venerable Ānanda and to those elders — the elders who went to Rede Mountain knowing full well that they had carried out the act of expelling you — 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' or 'acting out of fear.' And do not say to the monks: 'Venerable ones, here there are monks who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear — and thus, from one and the same transgression, some monks expel while others do not expel.' And why is that? Those monks are not acting out of desire, not acting out of aversion, not acting out of delusion, and not acting out of fear. Rather, venerable ones, it is you yourselves who are corruptors of households and practitioners of wicked conduct — you who are seen, heard, and well-known to have corrupted households, and who are seen, heard, and well-known to practice wickedness. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon this kind of verbal path, namely such words as 'acting out of desire,' 'acting out of aversion,' 'acting out of delusion,' and 'acting out of fear.' — This is the first proclamation of the formal act; the same is then recited a second and a third time."

If the Saṅgha approves and grants permission, then the Saṅgha shall administer to the monks Drogo and Napso the formal act by petition and three proclamations. Let those who approve remain silent; let those who do not approve speak. This is the first recitation of the formal act; and likewise it is recited a second and a third time. The Saṅgha has approved and granted this, and the Saṅgha has administered to the monks Drogo and Napso the formal act by petition and three proclamations. Since no one spoke, so it is held to be.

The monks, having heard from the Blessed One, complied with the venerable one's instruction, and administered to the monks Drogo and Napso the formal act by petition and three proclamations. Even after having been given the formal act by petition and three proclamations, they tenaciously clung to that very same position, remaining firmly attached to it, and continued to designate it with the words: "This alone is true; everything else is false." At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this occasion, and in this connection, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, as before. Likewise the passage beginning "Fully awakened Blessed Ones knowingly commit no offense" follows as before.

"My śrāvakas shall recite the following as a rule for training in the Vinaya: If a great number of monks are residing and dwelling near a village or a settlement, and if those monks are corruptors of households and practitioners of wicked conduct, and if it is seen, heard, or well-known that they have corrupted households, or if it is seen, heard, or well-known that they practice wickedness, then the monks shall address those monks as follows: 'Venerable ones, you are corruptors of households and practitioners of wicked conduct; it is seen, heard, and well-known that you have corrupted households, and it is seen, heard, and well-known that you practice wickedness. Venerable ones, you are welcome to remain here, but you must depart from this place,' and so they shall be addressed.

If those monks then say to the monks: 'Venerable ones, there are some monks here who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, and who act out of fear. From one and the same transgression, some monks expel, while others do not expel' — then the monks shall say to those monks: 'Venerable ones, do not say that the venerable ones here act out of desire, act out of aversion, act out of delusion, or act out of fear, and that from one and the same transgression some monks expel while others do not. Why? Because those monks do not act out of desire, they do not act out of aversion, they do not act out of delusion, they do not act out of fear. Rather, it is because you yourselves, venerable ones, are corruptors of households and practitioners of wicked conduct — it is seen, heard, and well-known that you have corrupted households, and it is seen, heard, and well-known that you practice wickedness. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon this manner of speaking — saying that there are those here who act out of desire, who act out of aversion, who act out of delusion, who act out of fear — and so they shall be addressed.'

When the monks have so addressed those monks, if they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, they shall be properly addressed and properly instructed a second time and a third time, for the purpose of making them relinquish that ground. If, upon being properly addressed and properly instructed two and three times, they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, that is an offense against the Saṅgha.

The term 'monks' refers to those who move quickly, to novices, and to others of similar standing. The term 'a great number' means more than two. 'Near a village or a settlement' means a market town and the like. As for the phrase 'corruptors of households,' 'households' refers to the households of brahmins and householders. They corrupt such households in two ways: through association and through enjoyment. How through association? They sit together with women on the same seat, they eat from the same vessel, and they drink various intoxicating drinks that lead to intoxication from the same cup — that is how it is through association. How through enjoyment? Through food, drink, clothing, flowers, fruit, and tooth-wood — that is how it is through enjoyment. 'Practitioners of wicked conduct' means practicing degraded conduct. 'Those households' means the households of brahmins and householders. 'Seen' means by way of visual consciousness. 'Heard' means by way of auditory consciousness. 'Well-known' means by way of the other groups of consciousness. 'Practicing wickedness' means practicing degraded conduct. 'By the monks' means by those who belong to this Dharma community. 'In this manner' means addressing them with the words exactly as set forth above. 'When the monks have so addressed those monks' means upon addressing them in that manner. 'If they relinquish that ground' means if they completely abandon that view. 'That is good' means that is well and good.

The words "if they do not relinquish it" mean if they do not completely relinquish it. They are to be admonished a second and a third time, properly instructed. The words "to be properly admonished and properly instructed" mean they are to be admonished by means of a formal act (□□, karman) with a motion and three proclamations, just as set forth above. That is what "properly admonishing" means. That is what "properly instructing" means.

The words "the matter rests with the Saṅgha" mean, as before, that the transgression depends on the Saṅgha, and therefore it is said "the matter rests with the Saṅgha."

As for how the transgression arises in that connection: if a monk, knowing full well that certain monks have carried out an act of expulsion against him, goes to them out of desire, goes out of aversion, goes out of delusion, or goes out of fear, he incurs a wrongdoing in every case.

When a monk takes it up and admonishes them, if they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, a serious offence arises. When admonishment is given by means of a formal act with a motion and three proclamations, if they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, a serious offence arises upon the motion. When the first proclamation is recited and, before it is completed, they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, a serious offence arises when it is completed. When the second proclamation is recited and, before it is completed, they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, a serious offence arises when it is completed. When the third proclamation is recited and, before it is completed, they relinquish that ground, that is good. If they do not relinquish it, a serious offence arises.

Once the full proclamation has been completed, if the admonishment is carried out in a concordant and non-Dharmic manner, there is no transgression. If it is carried out in a discordant and Dharmic manner, there is no transgression. If it is carried out in a form that accords with what is concordant and Dharmic, there is no transgression. If it is carried out in a form that accords with what is discordant and non-Dharmic, there is no transgression. If one does not admonish in accordance with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the teaching of the Teacher as it is, there is no transgression. If one does admonish in a concordant manner in accordance with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the teaching of the Teacher as it is, and the full proclamation is complete, then the matter rests with the Saṅgha.

While remaining seated in that place, the monk must declare: "Venerable ones, I have incurred a Saṅgha-remainder transgression." If he so declares, that is good. If he does not declare it, from that point onward the offence of concealment will arise for him.

Therefore, as long as that monk has neither confessed nor individually confessed and yet undergoes a motion, a motion with two proclamations, or a formal act with a motion and three proclamations, he incurs a wrongdoing in every case. For one who is a first offender, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

The twelfth, the Saṅgha-remainder concerning a family-defiling monk, is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Kauśāmbī in the Ghositārāma. At that time the venerable Channa incurred a transgression and did not make amends in accordance with the Dharma. The monks who wished his good, wished his benefit, wished his happiness, wished him to touch happiness, and wished his accomplishment and happiness, spoke to him and reminded him, saying: "Venerable Channa, you have incurred those transgressions — make amends in accordance with the Dharma." When reminded in this way, he replied: "To whom should I make amends for that transgression? If you have incurred a transgression, who would make amends, who would feel remorse? If you have incurred a transgression, who among you would feel remorse?" As the monks spoke to him again and again, he responded in the same vein, saying: "Venerable ones, whether you act virtuously or wickedly, do not say anything to me at all."

"Whether I act virtuously or wickedly, I will say nothing to the venerable ones. Let the venerable ones find a different path of speech toward me. What good would it do if I spoke to you? For you have all gone forth from various castes, various clans, and various households. It is just like the many leaves of various trees that the wind blows together, gathering in one place and resting in one place — in exactly the same way, you too have gone forth from various castes, various clans, and various households. But as for me, awakening has been realized by my noble one." Saying, "Why do monks of lesser aims, when monks speak in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya on the bases of training that fall under what monks are to recite, and on what falls within the sūtras of the Sugata, render themselves not subject to admonishment?" — he would disparage them, dismiss them, and speak ill of them.

On that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should approach the monk Channa, and the same should be done with any other such person, and address him with these words: 'Venerable Channa, when monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya on the bases of training that fall under what monks are to recite, and on what falls within the sūtras of the Sugata, do not render yourself not subject to admonishment. Rather, venerable one, make yourself subject to admonishment. When monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya, you too should speak to the monks in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya. That is to say, each should admonish the other, each should guide and instruct the other, and each should lift the other out of transgressions — it is in just such a way that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, will grow. Venerable Channa, abandon this course of action, namely the practice of rendering yourself not subject to admonishment.' Address him in that way."

The monks, having heard the Blessed One, said "As you command, venerable sir," and approached the venerable Channa and addressed him thus: "Venerable Channa, when monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya on the bases of training that fall under what monks are to recite, and on what falls within the sūtras of the Sugata, do not render yourself not subject to admonishment. Rather, venerable one, make yourself subject to admonishment. When monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya, you too should speak to the monks in accordance with the Dharma and the Vinaya. That is to say, each should admonish the other, each should guide and instruct the other, and each should lift the other out of transgressions — it is in just such a way that the retinue of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, will grow. Venerable Channa, abandon this course of action, namely the practice of rendering yourself not subject to admonishment."

When the monks approached and addressed him thus, he seized upon that very same ground with stubborn tenacity, clinging to it with great attachment, and proceeded to designate only that as true and everything else as false. On that occasion the monks reported this again to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should approach the monk Channa, and —"

"Furthermore, in a case such as this, the formal act of admonishment is to be carried out by a motion-and-three-resolutions procedure. It is to be carried out in the following way. Having prepared the seats and struck the gong, the monks are to be properly assembled by means of the words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is seated and in harmony, one monk is to make the motion and perform the act.

'Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The monk Channa, having committed a transgression, does not restore it according to the Dharma; and when the monks speak to him in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — citing both the training rules pertaining to what the monks recite and the sūtras belonging to the Sugata — he says: "Venerable ones, do not say anything to me, whether virtuous or not virtuous; and I, whether virtuously or not virtuously, will say nothing to the venerable ones. Venerable ones, do step aside from the path of words toward me. And since I am not in the habit of proclaiming myself while saying, 'What does it matter if you have spoken?' — whenever many monks take him up and admonish him, he clings to that very same ground with stubborn tenacity and great attachment and goes on designating only that as true and everything else as false." If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha give its approval. And let the Saṅgha admonish the monk Channa thus: "Venerable Channa, do not act in such a way that you fail to proclaim yourself; rather, let the venerable one do only what amounts to proclaiming himself. When the monks speak to the venerable one in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, let the venerable one also speak to the monks in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — that is to say: speaking to one another, explaining and teaching one another, and lifting one another out of transgression. It is in just such a way that the retinue of that Blessed One, that Tathāgata, that arhat, that perfectly and completely awakened buddha, will grow. Venerable Channa, abandon this course of action, namely the practice of rendering yourself not subject to admonishment." This is to be carried out as a formal act by a motion-and-three-resolutions procedure. This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows. "Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The monk Channa, having committed a transgression, does not restore it according to the Dharma; and when the monks speak to him in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — citing both the training rules pertaining to what the monks recite and the sūtras belonging to the Sugata — he says: "Venerable ones, do not say anything to me, whether virtuous or not virtuous; and I, whether virtuously or not virtuously, will say nothing to the venerable ones. Venerable ones, do step aside from the path of words toward me. And since I am not in the habit of proclaiming myself while saying, 'What does it matter if you have spoken?'" — having thus made himself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself — whenever many monks take him up and admonish him, he clings to that very same ground with stubborn tenacity and great attachment and goes on designating only that as true and everything else as false. Therefore let the Saṅgha admonish the monk Channa: "Venerable Channa, when the monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya —" do not make yourself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself when the monks speak to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya. Venerable one, make yourself someone who is indeed in the habit of proclaiming himself. When the monks speak to the venerable one in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, the venerable one too should speak to the monks in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — that is, by making it a matter of proclaiming oneself to one another, of instructing and guiding one another, and of one lifting the other out of transgression. It is in just such a way that the retinue of that Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened Buddha, will grow and flourish. Venerable Channa, abandon this conduct of yours — this extreme of acting as one who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself."

When this request and the formal act with four proclamations has been performed, those venerable ones who consent to the Saṅgha's performing the formal act with four proclamations against the monk Channa should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak. This is the first proclamation of the formal act; it is to be repeated a second and a third time in the same way. The Saṅgha has consented and approved, and the Saṅgha has performed the formal act with four proclamations against the monk Channa. Because no one has spoken, it is understood to be accepted accordingly.

The monks, having heard from the Blessed One, replied, "Venerable one, as you command," and proceeded to perform the formal act with four proclamations against the monk Channa. But even as the formal act with four proclamations was being performed, he clung to that very same ground with stubborn tenacity and great attachment, and continued to designate only that as true and everything else as false. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and these circumstances, convened an assembly of monks — and so on as before. The blessed buddhas act while knowing, and so forth — also as before.

The Blessed One then questioned Channa: "Channa, is it true that when the monks spoke to you in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — citing the precepts belonging to the exhortation of monks and citing the sūtras of the Sugata — you made yourself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself?" "Venerable one, it is so." The Blessed One then rebuked him, saying that such conduct is not the way of a renunciant, is not fitting, is not proper, is not in accord with conduct, and is not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Thereupon, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on as before.

"My hearers shall learn this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk here has come to be of a nature that is displeasing to admonish, and when the monks, citing the precepts belonging to the exhortation of monks and citing the sūtras of the Sugata, speak to him in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, he says, 'Venerable ones, do not say anything to me, whether good or bad, and I too will say nothing to you, venerable ones, whether good or bad. Venerable ones, refrain from bringing words my way. And since I am not in the habit of proclaiming myself while saying, "What does it matter if you have spoken?"' — thus making himself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself — the monks shall address that monk thus: Venerable one, do not make yourself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself when the monks, citing the precepts belonging to the exhortation of monks when those belonging to the Sugata's sūtra speak in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, the venerable one should not make himself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself, but should instead make himself precisely someone who is in the habit of proclaiming himself. When the monks speak to the venerable one in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, the venerable one too should speak to the monks in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya — that is to say, making themselves someone who proclaims to one another, who guides and instructs one another, who lifts one another out of transgressions. It is by such conduct that the retinue of that Blessed One, that Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and completely awakened Buddha will grow. Venerable one, abandon this kind of deed — making yourself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself." Thus shall the monks address him.

When the monks have addressed that monk in this way, if he abandons that position, that is well and good. If he does not abandon it, in order to get him to abandon that position, the address and instruction shall be given a second and a third time, correctly and properly. If upon being correctly and properly addressed and instructed a second and a third time he abandons that position, that is well and good. If he does not abandon it, it is a matter for the Saṅgha to resolve.

Here, the phrase "a certain monk" refers to the aspirant or anyone else of that kind. With regard to the phrase "has become one whose nature is to be difficult to address," the expression "difficult to address" means blocking, not following, not being receptive to the proper path of speech, not acting in accordance with right conduct, not proceeding straightforwardly, obstructing the entire collection of limbs that make up the practice of proper governance, not holding to them, not doing them, not performing them, and holding to what is contrary. The phrase "to him" refers to the aspirant. The phrase "by the monks" refers to the members of this Dharma community. With regard to the phrase "the training precepts belonging to the exhortation," "exhortation" refers to the four factors that constitute defeat, the thirteen matters for the Saṅgha, the two undetermined matters, the thirty matters entailing forfeiture, the ninety matters entailing downfall, the four matters requiring individual confession, the numerous training precepts, and the seven rules for settling disputes. With regard to the phrase "those belonging to the Sugata's sūtra," "Sugata" refers to the Teacher. "Sūtra" means either a sūtra closely connected to him or a correctly compiled sūtra. "In accordance with the Dharma" means in accordance with the discourses and the Māṭṛkā. "In accordance with the Vinaya" means in accordance with the Vinaya itself. The phrase "when they speak" means when they recite it back — that is, when the address is given in accordance with how the Dharma is, how the Vinaya is, and how the teaching of the Teacher is. The phrase "venerable ones, do not say anything to me, whether good or bad" means: do not engage me toward virtue, and do not turn me away from wrongdoing either. The phrase "I too will say nothing to you, venerable ones, whether good or bad" means: I will not engage you toward virtue, and I will not turn you away from wrongdoing either. The phrase "venerable ones, refrain from bringing words my way; and since I am not in the habit of proclaiming myself — what does it matter if you have spoken?" — this means that he establishes himself extensively as someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself. The phrase "when he makes himself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself" means when he establishes himself as precisely that — as one not in the habit of proclaiming himself. The phrase "that monk" refers to the aspirant. The phrase "by the monks" refers to the members of this Dharma community. The phrase "thus" means: having assembled, the monks shall give the address just as was previously shown, in the manner described.

The phrase "the monks shall give that monk the following address" means that he is turned back by the address given after the assembly has convened. The phrase "if that basis" refers to the very discomfort of the instruction. The phrase "he relinquishes it" means that he relinquishes it completely. The phrase "then that is good" means that if it is so, it is well. The phrase "if he does not relinquish it" means that he does not relinquish it completely. The phrase "one should give the address correctly a second and a third time, one should instruct correctly" means: one should give the address by the motion-and-four procedure just as was previously shown, addressing him correctly — and that is what "addressing correctly" is, and that is what "instructing correctly" is.

The phrase "the Saṅgha remains" means that, as before, that transgression depends upon the Saṅgha — therefore it is said that the Saṅgha remains.

Now, how does a transgression come about in this regard? Whenever the monks address a monk with training rules that fall within the scope of what the monks are to admonish, or with matters belonging to the sūtras of the Sugata, speaking in accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with the Vinaya, and that monk makes himself someone who is not in the habit of proclaiming himself — then in every case an offense is committed.

If a monk, after the assembly has convened and the address has been given, relinquishes that basis, then that is good. If he does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises. If the address is given by the motion-and-four procedure and he relinquishes that basis, then that is good. If he does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises at the time of the motion. When the first recitation of the act is being recited, if he relinquishes the basis before the recitation is complete, then that is good. If he does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises when the recitation is completed. When the second recitation of the act is being recited, if he relinquishes the basis before the recitation is complete, then that is good. If he does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises when the recitation is completed. When the third recitation of the act is being recited, if he relinquishes the basis before the recitation is complete, then that is good. If he does not relinquish it, a grave offense arises.

When the recitation is completed: if the address is given in a manner that is concordant but not in accordance with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If it is given in a manner that is discordant and not in accordance with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If it is given in a manner adjusted to be concordant and in accordance with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If it is given in a manner adjusted to be discordant and not in accordance with the Dharma, there is no transgression. If the address is not given in accordance with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the Teacher's teaching as it is, there is no transgression. If the address is given in a manner concordant with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the Teacher's teaching as it is, then when the recitation is completed, the remainder falls to the Saṅgha.

While remaining seated in that place, that monk shall say the following: "Venerable ones, a transgression belonging to the remainder with the Saṅgha has arisen for me." If he says this, then that is good. If he does not say it, from that point forward the offense of concealment will arise for him.

Therefore, so long as a monk has not confessed and individually confessed that basis, and continues to undergo acts consisting of a motion alone, a motion with two recitations, and a motion with four recitations, in every case an offense is committed. There is no transgression for a first offender, or for one who is insane, or for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is overwhelmed by painful sensations.

Here ends the twenty-fourth fascicle of the Vinaya Vibhaṅga.

The monks, having arisen in doubt, put all their doubts to the Buddha, the Blessed One. The venerable Ānanda, who lives the holy life, addressed the Blessed One: "Blessed One, please look upon the fact that this aspirant who lives the holy life declares and proclaims himself to be a relative of the Blessed One before such-and-such practitioners of the holy life." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now — "In the same way, in times past as well, this very one declared and proclaimed himself to be a relative of mine before such-and-such brahmins and householders. Listen now to how this came about.

Monks, long ago, in times past, in the city of Droṇāvatsara there lived a brahmin named Candrakīrti. He took a wife from his own social class, and with her he sported, rejoiced, and took his pleasure. While they were sporting, rejoicing, and taking their pleasure together, she gave birth to a son, and they named him Sūryacandra. They raised and nurtured him, and he grew to be grown.

Then in the course of time, the brahmin Candrakīrti fell ill and, abandoning his wife and son, was on the verge of death. He had a maidservant, and she thought to herself: 'The brahmin Candrakīrti, served by hundreds of bath-attendants, amassed great wealth and prosperity — yet now that he has fallen ill and abandoned his wife and son, hovering near death, it would not be fitting for me to abandon my master.' With this virtuous intention, and out of affection for her master, she went to a physician and said: 'Good sir, do you know the brahmin called Candrakīrti?' He said that he did. 'Then what is his affliction? He has fallen ill and, abandoning his wife and son, is near death — show me a cure for him.' The physician replied: 'Girl, if he has abandoned his wife and son, who will attend to him?' She said: 'Good sir, show me the cure and I will attend to him.' The physician then inquired into the nature of his illness and prescribed a remedy. The girl then served the brahmin Candrakīrti and nursed him back to health.

The brahmin Candrakīrti reflected: 'When I was struck down by such an illness, and abandoned by my wife and son, hovering between life and death, the very fact that I remained barely alive is due to this girl's power. I must repay her efforts with fitting reward.' Recognizing this, he called the girl to him and said: 'Girl, I know full well that it is through your power that I was not separated from my life when I was struck down by such an illness, abandoned by my wife and son. Tell me — what precious thing shall I give you?' The girl replied: 'Master, if you are pleased with me, I wish to meet with you privately.' He said: 'Girl, what purpose would meeting with me privately serve you? I will give you five hundred kārṣāpaṇas and release you from servitude.' She replied: 'Master, I have been a maidservant for a very long time — I remain a maidservant still. If you are pleased with me, I wish to meet with you privately.' Seeing that she was absolutely insistent on this assignation, he said: 'Girl, when the time comes and your monthly flow has passed, come to me then.' The girl was delighted by these words. She sat counting the days until her monthly flow was over, and when it had passed she went to that brahmin. She took her pleasure with him, and a being entered her womb.

Now the brahmin's wife, a brahmin woman herself, realized that her husband had taken his pleasure with this girl. Overwhelmed by jealousy, she could not bear it, and she struck the girl continually with fists and slaps, and fed her poor food and dressed her in poor, rough clothing. The girl thought: 'What kind of unfortunate being is it that has entered my womb? Ever since it entered my womb, I have been struck continually with fists and slaps, fed poor food, and made to wear poor, rough clothing.' She sat in sorrow over this. When the nine months were complete and she gave birth, a boy was born. He thought to himself:"

"This unfortunate being has entered my womb, and because of that I have come to endure such a condition. If this child is born, I shall have nothing whatsoever from anyone." Knowing this, she placed it in a dustbin and was about to throw it away. At that moment the brahmin saw this and asked: "Girl, what is that?" She answered: "It is nothing, master." He looked at the dustbin, and when he saw there was a baby boy, he said: "Girl, why are you throwing this away? From the time that this unfortunate being entered your womb, up until now, this brahmin woman of mine has been striking you continually with fists and slaps, and feeding you poor food and making you wear poor, rough clothing. It is because if this child were born, I would have nothing whatsoever from anyone. That is why." He said: "Girl, she has done no wrong — it is I who am at fault. Raise this child, and I shall keep count of my debts to it." And he began to suckle it. The brahmin also said to the brahmin woman: "You know that when I was once ill, you and my son abandoned me, and it was this girl who nursed me well with medicine and attendants. Therefore if you now provide this child with what it needs, well and good. If you do not, I will install this one as mistress of the household and make you her slave." The brahmin woman was frightened and thought: "This brahmin is fierce. If I do not act accordingly, he is quite capable of doing exactly that." And so she said: "Brahmin, you took pleasure with a serving girl and this boy is not my son, yet I have not complained even once. From now on I shall not trouble him in the least." Because the boy had been placed in the dustbin, he came to be named Dustbin-born. The brahmin regarded Dustbin-born with the thought: "His mother served as my servant, and this one too has come from me," and so he felt very great affection for him. He and the boy ate together, and wherever he was invited as a guest, he took the boy along with him.

Then in another time the brahmin fell ill. Dustbin-born nursed him with medicines of roots, trunks, leaves, flowers, and fruits, yet as he nursed him the sick man only grew more gravely ill, and when the time came that he felt he was approaching death and would not last much longer, he summoned his eldest son Nyizla and said: "Son, when I am gone you need not mourn, but your younger brother Dustbin-born will grieve, so you must provide for his needs." And he spoke these words:

All that is gathered reaches its end, all that is high will come to fall,
all meeting ends in parting, and all that lives must die.

Such is the nature of things in their season. And so, in due time, Nyizla, Dustbin-born, and others who were dear and close to him carried him to the charnel ground, burned him, and afterward performed the mourning rites and settled in.

Then one day at mealtime, Nyizla called out: "Dustbin-born, come here — eat something." The mother said to him: "Son, how can you eat together with the child of a slave girl?" The son replied: "Mother, I have always eaten and drunk with this younger brother of mine — how can he now be called the son of a slave girl?" The mother said: "Son, because your father was fierce, who dared say a word to him? This one is nothing but the son of a slave girl." When Dustbin-born heard this, he went to his mother and said: "Mother, is it true that I am the son of a slave girl?"

"Son, in this world each person experiences the fruits of their own karma — so whose slave is anyone? Son, go to another land and acquire learning and stay there."

He went to another land, and there he dropped his given name Cholzangpa and proclaimed himself Dawazhiba. In time he eventually made his way to Śrāvastī, where there was a brahmin who was a reciter of texts before an assembly. He went to him step by step, and with his calm and composed deportment and manner of conduct he spoke respectfully and settled at one side. Then the brahmin, welcoming him with words of greeting, gladly enquired: "Ho, brahmin youth, where have you come from?" "I have come from Drojog." "Do you know the community of people dwelling at Drojog?" "And what is the talk of the brahmin Dawadragpa there?" The brahmin youth began to weep. The brahmin asked: "Brahmin youth, why do you weep?" "He was my father." "Then why do you weep?" "He has died." "Brahmin youth, that one born must inevitably die — I am your father's junior friend, so take comfort and I will do everything for you." He replied: "Teacher, for the time being please send away other business and let me read the Vedas." "Son, do not be troubled — for a brahmin, proclaiming one's lineage is precisely that." And so he began to read the Vedas with him, and since he was sharp-witted, steady, and diligent, within a short time he had read through all four Vedas. The brahmin was greatly pleased and gave him his daughter adorned with every ornament as his wife, and also gave him abundant wealth of his own possession. He became known as the brahmin's chief reciter before the assembly and, renowned throughout the entire world as one possessed of the four Vedas, he amassed great household prosperity through generosity, offerings, and acts of service.

Then one day the community of people dwelling at Drojog took provisions and came to Śrāvastī, and there they heard how Cholzangpa had become a brahmin's chief reciter, was possessed of the four Vedas, was renowned throughout the entire world, and had amassed great household prosperity through generosity, offerings, and acts of service. Having heard this they began to deliberate: "Let us go and meet him in person, and spread the good news of Nyizla back at Drojog." And so they went to him. Recognizing him, they said nothing, but then changed their provisions, received payment, and departed for Drojog. When they had rested from the weariness of the road, they said to Nyizla: "In Śrāvastī your younger brother Cholzangpa has become a brahmin's chief reciter, is possessed of the four Vedas, is renowned throughout the entire world, and has amassed great household prosperity through generosity, offerings, and acts of service." Nyizla felt joy arise and said to his mother: "Mother, I hear that Cholzangpa in Śrāvastī has become a brahmin's chief reciter, is possessed of the four Vedas, is renowned throughout the entire world, and has amassed great household prosperity through generosity, offerings, and acts of service." The mother replied: "Son, how could that be so? Who would pay respect to that son of a slave girl through generosity, offerings, and acts of service — would anyone really pay him such respect?" And after that he said nothing more.

Then in time Nyizla's circumstances became straitened, and his mother said to him:

"Son, go to your younger brother. If you do so, he may share his wealth with you." Nyizla replied: "Mother, if he was a slave girl's son then, how can he be a younger brother now?" The mother said: "Son, even so, go — and do not refuse to accept what he offers." Pressed insistently by his mother, he sought out travelling companions and went to Śrāvastī.

Cholzangpa heard that his elder brother Nyizla had arrived there in the company of travelling companions and was staying somewhere in the vicinity. On hearing this, he went out to welcome him, greeted him with words of "Welcome, well come!" and then said: "I have given myself the name Śāntacandra here. Do not call me Cholzangpa." Nyizla replied: "If you are Śāntacandra, who else would anyone call you?"

Śāntacandra then brought Nyizla to his home, attended to him with great honour, provided him with food, and said to his brahmin wife: "Know this: this is my elder brother, called Nyizla. You are to supply him with everything he needs, speak no harsh words to him, and always treat him with respect." She agreed to this.

Now Nyizla was pleasant to live with, whereas Cholzangpa was fierce, proud, and violent, and for even the slightest fault he would beat that wife of his with fists and slaps. The brahmin woman said to Nyizla: "Master, you two were nursed at the same breast and are brothers — why is it that you are pleasant to live with, while this younger brother of yours is fierce, proud, and violent? What is the reason for this?" Nyizla replied: "Sister-in-law, he has not studied the household learning. Master, please grant me that household learning." Nyizla then spoke this verse:

Knowledge is not to be given to just anyone.

One should die with one's knowledge still one's own.

Knowledge is to be given to one possessed of learning, devotion, and wealth.

The brahmin woman said: "Master, how much wealth must one give?" "Sister-in-law, five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." She then took five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, placed them at his two feet, and said: "Master, please grant the household learning." Nyizla said: "Sister-in-law, bear with me — I will give it when it is time to leave."

The brahmin woman went to the mistress of the house and said: "My lord's son — your elder brother here dislikes being asked about household affairs and will be displeased. Please send him away." He replied: "Good woman, if that is so, then you prepare provisions for the road for sister-in-law here, and I will seek out travelling companions." He then began to seek companions to travel to the stone quarry. The brahmin woman prepared provisions for the road, took five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, placed them at Nyizla's feet, and said: "Master, now is the time of your departure — please grant the household learning." Nyizla said:

"Sister-in-law, at the time when Śāntacandra beats you, recite this learning:

Known to many other people, known too in other people's homes, known by the village guard's own kind —
sit apart, O Cholzangpa!

If he asks what these words mean, tell him: if he beats you, you will explain the meaning as well."

"Sister-in-law, these words, which carry the meaning of a secret mantra, will bear fruit by the mere act of reciting them. Take them well to heart so that you will have no cause for regret later."

The brahmin woman memorised those words carefully. Śāntacandra also found travelling companions to go to the stone quarry, divided the kārṣāpaṇas with Nyizla, gave him provisions for the road, and escorted him on his way.

The girl thought: "I should test whether these words of secret mantra are true or false." So when Śāntacandra escorted Nyizla on his way and then returned, she made no preparation whatsoever of food, drink, or water for bathing.

Then Śāntacandra said, "Bless you, bring water — I wish to bathe." His wife replied, "My lord's son, the bathwater has not been prepared." "Very well, Bless you, then bring food — I will eat." "My lord's son, that also has not been prepared." He grew angry and said, "All the while my elder brother was here, I merely kept you at a distance. But your nature is such that you cannot be managed without a beating." With that he rolled up his sleeve and moved to strike her. His wife said, "My lord's son, wait a moment — let me recite the lore of the household." He said, "Speak, then." His wife recited:

Known by many other people, known even in other people's homes,
known by the village guard's own kind —
sit apart, O Cholzangpa!

When she had spoken, he said, "Bless you, what is the meaning of those words?" His wife replied, "If you strike me, I will tell you the meaning as well." Those words pierced him like an arrow finding its mark, and he cried out in sharp pain, "Do not strike — let it go, and say no more of the meaning!"

O monks, the brahmin known at that time and on that occasion as Śānatacandra — that was none other than myself. The one known at that time and on that occasion as Cholzangpa — that is this Adhyāśaya here. O monks, even at that time this one, before brahmins and householders of that circle, spoke of me as his kinsman and made claims and counter-claims about himself. Even now this one, before those who practise a holy life in that same circle, speaks of me as his kinsman and makes claims and counter-claims about himself. O monks, therefore those who speak of me as their kinsman, claiming kinship with me, must live so as to come under the authority of the long-standing elders among those who lead a holy life, and the middling ones, and the newly ordained, with reverence, with respect, and with fear.

Here ends the thirteenth rule of the Remainder of the Saṅgha, the section on vexing counsel.

O monastics, I have now set forth these thirteen rules of the Remainder of the Saṅgha. Of these, nine are resolved on the first transgression. Four are resolved after three times. A monk who commits any one of these transgressions and, for as long as he knowingly conceals it, shall be required to undergo probation against his will for that same period. A monk who has undergone probation against his will shall thereafter, for up to six days, carry out the acts of appeasing the Saṅgha. A monk who has carried out the acts of appeasing the Saṅgha and then, without obstruction to the restoration, has acted in accordance with the rule and has pleased the minds of the monastic Saṅgha — in whatever place an assembly of twenty monks is present, that monk shall be restored. If, however, an assembly lacking so much as one of the twenty monks performs that monk's restoration, then the restoration is not valid, and those monks too are to be censured. That is the procedure in this matter.

Here ends the complete Remainder of the Saṅgha.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Now the venerable Udāyin, in the early morning, having put on his lower robe and taken up his alms bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī on alms round, and as he walked through Śrāvastī on alms round in due course, he came to the house of the householder's wife Bhedā. The householder's wife Bhedā, seeing the venerable Udāyin from some distance away —

— seeing the venerable Udāyin from some distance away, she prepared a seat for him and said: "Venerable Udāyin, please come over here. Welcome, venerable Udāyin. Venerable Udāyin, please be seated on the seat that has been prepared." The venerable Udāyin sat down on the seat that had been spread. Then the householder's wife Bhedā prostrated with her head to the venerable Udāyin's two feet, placed her two knees on the ground opposite his two knees, and sat down to hear the Dharma. The venerable Udāyin then began to teach her pleasant and agreeable teachings on the Dharma.

At that time the mother of Mṛgadharma was walking in the neighborhood of that house, and she heard the sound of the venerable Udāyin's voice ringing out from the house of the householder's wife Bhedā. Hearing it, she thought: "How wonderful — the noble Udāyin is teaching the householder's wife Bhedā pleasant and agreeable teachings on the Dharma, just like a bee drawing out honey. I too shall go and listen to the Dharma being taught to another."

So the mother of Mṛgadharma went to the house of the householder's wife Bhedā. When she arrived, she saw the householder's wife Bhedā sitting with her two knees placed opposite the venerable Udāyin's two knees, listening to the Dharma. Seeing this, she thought: "If some householder, or some wife of a householder, or some faithless son of a householder were to see this, they would certainly conclude that this noble Udāyin had done or was intending to do some sinful act unbecoming of an ascetic — something improper — while alone in a secluded place with the householder's wife Bhedā. It will inevitably lead to the worst outcome. Therefore this is my duty to act on."

So the mother of Mṛgadharma went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, prostrated with her head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the mother of Mṛgadharma addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, I was walking in the lane near the householder's wife Bhedā's house when I heard the sound of the venerable Udāyin's voice. Upon hearing it I thought: 'How wonderful — the noble Udāyin is teaching the householder's wife Bhedā pleasant and agreeable teachings on the Dharma, just like a bee drawing out honey. I too shall go and listen to the Dharma being taught to another.' So I went to the lane near the householder's wife Bhedā's house, and I saw the householder's wife Bhedā sitting with her two knees placed opposite the venerable Udāyin's two knees, listening to the Dharma. Seeing this I thought: 'If now some householder, or some wife of a householder, or some faithless son of a householder were to see this, they would certainly conclude that this noble Udāyin had done or was intending to do some sinful act unbecoming of an ascetic, while alone in a secluded place with the householder's wife Bhedā. It will inevitably lead to the worst outcome, and therefore this is my duty to act on.' Venerable One, for this reason, out of compassion, if the Blessed One would be so good as to lay down some reminder for the noble monks so that when noble ones are alone together in a secluded place with a woman, they do not remain seated — that would be excellent, excellent!"

The Blessed One consented to the mother of Mṛgadharma by remaining silent.

Then the mother of Mṛgadharma, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had given his consent, prostrated with her head at the feet of the Blessed One, rose from her seat, and departed.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, together with the grounds for the rule and the circumstances of the case, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. The Blessed Buddhas, though they know, enquire — and so forth, also as before.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, asked the venerable Udāyin: "Udāyin, is it true that you behaved in so unseemly a manner?" The venerable one admitted: "It is true, Blessed One." The Blessed One, the Buddha, censured him with such words as: "What is unbecoming of an ascetic, what is unsuitable, what is improper, what is contrary to proper conduct — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth" — and so forth, censuring him thoroughly.

Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, having seen ten benefits with full discernment, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be established" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Further, whatever monk, together with a woman — alone, one with one, in a secluded and screened place — sits down on a seat in a manner conducive to sexual intercourse: if a female lay practitioner (upāsikā) who possesses words of credible testimony then speaks of any one of the three that entails defeat, or the matter that remains for the Saṅgha, or any matter whatsoever that entails an offense — and the monk acknowledges having so sat — he shall be made to incur whichever of the three entailing defeat, or the matter remaining for the Saṅgha, or any offense whatsoever she has declared; and whatever particular matter that female lay practitioner of credible testimony has spoken of, by that same matter the monk shall be made to incur it. This, however, is a matter that is indeterminate."

Now as to the phrase "whatever monk" — this refers to Udāyin, or to anyone else similarly situated.

"Together with a woman" means a woman or a girl who is capable of bearing the Dharma that arises from unchaste conduct.

"Together" means in her company.

"Alone, one with one" means that one with that one.

"In a secluded place" means a place where no other woman, man, or eunuch whatsoever is present.

"Screened" — screened by five things: screened by a wall, screened by a partition, screened by a curtain, screened by dense [vegetation], or screened by darkness of night.

"In a manner conducive to sexual intercourse" means in a manner conducive to unchaste conduct.

"On a seat" means on a surface.

"Sits down" means placing his buttocks within the distance of a fathom.

Now regarding the phrase "if a female lay practitioner who possesses words of credible testimony": "credible" means one who has genuine faith in the Buddha, genuine faith in the Dharma and the Saṅgha; who has gone for refuge to the Buddha, who has gone for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha; who is devoted to the Buddha, devoted to the Dharma and the Saṅgha; who has no anxiety and no doubt regarding the Buddha, regarding the Dharma and the Saṅgha, regarding suffering, its origin, its cessation, and the path; who has seen the truths, obtained the fruit, and is endowed with direct realization; and who, even to preserve her own life, could not knowingly speak a false word.

Regarding the phrase "the three": the word "three" indicates a number.

"Or that entails defeat" —

"Or the Saṅgha's remainder, or any offense whatsoever" — regarding this phrase: "that entails defeat" means any one of the four defeats. "The Saṅgha's remainder" means any one of the thirteen remainder offenses. "Offense" means any one of the ninety offenses.

Now, a laywoman who is endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness is not learned regarding offenses, not learned regarding the grounds for offenses, and not learned regarding the instigation of offenses. Therefore, if a monk sees her doing any of the following — speaking of Dharma in a superior way to men, making bodily contact while sitting on the same seat as a woman, eating from the same vessel, drinking various intoxicating drinks that would cause intoxication in a single cup, digging the earth, cutting green grass, eating at an improper time, or doing any other transgressive act that is accompanied by an intrinsic fault — then whatever she has agreed to among those acts, he is to make her do it.

"Make her do it" means to have her commit it.

"That is an undetermined matter" means that it is a matter that has not been formally settled.

Then how does a transgression arise? If a monk, using the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, accepts her going but accepts neither her standing nor her sitting nor her lying down, then whatever she has accepted, he is to make her do that. If a monk, using the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, accepts her going and her standing but accepts neither her sitting nor her lying down, then whatever she has accepted, he is to make her do that. If a monk, using the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, accepts her going, her standing, and her sitting but does not accept her lying down, then whatever she has accepted, he is to make her do that. If a monk, using the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, accepts her going, her standing, her sitting, and her lying down, then he is to make her do all of them.

If, however, a monk, using the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, does not accept her going, nor her standing, nor her sitting, nor her lying down, then since he is deserving of a punitive act, the Saṅgha should grant him the formal act of having a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness investigate his conduct. This is how it is to be granted: a seat is prepared, the wooden board is struck, and after correctly informing the entire Saṅgha with the words of inquiry, with the entire Saṅgha assembled and in harmony, a single monk makes a motion and the formal act is performed.

"Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear this. The venerable Cāraka has, through the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, declined to accept going, declined to accept standing, declined to accept sitting, and declined to accept lying down. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it is agreeable, let the Saṅgha grant permission, and let the Saṅgha bestow upon the venerable Cāraka the formal act of having a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness investigate his conduct." That is the motion.

The formal act is then to be performed as follows: "Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear this. The venerable Cāraka, through the words of a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness, has declined to accept going, declined to accept standing, declined to accept sitting, and declined to accept lying down. Therefore, let the Saṅgha bestow upon the venerable Cāraka the formal act of having a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness investigate his conduct. If—those venerable members who consent to the Saṅgha bestowing upon the venerable Cāraka the formal act of having a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness investigate his essential nature — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak. This is the first proclamation of the formal act." It is then to be repeated a second and a third time in the same way. The Saṅgha having consented and agreed, the Saṅgha has bestowed upon the venerable Cāraka the formal act of having a laywoman endowed with the words of a trustworthy witness investigate his essential nature — as indicated by its silence, so it is held.

"O monks, I shall now set forth the rules of conduct that apply to a monk upon whom this act of investigation has been bestowed. One upon whom the act of investigation has been bestowed must not confer the going forth, must not confer full ordination, must not grant residence, and must not install a novice. He must not raise or mention before a monk any matter of damaged moral discipline, damaged view, damaged conduct, or damaged livelihood. He must not be appointed to teach nuns; and if he was previously appointed, he must not teach nuns. He must not establish a schedule of instruction, must not establish the restoration ceremony, and must not establish the invitation ceremony. He must not perform the formal act of a single motion, the formal act of a motion with two recitations, or the formal act of a motion with four recitations. If within the Saṅgha there are other individuals who hold the Vinaya, he must not recite the Sūtra of Individual Liberation. If one upon whom the act of investigation has been bestowed does not properly accept and enter into the rules of conduct that have been prescribed for him, he becomes one who is at variance with those rules."

The first set of undetermined rules is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove in the Bamboo Forest. At that time the monk Śīrika, having dressed in the morning and taken up his bowl and robes, entered Rājagṛha to collect alms. As he was going through Rājagṛha collecting alms in due order, he came to the place where the householder's wife, the noble Poṣadhā, lived. The noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, saw the monk Śīrika from a great distance, and upon seeing him, she prepared a seat for the monk Śīrika and said these words: "Venerable Śīrika, please come here. Venerable Śīrika, welcome. Venerable Śīrika, please be seated on the prepared seat." The monk Śīrika sat down on the prepared seat. Then the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, bowed her head to the two feet of the monk Śīrika and sat — knees not touching knees — in order to hear the Dharma. The monk Śīrika thereupon began to teach her pleasing and beautiful words of Dharma. At that time the laywoman Sujanā was passing through the vicinity of the noble Poṣadhā's house, and from within the house the laywoman Sujanā heard the sound and resonance of the monk Śīrika's voice. Hearing it, she thought to herself: "How wonderful — the noble Śīrika is teaching pleasing and beautiful words of Dharma to the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, just as a bee draws out honey. I too shall go to hear the Dharma that has been set forth for others." The laywoman Sujanā then went to the place where the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, lived, and there she saw the noble Poṣadhā sitting — knees not touching knees — in order to hear the Dharma from the monk Śīrika.

Seeing this, she thought to herself: "If some householder, or the householder's wife, or some son of the householder who lacks faith were to see this, they would inevitably conclude that the noble Śīrika has done or intends to do some sinful, disgraceful act — something unbecoming of an ascetic — alone in a secluded place together with the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder. Because this would surely lead to the worst outcome, this is something I must act upon." And so the laywoman Sujanā went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, she bowed her head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the laywoman Sujanā addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable one, while I was in the doorway of the householder's house near the noble Poṣadhā's restoration-day enclosure, I heard the sound and resonance of the noble Śīrika's voice. Hearing it, I thought to myself: 'How wonderful — the noble Śīrika is teaching pleasing and beautiful words of Dharma to the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, just as a bee draws out honey. I too shall go to hear the Dharma that has been set forth for others.'

And so I went to the place where the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder, was — near the restoration-day enclosure — and there I saw the noble Poṣadhā sitting with the monk Śīrika, knees not touching knees. Seeing this, I thought to myself: 'If some householder, or the wife of the householder, or some son of the householder who lacks faith were to see this, they would inevitably conclude that this noble Śīrika has done or intends to do some sinful, disgraceful act — something unbecoming of an ascetic — alone in a secluded place together with the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder. Because this would surely lead to the worst outcome, this is something I must act upon.' Therefore, venerable one, it would be excellent if, out of compassion, the Blessed One were to establish a reminder for the noble ones — so that when noble ones are alone together with a woman in a secluded place, they do not remain seated."

The Blessed One said nothing to the laywoman Sujanā, and by his silence gave his consent. Then the laywoman Sujanā, understanding that the Blessed One had given consent by his silence, bowed her head to the Blessed One's two feet, rose from her seat, and departed.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, in reference to this occasion and this context, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. And "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowing full well, make inquiry" — and so forth, also as before.

The awakened Blessed One then questioned the monk Śīrika: "Śīrika, is it true that you did such an unseemly thing?"

"Venerable one, it is so."

The awakened Blessed One then rebuked him — "What is unbecoming of an ascetic, what is discordant, what is improper, what is contrary to the rule — that is not something a renunciant should do" — and so forth, in full rebuke.

Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be laid down" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers are to observe and uphold this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk sits alone, in private, with a woman in a secluded place where the two of them are sheltered — a place unsuitable for unchaste conduct — and if a trustworthy laywoman then speaks of either of the two matters that are subject to the Saṅgha Remainder or to any of the offenses entailing downfall, and the monk acknowledges having sat there, he is to be made to undergo whatever of those two matters she has spoken of — that is to say, the Saṅgha Remainder or any of the offenses entailing downfall — by the words of that trustworthy laywoman, and whatever matters she has named, he is to be made to undertake the consequences of those matters accordingly. This is an indeterminate matter.

Now, "whatever monk" means a monk such as Śirika or any other of the same kind.

"In the realm of women" means one capable of serving as the basis for an offense involving the giving of unchaste conduct with a woman or a girl.

"Together" means in her company.

"One alone with one" means that one and that one.

"Secluded" means a place where no other woman, man, or person of indeterminate sex is present.

"Where there is shelter" means sheltered by one of five things: sheltered by a wall, sheltered by a screen, sheltered by a curtain, sheltered by something dense, or sheltered by darkness.

"Unsuitable for unchaste conduct" means a place unsuitable for unchaste conduct.

"On a seat" means on a high seat or a low seat.

"Sits there" means he settles his haunches within less than an arm's length of her.

Regarding "if a trustworthy laywoman": "trustworthy" means one who has explicit faith in the Buddha, explicit faith in the Dharma and the Saṅgha, who has gone for refuge to the Buddha, who has gone for refuge to the Dharma and the Saṅgha, who has become one with the Buddha, who has become one with the Dharma and the Saṅgha, who has no wavering and no doubt regarding the Buddha, who has no wavering and no doubt regarding the Dharma, the Saṅgha, suffering, its origin, its cessation, and the path, who has seen the truth and attained the fruit and possesses realization, and who is incapable of knowingly speaking a false word even to save her own life.

"The two matters" — the word "two" indicates a stated number.

Regarding "the Saṅgha Remainder or any of the offenses entailing downfall": "Saṅgha Remainder" means any one of the thirteen. "Entailing downfall" means any one of the ninety.

Because a trustworthy laywoman is not learned in what constitutes a downfall, not learned in the grounds for a downfall, and not learned in what constitutes the full commission of a downfall, if she has seen the monk do certain things alongside a woman — speaking of a matter surpassing a human's capacity, or sitting together with a woman on the same seat, or making bodily contact, or eating from the same vessel, or drinking various intoxicating beverages that could lead to intoxication from the same cup, or digging the earth, or cutting green grass, or eating at an improper time, or doing any other act that bears an inherent offense — then whatever she has acknowledged of these, he is to be made to undergo the consequences of that.

"To be made to undergo" means to be caused to assume the consequences.

"This too is an indeterminate matter" means this too is a matter that has not been determined as a specific downfall.

The rules concerning the establishment of a downfall, the manner of inquiring into its essential nature, and the conduct in accordance with the determination of its essential nature are to be understood as before.

The two indeterminate matters are complete.

In summary:

Retaining, losing, establishing — entering, taking,

begging, upper robe, lower robe —

each article assessed and conveyed at its proper value.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there arose among the monks this situation of having an excess of robes. Some monks were spreading their robes flat on the floor of the shrine hall. Others were rolling them up neatly. Others were rubbing them with a paste of heavy clay. Others were washing their hands and feet with them. Others were using them to discard their tooth-sticks. Others were wearing them to go on alms rounds in the village. Others were laying them out on the rows of food. Others were going about wearing them to visit their preceptors and teachers. Others were wearing them to listen to the Teacher's instructions. Others were wearing them to listen to the Dharma during the day. Others were wearing them to listen to the Dharma at night. When they put on and took off these robes, there was much busyness and much activity, and it caused them to neglect scriptural recitation, reading, chanting, yogic practice, mental application, and the inner stillness of calm abiding of the mind.

A certain monk of few wants said: "Why has this situation arisen among the monks — this excess of robes — such that some monks spread their robes flat on the floor of the shrine hall, others roll them up neatly, others rub them with a paste of heavy clay, others wash their hands and feet with them, others use them to discard their tooth-sticks, others wear them to go on alms rounds in the village, others lay them out on the rows of food, others go about wearing them to visit their preceptors and teachers, others wear them to listen to the Teacher's instructions, others wear them to listen to the Dharma during the day, others wear them to listen to the Dharma at night — and when they put on and take off these robes, there is much busyness and much activity, causing them to neglect scriptural recitation, reading, chanting, yogic practice, mental application, and the inner stillness of calm abiding of the mind?" He rebuked them, expressed disapproval, and spoke against them. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in connection with this founding case and in this context, convened an assembly of the community of monks. The Tathāgata convened the assembly of monks having seen the twofold purpose: namely, so that all my hearers might come to know, and so that I may properly establish a foundation for training in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, inquires knowingly — inquiring knowingly, yet not inquiring unknowingly; inquiring at the right time, not inquiring outside the right time; inquiring when it is purposeful, not inquiring when it is not purposeful. Thus the Blessed One, the Buddha, repels with a fence inquiring when it is not purposeful. And as for the Blessed One, the Buddha, when inquiring with purpose, he knows the right time. Therefore the Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned the monks: "Monks, has this situation of an excess of robes arisen among you — such that some monks spread their robes flat on the floor of the shrine hall, others roll them up neatly, others rub them with a paste of heavy clay, others wash their hands and feet with them, others use them to discard their tooth-sticks, others wear them to go on alms rounds in the village —" others spread them out among the food dishes; others wear them when going to visit their preceptors and teachers; others use them while receiving the Teacher's oral instructions; others use them while listening to the Dharma during the day; others use them while listening to the Dharma at night — and while you put on and take off robes in this way, you have many duties and many tasks, and you neglect recitation, reading, chanting, yoga, mental application, and the inner calm abiding of the mind. Is this true?" "Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, then censured those who are difficult to support, difficult to satisfy, who have great desires, and who do not know contentment. Then the Blessed One praised being easy to support, easy to satisfy, having few desires, knowing contentment, being restrained, maintaining few possessions, cultivating good qualities, being beautiful in conduct, and knowing measure. Having spoken these praises, he declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits fully and truly, a rule of training in the Vinaya is to be laid down for the hearers. It is this: for the sake of uniting the Saṅgha; for the sake of making the Saṅgha excellent; for the sake of the Saṅgha dwelling at ease; for the sake of cutting off those persons who are shameless and difficult to admonish; for the sake of those who feel shame dwelling at ease; for the sake of those without faith coming to have faith; for the sake of increasing the faith of those who already have faith; for the sake of restraining the defilements of this very life; for the sake of turning back those of future lives; and so that this pure conduct of mine, which brings benefit to the many, widely taught with full exactness among gods and humans, may long endure."

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: When a monk has obtained a robe fabric and it is sturdy and ready to be straightened out, he is to maintain three robes. If he keeps more than that, it is an offense of relinquishment." Thus the Blessed One laid down this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. At that time the Venerable Mahākāśyapa was sitting at the foot of a tree in a forest hermitage near Rājagṛha. Now at the time when the Blessed One had placed the Venerable Mahākāśyapa in charge of the Saṅgha, a certain householder had long been wishing: "Ah, if only I could offer the Elder Mahākāśyapa — who is worshipped by gods and humans — a meal and cover him with a great length of fine cloth, would that not be fitting?" But that wish had not yet been fulfilled. So that householder took a great length of fine cloth and went to where the Venerable Ānanda was. Having arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Venerable Ānanda and said to him: "Venerable Ānanda, do you know at present where the Elder Mahākāśyapa is staying?" "Householder, I have heard that he is sitting at the foot of a tree in a forest hermitage." "When might he come?" "On this very occasion of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony." "Venerable Ānanda, please be aware of this: I have long been wishing — 'Ah, if only I could offer the Elder Mahākāśyapa, who is worshipped by gods and humans, a meal and cover him with a great length of fine cloth, would that not be fitting?' — and I have come bringing that great length of fine cloth. Venerable Ānanda, please be aware of this. We householders have many duties and many tasks,

"Ah, Venerable Ānanda, out of your compassionate regard for me, please present this great length of fine cloth to the Elder Mahākāśyapa, who is worshipped by gods and humans."

Then the Venerable Ānanda thought to himself: "If I accept the great length of fine cloth from the householder, the rule of training may be undermined. But if I do not accept it, that too would obstruct the merit of the householder and obstruct the Elder Mahākāśyapa's receiving a gift. If I were to accept it, there may also be grounds on which the Blessed One would grant permission, since the time is right." And so the Venerable Ānanda accepted the great length of fine cloth from the householder and went to where the Blessed One was. On arriving, he bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Venerable Ānanda reported the whole matter to the Blessed One in detail.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, excellent, excellent! You knew what I had permitted. Therefore I now permit monks to keep, for up to ten days without designating it as allowable, a robe that is extra beyond what has been consecrated."

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of those who desire training, those who are respectful toward training, those who have devoted themselves to the training's implements, those of refined virtue, those of fine character, and those of measured conduct, declared to the monks: "Monks, what was stated before was a rule, and this is a permission. My hearers should learn this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: when a monk has received robes and the rains retreat is over, he should keep, for up to ten days without designating it as allowable, a robe that is extra beyond what has been consecrated. If he keeps it beyond that, it is an offence of forfeiture."

The word "monk" refers to one who is in this Dharma. As for the phrase "when a monk has received robes and the rains retreat is over," there are four cases: there may be receiving of robes without the rains retreat being over; there may be the rains retreat being over without receiving of robes; there may be both receiving of robes and the rains retreat being over; and there may be neither receiving of robes nor the rains retreat being over.

Now, what constitutes receiving of robes without the rains retreat being over? It is this: when a monk has washed, wrung, scrubbed, and turned the robes, but the Saṅgha has not yet released the rains retreat. That is what constitutes receiving of robes without the rains retreat being over.

What constitutes the rains retreat being over without receiving of robes? It is this: when a monk has not yet washed, wrung, scrubbed, and turned the robes, but the Saṅgha has released the rains retreat. That is what constitutes the rains retreat being over without receiving of robes.

What constitutes both receiving of robes and the rains retreat being over? It is this: when a monk has washed, wrung, scrubbed, and turned the robes, and the Saṅgha has also released the rains retreat. That is what constitutes the rains retreat being over and the robes being received.

What constitutes neither receiving of robes nor the rains retreat being over? It is any situation other than the foregoing three.

As for "up to ten days," this means up to the end of ten nights. "Extra beyond what has been consecrated" means beyond what has been set apart through consecration. "Without designating it as allowable" means without having examined it. "Keep" means to hold it as one's own. "If he keeps it beyond that" means if he keeps it past that point. "An offence of forfeiture" means that after forfeiting the object, the transgression of the forfeiture offence is to be confessed. That is why it is said to be an offence of forfeiture.

The Vinaya Analysis, twenty-fifth bundle.

Now, how does the transgression occur? It is as follows:

If a monk obtains a robe on the first day of the fortnight, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor designates it as allowable, nor gives it to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

Even if he does not obtain a robe on the first day, should he obtain one on the second day, or the third day, or the ninth day, or up to and including the tenth day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor designates it as allowable, nor gives it to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk obtains one robe on the first day and then obtains another robe on the second day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the first and give away the second, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another; or alternatively, consecrate the second and give away the first, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

Even if he does not obtain a robe on the first or second day, should he obtain one between the third day and the tenth day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the first and give away the second, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another; or alternatively, consecrate the second and give away the first, or designate it as allowable, or give it to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk obtains two robes on the first day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate those two robes, or give them away, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates them, nor gives them away, nor designates them as allowable, nor gives them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

Even if he does not obtain two robes on the first day, should he obtain two robes on the second day, or the third day, or the ninth day, or up to and including the tenth day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate those two robes, or give them away, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates them, nor gives them away, nor designates them as allowable, nor gives them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk obtains two robes on the first day and then obtains two further robes on the second day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the first two and give away the latter two, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another; or alternatively, consecrate the latter two and give away the first two, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk does not obtain robes on the first or second day but obtains two robes any time from the third day up through the tenth day, then that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the first two and give away the latter two, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another; or alternatively, consecrate the latter two and give away the first two, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk obtains many robes on the first day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate those robes, or give them away, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk does not obtain many robes on the first day but obtains many robes on the second day, or the third day, or the ninth day, or any day up through the tenth day, then that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate those robes, or give them away, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk obtains many robes on the first day and then obtains further many robes on the second day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either consecrate the first lot and give away the latter lot, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another; or alternatively, consecrate the latter lot and give away the first lot, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither consecrates, nor gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk does not obtain many robes on the first or second day but obtains many robes any time from the third day up through the tenth day, that monk must, within those very ten days, either give away the first lot, or designate them as allowable, or give them to another. If he neither gives away, nor designates as allowable, nor gives to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offence of forfeiture.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and without having relinquished it or separated himself from it, and without having confessed the transgression, he obtains another robe, that new robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by continuity with the first.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished it but without having separated himself from it, and without having confessed the transgression, he obtains another robe, that new robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by continuity with the first.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished it and separated himself from it, but without having confessed the transgression, he obtains another robe, that new robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by continuity with the first.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished it and separated himself from it, and having confessed the transgression, he then obtains another robe, there is no transgression with respect to that robe.

Likewise, for as long as a monk has not confessed and individually declared a forfeitable article, if he makes use of or takes up any other requisite whatsoever — whether an alms bowl, a Dharma robe, a strainer, a cup, a belt, or any other implement for the livelihood of a renunciant — that too becomes subject to forfeiture by continuity with the first.

There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

This completes the first section on forfeiture through possession.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, the following situation arose among the monks — an abundance of Dharma robes. A certain monk who had undertaken the rains retreat obtained a Dharma robe, washed it, mended it, sewed it up, turned it over, bundled it into a roll of patches, and then entrusted it to the monks who were residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis, saying: "Monks, go wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes." And those monks, going wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes, did so without concealing them or causing them to be hidden.

The monks who were residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis then had much work and many tasks with those Dharma robes — drying them, airing them, spreading them out, shaking them, beating them, and storing them — so that they abandoned the recitation of scripture, the reading of texts, chanting, yoga practice, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding of mind.

For this reason, those monks of few concerns censured, criticized, and complained: "Why is it that such an abundance of Dharma robes has come about among the monks? A certain monk who had undertaken the rains retreat obtained a Dharma robe, washed it, mended it, sewed it up, turned it over, bundled it into a roll of patches, and entrusted it to the monks residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis, saying: 'Monks, go wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes.' And those monks go wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes without concealing them or causing them to be hidden. And the monks residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis have much work and many tasks with those Dharma robes — drying them, airing them, spreading them out, shaking them, beating them, and storing them — so that they abandon the recitation of scripture, the reading of texts, chanting, yoga practice, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding of mind."

At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this grounds for the rule, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and so forth, as before. The Blessed Buddhas, though they know, yet inquire — and so forth, likewise as before.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned the many monks: "Monks, is it true that this abundance of Dharma robes has come about among you — that a certain monk who had undertaken the rains retreat obtained a Dharma robe, washed it, mended it, sewed it up, turned it over, bundled it into a roll of patches, and entrusted it to the monks residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis, saying: 'Monks, go wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes' — and that you, going wandering the provinces wearing upper and lower Dharma robes, did so without concealing them or causing them to be hidden; and that the monks residing there permanently and on an ongoing basis, having much work and many tasks with those Dharma robes — drying them, airing them, spreading them out, shaking them, beating them, and storing them — abandon the recitation of scripture, the reading of texts, chanting, yoga practice, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding of mind?"

"Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, then censured those who are difficult to support, difficult to satisfy, who have great desires, and who do not know contentment. Thereupon the Blessed One praised those who are easy to support, easy to satisfy, who have few desires, who know contentment, who are scrupulous, who use few requisites, and — who are trained in refinement and elegance, and who know moderation — having uttered such praises, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, seeing precisely ten benefits, the rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, as before. The rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established in this way: if a monk who has received his robes wrings them out because they are damp, and even for a single night separates any one of his three robes from him beyond the boundary, that is an offense entailing forfeiture.

Thus did the Blessed One establish the rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. At that time, the venerable Mahākāśyapa was dwelling in Rājagṛha in a cave of the Saptaparṇī, observing the rules of the restoration ceremony in harmony with the Saṅgha. A great many monks were also seated in harmony in the place of the restoration ceremony on that very fifteenth day of the restoration, waiting above all for the venerable Mahākāśyapa to arrive. Then, as the venerable Mahākāśyapa was going to the place of the restoration ceremony, a noble river swollen with the fine summer floods came rushing over, and a great wave arose and soaked his patched outer robe. The venerable Mahākāśyapa then wrung out that patched robe, aired it, and spread it to dry, and it took him a long while. After squeezing it out, airing it, and drying it, the venerable Mahākāśyapa went to the place of the restoration ceremony, and having arrived, he sat down right where a seat had been laid out for him before the assembly of monks.

Then the great many monks addressed the venerable Mahākāśyapa with these words: "Venerable Mahākāśyapa, please take note. Here we, a great many monks, have been seated in harmony in the place of the restoration ceremony, waiting above all for the venerable Mahākāśyapa, and yet the venerable Mahākāśyapa has been delayed. Venerable one, here, on the way to the restoration ceremony, a noble river swollen with the fine summer floods came rushing over, and a great wave arose and soaked my patched robe. As I was wringing out that patched robe, airing it, and drying it, it took me quite a long while. Venerable ones, now I, the monk Mahākāśyapa, am old, aged, and advanced in years, and since I am not strong enough to fully manage the patched robe on account of its heaviness, what am I to do?"

At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should grant permission to the monk Mahākāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, and to any others who are similarly situated, to not be separated from their patched robe. It is to be granted in this way: having prepared a seat, striking the wooden signal board, and duly informing the monks with the words of the motion, an assembly of all the monks who are seated in harmony within the boundary — no fewer than a quorum of four monks — shall convene, and the monk Kāśyapa, having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, shall bow in order of seniority, then sit on his heels at the edge of the senior monks, join his palms, present his patched robe to the Saṅgha, and speak these words: 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. I, the monk Kāśyapa, am old, aged, and advanced in years, and since I am not strong enough to fully manage my patched robe on account of its heaviness, I, the monk Kāśyapa, who am old, aged, and advanced in years, request from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from my patched robe.'

May the compassionate venerable Saṅgha, out of compassion, grant to me, the monk Kāśyapa, who am old, aged, and advanced in years, permission to not be separated from my patched robe.' This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

After that, one monk shall make the motion and perform the act. 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk Kāśyapa is old, aged, and advanced in years, and since he is not strong enough to fully manage his patched robe on account of its heaviness, this monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, requests from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from his patched robe. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it is agreeable, may the Saṅgha grant permission to the monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, to not be separated from his patched robe. This is the motion. The act shall be performed as follows. May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk Kāśyapa is old, aged, and advanced in years, and since he is not strong enough to fully manage his patched robe on account of its heaviness, this monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, requests from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from his patched robe. Therefore, if the Saṅgha grants to the monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, permission to not be separated from his patched robe, then those venerable ones who consent to granting the monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, permission to not be separated from his patched robe shall remain silent, and those who do not consent shall speak. The Saṅgha, having consented and agreed, has granted to the monk Kāśyapa, who is old, aged, and advanced in years, permission to not be separated from his patched robe. So it is held, since no one has spoken. The Saṅgha has granted to whichever monk permission to not be separated from his patched robe; that monk may travel about wearing the upper and lower robes together with it, and there should be no regret in this.'

At that time the venerable Śāriputra was present in that very assembly and was in agreement. Then the venerable Śāriputra said to the monks: 'Venerable ones, I, the monk Śāriputra, am afflicted with a wind ailment, and since I am not strong enough to fully manage my patched robe on account of its heaviness, what am I to do?' At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: 'Monks, grant to the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, and to any others who are likewise afflicted, permission to not be separated from their patched robes. It is to be granted in this manner: having prepared the lodging, having struck the wooden signal-board, having properly instructed the monks with the words of inquiry, a Saṅgha of not fewer than four monks shall all be present and in agreement in the center of the assembly. The monk Śāriputra shall arrange his upper robe over one shoulder, bow in order of seniority, then sit on his heels at the edge of the senior monks, join his palms, present his patched robe to the Saṅgha, and speak these words: "May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. I, the monk Śāriputra, am afflicted with a wind ailment, and since I am not strong enough to fully manage my patched robe on account of its heaviness, I, the monk Śāriputra, who am afflicted with a wind ailment, request from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from my patched robe. May the compassionate venerable Saṅgha, out of compassion, grant to me, the monk Śāriputra, who am afflicted with a wind ailment, permission to not be separated from my patched robe." This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

Following that, one monk is to make the motion and perform the formal act. "May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. The monk Śāriputra is afflicted with a wind ailment, and since he is not strong enough to fully manage his patched robe on account of its heaviness, the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, requests from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from his patched robe. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it is agreeable, may the Saṅgha grant that permission. The Saṅgha grants to the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, permission to not be separated from his patched robe. This is the motion."

The formal act is to be performed as follows. "May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. The monk Śāriputra is afflicted with a wind ailment, and since he is not strong enough to fully manage his patched robe on account of its heaviness, the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, requests from the Saṅgha permission to not be separated from his patched robe. Therefore, if the Saṅgha grants to the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, permission to not be separated from his patched robe, those venerable ones who consent to granting the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, permission to not be separated from his patched robe should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha, having consented and approved, has granted to the monk Śāriputra, who is afflicted with a wind ailment, permission to not be separated from his patched robe. This is accepted as such, since no one has spoken."

If the Saṅgha grants any monk whatsoever permission to not be separated from his patched robe, that monk may go about wearing both his upper and lower robes, and he should have no regret in this matter.

Then the Blessed One praised those who wish to train, spoke of their virtue, and spoke of the virtues of those who are respectful toward the training, those who are zealous in equipping themselves for the training, those who are thin, those who possess the qualities of thorough purification, those who are graceful, and those who know moderation — and then declared to the monks: "Monks, for this reason what was before was a rule, and this is now a permission. My hearers are to recite this as a basis of training in the Vinaya as follows: Should a monk who has obtained robes take them out to be aired and then separate himself, even for a single night, from any one of his three robes beyond the boundary — except by permission of the Saṅgha — that is an offense requiring forfeiture and confession."

"Monk" refers to one of this Dharma. "Who has obtained robes and takes them out to be aired" — there is the case of one who has obtained robes but has not taken them out to be aired; one who has not obtained robes but has taken them out to be aired; one who has obtained robes and has taken them out to be aired; and one who has not obtained robes and has not taken them out to be aired. These are to be elaborated in four branches as before. "Even for a single night" means even at the end of a single night. "Any one of his three robes" means any one of the patched robe, the upper robe, and the under robe. "Separates himself beyond the boundary" means causing dawn to break elsewhere. "Except by permission of the Saṅgha" means setting aside permission granted by the Saṅgha. "An offense requiring forfeiture and confession" means that after forfeiting that object, the transgression of the forfeiture offense is to be confessed — that is why it is called an offense requiring forfeiture and confession.

As for how a transgression arises in this regard, the intermediate summary in verse:

One dwelling, two dwellings,
a dwelling shared by a group, encircled by a wall, a fence, or a ditch —
these four constitute a village or homestead.
A way-station, a non-Buddhist establishment, a marketplace, a shop, a music hall, a battlefield, a naval vessel, a chariot, a tree grove, a pleasure park — these are the intermediate summary, complete.

A village having one dwelling, a village having two dwellings, a village having a group of dwellings, a village encircled by a wall, a village encircled by a fence, a village encircled by a ditch — these are to be understood as the four types: a village with a single surrounding area, a village with separate surrounding areas, many villages with a single surrounding area, and many villages with separate surrounding areas. A single household with a single surrounding area, a single household with separate surrounding areas, many households with a single surrounding area, many households with separate surrounding areas. A householder's dwelling with a single surrounding area, a householder's dwelling with separate surrounding areas, many householders' dwellings with a single surrounding area, many householders' dwellings with separate surrounding areas. A tīrthika's dwelling with a single surrounding area, a tīrthika's dwelling with separate surrounding areas, many tīrthikas' dwellings with a single surrounding area, many tīrthikas' dwellings with separate surrounding areas. A marketplace with a single surrounding area, a marketplace with separate surrounding areas, many marketplaces with a single surrounding area, many marketplaces with separate surrounding areas. A shop with a single surrounding area, a shop with separate surrounding areas, many shops with a single surrounding area, many shops with separate surrounding areas. A music hall with a single surrounding area, a music hall with separate surrounding areas, many music halls with a single surrounding area, many music halls with separate surrounding areas. A battlefield with a single surrounding area, a battlefield with separate surrounding areas, many battlefields with a single surrounding area, many battlefields with separate surrounding areas. A military encampment with a single surrounding area, a military encampment with separate surrounding areas, many military encampments with a single surrounding area, many military encampments with separate surrounding areas. A vessel with a single surrounding area, a vessel with separate surrounding areas, many vessels with a single surrounding area, many vessels with separate surrounding areas. A chariot with a single surrounding area, a chariot with separate surrounding areas, many chariots with a single surrounding area, many chariots with separate surrounding areas. A tree grove with a single surrounding area, a tree grove with separate surrounding areas, many tree groves with a single surrounding area, many tree groves with separate surrounding areas. A pleasure park with a single surrounding area, a pleasure park with separate surrounding areas, many pleasure parks with a single surrounding area, many pleasure parks with separate surrounding areas.

By means of these distinctions — traveling on a road and so forth, going straight ahead and so forth, and the distinctions of what is shared and what is not shared among the other boundary-zones — the transgressions of a monk's being separated from and not being separated from his Dharma robes are set forth in extensive detail.

Now, what is a village having one dwelling? It is, for example, the villages of forest-dwellers, Tibetans, and border peoples. And what is the surrounding area of such a village? It is the entire interior, and one arrow's length beyond the exterior — or the distance within which people carry out their threshing, winnowing, weaving, cooking, eating, drinking, and whatever children do. That is the surrounding area of such a village.

If a monk leaves his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks while he is in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks while he is inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village having two dwellings? It is just as with a village having one dwelling — a village having two dwellings is the same in that regard.

What is a village having a collection of dwellings? It is one that is inhabited from many gates on all sides. What is its surrounding area? Each part is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a walled village? It is a village that is enclosed by a wall. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, and one fathom beyond the exterior — or the distance within which a cart drawn by six oxen and loaded with bamboo can be covered, and as far as a crow will fly up and alight. That is the surrounding area of such a village. If a monk leaves his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks while he is in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks while he is inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village enclosed by a palisade? It is a village that is enclosed by a palisade. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, and one fathom beyond the exterior — or the distance within which the dust raised by the hooves of goats and sheep being driven out settles, and as far as a person who by nature has a sense of modesty will go to relieve himself. That is the surrounding area of such a village. If a monk leaves his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks while he is in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks while he is inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village enclosed by a moat? It is a village that is enclosed by a moat. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, and one fathom beyond the exterior — or the distance within which a ladder of twelve rungs can lie flat, and as far as the coarse sound of a donkey braying after having been struck with a cloth can be heard. That is the surrounding area of such a village. If a monk leaves his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks while he is in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks while he is inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village having a single surrounding area? It is a village in which there is a single pleasure grove, or assembly ground, or divine abode. What is its surrounding area? Each part is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? The divine abode. If a monk leaves his Dharma robes in the village and dawn breaks at the divine abode, there is no transgression. If he leaves his Dharma robes at the divine abode and dawn breaks in the village, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his Dharma robes in the village or at the divine abode and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a village having separate surrounding areas? It is a village in which there are many pleasure groves, assembly grounds, or divine abodes. What is its surrounding area? Each part is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is the case of many villages having a single surrounding area? It is the case of villages in which there is a single pleasure grove, assembly ground, or divine abode. What are the surrounding areas of those villages? Each is separate and distinct.

What do they share in common? The divine abode. If a monk leaves his robes in the village and dawn breaks at the divine abode, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes at the divine abode and dawn breaks in the village, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his robes in the village or at the divine abode and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a case of many villages having separate surrounding areas? It is the case of villages in which there are very many pleasure groves, assembly grounds, or divine abodes. What are the surrounding areas of those villages? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a household having a single surrounding area? It is the household of one person, or of family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one arm's length outside, or wherever the household members thresh grain, pound it, weave, distribute it, eat, drink, or where children play — that is its surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks within the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a household having a separate surrounding area? It is the household of different persons, or of family members whose doors have been opened separately. What is its surrounding area? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? The door. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks at the door, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes at the door and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his robes inside or at the door and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a case of many households having a single surrounding area? It is the many households of one person, or of family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is the surrounding area of those households? It is the entire interior, plus one arm's length outside, or wherever the household members thresh grain, pound it, weave, distribute it, eat, drink, or where children play — that is their surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks within the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. But if he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture.

What is a case of many households having separate surrounding areas? It is the many households of different persons, or of family members whose doors have been opened separately. What are the surrounding areas of those households? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a caravan household having a single surrounding area? It is the caravan household of one person, or of family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one arm's length outside, or wherever they set down their small hand drums, large barrel drums, lutes, single-headed clay drums, frame drums, gongs, cymbals and bells, wherever they thresh grain, pound it, weave, distribute it, eat, drink, or where children play — that is its surrounding area.

If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a caravan household with separate surrounding areas having many households? It is the caravan households of persons who are distinct from one another, or of family members whose doors have been opened separately. What are their surrounding areas? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a tīrthika household having a single surrounding area? It is the household of tīrthikas who share a single view, a single conviction, a single aspiration, and a single intention. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one arm's length outside, or wherever they suspend their heavy weights, wherever they place their fire-sacrifice wood, their wool, their bark, their sticks, their balls, their pouring vessels, their filling vessels, wherever they light fire, wherever they burn the fire-sacrifice wood, wherever they thresh grain, pound it, weave, distribute it, eat, drink, or where children play — that is its surrounding area.

If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a tīrthika household with separate surrounding areas? It is the household of tīrthikas who hold different views, different convictions, different aspirations, and different intentions. What are their surrounding areas? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? A divine abode.

Now, what is a caravan household having many households with a single surrounding area? It is the many caravan households of a single person, or of family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one arm's length outside, or wherever they set down their small hand drums, large barrel drums, lutes, single-headed clay drums, frame drums, gongs, cymbals and bells, wherever they thresh grain, pound it, weave, distribute it, eat, drink, or where children play — that is their surrounding area.

If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are many caravan households with separate surrounding areas? They are the many caravan households of persons who are distinct from one another, or of family members whose doors have been opened separately. What are their surrounding areas? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

If a monk stores his Dharma robes in the house of a non-Buddhist (tīrthika) and dawn breaks at a divine abode, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes at a divine abode and dawn breaks in the house of a non-Buddhist, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the house of a non-Buddhist or at a divine abode and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are many non-Buddhist households with a single shared surrounding area? They are the many non-Buddhist households of persons who share a single view, a single tolerance, a single wish, and a single intention. What is their surrounding area? It is everything inside and one bow-length outside, or wherever they pound and grind things, wherever they place firewood for the ritual fire, wherever they place their offering vessels, bark strips, pestles, round stones, pouring ladles, and filling ladles, wherever they light fire and burn the ritual firewood, wherever they beat and churn and weave and distribute and eat and drink — wherever young children play. That is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are many non-Buddhist households with separate surrounding areas? They are the many non-Buddhist households of persons who hold different views, different tolerances, different wishes, and different intentions. What are their surrounding areas? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What are many market stalls with a single shared surrounding area? They are the many market stalls belonging to a single person, or to family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? It is everything inside and one bow-length outside, or wherever they store goods, wherever they buy, wherever they sell, wherever they count, wherever they weigh, and wherever they set things down. That is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are many market stalls with separate surrounding areas? They are the many market stalls belonging to different persons, or to family members whose doors have been opened separately. What are their surrounding areas? Each is separate and distinct. What do they share in common? The placing platform. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks on the placing platform, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes on the placing platform and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or on the placing platform and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many market stalls with a single shared surrounding area? They are the very many market stalls belonging to a single person, or to family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? It is everything inside and one bow-length outside, or wherever they store goods, wherever they buy, wherever they sell, wherever they count, wherever they weigh, and wherever they set things down — all of that constitutes their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many market stalls with separate surrounding areas? They are the very many market stalls belonging to different persons, or to family members whose doors have been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? Each has its own separate surrounding area. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a shop with a single surrounding area? It is a shop belonging to a single person, or to family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is its surrounding area? It is everything inside and one bow-length outside, or wherever they store goods, wherever they store wheat, barley, black-eyed peas, sālu rice, rice, sesame, large lentils, raw sugar, butter, cotton wool, thread, and cloth, wherever they heap up grain, wherever they place small weights and scales, wherever they weigh, wherever they set up winnowing fans, wherever they buy, wherever they sell, wherever they count, wherever they weigh, and wherever they set things down — all of that constitutes its surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many shops with separate surrounding areas? They are the very many shops belonging to different persons, or to family members whose doors have been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? Each has its own separate surrounding area. What do they share in common? The sitting platform. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks on the sitting platform, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes on the sitting platform and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or on the sitting platform and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many shops with a single surrounding area? They are the very many shops belonging to a single person, or to family members whose doors have not been opened separately. What is their surrounding area? It is everything inside and one bow-length outside, or wherever they store goods, wherever they store wheat, barley, black-eyed peas, sālu rice, rice, sesame, large lentils, raw sugar, butter, cotton wool, thread, and cloth, wherever they heap up grain, wherever they place small weights and scales, wherever they weigh, wherever they set up winnowing fans, wherever they buy, wherever they sell, wherever they count, wherever they weigh, and wherever they set things down — all of that constitutes their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many shops with separate surrounding areas? They are the very many shops belonging to different persons, or to family members with separate doors. What is their surrounding area? It is separate and distinct for each. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a drum-house with a single surrounding area? It is a drum-house belonging to one person, or to family members who have not separated their households. What is its surrounding area? It comprises everything inside, plus one fathom outside, or wherever those who yoke the oxen, lay down the grass, beat the muñja reeds, load the ropes, thresh, winnow, weave, distribute, eat, drink, and the boys who play — wherever all of that takes place, that is its surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a drum-house with separate surrounding areas? It is a drum-house belonging to different persons, or to family members who have separated their households. What is its surrounding area? It is separate and distinct for each. What do they share in common? The threshing floor. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks on the threshing floor, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes on the threshing floor and dawn breaks in the drum-house, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the drum-house or on the threshing floor and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many drum-houses with a single surrounding area? They are the very many drum-houses belonging to one person, or to family members who have not separated their households. What is their surrounding area? It comprises everything inside, plus one fathom outside, or wherever those who yoke the oxen, lay down the grass, beat the muñja reeds, load the ropes, thresh, winnow, weave, distribute, eat, drink, and the boys who play — wherever all of that takes place, that is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What are very many drum-houses with separate surrounding areas? They are the very many drum-houses belonging to different persons, or to family members who have separated their households. What is their surrounding area? It is separate and distinct for each. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a granary with a single surrounding area? It is a granary belonging to one person, or to family members who have not separated their households. What is its surrounding area? It comprises everything inside, plus one fathom outside, or wherever those who thresh the grain, winnow it, sift it, pile it, place the small measuring vessels and the scales, weigh it, and set up the wind-ventilator — wherever all of that takes place, that is its surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a granary with separate surrounding areas? It is a granary belonging to different persons, or a granary belonging to those who have divided their shares. Its surrounding area consists of separate, distinct zones. What do they share in common? The threshing floor at the center of the granary. If a monk stores his Dharma robes at the center of the granary and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks at the center of the granary, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes at the center of the granary or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a granary with many sections having a single surrounding area? It is a granary with many sections belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Its surrounding area is the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or wherever they thresh the grain, toss it in the air, winnow it, pile it up, set out the small measuring vessels and the scales, measure it, and set up the wind-ventilator — that is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a granary with many sections having separate surrounding areas? It is a granary with many sections belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas consist of separate, distinct zones. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

The Vinaya Analysis, the twenty-sixth fascicle.

What is a fodder storehouse with a single surrounding area? It is a fodder storehouse belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Its surrounding area is the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or wherever they yoke the oxen, set out the fodder, beat the munja grass, load the ropes, and discard the dung — that is its surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a fodder storehouse with separate surrounding areas? It is a fodder storehouse belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Its surrounding area consists of separate, distinct zones. What do they share in common? The doorway. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks at the doorway, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes at the doorway and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or at the doorway and dawn breaks elsewhere, it becomes a transgression requiring abandonment.

What is a fodder storehouse with many sections having a single surrounding area? It is a fodder storehouse with many sections belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Their surrounding area is the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or wherever they yoke the oxen, set out the fodder, beat the munja grass, load the ropes, and discard the dung — that is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression.

If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it incurs a transgression entailing relinquishment.

What is meant by many fodder storehouses with separate surrounding areas? They are the many fodder storehouses belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas are separate and distinct from one another. What do they have in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a boat with a single surrounding area? It is a boat belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Its surrounding area, when the boat is moving, is the entire interior together with one fathom outside; when it is moored, it is likewise the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or wherever they drive in the mooring stakes, bail out the boat, stow the cargo, lay down the punt poles, beat the munja grass, load the ropes, or wherever they pound, scrub, weave, distribute, eat, drink, or where children play — that is its surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it incurs a transgression entailing relinquishment.

What is meant by boats with separate surrounding areas? They are boats belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas are separate and distinct from one another. What do they have in common? The prow of the boat. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks at the prow, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes at the prow and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or at the prow and dawn breaks elsewhere, it incurs a transgression entailing relinquishment.

What is meant by many boats with a single surrounding area? They are the many boats belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Their surrounding area, when moving, is the entire interior together with one fathom outside; when moored, it is the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or wherever they drive in the mooring stakes, bail out the boats, stow the cargo, lay down the punt poles, beat the munja grass, load the ropes, or wherever they pound, scrub, weave, distribute, eat, drink, or where children play — that is their surrounding area. If a monk stores his Dharma robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he stores his Dharma robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, it incurs a transgression entailing relinquishment.

What is meant by many boats with separate surrounding areas? They are the many boats belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas are separate and distinct from one another. What do they have in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a cart with a single surrounding area? It is a cart belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. Its surrounding area, when moving, is the entire interior together with one fathom outside; when stationary, it is the entire interior together with one fathom outside, or — the place where they drive in the pegs, yoke the oxen, set down the grass, beat the muñja reeds, load the ropes — the place where they thresh, winnow, weave, distribute, eat, drink, and where the boys do their work: that is its surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What are carts with separate surrounding areas? They are the many carts belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas are each separate and distinct. What do they have in common? Only the driver's seat.

If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks at the driver's seat, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes at the driver's seat and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or at the driver's seat and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is meant by many carts with a single surrounding area? They are the many carts belonging to one person, or to those who have not divided their shares. What is their surrounding area? When moving, it is the entire interior together with one fathom outside; when stationary, it is the entire interior together with one fathom outside; or the place where they drive in the pegs, yoke the oxen, set down the grass, beat the muñja reeds, load the ropes — the place where they thresh, winnow, weave, distribute, eat, drink, and where the boys do their work: that is their surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What are many carts with separate surrounding areas? They are the many carts belonging to different persons, or to those who have divided their shares. Their surrounding areas are each separate and distinct. What do they have in common? Nothing whatsoever.

What is a tree with a single surrounding area? It is a tree whose branches form a continuous, connected canopy. What is its surrounding area? The entire interior together with one fathom outside; or the place where undisturbed leaves fall without being blown away by the wind, where heavy drops fall from broken rain, and the place that, at midday, lies within the shade of the tree: that is its surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a tree with a separate surrounding area? It is a tree whose branches do not form a connected canopy. Its surrounding area is separate and distinct. What do they have in common? The root.

If a monk leaves his robes at the root and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks at the root, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes at the root or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a grove of many trees with a single surrounding area? It is a grove of many trees whose branches form a connected canopy. What is their surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one fathom outside, or wherever fallen leaves that have not been swept away by the wind come to rest, wherever large drops of water drip down after the rain has stopped, and wherever the shade of the trees covers the ground at midday — that is their surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a grove of many trees with separate surrounding areas? It is a grove of many trees whose branches do not form a connected canopy. Their surrounding areas are each separate and distinct. What do they have in common? Nothing at all.

What is a flower garden with a single surrounding area? It is a flower garden belonging to one person or to an undivided household. What is its surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one fathom outside, or wherever people gather flowers, set out offerings, string garlands, measure, buy, sell, or place small vessels and presentation offerings — that is its surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a flower garden with a separate surrounding area? It is a flower garden belonging to different persons or to divided households. Its surrounding area is separate and distinct. What do they have in common? The well. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks at the well, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes at the well and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or at the well and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a plurality of flower gardens with a single surrounding area? It is a plurality of flower gardens belonging to one person or to an undivided household. What is their surrounding area? It is the entire interior, plus one fathom outside, or wherever people gather flowers, set out offerings, string garlands, measure, buy, sell, or place small vessels and presentation offerings — that is their surrounding area. If a monk leaves his robes inside and dawn breaks in the surrounding area, there is no transgression. If he leaves his robes in the surrounding area and dawn breaks inside, there is likewise no transgression. If he leaves his robes inside or in the surrounding area and dawn breaks elsewhere, he incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment.

What is a plurality of flower gardens with separate surrounding areas? It is a plurality of flower gardens belonging to different persons or to — the flower gardens of persons who open the doors separately — a great many flower gardens of that kind. What are their surrounding areas? They are separate and distinct. What do they share in common? Nothing whatsoever.

The venerable Upāli then addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, if a monk entrusts his robes to another monk and sets out traveling the road, what is the surrounding area for those robes?" Upāli continued: "I put it to you that there is a brahmin's field in which stand seven mango trees in full blossom, with abundant fruit and abundant branches, separated from one another by intervals of seven armspans — and for each of those seven mango trees, forty-nine armspans are indicated. That is the surrounding area for the robes of a monk who has set out upon the road. The surrounding area for standing, sitting, or lying down is one armspan in every direction. The surrounding area for traveling straight ahead is likewise one armspan in every direction. The surrounding area for standing, sitting, or lying down in a straight line is also one armspan in every direction."

"Venerable Sir, if a monk goes to a different district and lies down to sleep there, what is the surrounding area for his robes?" Upāli replied: "It extends as far as the hem of the robe has not been separated from him."

If a monk becomes subject to relinquishment of a robe — if he has not relinquished it, not given it up, and not confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another — that other robe as well is to be relinquished by virtue of the same prior continuum. If a monk becomes subject to relinquishment of a robe — if he has not relinquished it, has given it up, and has not confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another — that other robe as well is to be relinquished by virtue of the same prior continuum. If a monk becomes subject to relinquishment of a robe — if he has relinquished it, has given it up, and has not confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another — that other robe as well is to be relinquished by virtue of the same prior continuum. If a monk becomes subject to relinquishment of a robe — if he has relinquished it, has given it up, and has confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another — there is no transgression with regard to that other robe.

Likewise, for as long as a monk who has become subject to relinquishment of an object has not confessed it separately and individually, if he acquires and keeps close at hand any other item — whether an alms bowl, robes, a net, a small bowl, a belt, or any other article used for the livelihood of a renunciant — that too shall be relinquished by virtue of the same prior continuum. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The second category, relinquishment through separation, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, there arose among the monks a situation of having many robes of the following kind: when any monk obtained a blue robe, he would not use it straightaway but would set it aside with the hope, "When I obtain another one like this, I will have the robe made" — and just as with the blue, so too with the yellow, the red, the thick, and the thin.

Monks of few wants began to criticize, to complain, and to grumble: "Why is it that among the monks there arose this situation of having many robes of the following kind — that when any monk obtained a blue robe, he would not use it straightaway but would set it aside with the hope, 'When I obtain another one like this, I will have the robe made' — and just as with the blue, so too with the yellow, the red, the thick, and the thin?"

At that point the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One thereupon, on account of this occurrence, on account of this occasion, and in this context, convened the community of monks — and the rest proceeds as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, act as though they do not know" — and the rest, again, is as before.

The Blessed One questioned the many monks: "Monks, is it true that among you such an accumulation of robes has occurred as this — that whenever any monk obtains a blue robe, he does not put it to use straightaway, but sets it aside with the hope, 'When I obtain another one like this, I will have the robe made,' and that just as with the blue, so too with the yellow, the red, the thick, and the thin?"

"Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed One then rebuked great desire, not knowing contentment, being difficult to support, and being difficult to satisfy. Thereafter, the Blessed One praised little desire, contentment, ease of support, ease of satisfaction, the quality of being frugal, simplicity of requisites, refinement of character, beauty, and awareness of warmth — and then addressed the monks:

"Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits in full, a rule of training for the hearers is to be established in the Vinaya" — and the rest proceeds as before.

"Let my hearers recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

If a monk whose robe-season has been received has the robe-material raised from storage, and if an out-of-season robe is obtained and he desires it, that monk may take that robe. Having taken it, if it suffices, he should promptly have it consecrated and kept as a robe without delay. If it does not suffice and there is hope that out-of-season cloth will supplement what is lacking, that monk may set that robe aside for up to a month. If he keeps it beyond that, it is an offense requiring forfeiture."

"Monk" refers to one who is a member of this Dharma community.

"Whose robe-season has been received and who has raised robe-material from storage" — here there are four cases: the robe-season received but the robe-material not raised from storage; the robe-season not received but the robe-material raised; the robe-season received and the robe-material raised; and the robe-season not received and the robe-material not raised — these four permutations are as before.

"An out-of-season robe" — one asks: what is the season for robes for a monk, and what is the out-of-season? In a place where the rains retreat is observed, the months from mid-autumn to the end of mid-spring constitute the robe season; beyond that is out-of-season. In a place where the rains retreat is not observed, all times are out-of-season.

"Obtained" means obtained from another.

"If he desires it" means if he seeks it out.

"That monk may take that robe" means he may make it his own.

"If it suffices" means if it is adequate.

"He should promptly have it consecrated and kept as a robe without delay" means he should consecrate it without putting it away and keep it.

"Supplement what is lacking" refers to supplementing what is incomplete in the lower robe, the upper robe, or the outer robe.

"If there is hope of obtaining a robe" means there is hope that a mother, father, sibling, sister, preceptor, or abbot will give a robe to oneself; or hope that a robe will be obtained at the occasion of the five-year festival, the six-year festival, the hair-cutting festival, the dwelling-house festival, or at the time of a great festival.

"That monk may set that robe aside for up to a month" means up to the limit of one month.

"If he keeps it beyond that" means if he goes past that limit.

"An offense requiring forfeiture" means that after having forfeited the article, the offense requiring forfeiture must be confessed. Therefore it is said to be an offense requiring forfeiture.

As for how the offense arises, there is a summary verse:

With doubt and without doubt,
deteriorated and not accomplished, interrupted, the five robes and the two robes, combinations, and the measures.

A monk, having obtained a blue robe on a particular date, does not put it into use, thinking, "When I find one like this, I will put the robe into use then" — and so he sets it aside. If on that very same date he then obtains another blue robe that is doubtful, that monk must, within those ten days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find one on the first day, but finds a blue robe on the second day, the third day, or any day up to the tenth, that monk must, within those ten days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find one within those ten days but finds one by the nineteenth day, that monk must, within those twenty days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the twentieth day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find one on the twentieth day but finds one by the twenty-ninth day, that monk must, within that same month, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the thirty-first day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to finding a blue robe applies equally to a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe.

A monk, having obtained a blue robe on a particular date, does not put it into use — having no expectation of finding one like it, he sets it aside — and if on that very same date he then obtains another blue robe that is not doubtful, that monk must, within those ten days, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find one on the first day, but on the second day or any day up to the tenth, or by the nineteenth, or by the twenty-ninth, he finds a blue robe, that monk must, within that same month, either consecrate that robe, or give it away, or make it allowable, or bestow it upon another. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the thirty-first day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to finding a blue robe applies equally to a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe.

A monk, having obtained a blue robe on a particular date, does not put it into use — he sets it aside with expectation regarding that robe — and that expectation he had regarding it has deteriorated, been delayed, and diminished, and then on that very same date he finds another blue robe.

That monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within those same ten days. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find it on the first day of the month but finds a blue robe on the second day of the month, or at any point up to the tenth day of the month, that monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within that same month. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the thirty-first day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to finding a blue robe applies equally to a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe.

A monk, having obtained a blue robe on a particular date, does not put it into use — he sets it aside with expectation, and that expectation he had regarding it has not yet been fulfilled, and has not yet been cut off — and then on that very same date he finds another blue robe. That monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within those same ten days. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find it on the first day of the month but finds one on the second day of the month, or at any point up to the twenty-ninth day, that monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within that same month. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the thirty-first day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to finding a blue robe applies equally to a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe.

A monk, having obtained a blue robe on a particular date, does not put it into use — he sets it aside with expectation — and every last bit of the expectation he had regarding that robe has been entirely cut off. That monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within those same ten days. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If he did not find it on the first day but finds one on the second day of the month, or at any point up to the twenty-ninth day, and does not put it into use but sets it aside with expectation, and every last bit of the expectation he had regarding that robe has been entirely cut off, that monk must consecrate that robe, give it away, make it allowable, or bestow it upon another within those same ten days. If he neither consecrates it, nor gives it away, nor makes it allowable, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eleventh day an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to a blue robe applies equally to a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe.

The venerable Upāli then addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha.

Venerable one, there are several kinds of robes. There are five in the adjacent category: a robe that has an owner, a robe that has no owner, a robe that has been taken back, a robe from a charnel ground, and fifth, a robe that has been cast aside as a rag.

What is a robe that has an owner? Any robe over which a man, a woman, or a person of indeterminate sex has ownership — that is called a robe that has an owner.

What is a robe that has no owner? Any robe over which no man, no woman, and no person of indeterminate sex has ownership — that is called a robe that has no owner.

What is a robe that has been taken back? It is like this: relatives, knowing that one of their kin has fallen ill, has died, or that the right moment has come, cover him with a robe from behind, carry him to the charnel ground, and then take that robe back again and present it to the Saṅgha. That is called a robe that has been taken back.

What is a robe from a charnel ground? Whatever robe has been taken from a charnel ground that has no one claiming ownership over it — that is called a robe from a charnel ground.

What is a robe cast aside as a rag? There are five kinds of robes cast aside as rags: a robe left on a road, one abandoned in a desolate place, one found on a riverbank, one that is excrement-soiled, and fifth, one that is tattered — and "tattered" means one that is thoroughly moth-eaten.

Furthermore, there are another five kinds of robes cast aside as rags: one burned by fire, one carried away by water, one eaten by rats, one eaten by oxen, and fifth, a shroud used for a corpse.

There are also two further kinds of robe: a new robe and a robe used in a particular season. What is a new robe? One freshly woven by a weaver that has not yet been used during any one of the three seasonal periods — that is called a new robe. What is a robe used in a particular season? One that has been used during any one of the three seasonal periods — and "a season" means four months — that is called a robe used in a particular season.

If a monk obtains a new robe, and if that monk is able to cut, stripe, net, sew, and alter it, then from that robe he should make a patched outer robe with two layers of stitching, an inner robe also with two layers of stitching, an upper robe of a single layer, and an under robe also of a single layer.

If a monk unravels the third layer of stitching in a double-stitched patched outer robe, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise. If a monk, intending to restitch it differently from the double stitching, pulls out a layer of stitching, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of pulling it out, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise. If a monk washes a double-stitched patched outer robe, turns it over, and intending to restitch it in that very same manner pulls out a layer of stitching, no offense arises at the moment of pulling it out; but if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

Whatever applies to the patched outer robe applies equally to the inner robe.

If a monk unravels the stitching of a single-layer upper robe, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise. Whatever applies to the upper robe applies equally to the under robe.

If a monk obtains a robe used in a particular season, and if that monk is able to cut, stripe, net, sew, and alter it, then from that robe he should make a patched outer robe with four layers of stitching, an inner robe also with four layers of stitching, an upper robe with two layers, and an under robe also with two layers.

If a monk unravels the fifth layer of stitching in a four-layered patched outer robe, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If a monk unravels a layer of a four-layered patched outer robe intending to rework it into something other than what it was, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If a monk unravels a layer of a four-layered patched outer robe having washed it and turned it around, intending to rework it into that very same garment, no offense arises at the moment of unraveling; however, if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

What applies to the patched outer robe applies equally to the inner robe.

If a monk unravels the third layer of a two-layered upper robe, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If a monk unravels a layer of a two-layered upper robe intending to rework it into something other than what it was, an offense of wrongdoing arises at the moment of unraveling, and if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

If a monk unravels a layer of a two-layered upper robe having washed it and turned it around, intending to rework it into that very same garment, no offense arises at the moment of unraveling; however, if ten days pass, an offense requiring forfeiture will arise.

What applies to the upper robe applies equally to the under robe.

As for a hand-towel or bathing cloth, one may rework it as many layers as one wishes.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, how many strips does a patched outer robe have?" Upāli continued: "There are nine types. A robe with nine strips, one with eleven strips, one with thirteen strips, one with fifteen strips, one with seventeen strips, one with nineteen strips, one with twenty-one strips, one with twenty-three strips, and one with twenty-five strips."

He then explained: a nine-strip robe consists of three panels of three joined pieces each. An eleven-strip robe consists of three panels of three joined pieces plus two additional strips. A thirteen-strip robe consists of four panels of three joined pieces plus one additional strip. A fifteen-strip robe consists of five panels of three joined pieces each. A seventeen-strip robe consists of five panels of three joined pieces plus two additional strips. A nineteen-strip robe consists of six panels of three joined pieces plus one additional strip. A twenty-one-strip robe consists of seven panels of three joined pieces each. A twenty-three-strip robe consists of seven panels of three joined pieces plus two additional strips. A twenty-five-strip robe consists of eight panels of three joined pieces plus one additional strip.

Upāli explained further: a patched outer robe of nine strips, one of eleven strips, and one of thirteen strips — these three are to be made with a board one and a half cubits by three cubits and kept accordingly. A patched outer robe of fifteen strips, one of seventeen strips, and one of nineteen strips — these three are to be made with a board one and a half cubits by four cubits and kept accordingly. A patched outer robe of twenty-one strips, one of twenty-three strips, and one of twenty-five strips — these three are to be made with a board one and a half cubits by five cubits and kept accordingly.

All of these are to be sewn with a running stitch.

"Venerable One, what are the proper dimensions of a patched outer robe?"

Upāli replied: "There are three sizes to be known: large, medium, and small. The large is three and a half cubits. The small is two and a half cubits. The medium is whatever falls between those two."

What applies to the patched outer robe applies equally to the upper robe and the under robe. Furthermore, the under robe comes in two forms: one that is five and a half cubits long, and one that is four and a half cubits long. The outermost of the under robes is one that covers three circuits of the body. The outermost of the forfeitable robes is one that covers exactly one cubit all the way around.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and before he has surrendered it, separated himself from it, and confessed the offense he obtains another robe, that robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuity.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and before he has surrendered it, separated himself from it, and confessed the offense he obtains another robe, that robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuity. If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and after he has surrendered it and separated himself from it, but before he has confessed the offense, he obtains another robe, that robe too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuity. If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and after he has surrendered it, separated himself from it, and confessed the offense he obtains another robe, there is no transgression regarding that robe.

Likewise, for as long as a monk, without having confessed the very forfeitable object in question and without having confessed it individually, proceeds to take possession of an alms bowl, a Dharma robe, a net, a cup, a belt, or any other requisite of a renunciant's livelihood, those too become subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuity. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is mentally disturbed, one whose mind is agitated, or one who acts while overcome by painful sensations. This completes the third section, on forfeiture through placing.

At the time when the Blessed One, as a bodhisattva dwelling in the Tuṣita heaven, having examined the world through the five examinations — of clan, of region, of time, of lineage, and of mother — transformed his appearance into that of a great elephant and entered his mother's womb, the great earth trembled violently. And those regions between the worlds where the sun and moon, though possessed of such great miraculous power and such great might, cannot make their light felt — those regions plunged in darkness, dense darkness, utter darkness — were at that moment pervaded by a great radiance. The beings born there, who could not even see their own outstretched hands, beheld one another by that light, and those who had understanding knew: "Other beings too have been born here. Other beings too have been born here."

At the time when the Blessed One as a bodhisattva was born from his mother's womb after ten months had passed, the great earth trembled violently. And those regions between the worlds where the sun and moon, though possessed of such great miraculous power and such great might, cannot make their light felt — those regions plunged in darkness, dense darkness, utter darkness — were at that moment pervaded by a great radiance. The beings born there, who could not even see their own outstretched hands, beheld one another by that light, and those who had understanding knew: "Other beings too have been born here. Other beings too have been born here."

On the very day that the Blessed One as a bodhisattva was born, sons were also born to the four great kings. In Śrāvastī, the great king Prasenajit fathered a son named Vimala-datta, and he thought to himself: "When my son was born, the world appeared bright and luminous, so I shall give this youth the name Prasanna-rāja" — and thus he named that son Prasanna-rāja. In Rājagṛha, the great king Mahāpadma fathered a son, and he thought to himself: "When my son was born, the world appeared as though the form of the sun had risen, and since this child is the son of queen Rūpavatī, I shall give this youth the name Rūpavatī-sāra" — and thus he named that son Rūpavatī-sāra. In Kauśāmbī, the great king Śatānīka fathered a son, and he thought to himself: "When my son was born, the world appeared as though the sun had risen, so I shall give this youth the name Udaya" — and thus he named that son Udaya.

In Āryarājya, the great king Mukhyūda-Ananta fathered a son, and he thought to himself: "When my son was born, the world shone with a brilliant radiance, so I shall give this youth the name Prabhasvara" — and thus he named that son Prabhasvara.

Each of the kings thought to himself, "This is the power of my son, this is the power of my son." Yet in truth it was not so, for all of this was the power of the bodhisattva.

On the very day the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was born, five hundred young Śākya men, beginning with Bhadrika, were also born. Five hundred attendants and companions were also born. From five hundred mares, five hundred foals — beginning with the celebrated Kaṇṭhaka — were born. And the gods revealed five hundred treasures.

The Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was prophesied by brahmins and astrologers who read signs and marks: "If this youth remains within the palace, he will become a wheel-turning king who conquers the four quarters, a righteous king of Dharma, possessing the seven precious things. And these seven precious things will be as follows: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious woman, the precious householder, and the precious minister of war — these are the seven. He will have heroic and courageous sons, endowed with the finest form of limb, a full thousand who utterly vanquish the armies of his enemies. He will govern, without exception, all the great earth that reaches to the ocean's shore, without violence and without harm, unbroken and uncut by weapons, ruling in accord with Dharma, bringing it under his sway in equanimity and establishing it well. But if he shaves off his hair and beard, dons the saffron robes, and goes forth from home into homelessness with sincere and perfect faith, he will become a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, renowned throughout the world, endowed with the voice of fame." Such was the prophecy.

When the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, appeared in the world, everywhere near the slopes of the Himālayas, along the banks of the auspicious river by the road of the fortunate chariot, near the hermitage of the yellow-robed sages, a young Śākya prince was born not far away. And the brahmins and astrologers, examining his signs and marks, proclaimed: "If this youth remains within the palace, he will become a wheel-turning king who conquers the four quarters, a righteous king of Dharma, possessing the seven precious things. And these seven precious things will be as follows: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious woman, the precious householder, and the precious minister of war — these are the seven. He will have heroic and courageous sons, endowed with the finest form of limb, a full thousand who utterly vanquish the armies of his enemies. He will govern, without exception, all the great earth that reaches to the ocean's shore, without violence and without harm, unbroken and uncut by weapons, ruling in accord with Dharma, bringing it under his sway in equanimity and establishing it well. But if he shaves off his hair and beard, dons the saffron robes, and goes forth from home into homelessness with sincere and perfect faith, he will become a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, renowned throughout the world, endowed with the voice of fame." And this proclamation was resounded abroad.

The kings of the southern regions also heard the proclamation — that not far from the Himalayas, near a river, beside a road along which fortunate horses traveled, in the hermitage of the yellow-robed seers, a youth had been born among the Śākyas; and that Brahmin soothsayers and mark-readers had declared: if that youth were to remain within the palace, he would become a wheel-turning king (cakravartin), victorious in the four directions, a righteous king endowed with Dharma, possessed of the seven precious treasures. Those seven precious treasures would be as follows: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious gem, the precious woman, the precious householder, and the precious general as the seventh. And he would have in his service a thousand valiant and resolute sons, endowed with the finest physiques, who crush enemy armies utterly. He would govern, without exception, all the great earth that reaches to the ocean's shore, without violence and without harm, unbroken and uncut by weapons, ruling in accord with Dharma, bringing it under his sway in equanimity and establishing it well. But if he were to shave off his hair and beard, don the saffron robes, and go forth from home into homelessness with sincere and perfect faith, he would become a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, endowed with the voice of fame renowned throughout the world. Thus did they hear the proclamation.

Having heard it, those kings of the southern regions thought to themselves: if we serve this youth now, he will in due time yield his fruit — so what must we serve in order to serve the youth? They reasoned: we should serve King Śuddhodana, for by serving him we will be serving the youth. And so they began to serve King Śuddhodana, sending messengers with reverential offerings and treasure-chests at the fitting and appropriate times.

Then King Śuddhodana reflected: now that my son has been born, all aims have been accomplished and all purposes fulfilled; therefore I shall name this youth Sarvārthasiddha — "All Aims Accomplished." And he named him Sarvārthasiddha.

Now when the Blessed One was born as a great bodhisattva, and having seen an old man, a sick man, and a dead man, he was moved at heart and went forth into the forest — at that time, King Śuddhodana and the Śākya named Supratibuddha sent two hundred and fifty, two hundred and fifty messengers bearing petitions and supplications, and those messengers came bringing the word of the Blessed One, the great bodhisattva, saying: "Each day the youth sustains himself on a single sesame seed, or a single grain of thick rice, or a single bean of black pulse, or a single bean of green pulse, or a single grain of pine-nut, or a single bean of soybean."

When the kings of the southern regions heard that the youth Sarvārthasiddha had seen an old man, a sick man, and a dead man, had been moved at heart, and had gone forth into renunciation, they thought to themselves: the youth on whose account we were serving King Śuddhodana has now gone forth. And so all of them, with the sole exception of Prasenajit, the king from Kosala, cut off their reverential offerings — their messengers and their treasure-chests — entirely.

At that time, at the court of Prasenajit, king from Kosala, there was a chief minister named Bandhaka, and at the court of King Śuddhodana there was a herald named Ācāra. Whenever Prasenajit, the king from Kosala, dispatched a messenger to King Śuddhodana, he would send the chief minister Bandhaka,

He would perform the royal duties and the royal functions, and then he would gain entry into the household of Ācāra. And whenever King Śuddhodana dispatched a messenger to Prasenajit, king from Kosala, he would send the herald Ācāra. And Ācāra too would perform the royal duties and the royal functions, and then he would gain entry into the household of the chief minister Bandhaka. Now Bandhaka had a wife named Bandhamatī, who was fair of form, pleasing and beautiful to look upon, and charming to men. Ācāra entered into an intimate liaison with Bandhamatī. When Bandhaka came to know that Ācāra had entered into an intimate liaison with Bandhamatī, he thought to himself: I should kill him. But then he thought again: if I were to kill him, the two kingdoms would fall into great conflict, so why should I kill a brahmin on account of a woman's body? And so he let the matter rest in equanimity.

Then Ācāra, sensing in his mind that Bandhaka had taken offense at him, grew afraid, left the house, and took up residence elsewhere. Bandhaka then said to him: Ācāra, why have you abandoned your own home and taken up residence elsewhere? Come here. This is your own home — stay here as comfortably as you wish. Then Ācāra thought to himself: In truth, he has given me his permission, and so he remained there just as before.

The Vinayavibhaṅga. The twenty-seventh fascicle.

Then at another time, Bandhaka, the chief minister, died when his time had come, and Prasenajit, king from Kosala, had all of his wealth placed in his own treasury and vaults on account of his having no son. Bandhamatī sent a letter to Ācāra, saying: When my husband was alive and living, you came to visit me regularly. Now the time has come when he has died, and Prasenajit, king from Kosala, has placed all the wealth into his own treasury and vaults on account of there being no son — will you not now even send a word on my behalf?

Then Ācāra, having heard the contents of the letter, thought to himself: If I were to go there, on account of that very matter people would say: Ācāra went there because he is attached to women, because of a woman. I must therefore devise some skillful stratagem. And so, having performed the royal duties and the royal functions two or three times over, he went to the place where King Śuddhodana was and, having arrived, spoke to King Śuddhodana thus: O King, at the time when the youth who accomplishes all purposes was born, all the kings of the regions beneath the sun bowed down and all of them offered messengers and treasure-chests. Then, at the time when the youth who accomplishes all purposes saw an old man, a sick man, and a dead man, and was moved in heart and went forth into the forest, all those kings of the regions beneath the sun, with the exception of Prasenajit, king from Kosala, cut off the stream of their offerings of messengers and treasure-chests. But Prasenajit, king from Kosala, continued to send messengers and treasure-chests, and dispatched them. Now, to abandon in this way one who has been a steadfast companion would in the future be a great harm — he stands close to us, in connection and continuity, and it is therefore fitting to maintain that companionship. Ācāra, if that is so, you yourself should go as the messenger. O King, as you command, he replied. And so Ācāra took up the treasure-chests and set out toward Śrāvastī, and in due course arrived at Śrāvastī.

Then Ācāra thought to himself:

Since one ought not to rely on those unworthy of reliance, but rather rely on those worthy of reliance, I should first look to the ministers and then, through them, approach the king — so that I may plead on behalf of the bride. And so he began to approach the ministers and said: "Good sirs, surely you know how I was formerly acquainted with the bride? Her husband's time has come, and Prasenajit, king from Kosala, has caused all her wealth to be placed in his own treasury and storehouses on the grounds that she has no son. Therefore I wish to petition the king on her behalf — please, be my allies in this." They agreed to do so.

Then Ācāra went to where Prasenajit, king from Kosala, was to be found, and having arrived, he offered the king salutation and blessings on his long life, took a seat beside him, and two or three times conducted royal business and performed royal services. Then he said to Prasenajit, king from Kosala: "O King, grant me a dwelling."

"Ācāra, where have you been residing until now?"

"O King, I have been staying as a guest-companion in the household of a chief minister's wife."

"Ācāra, go and take up residence in that very place."

"O King, the chief minister's wife — her time has come."

"If she herself has come of age, has her household also come of age?"

"O King, their union has not yet come of age, and yet there is not so much as a seat left in the house."

The king then said to the ministers: "Good sirs, provide Ācāra with a dwelling." And it having come to light that this was on Ācāra's behalf, the ministers said: "O King, does it seem to you that Ācāra has no dwelling? The fact is that Ācāra has come before you together with the bride, and in truth it is on the bride's behalf that Ācāra is petitioning you. O King, Ācāra is the son of a brāhmaṇa chanter who recites before the assembly. A brāhmaṇa cannot be compelled against his will — but if this matter is well settled, then, O King, one who eats pure food will have taken up something good."

Then the king summoned Ācāra and said: "Ācāra, I did not know before how you were acquainted with the bride. Now go, and take the bride, her household, and all her wealth."

"As the king commands," he replied.

Ācāra went to where the bride's house was. When the bride heard that Ācāra had come, she sat in the doorway and began to weep. Seeing this, Ācāra said: "Bride, why do you weep?"

She replied: "When one whose husband I sought has come of age, have you too abandoned me entirely?"

Then Ācāra thought to himself: if I speak in agreement with her, she will weep all the more bitterly — I must cut through this at once. And so Ācāra said to the bride: "Bride, the bodhisattva who practised austerities — he who renounced sixty thousand women such as the queen Grakdzin (Yaśodharā), Saatsoma, and Ridag Kye, and others, and went forth into homelessness — you would not even be worthy of the dust on the soles of his feet."

At that she fell silent and said nothing. Then Ācāra said: "It is not that I abandoned you — I came here for your own sake. I have obtained from the king both you and your household and all your wealth. Will you stay here, or go to the place where the yellow-robed ones dwell?"

She thought to herself: if I go to where the yellow-robed ones dwell, I shall not even obtain my life from the brāhmaṇa woman. And so she said, "I will remain here," and she stayed right there.

At that time Ācāra had two houses: one in Śrāvastī and one in the place of the yellow-robed ones. Now, at the time when the Blessed One, as a bodhisattva, had practised austerities for six years and came to understand that austerities accomplished nothing — he breathed in as he wished and breathed out as he wished, and was offered abundant food — rice gruel, hot cooked rice, and the like. His body was anointed with clarified butter and grain oil, and bathed with warm water. He then proceeded to a village, where he received from the two daughters of a householder — Gayā and Gayābala — milk mixed with honey, churned sixteen times. Praised by Kāla (Nāgarāja), the black king of the nāgas, he received from a grass-seller grass of golden hue, fashioned a seat of undisturbed grass at the place of awakening, and sat down there cross-legged, held his body upright, set his mindfulness directed inward, and, making his resolve, spoke these words:

Until the undefiled is obtained, this cross-legged posture I shall not break.
And so, until the undefiled is won,
he broke not his cross-legged seat.

At the midnight hour, the Blessed One subjugated by the power of loving-kindness the host of māras — three hundred thousand million māras together with their retinues of sixty billion — and, having comprehended unsurpassed omniscience, was requested by Brahmā and proceeded to Vārāṇasī, where, in twelve aspects and recited three times, he turned the wheel of Dharma endowed with the Dharma. At that time he tamed the five and the group of five, and five hundred lofty youths of the town. Going to the Karṇaṇḍīya grove, he established sixty members of Bhadravarga in the truths. Proceeding to the village, he established the two daughters of the householder, Gayā and Gayābala, in the truths. Going to Uruvilvā, he ordained the thousand Jaṭilas and conferred full ordination upon them. Going to the Gayāśīrṣa stūpa, he instructed those thousand monks by means of the three miracles, freed them from the wilderness of cyclic existence, and established them in the utterly supreme and peaceful unsurpassed nirvāṇa. Going to the eastern grove, he established together in the truths the king of Magadha, Śreṇiya Bimbisāra, together with eighty thousand gods, and the many hundreds of thousands of brāhmaṇas and householders who had arisen in Magadha. Going to Rājagṛha, he accepted the Bamboo Grove, and ordained Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana together with their retinue of two hundred and fifty, conferring full ordination upon them. Going to Śrāvastī, he accepted the Jeta Grove and tamed the young-example-of-a-king, Prasenajit of Kosala. Thereafter the buddha, the Blessed One, dwelt at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Then Prasenajit of Kosala sent a messenger to King Śuddhodana, saying: "Rejoice, O god! Your son has come to know the nectar, and satisfies beings with that nectar. He dwells at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada." Having heard this, King Śuddhodana sent a messenger before the Blessed One, saying: "It has been long since I have seen my son. I, your father, thirst to see you." That messenger was immediately ordained on the spot. A second messenger was sent, and he too was ordained on the spot. Because the Blessed One had taught the Dharma-Vinaya excellently, each and every messenger sent was ordained on the very spot. Then at another time, when King Śuddhodana heard this, he sat with his arm resting on his knee, lost in his own thoughts.

Chāraka saw this and said: "Your majesty, why do you sit with your cheek resting on your hand, lost in thought?" Chāraka, when the young prince Sarvārthasiddha was practicing austerities, I would send remarkable men as messengers, and each day they would bring back news and report: 'The young Sarvārthasiddha is staying at such-and-such a place.' Now that the young Sarvārthasiddha has taken the nectar of awakening to heart and satisfies beings with that nectar, and I have heard that he dwells at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada — when I send remarkable men as messengers, not one of them returns with news of the young Sarvārthasiddha. Each and every one I send as a messenger settles there on the spot. How then can I sit here with my cheek resting on my hand, lost in thought?

Chāraka said: "Your majesty, command me. I, too, will go there. I shall go, your majesty, presenting a message before the eyes of your son."

King Śuddhodana himself then composed a letter in these words:

From the time you lay within the womb
I watched over you with care and love.
Scorched by the burning canopy of affliction,
I remain standing by the Victor's tree.
Now through the branches, twigs, and roots of disciples you have come to full bloom.
While others rejoice in happiness,

I am left to cling to suffering.
When first you were born into this world you performed a great and meaningful act, and the kindred gathered round to embrace you — so too in that moment you made a solemn vow.
Therefore, now that you have found peace and rank, turn your compassionate mind toward me and toward all the host of your kinsmen, and be pleased to bring the thought of coming.

Having written this, Chāraka took the letter and set out for Śrāvastī. At length he reached Śrāvastī and, as soon as Chāraka had presented the letter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One himself read the letter. Chāraka then asked: "Blessed One, will you come to the land of the Śākyas?" "Chāraka, I will come." And with the same boldness he had shown before, Chāraka said this: "If the Blessed One does not come, I shall drag you there by force."

Then the Blessed One at that time spoke these verses:

For one in whom no net of craving spreads to lead him anywhere at all — that buddha, boundless in conduct and without ground, by whose home shall he be led?

For one in whom no net of craving spreads
to lead him anywhere at all — that buddha, boundless in power and without ground, by whose home shall he be led?

For one whose victory is never lost,
over whom the world can win no victory —
that buddha, boundless in conduct and without ground, by whose home shall he be led?

For one whose victory is never lost,
over whom the world can win no victory —
that buddha, boundless in power and without ground, by whose home shall he be led?

Chāraka said: "Blessed One, I will go and speak to King Śuddhodana." The Blessed One declared: "Chāraka, messengers of the Victor are not of that kind." "Blessed One, then of what kind are the messengers of the Victor?" "They are those who have gone forth, with shaven heads and wearing the ochre robe." "Blessed One, please grant me permission to return to King Śuddhodana." The Blessed One declared: "Go forth and depart."

For the Blessed One, having been a bodhisattva in all those successive past lives, had never broken a single word of the Dharma spoken by his father, his mother, his preceptor, his teacher, his guru, or those in the role of a guru — and so, the very moment the Blessed One spoke, Chāraka said: "Blessed One, I will go forth."

The Blessed One then addressed the Venerable Śāriputra:

"Śāriputra, give Chāraka the going-forth." "This will be for his long-term welfare, benefit, and happiness."

The Venerable Śāriputra, having heard from the Blessed One and replied "As the Venerable One commands," gave Chāraka the going-forth and full ordination. He then recited for him all the rules of conduct — what he should do and what he should not do — including: "Chāraka, from this day forward you shall not sleep under the same roof as a woman," and all the other rules of training.

Chāraka replied to his preceptor, "As the Venerable One commands," prostrated at the feet of the Venerable Śāriputra with his head to the ground, and departed. He went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One with his head to the ground, and said to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, I will go to the Śākya settlement."

The Blessed One declared: "Chāraka, you are not to enter the royal palace without announcement. Stand at the gate and say: 'A Śākya monk has come.' If they ask whether there are other Śākya monks as well, say: 'There are other Śākya monks as well.' If they say 'Enter,' then enter. If the young man Sarvārthasiddha asks whether those who have accomplished all aims also wear such robes, say: 'They too wear exactly such robes.' You are not to take up residence in the royal palace. If the young man Sarvārthasiddha asks whether he who has accomplished all aims would also not take up residence in the royal palace, say: 'He would not take up residence there.' If he asks where he would take up residence, say: 'In a hermitage or a temple.' If he asks whether the young man Sarvārthasiddha will come, say: 'He will come.' If he asks how long before he comes, say: 'After seven days have passed.'"

The Venerable Chāraka, having heard from the Blessed One and replied "As the Blessed One commands," prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One with his head to the ground and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

Now, when Chāraka set out, it had taken many days to travel to Śrāvastī, but on the return journey, by the power of the buddhas — that power which is the power of the buddhas — and by the power of the gods — that power which is the power of the gods — he reached the Śākya settlement in a single day.

The Venerable Chāraka then went to where King Śuddhodana was, and having arrived, called to the doorkeeper: "Ho there, my good man, go and announce to the king that a Śākya monk has come." The doorkeeper said: "Are there other Śākya monks as well?" Chāraka said: "There are other Śākya monks as well." The doorkeeper announced this to the king, and the king said: "Let the Śākya one enter. Who would turn away a Śākya?"

Then the Venerable Chāraka, recognized by the doorkeeper, went to where King Śuddhodana was, and having arrived, he said to King Śuddhodana: "Great King, the Blessed One sends you greetings."

King Śuddhodana, recognizing Chāraka by his voice, said: "Are you Chāraka? O lord of gods, a person conveys such greetings as this." The king then said: "Is the young man Sarvārthasiddha really wearing such robes as these?" "O lord, yes, he is wearing exactly such robes." The king fell from his lion throne onto the ground, and having been revived with water, he asked: "Will the young man Sarvārthasiddha come?" "O lord, he will come." "How long before he comes?" "After seven days have passed." The king then said to his ministers:

"Wise ones, today let the royal palace and the queen's retinue be swept and cleaned. The young god Sarvārthasiddha will not be taking up residence within the royal palace or among the queen's retinue." "Then where will he take up residence?" "In a hermitage or in a monastery." "What kind of monastery?" Chāraka then described what he had seen — what kinds of monasteries existed in Śrāvastī.

Now at that time King Śuddhodana had, in Kapilavastu, the Pleasure Grove of the Living, the Nyagrodha (banyan) pleasure grove, the Place of Brahmā, and four hundred and ninety-seven other pleasure groves. The king said to his ministers: "Wise ones, today, in each of the three groves — the Living Pleasure Grove, the Nyagrodha Pleasure Grove, and the Place of Brahmā — have them quickly build monasteries like the Jeta Grove, each containing sixteen great halls and sixty dwelling foundations. And let every place in the city of Kapilavastu be kept free of stones, gravel, and weeds."

"Kings accomplish things by their word, gods by their mind, and yogins by the mere arising of intention — all is accomplished. Let the ministers attend to this as though it were a divine command." Having heard this from King Śuddhodana, the ministers caused monasteries like the Jeta Grove — each with sixteen great halls and sixty dwelling foundations — to be built in each of the three pleasure groves: the Living Pleasure Grove, the Nyagrodha Pleasure Grove, and the Place of Brahmā. And every place in the city of Kapilavastu was made free of stones, gravel, and weeds.

Now there are ten things which, by the nature of reality, will infallibly occur during the lifetime of a living and abiding Buddha, the Blessed One. The Blessed One will not pass into complete nirvāṇa so long as: he has not given a prophecy of buddhahood; so long as another sentient being has not yet generated the irreversible mind toward unsurpassed awakening; so long as all those to be tamed by a buddha have not been tamed; so long as one-fifth of his lifespan has not elapsed; so long as he has not established a retreat boundary; so long as he has not indicated the foremost pair of śrāvaka disciples; so long as he has not shown the descent from the gods, illuminating the entire city; so long as he has not displayed the great miracle at Śrāvastī; so long as he has not, together with the śrāvakas, declared their past karmic causes at the great unheated lake; and so long as he has not established both his father and mother in the truths.

The Blessed One then reflected: "The time for taming Great King Śuddhodana and many hundreds of thousands of Śākyas is near at hand. And this — the establishing of both father and mother in the truths — is something the Tathāgata will assuredly accomplish." Having so reflected, the Blessed One then addressed the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, go and announce to the monks: 'The Tathāgata is going to Kapilavastu. Among you, whoever wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata to Kapilavastu and to witness the meeting of father and son — let him take up his robe.'"

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana replied, "Yes, Reverend One, as commanded," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is going to Kapilavastu. Among you, whoever wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata to Kapilavastu and to witness the meeting of father and son — let him take up his robe.'" The monks replied to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, "Yes, Reverend One, as you command," and heard this from him.

Then the Blessed One set out — he who had tamed, surrounded by a retinue that had been tamed; he who was peaceful, surrounded by a peaceful retinue; he who was liberated, surrounded by a liberated retinue; he who had found relief, surrounded by a retinue that had found relief; he who was subdued, surrounded by a subdued retinue; he who was an arhat, surrounded by arhats; he who was free from attachment, surrounded by those free from attachment; he who was beautiful, surrounded by a beautiful retinue.

He was encircled by a herd of bulls as a magnificent bull is by his herd. He was encircled by a host of young elephants as a great elephant is by them. He was encircled by a pride of fanged beasts as a lion is by his pride. He was encircled by a flock of geese as a king of geese is by his flock. He was encircled by a host of birds as a garuḍa is by his host. He was encircled by a group of students as a brahmin is by his students. He was encircled by a throng of the sick as a skilled physician is by them. He was encircled by a troop of soldiers as a hero is by his troop. He was encircled by those who have entered the path as a guide is by those he leads. He was encircled by a company of merchants as a caravan leader is by his company. He was encircled by the full assembly of his retinue as a guild master is by his following. He was encircled by a host of ministers as a king of the citadel is by his ministers. He was encircled by a thousand sons as a wheel-turning king (cakravartin) is by his. He was encircled by a host of constellations as the moon is by them. He was encircled by a thousand rays of light as the sun is by them. He was encircled by a host of gandharvas as Dhṛtarāṣṭra is by his. He was encircled by a host of kumbhāṇḍas as a noble man is by his household. He was encircled by a host of nāgas as Virūpākṣa is by his. He was encircled by a host of yakṣas as Vaiśravaṇa is by his. He was encircled by a host of asuras as Rāhu is by his. He was encircled by a host of the Trāyastriṃśa gods as Śakra (Indra) is by his. He was encircled by a host of Brahmā's realm as Brahmā is by his.

His sense faculties were utterly tamed. His deportment and conduct were undisturbed. He was steady as a great ocean. He was laden with goodness as a rain cloud with water. He was free from arrogance as a great elephant-king. He was well adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being. His body was beautified by the eighty minor marks. His form was adorned by an aura extending a fathom's breadth on every side. He possessed radiance exceeding that of a thousand suns. He was altogether good, moving like a walking mountain of jewels. He was possessed of the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three applications of mindfulness that are uniquely his own, and great compassion. He had entered upon the work of benefiting the world. He was the sole protector, uniquely heroic, without a second, uttering no dualities. He dwelt in calm abiding and insight. He made the three kinds of knowledge shine clearly. He was well trained in the three trainings. He was skilled in the basis of the three domains of discipline. He had crossed beyond the four rivers. He was well established in the basis of the four legs of miraculous power (ṛddhi). He had long since thoroughly purified the four means of gathering beings. He was not intimidated by any of the four fearlessnesses. He had abandoned the five limbs and had passed entirely beyond the five destinies. He was endowed with the six limbs and had fully completed the six perfections. He abode in the six constant abidings. He was rich with the flowers of the seven limbs of awakening. He taught the eightfold path. He was skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions. He was endowed with the power of the ten powers. His fame had spread throughout the ten directions. He was supremely distinguished, exercising sovereignty over a hundredfold.

His great śrāvaka retinue included the venerable Uruvilvā-Kāśyapa, Gayā-Kāśyapa, Nadi-Kāśyapa, and the thousand former matted-hair ascetics, along with the venerable Śāriputra, Mahāmaudgalyāyana, and many others — a great Saṅgha of monks — went before him and proceeded along the way, walking toward the place of the Nyagrodha pleasure grove in the city of Kapilavastu.

At that time King Śuddhodana, on the seventh day, had the entire city of Kapilavastu swept clean of stones, gravel, and weeds, and had it perfumed with incense and strewn with scented powder; flowers of every variety were spread about, and the great accessories of veneration — victory banners and pennants — were all arranged and raised. In the Nyagrodha pleasure grove, the ground was prepared with wide and open seats shaped like crescents. Along every road from the Nyagrodha pleasure grove to the city of Kapilavastu, the way was made beautiful and cleared of all stones, gravel, and weeds; fragrant water was sprinkled along it, many clusters of silk were hung in garlands at intervals, and masses of flowers were arranged. The smoke of sweet-smelling incense wafted thickly, flowers of every variety were spread out, and victory banners and pennants were raised and set in place. King Śuddhodana himself, with his great royal wealth and great royal power, prepared dwelling in the Nyagrodha pleasure grove in just this way, as a fitting abode for the Blessed One.

Then, as the Blessed One was proceeding on his way, he arrived at the bank of the river Rohitaka. There some of the monks washed their hands and feet, some discarded their tooth-cleaning sticks, some drew water, and some bathed.

The Śākyas residing in the city of Kapilavastu heard that the youth of universal accomplishment was coming, and that King Śuddhodana had prepared wide and open seating in the Nyagrodha pleasure grove. Upon hearing this, many hundreds of thousands of Śākyas assembled in the Nyagrodha pleasure grove. Among them, some came stirred by their roots of past virtue. Others came out of curiosity, wondering whether they would see the father bow at the feet of his son first, or rather the son bow at the feet of his father.

Then the Blessed One reflected thus: if the Tathāgata were to enter Kapilavastu on foot, the proud Śākyas would not show great reverence to the youth of universal accomplishment, thinking: "He who formerly, as a bodhisattva, departed from the city of Kapilavastu welcomed by many hundreds of thousands of gods descending from the sky above — now, even though he has realized the unsurpassed wisdom, he has come on foot." Disbelief might arise in them. Knowing this, the Blessed One resolved: I shall enter Kapilavastu by means of miraculous power.

He then spoke to the monks: "Monks, you shall cross the river Rohitaka on foot. The Tathāgata will go by miraculous power." The monks replied to the Blessed One: "As you command, venerable one," and, having listened to the Blessed One, they crossed the river Rohitaka on foot and proceeded directly to the Nyagrodha pleasure grove.

Then, not long after the monastic Saṅgha had departed, the Blessed One gathered his mind, and entering a meditative absorption of the following kind, with his mind perfectly settled in equipoise, he disappeared by miraculous power from the far bank of the river Rohitaka and rose into the sky above, like a king of geese stretching its wings. He proceeded from above the city of Kapilavastu directly to the Nyagrodha pleasure grove, arriving there, and then he remained seated in cross-legged posture in the sky above the Nyagrodha pleasure grove.

There the Blessed One, facing the eastern direction, performed the four modes of conduct: walking, standing, sitting, and lying down.

He then entered a meditative absorption on the element of fire. From the body of the Blessed One, the buddha who had entered absorption on the element of fire, rays of light of many kinds blazed forth: blue, yellow, red, white, rose-red, and colors like those of crystal and silver. He then displayed paired miracles: from the lower part of his body fire blazed, while from the upper part cool streams of water flowed; and from the upper part of his body fire blazed, while from the lower part cool streams of water flowed. Just as he performed these things facing the eastern direction, so too he performed them facing the south, the west, and the north. Thus in all four directions he displayed four kinds of miraculous wonder by his supernormal powers.

Then the Blessed One had this thought: if the Tathāgata were to touch his two feet to the feet of King Śuddhodana, the king's skull would split into seven pieces. And if King Śuddhodana were to bow down and touch his head to the Tathāgata's two feet, the haughty Śākya would think, "Why is one who has become a father touching his head to the feet of his son?" and their lack of faith would arise. Therefore he thought, "I must by all means employ such a miraculous power that King Śuddhodana will bow with his head to the Tathāgata's two feet while remaining in an upright stance, without prostrating his body." Having considered this and understood what was needed, the Blessed One remained suspended in the sky at a height of about seven tāla trees, then descended to the height of six tāla trees, then five, then four, then three, then two, then one tāla tree. Then he descended to the height of about seven men's lengths, then six, then five, then four, then three, then two, then one man's length.

Then King Śuddhodana, remaining upright without bowing, bowed his head to the two feet of the Tathāgata. And to make this known to the Śākya, he spoke these verses at that very moment:

When you were born, the earth trembled violently, and the shadow of the jambu tree did not shift from your body.
Three times the all-seeing, omniscient one looked — to your feet, O buddha, I pay homage.

The Blessed One then gathered back the miraculous display he had manifested, went to the Nyagrodha pleasure grove, and took his seat on the cushion that had been prepared before the assembly of the community of monks.

Then King Śuddhodana, and those known as Bṛhad-bhojana, Śvetabhojana, Amṛtabhojana, and many hundreds of thousands of Śākyas bowed their heads to the two feet of the Blessed One and assembled on one side. Some of the Śākyas, joining their palms together in the direction where the Blessed One was, assembled on one side. And some of the Śākyas, upon seeing the Blessed One from afar alone, assembled on one side without saying a word.

Then King Śuddhodana made this request to the Blessed One in verse:

How is it, O hero who once rode upon war elephants, on horses and in chariots for traveling to the city, that now across grounds covered with thorns
you walk upon your feet?

The Blessed One declared:

I range across the whole of the earth
by the mount of the legs of supernormal power and the vehicle of proper giving, unstung by the thorns of affliction.

The king asked:

O hero, formerly you were resplendent clothed in the robes of Kāśika silk — how is it that you endure upon your body these rough, ochre-colored robes?

The Blessed One declared:

O king, I am adorned by wearing the sewn cloth robe of the modest sage.
Whoever wears the robe of the Sage (the Buddha) becomes a beauty in the tranquil forest.

The king asked:

Formerly, steadfast one, you partook of meals of many flavors from golden vessels — how is it that you now come to accept such poor alms food?

The Blessed One declared:

Food of those endowed with Dharma is joy, accompanied by renunciation and meditative equipoise.
Though I have abandoned craving for food,
I eat for the sake of guiding the entire world.

The king asked:

O noble-minded one, formerly you dwelt in due season in your immeasurable palace above — now that you dwell alone in the forest,
how do you become free from cold and discomfort?

The Blessed One declared:

Gautama has abandoned the root and continuance of all fears together with their latent tendencies.
Dwelling in the forest, freed from the fear of sorrow, there is nothing there of which I am afraid.

The king asked:

O sovereign of sages, formerly in your city
you always performed the finest ablutions.
Now that you dwell alone in the forest,
how do you bathe with proper water?

The Blessed One declared:

Gautama bathes on the bank of the Dharma-lake, in the waters of merit — clear, cool, praised by the wise.
One who bathes there is cleansed in body and mind,
and passes beyond the attainments of the Vedas.

The king asked:

O hero, when in your own palace
you bathed with golden and silver vessels, how is it that you now bathe your body with water that is warm and turbid?

The Blessed One declared:

Gautama bathes in the river-like stream of moral discipline — clear and cool, praised by the wise.
One who bathes there is cleansed in body and mind,
and passes beyond the attainments of the Vedas.

Then King Śuddhodana asked:

From where does majesty arise?
From where does fear and dread arise?
From where does disenchantment arise?
Speak to me of these things as I have asked.

The Blessed One declared:

From where majesty arises, from where fear and dread arise, and from where disenchantment arises —
listen, and I shall explain them to you.

Were it not for aging, illness, and death, were those three things not to exist, then even I would take great delight in the objects that are so exceedingly pleasant.

The king said:

O hero who brings joy to the Śākya clans, that you are untouched by the eight worldly conditions — how excellent it is that you, so nobly born, have done so nobly well.

Then, with great joy and exuberance, he bowed his head to the feet of the sovereign of sages, surrounded by the Saṅgha of sages, and remained contemplating the Sugata on every side.

Then King Śuddhodana thought to himself: how fortunate I am to have found, in my son, one who has realized such a wealth of excellent qualities.

Thereupon the Blessed One, having discerned the dispositions, latent tendencies, elements, and natures of the assembly of common people, taught the Dharma in such a way that — with the exception of King Śuddhodana himself, and Devadatta (who was sinful, desirous, and more arrogant than arrogance itself) — seventy-seven thousand Śākyans, along with Śuddhodana and others, came to see the truths. From that assembly, many thousands of living beings directly realized the fruit of stream-entry, some the fruit of once-returning, some the fruit of non-returning, and some went forth and, by abandoning all afflictions, directly realized the state of arhathood. The greater part of that assembly was established in turning toward the Buddha, alighting on the Dharma, and alighting on the Saṅgha.

King Śuddhodana, so overwhelmed with joy at thinking "my son possesses such great miraculous power, such great might," did not see the truths. Devadatta, due to sinfulness, desire, and arrogance surpassing arrogance, also did not see the truths. And Devadatta, having failed to see the truths and overcome with anger, declared: "If I too were to master this magic of gathering followers in such a way, then the gathering of all the world as followers would depend on me alone."

The Śākyaas who had been gladdened and were displaying their joy said to him: "Devadatta, let it go. The Blessed One possesses great miraculous power and great might — do not speak in such a way." And so he fell silent and said nothing further.

On the second day, in the pleasure grove, seats like half-moons were arranged in a spacious area with good open ground. There too the Blessed One, having fully perceived the intentions, latent dispositions, constitutions, and natures of that great multitude of people, taught the Dharma in such a way — with the exception of King Śuddhodana and Devadatta, who was sinful, desirous, and arrogant surpassing arrogance — that seventy-six thousand Śākyaas, beginning with one named Breja, came to see the truths. Among that assembly, many thousands of living beings directly realized the fruit of stream-entry; some realized the fruit of once-returning; some realized the fruit of non-returning; and some went forth, abandoned all afflictions, and directly realized arhathood. Most of that assembly were established in turning toward the Buddha, alighting on the Dharma, and alighting on the Saṅgha.

King Śuddhodana, so overwhelmed with joy at thinking "my son possesses such great miraculous power, such great might," did not see the truths. Devadatta, due to sinfulness, desire, and arrogance surpassing arrogance, also did not see the truths. And Devadatta, having failed to see the truths and overcome with anger, declared: "If I too were to master this magic of gathering followers in such a way, then the gathering of all the world as followers would depend on me alone."

The Śākyaas who had been gladdened and were displaying their joy said to him: "Devadatta, let it go. The Blessed One possesses great miraculous power and great might — do not speak in such a way." And so he fell silent and said nothing further.

On the third day, in a spot of open, spacious ground in the pleasure grove at the place of Brahmā, seats like half-moons were arranged. There too the Blessed One, having fully perceived the intentions, latent dispositions, constitutions, and natures of that great multitude of people, taught the Dharma in such a way — with the exception of King Śuddhodana and Devadatta, who was sinful, desirous, and arrogant surpassing arrogance — that seventy-five thousand Śākyas, beginning with one who partook of ambrosia, came to see the truths. Among that assembly, many thousands of living beings directly realized the fruit of stream-entry; some realized the fruit of once-returning; some realized the fruit of non-returning; and some went forth, abandoned all afflictions, and directly realized arhathood. Most of that assembly were established in turning toward the Buddha, alighting on the Dharma, and alighting on the Saṅgha.

King Śuddhodana, so overwhelmed with joy at thinking "my son possesses such great miraculous power, such great might," did not see the truths. Devadatta, due to sinfulness, desire, and arrogance surpassing arrogance, also did not see the truths.

Then the Blessed One reflected: "Why does King Śuddhodana not come to see the truths?" Considering this, he understood: there are two causes by which one does not see the truths — a mind that is excessively elated, and a mind that is excessively downcast. He thus perceived that the mind of King Śuddhodana, which in his youth had been fulfilled in every aim and had formerly been revered by both gods and men, was now excessively downcast because he thought: "Now I am revered by men, but no longer revered by gods." Then the Blessed One reflected:

"I shall tame King Śuddhodana by teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone." Reflecting thus and perceiving this, the Blessed One then gave rise to a worldly intention.

It is the nature of all buddhas, the Blessed Ones, that when they give rise to a worldly intention, even the tiniest creatures — even worms and beetles — know it through the Blessed One's mind. But when they give rise to a supramundane intention, even pratyekabuddhas do not know it through the Blessed One's mind — how much less then śrāvakas and the rest.

Then Brahmā, Śakra (Indra), and the other gods thought to themselves: "Why has the Blessed One given rise to a worldly intention?" And they saw that the Blessed One wished to teach the Dharma to the divine retinue alone for the sake of taming King Śuddhodana.

Thereupon the gods of the desire realm and the gods of the form realm, knowing it through the Blessed One's mind, vanished from the divine world — just as a person might extend a bent arm or bend an extended arm — and appeared before the Blessed One in the pleasure garden of the Brahma realm. The Blessed One then, by his miraculous power, conjured a magnificent four-gated palace made of four kinds of precious jewels, and appointed the four World-Protecting Kings (the Caturmahārājas) as gatekeepers at the four gates.

The gods of the form realm then circumambulated the Blessed One three times, prostrated with their heads at his feet, and took their seats to the right, close by. The gods of the desire realm likewise circumambulated the Blessed One three times, prostrated with their heads at his feet, and took their seats to the left, close by.

Now, King Śuddhodana's daily practice was to go three times each day to see the Blessed One and to pay him reverence.

And so the next morning King Śuddhodana rose early and went to where the eastern gate of the palace was. Dhṛtarāṣṭra said to him: "Great King, stop — do not enter. The Blessed One is teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone, and no measure of mere humans can fill this place. Handsome one, who are you?" The King replied: "Great King, I am Dhṛtarāṣṭra, the Great King." Then King Śuddhodana went to where the southern gate of the palace was. Virūḍhaka said to him: "Great King, stop — do not enter. The Blessed One is teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone, and no measure of mere humans can fill this place. Handsome one, who are you?" The King replied: "Great King, I am Virūḍhaka, the Great King." Then King Śuddhodana went to where the western gate of the palace was. Virūpākṣa said to him: "Great King, stop — do not enter. The Blessed One is teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone, and no measure of mere humans can fill this place. Handsome one, who are you?" The King replied: "Great King, I am Virūpākṣa, the Great King." Then King Śuddhodana went to where the northern gate of the palace was. Vaiśravaṇa said to him: "Great King, stop — do not enter. The Blessed One is teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone, and no measure of mere humans can fill this place. Handsome one, who are you?" The King replied: "Great King, I am Vaiśravaṇa, the Great King."

Then King Śuddhodana thought to himself: "How unfortunate it is that I see the Blessed One teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone." The Blessed One, knowing King Śuddhodana's mind with his wisdom, transformed the palace into the nature of crystal, so that King Śuddhodana saw the Blessed One teaching the Dharma to the divine retinue alone as if they were seated within the reflection of a mirror. Having seen this, the King thought to himself: "There is no woman anywhere who is like this — one for whom all my aims are now as good as accomplished." And so King Śuddhodana's mind became exceedingly elated.

Then the Blessed One drew back the miraculous display he had manifested and began to teach the Dharma to King Śuddhodana. The Blessed One reflected thus: "Why is it that King Śuddhodana does not see the truth?" And he understood that at this very moment King Śuddhodana, out of excessive delight at the thought that "there is no woman anywhere like this — one for whom all my aims are now as good as accomplished," had his mind stream become exceedingly elated.

Then the Blessed One addressed the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, attend upon King Śuddhodana." The Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana replied, "Yes, Venerable One, as you command," and having received this instruction from the Blessed One, he went to where King Śuddhodana was.

King Śuddhodana saw the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana while he was still at a considerable distance, and when he saw him he said: "Venerable Maudgalyāyana, please come here. Venerable Maudgalyāyana, it is good that you have come. Venerable Maudgalyāyana, please take your seat on the prepared seat."

Then the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, given the opportunity by the Blessed One, entered into such a meditative absorption that, with his mind thus evenly placed, he became invisible from his own seat and arose into the open sky above the eastern quarter, where he performed the four deportments — walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. He then entered into absorption on the fire element, and from the body of the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, as he rested in absorption on the fire element, there issued forth rays of light of many kinds: blue, yellow, red, white, orange, and those resembling the color of crystal and silver. He also displayed pairs of miraculous feats: flames blazed from the lower part of his body while streams of cool water flowed down from the upper part, and flames blazed from the upper part of his body while streams of cool water flowed down from the lower part. Just as he did in the eastern quarter, so too in the southern, western, and northern quarters — displaying four types of miraculous wonder in each of the four directions. Then, having drawn back the miraculous display, he sat down on the prepared seat.

Then King Śuddhodana said to the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, is there anyone else among the Blessed One's śrāvakas who possesses such great miraculous power, such great might?"

Then the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana at that moment spoke these verses:

The śrāvakas of the Sage (the Buddha) are mighty.
They know the three knowledges and the categories of mind.
Many there are whose defilements are exhausted,
Many who have conquered their foes.

Then King Śuddhodana thought to himself: "Not only is the Blessed One alone great in miraculous power and mighty —"

"And so the śrāvakas, too, possess great miraculous power and great might." With that thought, the mind-stream of King Śuddhodana became calm and composed.

Then the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana led King Śuddhodana to where the Blessed One was and arrived there. He bowed his head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side.

Then the Blessed One, knowing King Śuddhodana's mind with his own mind, understanding his intentions, his latent dispositions, his constitution, and his nature, taught the Dharma to King Śuddhodana as he sat right there upon that seat — shattering with the vajra of wisdom the mountain peak of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi), twenty heights high, accumulated from beginningless time, and thereby directly actualizing the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, the king spoke: "Venerable One, through relying upon the Blessed One as my virtuous friend, the Blessed One has done for me what neither my father did, nor my mother, nor any king, nor the gods, nor my forefathers of old, nor ascetics and brahmins, nor the gathering of friends, companions, and kinsmen — you have dried the ocean of blood and tears, you have freed me from the mountains of bones, you have closed the doors to the lower realms, you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, you have drawn my feet out from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed me among gods and humans, you have brought cyclic existence to an end. With the vajra of wisdom you have shattered the mountain peak of the view of the transitory collection, twenty heights high, accumulated from beginningless time, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable One, I have entered the stream. Venerable One, I have entered the stream, and I go for refuge to the Blessed One, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha of monks. I pray to be accepted as a lay practitioner. From this day forth, for as long as I live, from the depths of my heart I take refuge with complete sincerity."

He also spoke these verses:

What a good son does for his father
in return — that benefit —
you have done for me.
My mind has turned toward the higher realms.

What a good son does for his father
in return — that benefit —
you have done for me.
My mind has turned toward liberation.

You have drawn me well out of the lower realms, and through your effort you have placed me on the path to the higher realms and to liberation.
You have accomplished this difficult task with excellence.

As a merchant who has found his profit,
I have found the higher realms.
To rely upon virtuous friends —
this is truly excellent.

Then King Śuddhodana, having seen the truth, said to Śuddhodana the White:
"Young man, let you govern the kingdom. I, like the royal seer, shall live the holy life. Why would I not give over the kingdom? I have seen the truths. When did the gods see them? This very day. The gods have seen them today, yet it was under the same parasol under which the Blessed One came here that I have seen the truths."

Then King Śuddhodana said to the young men Dronodana and Amṛtodana: "You two young men, let you govern the kingdom. I, like the royal seer, shall live the holy life. Why would I not give over the kingdom? I have seen the truths. When did the gods see them? This very day. The gods have seen them today, yet we had seen them still earlier."

The king said: "Among the sons of these young men, which is the eldest?" He replied: "It is the young man Bhadra." King Śuddhodana consecrated the young man Bhadra as the Śākya king.

At that time the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas —

Each day, without interruption, he attended the royal palace at mealtime, and King Śuddhodana saw those who had gone forth from Rāhula and were practicing austerities, their bodies appearing gaunt and unattractive. Having seen them, he thought to himself: "These great ones have good minds, yet their bodies are not good — it is the fierce austerities that make their bodies appear so unpleasant. If the Blessed One's retinue, however numerous, were to become just like the Blessed One himself in appearance, then the Blessed One would look all the more beautiful."

Then King Śuddhodana assembled the Śākyas and said: "O wise ones, if the young man Sarvārthasiddha had not gone forth, what would he have become?" They replied: "He would have become a divine wheel-turning king." "And what would your sons have become?" "They would have become his divine attendants." "Well then, since the young man Sarvārthasiddha has gone forth and drunk the nectar of the Dharma to his heart's content, and since he nourishes beings with that nectar, why do your sons not serve as his attendants? O king, shall those then be sent forth into the going-forth? Let them be sent forth! O king, if not, the Śākya lineage will be cut off." The king said: "Let one from each household be sent forth." They replied: "We will do as the king has commanded." King Śuddhodana then proclaimed that one Śākya youth from each household was to be sent forth.

At the time when King Śuddhodana made that proclamation, five hundred Śākya youths — Bhadra, Aniruddha, Nandaka, and others — went forth into the going-forth. At the time when the Blessed One sent forth those five hundred Śākya youths, the Blessed One said: "Going forth from a high lineage is a means of gain, and it brings closeness." Because of this, great gain and great honor arose for them.

The Blessed One then considered the matter: "These sons of good family went forth solely for the sake of others — they are attached to others alone," he reflected. He then wished to cut off the gain and honor that had arisen for them. Dwelling at his pleasure in the dwelling place of the Blessed One, he set out in the direction of Śrāvastī, traveling by stages, and arrived at Śrāvastī. There he resided in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The Vinayavibhaṅga. The twenty-eighth fascicle.

Then the venerable Udāyin, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and Dharma robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. As he was wandering through Śrāvastī collecting alms, step by step, he went to the dwelling of the householder's wife Śyāmā. The householder's wife Śyāmā saw the venerable Udāyin while he was still some distance away. Having seen him, she beat her breast and said: "Udāyin! Why have you abandoned me and gone forth?" Udāyin replied: "The bodhisattva, when he went forth, abandoned the queen Gopā, Śaktimatī, Mṛgajā, and sixty thousand other women — that was truly difficult. Yet as for you, who are like a speck of dust, why would I not abandon you? I too, Śyāmā, am going forth." She said: "Very well then. Let me properly conclude the household affairs first." Udāyin came at the right and fitting time on a subsequent occasion and said: "Śyāmā, will you not go forth?" Śyāmā replied: "I have not yet properly concluded the household affairs." Śyāmā said: "In all the time since Kosala was founded, the household affairs have never been fully concluded. Udāyin, let me conclude them well today and I will go forth tomorrow."

Udāyin thought to himself: "Previously I was overwhelmed by those with black begging bowls. If I were now to give ordination to a nun, the group of six would overwhelm me all the more, saying, 'Udāyin has given ordination to a nun.'" Remorse arose in him, and taking up his bowl and robes he set out walking toward Rājagṛha, and journeying gradually along the way he arrived at Rājagṛha. There he accepted the rains retreat and settled in.

The next day Śyāmā properly concluded the household affairs, came to the Jeta Grove, and went among the monks to ask them: "Noble ones, where has he gone? Who is he?" They replied: "He is the noble Udāyin. He has gone to Rājagṛha." Śyāmā began to weep. The monks said: "Śyāmā, why do you weep?" She answered: "At the word of the noble Udāyin I properly concluded the household affairs and came, saying he would give me ordination. He said,

'Come once you have properly concluded the household affairs, and I will give you ordination.' I did conclude the household affairs properly and came — but now he has gone to Rājagṛha. I am neither remaining at home nor have I gone forth." The monks said to her: "Śyāmā, Udāyin went to Rājagṛha for a razor, and the barber will shave your hair there." Then fully ordained nuns who had come to the Jeta Grove to present their confession ceremony saw Śyāmā weeping and asked: "Śyāmā, why do you weep?" She replied: "At the word of the noble Udāyin I properly concluded the household affairs and came, saying he would give me ordination. He said, 'Come once you have properly concluded the household affairs, and I will give you ordination.' I did conclude the household affairs properly and came — but now he has gone to Rājagṛha. I am neither remaining at home nor have I gone forth." The wandering nun said: "Monks, who performs the ordination of nuns? It is nuns who ordain nuns — come here. The noble great Progenitress Gautamī will give you ordination." They led her to the great Progenitress Gautamī and said: "Noble one, this Śyāmā, a householder's attendant, wishes to go forth." The great Progenitress Gautamī gave her the going forth and conferred upon her full ordination.

Udāyin thought to himself: "By my consideration for those with black begging bowls, I did not give ordination to Śyāmā, the householder's wife, and I even obstructed her with a razor, a whip, a sickle, and small sickles. And yet some of those with black begging bowls have gone ahead and ordained her — I will not even meet her now." Remorse arose in him, and reluctantly he accepted the rains retreat. At Śrāvastī an elder monk who had reluctantly accepted the rains retreat, placing his bowl and robes under his arm, performed the invitation ceremony, and the invitation ceremony was performed correctly. The invitation ceremony was performed exceedingly well. With that he set out toward Rājagṛha, and journeying gradually along the way he arrived at Rājagṛha. There the venerable Udāyin was sitting at the gate of the monastery looking along the road, and from quite a distance he saw someone approaching — an elder with hair white as a brahmin-flower, with hanging eyebrows. Udāyin thought: "This monk coming — whoever this elder is," and said aloud: "Welcome, elder. Well come. I prostrate." The other replied: "I prostrate to the teacher." Udāyin perceived: "This is an elder who knows neither preceptor nor abbot." Udāyin had him enter the monastery and asked: "Elder, where have you come from?" He replied: "From Śrāvastī."

Udāyin thought: "If I ask about the householder's wife Subhadrā right at the start, it will seem rude. I should approach the matter gradually, asking first about other things and then about her." So he spoke: "Venerable one, how is the Blessed One — does he have little trouble, little distress? Is he at ease, free from illness, and abiding in strength? Has he consented to spend the rains retreat at Śrāvastī?" The venerable Udāyin replied: "It is just so. The Blessed One has little trouble, little distress; he is at ease, free from illness, abiding in strength, and has consented to spend the rains retreat at Śrāvastī." "Venerable one, and how is the community of monks, the community of nuns, the assembly of laymen, and the assembly of laywomen — are they at ease in Śrāvastī, with little trouble, little distress, free from illness, and abiding in strength? Do they wish to see the Teacher? Do they wish to hear the sacred Dharma?" "Venerable Udāyin, it is just so. The community of monks, the community of nuns, the assembly of laymen, and the assembly of laywomen are dwelling at Śrāvastī with little trouble, little distress, at ease, free from illness, and abiding in strength. They wish to see the Teacher, and they wish to hear the sacred Dharma." "Venerable one, and how are the elder Kauṇḍinya, the elder Mahākāśyapa, the elder Śāriputra, the elder Mahāmaudgalyāyana, and the other senior monks — are they dwelling at Śrāvastī with little trouble, little distress, at ease, free from illness, and abiding in strength?" "Venerable Udāyin, it is just so. They are dwelling at Śrāvastī with little trouble, little distress, at ease, free from illness, and abiding in strength." "Venerable one, and are you acquainted with Prasenajit, king of Kosala, the chaplain-brahmin Brahmadatta, the elder Jyeṣṭha, and the householder's wife Mṛgāramatā Viśākhā?" "Venerable Udāyin, yes, I know them." "Then, venerable one, do you know the householder's wife Subhadrā?" "Venerable Udāyin, I know her. She is the former wife of the venerable Udāyin." Then Udāyin said: "You are aware of the situation — the talk that comes with old age. Do you still consider her your householder's wife?" "She has gone forth." "Who gave her the going forth?" "The great lady Gautamī." Udāyin thought: "She still has residual objects of attachment," and said: "Come here, old one — wash your feet." He then massaged the other's feet and gave many rubbings of the hands, hung the other's bowl and robe on a peg and set them up on a high rack, and said: "Old one, this monastery has food and gains. Be pleased to stay here." The elder replied: "Venerable Udāyin, I have come to pay reverence at a shrine and intend to go on; I do not wish to stay here." Udāyin then placed iron door-bolts and a bent key before him and said: "The Blessed One has declared that monks should lodge in the monastery; they should not go without lodging," and with that he disappeared from sight. The elder eventually wandered on gradually and, arriving at Śrāvastī, Udāyin swept out his own monastery room, plastered it well, applied a plaster of fresh cow-dung, shut the door, and lay stretched out on top of a seat with his outer robe on, intoning a recitation in a melodious voice. Then nuns who had come to make an offering arrived and, hearing the melody of his voice, they paid him reverence and said: "Noble Udāyin, where have you been travelling?" Udāyin said: "To Rājagṛha." They went to the residence hall and said to Subhadrā:

"Subhadrā, rejoice! Your teacher has come." "Where is my teacher?" "Udāyin!" "How is he my teacher? Did she read that from his forehead? You scatter-brain — you do not understand. Nuns depend heavily on monks, so go and look to that." Subhadrā took barley flour, bathwater leavings, and oil, and went to Udāyin's monastery. Subhadrā knocked on the door of Udāyin's monastery room, and Udāyin said: "Who is there?" Subhadrā said: "It is I, Subhadrā." "Welcome — the householder's wife Subhadrā has come." "Am I still your householder's wife?" "Then what are you?" "I have gone forth." "Who ordained you?" "The noble great Mātṛkā, Gautamī." "Something of that sort has happened, and it was on that account that I went to Rājagṛha; because I wanted to inquire after you, you have gone forth. You said with your own mouth that you would settle the household affairs properly and come, and I said I would give you the going-forth. When you had settled the household affairs properly and came, you had already entered Rājagṛha, and if the noble one had not given me the going-forth, I would have been neither one who remains in the home nor one who has gone forth." Udāyin said: "Subhadrā, do you think I am going to salt my own hand? Whether the great Mātṛkā Gautamī ordained you or I ordained you, it is fine — come inside and I will teach the Dharma." Subhadrā paid reverence at Udāyin's two feet and sat before him to hear the Dharma. He began to teach her Dharma, and after he had taught her Dharma for a time, he began to call to mind their former conversations, the delight they had shared, their play, and the pleasures they had enjoyed together: "Subhadrā, do you remember how the two of us ate such-and-such food in a grove, a pleasure garden, or some delightful divine residence, and dressed in such-and-such finery, and drank such-and-such drink?" At those words, attachment arose in Udāyin. The more attachment arose in him, the more he became agitated.

Now, women skilled in the ways of men have five qualities unmixed with others. What are those five? They know when a man has become attached and when he has become free of attachment; they know the right time and know the signs of the months; they know when conception has taken place in the womb; they know from whom that conception in the womb arose; and they know whether it is a boy or a girl — if it is a boy, it rests leaning on the right hip, and if it is a girl, it rests leaning on the left hip.

Subhadrā, knowing that Udāyin had become attached, said: "I must step outside for a moment and will return." Udāyin thought: "Does she want to defecate, or does she want to urinate? Let nothing go wrong." And so he said: "Go ahead." Subhadrā went out, broke off an armload of firewood, and began to run. Udāyin was skilled in sounds, and hearing the noise she made, he ran out after her, calling: "Nun, where are you running to with your shaved head?" He ran after her, and as he grabbed her his semen was released. At that, freed entirely from his entanglement, he remained in that very place, like an elephant freed from rut.

Subhadrā, seeing him freed from all entanglement and turned back, understood: "This one is freed from all entanglement." She went to him and said to the venerable Udāyin: "Noble one, if I had consented, I would have become unfit to remain a nun, and you would have become unfit to remain a monk. Sister, the Blessed One (the Buddha) has well declared: 'If one guards oneself, one guards others; if one guards others, one guards oneself.' How does guarding oneself guard others? By cultivating, by habituating, by doing it repeatedly, by protecting continuously, by making it a felt reality, by making it manifest — in this way, guarding oneself guards others. How does guarding others guard oneself? By not acting harshly, by not reviling, by not harming, by caring for others, by being tender toward others, by a mind of loving-kindness — in this way, guarding others guards oneself. Noble one, please pass me that lower robe; I will wash it." Udāyin gave that lower robe to Subhadrā. Subhadrā, seeing the semen on it, felt remorse, thinking: "Had the monk Udāyin previously seen some part of my body, or previously smelled it, or previously touched it, then my not consenting was wrong of me." And as Subhadrā was thinking in this way, her mind became thoroughly inflamed with desire and torn apart, and she poured that semen into the opening of her own womb. Because the ripening of karma (Skt. karman) in sentient beings is inconceivable, a being entered into her.

The nuns who saw this said: "Subhadrā, all of us know you — do you really intend to go to the noble Udāyin on the grounds of the Dharma of good conduct? We never thought that he would put you in such a situation as this." Subhadrā replied: "Sisters, that monk is one of pure moral discipline — from the time he went forth until now, not once has he so much as touched her with his hand." They said: "Even without touching you, if he has put you in such a situation as this, what sort of situation might he have put you in if he had touched you?" At that point, the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, that nun has not incurred a defeat. However, let her be set apart in a secluded place, free from any involvement with alms-gathering. And she will give birth to a young son named Kāśyapa (Skt. kāśyapa), who will go forth in my teaching and, having abandoned all afflictions, will directly realize arhathood — namely, the novice monk Kāśyapa, who will become the foremost among those who speak my varied teachings, speak pleasing words, and who possess the confidence born of virtue." The Blessed One then reflected: "The offense that has arisen among the monks came about through a nun who was not a blood relative draping an old garment over herself." Thinking thus, the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this ground of formulation, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks, and so forth as before.

"My śrāvakas, in training in the Vinaya, are to recite this rule as follows: Whatever monk causes a nun who is not a blood relative to drape an old garment over herself, or wrings it out for her, or holds it out for her to step into — that is an offense requiring forfeiture.

Now, 'whatever monk' refers to Udāyin or any other monk of that kind. 'Nun' refers to one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Who is not a blood relative' means one who is not a grandmother, a grandfather, or any other relative up to and including the seventh generation reckoned through both fathers and mothers. Beyond that seventh generation, one is not a blood relative.

"Garment" refers to any one of the seven kinds: woolen cloth, cotton cloth, silk cloth, fine muslin, coarse hemp cloth, kotamba cloth, or linen cloth.

"Old" means one that has been used in any one of the three seasons.

"Drapes it over her" means: places it into water for soaking.

"Wrings it out for her" means: even dips it into dye.

"Holds it out for her to step into" means: even strikes it with the palms of the hands.

"An offense requiring forfeiture" means: the item is to be forfeited and the transgression is to be confessed; therefore it is said to be an offense requiring forfeiture.

As for how the transgression arises: if a monk, perceiving a nun who is not a blood relative as not being a blood relative, drapes an old garment over her, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he wrings it out for her, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he holds it out for her to step into, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he drapes it and also wrings it out; if he drapes it and also holds it out for her to step into; if he wrings it out and also drapes it; if he wrings it out and also holds it out for her to step into; if he holds it out for her to step into and also drapes it; if he holds it out for her to step into and also wrings it out; or if he drapes it, wrings it out, and holds it out for her to step into — in each of these cases it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, uncertain whether a nun who is not a blood relative is or is not a blood relative, drapes an old garment over her, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he wrings it out for her, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he holds it out for her to step into, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he drapes it and also wrings it out; if he drapes it and also holds it out for her to step into; if he wrings it out and also drapes it; if he wrings it out and also holds it out for her to step into; if he holds it out for her to step into and also drapes it; if he holds it out for her to step into and also wrings it out; or if he drapes it, wrings it out, and holds it out for her to step into — in each of these cases it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, perceiving a nun who is a blood relative as not being a blood relative, drapes an old garment over her, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he wrings it out for her, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he holds it out for her to step into, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he drapes it and also wrings it out; if he drapes it and also holds it out for her to step into; if he wrings it out and also drapes it; if he wrings it out and also holds it out for her to step into; if he holds it out for her to step into and also drapes it; if he holds it out for her to step into and also wrings it out; or if he drapes it, wrings it out, and holds it out for her to step into — in each of these cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

If a monk, uncertain whether a nun who is a blood relative is or is not a blood relative, drapes an old garment over her, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he wrings it out for her, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he holds it out for her to step into, it becomes a wrongdoing. If he drapes it and also wrings it out; if he drapes it and also holds it out for her to step into; if he wrings it out and also drapes it; if he wrings it out and also holds it out for her to step into; if he holds it out for her to step into and also drapes it; if he holds it out for her to step into and also wrings it out; or if he drapes it, wrings it out, and holds it out for her to step into — in each of these cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by pain.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. The Blessed One addressed the monks thus: "Monks, this kind of person — one who has gone forth from a high noble family — is close to being surrounded by gains.

When the Blessed One had spoken thus, those among the Śākya who had gone forth gained great offerings and great honor, and they became thoroughly devoted to the pursuit of adorning themselves with robes and maintaining extra possessions — carrying extra alms bowls, extra robes, extra nets, extra cups, and extra belts. Although the Blessed One taught them the Dharma again and again, at the proper times, they did not come to see the truths.

Then the Blessed One reflected: "Why is it that these Śākyan monastics do not come to see the truths?" He saw that it was because they were thoroughly devoted to the pursuit of adorning themselves with robes and because they carried extra alms bowls, extra robes, extra nets, extra cups, and extra belts. He thought: "If I were to rebuke these Śākyan monastics, it would be difficult to shame them." Since the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, are supremely skilled in taming those who are to be tamed, the Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, during these three months I wish to enter into retreat. Except for a single monk who brings me my alms round, and except at the time of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of that same period, no monk is to come near me. The community of monks, too — venerable ones — during the months of the rains retreat, except for a single monk who brings me my alms round and except at the time of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of that same period, you are to establish as a rule among yourselves: none of you is to approach the Blessed One. Whoever among you during the rains retreat — other than the one who brings the alms round and except on the day of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony — approaches the Blessed One is to be made to undergo a transgression." With that, the rule was established.

When the Blessed One had entered into the three-month retreat, no monk went to him except for the one who brought his alms round and except on the day of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony.

At that time the venerable Upananda had undertaken to observe the rains retreat with the last month added on, while the Blessed One had accepted to observe the rains retreat with the last month added on as well.

Then, when the venerable Upananda had passed through the three months of the rains retreat, he made himself ready with his robes prepared and his robes collected, looking fine and with an attractive retinue, and taking up his alms bowl and robe, he set out toward Śrāvastī, traveling gradually on his way, until at last he arrived in Śrāvastī.

Then the venerable Upananda set down his alms bowl and robe, washed his two feet, and went toward the Blessed One's assembly hall. The six-group monks saw the venerable Upananda from quite a distance. On seeing him, they said: "Venerable ones, right now that one, for the sake of a small matter, will be splitting the community's rule." Others said: "He will be made to undergo a transgression." Still others said: "He is now only beginning to engage in the matter — when the splitting actually occurs, then he will be made to undergo it."

Then the venerable Upananda gently knocked on the door of the Blessed One's assembly hall, and the Blessed One opened the door for him. The venerable Upananda bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side.

Now it is the nature of reality of the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, to ask a monk who has arrived unexpectedly: "Monk, where have you come from just now?"

The Blessed One, having asked the venerable Upananda "Upananda, where have you come from just now, and where did you commit to spending the rains retreat?" — this being the occasion for mutual rejoicing — the Blessed One expressed his delight, and the venerable Upananda replied: "Venerable One, I have come just now from the provinces. I request permission to spend the rains retreat there in the provinces."

"Upananda, have the monks in the provinces performed the invitation ceremony?"

"Venerable One, they have."

"Upananda, what was the cause, what was the condition, by which you came to have a beautiful retinue, a retinue of fine appearance?"

"Venerable One, if there was someone who had gone forth under my former preceptor, I would say to him: 'Good fellow, come here. Seek out a forest-dweller.' And I would also speak the praises of the forest-dwelling life itself. 'Seek out an alms-goer, one who wears only the three robes, one who makes use of rags from the dust-heap, one who dwells at the foot of a tree.' And I would also speak the praises of tree-root dwelling itself. If he said he would do so, I would have him go forth. If there was someone seeking full ordination, or one who had entered upon a dwelling, or one who had entered upon reading, or one who had entered upon the meaning of what was spoken, or one who had entered upon reflection — I would say to him as well: 'Good fellow, come here. Seek out a forest-dweller,' and I would speak the praises of the forest-dwelling life itself. 'Seek out an alms-goer, one who wears only the three robes, one who makes use of rags from the dust-heap, one who dwells at the foot of a tree,' and I would speak the praises of tree-root dwelling itself. If he said he would do so, I would cause him to take up the reflection. Venerable One, that was the cause, that was the condition, by which I came to have a beautiful retinue, a retinue of fine appearance."

"Upananda, it is excellent, excellent, that you have undertaken this for the benefit of the many, for the happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the welfare and benefit and happiness of gods and humans. Upananda, whoever does not speak in praise of the cultivated qualities of another — that person does not speak in praise of me. Whoever does speak in praise of the cultivated qualities of another — that person speaks in praise of me. And why is that? Because I have long commended, honoured, praised, and extolled those very cultivated qualities.

"Upananda, do you not guard the rule of the Saṅgha?"

"Venerable One, I do not know what the rule of the Saṅgha is, nor what constitutes observing the rule."

"Upananda, here I declared to the monks as follows: 'Monks, during these three months I wish to remain in seclusion within. No monk is to come before me save for one monk who brings my alms-food, and at the time of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of this very period.' And the Saṅgha of monks likewise established this as a rule: 'Reverends, during the months of the rains retreat no one among us is to go to visit the Blessed One save for one monk who brings alms-food and at the time of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of this very period. During the rains retreat, save for one monk who brings alms-food and at the time of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of this very period, whoever among us goes to visit the Blessed One — we will make that person undergo a transgression-producing downfall.' That was the rule that was established.

"Venerable One, I arrived unexpectedly —"

That rule was to be observed by the monks who were permanent residents. But when a monk arrives unexpectedly, both he who arrives unexpectedly and those who are permanent residents must observe the rule of the Saṅgha. Reverend, I shall therefore establish the following standards of conduct for monks who arrive as unexpected visitors: a monk who arrives unexpectedly shall enter the assembly hall and inquire of the monks what rule is in effect at that place. If he asks, that is well. If he does not ask, it becomes a matter involving an offence.

Reverend, be that as it may, I grant to forest-dwelling monks the exemption from forest retreat, so that for a forest-dwelling monk who wishes to pay homage to the Tathāgata there is no inappropriate time to go.

A monk who is an alms-round practitioner, or a content-with-what-is-found alms-round practitioner, or one who does not eat after mealtime, or one who eats at a single sitting, or one who holds to the three robes, or one who dwells at the foot of a tree, or one who dwells in a charnel ground, or one who sits in the open air, or one who uses any seat as it comes, or one who lives without a roof — to such a monk who practises in accordance with his own foundation I grant the exemption from that foundation, so that for a monk who practises in accordance with his foundation there is no inappropriate time to go for the purpose of paying homage to the Tathāgata.

Then the venerable Neyasena rejoiced in and praised what the Blessed One had spoken, bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet in reverence, and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then the group of six went to where the venerable Neyasena was, and upon arriving they said this to the venerable Neyasena: "Venerable Neyasena, open the matter. Disclose the matter with regard to these five categories of transgression. The transgression that has arisen for you — confess it in accordance with the Dharma." "I see no transgression." "Did you not break the rule of the Saṅgha? What is the rule of the Saṅgha?" The group of six explained the matter at length, and then the venerable Neyasena said this to the group of six: "Reverends, the Blessed One declared: 'Reverend, be that as it may, I grant to forest-dwelling monks the exemption from forest retreat, so that for a forest-dwelling monk there is no inappropriate time to go for the purpose of paying homage to the Tathāgata. A monk who is an alms-round practitioner, or a content-with-what-is-found alms-round practitioner, or one who does not eat after mealtime, or one who eats at a single sitting, or one who holds to the three robes, or one who dwells at the foot of a tree, or one who dwells in a charnel ground, or one who sits in the open air, or one who uses any seat as it comes, or one who lives without a roof — to such a monk who practises in accordance with his foundation I grant the exemption from that foundation, so that for a monk who practises in accordance with his foundation there is no inappropriate time to go for the purpose of paying homage to the Tathāgata."

Then those Śākyan monks who had gone forth thought: "In this way the Blessed One has censured great desire and praised having few desires — which means in effect that the Blessed One has censured us. So let us send our surplus bowls, robes, straining cloths, small bowls, and girdles to the venerable Ānanda and, with minds made pure, go to where the Blessed One is."

Then those monks, taking their surplus bowls, robes, straining cloths, small bowls, and girdles, went to where the venerable Ānanda was, and upon arriving they said this to the venerable Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda, out of compassion for us, please accept these — our surplus bowls, robes, straining cloths, small bowls, and girdles."

"Venerable ones, wait here until I have asked the Blessed One about this matter." Then the venerable Ānanda went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated at the Blessed One's feet with his head, and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Ānanda reported the matter in full to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, take them and pile them in a great assembly hall, and give them to whichever monk who is in need of such things."

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he collected the surplus bowls, robes, straining cloths, small bowls, and girdles from the Śākya monks who had gone forth, piled them in a great assembly hall, and placed them there.

Then those Śākya monks who had gone forth, abandoning their surplus bowls, robes, straining cloths, small bowls, and girdles — as one abandons sickness, as one abandons a festering wound, as one abandons a thorn — took up the three robes as their full kit, and with pure minds and with few possessions went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, they prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with their heads and took their places to one side.

The Blessed One, having fully understood the intention, the latent dispositions, the faculties, and the nature of those monks, then taught the Dharma in such a way that, while those five hundred young Śākya monks remained sitting right there in their seats, he shattered with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection — which had been accumulated since beginningless time — and caused the fruit of stream-entry to be directly realized.

Having seen the truth, they addressed him thus: "Venerable one, through relying on the Blessed One as our spiritual friend, what the Blessed One has done for us is something that our fathers did not do for us, our mothers did not do for us, kings did not do for us, the gods did not do for us, our ancestors of old did not do for us, ascetics and brahmins did not do for us, and the host of loving friends, dear companions, and relatives did not do for us. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, freed us from the mountains of bones, shut the door to the lower realms, opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, drawn our feet out of the hells, the animal realms, and the realms of hungry ghosts, placed us among gods and humans, brought cyclic existence to an end, and — shattering with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time — made the fruit of stream-entry directly realized."

Then the monks, having generated doubt, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, who cuts through all doubts: "Venerable one, how wondrous it is that the Blessed One, relying on the venerable Ānanda, arranged for those five hundred young Śākya monks to be established in the having of few desires and the abandonment of great desires, and then settled them in the utterly perfected accomplishment and bliss of nirvāṇa."

"Monks, now I — free from attachment, free from craving, free from clinging, omniscient, having mastery over all knowable things — how much more wondrous is it that, relying on the noble son Ānanda, I arranged for those five hundred young Śākya monks to be established in the having of few desires and the abandonment of great desires, and settled them in the utterly perfected accomplishment and bliss of nirvāṇa. For in the past I was possessed of attachment, possessed of aversion, possessed of delusion, possessed of craving, possessed of clinging — subject to birth, aging, sickness, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, mental unhappiness, and disturbances — and yet, not yet freed from disturbances, I brought about this: relying on the noble son Ānanda, I established these five hundred young Śākya monks, setting them free from great desires, settling them in having few desires, and placing them in the five higher knowledges. Now hear this.

Monks, in former times, in the past, in the city of Vārāṇasī there was a king named Brahmadatta. His kingdom was prosperous, flourishing, and happy; the years were good; it was filled with people and a great multitude; and he caused to be pacified the strife, fighting, quarreling, disputes, tumult, internal conflict, banditry, famine, and disease. He had his only son, dear to him as his own heart, govern the kingdom.

King Brahmadatta had a queen named Brahmavatī and a lotus pond also called Brahmavatī. King Brahmadatta had no son, and desiring a son he made prayers to the water deity, to those of ill form, to Śakra (Indra, king of the gods), to Brahmā, and to still other particular classes of deities — the deities of the pleasure grove, the deities of the forest, the deities of the crossroads, the deities of the triple juncture, the deities who accept torma offerings, the deities born together with one, those in accord with the Dharma, and the deities who always follow in one's train.

Now there is a saying in the world that sons and daughters are born as a result of the cause of making such prayers. But that is not so. If it were so, then each person would have a thousand sons — like a wheel-turning king (cakravartin). In fact, it is from the coming together of three conditions that entry into the mother's womb and dwelling therein occurs. What are those three? The parents are united and have come together; the mother's time has come and she has her monthly sign; and a gandharva (Skt. gandharva) is nearby and ready to enter. It is from the coming together of these three conditions that sons and daughters are born.

Now it happened that while this one was earnestly devoted to the making of prayers, a certain sentient being who had set the aspiration toward unsurpassed, perfectly complete awakening and whose resolve was firm passed away from the hells and entered into the womb of Queen Brahmavatī.

Among women versed in the ways of women, some possess five distinctive qualities. What are these five? They know when a man has come under the influence of desire and when he is free from desire. They know the time and know the monthly sign. They know when a being is dwelling in the womb. They know from what circumstance the entry into the womb has occurred. And they know whether it is a boy or a girl — for if it is a boy, it dwells leaning upon the right hip, and if it is a girl, it dwells leaning upon the left hip.

She, rejoicing and delighted, said to King Brahmadatta: "May the god be pleased. The being that has entered me is certainly going to be a boy, for it is dwelling leaning upon my right hip."

King Brahmadatta too was filled with joy and delight, and he spoke thus: "Ah! Now after so long I see the face of the son I have longed for. He will be born in accord with me and not discordantly. He will perform my deeds. As I have nurtured him, so he will in turn nurture me. He will enjoy his inheritance. He will cause my lineage to continue for a long time. And after we have died and passed on, whether little or much, let us give gifts and make merit, and may this pair, wherever they are born, go there together and follow one after the other" — so he uttered and uttered again a solemn declaration, naming the merit-dedications by name.

Now, knowing that a being had entered, in order to bring the embryo dwelling in the womb to full maturation, she arranged within the upper apartments — when it was cold, the implements appropriate for cold, and when it was warm, the implements appropriate for warmth — along with foods prepared under medical supervision that were not too bitter, not too sour, not too salty, not too sweet, not too hot, not too pungent, and free of bitterness, sourness, saltiness, sweetness, heat, and pungency; and she had her attended in every comfort, adorned with necklaces and ornaments upon her body, moving about as though in the pleasure grove of the daughters of the gods, not descending from one couch to another couch, nor from one small seat to another small seat, nor to any lower floor, so that she would hear not even the slightest unpleasant sound, and so that she would remain entirely without harm.

Then at another time, a wish of this kind arose in Queen Brahmavati: "Oh, may gifts be given and merit be made at the eastern gate of the city of the gods! And may the same be done at the southern gate, the western gate, the northern gate, and the four crossroads at the center — may gifts be given, merit be made, and may all prisoners be freed!" Thereupon King Brahmadatta, upon hearing that such a wish had arisen in Queen Brahmavatī, gave gifts and made merit at the eastern gate of the city. Likewise at the southern gate, the western gate, the northern gate, and the four crossroads at the center, he gave gifts, made merit, and freed all the prisoners.

Again a wish of this kind arose in Queen Brahmavatī: "Oh, may I, together with the gods, go out to sport, rejoice, and make merry in pleasure groves and in the forests of austerities!" Thereupon King Brahmadatta, upon hearing that such a wish of this kind had arisen in Queen Brahmavatī, entered together with Queen Brahmavatī into the pleasure groves and the forests of austerities, and they sported, rejoiced, and made merry.

Again a wish of this kind arose in Queen Brahmavatī: "Oh, may I board a boat together with the gods and enter the water, and sport, rejoice, and make merry in the lovely pond!" Thereupon King Brahmadatta, upon hearing that such a wish of this kind had arisen in Queen Brahmavatī, boarded together with Queen Brahmavatī a boat filled with blue lotus flowers, red lotuses, white night-blooming lotuses, and white day-blooming lotuses, and they entered the water and sported, rejoiced, and made merry in the lovely pond.

And right there in that very boat she gave birth, and a boy was born who remembered his former lives, handsome, beautiful to behold, fair, radiant, of a golden complexion, possessed of a head like a parasol, with long arms, wide forehead, arched brows, and a high-bridged nose. His kinsmen gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — three times seven — a grand birth-celebration was held, and they proceeded to give the boy a name, asking what he should be called. They thought to themselves: "Because this boy was born inside the water, let his name be Jātassara — Born-of-Water." And so his name was given as Jātassara — Born-of-Water.

The young Jātassara was entrusted to eight nurses: two nurses to hold him in their laps and raise him, two to give him suck, two to bathe and cleanse him, and two to play with him and keep him company. These eight nurses nourished and raised him with milk, yogurt, clarified butter, the essence of butter, and other finest provisions of every kind, and caused him to grow swiftly, like a lotus dwelling in a pond.

Then the young Jātassara reflected: "From where did I die and transmigrate to be born here?"

He understood that he had died and transmigrated from the hell realms and been born here. He then wondered: "What action was it that caused those beings to be born in the hells?" He understood that it was because they had been installed in the exercise of royal power as regents for sixty years that they had been born there. He then reflected: "Where have I now been born?" He understood that he had been born among human beings, in the royal lineage. And so he thought to himself: "If I too am installed in the exercise of royal power, that will lead me to be born in the hells — which would be terrible. I should devise some stratagem." And so he presented himself as though he were a fool and sat in that manner.

On the very day that the young Jātassara — Born-of-Water — was born, the sons of five hundred ministers were also born, and each of them was given a name fitting his family lineage. The practice of those ministers was to come every day, just as they went to King Brahmadatta, so too to the young Jātassara. Then in time, those five hundred young men came to be capable of jumping and running. King Brahmadatta then thought: "Even if my son Jātassara had not become a fool, he would by now be capable of just such jumping and running. Yet since this one of mine is a fool, I should at least establish sovereign authority over the kingdom in him for the sake of name and lineage." Then the young Jātassara heard this and thought to himself: "This king will harm me without compunction. I should present myself as mute and sit in that manner." And so he deliberately presented himself as mute and sat thus.

Then in time those five hundred young men came to be capable of speech. King Brahmadatta thought: "Even if my young Jātassara had not become mute, he too would by now be capable of just such speech." At that time the name Jātassara — Born-of-Water — fell into disuse, and the name Young-Mute-Fool, Young-Mute-Fool took hold.

Then at another time King Brahmadatta sat resting his cheek upon his hand, deeply absorbed in thought. The ministers said: "Sire, why do you sit with your cheek resting in your hand, lost in thought?" The king said: "I am lord over a kingdom such as this, yet I have neither son nor daughter. When I am gone the royal line will be cut off. And the one son I do have has become a mute fool. How can I not sit here lost in thought?" The ministers summoned physicians, and having examined him the physicians said: "Sire, this young man's faculties appear clear. There seems to be not the slightest indication of madness. It seems right to put him to the test."

King Brahmadatta summoned executioners and gave them this secret command: "I am banishing this Young-Mute-Fool in plain sight of the common people. You are not to kill him." "As the god king commands." King Brahmadatta then went into his retinue and gave the executioners this order: "I am banishing this young man; take him away." "As the god king commands." With that, the executioners, following King Brahmadatta's instructions, placed the Young-Mute-Fool upon a chariot and led him out from the city of Vārāṇasī.

Then the Young-Mute-Fool, seeing the prosperity and abundance of the city of Vārāṇasī, spoke these words: "Is this Vārāṇasī empty, or is it inhabited?"

The executioners then presented the Young-Mute-Fool to the king, saying: "Your divine majesty, the Young-Mute-Fool spoke words such as these." Thereupon King Brahmadatta took the Young-Mute-Fool upon his lap and spoke these words: "Young man, whom shall I have killed? Whom shall I have put to death? Whom shall I have deprived of life? To whom shall I give what?" Though he spoke these words, the Young-Mute-Fool said nothing at all. King Brahmadatta then said again to the executioners: "I am releasing this young man; take him away." The executioners replied, "As the god king commands," and once again placed the Young-Mute-Fool upon a chariot and led him out from the city of Vārāṇasī.

As they went, the Young-Mute-Fool saw four men carrying a corpse and said: "Is this corpse the body of one who has died, or the body of one still living?" The executioners again presented the Young-Mute-Fool to the king, saying: "Your divine majesty, the young man spoke words such as these." King Brahmadatta again took the Young-Mute-Fool upon his lap and said: "Young man, whom shall I have killed? Whom shall I have put to death? Whom shall I have deprived of life? To whom shall I give what?" Though he spoke these words, the Young-Mute-Fool said nothing at all. King Brahmadatta then said again to the executioners: "I am releasing this young man; take him away." The executioners replied, "As the god king commands," and once again placed the Young-Mute-Fool upon a chariot and led him out from the city of Vārāṇasī.

As they went, the Young-Mute-Fool saw a great heap of grain and said: "If this heap of grain were not eaten from its base at the very start, it would grow great." The executioners again presented the Young-Mute-Fool to the king, saying: "Your divine majesty, the young man spoke words such as these." King Brahmadatta again took the Young-Mute-Fool upon his lap and said: "Young man, whom shall I have killed? Whom shall I have put to death? Whom shall I have deprived of life? To whom shall I give what?" Though he spoke these words, the Young-Mute-Fool said nothing at all.

King Brahmadatta then said again to the executioners: "I am releasing this young man. Wise ones, go now and take the young man quickly into the forest and bury him in the ground there." The executioners replied, "As the god king commands," and once again placed the Young-Mute-Fool upon a chariot, went to a place in the forest, arrived there, and began to dig a pit.

Then at that moment the Mute-Fool spoke these verses:

You who steer the chariot, why do you
Dig a pit with mattock and with spade?
Why is it that you dig this pit?
Tell me quickly when I ask.

The charioteer answered:

The king's own son who does not speak —
The Mute-Fool born — for him the order came:
Bury this one quickly
Here within the forest in a pit.

Then the Young-Mute-Fool thought to himself: "These men are violent, red-handed, given to tormenting and to inflicting great torment, cutting short the lives of others, making their living by taking the lives of others. It may come to pass that they will kill me." Recognizing this and feeling frightened, he said to the executioners: "If the gods would grant me one boon, I would enter the city on my own feet and speak."

The executioners went before the king and reported this in full. The king said: "Young man, if you desire the kingdom, I shall grant even that to you."

Thereupon King Brahmadatta, filled with joy and delight, said to his ministers: "Wise ones, today quickly clear all the streets of every city of stones, gravel, and thorns, and burn incense, strew perfumed powder, raise victory banners and pennants, and scatter flowers of every kind." For kings accomplish things through the spoken word, and gods through the power of mind, while yogins accomplish everything through the mere arising of intention — and so the ministers, hearing from the king and seeking to fulfill his command as one fulfills a divine command, cleared all the cities of stones, gravel, and thorns, burned incense, strewn perfumed powder, raised victory banners and pennants, and scattered flowers of every kind. Many hundreds of thousands of people from throughout the realm, filled with amazement, gathered together to watch the mute youth with the withered limb enter the city and speak words.

Vinayavibhaṅga, the twenty-ninth fascicle.

Then the mute youth with the withered limb entered the city, went to where King Brahmadatta was, approached him, and touched his two feet. At that moment he spoke these verses:

I am not mute, nor am I lame,
nor am I simple-minded, nor without intelligence.
With words that make things plain and clear
I speak, O lord of men.
I am not mute, nor am I lame,
nor am I simple-minded, nor without intelligence.
With faculties intact, bright and clear,
so am I endowed, O lord of men.

The king said: "Son, why did you neither speak nor walk on your feet? Live, for that one's sake. In my former lives, for sixty years I ruled as regent over men within the kingdom, acting in harmony with my lineage; for sixty thousand years I burned in the hells as a sentient being. Recalling the unbearable, fierce, and terrible suffering of the hells, I do not desire a kingdom, and I will not go to the hells again. Father, I pray you give your permission for me to go forth into renunciation."

The king said: "Son, the ascetics (ṛṣis) who torment themselves with austerities, who perform fire sacrifices and burnt offerings — they do so for the sake of a kingdom. Why would you abandon what lies in the palm of your hand and go forth into renunciation?"

Then the mute youth with the withered limb spoke these verses:

I do not desire the enjoyment of sensual pleasures won through enmity, conflict, and strife.
I will practice the holy life,
that life made fearful by enmity, conflict, and strife.
I do not desire the enjoyment of sensual pleasures that resemble the fruit of the kimpā tree.
I will practice the holy life

whose fruit yields the taste of nectar.

The king said: "Every pleasure that one can possibly experience is found in kingship itself. Why would you abandon the kingdom and go forth into renunciation?"

Then the mute youth with the withered limb spoke these verses:

From that which produces suffering,
I do not count pleasure as pleasure.
From that which produces happiness,
I count that suffering as happiness.
Father, grant me leave to go to the forest of austerities.

The king said: "Son, here you may lie in perfect safety on the upper terrace, amid incense burning and perfumed powder strewn, with flowers of every kind scattered about, and soft, fine bedding well arranged; you will be woken by the sweet sounds of melodious music; you will wear soft garments and eat and drink the finest foods and drinks. Whereas if you go forth in a wilderness, you will always lie beneath trees on beds of grass or leaves, with a mind seized by fear and dread, sleeping alongside savage wild beasts, woken by the cries of jackals, wearing pieces of bark and tree-skin, eating roots and fruits, and drinking only warm, muddy water — why would you abandon a royal kingdom and go forth?" Then the young prince spoke these verses in reply:

To dwell in the forest, clad in bark and grass, subsisting on roots and fruits, dwelling together with fierce wild beasts —
this is the highest good.
For the wise, fearing the world beyond, do not commit killing, binding, and beating for the sake of a kingdom — and so that way is not for me.
Therefore, Father, please grant me leave to go to the forest of austerity.

The king said: "Son, it is no fault. But first resolve these three doubts of mine, and after that your going forth will not be difficult. When you saw the city of Vārāṇasī in its prosperity and abundance and said, 'Is this Vārāṇasī empty, or is it inhabited?' — from what thought did you speak so? O God, let it live! When a god commands, 'Let it be compressed until it has no entrails,' and yet no one speaks a righteous word asking why this young one should be destroyed — it was from reflecting on that that I spoke."

"Son, it is no fault. When you saw a human corpse being carried by four men and said, 'Is this body the body of one who has died, or the body of one still living?' — from what thought did you speak so? O God, let it live! The body of one who has done wrong action is a dead body, and the body of one who has done good action is a living body — it was from reflecting on that that I spoke."

"Son, it is no fault. When you saw a great heap of grain and said, 'If this heap of grain were sought from the very beginning without being consumed at the base, it would grow large' — from what thought did you speak so? O God, let it live! Those farmers who borrow grain as a loan, who seek it and work, at harvest time offer great heaps of grain to those who lent it, and so those lenders have indeed been seeking repayment from the very beginning. In the same way, when one obtains human existence through the path of the ten virtuous actions, if having obtained it one does not continue to accumulate virtue through the path of virtuous action, then those prior roots of virtue will be cut off; and when the roots of virtue are cut off, one falls away entirely from the happy destinies and comes to rely upon the lower realms — it was from reflecting on that that I spoke."

Then the king, having heard his son's words, took him up with eyes full of tears and spoke: "Keep and bear this discipline as your own practice of the Dharma. I too declare myself your student." Then King Brahmadatta spoke to his ministers: "Wise ones, if the young prince had not gone forth, what would he have become?" "O God, he would have become king." "And what would your sons have become?" "O God, they would have become his servants." "Then why do your own sons not go forth, since he is doing so?" "O God, as your majesty commands, so shall it be done."

At that time, not far from the city of Vārāṇasī, there dwelt in a hermitage a sage endowed with loving-kindness, possessed of compassion, full of affection, one who loved all sentient beings. The young prince, accompanied by a retinue of five hundred, went forth to that sage with great abundance. The sage gave teachings and instructions to the prince, and the prince, through striving, effort, and application, directly realized the five superknowledges (abhijñā).

Then, at another time, the sage passed away in the natural course of things. The young prince Lūgphye cremated the body of that sage upon a pyre of various fragrant woods and performed great offerings and acts of veneration. The young prince Lūgphye then began to care for and provide for all five hundred brahmin youths. The name "young prince Lūgphye" faded from use, and the name "Teacher Lūgphye, Teacher Lūgphye" came to be established.

Then, at another time, the Teacher Lūgphye thought to himself: "Why is it that these five hundred brahmin youths do not directly realize the five superknowledges?" And he reflected: "It is because they remain devoted to and absorbed in the pursuit of grass, bark, sticks, balls, pouring-ladles, filling-ladles as secondary matters, and in the use of leafy greens, wild grains, and the roots of the utpala lotus." Then the Teacher Lūgphye thought: "If I were to rebuke these brahmin youths openly, it would be difficult to accomplish." Since bodhisattvas are supremely skilled in taming those who are to be trained, the Teacher Lūgphye said to the brahmin youths: "Brahmin youths, during these three months of the rains retreat, if any one of you wishes to remain properly settled within, you may come to me only to deliver roots and fruits, a single portion, and for the ceremony of restoration on the fifteenth day of this very period — no one is to approach for any other reason. And among you brahmin youths, during the rains months, no brahmin youth shall go to the teacher except to deliver roots and fruits, a single portion, and for the restoration ceremony on the fifteenth day of this same period." They then established it as a rule: "During the rains months, any brahmin youth among us who goes to the teacher other than to deliver roots and fruits, a single portion, and for the restoration ceremony on the fifteenth day of this same period shall be made to incur a downfall-producing transgression."

When the Teacher Lūgphye had entered into the three-month period of proper settledness, during that time no brahmin youth came near him except to deliver roots and fruits, a single portion, and for the restoration ceremony on the fifteenth day of that same period.

The Teacher Lūgphye, from a considerable distance, caught sight of a deer. Having seen it, he spoke these words: "Deer, come here. Deer, it is good that you have come. You and I are alike — you are content and fully contented with food that fills the belly, and I too am content and fully contented with alms that fill the belly. Those here who remain devoted to and absorbed in the pursuit of leafy greens, wild grains, and the roots of the utpala lotus are not like that."

Then the brahmin youths thought to themselves: "Without a break, our teacher's vow of discipline has become complete — it seems he is now speaking of going about together with deer." Realizing this, they went to where the Teacher Lūgphye was, and having arrived, they prostrated at the two feet of the Teacher Lūgphye and stood to one side.

Then the Teacher Lūgphye sat in silence, saying nothing. Then the brahmin youths thought: "Our teacher speaks of going about with animals, but does not do so with humans — surely the vow is unbroken," and they rose from their seats and departed.

Then one who observed the deer-vow came to where the Teacher Lūgphye was, and the Teacher Lūgphye saw that observer of the deer-vow from a great distance. Having seen him, he said: "Come here, observer of the deer-vow! It is good that you have come. You and I are alike: you carry a single water-vessel, and I too carry a single water-vessel. You carry a single strip of bark, a single staff, a single ball of dung, a single ladle, and a single cup, and I too carry a single strip of bark, a single staff, a single ball of dung, a single ladle, and a single cup. You are contented and content in every way with alms just sufficient to fill the belly, and I too am contented and content in every way with alms just sufficient to fill the belly. Here, some carry an excess of water-vessels, strips of bark, staffs, balls of dung, ladles, and cups — but not so with us."

Then the brahmin youths thought to themselves: "Our teacher is reproaching great desire and praising fewness of desire — but in substance our teacher is reproaching us. Let us therefore throw our own excess water-vessels, strips of bark, staffs, balls of dung, ladles, and cups into the swift-flowing river, and go to where the Teacher is." And so they threw their excess water-vessels, strips of bark, staffs, balls of dung, ladles, and cups into the swift-flowing river, and went to where the Teacher Lūgphye was, approaching in a manner that showed purity of conduct and restraint of possessions. Having arrived, they bowed their heads to the two feet of the Teacher Lūgphye and stood to one side.

Then the Teacher Lūgphye, having fully understood the intention, the underlying disposition, the temperament, and the character of those brahmin youths, taught the Dharma to them in such a way that those five hundred brahmin youths directly realized the five superknowledges (abhijñā).

Monks, whoever was the Teacher Lūgphye at that time and in that moment — that was I, entering into the conduct of a bodhisattva. Those who were the five hundred brahmin youths at that time and in that moment — they are these five hundred young Śākyas now. He who was the observer of the deer-vow at that time and in that moment is the monk Nyede. And at that time too, through the monk Nyede — son of good family — I led those five hundred young Śākyas away from great desire, established them in fewness of desire, and set them in the five superknowledges. And now too, through the monk Nyede — son of good family — I have led these five hundred young Śākyas away from great desire, established them in fewness of desire, and placed them in the utterly final accomplishment and happiness of nirvāṇa.

Monks, thus it is: the karmic maturation of actions that are uniformly dark is uniformly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are uniformly bright is uniformly bright; and the karmic maturation of mixed actions is mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are uniformly dark and mixed, and strive after actions that are uniformly bright. Monks, this is how you should train.

This concludes the fourth section, the abandonment of involvement in deceit.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the Blessed One had not yet prohibited the nuns from dwelling in solitary places, the nuns likewise went to dwell in solitary abodes, and through meditative concentration, liberations (vimokṣa), meditative absorption, and meditative attainment, they experienced states of bliss. Then the nun Utpalavārṇā, together with five hundred attendants, went to that dark forest and arrived there, and leaning against a tree, she sat down in the half cross-legged posture and experienced states of bliss arising from meditative concentration, liberations, meditative absorption, and meditative attainment.

When the other nuns wished to enter Śrāvastī to beg for alms, they said, "Noble Utpalavārṇā, please arise." Some said, "Noble Utpalavārṇā is one of great power and great miraculous ability; she will find her own way to the almshouse first," and saying this, they went on without rousing her. Utpalavārṇā, for her part, arose at the time of the alms round, and seeing that all the nuns had already gone, she thought, "Shall I go now, or shall I simply remain here?" and decided to remain there, and entered meditative absorption on cessation right where she was.

About five hundred rogues, having done their work, arrived in the dark forest, and among themselves they said, "Let two hundred and fifty of us divide up the shares, and two hundred and fifty of us scatter through the forest." So two hundred and fifty of them began to divide the shares, and two hundred and fifty began to scatter through the forest, and in so doing they caught sight of Utpalavārṇā sitting there. Some among them said, "Wise ones, this is a stump." Others said, "No, it is a person." Still others said, "It is a monk." Then one among them who was familiar with the monastic community said, "This is a nun, not a monk. How can one tell? Monks sit in the full cross-legged posture, while nuns sit in the half cross-legged posture." They were struck with wonder, and said, "Wise ones, just look — a single nun has agreed to remain here alone in the night, in such a fearsome forest." They went before their commander, and the commander asked them, "Wise ones, have you seen anything remarkable in this dark forest? It seems a single nun has agreed to remain here alone in the night, in such a fearsome forest. Go and see to it." They went before her, and the commander saw the nun Utpalavārṇā, beautiful of form, lovely to behold, radiant and fair. Having seen her, he was moved to admiration, and from that admiration he said, "Ah, this nun is remarkable on two counts: that she sits through the night like the moon, and that she is beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and radiant and fair." He then began to rouse her, but his men said, "Why are you rousing her? Rather, offer her food." One among them who knew the ways of the monastic community said, "She does not eat at an improper time." The commander said, "Why not?" He replied, "She has given up eating at an improper time." The commander said, "Ah, this nun is remarkable on two counts: that she is beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and radiant and fair, and that she has given up eating at an improper time." Then someone said, "Let her be given wine to drink." The one who knew the ways of the monastic community said, "She has given up intoxicating drink." The commander said, "Ah, this nun is remarkable on two counts: that she is beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and radiant and fair, and that she has given up intoxicating drink." Then someone said,

"I was unable to fulfill my vow at a merit-field such as this by means of alms-begging alone." With that, he offered up one piece worthy of a great cloth and a portion of his alms-food, hung them on the branch of a tree, and said: "Noble one, since there is nothing whatsoever that you do not know, do not see, do not understand, and do not perceive regarding yourself, I offer you these alms-food and this robe," and then he departed.

Utpalavārnā rose early the next morning and, seeing the many tracks left by a large number of people, she reflected on what had happened. Then, seeing that five hundred thieves had come nearby, she wondered whether any one of them had done something improper to her — and she saw that not one of them had. She then saw the great cloth and the alms-food hanging on the branch of a tree, and she thought: "This has been placed here out of devotion by those who have become faithful." Then she thought: "Should I remain here accepting what has been left? It would be eaten up and consumed by monkeys. I am the one who receives the first portion of alms on behalf of the Saṅgha. Now, in such matters, whatever is unsuitable for monks is suitable for nuns, and whatever is unsuitable for nuns is suitable for monks. Therefore I myself shall carry this and go to the Jeta Grove to offer the first portion of alms to the Saṅgha." Having so resolved, she took it and set off for the Jeta Grove.

It was the custom of the Group of Six that at least one of the Group of Six would always be stationed at the gate of the Jeta Grove, leaving no gate unguarded. Ānanda was walking back and forth and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove when he saw Utpalavārnā and said: "Sister, why have you come through the gates of Śrāvastī so early in the morning?" She replied: "I was not in Śrāvastī. Last night I accepted a dwelling in a dark forest." Ānanda said: "If even Ānanda were to enter a dark forest in the daytime, his hair would stand on end. Sister, what is it that you are carrying?" She replied: "About five hundred robbers had gathered there, and out of devotion those faithful ones made an offering to me out of their faith. Sister, you are one who ought to inspire faith even in robbers. But if those companions had caught sight of you, they would have beaten you with many whips and dragged you away as their captive. Now, whoever possesses a great cloth such as this — even with only a little goodness of heart she will strive toward virtue, just as a patched and layered garment is fashioned from fine cloth. Noble one, do you wish to take this great cloth?" "As the residue of a divine dwelling," she said. "Noble one, wait here until I have offered the first portion of the alms-food to the Saṅgha and returned, and after that I will offer you the great cloth." Ānanda thought: "Whoever holds a black begging bowl will be tempted by this and will desire it." And he said: "Sister, bring those who are receiving the first portion of alms-food and come back; until then, stay right here." Ānanda entered the Jeta Grove and, seeing the monks who were receiving the first portion of the alms-food sitting in a huddled little group, he said: "Venerable ones, the donors are weary and burdened under their loads, and yet you sit here huddled together in a small group. Come here! Receive the first portion of alms-food." They took their bowls and came forward. Utpalavārṇā offered them the first portion of the alms-food, then shook out the great cloth and offered it to Ānanda. Ānanda said: "May this act of generosity of yours become the adornment of the mind, the provision of the mind, the accumulation of yogic practice, the highest benefit, and the obtaining of robes for gods and humans." Utpalavārṇā thought to herself:

"I shall go to the summer dwelling and, whatever may happen, I will go to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One." And so Utpalavārṇā went to where the Blessed One was, approached, bowed her head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat down to one side.

At that time Utpalavārṇā's five robes of Dharma had become worn, tattered, and threadbare. There the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, have the nuns obtained their rains-retreat robes?" "Venerable one, they have." "Then why have the five robes of Dharma of the nun Utpalavārṇā become worn, tattered, and threadbare?" "Venerable one, this sister is faithful, good, and possessed of virtuous intention. There is nothing she has not offered or fully given away to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to monks she found pleasing. Even today she obtained a great length of cloth and gave it as well to the venerable Ānanda."

"Ānanda, do monks accept surplus robes from nuns who are not their relatives?" "Venerable one, they do." "Ānanda, do monks, when accepting from nuns who are not their relatives, think to themselves, 'Are this one's five robes complete or not?' No — they simply take whatever comes to hand, whereas from a relative they would not accept even what is given."

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Give the nun Utpalavārṇā five robes of Dharma from the great monastery." And the venerable Ānanda gave the nun Utpalavārṇā five robes of Dharma from the great monastery.

Then, on account of this occurrence, this case, and this occasion, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks, and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this as the basis of Vinaya training: 'Whatever monk accepts robes from a nun who is not his relative commits an offense requiring expiation.'" Thus did the Blessed One establish this as the basis of Vinaya training for his hearers.

The Blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had taken a wife from his own social class. He played with her, rejoiced with her, and lived in delight together with her. Thinking to himself, "Though my household is rich with many possessions, I have not gathered even the slightest provision for the journey to the world beyond," he rested his chin upon his hand and sat sunk in thought. His wife, seeing this, said: "My lord's son, why do you sit with your chin resting in your hand, lost in thought?" He replied: "My dear, though our household is rich with many possessions, I have not gathered even the slightest provision for the journey to the world beyond. If I were to feed the Buddha and the monastic Saṅgha of monks with a meal and present each one with a piece of fine robe-cloth, that would carry provision for me on the journey to the world beyond." His wife replied: "My lord's son, let it be so." And so that householder went to where the Blessed One was, approached, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the Blessed One fully instructed that householder with Dharma-endowed words, fully inspired him to embrace the Dharma, fully praised him, and fully gladdened him. With many categories of Dharma-endowed words he fully instructed, fully inspired, fully praised, and fully gladdened him, and then was silent.

Then that householder rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, turned toward the Blessed One and joined his palms in reverence, and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Blessed One, would it be permitted for us to offer a noonday meal tomorrow to the Saṅgha of monks together with the Blessed One at our home?" The Blessed One gave his consent by remaining silent, saying nothing.

Then that householder, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, rejoiced and delighted in the Blessed One's words. He bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

That very night the householder prepared pure and excellent food and drink, rose early in the morning, spread out the seats, and set out water vessels. Then he sent an invitation to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, the hour of the midday meal has arrived. May the Blessed One now be pleased to know that the time has come." And so the Blessed One was invited for the noon meal.

Then the Blessed One, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and set out for the dwelling of that householder, surrounded by the assembly of monks and with the Saṅgha of monks going before him. He arrived and took his seat on the seat that had been prepared, at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Then that householder, knowing that the Buddha and all the Saṅgha of monks were comfortably seated, satisfied and sustained them with his own hands with pure and excellent food and drink. Having satisfied and sustained them with many kinds of pure and excellent food and drink from his own hands, he then offered to each member of the Saṅgha of monks — the Buddha and all the rest — a single piece of fine woven cotton cloth.

After that the householder took a low seat and sat down in the presence of the Blessed One to hear the Dharma. Then the Blessed One fully instructed that householder with Dharma-endowed words, fully inspired him to embrace the Dharma, fully praised him, and fully gladdened him. With many categories of Dharma-endowed words he fully instructed, fully inspired, fully praised, and fully gladdened him, and then rose from his seat and departed.

That householder then followed behind the Blessed One just a short distance, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet, circumambulated the Blessed One three times, and turned back from the presence of the Blessed One. He went toward his own home, and when he had arrived and was on the ground floor beneath the upper chambers, he reflected on the joy of giving and spoke to his wife: "Good woman, let us carry much provision for the journey to the world beyond, and let us rejoice and delight in this." His wife replied: "My lord's son, if you are carrying provision for the journey to the world beyond, I would not withhold my part. But good woman, are not our possessions held in common between us two? My lord's son, it is just so — our possessions are indeed common to us both. Yet for my part, I would also like to invite the Saṅgha of nuns with the great Mistress of Beings (Skt. prajāpatī), Gautamī, at their head, offer them a meal, and present them with robes befitting such great ones. If I do that, then I too will have carried some provision for the journey to the world beyond." The householder said: "Good woman, does giving earlier prevent one from giving later? Do it just the same way." Then the wife of that householder went to where the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī was, arrived, bowed her head to the two feet of the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī, and sat down to one side.

Having sat down to one side, the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī then properly taught the householder's wife with Dharma-filled words, properly had her take them to heart, properly praised her, and properly gladdened her. Having properly taught, had her take to heart, praised, and gladdened her with Dharma-filled words through many categories, she said nothing more. Then the householder's wife rose from her seat, turned toward the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī, joined her palms in reverence and bowed, and then said the following to the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī: "Noble lady, would it please you to accept a midday meal together with the Saṅgha of nuns tomorrow?" The great Mistress of Beings Gautamī accepted the householder's wife's invitation by remaining silent. Then, understanding from the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī's silence that her invitation had been accepted, the householder's wife rejoiced and expressed her delight at what the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī had said, bowed her head to the two feet of the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī, and departed from the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī's presence.

Then, that very night, the householder's wife prepared pure and choice food and drink, rose early the next morning, arranged seats and set out water, and called out in the morning: "Noble lady, the time is prepared for the midday meal; may the noble lady now be pleased to know that the hour has come." Then the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī, in the early morning, put on her lower robe, took up her bowl and Dharma robe, and, surrounded by the assembly of nuns with the Saṅgha of nuns going before her, went to the dwelling of the householder's wife and, having arrived, took her seat at the head of the Saṅgha of nuns. Then, once the householder's wife perceived that the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī and the rest of the Saṅgha of nuns were comfortably seated, she satisfied and served them with pure and choice food and drink with her own hands. Having satisfied and served them repeatedly with pure and choice food and drink through many rounds with her own hands, she then opened the bundles of robes befitting great ones, took up those robes befitting great ones, and sat down to one side at the edge of the elder's seat.

Then the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī thought to herself: "The Blessed One has prohibited nuns from accepting robes befitting great ones. If we were to accept them now, it would disturb the foundation of the training. But if we do not accept them, it will become an obstacle to the householder's wife's accumulation of merit, and an obstacle to the gain of the Saṅgha of nuns." The nuns then thought: "Ah, if only the noble great Mistress of Beings Gautamī would accept the robes befitting great ones! If she accepts, the Blessed One will surely grant permission for the fitting occasion." Then the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī accepted the robes befitting great ones, expressed her gratitude to the householder's wife, rose from her seat, and departed. She went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One, and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī then reported the matter at length to the Blessed One. When she had spoken thus,

The Blessed One then spoke these words to the great Mistress of Beings Gautamī: "Gautamī, it is excellent, excellent, that you have understood what permission I have given. Therefore I hereby grant permission for the nuns to take the robes befitting great ones and to exchange them with the monks."

Then a group of twelve nuns took those robes, went to the group of the Six Monks, and said: "Noble ones, the Blessed One has forbidden the nuns from keeping robes befitting great ones. We have obtained these robes befitting great ones — please accept them and give us your inferior ones in return."

The Six Monks replied: "Sisters, we have no need of nuns' plain cloth robes. At that time too it was we who were foolish, confused, unclear, and unskilled, and we were the ones burdened with that affair — we will not take them."

Other nuns then went to the elders, the senior monks, and said: "Noble ones, the Blessed One has forbidden the nuns from keeping robes befitting great ones. We have obtained these robes befitting great ones — please accept them, and give us your inferior and lesser ones in return."

When those sisters said, "Please present this matter to the Blessed One," the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, exchange is excepted. And the exchange is this: one should exchange to whatever extent, or for as much as, will make the nun pleased."

Then the Blessed One uttered praise for one who is desirous of training, and spoke in praise of respect for training, of keeping equipment for training at hand, of the qualities of one who is disciplined, of subtlety, and of knowing the right measure of warmth. He then addressed the monks with words in harmony with that teaching, consonant with it, rich in its substance, and in accord with its Dharma. Having done so, the Blessed One spoke to the monks:

"Monks, what came before was a prohibition; this is now a permission. My disciples shall establish the following as a rule of training in the Vinaya: If any monk takes a robe from a nun who is not a blood relation — exchange excepted — he commits an offense requiring forfeiture."

Now, as to the phrase "any monk" — this refers to a companion monk or any other of that kind. The phrase "a nun" refers to one who belongs to this very Dharma. The phrase "who is not a blood relation" means that a relation through one's grandmother, grandfather, or up to the seventh degree of cousinship counts as a blood relation; beyond that, one is not a blood relation. The phrase "a robe" refers to whichever of the seven kinds of cloth: wool cloth, linen cloth, silk cloth, fine cotton cloth, coarse woolen cloth, cotton cloth, or hempen cloth. The phrase "takes" means taking it as one's own. The phrase "exchange excepted" means that an exchange has been set aside. The phrase "commits an offense requiring forfeiture" means that having forfeited the object, the transgression — a forfeiture offense — is to be confessed; that is why it is said to be "an offense requiring forfeiture."

As to how the offense arises: if a monk takes a robe from a nun who is not a blood relation while perceiving her as not a blood relation, he commits an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk takes a robe from a nun who is not a blood relation while being uncertain about her, he commits an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk takes a robe from a nun who is a blood relation while perceiving her as not a blood relation, he commits a wrongdoing. If a monk takes a robe from a nun who is a blood relation while being uncertain about her, he commits a wrongdoing.

There is no offense in offering a robe to the Saṅgha or in speaking well of it. There is no offense if one has undertaken full ordination and then abandoned it, or if one is utterly ruined. There is no offense in receiving by purchase, and there is no offense in exchange.

There is a nun of great fame and merit. She placed goods before a monk and said, "Noble one, I have such and such things. Please accept them out of compassion for me," and then she departed without looking back. In such a case there is no offense.

There is no offense for one who is a novice, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by painful sensations.

The fifth section, on the abandonment of taking, is complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha), the Bhagavān, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had taken a wife from his own social rank. He would play with her, delight in her, and take his pleasure in her company. One day he said to his wife, "Dear one, I must pack my things and travel to another region. For a time, young lady, take your delight and your joy and live happily as befits your youth. In your later years apply yourself to accumulating wealth. Dear one, for as long as the great elements of youth give one endurance of cold and heat, one should apply oneself to earning wealth; in old age one may live at ease and in comfort."

The wife thought, "What I am being urged to do is what I myself intend to do," and she said, "Very well, my lord, it shall be as you say."

The householder gave his wife a small provision of food, packed his belongings, and set off for another region.

The wife then thought, "My husband, while he is away in the cold, is being afflicted by cold; in the heat, tormented by heat; suffering from hunger and thirst; harassed by gadflies, mosquitoes, wind, sun, and venomous snakes. All the effort, the exertion, and the striving he undertakes to acquire wealth and goods — all of that is for my sake. That he should be away from me while doing so is not in keeping with what is right for me." With that thought she went to the market, purchased fine cotton wool, loaded it on a fine pack-frame, had a skilled weaver weave it into a fine pair of cotton cloths, then had those cloths treated with various perfumes and placed them in a fine cloth box, where she kept them.

As for the householder, having completed his business successfully, he made a profit and returned in good time. His wife bathed him and then presented him with that pair of cloths.

The householder thought, "All the mere provisions of food I left her would not have been enough to obtain a pair of cloths like this." He realized this and said to his wife, "Dear one, where did you get this pair of cloths? Please tell me, my lord's son." The householder put them on and asked again, "Dear one, where did you get this pair of cloths? Please explain fully." After eating his meal he asked again, "Dear one, where did you get this pair of cloths?"

At that point she explained the matter to him in full detail. The householder said, "Excellent, dear one! I have been earning wealth and you too have been so diligently preserving it. In no great time our wealth and possessions will grow, increase, and become abundant."

His wife replied, "My lord's son, I obtained this through great hardship. Do not give it to anyone."

Now the householder was a person of faith, a good person with a virtuous disposition. He went to the Jeta Grove to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One. As he was walking along the road he was seen by a wandering peddler of goods, who thought, "This householder is wearing a pair of cloths of such quality — he must be a man who comes by many fine things."

Now the habitual conduct of the Group of Six was that no one among them would ever leave the gate of the Jeta Grove unattended, and so a companion of theirs was walking and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove. He saw the householder and thought to himself, "This householder is wearing a pair of cloths of such quality — he must be a man who comes by many fine things. If I do not steal them from him, I shall not be worthy of the name 'Ānanda.'" So he said to him, "Welcome, householder! Welcome! You have been gone so long, so very long — where have you been wandering, like the moon?" He added, "Noble sir, I have just come back from another region after attending to some business. Householder, have you managed to acquire much wealth?" The householder replied, "Noble sir, just a little." He then said, "Householder, is not the pond turbid? One should understand by the indication of faith. From the fact that you are wearing such a fine pair of cloths, it is evident that you have acquired great wealth. Come here — let me teach you the Dharma."

Now this companion of the Group of Six had a habit of speaking: if he talked of moral discipline, the listeners would think, "We have been born among the gods." If he talked of generosity, the listeners would think, "We should cut off even our own flesh and give it away, again and again." But if he talked of the lower realms, the listeners would come to think, "We have been reborn in the lower realms."

The householder bowed at his two feet and sat down before him in order to hear the Dharma, and the companion of the Group of Six began to teach him Dharma. He spoke to him in such a way as to inspire faith in him, and having inspired faith, the householder said, "Noble sir, I offer you one of these well-made garments."

The companion said, "Good friend, excellent! May this act of giving bring you the ornament of the mind, the furnishing of the mind, the accumulation of yogic practice, the highest aim, and the garments of the gods."

He then said, "Good friend, the Blessed One himself has declared: 'Who knows what tomorrow may bring — even death? Act with resolve this very day. That great host, the lord of death, is no friend of yours.' Good friend, give me the very fine pair of cloths you are now wearing, and from them I shall fashion a patchwork robe stitched in layers, and from my youth onward I shall travel comfortably on the side of virtue."

The householder replied, "Noble sir, do you want them? They are just like the leavings of a divine dwelling." And he added, "Noble sir, it is not that I am unwilling to offer them to you — it is just that these were given to me by my wife."

The companion retorted, "Householder, if I inspire faith in you toward another, are you then entirely under the power of one woman?" And at that, using the opportunity of the moment, he seized the upper robe from him and twisted both his arms, turning his face.

The householder said to him, "Noble sir, what does this mean? Householder" — addressing himself — "there exists a basis for the merit arising from completely giving to you, but there is no basis for the merit arising from using it for oneself. Whenever one obtains something like this, it will be used to make a Dharma robe from it, so it will be used up serving as a Dharma robe. Noble sir, shall I then go naked?"

He replied, "Householder, what use is it for you to wear a garment? Moral discipline, good conduct, and proper behavior — these are sufficient clothing. Naked, those who have lost their sense of shame and their sense of conscience are unpleasant to behold when they go about naked. But for one like you, possessed of a sense of shame and conscience, what is unpleasant about going about naked? Householder, will you not wear a loin cloth?" The householder replied, "Noble sir, I would appreciate that." Then the companion said, "The habitual practice of householders is to wear a loin cloth, carry a wood-bundle, and go about like the backside of a cow. So you too should take a wood-bundle and go off like the backside of a cow."

The people would know that a cow had strayed and come out." And with that, the companion took for himself half the loin cloth that belonged to the householder at that inauspicious midnight hour. When the householder set out carrying a bundle of firewood, going along in the manner of the backside of a cow, a gatekeeper saw him and said, "Householder, just now I saw you wearing a pair of fine garments befitting a great man. Were those stolen by thieves?" "My friend, the thieves did not steal them. Rather, it was the venerable companion who stripped me of them by the law of the mouth." "Householder, it is the custom of the institution of Anāthapiṇḍada to rise early each morning and go with a retinue of five hundred to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and the elder monks. So, householder Anāthapiṇḍada, you rose early this morning and came out of Śrāvastī with a retinue of five hundred — why did you bring so many associates and yet take no precaution against being robbed?" "Oh noble one, are there bandits between the Jeta Grove and the road?" "Not on the road — the bandits are right there in the Jeta Grove itself." "Noble sir, you are like a black wool — since you came through this very gate, none among the Blessed One or the elder monks have made you white. As for me, I have taken upon my own head the dust from the feet of the Blessed One and the elder monks. Yet today, in broad daylight, you stripped a great householder of his fine pair of garments, then shamed the householder and sent him off in a short loin cloth." Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada thought to himself, "This is my own affair," and he went to the Jeta Grove. When the companion saw him, he said, "Householder, how are you?" The householder replied, "Whether well or not, so be it." "Householder, before, when you were lukewarm toward me, now you burn with fire alone?" "How could I not burn with fire? While others go forth into renunciation in order to abandon desire, the venerable companion has gone forth for the sole purpose of actively increasing desire. What have I done? You came to the Jeta Grove like a householder, and there you seized half the loin cloth by force at midnight and shamed the householder — do you not?" The companion replied, "That is what they say in the world: gods give, and hungry ghosts (pretas) take back. Well, did he hand you a round pill with a ringing sound? Householder, if you cannot bear it, let a rule of training be promulgated. Would I simply throw that away for nothing?" Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, bowed with his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Venerable sir, if these noble ones solicit clothing from those who are not the householder's close relatives or the householder's kinsmen present, then — O Blessed One — it would be fitting for you to institute some reminder for the noble ones so that noble ones do not solicit clothing from those who are not the householder's close relatives or the householder's kinsmen present." The Blessed One said nothing to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, and by his silence he consented. Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had consented, rose from his seat, bowed with his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and departed from the Blessed One's presence. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and on account of this ground for legislation,

"On this occasion, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks" — and so forth, as before. "The blessed buddhas, while knowing, act as though they do not know" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One asked Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you solicited clothing from someone who was not the householder's or the householder's wife's close relative?" "Venerable one, it is not so." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that what was unworthy of an ascetic, what was improper, what was unsuitable, what was unbecoming of one's conduct — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One spoke to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya thus: 'Whatever monk goes to a householder or to a householder's wife who is not a close relative and solicits clothing — that is an offence entailing relinquishment.'" In this way the Blessed One established that training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers.

The Vinaya Analysis, the thirtieth bundle.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Forty monks from the city of Vaiśālī, who were of like purpose, were travelling and journeying together through the countryside, when they were set upon by bandits. They thought to themselves: "The Blessed One has established the training rule that whatever monk goes to a householder or to a householder's wife who is not a close relative and solicits clothing commits an offence entailing relinquishment. We have no relatives here at all. If we go to Śrāvastī, our fellow practitioners of the holy life there will share clothing with us." So they said to one another: "Shall we travel in broad daylight? Let us rather travel by night under cover of darkness — hide in the bushes during the day and set out on the road at night." So they went to the Jeta Grove by night under cover of darkness. Some monks who were devoted to practice and did not sleep during the first or the last part of the night saw them and said: "You naked vagabonds — this is not your dwelling place, nor is it a temple. Where have you come from?" The venerable ones replied: "We are not naked wanderers." "Then who are you?" "We are monks." "Are there monks like this? What happened to you? Were you set upon by bandits?" "We are indeed the forty monks of Vaiśālī." "Welcome, welcome, venerable ones!" And some of those monks gave them patchwork robes, some gave upper robes, some gave lower robes, and some gave sweat cloths. Thereupon the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, except in the right time — and the right time is this: when a monk's clothing has been snatched away, or destroyed, or burned, or carried off by the wind, or carried off by water — in that case it is the right time." Then the Blessed One praised those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who devote themselves to the means of training. He then addressed the monks with talk that accorded with that, was of greater scope than that, and was in harmony with the Dharma of that. And then the Blessed One spoke to the monks: "Monks, therefore, what was formerly prescribed stands, this is permitted. And my śrāvakas shall observe this as a rule of training in the Vinaya in the following manner: Furthermore, should any monk go to a householder or to a householder's wife who is not a relative and beg for clothing — except in the right time — he commits an offense of abandonment. And the right time is this: when a monk's clothing has been snatched away, or destroyed, or burned, or carried off by the wind, or carried off by water — in that case it is the right time.

Now, "any monk" means a fully ordained monk or another of that kind. "Householder" means a man. "Householder's wife" means a woman. "Who is not a relative" — a grandmother or grandfather down to the seventh generation of cousins counts as a relative; beyond that is not a relative. "Goes to" means goes into the presence of. "Clothing" means any one of the seven kinds: woolen cloth, linen, silk, cotton cloth, coarse hemp cloth, jute cloth, or cloth of that which grows beneath the sun. "Begs" means makes a request. "Except in the right time" means outside of the appointed time. "Commits an offense of abandonment" means that, having relinquished that object, the transgression of abandonment is to be confessed.

Now, "the right time" as stated — "when a monk's clothing has been snatched away" — means this: the monk's clothing has been taken away by thieves or by deceitful persons. "Or destroyed" means this: the monk's clothing has been ruined or has gone to waste. "Or burned" means this: the monk's clothing has been burned by fire. "Or carried off by the wind" means this: the monk's clothing has been carried off by wind. "Or carried off by water" means this: the monk's clothing has been carried off by water.

Now, how does a transgression arise? It arises on the basis of value, of color, and of measure. How does it arise on the basis of value? If a monk begs for clothing worth five kārṣāpaṇas and receives clothing worth five kārṣāpaṇas, then the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment. In the same way, if he begs for clothing worth ten kārṣāpaṇas, fifteen kārṣāpaṇas, twenty kārṣāpaṇas, or up to fifty kārṣāpaṇas, and receives clothing worth fifty kārṣāpaṇas, then the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment. If a monk begs for clothing worth five kārṣāpaṇas and receives something of greater value, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the greater amount there is no transgression. In the same way, if he begs for clothing worth ten, fifteen, twenty, or up to fifty kārṣāpaṇas and receives something of greater value, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the greater amount there is no transgression. Such is transgression on the basis of value.

How does it arise on the basis of color? If a monk begs for blue clothing and receives blue clothing, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment. Just as with blue, so too if he begs for yellow, red, heavy cloth, or fine cloth, and receives the fine cloth, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment. If a monk begs for blue clothing and receives yellow — the act of begging for blue constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the yellow there is no transgression. Just as with begging for blue, so too if he begs for yellow, red, heavy cloth, or fine cloth, and in begging for fine cloth he receives heavy cloth — the act of begging for fine cloth constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the higher-quality item there is no transgression. Such is transgression on the basis of color.

How does it arise on the basis of size in cubits? If a monk begs for a five-cubit cloth and receives a five-cubit cloth, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment. Just as with five cubits, so too if he begs for cloth of ten cubits, fifteen cubits, twenty cubits, up to fifty cubits, and receives a fifty-cubit cloth, the act of begging constitutes a wrongdoing, and if he receives it, it becomes an offense of abandonment.

If a monk begs for a five-cubit cloth and receives something larger, the act of begging for the five-cubit cloth constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the larger amount there is no transgression. Just as with five cubits, so too if he begs for cloth of ten cubits, fifteen cubits, twenty cubits, up to fifty cubits — if in begging for the fifty-cubit cloth he receives something larger, the act of begging for the fifty-cubit cloth constitutes a wrongdoing, but in receiving the larger amount there is no transgression. Such is transgression on the basis of size in cubits.

If a monk does not beg for finished cloth but receives pieces of cut cloth, or if he begs for pieces of cut cloth but receives finished cloth, or if he does not beg for finished cloth but receives whole bolts of cloth, large or small — in all these cases there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression for one who acts for the first time, for one who is mentally deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one overcome by pain. The sixth offense of abandonment — that of begging — is hereby complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A thought arose in Ānanda's mind: "All of these laymen have been bound by the training rules established by the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, so that henceforth they cannot offer even the price of a needle from anywhere. Since the Blessed One has, in dependence upon the forty village-dwelling monks, relaxed certain training rules, I shall send those forty village-dwelling monks ahead and thereby secure provisions." With that intention he went to where the forty village-dwelling monks were, and he saw them there mending and patching their torn and worn-out robes. He said to them: "Venerable ones, I had heard and imagined otherwise — I had thought in my mind that you forty village-dwelling monks would be enjoying the pleasures of meditative concentration, liberation, meditative absorption, and states of meditative entry. I had not thought, venerable ones, that I would find you sitting here mending and patching worn and tattered robes."

The elder monks replied: "We have been undone by thieves, venerable one. Alas, how unfortunate! How very unfortunate!" Ānanda said: "Elder, for whose sake do you grieve? For ours? No — those who have taken without being given what belongs to you will be reborn in complete isolation and will die in complete isolation. It is for their sake that one should grieve."

Then Ānanda said to them: "Venerable ones, why do you not beg for robes? Is there any elder who, having abandoned the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, would think to give to us and do so? Venerable ones, were you not praised, honored, extolled, and highly commended by the Blessed One in various sūtra passages? Elder, we ourselves do not know from whom to beg. Venerable ones, why do you not entrust the task to some knowledgeable monk who can beg for robes on your behalf?"

What knowledgeable elder monk would ruin his own stock of virtue and beg robes on our behalf? Venerable ones, for the moment I myself have resources for even ten people, and furthermore, since each of us six is able to provide for ten, we six together have resources for sixty people. Moreover, if it would not trouble you, we will also beg small and large pieces of cloth on behalf of the young monks. Elder, what trouble is there to us in this? For the time being, let each one beg and obtain three robes apiece. Venerable ones, since we cannot both go on alms round and also beg for robes, let it be done this way: whenever one is invited outside for food, the robes shall be requested at that time."

With this, Ānanda washed his feet outside the monastery, entered inside, and sat down. He thought to himself: "What means could be found to clothe all of Śrāvastī?" Then he thought further: "First I shall go to the street of the poor, and after that to the street of the wealthy. After that I shall go to the palace of King Prasenajit of Kosala, to the household of Queen Kṣullodharā of royal lineage, to the household of Queen Mālagandha, to the household of the layman Anāthapiṇḍada, to the preceptor the sage Jina, to the households of the two elders, to the household of the laywoman Mṛgāramatā, and to the household of the laywoman Sujanā, wife of the householder."

At that time a householder invited the community of monks with the Buddha at their head to another house for a midday meal. Ānanda said to the young monks: "Venerable ones, if tasks are assigned to you, do not refuse but say to them, 'Our preceptors and teachers have a small matter to attend to.'"

The next morning Ānanda sent a young monk to the forty monks of the city to request them to come back, having collected the robes. When the young monk arrived there and saw that they were all in meditative absorption, he thought: "Who in the world, with a heart devoid of compassion, would rouse these ones from their meditative absorption?" He returned to Ānanda and said: "Teacher, those monks are in meditative absorption. No one is able to rouse them from that absorption."

Ānanda said: "Poor fellow, will you realize the exhaustion of defilements with such diligence?" And he said: "I will go myself." He went and struck the door-panel of the meditation hall with his fist. The entire meditation hall shook, and they arose from their absorption and said: "If the forty venerable monks are to beg three robes, should you not station yourselves in a smaller space in our hearts? Come, let us go. Elder Jesa, take your staff and go. Come now — let us go by this very road."

Then those noble ones and Ānanda said: "Venerable ones, we six of the group are like white crows, and so rather than standing in strict order of seniority, let the elders be interspersed at intervals among the others." They went to the street of the poor, turned to face outward, and stood. When the people there saw them they were moved with pity and said: "Noble ones, has no fault occurred? Fair ones, a fault has occurred. What has gone wrong? Have you heard that the forty monks of the city whom the Blessed One praised, honored, extolled, and highly commended in various sūtra passages —"

"Have you heard?" "We have heard. They were beaten by bandits." The people said: "Wise ones, take up bows and arrows! Take up spears and clubs! We will go and seize the bandits!" The group of six said: "It is long since they were beaten, and they have since robbed in other districts. So what shall be done? Give those monks some robes." The people then gave them both new and old robes. But the group of six found those robes too burdensome to carry, so they handed them to some young men and said: "Take these to the monastery right away." The young men carried the robes and set off for the monastery. Then the group of six went to the street of the wealthy, stood there with their bowls held out, and lingered. When the people there saw them they were moved with pity and said: "Noble ones, has no fault occurred?" "A fault has occurred." "What has gone wrong?" "Have you heard of the forty monks of the city whom the Blessed One praised, honored, extolled, and highly commended in various sūtra passages?" "We have heard. They were beaten by bandits." The people said: "Wise ones, take up bows and arrows! Take up spears and clubs! We will go and seize the bandits!" The group of six said: "It is long since they were beaten, and they have since robbed in other districts. So what shall be done? Give those monks some robes." The people then gave them robes befitting persons of high station. The group of six found those robes too burdensome to carry, so they handed them to some young men and said: "Take these to the monastery right away." The young men carried the robes and set off for the monastery. Then the group of six went to the palace of King Prasenajit (Skt.

Prasenajit), the king of Kosala, and stood there with their bowls held out. King Prasenajit of Kosala saw them and was moved with pity and said: "Noble ones, has no fault occurred?" "Your Majesty, a fault has occurred." "What has gone wrong?" "Your Majesty, have you heard of the forty monks of the city whom the Blessed One praised, honored, extolled, and highly commended in various sūtra passages?" "We have heard. They were beaten by bandits." The king said to his general Āryajāta: "Go quickly and seize the bandits and recover the stolen goods." The group of six said: "Your Majesty, those bandits struck long ago and have since robbed in other districts. So what shall be done?" "Your Majesty, give those monks some robes." The king gave each of the monks a set of thirteen requisites. The group of six found those robes too burdensome to carry, so they handed them to some young men and said: "Take these to the monastery right away." Those young men carried the robes and set off for the monastery. Then the forty monks of the city said: "Elders, that is enough — release us now." The group of six said: "Venerable ones, do not be so impatient. Did we not say to you from the very beginning: 'Venerable ones, if you will not harm us, we on our part will beg small strips of cloth and large strips of cloth for the sake of the young men'?" Since those monks were known to be of great influence, the group of six, daunted by their authority, said nothing more and stood in silence. Then the group of six went to the house of the queen of the kṣatriya lineage, Varṣatulā; to the house of the queen Mālikā; to the house of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada; to the house of the brahmin teacher Kṛtajña; to the house of the two elders; to the house of the lay woman Mṛgāramatā, Migāra's mother; and to the house of the laywoman Sujanā, wife of the householder, and so on in order, speaking the words as described before. Those households each gave thirteen sets of requisites to each monk.

Then the group of six said: "Venerable ones, if the monks are not arranged in the rows of a hundred, the rows will be left empty. Today, please take your places in the rows. Do not worry — we too will go after collecting alms." The group of six then went to the monastery and gathered forty sets of old rags into a pile and left them there.

When the forty monks came back having finished their meal, the group of six, sitting there among them, said to the attendant monks: "Venerable ones, come here — call just a few of them over." The attendants called them, and the group of six said: "Venerable ones, are we guarding your robes? Take your own robes." The forty monks then began to look at one another, and the group of six said: "Venerable ones, why are you looking at one another? The elders' things are nothing but old rags. Venerable ones, these here — tie them together; they are patched robes. These are stitched-together rags and an upper robe. These are stitched-together rags and a lower robe. These are stitched-together rags and a sweat cloth. If you do not want them, go ahead — you may raise the matter again. Oh well, venerable elders, it is fine even if those are not raised." The monks took those old rags, went off to the hermitage, and stitched and sewed them.

The word spread everywhere: "Each of the forty monks from Vārāṇasī has obtained seven sets of the thirteen requisites." When other monks saw this and were told of it, they said: "Venerable ones, we have heard one thing and seen another. We hear that each of the forty monks from Vārāṇasī has obtained seven sets of the thirteen requisites, venerable ones, and that the old rags have been stitched and sewn up." They replied: "You see — we also heard that they were to be carried off each on their own shoulders." With this, the matter was reported to those monks, and those monks reported it to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, on account of this case, on account of this circumstance, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so on just as before. "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, act as if they do not know" — and so forth, again just as before.

The blessed Buddha then questioned the forty monks from Vārāṇasī: "Monks, is it true that you did not know the proper measure of what you were receiving?" "Blessed One, it is so." The blessed Buddha censured lack of effort, lack of application, and acting without examining, and then, having praised effort, application, and acting with thorough examination, he declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training shall be established for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so on just as before. "My śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should a monk's robe be stolen, destroyed, burned, carried off by the wind, or swept away by water, he may go to a householder or a householder's wife who is not a relative and request a robe. If a brahmin or a faithful householder should wish to supply him with many robes at the right time, that monk may accept from them at most one upper robe and one lower robe. To accept more than that is an offense entailing relinquishment.

The word 'monk' here refers to one belonging to this Dharma."

The phrase "robe stolen" means this: a monk's robes have been taken by thieves or by swindlers.

The phrase "robe destroyed" means this: a monk's robes have been ruined or have fallen to pieces through wear.

The phrase "robe burned" means this: a monk's robes have been consumed by fire.

The phrase "robe carried off by wind" means this: a monk's robes have been carried away by the wind.

The phrase "robe swept away by water" means this: a monk's robes have been swept away by water.

The word "householder" means a man. The phrase "householder's wife" means a woman. The phrase "not a relative" means this: one's grandmother, grandfather, and all relations down through the seventh generation of cousins are relatives; beyond that they are not relatives.

The phrase "go to" means to go and approach.

The word "robe" refers to any one of the seven kinds: wool fabric, linen fabric, silk fabric, fine cotton fabric, coarse cotton fabric, hemp fabric, and jute fabric.

The phrase "may request" means to beg for.

The phrase "should wish" means if one genuinely desires it.

The phrase "may accept at most one upper robe and one lower robe" is explained as follows. Upper and lower robes together come in two kinds: the upper and lower robes of a monk, and the upper and lower robes of a layman. The upper and lower robes of a monk consist of a stitched and layered patchwork robe, a plain length of fine cloth of five cubits, and a belt. The upper and lower robes of a layman consist of a large length of cloth of twelve cubits, a smaller length of cloth of seven cubits, and a belt.

The phrase "to accept more than that" means anything beyond those.

The phrase "an offense entailing relinquishment" means that the object in question must be relinquished and then the offense of transgression confessed. That is why it is called an offense entailing relinquishment.

As for how the transgression arises: if a monk has requested the upper and lower robes of a layman and has received them, and he then requests more, the very act of requesting more constitutes a wrong-doing; and should he actually receive more, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment. If a monk has requested the upper and lower robes of a monk and has received them, and he then requests more, the very act of requesting more constitutes a wrong-doing; and should he actually receive more, it becomes an offense entailing relinquishment.

If a monk has requested the upper and lower robes of a layman and has received them, then even if what he received falls short of the full measure he should not ask for more, and even if there is a surplus it should not be given to him. If a monk has requested the upper and lower robes of a monk and has received them, then even if what he received falls short of the full measure he may ask for more, and any surplus may also be given to him.

Thus, in all cases: if a monk requests more than the upper and lower robes of a layman, or if more than the upper and lower robes of a monk is given, an offense entailing relinquishment arises.

If a monk's robe has become subject to relinquishment and he has neither relinquished it nor separated himself from it, and has not yet confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another robe, that second robe too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the first. If a monk's robe has become subject to relinquishment and he has relinquished it but has not yet separated himself from it, and has not yet confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another robe, that second robe too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the first. If a monk's robe has become subject to relinquishment and he has both relinquished it and separated himself from it, but has not yet confessed the transgression, and then he obtains another robe, that second robe too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the first.

If a monk's robe has become subject to relinquishment and he has relinquished it, separated himself from it, and confessed the transgression, and then obtains another robe, there is no transgression in that case.

Likewise, for as long as a monk, without having confessed and individually confessed the very item subject to relinquishment, proceeds to keep at hand an alms bowl, a Dharma robe, a net, a cup, a belt, or any requisite for a renunciant's livelihood, that too becomes subject to relinquishment by reason of the first. There is no transgression for one who is a novice, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The seventh category, relinquishment of what is fitting to beg, is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Now in Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had taken a wife from a family of equal standing. With her he sported, took delight, and enjoyed himself in pleasure. That householder then became attached to another man's wife. His own wife tried to dissuade him, saying, "My lord and master, do not act in this way." But however much she dissuaded him, he did not turn back, and so his wife too began to enter into misconduct with other men. The householder gave himself to other women, and the wife gave herself to other men, and in this way both of them brought their household to ruin. They had a maidservant living with them, and the householder beat that girl with his fists and the flat of his hand, saying, "It is you who have ruined this household." The girl replied, "I would indeed wish to know what has caused this household to fall into ruin. But how could it be right for me to speak ill of my masters?" A close friend, having understood the situation, went to both the householder and his wife and, wishing by some means to bring the two of them to take refuge and to abide by the precepts of training, spoke in praise of moral discipline and spoke words that were no praise of moral laxity. And so that friend brought the two of them to take refuge and to abide by the precepts of training.

Now the householder was fierce, rough, and hot-tempered, and he began to beat the girl again. His wife then said to him, "My lord and master, at such time as you and I did not know karma and the karmic maturation of karma, you might perhaps have struck her in your ignorance. But now, relying on our good spiritual friend, the noble Ānanda, we know karma and its karmic maturation. In this world, beings experience the fruit of their own karma — so who is anyone's slave? Do not beat this girl. You called her a good woman — that was not wrong. Girl, come here. Come, wash yourself." The girl came after washing, and the wife dressed her in a fine robe and said, "Girl, be glad and go about your work."

The girl thought to herself, "This householder, my master, was formerly fierce, rough, and hot-tempered, and again and again he used to beat me with fists and the flat of his hand and give me poor food and poor clothing. But now he has become like a father to me." Then she thought again, "From the time the noble Ānanda began to enter this house, the householder has been like a father to me, so how should I make the noble Ānanda glad? What could I do for him?" And she thought, "If I were to steal a little from here and give it secretly — but then the householder would beat me severely and return me to my former situation." And so she sat and remained where she was.

Then the householder's wife said to the householder:

"My lord's son should know this: the noble Ānanda is our spiritual friend. The noble Ānanda has separated us from defilement, established us in the going for refuge and the bases of training, and again and again he gathers us together through the Dharma. Therefore we too should gather him in with a little material gift." "Excellent, let it be so. But what shall we do?" "We should offer him a fine large cloth." The girl, hearing this, thought to herself, "I shall express my joy to the noble Ānanda."

Now Ānanda, having put on his lower robe early in the morning and taken up his bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī on his alms round, and as he moved through the streets collecting alms in order, he entered that house. The girl had swept the house well and scattered fresh floor coverings, and when she saw Ānanda she prostrated at his two feet and said, "I shall express my delight to the noble Ānanda. The householder here will offer you a fine large cloth."

Ānanda thought to himself, "All those beings on the earth who possess desire — this girl today has put me on a par with every one of them," and he scolded her, saying, "Girl, if this is true, do not take offence at my scolding you. But if it is false, I shall have you severely beaten and put back in your former situation. If the noble one reproaches you at length, then leave — and you will find out for yourself."

She departed and sat down right where a seat had been prepared. Then the householder together with his wife prostrated at his feet, took seats lower than his, and sat before him to hear the Dharma. Ānanda said, "Householder, let me see this fine large cloth that is to be given to me." The two of them began to look at each other and said, "Noble one, who told you what we said to each other in private? Does the noble one also know the minds of others?"

Ānanda replied, "I have eaten from the bowl and my teeth have worn down and my hair has turned white — could something even so small as this be beyond me?" The householder then took the fine large cloth and offered it to Ānanda. When Ānanda saw the fine large cloth he wrung his hands together and twisted his face. The householder asked, "Noble one, why do you wring your two hands? Why do you twist your face?" Ānanda said, "Householder, for you there is indeed merit arising from having given it away completely, but there is no merit arising from having enjoyed it to the full. This fine large cloth is fit only for wiping boots or patching a window — it will end up worn out and finished off on the face of a robe. So what is to be done?" "Give a different, better fine large cloth." "There is no other fine large cloth." "Buy one from the market and give it." "There is no money." "Give it when the time comes." The householder began to look toward his wife's face, and his wife said, "My lord's son, since the noble Ānanda has benefited us, take out a fine large cloth and offer it to him."

The householder then went to the market together with Ānanda, and they arrived at a shop. Ānanda thought to himself, "I shall arouse the merchant's pride, and then he will give a good fine large cloth." So Ānanda said to the householder, "Householder, this merchant is a small trader — he will have no good fine large cloth here. Let us go elsewhere." When the merchant heard this, he brought out a fine large cloth fit for a great person and said, "Noble one, please look at this fine large cloth. If this cloth is of good quality, the price is such and such, this much. Householder, measure it out. Has the householder measured it? Yes, it is measured. When is payment due? Payment is due at such and such a time."

The merchant gave that fine large cloth to the householder, and the householder presented it to Ānanda. Ānanda said to the householder, "Arogy" — a term of address — and spoke these words: "May this act of generosity become an ornament of your mind, a resource of your mind, an accumulation of yogic merit, the attainment of the highest goal, and the attainment of the robes of gods and humans." So saying, he departed.

The householder then fell into reduced circumstances, and when the time came he was unable to pay the price in full. The merchant had him brought before the sun — that is, exposed him publicly — and when the young companions of the householder saw this, they said, "What is this? Have you been drinking melted butter, or have you been struck by plague? You are being held by a creditor. Your father never had debts, and your ancestors never had debts — so where has this debt come from?" He replied, "Those who place their faith in the śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), the sons of the Śākya, end up like this: whatever is given to them, they do not take it as enough but always beg for more."

At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, in regard to this occurrence, this basis, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks, and so on as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign ignorance, and so on as before. The Blessed One asked Ānanda, "Ānanda, is it true that, not being satisfied with what was given, you urged for more?" "Venerable one, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that such conduct was unbefitting the way of a śramaṇa, was not in accord with it, was not appropriate, and was contrary to proper conduct — it was not something a person who has gone forth should do. Having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training (Skt. śikṣāpada) for the hearers in the Vinaya," and so on as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a householder, or the wife of a householder, who is not a relative, has set aside funds for the purchase of robes on behalf of a monk, thinking, 'I shall use these funds to purchase such and such a robe, and when the monk of such and such a name arrives, I shall present him in due time with a robe that is suitable' — then if, before the cloth has been procured, some thought arises in that monk and, out of desire for something fine, he goes to that householder or that wife of a householder who is not a relative, and says, 'Venerable one, you have set aside robe-funds on my behalf; please use those funds to purchase for me such and such a robe and present it to me in good time as a robe that is suitable' — if he obtains the robe in this way, it is an offense requiring forfeiture (Skt. nissaggiya pācittika).

"On behalf of a monk" means on behalf of Ānanda, a son of the Śākyans, or anyone else of that kind. "A householder" means a man. "The wife of a householder" means a woman. "Who is not a relative" — grandmothers and grandfathers, and those related within seven generations, count as relatives; beyond that they are not relatives. "Funds for the purchase of robes" means gold or silver. "Such and such a robe" means any one of the seven: a woolen cloth, a linen cloth, a silk cloth, a fine cotton cloth, a coarse cotton cloth, a hemp cloth, or a half-and-half cloth. "Purchase" means having purchased it. "When the monk of such and such a name arrives" means Ānanda, the son of the Śākyans. "I shall present him in due time with a robe that is suitable" means one that is acceptable for use.

"If the monk had not previously been invited" means he had not previously been called as a guest. "Some deliberation arose" means that some consideration of hospitality arose. "Out of a desire for something fine" means for the sake of what is excellent and superior. "Having gone to the presence of the householder or the householder's wife who is not a relative" means having gone directly to them. "If a robe should be obtained" means if a robe is received. "It is an offense entailing forfeiture" means that the thing in question must be forfeited and the offense of transgression confessed; that is why it is said to be an offense entailing forfeiture.

Now, how does the transgression arise? It arises through three things: value, color, and measure in cubits.

How does it arise through value? If a monk has received a robe worth five kārṣāpaṇas and then solicits something beyond that, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for what was received before. Just as for a robe worth five kārṣāpaṇas, so too for a robe worth ten kārṣāpaṇas, twenty kārṣāpaṇas, or up to fifty kārṣāpaṇas — if a monk has received such a robe and solicits beyond that value, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for what was received before. Such is the arising of the transgression through value.

How does it arise through color? If a monk has received a blue robe and solicits something beyond it, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for what was received before. Just as with blue, so too with yellow, red, heavy, and light — if such a robe has been received and something beyond it is solicited, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for what was received before. Such is the arising of the transgression through color.

How does it arise through measure in cubits? If a monk has received a robe of five cubits and solicits something beyond that, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for what was received before. Just as for a robe of five cubits, so too for robes of ten cubits, twenty cubits, or up to fifty cubits — if such a robe has been received and something beyond it is solicited, the solicitation of the excess constitutes a misdeed, and upon obtaining it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Such is the arising of the transgression through measure in cubits.

If a monk's robe is subject to forfeiture, and he neither forfeits it nor separates himself from it, and without having confessed the transgression he obtains another, that other also falls under forfeiture by continuity with the first. If a monk's robe is subject to forfeiture, and he forfeits it but does not separate himself from it, and without having confessed the transgression he obtains another, that other also falls under forfeiture by continuity with the first. If a monk's robe is subject to forfeiture, and he forfeits it and separates himself from it, but without having confessed the transgression he obtains another, that other also falls under forfeiture by continuity with the first. If a monk's robe is subject to forfeiture, and he forfeits it, separates himself from it, confesses the transgression, and then obtains another, there is no transgression with respect to that.

Likewise, as long as a monk's robe is subject to forfeiture and that matter has not been confessed and individually disclosed, if he takes possession of an alms bowl, a Dharma robe, a net bag, a small bowl, a belt, or any other article of the ascetic's livelihood, those too fall under forfeiture by continuity with the first.

There is no transgression when soliciting a patch and receiving thread along with it, or when soliciting thread and receiving a small or large piece of cloth. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The eighth forfeiture — soliciting in excess beyond what had been entrusted — is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At Śrāvastī, there was a certain householder who had taken a wife from a family of equal rank. He lived with her in play, in delight, and in happiness. But then that householder became attached to another man's wife. Whenever his own wife tried to restrain him from this, no matter how often she did so, he would not turn back — and to the same degree his own wife began to take up misconduct with other men. The householder, for his part, gave himself to other women, and his wife gave herself to other men, and in this way both sides of the household fell into ruin. The couple had a maidservant girl in their house, and the householder began to beat her with fists and slaps, saying that she had caused the household's ruin. The girl said, "I would indeed wish to know what I have done to cause this ruin. And yet, how could it be right for me to speak words that are no praise of my masters? But let a dear friend take note." Hearing this, that dear friend went to both the householder and his wife, and in whatever way would lead them to take refuge and to abide in the foundations of the training, spoke in praise of moral discipline and against the lack of it, until those two were made to take refuge and to abide in the foundations of the training.

The householder was violent, rough, and overbearing, and he began to beat the girl again. At this, the wife spoke to him: "O son of a master, there was a time when you did not know about karma and the ripening of karma, and in those days you could be said to strike blows. But now we have relied upon the noble one Nandika as our virtuous spiritual friend, and through him we know about karma and its ripening. In this world, beings fare according to the fruit of their own karma — so who then is anyone's slave? Do not strike this girl. Good woman, it is not wrong that you are called 'good.' Come, girl, come — wash yourself and come." The girl washed herself and returned, and the wife dressed her in a new robe and said, "Girl, be glad and work joyfully."

The girl thought to herself, "This master of the household, my owner, was formerly violent, rough, and overbearing, beating me again and again with fists and slaps and giving me poor food and poor clothing. But now he has become like a father and mother to me." And she thought further: "From the time the noble one Nandika began to come to this house, this householder has been like a father and mother to me — so what can I do to gladden the noble one Nandika?" She thought: "If I were to steal a little from here, and the householder were to find the shortage, he would beat and harass me greatly and put me back in my former state." And so she stayed where she was, in her place.

The householder's wife then spoke to the householder: "O son of a master, please know this: the noble one Nandika is our virtuous spiritual friend. The noble one Nandika separated us from defilement, established us in the going for refuge and in the foundations of the training, and again and again he gathers us in through the Dharma. Let us gather him in, in return, with some material gift." "Very well — let it be done so. But what shall we do? Let each of us from our own means offer a large bolt of cloth." The girl, hearing this, thought to herself, "I too shall join my joy to the noble one Nandika's."

Now Nandika, in the early morning, having dressed, taken his bowl and his robe, had entered Śrāvastī on the alms round, and as he went gradually along collecting alms, he entered that house. The girl, having carefully swept and cleaned the house and laid out a cloth, saw Nandika and bowed at his two feet, saying:

"I shall join my joy to the noble one Nandika's. This householder and the householder's wife will each offer you a large bolt of cloth."

Nandika thought to himself, "Among all those on the face of the earth who are possessed of desire, this girl today has gone as far as any of them," and he rebuked her, saying: "Girl, if it is true, do not take offense at the rebuke I give you. But if it is false, then I shall have you given many blows and beatings and left in your former condition. Noble one, if you are given to much abuse, please leave — and you yourself shall come to understand."

She went inside, and as soon as she took her seat on the prepared cushion, the householder together with his wife bowed at his two feet, took lower seats, and sat before him to hear the Dharma.

Nandika said: "Householder, observe what you have done — each of you offering me a large bolt of cloth." The two of them began looking at one another and said: "Noble one, who disclosed to you what we said in secret? Does the noble one know the minds of others too?"

Nandika replied: "I have eaten from my bowl, my teeth are worn down, and my hair has turned white — is even this much not possible for me? Householder and wife, each take a large bolt of cloth and present it to Nandika." They took the large bolts of cloth and offered them to Nandika, and when Nandika saw those large bolts of cloth, he wrung his hands together and turned his face aside.

The householder asked: "Noble one, why do you wring your hands together? Why do you turn your face aside?"

Nandika replied: "Householder, there is merit arising from the renunciation you have made, but there is no merit arising from full enjoyment — these large bolts of cloth are fit only for wiping sandals or patching windows. They will be worn out and come to an end in binding up monastic robes. Then what shall we do? Give other, finer large bolts of cloth." "We have no large bolts of cloth." "Buy some from the market and give them." "We have no money." "Give them when the time comes."

The householder began looking toward his wife's face, and the wife said: "Son of a noble family, since the noble Nandika has shown us kindness, let us borrow large bolts of cloth and offer them to him."

The householder went together with Nandika to the market street and entered a shop. Nandika thought, "I shall provoke the merchant's pride, and then he will give fine, large bolts of cloth," so Nandika said to the householder: "Householder, this merchant is a petty fellow — there will be no fine large bolts of cloth here. Let us go elsewhere."

When the merchant heard this, he displayed large bolts of cloth of a quality befitting something great, and said: "Noble one, look at these large bolts of cloth. These bolts are fine — how much are they? So and so much. Householder, will you measure them?" "Yes, I will measure." "How long a time will you need? About this much time."

The merchant gave those large bolts of cloth to the householder, and the householder offered them to Nandika. Nandika said to the householder, "Excellent!" and added: "By this generosity of yours, may you obtain an ornament of mind, and provisions for the mind, and the accumulation of yoga, and the attainment of the highest aim, and the garments of gods and humans" — and then he departed.

The householder's means had become thin, and he was unable to pay the price within the allotted time, so the merchant brought the householder to court before the sun. When he was brought low, his friends saw him and said: "Have you been drinking melted butter? Or have you been struck by fever? You are being held by a creditor. Your father never incurred debts, nor did your grandfather — so how did this debt come about?"

He replied: "Those who place their faith in the śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), the sons of the Śākyas, come to be like this — saying that whoever gives something will be unsatisfied with what they have received and will demand more besides."

The monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this origin-case, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, feign ignorance" also proceeds as before. The Blessed One then questioned Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you were unsatisfied with what was given and demanded more?" He replied: "Venerable One, it is not so." The Blessed One then censured the conduct unworthy of a śramaṇa, the conduct not in conformity with the training, the conduct not proper, the conduct not in accord with the rule, declaring that one who has gone forth should not act in such a way. After censuring it in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits, one should establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If, for the sake of a monk, a householder and someone who is not a close relative of the householder's wife each set aside separate cloth-fund contributions, thinking, 'We two, using our separate cloth-fund contributions, will each separately purchase this or that variety of robe and present a suitable robe to the monk so-and-so when he comes' — then, if that monk, without having been invited beforehand, approaches out of desire for something superior that householder and that non-relative of the householder's wife and says: 'Venerable ones, please pool together the separate cloth-fund contributions that the venerable ones have set aside for my sake, purchase this or that variety of robe together, and at the right time present me with a suitable robe' — if he obtains the robe in this way, he commits an offense involving relinquishment (Skt. naihsargika-pācittika)."

Now, the phrase "for the sake of a monk" means: for the sake of Ānanda, the son of the Śākyas, or for the sake of any other monk of that kind. "A householder" means a man. "The householder's wife" means a woman. "Non-relative" means: up to and including a grandmother, grandfather, or seventh-degree cousin by descent — these count as relatives; beyond that, they are non-relatives. "Cloth-fund" means gold or silver. "This or that variety of robe" means any one of the seven: woolen cloth, hempen cloth, silk, fine muslin, coarse cotton, kotamba cloth, or bark cloth. "Purchase" means: let them buy it. "The monk so-and-so comes" means: Ānanda, the son of the Śākyas, comes. "Present a suitable robe at the right time" means: to allow it to be used. "Without having been invited beforehand" means: without having previously been invited as a guest. "A certain thought arising" means: a certain thought of seeking veneration arises. "Out of desire for something superior" means: for the sake of the best and finest. "Approaches that householder and that non-relative of the householder's wife" means: goes into their presence. "Pooling together" means: both together assemble it. "If he obtains the robe" means: if he receives the robe. "He commits an offense involving relinquishment" means: having relinquished the thing, one must confess the transgression — therefore it is called an offense involving relinquishment.

How then does the transgression come about? It depends on the value, the color, and the measure in cubits. As to how it comes about in terms of value —

When a monk has received a robe worth five kārṣāpaṇas and then solicits something beyond that amount, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. For what came before, there is no transgression. Just as it is with a robe worth five kārṣāpaṇas, so too with robes worth ten kārṣāpaṇas, twenty kārṣāpaṇas, and up to fifty kārṣāpaṇas: when a monk has received such a robe and solicits something beyond that amount, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. For what came before, there is no transgression. Thus it comes about in terms of value.

How does it come about in terms of color? When a monk has received a blue robe and solicits something beyond that, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. For what came before, there is no transgression. Just as it is with a blue robe, so too with a yellow robe, a red robe, a thick robe, and a thin robe: when a monk has received such a robe and solicits something beyond that, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. For what came before, there is no transgression. Thus it comes about in terms of color.

How does it come about in terms of measure in cubits? When a monk has received a robe of five cubits and solicits something beyond that, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. For what came before, there is no transgression. Just as it is with a robe of five cubits, so too with robes of ten cubits, twenty cubits, and up to fifty cubits: when a monk has received such a robe and solicits something beyond that, the act of soliciting the excess constitutes a wrongdoing, and should he receive it, it becomes an offense involving relinquishment. Thus it comes about in terms of measure in cubits.

If a monk's robe is to be relinquished but he has not yet relinquished it, not yet separated himself from it, and not yet confessed the transgression, and he then obtains another robe, that other robe too is to be relinquished by virtue of the continuum of the first. If a monk's robe is to be relinquished and he has relinquished it and separated himself from it, but has not yet confessed the transgression, and he then obtains another robe, that other robe too is to be relinquished by virtue of the continuum of the first. If a monk's robe is to be relinquished and he has relinquished it and separated himself from it, but has not yet confessed the transgression, and he then obtains another robe, that other robe too is to be relinquished by virtue of the continuum of the first. If a monk's robe is to be relinquished and he has relinquished it and separated himself from it, and has confessed the transgression, and he then obtains another robe, in that case there is no transgression.

Likewise, if a monk's robe is to be relinquished, for as long as that item has not been confessed and individually confessed, should he place nearby his alms bowl, his Dharma robe, a net, a small cup, a belt, or any other requisite for a monk's livelihood, all of those too are to be relinquished by virtue of the continuum of the first.

When soliciting a needle-case one receives a companion item, and when soliciting a companion item one receives a small piece of cloth or a large piece of cloth, there is no transgression. There is also no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The ninth offense involving relinquishment — that of soliciting beyond what was individually designated — is complete.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the thirty-first fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. Ānanda conceived the following idea: all these householders who have restrained themselves by means of the training rules established by the householder Anāthapiṇḍada are, from this time forward, unable to solicit even a single small scrap of cloth from anyone. He thought: there is a brahmin teacher of the summer season who teaches the letters of the alphabet together with me in a school of writing; if I go to him and look, it may even be possible to obtain a little something from him. With this in mind, he went to that person's house, whereupon the doorkeeper stopped him, saying: "Noble one, do not enter."

Ānanda said: "Friend, the Blessed One has taught five kinds of places that are not proper domains for us: the house of a musician, the house of a woman of dissolute ways, the house of a liquor-seller, the royal palace, and —"

"— or the house of an outcaste. Is this a musician's house, a house of dissolute ways, a liquor-seller's house, a royal palace, or the dwelling of an outcaste?"

Noble one, you have come a great many times. This is not a musician's house, not a house of dissolute ways, not a liquor-seller's house, not a royal palace, and not the dwelling of an outcaste. Rather, it is the house of the brahmin of the summer season. Go inside and let the brahmin of the summer season know that the venerable Ānanda wishes to see him and is waiting at the gate."

The doorkeeper went in and said: "Do you perhaps have the heart of a king of noble form and noble substance? If a poor person begs, then give. If you do not give, I shall see to it that a great barrier is placed between you." The doorkeeper thought: this person speaks without fear and without shame, and if I do not go and tell him, he will make trouble for me — so I had better go and tell him. He went and said: "Venerable lord, the venerable Ānanda wishes to see you, reverend lord, and is waiting at the outer gate."

The brahmin of the summer season said: "Who would stop the venerable Ānanda? Let the venerable Ānanda enter." When Ānanda had entered, the brahmin of the summer season said: "Welcome, venerable Ānanda. Welcome, welcome. Venerable Ānanda, please be seated on this prepared seat." Ānanda sat down before him, and with a high voice, a pleasing voice, and a deep voice began to recite a eulogy of generosity. As Ānanda, joyful and gladdened, recited the eulogy of generosity, the faithful brahmins and householders thought: "Alas, we should cut away even our own flesh and give it away!" And so the brahmin of the summer season said: "Venerable Ānanda, for the rains retreat I offer sixty kārṣāpaṇas. May this gift of healing bring you ornament of mind, equipment of mind, the accumulation of yoga, the attainment of the highest aim, and may you also obtain the enjoyments of gods and humans." Having said this, he departed.

Two monks came from Śrāvastī to Rājagṛha to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'The Tathāgata is setting out to tour the Kosala lands; whoever among you wishes to travel to the Kosala lands together with the Tathāgata, let that one perform the robe-work ceremony.'" The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One, replied: "Venerable one, as you command," and announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is setting out to tour the Kosala lands; whoever wishes to travel to the Kosala lands together with the Tathāgata, let that one perform the robe-work ceremony." The monks replied to the venerable Ānanda: "As you command, venerable Ānanda," and heard him.

When the two monks who had come from Śrāvastī heard this, they thought: "We too need to return to Śrāvastī," and became displeased. Ānanda, upon hearing, became distressed, thinking: "An obstacle has arisen to the gain that I was on the verge of obtaining after a hundred or a hundred attempts." He went to the brahmin of the summer season and began to recite the eulogy of generosity with a low voice, an unpleasing voice, and a subdued voice. The brahmin of the summer season said: "Venerable Ānanda, before you recited the eulogy of generosity with a high voice, a pleasing voice, and a deep voice, yet now you use a low voice, an unpleasing voice, and a voice without depth, to recite the eulogy of generosity. What is the reason for this?" "Friend, it is because when companions meet once in a hundred encounters, a hundred journeys, even that parting comes after no great length of time." The people of Magadha understood by implication. The people of Kosala grasped it when it was stated openly. The people of Pañcāla understood by half a letter. But the people of the west do not understand unless it is said plainly.

The brahmin of the summer season reflected in his mind: "This man has abandoned so vast a fortune of the Śākya clan and gone forth into homelessness — he will not grieve at parting from me, but he grieves at losing sixty kārṣāpaṇas." So he said: "Venerable Ānanda, wherever you may be staying, I shall send you sixty kārṣāpaṇas." "Excellent! In that case," said Ānanda, "one gives and makes merit free of benefit to oneself and free of any affliction." And having said this, he rose from his seat and departed.

Then the Blessed One — himself tamed, his retinue tamed; himself peaceful, his retinue peaceful; himself liberated, his retinue liberated; himself at ease, his retinue at ease; himself subdued, his retinue subdued; himself an arhat, his retinue arhats; himself free of attachment, his retinue free of attachment; himself resplendent, his retinue resplendent — surrounded by a herd of bulls as by a supreme bull among the herd; surrounded by a company of young elephants as by a great elephant; surrounded by a pride of fanged beasts as by a lion; surrounded by a flock of geese as by the king of geese; surrounded by flocks of birds as by Garuḍa (the sky-soarer); surrounded by a company of students as by a brahmin; surrounded by a company of the sick as by a skilled physician; surrounded by troops as by a hero; surrounded by those entered upon the road as by a guide; surrounded by a company of merchants as by a caravan leader; surrounded by a retinue of followers as by a merchant-chief; surrounded by a company of ministers as by a king of the citadel; surrounded by a thousand sons as by a wheel-turning monarch; surrounded by a host of constellations as by the moon; surrounded by a thousand rays of light as by the sun; surrounded by a company of gandharvas (fragrance-eaters) as by Viśvāmitra (guardian of the realm); surrounded by a company of treasure-vases as by a noble man; surrounded by a host of nāgas as by Virūpākṣa (the ill-eyed one); surrounded by a host of yakṣas as by the wealth-giver; surrounded by a host of asuras as by Vemacitrin; surrounded by a company of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three as by Śakra (Indra); surrounded by the company of the brahmin worlds as by Brahmā —

With his faculties supremely tamed, his conduct and behavior unagitated, deep as an ocean of water, full of rain-clouds, free of arrogance as the king of great elephants, his body finely adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being, his form beautified with eighty excellent features, clothed in radiance a fathom wide, possessed of a brilliance surpassing a thousand suns, wholly beautiful as a moving mountain of jewels, endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three establishments of mindfulness, and great compassion, devoted to the benefit of the world, sole protector, uniquely courageous, without a second, speaking of no second, abiding in calm abiding and insight, fully illuminating the three knowledges, perfectly trained in the three trainings, skilled in the basis of the three grounds of discipline, having crossed the four rivers, perfectly established in the basis of practice of the four legs of miraculous ability, long purified in the four means of gathering — not intimidated by the four fearlessnesses, having abandoned the five hindrances, having fully transcended the five destinies, endowed with the six qualities, having perfectly fulfilled the six perfections, abiding in the six constant abidings, rich with the flowers of the seven factors of awakening, teaching the eight limbs of the path, skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions, endowed with the powers of the ten powers, his renown fully spread throughout the ten directions, supremely excellent above those who command a hundred companies of a hundred — surrounded by and preceded by great śrāvakas, namely Kauṇḍinya the Omniscient, Śreṇika, Mahānāman, Anupama, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, and Nandottara, together with many others in the great community of monks, the Blessed One was passing through the region of Kosala and came to Śrāvastī, where he took up residence in the Jeta Grove in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Now certain merchants of Śrāvastī had taken up their packs and were setting out for Rājagṛha. If a sufficient number of them were of one mind, the brahmin Varṣatula would cut dice for them, and so Varṣatula said to those who played dice with him: "Whenever the merchants of Śrāvastī come back to Śrāvastī, let them bring word to me." The dice-players passed the message along to the merchants. Those merchants exchanged their goods, received their payment, and went before the brahmin Varṣatula, saying: "What are our obligations toward you upon our return to Śrāvastī?"

Varṣatula entrusted to one of the merchants sixty kārṣāpaṇas and gave him this instruction: "Take these to the Venerable Ānanda and offer them to him." The merchant thought to himself: "This monk whom Varṣatula the brahmin intends to honor is certainly someone of great repute. Let me also do something pleasant for him and provide him with fine robes." And so he went to the Amber Grove, came before the monk, and asked: "Noble monk, what kind of robes are proper for a monk? Good sir, does the Saṅgha accept the gift of a large cloth?"

"The Saṅgha does not accept the gift of a large cloth. I have come to convert the sixty kārṣāpaṇas that Varṣatula the brahmin has sent to the Venerable Ānanda into proper robes for him."

The monk said: "Good sir, accept the proper robes, and as for the matter of your offering the sixty kārṣāpaṇas — there will be an occasion for that."

The merchant thought: "This is just the same matter and nothing else." He went before another monk and asked: "Noble monk, what kind of robes are proper for a monk? Good sir, does the Saṅgha accept the gift of a large cloth?"

"The Saṅgha does not accept the gift of a large cloth. I have come to convert the sixty kārṣāpaṇas that Varṣatula the brahmin has sent to the Venerable Ānanda into proper robes for him."

That monk said: "If you bring it without a seal, your matter of offering the local customs duty will have an occasion."

The merchant thought: "These two answers are in agreement." He went before the brahmin Varṣatula and said: "Varṣatula, have these kārṣāpaṇas sealed. Good sir, take them yourself with confidence."

Varṣatula said: "Though I am grateful for your concern on my behalf, I shall do what is proper." Varṣatula affixed his seal, and the merchant took the coins and went to Śrāvastī. He went to the Jeta Grove and asked the monks: "Noble ones, which is the monastery of the noble Ānanda?"

They showed him which monastery was Ānanda's, and he went there. Finding the noble Ānanda nowhere to be seen, he asked a monk: "Noble sir, where has the venerable Ānanda gone?" The monk replied: "He has gone out for his daytime walk." The merchant said: "The brahmin Varṣatula has sent these sixty kārṣāpaṇas for him. Please keep them, and when he arrives, give them to him. Good sir, have you ever seen anyone carrying a blazing lamp on their head?" The monk thought: "This man is certainly referring to that very person." And so he went to another monk and said: "Noble sir, the brahmin Varṣatula has sent these sixty kārṣāpaṇas for the venerable Ānanda. Please keep them, and when he arrives, give them to him. Good sir, if you were to come without a seal, you would find yourself in a situation of having to pay the local customs duty." That monk thought: "These two are in agreement with each other. I shall go home, and when he arrives there I shall answer him pleasantly with words." He then said: "Noble sir, the householder asks me to convey this message to the venerable Ānanda: 'My storehouse is in a certain corner somewhere; if you wish to take the kārṣāpaṇas, please come,' " and departed.

Ānanda then arrived at the monastery. The monks said to him: "Venerable Ānanda, the Blessed One has well spoken when he said that the aspirations of the mind of one endowed with moral discipline are fulfilled, precisely because of the purity of moral discipline. Today you went out for your daytime walk, and today itself the sixty kārṣāpaṇas have been obtained. As for the benefactor who gave sixty kārṣāpaṇas each to the Blessed One's retinue of twelve hundred and fifty — who is such a person? Venerable Ānanda, it is not for the whole Saṅgha but for you alone. And as for the benefactor who gave sixty kārṣāpaṇas to Ānanda — who is such a person? It was sent by the brahmin Varṣatula. Now, if this is merely an outside acquisition — was it weighed? Was it assayed? Was it tested for fraud? By whom was it examined? Was it taken without examination? By whom was it taken? I myself am sitting right in the midst of enemies."

To this the other monk said: "Venerable Ānanda, what is the penalty for you in this? The householder said: 'My storehouse is in a certain corner somewhere; if you wish to take the kārṣāpaṇas, please come.' " Ānanda took his outer robe and set out, walking briskly. The householder, seeing him coming from quite a distance, thought: "This ascetic coming along with such a brisk stride — he cannot be anyone other than the venerable Ānanda." From quite a distance he called out to him: "Are you not the venerable Ānanda?" "I am." "The brahmin Varṣatula has sent these sixty kārṣāpaṇas for you. Please accept them. May this gift of Ārogyasabhiṃ bring you adornment of mind, equipment of mind, a gathering of yogic merit, attainment of the highest aim, and also the enjoyments of gods and men." The noble one said: "Why did you announce the offering in my name? Announce it in the name of the brahmin Varṣatula. What need does this poor man have of it? For it is because you took great pains and you brought it here." "Whoever brought this — please first find a boy to carry it to the marketplace." "Noble sir, I have no boy." "Poor man, having carried it all the way from Rājagṛha to here, are you unable to convey it to the marketplace?" The merchant then said to a boy: "Carry these kārṣāpaṇas and walk behind the noble one, but do not go outside."

"Have this one pay you the wages owed." The boy took the kārṣāpaṇas and walked behind him, and arriving first at the marketplace's opening stall, he said: "Noble sir, please set these kārṣāpaṇas down here." The noble one replied: "Boy, you have been very well trained." He then said to a boy working at a perfume stall: "Good fellow, set these kārṣāpaṇas down here for a moment." "Noble sir, I depend on my teacher." "May you never have to depend on yourself." He then went to another perfume-stall boy and said: "Good fellow, set these kārṣāpaṇas down here for a moment." "Noble sir, my teacher has gone to the back." "May you never enter into such a state." He then went to yet another perfume-stall boy, one who possessed fresh faith, and said: "Good fellow, set these kārṣāpaṇas down here for a moment." "Noble sir, I depend on my mother." "I know you to be a person of faith, but how deeply your faith runs I do not know. If you were to lose your faith, you might even take up a cudgel and drive monks away." The boy was frightened and said: "Noble sir, please set them down." The noble one left the kārṣāpaṇas there, sent the householder's boy back, and departed.

The assembly of merchants then established the rule: "Whoever among us is the last to arrive when the sun has risen shall be fined sixty kārṣāpaṇas." The mother said to the perfume-stall boy: "Son, by all means see to it that you yourself are not fined sixty kārṣāpaṇas."

That night, remorse arose in the noble one, and he thought: "Since that perfume-stall boy possesses fresh faith, there will surely be some occasion on which those kārṣāpaṇas will be taken from him." So the next morning he rose early, brought a boy with him, and went to the marketplace. He saw the perfume-stall boy sitting there opening his stall, and said to him: "Good fellow, give back those kārṣāpaṇas." "Noble sir, the merchants' assembly has established a rule that whoever arrives last among us when the shade of the parasol has shifted shall be fined sixty kārṣāpaṇas. Since I belong to the merchants' assembly, please keep them just for a moment until I return. What poor wretch do you think will fill your belly, and who do you think will crouch folding and unfolding their knees sitting here? If you leave without giving them back, I will have you summoned to trial before King Prasenajit of Kośala for a debt of sixty kārṣāpaṇas."

The perfume-stall boy flew into a rage and flung down the bundle of kārṣāpaṇas, and the seal broke. The noble one said: "Did the seal break? Has it not been untied? Has it not been tampered with? Let it be inspected. Did I entrust it to you after examining it? If you accepted it without examining it, why do you now break the seal?"

The noble one kept the perfume-stall boy detained in this way until the merchants' assembly had pledged sixty kārṣāpaṇas from his household as surety. The mother then said to him: "Son, what have you done? You have now had yourself summoned to trial for sixty kārṣāpaṇas." The boy said: "Those who place their faith in the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya, come to this: a sprout of faith no sooner arises than it is caused to wither." It was at this point that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this founding occasion, and this context, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowing yet feigning not to know" — and so forth, also as before.

The Blessed One, the awakened one, questioned the venerable Nanda: "Nanda, is it true that you did something so unbecoming?" "Reverend Sir, I did."

The Blessed One, the awakened one, rebuked him, saying that it was conduct unworthy of a śramaṇa, conduct not in accordance with the way, not fitting, not in conformity with the rule — and that it was not something a person who has gone forth ought to do. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving these ten benefits, one ought to establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "Let my hearers rehearse this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

If a king, or a great minister, or a brahmin, or a householder, or a townsman, or a villager, or a wealthy person, or a merchant, or a caravan leader, wishing to present a monk with the price of a robe, dispatches it by the hand of a messenger — and if that messenger, carrying those funds, goes to where that monk is and says: 'Venerable one, be pleased to know that a king, or a great minister, or a brahmin, or a householder, or a townsman, or a villager, or a wealthy person, or a merchant, or a caravan leader, out of respect, sends these funds for robes. Noble one, please accept them out of compassion' — then that monk shall say to the messenger: 'Friend, messenger, monks are not permitted to accept funds for robes. When robes of the right kind are obtainable at the proper time, we will accept them.'

If that messenger then says to that monk: 'Noble one, does someone here act as steward for the noble ones? Does someone here carry out the business of the noble ones?' — then the monk, being desirous of a robe, shall indicate the Ānanda grove keeper, or a male lay practitioner who acts as steward, saying: 'This person is the steward for monks; this person carries out the business of monks.'

The messenger shall then take those robe funds, go to where that steward is, and upon arriving, say to him: 'Friend, steward, be aware — these robe funds: with them purchase such-and-such a robe, and when the monk named such-and-such comes, present him with the robe at the proper time.' The messenger shall instruct and inform him clearly and thoroughly.

The messenger shall then go back to where that monk is and, upon arriving, say to him: 'Noble one, the steward you indicated to me — I have duly informed him. Noble one, go to him, and he will present you with a robe at the proper time.'

The monk who is desirous of a robe shall go to the steward and say: 'Friend, steward, I am in need of a robe. Friend, steward, I am in need of a robe' — prompting him two times, three times. He shall prompt him and remind him. If, having prompted and reminded him two or three times, the robe is obtained, that is well and good. If it is not obtained, he shall remain silent in that quarter up to four, five, or six times. If, remaining silent up to four, five, or six times, the robe is obtained, that is well and good. If it is not obtained, then, making further effort beyond that to obtain the robe — if the robe is obtained, an offense requiring expiation (pācittika) is incurred. If it is not obtained, he should go to the place from which those robe funds came."

"Furthermore, if the reliable messenger sent by venerable persons to convey robe funds on behalf of a senior monk has accomplished nothing for that monk's purpose, the venerable ones should be sent word: 'Know that we have accomplished nothing for that monk's purpose — please do not let your own wealth go to waste.' That is the proper procedure in that case.

'On behalf of a monk' means: on behalf of a son of the Śākyas, Ānanda, or anyone else of that kind.

'A king' means the following: whether a woman who has been anointed with sovereignty over a kingdom — such a one too is a king anointed over the royal class with the crown — or whether members of the royal class, the brahmin class, the merchant class, or the common class have been anointed with sovereignty over a kingdom, such a one too is a king anointed over the royal class with the crown.

'A great minister' means those other than the king — ministers, accountants, and senior officials — who govern the kingdom, who live by mutual agreement on confidential matters, and who maintain their livelihood in dependence on the king.

'Or a brahmin' means a brahmin of pure caste.

'Or a householder' means a wealthy person.

'Or a townsman' means a person of a city.

'Or a country person' means a person of a village.

'Or a man of wealth' means one who is wealthy through his riches.

'Or a merchant' means one who wears a turban.

'By a caravan leader' means one who has gone beyond the agreed number two or three times.

'Into the hands of a messenger' means into the hands of a male, a female, or a eunuch.

'Robe funds' means gold or silver.

'If he says' means if he speaks.

'A suitable robe' means one that is fit for use.

'If the monk, wishing a robe' means if he seeks one.

'The attendant of Ānanda's grove' means one who renders it suitable.

'A layman' means one who has gone for refuge to the Three Jewels and has taken the five bases of training (the five precepts).

'In a quarter' means in the four quarters. What are these four quarters? They are: the place of calling, the place of residence, the far end of a task, and the place of a task. The place of calling is the potter's workshop and the weaver's workshop. The place of residence is a house or a waterside dwelling. The far end of a task means the far end of sugarcane work, the far end of rice cultivation, and the far end of salt production. The place of a task means a shop or a market.

'He shall remain silent' means through the six modes of prompting. What are these six modes of prompting? They are: when someone says 'Have you come?' — he says 'It is for that reason'; when someone says 'Welcome' — he says 'It is for that reason'; when someone says 'Please sit on this seat' — he says 'It is for that reason'; when someone says 'Please wash your feet' — he says 'It is for that reason'; when someone says 'Please eat food and refreshments' — he says 'It is for that reason'; and when someone says 'Please drink a drink' — he says 'It is for that reason.' If the six modes of prompting are delivered too quickly and without pause, leaving no room for another's words, then it is said that the six modes of prompting have not been completed. If the six modes of prompting are delivered not too quickly, with pauses, and allowing room for another's words, then it is said that the six modes of prompting have been completed.

'After that' means below that point, thereafter.

'If the robe is obtained' means if it is received.

'An offense requiring expiation is incurred' — it is declared that, having abandoned the object, one must confess the offense of expiation; hence it is called 'an offense requiring expiation.'

'He should go to the place from which those robe funds came' means he himself should go there."

Alternatively, "from a messenger who has been prompted" means from a companion or attendant.

"That is the proper procedure in that case" means that is the conforming Dharma in that case.

As for how a transgression arises in that case: if the donor comes to that monk and says, "Noble one, please accept these robes," then that monk must say to the donor, "I have already abandoned these; go and give them to that very person." If the donor then says to that monk, "Noble one, I shall do what is needed to win his acceptance; please take them," then the monk may accept them.

If the monk takes anything at all without having followed that procedure, an offense results in every case.

If a non-human being makes the gift, the messenger is a non-human, and a non-human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a non-human being makes the gift, the messenger is a non-human, and a human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a non-human being makes the gift, the messenger is human, and a non-human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a human makes the gift, the messenger is a non-human, and a non-human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a human makes the gift, the messenger is human, and a non-human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a human makes the gift, the messenger is a non-human, and a human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a non-human being makes the gift, the messenger is human, and a human makes the transaction fit, an offense results. If a human makes the gift, the messenger is human, and a human makes the transaction fit, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and without having relinquished and separated from it and without having confessed the offense he obtains another robe, that one too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuum. If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished it but without having separated from it and without having confessed the offense he obtains another robe, that one too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuum. If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished and separated from it but without having confessed the offense he obtains another robe, that one too becomes subject to forfeiture by reason of the former continuum. If a monk's robe has become subject to forfeiture, and having relinquished and separated from it and having confessed the offense he obtains another robe, in that case there is no offense.

Likewise, for as long as the monk has not confessed and individually confessed that basis, if he keeps nearby an alms bowl, a Dharma robe, a net, a small bowl, a belt, or any other implement of a renunciant's livelihood, that too becomes subject to forfeiture. There is no offense for one who acted for the first time, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feelings.

The tenth forfeiture, the forfeiture by dispatch, is complete.

Summary verse:

Wool alone, two shares,
Six, a cubit's span, the road,
Washing, gold and silver,
Explicit claiming, and buying and selling.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time monks were making and having made seats of wool. When monks made and had made seats of wool, because wool was scarce and precious there became much work and much activity, and they abandoned scriptural recitation, reading, chanting, yoga, mental application, and inner calm abiding of the mind. Those who wanted wool, and those who came for the very purpose of wool, repeatedly made inquiry of brahmins and householders. Other non-Buddhists, who were learned, said of them: "These renunciants, sons of the Śākya, are ones who take life — they have not turned back from taking life, have not abandoned it, have not individually abandoned it — and therefore they make and have made seats of wool." Because they made and had made seats of wool, they destroyed and took the lives of many living creatures, hosts of insects that arise within the wool. Whoever thought to give alms to these shaven-headed renunciants — they reviled them, derided them, and spoke ill of them.

On that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this as the basis, and on this occasion, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and the rest proceeds as before. "The awakened Blessed Ones, while knowing, act without concealment" — and so forth, also as before.

The awakened Blessed One questioned the monks: "Monks, is it true that you make seats of wool?" "Venerable One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One then rebuked having great desires, not knowing contentment, being difficult to sustain, and being difficult to satisfy. After that, the Blessed One spoke in praise of having few desires, knowing contentment, being easy to sustain, being easy to satisfy, wearing simple robes, using few possessions, having the quality of refinement, being of good appearance, and knowing warmth. Then he declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing these ten benefits clearly, a rule of training is to be established for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk makes a seat of wool commits an offense requiring abandonment.

'Whatever monk' refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. 'A seat of wool' refers to two kinds of seat: one that is filled inside and one that is a pad — and here both are intended. 'Makes' is understood in two senses: making anew, and making from what has been obtained — and here 'making anew' is intended. 'If he makes it' — whether he does so himself or has another do it. 'Commits an offense requiring abandonment' means that, having abandoned the item, he is to confess the transgression of an offense requiring abandonment. Therefore it is called 'an offense requiring abandonment.'

In that regard, one may ask: how does a transgression come about? It comes about through bundles, through layers, and through heaps. If a monk separates, destroys, or tears apart bundles of wool, then for as long as he has not made the seat, it is a wrongdoing; once the seat has been made, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment. If a monk separates, destroys, or tears apart layers of wool, then for as long as he has not made the seat, it is a wrongdoing; once the seat has been made, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment. If a monk separates, destroys, or tears apart heaps of wool, then for as long as he has not made the seat, it is a wrongdoing; once the seat has been made, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

If a monk separates, destroys, or tears apart bundles and layers, bundles and heaps, layers and bundles, layers and heaps, heaps and bundles, heaps and layers, bundles and layers and heaps, bundles and layers and heaps — in all their combinations — then for as long as he has not made the seat, it is a wrongdoing; once the seat has been made, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

As for one who obtains a completed seat and makes full use of a completed seat —

There is no offense for one who is refurbishing something old. There is no offense for a first offender, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations. The eleventh section, the abandonment of wool fleece, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, certain monks were making seats entirely of black sheep's wool and were having them made. Now because they were making and having made seats entirely of black sheep's wool, black sheep's wool being rare and costly, this gave rise to much work and many tasks — receiving scriptural transmission, reading, recitation, yoga, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding were being abandoned. Those who desired only black sheep's wool, and those who came for the sole purpose of black sheep's wool, were repeatedly soliciting brahmins and householders. Monks criticize this matter of so little importance: "Why are monks making seats entirely of black sheep's wool and having them made? Because black sheep's wool is rare and costly, this gives rise to much work and many tasks — receiving scriptural transmission, reading, recitation, yoga, mental application, and the practice of inner calm abiding are abandoned. Those who desire only black sheep's wool, and those who come for the sole purpose of black sheep's wool, repeatedly solicit brahmins and householders." They criticized, they raised an outcry, and they spread it about. Thereupon, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this founding case, and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, act as if unknowing — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One addressed the monks: "Is it true, monks, that you have been making seats entirely of black sheep's wool?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One reproached those of great desire, those who do not know contentment, those who are difficult to support, and those who are difficult to satisfy.

Then the Blessed One, having praised those of few desires, contentment, ease of support, ease of satisfaction, frugality, restraint in material things, the quality of refinement, beauty, and knowledge of what is sufficient, addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk makes a seat entirely of black sheep's wool incurs an offense requiring abandonment."

Now, "whatever monk" means one who belongs to this Dharma. "Wool" means sheep's wool. "Entirely of black" means four kinds of black: naturally black, darkened by blue, muddy black, and dark reddish-brown. "Seat" means two kinds of seat: one with an inner frame and a rug; in this context it is the rug that is intended. "Makes" means two kinds of making: making it as something new, and making it from something found; in this context it is making it as something new that is intended. "If he makes it" means whether he does so himself or has another make it. "Incurs an offense requiring abandonment" means that having abandoned that object, the offense requiring abandonment is to be confessed; therefore it is called an offense requiring abandonment. Thus it was taught.

Now, how does the transgression arise? It arises in three ways: through a bundle, through a layer, and through a heap. If a monk separates, destroys, or pulls apart a bundle of nothing but black sheep's wool, then for as long as he does not make a seat from it, it remains a wrongdoing; but once he has made the seat, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment. If a monk separates, destroys, or pulls apart a layer of nothing but black sheep's wool, then for as long as he does not make a seat from it, it remains a wrongdoing; but once he has made the seat, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment. If a monk separates, destroys, or pulls apart a heap of nothing but black sheep's wool, then for as long as he does not make a seat from it, it remains a wrongdoing; but once he has made the seat, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment. If a monk separates, destroys, or pulls apart any combination of bundle and layer, bundle and heap, layer and bundle, layer and heap, heap and bundle, heap and layer, bundle and layer and heap, from nothing but black sheep's wool, then for as long as he does not make a seat from it, it remains a wrongdoing; but once he has made the seat, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

There is no offense for one who uses something already made, who makes full use of something already made, or who makes use of something found. There is no offense for one who is a first offender, who is mentally deranged, whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by feeling.

The twelfth offense requiring abandonment, that concerning nothing but black wool, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One had declared that monks must not make seats of nothing but black sheep's wool. Thereupon those monks, mixing in some white wool and some coarse wool together with nothing but black sheep's wool, proceeded to make seats and to have seats made. This activity, together with having it done, brought about many tasks and many duties; and they gave up the recitation of scripture, reading, memorization, yoga practice, mental application, and inner calm abiding of the mind. They repeatedly informed brahmins and householders who had come with desires and for that very purpose about these activities, saying: "Why do monks of little purpose make seats of nothing but black sheep's wool mixed with some white wool and some coarse wool, and have such seats made? This activity and having it done brings about many tasks and many duties, and leads them to abandon the recitation of scripture, reading, memorization, yoga practice, mental application, and the inner calm abiding of the mind; and they repeatedly inform brahmins and householders who have come with desires and for that very purpose." Thus they censured them, ridiculed them, and spoke ill of them. On that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and these circumstances, convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, inquire knowingly, and so forth, likewise as before.

The Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, is it true that when I had declared that monks must not make seats of nothing but black sheep's wool, you proceeded to mix in some white wool and some coarse wool and to make seats of nothing but black sheep's wool, and to have such seats made?"

"Venerable one, it is so." The buddha, the Blessed One, censured those of great desire, of no moderation, who were difficult to sustain and difficult to satisfy.

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of few desires, of moderation, of ease of sustenance, of ease of satisfaction, of restraint, of frugality with requisites, of qualities refined through training, of dignity, and of knowing warmth, and he addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing fully these ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to take up this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk makes a new sitting mat, two parts of it must be made from nothing but black sheep's wool, the third part from white wool, and the fourth part from coarse wool.

If a monk makes a new sitting mat without putting in two parts of nothing but black sheep's wool, without putting in a third part of white wool, and without putting in a fourth part of coarse wool, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment.

Regarding the phrase 'a monk': one who belongs to this Dharma community. Regarding 'mat': there are two kinds of mat, the enclosed kind and the open kind; here the open mat is what is intended. Regarding 'new': there are two kinds of new, new by being newly made and new by being newly obtained; here new by being newly made is what is intended. Regarding 'makes': whether one makes it oneself or causes another to make it.

Regarding the phrase 'two parts must be made from nothing but black sheep's wool': 'sheep's wool' means the wool of sheep. 'Nothing but black' means the four kinds of black: naturally black, dark with a bluish cast, mud-colored, and dark brown. Regarding 'the third part from white': 'white' means the wool from the belly, the wool from the back, and the wool from the neck. Regarding 'the fourth part must be made from coarse wool': 'coarse wool' means the wool from the legs, the wool from the head, and the wool from the belly-region. Regarding 'without putting in': without mixing in. 'It is a transgression entailing relinquishment' means that, having relinquished that article, one must confess the offense of transgression; hence it is called a transgression entailing relinquishment.

How does the transgression arise? If a monk makes a sitting mat of ten tolas weight, he must put in five tolas of nothing but black sheep's wool, two and a half tolas of white wool, and two and a half tolas of coarse wool. If a monk makes a new sitting mat without putting in two parts of nothing but black sheep's wool, without putting in a third part of white wool, and without putting in a fourth part of coarse wool, once the mat is completed it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

In the same way as for a mat of ten tolas, if a monk makes a sitting mat of twenty tolas, thirty tolas, forty tolas, or fifty tolas, he must put in twenty-five tolas of nothing but black sheep's wool, twelve and a half tolas of white wool, and twelve and a half tolas of coarse wool. If a monk makes a new sitting mat without putting in two parts of nothing but black sheep's wool, without putting in a third part of white wool, and without putting in a fourth part of coarse wool, once the mat is completed it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk, falling short by even one tola or half a tola of white wool or coarse wool, makes a new sitting mat from nothing but black sheep's wool, it is in every case a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If only black wool is available, if white wool and coarse wool cost the same, or if white wool and coarse wool are scarce or expensive, there is no offense. Likewise there is no offense for one who is a first offender, for one who is deranged, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The thirteenth rule, concerning relinquishment for mixing in two parts, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, something of this kind occurred among the monks: there was an excess of sitting mats. The monks would say of a mat, "This one is far too long," or "This one is far too short," and discard it to have another one made. They would say, "This mat is far too narrow," or "This one is far too wide," or "This one is, in every single respect, full of holes, worn through, and beyond repair," and discard it to have another one made. Because the monks kept making sitting mats and discarding them over and over, they found themselves with an abundance of tasks and an abundance of work to do, and they abandoned the recitation of scripture, reading aloud, chanting, the practice of yoga, contemplation, and the cultivation of inner calm abiding.

Certain monks of few wants complained about this, reproached the others, and made their displeasure known, saying: "Why has this occurred among the monks — this excess of sitting mats — such that they say of a mat, 'This one is far too long,' or 'This one is far too short,' and discard it to have another one made; or say, 'This mat is far too narrow,' or 'This one is far too wide,' or 'This one is, in every single respect, full of holes, worn through, and beyond repair,' and discard it to have another one made? Because these monks keep making sitting mats and discarding them over and over, they have an abundance of tasks and an abundance of work to do, and they abandon the recitation of scripture, reading aloud, chanting, the practice of yoga, contemplation, and the cultivation of inner calm abiding." These monks criticized, censured, and spread the matter widely.

Then those monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Whereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident and in regard to this occasion and circumstance, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed One, buddhas and blessed ones, knowingly caused inquiry to be made — and so forth as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, then asked the monks: "Is it true, monks, that something of this kind occurred among you — that you were saying of a mat, 'This one is far too long,' or 'This one is far too short,' and discarding it to have another one made; or saying, 'This mat is far too narrow,' or 'This one is far too wide,' or 'This one is, in every single respect, full of holes, worn through, and beyond repair,' and discarding it to have another one made?" The venerable ones replied: "It is true, Blessed One."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, then rebuked them for their great wanting, their lack of contentment, their difficulty in being nourished, and their difficulty in being satisfied. After that, the Blessed One praised the virtues of having few wants, contentment, ease of nourishment, ease of satisfaction, conscientiousness, restraint in the use of requisites, diligence, elegance, and sensitivity to warmth. Then the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten true benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall observe this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk makes a new sitting mat, he is to keep the old one for six years against his will. If a monk, having kept the old sitting mat for fewer than six years — whether he has discarded it or not — makes a new sitting mat, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment." Thus the Blessed One, the Buddha, laid down this rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was then dwelling in a forest dwelling, in a forest grove.

The dwelling place was cold and windy, and the monks who could not manage with a sitting mat for six years found that the cold caused them to fall into a decline in their monastic work. Now, the Blessed Ones, the Buddhas, know and yet ask. They know and ask; they know and yet do not ask; they ask at the right time and not at the wrong time; they ask when it is purposeful and do not ask when it is without purpose. And so the Blessed Ones, the Buddhas, ward off with a preliminary formality anything that would be purposeless to ask about. In matters where asking would be purposeful, the Blessed Ones, the Buddhas, know the right time. And so the Blessed One, the Buddha, asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why have the monks who cannot manage with a sitting mat fallen into a decline in their monastic work?" "Blessed One, it is as you have ordained — that if a monk makes a new sitting mat he is to keep the old one for six years against his will; that if a monk, having kept the old sitting mat for fewer than six years — whether he has discarded it or not — makes a new sitting mat, it is a transgression entailing relinquishment. And so those monks who cannot manage with a sitting mat for six years have been laid low by the cold in their monastic work." The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, a monk who cannot manage with a sitting mat for six years should request a leave regarding sitting mats, for fewer than six years, from the Saṅgha. He should make the request as follows: Having arranged the seats, struck the wooden signal board, properly informed the monks with the words of inquiry, and assembled the entire harmonious Saṅgha, that monk with the hand-robe should place his robe over one shoulder, bow in order of seniority, sit on his haunches at the edge where the seniors are, join his palms together, and speak these words: 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. I, the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such, am unable to manage with a sitting mat for six years. I, the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such, request of the Saṅgha a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years. May the venerable Saṅgha, out of compassion, grant me, the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such, a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years out of compassion.' He should make this request in the same way a second and a third time. Those monks should not go to the monk with the hand-robe out of faith or trust alone; rather, the entire Saṅgha should go to him, or else monks appointed by the Saṅgha should be sent, and those sent should have the sitting mat brought before their own eyes, or else the sitting mat should be brought up into the midst of the Saṅgha. If the mat is too long, they should cut it. If it is too short, they should add stuffing. If it is too wide, they should cut it. If it is too narrow, they should add stuffing. If it is frayed and worn through, they should add stuffing. If it is entirely worn through in every part, the flesh is gone, and it cannot be repaired, then one monk should thereafter make a motion and perform the act: 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such requests of the Saṅgha a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years, being unable to manage with a sitting mat for six years. If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha grant the leave. The Saṅgha grants the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years.' This is the motion."

The formal act is to be performed as follows. "May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. This monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such is unable to manage with a sitting mat for six years and requests of the Saṅgha a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years. For that reason, if the Saṅgha grants the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years, then those venerable ones who consent to granting the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha has consented and approved, and the Saṅgha has granted the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years. Since no one has spoken, it is held to be so."

The Saṅgha having granted a leave regarding sitting mats for fewer than six years to the monk with the hand-robe named such-and-such, that monk should be made to use a sitting mat for fewer than six years, and in this matter there should be no regret.

Thereupon the Blessed One spoke words of praise for those who desire the training, who respect the training, and who are content with the requisites of the training. He then addressed the monks with words that were in harmony with this, that surpassed it, and that were suited to it, and he declared to the monks: "Monks, that which came before was a rule, and this now is a permission. My hearers should take up this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk makes a new sitting mat, he should keep it for six years even if he does not want to. If, within fewer than six years, a monk — whether he has discarded the old sitting mat or has not discarded it — makes another new sitting mat, that is an offense with forfeiture, except when the Saṅgha has granted a leave. As for the phrase 'a monk': this refers to one who follows this Dharma. As for the phrase 'a sitting mat': there are two kinds of sitting mat — the bordered and the unbordered; here the unbordered is intended. As for the phrase 'makes new': there are two senses of new — new by being newly made, and new by being newly acquired; here the sense of newly made is intended. As for the phrase 'makes': whether one makes it oneself or directs another to make it. As for the phrase 'he should keep it for six years even if he does not want to': he should keep it for the full extent of six years. As for the phrase 'if, within fewer than six years': that is, within that full period. As for the phrase 'the old sitting mat': it is whatever sitting mat he already has. As for the phrase 'whether he has discarded it or has not discarded it, makes another new sitting mat': that is the second case. As for the phrase 'except when the Saṅgha has granted a leave': setting aside the case where the Saṅgha has granted leave. As for the phrase 'an offense with forfeiture': having forfeited that object, the forfeiture offense is to be confessed — and therefore it is called 'an offense with forfeiture.'"

As to how transgressions arise in this regard, a summary verse on the intermediate rule:

Beginning two and grasping the later;
beginning two and grasping the earlier;
grasping two and then discarding one;
beginning two and giving both away;
and on the sixth year, no offense —
this is the summation of the sitting mat rule.

If in the very year in which a monk begins a sitting mat he also begins a second sitting mat, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it likewise incurs a wrongdoing; there is, however, no defeat with respect to the first. Even if he does not begin a second sitting mat in that same year, if he begins a second sitting mat in the second year, the third year, the fourth year, or the fifth year, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it likewise incurs a wrongdoing; there is, however, no defeat with respect to the first.

If in the very year in which a monk begins a sitting mat he also begins a second sitting mat and, before completing the first, completes the second, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it incurs a forfeiture-entailing transgression; there is, however, no transgression with respect to the first. Even if he does not complete the second sitting mat begun in that same year, if in the second year, the third year, the fourth year, or the fifth year he begins a second sitting mat and, before completing the first, completes the second, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it incurs a forfeiture-entailing transgression; there is, however, no transgression with respect to the first.

If in the very year in which a monk makes a sitting mat he also makes a second sitting mat, and he then consecrates the first and gives away the second, or keeps the second and gives away the first, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it incurs a forfeiture-entailing transgression; there is, however, no transgression with respect to the first. Even if he does not make a second sitting mat in that same year, if in the second year, the third year, the fourth year, or the fifth year he makes a second sitting mat, and he then keeps the first and gives away the second, or keeps the second and gives away the first, beginning that second one incurs a wrongdoing, and completing it incurs a forfeiture-entailing transgression; there is, however, no transgression with respect to the first.

If in the very year in which a monk begins a sitting mat he also begins a second one and abandons it before completing it, or if he begins it in the second year, the third year, the fourth year, or the fifth year and abandons it before completing it, beginning it in each such instance incurs five wrongdoings; there is, however, no transgression with respect to the first.

If a monk does not make a second sitting mat in that same year, nor in the second year, nor in the third year, nor in the fourth year, nor in the fifth year, but makes one in the sixth year, there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression for one who is a first-time offender, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by pain.

This concludes the fourteenth forfeiture — the forfeiture pertaining to keeping a sitting mat for six years.

The Vinaya Analysis. The thirty-second fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At the time when the Blessed One had fully realized unsurpassed knowledge, the sound rang out everywhere throughout the central land: "A buddha has arisen in the world." Merchants traveling on the northern road heard that a buddha had arisen in the world in the central land, and that those who made offerings to him would gain offerings of tremendous fruit, tremendous benefit, great renown, and wide reach. Upon hearing this, they thought to themselves: "Let us take our loads of goods and travel to Śrāvastī; there we shall accomplish our trade as well as pay homage to the Blessed One." And so five hundred merchants, taking their loads of goods, set out from the northern road and journeyed to the central land. When they had at length arrived at Śrāvastī, they set down their loads of goods and went to where the householder Anāthapiṇḍada was. They said to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada: "Householder, we wish to behold the Blessed One, the buddha." The knowledgeable Anāthapiṇḍada replied: "Friends, Tathāgatas — arhats, perfectly and fully awakened buddhas — are truly precious to behold. Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and fully awakened buddhas appear as rarely as the udumbara flower blossoms and comes forth." Thereupon the householder Anāthapiṇḍada led those five hundred merchants to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, they bowed their heads at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side.

Having sat down to one side, the Blessed One then taught those merchants with a Dharma-rich discourse, rightly presenting it, rightly establishing them in it, rightly praising it, and rightly delighting them in it. With many categories of Dharma-rich talk he rightly taught, rightly established, rightly praised, and rightly delighted them, and then fell silent.

Thereupon those merchants paid homage to the Blessed One and began to tour the assembly halls of the elder monks. As they moved among the sleeping quarters of the elder monks, those merchants saw that the mats there were worn through in the middle. Seeing this, they said to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada: "Householder, why are the mats of these elder monks worn through in the middle?" Anāthapiṇḍada replied: "These great ones for the most part spend the night sitting in meditation." Their minds filled with confident faith, and from that faith which had arisen they offered the monks five hundred great bolts of cloth. The monks then placed those old, worn-out mats in an uncovered storage area of the great hall.

At that time, a certain householder invited the Saṅgha of monks to his home at midday, and the Saṅgha of monks went. The Blessed One, however, remained behind in the storehouse and occupied himself with gathering alms. Now, awakened ones, blessed ones, remain in a storehouse and attend to the gathering of alms for five reasons. What are those five? They wish to rest inwardly in meditative composure; they wish to teach the Dharma to the gods; they wish to visit the sick; they wish to inspect the sleeping quarters; and they wish to lay down training rules for the hearers in the Vinaya. In this instance, the Blessed One remained in the storehouse and attended to the gathering of alms because he wished to inspect the sleeping quarters and to lay down training rules for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Then, not long after the Saṅgha of monks had gone, the Blessed One understood what had occurred, took his key, and from one courtyard to another courtyard, from one assembly hall to another assembly hall, from one dwelling to another dwelling, from one walkway to another, he passed along and proceeded gradually until he came to where the great hall was. At that time in the great hall there lay spread upon the floor a great many old, worn, tattered mats, all mixed with dust and grime. The Blessed One beheld those many old, worn, tattered mats, all mixed with dust and grime, lying spread upon the floor. Beholding them he exclaimed, "What a shame!" and, deeply moved, he thought: "The faith-filled brahmins and householders who, squeezing and squeezing out their skin, flesh, and blood, give gifts and make merit — the monks consume what those persons give without any warmth of feeling and without discerning reflection." Then the Blessed One carefully swept and shook out those old mats, dried them and aired them, arranged them without letting them touch the walls, and rinsed his two feet outside the assembly hall. Then he entered the assembly hall in order to rest inwardly in meditative composure.

Then a certain monk who had been gathering alms, having collected his alms, went to where the Blessed One was. Now, awakened ones, blessed ones, when attending to a monk who is gathering alms by performing the customary work of monks — how does one receive food from a monk?

"Did he satisfy the community of monks?" — thus individually gladdening them. It was by this act of individually gladdening them that he gladdened them. The Blessed One, attending to a monk gathering alms, individually gladdens them with the words: "Did you satisfy the community of monks?" And that monk replied: "Venerable One, I gathered alms for Tebo and satisfied the community of monks."

Then, after the Blessed One had taken his meal, he rinsed his two feet outside the assembly hall and entered the assembly hall in order to rest inwardly in meditative composure. Later, in the afternoon, the Blessed One arose from meditative composure and took his seat on the mat that had been spread before the community of monks. Having seated himself, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, I knew that not long after the community of monks had gone out, and so I took the key and went from courtyard to courtyard, from assembly hall to assembly hall, from building to building, from walking path to walking path. As I walked along and came at last to a certain great assembly hall, there in that great assembly hall I saw a great many old mats, crumbling and worn to tatters, scattered on the ground mixed with fine dust. When I saw this I was dismayed, and thinking critically to myself: 'The faithful brahmins and householders who give gifts by squeezing from their very skin, flesh, and blood — who are making merit — these monks use what is given without gratitude and without discerning reflection.' Therefore, monks, it would be well if, with respect to what is given in faith, you were to make use of things with gratitude, to make use of things with renunciation, to make use of things at the right time, to make use of things with discernment, and to make use of things with care."

A summary verse:

With gratitude, and with renunciation, likewise at the right time, with discernment, and with care — so should one make use.

Then, having spoken in praise of making use with gratitude, renunciation, timeliness, discernment, and care, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing these ten benefits, one should establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — " and so forth, as before. "My hearers should recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should a monk make a new mat, he is to have it bordered all around with old mat-material one sugata-span wide, so as to dull the brightness of the new color. If a monk makes a new mat without having it bordered all around with old mat-material one sugata-span wide — so as to dull the brightness of the new color — that is an offense requiring relinquishment."

As for the terms of the rule: "A monk" refers to one who follows this Dharma. "A mat" means a specific mat. "New" — there are two kinds of newness: new by being freshly made, and new by having been newly obtained. In this context, newness by being freshly made is what is intended. "Makes" means doing it oneself or causing another to do it. "So as to dull the brightness of the new color" means in order to make the new mat's appearance less striking. "Bordered all around with old mat-material one sugata-span wide" — this applies if he has other old mat-material measuring one sugata-span to border it with. "Sugata" means the Teacher. The sugata-span is one and a half standard forearm-lengths, plus a span.

"Bordered all around" means that there is a raised edge on every side. "Shall be joined" means it shall be attached. "Without joining" means without having attached it. "An offense of abandonment" means that having set that item aside, the transgression of the abandonment offense is to be confessed. That is why it is taught as an offense of abandonment.

Now, how does the transgression come about? If a monk uses a new mat while the old mat has not been bordered all around with a sugata-span of old mat-material — even if only a little portion remains unbordered — then in every case it becomes an abandonment offense. If all parts of the entire old mat have completely worn away, or have fallen into holes, or are in a condition that cannot be repaired, there is no offense. If that much old material is simply unavailable, there is no offense. For one who is a novice practitioner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no offense.

This completes the fifteenth offense of abandonment, concerning the sugata-span.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six said: "Friends, Nandaka and Upanandaka — these fellows with their black alms-bowls anoint their feet with monkey-fat and, when they go out, procure gains; and when they return, they also procure gains from unexpected arrivals, and they become pleasing and agreeable to many people. As for us, we are like tortoises in a dried-up well — we go nowhere and come from nowhere, so how could we ever obtain gains or become pleasing and agreeable to many people? Let us also go out. Where shall we go? Wherever our purpose can be accomplished." They thought: "If we all go, the households that depend upon us for their needs will be taken over by those with black alms-bowls. So let one of us remain while the others go — but who shall remain? Venerable Chāraka." Then they said: "Venerable Chāraka, you stay right here. We shall go." And Chāraka agreed to stay.

The five began to seek a purpose, and seeing an opportunity to travel to Nepal, they went to those travelers and said: "Good sirs, where are you going?" "Noble ones, we are going to Nepal." "Good sirs, we would travel together with you." "Noble ones, Nepal is like the back of a drum — you will not find it to your liking." "Good sirs, even so, since we shall at least see the land, let us go." "Noble ones, if that is the case, then please come along." The group of six set out together with those travelers toward Nepal and eventually arrived there. On the very same day they arrived in Nepal, they became displeased with it, and early the next morning they rose and set out along the road. Some merchants saw the group of six and bowed at their feet, saying: "Noble ones, what was Nepal like? Did you not find it to your liking?" "Good sirs, on the very same day we arrived in Nepal, we became displeased with it." "Noble ones, did we not tell you from the very beginning that Nepal is like the back of a drum and that you would not find it to your liking?" "Good sirs, since that is the case, shall you come back now?" "Noble ones, we ourselves did not change our route — it was indeed as we said — but we have other merchant companions who did change their route; we have entrusted our goods to them, so please travel with them." The group of six said:

"Very well, we shall do just so." Now in Nepal there were two groups, the Nepalīs and the Doṇros, who were traveling companions. The Nepalīs loaded their wagons and set out, and the group of six also joined those companions and departed together. The customary practice of the group of six was this: fearing dust, they would either walk ahead of the companions or walk behind them as a rear party. And so they began walking behind those companions as a rear guard.

After a time, the axle of the merchants' wagon broke. The merchants thought to themselves: "If we repair the wagon axle, the noise will bring brigands, and they will first kill us and afterward steal our goods as well. Let us therefore take what is most precious to us and go." And so they halted in a state of gloom.

The group of six caught up and asked them: "Good sirs, why do you halt in such gloom?" "Noble ones, the wagon axle has broken, and if we repair the wagon axle the noise will bring brigands, who will first kill us and afterward steal our goods as well. Therefore we are going to take what is most precious to us and come along." "Good friends, do you have Nepali wool to spare?" "We do." "If it will not be a burden to you, please hand over a little in exchange for hats, tied sandals, inner upper-garments, silk cloth, whips, fine cords, and so forth." "Noble ones, what use is all this to us? Take everything."

The group of six said: "Friends, dear companions, cloth rags have been found!" And with that they packed all five sets of begging bowls and robes together into one bundle, had four men take ropes on the spot, made up four great heavy loads, and those men took them up and went.

As they were carrying those loads and making their way along, the merchants saw the group of six coming behind them bearing Nepali loads and said: "Noble ones, we had thought we would bring along hired hands — but you yourselves have carried all this wool and come! Noble ones, we will pay you a wage." "Poor fellows, are we your hired hands?" "Noble ones, even so, at least accept some payment." The group of six said: "Friends, dear companions, we have found cloth rags." And laughing at that, they went on.

Among those traveling together there were some non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) making their way along, and they said: "Alas, group of six — where your loads will be destroyed, there your gains will be fulfilled; where your mother's belly was torn open, there your loads will be destroyed and there your gains will be fulfilled." The group of six replied: "Friends, dear companions, if we go together with the companions, many disputes will arise — so we will go ahead of the companions." And saying so, they went on ahead of the companions.

At a certain cliff face, many bandits were posted in ambush to attack travelers. Those bandits spotted them from a great distance, and upon seeing them they grew alarmed and said to one another: "Good sirs, an army with elephants is coming!" And all those posted at the cliff face were frightened and fled into the forest.

Then some among them said: "These are not an army with elephants — this is some kind of female yaks coming." Others said: "These are not female yaks — these are oxen of some kind." Others said: "These are not oxen — these are people carrying loads." As they drew nearer, the bandits said:

"Noble ones, because you carry such loads as these, every man posted at the cliff face was frightened and fled into the forest. Poor fellows, if the bandits come to know that you are afraid of them, they will bind you in broad daylight and drag you off into the forest. Dear friends, if you travel by the main road, you will meet with many thieves, so go by the side road." And saying this, those people sent them off along the side road.

Then some gamblers, who had stationed many lame men to wait and watch for traders carrying dice, saw them coming and said: "Well now, traders carrying dice — why do you come entering the town by a side way?" "Poor men, are we your dice-carrying traders? Who are you?" "We are the group of six nobles. Let us pass." Those men said: "Dear friends, if you enter through the gate of the Jeta Grove, you will meet with many thieves among those with black bowls, so you should enter by the window." And so they entered through a window.

A gatekeeper saw them and said: "Well now, porters — why do you enter the settlement by a side way?" "Gatekeeper, are we your porters?" He asked: "Who are you then?" "We are the venerable group of six." "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome!" They went inside, set down those loads of wool, and the great heaps stood there resembling Mount Meru.

Then the monks said to them: "Venerable ones, carrying such loads as these — do you not attract thieves? Venerable ones, have you really gone to such trouble merely to fill your own mouths? Whatever is offered to us we should in turn give back doubled." The monks then reproached, rebuked, and upbraided them, saying: "Monks — why such paltry little aims? Monks, you fill yourselves by means of the very member by which you should be making others feel ashamed." And the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, on account of this occasion, and in this connection, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The awakened Blessed Ones, knowing full well, act as if unknowing — and so forth, as before. The awakened Blessed One questioned the group of six: "Monks, is it true that you committed such an unseemliness?" "Blessed One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One rebuked them, saying that this was unbecoming for a renunciant, was improper, was unfit, and was contrary to proper conduct — it was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. And after rebuking them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should a monk traveling a road come upon some sheep's wool and desire it, that monk may take it. Having taken it, if there is no one to carry it, he may carry it himself for up to a distance of three leagues. If he carries it beyond that, it is an offense requiring expiation.

'Monk' refers to the group of six or anyone else of that sort. 'Traveling a road' means traveling a road in a remote area."

"Sheep's wool" means wool from sheep. "Found" means obtained from another. "If he desires it" means if he seeks it for a purpose. "That monk may take it" means he may pick it up. "If there is no one to carry it" means if there is no one willing to do so. "Up to a distance of three leagues" means up to and not beyond the limit of three leagues. "He may carry it himself" means he himself may carry it. "If he carries it beyond that" means if he carries it further than that. "An offense requiring expiation" means that having set aside that object, one must confess the offense of expiation; and therefore it is called an offense requiring expiation.

Now, how does the offense occur? If a monk has found some sheep's wool and there is no one to carry it, and he carries it himself beyond three leagues, then at half a krośa he incurs a minor offense, and at the full krośa he incurs an offense requiring expiation. If, though there is someone to carry it, he carries it himself, then at the very moment of beginning he incurs a minor offense; at half a krośa he incurs another separate minor offense; and at the full krośa he incurs an offense requiring expiation.

Six very subtle particles make one subtle particle. Six subtle particles make one water particle. Six water particles make one iron particle. Six iron particles make one rabbit's dust particle. Six rabbit's dust particles make one sheep's dust particle. Six sheep's dust particles make one ox's dust particle. Six ox's dust particles make one sunbeam mote. Six sunbeam motes make one liceling. Six licelings make one louse. Six lice make one barleycorn. Six barleycorns make one finger-breadth. Twenty-four finger-breadths make one cubit. A cubit and a half plus four cubits makes a human fathom. Four cubits make a bow-length. Five hundred bow-lengths make one krośa. Eight krośas make one league.

Now, a monk dwelling in a remote area who has set out on a road and has found sheep's wool, takes it and, finding no one to carry it: at half the distance of the seventh village measured by a krośa, he incurs a minor offense, and at the village boundary he incurs an offense requiring expiation. If he then sets out from the village on the road to the remote dwelling, he incurs a minor offense at each half krośa, and an offense requiring expiation at each full krośa.

If one carries such wool to make a hat, sandals with straps, an inner garment for the upper body, a broad sash, a whisk, or a small bag and the like, there is no offense. Likewise there is no offense for one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is threatened by pain.

This completes the sixteenth rule, the expiation concerning carrying wool.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six monks said: "Let us divide the shares among Nandaka and Upananda." The other monks who were to receive shares said: "Our venerable Charka is right here among us — why give a share to him?" "Let it be six shares." Nandaka and Upananda replied: "We shall put those shares to the purpose of our venerable Charka who is staying here." Hearing this, Charka said: "Venerable ones, whatever gains you have obtained there, keep them for yourselves. Whatever gains I have obtained here while staying here shall remain mine." Then Upananda thought to himself: "By staying right here I stand to lose many gains," and he said: "Venerable ones, we are always a group of six — why should we now become a group of five? Let it remain a full group of six. Put forward someone. As for the venerable Charka, since he is not tired, let him be put forward." So Charka divided it into six shares and had his own share placed in his own quarters and set it aside.

Then the others said:

"Venerable Charka, take for yourself whatever gains you have obtained — go ahead and divide them up." Charka said: "In all that time I did not obtain so much as a single kakaṇi coin. You have deceived me." Charka thought to himself: "I have obtained a small amount of wool — to whom shall I entrust it for carding? If I entrust it to laypeople, since they have not properly taken up the precepts, all of it will be stolen. If I entrust it to members of the twelve sects, they will charge a fee for keeping it. If I entrust it to Dharmadatta, Dharmadatta is a specialist in the sūtras, and his retinue is likewise made up of sūtra specialists — while they are turning over the words of the sūtras in their minds, time will drag on. If I entrust it to the ascetic Gautamī, the ascetic Gautamī is a holder of the Vinaya, and her retinue too consists of Vinaya holders — while they are deliberating over what is a transgression and what is not a transgression, time will drag on. The great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, is not a renunciant, and her retinue consists of those who are renunciants; since carding wool would not disturb her one-pointed concentration, I shall entrust the wool to her for carding." As he was sitting there thinking these very thoughts, the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, came to where the Blessed One was. At that moment the venerable Charka, seeing her from a considerable distance, said: "Gautamī — the Blessed One has declared well when he said, 'By virtue of pure moral discipline, the aspiration of the mind endowed with moral discipline is fulfilled.' Now indeed I feel: 'Oh, if only the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, would come!' — and here you have come. Please card this small amount of wool I have obtained, and give it back. I bow at the feet of my noble lord, the Blessed One, and upon returning please send two nuns over and have them sent here with it." Charka bound those bundles of wool tightly into two bales with carding rope and placed them against the door panel. Then the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, bowed at the feet of the Blessed One and went into her summer residence, and sent two nuns to him with the instruction: "Go to the venerable Charka and say: 'We have been sent to deliver this wool to you today.'" The two of them went and said: "We come with a message from the noble Gautamī, bearing this wool to deliver to you." Charka said to the two of them: "There are two bales by the door panel — take them and go now." The two of them entered the quarters and began to lift the bales, but were unable to budge them even slightly. The two said: "Venerable one, have you perhaps put some additional rope weights in here?" Charka replied: "Young women, are you two flimsy little girls?" Then with one hand he hoisted up one bale and tossed it onto one of their heads, and with the other hand tossed the other bale onto the other's waist. "My head is broken!" said one. "My waist is broken!" said the other. They went into the summer residence, set the load down in the carrying place, laid it on top of a bed-frame, and sat down. The nuns said to the two of them: "Are you two flimsy little girls?" The two replied: "Whoever among you has strength — let her lift this." They began to lift it but were unable to budge it even slightly, and they said: "Noble ones, has he perhaps put some actual stones in here?" They then undid those two bales, and immediately it turned out to be one enormous great heap. The nuns burst into laughter and said: "The venerable Charka said it was just a little wool — if it were more, what would it be like?" The great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, said:

"Sisters, what shame is there in that for those of you who have shaved heads and tattered armpits? The venerable Charka said it was just a little wool — if it were more, what would it be like?" The great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, said: "Sisters, those ones are of evil conduct and wicked behavior, and by that conduct they incur a transgression against the Blessed One's teaching, causing a downfall. Sisters, the Blessed One has declared that these two are noble persons — those who do not take up a burden they have not assumed, and those who, having taken up a burden, carry it through to the end. Since this burden has been taken up, it must be carried through to the end. Therefore let each of you spin as much as you are inclined to spin, and carry it there and give it."

Those nuns delayed for a long time, and Charka thought: "They have stored that wool at the price of lodging, and it is not lost. I have done something wrong, and that wool of mine has become like something left out in the open at the mercy of the rain." The two nuns spun a load of wool and came bringing it, and said: "Venerable Charka, we have come bringing spun wool — where shall we put it?" Charka thought: "There is still more domain of activity remaining," and said: "Take it into the cell and set it down." Those two set it down and went. Then others also came bringing theirs. And so in due course all of them came bringing theirs.

Then the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, paid homage at the Blessed One's feet, and sat down to one side. At that time the two hands of the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, were red — red and extremely red, just like the hands of a washerwoman.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the great lady Gautamī, mother of beings, in these words: "Gautamī, why have your two hands become red and very red, like the hands of a washerwoman?" "Blessed One, if there is something else to be done here, then something else is being done. How did it come about? The venerable Charka gave me wool to spin." Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, do monks cause nuns who are not their relatives to spin sheep's wool?" "Venerable One, he did cause them to spin."

Then the Blessed One reproved this, and the occasion for it, and the circumstances of it, and convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The awakened Blessed Ones, while knowing, caused inquiry to be made — and so forth, also as before.

The awakened Blessed One addressed the venerable Charka: "Charka, is it true that you caused nuns who are not your relatives to spin sheep's wool?" "Venerable One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One censured him, saying that such conduct was not in accordance with the ascetic life, was not fitting, was not proper, was not in conformity with proper conduct, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits fully, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk causes a nun who is not his relative to spin sheep's wool by twisting it, or by combing it, or by spinning it — that is an offense requiring expiation.

Here, 'whatever monk' means one such as Charka or any other of that kind. 'Nun' means one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Who is not his relative' — seventh-degree cousins and closer than that count as relatives, Beyond that degree, they are not relatives. "Sheep's wool" means the wool of sheep. "By twisting it" means having her twist it, even just to draw it through water. "By combing it" means having her comb it, even just to draw it through dye. "By spinning it" means having her spin it, even just to draw it across the thread. "An offense requiring expiation" means that after forfeiting the article, the transgression requiring expiation is to be confessed — and therefore it is called an offense requiring expiation.

As for how the transgressions arise: if a monk, perceiving a nun who is not his relative as not his relative, has her twist sheep's wool, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her comb it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her spin it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her both twist and comb it, or twist and spin it, or comb and twist it, or comb and spin it, or spin and twist it, or spin and comb it, or twist, comb, and spin it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation.

If a monk, with uncertainty about whether a nun who is not his relative is or is not his relative, has her twist sheep's wool, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her comb it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her spin it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation. If he has her both twist and comb it, or twist and spin it, or comb and twist it, or comb and spin it, or spin and twist it, or spin and comb it, or twist, comb, and spin it, it becomes an offense requiring expiation.

If a monk, perceiving a nun who is his relative as not his relative, has her twist sheep's wool, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her comb it, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her spin it, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her both twist and comb it, or twist and spin it, or comb and twist it, or comb and spin it, or spin and twist it, or spin and comb it, or twist, comb, and spin it, it becomes a wrong deed.

If a monk, with uncertainty about whether a nun who is his relative is or is not his relative, has her twist sheep's wool, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her comb it, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her spin it, it becomes a wrong deed. If he has her both twist and comb it, or twist and spin it, or comb and twist it, or comb and spin it, or spin and twist it, or spin and comb it, or twist, comb, and spin it, it becomes a wrong deed.

There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful feelings.

This concludes the seventeenth forfeiture, the offense requiring expiation concerning having wool spun.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Rājagṛha, at the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove in the Veṇuvana. Then the headman Topknot Jewel went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Having sat to one side, the headman Topknot Jewel addressed the Blessed One with these words.

Venerable sir, in former times, long ago, in the royal palace, there was an assembly of the king and his ministers, and among those gathered in agreement, a conversation of this sort arose as a topic of discussion from time to time. The wise ones asked: Is it proper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and do the śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), sons of the Śākyas, take gold as their own? Or is it improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and do the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, not take gold as their own? At that, some spoke up saying: It is proper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do take gold as their own. Others spoke up saying: It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do not take gold as their own.

Venerable sir, with regard to those who speak thus, saying that it is proper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own and that the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do take gold as their own — if one were to explain things as they do, would one not be maligning the Blessed One and going too far? And would not those people be speaking in accordance with what the Blessed One has said, speaking the Dharma, explaining what is consistent with the Dharma? And would it not be the case that for those who speak in accordance with what has been said, there is nothing whatsoever that could rightly be criticized by others on the grounds of consistency with the Dharma?

Headman, those who say that it is proper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own and that the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do take gold as their own — in explaining things in that way, they malign from within and go too far. Those people are not speaking in accordance with what I have said, they are not speaking the Dharma, they are not explaining what is consistent with the Dharma. For those who do not speak in accordance with what has been said, there is indeed something that can rightly come to be criticized by others on the grounds of consistency with the Dharma. And why is that?

Headman, it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do not take gold as their own. If there is someone for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own, that is not the way of a śramaṇa, and it is not the way of a son of the Śākyas.

Headman, for this very reason I shall state the matter to you two and three times: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do not take gold as their own. If there is someone for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own, that is not the way of a śramaṇa, and it is not the way of a son of the Śākyas.

Venerable sir, how wonderful it is that the Blessed One has declared: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do not take gold as their own. If there is someone for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own, that is not the way of a śramaṇa, and it is not the way of a son of the Śākyas! How exceedingly well has the Blessed One spoken!

Venerable sir, as to why the Blessed One declared: Headman, for this very reason I shall state the matter to you two and three times — it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver as their own, and the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, do not take gold as their own —

If there is someone for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own, that is not the way of a śramaṇa, and it is not the way of a son of the Śākyas — that declaration of the Blessed One is exceedingly good. Venerable sir, I myself think this too: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own. Whoever is one for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own — that person is surely one for whom the five strands of sensual pleasure are likewise proper.

The Blessed One replied: Headman, it is exactly so. It is exactly so: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own. Whoever is one for whom it is proper to accept gold and silver and who does take gold as his own — that is not the way of a śramaṇa, and it is not the way of a son of the Śākyas.

Then the headman Cūḷadhanañjaya, having rejoiced in and applauded what the Blessed One had declared, bowed his head to the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from his presence.

Now at that time the venerable Ānanda was seated to one side of the Blessed One, holding a fan and fanning the Blessed One. Then, not long after the headman Cūḷadhanañjaya had departed, the Blessed One took the matter to mind and spoke to the venerable Ānanda: Ānanda, go to the Kalandaka Grove in the Bamboo Park and assemble in the meeting hall all the monks who are dwelling there in dependence upon that place.

The venerable Ānanda replied, "Yes, venerable sir, as you have commanded," and having heard the Blessed One, he went to the Kalandaka Grove in the Bamboo Park and assembled in the meeting hall all the monks who were dwelling there in dependence upon that place. He then went to where the Blessed One was, approached, paid homage at the Blessed One's feet, and sat down to one side.

Sitting to one side, the venerable Ānanda said this to the Blessed One: Venerable sir, all the monks who dwell in dependence upon the Kalandaka Grove in the Bamboo Park have assembled and gathered in the meeting hall. The Blessed One should now know that the time has come.

Then the Blessed One went to the meeting hall, arrived, and took his seat upon the mat that had been spread at the head of the assembly of monks. Once seated, the Blessed One said this to the monks: Monks, just now the headman Cūḷadhanañjaya came to me, paid homage at my two feet, and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the headman Cūḷadhanañjaya said this to me: Venerable sir, some time ago, when a former gathering of canopies was assembled — in the royal palace, with the king and ministers all gathered together — there arose in conversation this kind of topic in between: Wise ones, is it proper for monks to accept gold and silver, and do the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas take gold as their own? Or is it improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and do the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas not take gold as their own?

Some there said this: It is proper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do take gold as their own. Others there said this: It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own.

Venerable sir, in that matter, those who said this — that it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and that the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own —

Venerable sir, those who spoke in that way — when they instruct others in that manner — do they not thereby misrepresent the Blessed One, and do they not go to the other extreme? And do they not speak in accordance with what the Blessed One has said, speak the Dharma, instruct others in a teaching that accords with the Dharma, and speak in accordance with what was taught? And is there any teaching that accords with the Dharma, such that they could be faulted by others on the basis of that accord?

Saying this, I then spoke as follows: Village headman, those who say that it is proper for monks to accept gold and silver, and that the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do take gold as their own — when they instruct others in that manner, they do misrepresent me, and they do go to the other extreme. They do not speak in accordance with what I have taught, they do not speak the Dharma, they do not instruct others in a teaching that accords with the Dharma, and they do not speak in accordance with what was taught. For those who do not speak in accordance with what was taught, there will indeed come upon them some teaching by which others may rightly find fault on the basis of accord with the Dharma. And why is that? Village headman, it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own. Whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyas.

Village headman, on account of this very matter I will state it to you a second and a third time: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own. Whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyas.

Having said this, the venerable one now speaks: For whose sake did the Blessed One declare this, saying, "It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own; whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyas"? How wonderfully well the Blessed One has spoken! Venerable sir, for whose sake did the Blessed One further declare: "Village headman, on account of this very matter I will state it to you a second and a third time: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own; whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyas"? That declaration of the Blessed One is thoroughly excellent. Venerable sir, I myself also think this: it is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyas do not take gold as their own. Whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — for such a one the five strands of sensual pleasure are likewise fitting.

I then spoke as follows: Village headman, just so, just so. It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyaas do not take gold as their own. Whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyaas.

Thereupon the village headman Jewel-on-the-Crown, delighted and rejoicing in what I had said, bowed his head to my feet and departed from my presence.

Monks, the village headman Jewel-on-the-Crown, taking up that very point, proclaimed in the presence of the retinue attending the king: "It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyaas do not take gold as their own. As for any one who finds it proper and does take gold as his own — the five strands of sensual pleasure are likewise certainly fitting for such a one." With these words, speaking the great speech of a thoroughbred bull, he roared the lion's roar rightly and truly in the midst of the assembly.

And monks, I too then spoke thus: "It is improper for monks to accept gold and silver, and the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyaas do not take gold as their own. Whoever finds it proper and does take gold as his own — that is not the practice of a śramaṇa, and that is not the practice of a son of the Śākyaas."

Therefore, monks, from this day forward: those who wish for wood should seek out wood in full; those who wish for grass should seek grass; those who wish for carpentry work should seek carpentry work; those who wish for servants should seek servants in full. But by no category whatsoever shall the taking of gold as one's own be spoken of.

Now, this event had occurred, yet the Blessed One, the Buddha, had not yet at that point established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time the group of six monks were accepting gold and silver with their own hands, causing others to accept it for them, piling it into one heap, piling it into two heaps, placing it on thrones, on small thrones, and on tiny seats. Other non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), persons of understanding, remarked: "The śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya have neither turned back nor abandoned, nor have they individually abandoned these things — for in just this way they accept gold and silver with their own hands, cause others to accept it for them, pile it into one heap, pile it into two heaps, and place it on thrones, on small thrones, and on tiny seats."

And brahmins and householders likewise, when they saw others accept gold and silver with their own hands, cause others to accept it for them, pile it into one heap, pile it into two heaps, and place it on thrones, on small thrones, and on tiny seats, persons of understanding said: "What difference is there, what distinction is there, what separation is there between the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya and the brahmins and householders?" They criticized, derided, and reproached, saying: "Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed śramaṇas?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this ground, and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddhas act with full knowledge, feigning otherwise — and so forth likewise as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you accept gold and silver with your own hands and cause others to accept it for you?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One, the Buddha, rebuked them, declaring that what is not in keeping with the conduct of a śramaṇa, what is not concordant, what is not fitting, what is not in conformity with proper conduct — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing the ten benefits, the training rules (śikṣāpada) for the hearers in the Vinaya are to be laid down" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk accepts gold and silver with his own hands, or causes others to accept it for him — that is an offense entailing forfeiture."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to the group of six — or any other of that same kind. "With his own hands" means with one's own hands. "Gold and silver" means silver and gold. "Accepts" means accepting it oneself. "Causes others to accept" means through another person. "An offense entailing forfeiture" means that having relinquished the object in question, the transgression (āpatti) of the offense entailing forfeiture is to be confessed — and that is why it is said to be "an offense entailing forfeiture."

As to how the offense is incurred, it is incurred through eight bases. These are the instructions: "Take this," "Take it from here," "Take this much," — and — "Bring this," "Bring it from here," "Bring this much," — and — "Put this down,"

"Put it down here," "Put down this much" — and likewise — "Take that," "Take it from there," "Take that much," — and — "Bring that," "Bring it from there," "Bring that much," — and — "Put that down," "Put it down there," "Put down that much."

Regarding these: "Take this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take this silver" or "take this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Take it from here" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take it from this large copper vessel, or from this copper pot, or from this clay vessel, or from this box, or from this leather bag, or from this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Take this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Bring this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "bring this silver" or "bring this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is brought, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Bring it from here" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "bring it from this large copper vessel, or from this copper pot, or from this clay vessel, or from this box, or from this leather bag, or from this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is brought, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Bring this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "bring a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is brought, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Put this down" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "put down this silver" or "put down this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is put down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Put it down here" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "put it in this large copper vessel, or in this copper pot, or in this clay bowl, or in this box, or in this leather bag, or in this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is put down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Put down this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "put down a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is put down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Receive this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "receive this silver or this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is received, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Receive from this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "receive from this large copper vessel, or from this copper pot, or from this clay bowl, or from this box, or from this leather bag, or from this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is received, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Receive this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "receive a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is received, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Take this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take this silver or this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Take from this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take from this large copper vessel, or from this copper pot, or from this clay bowl, or from this box, or from this leather bag, or from this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Take this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "take a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is taken, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Place this" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "place this silver or this gold." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is placed down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Place it there" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "place it in this large copper vessel, or in this copper pot, or in this clay bowl, or in this box, or in this leather bag, or in this basket." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is placed down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

"Place this much" means directing someone in the direction of what is to be obtained, saying "place a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand." The one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is placed down, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

Now, if one directs someone using any of the following expressions — "receive this," "receive from this," "receive this much," "take this," "take from this," "take this much," "place this," "place it here," "place this much," or using the forms "receive that," "receive from that," "receive that much," "take that," "take from that," "take that much," "place that," "place it there," "place that much" — but directs them toward something that is not going to be obtained, then the one who issues such a direction incurs a wrong action, and when it is received, taken, or placed down, it also becomes a wrong action.

If a monk touches silver, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches gold, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches both silver and gold, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If a monk touches beaten silver or beaten gold, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches silver or gold that bears a visible stamp or mark, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches money, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches a precious gem, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches a pearl, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches lapis lazuli, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he touches a precious gem, a pearl, and lapis lazuli together, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If a monk touches silver or gold that passes as legal currency in a region, it becomes a wrong action. If he touches brass and copper — touching iron, sharp iron, lead, tin, and alkaline water — these entail no offense. In this way the Blessed One thus established the rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the thirty-third fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was in Campā a householder who was faithful, of virtuous intention, and a generous giver. He had a monastery constructed for the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers — one with tall stairways, windows, latticed windows, adorned with balustrades, beautiful and pleasing to behold, fit to serve as a stairway to the heavens. Many monks accepted the invitation to spend the rains retreat there. When the invitation ceremony had concluded, they said: "Householder, we intend to go to Śrāvastī to pay homage at the feet of the Teacher and of the elder monks. Please give us robes."

The householder said: "Noble ones, there are no fine robes available here. Let it be known that suitable things are on their way. Wait a while until suitable things arrive, and then fine robes will be measured out and offered to you."

They said: "Householder, if there are no fine robes, then give us coarse ones."

"Noble ones, I am a generous giver — how could I offer you inferior things? If you are willing, please accept cloth-money of kārṣāpaṇas for the robes and depart."

"Householder, the Blessed One has forbidden kārṣāpaṇas, so we will not accept them."

"Noble ones, not to give you anything at all is not right for me, and to give inferior things is also not appropriate." The monks departed, taking only the coarse robes and refusing the kārṣāpaṇas, and in due course arrived at Śrāvastī. There the other monks asked them: "Venerable ones, did you not obtain gains in the form of rains-retreat robes? How is it that you have ended up with inferior robes? Where did you spend the rains retreat?"

"In Campā, at a certain householder's." "Which householder?" "The one known as the generous giver — that is why we did not obtain them."

They then related the matter in full, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One thought: "Even faithful brahmins and householders give cloth-money as offerings, and my hearers too desire cloth-money. Let me grant the hearers a small permission in this regard."

Having so reflected, the Blessed One declared: "One may accept it, and once accepted, entrust it to that very donor to keep on one's behalf. Furthermore, a monk may have a lay steward attend to transactions. Since the monks did not know what 'having a lay steward attend to transactions' meant, the Blessed One declared: "An ānanda-garden-dweller or a layman may act as steward. An ānanda-garden-dweller is one who provides requisites. A layman is one who has gone for refuge to the Three Jewels and has taken the five training precepts."

When monks traveling to another district felt regret, thinking, "Here we have no patron at all," the Blessed One declared: "For as long as that same patron is traveling, staying, living, or dwelling, one may go to him even at great distance without any lapse." When monks had obtained cloth-money for a monastic robe but had no patron and felt regret, not accepting it, the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared:

It should be accepted, and having accepted it, one should stand before a monk and say these words: "Venerable one, please take note. I, the monk called such-and-such, have obtained this unsuitable article. I, the monk called such-and-such, hereby consecrate this unsuitable article. With this unsuitable article I will acquire a suitable article." In the same way one should say this a second and a third time. In this there is no cause for regret.

When faithful brahmins and householders had temples built in border regions, and from time to time alarms arose there and the monks abandoned the temples and fled, those who took without being given, knowing the temples to be empty, ransacked them. The Blessed One declared: "The valuables of the Saṅgha or of a stūpa should be concealed and one should depart." When the Blessed One had declared that they should be concealed, the monks did not know who should conceal them. The Blessed One declared: "A garden-keeper or a layman should conceal them." When those same people who did the concealing then stole the items, the Blessed One declared: "A faithful layman should conceal them. If there is no faithful layman, a novice should conceal them. If there is no novice, the monks themselves should conceal them." When it was necessary to dig a pit for this purpose and they did not know who should dig it, the Blessed One declared: "A garden-keeper or a layman should dig it. If that same person steals from it, the Blessed One declared: A faithful layman should dig it. If there is no faithful layman, a novice should dig it. If there is no novice, the monks themselves should dig it." When the danger has passed, they should retrieve the items in just that manner and present them to the Saṅgha.

"Monks, what I have permitted during times of hardship must not be practiced in times of ease. If it is practiced in ease, it becomes a serious offense. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is endangered by painful sensations."

Here ends the eighteenth section, on the avoidance of touching gold and silver.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the Blessed One appeared in the world, throughout every land the sound went forth that a Blessed One, a buddha, had arisen. His śrāvakas performed miracles of blazing, of radiance, of rainfall, and of lightning. Hearing that those who made offerings to him thereby gained results exceedingly great, benefits exceedingly great, glory exceedingly great, and expansion exceedingly great, a caravan of traders from the northern road said to one another: "Friends, let us go to the central land. There we shall also accomplish great profit. Let us make offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha." Those caravan traders of the northern road loaded up their goods, set out for the central land, and journeyed on until they arrived at Śrāvastī.

Now at Śrāvastī there dwelt a learned and skilled accountant. He heard that traders had come from the northern road for mutual benefit, and thought: "If I go and look into this matter, I may gain something." He understood a little by observation and a little by calculation. He went and addressed the caravan leader by clan and by name: "Welcome, you who are called such-and-such! Welcome, welcome! Your mother is called such-and-such. Your father is called such-and-such. Your goods have come to this amount. On such-and-such a day your pack-load will come to ruin."

"Your profit will come to this much," he said. The caravan leader then thought: "Among those disciples of the Blessed One who are reputed to perform the miracles of blazing, shining, raining, and lightning, this man must surely be one of them." With faith he filled a begging bowl with fruits from the northern road's forests and gave it to him, and draped over him a robe the color of a lac-insect larva. The learned man accepted it, put it on, and went among those who practice the holy life. When they saw him they said: "Learned one, how did you come by the robe you slept off your deceit to obtain?" He replied: "Traders came from the northern road for mutual benefit, and there I addressed the caravan leader by clan and by name, and he, out of faith, gave it to me as a gift prompted by his trust." They said: "Learned one, we would have you know that those renunciants who are sons of the Śākyan never inspire heartfelt confidence in anyone who is not primarily a ropemaker, a garland-maker, or an oil-presser. Go, wearing that robe, and split open the hearts of those renunciants who are sons of the Śākyan." And so the learned man, wearing that robe, went to the Jeta Grove.

Now the conduct of the group of six was this: "Here we shall teach the Dharma to whatever brahmins and householders come, defeat our opponents in debate, and proclaim our own fame." And so one or another of the group of six would never leave the gate of the Jeta Grove unguarded. The friend Ānanda, who was pacing and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove, spotted the learned man from a great distance. Ānanda then thought: "This wretched naked ascetic has come wearing a fine robe. If I do not strip it from him, the name 'Ānanda' will mean nothing." He said to him: "Learned one, you are a naked ascetic — how have you come to be wearing such a robe? Have you turned back? I myself have not turned back. Here is what happened: traders came from the northern road for mutual benefit, and there I addressed the caravan leader by clan and by name, and he, out of faith, gave it to me as a gift prompted by his trust." "Wrong! Wrong! In your old age you have practiced corrupt conduct in full. Come, sit down, and I shall teach you the Dharma." The learned man sat before Ānanda, and Ānanda, pleased and delighted, began to deliver a discourse in praise of generosity.

Now the conduct of the group of six was this: when they delivered discourses on moral discipline, the listeners would think, "We ourselves have been born among the gods." When they delivered discourses on generosity, the listeners would think, "Let us cut off our very own flesh and give it away, again and again." When they delivered discourses on the lower destinies, the listeners would think, "We ourselves have been born in the lower destinies." So Ānanda said to the learned man: "Learned one, your teacher is inclined toward the bad. If he truly desired what is good, he would have given you a hundred thousand robes of fine wool, food endowed with a hundred flavors, and a many-windowed multistory palace — yet he has given you none of these. Our teacher, by contrast, is inclined toward the good, and so he has given us a hundred thousand robes of fine wool, food endowed with a hundred flavors, and a many-windowed multistory palace. If you were to go begging while wearing such a robe as that, the faithful brahmins and householders would know that this learned man has practiced corrupt conduct, and you would obtain nothing in alms. Give me your robe and I will give you another one in exchange."

"When I go begging while wearing this robe, the faithful brahmins and householders will see me and say, 'Venerable Ānanda, where did you obtain such a robe?' I shall then tell them, 'A certain learned man gave it to me.' They will thus come to know that the learned man is endowed with faith, and when you go out begging they will fill your bowl with ale and oil and give it to you."

He said, "Venerable Ānanda, please accept it."

Ānanda replied, "Learned man, those who live the celibate life alongside you are of corrupt moral discipline, and having heard your words they may well come again to take it back — that situation could arise. Venerable Ānanda, is this robe under the control of those celibate companions of yours, or is it under my own control? Take it, and it shall not be taken back."

Ānanda took that robe, gave him a different, coarser robe in exchange, and the learned man, having put on that coarse robe, went back to where the celibate practitioners were. When they saw him they said, "Learned man, where did you get that turned head — that sleeping robe?" He replied, "This came about through other means. How so? I gave the robe to Venerable Ānanda, and he in turn gave me this robe." They grew angry and said, "Learned man, the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyan — even their living is unwelcome to us. Just as the Group of Six behave one way and others do not, so Ānanda behaves like the Group of Six and others do not. If you had given it to some other senior monk, we would have rejoiced along with you — but you gave it to Ānanda. That one wants to wipe the blood from our wounds with a cloth soaked in blood. If you bring back the robe, well and good. If you do not bring it back, we will expel you from the community of celibate practitioners, overturn your meditation seat, upend your sitting mat, smash your begging bowl, and throw away your water vessel."

Frightened, he went to where Ānanda was. Ānanda, seeing him coming from a great distance, thought, "This learned man is coming with such a gait — he is coming to take back my robe." So he went inside the monastery, closed the door, and sat there. The learned man began knocking at the door, calling out, "Venerable Ānanda! Venerable Ānanda!" but Ānanda said nothing.

The monks said to him, "Learned man, what do you want with Venerable Ānanda?"

He replied, "He has taken my robe."

"Learned man, if you want the robe back, go and take refuge with the Blessed One."

He then went to where the Blessed One was. The Blessed One, seeing the learned man coming from a great distance, declared to the monks: "Monks, look at that learned man coming from afar. Venerable One, as you have commanded — this one has come on account of the robe. If he obtains the robe, well and good. If he does not obtain it, he will vomit blood and die at that very moment."

The learned man then approached and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Blessed One, Venerable Ānanda has taken my robe. May the Blessed One restore it to me. If the Blessed One does not restore the robe to me —"

"I shall thus be expelled from the celibate community, and my mendicant's staff too shall be taken away. My flat-seated mat shall be overturned, my begging bowl shall be upended, and my staff shall be cast aside."

The Blessed One then declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go to where the companion is and say to him: the learned man's robe is to be returned. If it is not returned, there exists such a situation that this learned man will vomit blood and die at that very moment."

The venerable Ānanda replied to the Blessed One, "Venerable One, as you have commanded," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he set out toward where the companion was. The companion, seeing the venerable Ānanda coming from a great distance, thought to himself: "A messenger of this kind has been brought along — he has come so that this one may snatch away my robe."

The venerable Ānanda then said to the companion: "The Blessed One has declared: the learned man's robe is to be returned. If his robe is not returned swiftly, there exists such a situation that this learned man will vomit blood and die at that very moment."

The companion replied: "Venerable Ānanda, I do what the Teacher commands and nothing else. Otherwise, were this naked ascetic, this Nirgrantha, to vomit blood and die — and were learned men, as numerous as sugarcane groves or bamboo thickets or forests of reeds, to fill this whole continent of Jambudvīpa, every last one of them vomiting blood, turning pale, and dying — not a single hair on the companion's body would stir. Nevertheless, begone, and I shall give it."

When the venerable Ānanda had gone, the companion said: "Hey, you naked Nirgrantha, listen! Your lying Teacher, through his false speech, deceived the world and was born in the hell realms, where his tongue is ploughed with five hundred ploughshares. You are an even greater liar than he, so your tongue too shall be ploughed with a thousand ploughshares. And further, if you wear my robe — do you suppose I would then wear your robe? Certainly not, venerable Ānanda."

The companion then folded the robe on all four sides, then folded it again into four layers, placed it on his left hand, and with his right hand slapped it with a crack, so that every fold burst open. He said: "Learned man, stretch out both your hands." The man stretched out both his hands, and the companion, with such force that it would have knocked him down, placed the robe into his hands — and down he fell. The companion jabbed him with his knee and said: "Naked Nirgrantha, go from this Śrāvastī without so much as touching the threshold of its monastery. Venerable Ānanda, if you do not like it, then come — but henceforth you shall not come to the Jeta Grove." That is what occurred for the time being. As for the Buddha, the Blessed One, he was not yet establishing training rules for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time the group of six monks were engaging in various scandalous forms of conduct: making general loans, making special loans, distributing capital, distributing profits — and whether for something done returning something done, or for something done returning something not done, or for something not done returning something done, or for something not done returning something not done, giving out funds in all such ways.

Now, how did they make general loans? They would initiate transactions.

They would seek out markets, ready carts and the like, arrange goods for travel to those markets, and seek out accountants, grain measurers, ink, pens, and scribes. That is how they made general loans.

And how did they make special loans? For the sake of one-eighth interest, or one-tenth interest, or one-twelfth interest, they would seek out moneylenders, grain measurers, ink, pens, and scribes. That is how they made special loans.

And how did they distribute capital? They would send out old barley and grain, refined gold, and similar items for the benefit of a community of associates, seeking out measuring vessels, small weights, tips and grain measurers, ink, pens, and scribes. That is how they distributed capital.

And how did they distribute profits? For the sake of a collection of conch shells, they would send out a collection of jewels; for the sake of a collection of jewels, they would send out a collection of pearls; for the sake of a collection of pearls, they would send out a collection of vaiḍūrya, and they would seek out witnesses, grain measurers, ink, pens, and scribes. That is how they distributed profits.

And how did they give for something done returning something done? For marked gold, they would give what was marked. That is how they gave for something done returning something done.

And how did they give for something done returning something not done? For marked gold, they would give what was unmarked. That is how they gave for something done returning something not done.

And how did they give for something not done returning something done? For gold that was unmarked, they would give what was marked. That is how they gave for something not done returning something done.

And how did they give for something not done returning something not done? For gold that was unmarked, they would give what was unmarked. That is how they gave for something not done returning something not done.

Now certain learned non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) said: "The ascetics who are sons of the Śākyan have not turned back, have not abandoned, have not individually abandoned these things. Indeed, those who conduct themselves with marked currency engage in various forms of conduct — making general loans, making special loans, distributing capital, distributing profits — and give for something done returning something done, for something done returning something not done, for something not done returning something done, and for something not done returning something not done."

And brahmins and householders too would say: "Those who conduct themselves with marked currency engage in various forms of conduct — making general loans, making special loans, distributing capital, distributing profits — and give for something done returning something done, for something done returning something not done, for something not done returning something done, and for something not done returning something not done. O learned ones, what difference then is there between the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya and brahmins and householders? What intention is there? What distinction is there? Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed ascetics?" And they reproached them, taunted them, and spoke disparagingly of them.

Thereupon the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this incident, and in this connection, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and so on as before. And: "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, make inquiry" — and so on as before.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, then questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you engage in various forms of conduct involving marked currency?" "It is true, Venerable One," they admitted. The Blessed One, the Buddha, rebuked them: "That which is not the way of an ascetic, is not fitting, is not proper, is not in accord with the rule — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth." And thus he formally reproached them.

Then the Blessed One, having rebuked them in many ways, spoke to the monks: "Monks, seeing fully the ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so on as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk engages in various forms of conduct involving marked currency commits an offense requiring abandonment.

'Whatever monk' means those of the group of six, or any other of that kind. 'Various forms of conduct involving marked currency' means many types. 'Engages' means if he fully arranges it, if he thoroughly arranges it, if he lends grain, if he lends seed — if he engages in these activities. 'Commits an offense requiring abandonment' means that having abandoned that thing, the offense requiring abandonment must be confessed; it is therefore called an offense requiring abandonment.

As to how the transgression arises: if a monk, desiring gain, fully arranges a transaction in the conventional currency of a region, and for that transaction seeks out carts, oxen, hired men, witnesses, written records, ink, a pen, and a scribe, and gives pledges of dice, stakes, or boat-passage — so long as he does not appropriate the gains, it constitutes a wrong act; but when he appropriates the gains, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

If a monk, desiring gain, thoroughly arranges a transaction in silver or gold, and for that transaction seeks out witnesses, written records, ink, a pen, and a scribe — so long as he does not appropriate the gains, it constitutes a wrong act; but when he appropriates those gains, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

If a monk, desiring gain, lends out barley or grain, and for that transaction seeks out measuring vessels, small ladles, bowls, witnesses, written records, ink, a pen, and a scribe — so long as he does not appropriate the gains, it constitutes a wrong act; but when he appropriates those gains, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment.

If a monk, desiring gain, gives a collection of conch shells in exchange for a collection of jewels, or gives a collection of jewels in exchange for a collection of pearls, or gives a collection of pearls in exchange for a collection of vaidūrya gems, and for such a transaction seeks out witnesses, written records, ink, a pen, and a scribe — so long as he does not appropriate the gains, it constitutes a wrong act; but when he appropriates those gains, it becomes an offense requiring abandonment."

Thus did the Blessed One establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in Vaiśālī, in the Excellent Hall of the Storeyed Pavilion on the bank of the Monkey Pool. At that time, the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī were building houses of six and seven storeys. Just as the houses of the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī were, so too were their temples built to six and seven storeys. These being constructed very tall, they were built up and then collapsed. The patrons thought: "While we are alive and living, our temples are collapsing in this way — what will happen to them after we are dead? Let us offer an inexhaustible endowment to the Saṅgha for the purpose of repair." Thinking thus, they took up the inexhaustible endowment and went to the monks' quarters. Having arrived, they said this to the monks: "Noble ones, please accept these inexhaustible endowments for the purpose of repair." The monks said:

"Good sirs, the Blessed One has established a rule of training; therefore we will not accept them." On that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "For the sake of the Saṅgha, inexhaustible endowments for repair are to be accepted." Furthermore, the Blessed One declared: "The temple of the monks' Saṅgha is to be built to three storeys. The rains-retreat hall of the nuns' Saṅgha is to be built to two storeys." The monks, having heard this from the Blessed One, accepted the inexhaustible endowments and deposited them in the treasury of the Saṅgha, where they were kept.

The patrons came and said: "Noble ones, why is no repair of the temple being done? There are no kārṣāpaṇas." The monks replied: "Do you think we have consumed the inexhaustible endowments? They are sitting in the treasury of the Saṅgha." The patrons said: "Noble ones, if that is so, it will not be inexhaustible — in fact it will be exhausted. Is it that there is no one among you skilled in investment? Why do you not put them to work?" On that occasion, since the monks said "The Blessed One has established a rule of training; therefore we do not put them to work," the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "For the sake of the Saṅgha, the inexhaustible endowments for repair are to be put to work in investment."

Likewise, when faithful brahmins and householders offered inexhaustible endowments for the sake of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, the Blessed One declared: "The inexhaustible endowments offered for the sake of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha are to be invested, and whatever income is generated from them is to be used for offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha."

When those patrons gave the endowments to certain persons, and after they had done so disputes arose among those persons over the funds, and the monks asked: "Noble ones, why have disputes arisen over your own wealth?" — on that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "They are not to be given to such persons."

When those patrons gave the endowments to wealthy persons and, after they had done so, those recipients relied on the powerful and would not repay, and through the influence of superior households they withheld repayment, the Blessed One declared: "They are not to be given to such persons."

When those patrons gave the endowments to poor persons, and those persons in turn were unable to repay, the Blessed One declared: "A pledge deed is to be taken at twice the value of the collateral, written on a tablet with a seal and in the presence of witnesses, and then the endowment is to be given. On that tablet the year, the month, the day, the senior elder of the Saṅgha, the steward, the recipient, the principal, and the names of the returns are to be written. As for whoever is to receive the endowment — even if it be a faithful lay practitioner who has undertaken the five bases of training — it is to be given solely on the basis of a pledge deed. There is no transgression for one acting for the first time, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by sensation."

The nineteenth section, on the abandoning of conduct involving manifest characteristics, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks engaged in various kinds of trading: buying and selling, acquiring and dispensing. How did they acquire? When the harvest was good in the countryside but bad in the city, they would bring goods from the countryside into the city — that is how they acquired. How did they dispense? When the harvest was good in the city but bad in the countryside, they would send goods from the city out to the countryside — that is how they dispensed. How did they buy?

When the price was low, they would buy. That is how they bought. How did they sell? When the price was high, they would sell. That is how they sold.

Other wise non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) remarked: "The ascetics who are sons of the Śākya have not turned away, have not abandoned, have not each individually abandoned these things — they engage in all manner of buying and selling: acquiring, dispensing, buying, and selling." And brahmins and householders likewise engaged in all manner of buying and selling — acquiring, dispensing, buying, and selling. "Then what difference is there between these ascetics who are sons of the Śākya and brahmins and householders? What distinction of intent is there? What distinction of conduct is there? Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed ascetics?" They spoke in reproach, spread the word, and gossiped.

The monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, with this as the basis, on this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so on, as before. And the passage "the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, ask while knowing," and so forth, is likewise as before.

The Blessed One rebuked the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you engage in all manner of buying and selling — acquiring, dispensing, buying, and selling?"

"It is true, Blessed One."

The Blessed One censured them, saying that this was not befitting an ascetic, was not consonant with right conduct, was not proper, was not in accord with the rule — it is not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then the Blessed One, having censured them in many ways, addressed the monks: "Therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so on, as before.

"My śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk who engages in all manner of buying and selling incurs a transgression requiring abandonment and confession (a pācittika requiring forfeiture)."

Now, "any monk" means the group of six or any other who is likewise so inclined. "All manner of buying and selling" means the many forms thereof. "Engages in" means habitually carrying on acquiring, dispensing, buying, and selling. "Incurs a transgression requiring abandonment and confession" means that, having relinquished the article in question, one must confess the pācittika transgression — that is why it is said to "incur a transgression requiring abandonment."

How does a transgression arise? If a monk, out of desire for gain, buys and then sells: in the buying there is a wrongdoing, and in the selling there is a transgression requiring abandonment and confession. If a monk buys out of desire for gain and sells without desire for gain: in the buying there is a wrongdoing, but in the selling there is no transgression. If a monk buys without desire for gain and sells out of desire for gain: in the buying there is no transgression, but in the selling there is a transgression requiring abandonment and confession. If a monk both buys and sells without desire for gain: in both there is no transgression. When one is purifying something obtained in a prior stream through an arrangement in another district, there is no transgression.

Thus the Blessed One established the rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Vaiśālī, in the Gabled House beside the Monkey Pond.

At that time, some merchants who were travelers on the northern road caught sight of a monastery with high gabled porticos, latticed windows, window-lattices, and balustrades adorned with ornamental railings — a sight so captivating to the eye and heart that it was like a stairway to the heavens. Filled with faith, they entered the monastery and said to the monks: "Noble ones, we wish to offer a feast to the Saṅgha." The monks replied: "Bring the requisites for the feast and come." The merchants said: "We are people who have arrived here suddenly. We would like to give you the price; please provide us with rice." When the monks replied that the Blessed One had established a rule of training and that they therefore did not sell rice, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Do not act in such a way. Rather, for those who hold a feast on behalf of the Saṅgha, rice should be given in exchange for a price."

When the monks gave only raw, unhusked rice, the Blessed One declared: "For those who hold a feast at the monastery itself, give it with husking included."

After the Blessed One had established the rule that rice should be given in exchange for a price, many people held feasts and, since rice was given to all of them, the communal stores became exhausted through the consumption of rice. The monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Do not act in that way. Rather, use that price to purchase other rice. As for old rice, inspect it individually; if there are no living creatures in it, sell it in due season so as to fill the rice-storage bins." There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, or who is mentally deranged, or whose mind is disturbed, or who acts under the duress of painful feelings. This completes the twentieth training rule, the rule concerning buying and selling.

Summary verse:

Two bowls and two garments,
Taking by stealth, a feast, a junior month,
A hermit and heavy cloth,
Something dedicated, and a store set aside.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍada's park.

Then the venerable Ānanda thought to himself: "All of these householders have been encompassed by the rules of training laid down by the donor Anāthapiṇḍada, so that henceforth it will be impossible to raise any gain from any quarter." While he was thinking this, he saw a group of sixty revelers going into a pleasure garden. The venerable Ānanda thought: "If I cannot secure some gain from them, I do not deserve to bear the name of Ānanda."

Now, the habitual conduct of the group of six monks was this: whenever someone spoke about generosity, they would think to themselves that if listeners heard them they would cut off their own flesh piece by piece and give it away; whenever someone spoke about moral discipline, they would think that listeners would imagine they had been born among the gods; and whenever someone spoke about the lower realms of existence, they would think that listeners would be convinced they had been born in those lower realms. And so, carrying a bright, round alms-bowl under his arm, Ānanda went to where that group of revelers was. When he arrived, he spoke words of generosity to one of the revelers in such a way as to arouse full faith in that person's mind. The person's faith was stirred, and he said: "Noble one, why have you come?" Ānanda replied: "Good friend, I need an alms-bowl." The man said: "Noble one, I do not have an alms-bowl, but if you find one for a price I will present it to you when I see you." Ānanda then drew the alms-bowl from under his arm, showed it to the man, and said: "Good friend, this alms-bowl too was obtained for a price." The man asked: "Noble one, how much is its price?"

"Sixty kārṣāpaṇas." "I will present sixty kārṣāpaṇas as the price of this bowl. Good friend, may these sixty kārṣāpaṇas become yours. May this act of generosity become an ornament of your mind, a provision for your mind, an accumulation for your practice of yoga, a means of attaining the supreme goal, and may it make you a worthy vessel among gods and humans."

In the same way, Ānanda caused each of the sixty revelers to contribute sixty kārṣāpaṇas apiece. Having done so, he departed. All those revelers then gathered together in one place, and one of them said: "Friends, let us rejoice that we have given sixty kārṣāpaṇas as the price of an alms-bowl to the venerable Ānanda, who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who preaches the Dharma, and who is endowed with the confidence of learning and liberation." Another said: "I too gave." Yet another said: "I too gave." And in this way all of them said: "I too gave, I too gave." Then they looked at one another and asked a monk: "Friends, we understand that one monk needs an alms-bowl." They asked a monk: "Noble one, one monk needs an alms-bowl." He replied: "Good friends, only one is needed." At that they began to criticize the community, saying: "These ascetics, sons of the Śākyans, are people overcome by the desire for gain."

This is what had occurred, but the buddha, the Blessed One, had not yet established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One was then dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time the group of six monks were accumulating alms-bowls, keeping everything they received, neither using them themselves nor giving them to other monks. Monks of modest means began to censure, disparage, and gossip, saying: "Why do these monks accumulate all the alms-bowls they receive, neither using them themselves nor giving them to other monks?"

The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in connection with this basis, and in regard to this matter, convened the community of monks — and so forth as before. The phrase "although the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, know, they pretend not to know" — and so forth as before. The Blessed One interrogated the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you accumulate all the alms-bowls you receive, neither using them yourselves nor giving them to other monks?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying: "This is not befitting a renunciant, not in accord with it, not proper, not consonant with the ascetic life — this is not something a person who has gone forth should do." Having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

A monk may keep an extra alms-bowl for up to ten days. If he keeps it beyond that, it is an offense requiring relinquishment.

The phrase 'a monk' refers to the person under this rule. 'Extra alms-bowl' means one that is in excess of what has been consecrated. 'For up to ten days' means until the end of ten days and nights. 'May keep' means may take as his own."

The phrase "if he keeps it beyond that" means keeping it past that point. The phrase "it is an offense requiring relinquishment" means that after relinquishing that object, the transgression — an offense requiring relinquishment — is to be confessed. That is why it is said to be an offense requiring relinquishment.

Now, as to how the offense comes about, it is as follows. If a monk obtains an alms-bowl on the first day of the fortnight, he must, within those very ten days, either consecrate that bowl, relinquish it, examine it, or give it to another. If he does not consecrate it, relinquish it, examine it, or give it to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If he does not obtain a bowl on the first day, but obtains one on the second day, the third day, the ninth day, or any day up to and including the tenth, he must within those very ten days either consecrate that bowl, relinquish it, examine it, or give it to another. If he does not consecrate it, relinquish it, examine it, or give it to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk obtains one alms-bowl on the first day and then obtains another on the second day, he must within those very ten days consecrate the former and either relinquish the latter, examine it, or give it to another; or alternatively, consecrate the latter and either relinquish the former, examine it, or give it to another. If he does not consecrate, relinquish, examine, or give either of them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If he obtains no bowl on the first or the second day, but obtains one on the third day or on any day up to and including the tenth, he must within those very ten days consecrate the former and either relinquish the latter, examine it, or give it to another; or alternatively, consecrate the latter and either relinquish the former, examine it, or give it to another. If he does not consecrate, relinquish, examine, or give either of them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk obtains two alms-bowls on the first day of the fortnight, he must within those very ten days either consecrate both, relinquish both, examine both, or give both to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If he does not obtain two alms-bowls on the first day, but obtains two on the second day, the third day, the ninth day, or any day up to and including the tenth, he must within those very ten days either consecrate both, relinquish both, examine both, or give both to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk obtains two alms-bowls on the first day and then obtains two more on the second day, he must within those very ten days consecrate the first two and either relinquish the second two, examine them, or give them to another.

Alternatively, he may consecrate the second two and either relinquish the first two, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk does not obtain two alms-bowls on the first or second day but obtains two on the third day or on any day up to and including the tenth, then that monk must within those very ten days consecrate the first two and either relinquish the second two, examine them, or give them to another. Alternatively, he may consecrate the second two and either relinquish the first two, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk obtains many alms-bowls on the first day, he must within those very ten days either consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk does not obtain many alms-bowls on the first day but obtains many on the second, the third, the ninth, or on any day up to and including the tenth, then that monk must within those very ten days either consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk obtains many alms-bowls on the first day and then obtains more on the second day, he must within those very ten days consecrate the first set and either relinquish the second set, examine them, or give them to another. Alternatively, he may consecrate the second set and either relinquish the first set, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk does not obtain many alms-bowls on the first or second day but obtains many on the third day or on any day up to and including the tenth, then that monk must within those very ten days consecrate the first set and either relinquish the second set, examine them, or give them to another. Alternatively, he may consecrate the second set and either relinquish the first set, examine them, or give them to another. If he does not consecrate them, relinquish them, examine them, or give them to another, then when the dawn of the eleventh day breaks, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

If a monk's alms-bowl has become subject to relinquishment and he obtains another without having relinquished the first, without having parted from it, and without having confessed the transgression, then that new bowl too becomes subject to relinquishment by virtue of the continuity of the earlier one.

If a monk's alms-bowl has become subject to relinquishment, and he has relinquished it and parted from it, yet obtains another without having confessed the transgression, that new bowl too becomes subject to relinquishment by virtue of the continuity of the earlier one. But if a monk's alms-bowl has become subject to relinquishment, and he has relinquished it, parted from it, confessed the transgression, and then obtains another, there is no transgression in that new one.

Likewise, for as long as a monk, without having confessed and individually acknowledged an item that has become subject to relinquishment, sets aside another alms-bowl, or a robe, or a net, or a cup, or a belt, or any other requisite of a renunciant's life, that item too becomes subject to relinquishment by virtue of the continuity of the earlier one.

There is no transgression in holding a small alms-bowl, a plain alms-bowl, a large alms-bowl, or an undyed alms-bowl. There is no transgression in any case of holding an alms-bowl for the sake of one who is going forth into renunciation. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, or who is mentally deranged, or who is mentally disturbed, or who is afflicted by pain.

This completes the twenty-first relinquishment concerning the holding of alms-bowls.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Now in Śrāvastī there was a young incense-seller who had come upon an alms-bowl that was perfectly bright, well-shaped, and fit for use. A certain mendicant monk, having dressed in his inner robe early in the morning and taken up his alms-bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī to collect alms, and after making his alms-round he went along the main street. The young incense-seller saw him and said, "Noble one, I have found an alms-bowl that is perfectly bright, well-shaped, and fit for use. If you wish, please accept it graciously — I have an alms-bowl for you. Noble one, if any other monk should come seeking an alms-bowl, please do send him to me, and I will give it."

Then that monk, having completed his alms-round in Śrāvastī, went to the Jeta Grove. After eating his meal, while washing his alms-bowl, he said to the other monks, "Venerable ones, on a certain main street there is a young incense-seller who has found an alms-bowl that is perfectly bright, well-shaped, and fit for use. Whichever of you wishes an alms-bowl, go there." Not far away, a certain companion monk was sitting and overheard this. He thought to himself, "If some monk with a black alms-bowl were to hear of this and come running, that would be unseemly — he ought to be reprimanded." And so he said to the monk, "Venerable one, you have eaten food given in faith, and yet you speak of nothing but alms-bowls and robes." The monk thought, "All those in the world who are attached to desire are no different from this companion of mine. For a moment he has reprimanded me, but if some senior monk were to hear of this, he would be reprimanded even more severely." So he said nothing.

The companion then urged him on, saying, "Venerable one, my own preceptor and yours are friends, so do not be troubled by my reproach. Elder, if I too have said something wrong, you may reproach me in return. Venerable one, I was merely trying to set things at ease — for is that bowl not, after all, a bowl? I ask that the elder not speak any further on this matter."

The monk said, "So it may be, venerable one, yet say this much at least: on a certain main street there is a young incense-seller who has found an alms-bowl that is perfectly bright, well-shaped, and fit for use, and he has said that if any monk should come seeking an alms-bowl, please send him. That is all it was."

But that was only enough to set things a little at ease. Then Ānanda put on his patched robe, set out at a measured pace, and went to the market. The young incense-seller saw him coming from quite a distance, walking at that steady pace, and thought to himself: "This wandering ascetic is coming at such a pace — he must be coming to take my alms-bowl." So he picked up the bowl, hid it beneath the hem of his garment, and set it there. When Ānanda saw him hiding it, he said, "Good fellow, is that alms-bowl the property of some low-caste person, that you would hide it away like that?" The young man stretched out his hand, took the alms-bowl, and said, "Good fellow, may this gift of Arogya cause you to become an ornament of mind, a furnishing of mind, a gathering of yogic qualities, an attainer of the highest aim, and a vessel worthy among gods and humans. Noble one, we merchants make our living by seeking profit, and so I will not give this away without payment — I offer it thus, in exchange for a price."

"Good fellow, are you really selling a vessel fit for a sage?" And he also spoke a verse:

If a man of clay were to obtain a vessel of pure gold,
why would he grieve?
I see in this no deception at all.

"Noble one, you may say much, but I will not give it without payment."

Ānanda said, "Your excessive attachment to this alms-bowl will cause you to be reborn among the hungry ghosts with hollow bellies." While he was speaking to him in this way, a householder arrived from that direction and said, "Homage to the noble one. Homage to the venerable Ānanda."

Ānanda said, "Good fellow, what use is your empty salutation? Noble one, there is something the venerable Ānanda commanded me to do that I have not yet accomplished. Purchase this alms-bowl and give it to him."

That householder said to the young incense-seller, "Good fellow, what is the price of this alms-bowl?" "Such and such an amount." "I give it to you." The young incense-seller gave the alms-bowl to the householder, and the householder in turn presented it to Ānanda.

Ānanda said, "May this gift of Arogya cause you to become an ornament of mind, a furnishing of mind, a gathering of yogic qualities, an attainer of the highest aim, and a vessel worthy among gods and humans."

After the householder had departed, Ānanda said to the young incense-seller, "Poor fellow, did you not realize that Ānanda would be unable to spend the price of an alms-bowl? Your excessive attachment to this alms-bowl will cause you to be reborn among the hungry ghosts with bloated bellies."

"Noble one, what has gone wrong? You have received the alms-bowl, and I have received the price — so be on your way."

Ānanda took the alms-bowl and went to the monastery, where he showed it to the monks and said, "Venerable ones, look — what a bowl I have!" A young monk said, "Elder, do you not already have another alms-bowl?" "I do." "Well then, is it proper for an elder who already has an alms-bowl to go seeking yet another one?" "It was because I was crushed underfoot at the enemies' throats." "Does the elder have enemies?" "Since you yourself cannot bear my having a second alms-bowl, you are clearly my chief enemy."

The monks of few wants began to criticize, censure, and gossip among themselves, saying: "Why do monks seek out another alms-bowl when they already have one?" And so the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident and this occasion —

For this occasion, the convening of the assembly of monks and so forth proceeds as before. Likewise, the passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, while knowing full well, yet inquire" and so forth also proceeds as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that while you already possess an alms-bowl, you went seeking yet another one?" "Venerable sir, it is so." The Blessed One, the Buddha, rebuked him, saying that this was not the way of a renunciant, not befitting, not proper, not in accord with the rules, and not something that one who has gone forth ought to do. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore a monk who already possesses an alms-bowl must not seek out yet another one."

Vinaya Vibhaṅga, thirty-fourth fascicle.

After the Blessed One had declared that a monk who already possesses an alms-bowl must not seek out yet another one, a certain monk who was going on alms-round had his alms-bowl crack slightly. Holding it together, he entered Śrāvastī for alms. He found some flour and pressed it into the crack of the bowl with the bowl itself. Then, finding some moist grain husks, he pressed those in as well. But the moisture caused the flour to become wet and soggy, making the bowl unfit as a vessel, and it became entirely surrounded by flies. At that, some boys and girls said: "The noble one has performed the deed of gaining a great retinue, just like a wealthy man, a merchant, or a caravan leader, and goes about surrounded by flies." When the householder Anāthapiṇḍada saw this, he said: "Children, why do you mock the noble one in this way?" The householder said: "Noble one, what is this commotion?" The boys replied: "The noble one has performed the deed of gaining a great retinue, just like a wealthy man, a merchant, or a caravan leader, and goes about surrounded by flies." The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to that monk: "Noble one, the Blessed One's teaching adorns all — why do you engage in such frivolous behavior?" The householder replied: "Noble one, what is frivolous about this? Have you not seen him entering the homes of musicians, the homes of dancing girls, taverns, the royal palace, and the homes of outcastes?" The noble one said: "But then why do you let children surround and mock you?" The householder said: "My alms-bowl has cracked." "Then why do you not seek another bowl?" "The Blessed One declared that a monk who already possesses an alms-bowl must not seek out yet another one." "Noble one, this bowl of yours — do you actually possess and own something like this?" At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Whoever has a cracked bowl may have it repaired." Having made this ruling — that a monk whose bowl has cracked may repair it — the monks used the five soft adhesives: sugar, lac resin, monkey fat, fragrant resin, and dark pigment to seal it. But when these came into contact with heat, the bowl leaked again. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Abandon those five soft adhesives and repair it instead with the five hard adhesives." The monks did not know what the five hard adhesives were, and so the Blessed One declared: "They are long lac strips, small lac chips, lac paste, material like the teeth of a water-serpent, and powdered mineral." The monks did not know how much powdered mineral to use, and so the Blessed One declared:

"There are two kinds of powdered mineral: iron powder and stone powder. An iron bowl is to be repaired with iron powder, and an earthenware bowl is to be repaired with stone powder." When these were mixed with water and ground, then sealed in the same way, but the bowls leaked again, the Blessed One declared: "Grind it with sesame oil and seal it." When these were fired too intensely, the seal cracked, and when heated too little, it did not hold, so the Blessed One declared: "Heat it to just the right degree." When they became too rough, the Blessed One declared: "Polish them." When the monks poured water over them and polished them, and they again leaked, the Blessed One declared: "Pour sesame oil and polish them." When earthenware bowls cracked, the Blessed One declared: "Repair them with molasses and clay, then fire them." Thus the Blessed One ruled: "Repair bowls using these five hard adhesives."

Having made this ruling, a monk who was on his alms round dropped an earthenware bowl from his hands and it broke into five pieces. He stuffed those pieces with tow and strung the shards together with thread and went about on his alms round. The Blessed One then declared that there should be no food in a bowl in such a condition, and while he was trying to make it serviceable he kept breaking it apart and rejoining it, so that the entire morning was spent thus. Then the other monks said to him: "Venerable one, is this the whole of your virtuous practice — just tying things back together?" He replied: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has ruled that a broken bowl must be repaired with the five hard adhesives." The monks then reported this matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, in many ways expressing praise for those who desire training, who respect training, and who provide the requisites for training, addressed the monks with a discourse consonant with that, containing the substance of it, and appropriate to the occasion. He then declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten genuine benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on, as before — "and my hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should any monk, when his bowl lacks the five adhesives, though it is still usable, seek a new bowl out of a desire for something better, and upon obtaining a bowl, commit an offense entailing relinquishment. That monk shall present that bowl to the community of monks. Whichever bowl is the most inferior among the bowls of that community of monks shall be given to that monk with the words: 'Monk, you must not consecrate this bowl, give it away, or donate it to another; you must use it carefully, little by little, until it finally breaks.' That is the procedure."

The commentary then explains: the phrase "should any monk" refers to one of this Dharma. "Lacks the five adhesives" means that the bowl is incomplete in the five adhesives. "Though it is still usable" means that it is still fit for continued use. "Out of a desire for something better" means either desiring what is superior or desiring it repeatedly. "A new bowl" — there are two kinds of new: new because it is newly made, and new because it is newly acquired; in this context both are intended. "Another" means a second one. "Seek" means he goes about seeking. "Upon obtaining a bowl" means upon actually getting a bowl.

"Is a relinquishment offense" means that having relinquished that article, one must confess the relinquishment offense. That is why it is said to be a relinquishment offense. "That monk" means the particular monk in question. "That bowl" means the bowl that is without an owner. "Should present it to the assembly of monks" means to those monks who are gathered there.

The monk who has the lowest-ranking bowl in that assembly of monks is to be told: "Monk, you should not consecrate this bowl, give it away, or donate it to another. Rather, it is given to you so that you may use it gently and carefully until it breaks completely." Furthermore, the Saṅgha is to appoint a monk who is skilled in distributing ownerless bowls. A monk who is skilled in distributing ownerless bowls but who possesses the following five qualities should not be appointed even if he has not yet been appointed, and should be dismissed if he has already been appointed. What are the five? He goes on account of desire, he goes on account of aversion, he goes on account of delusion, he goes on account of fear, and he does not know what constitutes a proper or improper distribution of an ownerless bowl.

A monk who is skilled in distributing ownerless bowls but who possesses the following five qualities should be appointed even if he has not yet been appointed, and should not be dismissed if he has already been appointed. What are the five? He does not go on account of desire, he does not go on account of aversion, he does not go on account of delusion, he does not go on account of fear, and he knows what constitutes a proper or improper distribution of an ownerless bowl.

He is to be appointed in the following manner. First he is to be asked his willingness: "You who are called so-and-so — are you willing to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha?" If he is willing, he should say, "I am willing." After this, he is to arrange the assembly seats, strike the gong, and duly inform the monks with a formal announcement. Once the entire Saṅgha has assembled and is in harmony, one monk should present the motion and perform the act.

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. The monk named so-and-so is willing to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha. If it seems right and the Saṅgha approves, may the Saṅgha grant permission, and may the Saṅgha appoint the monk named so-and-so to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha." This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows. "May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. The monk named so-and-so is willing to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha. Accordingly, the Saṅgha appoints the monk named so-and-so to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha. Those venerable ones who consent to the appointment of the monk named so-and-so to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak." Since no one has spoken, the Saṅgha has consented and granted this, and the Saṅgha has thereby appointed the monk named so-and-so to distribute ownerless bowls for the Saṅgha. So it is held, and it is so received.

I shall now establish the rules of conduct for the monk who distributes ownerless bowls. At the time of assembly, the monk who distributes ownerless bowls should announce to the venerable members of the Saṅgha: "Tomorrow I will distribute ownerless bowls to the Saṅgha."

"Tomorrow, when the sounding board is struck, take up your own bowls and enter the Saṅgha hall." This announcement is to be made.

Then, on the following day, the monk who distributes ownerless bowls is to prepare the sitting places, strike the sounding board, and by means of the customary words of inquiry, make the proper announcement to the monks. The monks, for their part, are to take up their own bowls — those that have been consecrated — and enter the Saṅgha hall.

The monk who distributes ownerless bowls is then to take up an ownerless bowl. When the entire Saṅgha has assembled and is in harmony, he is to pay homage at the side of the most senior member, then sit before the senior elder of the Saṅgha and, praising the ownerless bowl according to its actual qualities — saying such things as, "Most venerable, this bowl is very bright, well-shaped, and fit for use; if you wish, please accept it" — offer it. The senior elder of the Saṅgha may accept it if he wishes.

If the senior elder of the Saṅgha accepts that bowl, then whatever bowl belonged to the senior elder is to be offered to the second elder. Whatever bowl belonged to the second elder is to be offered to the third elder. And so on in this manner, until whatever bowl belongs to the second-most-junior member of the Saṅgha is offered to the most junior member.

If the senior elder of the Saṅgha does not accept it, it is to be offered to the second elder. If the second elder does not accept it, it is to be offered to the third elder. If the third elder does not accept it, and if the senior elder of the Saṅgha makes a request, it is not to be given on the first request, nor on the second request. On the third request it is to be given — and the senior elder of the Saṅgha is to confess the transgression and downfall of acting contrary to the Vinaya.

Likewise, if the third-most-junior member of the Saṅgha has not accepted it, it is to be offered to the second-most-junior member. If the second-most-junior member does not accept it, it is to be offered to the most junior member. If the most junior member of the Saṅgha has accepted it, and if the third-most-junior member then makes a request, it is not to be given on the first request, nor on the second request. On the third request it is to be given — and the third-most-junior member of the Saṅgha is to confess the transgression and downfall of acting contrary to the Vinaya.

Whatever bowl is left last in that assembly of monks is to be given to that monk with these words: "Monk, you are not to consecrate this bowl, not to give it away, not to offer it to another. Until it is broken beyond use, make gradual, careful use of it." This is how it is to be given.

If the monk who distributes ownerless bowls, having properly received the rules of conduct he is to observe in every respect, does not put them into practice, he incurs a serious fault.

I shall now set down the rules of conduct for the monk who holds ownerless bowls. The monk who holds ownerless bowls is to keep two bowl-vessels nearby. Into the better of the two he is to place the ownerless bowl, and into the other he is to place his consecrated bowl. Carrying both bowls, he is to go on the alms round. If he receives dry cooked rice, it is to be received into the ownerless bowl. If he receives wet cooked rice, it is to be received into the consecrated bowl.

Upon arriving at the temple, he is to make a maṇḍala, place the ownerless bowl before him, and eat from the consecrated bowl. After eating, the scraping out and wiping away of the smell of food is to be done first with the ownerless bowl and afterwards with the consecrated bowl. Washing, drying, and polishing with a weight are likewise to be done in that same order. If the bowl-vessel has two compartments, the ownerless bowl is to be placed in whichever is the better of the two, and the consecrated bowl is to be placed in the other. If there is only one compartment and the side is good, the ownerless bowl is to be placed at the side and the consecrated bowl is to be placed in the compartment. If the compartment is better, the ownerless bowl is to be placed in the compartment and the consecrated bowl is to be placed at the side.

When firing the bowls, if there are two kilns, the ownerless bowl is to be fired in whichever kiln is the better one, and the consecrated bowl is to be fired in the other. If there is only one kiln and the bottom fires well, the ownerless bowl is to be placed at the bottom and the consecrated bowl is to be placed on top. If placing on top fires well, the ownerless bowl is to be placed on top and the consecrated bowl is to be placed at the bottom.

When traveling on the road, both bowl-vessels are to be carried, and the ownerless bowl is to be placed in whichever of the two is the better one, with the consecrated bowl placed in the other. If there is a porter available, the ownerless bowl is to be entrusted to that person to carry, and the monk himself is to carry the consecrated bowl. If there is no porter at all, the ownerless bowl is to be carried on the left shoulder and the consecrated bowl is to be carried on the right shoulder.

This is for the time being a matter of forfeiture, and it is to be observed for as long as one lives through the proper guarding of moral discipline. If the monk who holds ownerless bowls, having duly taken up all the rules of conduct he is to observe in every respect, does not put them into practice, he incurs a serious fault.

As for the phrase "that is the proper procedure," it means that that is the conforming practice in the matter. As for how a transgression arises: if a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with a single patch, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with two patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with three patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with four patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with one patch, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with two patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with three patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with four patches, yet it has not been repaired but remains usable, and while that usable bowl exists he goes seeking another new bowl, then the seeking itself constitutes a misdeed, and if he obtains one it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture.

If a monk's bowl is broken and it is suitable to have it repaired with five patches, then whether it has been repaired or not, whether it remains usable or not, if he goes seeking another new bowl, there is no transgression in the seeking and no transgression if he obtains one. There is likewise no transgression in acquiring one by purchase or by exchange. There is no transgression for one who is acting for the first time, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feelings.

This completes the twenty-second forfeiture concerning the seeking of a bowl.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Ānanda thought to himself: all of these people have been bound by the rules of training laid down by the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, so that from now on they are unable to borrow even the value of a single small and coarse piece of cloth from anyone. Let me go and look — it is possible that some among them may still be able to provide something. So early that morning he dressed, took up his bowl and his monastic robe, and entering Śrāvastī through the eastern gate he went on his alms round. In a certain garden he saw about five hundred women dressed in coarse cloth, carrying loads and doing work. He thought: these are people who have work that belongs to others to do — day and night they wear white garments, yet they do not pay the tribute owed to King Prasenajit of Kosala. He then addressed them, saying: "Sisters, may you be well! May you be well!" They made no response but remained at their work. He spoke to them again:

"Sisters, this phenomenon called death — unwanted by many people, unloved by many people, disagreeable to many people, unwelcome to the minds of many people — is common to the entire world and will come. When it does, you will be unable to speak even a word from the very first moment."

Then a young woman who desired merit rose from her seat, spread a seat for the venerable Ānanda, and having invited him to sit, she prostrated at his feet and sat before him. Ānanda then said to them: "Sisters, is there among you even a little of the wholesome Dharma rightly undertaken and practiced?" "Noble one, there is nothing at all." "Sisters, that is not good. This young woman has already created and accumulated two wholesome qualities of Dharma. Through the fact that she has generated sincere faith toward me, she has created and accumulated the karma by which she will become wealthy. Through the fact that she rose to greet me, spread a seat, and made prostration, she has created and accumulated the karma by which she will be reborn in a high family."

"If she were to give even a little, that would become for her a cause of great wealth. Sisters, where do your livelihoods come from?" "Noble one, from this very alms-round." "And your robes — where do they come from?" "From this very alms-round." "Do you carry with you even a little provision for the journey to the next world?" "Noble one, there is none at all, none whatsoever." "Sisters, that is not good, not good at all."

"Noble one, toward whom do you bear ill will?" "Toward you. You come here having been ruined in the next world, and you go to the next world continuing to be ruined here." "Noble one, by what means could we send even a little provision ahead of us to the next world?" "Sisters, if you were to present a length of cloth to a mendicant (śramaṇa) of the Śākya lineage who has gone forth, who is endowed with the three collections of scripture, who teaches the Dharma, who possesses the confidence of reasoning and liberation — then that would carry for you a great deal of provision for the journey to the next world." "Noble one, where would we find such a monk?" "Sisters, do you not know that I myself have gone forth from the Śākya lineage, am endowed with the three collections of scripture, teach the Dharma, and possess the confidence of reasoning and liberation?" "Noble one, where would we find a length of cloth to give?"

"Sisters, do you not know this verse:

Do not despise even a little merit,
thinking it will not come to me.
Just as falling drops of water can fill a great vessel, so the steadfast, by gathering merit little by little, become complete.

Can you manage to give so much as one tola of raw wool? I'll accept it." One of them said, "I will give a full tola." Another said, "I will give a quarter tola." And in the same way all of them pledged to give their respective portions.

Ānanda said, "Sisters, give whatever fine-spun wool you have." "Noble one, all of us are burdened with coarse loads. There is one among us, the comfortable one, who carries fine-spun wool." "Sisters, call her." They called her, and Ānanda said to her, "Girl, measure out the fine wool still smaller." She measured it out smaller, and Ānanda said, "Girl, measure it out smaller still." She measured it out still smaller. Ānanda said again and again, "Girl, measure it out even smaller than that." She replied, "Noble one, it cannot be made finer than this." Ānanda said to them all, "Sisters, all of you give exactly this much wool." "Noble one, we cannot accept carrying wool this fine as a load. But can this girl not manage it? You carry it for her sake, and let her carry it for your sake." "Noble one, if that can be done." Ānanda said to her, "Girl, do it — and it will become merit for you. Noble one, this wool is so fine and light; please do not press too hard, but just hold it for now and carry it for a little while." Ānanda said "Arogya" to her, rose from his seat, and departed.

The comfortable one, holding the wool until that moment, then went to the others, they all gathered, and the wool was offered to Ānanda. Ānanda said to them all, "May this gift of Arogya become for you the adornment of mind, the resource of mind, the accumulation for the practice of yoga, the attainment of the highest purpose, and the obtaining of the garments of gods and humans," and he departed.

Then Ānanda took the wool and went to the monastery, where he showed it to the monks and said, "Venerable ones, look at this wool of mine. Elder, the wool is fine. Elder, might you find a weaver capable of weaving a great length of cloth from this wool?" The venerable ones said, "Did you overwhelm Ānanda? If Ānanda has not yet gone forth, Ānanda himself will do the weaving." "Elder, we overwhelmed the elder Gala. There is a weaver living near the fence of Gagemo, and if he obtains this wool, a great length of cloth worthy of a great one will result. Children, it is for the sake of Arogya that you have had my great length of cloth woven," and taking the wool he went to the weaver's house. The weaver saw him from a great distance and spoke these verses:

The wise shine forth even from afar, like a snow-laden mountain peak.

The unwise are nowhere to be seen, like an arrow shot into the dark.

Fair-faced one, your fame has filled all of Śrāvastī — truly, what you have obtained, you have obtained well.

Look at this wool — what a fine thing!

Noble one, the wool is excellent.

This is the wool, and I am the weaver; a great length of cloth worthy of a great one shall result.

Fair-faced one, take it.

Ānanda said, "Noble one, who will give me the weaving fee?" "Fair-faced one, do you really never tire of always receiving a weaving fee? Provide also the provisions for the journey to the world beyond." Then the wife said, "This son of a noble family has praised the two of us from a great distance — take the great length of cloth. Noble one, this wool is exceedingly fine and delicate; please use it gently for this time being." Ānanda said "Arogya" and departed. The weaver completed the great length of cloth in exactly that much time. Ānanda returned there in exactly that much time, and the weaver offered him the great length of cloth. Ānanda took it and went to the monastery, where he showed the great length of cloth to the monks and said, "Venerable ones, look at this great length of cloth of mine. Elder, the great length of cloth is fine. Whoever has a second piece like this should stitch the pieces together from the selvage, overlapping them in sequence, and apply himself wholeheartedly and diligently to the side of virtue. Venerable ones, do you really think in your hearts that Ānanda is incapable of joining two such great lengths of cloth together? Watch how he joins them."

Then Ānanda, early in the morning, having put on his lower robe and taken up his bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī from the west gate for alms. In a certain garden he saw approximately five hundred yoke-loads of wool laid out and spread around, and he thought: "These are persons who have tasks that are their own business. Though day and night they make use of white combed fleece, they do not pay the weaving tax to King Prasenajit of Kosala." Thinking thus, he spoke to them: "Sisters, Arogya, Arogya." They remained there without saying anything, and he spoke to them again: "Sisters, there is something unwelcome to many people, displeasing to many people, disagreeable to many people, and disagreeable to the minds of many people — something that is common to the entire world — namely, the phenomenon called death that is bound to come. At that moment, from the very first, you will be unable to speak a word."

Then a young woman named Sonam Döpa who was present rose from her seat, spread a cushion for Nyadga, sat down beside him, and prostrated at his feet, then sat before him. Nyadga spoke to them: "Sisters, do you have even a little wholesome Dharma that you have properly taken up and are putting into practice?" "Noble one, there is nothing whatsoever." "Sisters, that is not good. This young woman has performed and accumulated two wholesome acts of Dharma. What she has done is this: by generating faith and devotion toward me, she has performed and accumulated karma that will cause her to become wealthy. And by rising to greet me, spreading a cushion, and prostrating before me, she has performed and accumulated karma that will cause her to be born into a high family. If she were to give even a little in generosity, that too would become for her a source of great prosperity. Sisters, where does your food come from? From this very weaving. Where do your clothes come from? From this very weaving. Do you have even a little provisions set aside for the journey to the world beyond?" "Noble one, we have nothing whatsoever of that kind." "Sisters, that is not good, not good at all." "Noble one, toward whom do you bear ill will? It is toward you! You come here broken from the world beyond, and from here you go on broken to the world beyond." "Noble one, by what means might we send ourselves a little provision for when we journey to the world beyond?" "Sisters, if you were to give a great bolt of cloth to a monk of the Śākya clan who has gone forth, who is versed in the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who is endowed with the confidence of reasoning and liberation, then by that act you would carry much provision on the road to the world beyond." "Noble one, where would we find such a monk?" "Sisters, do you not recognize that I myself am one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, versed in the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and endowed with the confidence of reasoning and liberation?" "Noble one, how could we possibly come by a great bolt of cloth?" "Sisters, do you not know the verse:

Do not despise a small merit,
thinking it will not come to me.

Just as a great vessel fills to the brim drop by drop of dripping water, so the steadfast, by accumulating merit little by little, bring it to fullness.

Can you give even a single measure of thread for now? Go ahead and load it." Another said, "I will give half a measure." Another said, "I will give a quarter of a measure." And in the same way all of them promised to contribute each their own portion. Nyadga said, "Sisters, each of you give just a small amount." "Noble one, all of us are the heavy-load carriers here. There is one among us, Dekhenma, who carries the lighter load." "Sisters, call her over." They called to her, and Nyadga said to her, "Girl, spin the thread down finer." She spun it finer, and Nyadga said, "Girl, spin it finer still." She spun it finer still, and again and again Nyadga said, "Girl, spin it even finer than that," until she said, "Noble one, I cannot spin it any finer than this." Then Nyadga said to them all, "Sisters, all of you together give thread of just this fineness." "Noble one, we cannot load thread of this fineness by the measure. Can this girl not manage it? Or if you want it for her benefit, then let her carry it on your behalf." "Noble one, if she is willing." Then Nyadga said to her,

"Girl, do it, and it will become merit for you. Noble one, this thread is very fine, so please load it gradually over a long time and do not pull it too taut — weave it in this present moment." Nyadga said to her, "Bravo," and rose from his seat and departed.

O Fortunate One, that woman loaded the thread by that same time, then went to the others, and all gathered together and offered that thread to Nyadga. Nyadga said to them, "Bravo. May this act of generosity become an ornament of mind, a provision of mind, an accumulation of yogic practice, the attainment of the supreme benefit, and the obtaining of garments for gods and humans." Having said this, he departed.

Then Nyadga took that thread, went to the assembly hall, and showed the thread to the monks, saying, "Venerable ones, look at this thread of mine. Elder, the thread is excellent. Elder, might there be a weaver who could weave a great cloth worthy of it?" "Venerable ones, are you trying to suppress Nyadga? If Nyadga cannot manage this, Nyadga will weave it himself." "Elder, we are not trying to suppress the elder. There is a certain weaver who has just arrived, by the name of Gaga, living nearby. If he could obtain this thread, he could produce a great cloth worthy of something grand. My children, bravo — in effect you have made him weave my great cloth." With that he took the thread and went to the weaver's house, and when the weaver saw him from a great distance, he recited these verses:

The learned shine brilliantly from afar, like a snow-clad mountain peak.
The unlearned do not shine at all,
like an arrow shot in darkness.
Fair of face, your renown has filled all of Śrāvastī — what you have found, you have found well.

"Look at this thread. Noble one, the thread is excellent." "This thread here — and I am the weaver — will become a great cloth worthy of something grand." "Fair one, take this as well." "Noble one, who will give me payment for the weaving?" "Fair one, are you not perpetually satisfied with weaving pay? Send along provisions too for the journey to the world beyond." "Noble one, when I was weaving the previous great cloth, the debts I took on at that time have still not come back around." He began to look at his wife's face, and his wife said, "Noble one, even if he wants it, I do not want it." Nyadga laughed and said, "Hey, bare-headed weaver, listen! If I cannot get you to weave this great cloth, I swear by this bare head." The weaver also laughed and said, "Hey, shaven-headed ascetic, listen! If I do weave your great cloth, I swear by this shaven head." Nyadga laughed and went off, and he had a friend at the great palace of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, a man named Yidten Chempa. Nyadga went to visit him, and said to the household servants, "Hey, servants, where has the great one gone?" They said, "Noble one, he has gone to the market." Nyadga went to the market where he was coming, and the great one had entered a certain wine-seller's stall. Nyadga stood at the door of that stall and sent word to the great one that Nyadga was waiting at the door. The great one came out and said, "Venerable Nyadga, I bow to you. I bow to you." Nyadga said, "Great one, I have come about the king's affairs and thought that I had come with the intention of being diligent in the king's affairs. It never occurred to me that I would find you wandering from wine-seller's stall to wine-seller's stall like this." The great one said, "Noble one, I entered here on the king's business." Nyadga said, "Venerable Nyadga, what is the purpose of your coming?" The great one said, "I have obtained a small amount of raw fiber. Let it first be sent to be woven into a large bolt of cloth. I shall present Venerable Nyadga with that very bolt of cloth." Then he added, "But if it is to be sent, should one not give with faith rather than set aside this act of giving?" The great one then instructed a man: "Hey, servant, go to that weaver Spyicer's house and take this noble Nyadga's large bolt of cloth and present it." Nyadga said, "Rather than having it woven by the weaver Snabo, let it be woven by the weaver Spyicer, who lives beside a certain fence over there, sitting with his loom out in the open." The great one said to that man, "Hey, servant, go to the weaver Spyicer and say these words: the great one says, take this and give it." That man took the raw fiber, went to where the weaver Spyicer was sitting in the open, and said, "Hey Spyicer, the great one says, take this and give it." Spyicer recognized the fiber and said, "It is my turn." The man went back and said to the great one, "The weaver Spyicer says: it is my turn." The great one said, "Hey, servant, go to Spyicer and say: he will not be allowed to take another turn." The man went and said, "Hey Spyicer, the great one says: he will not be allowed to take another turn." Spyicer said, "Hey, servant, if the great one rules in Śrāvastī, I for my part need only leave Śrāvastī. I will not do work that is not my due." The man went back to the great one and said, "Spyicer says: if the great one rules in Śrāvastī, I need only leave Śrāvastī. I will not do work that is not my due." The great one said, "Hey, servant, go to the weaver Snabo and say: take this fiber and weave a large bolt of cloth." Nyadga said, "Let it not be woven by the weaver Snabo, but rather let it be woven by the weaver Spyicer." The great one said to that man, "Hey, servant, go to the weaver Spyicer and say: the great one says, in exchange for a drink of water, take this and weave a large bolt of cloth." Then the noble Nyadga said to that same man, "You wretch, who appointed you as the king's man? You are to be struck with many blows and put to work breaking up the ground and cutting wood." Then the man went and said, "The great one says: in exchange for a drink of water, take this and weave a large bolt of cloth." Spyicer said, "I, who am not of the allotted lot, cannot weave it." The man seized him by the hair, dragged him over, and struck him with his fist. Spyicer began to cry, and the man began to tangle his loom out of order. Spyicer's wife began to cry as well, and

He seized the other by the hair and began to drag him along, saying, "You two have insulted the great one, so come — you two are to be brought before King Prasenajit of Kosala to face a lawsuit in which five hundred kārṣāpaṇas are to be assessed. You are to go to the royal palace." With that, he took the two of them away. The noble one's wife said to Spyicer, "My lord's son, if the two of us are put in prison there will be no one at all to secure our release, and we would have to die there from the torments of the prison. Take this large bolt of cloth."

Spyicer said, "Dear kinswoman, do not be anxious — rather than having us dragged to the royal palace, let us be on our way. I will weave the large bolt of cloth, and I will also give you many combs." She set aside her anxiety and left. Then Spyicer said to his wife, "Good woman, that bolt of cloth must be woven in such a way that it will be of no use either as a loom-weight or as a large bolt of cloth." His wife said, "My lord's son, since that mendicant is such a miserable wretch, if we make the bolt of cloth like that, he will no doubt just leave it behind." So he wove the large bolt of cloth, and while that large bolt of cloth was still hanging free from the loom, Ānanda arrived and took the large bolt of cloth. Spyicer said, "Noble one, please give me a drink of water." Ānanda replied, "You wretch, am I to give you a drink of water? Why did you not send poison? Why did you not send corrosive? The monastic conduct of the mendicants, the sons of the Śākya, is just words. The conduct of a brahmin is just words. In this way, even with a little payment for the mouth they made him weave; even with a small power of the royal palace they made him weave," — and so he abused, snapped his fingers, and hurled insults.

At that point the monks informed the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in connection with this origin story and on this occasion, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, as before. That the buddha Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign not to know — and so forth as before. The buddha Blessed One asked Ānanda, "Ānanda, is it true that you acted in such an unseemly manner?" "Venerable one, yes, it is." The buddha Blessed One rebuked him, saying that what was unbecoming of a mendicant, discordant, improper, and contrary to deportment was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having rebuked him in many ways, addressed the monks, declaring: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk causes a weaver who is not a relative to weave cloth, soliciting him with thread that the monk himself has obtained — when the cloth is finished, that constitutes a downfall entailing relinquishment.

'Whatever monk' means a son of the Śākya, Ānanda or any other of that sort. 'Thread that he himself has obtained' means thread solicited with intent — from some, one śrāṇa in weight; from some, half a śrāṇa; from some, two śo; from some, one śo. 'Weaver' means a person who weaves on a loom. 'Who is not a relative': the seventh degree of relation reckoning from the grandmother and grandfather back through collateral lines constitutes a relative; beyond that is not a relative. 'Causes to weave cloth': the seven kinds of cloth are: woolen cloth, hempen cloth, silk cloth, fine cotton cloth, cotton-and-wool cloth, coarse linen cloth, and sun-bleached cloth — any one of these."

"When the cloth is finished" means when the cloth has been obtained. "It is an offense requiring forfeiture" means that after forfeiting that article, the transgression requiring forfeiture must be confessed. That is why it is said to be an offense requiring forfeiture.

Now, as to how the transgression arises: if a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and then directs a weaver who is not a relative to weave cloth, there is a wrong act in the soliciting, and directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and then directs a weaver who is a relative to weave cloth, there is a wrong act in the soliciting, but there is no transgression in directing the relative weaver to weave. If a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and weaves the cloth himself, there is a wrong act in the soliciting, and weaving it himself also constitutes a wrong act.

If a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and then directs both a relative weaver and a non-relative weaver to weave cloth, there is a wrong act in the soliciting; directing the relative weaver to weave incurs no transgression, while directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and then directs himself and a non-relative weaver to weave cloth, there is a wrong act in the soliciting; weaving it himself also constitutes a wrong act, and directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a non-relative and then directs himself and a relative weaver to weave cloth, there is a wrong act in the soliciting; weaving it himself also constitutes a wrong act, but directing the relative weaver to weave incurs no transgression.

If a monk solicits thread from a relative and then directs a non-relative weaver to weave cloth, there is no transgression in the soliciting, but directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a relative and then directs a relative weaver to weave cloth, there is no transgression in the soliciting, and no transgression in directing the relative weaver to weave either. If a monk solicits thread from a relative and weaves the cloth himself, there is no transgression in the soliciting, but weaving it himself constitutes a wrong act.

If a monk solicits thread from a relative and then directs both a relative weaver and a non-relative weaver to weave cloth, there is no transgression in the soliciting; no transgression arises in directing the relative weaver to weave, but directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a relative and then directs himself and a non-relative weaver to weave cloth, there is no transgression in the soliciting; weaving it himself constitutes a wrong act, but directing the non-relative weaver to weave constitutes an offense requiring forfeiture. If a monk solicits thread from a relative and then directs himself and a relative weaver to weave cloth, there is no transgression in the soliciting; weaving it himself constitutes a wrong act, but directing the relative weaver to weave incurs no transgression.

Directing weaving for wages incurs no transgression. For a first offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

The twenty-third forfeiture offense, that of directing weaving, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was a certain householder in Śrāvastī who had taken a wife from an equal family. He took pleasure with her, rejoiced with her, and lived in delight with her.

At another time that householder became attached to another man's wife. When his own wife tried to turn him away from this, saying, "My lord, please do not act in this way," he would not desist no matter how much she tried to dissuade him. And so his wife, for her part, began to take up with other men. The householder then gave himself to other women, and his wife gave herself to other men, and in this way both households fell into ruin. Now there was a maidservant in that household, and the householder began striking her with his fists and the flat of his hand, saying, "You have brought this household to ruin." The maidservant replied, "I do not dispute that this household has fallen to ruin. And yet, how could it be fitting for me to speak ill of my lord and master?"

A friend, hearing this, went to that householder and his wife and, by speaking the praises of moral discipline and the disgrace of moral misconduct in whatever way would cause both of them to take refuge and abide by the precepts of training, managed to establish them in the going for refuge and in the observance of the training precepts.

But the householder, being fierce, impetuous, and violent, began striking the maidservant again. His wife then said to him, "My lord, at the time when you and I did not understand karma and the ripening of karma, that was the time to do the striking. Now we have relied upon the virtuous friend, the noble Ānanda, and we understand karma and the ripening of karma. This being so, since beings in this world live out the fruits of their own karma, who is whose slave? Do not strike this girl. Good woman, I am pleased with what you said. Come here. Go and bathe." The girl bathed and came, and he dressed her in a new garment and said, "Girl, take delight and be at ease in your work."

The girl thought to herself, "This master of the house, my husband's lord, was previously fierce, impetuous, and violent, and he repeatedly struck me with his fists and the flat of his hand and gave me poor food and clothing. Now he has become like a father and mother to me." She then thought further, "From the time that the noble Ānanda began coming to this house, this householder has become like a father and mother to me. How might I do something to please the noble Ānanda?" And she thought, "If I were to steal something from here, even a small thing, this householder, because I am a servant, would beat me many times and leave me in my former condition." So she sat and stayed where she was.

The householder's wife then said to the householder, "My lord, please take note of this: the noble Ānanda is our virtuous friend. It is the noble Ānanda who separated us from our defilements, established us in the going for refuge, and set us in the training precepts. Again and again he gathers us through the Dharma. We for our part should gather him with a small material gift." "Good woman, let it be so." "My lord, I have spread out a soft cushion. From the yarn of that cushion I shall have a master weaver weave a great bolt of cloth, and afterwards I shall present you with that great bolt of cloth." The householder gave the cushion to the weaver, saying, "Good man, weave a great bolt of cloth from this cushion and I will offer it to the noble Ānanda." "So be it."

When the girl heard this she thought, "I shall add to the joy being made ready for the noble Ānanda."

Now Ānanda, rising early in the morning and putting on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe and entered Śrāvastī on the alms round. Going from house to house in due order, he entered that house. The girl had cleaned and swept the house well, and

When the girl saw Ānanda she prostrated at his feet and said, "I shall add to the joy being made ready for the noble Ānanda." Ānanda said, "Girl, what joy do you mean to add for me? This householder will present you with the great bolt of cloth." Ānanda thought to himself, "Of all the beings on the face of the earth who are subject to desire, I know that this girl today has become as agitated as any of them," and he spoke to her thus: "Girl, are you trying to beguile me?" The girl replied, "Why would I try to beguile the noble one?" Ānanda said, "Girl, if it is true, I shall not hold you to blame for any harsh words. But if it is false, I shall have you beaten and dirtied many times over and placed back just as you were before. Noble one, if you do not believe me, there is a weaver in a certain direction — go there and you will find out for yourself."

She went there and said to the weaver, "Good man, whose work is this great bolt of cloth being woven?" "It belongs to the venerable noble Ānanda." "Do you know Ānanda?" "I do not." "He is me." "Good man, be satisfied with this much for now." "Noble one, who will provide the dye?" "That same householder will provide it." "I too shall do a small service for you."

The next morning Ānanda rose early, put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and entered Śrāvastī on the alms round. Going from house to house in due order, he entered the home of the queen Phreñ Idan ma. She had his seat laid out, and when he had sat down, the queen Phreñ Idan ma prostrated at Ānanda's feet and sat before him to hear the Dharma. He taught her the Dharma, and she said, "Noble one, have you been invited today, or are you on the alms round?" "I am on the alms round." She thought, "Who might offer him the finest alms?" and she filled his bowl with the best foods and offered them to him. Ānanda accepted them, then went to that weaver and said, "Good man, hold out both hands." When he had held out both hands, Ānanda gave him one morsel of food and said, "Good man, eat this." When he had eaten it, Ānanda said, "Good man, how does the food taste?" "Noble one, it is delicious." "Have you ever before eaten food like this?" "Noble one, never once." "Hold out your bowl." When he held out his bowl, Ānanda poured all the food into it and said, "Good man, weave this great bolt of cloth of mine well. I have done you a small service with a little food, and now for this much in return, complete it. Noble one, if the dye runs out, who will provide it?" "That same householder will provide it."

When the weaver had woven the great bolt of cloth and the dye ran out, he went to the householder's home. As it happened the householder's wife was not there; only the householder was present. The weaver said to the householder, "Householder, the dye for weaving that great bolt of cloth has run out — give me dye." The householder gave it and sent him off. Again when he was weaving and the dye ran out, he once more went to the householder's home. As it happened the householder was not there; only the householder's wife was present. The weaver said to the householder's wife, "Madam, the dye for weaving that great bolt of cloth has run out — give me dye." She gave it and sent him off. Again when he was weaving and the dye ran out, he went to the householder's home. As it happened both the householder and his wife were present. The weaver said to the householder, "Householder, again the dye for weaving that great bolt of cloth has run out — give me dye again."

The householder's wife said, "Weaver, how is that great bolt of cloth coming along?" The householder said to his wife, "My dear, did you also give him dye?" She said that she had. The householder said, "Weaver, how is that great bolt of cloth coming along?" The weaver replied, "Householder, do you think I could finish it today? On the very day that the noble Ānanda came to me and said, 'Weave this much in width and this much in length,' it was on that very day that I began weaving it." The householder's wife thought to herself, "I wonder how that great bolt of cloth is turning out," and went there to see. She saw a great bolt of cloth, fit in every way for a great man. Seeing it, her eyes filled with tears and she said, "She will not give this great bolt of cloth to the noble Ānanda. She will have another great bolt of cloth woven for that purpose," and with that she left.

Ānanda came there from time to time and said, "Weaver, is it ready?" "Noble one, it is ready for me but not for you." "Weaver, what has happened?" He replied, "The householder's wife came and saw the great bolt of cloth, and her eyes filled with tears. She said she would not give this great bolt of cloth to the noble Ānanda, and that she would have another great bolt of cloth woven for that purpose, and then she left." Ānanda said, "Weaver, do you know what a small thing I did for you?" He replied, "Why would I not know? Even now I am still coming and paying my respects at your feet. Weaver, when I come to that house, take this great bolt of cloth and bring it. Have the noble one step back a little, and I too will come around from the other side."

Ānanda went to that house and stood right at the doorway. The householder's wife bowed at his feet and sat before him looking toward the door. The weaver rolled up the great bolt of cloth, took it, and went there. The householder's wife saw him from a great distance and gestured with her hand signaling him not to come. The weaver looked in all four directions and, watching carefully, bowed his head and slipped inside and placed the great bolt of cloth in the lap of the householder's wife. Ānanda without hesitation took it and said, "May this gift bring you adornment of mind, the requisites of mind, the accumulation of yoga, the attainment of the highest purpose, and the obtaining of robes among gods and humans."

The householder's wife said, "Noble one, please return it, giving it back from your own hands to the householder." Ānanda said, "I have made this more auspicious. After this, have the householder take on the banner of a ṛṣi." The householder's wife said, "Noble one, the Blessed One has praised the white color." Ānanda said, "Let him take on the banner of a ṛṣi," and with that he rose and departed.

Vinayavibhaṅga, thirty-fifth fascicle.

The weaver said, "Householder's wife, give me my wages." She said, "Having had even one great bolt of cloth taken from her, would she drive away other wages as well? Go, and ask for your wages from the one to whom you gave the great bolt of cloth." He went to Ānanda's presence and said, "Noble one, give me my wages." Ānanda said, "Go and ask the householder's wife herself." "Noble one, shall I go to the householder's dwelling and say, 'The one to whom you gave the great bolt of cloth — go and ask that one for your wages?'" Ānanda said, "Go, and you shall receive them." The weaver went to her presence and said, "Householder's wife, give me my wages." She said, "My goodness, husband — can you not bear to sit? If you will sit, then sit."

"If you will not sit, she will fasten a copper yoke around your neck and parade you through all of Śrāvastī." The weaver then went to Ānanda's presence and said, "Noble one, the householder's wife said to me, 'My goodness, husband — can you not bear to sit? If you will sit, then sit. If you will not sit, she will fasten a copper yoke around your neck and parade you through all of Śrāvastī.' So please, noble one, give me my wages." Ānanda said, "O householder, if I were to pay the wages of the one who had my great bolt of cloth woven, I would be left without even my alms bowl and robes. Furthermore, reckon it up: add together all the flour, clarified butter, molasses, and the like that you have carried off from me, and count it out." When they reckoned it up, it turned out that he had taken considerably more than was due. Ānanda then had the weaver placed in the sun for a short while and sent him away.

That weaver was in the habit of disparaging the manner of life of the renunciants who were sons of the Śākyans, and the manner of life of the brahmins, saying, "They are like that — they just talk about doing more, yet in practice they do only less." He would mock them, spread false rumors about them, and slander them. On that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, in this context, and concerning this case, convened an assembly of monks — and so on, as before. The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though fully knowing, feigned not to know — and so on, as before. The awakened Blessed One then asked Ānanda, "Ānanda, is it true that you did something so unseemly?" The Venerable One replied, "It is so, Lord." The awakened Blessed One rebuked him, saying that what was not in keeping with the manner of a renunciant, not befitting, not proper, not in accord with the discipline, was not something to be done by one who had gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having rebuked him in many ways, addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so on, as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Should a monk — on behalf of a monk — cause a weaver who is not a relative to weave cloth for him, and if, before having previously arranged the matter, some thought arises in that monk and he goes to the non-relative weaver and says, 'Venerable weaver, know that this cloth is being woven for my sake. Venerable weaver, please make this cloth wide, long, closely woven, and well finished.' And if, after having said this, that monk gives the weaver wages such as food, provisions of some kind, or a little something to eat in order to obtain the cloth, and the cloth is completed — that constitutes an offense entailing forfeiture.

As for the phrase 'on behalf of a monk': this refers to Ānanda, a son of the Śākyans, or to another of that kind. 'Householder' means a man. 'Householder's wife' means a woman. 'Not a relative' is explained as follows: a grandmother, a grandfather — up to and including the seventh degree of kinship on the mother's side, these are relatives; beyond that, they are not relatives. 'Weaver' means one who weaves. 'For a non-relative' is explained as follows: a grandmother,

a grandfather, and up to and including the seventh degree of kinship on the father's side are relatives; beyond that, they are not relatives. As for the phrase 'from the weaving of cloth': this refers to any one of the seven kinds of cloth — woolen cloth, linen cloth, silk cloth, cotton cloth, coarse wool cloth, hemp cloth, or goat-hair cloth. As for the phrase 'if for that monk': this refers to Ānanda, a son of the Śākyans. As for 'not having previously invited': this means not having previously called him as a guest. As for the phrase 'some thought having arisen': this means that some notion of hospitality has arisen. As for 'going to a non-relative weaver': this means going into his presence. As for the words 'Let the venerable weaver know this — weave this cloth for me': this means presenting oneself as the beneficiary. As for 'wide': this means broad in width. As for 'long': this means long in length. As for 'tightly woven': this means without loose ends. As for 'well finished in weave': this means the warp threads are even, the quality is good, and there are no protruding strands. As for 'something to eat': these are the five kinds of food. As for 'or something as a relish': these are the five kinds of relish. As for 'edible cause': this means what serves as the basis for food. As for 'if that monk': this refers to Ānanda, a son of the Śākyans. As for 'in order to obtain the cloth': this means for the purpose of acquiring the cloth. As for 'when the cloth is completed': this means upon obtaining the cloth. As for 'that constitutes an offense entailing forfeiture': the item is to be forfeited, and then the offense entailing forfeiture is to be confessed — therefore it is said to constitute an offense entailing forfeiture. As for how the offense is incurred: from the moment the monk rises from his seat in order to accomplish his purpose — putting on robes and lower garment, washing his hands and his alms bowl, going out to beg for alms, soliciting the five kinds of relish and the five kinds of food, and giving them to the weaver — until the cloth is not yet obtained, each action constitutes a wrongdoing. When the cloth is obtained, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If, however, someone from some region had previously invited him, saying "Have cloth woven there and you may inspect it," then there is no offense. There is no offense for one who acts for the first time, for one who is mentally deranged, for one who is distracted in mind, or for one who is afflicted by pain.

The twenty-fourth offense, entailing forfeiture — that of causing weaving — is complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain companion of Ānanda — a monk named Dharma, who was conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and eager for the training — as long as he did not know that this other monk was constantly engaging in corrupt conduct, dwelt together with him. But when he came to know that he was constantly engaging in corrupt conduct, he began to live instead with monks of naturally upright character, and by the instruction of the Blessed One he went to pay homage at his feet only at the three proper times of day. Then the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks that the Tathāgata is setting out to tour the Kosala districts — whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata on the tour of the Kosala districts should prepare their robes." The venerable Ānanda replied, "Reverend one, I shall do as you have commanded," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he spoke to the monks:

"Venerable ones, the Blessed One is setting out to tour the Kosala districts. Whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Blessed One on the tour of the Kosala districts should prepare their robes." When Ānanda heard this, he then spoke to Nandaka: "Venerable Nandaka, take note." And the venerable Ānanda spoke to the monks: "Venerable ones, take note. The Blessed One is setting out to tour the Kosala districts. Whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Blessed One on the tour of the Kosala districts should prepare their robes." At this, some said among themselves: "If we stay here, we will have passed through a hundred doorways and will still have to struggle somehow just to fill our bellies. But if we travel together with the Blessed One, the Blessed One has taught that traveling in the retinue of a buddha brings eighteen benefits, and so many hundreds and thousands of living creatures will also be traveling together with the Blessed One. Yet if we do travel with the Blessed One, for a time we will have to drink muddied water, and we shall not be able to find a place in the shade of a tree. So let us take some monks who are good companions, reciting the praises of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha as we go forward — in that way we will travel in comfort and obtain abundant provisions."

Nandaka said: "Master, have you given up a golden begging bowl and taken to going on almsround with an earthen bowl? Is there anyone here among your companions who has the qualities of Dharma — who is conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and eager for the training? That person wants nothing to do with seeing you. Master, of the four means of gathering disciples (saṃgrahavastu) — generosity, kind words, purposeful conduct, and consistency of purpose — that the Blessed One has taught, has the master properly adopted and practiced even a single one? Not in the slightest. That is why you have come to your present situation."

The venerable Dharma had a worn-out patch-robe, and having found a large bolt of cloth he thought: "I will go and request the preceptor to sew a new patch-robe." He took it and went to the presence of Ānanda, and as he was going, a monk on almsround saw him and said: "Venerable Dharma, where are you going?" He replied: "My patch-robe is worn out, and I have found this large bolt of cloth, so I am going to ask my preceptor to sew a new patch-robe." The almsround monk said: "If you are going to have a new patch-robe sewn, give that old patch-robe to me." He agreed, and went to Ānanda's presence and said: "Preceptor, my patch-robe is worn out and I have found this large bolt of cloth, so I ask you to sew me a new patch-robe." Nandaka said: "Master, this is the right moment." Ānanda said: "Venerable Dharma, I myself have a patch-robe, and I will give it to you. There is no need to trouble the preceptor — from this large bolt of cloth I will cut and sew a patch-robe and keep it." Nandaka said: "Venerable Dharma, I have heard with my own ears and seen with my own eyes that you are conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and eager for the training. But I do not know how you could so flout what the preceptor has said, which accords with the Dharma. Could it be that you are accepting something contrary to the preceptor's intention?" At this, the powerful monk said nothing in response to the rebuke, and Ānanda gave him the patch-robe.

He took it and said: "Preceptor, please accept this large bolt of cloth." The venerable Dharma said: "Why would I exchange anything with you? You gave me the patch-robe, so take the large bolt of cloth back for yourself." The other monk thought: "What use have I for this useless article? I will offer this large bolt of cloth to the Saṅgha, and as for this old patch-robe, I will ask the preceptor's permission to give it to that almsman." He then said: "Preceptor, I intend to offer this large bolt of cloth to the Saṅgha, and since an almsman has received this old patch-robe, I wish to give it to him — I ask the preceptor's permission." The preceptor replied: "So be it." The monk offered the large bolt of cloth to the Saṅgha and gave the old patch-robe to the almsman.

The next morning, the almsman came wearing that patch-robe to pay his respects at the preceptor's feet. Ānanda said: "Venerable Dharma, please take note. Let the venerable Ānanda inform the monks: the Blessed One is setting out to tour the Kosala regions. Whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Blessed One on this tour of the Kosala regions should attend to the matter of robes. If we stay here, we will have to pass a hundred doorways and somehow manage to fill our bellies. But if we travel together with the Blessed One, the Blessed One has declared there to be eighteen benefits in traveling together with a buddha, and many hundreds of thousands of living beings will likewise travel with him. Even so, when one travels together with the Blessed One, one will at times have to drink turbid water and will not find shelter at the foot of a shaded tree. But if we go ahead reciting the praises of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, then we shall travel in comfort and abundant gains will also be secured."

The preceptor spoke: "Those eighteen benefits that the Blessed One has declared to attend traveling together with a buddha — for me they amount only to drawbacks. For my part, I shall travel together with the Blessed One himself." Ānanda said: "Then I will go along with you." The other replied: "I am going with the Blessed One himself." Ānanda grew angry and said: "Wicked one! Do you imagine that I gave you the patch-robe out of genuine spiritual regard for you in the Dharma? I gave it to you so that you would travel together with me. If you do not go together with me, I will not let you keep the patch-robe." The venerable Dharma thought: "Having my robe seized is the better option. It would not be right for me to go on a regional tour together with those who are completely given over to vile conduct." And so he returned the patch-robe to him.

Then the Blessed One — himself tamed, his retinue tamed; himself at peace, his retinue at peace; himself liberated, his retinue liberated; himself at ease, his retinue at ease; himself subdued, his retinue subdued; himself an arhat, his retinue of arhats; himself free of attachment, his retinue free of attachment; himself resplendent, his retinue resplendent — surrounded by a herd of bulls as a supreme bull among them, surrounded by a herd of elephants as a great elephant, surrounded by a pride of fanged beasts as a lion, surrounded by a flock of geese as a king of geese, surrounded by a host of birds as a Garuḍa, surrounded by a company of students as a brahmin, surrounded by a crowd of patients as a skilled physician, surrounded by an army of warriors as a hero — surrounded by a company of travelers as a caravan leader; surrounded by a throng of merchants as a merchant chief; surrounded by a host of attendants as a lord of trade; surrounded by a council of ministers as a king in his fortress; surrounded by a thousand sons as a wheel-turning monarch (cakravartin); surrounded by a multitude of constellations as the moon; surrounded by a thousand rays of light as the sun; surrounded by hosts of gandharvas as Dhṛtarāṣṭra, guardian of the realm; surrounded by throngs of kinnaras as an āryan; surrounded by hosts of nāgas as Virūpākṣa; surrounded by hosts of yakṣas as Vaiśravaṇa, the giver of wealth; surrounded by hosts of asuras as Vemacitra; surrounded by the assembly of the Thirty-Three as Śakra (Indra, king of the gods); surrounded by the assembly of the Brahmā realm as Brahmā —

His sense faculties utterly tamed; his conduct and comportment untroubled; still as an ocean; bearing moisture like a cloud; free of pride as a great royal elephant; his body beautifully adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being; his form made splendid by the eighty minor marks; adorned with a halo of radiance a fathom wide; possessing a luminosity surpassing that of a thousand suns; moving through the world with uninterrupted goodness like a moving mountain of jewels; endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unshared mindfulnesses; possessing great compassion; entered upon the work of benefiting the world; sole protector; solitary hero; without a second; speaking nothing of duality; abiding in calm abiding and insight, making the three knowledges shine clear; well trained in the three trainings; skilled in the foundation of the three bases of discipline; having crossed the four rivers; well established in the foundation of practice in the four bases of miraculous power; having long since thoroughly purified the four means of gathering beings; knowing no intimidation from the four fearlessnesses; having abandoned the five limbs; having truly passed beyond the five destinies; endowed with the six limbs; having fully perfected the six perfections; abiding in the six constant abidings; rich with the flowers of the seven limbs of awakening; teaching the eight limbs of the path; skilled in the nine absorptions of successive abiding; endowed with the power of the ten powers; his fame having spread and pervaded completely in all ten directions; exceedingly exalted above those who rule over a hundred thousand realms —

He set out to tour the realm of Kośala, preceded by his great śrāvaka retinue: the venerable Uruvilvā-Kāśyapa, Gayā-Kāśyapa, Nadī-Kāśyapa, and the remaining thousand former matted-hair ascetics; the venerable Śāriputra, the great Maudgalyāyana, and the many monks of the Saṅgha who accompanied him.

Now, it is the nature of reality that whenever a blessed buddha sets out to tour the realm, he surveys with his entire body, turning in the manner of an elephant, to the right, to see whether anything is out of order or improperly arranged. And so as the Blessed One surveyed to the right in the manner of an elephant with his whole body, he saw the venerable one walking on the tour of the realm clad only in his Dharma robe, with upper and lower robe in place. Having seen this, the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, have the robes of the monks who are in the rains retreat been successfully obtained?" "Blessed One, they have." "Then why does this monk walk on the tour of the realm wearing his Dharma robe alone, with upper and lower robe in place?" At that point, a detailed account was presented to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, do monks give a robe to a monk and then take it back?" "Venerable One, they do."

Then, with regard to this incident, this founding case, and this circumstance, the Blessed One convened the assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The Blessed Buddhas, while knowing, question for a purpose" also proceeds as before. The Blessed Buddha questioned Dāsaka: "Dāsaka, is it true that you gave a robe to a monk and then took it back?" "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed Buddha then censured him, saying that such conduct was unworthy of a renunciant, improper, unsuitable, out of keeping with the Vinaya, and not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should any monk, having given a robe to another monk, later become angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure either seize it back himself or cause another to seize it back, saying to that monk, 'I do not give you the robe — return it!' — if that monk, having a surplus, gives it back and relinquishes it, he incurs an offense requiring forfeiture."

"Any monk" refers to a son of the Śākyaas — Dāsaka or any other such person. "To a monk" means one who is a member of this Dharma community. "A robe" means any one of the seven kinds: wool cloth, hemp cloth, silk cloth, cotton cloth, coarse linen, jute cloth, or sun-bleached cloth. "Having given" means without any need to return it. "Later" means at some other time. "Angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure" means while the anger has not subsided. "Seize back himself" means to do so by one's own hand.

"Cause another to seize back" means to have another do so. "That monk" means whichever monk it is. "Having a surplus" means having whatever surplus is available. "Gives it back and relinquishes it" means to hand it over. "If he relinquishes it" means if he has parted from it bodily. "He incurs an offense requiring forfeiture" means that, having forfeited the article, one must confess the offense requiring forfeiture — that is why it is said "he incurs an offense requiring forfeiture."

Now, how does the transgression arise? It arises through bodily action, through verbal expression, through both together, or through others acting on one's behalf.

How does it arise through bodily action? If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure physically grabs, pulls, and carries away the robe without saying verbally to the monk "I do not give you the robe — return it!" — then, for as long as he has not separated the robe's hem from the recipient's body, he incurs a wrongdoing; but when he does cause the robe's hem to separate from the body, he incurs an offense requiring forfeiture. That is how it arises through bodily action.

How does it arise through verbal expression? If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure says verbally "I do not give you the robe — return it!" without laying hands on the robe himself — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, he incurs a wrongdoing;

but when he does cause the robe's hem to separate from the recipient's body, he incurs an offense requiring forfeiture. That is how it arises through verbal expression.

How does it arise through both together? If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure both lays hands on the robe bodily and says verbally "I do not give you the robe, monk — return it!" — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, he incurs a wrongdoing; but when he does cause the robe's hem to separate from the body, he incurs an offense requiring forfeiture. That is how it arises through both together.

How does it arise through others? If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a monk to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, a wrongdoing accrues to each of the two; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, each of the two incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a nun to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, a wrongdoing accrues to each of the two; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, the nun incurs a wrongdoing, while the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a female probationer to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, a wrongdoing accrues to each of the two; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, the female probationer incurs a wrongdoing, while the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a novice monk to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, a wrongdoing accrues to each of the two; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, the novice monk incurs a wrongdoing, while the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a novice nun to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, a wrongdoing accrues to each of the two; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, the novice nun incurs a wrongdoing, while the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a layman to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, great demerit accrues to the layman and the monk incurs a wrongdoing; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, even greater demerit accrues to the layman, and the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture.

If a monk, having given a robe to another monk, later becomes angry, agitated, and wrathful, and in a state of displeasure, sends a laywoman to snatch it back — then, for as long as the robe's hem has not been separated from the recipient's body, great demerit accrues to the laywoman and the monk incurs a wrongdoing; and when the robe's hem is caused to separate from the body, even greater demerit accrues to the laywoman, and the monk incurs an offense requiring forfeiture. That is how it arises through others.

For other purposes, and through implements of the Vinaya, there is no transgression.

How does it arise for other purposes? It is like this: when a preceptor, an abbot, or their attendants are traveling at an improper time toward a dangerous area, toward the bank of a river, or toward the edge of a great precipice, and the abbot or preceptor thinks, "It would not be right if thieves or deceivers were to snatch their robes," and so snatches the robes or causes them to be snatched — that is how it arises for other purposes.

How does it arise through implements of the Vinaya? It is like this: when attendants dwelling together with monks are keeping company with evil friends, evil associates, and evil companions, going along the road with them and associating in evil, and the abbot or preceptor thinks, "It would not be right for these attendants to be in the company of evil friends, evil associates, and evil companions," and so snatches the robes or causes them to be snatched — that is how it arises through implements of the Vinaya. There is no transgression for a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by pain. The twenty-fifth rule, the abandonment of snatching, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At a certain rocky cliff there lived a faithful householder, good and of virtuous intention, who had built a monastery temple for the Saṅgha — one furnished with high entrance steps, with latticed windows, adorned with railings, delightful to the heart and eye, fit to serve as a stairway to the heavens, and fully equipped with large and small seats and furnishings. Sixty monks resided there, and that householder provided them with robes, alms-food, and other necessities. Then at another time, the householder came to possess the Dharma of the season — that is, he passed away — and he had a son. The monks went to that son and said, "Good sir, your father provided the sixty monks with robes, alms-food, and other necessities. Would you also be able to provide the sixty monks with robes, alms-food, and other necessities?" He replied, "Noble ones, some give service to a hundred, some to a thousand, some even to a hundred thousand. But as for me, I can barely sustain myself, so I cannot take this upon my shoulders." Thereupon the monks departed from that temple.

Two men who had gone forth from the household life right there at that same rocky cliff, having wandered for alms, took up residence in that very temple. Travelers heading in the same direction arrived from the north, and they saw that temple from a great distance and went there. Having paid homage to the stūpa with verse, they entered the temple. They found it empty, and they thought, "Have the monks gone inside for proper meditation, or have they gone out on their daytime rounds?" As they were walking around inside, they saw the two newly ordained men, and they said to them, "Noble ones, where have the monks gone?" The two replied, "Good sirs, no monks are residing here. Why? The householder who had this temple built provided the sixty monks with robes, alms-food, and other necessities; then he came to possess the Dharma of the season, and the monks went to his son and said, 'Good sir, your father provided the sixty monks with robes, alms-food, and other necessities. Can you likewise provide the sixty monks with robes, alms-food, and other necessities?' The son replied, 'Noble ones, some people make offerings to a hundred; some make offerings to a thousand; some even make offerings to a hundred thousand. But as for me, I can barely support myself, so I cannot take this on.' And so those monks departed. As for the two of us, we supported ourselves by going on alms rounds and have remained here in this very temple."

The caravan leader said, "Wise ones, it has long been our aspiration: 'How wonderful it would be if we could have a Saṅgha temple built, and having had it built, provide the monks with what they need.' Now this temple is already built, so we will provide the monks with what they need in this very temple." He then spread out a large bolt of cloth and said, "Wise ones, each of you, donate here whatever you can give." They each gave according to their means, and a great quantity of goods was assembled there. The caravan leader then said to the two newly ordained men, "Noble ones, this is three months' alms-food for sixty monks. This is alms-food for the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth of the fortnight. This is for illness and medicinal supplies. This is for gains. This is a store of robes. Please invite the good monks, for after the rains retreat has passed, we will come here and provide a hundred monks with what they need." Having said this, they departed.

One of the two newly ordained men said, "Who shall keep the Saṅgha's gains?" The other replied, "The younger one." Of the two, the younger one hid the gains away, and then said, "When monks are being summoned from Śrāvastī, who should go there?" The elder said, "The younger one should go." The younger replied, "I am the one who hid the gains, so you go." The elder of the two went to Śrāvastī to summon monks.

Now the conduct of the group of six was this: they thought, "Here, when brahmins and householders come and gather, we shall teach them the Dharma, defeat our opponents, and proclaim our own reputation." So one of the group of six, not wanting to leave the gateway of the Jeta Grove empty, was walking and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove. Venerable Ānanda, walking and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove, saw from a considerable distance an approaching figure — the elder monk — gray-haired like the flower of the wheat plant, with hanging eyebrows. He thought, "Who is this senior monk coming? I should greet him." So he said, "Welcome, elder. Well come, well come. I pay you homage."

The elder replied, "I pay homage to the teacher." Then Ānanda thought, "Alas — this is merely a newly ordained man; he does not even know who is a teacher and who is a preceptor." Ānanda said to him, "Newly ordained one, where have you come from?" "I have come from a certain rocky mountain temple." "Newly ordained one, is that place a proper temple, or is it a place of poverty? What is a proper temple? What is a place of poverty? Where all requisites are present — that is a proper temple. Where all requisites are lacking — that is a place of poverty." "Previously it was a place of poverty, but now it has become a proper temple." "How did that come about?" Along the road, likeminded companions had gathered together, and they had offered to it three months' alms-food for sixty monks, alms-food for the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth of the fortnight, supplies for illness and medicine, gains, and a store of robes; and saying, "Please invite the good noble monks — "We too, after the rains retreat has passed, will come here and provide requisites for a hundred monks," they said. The intimate companion replied, "And yet you have come to steal monks." "Indeed so." The elder Prasena, who had arrived in Kosala, King Prasenajit, Queen Mālikā, the Kṣatriya woman Vārsākārī, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, the learned brahmin Jīvaka, the elder Vṛddha, the householder's wife, the mother of Mṛgāradhṛtā, Sujanā, other brahmins, and many other faithful householders — all of these had served the monks with every requisite, and each day the elders of the Saṅgha were announcing donations, saying, "May those monks who have not yet come to this place also come, and may those who have come take great delight here." For there, robes, alms-food, lodging, the conditions needed in illness, and the supplies of medicine were all present without any lack, and the Blessed One was personally teaching the Dharma. So here the enjoyment of the Dharma and the enjoyment of material things were both in full abundance. "Therefore, if the monks were to learn that you had come here to steal monks, there would be a procedure to expel you from this residence. So do not say such a thing to any other monk. Rather, we each have a retinue of ten, making sixty of us in all, and we have come out of affection for you." "Teacher, I have come to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and to return thereafter." The intimate companion thought, "If some black-bowl bearer should see this and hear of it and go straight to the Blessed One first, that would not be right." He therefore said, "Elder, have you not heard the saying, 'A god is circumambulated with the mind, not with the body'? And the Blessed One himself declared:

All phenomena are led by the mind, the mind is their foremost, they move in the mind's wake.

So right here, pay homage at the Blessed One's feet." And taking the elder by the scruff of the neck, he made him bow down, saying, "Do this: 'Homage to the buddha! Homage to the Dharma! Homage to the Saṅgha!'" And thus he caused him to bow. "Teacher, I am thirsty. Please drink whatever you need to drink for thirst. Wait right here — I will fill a small thirst-bowl and bring it back to you." Having filled the thirst-bowl and poured it out, he said, "Elder, go now." He escorted him a good distance away, then instructed him, "Do not turn back now," and returned by himself.

Now the way of the Group of Six was this: however small a piece of news they heard, the moment it spread about they would gather together and report it to one another. So the intimate companion went to the temple and said to the Group of Six, "Venerable ones, let us at last put an end to our worries. Have you heard a certain small piece of news?" "We have. At a pleasant temple among rocky crags, a group of like-minded companions arrived from the northern road, and they offered there three months' alms-food for sixty monks, food for the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth of the fortnight, the conditions needed in illness, the supplies of medicine, gains, and a store of robes. Go there." "Should we keep the rains retreat there or not?" "No — consume those provisions there during the rains itself, then come back here and accept a place for the later rains retreat, which is now close at hand."

When those monks arrived and the two elders saw them coming from a great distance, the intimate companion said, "Venerable ones, welcome!"

"Welcome!" the two elders said, and they assigned those monks their lodgings and gave out bedding, high seats, low seats, water pitchers, bowls, water-straining cloths, and crooked keys.

Those monks thought, "Let us now look into the matter for which we have come," and they said, "Venerable elders, show us whatever gains have been accumulated here." The two elders, being of straightforward character, showed them everything: "This is three months' alms-food for sixty monks. This is the food of the eighth. This is the food of the fourteenth. This is the food of the fifteenth. This is the provision for illness. This is the store of medicinal supplies. This is the gain from this source. This is the store of robes."

Those monks said, "Venerable ones, since the two elders are miserly, they are unable to give food in alms, and yet here the two elders have rendered service to the Saṅgha. On account of that, we give the relinquishment." They gave the two elders the relinquishment, and the two elders were glad, saying, "We have received the relinquishment."

Then those monks said, "Venerable ones, if we entrust this to some monk who has a good stomach, he will provide the assembly each day with meals in eighteen varieties, together with many kinds of oily and flavourful side dishes, and well-prepared beverages in abundance." They did entrust it to a monk with a good stomach, and he provided them each day with meals in eighteen varieties, many kinds of oily and flavourful side dishes, and well-prepared beverages in abundance. In a short time all the alms-provisions were spent.

Then the appointed steward sat down to one side of the elders and said, "Venerable ones, a single parasol's share has now arrived for the Saṅgha."

Those monks said, "Venerable ones, those who have not properly undertaken the training observe the ceremonies of the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth. We who have properly undertaken the training do not do that — so eat that too." And they ate it.

Again the steward sat down to one side of the elders and said, "Venerable ones, there now remains a single portion of the Saṅgha's provisions for illness and medicinal supplies."

The group of six said, "Venerable ones, for as long as the five aggregates subject to clinging continue to live, we are perpetually ill — so eat that medicine too." And they ate it.

Then they said, "Venerable ones, it is hard to carry an unequal load. Let us divide this store of robe-cloth as well, so that with equal loads we may travel comfortably." And they divided that too.

Again the steward sat down to one side of the elders and said, "Now there is nothing left of the Saṅgha's single parasol's share."

Those monks said, "You two elders claimed there were three months' alms-provisions for sixty monks, yet they have all been exhausted within the rains itself."

The two elders said, "Did we say, 'Make only a continuous succession of meals in eighteen varieties, many kinds of oily and flavourful side dishes, and well-prepared beverages'?"

Those monks said, "The two elders used it themselves before, and now they criticize those who are doing the same. Venerable ones, perform the act of expulsion against these two from this residence." Some said, "Let the two elders request forgiveness at once. If they wait to request forgiveness later, it will be as late as the hair on a louse." The two had just begun to request forgiveness when some said —

Some said, "Venerable ones, these two elders are straightforward by nature — grant them forgiveness." The others said, "The two elders are to be forgiven." Then they said, "This rocky cliff has many who lack faith, and even alms are hard to find here. If there are a few leftovers, give those. But if there are none, we shall depart." The venerable ones replied, "There is nothing at all — you may leave today." And so those monks departed, went to Śrāvastī, and upon arriving there agreed to observe the latter rains retreat.

When the rains retreat had passed, a corresponding group also arrived, and they paid homage to the stūpa with the same verse-recitation, and entered the monastery. Upon entering, they saw the monastery was empty and thought, "Have the monks gone inside to lie down properly, or have they gone out for their daytime activities without delay?" As they were making their way around, they caught sight of those two elders and said, "Noble ones, where have the monks gone? Good sirs, there are no monks here at all." The noble ones said, "Did we not provide alms-food for sixty monks for three months?" The two elders replied, "The monks came, ate everything during the rains retreat, and departed." They asked, "Which monks did you two bring?" The answer was: "The group of six." The noble ones said, "You two went to the great ocean and brought back string-pearls, yet could you not find any monks other than the group of six to bring?"

Those people then condemned the conduct of the śramaṇas (renunciants) who are sons of the Śākya, and the conduct of brahmins, saying, "The very moment a sprout of faith arises in us, they crush it." They complained, they slandered, and at that very occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon, the Blessed One — on account of this incident, this occasion, and this context — convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, just as before. And the passage beginning "The Blessed Buddhas, though knowing, act as if they do not," and so on, also proceeds as before. The Blessed One then asked the group of six monks: "Is it true, monks, that you divided the gains of the rains retreat during the rains retreat itself?" They replied, "It is true, Blessed One." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that such conduct is unworthy of a renunciant — it is not the proper way of a renunciant, it is not fitting, it is not suitable, it is not in accord with the precepts.

Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing these ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, just as before.

The rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be recited as follows: "Therefore, monks shall not divide the gains of the rains retreat during the rains retreat itself. If monks divide the gains of the rains retreat during the rains retreat itself, it shall constitute a serious offence." Thus did the Blessed One establish this rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī, there were the fully ordained nun Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī and Dharmadinnā. Of these two, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, though not herself accompanied by a retinue of renunciants, was one possessed of the qualities of a renunciant, Dharmadinnā, for her part, was accompanied by a retinue versed in the sūtra collection, and that retinue was itself possessed of expertise in the sūtra collection. Both had undertaken to observe the rains retreat together in a single dwelling. When the time came that Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī's retinue arose and departed, Dharmadinnā instructed her own retinue, saying to her sisters: "Whatever the Blessed One has permitted to the fully ordained nuns — the going forth, the full ordination, and all the requisites of the fully ordained nun's life — all of this depends upon Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī. Moreover, the Blessed One has declared that a person who protects the mind of another generates abundant merit. Therefore, for the time being, cultivate the contemplation of impermanence." And her retinue began to cultivate the contemplation of impermanence.

When the time came that Dharmadinnā's retinue arose and departed, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī likewise instructed her own retinue, saying to her sisters: "Over three immeasurable eons, through hundreds and thousands of ascetic deeds, the Blessed One fully perfected the six perfections, and all the unsurpassed knowledge he thereby realized is a cause of benefit for sentient beings. Moreover, the Blessed One has declared that a person who protects the mind of another generates abundant merit. Therefore, for the time being, chant all those passages of the sūtra collection that deal with impermanence." And her retinue began to chant all those passages of the sūtra collection concerned with impermanence.

In this way, the fully ordained nuns, by thus guarding one another's minds, did not flourish in virtuous qualities — like a blue lotus (utpala) growing without water. Now, there was a laywoman named Sāgā who had faith in Dharmadinnā, and she invited her as a guest, providing all necessities. On a later occasion, the laywoman Sāgā came to prostrate at Dharmadinnā's feet. Dharmadinnā said to her: "Good lady, a great many fully ordained nuns have undertaken to keep the rains retreat together in one dwelling, yet because they guard one another's minds, they do not flourish in virtuous qualities — like a blue lotus growing without water. Could you arrange for the nuns' Saṅgha to have a rains retreat dwelling built? The land belongs to the king; for the sake of the land, please petition the king."

Sāgā replied: "Noble one, I have kārṣāpaṇa coins available. As for the land, since it is under the king's authority, please petition the king yourself. As for the construction, I shall provide for it."

The fully ordained nun Dharmadinnā went to Queen Mallikā, and Queen Mallikā said: "Noble one, welcome, welcome. Noble one, for what purpose have you come?" Dharmadinnā replied: "I wish to have a rains retreat dwelling built for the nuns. The land is under the king's authority, and I wish to petition the king for the land. Noble one, please go ahead; I shall petition the king on the noble one's behalf."

Dharmadinnā departed. Then Queen Mallikā went before Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, and said to him: "Your majesty, the fact that the noble Dharmadinnā has come to your palace is a great gain for you. She has come wishing to have a rains retreat dwelling built for the nuns, and she says she has come to petition the king for land that is under your royal authority."

The king said: "If the noble Dharmadinnā wishes to stay here in this very place, she may remain right here and I shall have another palace built. If she does not wish that, she may choose whichever location she pleases and a rains retreat dwelling shall be built there."

Queen Mallikā conveyed the king's reply to Dharmadinnā, saying: "Your majesty offers the noble one this assurance —"

"If the noble Dharmadinnā wishes to remain in this very place, she may stay here and I shall have another palace built. If she does not wish that, wherever she pleases, a rains retreat dwelling shall be built there." This was the message she conveyed.

Dharmadinnā then told the laywoman Sāgalā that King Prasenajit, born of Kosala, had given her this assurance: "If the noble Dharmadinnā wishes to stay here in this very place for the time being, she may remain here and I shall have another palace built elsewhere. If she does not wish that, wherever she pleases, a rains retreat dwelling shall be built there." This was the message she passed on.

Now the King of Kosala, Prasenajit, had two districts: one called Sword-Powered and one called Noble Royal Lineage. The Sword-Powered district had gone off to a military posting, and the wives of those men were spending their time in pleasurable company with other men, so that quarter had become quiet and secluded. Dharmadinnā said: "Let a rains retreat dwelling be built in that direction." The laywoman Sāgalā had the rains retreat dwelling built in that quarter, and the nuns began residing there.

Then the Sword-Powered district returned from the military posting. Those men began dragging their wives back and beating them, and in the streets the sound of the women weeping rose up high and loud, like the sound of horses and elephants.

The nuns said: "Noble one, we are frightened by the summer rains and have taken shelter under the eaves."

Dharmadinnā thought: "I wonder whether any among these women have roots of virtue." She looked and saw that some did. She then thought: "On whom does it depend?" and saw that it depended on herself. She said: "Sisters, in accordance with their capacity to be tamed, one must bear all of this with patience."

Dharmadinnā set a jar of sesame oil to one side and said to the nuns: "Sisters, whatever nail-clippings any of you have, put them all into this jar." Whatever nail-clippings they had, they all poured into the jar.

Then some children came there, and Dharmadinnā gave the boys sesame oil, had them anoint one another's heads with it, and with her own hands she gave them food. To the girls she herself applied the sesame oil, anointed their heads, and with her own hands gave them food. The children took these things and went off to their own homes, and their mothers asked them: "Who gave you these?" They said: "The noble Dharmadinnā did." The wives thought: "In truth, the noble Dharmadinnā has done for us the work of a mother." They were filled with faith in her and thought: "Whenever our husbands go off to the military posting, we shall see our husbands off and then attend upon the noble Dharmadinnā."

On another occasion their husbands departed for the military posting, and Dharmadinnā, knowing it was the right time to tame them, had the temple swept clean, well plastered, coated with a smooth plaster of fresh clay and dung, and arranged with washing materials, water, incense, fragrant smoke, flowers, and mats. She appointed nuns with pleasant voices to remain there. The wives, having seen their husbands off, came into the presence of Dharmadinnā, and Dharmadinnā provided them with washing materials, water for rinsing the hands, incense, fragrant smoke, flowers, and seating mats, and in a melodious, verse-like voice made prostration to the stupa. She then took her seat in the presence of the community of nuns. The wives too made prostration at her feet and arranged themselves before her in order to hear the Dharma. Dharmadinnā, having fully understood their intentions, habitual tendencies, constitutions, and characters, taught the Dharma in such a way that, without fail, they shattered with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection that had been accumulated since beginningless time, and directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, they said: "Noble one, relying on you as our virtuous spiritual friend, what you, noble one, have done for us is something that neither our fathers did for us, nor our mothers, nor the king, nor the gods, nor our ancestors of former times, nor ascetics and brahmins, nor friends and companions, nor any gathering of relatives — you have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed us from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; you have lifted our feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; you have established us among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to an end. By shattering with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection that had been accumulated since beginningless time, we have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Noble one, we have truly entered the path. Noble one, we have truly entered the path. Noble one, we take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the community of monks. We ask to be received as laywomen. From this day forward, for as long as we live, we take refuge from the very depth of our hearts."

Having become filled with faith, they went home to their respective houses, swept them clean, plastered them well, coated them with a smooth plaster of fresh clay and dung, and conducted themselves with peaceful composure. When their husbands returned from the military posting, the husbands thought: "Our wives must be making merry with some elephant-keeper, or cowherd, or someone of that sort." Then they heard that their husbands had arrived. Having heard this, the wives greeted them with gracious and welcoming words, saying "Welcome, dear lords, welcome," and sent them off to their respective homes. Their wives massaged them with scented oils, bathed and cleansed them, dressed them well, and gave them food. The husbands thought: "Such conduct as this has never happened before," and asked them: "Dear ones, if conduct like this is unprecedented, how has it come about?" They replied: "Dear lords, the noble Dharmadinnā has taught us the Dharma in such a way that, however long we continue to revolve in cyclic existence, such afflictions will never again arise among those who wander in saṃsāra." The husbands thought: "The noble Dharmadinnā is one who tames the untamed — and look, she has tamed these women here. Those whom we were unable to tame by killing, binding, beating, and cursing have been tamed by the noble Dharmadinnā through teaching the Dharma. The noble Dharmadinnā has truly benefited us, and for our part we shall look to the king and pay homage to the noble Dharmadinnā."

Dharmadinnā, knowing it was the right time to tame them as well, had the temple swept clean, plastered well, coated with a smooth plaster of fresh clay and dung, and arranged with washing materials, water, incense, fragrant smoke, flowers, and seating mats, and appointed nuns with pleasant voices to remain there. The husbands too, having looked to the king, came into the presence of Dharmadinnā, and Dharmadinnā gave them washing things, water for rinsing the hands, incense, fragrant smoke, flowers, and betel, and then with a voice of verse offered salutation to the stūpa. She then sat down on the seat that had been prepared before the community of nuns. The husbands as well paid homage at her feet and took their places before her to hear the Dharma.

Dharmadinnā, having fully grasped their intention, their latent tendencies, their elements, and their character, taught the Dharma in such a way as to ensure that through the vajra of gnosis they would shatter the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a personal self), accumulated from beginningless time, and directly realize the fruit of having entered the stream.

Having seen the truths, they said: "Noble one, even our own fathers did not do for us what the noble one has done for us by relying on her as a virtuous spiritual friend. Our mothers did not do it. The king did not do it. The gods did not do it. Our forebears of old did not do it. Ascetics and brahmins did not do it. The assembly of friends, companions, and relatives did not do it. She has dried up the ocean of blood and tears. She has freed us from the mountains of bones. She has closed the doors to the lower destinies. She has opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. She has drawn our feet out from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed them among gods and humans. She has brought cyclic existence to an end. Having shattered with the vajra of gnosis the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated from beginningless time, we have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Noble one, we have entered the stream. Noble one, we have entered the stream. Noble one, we go for refuge to the Blessed One, the Dharma, and the community of monks. Please accept us as laymen. From this day forward, for as long as we live, we go for refuge from the depths of our hearts."

Having become filled with faith, they spoke again: "Noble one, since from this day forth we shall not incur the guilt of intentionally taking the life of even a worm or a beetle, and yet we live by the sword, how shall we sustain ourselves?"

Dharmadinnā replied: "Take up bows without strings, arrows without points, and swords made of wood."

And so they took up bows without strings, arrows without points, and swords made of wood.

From the moment they saw the truths, they no longer engaged in sport with weapons, no longer drank ale, and no longer pursued pleasure in the company of other women. As a result, they became wealthy and prosperous through their possessions. Their elephants and horses, being no longer used up, grew thriving, well-hided, flush with flesh and blood.

Now a certain chieftain had turned against Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, and the king sent one regiment there. It was defeated, thoroughly routed, and scattered, and returned. In the same way, a second regiment was sent there, and it too was defeated, thoroughly routed, and scattered, and returned. Then the ministers said to the king: "Sire, the chieftain's forces grow while the king's forces dwindle. If the king himself does not go there, the chieftain will be difficult to overcome."

The king had the drum of proclamation sounded and issued the order: "Let all those within my realm who live by the sword go there."

The king himself also set out, equipped and armed with a four-division fourfold army.

Now in the service of Prasenajit, king of Kośala, there were two guilds, one called the Sword-Mighty and the other called the Noble-Kshatriyas. The guild of the Sword-Mighty were men who went in the van of battle, while

The guild of the Noble-Kshatriyas consisted of men who came from outside, and so when the king looked toward the front of the Sword-Mighty guild, he saw the men marching there to be well-fed, full of flesh and blood, and their elephants and horses likewise well-fed, full of flesh and blood. Seeing this, he said to his ministers, "Wise ones, to whom does this guild belong?" They replied, "Sire, this is the guild called the Sword-Mighty, which marches at the fore." Then when the king looked behind, he saw the men of the Noble-Kshatriyas guild to be haggard, thin, emaciated, lean, and without bodies filled out, and their elephants and horses likewise haggard, thin, emaciated, lean, and without bodies filled out. Seeing this, he said to his ministers, "Wise ones, to whom does this guild belong?" They replied, "Sire, this is the guild called the Noble-Kshatriyas, which follows behind."

The king said, "Wise ones, are they not given equal provisions?" They replied, "Sire, please grant them equal provisions." He had them summoned, and when they came the king said to them, "Wise ones, are you not given equal provisions? I grant you equality. But then why is it that the Sword-Mighty guild is prosperous, full of flesh and blood, whereas you of the Noble-Kshatriyas guild are reduced to wretchedness, thinness, emaciation, leanness, and lack of bodily fullness?" They said, "Sire, if only we too were without bows and bowstrings, without arrows, carrying wooden swords, selling and reselling weapons, then we too would become prosperous, full of flesh and blood. Furthermore, the elephants and horses of those others are wholly unused, while our own horses and elephants are wholly used up."

The king said to them, "Wise ones, is what you say true?" They replied, "Sire, it is." "Then do you wish to be led out there and slaughtered at a cliff?" They replied, "Sire, what shall it be — battle with weapons or battle without weapons?" The king replied in anger, "If you will not fight with weapons, then you yourselves this very day — topple that cliff." And with that, the king turned back.

The guild of the Sword-Mighty went to the presence of Dharmadatta and said, "Noble one, the king has appointed us to a military post. How are we to carry it out?" Dharmadatta said, "Come now. No harm whatsoever will befall any of those of you who go there. In whichever place you are stationed, look to the third lunar day. On whichever day the cliff is to be circumambulated, give them the gift of hearing the Dharma throughout all the watches of that night, and invoke in praise the lord of the Enduring World, Brahmā; the lord of the gods, Śakra (Indra); the Four World-Guardians (the four mahārājas); the twenty-eight great yakṣa commanders; the five great yakṣa commanders called Sena; the nāga king Nandaka; and Priya by name — praise them and rejoice with them."

At these words of the noble Dharmadatta, those men expressed joyful approval and rejoiced aloud. Thereafter, in whichever place they were stationed, the noble one had them recite the third lunar day text. On whatever day the cliff was to be circumambulated, he gave them the gift of hearing the

Dharma throughout all the watches of that night, and they praised the lord of the Enduring World, Brahmā; the lord of the gods, Śakra; the Four World-Guardians; and the twenty-eight great yakṣa commanders, and the five great yakṣa commanders called Sena, and the nāga king Nandaka, and Priya by name — and they offered praise and rejoiced with them.

At that very time, Vaiśravaṇa, the great king and son of a good family, had gathered the yakṣas together, and when he heard the praises being offered, he thought: "Who is this who offers praise using my name?" And he saw that a certain number of his Dharma-brothers had been stationed in an unsuitable place. Seeing this, the five great yakṣa commanders called Sena addressed him: "These Dharma-brothers of mine have been posted in an unsuitable place. Go and drive down that cliff and hurl it upon them — but harm no living creature."

The five great yakṣa commanders called Sena obeyed the great king Vaiśravaṇa and manifested: elephants resembling mountain peaks, horses resembling rhinoceroses, chariots resembling boundless palaces, and men resembling ferocious yakṣas. The cliff-dwellers, looking from a great distance, saw them coming, and were seized with terror. They thought:

When both land and life are threatened, a person must strive above all to preserve life.

Weighing both with reason one finds:
land can be regained, but lives cannot.

With that, they hung their swords around their necks, departed from the cliff, and were captured. Bound with fetters, they were escorted to Śrāvastī and brought before Prasenajit, the king who had arisen in Kośala, and they were told: "Your majesty, here are the cliff-dwellers, and here are their weapons." The king was pleased and said: "Wise men, keep these weapons for yourselves." They thought: "All of our survival and well-being, all of our prosperity and good fortune in full measure, is entirely due to the power of the noble Dharmadatta. Let us go, then, and offer these weapons to the noble Dharmadatta." And so they took the weapons, went to Dharmadatta, and said: "Noble one, whatever survival and well-being we have, whatever prosperity and abundance of good fortune is ours — all of it is solely due to the power of the noble one. These weapons that the king has given us, we beg the noble one to accept them out of compassion."

He replied: "Children, even among the gods there are those who are poor, so make offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha — that will bring you long-lasting benefit, welfare, and happiness."

They then invited the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of hearers for three months, providing all requisites. In the mornings they made offerings to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha; in the afternoons they listened to the Dharma.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the thirty-sixth fascicle.

At another time, some other cliff-dwellers came back to Prasenajit, the king who had arisen in Kośala, and the king commanded the market guild of the warrior class: "Today, drive down those cliff-dwellers." They replied: "Your majesty, we are exhausted, while the guild of those who wield the power of swords is well supplied — why then, at this time, give commands to us and send us on yet another mission?" The king then commanded the guild of those who wield the power of swords: "Today, drive down a great number of cliff-dwellers." They replied: "Your majesty, it is our turn in rotation. We will go today, but should not be sent on the next occasion." They thought: "On that previous occasion, it was through the power of the five great yakṣa commanders called Sena that we drove down those cliff-dwellers.

"Now we ourselves will have to die right there in that place. Let us therefore present robes to those noble ones whom we have hosted for three months with all provisions, and then depart." With that thought, they took up the robes, went to the monastery, and said to the monks: "Venerable ones, the king has sent us to a military posting. Should we happen to perish there, we may come to such an end. Please accept these robes." The monks replied: "Good sirs, the Blessed One has established a training rule that monks must not divide the rains-retreat gains within the rains retreat itself, so we will not accept them." The men said: "Venerable ones, please take them, set them aside, and after the invitation ceremony distribute them." With that, they placed the robes in the monks' lodgings and departed.

The noble ones and the householder Anāthapindada (the giver of food to the unprotected) saw them and said: "Good men, where are you going?" "Householder, we are going to a military posting." "Is it your rotation?" "Householder, it is our rotation." "Then why are you going?" "Word came from His Majesty that we should go today, and that we would not be sent on the next occasion." "I will petition His Majesty on your behalf — wait here a moment." He went before the king and said: "Your Majesty, to which guild did you give the command?" "Householder, a large group of cliff-dwellers has come back; go drive them down." "Is it their rotation, Your Majesty?" "Householder, it is their rotation." "Then why have you given the command?" "They were not to be sent on the next occasion." "But does Your Majesty not know that those men, having no bows with bowstrings, no arrows, and carrying only ceremonial swords made of wood, cannot possibly turn back the cliff-dwellers? Furthermore, they are nothing but sons of the Buddha — they would not incur the sin of intentionally taking the life of even a living worm." The king replied: "It is just as it was before — on that previous occasion too it was through the power of the five great yakṣa commanders called Sena that those cliff-dwellers were driven down. Yet if they go there now, some fault may arise, and that too would reflect badly on Your Majesty. So I did not kill them." "Householder, are they truly nothing but sons of the Buddha?" "Your Majesty, that is indeed so — and through reliance on their good spiritual friend, the noble Dharmadattā, every one of them has directly realized the fruit of stream-entry."

The king of Kosala, Prasenajit, then issued orders to his ministers: "Good sirs, from this day forward you are to issue commands to the noble warrior class. You are not to issue commands to the guild of those who wield the power of swords." He then dismissed that guild of sword-wielders and stood them down.

When the monks performed the invitation ceremony, the monks went before those men and said: "Good sirs, we have performed the invitation ceremony — give us the robes." The men replied: "Venerable ones, we have already offered those robes. Please accept them." The monks went and opened the door of the lodging, and found that the robes had been lying there, permeated with the oiliness and sweetness of the air, wrapped up in mold, and crumbled to dust. At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, a robe-keeper monk is to be appointed. One lacking the following five qualities is not to be appointed as robe-keeper monk, and one already appointed is to be removed. What are the five? One who proceeds through desire, one who proceeds through aversion, one who proceeds through delusion, one who proceeds through fear, and one who does not know what robe-gains have been stored and what have not. A monk who is a robe-keeper and who possesses the following five qualities is to be appointed even if not yet appointed, and one already appointed is not to be removed. What are the five?

One who does not proceed through desire, one who does not proceed through aversion, one who does not proceed through delusion, one who does not proceed through fear, and one who knows what robes have been stored and what have not.

He is to be appointed in the following manner. First, consent is to be sought: "You, whose name is such-and-such, are you willing to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during the rains retreat?" If he is willing, he should say, "I am willing." After that, a seat is to be arranged, the gong is to be struck, the monks are to be properly informed with the words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, one monk is to make the motion and perform the act.

"May the venerable Saṅgha hear me. If the monk named such-and-such is willing to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat, and if it is timely for the Saṅgha and they consent, may the Saṅgha please grant permission. The Saṅgha appoints the monk named such-and-such to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat. The monk named such-and-such will keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat." This is the motion.

The act is to be performed as follows. "May the venerable Saṅgha hear me. The Saṅgha appoints the monk named such-and-such to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat. If the appointment of the monk named such-and-such to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat is acceptable to the venerable ones, those who consent to the appointment of the monk named such-and-such to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat should remain silent; those who do not consent should speak. The Saṅgha has consented and permitted; the Saṅgha has appointed the monk named such-and-such to keep the robe-gains of the Saṅgha during this rains retreat. So it is held, in that no one spoke."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who aspire to the training, those who are devoted to the training, those who are equipped with the implements of the training, those who are clean, those who possess the virtues of refinement, those who are beautiful, and those who sense warmth, and he declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, what came before was a rule, and this is a permission. My hearers are to recite this as the basis for training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk, before the last ten days of the last month of autumn have been reached, obtains a robe that has arisen from an urgent occasion and desires it, that monk may accept that robe. Having accepted it, he is to keep it until the time for distributing robes. If he keeps it beyond that, it is an offense requiring relinquishment."

Now the explanatory commentary: "A monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. "Before the last ten days of the last month of autumn have been reached" means up until the invitation ceremony arises on the tenth day. "A robe that has arisen from an urgent occasion" means the five robes that arise from urgent occasions: one given to a sick person, one given on account of a sick person, one given to someone at the point of death, one given on account of someone who has died, and one given to someone who is about to depart. "Obtains" means from another person. "Desires" means if one seeks to make use of it. "That monk" means whichever monk it may be. "That robe" means any one of the seven: a woolen robe, a linen robe, a silk robe, a fine cotton robe, a coarse cotton robe, a hemp robe, or a canvas robe.

"Should be taken" means should be made one's own. "Having taken it, should keep it until the time for distributing robes to monks" means should store it away.

What, then, is the time for distributing robes to monks, and what is the non-time? In a place where the spreading out of mats has not been performed, up through the fifteenth day of the last month of autumn is the non-time for distributing robes; the remainder is the time. In a place where the spreading out of mats has been performed, from the fifteenth day of the last month of autumn onward up through the fifteenth day of the middle month of spring is the non-time; the remainder is the time.

"Should one keep it beyond that" means should one keep it in excess of that. "It is an offense requiring forfeiture" means that having forfeited that article, the transgression requiring forfeiture must be confessed; therefore it is called an offense requiring forfeiture.

As to how a transgression arises in that regard: however much a monk makes gains of the rains retreat his own during the rains retreat, or keeps them beyond the time for distributing robes, in every case it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If one makes one's own any of the five robes arising from an urgent occasion, and the donor gives them from his own hand, there is no transgression. If a monk has been appointed to oversee the storing of robes, and a donor comes saying, "Noble ones, please accept these; I am here with these robes and will distribute them from my own hand," there is no transgression. For one who is a beginner, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, and for one afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

This completes the twenty-sixth forfeiture arising from urgent occasions.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Not far from Śrāvastī there was a cliff-face, and there dwelt a wealthy householder of great possessions and abundant resources. He was a man of faith, of good character, and of virtuous intention, and so he dedicated an assembly hall to the Saṅgha: a lofty building with high doorways, with latticed windows, adorned with balustrades, captivating to heart and eye, fit to serve as a stairway to the higher realms. In that assembly hall sixty monks performed the rains retreat and the invitation ceremony, and when they had departed the householder set guards there, saying, "Let no one steal the chairs and benches."

Now at another time sixty other monks were traveling through the countryside and arrived at that cliff-face, seeking lodging. A man spoke to them, saying, "Noble ones, why do you not stay in the assembly hall? Where is the assembly hall? Noble ones, it is right here in this hermitage." The monks went there, and the guards saw them and welcomed them with words of greeting. They assigned them their quarters, provided chairs, benches, cushions, bedding, and water vessels and the like, then borrowed a broom and said, "Noble ones, please wash first, and in the meantime I will inform the householder." The man went to the householder and said, "Be pleased, householder! Sixty monks have suddenly arrived at your assembly hall." The householder, gathering himself with reverence, spoke to his household members: "Wise ones, let those monks of the Saṅgha who have come to my assembly hall be satisfied with well-prepared drinks, sugar, molasses, treacle, grapes, and pomegranates." The householder prepared those well-mixed drinks and went to the assembly hall. The monks had washed and arranged themselves each according to his own deportment. The householder, seeing those monks from a distance, saw the assembly hall as if it were filled with a lake of lotuses.

Moved by a surge of deep faith, his being transformed, he spoke these verses:

Whether it be a village or a hermitage,
a valley or an open plain,
wherever noble ones take up their abode, that very ground becomes a place of joy.

He then prepared the well-mixed drinks, and with his own hands satisfied that community of monks. He himself took up a vessel and, together with the community of monks, offered prostrations before the stūpa, then entered the assembly hall and sat to one side among the elders. The elder of the Saṅgha explained the merit of giving, and the householder then prostrated to his feet and said: "Would the noble Saṅgha graciously consent to take the midday meal tomorrow at my home?" The monks accepted, and after prostrating to the householder's feet, departed.

The next day the householder satisfied the monks with alms food, and even outside mealtimes he poured out drinks for them, and the monks in turn taught the Dharma. Later, in the same manner, after the elder of the Saṅgha had explained the merit of giving, the householder sat to one side among the elders and said: "Noble ones, this assembly hall has not been built for my own benefit, nor for the benefit of my relatives; it has been offered precisely for the sake of noble ones such as yourselves. Please accept it and take up the rains retreat here. I shall see to it that noble ones are supplied with all requisites and want for nothing."

The monks replied: "Householder, in Śrāvastī the Blessed One, the Lord of the Dharma, is dwelling in person, and from time to time one hears reports that some great monk has directly realized arhatship, and that another great monk has announced the attainment of the interval before the unlovely state. The king is greatly devoted to the teaching; and the queen Mālyā (Phreng ldan ma), the royal ladies of the Kṣatriya summer assembly, the teacher Bla mkhyen the sage, Byid the elder, the laywoman Sāgā, the mother Mṛgadadhāriṇī (Ri dags 'dzin gyi ma), and many other faithful ones are also there — so both material abundance and great Dharmic abundance are to be found there. For these reasons we intend to go there."

The householder replied: "Noble ones, Dharmic abundance depends on noble ones themselves, while material abundance depends on me. Please be of good cheer — not the slightest insufficiency will occur." The elder of the Saṅgha then said: "Friends, the Blessed One has taught that one should foster the faith of the faithful and show compassion toward one's benefactors. Let us therefore remain here." And so they agreed to stay there.

Blo brtan pa then proceeded to examine the assembly hall thoroughly, both inside and outside, and found it to be abundantly endowed with flowers and abundantly endowed with fruits — a most delightful place. The elder of the Saṅgha said: "Friends, since this assembly hall is so abundantly endowed with flowers and fruits and is so very delightful, if we were to accept the early rains retreat here we would not be able to enjoy all its flowers and fruits to the full. We must therefore definitely accept the late rains retreat." And so they agreed to observe the late rains retreat there.

Now, as that householder had only this one assembly hall, everything he intended to give or do as an act of generosity he gave and did in that very assembly hall. In that rocky place too there was no other assembly hall, and so those who dwelt among the crags likewise directed everything they intended to give or do as an act of generosity to that same assembly hall.

Since there was no other assembly hall in the vicinity of those crags, all those who dwelt among the crags likewise directed everything they intended to give or do as an act of generosity to that same assembly hall, and so the monks who had accepted the rains retreat there received abundant gains.

Now the wayward ones whose conduct belonged to the last month of autumn gathered together right after the invitation ceremony and began to deliberate among themselves, saying: "What could we do so that we might enjoy ourselves and live comfortably all year round without needing to exert ourselves?" They thought to themselves: "We should destroy these monks, the sons of the Śākya." But others said: "Even if they recite a hundred door-panels' worth of begging, it is hard for them to fill their bellies. If they have nothing at all, why should we stay here as long as that?" Then one among them who knew about monks spoke up and said: "What do you know? Those monks have plenty." "How so?" "Well, the householder to whom this assembly hall belongs is a man of faith, a good man with wholesome intentions. And as he has only that one assembly hall, everything he intends to give or do as an act of generosity he gives and does in that very assembly hall. Here among these crags too there is no other assembly hall, and so those who dwell among the crags likewise direct everything they intend to give or do as an act of generosity to that same assembly hall. And in the vicinity of these crags as well there is no other assembly hall, and so those who dwell in the vicinity of the crags likewise direct everything they intend to give or do as an act of generosity to that same assembly hall. Therefore the monks who have accepted the rains retreat here have received abundant gains. If you don't believe me, go and see for yourself — it will become plain to your own eyes." "Very well then, if that is the case, you go ahead and see for yourself directly, and we will come later." He replied: "Good, do it that way. I will go." And with that he adjusted his robes and set out.

Then, singing in verse, he paid homage to the stūpa and entered that assembly hall. As soon as he stepped into the gatehouse, he found an elder sitting there. The wayward one bowed at his feet and began to question him: "Noble one, this assembly hall — so captivating, so delightful — this stairway to the higher realms: to whom does it belong?" "Good-looking one, it belongs to a certain great householder." "Noble one, is this an assembly hall, or is it destitute?" "Good-looking one, what is an assembly hall like, and what is destitution like?" "Noble one, where the requisites are complete and well-furnished — that is an assembly hall. Where the requisites are absent — that is destitution." "Good-looking one, then this is indeed an assembly hall and not destitution, for here the requisites are complete and well-furnished; it is not a place where requisites are absent." "Noble one, those who eat food do not eat any mere dust, and those who wear clothes do not wear any mere tree bark — so do you not have even a little clothing?" The elder, being of a straightforward nature, took the wayward one by the hand, led him into his room, and said: "Good-looking one, look at those stacked piles of cloth lying there." "Noble one, are these yours, or do they belong to the Saṅgha?" "Good-looking one, these belong to me personally." "Noble one, then without any ambiguity you are an elder of the Saṅgha, or a Dharma-preacher." "Good-looking one, I am neither an elder of the Saṅgha nor a Dharma-preacher. The fact is, I am a newly admitted novice of the Saṅgha."

The noble one said: "Good-looking one, is there not even a little Saṅgha lodging here? There are many such things — for now, you may also obtain the seven items among my own personal belongings. And you should come and meet that noble one too, and ask him this: here in this monastery, those to whom no one pays reverence — are they washed in the vessels of a potter, or are they washed in bronze vessels? Good-looking one, have you seen these lodging rooms?" "Noble one, I have." "Good-looking one, these lodging rooms are full and stocked with bronze vessels."

The wayward one thought: "I have been thoroughly tricked — now I shall go." And the wayward one said: "Noble one, the full decline of your virtuous side is the full decline of my own purpose; and so it is for my sake as well that I shall come — yes, now I shall come." "Good-looking one, do as you will then."

The wayward one made obeisance at the feet of that elder who had entered old age, and departed. Then that wayward one went to those thieves and said:

"Lotus-eyed ones, a great ship laden with all manner of goods lies grounded on dry land — rob it! Rob it!"

At that, one of them said: "It is well known that the sixty monastics staying there are masters of archery and nothing less — we cannot overpower them in the same way. When they go to hear the Dharma at night, that is when we should strike." Others said: "On what day does their Dharma-hearing take place?" He replied: "It falls on the eighth and the fourteenth — the eighth has already passed, so it will occur on the fourteenth."

They counted the days on their fingers, keeping track one by one, until at last the fourteenth arrived. The Saṅgha's elder recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra (the sūtra of individual liberation), the Saṅgha performed the restoration ceremony, and the Dharma-preacher ascended the lion throne and began to speak these words:

He who steers the chariot of taming the best of men, the Tathāgata who cuts the bonds of all fettered attachments, skilled in the stilled and the very stilled, with pacified faculties — as he entered Śrāvastī he spoke in accord with his word.

Just as he began to speak, those wayward ones beat upon the door. The monks, becoming aware, asked: "Gentlemen, who are you?" "Noble ones, we are sons of good families." The monks thought: "A crowd of people has surely come down from the rocky crags to hear the Dharma — we must not cause them to miss it; let us open the door." So they opened it, and those men entered.

When they were just about to strike, the monks said: "Gentlemen, you announced yourselves as sons of good families — and now you intend to attack us?" Those men replied: "Noble ones, we have two names: outwardly we are called sons of good families, and inwardly we are called thieves. It is a disgrace that you address us by that name." Those wayward ones then beat and drove away those monks.

The beaten monks deliberated together: "The Blessed One has declared that these and all the rest must be beaten as well. For now, this householder has had gifts given to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions — what more is there to do? He has had gifts given to us — what more is there to do? If we were to go to Śrāvastī itself, those there who lead the holy life (brahmacarya) in the same manner as ourselves would provide us with robes and we would not be in want." So they resolved.

How should they travel? "We shall travel covered by night and move in dense concealment by day." And so they departed without even looking back at the householder.

When in the course of time they finally reached Śrāvastī, and the monks who were devoted to practice without sleeping in the first or last watch of the night saw those monks wandering alone at the threshold of the gate, they said:

"You naked, disheveled fellows — what do you want here? This is neither your monastery nor your dwelling place."

They replied: "Venerable ones, we are not naked men." "Then who are you?" "We are monks." "Are such as you monks? What are those who have been stripped by robbers like? What are your names?" "We live by the Buddha. We live by the Dharma. We live by the Saṅgha."

"Welcome, venerable ones, welcome!" the monks said, and opening the gate they let those monks enter. Some gave them outer robes, some gave them lower garments, some gave them sweat-cloths, some gave them alms bowls, some gave them water-strainers, and they shared everything equally according to each one's proper share.

At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, a forest-dwelling monk may leave any one of the three robes in another's dwelling." After the Blessed One had declared that a forest-dwelling monk might leave any one of the three robes in another's dwelling, those monks went there and spent the night, and some brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, why do you sleep here? We have left robes here. Noble ones, do you think we would steal your robes? If you have no worry about that, please feel free to go." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One may not spend the night there."

They went back, and as dawn was breaking they went out in stages. Some women who were sleeping there alone said: "Noble ones, why have you come here in the middle of the night? We have left robes here. Noble ones, do you think we would steal your robes? If you have no worry about that, please feel free to go." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One may not be there at dawn."

Later they went there and were waiting in the courtyard for dawn to break, and at that point they fell into the power of robbers, tricksters, lions, tigers, and leopards. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One may be there at dawn inside the monastery." When monks needed to go beyond the boundary for the sake of Saṅgha business, stūpa business, or personal affairs and said, "We have left robes in another's dwelling," and then did not go, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "A forest-dwelling monk may be separated from that robe beyond the boundary for up to six nights at the most."

When the group of six monks intentionally remained separated beyond the boundary for seven nights, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and so forth as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though fully knowing, act as if they did not know" — and so forth also as before. The awakened Blessed One then questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, I declared that a forest-dwelling monk may be separated from that robe beyond the boundary for up to six nights at the most — is it true that you intentionally remained separated beyond the boundary for seven nights?" "Venerable One, it is true."

The awakened Blessed One then rebuked them, saying that this was unbecoming of a renunciant, discordant, unseemly, and contrary to proper conduct — and that it is not something one who has gone forth should do. Having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

When a number of monks are dwelling in a forest lodging that is known to be dangerous — known as a place of danger from thieves and rogues, known as a place of fearsome creatures where there are various distinct terrors — and when the latter rains retreat has commenced, if a forest-dwelling monk so wishes, he may place any one of the three robes in a household. Should a circumstance arise that requires the forest-dwelling monk to go beyond the boundary, that forest-dwelling monk may remain separated from that robe beyond the boundary for up to six nights at the most. To exceed that and remain separated is an offense entailing relinquishment."

Now, as for the term "monk" — this refers to one who is a member of this Dharma community. "A number" means two or more. "Lodging" refers to a temple or monastic hall. "Forest" is defined as follows: six subtle particles make one subtle particle; six subtle particles make one water particle; six water particles make one iron particle; six iron particles make one rabbit-hair particle; six rabbit-hair particles make one sheep-wool particle; six sheep-wool particles make one ox-hair particle; six ox-hair particles make one dust-mote visible in a sunbeam; six sun-mote particles make one nit's egg; six nit's eggs make one louse; six lice make one barleycorn; six barleycorns make one finger-breadth; twenty-four finger-breadths make one cubit; one and a half cubits make one fathom; four cubits make one bow-length; five hundred bow-lengths make one league — and from that distance onward is "forest."

"Known to be dangerous" means known to be a place of danger from thieves and rogues. "Known as a place of fearsome creatures" means known as a place dangerous on account of lions, tigers, and leopards. "Where there are various distinct terrors" means known as a place of various distinct terrors on account of wasps, mosquitoes, wind, sun, and venomous snakes.

"When the latter rains retreat has commenced" means when one has undertaken to remain for the latter portion of the rains retreat. "A forest-dwelling monk" refers to whichever monk it may be. "If he so wishes" means if he desires it for a purpose. "Any one of the three robes" means whichever he wishes from among the lower robe, the upper robe, and the outer robe. "In a household" means in a place where there is a main road, a market street, a crossroads, or a junction. "May place" means may store it there.

"Should a circumstance arise that requires the forest-dwelling monk to go beyond the boundary" means if a circumstance arises that requires him to go beyond the boundary for the sake of the Saṅgha, or of a stūpa, or of an individual. "That forest-dwelling monk" refers to whichever monk it may be. "Up to six nights at the most" means within the limit of six days and nights. "May remain separated from that robe beyond the boundary" refers to the robe that was placed there.

"Should he remain separated beyond that" means if dawn breaks while he is beyond that limit.

"It is a transgression requiring forfeiture" means that after forfeiting that article, the transgression that requires forfeiture must be confessed. That is why it is said to be a transgression requiring forfeiture.

Now, how does the transgression come about? It is as follows: if a forest-dwelling monk remains separated from any one of his three Dharma robes beyond the boundary, in every case it becomes a transgression requiring forfeiture. The eight obstacles in this regard are these: the danger of a king, the danger of thieves, the danger of fire, the danger of water, the danger of a lion, the danger of a tiger, the danger of humans, and the danger of non-humans. If any one of these is present nearby, there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is mentally deranged, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one afflicted by feelings.

This completes the twenty-seventh rule, concerning forfeiture through remaining separated for seven nights.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One had declared that monks should store their heavy rains cloth. Thereupon, monks who had accepted the invitation for the earlier rains retreat thought: "Our own time has come," and they would go searching for it, saying: "Why should we not store it?" Monks who had accepted the invitation for the later rains retreat also thought: "Our own time has come," and they would store it, saying: "Why should we not go searching for it?" Because some searched too quickly and others stored for too long, much activity and busyness arose, and they abandoned the recitation of scripture, the chanting of liturgy, the practice of yoga, mental work, and the inner mental calm abiding. The few monks of modest aims said: "The Blessed One has declared that monks should store their heavy rains cloth — so why do they cause so much activity and busyness by searching too quickly and storing for too long, thus abandoning the recitation of scripture, the chanting of liturgy, the practice of yoga, mental work, and the inner mental calm abiding?" They criticized them, spread the matter abroad, and spoke against them. On that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, with this as the basis and in this context, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. "The blessed buddhas, though knowing, would ask" — and so forth, also as before.

The Blessed One then asked the monks: "Monks, when I declared that monks should store their heavy rains cloth, is it true that you were searching too quickly and storing for too long?" "Lord, it is true."

The Blessed One then rebuked those who are hard to support, hard to satisfy, who have great desires, and who do not know contentment. He then praised the qualities of being easy to support, easy to satisfy, having few desires, knowing contentment, being refined, well-trained, excellent in conduct, and being warmly regarded, and spoke to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before.

"Let my hearers recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: When one month of the hot-season months remains, a monk should seek out his heavy rains cloth. After the rains have ended, he may store it for up to half a month thereafter.

If a monk seeks out his heavy rains cloth before one month of the hot-season months remains, or or stores it for more than half a month after the rains have ended, that is an offence entailing forfeiture.

"By a monk" means: by one who upholds this Dharma. "When one month of the hot-season months remains" means: when the rains retreat is about to be established within one month. "The heavy rains cloth" means: a garment for when rain has fallen. "Should seek it out" means: from another. "He may store it for up to half a month after the rains have ended" means: for half a month after the invitation ceremony has been performed. "If a monk seeks out his heavy rains cloth before one month of the hot-season months remains" means: prior to that time. "Or stores it for more than half a month after the rains have ended" means: beyond that limit. "That is an offence entailing forfeiture" means: having forfeited the item, the transgression that is an offence entailing forfeiture must be confessed. That is why it is said to be an offence entailing forfeiture.

As to how the transgression is incurred: it applies either to the earlier or the later rains retreat. Those who have committed to observing the earlier rains retreat incur an offence entailing forfeiture if they keep the cloth for too long. Those who have committed to observing the later rains retreat incur an offence entailing forfeiture if they seek it out too soon. Thus, in all cases, a monk who seeks it out too soon or keeps it too long incurs an offence entailing forfeiture. There is no transgression for a first-time offender, for one who is mentally deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feelings.

The section on forfeiture of the rains cloth, the twenty-eighth, is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling among the Śākya in the Śākya market-town called Sakkara. At that time a householder, out of his own faith, his own initiative, and his own generosity, had a monastery built and offered it to the venerable Śāgata personally. After residing in that monastery for a time, the venerable Śāgata took up his bowl and his Dharma robe and departed to travel through the region. When the householder heard that the noble Śāgata had resided in that monastery for a time, then taken his bowl and Dharma robe and gone traveling through the region, he donated that monastery to the Saṅgha.

Then the venerable Śāgata, having wandered the region as he pleased, set out traveling toward the Śākya market-town of Sakkara. As he journeyed along, gradually making his way, he arrived at Sakkara, and there he heard that the householder had donated the monastery to the Saṅgha. Hearing this, he went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he prostrated with his head to the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Śāgata addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Bhante, here a householder, out of his own faith, his own initiative, and his own generosity, had a monastery built and offered it to me personally. After I had resided in that monastery for a time, I took my bowl and Dharma robe and went traveling through the region. That householder then heard that the noble Śāgata had resided in that monastery for a time, taken his bowl and Dharma robe, and gone traveling, and upon hearing this he donated the monastery to the Saṅgha. Bhante, what am I now to do in this matter?"

"Śāgata, come here. Go to where that householder is, and when you have gone to him, say these words to him: 'Householder, would you do me even a small discourtesy in body or in speech?'"

The venerable Śāgata replied, "As you command, Bhante," received these words from the Blessed One, went to where that householder was, and when he had arrived, spoke these words to the householder: "Householder, would you do me even a small discourtesy in body or in speech?" The householder replied, "Noble Śāgata, I would not show you even the slightest discourtesy in body or in speech."

Thereupon the venerable Śāgata went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Śāgata addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Bhante, I went to where that householder was, and when I had arrived, I said to the householder these words: 'Householder, would you do me even a small discourtesy in body or in speech?' And he replied: 'Noble Śāgata, there is not even the slightest discourtesy on my part toward your body or your speech.'"

Now at that time the venerable Ānanda was seated to one side of the Blessed One, holding a fan and fanning the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and assemble all the monks who are lodging nearby with their foxes into the meeting hall."

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Bhante," received these words from the Blessed One, assembled all the monks who were lodging nearby with their foxes into the meeting hall, then went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Bhante, all the monks who were lodging nearby with their foxes have assembled in the meeting hall and are ready. May the Blessed One now know that the time has come."

Then the Blessed One went to where the meeting hall was, and having arrived, sat down on the seat that had been arranged in front of the community of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, when one has made a gift to one person and then makes a gift to another single person, that is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use. Likewise, when one makes a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to two persons and then makes a gift to another single person, that is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use. Likewise, when one makes a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to a great many persons and then makes a gift to another single person, that is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use. Likewise, when one makes a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to the Saṅgha and then makes a gift to another single person, that is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use. Likewise, when one makes a gift to two others, or to a great many others,"

"or to the Saṅgha — that too is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use.

"Monks, when the Saṅgha has split and divided into two factions dwelling on opposite sides, and one makes a gift to one faction and then makes a gift to the second faction — that is not a proper gift, nor a proper reception, nor is it fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to a single person and does not make a gift to another single person — that is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use. Likewise, when one does not make a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to two persons and does not make a gift to another single person — that is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use. Likewise, when one does not make a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to a great many persons and does not make a gift to another single person — that is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use. Likewise, when one does not make a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use.

"Monks, when one has made a gift to the Saṅgha and does not make a gift to another single person — that is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use. Likewise, when one does not make a gift to two others, or to a great many others, or to the Saṅgha — that too is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use.

"Monks, when the Saṅgha has split and divided into two factions dwelling on opposite sides, and one has made a gift to one faction and does not make a gift to the second faction — that is a proper gift, a proper reception, and it is fit for use.

"Monks, therefore: the former gift is a gift, and the latter is not. A king has authority over the land; an owner has authority over lodgings; a monk has authority over his bowl and robes. A donor and a patron may make offerings intended as their own acts of giving, but they may not give away on their own what belongs to another.

"Monks, let the monastery be returned to the monk named Grācin. Those monks then returned the monastery to the venerable Grācin. This matter had arisen, but the Blessed One had not yet established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

"The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A mendicant had established a certain householder in the refuges and set him in the training precepts, and on a later occasion that mendicant praised to the householder the seven bases of meritorious action that arise from material things. The householder said: 'Noble one, I too shall do a little merit through bases of meritorious action arising from material things. Please let it be so.'

"What should be done?" The mendicant said, "Offer a feast of offerings to the Saṅgha of monks, with the Buddha at their head." "So it shall be. But do you have some spare cloth?" "Noble one, my means are slender, yet I will offer a single pair of cloth." "Noble one, please invite in my name, for tomorrow at midday, the Saṅgha of monks with the Buddha at their head."

At the time of assembly, that mendicant invited, in that householder's name, the Saṅgha of monks with the Buddha at their head, to another house at midday. The monks then said: "Mendicant, you have made the household into a devotee. But tell us — has the householder offered a feast with a gift-offering, or a feast without a gift-offering?" "Venerables, it is with a gift-offering. However, since that householder's means are slender, he is offering a single pair of cloth."

Ānanda heard this and thought: "Whoever offers a single pair of cloth to the Saṅgha of monks with the Buddha at their head — from that, something great is surely bound to arise. If I do not take that pair of cloth, I will no longer be known by the name Ānanda." Having thought this, the next morning Ānanda put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, and went to that householder's house. When he arrived, he saw that the householder was making preparations for the feast. He asked the householder: "Householder, what are you doing?" "Noble one, I am preparing a feast." "Householder, the Blessed One has declared — and this was well spoken — that for those sentient beings who during the period of morning conduct themselves well in body, speech, and mind, a good morning will be close at hand for them at that time; and for those sentient beings who during the period of midnight and the period of dawn conduct themselves well in body, speech, and mind, a good midnight and a good dawn will be close at hand for them at those times. Householder, do you have a little cloth to give?" "Noble one, my means are slender, yet I will offer a single pair of cloth." "Householder, let me see what that pair of cloth is like."

The householder showed it, and seeing how fine it was, Ānanda said: "Householder, for you there is merit arising from having given it away completely, but there is not even a fraction of merit arising from having fully enjoyed it yourself. The Blessed One's retinue numbers twelve hundred and fifty, and it takes twelve hundred and fifty pairs of cloth to satisfy them. With this single pair, only one collar of a robe can be completed at most. The Blessed One has moreover taught that when food is obtained it should be shared even down to the last grain on a lotus leaf, and when cloth is obtained it should be shared even down to what would suffice for the wick of a lamp. So if you do not share it, you will derive no enjoyment from this either."

The householder then said: "Noble one, what means is there by which I may have merit arising from having given it away completely and also merit arising from having fully enjoyed it myself?" Ānanda replied: "Householder, if you were to make an offering of this pair of cloth to one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation — then you would have both the merit arising from having given it away completely and the merit arising from having fully enjoyed it yourself." The householder said: "Noble one, one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan — who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation — who is there?" Ānanda replied: "Householder, I myself have gone forth from the Śākya clan, I possess the Three Baskets, I proclaim the Dharma, and I have the confidence of reasoning and liberation." At this, the householder began to offer the pair of cloth to Ānanda, saying: "Noble one, please accept this pair of cloth." But Ānanda said: "Householder, do you not know how to give a gift? Whenever a feast is held in offering to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, let there be someone at the elder's side rejoicing in it, and then give it to me." The noble one replied: "Very well," and having listened to him, the householder thereafter held a feast in offering to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, and then said: "Please rejoice in this pair of cloth at the elder's side. Please do rejoice." Having caused him to rejoice, he gave it to Ānanda. The monks then said to the monastery's attendant: "Receive that pair of cloth from Ānanda." The attendant said to Ānanda: "Hand over that pair of cloth. Is it to be carried to the assembly hall and given there?" The attendant replied: "No — this has been offered to the Saṅgha." Ānanda said: "Why do you not offer your own bowl and robe to the Saṅgha? This was given to me." Then the Blessed One, having spoken words of appreciation, rose from his seat and departed, and the almsman, startled, remained right there. That almsman, having realized that the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha had not gone far after departing, said this to the householder: "Householder, the thunder has sounded in one place while the rain has fallen in another." The householder asked: "Noble one, what should I do?" He replied: "Venerable Ānanda has said to me that for you, householder, there exists merit arising from having given it away completely, whereas merit arising from having fully enjoyed it yourself does not exist even once — for the Blessed One's retinue numbers twelve hundred and fifty, and to fulfill their needs would require twelve hundred and fifty pairs of cloth, so for now this will have to be exhausted on the mere borders of the robes. Moreover, the Blessed One himself has declared that if a gain of food arises, it should be shared even with those as small as flies on a lotus leaf; and if a gain of cloth arises, it should be shared even with those fit only to be wicks for oil lamps. If it is not divided, then this too will not become something you have fully enjoyed." I then said to him: "Noble one, what means is there by which I may have both the merit arising from having given it away completely and the merit arising from having fully enjoyed it myself?" And venerable Ānanda said to me: "Householder, if you were to make an offering of this pair of cloth to one who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation — then you would have both the merit arising from having given it away completely and the merit arising from having fully enjoyed it yourself." I then said to him: "Noble one, who is there who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation?" Venerable Ānanda said to me: "Householder, I myself have gone forth from the Śākya clan, I possess the Three Baskets, I proclaim the Dharma, and I have the confidence of reasoning and liberation." And so I began to offer the pair of cloth to venerable Ānanda, saying: "Noble one, please accept this pair of cloth." But venerable Ānanda said: "Householder, do you not know how to give a gift?"

"When the feast for the monastic Saṅgha headed by the Buddha is being offered, let those at the far edge among the elders express their rejoicing, and then give it to me." Since I did exactly as he said, what fault have I committed in this matter?" The almsman went to the monastery, and the monks said to him: "Whatever is in conformity with almsmanship — if a householder generates faith and makes an offering, the thunder rolls in one place and the rain falls in another." He said: "What fault is there in that? It was like this: one person went there and said these words: 'Householder, if there is merit arising from your full gift, then there is not even a trace of merit arising from full use. The Blessed One's retinue of twelve hundred and fifty receives twelve hundred and fifty pairs of cloth, so this need only be entirely used up for the purpose of robes. And the Blessed One has said that if food is received it should be divided even to the size of a pula leaf, and if cloth is received it should be divided even to what is fit for a lampwick — and if you do not divide it, then this too will not come to be used by you.'" Saying this, he spoke thus: "Noble one, what means is there by which merit arising from my full gift to you may come to be, and merit arising from your full use of it may also come to be?" Then he said: "If you were to offer this pair of cloth to someone who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation, then in that case it would become for you both merit arising from full giving and merit arising from full use." He then asked: "Who is there who has gone forth from the Śākya clan, who possesses the Three Baskets, who proclaims the Dharma, and who has the confidence of reasoning and liberation?" To this he replied: "I myself have gone forth from the Śākya clan, I possess the Three Baskets, I proclaim the Dharma, and I have the confidence of reasoning and liberation." And so he began to offer that pair of cloth to him. At that point the other said: "Householder, do you not know how to give a gift? When the feast for the monastic Saṅgha headed by the Buddha is being offered, let those at the far edge among the elders express their rejoicing, and then give it to me." Since he did exactly as he was told, what fault does he have? Why do certain monks of little sense, knowing full well that a gain has been dedicated to the Saṅgha, yet direct it to be dedicated to themselves personally, and then berate, slander, and speak ill of the matter?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in connection with this ground case, and in these circumstances, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and so on as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, act as though they do not know — and so on as before.

The Blessed One then addressed Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that, knowing full well that a gain has been dedicated to the Saṅgha, you directed it to be dedicated to yourself personally?" "Venerable sir, it is not so." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying: "That which is unworthy of an ascetic, not befitting, not allowable, and not in accord with proper conduct — such is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Having rebuked him in this way, the Blessed One then addressed the monks in many ways:

"Monks, seeing clearly these ten benefits — and so on as before — a rule of training for hearers in the Vinaya is to be established." The rule of training is to be recited by my hearers in the Vinaya in this way: "Furthermore, whatever monk, knowing that a gain has been dedicated to the Saṅgha, directs it to be dedicated to himself personally — that is an offense entailing forfeiture."

The phrase "whatever monk" refers to Ānanda, son of the Śākya, or any other who is of that kind. "To the Saṅgha" means to the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. "Dedicated" means that it has been set apart and assigned. "A gain" — there are two kinds of gain: gain in robes and gain in food; in this context, gain in robes is understood to be intended. "Knowing" means either that one has come to know it oneself, or that others have told one of it. "Directs it to be dedicated to himself personally" means that one causes it to be offered to oneself. "An offense entailing forfeiture" means that after forfeiting that article, the offense of transgression is to be confessed — therefore it is said to be "an offense entailing forfeiture."

Vinaya Analysis, the thirty-seventh fascicle.

Now, how does the transgression come about?

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one person to be dedicated to himself personally, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to two persons to be dedicated to himself personally, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to many persons to be dedicated to himself personally, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to himself personally, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one person to be dedicated to one other person, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one person to be dedicated to two other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one person to be dedicated to many other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one person to be dedicated to the Saṅgha, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to two persons to be dedicated to one other person, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to two persons to be dedicated to two other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to two persons to be dedicated to many other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to two persons to be dedicated to the Saṅgha, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to many persons to be dedicated to one other person, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to many persons to be dedicated to two other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to many persons to be dedicated to many other persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to many persons to be dedicated to the Saṅgha, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to one person, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to two persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to many persons, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to another Saṅgha, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the Saṅgha to be dedicated to the community of nuns, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the community of nuns to be dedicated to the community of monks, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the community of both to be dedicated to the community of monks, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the community of both to be dedicated to the community of nuns, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk, when the Saṅgha has divided and is residing as two factions in separate quarters, directs a gain dedicated to one faction to be dedicated to the other faction, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one residence to be dedicated to another residence, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to a residence to be dedicated to a cloister, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to a cloister to be dedicated to a residence, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one particular pillar to be dedicated to a second pillar, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one particular pillar to be dedicated to a gatehouse, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to a gatehouse to be dedicated to a staircase platform, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to a staircase platform to be dedicated to a gatehouse, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one particular buddha image to be dedicated to a second buddha image, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one particular stūpa to be dedicated to another stūpa, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the first step of a stūpa's stairway to be dedicated to the second step of the stairway, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression. The same applies likewise to the second step, the third step, the fourth step, and on up to the topmost of all the steps.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the topmost of all the stairway steps to be dedicated to the flower chamber, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the flower chamber to be dedicated to the harmikā, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one particular harmikā to be dedicated to a second harmikā, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression. The same applies likewise to the second, third, and fourth harmikās.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the fourth harmikā to be dedicated to the vase of the stūpa, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the vase of the stūpa to be dedicated to the finial shaft, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the finial shaft to be dedicated to the lowest umbrella disc, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression. The same applies likewise to the second, third, and fourth umbrella discs, and on up to the topmost of all.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the topmost of all the umbrella discs to be dedicated to the rain cover, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the rain cover to be dedicated to the topmost of all the umbrella discs, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression. The same applies likewise going downward, to the third, and on down to the lowest umbrella disc.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the lowest umbrella disc to be dedicated to the finial shaft, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, however, there is no transgression. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the finial shaft to be dedicated to the reliquary vase of the stupa, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the reliquary vase of the stupa to be dedicated to the harmikā, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the harmikā to be dedicated to the flower chamber, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to the flower chamber to be dedicated to the upper step platform, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. In the case of a loan given as a Dharma gift, there is no transgression.

The same applies likewise going downward, from the third step platform on down to the last of all.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one portico to be dedicated to another portico, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. If one has searched and it cannot be found, there is no transgression.

If a monk directs a gain dedicated to one animal born in an animal realm to be dedicated to another animal born in an animal realm, the act of directing it constitutes a wrong act, and upon receiving it, it likewise remains a wrong act only. If one has searched and it cannot be found, there is no transgression.

There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is mentally disturbed, whose mind is agitated, or who is afflicted by painful feelings.

This completes the twenty-ninth section: the abandonment of redirecting what has been dedicated.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. At that time the venerable Pilindavatsa was residing there together with his attendant monks. Certain medicines that had been taken into storage, received from others, mixed with powdered food, blended together, and absorbed into the body such that no distinction was apparent — these they ate at the proper time and also at improper times, and no distinction in their manner of eating was apparent. A few monks of little concern said: "Why do monks eat medicines that have been taken into storage, received from others, mixed with powdered food, blended together, and absorbed into the body such that no distinction is apparent, both at the proper time and at improper times, with no apparent distinction in the manner of eating them?" They criticized them, threw it in their faces, and spoke disparagingly.

Thereupon the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in light of this founding incident and on this occasion, assembled the community of monks — and so forth as before. And the passage beginning "The Blessed Ones, the Buddhas, though knowing, feign not to know" — and so forth as before.

The Blessed One then addressed the venerable Pilindavatsa and his attendant monks: "Monks, concerning medicines that have been taken into storage, received from others, mixed with powdered food, blended together, and consumed through one's own bloodstream — those that cannot be distinguished even when separated — may one eat them both in season and out of season, and is it true that no distinction in eating them is apparent?" "Venerable sir, it is so."

The Blessed One, the buddha, then censured those who are difficult to heal, difficult to satisfy, who have great desires, and who know no contentment.

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who are easy to heal, easy to satisfy, of few desires, of contented nature, of cultivated virtue, of gracious conduct, and who are discerning in what is fitting. He then addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing these ten benefits, a training rule is to be established for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to take up this training rule in the Vinaya in the following manner: The Blessed One has permitted medicines for use as individual remedies for sick monks, namely: clarified butter, grain oil, honey, and molasses. If a sick monk so desires, he may himself consecrate these for seven days and use them while keeping them in storage. If he uses them beyond that, it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

The phrase "the Blessed One" refers to the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha. The phrase "monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. "For the sick" means for those who are ill. "Beneficial" means agreeable or suitable. "For individual use as remedies" means fitting and appropriate. "Medicines that have been permitted" means those that have been explicitly taught. "Clarified butter" means butter that has been melted and clarified. "Grain oil" means oil derived from grain. "Honey" means the honey of bees. "Molasses" — the expression "the head of molasses" — means molasses itself. "A monk" refers to whichever monk it may be. "A sick person" means one who is ill. "If he so desires" means if he seeks it for that purpose. "Himself" means by his own hand. "Consecrated for seven days" means within seven days and nights. "He may use them while keeping them in storage" means he may take and consume them himself. "If he uses them beyond that" means beyond seven days. "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment" means that the article is to be relinquished and the transgression — the falling — is to be confessed; hence it is said to be a transgression entailing relinquishment.

Now, how does this transgression arise? If on the first day of the lunar fortnight a monk obtains a medicinal remedy for the sick, that monk should consume it, give it away, or bestow it upon another within those very seven days. If he neither consumes it, nor gives it away, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Even if he does not obtain it on the first day, but obtains it on the second, the third, or up through the seventh day, that monk should likewise consume it, give it away, or bestow it upon another within those seven days. If he neither consumes it, nor gives it away, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk obtains a medicinal remedy on the first day and then obtains another medicine on the second day, that monk should consume the earlier one within those seven days and give away or bestow upon another the later one; or alternatively, he may consume the later one and give away or bestow upon another the earlier one. If he neither consumes it, nor gives it away, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

Just as described for the first and second days, the same applies through the sixth day: if a monk obtains a medicinal remedy on any day up to and including the sixth, and then obtains yet another on any day up to and including the seventh, that monk should consume the earlier one within those seven days and give away or bestow upon another the later one; or alternatively, he may consume the later one and give away or bestow upon another the earlier one. If he neither consumes it, nor gives it away, nor bestows it upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk obtains two medicinal remedies on the first day, that monk should consume both of those medicines within those seven days, or give them away, or bestow them upon another. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Even if he does not obtain them on the first day, should he obtain two medicinal remedies on the second day, or the third day, or on any day up to and including the seventh, that monk should consume both of those medicines within those seven days, or give them away, or bestow them upon another. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk obtains two medicinal remedies on the first day and then obtains two more on the second day, that monk should consume the first two within those seven days and give away or bestow upon another the latter two; or alternatively, he may consume the latter two and give away or bestow upon another the first two. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Just as described for the first and second days, the same applies through the sixth day: if a monk obtains two medicinal remedies on any day up to and including the sixth, and then obtains two more on any day up to and including the seventh, that monk should consume the first two within those seven days and give away or bestow upon another the latter two; or alternatively, he may consume the latter two and give away or bestow upon another the first two. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk obtains a great many medicinal remedies on the first day, that monk should consume all of those medicines within those seven days, or give them away, or bestow them upon another. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Even if he does not obtain them on the first day, should he obtain a great many medicinal remedies on the second day, or the third day, or on any day up to and including the seventh, that monk should consume all of those medicines within those seven days, or give them away, or bestow them upon another. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

If a monk obtains a great many medicinal remedies on the first day of illness, and then on the second day obtains yet another great many, that monk should, within those same seven days, either consume all the earlier medicines and give away or bestow upon another the later ones, or else consume all the later medicines and give away or bestow upon another the earlier ones. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Just as it is with the first and second days, so too if he obtains a great many medicinal remedies on any day up to and including the sixth, and then on any day up to and including the seventh obtains yet another great many, that monk should, within those same seven days, either consume all the earlier medicines and give away or bestow upon another the later ones, or else consume all the later medicines and give away or bestow upon another the earlier ones. If he neither consumes them, nor gives them away, nor bestows them upon another, then at the dawn of the eighth day it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment.

Now, as for any medicines that have been taken into personal keeping from that stock, or received as gifts from it, or mixed with powdered food, or mixed together with one another, or absorbed into one's own body-stream, such that they can no longer be distinguished as separate — these should be relinquished to the residents of the monastery or to the novices.

As for any medicines that have not been taken into personal keeping from that stock, have not been received as gifts from it, have not been mixed with powdered food, have not been mixed together with one another, and have not been absorbed into one's own body-stream, such that they still cannot be distinguished as separate — these the monk may consecrate for seven days by his own act of dedication and then make use of them as stored provisions. The consecration is to be performed as follows. Having washed his hands, taking the medicines into his hands, and sitting in the presence of a fellow practitioner of the celibate life, he should recite these words:

Venerable one, please give heed. I, the monk known as such-and-such, hereby consecrate these suitable medicines for seven days, for the sake of myself and my fellow practitioners of the celibate life.

He should repeat this a second time and a third time. As much as he consumes he should also report to his fellow practitioner of the celibate life, saying: Today I have consumed one day's portion; I will continue to consume the remainder. He should continue to make this report in the same way up to and including the seventh day. If anything remains after that, all of it should be relinquished to the residents of the monastery or to the novices.

If a monk's medicinal remedies have become subject to relinquishment, and he has neither relinquished them, nor separated himself from them, nor confessed the transgression, and then obtains further medicines, those too become subject to relinquishment through the continuity of the earlier one. If a monk's medicinal remedies have become subject to relinquishment, and he has relinquished them but has not separated himself from them, and has not confessed the transgression, and then obtains further medicines, those too become subject to relinquishment through the continuity of the earlier one. If a monk's medicinal remedies have become subject to relinquishment, and he has relinquished them and has separated himself from them, but has not confessed the transgression, and then obtains further medicines, those too become subject to relinquishment through the continuity of the earlier one. If a monk's medicinal remedies have become subject to relinquishment, and he has relinquished them, separated himself from them, and confessed the transgression, and then obtains further medicines, there is no transgression with regard to those.

Likewise, to whatever extent a monk's medicinal remedies have become subject to relinquishment, and he has neither relinquished them nor individually relinquished them, and has neither confessed nor individually confessed the transgression, if he then obtains an alms-bowl, or a monastic robe, or a net, or a bowl, or a belt, or or any other requisite for a renunciant's livelihood, these too shall be subject to relinquishment by continuity with the earlier one. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations. This completes the thirtieth rule on relinquishment through hoarding. The rules entailing relinquishment are complete.

Summary verse:

Knowingly, and with seeds, without appointment, and repeatedly,
water, a house, and deliberately, many guests, a thief, a feast.

Summary verse:

False accusation of a monk, slander, causing regret, and teaching, recitation, accepting bad lodging, and Dharma for the sake of a friend's face, and disparagement.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. At that time the venerable Śāriputra was staying at Rājagṛha in the Hot Springs pleasure grove. Brahmins and householders of faithful disposition went to where the venerable Śāriputra was, and having approached him, asked: "Venerable Śāriputra, where is the Blessed One dwelling?" If the Blessed One was in the Bamboo Forest, Śāriputra would say: "He is dwelling on Vulture Peak." If the Blessed One was on Vulture Peak, Śāriputra would say: "He is dwelling in the Bamboo Forest." If the Blessed One was in the cave of Pippala, Śāriputra would say: "He is dwelling in the cave of Mṛgāra's Mother." If the Blessed One was in the cave of Mṛgāra's Mother, he would say: "He is dwelling in the cave of Pippala." When they then sought the Blessed One and did not find him, they returned, wearied and exhausted and worn in body, to where the venerable Śāriputra was. Śāriputra asked them: "Friends, did you see the Blessed One?" "Venerable Śāriputra, we did not see him." Thereupon he laughed, and they said to him: "Venerable Śāriputra, do you not deliberately mislead us? That is indeed what you are doing." They reproved him, they raised their hands against him, they spoke harsh words to him. On that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, in the morning, put on his lower robe, took his bowl and monastic robe, and went to Rājagṛha for alms. Having gone on alms round in Rājagṛha and completed the meal, on returning from the after-meal alms round he went to the Hot Springs pleasure grove, to the dwelling of the venerable Śāriputra. The venerable Śāriputra saw the Blessed One from a great distance. Seeing him, he prepared a seat for the Blessed One, set out water for washing the feet together with a footstool, went to receive him, and took the monastic robe, saying: "Welcome, Blessed One. It is good that the Blessed One has come. Let the Blessed One be seated on the prepared seat." And so he said it. The Blessed One sat on the prepared seat. Then the Blessed One himself washed his two feet, left a small remainder of water in the water vessel, and said to the venerable Śāriputra: "Śāriputra, do you see that I have left a small remainder of water in the water vessel?" "Venerable one, I see it." "Śāriputra, in just that way, whoever among those who are not utterly deluded speaks deliberate falsehood, without shame, without modesty, without remorse — I say that their conduct as a renunciant is of little worth." Then the Blessed One poured out that small remainder of water on the ground and said to the venerable Śāriputra: "Śāriputra, do you see that I have poured out that small remainder of water on the ground?" "Venerable one, I see it." "Śāriputra, in just that way, whoever among those who are not utterly deluded speaks deliberate falsehood, without shame, without modesty, without remorse — I say that their conduct as a monk is overturned." Then the Blessed One tilted that water vessel on the ground and said to the venerable Śāriputra: "Śāriputra, do you see that I have tilted the water vessel on the ground?" "Venerable one, I see it." "Śāriputra, in just that way, whoever among those who are not utterly deluded speaks deliberate falsehood, without shame, without modesty, without remorse — I say that their conduct as a renunciant is tilted." Then the Blessed One turned that water vessel upside down on the ground and said to the venerable Śāriputra: "Śāriputra, do you see that I have turned the water vessel upside down on the ground?" "Venerable one, I see it." "Śāriputra, in just that way, whoever among those who are not utterly deluded speaks deliberate falsehood, without shame, without modesty, without remorse — I say that their conduct as a renunciant is turned upside down."

"Śāriputra, consider this example. Take a royal elephant — one born from the finest stock, in the prime of youth, sixty years old, with tusks as long as chariot-shafts, with a broad chest, trained for battle, having entered the field of combat — who does his work with his two forefeet, his two hindfeet, his two knees, his haunches, his tail, his two flanks, his back, his two sides, his neck, his two ears, and his two tusks, and does his work, routing the enemy's forces and the enemy's army; yet who guards his trunk. The elephant-rider thinks to himself: 'This royal elephant — born from the finest stock, in his prime, sixty years old, with tusks as long as chariot-shafts, with a broad chest, trained for battle, having entered the field of combat — does his work with his two forefeet, his two hindfeet, his two knees, his haunches, his tail, his two flanks, his back, his two sides, his neck, his two ears, and his two tusks, routing the enemy's forces and the enemy's army; yet he guards his trunk. The royal elephant has not yet given his life utterly.'

"Śāriputra, when a royal elephant — born from the finest stock, in the prime of youth, sixty years old, with tusks as long as chariot-shafts, with a broad chest, trained for battle, having entered the field of combat — does his work with his two forefeet, his two hindfeet, his two knees, his haunches, his tail, his two flanks, his back, his two sides, his neck, his two ears, and his two tusks, and with his trunk as well, routing the enemy's forces and the enemy's army, the elephant-rider thinks to himself: 'This royal elephant — born from the finest stock, in his prime, sixty years old, with tusks as long as chariot-shafts, with a broad chest, trained for battle, having entered the field of combat — does his work with his two forefeet, his two hindfeet, his two knees, his haunches, his tail, his two flanks, his back, his two sides, his neck, his two ears, his two tusks, and with his trunk as well, routing the enemy's forces and the enemy's army; and he does not guard his trunk. The royal elephant has given his life utterly.' Śāriputra, I say that there is nothing whatsoever that such a royal elephant will not do.

"Śāriputra, in just that way, when one who is not utterly deluded speaks deliberate falsehood, without shame, without modesty, without remorse — I say there is not even the slightest evil deed that such a person will not commit."

Then at that moment the Blessed One spoke these two verses:

One who, embodied, speaks falsehood has transgressed the one Dharma, and being without any regard for the world beyond,
there is no evil such a person will not do.

Better to swallow iron balls
blazing like tongues of flame, than for one who is without discipline, who holds no genuine restraint, to eat the alms food of a realm.

"Rāhula, why do you think people hold up a mirror? It is for this reason, venerable one: to examine one's own reflection, feature by feature. In just the same way, Rāhula, you too should examine again and again every bodily action you intend to perform: 'Is this bodily action that I intend to perform one that would harm myself or others — non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering? Or is this bodily action one that would benefit myself and others — virtuous, productive of happiness, ripening in happiness?' Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the bodily action you intend to perform is one that would harm yourself or others — non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering — then, Rāhula, you must abandon that bodily action. But, Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the bodily action you intend to perform is one that would benefit yourself and others — virtuous, productive of happiness, ripening in happiness — then, Rāhula, you should go ahead and carry out that bodily action.

"Rāhula, while you are actually performing a bodily action, you should examine it again and again: 'Is this bodily action that I am performing one that would harm myself or others — non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering? Or is this bodily action one that would benefit myself and others — virtuous, productive of happiness, ripening in happiness?' Rāhula, if, while examining it in this way, you understand that the bodily action you are performing is one that would harm yourself or others — non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering — then, Rāhula, you must stop that bodily action. But, Rāhula, if you understand that the bodily action you are performing is one that would benefit yourself and others — virtuous, productive of happiness, ripening in happiness — then, Rāhula, you should continue and complete that bodily action.

"Rāhula, having performed a bodily action — one that is past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — you should examine it again and again: 'Was this bodily action that I performed one that harmed myself or others — non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering? Or was it one that benefited myself and others — virtuous, productive of happiness, ripening in happiness?' Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the bodily action you performed — now past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — was one that harmed yourself or others, was non-virtuous, productive of suffering, ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should disclose and confess that bodily action openly before the Teacher, before those who practice the holy life, and before the wise, and from that point forward you should strive to restrain yourself. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that —"

If you understand that the bodily action you performed — now past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — was one that benefits yourself and others, is virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, with that very joy and delight you should train day and night, continuing to abide abundantly in mindfulness and vigilance.

Rāhula, as for whatever verbal action you are intending to perform, you should again and again examine it carefully: "Is this verbal action I intend to perform one that will harm myself or others, being non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering? Or is this verbal action one that will benefit myself and others, being virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness?" Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the verbal action you intend to perform will harm yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should abandon that verbal action. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the verbal action you intend to perform will benefit yourself and others, is virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, you should carry out that verbal action.

Rāhula, as for whatever verbal action you are in the midst of performing, you should again and again examine it carefully: "Is this verbal action I am performing one that will harm myself or others, being non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering? Or is this verbal action one that will benefit myself and others, being virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness?" Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the verbal action you are performing will harm yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should abandon that verbal action. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that this verbal action will benefit yourself and others, is virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, you should continue to carry out that verbal action.

Rāhula, as for whatever verbal action you have already performed, you should again and again examine it carefully: "Is this verbal action I performed — now past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — one that harmed myself or others, being non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering? Or is this verbal action one that benefited myself and others, being virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness?" Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the verbal action you performed — now past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — was one that harmed yourself or others, was non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should disclose and confess that verbal action openly before the Teacher, before those who practice the holy life, and before the wise, and from that point forward you should strive to restrain yourself. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the verbal action you performed — now past, exhausted, ceased, dissolved, and transformed — was beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, with that very joy and delight you should train in it day and night, and you should dwell at length in mindfulness and vigilance.

Rāhula, since the mind arises in dependence on past formations, what of that mental action? Examine again and again whether the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on past formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, or whether that mental action is beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness.

Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on past formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should abandon that mental action.

Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on past formations is beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, you should pursue that mental action.

Rāhula, since the mind arises in dependence on future formations, what of that mental action? Examine again and again whether the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on future formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, or whether that mental action is beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness.

Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on future formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should abandon that mental action. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on future formations is beneficial to yourself and others, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, you should pursue that mental action.

Rāhula, since the mind arises in dependence on present formations, what of that mental action? Examine again and again whether the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on present formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, or whether that mental action is beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness.

Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on present formations is one that harms yourself or others, is non-virtuous, productive of suffering, and ripening in suffering, then, Rāhula, you should abandon that mental action. Rāhula, when you examine it in this way, if you understand that the mental action that has arisen from your mind in dependence on present formations is beneficial to yourself and others, virtuous, productive of happiness, and ripening in happiness, then, Rāhula, you should carry out that mental action.

Rāhula, all the ascetics and brahmins (śramaṇas and brāhmaṇas) who at the present time examine and thoroughly purify their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions, and who dwell much in that purification — they all examine and thoroughly purify their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions in just this way, and dwell much in that purification. All the ascetics and brahmins who in the past examined and thoroughly purified their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions, and dwelt much in that purification — they all examined and thoroughly purified their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions in just this way, and dwelt much in that purification. All the ascetics and brahmins who in the future will examine and thoroughly purify their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions, and will dwell much in that purification — they all will examine and thoroughly purify their bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions in just this way, and will dwell much in that purification.

Therefore, Rāhula, you should train in this way: examine and thoroughly purify your bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions, and dwell much in that purification. Rāhula, you should train in just this way.

The Blessed One thus declared these words, and having so spoken, the Sugata, the Teacher, spoke yet further:

If one holds in mind the Buddha's teaching,
Then in bodily action, verbal action,
And mental action, examine them thoroughly,
And dwell therein at length, O Rāhula.
This is the work of the ascetic's life;
Train yourself in this, O Rāhula.
If you train yourself accordingly in this,
You will become virtuous and free of wrong.

Then the Blessed One, having duly instructed the venerable Rāhula with words full of Dharma, having caused him to retain them, having duly praised him, and having caused him to rejoice fully, rose from his seat and departed.

This, for now, is what occurred. As yet the Blessed One, the Buddha, was not establishing rules of training for his śrāvaka disciples in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time in Śrāvastī there was a certain Śākyan monk named Laghuvaggiya, who was most fond of talk and was devoted to following after the speech of others. At that time a young brahmin student who desired secret formulas and was seeking a teacher of them traveled southward from the middle country. There was a brahmin who had mastered the Vedas and their ancillary sciences and who served as a teacher to brahmin communities dwelling in various regions. The young student went to that brahmin, and upon arriving, bowed his head to the ground with a calm and gentle bearing, and sat to one side. The brahmin then addressed the student with the customary words of welcome, saying: "Young man, from where have you come? And what do you wish?" The student replied: "I have come from the middle country and wish to sit at the feet of the learned master. For what purpose? In order to recite the Vedas." The brahmin said: "Well then, young man, so be it. You are a brahmin." And so the student began to study the Vedas in the presence of that brahmin.

Now this was the general conduct of the students: whenever they were not reciting, some would go down to the riverbank to bathe, some would go to look about the town, and some would go to gather firewood for the sacred fire. One day it happened that, while they were not reciting and had gone to gather firewood for the sacred fire, along the road they fell into casual conversation of this kind. "Ho, you of the Kautsas! You of the Vātsas! You of the Śāṇḍilyas! You of the Bharadvājas! You of the Pañcas! You of the Upapañcas! Let each of you be asked from which region you have come." Then one student said: "I have come from the east." Others said: "We have come from the southern road." Yet another said: "I have come from the west." And another said: "I have come from the northern road." Then that one student said: "I have come from the middle country." The others replied: "Good sirs, though we have seen and heard of all regions, we have neither seen nor heard of the middle country." And they spoke this verse:

In the east dwell the clear-minded, on the southern road the crooked, in the western lands the deceitful, on the northern road the harsh of tongue.

Then they asked: "Young man, what is the middle country like?" "Good sirs, the middle country is the finest of all regions. It is endowed abundantly with rice, garlands of sugarcane, cattle, and buffalo; pervaded by hundreds of wandering mendicants; filled with the people of the centre; shunned by the people of the borderlands; frequented by the wise. There flows a river named the Gaṅgā, famed as a place of good fortune, merit, auspiciousness, purity, and the very essence of cleanliness, with cool moisture rising from both its banks, renowned as the abode of the sages, into which flow nine hundred and eight streams. There, when the sages perform austerities, they ascend by means of their own bodies to the higher realms. Ho, young man, ask him about this another time. Are there those counted as learned in the middle country?" "Good sirs, did I not say at the very outset that the middle country is filled with the people of the centre, shunned by the people of the borderlands, and frequented by the wise?" "Young man, you did say that." "In the middle country there are those like this: for example, are there the finest of speakers, comparable to our own teacher?" "Good sirs, in the middle country there are finest-of-speakers who speak eloquently, such that even our teacher would be unable to look them in the face." When that student had thus praised the middle country to them in this way, all of them came to wish to go there. Then those students gathered firewood for the sacred fire, and taking up loads of firewood, went to where the brahmin's house was. Having arrived, they set down the loads of firewood to one side, went to where the brahmin was, and addressed him thus: "Honoured teacher, please know that this student has so praised the middle country that all of us have come to wish to go there." The brahmin said: "Children, is everything one hears to be journeyed to? Regions are pleasing to hear about, so one should listen, but one need not go." "Teacher, from what this student has said, there are in the middle country the finest of speakers who speak so eloquently that even our teacher would be unable to look them in the face." "Children, do I claim that I alone upon this earth am a speaker and that there is no other? The earth holds many precious things, and so the ground is filled with magnificent beings."

"Master, I too shall one day see that region, draw near to its shores, pay reverence to those foremost speakers, silence my opponents, proclaim my own renown, and secure my gains. Let us go to the middle country." The brahmin, feeling affection for his students and having but a small retinue, said to those young men: "Children, if that is your wish, then gather your carrying straps, bark strips, staffs, ladles, cups for pouring, and balls of provisions, and set out for the middle country." They gathered those things, and together with that brahmin they set out nobly for the middle country. As they traveled, he silenced some opponents and yoked them to his own debating chariot; some he struck on the head with clay pots filled with ash; some he abandoned from a great distance, like a crow driven from a burial ground; some he received with parasols, victory banners, and flags; and some he accepted as students outright. In this way, gradually traveling through villages and market towns, through hamlets and trading posts, silencing opponents as he went, he arrived at Śrāvastī.

The Vinaya-vibhaṅga, the thirty-eighth fascicle.

At Śrāvastī, a brahmin with a very large retinue heard the news: "A brahmin debater has come from the southern road." On hearing this, he said to his own followers: "Learned ones, take note. I have heard that a brahmin debater has come to Śrāvastī from the southern road. If he wishes to debate on some great branch of learning, you should engage in debate with him. If he wishes to debate on some other great branch of learning, then you should engage in debate with him as well. If for now you are able to defeat him, all the better. If you are unable to defeat him, send him into the community of the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākyas. If the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, defeat him, then we brahmins shall be the foremost. And if he defeats the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, then throughout all the directions and their quarters a vast and glorious wave of auspicious renown will arise for us: that a debater who came from the southern road was defeated right here at Śrāvastī."

The brahmin who had come from the southern road rose early in the morning, wrapped his robes tightly about him, took a torch of grass in his hand, and entered Śrāvastī. The young brahmins of Śrāvastī said to him: "Master, why have you wrapped your robes about you?" "So that all I have heard and retained does not burst out and escape." "If that is the case, it would be fitting to wrap yourself with a board of copper instead." "And why do you carry a torch of grass?" "To walk with the lamp of knowledge into the darkness of a world that does not know." He then went about and debated with whichever learned persons he encountered in any branch of learning, leaving every one of them without eloquence; and when he had rendered them all speechless, they said to him: "Master, are you only capable of defeating your opponents' positions?" He replied: "Is there any opposing position at all that I have failed to defeat?" They said: "There is. There are the śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyas, who are not long arisen, yet they are keenly committed to making the four classes pure in exposition, in imputation, and in thorough refutation. Please go and debate with them for a time." "And where are they?" "Right here in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada." "Who among them is the foremost speaker?" "They are all learned —"

"— though their conduct is exemplary indeed. But the foremost speaker among them is called the śramaṇa Lakṣaṇa, a son of the Śākyas." "And where is he?" "Right here in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada."

As they were conversing in this way, Lakṣaṇa, the son of the Śākyas, happened to pass right by. The brahmin youths said to the brahmin: "Master, set aside the other śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyaas — please engage in debate with this Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyaas." The brahmin looked at him and said: "He bears the mark of a teacher, so he is indeed the foremost speaker." He then approached him and said: "Ho, monk! I have gathered a few letters from my master. I wish to settle some matters in discussion with you." The brahmin replied: "No offence, brahmin. As for me too, whenever the thought arises in my mind that I should sharpen my treatise for debate, you should likewise come here and do the same." "When?" "Tomorrow." "At what place?" "In a certain pleasant grove." "Very well," said the monk, and departed.

The brahmin then spent the whole night turning over his own position and his opponent's position, thinking: "If he says such-and-such, I shall reply thus," until all the night watches had passed. Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyaas, reflected: "If I were simply to defeat the brahmin straightaway, I would still need to pass through a hundred gateposts and find a way to fill my belly. But if the brahmin defeats me, my garland of renown will be no more."

Early the next morning the brahmin rose and went to the grove, where he waited a long time. Realising that the other was not coming, he entered Śrāvastī. Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyaas, had also let the appointed time for the debate slip by, and entered Śrāvastī on his alms round. The brahmin saw him and said: "Ho, monk! You did not come to that grove." Lakṣaṇa replied: "I never agreed to come to any particular grove. I said we should settle our discussion tomorrow in a certain pleasant grove." "Brahmin, I have completely forgotten." The brahmin thought: "I spent the whole night turning over my position and my opponent's position, and when day broke this monk said he had forgotten entirely. He must either be a great minister of state, or someone whose mind is undisturbed by learning." So he said: "Ho, monk, let it be tomorrow." "Very well, brahmin."

The following day the brahmin rose early again and went to that grove, where he waited a long time. Realising that the other was not coming, he entered Śrāvastī again. Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyaas, had likewise let the appointed time for debate slip by and had entered Śrāvastī on his alms round. The brahmin saw him and said: "Ho, monk! You did not come to that grove." Lakṣaṇa replied: "Brahmin, are my activities confined to that alone? I must attend upon my Teacher, receive his teachings, take part in the recitation of texts, and teach the Dharma to whatever brahmins and householders come and arrive." The brahmin said: "Monk, do you not deliberately slight me?" "That is indeed the case." At that moment Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyaas, indicated a direction with a gesture and gave a sign. Having given that directional gesture and that sign, he deliberated and, not going there himself —

— other tīrthikas and persons of knowledge were saying: "These ascetics (śramaṇas), sons of the Śākyans, are liars who have not turned away from lying, who have not abandoned it and individually abandoned it. They indicate a direction and give gestures and signs; having indicated a direction and given gestures and signs, they deliberate and yet do not go there." They were reviling him, throwing abuse at him, and speaking ill of him. On account of this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this occasion, and in this context, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The buddhas, the blessed ones, knowingly put a question — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One, the buddha, questioned Lakṣaṇa, son of the Śākyans: "Lakṣaṇa, is it true that you indicated a direction and gave gestures and signs, and then, having indicated a direction and given those gestures and signs, you deliberately did not go?" "Venerable one, that is so." The Blessed One, the buddha, rebuked him, saying that this was not the conduct of an ascetic, was not fitting, was not proper, was not in accordance with the rule, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. After rebuking him in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

If one speaks a deliberate lie, it is a transgression.

'Deliberately' means after having examined the matter. As for 'if one speaks a lie,' false speech has nine modes. It also has eight modes, seven modes, six modes, five modes, four modes, three modes, and two modes.

What are the nine modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of a defeat (pārājika) without grounds; of a matter remaining before the Saṅgha; of a transgression; of something requiring individual confession; bringing up a matter involving a fault; falsely accusing another of a lapse in moral discipline, a lapse in view, a lapse in ritual conduct, or a lapse in livelihood.

What are the eight modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of a defeat without grounds; of a matter remaining before the Saṅgha; of a transgression; of something requiring individual confession; bringing up a matter involving a fault; and falsely accusing another of what one has not seen, not heard, or only suspected.

What are the seven modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of a lapse in moral discipline, a lapse in view, a lapse in ritual conduct, or a lapse in livelihood without grounds; and falsely accusing another of what one has not seen, not heard, or only suspected.

What are the six modes of false speech? A monk who wishes to speak falsely thinks: "I shall speak a lie." While speaking the lie he thinks: "I am speaking a lie." Having spoken the lie he thinks: "I have spoken a lie." And a monk speaks falsely concerning what he has not seen, not heard, or only suspected.

What are the five modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of a defeat without grounds; of a matter remaining before the Saṅgha; of a transgression; of something requiring individual confession; and bringing up a matter involving a fault.

What are the four modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of a lapse in moral discipline, a lapse in view, a lapse in ritual conduct, or a lapse in livelihood without grounds.

What are the three modes of false speech? Falsely accusing another of what one has not seen, not heard, or only suspected.

As for a further set of three modes of false speech: when wishing to speak falsely, one thinks: "I shall speak a lie." While speaking the lie, one thinks: "I am speaking a lie." Having spoken the lie —

Having spoken the lie, one thinks: "I have spoken a lie." What are the two modes of false speech? While speaking the lie, one thinks: "I am speaking a lie"; and having spoken the lie, one thinks: "I have spoken a lie." There is no single solitary mode of false speech standing alone.

Among instances of false speech: there is false speech that constitutes a defeat; there is false speech that results in a remainder for the Saṅgha; there is false speech that constitutes a grave offense; there is false speech that constitutes a transgression; and there is false speech that constitutes a misdeed.

What is the false speech that constitutes a defeat? It is this: a monk who does not possess them falsely claiming, as though he did, superhuman qualities of a noble person.

What is the false speech that results in a remainder for the Saṅgha? It is this: a monk who has become angry and filled with aversion, thinking "By whatever means I shall drive this one from the celibate life," falsely accusing a pure monk who is free from transgressions, groundlessly, with a matter that would constitute a defeat.

What is the false speech that constitutes a grave offense? It is this: a monk who deliberately, in the midst of the Saṅgha, teaches what is not Dharma as Dharma, teaches what is Dharma as not Dharma, teaches what is not Vinaya as Vinaya, and teaches what is Vinaya as not Vinaya.

What is the false speech that constitutes a misdeed? It is this: when a monk, at each half-month when the sūtra of individual liberation is being recited, is asked "Are you pure in this regard?" and, not being pure, remains silent without saying a word.

What is the false speech that constitutes a transgression? It is this: all other instances of false speech apart from those four kinds of false speech just described constitute transgressions.

As for what is meant by "transgression": it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, states of misfortune, and states of wrong descent. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and not individually confessed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. Therefore it is called a transgression.

Now, how does one incur a transgression? The intermediate rule states:

Not forgotten, and of two minds,
Perception is the last condition.

When a monk has not seen, not heard, not known, or not perceived something, yet alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it; I have heard it; I have known it; I have perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has seen something yet forgotten it, or has heard, known, and perceived it yet forgotten it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and I have not forgotten it; I have heard, known, and perceived it and I have not forgotten it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has seen something yet has doubt about it, or has heard, known, and perceived it yet has doubt about it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and I have no doubt about it; I have heard, known, and perceived it and I have no doubt about it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he perceives what he has seen as not seen, perceives what he has heard, known, and perceived as not perceived, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it; I have heard it, known it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has not heard something yet has seen, known, and perceived it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it, but I have not heard it, not known it, and not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has not known something yet has seen, heard, and perceived it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have known it, but I have not seen it, not heard it, and not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has not perceived something yet has seen, heard, and known it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have perceived it, but I have not seen it, not heard it, and not known it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has seen something and has also forgotten it, and has heard, known, and perceived it and has also forgotten it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it and I have not forgotten it either; I have not heard it, not known it, and not perceived it, and I have not forgotten those either" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has seen something yet has doubt about it, and has heard, known, and perceived it yet has doubt about it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it and I have no doubt about it; I have not heard it, not known it, and not perceived it, and I have no doubt about those either" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has seen something and perceives it as seen, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it, but I have heard it, known it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has heard something and perceives it as heard, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not heard it, but I have seen it, known it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has known something and perceives it as known, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not known it, but I have seen it, heard it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When he has perceived something and perceives it as perceived, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not perceived it, but I have seen it, heard it, and known it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk alters his perception with respect to what he has seen, heard, known, and perceived, and with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it; I have not heard it; I have not known it" —

"I have not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not seen something and has not forgotten that he has not seen it, and has not heard it, not known it, not perceived it, and has not forgotten that either, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and have forgotten that; I have heard it, known it, and perceived it, and have forgotten that too" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not seen something and has no uncertainty about that, and has not heard it, not known it, not perceived it, and has no uncertainty about that either, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and I am uncertain about that; I have heard it, known it, and perceived it, and I am uncertain about that too" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk perceives what he has not seen as seen, and perceives what he has not heard, not known, and not perceived as perceived, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it; I have not heard it; I have not known it; I have not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has seen something but has not heard it, not known it, and not perceived it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not seen it, but I have heard it, known it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has heard something but has not seen it, not known it, and not perceived it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not heard it, but I have seen it, known it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has known something but has not seen it, not heard it, and not perceived it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not known it, but I have seen it, heard it, and perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has perceived something but has not seen it, not heard it, and not known it, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have not perceived it, but I have seen it, heard it, and known it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not seen something and has not forgotten that, and has not heard it, not known it, not perceived it, and has not forgotten that either, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and have forgotten that; I have heard it, known it, and perceived it, and have forgotten that too" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not seen something and has no uncertainty about that, and has not heard it, not known it, not perceived it, and has no uncertainty about that either, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it and I am uncertain about that; I have heard it, known it, and perceived it, and I am uncertain about that too" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not seen something and perceives it as not seen, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have seen it; I have not heard it, not known it, and not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not heard something and perceives it as not heard, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view —

— says "I have heard it; I have not seen it, not known it, and not perceived it"
— everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not known something and perceives it as not known, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have known it; I have not seen it, not heard it, and not perceived it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

When a monk has not perceived something and perceives it as not perceived, and then alters his perception and, with acceptance, desire, reasoning, thought, and altered view, says: "I have perceived it; I have not seen it, not heard it, and not known it" — everything he has said constitutes a transgression.

However extensively a monk alters his perception and then speaks, everything constitutes a transgression. However, there is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is deranged, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is overcome by painful feelings. The first transgression regarding false speech is complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha), the Bhagavān, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, the group of six monks addressed the other monks in terms of their physical defects, calling them things such as: big-ears, bald-heads, loose-limbed ones, stumpy-fingered ones, hunchbacks, dwarfs, those with goiters, mutes, deaf ones, scab-covered ones, flat-footed ones, impudent ones, droopy-lipped ones, and big-heads. By speaking of monks in terms of their physical defects and conducting themselves in this way, those monks became dejected, humiliated, and despondent, and they abandoned the recitation of scripture, the reading of texts, oral repetition, yoga practice, mental cultivation, and the inner calm abiding of the mind, and they remained in a state of much suffering and mental discomfort.

Some monks of few wants said: "Why do these monks address other monks in terms of their physical defects, calling them big-ears, bald-heads, loose-limbed ones, stumpy-fingered ones, hunchbacks, dwarfs, those with goiters, mutes, deaf ones, scab-covered ones, flat-footed ones, impudent ones, droopy-lipped ones, and big-heads — mocking them, jeering at them, and speaking ill of them?" Those monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, in view of this occasion and this context, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and what follows is as before. The statement "The blessed buddhas, while knowing, act as though they do not know" and what follows is also as before.

The Blessed One censured the group of six monks, saying: "Is it true, monks, that you have been addressing other monks in terms of their physical defects, calling them big-ears, bald-heads, loose-limbed ones, stumpy-fingered ones, hunchbacks, dwarfs, those with goiters, mutes, deaf ones, scab-covered ones, flat-footed ones, impudent ones, droopy-lipped ones, and big-heads, and conducting yourselves in this way?" "It is true, Venerable One." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that this was not the conduct of a renunciant, was not appropriate, was not fitting, and was not in accord with proper discipline — it was not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

"Monks, long ago in a time past, there lived a householder on a rocky cliff. He took a wife of equal birth, and with her he played, rejoiced, and lived in happiness. To them a daughter was born, and they raised and nurtured her until she grew up. That householder was a farmer, and he himself went to plow the fields.

A son of another householder, separated from his parents, came from the forest carrying a load of firewood. He set it down beneath a tree near that field and rested, and he said to him, "Uncle, why do you plow the field yourself? You who could do the work of the village in the village — why do you do the work of the forest in the forest? I have no son, and I have no brothers. Uncle, lend me the yoke and let me plow while you rest a while." And with that he began to plow.

The householder came, bringing food for the young man, and called out, "Nephew, come here and eat." The two of them ate, and then the householder's son said, "Uncle, I do not know your household — you should go home. Stay and I will finish the plowing by evening." The householder departed, and the young man plowed for a little while longer; then, toward evening, he turned the two oxen loose in the direction of the field boundary, took up a load of grass, and began heading toward that rocky cliff. The householder, going to meet him, led him back to the house.

The householder's son tethered the oxen to their post, spread out fodder, calmed them with a gentle motion, and laid grass before the two oxen. The householder thought, "This boy has been of great benefit to me. I will give him my daughter as his wife." He said to the young man, "Nephew, work here happily — I will give you this daughter as your wife." The young man began to build a house. Then one of the oxen bolted into the field, and when he tried to drive it back he could not, so he struck it and hurled a piece of wood at it; this broke one of its horns, and from that event the ox was named Broken-Horn. On another occasion the ox again bolted into the field, and when he tried to drive it back he could not, so he struck it and hurled a clod at it; this cut off its tail, and from that the ox was named Stump-Tail. And so, having been given the names Broken-Horn and Stump-Tail, the ox was thereafter called simply Broken-Stump.

At another time the householder's son said to the householder, "Uncle, keep the promise you made." The householder said to his wife, "Good woman, make preparations for the bridal sendoff — we will send the daughter as a bride." The wife replied, "My lord, this daughter has never been given to anyone at all — how shall we send her as a bride?" He said, "I have promised her to another." "To whom?" "To this young householder." The wife said, "It seems wrong to give our daughter to this one, who is as white and vacant as a white gourd and has never achieved anything of his own. Let her be given where she will have clothing to wear and food to eat." He said, "My dear, this young man has been of great benefit to me — and even if he were to leave, I would still have to plow the fields myself." The wife replied, "I cannot give my daughter to this good-for-nothing." The householder thought, "If I say to the young man, 'I will not give you my daughter,' he will leave this very day and I will be left in suffering." So he put the matter off.

Again the householder's son said to the householder, "Uncle, keep the promise you made." He replied, "Nephew, I must provide a feast for all my many relatives — first go and harvest the rice." The young man harvested the rice and came back saying, "Uncle, now send the bride." He replied, "Nephew, I also need sugar cane for the feast — first go and procure the sugar cane." He went and procured the sugar cane, and returned saying, "Uncle, now send the bride." He replied, "Nephew, I also need loads for the feast — first go and procure the grain." He went and procured the grain as well, and returned saying, "Uncle, now send the bride." The householder said, "Nephew, the earlier rice is used up — go and harvest more rice first."

The householder's son thought to himself: "These three tasks are by their very nature impossible to complete all at once, so he is simply stringing me along. I will go into the assembly of common people, make him acknowledge his promise publicly, and if he still refuses to give her, I will have him brought to court from the royal palace." So he went into the assembly of common people and said to him there, "Uncle, send the bride." The householder was irritated and said, "Good people, if this man is doing the work of my stomach — that is, working as my farm laborer — should I really give him my daughter?" The householder's son thought to himself: "I have received neither the kārṣāpaṇas nor the girl. I will do him some injury and be on my way." So he ploughed the fields with those oxen that very day, flogged them many times with a whip, tied them in the hot sun to a dry post, and left.

Now, by the nature of reality, in the early age when the world was first established, animals too could speak. So those oxen said to him: "Hey, you — you have been just like a father and mother to us. You always tended us well with comfort and care. Why then, today, did you plough the fields, flog us many times with a whip, tie us to a dry post in the hot sun, and leave? Did we do you some wrong?" "You have done me not the slightest wrong. It is your master who has wronged me." "And what did he do?" "He promised to give me his daughter and has not given her." "Then why don't you go to the royal palace?" "I have no witnesses." "Go — we will testify as witnesses." "But can you speak in human language?" "We cannot. But here is what you should do: petition the king with a declaration of truth. We will be tied up for seven days without anyone giving us grass or pouring us water. On the seventh day, send us toward a place with abundant grass and abundant water. Then, before the king, speak these words of truth: 'If I am telling the truth, may these oxen neither eat grass nor drink water.' We, for our part, for as long as the king has not yet come to believe, will neither eat grass nor drink water."

The householder's son went to the royal palace and petitioned the king: "Sire, a certain wealthy householder promised to give me his daughter and then refused." The king said, "Do you have any witnesses?" "I do, Sire." "Are they men?" "They are not men." "Who, then?" "Sire, they are oxen." "Can they speak in human language?" "They cannot, Sire. But this is what I will do: I will petition by a declaration of truth. I myself will tie up those oxen for seven days, give them no fodder and pour them no water, and on the seventh day I will send them toward a place of abundant fodder and abundant water. At that time I will petition before Your Majesty with these words of truth: 'If I am not lying, may these oxen neither seek fodder nor seek water.' And for as long as Your Majesty has not yet come to believe, they will neither seek fodder nor seek water." The king instructed his ministers, "Good people, do as he has said." They tied up those oxen and left them. Then Khaṇḍarūpa said, "Has the sun risen in the west?"

"Why do they not release us?" The others said, "No — we must petition before that householder's son in this way, with words of truth: 'We will remain tethered in the stable for seven days, receiving no fodder and no water, and on the seventh day we will be sent toward a place of abundant fodder and abundant water. At that time, you must petition before the king with these words of truth: If I am not lying, may these oxen neither eat fodder nor drink water.' And we have pledged that for as long as the king has not yet come to believe, we will neither eat fodder nor drink water."

Khaṇḍarūpa said, "If they were let free, what need is there even to mention grass — they would eat stones."

The others said, "That householder's son is like a father and mother to us. Do not act in that way."

Khaṇḍarūpa said, "It is true that he is like a father and mother to us, yet he calls me Khaṇḍarūpa — and that I do not like at all. In fact, I would rather rip out his belly."

Now the householder's son came to the oxen from time to time and asked them, "Dear oxen, how are you faring?" They replied, "We are faring well — it is you who are not faring well. What harm has Khaṇḍarūpa done? He says, 'If I were let free, what need even to mention grass — I would eat stones.' Well then, should we flee? No — rather do not flee: instead, punch this Khaṇḍarūpa on the nose, and if he should try to eat grass or drink water, we will seize him by the nose with our horns and hold his head up toward the sun. And you, at that moment, tell everyone: 'The fifth world-guardian sun is also among the four great ones' — pointing up at the sun."

When the boy began to punch Khaṇḍarūpa on the nose, Khaṇḍarūpa cried, "Wise ones, look at this — he is matching himself up to my height!" The others said, "He is adorning you with an ornament — be silent."

Then on the seventh day, the king assembled together with the ministers, and the oxen were sent toward a place of abundant fodder and abundant water. At that moment Khaṇḍarūpa reached out to take a mouthful of grass, and those oxen seized him by the nose with their horns and held his head up, gazing at the sun. The king said to the ministers, "Wise ones, why are these oxen gazing at the sun and standing still?" At that one minister said, "Your Majesty, in effect they are making a petition to the deity: not merely that the four great ones are ours alone, but that the fifth world-guardian sun with its canopy is yet another set of four great ones." The king was filled with wonder and instructed the ministers, "Wise ones, let the non-humans resolve the dispute over the four great ones, and give this householder's son the householder's daughter." The householder's son defeated that householder and was given his daughter.

Monks, even those creatures born in the animal realm, when led by humans into court and made to act and speak, will plot to kill — to say nothing of human beings. Therefore a monk must not lead a fellow monk into court through human testimony and make him act and speak so.

Monks, in times gone by, long past, in a certain rocky mountain gorge there lived a householder who was a wagon-driver, and he had two bulls named Bādagāyeda and Sārī. From among those two, in the spring month a dappled calf followed by two dappled ones. Now, the calf of Bādagāyeda was a hornless bull, and the calf of Sārī was a striped one, and so he named one Bādagāyeda Hornless and the other Sārī Striped. In time, those two grew into great bulls.

On another occasion, some wagon-drivers gathered at a drinking party and fell to boasting. "Good sirs," they said, "whose bulls are the finest?" One of them said, "Mine are the best." Another said, "Mine are the best." The wagon-driver in question also said, "Mine are the best." The others said, "How do you know?" He replied, "Load the wagon heavily on the lowest road, stake five hundred kārṣāpaṇas as the wager, and drive the two bulls — that will settle it." So they loaded the wagon heavily on the lowest road, staked five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, and that day drove those two bulls. The wagon-driver began to urge them on: "Go, Bādagāyeda Hornless! Go, Sārī Striped!" But those two bulls stood motionless and would not budge. He then began to beat them with his hands. The other wagon-drivers said, "You have lost — do not harm the cattle; release those two bulls and pay the forfeit." And so he was made to pay five hundred kārṣāpaṇas.

Then that wagon-driver, furious with the two bulls, flogged them many times with a whip and tied them to a dry post in the sun. Now, by the very nature of reality, in a world not long established animals too were still able to speak in human language. So the two bulls said to him, "You treat us as though we were your own father and mother — have we ever done you any wrong? Why then do you flog us many times and tie us to a dry post in the sun?" He replied, "You two deliberately feigned weakness, and it has cost me a forfeit of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." The two replied, "You brought the forfeit on yourself by your own tongue. What has come to pass? We two — one named Bādagāyeda and the other named Sārī — why do you call us by those ugly epithets, Hornless and Striped? Be that as it may. Now load the wagon twice as heavily on the lowest road, stake twice that amount in kārṣāpaṇas as the wager, and drive us two. Or do you also wish to be made to pay another forfeit? Do not call us by ugly names — give us our proper names — and we will pull the wagon."

On another occasion those wagon-drivers again gathered at a drinking party and fell to boasting. "Good sirs," they said, "whose bulls are the finest?" One said, "Mine are the best." Another said, "Mine are the best." That same wagon-driver also said, "Mine are the best." The others said, "Good fellow, do you also wish to be made to pay a forfeit again?" He replied, "What harm is there to you? Load the wagon twice as heavily on the lowest road, stake a thousand kārṣāpaṇas, and drive the bulls." So they loaded the wagon twice as heavily on the lowest road, staked a thousand kārṣāpaṇas as the wager, and drove those two bulls. The wagon-driver began to urge them on: "Go, Bādagāyeda! Go, Sārī!" And those two swiftly, with all speed, hauled that load across the plain. The wagon-driver received the forfeit of a thousand kārṣāpaṇas, and then the gods spoke these verses:

When the load is heaviest and when the road runs lowest, those two bear the burden there and draw the wagon forward.
If pleasant words are spoken — they carry even the heaviest load and are rewarded for it as well, and both are glad at heart.
Therefore speak what is pleasing, and never what is displeasing.
When pleasant words are spoken, virtue arises and no wrongdoing remains.

Monks, even those creatures born in the animal realm — when humans treat them with taunting speech and habitually address them in that way, it severs the stream of loving-kindness toward them. How much more so is this true in the case of human beings. Therefore a monk must not habitually address another monk with speech that demeans him by reference to his human origins.

Then the Blessed One, having rebuked this conduct in many ways, addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk speaks with the intent to demean another by his human origins commits a transgression."

Now, "speaks with the intent to demean another by his human origins" means: with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, one utters speech — words, phrases, designations, expressions, utterances, definitive statements, verbal routes, vocal sounds, verbal actions, and vocal communications. "Commits a transgression" means: it burns, torments, and causes one to fall into the states of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the realms of ruin and wrong descent. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the virtuous qualities. It is for this reason that it is called "committing a transgression."

Now, as to how the transgression occurs, the summary verse states:

By birth, by craft, by occupation, by bodily signs — five categories of internal transgressions — along with the secondary afflictions, and the act of mockery is the last.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the brahmin caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a wrongdoing for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the warrior caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a wrongdoing for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the noble class and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the noble class" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the common people and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the common people" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the rope-makers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the rope-makers' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the needle-makers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the needle-makers' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the cooks' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the cooks' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste and says to him:

"Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the hammersmiths' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the hammersmiths' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the leather-workers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the leather-workers' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the potters' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the potters' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the sweepers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the sweepers' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenters' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the carpenters' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste and says to him:

"Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the servants' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you?"

"You, venerable one, have gone forth from the servants' caste" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the brahmin caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: the brahmin manner of conduct, the brahmin way of living, purity practices, deportment, the taking of ashes, the taking of the water-pot with the bird emblem, the taking of clay, hand gestures, the topknot, the recitation of hymns of praise, the exclamation 'Kye!', the Veda of definitive utterance, the Veda of fire-sacrifice, the Veda of poetry, the Veda of statecraft, performing fire-sacrifices, causing others to perform fire-sacrifices, reciting, causing others to recite, giving, and receiving" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes an offence for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste (kṣatriya) and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the warrior caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: riding atop a great elephant, riding a horse, the arts of the chariot, the arts of the sword, thrusting and striking backward, striking forward, the technique of guiding with a goad, casting a lasso, methods of shooting a great bow, postures of standing and walking, the topknot, cutting, slashing, stabbing, striking from a distance, striking with a sound, striking at a vital point, striking without missing, and the various severe arts" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes an offence for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the householder caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the householder caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: tilling fields, tending cattle, and trading" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the common people's caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the common people's caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: weaving and carrying loads" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the rope-makers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the rope-makers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: silks, great bolts of cloth, fine cotton cloths, silk goods, fine wool fabrics, and kotamba cloth" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the needle-makers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the needle-makers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: fine cotton cloth, large bolts of cloth, par-thang cloth, needle-work, small woven goods, and woven discs" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the hat-makers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the hat-makers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: hats, peaked hats, children's garments, shoulder-stitched garments, long cloaks, short cloaks, and whatever other crafts belong to hat-makers" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: alms bowls, small alms bowls, needles, knives, scissors, and whatever other crafts belong to blacksmiths" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the coppersmiths' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the coppersmiths' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: large bowls, small bowls, platters, drinking cups, balls, and whatever other crafts belong to coppersmiths" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the leather-workers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the leather-workers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: laced sandals, sandals without straps, upper sandals, saddles, sheaths, and whatever other crafts belong to leather-workers" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the potters' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the potters' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: clay vessels, water pots, balls, small pots, earthen cups, and whatever other crafts belong to potters" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the barbers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the barbers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: cutting hair, trimming nails, shaving beards, dressing wounds, and whatever other crafts belong to barbers" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenters' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the carpenters' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: beds, small beds, chairs, stools, door-panels, and whatever other crafts belong to carpenters" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: wickerwork containers, baskets, parasols, fans, sieves, and whatever other crafts belong to basket-weavers" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the servants' caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the servants' caste — and so, venerable one, you should practise the crafts proper to you, namely: giving massages, fanning, bathing, running on errands, attending to commissions, and whatever other crafts belong to servants" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a transgression for that monk.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the thirty-ninth section.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the brahmin caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: brahminic conduct, deportment and cleanliness, general behavior, taking ashes, taking a water-vessel, taking clay, hand-gestures, the topknot, the hymns of praise, the exclamation 'kye!', the Veda of definitive utterance, the Veda of sacrifice, the Veda of poetry, the Veda of protection, performing sacrifices, causing others to perform sacrifices, reciting scriptures, causing others to recite, giving, receiving, and whatever other activities belong to brahmins" — whether the monk who says this is tonsured or not, it constitutes a misdeed for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior-noble (kṣatriya) caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the warrior-noble caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: riding elephants in rut, riding horses, chariot-craft, sword-craft, throwing spears, drawing back and shooting forward, maneuvering with iron hooks, casting lassos, shooting great arrows — techniques of handling, stances, top-knot combat, cutting, slashing, thrusting, striking at range, striking with a sound, striking a vital point, striking without missing, and striking with great force — and whatever other activities belong to the warrior-noble caste you should also perform." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the warrior-noble caste, it is a misdeed for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the commoner caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the commoner caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: plowing fields, herding cattle, trading, and whatever other activities belong to the commoner caste you should also perform." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the commoner caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the weaver caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the weaver caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: weaving fine cloth, carding wool, spinning thread, using a shuttle, and such things — your own proper activities." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the weaver caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the needle-worker caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the needle-worker caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with a weaving frame, thread, dye, pegs, and needles." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the needle-worker caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the tailor caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the tailor caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with needles, thread, cutting knives, scissors, and thimbles." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the tailor caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmith caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the blacksmith caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with bellows, bellows-pipes, tongs, drying racks, and hammers." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the blacksmith caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmith caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the blacksmith caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with bellows, bellows-pipes, tongs, drying racks, and hammers." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the blacksmith caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the leather-worker caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the leather-worker caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with hides, small hides, straps, hide-knives, awls, and small awls." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the leather-worker caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the potter caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the potter caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with the wheel, the modeling stick, cord, the wheel's support-stand, and a smoothing tool." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the potter caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the barber caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the barber caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with a razor, scissors, a whetstone, a cosmetic lancet, and nail-scissors." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the barber caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenter caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the carpenter caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with a chisel, an adze, a plane, a vice, and a hammer." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the carpenter caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the basket-weaver caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the basket-weaver caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: working with bamboo, a knife, dye, a bamboo mallet, and a splitting tool." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the basket-weaver caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth from the servant caste and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? You, venerable one, have gone forth from the servant caste — and so, venerable one, you should perform your own proper activities, namely: massaging, scrubbing the body, bathing another, running errands, and carrying out assigned tasks." Whether or not the monk himself has gone forth from the servant caste, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? Venerable one, you are one who has gone forth from among the lame, the deformed, the spindly, the one with broken fingers, the hunchbacked, the dwarfish, the one with a goiter, the foolish, the mute, the coarse, the deaf, the one who walks on crutches, the one with club feet." Whether or not the monk himself is bald-headed, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? Venerable one, you are one who has gone forth from among the leprous, the one with fine pustules, the one with eczema, the one with scabies, the one with ringworm, the one with a dog-smell, the one with epilepsy, the one with athlete's foot, the one with hiccups, the nauseating, the consumptive, the feverish, the one with severe fever, the one with phlegm, the one with breathing difficulties, the one with wasting disease, the one with memory loss, the one tormented by hunger and thirst, the one with pallor, the overly obese, the one with a tumor, the one with a blood disease, the one with a bile disease, the one who is incontinent at night." Whether or not the monk himself is bald-headed, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? Venerable one, you are one who has incurred a defeat, a remainder-for-the-Saṅgha offense, a transgression, a matter requiring individual confession, or a wrongdoing transgression." Whether or not the monk himself is bald-headed, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? Venerable one, you are one who is wrathful, who harbors resentment, who conceals faults, who is of bad character, who is envious, who is miserly, who is deceitful, who is crafty, who is without shame, who is without conscience, who desires evil, who holds wrong views." Whether or not the monk himself is bald-headed, it is a transgression for that monk.

If a monk, with the intention of demeaning another by his human origins, goes to one who has gone forth and says to him: "Venerable one, where is the conduct of a renunciant in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin in you? Venerable one, you are like a corpse" — and insults him with such insults and the like — whether or not the monk himself is bald-headed, it is a transgression for that monk.

If there happen to be many persons with such a name, and in answering the one spoken to he says "Which is the monk Saṅgharakṣita?" and says "It is the one who went forth from the brahmin caste" — and similar preceding statements of that kind — there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who acts for the first time, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by acute sensations.

The second transgression of demeaning by human origins is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks were everywhere engaging in slander against the monks. When they engaged in slander everywhere, some monks became humiliated, downcast, and dispirited, and ceased studying, reading, reciting, and meditation, mental application, and inner calm abiding. In this way the group of six monks also severed the continuum of virtuous qualities that the others had been diligently cultivating and accumulating over a long time. Those monks then reported this to the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, why do monks engage everywhere in slander against monks?" — reviling them, deriding them, and speaking ill of them.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and this circumstance, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so on, as before. "The blessed buddhas, knowing yet feigning not to know" — and so on, also as before.

The blessed Buddha questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you engaged everywhere in slander against monks?" "Venerable sir, we did." The blessed Buddha then censured them, declaring that such conduct was unbecoming for a renunciant, unsuitable, improper, and not in accord with discipline — it was not something a fully ordained monk should do.

"Monks, in times long past there was a lioness who was pregnant and dwelling in a certain forest. Now the habit of lionesses is this: when the time of giving birth arrives, they assemble a great store of meat and then give birth. This lioness followed after a large herd of cattle and, while still nursing her young shortly after giving birth, a calf that was following at the herd's rear — a calf being tended by its mother, who would not go far — was killed by the lioness, who took its flesh and returned to her den.

Now that calf, wishing to drink its mother's milk, kept following after the lioness, and the lioness thought: 'This calf too should be killed.' But then she thought again: 'If my own cub comes to follow this calf, then this calf will become a companion to my cub — I will not kill it.'

The lioness gave birth, and a male cub was born to her. The lioness began nursing both her own cub and that calf together, and in time both of them grew large. Then at another time the lioness grew old, and as the moment of her death approached she spoke to them: 'You two are nursing-companions, having suckled at the same breast. Slanderers, those who sow division, will fill the entire world. After I am gone, you two must not listen to any of them.' And having said this, she spoke these words:

All that has been gathered comes to its end, and those who have risen high are brought to fall.
Whatever has met together must part,
and whatever lives must die.

And so it was that her time came, and she passed away in accordance with the nature of things.

The lion grew large by slaying the finest of wild beasts, eating their excellent flesh, and drinking their rich blood. And that noble bull calf also grew large by eating fine grasses in the lion's protected domain and drinking clean water. The king of wild beasts, that lion, had in his retinue an old fox — utterly greedy, a scavenger living on scraps — who always followed behind. Now the lion, having slain the finest of wild beasts and eaten their excellent flesh and drunk their excellent blood, would rest there contentedly, and because of this the other smaller predators of that vicinity dared not approach. So that old fox ate and drank the scraps of meat and the remnants of blood left behind after the lion had slain the finest of wild beasts and eaten their excellent flesh and drunk their excellent blood, and thereby became fat in hide, flesh, and blood."

Now at a certain other time, the lion slew the finest of wild beasts and ate their excellent flesh and drank their excellent blood, then went straight home to his pride and sat playing and resting with the finest of stallions. The leftover meat was eaten by the other smaller predators, and the old fox thought to himself: "I must watch where this lion goes." So he followed along behind him, and when he saw him sitting and playing with the finest of stallions, the fox thought: "This stallion has become an obstacle to my food supply. I must drive these two apart." And the old fox went and sat before the stallion with his ears laid flat. The stallion said: "Uncle, do the hot winds not blow?" The fox replied: "Indeed, hot winds blaze fiercely. But what of it? This lion here says: 'Where has that stallion gone, my means of gathering meat? When I cannot find other flesh, I shall eat this stallion.' " The stallion said: "Uncle, when we were both at our mother's deathbed, we two were brothers who nursed at the same teat, and she gave her last testament saying that after she was gone, you two must not listen to slanderers, those who sow division and fill the world with their scheming. Do not say such things." The fox replied: "Stallion, if you will not now listen to my words spoken for your benefit, you will come to ruin." The stallion said: "Uncle, how would that come about?" The fox replied: "Stallion, this lion will come forth from his lair, shake himself, yawn wide, survey the four directions, and then roar the lion's roar three times before coming toward you.

When that happens, know that it is I he means to kill."

Then the fox went and sat before the lion with his ears laid flat. The lion said: "Uncle, do the hot winds not blow?" The fox replied: "Indeed, hot winds blaze fiercely. But what of it? This stallion here says: 'Where has that ancestral lion of mine gone? I shall slash open his belly in revenge for the killing of his mother.' " The lion said: "Uncle, when we were both at our mother's deathbed, we two were brothers who nursed at the same teat, and she gave her last testament saying that after she was gone, you two must not listen to slanderers, those who sow division and fill the world with their scheming. Do not say such things." The fox replied: "Lion, if you will not now listen to my words spoken for your benefit, you will come to ruin." The lion said: "Uncle, how would that come about?" The fox replied: "Lion, this stallion will come forth from the herd, shake himself, make a buzzing sound, paw the ground, snort with fury, and then come toward you. When that happens, know that it is I he means to kill."

Now although both of them naturally behaved in exactly these ways all the time, on no occasion had they ever taken it as a sign directed against them. But then at another time, the lion, king of wild beasts, came forth from his lair, shook himself, yawned wide, surveyed the four directions, roared the lion's roar three times, and then went toward the stallion. The stallion too came forth from the herd, shook himself, made a buzzing sound, pawed the ground, snorted with fury, and then went toward the lion. Those two had always naturally behaved in exactly those ways all the time, and on no prior occasion had they ever taken it as a sign directed against them — but now, at the very moment when the seed of division had been planted in their minds, they took it as such.

The stallion thought, "He is going to kill me," and the lion thought, "He is going to kill me." The lion raked the stallion's chest with his claws, and the stallion gored open the lion's belly with his horn, and both fell dead at the same moment. Then the god spoke in verse:

Those who look upon what is good should not keep company with the wicked.
See how the fox drove apart
the lion and the stallion who were dear to one another.

Monks, even animals born into animal destinies will, when slander is practiced among them, think to kill one another — how much more needless to say this of human beings. Therefore, monks, a monk must not practice slander against a fellow monk. If a monk does practice slander against a fellow monk, it will bring about serious conflict.

Monks, in a time long past, in a certain forest there lived a lioness with her cub and a tigress with her cub. The lioness went out to her hunting ground, and while her cub was wandering about it came upon the tigress's den. The tigress saw it and thought, "I shall kill this one," but then thought again, "No — this one can become a companion and younger friend to my own cub; I will not kill it," and she began to suckle it. The lioness, having ranged through her hunting ground, returned home. When she could not find her cub she began to search for it, and she found the cub being suckled by the tigress. The tigress, seeing the lioness, was frightened and began to flee. The lioness called out to the tigress, "Sister, do not flee! Let us dwell together. In this way, when you go out to your hunting ground I will tend to your cub, and if you should go out to the hunting ground, I will tend to your cub as well." The two began to live together, and together they named the lion cub Goodfang and the tiger cub Goodshoulder, and in time those two grew up. Then, at another time, the lioness and the tigress both fell ill, and as the time of their death drew near they spoke to their two sons: "You two are brothers who have suckled at the same breast — but those who carry slander, those who drive apart with divisive words, fill the world with discord. After we two have passed away, you must not listen to anyone of that kind." Then they said:

All that has been gathered comes at last to exhaustion, all that has risen high must in the end fall.

All meeting ends at last in parting, and all that lives must in the end die.

And so it was that they met the nature of impermanence. The lion used to go out, kill the finest game animals, eat the best flesh and drink the best blood, and then return swiftly, directly to the lair. The tiger used to go out to the hunting ground, kill game animals with great effort, eat flesh and drink blood, and then return only after a long time. Then on one occasion the tiger hid his leftovers and ate from them, and returned quickly. The lion said to the tiger, "Before this, you always came back after a long time, yet today you have come back quickly — what is the reason for this?" The tiger said, "I had hidden some leftovers and I ate from those and came back." The lion said, "You hide leftovers?" The tiger said, "Yes." The lion said, "As for me, I kill the finest game, eat the finest flesh, and drink the finest blood, and then go home without a second thought." The tiger said, "You have great strength, that is true — but I cannot do likewise." The lion said, "Let us go out together." And so the two of them set off together.

Now, an old fox — exceedingly cunning, a eater of leftovers — was in the retinue of that lion, king of wild beasts, and was always following along behind him. This fox thought, "This tiger has become a rival for my food supply, so I must drive these two apart." With that in mind, the old fox went and sat before the lion with its ears drooping down. The lion said, "Uncle, are hot winds not rising?" The fox said, "Hot winds, blazing fiercely, are indeed rising. What is wrong? This tiger here keeps saying, 'Where has that lion gone, the root of my strength? Because he made me eat leftovers, I shall surely kill him.'" The lion said, "Uncle, our two mothers, at the moment of their deaths, told you two that you were brothers who had nursed at the same breast. Slanderers and troublemakers who split households fill the world, and they left a testament saying that after the two of them passed away you two should never listen to anyone like that — so do not say such things." The fox said, "Elder, if you do not listen to words spoken now for your own benefit, you will come to ruin." The lion said, "Uncle, how will it come about in sequence?" The fox said, "Elder, this tiger will come out from his lair, screech like a bird, crouch low, look out in all four directions, then give three tiger roars and come before you — and when that happens, you should know that he intends to kill you. After that, go and sit before the tiger with your ears drooping down." The tiger said, "Uncle, are hot winds not rising?" The fox said, "Hot winds, blazing fiercely, are indeed rising. What is wrong? This lion here keeps saying, 'Where has that tiger gone, the root of my strength? He shall surely be killed.'" The tiger said, "Uncle, our two mothers, at the moment of their deaths, told you two that you were brothers who had nursed at the same breast. Slanderers and troublemakers who split households fill the world, and they left a testament saying that you two should never listen to anyone like that — so do not say such things." The fox said, "Elder, if you do not listen to words spoken now for your own benefit, you will come to ruin. Elder, how will it come about in sequence?" The fox said, "Elder, this lion will come out from his lair, screech like a bird, crouch low, look out in all four directions, then give three lion roars and come before you — and when that happens, you should know that he intends to kill you."

Now, although by their natures these two always behaved in just this way, not once had they ever taken it as a sign. But on another occasion, the lion king of wild beasts came out from his lair, screeched like a bird, crouched low, looked out in all four directions, gave three lion roars, and went before the tiger. The tiger too came out from his lair, screeched like a bird, crouched low, looked out in all four directions, gave three tiger roars, and went before the lion. Although these two had always done exactly this, they had never once taken it as a sign — but now, the moment the seed of discord had been planted in their minds, they took it as a sign, and the lion thought, "He intends to kill me," and the tiger likewise thought, "He intends to kill me."

Then the lion thought further, "I am endowed with great strength, whereas the tiger is not like that, so he cannot attack me — let me investigate more closely." And with that thought he spoke in verse:

With a splendid grove of trees and water,
With skill and strength endowed,
To attack one with fine fangs is not right.

Then the tiger also spoke in verse:

With a fine grove and water,
And endowed with skill and strength,
To attack one with fine flanks is not right —
One with fine fangs should not do so.

The lion said, "Who told you this?" The tiger replied, "This fox did." The tiger then said, "And who told you?" The lion replied, "This fox did."

The lion reflected, "This one is trying to drive a wedge between the two of us." And with that he struck the fox dead with a blow of his paw. Then a god spoke in verse:

Do not abandon a friend on account of another's words,
But examine well what others say.
Those who seek occasion to divide
Are slanderous persons — do not trust them.
The fox, born a village-dweller, spoke falsehood
And sought to part good friends — look at that!
Now that this slanderer has been slain,
See how friends rejoice in happiness.

Monks, even these creatures born in the animal realm were willing to kill when slander was practiced against them — what need is there to speak of human beings? Therefore, monks, a monk must not engage in slander against a fellow monk. If a monk slanders a fellow monk, it becomes a serious transgression.

Then the Blessed One, having censured this conduct in many ways, addressed the monks and said: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk engages in slander, it is a transgression."

The phrase "if a monk engages in slander" means: with the intention of slandering a fellow monk, one speaks — using speech, words, terminology, sounds, declarations, definitive expressions, the avenue of words, the sounds of words, verbal actions, or verbal expressions.

The phrase "it is a transgression" means: it scorches, it burns, it causes one to fall into the bad rebirths of hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, into wretched destinies and downfalls. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and individually confessed, it obstructs wholesome dharma — therefore it is called a transgression.

How does one come to incur a transgression in this matter? A summary verse:

Clan, craft, livelihood,
Sign, illness, the five categories of transgression,
The minor afflictions,
And mockery — that is the last.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the brahmins'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste (kṣatriya) and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the warrior caste" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the commoner caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the commoner caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the rope-maker caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the rope-maker caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the needle-worker caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the needle-worker caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenter caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the carpenter caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the ironsmith caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the ironsmith caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the hammerer caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the hammerer caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the potter caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the potter caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the barber caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the barber caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenter caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the carpenter caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the basket-weaver caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the basket-weaver caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the slave caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the slave caste'" — and if he names a monk saying, "The monk's name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such" — then the utterance of the name constitutes a full offense, and the utterance of clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense of slander.

If a monk, with the intention of slandering, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Where is the conduct of an ascetic in you, venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? You, venerable one, are one gone forth from the brahmin caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: the brahminic mode of conduct, brahminic behavior, purity, deportment, the taking of ashes, the taking of the water-pot with a bird-effigy, the taking of earth, hand-gestures, the top-knot, the Veda of praises, the exclamation kye, the Veda of definitive statements, the Veda of offerings, the Veda of poetry, the Veda of statecraft, the performing of sacrifices, the causing of others to perform sacrifices, the recitation of sacred texts, the causing of others to recite them, the giving of gifts, and the receiving of gifts — these are what you ought to be training in." And as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes an offense, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the warrior caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: riding great elephants, riding horses, the methods of the chariot, the methods of the sword, throwing and drawing back, thrusting forward, the technique of directing with the iron hook, the casting of the lasso, the methods of shooting the great arrow, gripping, footwork, the top-knot, cutting, slashing, stabbing, striking from a distance, striking with a sound, striking at a vital point, striking without missing, and the weighty arts — these are what you ought to be training in.'" And as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes an offense, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a minor offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the merchant caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the merchant caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: tilling the fields, tending cattle, and engaging in trade — these are what you ought to be training in.'" And as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the common people's caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the common people's caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: scything and carrying loads on the shoulders — these are what you ought to be training in.'" And as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the weavers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the weavers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: silk fabrics, great bolts of cotton cloth, fine cotton cloth, silk, fine wool, and cotton — these are what you ought to be training in.'" And as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the needle-workers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the needle-workers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows:

one ought to practice the making of coarse cloth, middling cloth, fine embroidered cloth, small woven pieces, and balls of thread" — and as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the good-workers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the good-workers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of hats, peaked caps, children's garments, shoulder-sewn robes, long garments, short garments, and whatever other crafts of the good-workers there are'" — and as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the blacksmiths' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of bowls, small bowls, needles, knives, nail-cutters, and whatever other crafts of the blacksmiths there are'" — and as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the coppersmiths' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the coppersmiths' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of large basins, small basins, plates, drinking cups, balls, and whatever other crafts of the coppersmiths there are'" — and as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the leather-workers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the leather-workers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of laced sandals, cut sandals, upturned-toe shoes, saddles, quivers, and whatever other crafts of the leather-workers there are'" — and as for which monk — his name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the potters' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the potters' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of pots, jars, balls of clay, small vessels, bowls, and whatever other crafts of the potter one ought to practice" — and if he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the barbers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the barbers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the cutting of hair, the trimming of nails, the shaving of beard, the dressing of sidelocks, and whatever other crafts of the barber one ought to practice.' Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such." If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenters' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the carpenters' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of large seats, small seats, benches, footstools, door-panels, and whatever other crafts of the carpenter one ought to practice.' Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such." If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the basket-weavers' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice the making of baskets, winnowing fans, parasols, fans, conch-shell covers, and whatever other crafts of the basket-weaver one ought to practice.' Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such." If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the servants' caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the servants' caste — and the venerable one's own craft is as follows: one ought to practice massaging, scrubbing, bathing, running errands, carrying out commissions, and whatever other crafts of the servant one ought to practice.' Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such." If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

The Vinaya Analysis, the fortieth fascicle.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the brahmin caste and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the brahmin caste — the venerable one ought to practice his own proper occupation, which is this: the conduct and deportment of a brahmin, cleanliness, proper behavior, taking up ashes, taking up a water vessel with a spout, hand gestures, a topknot, the recitation of hymns of praise, the exclamation "Kye!", the Veda of invocations, the Veda of oblations, the Veda of poetry, the Veda of protection, performing fire sacrifices, directing others to perform fire sacrifices, reciting texts, directing others to recite texts, giving and receiving, and whatever other occupations belong to brahmins." Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the warrior caste (kṣatriya) and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the warrior caste — the venerable one ought to practice his own proper occupation, which is this: riding on elephants, riding horses, chariot methods, sword techniques, the lance, thrusting backward and thrusting forward, maneuvering with an iron hook, casting a lasso, hurling a great arrow, gripping postures, walking postures, the topknot, cutting, slashing, piercing, striking from a distance, striking with sound, striking a vital point, striking without missing, striking with great force, and whatever other occupations belong to the warrior caste.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a downfall, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes an offense.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the merchant caste (vaiśya) and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the merchant caste — the venerable one ought to practice his own proper occupation, which is this: plowing fields, tending cattle, engaging in trade, and whatever other occupations belong to the merchant caste.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression (pārājika-class offense), while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the common people (śūdra) and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the common people — the venerable one ought to practice his own proper occupation, which is this: weaving and carrying loads on the shoulders, and whatever other occupations belong to the common people.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the rope-makers and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the rope-makers — the venerable one should do his own work with loom-frames, thread, dye, pins, and combs, and whatever other occupations belong to the needle-workers.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the weavers and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you,

'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the weavers — the venerable one should do his own work with needles, thread, knives, thimbles, and scissors, and whatever other occupations belong to them.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the blacksmiths and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the blacksmiths — the venerable one should do his own work with bellows, bellows-tubes, tongs, dried fuel, and hammers, and whatever other occupations belong to them.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the metal-beaters and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the metal-beaters — the venerable one should do his own work with bellows, bellows-tubes, tongs, dried fuel, and hammers, and whatever other occupations belong to them.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

